

Northern Ireland Assembly

OFFICIAL REPORT
(Hansard)
and
JOURNAL OF PROCEEDINGS

Volume 133

(16 November 2020 to 13 December 2020)

Table of Contents

Assembly Members	vii
Principal Officers and Officials of the Assembly	viii
Ministerial Offices	ix
Office of the Official Report (Hansard).....	x

Official Report (Hansard)

Assembly Sittings

Monday 16 November 2020

Ministerial Statements

North/South Ministerial Council: Environment	1
North/South Ministerial Council: Aquaculture and Marine.....	6

Executive Committee Business

Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill: Second Stage	10
--	----

Oral Answers to Questions

The Executive Office	16
Infrastructure	22

Ministerial Statement

COVID-19: Executive Decisions on 12 November 2020.....	29
--	----

Questions for Urgent Oral Answer

Health	37
Flu Vaccinations	37
COVID-19: Surge Planning	41
COVID-19 Business Support Scheme	45

Assembly Business	49
--------------------------------	----

Executive Committee Business

Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill: Second Stage	49
--	----

Private Members' Business

Ammonia Levels in Northern Ireland	61
--	----

Tuesday 17 November 2020

Ministerial Statements

COVID-19: Self-isolation Payment Update	75
North/South Ministerial Council: Special EU Programmes	79
British-Irish Council: Environment.....	82
Basic Payment Scheme Simplifications and the Direction of Travel for Future Agricultural Policy in Northern Ireland, including Support Payments	85

Oral Answers to Questions

Justice	92
Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	99

Executive Committee Business

Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill: Consideration Stage.....	105
--	-----

Monday 23 November 2020

Assembly Business

New Assembly Member: Ms Nicola Brogan193

Speaker's Business193

Ministerial Statements

Health: COVID-19 Decisions194

Finance: 2020-21 November COVID-19 Funding202

Oral Answers to Questions

Communities209

Economy215

Executive Committee Business

Harbours (Grants and Loans Limit) Bill: First Stage221

Committee Business

Committee for the Economy: Energy Strategy Report221

Assembly Business

Suspension of Standing Order 10(3A)233

Committee Business

Health: Impact of COVID-19 Pandemic233

Tuesday 24 November 2020

Ministerial Statement

Urology: Southern Health and Social Care Trust249

Private Members' Business

Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill: Consideration Stage255

Oral Answers to Questions

Education267

Finance273

Private Members' Business

Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill: Consideration Stage (continued)281

Adjournment351

Monday 30 November 2020

Assembly Business

Budget (No. 3) Bill: Royal Assent353

Committee Membership353

Ministerial Statement

NSMC: Languages Sectoral Format353

Executive Committee Business

Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 11) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020356

Oral Answers to Questions

The Executive Office368

Health375

Executive Committee Business

Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 11) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020 (continued)382

Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 12) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020384

Health Protection (Coronavirus, Wearing of Face Coverings) (Amendment No. 3) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020385

Medicines and Medical Devices Bill: Legislative Consent Motion385

Committee Business

Licensing and Registration of Clubs (Amendment) Bill: Extension of Committee Stage394

Tuesday 1 December 2020

Matter of the Day

Public Inquiry into the Murder of Human Rights Solicitor Pat Finucane	397
---	-----

Ministerial Statement

The Procurement Board	400
-----------------------------	-----

Executive Committee Business

The Harbours (Grants and Loans Limit) Bill: Accelerated Passage	406
---	-----

The Harbours (Grants and Loans Limit) Bill: Second Stage	409
--	-----

Oral Answers to Questions

Infrastructure	415
----------------------	-----

Justice	421
---------------	-----

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Economy.....	429
--------------	-----

Collapse of the Retailers Debenhams and Arcadia	429
---	-----

Private Members' Business

COVID-19 Vaccine: Preparations	432
--------------------------------------	-----

Monday 7 December 2020

Assembly Business	445
--------------------------------	-----

Ministerial Statements

Intergovernmental Agreement on Criminal Justice Cooperation.....	445
--	-----

North/South Ministerial Council: Inland Waterways	451
---	-----

Executive Committee Business

The Administration of Estates (Small Payments) (Increase of Limit) Order (Northern Ireland) 2020	455
--	-----

Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill: Further Consideration Stage	457
---	-----

Oral Answers to Questions

Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	459
--	-----

Communities	464
-------------------	-----

Tuesday 8 December 2020

Assembly Business	473
--------------------------------	-----

Executive Committee Business

The draft Marketing of Plant and Propagating Material (Legislative Functions) (Amendment) (EU Exit) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020	474
---	-----

The draft Plant Health and Diseases of Animals (Amendment) (EU Exit) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020	476
--	-----

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 13) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020	482
--	-----

Oral Answers to Questions

Economy.....	490
--------------	-----

Education	495
-----------------	-----

Northern Ireland Assembly Commission	502
--	-----

Executive Committee Business

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 13) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020 (continued).....	507
--	-----

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Wearing of Face Coverings) (Amendment No. 4) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020.....	523
---	-----

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 14) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020.....	523
---	-----

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 15) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020.....	523
---	-----

The Health Protection (Coronavirus, Restrictions) (No. 2) (Amendment No. 16) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2020.....	523
---	-----

Committee Business

Macro Economic Outlook Micro Inquiry Special Report	524
---	-----

Written Ministerial Statements

Department for the Economy

£1.65M Broadband Improvement Contract Awarded to Fibrus Networks Ltd..... WMS 1

Department of Health

COVID-19 Decisions..... WMS 2

Department of Health

COVID-19: Update WMS 2

The Executive Office

Appointment of Interim Head of the Civil Service..... WMS 3

Department of Finance

BUDGET 2021-22: Funding Available..... WMS 4

Department of Health

COVID-19 Vaccine..... WMS 5

Executive Office

Decisions of the Executive on COVID-19, 3 December 2020 WMS 5

Department for Communities

Additional Support for Vulnerable People Over the Christmas Period..... WMS 7

Written Answers

Friday 20 November 2020

The Executive Office WA 1

Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs WA 1

Department for Communities WA 8

Department of Education WA 24

Department of Finance WA 30

Department of Health WA 34

Department for Infrastructure WA 61

Department of Justice WA 78

Department for the Economy..... WA 88

Northern Ireland Assembly Commission WA 91

Friday 27 November 2020

The Executive Office WA 95

Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs WA 97

Department for Communities WA 110

Department of Education WA 117

Department of Finance WA 127

Department of Health WA 135

Department for Infrastructure WA 155

Department of Finance and the Department for the Economy WA 181

Department of Justice WA 181

Department for the Economy..... WA 187

Northern Ireland Assembly Commission WA 193

Friday 4 December 2020

The Executive Office	WA 195
Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	WA 198
Department of Education	WA 240
Public Health Agency and the Department of Health.....	WA 248
Department of Finance	WA 257
Department of Health	WA 262
Department for Infrastructure.....	WA 289
Department of Justice	WA 305
Department for the Economy.....	WA 311
Northern Ireland Assembly Commission	WA 335

Friday 11 December 2020

The Executive Office	WA 337
Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	WA 338
Department for Communities	WA 341
Department of Education	WA 367
Department of Finance	WA 376
Department of Health	WA 381
Department for Infrastructure.....	WA 407
Department of Justice	WA 414
Department for the Economy.....	WA 419

Revised Written Answers

Friday 27 November 2020

Department of Justice	RWA 1
Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	RWA 1

Journal of Proceedings

Minutes of Proceedings

Monday 16 November 2020.....	MOP 1
Tuesday 17 November 2020	MOP 7
Monday 23 November 2020.....	MOP 17
Tuesday 24 November 2020	MOP 23
Monday 30 November 2020.....	MOP 43
Tuesday 1 December 2020	MOP 49
Monday 7 December 2020	MOP 55
Tuesday 8 December 2020	MOP 61

Assembly Members

A

Aiken, Steve (South Antrim)
Allen, Andy (East Belfast)
Allister, Jim (North Antrim)
Anderson, Ms Martina (Foyle)
Archibald, Dr Caoimhe (East Londonderry)
Armstrong, Ms Kellie (Strangford)

B

Bailey, Ms Clare (South Belfast)
Barton, Mrs Rosemary (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Beattie, Doug (Upper Bann)
Beggs, Roy (East Antrim)
Blair, John (South Antrim)
Boylan, Cathal (Newry and Armagh)
Bradley, Maurice (East Londonderry)
Bradley, Ms Paula (North Belfast)
Bradley, Ms Sinéad (South Down)
Bradshaw, Ms Paula (South Belfast)
Brogan, Ms Nicola (West Tyrone) (from 23 November 2021)
Buchanan, Keith (Mid Ulster)
Buchanan, Thomas (West Tyrone)
Buckley, Jonathan (Upper Bann)
Bunting, Ms Joanne (East Belfast)
Butler, Robbie (Lagan Valley)

C

Cameron, Mrs Pam (South Antrim)
Carroll, Gerry (West Belfast)
Catney, Pat (Lagan Valley)
Chambers, Alan (North Down)
Clarke, Trevor (South Antrim)

D

Dickson, Stewart (East Antrim)
Dillon, Ms Linda (Mid Ulster)
Dodds, Mrs Diane (Upper Bann)
Dolan, Ms Jemma (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Dunne, Gordon (North Down)
Durkan, Mark (Foyle)

E

Easton, Alex (North Down)
Ennis, Ms Sinéad (South Down)

F

Flynn, Ms Órlaithí (West Belfast)
Foster, Mrs Arlene (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Frew, Paul (North Antrim)

G

Gildernew, Colm (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Givan, Paul (Lagan Valley)

H

Hargey, Ms Deirdre (South Belfast)
Harvey, Harry (Strangford)
Hilditch, David (East Antrim)
Humphrey, William (North Belfast)
Hunter, Ms Cara (East Londonderry)

I

Irwin, William (Newry and Armagh)

K

Kearney, Declan (South Antrim)
Kelly, Mrs Dolores (Upper Bann)
Kelly, Gerry (North Belfast)
Kimmins, Ms Liz (Newry and Armagh)

L

Long, Mrs Naomi (East Belfast)
Lunn, Trevor (Lagan Valley)
Lynch, Seán (Fermanagh and South Tyrone)
Lyons, Gordon (East Antrim)
Lyttle, Chris (East Belfast)

M

McAleer, Declan (West Tyrone)
McCann, Fra (West Belfast)
McCrossan, Daniel (West Tyrone)
McGlone, Patsy (Mid Ulster)
McGrath, Colin (South Down)
McGuigan, Philip (North Antrim)
McHugh, Maoliosa (West Tyrone)
McIlveen, Miss Michelle (Strangford)
McLaughlin, Ms Sinead (Foyle)
McNulty, Justin (Newry and Armagh)
Mallon, Ms Nichola (North Belfast)
Maskey, Alex (West Belfast)
Middleton, Gary (Foyle)
Muir, Andrew (North Down)
Mullan, Ms Karen (Foyle)
Murphy, Conor (Newry and Armagh)

N

Nesbitt, Mike (Strangford)
Newton, Robin (Speaker)
Ní Chuilín, Ms Carál (North Belfast)

O

O'Dowd, John (Upper Bann)
O'Neill, Mrs Michelle (Mid Ulster)
O'Toole, Matthew (South Belfast)

P

Poots, Edwin (Lagan Valley)

R

Robinson, George (East Londonderry)
Rogan, Ms Emma (South Down)

S

Sheehan, Pat (West Belfast)
Sheerin, Ms Emma (Mid Ulster)
Stalford, Christopher (South Belfast)
Stewart, John (East Antrim)
Storey, Mervyn (North Antrim)
Sugden, Ms Claire (East Londonderry)
Swann, Robin (North Antrim)

W

Weir, Peter (Strangford)
Wells, Jim (South Down)
Woods, Miss Rachel (North Down)

Principal Officers and Officials of the Assembly

Speaker	Mr Alex Maskey MLA
Principal Deputy Speaker	Mr Christopher Stalford MLA
Deputy Speakers	Mr Roy Beggs MLA Mr Patsy McGlone MLA
Clerk to the Assembly/Chief Executive	Mrs Lesley Hogg
Director of Corporate Services	Mr Richard Stewart
Director of Legal, Governance and Research Services	Ms Tara Caul
Director of Parliamentary Services	Dr Gareth McGrath
Adviser to the Speaker/Head of Corporate Support	Mr Robin Ramsey
Clerk Assistants	Dr Kevin Pelan Dr Frank Geddis Mr Paul Gill
Editor of Debates and Head of Public Engagement	Mr Simon Burrowes
Examiner of Statutory Rules	Ms Angela Kelly

Ministerial Offices

The Executive Committee

First Minister	Mrs Arlene Foster
Deputy First Minister.....	Mrs Michelle O’Neill
Minister for Communities.....	Ms Cáral Ní Chuilín
Minister for Infrastructure.....	Ms Nichola Mallon
Minister for the Economy.....	Mrs Diane Dodds
Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs	Mr Edwin Poots
Minister of Education	Mr Peter Weir
Minister of Finance	Mr Conor Murphy
Minister of Health.....	Mr Robin Swann
Minister of Justice.....	Mrs Naomi Long

Junior Ministers

The Executive Office	Mr Declan Kearney Mr Gordon Lyons
----------------------------	--------------------------------------

Office of the Official Report (Hansard)

Staff

Editor of Debates..... Simon Burrowes

Deputy Editors..... Martha Davison
Patrick Marsh

Assistant Editors..... Bronagh Allison
Tom Clarke
Brendan Doherty
Phil Girvan
Gail Nicholl
Catherine Roberts
Carina Rourke
Alison Webb

Parliamentary Reporters..... Brian Cassidy
Colin Close
Glenn Frazer
Luke Gibbons
Keith Gilmore
Linda Hare
Sharon McCabe
Shauna McCloskey
Rosie McDonald
Colm McNamee
Katrina McNeill
Nicola Murphy
Fintan Murray
Patrick O’Hanlon
Rónan O’Reilly
Simon Shaw
Jack Smith
Philip Wilson

Administration..... Conor McCourt

Official Report (Hansard)

Assembly Sittings

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 16 November 2020

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Ministerial Statements

North/South Ministerial Council: Environment

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs that he wishes to make a statement. Before I call the Minister, I remind Members that, in the light of social distancing being observed by parties, the Speaker's ruling that Members must be in the Chamber to hear a statement if they wish to ask a question has been relaxed. Members do still have to make sure that their name is on the speaking list if they wish to be called, but they can do that by rising in their place, as well as by notifying the Business Office or Speaker's Table directly. I remind Members to be concise in asking their questions. This is not an opportunity for debate per se, and Members should not engage in long introductions.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): Thank you, Mr Speaker. In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following statement on the twenty-third meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in environment sectoral format, which was held in Armagh and by videoconference on Wednesday, 21 October 2020. The statement has been agreed with junior Minister Kearney.

Junior Minister Kearney and I represented the Northern Ireland Executive at the meeting. I chaired the meeting. The Irish Government were represented by Eamon Ryan TD, Minister for the Environment, Climate and Communications, and Darragh O'Brien TD, Minister for Housing, Local Government and Heritage.

The Council noted the work that is being carried out to prepare for the end of the transition period and the need for continued cooperation on environmental matters, including those of a cross-border nature. Ministers agreed to continue to cooperate on environmental issues in coming months. They recognise that it is in the common interest of both jurisdictions to work together to minimise disruption to trade and economic activity on the island.

Ministers welcomed the continuing cooperation on, and draw down for, the main sources of EU funding in the environment sector — INTERREG Va, LIFE and Horizon 2020 — including successful delivery of Northern Ireland and Ireland partnership projects and ongoing collaboration through joint meetings, training and information events. We noted that, under the INTERREG Va environment objective, nine cross-border projects were awarded funding totalling €89 million in the 2014-2020 programme period, and collaboration is ongoing to maximise draw down of the available EU moneys and to continue to implement the programmes as agreed.

Ministers noted the commitment to funding INTERREG Va after the UK withdraws from the EU, allowing the projects to be continued until their conclusion in 2023, and that, under Horizon 2020 societal challenge 5, two North/South collaborations on low temperature anaerobic digestion treatment of low-strength waste waters and photo-irradiation and absorption-based novel innovations for waste treatment were successful and contributed to the drawdown figures, with €2.5 million being shared by five organisations in Ireland and €0.55 million shared between two organisations in Northern Ireland.

The Council noted that benefits for joint environmental priorities from a small number of LIFE projects have been achieved through ongoing collaboration between Departments, agencies and partnerships operating in both jurisdictions. Ministers also noted the potential to build on the success of the INTERREG projects through access to the new PEACE PLUS programme 2021-27 and its environment policy objective of achieving a greener, low-carbon Europe.

Ministers noted the ongoing collaboration between officials in both jurisdictions and submission of joint position papers focusing on a range of holistic clean air, water catchment and nature based solutions to address future pressures from climate change, support sustainable economic recovery and protect the environment to inform emerging PEACE PLUS themes.

The NSMC noted that the work programme will be kept under review at future NSMC environment sector meetings, having regard to particular matters arising from the outcome of the UK referendum on EU membership. Ministers agreed that, within the work programme, consideration should continue to be given to opportunities for cooperation on wider environmental issues, such as sustainable development; encouraging cooperation and knowledge sharing in relation to the environmental impact of agricultural activities and related issues; cooperation and exchange of information on marine, bathing and shellfish waters; cooperation and collaboration on water and urban waste water services areas, including implementation of EU measures; the promotion of a circular economy; a joint programme of enforcement and collaboration on tackling environmental crime; and cooperation with a view to maximising draw down of EU funding. We also agreed the proposed updated work programme.

The NSMC noted that both Environment Ministers are continuing to work together to target resources into joint enforcement action against those involved in illegal waste activity, including the continued exchange of intelligence and information on problem areas and the continuation of coordinated joint inspections.

Ministers noted the efforts of both Administrations to increase the quantity and quality of recycling, including the publication, on 4 September 2020, of Ireland's national waste policy 2020-25, 'A Waste Action Plan for a Circular Economy', the publication of the new Northern Ireland waste prevention programme, 'Stopping Waste in its Tracks', and the associated actions and successes.

We also noted the ongoing work in Northern Ireland to tackle plastic pollution, the success of the extended producer responsibility schemes in Ireland and the opportunities for both Administrations to share examples of good practice in this area.

The NSMC welcomed the work being undertaken in both jurisdictions to further a clean air strategy and the collaboration between officials working together to identify cross-border research opportunities and develop proposals.

Ministers noted the publication of the second-cycle river basin management plan for Ireland in 2018 and welcomed the ongoing preparation of the third-cycle river basin management plans in Ireland and Northern Ireland. We noted that the public consultation on significant water management issues closed in Northern Ireland on 22 June 2020 and, in Ireland, on 7 August 2020. We acknowledged the continued support for the Rivers Trust in cross-border areas, and we welcomed the level of beach awards in both jurisdictions for 2020 and the continued coordination on the Clean Coasts and Coast Care schemes.

Ministers acknowledged the engagement of both Administrations in the work of the advisory group for Ireland's marine protected areas, the final report of which is expected shortly, and noted the continuing engagement between the Department for Infrastructure, the Department of Housing, Local Government and Heritage, Irish Water and Northern Ireland Water on exploring opportunities for cooperation, including applications to access funding under the EU's new PEACE PLUS programme.

The Council agreed to hold the next environment meeting in early 2021. Ministers agreed the joint communiqué.

Mr Irwin: What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that the Republic of Ireland moves to repatriate illegal waste from the Republic of Ireland that has been dumped in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: Eamon Ryan was the Environment Minister back in 2009 when I was also Minister. An agreement was drawn up then whereby waste that was illegally tipped on 20 sites in Northern Ireland, emanating from the Republic of Ireland, would be repatriated. It is my understanding that around only half of those sites have been cleared. That leaves around 100,000 cubic tons of illegally tipped waste in Northern Ireland on sites that have not been secured. Consequently, I have raised the issue again and asked why it has not happened. The reason given is that they have capacity issues in taking the waste. However, I do not find that acceptable. I will continue to work to ensure that that work, which has been let go by the by in spite of an agreement, is taken up again and that the material on those waste sites is removed and taken back to the Republic of Ireland.

Mr McHugh: I note the Minister's commitment to cooperation on environmental matters. I am sure he is aware of the recent news of a major bog slippage in the Tyrone/Donagel border at the Meenbog wind farm. That has impacted on the Mourne Beg river — a major tributary to the Derg river, which is a renowned salmon watercourse. What work will the Minister do to ensure that we have the cooperation of the authorities on both sides of the border to minimise the impact of that bog slippage on fauna, flora and the fish stocks of the Mourne Beg river?

Mr Poots: The Loughs Agency, which is a cross-border body, has been engaging in investigations since that slippage occurred, as has the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA). I watched a video of the slippage: it was astonishing to see the amount of material moving slowly but inexorably. Donegal County Council has organised a meeting for today. My officials will be in attendance, as it is an issue that has a material impact on both sides of the border. It is clear that the rivers have been affected by large amounts of peaty soils coming into them. At this stage, oxygen levels in the rivers are still high, which is good, but fish gills can become contaminated with high levels of peat, and they can die from that. Small levels of fish kill have been identified at this stage, but that does not mean that that will be the case. Given the amount of peat and so forth in the water and the high levels of water, it is not particularly easy to identify the issues, but all of those things will be investigated in due course. We will continue to work with the authorities in the Republic of Ireland on that matter.

Mr McGlone: In the Minister's statement, heavy emphasis is placed on the exchange of and cooperation on information on marine bathing waters, rivers and the like. What cooperation has there been on the strain of COVID that has been identified in mink in Denmark. As we know, mink inhabit our waterways and rivers. Has there been collaboration between both Departments?

12.15 pm

Mr Poots: We suspect that the problem is less of an issue with wild mink because they do not come into contact with humans; in general, the problem is with farmed mink. There are three mink farms in the Irish Republic. There have not been any here since 2002 because the keeping of mink for fur was banned, but that practice has continued in Ireland. I believe that those three mink farms will be run down over the next year. It is a matter for the health authorities in the Republic of Ireland to keep a close eye on that circumstance.

I believe that there are 17 million mink in Denmark. The original plan was to have an immediate slaughter of them all, but I do not think that that is now the case. It is an issue of significant concern because a lot of effort and money has been expended on developing vaccines. We know that one is virtually ready to go and that another one will come very shortly afterwards. It would be of significant concern if a mutation of COVID happened through the mink and, consequently, those vaccines were not fit for purpose. Any country that has mink farms needs to act very responsibly in that regard at the moment. My preference is that mink farms would cease to exist.

Mrs Barton: Minister, thank you very much for your statement. What cooperation is there on cross-border fly-tipping, particularly from homes in border areas? Much waste from homes is dumped in Northern Ireland because there is an expense involved in having that waste collected from homes in the Republic.

Mr Poots: The Member puts her finger on a problem that emanates more from the Republic of Ireland than here. One of the benefits of our rating system is that people have their waste collected. The issue of fly-tipping arises but not to the same extent. It is for local authorities, in the first instance, to deal with fly-tipping. We have a level of cross-border cooperation on issues around waste in general, and we will press hard to ensure that as much information as possible flows to each side so that the people involved in the illegal tipping of waste are caught and prosecuted for their activities.

Mr Blair: I also thank the Minister for the statement and the detail therein, including the reassuring cooperation envisaged on marine waters, as well as the joint programme of enforcement and collaboration on environmental crime. In that regard, how will the proposed Office for Environmental Protection, which will have only one Northern Ireland representative, be able to play a part in intergovernmental arrangements that are already making progress here?

Mr Poots: The Office for Environmental Protection will deliver on the same standards that currently exist under the EU and are monitored by the European Commission. Therefore, the standards that exist in the Republic of Ireland will be the same standards as exist in the United Kingdom until the United Kingdom makes legislation that may produce different standards. Those standards could be higher or lower, but that is a matter to be debated by the UK Parliament or, indeed, the Assembly, should we wish to change them. At the moment, the standards will be the same, and the Office for Environmental Protection will have a role to ensure that the standards that have been set are implemented right across the United Kingdom after it leaves the European Union.

Mr Harvey: We are back to waste: what commitments have been made to ensure that greater enforcement measures are put in place to stop illegal waste practices?

Mr Poots: Clearly, there is a series of rules relating to waste, the tipping of waste and illegal management of waste. It is a matter for the courts to decide how they use the fine process that is available. There are substantial opportunities to fine individuals who are involved in the illegal management of waste. We all know that there is substantial money to be made in the illegal management of waste. Our Department has a “polluter pays” principle, so we will ensure that people who are caught dealing with illegal management of waste pay for all of the costs associated with disposing of it properly. There is a series of measures, but I accept that those measures may be made be stronger because people are still involved in this. So, whether it is through greater enforcement or whether it is through strengthening the fines that are imposed, we need to ensure that what is done is enough to put people off engaging in this activity.

Mr McGuigan: Given the recent discovery of two birds, a swan in Derry and a falcon in Limerick, with bird flu, what are the contingency plans in the Department here in the North in the event of an outbreak of bird flu? What is the level of cooperation across the island to monitor the situation?

Mr Poots: It is very concerning. There have been a couple of outbreaks in England. Obviously, there is the one in Limerick and the mute swan that was picked up in Lough Beg. That is a matter of significant concern to us, because the poultry industry in Northern Ireland is worth around £900 million. It employs directly 5,500 people, so it is an industry that is hugely important to us.

Every keeper of birds is supposed to register with DAERA — even if there are only two or three chickens scratching about in your back garden, they are supposed to be registered. DAERA has a website set up that identifies how best to manage biosecurity arrangements. DAERA has been escalating, through the veterinary section, its response. We are not at the point yet where birds should be closed up, but, nonetheless, we are pressing and impressing upon people the need to take all of the biosecurity steps that they should and we have been very clearly indicating what those biosecurity measures are. Fundamentally, the most important thing that a chicken farmer or any keeper of poultry can do at this minute is to manage their biosecurity particularly well. If we believe that we need to move to that next stage of closing up free range birds, we will recommend that step in the not-too-distant future, if that is required.

Mr M Bradley: I thank the Minister for his statement. He referred to the implications of withdrawal from the EU and preparations for the end of the transition period, but what are the implications for Northern Ireland if there are no preparations ready to hit the ground running come the end of the transition period?

Mr Poots: I assure the Member that there has been a lot of preparation. Sometimes, it is a little difficult to prepare for something when you do not know what you are preparing for, so the conclusion of the negotiation is absolutely critical. I believe that the aim is that that will take place this week, but there are still outstanding issues, particularly on state aid and on fisheries. Those are the two issues that seem to be preventing a trade deal at this stage.

For Northern Ireland, there are particular areas of concern that arise through the implementation of the protocol. First is seeds that are imported to Northern Ireland, mainly from Scotland. In fact, the issue is of seeds imported to all of Ireland, mainly from Scotland. That is around 90% of seed used. That importation is currently a problem as a result of the protocol.

There is another group called PMR. That relates to minced beef and processed meats and accounts for up to 30,000 tons of meat imported into Northern Ireland every year. As things stand, that would stop immediately on 1 January, so it is not even a matter of having an export health certificate — you just do not import it, full stop. So, for example, there would be no lasagnes in Iceland. In fact, many of the products that you get in our shops would no longer be available and the shelves would be empty. That is purely a matter for the European Union.

I will add further that the importation of red meat amounts to around one quarter of a billion pounds per year. Indeed, a considerable amount of chicken — white meat — is imported to Northern Ireland, processed in Northern Ireland and, in the main, goes back to GB. There are issues around that. Those issues really need to be sorted this week, and we need to get solutions.

It has to be stressed that it is not about damaging the single market or reducing the quality of things in the single market, but it will be hugely detrimental and have serious implications for Northern Ireland, both at a consumer and a business level, if we cannot get those issues resolved. The Executive are aware of the issues, and they have mandated me to write on their behalf to the European Union to impress the need to get those matters resolved to everybody's satisfaction.

Mr McAleer (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): In paragraph 9 of the Minister's statement, he refers to the importance of clean air. Will he update us on whether any progress has been made on developing a clean air strategy discussion document for here and, indeed, on a cross-border basis?

Mr Poots: We discussed clean air and where cooperation could take place. We intend to bring to the Assembly this year the clean air discussion document that we are working on. It will go out to the public so that we can have a consultation process on clean air, which is a very important matter, particularly for those who live in cities.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for his statement. It refers to greater cross-border work on increasing water quality. In that regard, such collaboration will be absolutely essential in investigating and mitigating the environmental damage caused by the peat landslide that the Minister referred to at Meenbog, which has caused contamination of the Mourne Beg river and the local waterways.

I visited yesterday with councillor Steven Edwards, and there is clear anxiety amongst my constituents in Killeter, Aghyaran, Castlederg and Ardstraw. Will the Minister outline what action his Department has taken to reassure the public in that area that his Department is doing everything possible to mitigate contamination of those waterways? Does he know the root cause of the slippage problem?

Mr Poots: On 13 November, at around 1.30 pm, NIEA was informed of a landslide at a peat bog adjacent to the Mourne Beg river in Donegal. NIEA contacted Northern Ireland Water and the Loughs Agency regarding the event. In response, Northern Ireland Water shut down its intake of raw water from the River Derg as a precaution. As the incident occurred on the southern side of the border, the investigation and initial response to the event was the responsibility of the Loughs Agency. It has been on site investigating the matter.

NIEA tasked a water quality inspector to assess the impact on the Mourne Beg and Derg rivers on Saturday morning. The initial assessment showed that the oxygen levels have not been suppressed but that the high levels of suspended solids were affecting aquatic life, including a fish farm business. Loughs Agency is working with the owners to mitigate the impact, including the deployment of aerators.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for his statement. I would be grateful if the Minister could provide some further detail on the LIFE projects referred to in paragraph 7.

12.30 pm

Mr Poots: A number of the LIFE projects that we mentioned have taken place. They have been achieved through work done by Departments, agencies and their partnerships operating in both jurisdictions. The LIFE projects have environmental priorities. There are a small number of them. I will write to the Member to give him the detail of the projects so that he can get fully updated on them.

Dr Archibald: I thank the Minister for his statement. He will be well aware that ammonia emissions are a particular issue here not just in the North but across the island. There will be a debate on the issue later this afternoon. Work has been going on to inform an ammonia strategy. When can we expect publication of the draft strategy?

Mr Poots: It is at the latter stages of preparation and will be produced before the end of this year. Ammonia is an area of significant concern for us. We know that most ammonia is produced on farms. A course of actions therefore needs to be taken to reduce ammonia levels as we continue to increase our agricultural output. It is important that we support the industry to increase its output but that that be done in a way that is less harmful to the environment. One of the things that we want to do is to ensure that, over the next number of years, ammonia outputs on farms are reduced, and there are ways and means of doing that. One of those means is through low-emission spreading equipment. We recently launched a grant that will support a number of things, but the priorities are that people will get additional points for having such equipment, for covering tanks, for better separation of slurry and for slurry scraping. We are already working on a series of measures that will help reduce ammonia emissions. If I get more funding, there is the opportunity to make a much more significant reduction in ammonia emissions, so that is an area of work that we will continue to impress on the industry.

Ms Sheerin: I thank the Minister for his statement. Minister, can you provide an update on the joint programme of cross-border collaboration and enforcement to tackle environmental crime?

Mr Poots: At our meeting, Ministers agreed to continued cooperation in five key areas of mutual benefit and future development potential: environmental research and reporting; environmental protection and sustainable development; water and waste water management; waste management in a cross-border context; and EU funding. In all those areas, we are encouraging sustainable development; cooperation sharing; cooperation and exchange of information on marine issues; cooperation and collaboration on water and waste water service areas; the promotion of a circular economy; a joint programme of enforcement and collaboration on tackling environmental crime; and cooperation with a view to maximising drawdown of EU funding. Environmental crime is therefore very much a key area within those areas of cooperation.

Mr O'Toole: Minister, thank you for your statement. It contains an update on EU funding, including existing INTERREG funding and, looking ahead, Horizon 2020 funding. What it does not mention, however — it would be good to get your thoughts on this, Minister — is the European green deal, which is an enormous, multi-year plan of investment by the European Union to transition to a lower-carbon economy. Given that, for example, large parts of Northern Ireland's energy generation sector will remain in the EU emissions scheme and given some of the potential benefits from the protocol, notwithstanding the issues that he described earlier, can the Minister ask his officials to work with officials on the other side of the border on looking at potential benefits for Northern Ireland projects from what could be a £20 billion-plus Just Transition Fund (JTF) for green transition. That is something from which we might be able to benefit. I ask the Minister really to look at the European green deal and figure out how Northern Ireland could benefit from it.

Mr Poots: Some funding continues, despite the fact that the UK has left the European Union, and it will certainly go on until 2023, as set out in the statement.

The ETS is a scheme into which we pay very heavily, at close to £60 million a year. A new scheme will be set up for the UK, but, under that, only around 18% of our payments will go to the UK scheme, with 82% going to the EU. Over the years we have never drawn down any money from the ETS because of its three project per country rule. Given that the UK is quite a large country, ETS has not benefited Northern Ireland.

We are asking whether Northern Ireland will have the status of being a country in this instance because Northern Ireland remains part of the ETS outside of the UK. That would allow us to bid for three schemes per year, and that would be hugely progressive. However, thus far, we have not had the benefits from the emissions trading scheme that I would like to have seen. Northern Ireland has many wonderful opportunities in hydrogen and in how we can better manage and capture carbon and so forth. It would be good if the EU allowed Northern Ireland the status of being its own country and consequently we were able to draw money from the scheme.

Mr Lynch: I thank the Minister for his statement. What assurances can he offer to the many organisations who have contacted me and other MLAs regarding the replacement of lost EU funding as we come to the end of the transition period?

Mr Poots: There has been a rollover of funding by the UK Government. Therefore, the funding that is currently in place for the environmental sector continues to be in place as we go forward.

Ms Bailey: Thank you to the Minister for the statements and for bringing them forward in a timely manner. That was much appreciated.

Members have asked about enforcement, but I want to go further, Minister. What discussion has there been around how we deal post transition with trans-boundary environmental breaches under existing EU directives? Ammonia, for example, was brought up, but it is certainly not the only issue. We know that we are not meeting our EU directive targets for ammonia. That is not the farmers' fault; it is certainly not the chickens' fault. It is the result of policies. How will we meet those targets post transition across the island?

Mr Poots: There is a series of issues in and around the environment. The UK Government have set out their policy of being carbon-neutral by 2050. That sets significant challenges. You will not achieve carbon neutrality without significant investment, and that is just a reality. People need to put their money where their mouths are when it comes to the environment. One of the things that I will raise at Executive level is how all our Departments will pull together to achieve carbon neutrality by 2050 and what investment is required to achieve that. For example, agriculture, energy and transport account for around 70% of emissions. Consequently, we need significant investment in those areas. Energy has demonstrated that there has been significant reductions in its carbon. We are looking at about 40% to 45% of our energy coming from renewable sources now. However, some of that energy is not appropriately captured, so we need to ensure that we have the capacity to capture all the energy produced.

COVID-19 has demonstrated that people do not need to travel as much. Those of us who were on the roads this morning will have noticed the considerable reduction in the number of vehicles on the roads, and, driving past them, you will have noticed the substantial reduction in the number of vehicles in our government car parks. There are opportunities to do more work from home. We can also use electric cars, as well as cars that are more fuel-efficient. My only caveat with electric cars is how they and the materials involved in their production are used at the end of life, so that there is no other kind of environmental damage done as a consequence of that. However, there are opportunities in transport.

Agriculture is a huge issue, particularly for Northern Ireland, as it produces more than 10% of the food produced in the entire United Kingdom. How do we manage that in a way that reduces emissions? We spoke about ammonia. I want to look at issues around nitrogen and phosphates and how we can better manage the materials and nutrients excreted so that they can be used for something other than slurry that is applied to land. That will involve investment. There is a series of things.

I am happy to cooperate with people in similar areas to ourselves, be that in other parts of the United Kingdom or in the Republic of Ireland, because, ultimately, all of us have similar problems, and so our responses will be similar. The research that will allow us to take the appropriate steps in environmental management is research that I am happy to support, and I am happy to cooperate with colleagues in the Republic of Ireland, Scotland, England or Wales to identify solutions that we can all apply in delivering a better environmental outcome.

Mr Allister: Can I take the Minister back to the INTERREG Va programme? Now that we have left the EU, would the Minister remind the House of the funding formula for INTERREG Va? Would he also remind the House of the match funding aspect, with an indication of what it will cost the public purse in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: I do not have the match funding figures required under INTERREG Va to hand. However, we have been able to fund about €89 million worth of projects over the past six years, and we will continue to be able to access EU money. Significant amounts of money have been spent directly into Northern Ireland, some on cross-border projects. We have been net receivers, as opposed to givers, of that income, and I regard that as positive. We will continue to work to secure as much of that funding as possible for the environmental benefit.

Mr Carroll: In relation to environmental protection, can I ask whether Ministers discussed measures to keep fossil fuels in the ground? My party colleague, Bríd Smith TD, brought a proposal to take such measures in the South, but it was guillotined by a previous Government. Was there any discussion about legislation or policies and proposals to ensure that fossil fuels are kept in the ground?

Mr Poots: No such discussion took place. Of course, keeping fossil fuels in the ground may be appropriate when you have fully identified alternatives to fossil fuels. Sometimes I wonder at people objecting to extracting fossil fuels closer to home when we import fossil fuels from regions that are deeply unstable and use the money that they gain from fossil fuels to engage in wars, whether they be cyberwars or wars involving traditional weapons.

Not utilising fossil fuels closer to home is not necessarily something that is good for the environment, but it can be very good for people who do not care about the environment and human rights, and that is something that is of concern to all of us.

12.45 pm

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions on the statement. I ask Members to take their ease for a moment or two, please.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

North/South Ministerial Council: Aquaculture and Marine

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs that he wishes to make another statement.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make a statement regarding the thirteenth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in the aquaculture and marine sector. This was held on Wednesday 21 October. Due to the current COVID restrictions, the meeting was conducted via videoconference. The Executive were represented by Minister Nichola Mallon, as accompanying Minister, and me. The Irish Government were represented by Mr Eamon Ryan TD, the Minister for the Environment, Climate and Communications, who chaired the meeting. The statement has been agreed with Minister Mallon, and I make it on behalf of us both.

Ministers welcomed the report on the activities of the Loughs Agency, including the ongoing conservation and protection efforts, and noted in particular the Loughs Agency's response to COVID-19; the Loughs Agency's strategic direction for a new decade 2020-2030; the collaborative work and delivery of a number of conservation, angling and marine tourism projects; and the success of the Foyle and Carlingford ambassador programme. The Council also welcomed the Loughs Agency's continued investment in a scientific fisheries monitoring programme.

The Council agreed that the Loughs Agency, the Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs and the Department of the Environment, Climate and Communications will continue to work together to consider the impact of the UK's withdrawal from the EU. Ministers agreed that the matter will be kept under review at future NSMC meetings in the sector.

The Council approved the Loughs Agency's business plans and budget grants for 2017-18, 2018-19 and 2020 and the Loughs Agency's corporate plans for 2017-19 and 2020-22, which have been completed in accordance with the agreed guidance issued by the Department of Finance and the Department of Public Expenditure and Reform and agreed by sponsor Departments and Finance Ministers. The plans could not be formally improved in the previous absence of the NSMC.

The Council noted the Loughs Agency's annual reports and accounts for 2016, 2017 and 2018, which have been laid before the Northern Ireland Assembly and both Houses of the Oireachtas. The Council approved the continuation for a period of one year with effect from 21 October 2020 of the framework designed to support the Loughs Agency in dealing with emergencies, such as a serious pollution incident. Ministers agreed to review the operation of the procedure, including its possible renewal based on a report from the Loughs Agency and the sponsor Departments before 20 October 2021.

The Council noted that the Loughs Agency, with the support of the Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs and the Department of the Environment, Climate and Communications, is undertaking a competitive recruitment process for the post of the chief executive of the agency. In that regard, the Council noted that the sponsor Departments are shortly to seek approval from their finance Departments for the recruitment process and the terms and conditions of the post. The Council also noted that the recruitment process will be managed by the South's Public Appointments Service, as agreed with the sponsor Departments. Finally, the Council agreed to hold its next aquaculture and marine meeting in 2021.

Mr McAleer (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): I thank the Minister for his statement. In his statement, the Minister referred to Lough Foyle and made references to the Loughs Agency. The Minister will be aware that the ongoing dispute over the ownership of Lough Foyle is impeding the full remit of the Loughs Agency's work. Does he have any update on how best to deal with that dispute?

Mr Poots: Issues arise about Lough Foyle that cause us problems. The long-running jurisdictional issue about Lough Foyle is a reserved matter and is not within the competence of my Department or the Assembly and can be resolved only through the agreement of the Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office in London and the Department of Foreign Affairs in the Republic of Ireland. The lack of resolution of the jurisdictional issue has, however, created practical difficulties, as the Member indicated, in creating a system for the licensing of aquaculture in Lough Foyle, and, consequently, there is significant unregulated aquaculture activity. Currently, the Loughs Agency has no authority to intervene in its expansion.

I have raised my concerns about the unregulated activity with the Northern Ireland Secretary of State and asked for an update on progress made by both Governments to resolve the current difficulties. The Minister of State for Northern Ireland has advised me that the UK Government recognise the need to take action to address the illegal activity and that they remain committed to working closely with the Irish Government on improvements to the management of the loughs. The UK Government are optimistic that progress can be made by both Governments on a management agreement for Lough Foyle, which would enable authorities to exercise criminal and regulatory jurisdiction of the bed of the lough. I very much support the efforts of both Governments to progress an agreement that will enable a licensing regime for Lough Foyle until such time as the jurisdictional issue is resolved.

Mr Harvey: Thank you, Minister. My question probably relates to the previous one. What steps are being taken to ensure that illegal oyster trestles are stopped in Lough Foyle, given the impact that that unregulated practice will have on the environment?

Mr Poots: The Loughs Agency estimates that there are 70,000 oyster trestles, which are particularly on the Donegal side of the lough. That unregulated oyster farming is inextricably linked to the jurisdictional issue that I have just dealt with and which is a reserved matter that is not within our competence. The unregulated activity, however, creates hazards and risks, including the potential threat of the introduction of non-native species and a threat to the environment generally. Currently, the Loughs Agency does not have the authority to intervene.

In our jurisdiction, a lot of the trestles had been set up on land owned by the Crown Estate, and we were able to have a large proportion of those trestles removed. Unfortunately, individuals have moved to the Donegal side and set up trestles, and there is a considerable issue at that side of the lough. There is a clear understanding that, in the area within Northern Ireland in which we have been able to take some degree of enforcement action, the robust approach prevented the spread of illegal aquaculture development on the Northern Ireland side. We encourage it very strongly that the authorities in the Republic of Ireland find a means of taking action against the individuals who are setting up the illegal trestles.

Mr McGrath: I thank the Minister for his statement. It is very welcome. In towns such as Dundrum in South Down, we see native crayfish stocks that are among the finest in Ireland, but now they are becoming depleted. How does the North/South council intend to re-establish a cross-border technical aquaculture advisory service for the whole of the North and not just the cross-border loughs?

Mr Poots: The issue that the Member raises is one that is directly for us in the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA), and, therefore, we will be happy to deal with it. If the Member wants to write to me, we will certainly correspond with him on how best we can conserve the various species that are in Dundrum Bay, which is a very important and sensitive environmental area indeed.

Mrs Barton: How big a problem for the Loughs Agency is illegal fishing such as poaching, particularly in the Foyle area? How many people have been prosecuted for illegal fishing in that area?

Mr Poots: Salmon poaching is one of the big issues. Illegal fishing activity and water pollution remain a concern. The Loughs Agency has seized a significant quantity of illegal fishing material. Seizures by Loughs Agency staff have fallen, when compared with the 2019 figures. In 2019, there were 303 seizures of items such as boats, nets, rods and fish, compared with 165 seizures to date in 2020. The breakdown is as follows: two seizures of boats and cars in 2019 and seven in 2020; 31 seizures of nets in 2019 and 30 in 2020; eight seizures of other items in 2019 and four in 2020; 47 seizures of rods in 2019 and 54 in 2020; and 215 seizures of fish in 2019 and 70 in 2020. That gives a total of 303 seizures in 2019 and 165 up to 16 October 2020.

The agency has instigated a significant number of prosecution cases stemming from those enforcement actions. The agency has also collaborated with the Police Service of Northern Ireland, an Garda Síochána and other enforcement agencies to secure convictions.

Mr Blair: I thank the Minister for his statement. We are, more than ever, in a time when we need workable solutions to complex jurisdictional issues. I note that there are frameworks in place to deal with emergencies, and we have been reminded in recent days of the importance of that.

On a different theme, has there been a refreshed or renewed effort to promote the tourism product on this island by, for example, examining interchangeable or transferable angling licences to assist in the post-COVID recovery?

Mr Poots: We all recognise that angling has traditionally been a huge tourist draw to this jurisdiction, and we warmly welcome that. We will continue to cooperate with tourism authorities to promote that. We are also happy to cooperate with others on licensing to ensure that visitors who come to Ireland, North or South, have as good an opportunity as possible to enjoy the angling that is available and that there is as little bureaucracy — let us put it that way — as possible for the individuals who are doing it. That just makes sense.

Mr Irwin: The Minister stated:

“The Council agreed that the Loughs Agency, the Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs and the Department of the Environment, Climate and Communications will continue to work together to consider the impact of the UK’s withdrawal from the EU.”

Does the aquaculture and marine sector have any particular concerns about leaving the EU?

Mr Poots: The aquaculture sector is less concerned than perhaps the sea fishing sector. Most of its material will not have issues around the import of goods from GB, and, consequently, it will, whatever opportunities there are to sell its product, be able to sell that in both GB and, indeed, the single market. The issues, therefore, are of less concern to the aquaculture sector than, for example, the deep-sea fishing sector, for which there are still issues outstanding, because fish caught in UK waters outside the Northern Ireland zone would be regarded as imports to the European Union single market and would, consequently, have to go through a series of hoops. Those issues are still to be resolved in the negotiations, and one hopes that they are resolved to everyone’s satisfaction.

1.00 pm

Mr McGuigan: Will the Minister give us an update on the readiness of ports in the North for the end of the Brexit transition period and what will happen if they are not fully ready by that date?

Mr Poots: I am not sure how it relates to the topic, but temporary facilities will be available from 15 December and will be in place. That is the action that has been taken. Permanent facilities will not be available until, probably, the middle of next year, but the procurement procedures have started, the companies have been awarded the contracts and certificates of lawful use or development (CLUDs) are now available for three of the four sites. Work will probably commence on those in the not-too-distant future, but temporary measures will be put in place to ensure that food enters Northern Ireland irrespective of the protocol.

Ms Ennis: I thank the Minister for his statement. What assurances can he give that the Loughs Agency will continue to receive EU funding post Brexit?

Mr Poots: Loughs Agency will continue to apply for funding from whatever sources, the key ones being us and the Irish Government. There will be opportunities to apply for EU funding for particular projects, and it is likely that we will continue to draw down that funding.

Loughs Agency has been involved in a series of projects. For example, under INTERREG Va, there was a sea monitor project that delivered €4.6 million. It is a unique marine research project, studying the seas around the island of Ireland and western Scotland, using innovative tracking technology to better understand and protect vulnerable marine life. The agency is also a project partner in other EU projects: the shared waters enhancement and loughs legacy (SWELL) project, which is a €35 million project, and Catchment Care, which is a €13.7 million project.

The agency is projected to bring in around £700,000 in INTERREG funding in 2020 out of its total budget of £5.475 million. We have been reassured by the assurances from the two Governments and the European Union of continued funding of INTERREG Va, allowing those projects to reach their conclusion in 2023, and the development of a new PEACE PLUS programme from 2021-27. They will focus on a range of nature-based solutions and other initiatives to support environmental protection, sustainable economic activity and climate action.

Mr McGlone: In relation to the expansions at points of entry, can the Minister advise whether there has been any consultation with the Loughs Agency around any potential impact, whether environmental or other?

Mr Poots: I am not sure; there may well have been. There should not be an impact because the goods that are being brought in are the goods that have been brought in for many years. The impact will be on the end-user, the consumer, with potential additional cost. That is something that we need to remove and something that the European Union needs to take account of, for example, when insisting on export health certificates for food that will end up on shelves in shops in Northern Ireland. Those goods will do no violence whatever to the single market, so why does the European Union want to produce additional costs, additional bureaucracy and an onerous burden on businesses that will inevitably be passed to consumers in Northern Ireland — some of the consumers with the lowest disposable income in the UK — as a consequence? It is important that we all continue to drive home the message to the European Union that, in the negotiations, it needs not to introduce things that will create additional burdens for businesses and consumers in Northern Ireland, particularly things that will have zero impact on the credibility of the single market.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for his statement. Does the decision to extend the Loughs Agency’s framework for emergencies by one year only to allow for a review suggest that there are concerns that the current framework is not fit for purpose?

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for the question. Rather than say that it is not fit for purpose, we always need to review how we engage, and, where we can improve on the good practice that exists, we should carry out such improvements. The agency has responded quickly to, for example, the major pollution incident around Mourne Beg, which is critical. We need to get as good an outcome as possible to that, and the agency appears, thus far, to have responded well.

In all these things, it is always good to review what you have been doing and the practice, and, if you can improve, we always need to look at how we can do that.

Mr M Bradley: I thank the Minister for his statement. Has there been a Loughs Agency response to salmon farming? Have discussions taken place to investigate possible pollution and disease through that activity and the impact that it may have on wild salmon during their migration to Northern Ireland rivers?

Mr Poots: Salmon farming is a concern for many jurisdictions. It is not as significant an activity here as in some other jurisdictions. Consequently, those concerns would not have come to the fore to the same extent.

Wild salmon is a wonderful resource that has been diminishing in Northern Ireland. We have never quite got to the bottom of the reason for that, so some of our high-quality salmon rivers do not have as many salmon as they once had. Therefore, it is important that we continue to identify how best we can ensure that that salmon stock is maintained and, ultimately, that we turn the tide and it increases.

Salmon draw tourists from far and wide. We have quality salmon fishing, so our focus needs to be on that source as opposed to salmon farms, which have a much more limited financial return and, environmentally, are much more challenging for us.

Ms Kimmins: I thank the Minister for his statement. What is being done to ensure that fishermen from North and South will have access to all the island's waters post Brexit?

Mr Poots: Clearly, fishing rights and licensing are matters for both jurisdictions. Currently, licences are cheap in Northern Ireland, at around £20, so people who want to engage in the sport of fishing can do so for a relatively modest cost. We want to encourage people to get out into the countryside. Most fish are returned to the water by most anglers. They fish for the enjoyment of getting out to a river and into the open air and engaging in the activity that they enjoy.

Mr Boylan: I welcome the Minister's statement. Paragraph 3 mentions the Lough Agency's response to COVID-19. Can you detail the nature of that response and its impact?

Mr Poots: The agency is engaged in ongoing efforts, particularly to provide a safe environment for its employees and for stakeholders and members of the public, while continuing to deliver a valuable public service in difficult times. Fishery protection staff, who play an important role in protecting our shared natural resources, have returned to full operational duties since 18 May, and a full range of statutory scientific surveys have recommenced. The Loughs Agency's goal is to offer a hybrid model of working that facilitates a blend of home and office working, with ongoing monitoring and adherence to public health guidance. The Riverwatch visitor centre remains closed. The delivery of capital projects has recommenced where possible, with all projects being kept under constant review.

Mr O'Toole: Has the Loughs Agency had an increase in funding to deal with the consequences of Brexit? If so, will the Minister give us the quantum? Were there conversations about the fate of our eel fisheries, particularly in Lough Neagh, whose main market would be decimated if there were not a comprehensive deal with the EU? What are the latest conversations that he has had with that sector?

Mr Poots: The Lough Neagh eel fishery was not mentioned in this context because they are not part of the agency's remit. It lies solely within this jurisdiction. That sits with all the arguments that I have made to the European Union and the UK Government negotiators about the well-being of our people who sell product to GB and the European Union. I do not believe that additional funding has been awarded to the Loughs Agency for Brexit issues.

Ms Bailey: I want to focus on issues of transboundary breaches of existing environmental laws, specifically with regard to aquaculture and marine breaches. In the statistics for Northern Ireland, 78% of our shellfish water bodies now fail water quality standards for E. coli. There has also been a decline —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): May we have a question, please?

Ms Bailey: — in freshwater birds by up to 42%. Minister, are those statistics collated island-wide so that we can know the full extent across the island and come up with strategies to deal with such transboundary issues?

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for her question. At the meeting, the agency reported on the number of pollution incidents over the past five years. A total of 210 incidents have been dealt with in 2020 to date, compared with a total of 252 in 2019. That should give the Member a feel for the number of incidents. I am concerned about the number of serious pollution incidents in our rivers. I believe that the Loughs Agency has a responsibility to work closely with the local community here and in the Republic of Ireland to reduce pollution and the inevitable fish kills in the Foyle and Carlingford catchment areas.

Mr Allister: Minister, correct if I am wrong, but is it the case that the Loughs Agency has been without a chair for over two and a half years and without a chief executive for over three and a half years? I see no reference to any of that in the statement. More than that, is there a problem in the agency with absentee board members? I refer to the fact that the minutes of the Loughs Agency suggest that Mr Ian McCrea, formerly of this parish, who receives something like £6,000 a year to be a member of the Loughs Agency board, has not bothered to attend a board meeting since October 2018. What action is being taken to deal with absentee board members?

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for his question. Maybe he was not listening when I made the statement, which is not like him:

"The Council noted that sponsor Departments are shortly to seek approval from their Finance Departments for the recruitment process and the terms and conditions of the post."

There is a recruitment process for a chief executive. Clearly, there have been issues with there being no NSMC cover for the appointment of either a chair or a chief executive, but that is now under way.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That concludes questions to the Minister on his statement. I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments.

1.15 pm

Executive Committee Business

Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill: Second Stage

Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill [NIA 11/17-22] be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Second Stage of the Bill has been moved. In accordance with convention, the Business Committee has not allocated a time limit to the debate. I call the Minister to open the debate on the Bill.

Mrs Long: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am pleased to be back in the Chamber after taking advice from the Chief Medical Officer (CMO) on the required period of self-isolation after my negative test for COVID-19. I would like to put on record my thanks to the Members of the House who were in contact with their good wishes over the last week.

The Bill that I move today is designed to help tackle some of the key challenges faced by our criminal justice system. The measures in the Bill will help tackle delay in the most serious cases that are heard in the Crown Court and will improve the experiences of victims and witnesses on their journey through the criminal justice system. The Bill, whilst relatively short, deals with the complex area of criminal law. Some aspects are very technical in nature. The clauses have been developed in consultation with the relevant criminal justice organisations to ensure that they provide a sound footing on which to implement the necessary reforms.

It is important to say at the outset that the principles of committal reform are not new. Powers to directly commit or transfer an accused person from the Magistrates' Court to the Crown Court in certain circumstances are included in the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015. I will refer to it as "the 2015 Act" from here on. Reforms to the committal process were considered in detail during its passage through the Assembly. There have also been external reports and reviews recommending committal reform, and I would like to touch on some of those shortly.

Before getting into the detail of the Bill, I want to briefly explain what we mean by "committal". Committal proceedings were originally used to collect and record evidence ensuring that an accused was not sent for trial on indictment in the Crown Court unless there was sufficient legal evidence to justify doing so. However, as committal proceedings have developed, they have become a means for the defence to test the prosecution case pre-trial, often at the cost of additional stress to victims and witnesses. Indeed, Sir John Gillen's recent report on his review of sexual offences said:

"The paucity of cases where any material benefit is achieved for the defendant is completely outweighed by the disproportionate cost of and stressful nature of such hearings. More importantly is the fact that precisely the same issues of liability can be dealt with by the Crown Court at an equally early stage. I can see no justification, therefore, for continuing with the present system, which is wasteful of time, costs and resources in circumstances where the vast majority of cases will be transferred anyway to the Crown Court."

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Long: I will, yes.

Mr Allister: I am sure that the Minister is aware that the figures that she supplied in answer to an Assembly question indicate that, in the last three years for which figures are available, 95.5% of all cases went on committal without the calling of evidence, without a preliminary investigation (PI) and without any delay in that respect. Why does she tell us that this causes excessive delays and that the defence are testing the prosecution case? Perish the thought. Why does she tell us that it costs money, when, if, at preliminary investigation, a matter does not proceed to trial, it saves the cost of what would have been the resulting trial?

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for his question. I am happy to deal with the issues that he raises as best I can. First, on the time that it takes for a preliminary inquiry or for a mixed committal, where oral evidence is given, on average it takes six and seven court hearings respectively, as opposed to two for a direct committal or a written evidence case. The number of court hearings is much greater than the number of cases to which they apply. The number is multiplied on that basis. Furthermore, the Audit Office — I do not wish to suggest that Mr Allister would not want to be acutely aware of what happens when it comes to the Audit Office — has said that committal reform is an urgent necessity in terms of cutting delay in the justice system. As I have set out even in the brief part of my speech to date, this is not just about delay; it is about the additional stress that it places on vulnerable victims and witnesses in cases where the victim may be retraumatised by the experience — for example, in cases of rape and other serious sexual assault — or where they may be subject to intimidation due to a link to paramilitary cases. That has been demonstrated in a number of cases.

The Member makes a good point, if, indeed, this is so important in terms of testing the evidence at an early stage. First, the evidence can still be tested at an early stage. If the Member allows me to proceed with my speech, he will be reassured of that in due course. More than that, however, this is also being used by people who do not want to test the evidence at an early stage. Around a third of people who requested a preliminary inquiry or a mixed committal hearing, on the day of that hearing, reverted to written-only evidence. Victims included in that cadre had to spend time stressed and anxious, expecting to have to give evidence and be brought to court, only to be told, at the last possible minute, that they would not be called on. That goes further than simply wishing to test the case; it is about trying to test the mettle of victims and witnesses in such cases. It is not, frankly, an appropriate way for defence barristers to behave. It is not therefore simply about the evidence.

I will move on. Committal hearings can proceed in three ways, as I mentioned in response to the Member's question: via preliminary enquiry (PE), where written evidence only is provided; via preliminary investigation or "PI", where oral evidence is called for from victims and witnesses; or, finally, via mixed committal, where oral and written evidence is considered. However, despite the fact that the process is intended to act as a screen to ensure that only suitable cases proceed to the Crown Court, the vast majority of cases end up being committed for trial. The 2019 figures suggest that only 75 of the 1,765 defendants who went through the committal process did not proceed to the Crown Court. That means that only 4% of cases did not proceed to the Crown Court for trial. Given that the time to complete a Crown Court case is lengthy — a median of 565 days last year — it is important that we take all possible steps to reduce delay.

I mentioned that a range of external reviews have called for reform of the committal process. It is important to highlight some of those. As part of 'A Fresh Start', the Executive committed to implement:

"Further measures to speed up criminal justice and support victims to give evidence."

The 2016 Fresh Start panel report made two recommendations in relation to committal. First, it called on my Department to:

"bring forward ... legislation to further reform committal proceedings to remove the need for oral evidence before trial".

Secondly, it recommended that we should:

"use the measures already available ... to abolish committal proceedings in respect of those offences most frequently linked to paramilitary groups, including terrorist offences and offences which tend to be committed by organised crime groups".

Both of those recommendations were subsequently accepted by the Executive in their 2016 action plan. In its 2018 'Speeding Up Justice' report, the Audit Office noted:

"When criminal justice does not perform effectively it can have a significant impact upon the lives of victims, defendants, witnesses and their families. Participating in a trial can place an enormous burden upon a person: numerous stakeholders described to us how involvement in a serious criminal case can effectively put a person's life on hold until its completion. It is critical for these people that cases do not take an excessive amount of time to progress through the justice system and do not have their progress punctuated by administrative delays and adjournments at court ... Alongside the human cost of these delays, there is also a waste of public money resulting from inefficiencies."

That report recommended that my Department should establish an action plan and timetable for the eradication of the committal process. In the 2018 'Without Witness' report, the Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice recommended:

"Once direct transfer to the Crown Court is established for murder and manslaughter cases, the DoJ should ensure that rape, serious sexual offences and child abuse offences be added to the list of specified offences under the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015".

That report concluded:

"the criminal justice processes in Northern Ireland for handling these cases take too long, are too expensive and conclude with, all too often, a failure to deliver an acceptable outcome for victims."

The report highlighted the following statistics in relation to cases in which the defendant was charged with only sexual offences:

"In 2017, 125 of 127 (98%) of such cases were transferred to the Crown Court from the Magistrates' Court. In 2016 the comparable figures were 170 of 171 (99%) and in 2015, it was 164 of 171 (96%)."

The report stated:

"These figures demonstrate that there are limited risks involved in abolishing the committal proceedings in these types of cases, as the vast majority will be transferred anyway. Direct committal would also reduce the anxiety for victims and should reduce delays in case progression."

Then, in 2019, in Sir John Gillen's 'Report into the law and procedures in serious sexual offences', to which I have already referred, he recommended that my Department:

"should make provision for the direct transfer of serious sexual offences to the Crown Court bypassing the committal process".

Looking at committal proceedings in general, we can see that the vast majority of cases that proceed through the committal process end up being committed for trial to the Crown Court. Finally, at the beginning of this year, the 'New Decade, New Approach' deal stated:

"The Executive will deliver committal reform to help speed up the criminal justice system, benefiting victims and witnesses."

It is clear that further reform of the committal process is needed and supported by all Executive parties and a range of justice partners.

As I have said, the principles and policies around reforming the committal process are not new, and we, as an Assembly, have already legislated for some reform. So, why the need for this short, tightly focused Bill? It is designed, in the main, to do three things.

1.30 pm

First, the Bill seeks to get more cases, more quickly, to the Crown Court. The 2015 Act provided only for murder and manslaughter cases to be directly committed to the Crown Court in certain circumstances. This Bill proposes to expand that list so that all offences that, as an adult, are triable only on indictment will be directly committed. This definition is necessary to ensure that we capture in legislation an appropriate set of offences, and it ensures that the system works for adults and youths. The group of offences will include serious sexual offences like rape, helping to deliver the Gillen recommendations, and offences that are often, but not exclusively, linked to paramilitary activity and organised crime, such as firearms, explosives, GBH with intent and, of course, murder. This change will contribute to the delivery of commitments arising from the Fresh Start Agreement.

The Bill also includes provisions to add small numbers of additional offences by way of an order made by draft affirmative resolution procedure, should that need arise in the future. It is also important to note that my Department's long-term aim is to completely eradicate the traditional committal process, with all offences being directly committed to the Crown Court. That will take time and further legislation, but it is the right direction of travel and something that external scrutiny bodies say that we need to do.

The second key objective of the Bill relates to the area of oral evidence. The proposals to directly commit more cases will remove committal hearings and, with that, the option of oral evidence at that stage. However, for cases that are not yet directly committed, and until direct committal is operational, there will continue to be committal hearings. I have already outlined that oral evidence can be provided at that stage through a preliminary investigation or via mixed committal.

Through the Justice Bill in 2015, my Department previously sought to abolish the option to hear oral evidence from victims and witnesses at a committal hearing. The experience of giving sometimes traumatic oral evidence, particularly under cross-examination, both at committal and again at the Crown Court trial, can have a significant impact on victims and witnesses. However, this did not receive sufficient support at the time of the passage of the Bill, and instead an amendment was made that ensured oral evidence could be called only if the judge was satisfied that the interests of justice required it. However, as I said, in 2016 the three-person panel appointed by the Executive to report on a strategy for disbanding paramilitary groups recommended that the Department of Justice should bring forward draft legislation to further reform committal proceedings to remove the need for oral evidence before trial. This was accepted by the Executive in their action plan published in July 2016, and this Bill gives effect to that commitment.

There will no doubt be those who say that oral evidence at the committal hearing is an important part of the criminal justice system and should be retained. Mr Allister is one such Member, and he has made that clear already today. To that I say three things. First, it is not just me or my Department saying that we should remove oral evidence. We are delivering previously agreed Executive commitments flowing from the Fresh Start Agreement. Secondly and, I believe, most importantly, I want to do this for victims, who will face a committal hearing until the committal process is fully eradicated. I have heard all too often of the impact on vulnerable victims who have to give traumatic evidence not just once but twice as part of our criminal justice process. Last year, cases involving 109 out of 1,765 defendants proceeded with oral evidence at committal stage, either through a preliminary investigation or a mixed committal. On the one hand, that is only 6%, so Mr Allister was correct. However, this is not just about numbers and statistics; it is about people. Direct committal of the additional offences I have outlined will remove the need for oral evidence in many of those cases but, for the remainder, I want to ensure that victims and witnesses do not have to go through this process.

We also know that, as I alluded to earlier, in the cases of a further 53 defendants, a preliminary investigation or mixed committal proceeding had been planned, only to be changed at a late stage — often, on the day — to proceed with written evidence through a preliminary inquiry. As Sir John Gillen noted in his report:

“committal proceedings ... are often listed as a mixed committal, which then turns into a conventional preliminary enquiry hearing on the morning of the matter, after the complainant has suffered the stress and worry of a court appearance, only to be told that they are not required. This is quite unnecessary and that practice should be strongly deprecated, given the additional stress and delay this process is causing.”

Besides the obvious impact on victims and witnesses, the preparation and process for these committal hearings can add both delay and burden to an already stretched system. We know, for example, that the number of hearings for a preliminary investigation or mixed committal can average three to four times the number of those required for a preliminary inquiry that uses only written evidence.

The final key objective of the Bill is to make improvements to the smooth operation of the direct committal process. The 2015 Act provided for a new process in cases directly committed to the Crown Court. Called application to dismiss, it allows the defence to apply to the Crown Court for some or all of the charges to be dismissed on the basis that the evidence is insufficient for the accused to be properly convicted. The 2015 Act allows oral evidence in that process, but, to ensure consistency with the objective of victims and witnesses not giving evidence before trials, the Bill includes a provision to remove oral evidence in the application to dismiss process.

The Bill also seeks to introduce a new power for the Public Prosecution Service to discontinue proceedings between cases being committed to the Crown Court and the presentation of indictments that set out the charges for which the accused is to be prosecuted. That is seen as necessary for the operational outworkings of direct committal and is similar to powers that exist in England and Wales. It means that where there is a material change in the circumstances of the case, such as new evidence, that leads the prosecution to conclude that the test for prosecution has not been met, immediate action can be taken to discontinue the case without adding additional delays.

Following extensive engagement with relevant criminal justice organisations, the Bill also seeks to repeal section 10 of the 2015 Act. That provides that a Magistrates' Court will directly commit an accused to the Crown Court if they indicate, prior to a traditional committal hearing, an intention to plead guilty. I recognise the benefits to victims, witnesses and defendants of that approach; however, a number of significant operational complexities and risks have been identified by justice partners, including the risk of false release or false imprisonment. It is also an interim measure and once direct committal is fully rolled out it would become obsolete. Although it is not possible to quantify the numbers involved with any certainty, it potentially applies to a relatively small number of cases. On balance, therefore, my Department considers that focusing efforts on a more expansive roll-out provides a better and less-complex basis on which to implement the changes required and speed up the justice system.

I recognise the benefits to victims, witnesses and defendants of fast-tracking cases when accused parties wish to plead guilty. Therefore, the Bill also includes powers where an individual is charged with committing a relevant offence and expresses an indication to plead guilty to allow the Magistrates' Court to order the necessary reports in preparation for the Crown Court. That answers the third part of Mr Allister's question about the potential transfer of duties to the more expensive tier of the courts system.

Finally, the Bill will ensure that related offences can be transferred to the Crown Court —.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: No, I will not. I have given the Member quite a bit of attention thus far.

The Bill will ensure that related offences can be transferred to the Crown Court together with relevant offences. I recognise that much of that is quite technical, but it is important so that the reformed processes can operate as effectively as possible.

In summary, the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill seeks to, first, expand the use of direct committal to a wider range of offences and bring more offences more quickly to the Crown Court. Secondly, it will remove the need for pre-trial oral evidence. Finally, it will smooth the operational outworkings of direct committal.

I want to pay tribute to everyone who has helped us in the Department to reach this stage, including our criminal justice partners, whom I know will continue to work together with us to implement the reforms. I look forward to Members' support in taking the Bill through the Assembly and in keeping it focused on its current provisions, with any material policy amendments being dealt with through a future legislative vehicle.

This is another piece of significant legislation from my Department. It is a relatively short Bill of six clauses only, but the changes that it proposes will deliver much-needed reform of the criminal justice process, reduce delay and improve the experience of victims and witnesses, which, in my view, is the most important thing. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I also welcome the Minister back in her place. We are thankful for her speedy recovery. I also thank — I know that she did not — her Executive colleague Edwin Poots, who kindly offered to take the Second Stage of the Bill through today and, indeed, the Consideration Stage of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill last week.

I know that the Minister is able to do it today, but it is worth putting on record that there was a willingness to do that, and it is good to see Executive Ministers supporting each other in that way.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. I do not normally discuss Executive correspondence in the Chamber, but I have thanked Minister Poots for that kind offer. It was very generous of him.

Mr Givan: OK. Thank you, Minister.

As Chairman of the Committee, I am pleased to be able to speak, on behalf of the Committee, during the debate on the Second Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill. A primary objective of the Bill, as the Minister said, is to improve the operation of the criminal justice system by reforming committal proceedings, which is the procedure that determines whether there is sufficient evidence to justify putting a person on trial in the Crown Court.

In oral evidence to the Committee on 5 November, Department of Justice officials outlined that the Bill will do three key things. It will remove the need for victims and witnesses to give oral evidence pre Crown Court trial, it will seek to get more cases to the Crown Court quicker by expanding the range of offences to which direct committal will apply, and it will make some technical amendments to smooth the committal process. In the longer term, the Department aims to abolish the committal process completely.

There have been many calls for reform or, indeed, the eradication of the committal process over recent years. In addition to the length of time it takes for cases to progress through the criminal justice system, one of the key concerns with the process is the impact that it has on victims and witnesses, who may be required to give oral evidence at the committal stage as well as at the trial itself. The experience of giving oral evidence can be traumatic, particularly under cross-examination, and has a significant impact. We need to address the fact that they have to do that twice for the same case so that we can improve the experiences of victims and witnesses.

Delay in the criminal justice system and the time it takes to progress cases through the system has been a recurring issue and concern for the Committee since the devolution of policing and justice powers in 2010. The Committee was recently advised that reducing delay is one of the biggest challenges facing the justice system and is a priority for the Department, its criminal justice partners and the Criminal Justice Board. Reforming the committal process is a key part of the plan to reduce avoidable delay.

In its report on speeding up justice, which was published in 2018, the Northern Ireland Audit Office suggested that the committal process added minimal value to the progression of cases whilst imposing demands on victims and witnesses. The report stated that the committal process could:

“effectively amount to a preliminary trial, with victims and witnesses required to provide testimony which they will have to deliver again at trial in the Crown Court. This is, at the least, stressful to participants and ... may deter them from attending for trial.”

In its consideration of the implementation plan for the recommendations in the Gillen review of the law and procedures in serious sexual offences in Northern Ireland, the Committee learned that the time taken for sexual offence cases was 698 days in 2019-2020 compared with 470 days in 2015-16. I am sure that all Members will agree that that is much too long, and the impact that delays of that magnitude may have on a victim cannot be overstated. A key recommendation from the Gillen review is that steps should be taken to combat excessive delay in the judicial system, and the specific recommendation in that regard is that provision should be made for the direct transfer of serious sexual offences to the Crown Court.

Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland (CJINI) also pointed out in its report on the handling of sexual violence and abuse cases by the criminal justice system that, in each year from 2015 to 2017, at least 96% of cases where the defendant's offences are exclusively sexual offences were transferred to the Crown Court from the Magistrates' Court for preliminary enquiries and preliminary investigations. In CJINI's view, that demonstrates that there are limited risks in abolishing the committal proceedings in these types of cases as, in the vast majority of cases, they will be transferred. Direct committal will also reduce the anxiety for victims in such cases and should reduce delays in case progression.

The Minister outlined that the Fresh Start panel on the disbandment of paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland recommended that the Department of Justice should bring forward legislation to further reform committal proceedings to remove the need for oral evidence before a trial. Indeed, the 'New Decade, New Approach' document noted that the Executive would deliver on committal reform.

1.45 pm

The Committee for Justice considered committal reform as part of its Committee Stage scrutiny of the 2014 Justice Bill. Those who were on the Committee at that time will remember fondly that scrutiny, and the debate that took place in the Chamber. The provisions of that Bill, as introduced, aimed to abolish the use of preliminary investigations and the use of oral evidence at preliminary inquiries, provide for the direct committal to the Crown Court of certain indictable cases, where the defendant intends to plead guilty at arraignment, and provide for the direct committal to the Crown Court of certain specified offences. As Members will know, there was a divergence of views in the evidence that the Committee received at that time on those proposals. The Public Prosecution Service and Victim Support NI were supportive of the changes, but the Law Society believed the proposals to be flawed. Having previously undertaken an inquiry looking at the experiences of victims and witnesses of the criminal justice system, the Committee was fully aware of the trauma that is caused to victims by having to give evidence twice. It also believed that measures needed to be taken to address avoidable delay in the system. The Committee was, therefore, supportive of the Bill's provisions, but, as Members are aware, an amendment to the Bill retained the use of oral evidence where the court deemed it to be in the interests of justice.

When discussing the principles and provisions of this Bill with departmental officials on 5 November, Committee members raised a number of issues, including the likely volume of cases to which direct committal will apply under the legislation, the likely time reduction for such cases to be completed, the likely costs associated with the changes, any legal aid implications and operational complexities, and risks associated with the section 10 process provided for by the Justice Act 2015 and the reasons for its repeal in this Bill. Officials were also asked to address the argument that is sometimes put forward that having an oral hearing is useful in sorting out issues and that only so much can be conveyed through written papers, so it is better to have the opportunity to question in person. Officials responded by indicating that while there are arguments for and against direct committal, and while the number of cases that go through a preliminary investigation or mixed committal are small, it is a traumatic experience for those who are required to give oral evidence, pre-trial. The recommendations from a number of external organisations and sources indicate that direct committal should be implemented in full.

Officials also advised the Committee that it is difficult to specify how much time might be saved in progressing cases. Although there will be no committal hearing, which can, at times, be lengthy, at the Magistrates' Court, the proceedings in the Crown Court are likely to take slightly longer. In addition, it is difficult to predict cost savings, as it is more likely that there will be a change in the balance of costs between Magistrates' Courts and the Crown Court. However, there is no expectation that the new procedures will cost any more overall. The implications for legal aid are still being considered.

The Committee was also informed that there will be a phased approach to the roll-out of direct committal. The initial tranche will be for those cases that are triable on indictment only, which account for 30% of cases annually. The intention of the Department is that, eventually, direct committal will apply to all cases that go to the Crown Court.

In relation to the repeal of section 10 of the Justice Act 2015, officials indicated that, currently, if a defendant indicates an intention to plead guilty, regardless of the offence type, it will go straight to the Crown Court. However, if they change their mind, they will be returned to the Magistrates' Court. That is a complex matter, and it poses a number of operational and IT difficulties which produce risks, including the risk that the incorrect application of bail could result in the person being wrongly released or imprisoned. Given that section 10 applies only to a small number of cases, and will become redundant when the traditional committal hearing is removed, the Department has decided to repeal it and to include powers in the Bill to enable the Magistrates' Court to do a lot of the preparatory work for such cases for the Crown Court.

The Committee will wish to explore all of those issues, and others that no doubt will arise during the Bill's Committee Stage, assuming that it passes Second Stage today. The Committee is content to support the principles of the Bill. We look forward to dealing with it at Committee Stage. Members have already indicated some of the points that were rehearsed back in 2014.

I give the commitment that all of those issues will be given the detailed scrutiny that the Justice Committee has shown itself to be adept at carrying out. It is vital that the Department engages with the Committee during Committee Stage. As I said on the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill, when a Department introduces a Bill, it becomes an Assembly Bill. The Assembly takes the final decisions. I am sure that Members will propose amendments or other issues that could be deemed to be within the scope of the Bill, and it is vital that the Department engages at that stage rather than leaving it until the eleventh hour.

I encourage Members who want to propose amendments to do so early to allow the Committee to carry out its scrutiny work. Obviously, they retain the right to do that once the Committee has reported, but, if evidence is brought to the Committee during the scrutiny stage, it is a lot easier for members of that Committee to have a considered position on the amendments. The evidence would also go to the Department and others.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I now call Linda Dillon. I may need to interrupt because we are approaching Question Time, which starts at 2.00 pm.

Ms Dillon: I assure you, a LeasCheann Comhairle, that you will not have to interrupt me: I will be finished before Question Time.

I thank the Minister for moving the Bill. As the Chair has outlined, it will be scrutinised in much greater detail as it progresses through the legislative process. It has been a steep learning curve for me. I have just been through the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill, my first ever legislation. A number of pieces of legislation are coming through the Committee. That is a positive thing. It is what the House is for. We are here to try to make the best law that we can.

Committal proceedings are held to determine whether, in the case of more serious offences, there is sufficient evidence to require a defendant to stand trial. That can include the taking of oral evidence, as has already been referred to, from victims and witnesses, which means that they will have to give further oral evidence at a trial. There is a huge risk of retraumatisation. We have spoken on many occasions in the House about the need to support and look after victims and have a victim-centred approach to everything that we do. We should do whatever we can to reduce that trauma to victims, and I am hopeful that the committal Bill will go some way to dealing with that. The proposals to streamline —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Ms Dillon: Yes.

Mr Allister: I understand entirely the sentiment that the Member expresses. The debate has not lasted for long, but, already, every Member who has spoken has fallen in to the trap of talking not about “alleged victims” but about “victims”, before you get anywhere near conviction. At the stage of committal and until a jury says, “Guilty”, there is nothing but an alleged victim. We should not allow that to cloud our judgement in the manner in which it seems to be doing.

Ms Dillon: I accept what you say. That is why we will scrutinise the Bill as a Committee. We will speak to everybody during that process, not just to alleged victims but to those from a background such as yours, Mr Allister. I appreciate that you may have a different and more detailed understanding.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. Does she agree that part of the process of speeding up justice is for the alleged perpetrators and defendants in a case who are not guilty but will have that hanging over their head for a more protracted period if justice is not swift?

Ms Dillon: Absolutely. It hangs over the heads not just of the perpetrators but of their families. Even where someone is guilty of something, their family has done nothing wrong. A protracted process does not help anyone in relation to those issues.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask the Member to ensure that she speaks into a microphone so that her comments are picked up.

Ms Dillon: Apologies.

We, as a party, support the two main purposes of the Bill around removing the option of calling alleged victims and witnesses for oral evidence in advance of a trial and the issue around speeding up the time for progressing Crown Court cases. However, we will not take a final position without going through the scrutiny process.

It is vital that the wider justice system supports victims of crime at every stage of their journey through the system. The Bill is one piece of the puzzle of how we can do that by removing the need to give oral evidence more than once. That, along with shortening the time taken for that journey to be progressed are major cogs in the process of how we can properly support victims in the process. The Department, however, has a responsibility to ensure that victims are put at the front and centre of the Bill and any other measures that are designed to improve the system for them. I would like to think that, in developing the Bill, the Minister and her Department have engaged with victims and organisations that represent victims and that she has their support.

As a member of the Justice Committee, I am sure that I speak for other members of the Committee when I say that the best interests of victims and alleged victims will be our priority in scrutinising the legislation. I am certainly keen to engage with all, including those from a legal background and the Bar, who obviously have had some issues with previous Bills that have come before the House.

I am also keen to hear some figures from the Minister on the expected outcomes of the Bill. For example, we know that there is a major backlog of cases and that the time taken to deal with serious criminal cases is already far too high. We need to hear additional information on the figures. I accept that it is not all about the figures — it is very much about people — but we are a public body that uses public finances. We also have a real focus on shortening the time for cases going through court, so we need to see some of the figures.

The issue was, of course, raised in 2015 as part of the Justice Bill. The 2015 Act provided for more fundamental reforms to the committal process by allowing direct committal of an accused person from the Magistrates' Court to the Crown Court in certain circumstances without the need for the traditional committal hearing. It was considered throughout the 2015 Bill whether we should abolish the option to hear oral evidence from victims and witnesses at the traditional committal hearing in the Magistrates' Court. However, it did not receive sufficient support at that time. Since 2015, however, there has been a range of developments that have led to where we are today, and some of those have already been outlined. We had the Fresh Start panel report, the NI Audit Office report in 2018 on speeding up justice, the Gillen review, a number of CJINI reports and then NDNA. Therefore, although the issue was not resolved in 2015, it has become clear that the case for further reform of committal proceedings is strong. My party, therefore, at this stage welcomes the Department moving on the issue. The changes are regarded as key to improving the speed of the justice system and delivering on the Executive's priorities outlined in NDNA.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): As Question Time is scheduled for 2.00 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease for a few moments until then. This debate will continue after a further ministerial statement and a number of questions for urgent oral answer. When we resume the debate, the next Member scheduled to be called is Sinéad Bradley.

2.00 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Oral Answers to Questions

The Executive Office

COVID-19: Recovery Planning

1. Ms Flynn asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what assurances they can give that the emotional and financial needs of individuals and families will be at the centre of COVID-19 recovery planning. (AQO 1082/17-22)

7. Ms Bailey asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what long-term planned response has been agreed to manage COVID-19 into 2021. (AQO 1088/17-22)

11. Mr Buckley asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the discussions on COVID-19 at the British-Irish Council (BIC). (AQO 1092/17-22)

Mrs Foster (The First Minister): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will answer questions 1, 7 and 11 together.

The Executive's response to and recovery from COVID-19 continues to be focused on the health and well-being of our citizens, our economic well-being and revitalising the economy and our societal and community well-being. The Executive are also placing a particular emphasis on people and families, as we know how important that is to everyone. That means that any decisions on the Executive's next steps will be informed by the impact that they will have on us as individuals, families and the wider communities in which we all live. In addition to the financial support mechanisms provided by the United Kingdom Government, the Executive have put in place a range of targeted local schemes aimed at supporting individuals, families, communities and businesses at this difficult time. Going forward, we are committed to ensuring that support packages meet the needs of those who are in need of help.

Looking into 2021, the Executive have approved a recovery framework that is aimed at progressing a cohesive approach across the whole of government and will deliver an economic, health and societal recovery that has the citizen at its centre. That work will also complement the longer-term Programme for Government that is currently being developed and which we are aiming to have in place by April 2021.

As our recent statement will advise, the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on all the member Administrations was central to the discussion at the British-Irish Council summit on 6 November. BIC members shared information on the measures that they have taken both to contain the virus and to mitigate its impacts on health and on their economies. We also recognised the importance of continuing communication as we all work towards economic recovery while living with and managing the continuing threat posed by the virus.

Ms Flynn: I thank the First Minister for her answer. Will she give a commitment that the promotion of positive mental health and the provision of support services for individuals and families who are struggling at the moment will be central to any COVID-19 recovery package?

Mrs Foster: The Member will have heard the Chief Medical Officer (CMO) just this morning talk about the fact that mental health was a continuing pressure for us in the Executive. We are very concerned at the impact that it is having immediately and in the medium to long term, so we will have to put in resources, as well as a determination from the Executive, to deal with that very real issue.

Over the weekend, I was contacted by a family friend of someone who, at 41 years of age, felt that she had lost all purpose in her life because she had lost her job and had attempted to take her own life on three occasions. That is a sobering thing to hear, and it is something that we all in the House should be very concerned about. The answer is that, absolutely, we will put in place mechanisms to deal with that. I think that I said last week that I was afraid that we were going to face a mental health tsunami, and that is a fear that I hold. I know that it is shared across the Executive, and it is something that we will have to deal with.

Ms Bailey: COVID did not create our mental health crisis: it is adding to it. Is there a long-term strategy or acceptance that we need to deal with our mental health problems in Northern Ireland not just now but in the longer term?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for her question and observation, because it is something that we identified on coming back into the Executive as one of our priorities to deal with. It is why we set up the Executive subcommittee to deal with resilience, well-being and mental health provision, which all Ministers can and do attend. We recognised that before COVID-19 hit, and we now know that it has exacerbated the difficulties that we have. When we meet groups from across Northern Ireland, albeit virtually at present, we are always reminded of the simmering undercurrent of mental health issues that exist across Northern Ireland. It is absolutely something that we recognised as being there before COVID, but COVID has exacerbated the mental health crisis, and we very much need to deal with it.

Mr Buckley: The First Minister will be acutely aware of the devastating impact that COVID-19 has had on our care homes across Northern Ireland. On 12 October, there were 46 care homes with COVID-19 outbreaks, yet, on 12 November, that number had risen extraordinarily to 143, all at a time when hospitality and close-contact services were closed. While we know that testing is one of the best answers to combat the spread, can the First Minister outline what conversations she had with counterparts at the British-Irish Council about ways in which we can ramp up our test and trace capabilities?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. It is a cause for deep concern to us that the number of outbreaks continues to rise, despite the sterling work of our care home staff. I want to make that very clear.

There is a need for us to have a more robust testing system. The Member may be aware that, in Liverpool, a pilot is ongoing in which mass testing is taking place, and we have had some good feedback from that testing regime. The feedback encourages me that we can do something similar across Northern Ireland. We have a population of 1.8 million, so it is not something that should be beyond us. The Executive Office believes that test, trace and isolate and the capacity to do so in a meaningful way will very much be part of trying to deal with the transmission of the virus.

Mr McGrath: Nichola Mallon, on 3 November, got the powers to deliver a scheme for the taxi sector. That scheme opened on 13 November, 10 days later. Can the First Minister, as the leader of the Executive, explain why, after four and a half weeks, many in the business sector are still waiting for a scheme being opened that they can apply to in order to get much-needed finance to give them some form of income?

Mrs Foster: Although I welcome the fact that the taxi scheme is now open, it took a considerable time to get there. I say to Members who have been waiting for that funding that we are disappointed that it took such an amount of time to get there but we are pleased that it has got there now.

Like all the schemes that were put in place to deal with what was to be the four-week intervention, the taxi scheme had to be dealt with from scratch. As I understand it, from the date on which the Economy Minister was asked to put it in place, the scheme was up and running and working nine days later, one day less than the Member said. The money is now going out in different tranches. I understand that the Land and Property Services (LPS) scheme, which deals with most of the money that goes out into the community, is moving now as well.

We would always like just to flick the switch and get the money out immediately, but I am sure that Members would ask us questions about due process and public accountability for money if we did not do things properly, and, of course, they are very much entitled to do so. We will do what we can as quickly as we can, but we have to acknowledge that this is public money that we are dealing with.

Ms Armstrong: First Minister, I am delighted to hear that the BIC has been talking, but I am wondering whether there is any coordinated approach being taken to the Christmas holidays and the restrictions that there may be. When we think about young people's mental health and that of families, getting our young people back from universities across the UK is vital at Christmastime.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for her question. It is something that we discussed with other devolved Administrations and Michael Gove last Wednesday, because we recognise that it is a huge issue not just for young people but for families across the United Kingdom and, indeed, in the Republic of Ireland. We will want to make sure that people can come together at Christmastime. That is an ongoing discussion. It would be wise to have the same restrictions, messaging and communications on that issue so that there is no room for misunderstanding about how people can travel home for Christmas. I know, for example, that some students who finish their course at the beginning of December will be tested and then allowed to go home, and they may have to self-isolate for a period. Those conversations continue. We very much want a coordinated approach across the United Kingdom.

Mr Allister: First Minister, today the Health Minister publicly said that he could unilaterally bring in restrictions. Do you agree that he could? What would be the consequences?

Mrs Foster: Well, it depends on whether you read the 1967 Act on its own or whether you read it alongside the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which clearly says that controversial, cross-cutting and financially significant issues will have to come to the Executive. Whilst he could, technically, make that decision, I think that he will be open to judicial review (JR). Let us just say that.

Mr Speaker: Before I move on to the next question I advise Members that I took a number of additional supplementaries on the basis that we had three grouped questions. That would not be the norm.

Office of Identity and Cultural Expression

2. Ms Bradshaw asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the establishment of the Office of Identity and Cultural Expression, as outlined in 'New Decade, New Approach'. (AQO 1083/17-22)

Mrs Foster: Our officials continue with preparatory work to legislate for the core elements of the rights, language and identity proposals contained in 'New Decade, New Approach'. This includes arrangements to progress a Northern Ireland Act 1998 (Amendment No. 1) Bill that provides for the establishment of the Office of Identity and Cultural Expression. We will progress the legislation during 2020-21 and establish the Office of Identity and Cultural Expression as quickly as possible thereafter. We will, of course, keep the Assembly updated on progress.

Ms Bradshaw: Thank you, Mr Speaker, and thank you, First Minister, for your answer. Are you confident that the associated legislation will be on the statute book by the end of the Assembly term?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am confident. It is part of the 'New Decade, New Approach' agreement. Therefore it is important that the basis on which we came back is followed through on, not just in respect of this issue but on a range of issues where our Government, the Irish Government and other people have made commitments. It is important that we follow through on those commitments.

Mr Speaker: Paula Bradshaw for a supplementary. Sorry, I need to keep up. Doug Beattie.

Mr Beattie: First Minister, you will know that I spent three torturous years on the Commission on Flags, Identity, Culture and Tradition and produced a report that is now with the Executive Office. Is that report likely to be made public, or is it acting purely as a reference document for the new identity office?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. I feel your pain in relation to that issue. The report was submitted to us on 17 July. It was my 50th birthday present, and I really want to say, "Thank you" for it. In concluding its work, the commission was very much aware of the content of 'New Decade, New Approach' that I have just referred to. On 20 October the junior Ministers met the joint chairs of the commission to discuss the report and its recommendations. We are considering the content of the report and the appropriate next steps, including a decision on the full publication of the report.

Ms Ennis: Will the Minister outline her understanding of the relationship between the Office of Identity and Cultural Expression and the offices of the Irish language commissioner and the commissioner to enhance the Ulster-Scots and Ulster-British identity.

Mrs Foster: The Bills provide for three separate appointments — the director into the office and two commissioners to lead the three bodies. The office and the commissioners are therefore independent of each other, but the office may provide support services to the Irish language commissioner and to the Ulster-British commissioner. It is important to recognise that they should all work together because, if we are serious about representing the plurality of cultures and identities in Northern Ireland, there should not be any difficulties with the three bodies working together.

Mr McGlone: Thanks very much, First Minister, for outlining that and your commitment to have the legislation in place within this Assembly term. Will that legislation of itself define the roles of the commissioners and the functions of the offices that they hold?

2.15 pm

Mrs Foster: The commissioners will be defined in the various pieces of legislation to amend the Northern Ireland Act. As the Member will know, that is how we are taking this forward: the Northern Ireland Act will be amended so that those bodies and commissioners can be set up. It will be clear in the legislation what the two commissioners' roles will be, and, indeed, the role of the Office of Identity and Cultural Expression.

Commissioner for Victims and Survivors

3. Ms S Bradley asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the appointment of a victims and survivors commissioner. (AQO 1084/17-22)

Mrs Foster: This is a key time for victims and survivors, with preparations for the victims' payment scheme progressing, concerns with legacy issues, and looking ahead towards the next victims' strategy. It is important that we consider all matters fully and move forward in the right way. Therefore we have decided to appoint a new Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. We have instructed our officials to begin the work required to commence the appointment process, and, alongside that, we have asked officials to consider terms of reference for a review of the office of the commissioner.

Ms S Bradley: I thank the First Minister for that update. Can I ask the First Minister to give an update on the Victims' Forum and what, if any, appointments have been made to it? Is there an anticipated date for a conclusion?

Mrs Foster: The Victims' Commission continues in legal existence, even without the commissioner, and that will continue in the interim. It will work and interact with the forum. There were no fresh appointments to the forum, as I understand it, during the time when we were without devolution. That being the case, it may be time to look at the forum to see whether it is representative of the different strands of victims across Northern Ireland. That is something that we will be looking at alongside the review of the commissioner's office.

Mr Dunne: I thank the First Minister for her answers. We all appreciate the urgent need for the appointment of a Victims' and Survivors' Commissioner. Can the First Minister assure us that the needs of victims will continue to be met until a commissioner has been appointed?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. The body corporate of the Commission for Victims and Survivors continues, and its chief executive officer will now be responsible for its day-to-day business. It is important to say that it still exists as a reference point for victims. If victims have issues, they should bring them to the commission. Moreover, the Victims and Survivors Service (VSS) will continue to deliver services to victims and survivors throughout Northern Ireland during this time.

Unfortunately, it will, because of the public appointments process, take probably up to six months to have the new commissioner in place. In the interim, however, we will want to work with the commission and with the Victims and Survivors Service to make sure that the voice of victims is heard.

Ms Dolan: I think that the First Minister might have just answered my question, but can I ask her to outline the timescale for the appointment of a commissioner?

Mrs Foster: As I indicated, this appointment, like so many appointments, is regulated by the Commissioner for Public Appointments. As such, the process must comply with the code of practice for ministerial public appointments. It is carried out in that way to make sure that there is transparency and support for the process, and it may take up to six months to complete. That will ensure that everyone can have confidence in the appointment process and that it will be open and transparent.

Communities in Transition: East Antrim

4. Mr Hilditch asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the Communities in Transition project in East Antrim. (AQO 1085/17-22)

Mrs Foster: With your permission, Mr Speaker, junior Minister Lyons will answer this question.

Mr Lyons (Junior Minister, The Executive Office): The Castlemara and Northland wards in Carrickfergus and the Antiville and Kilwaughter wards in Larne form one of the eight areas of focus for the communities in transition project. Four projects are in delivery in that area under a number of key themes: capacity building, community safety, health and well-being, and arts and culture. Furthermore, a regional project on restorative practice is being delivered in all eight areas.

Whilst COVID-19 had the potential to disrupt delivery, good progress has been made across all the projects, thanks to the commitment, creativity and enthusiasm shown by delivery partners and officials.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the junior Minister for his answers. Despite COVID-19, I know that those groups have gone well beyond their role, and I thank and congratulate them for their continuing work during the COVID-19 period.

Can the junior Minister provide further detail on the work being done and the number of people being impacted upon in the four projects in the Carrickfergus and Larne areas?

Mr Lyons: Yes. I have outlined the four areas. First, on community capacity — building an Intercomm Ireland is the delivery partner for this project — groups have been recruited, actions plans have been completed and training needs have been identified. A range of social action proposals are under consideration. The project's profile has been raised given additional requests from individuals from the community to be involved.

With regard to arts and culture — Intercomm Ireland is also delivering this project — 33 participants have been recruited, and a handbook has been developed to inform training and development modules on arts and culture skills. Planning is also under way for events in both areas at Christmas.

With regard to health and well-being — this project is being delivered by Extern Northern Ireland — development interventions and specialised support, with a number of referrals for mental health support, have already been received.

With regard to community safety — the delivery partner for this project is Intercomm Ireland — volunteers have been recruited and a community engagement forum has been established. The community safety forum is in the process of becoming a constituted group, and a community safety survey is currently with residents.

I confirm to the Member that all of the projects are taking place in each of the four areas that I have already listed. Additionally, a tender competition to deliver a pilot programme on raising aspirations for compulsory school-age children and young people in the area was published on 30 October. As the Member will be aware, raising aspiration is really important as we seek to move forward and to get our young people to move forward.

Mr Beggs: I support such a programme, which empowers the local community to represent their interests and enables them to deal with issues. However, does the Minister accept that a separated prison regime helps to perpetuate societal issues around paramilitaries and serves only to give them a warped credibility when they are in prison and when they leave prison and continue to try to exert influence?

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for his question. The entire point of the Communities in Transition (CIT) programme is try to break that coercive control, and to move our communities forward. That is very much what this programme is focused on and we can see the results that have already been, and continue to be, delivered. I am glad that there has been political engagement over the last number of weeks. We had a very useful meeting on 10 November with political representatives in the area to see and hear about the things that have been taking place to end that coercive control and to limit the influence and reach of paramilitary activity. Of course, one programme on its own is not going to tackle this problem, which can be very deep-rooted in our society, and that is why it is incumbent on all of us to work together, in all of the ways that we can, and to speak with one voice against paramilitary activity and the coercive control that it can have in our communities.

Mr McGuigan: Can the Minister give an overview on the phase two preparations for the delivery of the Communities in Transition project?

Mr Lyons: The tackling paramilitary activity, criminality and organised crime programme is due to expire in March 2021. The Executive have discussed and agreed, in principle, to a further phase of the programme, which is to be delivered over a three-year period up to March 2024. The Communities in Transition project will be a significant part of the community-facing element in the next phase. Subject to the confirmation of a budget and an ongoing Government-wide budgeting exercise, it is hoped that the Communities in Transition project will have an indicative budget of £12 million.

The interventions that have been supported through the CIT project have been shaped and informed by communities in response to the very specific issues that manifest in each locality. The range of interventions continues to deliver much needed community responses at a time when positive community leadership has never been needed more. We recognise the commitment and innovation that has been shown across the CIT areas at this time, and we assure our community delivery partners of continued support for their good work. These projects must be given time to become embedded at a community level, but we are already seeing the impact of these interventions, and we must ensure that the necessary time is given to bring about the sustainable change and positive legacy that our communities want to see.

Brexit Negotiations

5. Mr O'Dowd asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on preparations and state of readiness for possible Brexit negotiations outcomes. (AQO 1086/17-22)

12. Mr McGlone asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on Brexit negotiations. (AQO 1093/17-22)

Mrs Foster: Mr Speaker, with your permission, I will answer questions 5 and 12 together.

Over recent weeks, the UK and EU have intensified their negotiations with the aim of securing an agreement. Discussions on the future relationship have continued since then. For an agreement to be in place for the end of the transition period, we understand that it must be negotiated by mid-November in order for the EU to complete internal processes. We welcome the commitment of both sides to continue discussions, however, we recognise that the talks could still result in a non-negotiated outcome. We are, therefore, continuing our operational readiness planning to include that possibility.

A key challenge for Departments in this planning process is the urgent clarity that is needed to implement both the protocol and any agreed deal with the European Union. Our officials have undertaken bilateral meetings with officials from other Departments in order to scrutinise readiness issues and to identify possible mitigations, including where interventions would be required from the UK Government, and assurances around continuity agreements or bilateral agreements. An Executive action plan to address high-priority readiness issues is in the final stages of development.

Mr O'Dowd: The Minister will be aware that, before COVID had its devastating economic impact, we were in recession. One of the reasons why we were in recession was the uncertainty around Brexit and the uncertainty faced by businesses and employees. Does the Minister agree that the worst-case outcome is that we have no deal at the end of the talks and that that will have a further devastating impact on our economy?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. Actually, before COVID hit, the Northern Ireland economy was performing well, and we were pleased to see that happening. Of course, we need to see an overall agreement being reached. We very much encourage the negotiators to find that way forward. We know that there are still some very significant sticking points, particularly around fisheries governance and the issue of a level playing field. We hope that solutions can be found to those issues in the coming days, because, if not, we will have a hugely significant task ahead of us, running up to the end of the year. The Executive are agreed that flexibility needs to be shown by others so that we do not reap the harvest of the protocol, which could cause us severe difficulties, particularly with foodstuff coming from Great Britain into Northern Ireland. We ask for flexibility, but we also hope that the negotiations reach a good outcome.

Mr O'Toole: There is an almost overwhelming amount of detail for the Assembly and our economy to process before the end of this year. It is, frankly, bewildering and scary. I ask the First Minister for an urgent update on the volume of primary and secondary legislation that the Assembly will be required to pass before the end of this year to give us a semblance of preparation. At the minute, we have not had really any update from the Executive Office about what the Assembly will have to achieve in the next few weeks. Frankly, that is not good enough.

Mrs Foster: I do not agree with the Member that he has not had any idea about what is expected of the Assembly and the Executive. We have been very clear that a number of statutory instruments will have to be brought forward. The different Committees are working their way through those statutory instruments. Nobody is pretending for a second that, if there is not a negotiated outcome, it is not going to be a very difficult period ahead; of course it is. It is very important that we all work together to make sure that we get through this period of great uncertainty, so that we can go into next year in a much more positive frame of mind.

Dr Aiken: The First Minister and the deputy First Minister wrote, on 5 November, to the European Commission and received a reply that was — for the Europeans — prompt but not very forthcoming. Will the First Minister update us on any further steps that the Executive Office is taking to ensure that we have security of our food supply?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question, which he raised with me when I made my statement, last week, on the British-Irish Council. We felt that there was a need to write to the vice president of the Commission, Mr Šefčovič — if I have got his name right — on the issue of goods coming from Great Britain to Northern Ireland. We are particularly concerned about the fact that the Joint Committee has not reached agreement on goods at risk.

We now face another challenge on pre-prepared meat products, with which the European Union says that there is a difficulty. The Member may recall the famous issue of lasagne going from Great Britain into Northern Ireland. Frankly, it is a nonsense. As far as I am concerned, lasagne comes over in a supermarket truck that goes to a destination in Northern Ireland and is sold in sterling to a consumer, so what is the difficulty? I hope that there is enough flexibility shown by the European Union to find a solution to the problem. I also hope that it is not using it as a way to get its own way in the main negotiations.

2.30 pm

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We move on to topical questions.

'COVID-19 Feminist Recovery Plan'

T1. Mr Nesbitt asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they support the Women's Policy Group Northern Ireland document 'COVID-19 Feminist Recovery Plan'. (AQT 661/17-22)

Mrs Foster: I am disappointed to tell the Member that I have not read the document, but, if he would like to share it with me — he has clearly read it in great detail — I would be only too happy to come back to him about it.

Mr Nesbitt: I recommend the document to the First Minister. I also recommend the response from the Civil Service. Will she address the criticisms of the Women's Policy Group to that response, particularly the denial of the fact that there is a gender pay gap and the lack of reference to women, given that 82% of part-time workers are female and are therefore most affected by COVID-19?

Mrs Foster: Thank you for raising that issue, which is of great concern to me and, I believe, to other members of the Executive. We know that women are disproportionately hit by the COVID-19 restrictions, given that many of them are in part-time, low-paid jobs. The lady whom I referred to in my first answer was seeking to take her own life because she felt that there was no purpose left to her life. We should be very concerned about that. Absolutely, I am happy to follow up on that issue with the Member.

EU Trade Deal

T2. Mr Newton asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment of the likelihood of a deal being agreed by the Government and the EU. (AQT 662/17-22)

Mrs Foster: I very much want — I hope that the Member took this from my comments to Mr O'Dowd — to see a deal between the United Kingdom and the European Union, because it would be better not just for us in Northern Ireland but for all the countries and institutions involved if we reached an agreement.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for her reply. Unfortunately, I was not in the Chamber when Mr O'Dowd asked his question, so I apologise for that. Which part of the text from an emerging agreement would you be studying with particular reference to Northern Ireland's position?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for that. Of course, if there is a free trade agreement, that will make the operation of the protocol, to which, he knows, we are opposed, easier on the people of Northern Ireland, and we will not have to deal with some of the issues that we have been talking about, such as goods at risk coming from Great Britain to Northern Ireland, which, of course, is a complete anathema, given that we are part of the same country. However, hopefully, if there is an overall agreement, we will not have to deal with those thorny issues.

COVID-19: Local Government

T3. Ms P Bradley asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what further role they believe that local government can play in the battle against COVID-19, given the great role it played during the first lockdown. (AQT 663/17-22)

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for her question. I am pleased to say that there has been proactive and meaningful engagement with local government, principally through the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE) and the two junior Ministers. I am pleased to see the way in which there has been engagement, and I am pleased that it wants to play a role in dealing with COVID-19 by helping us to get COVID-secure businesses and helping with community champions and ambassadors, as well as assurance schemes to de-risk some of the issues out there. I am pleased to say that local government is working proactively.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the First Minister for her answer. Surely, to help in the battle against COVID, we need tougher enforcement to deter people from breaking the rules. Can you give us some views on that?

Mrs Foster: Yes, tougher enforcement, probably, and more resource. I think it is common cause across the Executive that, if we need to put further resource into dealing with the issue, we will try to do that.

Enforcement is an issue for a number of agencies. The junior Ministers have been leading on enforcement and compliance. It is important that we see people called out if they are simply rule-breaking and not listening to the messages on why it is important to be COVID-secure. We will want to look at that important issue continuously.

Criticism of Surge Plans and Public Health Leadership

T4. Mr Givan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, after paying tribute to the front-line health workers who are doing an incredible job in very difficult circumstances, whether they have a response to the very critical comments on today's 'Talkback' programme, by Prof Gabriel Scally, an eminent public physician of world renown, about the Department of Health's surge plans and overall public health leadership, albeit that they may not have heard the programme. (AQT 664/17-22)

Mrs Foster: I have not heard Professor Scally's comments, and I am sure that he would not be surprised by that. It is important that we have plans in place to deal with the issues in front of us. I join the Member in paying tribute to our health and social care staff, all those who have put themselves in harm's way for the community. There was a huge outpouring of support during the first wave, and I think that many staff got through on adrenaline and a recognition that there was huge support. In this wave, I understand that a lot of them are tired. They have worked long, hard hours, and I want to tell them that their work has not gone unnoticed and that the House and the Executive deeply appreciate it.

Mr Givan: I thank the First Minister for that response. Are there additional support measures that the Executive Office can provide to the Minister of Health so that effective decisions on the internal running of his Department can be taken so that the front-line staff get the support that they need to provide the people of Northern Ireland with the best possible support?

Mrs Foster: We continuously speak with the Health Department from the Executive Office and, indeed, across the Executive, and, if specific issues have arisen in relation to surge planning, testing or the roll-out of a vaccination, we will very much want to assist the Health Minister to deal with those issues because we recognise that COVID is an issue for all of us. It is important to say that because we want to tackle it together. Whatever about what happened last week, we all recognise that there is a need to step up and to deal with all of the issues in front of us, because we are in a very difficult situation at present.

NDNA: New Approach to Government

T5. Mr Allister asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister how the new approach to government in Northern Ireland, which the New Decade, New Approach agreement boasted about, is going. (AQT 665/17-22)

Mrs Foster: Given that we only came back on 11 January — much to the delight of the Member — and that we then faced a global pandemic and given that we are in a five-party coalition, we are dealing with the issues in front of us. As leaders in our community of all five parties, we want to see resolutions happen. Sometimes, it does not look too pretty — we accept that — but that does not take away the fact that we want to find solutions and a way forward because we recognise that the people of Northern Ireland have put their trust in us.

Mr Allister: Was last week's omnishambles not confirmation that, if a mandatory coalition cannot work even on what should be a unifying issue of public health, it will never work and it is a cruel deception on the people of Northern Ireland, who deserve better, to pretend that it will?

Mrs Foster: No. I do not accept that. The Member will not be surprised at that. As I have said, it was a very difficult week; it was a tortuous week. However, it is right that we try to take decisions that are balanced and proportionate and take into account the enormous pressure that our healthcare staff and hospitals are under but also recognise that people need to earn a living, otherwise they fall into poverty and fall into health outcomes that are very bad as well. So, look, I make no apology for trying to get to a balanced and proportionate place, and I think that that is where the people of Northern Ireland want us to get to as well.

Cross-community Vote

T6. Mr T Buchanan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to respond to criticisms levelled by parties over the weekend and today about so-called abuse of the cross-community vote. (AQT 666/17-22)

Mrs Foster: Given our history in Northern Ireland, a number of protections are built into the operating of the Assembly and Executive. There is also an obligation in the ministerial code to try to seek consensus rather than to simply drive through controversial matters by a simple majority. That protection is written into the Northern Ireland Act 1998 to ensure that sufficient consensus is achieved. That safeguard can be triggered by any three Ministers of any parties when they are opposed to a course of action on any topic.

The determining factor subsequently becomes the fairly blunt tools — I accept that — of parallel consent or weighted majority. However, it is lawful that that is used, and any impression created that the sufficient consensus requirement applies only to so-called unionist or nationalist issues is entirely bogus and is, frankly, at odds with the Northern Ireland Act. People might like to revisit the Northern Ireland Act and have a look at it.

Mr T Buchanan: I thank the Minister for her response. Was a change in that voting mechanism an issue in the three years of negotiations to restore the Executive?

Mrs Foster: Not that I am aware of. The only suggestion that I recall was from one of the smaller parties to reduce the threshold for such protections from three Ministers to two. We all know that there are those who want to apportion blame on the use of vetoes and all the rest of it. The truth is that we should never have got to that point, and I hope that, in our discussions in the coming days, which, again, will be difficult and controversial, we can get to a position without the need to invoke any of that.

Efforts of Healthcare Staff

T7. Mrs Cameron asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment of the efforts of healthcare staff in the second wave of the pandemic, particularly in light of gifts being left at hospitals, the lack of clapping on Thursday evenings and the lack of hot food and drink being served to those workers, not least those in COVID wards and in ICUs. (AQT 667/17-22)

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for her question. She has put her finger on the matter. I know that the Member has family in positions in ICU and will, therefore, be fully aware of the difficulties that our nursing staff face.

I say again that we absolutely support all those who put themselves in harm's way. We know how restrictive all this is not just when they are working but in their home lives, and we very much appreciate everything that they do.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the First Minister for her answer. It is important that we demonstrate our support for the incredible work that healthcare workers are doing in these challenging times.

Does the First Minister believe that the Executive can find a balanced and proportionate way forward over the winter months in dealing with COVID-19?

Mrs Foster: I think that we have found a balanced and proportionate way forward. We need to continue to find that balanced and proportionate way forward. When we have the testing regime to a higher level of capacity where we can test staff in healthcare, social care and care home settings more frequently, that will help. It will also give them a sense of worth that we are concerned about their well-being and want to know what is happening in those settings. The testing regime is very much part of what we need to do. As I said in reply to an earlier question, it is important that we take the learnings from the Liverpool experience and use them in Northern Ireland so that we can be more focused on using testing as a mechanism to cut transmission of the virus.

COVID-19: Reopening of Businesses

T8. Mr Irwin asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what assurances they can give, given the business community's concerns over recent COVID-19 related closures and their impact, that the planned reopening will be made crystal clear to businesses and that they will have sufficient time to know what is happening. (AQT 668/17-22)

Mrs Foster: We really regret the fact that our businesses were left in the position they were left in last week. A lot of them have been challenged in terms of stocking up and the amount of money they have spent in dealing with COVID-19 restrictions. We want to be as clear as possible, so we will continue to engage with the retail sector, the hospitality sector and, indeed, with our faith sectors, as we do, to get as many messages out as possible and to hear from them about what they can do to help us in this terrible time.

2.45 pm

Mr Speaker: Time is almost up. William Irwin, your supplementary.

Mr Irwin: I thank the First Minister for her response. I impress on her the urgency of the situation in which many businesses find themselves. They are at their wits' end; I know that she is aware of that. It is important for them to get clarity.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for that.

Mr Speaker: Time is up. Members may take their ease for a moment or two.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair)

Infrastructure

Diesel Emissions: Private and Light Goods Vehicles

1. Ms Bailey asked the Minister for Infrastructure for an update on diesel emissions testing for private and light goods vehicles. (AQO 1097/17-22)

Ms Mallon (The Minister for Infrastructure): I have recently approved the award of a £16.5 million contract to build a new test centre and enforcement depot at Hydebank in Belfast, which are scheduled to open in autumn 2022. The new test centre will include facilities to deliver safely fully compliant emissions testing, and its design will be used as a template for further proposed test centres, subject to further consideration and funding.

The Driver and Vehicle Agency (DVA) currently conducts fully compliant diesel emissions tests on all heavy goods vehicles, buses and vans over 3,500 kg and a partial diesel emissions test for cars and light goods vehicles. The partial test includes a visual inspection of the vehicle's emissions and a check of the engine malfunction indicator lamp (MIL), which indicates a defect in the vehicle emission control systems.

Reintroducing full emissions testing will require the modernisation of the test centre network to create safe, sustainable environments for DVA staff and customers. That is a longer-term programme of work that will require substantial capital investment. I will examine the issue further in the coming weeks and months to ensure that we can safely deliver a fully compliant diesel emissions test for cars and light goods vehicles.

Ms Bailey: I thank the Minister for her answer. This has been going on for years and years, and we keep hearing that there are plans to deal with it. Will the Minister give the House a time frame so that we know that diesel private and light goods vehicles will be checked, just as every other vehicle in Northern Ireland is checked?

Ms Mallon: I agree with the Member that the issue has been going on for a long time. I inherited the current network of vehicle test centres, which is over 40 years old and cannot support the introduction of a fully compliant diesel emissions test without significant capital investment. The DVA introduced a diesel emissions test for cars, light and heavy goods vehicles and buses in 2006, in compliance with the roadworthiness directive. However, for health and safety reasons related to the build-up of fumes in the test halls and in consultation with the Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland, the emission test for cars and light goods vehicles was suspended in June 2006. I assure the Member that, on taking up this post, I wanted to address the issue, which is why I have allocated the capital funding. We are looking to autumn 2022 when we will see the new depot at Hydebank that will include this facility, and I would be keen to see this rolled out across further depots in the coming years.

Mr Dunne: Can the Minister give an update on an increase in capacity for MOTs for vehicles moving forward? What is being done to try to accommodate the public in waiting inside the building in a safe and hygienic manner? At present, as I understand it, the public are left to wait in the rain, which is totally unacceptable.

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. We have been aware of the issue of customers having to wait outside the test centres. We are conducting a number of risk assessments, and we are providing local arrangements at each of the MOT centres to facilitate customers. We will be providing masks and are asking them to be mindful of social distancing and the use of hand gel to help address that.

The current capacity for vehicle testing at our MOT centres is approximately at 30% in comparison with the levels prior to the pandemic and the lift issues. To meet increasing demand, the DVA is in the process of recruiting additional examiners. It will also use overtime to provide additional capacity and cover for vehicle tests, if, due to a variety of unforeseen reasons such as sick absence or the requirement to self-isolate, examiners are unable to attend work. I am conscious of the disruption being caused to those who are trying to access public-facing services, but the COVID-19 restrictions mean that the DVA has had to adapt its services to ensure that they can be provided safely. We ask customers for their patience at this difficult time. Vehicle testing capacity will increase as restrictions ease. Risk assessments are continually updated until such times as normal service delivery can resume.

Mr Beggs: Last week, the Westminster Government decided to bring forward the ban on new fossil fuel vehicles to 2030. That will bring a considerable reduction in emissions. What consideration has been given to the creation of a hydrogen hub in Northern Ireland? The emission from a hydrogen vehicle is water, which is much preferable to what is used at present.

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. He is right that in early February the United Kingdom Government announced that they were bringing forwards their plans to ban the sales of diesel and petrol vehicles in the UK from 2040 to at least 2035. The ban will also include hybrid vehicles for the first time. My Department is liaising with the Office for Low Emission Vehicles to consider what we need to do to meet the challenge. The Member will also be aware of the actions that we are taking to increase the uptake of electric vehicles.

On the issue of the hydrogen hub, the Member will know that, shortly, we hope to bring online three hydrogen-fuelled buses. With the hydrogen hub, that will be the first on the island of Ireland. I recently met the Finance Minister, the Economy Minister and the AERA Minister to see what we can do to maximise the environmental and economic benefits of positioning Northern Ireland as a leader in the world of hydrogen.

Comber Greenway: Street Lights

2. Ms Bunting asked the Minister for Infrastructure when street lights will be installed along the Comber greenway. (AQO 1098/17-22)

Ms Mallon: As you will be aware, a number of Members have raised the issue recently. I recognise the importance of lighting, and this is key to enhancing greenways and making people feel safe when using them. I also understand that, during the dark evenings, we still want to maintain the levels of walking and cycling on our greenways that we have seen, particularly during COVID. Lighting of the Comber greenway will require a public consultation, and the design will need to be sympathetic to the environmental sensitivity of the route. My Department is currently carrying out preliminary design work for lighting the Comber greenway. Following completion of an outline design for a lighting scheme of the greenway, a public consultation will have to be conducted. This will inform a decision on whether or not lighting should be installed.

Ms Bunting: I am grateful to the Minister for her answer. She will know that the ducts were installed a couple of years ago, I think. She will also know that the place is pitch-black. We now know about the benefits of walking to all of society, particularly for people's mental health in these uncertain times. People using that greenway might be in the middle of it at dusk. Then, all of a sudden, there is pure darkness, and you cannot see your hand in front of your face. At the same time, there are cyclists, joggers and pedestrians. There are rabbits and dogs, and, most importantly, there is dog fouling. People need to be able to see, not just for their safety but for the practical use of the greenway. I appreciate what the Minister said about a public consultation, but can she indicate the time frame for that?

Ms Mallon: I cannot give the Member a definitive time frame at present. As I said, we are working through a design, and it will have to go out to consultation. As someone who uses the greenway frequently, the Member will know that a number of properties back on to it and that bats are present in the area, which will have to be factored into the design. I assure the Member that I am committed to the roll-out of the improvement of existing greenways. They bring huge physical and mental health benefits. As the Comber greenway has demonstrated, greenways can be a solution to a multiplicity of problems. I reassure her that I want to advance this agenda and am keen to work with the councils. Indeed, the steering group that was established between the three councils and my Department will meet on 9 December, and I hope that we can, in partnership, continue to make progress on improving that asset.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for the work of her Department to upgrade the Toucan Crossing at the Braniel section of the Connswater community greenway in east Belfast.

Will the Minister provide an update on her Department's work, in conjunction with councils, on the potential transfer to councils of responsibility for the Comber greenway, thereby enabling the high-level, ongoing maintenance and upgrade of that community asset?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. He was an active campaigner on the issue of the crossing; indeed, he shared with me a petition signed by a number of residents.

As I said, my Department has established a steering group, with agreed terms of reference, to consider the matter. As I stated in my previous answer, the next meeting is scheduled to take place on 9 December. Councils' wider powers in respect of community development, health and well-being puts them in a better place to develop greenways as community assets. I am very open to exploring whether the three councils might capitalise on those opportunities, and that includes the option of transferring ownership to them.

Mr O'Toole: For the people of east Belfast, the Comber and Connswater greenways are examples of how wonderful these facilities are. In my South Belfast constituency, people in Carryduff are keen to see progress. Will the Minister provide an update on that and raise the matter with the relevant council at the meeting in the weeks ahead?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. It is clear from the amount of correspondence that I have had that Members across Northern Ireland feel passionate about greenways. The Member will be aware that I announced £20 million of capital funding for blue/green infrastructure. I am keen to work with councils to see the further development of greenways. I am funding a number of greenways that are ready for construction in this financial year. We have also written to councils to encourage them to develop their proposals so that we can get as many as possible to the stage where we can move them on to construction. I am keen to work with councils on the development of greenways across Northern Ireland, including, of course, one in Carryduff.

Lough Neagh: Sand Dredging

3. Mr Carroll asked the Minister for Infrastructure how permitting sand dredging in Lough Neagh fits with her Department's aims to address climate change. (AQO 1099/17-22)

Ms Mallon: Climate change is the single biggest environmental challenge that we face today, so it is vital that we work together towards a zero-carbon future that delivers better outcomes for our people, our economy and the environment. There is an urgent need to reduce emissions in order to tackle the climate emergency that we face and reach net zero as quickly as possible. As Infrastructure Minister, I have a clear agenda on climate change. My focus is on using available resources to create greener infrastructure and to deliver sustainable transport that connects people, unlocks our economic potential, protects our valuable environment and improves the health and well-being of all in our community.

Where an application is made for planning permission, my Department, in dealing with that application, must have regard to the local development plan, so far as it is material to the application, and to any other material considerations.

Those other material considerations include the regional development strategy 2035, the strategic planning policy statement, the planning strategy for rural Northern Ireland, retained planning policy statements and supplementary planning guidance. This application was subject to environmental impact assessment, habitats regulation assessment and a public inquiry before the Planning Appeals Commission. My decision to grant planning permission was taken after consideration of all of the above, and I am content that it properly considers any impacts on climate change.

3.00 pm

Mr Carroll: I thank the Minister for her answer. The Minister may or may not be aware that article 31 of the Wildlife and Natural Environment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 makes it an offence to permit the carrying out of an operation which damages any feature of an area of special scientific interest — obviously, the whole of Lough Neagh is one — stating that anyone who does so shall be guilty of a criminal offence. Given that the removal of natural habitats by sand dredging creates unquestionable damage and the fact that sand dredging is still unlawful, is the Minister not clearly committing a criminal act under that legislation by permitting further extraction that damages an area of special scientific interest?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. I am an advocate for protection of the environment, particularly a special one such as Lough Neagh. The decision to grant planning permission for sand dredging on Lough Neagh was taken in line with current planning policy. The environmental effects of the development have been the subject of rigorous assessment including environmental impact assessment, habitat regulations, appropriate assessment and a public inquiry hearing. I have come to the view that no adverse effect will be caused by the development on the lough in terms of its integrity or other aspects of its designated status, provided that suitable conditions and agreed measures are put in place.

Given the importance of maintaining the integrity of the designated status of Lough Neagh, my final decision will issue only when the section 76 agreement with the applicant and relevant parties has been concluded to my satisfaction. The conditions and section 76 cover matters such as the area that can be subject to dredging and the amount of dredging that can take place and when it can take place. They also cover the system for monitoring those aspects of the operation. The conditions and section 76, between them, will limit the number, size and operating times of the barges and restrict the hours of operation of the downstream processing facilities.

Ms Sheerin: Following this decision, will the Minister, at the very least, commit to robust monitoring of the dredging of Lough Neagh?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for her question. As I outlined in the supplementary response to Mr Carroll, there are a number of conditions attached. Monitoring is one, and my officials and I, as Minister, will take it very seriously.

Dr Aiken: Dredging has been permitted in a very limited area of Lough Neagh. Does the Minister accept that, were we to import sand from elsewhere, even more significant environmental and economic damage would occur and add significant costs to the construction and manufacturing industries here?

Ms Mallon: The Member makes an important point. We, as leaders, always weigh up the environmental aspect and the economic aspect. I have been very clear in the conditions that are being placed on this particular development. That is to ensure that we do what we can to protect our environment. However, the Member is also right to point out the contribution that it makes to the construction sector, in particular. As someone who is very mindful of our housing shortage, I am very conscious of the need to build more homes. We have to make sure that we are in a position to be able to do so. We have to consider all those things in the round. I hope that anyone who has been following this situation closely will take some reassurance from the fact that we have placed conditions on this. I am always very mindful of the impact on our environment of the decisions that we all take.

Roads: Winter Gritting

4. Mr McAleer asked the Minister for Infrastructure for an update on the winter gritting service. (AQO 1100/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I am pleased to advise that my Department started the delivery of its winter gritting service on 19 October. Gritting on selected routes in the northern and western divisions has already been undertaken, and 330 tons of salt has been used to date. As part of planning for the winter gritting programme, my Department ensures that adequate staff are available, that all winter service equipment is in satisfactory working order, and that there are adequate supplies of salt. There are also arrangements in place to supplement stocks of salt during the winter period, if necessary. A full winter service will operate from 19 October until 5 April and will have approximately 300 staff and 130 gritters available and ready to salt main roads in order to help drivers across Northern Ireland deal with wintry conditions.

The average cost of providing the winter service is £7 million, but it can be as high as £10 million in more severe winter conditions. I have already allocated £3 million from the opening 2020-21 resource baseline budget as a contribution to funding for the winter service, and a recent COVID bidding exercise provided a further £5 million in funding for winter gritting services. I was disappointed that my further bid for £2 million in the October monitoring round was not successful. However, funding for the winter service will be reassessed as part of January monitoring, and any bid that is required will be submitted by my Department.

Mr McAleer: I thank the Minister for her response. She will be aware that, along with Ms Sheerin behind me here, I have been lobbying for quite a while now in relation to the B47 route through the Sperrins. That is a key route for people living up in communities like Cranagh for accessing services in south Derry, Magherafelt and Ballinascreen. Will the Minister give further consideration to including that section of the B47 from Cranagh to Ballinascreen on the main gritting schedule?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question; I am aware that, with his colleagues, he has been raising this issue. Under the present policy, 28% of the road network is gritted, which covers 80% of the volume of traffic, and that has an average cost of £7 million. If I were to extend that to cover, say, 90% of our traffic, it would double the cost of the winter gritting service to £14 million. If I were to extend it further to cover 100% of traffic, we would be talking about an annual budget of £28 million for the winter gritting service. My Department has to operate within the policy to ensure that it is fairly applied across the board in Northern Ireland. I would very much like to be in a position to do much more salting and gritting, but I have to operate within the policy and, particularly, within the financial constraints facing my Department.

Mr McCrossan: Minister, given COVID, what contingency services are in place for winter services going forward?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. My Department has a staff sickness contingency plan in place which ensures that, initially, efforts are directed towards motorways and trunk roads before moving on to other main roads. Even with all of our available resources, it is unknown what impacts COVID-19 will have on our winter service. The traffic information control centre is operational 24 hours, 7 days a week, and will advise the public through the TrafficwatchNI website and social media of any routes not salted due to staff sickness. I want to assure the Member that this is something that we are very conscious of and that we are keeping our contingency arrangements under constant review.

Mr Butler: I am sure that the Minister would like to join me in Road Safety Week and take up the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service challenge today to "kill your speed", given the problems that ice and snow can cause. As we know, rainwater has been a problem over the past weekend. Will the Minister take a look at the A26, particularly under the railway bridge? Members from Lagan Valley will know what I am talking about. Close to Moira, it floods absolutely every year, and it is a main arterial route. It is one of the busiest roads in Northern Ireland. Will the Minister give an undertaking today to look at that, please?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. Unfortunately I do not have the detail of that specific road to hand, but I am content to speak with officials after Question Time and ask them to look into the matter and report back to you.

Bicycle Strategy

5. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister for Infrastructure whether her departmental budget for 2021-22 will facilitate meeting the bicycle strategy target of £10 per capita spend on cycling. (AQO 1101/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question; I know that this is an area he is very passionate about. My Department does not identify spend on walking and cycling separately but includes funding for both in active travel. The attribution of spend to active travel is also not a precise exercise, as some projects have benefits for active travel even if they are not carried out specifically for that purpose. Other Departments, councils and other agencies provide additional funding for walking and cycling promotion and infrastructure development. For example, we have had recent commitments of many millions of pounds by a number of councils for walking and cycling as part of their contribution to the greenways that they are developing.

I am not in a position to provide guarantees for active travel in 2021-22. The Executive have not agreed the Budget for next year; therefore, I do not know what budget my Department will have. However, I can confirm that I am committed to investing in active travel and encouraging walking and cycling. In demonstration of that commitment, I have appointed a walking and cycling champion in my Department and invested in a £20 million fund for the development of blue/green infrastructure, which will support the connection of communities and active travel. I expect to make further investments in active travel next year.

Already this year, I have completed the new Blaris greenway and pop-up cycle lanes on the Dublin and Grosvenor Roads, and I continue to develop more opportunities to put walking and cycling at the front of a green recovery for all our towns and cities. My September announcement indicated a total capital grant for the six greenway projects of £1.4 million this year and £2.3 million next year. Capital funding for those increased grants could be made available from blue/green infrastructure funding.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for her support of active travel. Does she, however, agree that there has been underinvestment in active travel infrastructure? Would she consider an active travel Act to make it a statutory responsibility for a minimum percentage of the Department for Infrastructure's budget to be spent on active travel?

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. I agree with his assessment that there has not been enough funding to encourage and provide opportunities for citizens to walk and cycle. I am committed to addressing that.

I advise him that I am actively considering an active travel Bill. I have asked my officials to prepare a submission that sets out a range of options for how I can move that forward with policy changes, resources and what we might be able to do on the legislative front.

Mr McGuigan: The Minister will obviously be aware of the tragic death of another cyclist on our roads five days ago. Without any knowledge of that specific incident, as a cyclist, I am well aware that, without cycling-only infrastructure and additional cycling safety measures, unfortunately, further tragedies on our roads will occur. Does the Minister intend to review the Highway Code to explore ways of strengthening it with cycling safety measures?

Ms Mallon: I am aware of that fatality, and I want to express my deepest sympathies to the family and friends of the person who lost their life. I agree with the Member that one of the best ways of encouraging people to cycle and ensure that they can do so safely is by providing cycling-only infrastructure. I am very keen to work with councils on that. I have to be honest: as someone with very little patience, I would like to see a much faster pace of change, but we are trying to do what we can.

As part of my consideration of safe active travel, I have asked officials to look at what we can do to review the Highway Code. I am keen to provide updates to the all-party group on cycling, which I know the Member is on.

Mr Dunne: Is the Minister convinced that she is getting it right with her priorities? I appreciate her enthusiasm for greenways, cycle lanes and so on, but we need to get back to the basic principles of maintaining our existing road structure. Is the Minister convinced that she is getting it right?

I look at my constituency of North Down and the A2, which carries 45,000 vehicles per day. The drains are blocked. Following a strong campaign by us, the grass is now being cut twice a year and weeds are growing wild on the verges. That is not happening only in my constituency; Belfast, including south Belfast, which now has an SDLP MP, is an absolute disgrace. Weeds are growing on footpaths and grass verges.

Minister, with all due respect, you have your priorities wrong. We have a huge volume of vehicles —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Could the Member come to a question or he will not get an answer?

Mr Dunne: People pay road tax, but cyclists do not.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Question please, Gordon.

Mr Dunne: I appreciate that. Thanks very much.

3.15 pm

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member. I know that he is very passionate about his constituency. I do not believe that I am getting my priorities wrong. The Member will recall that, on taking up my post, I said that we needed to get the basics right, and that is why I have fully funded a 12-month repair scheme for street lighting and why I have invested £8 million in LEDs to replace our street lights. It is why I have maintained the structural budget for our roads and set up a £10 million rural roads fund as well.

It is not a question of getting priorities right; it is question of having the resource to be able to do what you want. The Member will know that the Barton report said that we should be investing £140 million per annum in our road network. I am not being allocated money to in any way touch the sides of that figure. I want to bring about change in active travel, and I want to make sure that people can be active and that they have better outcomes for their physical and mental health and in terms of the environment as well, but I share the Member's frustration. If I had much more money, I would be doing much, much more.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I have time for a very brief question from Sinéad Bradley, followed by an answer.

All-island Infrastructure

6. Ms S Bradley asked the Minister for Infrastructure for an update on her discussions with the Irish Government on all-island infrastructure. (AQO 1102/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I am fully committed to improving connectivity across the island, and I am working with my counterparts in Dublin on a number of key all-island projects aimed at improving the lives of people across the island. This includes enhancing the rail network to create a spine of connectivity on the island, the A5 project, the Narrow Water bridge project and the Ulster canal project, all of which are commitments in New Decade, New Approach.

The Member will know that I have been engaging with Minister Ryan, and I know that she has an interest in Narrow Water bridge. I joined party colleagues in a Zoom meeting with the Taoiseach on Friday night. He is giving updates to all parties on the shared-island unit, and I discussed with him the issue of Narrow Water and the multiple benefits that that project can deliver, which is news that I know the Member will be delighted by.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): That concludes the period for listed questions. We will now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Belfast International Airport

T1. Dr Aiken asked the Minister for Infrastructure what additional support she might consider for Belfast International Airport, albeit that responsibility for airports would lie better with the Department for the Economy, as opposed to the Department for Infrastructure. (AQT 671/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. Our local airports play an important role in growing our local economy and in connecting people and business. I am disappointed to learn about the reduced hours of operation at Belfast International Airport, but I understand how that reduction in operations will help the airport reduce its cost base in light of the reduction in scheduled services because of the COVID-19 measures.

The Member is right: my Department's remit on airports is limited. I have agreed previously to meet the airport, and I am committed to working alongside my ministerial colleagues, given the shared statutory responsibilities in this area, to explore what the Executive can do to support the industry through this challenging time.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister for her comments and, indeed, her support for the aviation sector in Northern Ireland. As she is aware, Belfast International Airport is the only 24-hour operational airport in Northern Ireland, and it is not just a question of commercial aviation but a question of general aviation. It is about fixed-wing air ambulance support, about the PSNI and it has been available as an alternative diversionary airfield along the edge of the Atlantic as well, so it has significant implications. The fact that Northern Ireland does not have a 24-hour operational airport will have a considerable impact, not just on our international reputation but on our ability to grow and maintain business going forward. Is the Minister willing to join with the Finance Minister to work together to get a bespoke package for Belfast International Airport so that it can get back to 24-hour operation for the good of everybody in Northern Ireland as soon as possible?

Ms Mallon: As the Member highlighted, the issue of airports cuts across a number of policy areas but also across the statutory responsibilities of a number of Ministers. I can assure him that, just as we did before, I am committed to working with the Minister of Finance and, given her responsibility around airlines, the Minister for the Economy as well. I believe that, if we work together, we can and should be able to support the industry through this incredibly difficult time.

Rural Roads

T2. Ms Dillon asked the Minister for Infrastructure for an update on the rural roads fund. (AQT 672/17-22)

Ms Mallon: As the Member will know, we have allocated £10 million for the rural roads fund. That is being worked out across divisions. We are providing reports to all of the councils on the projects that have qualified for investment as part of the rural roads fund. Those reports are being made available on the councils' websites.

Ms Dillon: I appreciate the Minister's answer, and the fact that we will be able to get online access to those reports. Does the Minister's Department have a strategy or funding coming forward for short stretches of footpaths in rural areas? Such infrastructure would make a big difference for people being able to walk to school or football clubs. At this time, we are devoid of a strategy and, in many areas, any type of infrastructure.

Ms Mallon: I am aware that the absence of footpaths to ensure that people can walk safely is an issue across the North. It runs counter to my ambition to have more people walking and cycling. That is why I have set up the £20 million blue/green fund. I have also been clear that I cannot impose solutions from on high. I do not know communities. That is why I am looking to councils to bring forward proposals that I can support financially, and on which I can work with them to try to progress. We have had a focus on cities in the initial roll-outs and pilots, but I am conscious of the fact that we need to see improvements across the North.

Infrastructure Commission

T3. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister for Infrastructure for her thoughts about a potential infrastructure commission, given the recent PAC report that was quite damning about capital project delivery in Northern Ireland, some of which falls to her Department. (AQT 673/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. He will know that I set up a ministerial advisory panel to look at that issue. I understand that the panel has reported to the Committee. I am sure that the support that the Committee had for the initiative when I went to discuss the matter, remains. I am keen to see that it is progressed with my Executive colleagues. I have already met the Finance Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, and I am due to meet the Education Minister and the Communities Minister. There are opportunities to be more strategic in the planning and delivery of our infrastructure in its more holistic sense. I am, therefore, keen to see how that can be progressed with my Executive colleagues so that we can get into a better position with regard to long-term planning and the future delivery of strategic infrastructure projects.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for the optimism in her answer. Does the Minister see the report as having sidelined the Infrastructure Minister in any way, as the commission would report directly to the Executive? What takes place in other devolved situations?

Ms Mallon: I am sure that it seems bizarre to have an Infrastructure Minister say that she wants to see an infrastructure commission that deals with issues outside the Department and brings them to the Executive, but it is not about a power grab for the Infrastructure Minister. It is about ensuring that we have the right mechanisms for delivering our infrastructure projects strategically, minimising delays and doing it in the most efficient manner. We have to look at our competitors across these islands. We look to New Zealand and often cite it as an example of how you can do things much better. All of those places have an independent infrastructure commission because they have ambition. We should not have any less ambition.

Driving Tests

T4. Mr K Buchanan asked the Minister for Infrastructure for an update on driving tests and what additional measures she will put in place in relation to them after the relaxation of the current regulations. (AQT 674/17-22)

Ms Mallon: As the Member will know, driving instructors were included in the Executive's regulations on businesses that closed until 13 November to help stop the spread of COVID-19, and which have been further extended by the Executive to 20 November. Following that Executive decision, driving tests ceased over that period of increased restrictions based on public health and scientific advice. I assure the Member that we have work in order and that we will be recommencing driving tests on 21 November. We took a decision not to recommence on 20 November, because we are allowing a day for people to have their formal driving lessons, if they need to.

With regard to creating additional capacity, the DVA has opened up the booking system for February for the customers who were impacted by the recent restrictions. Over 2,000 additional booking slots have been made available in November, December and January as the DVA increases capacity by recruiting additional examiners. Once all customers whose test has been cancelled recently have had the opportunity to rebook their appointments, the DVA will open up the booking service for all other customers in early December. The DVA will continue to offer driving tests on a Saturday. Following consultation with key stakeholders, it is planning to offer driving tests for HGVs on Sundays. The DVA will also use overtime to rota off-shift dual-role driving examiners to provide additional capacity and cover for scheduled driving tests where, due to a variety of unforeseen reasons, such as sick absence or the requirement to self-isolate, driving examiners are unable to attend work.

Mr K Buchanan: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. Minister, I have concerns about how you are going to address the backlog. I appreciate that, for car MOTs, you can issue a temporary exemption certificate (TEC), which will let people drive on. I have concerns about that as well because of the amount of work that garages are not doing; there are cars on the road that are not safe, although it is up to the individual to ensure that their car is safe. How are you going to increase the percentage and numbers? A rate of 100% means that driving test numbers will just sit still; you need to increase that by another 100% to address the backlog. Many young people have contacted my office because they have been turned down when they try to get a test date; they cannot get one. One or two more people will not do it; we need a massive increase in the percentage to address the backlog.

Ms Mallon: I know that disruption is being caused to learner drivers. I have taken the decision to further extend the validity of their theory test pass certificates to try to reduce the disruption to them. It is a public-facing service, and all public-facing services are being impacted by COVID. I assure the Member that it is not just a case of recruiting one or two additional examiners; we are recruiting 27 additional temporary and permanent examiners. We are looking at testing on a Saturday and Sunday to free up capacity as well. We will continue to look creatively at doing what we can to try to maximise the number of people who we can test, while being mindful of the public health advice and the need to adhere to the risk assessments that we have carried out.

Craigavon: Rail Hub

T5. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister for Infrastructure what consideration her Department has given to the provision of a rail hub in central Craigavon. (AQT 675/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I have not, to date, been able to give very active consideration to that. I am struggling to make sure that our public transport network remains viable under the current conditions, given that we have seen such dramatic falls in passenger numbers. As I have said, my job is to protect the existing public transport network in terms of bus and rail, but I also want to see it being improved and enhanced. I will continue to make representations to Executive colleagues to ensure that we get the finances that we need to see enhancements to the network, such as the one that the Member has, rightly, highlighted.

Mr O'Dowd: I appreciate the pressure that the Minister's Department and the entire Executive are under. I would not expect her to be able to say, "I'm building that within a short time". I want to ensure that it is in the mindset of the Department that we need to expand our rail network. We need to be imaginative in the provision of further rail halts, particularly along the main Belfast to Dublin line. A rail halt in central Craigavon would lift the traffic congestion out of Lurgan and allow Lurgan to return to being a market town with specialist traders.

Ms Mallon: The Member does not need to persuade me of the merits of that; I can see it, and I share his enthusiasm. It is an issue of finance. My Department is currently working on the regional strategic transport plans, which will go out for consultation. That will be an opportunity for Members and members of the public right across the North to respond and share their views and ambitions of what public transport provision they would like to see in their local community. I encourage Members and their constituents to respond to that consultation once it is published so that I can be clear on their views.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): If we turn around the next one quickly, we will get in a question and an answer.

COVID-19: Support Payments to Bus, Coach and Taxi Sectors

T6. Mr Boylan asked the Minister for Infrastructure when those in the bus, coach and taxi sectors can expect their COVID-19 support payments. (AQT 676/17-22)

Ms Mallon: I thank the Member for his question. He will know that I was given new powers for the financial scheme on 3 November. Ten days later, I opened the taxi scheme; it opened on Friday, and, at close of play, there had been around 2,000 applications.

I have committed to ensuring that payments for that scheme are out before Christmas, because I understand that people are finding it very difficult financially. The scheme for the bus-and-coach sector will open next week.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Members, please take your ease while we change the Chair and move on to the next topic.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Ministerial Statement

COVID-19: Executive Decisions on 12 November 2020

Mr Speaker: Members, I have received notice from the First Minister and deputy First Minister that they wish to make a statement.

Mrs O'Neill (The deputy First Minister): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank you and your office for making arrangements to accommodate the statement today. The First Minister and I recognise the importance of making these announcements to the Chamber, and we are grateful that you were able to facilitate us at such short notice.

On 16 October, the Executive put a series of measures in place in response to a significant increase in the transmission of COVID-19 and a concerning rise in positive cases and hospital admissions, including those requiring intensive care. Those measures were informed by the latest scientific and medical advice and a consideration of the societal and economic impacts that they could have. They have been a necessary and proportionate step to protect our valuable health service at this difficult time.

While the measures have not been easy for any of us, we are starting to see the positive impact. That has been due to the hard work of all of us in adhering to the measures, and I want to thank every one of you for that. The R number has started to come down, and positive cases and hospital admissions have started to level out. However, they are still at a very high level, which means that we are not out of the woods yet. It is, therefore, vitally important for us to continue to be vigilant at this time, especially as we face into the winter months.

It is in that context that the Executive met last week to consider the next steps that must be taken. That resulted in the current restrictions being extended for one week until 19 November, after which there will be a number of relaxations. They relate to the opening of close-contact services, including driving instructors, on 20 November, which will be by appointment only, and to the opening of unlicensed premises such as cafes and coffee shops, also on 20 November. They will operate with restricted opening hours of 5.00 am to 8.00 pm, and the consumption of alcohol on the premises will not be permitted. Both unlicensed premises and close-contact services will have a legal duty to record contact details of those using their service to assist in contact tracing. Additionally, pubs and bars will be permitted to sell off-sales from 20 November. They must be in the manufacturer's original sealed packaging only. All other restrictions remain in place until 27 November. They include the measures relating to private households and gardens, gatherings, marriages, funerals, sport and indoor attractions and libraries. We know that this will be difficult, but I want to commend the determined efforts of all of the people in our community who to date have ensured that we have made good progress. We want to thank you for that, and we want to urge you to continue to work with us in the weeks and months ahead.

You will have heard the First Minister and me talking previously about co-existing with the virus, and it is with that focus that the Executive have agreed a number of support measures, which we are now working on. They are the roll-out of a vaccination programme as early as possible, initially targeting priority groups such as healthcare staff, care homes and those with underlying vulnerabilities; ongoing preparation for the introduction of rapid and mass testing at the earliest opportunity; and additional financial supports in place for affected businesses and individuals. A focus working group will also be established that will work to mitigate the risk in the opening of hospitality businesses, including improved ventilation and requirements for the recording of customer information for contact tracing purposes.

We have all acknowledged that this was a challenging week. That is because none of the decisions before us are easy. The Executive have had to consider the impact on health, our hospitals, our health staff, alongside the economic and societal impacts and the very real impact that it has on people there too, including employees, many of whom are lower-paid. We also know that further decisions need to be made. The ability of the health service to cope over the winter months and the economic and societal impacts will remain key issues.

Going into winter — a time when people's health is already more vulnerable and the health service is under more pressure — it is vital that we continue to work together to suppress the transmission of the virus. COVID will also have a detrimental impact on people's general health and well-being, and we are mindful of the other health impacts that we are seeing in the pandemic. People will present with illnesses that are not COVID-19-related. We want people to make sure that they seek advice and services if they are worried about their health. People will also be experiencing mental health problems, social isolation and anxiety.

We will work with all sectors and other partners to identify the measures and solutions that can be put in place to effectively tackle the spread of the virus. Our wish is to avoid the need for ongoing cycles of restrictions, but we are living in a period of great uncertainty. We need to work closely with all our partners and citizens to get through the Christmas and winter period and to prepare for mass testing and the delivery of vaccines. The Executive have a very clear focus on that pathway.

There is still some way to go, and nothing about the virus is predictable. As I have previously said, there is no certainty. We know that everyone wants to know what the next few months will hold, and that is a natural expectation. We are currently planning for that, and we want to protect as much of the festive period as we can. Our clear commitment is that we will do absolutely everything we can to secure that, and we will make more announcements on that soon.

At this point, I would like to draw everyone's attention to the most powerful tool that we have at our disposal in the fight against the virus: our own behaviour and the actions that each and every one of us takes. Our decision will now ultimately shape what happens next and what steps are required. We have a new media campaign, and we encourage everyone to engage with it; to continue to follow the public health advice on social distancing; to limit our social contacts now; to wear our face coverings now; to wash our hands now; to go out only for necessary activities and travel; and to stay at home as much as we can. Those are small individual acts, but they are incredibly powerful when we act together. As a society and a community, our small, daily steps can make that real difference. They will build capacity for the health service. They will help keep the economy going. They will mean that we will do the right thing for our friends and families. Those small, daily steps are more than the sum of their parts. They are a huge part of how we will get through this.

As I said, we are very grateful to everyone for the steps that they have taken, and we understand how difficult the past months have been. We all have to dig deep now, and I have every confidence that we can do this together. The vast majority of society are following the public health advice and, in doing so, are keeping people safe and, undoubtedly, saving lives. To those who are considering going against the public health guidance and regulations, I ask you to think carefully. Your decision could be detrimental to all our efforts to reduce the transmission of this deadly virus. Your decision could also be detrimental to the health and well-being of your loved ones and to the capacity of our health service to cope.

In closing, I thank everyone for their efforts and their hard work so far. This has been a difficult year for all of us, especially the many families who have lost loved ones and the many others who have been ill as a result of COVID. However, let me end by saying that I continue to be amazed and impressed by the widespread fortitude and resilience across all our society. I know that, looking forward, we are well placed to continue rising to the unprecedented challenges that we face.

Mr McGrath (The Chairperson of the Committee for The Executive Office): I thank the joint First Minister for her statement. Last week was a failure of good governance here. It was an embarrassment and an example of how not to reach decisions. It may have been an embarrassment to the Assembly, but, more importantly, it created a system of chaos that does not deliver for the public. The background briefings, leaks and updates to us via the media were shocking. Can the joint First Minister confirm and detail the plan that is now being put in place by the Executive Office to ensure that the shambles that we witnessed last week will not be repeated and that, before 27 November, we will have a timely way forward for protecting lives and livelihoods and not party political perspectives?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Chair for his question. Last week was unedifying for everybody: not one party, not two parties, but every party that sits around the Executive table. Let me put that on the record.

We need to get a grip on the pandemic. We need to get to grips with the fact that, comparatively speaking, we find ourselves in a worse position compared with many other areas and many of our neighbours. We need to get virus transmission under control, and we need to find a way to work collectively to deliver that. We need to continue to follow the public health advice. We need to be guided all the while by what we said we would do at the very start of the pandemic: keep transmission in check and keep the pressure off our health service. Those are our guiding principles through this. What we need to do as an Executive is to go forward in the way that I outlined in the statement, where I talk about looking to the future. What can we do? What will allow us to open things up? We have had some glimmer of hope around vaccination, and we look forward to having that rolled out. Even before that, however, there is the issue of mass testing. How can we quickly get that rolled out? Doing that will allow us to have more freedoms to move around.

Everybody wants certainty now. This has been such a difficult year for everybody, and everybody is craving some certainty. I only wish that we could give that certainty, but the reality is that, because we are dealing with the pandemic, we cannot. What we can be certain about, however, is when we are going to communicate with the public. What we can be certain about are the trigger points at which we take certain decisions. That is what I want the Executive to focus on. We will focus on vaccination, on mass testing and on additional supports for individuals. The Minister for Communities will make a statement on that tomorrow, which, again, is some positive news. We have to give the public something to grab onto for the future, and it is those areas that we want to work on. The Executive need to get a grip collectively on their approach. We need to reflect on last week and make sure that it is not repeated.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the deputy First Minister for her statement to the House at what is a critical stage of the pandemic. I welcome the new media campaign. I caught sight of an ad at the weekend, and it was very good.

Does the deputy First Minister agree that every one of us has the power to control the spread of the virus and that, through taking the most basic of precautions, infection rates can be reduced further, thus allowing non-COVID health services to continue or, indeed, recommence?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I concur with the Member. It is back to basics. It is back to the principles of washing your hands and staying apart. In the simplest terms, we are trying to break the transmission of the virus, and the best way in which we can do that is to limit our contacts. We really want to reinforce that message, and we hope that the new communications campaign will help us get that message out there again and remind people of what is expected of all of us.

I also think that people should take some hope from the fact that the restrictions that we have brought in to date have worked. We have demonstrated that they work. The rate in Derry and Strabane was through the roof: the intervention there worked. We can see that the four-week intervention that we have had is starting to work. We are at where we predicted that we could be. We have to learn from those things and continue to do them where required, but, ultimately, we need to get to the point at which we have the virus transmission at a controllable rate and the pressure off our health service, and then we can focus on the other areas on which we need to be very much focused into the future.

Mr Sheehan: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a ráitis. I thank the Minister for her statement. I wonder whether she can tell us what she thinks the political fallout will be from the Executive's decision last week.

Mrs O'Neill: I described last week as being unifying for everybody. It does not reflect well on the Executive. We have a challenging Executive in the most normal of times. We have five parties sitting around the table that have a duty to work towards collective decision-making and collective responsibility, and, unfortunately, that was not the case last week.

It was a really challenging week for the Executive. It does not reflect well that we found ourselves in a difficult position but we had very clear public health advice. It is very challenging to work your way through, and I readily say that. I believe that everybody is conflicted all the while when trying to make decisions. The majority of Ministers voted to extend the restrictions for two weeks, and that should have been the case and the outworking of Executive. I find it a matter of profound concern and regret that colleagues opposite decided to use a mechanism that is there to protect minority rights. That should not have been the case. The will of the Executive should have been carried through.

3.45 pm

We need to accept where we are now. I accept that this is now the outworking of the Executive. We are all duty-bound now to communicate the current situation to the public and to work with the public and to work our way through this. We need to try to give people some hope in the middle of all this doom and gloom and the challenges and mental health damage that the pandemic brings and everything else that comes with it. For me, certainly, last week was a bad week all round, and I do not want to see that repeated.

Dr Aiken: I thank the deputy First Minister for her statement. I echo the thanks that all of us in the Assembly owe our health service workers in what they do.

In the light of the disastrous example of so-called leadership and management shown by the Northern Ireland Executive last week, in particular the divisive, significant and controversial use of the cross-community vote, will she highlight how decisions, which should be based on the science and medical advice, will now be debated and delivered cooperatively, rather than having decisions based on the narrowest of narrow political expediency, a political expediency that has already reduced the people of Northern Ireland's faith in our institutions to a new low that even I thought was impossible. With the First Minister and the deputy First Minister here, I ask you both to make a commitment now that you will not use the cross-community vote mechanism, particularly on health issues and issues that are of vital interest to the people of Northern Ireland? You are both here: you can make that commitment.

Mrs O'Neill: We should always inject a wee bit of honesty into these debates and conversations. It was not two parties that used a cross-community vote: it was one party. Let us be clear about that. Let us also say that all other parties in the Executive wanted to extend the period for two weeks. That is also honesty with the public. That reality was voted down by a cross-community mechanism, which I am aghast at. I do not believe that it should have been used. That is my clear position, and that will always be my position.

Where do we go from here? We communicate to the public where we are now; we tell them where the spread of the virus is now; we tell them about the hospital pressures that we are under now; we tell them what the current restrictions are now; and then we work towards what can we do for the future. What can we do to fix this picture and take pressure off our health service and to support people to isolate? That is what is required. All the evidence tells us that, of the people who have to self-isolate, many of those on low incomes dread getting a ping on their phone, if they have downloaded the app, because they cannot afford to isolate.

We have to get to a point where we make this as easy as we can for people in the most challenging of times. That should be the objective of the Executive, and we should be guided by two things that we said on our pathway to recovery: keeping the transmission rate under control, under 1; and, alongside that, keeping the pressure off our health service. That is what should guide us in all our future decision-making. All those decisions should be made in a timely way to make sure that people have that information well in advance so that they can plan.

Ms Armstrong: I am delighted to hear that the deputy First Minister no longer supports or does not support the use of the cross-community vote. As someone who does not have their vote counted because of the cross-community vote, I think that maybe it is now time to change that, to modernise the Assembly and move on.

Deputy First Minister, you mentioned that last week was a bad week: I do not want to continue that bad week any further. You talk about supporting people to isolate. On that basis, when we look at your statement where it talks about the roll-out of a vaccination programme, we need clarity on how some of the things in the statement will work. That is one on the things that we can give people clarity and certainty on. For clarification, will domiciliary care workers and unpaid carers, who have not had a break in nine months, be included in the vaccination programme?

All of us are looking for clarification. For instance, it talks about unlicensed premises such as cafes and coffee shops, but many of those cafes and coffee shops have bistros that open in the evenings with licensed services. Does that mean that they are closed for the whole day? We need clarification for the businesses that can open. I ask the deputy First Minister to give that clarification either now or in the regulations as they come forward.

Mrs O'Neill: On the second point, clarification will come with the regulations. We said last week that we need to help businesses to understand what is expected of them. I do not think that there has been enough communication between the Department of Health and the wider sector. Meetings with various sectors have been held throughout the pandemic, and I have to say that many sectors and businesses have worked really hard to adjust their businesses and to bring in things to make them more COVID-19-secure. We will just have to keep working at that. However, people need to be communicated with in order to make decisions about what comes next.

On the issue of the vaccine roll-out and prioritising who will get first, there will be an Executive discussion on that. I am sure that we will be able to say more about it over time. Clearly, those who work on the front line will be prioritised, as will those who are vulnerable to the virus. There will be choices to be made by the Department of Health. However, we are assured that we will receive a paper for discussion on testing and vaccination. I look forward to that conversation, hopefully this week.

Mr Buckley: The deputy First Minister talks about injecting honesty into the debate. However, she failed to mention the fact that her position on Sunday was a fair compromise. Only she can answer why that changed on Monday.

In the spirit of looking forward, I welcome the statement, as, during the crisis, it gives clarity on dates for businesses, in particular for working families, who have borne the brunt of some of the restrictions. The deputy First Minister and the First Minister have talked about coexisting with the virus, so I want to ask this: what work is going on with businesses to ensure that, when businesses reopen, they do so in a safe and compliant manner?

Mrs O'Neill: I hope that I addressed the Member's point in a previous answer when I spoke about the compliance group being put together to work with different sectors to get them ready to open. We also have supported our councils, as they have a key role to play, with local environmental health officers and enforcement officers working with businesses to help them to open in a safe, secure way. I welcome the funding that has been given to councils to do that work, and we need to continue to do that.

In order to deal with the pandemic, we need not just the Executive but all partners. We have said from the very start that it would require a partnership approach and heavy lifting by everybody. That is how we will take it forward.

Back to the point about honesty: I was very honest on Sunday in saying that I would weigh up all the factors on the basis of the public health advice. Every time we come to one of these crucial points, we have to look at it from the perspective of health, of the economy and of society. All those things are factored in to our discussions. They are very difficult decisions for everyone. You cannot take away from that. People have different emphases and priorities for what is required. When we, at this juncture, as at every juncture, have discussions with the public health team, with the Health Minister, with Michael McBride and Ian Young and they tell us, "No matter how you slice and dice it, we will, in all likelihood, be coming back to an intervention before Christmas if we do not have a full two-week lockdown" — that was the scenario with which we were faced — when I hear that evidence, I take it seriously. Further to that, after days of conversation in the Executive, we have the Chief Medical Officer saying that to proceed down this route will cause excess deaths: again, we have to take that seriously.

I accept that these are challenging conversations, and the best way to communicate with the public is with honesty. None of us can make cast-iron guarantees: we are dealing with a pandemic. It would be untrue to the public to give them any kind of guarantee. All we can do is try our very best and communicate it in a timely way and take balanced decisions in the best way we can.

Ms Sheerin: I thank the Minister for her statement and for the honesty and integrity with which she has handled this. Can the deputy First Minister update us on what local financial assistance there is for individuals at this time?

Mrs O'Neill: This is a fundamental tool in dealing with COVID-19. As I say, all the attitude surveys tell us that people intend to self-isolate, for example, but cannot because they cannot afford to. The pandemic has a disproportionate effect on those on lower incomes and women. Its implications are dire. Financial support is, for me, crucial. I know that the Communities Minister will make a statement to the House tomorrow on that. However, I will drive that message home to the public: there is financial support in place. Tomorrow, as I have said, we will have more detail around a self-isolation grant, and the current scheme will be increased. That is really important in getting that money to people who are on low incomes and maybe face a reduction in their pay because they have tested positive or have been told to self-isolate. The grant that Carál has brought forward is a tax-free and non-repayable grant, and no other jurisdiction has it. That is a really important thing that we have that she has been able to bring forward.

Alongside that, there is a dedicated urgent referral service from the advice sector to escalate supports for people who desperately need them. We, as MLAs, all should promote this work to make sure that people know where they can get support when they need it. We have had the different supports through the different helplines, which I very much welcome, and we have had the community support funding and the commitments that were made to councils. That was to help with things like, for example, grassroots services so that, whenever there are localised lockdowns, we will provide wrap-around services, food and financial support. Those are all really important areas of work that we need to continue to promote. That is because a lot of these things are out there, and I do not know if everybody knows about them. We need to continue to promote them to make sure that the people who need that support know where to go to get it.

Mr Clarke: I follow on from other questions about your honesty, deputy First Minister. You referred to advice from Mr Young: we heard Mr Young on the radio this morning, and he said that the excess deaths would occur whether we opened or otherwise. My colleague asked you about your change of opinion. Of course, at the start of this lockdown, all of the parties agreed that this would be for four weeks and four weeks only. The circumstances that brought of us out of the first lockdown were to get the R number under 1: last week, we were told that the R number was 0.7. What changed? What advice has the Minister got, and will she publish that advice on what changed between 0.7 and the previous advice, where it was under 1?

Mrs O'Neill: I encourage the Member to maybe listen to all that I say on different occasions. I was consistent from the start of the four-week intervention that I hoped that it would be a four-week intervention but we needed to keep everything on the table because we did not know where the virus would sit at the end of the four-week period. We had predicted and all of the modelling told us that the four-week intervention could get us to 0.7, which it did. Again, that demonstrates that what we are doing works. It also further modelled that it would go up again with the impact of schools, and we know that all of our measures have a lag period. The impact of schools opening means that our R rate is sitting at 0.9 and is maybe even closer to 1, if not above it, this week. We will know more about that later in the week.

All of these things are predictable and they are modelled. The Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser have been very clear with regard to the four-week-only intervention. If you remember back to the four-week intervention, the Health Minister wanted more; he modelled four to six weeks. We talked about all of these things, and we tried to get an accommodation and a way forward. We really hoped that the intervention would work, but, when it does not work, you have to do further things. That is the position that we find ourselves in [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to continue to show respect to everybody else when they are speaking. You had your chance to ask a question, so please respect others.

Ms Anderson: Thank you, Minister, for that statement. In the statement you talk about the additional financial support that is in place for individuals and businesses that have been affected. However, Minister, there is the failure of the Economy Minister to release the funds for those who are recently self-employed and those in the supply chain. Given the comments that we have heard, especially over the last week, about poverty and deprivation, does she realise and could you please relay to her that some of the people who have not received a single penny need to put food on the table and to pay bills?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for her question. Yes, I am deeply concerned that many of the businesses that were asked to close four weeks ago have still not received their grant aid, particularly those in the close-contact services — again, a predominantly female workforce who are often at the lower end of pay scales. The money needs to be delivered to them and into their bank accounts ASAP. It should already have been delivered. There is no doubt that these are complicated times, but I have raised this with the Minister for the Economy and will continue to do so in the Executive.

4.00 pm

Mrs McLaughlin: I thank the deputy First Minister for her answers so far. The deputy First Minister has spoken about giving people some hope. At the weekend, I had an email from a constituent, who is looking for some hope. This is what she said:

"Every Christmas, I welcome home my family, my children and my grandchildren. We have a large family dinner on Christmas Day. There could be 22 at our table. Members of my family return from Galway, Edinburgh and London. Will this be permitted this year? I have to make arrangements, and I do not trust the Executive to plan ahead so that I can plan ahead. When do you think that we will get clear guidance? This is making me anxious as Christmas is just round the corner and travel arrangements need to be made. Can you shed any light? I just want a very merry, Derry Christmas."

What do you say to her?

Mrs O'Neill: That reflects the concerns of many families right now and demonstrates the enormity of what we are dealing with and the fact that people have been separated all year long. Now, we are coming up to the Christmas period, and it is the natural instinct of us all to be with our family and friends and to spend time together. We have to work our way through this. We have to be very clear with the public about the fact that close contact spreads the virus. At the same time, we have to give people something in terms of being able to find some way to spend some time with family members. As an Executive, we will have to discuss the approach to this. It will be dependent on the virus's spread at the time, as you would expect. We will have to find a way to communicate it, in the clearest possible terms that we can, to the public. It will depend on the public health at the time. It will be a challenging time for people, but we have to give them that wee bit of hope. We should be able to find a way to allow some flexibility to allow people to get over the Christmas period and have some comfort.

Mr Chambers: I thank the Minister for her statement. Does the Minister agree that the decision taken by the Executive last week has the unfortunate potential to breed public complacency and to undermine confidence in the public, medical and scientific messaging that is coming from the Executive?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I do not think that anybody can get away from that. When the public see what happened here last week, they will rightly be dismayed. Let us not repeat what happened last week. Let us make sure that there is a better way forward — a consensus way forward. Let us make sure that we use this time to not lose sight of the fact that we are dealing with a global pandemic. Despite everything that happened last week, we still need to communicate to the public that we are asking them to do those basic things to break the transmission. We are in a very challenging situation, and our health service is under huge pressure right now. We are asking people to continue to work with us, and, hopefully, we can continue to keep the virus's transmission down.

Mr Robinson: First and foremost, I thank all our dedicated health staff who are working day and night to try to protect us all from this horrific virus. When does the Minister hope that the first people in Northern Ireland will be able to avail themselves of the much-needed virus vaccine? What role can rapid testing and potential mass testing play in Northern Ireland?

Mrs O'Neill: Thanks to the Member for his question. We cannot give a definitive date right now, but we have been told that we will perhaps have supplies of vaccine this side of Christmas — so, hopefully, in December. There will be prioritisation around how we roll out the vaccination programme. That is one of the discussions that we will come back to at the Executive around what that will look like and who gets prioritised. We await a paper on that from the Department of Health. I have no doubt that, given the significance of having a vaccination programme, the Health Minister will want to make a statement to the Assembly and to take Members' questions.

Mr Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, joint First Minister. Given the serious impact that the measures have on business and the fact that they are absolutely necessary in the absence of other public health measures, what supports are in place locally for business?

Mrs O'Neill: Thanks to the Chair of the Health Committee for his question. There is a range of supports in place. We have different schemes across the Department of Finance and grants available at three different levels: £800, £1,200 and £1,600 per week. In addition to that, we still have the 12-month rates holiday in place, which is obviously a welcome initiative for businesses that still have their overheads to pay but that are not trading right now, whether that is in hospitality, tourism or leisure.

Obviously, we know that some services are impacted more than others. We also have the localised restrictions support scheme in the Department for the Economy, and we have the COVID restrictions business support scheme. There is a whole range of schemes that we have tried to get into the public domain as quickly as possible. There is the Department for Infrastructure scheme for taxis and buses, and we still have the furlough scheme, so there is a whole range of schemes to help businesses to survive this. That is the best that we can do in this period: try to mitigate the damage that this is causing to our economy. There are also other areas that we need to focus on such as, as I said earlier, the issue of mass testing. How can that help us to open up more things in the economy and lift some of the restrictions?

At the weekend, I had a very interesting conversation with Joe Anderson, the Mayor of Liverpool, about its mass testing programme. It was really interesting to talk to him about how it has been able to break the chain of transmission. Some of the early detail from the pilot is that mass testing can bring transmission down by as much as 50%. That is transformative in terms of what we can do here. That is a really important area of work, and I would make the case that we should give priority to the roll out of either a mass-testing pilot or its full implementation on the back of the pilots that are being done. That, to me, would allow us to have both personal freedom and freedom for more businesses to open as well.

Mr Lyttle: Participation in sport is vital to the physical and mental health of young people. What work are the Executive doing to establish the impact of youth sport on the transmission of COVID-19, and when will youth sport be allowed to recommence?

Mrs O'Neill: We have not got any decisions on what happens next. The current restrictions are still in place. I am happy to take that up with the Communities Minister and talk to her about the current restrictions. You have put on the record the positive benefits of youth sport. It is about giving people the chance to go outside, if there are opportunities for us to do things outside, because being outside comes with less risk than being inside. I will ensure that that is raised with the Department for Communities and that it is factored into the conversations about what comes next.

Dr Archibald: I thank the Minister for her responses so far. I caught your response to Martina Anderson about business support. I think that it is really important that that be raised as a matter of urgency with the Economy Minister. Further to Sinead McLaughlin's question, what advice would you give to people this Christmas?

Mrs O'Neill: We will communicate that to the public as soon as we can. We are very conscious that people want to spend time with their loved ones and families; I know that I certainly do. How much time we can spend with them will depend on the current position with the virus at that time. We will talk about that at the Executive, and we will come back and communicate what it will look like for people as soon as we possibly can. Unfortunately, it is a wee bit too far away yet to be able to give that information in any kind of detailed way.

Mr O'Toole: One of the big issues facing businesses, as we all know, is the inability to get money out to them quickly enough to enable them to get through this period of restrictions. Many of them are willing to close, because they know that that is in the broader public benefit and that it is better for them to be open around Christmas than in late November, given the rising infections. Can the deputy First Minister confirm that £500 million has not yet been allocated? Does she agree with me that it is incumbent on the Economy Minister to work with, yes, the Finance Minister to get as much of that money allocated and out the door to businesses as quickly as possible?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, you are right. We received an additional allocation of £400 million, and that has been added to some money that we already had. The public would be right not to forgive us if we do not use that money wisely to support them through the pandemic. It is incumbent on all Ministers around the table, actually, to come forward with ideas, and I know that the Finance Minister is talking to all Ministers about that. We need to help people in the here and now. Whatever we can do to get financial support to them in the here and now is what we should do. Certainly, the Executive are focused on that, and we want to make sure that we get everything and every penny out the door to support businesses as quickly as we can.

Mr McNulty: I thank the joint First Minister for her statement and her answers thus far. In relation to protecting the health service, the economy and our family and friends, the joint First Minister mentioned the importance of us all taking small, daily steps. That I agree with. However, many businesses and families are on their hands and knees and have yet to receive any support from the Executive. There are 11,000 applications to the Department of Finance, but only 9,000 have been paid. What does she have to say to those businesses and families who are on their hands and knees about taking small, daily steps?

Mrs O'Neill: The Member would be wise to separate the two things. What we are asking people to do is about compliance and their personal behaviour. What I said, throughout the statement, is that this is a challenging and difficult time for everybody, particularly for those who have had to shut businesses. As I said in answer to many questions that I have been asked today, I am aware that many businesses have raised concerns about the slow payment of grant aid. I also said that the delay concerns me greatly. I also said that I have taken the matter up with the Economy Minister and I will do so again at the Executive this week.

Ms Bailey: We are now nine months into the pandemic, and for nine months we have known that it is a winter virus, so while it might be reassuring for some to hear that the Executive are now starting to prepare for the introduction of mass testing, it is long overdue. They are looking to establish a focussed working group. Again, that is long overdue. How can the Minister assure the public that they can have confidence in delivery from the Executive, given the track record of chaos and given the Executive parties' continuing to act as their own opposition? People need action and delivery more than they need promises and statements.

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for her question. I can assure her that, the whole way through the pandemic, we have been guided by the two principles that I outlined earlier: keeping the virus transmission under control and keeping capacity in our health service to be able to respond. However, there is no doubt that it is challenging. I have also said repeatedly that it is challenging to be in a five-party Executive in normal times, but to deal with a pandemic in the middle of it all is even more challenging and difficult. We need to work to gain the public's confidence. We need to work to make sure that the public continue to work with us — they have been absolutely amazing in getting us to this point. Every time something was asked of the public, they responded, and I very much welcome that and commend them for that. However, we are not out of the woods yet. We have a way to go.

All I can say to the public is that I will continue to lead and to steer us through these most challenging of times, and that means taking all of those things into account. The message that the public needs to hear from this Chamber this week is that we are working together, we are going to chart our way through this, and we are going to get to the other side. The best way we can do that is to have a first-class system in place to test, trace and isolate cases. I agree with the Member. I do not think that enough was done as regards the Department of Health's preparation. We always knew that winter was coming. That was certain. We did not know when a second wave would come, and I think that it came more quickly than people expected. So there is a whole combination of things, but there is a trust and confidence issue on the part of the public, and I am determined to capture that.

Mr Nesbitt: Earlier today, the First Minister agreed to look at the Women's Policy Group NI's document, 'Covid-19 Feminist Recovery Plan' and the Civil Service's reaction to it, and in particular what the group feels has been the failure to acknowledge the gender pay gap or the fact that 82% of part-time workers are female and therefore the most affected by COVID-19. Will the deputy First Minister join the First Minister in looking again at that document and its recommendations?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member. Yes, I heard that question earlier, and I am more than happy to look at it.

Mr Allister: Mr Speaker, the six pages of this statement would not go far to paper over the gaping chasms in the Executive's approach. The statement contains some great words, if only they were not so empty falling from the lips of the deputy First Minister. There are words like:

"the most powerful tool that we have ... is our own behaviour and ... actions", and words like:

"To those who are considering going against the public health guidance and regulations, I ask you to think very carefully".

4.15 pm

Deputy First Minister, I think that invites the question: with people still outraged by your behaviour in attending the Storey funeral, how carefully did you think about that? Do you not think that you could claw back some credibility for yourself, in making these exhortations to others, if you were to belatedly apologise not for the undermining of the public message but for your actions in causing the undermining of the public message?

Mrs O'Neill: Thanks to the Member for his repeated question. I think that I have answered that question in the House on many occasions and I am satisfied that I have nothing new to add.

Mr Carroll: I do not really know where to start with this statement. It is embarrassingly lacking. There is little content, little direction, and an attempt to paint a united picture of the period ahead when we are likely to see in the near future a repeat of last week's charade.

Can the deputy First Minister please give a concrete answer as to whether she backs the political decision of living with this virus rather than putting a zero-COVID, strategy in place, which could have results as successful as those in New Zealand and would put our health first?

Mrs O'Neill: The Member will know that we are not New Zealand, we are Ireland, and we are very challenged in dealing with this strategy. We have been clear from the start that we needed an all-island approach. I actually think that we should have had a two-island approach from the outset of the pandemic. I regret that that has not been the case. There has been some cooperation but nowhere near enough.

When we say "coexist" or "find a way to live with", the best way to say it is, "find a way to live through this pandemic" because we have to live through the pandemic. We have to find a way to maximise people's freedoms, lift the restrictions as best we can, when we can, to keep the pressure off the health service and to give people that glimmer of hope. I would say to people not to be over-optimistic, but the fact that we now have a vaccine shows that there is some light and the fact that we can roll out mass testing and that that will bring transmission down by 50% are huge advances. So, there is the wee bit of hope for people in the middle of this.

We have to continue to find a balanced way forward that respects the public health advice, keeps transmission in check, keeps the pressure off the health service, supports people who need to isolate, and that finds cases. Do not just wait until people come forward; we need to find cases and asymptomatic people in the community. Mass testing will help us to do that.

There are a number of things on the horizon that can help us to turn the corner. I look forward to that day, and to working with all of the Executive and Assembly until we find that way forward.

Mr Butler: I thank the Minister for her statement. In her last answer, she used the word "hope". That is a word that was been bandied around here for a number of years. Last week, however, we had people crippled by the fear of contracting COVID and people crippled by the fear of losing their finances, but all of them were crippled by the fact that they could get no answer from the Executive, which was worse than lamentable.

Minister, what confidence can you give to people that lessons have been learned by the Executive, and what has been put in place to ensure that information comes out in a timely manner so that people are not waiting until the last minute to hear the decisions that the Executive come to?

Mrs O'Neill: I have no doubt that your colleague the Health Minister gave you chapter and verse about the Executive meeting. I have no doubt that he also said that I was very supportive of him the whole way through. I have no doubt that he could not say anything other than that I tried to find consensus the whole way through, and I have no doubt that that would be the statement that he could make to you today if he was sitting beside you.

We will continue to work with the Health Minister and Executive colleagues. We will continue to try to find a way to keep the virus in check, keep the pressure off the health service, and do all the things that I have stated here at length today. That is what we need to do; that is what the Executive need to do; and we all need to work together. We are all in this together, and we have to be as fulsome with the public as we can be and tell them how difficult and challenging these decisions are. The best thing that we can do is to communicate clearly.

Ms Sugden: The deputy First Minister has consistently criticised the use of the Northern Ireland Executive cross-community voting mechanism, and I agree with that criticism. However, that mechanism was legitimately applied in that the current policy and legislation allowed it to happen, and all five Executive parties signed up to it on that basis knowing that it could be applied at some point. Will the deputy First Minister commit to abolishing that mechanism either in law or policy, and, if she does not abolish it, is that an admission that, at some point when politics suit, it will be used again?

Mrs O'Neill: We should never tar everybody with the one brush. One party decided to use the mechanism, which is there to protect minorities; the Member is absolutely right. Two questions arise from that: is it the mechanism itself, which is designed to protect minority rights, which I absolutely fully support, or is it the use of the mechanism? It is the use of the mechanism that is being called into question. It is appalling that it was used. I would not use it. I could have blocked the last decision in the Executive, but I chose not to. This is a public health crisis; it is not about minority rights. The COVID pandemic impacts everybody equally. This conversation to be had is about whether it is the mechanism or the use of the mechanism — it is the abuse of the mechanism that is at the heart of the problem.

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions to the First Minister and deputy First Minister. I invite Members to take their ease before we commence the next item of business, which will be a question for urgent oral answer from Mr Colin McGrath to the Health Minister.

Questions for Urgent Oral Answer

Health

Flu Vaccinations

Mr Speaker: Colin McGrath has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Health. If Members wish to ask a supplementary question, they should rise continually in their place. The Member who asked the original question will be called automatically for a supplementary.

Mr McGrath asked the Minister of Health how his Department will address the shortage of 200,000 flu vaccinations, which has been described as deeply concerning and frustrating by senior GPs.

Mr Swann: I am glad to have this opportunity to come to the House today to clarify some of the issues regarding this year's flu vaccination programme.

First, let me assure Members and, more importantly, those listening at home, that there is no shortage of ordered vaccines. This year in total, 1,050,300 doses have been procured for the flu vaccination programme. As of last Friday morning, 826,890 doses have been delivered to Northern Ireland. A total of 601,243 doses have been delivered to GPs and trusts. I can confirm that, as of this morning following two further deliveries totalling 192,700 doses, the total vaccines delivered now stands at 1,019,590 doses. Around 30,000 doses of the childhood vaccine are still to be delivered and that is the only order that remains outstanding.

As was outlined by the Public Health Agency last month, uptake has been exceptional with higher numbers of people getting the vaccine than ever before. A temporary pause was placed on some aspects of the seasonal flu vaccination programme but those additional vaccines are now available.

Let me assure Members that there significant quantities of the vaccine available for those over 65. There are approximately 323,000 people over the age of 65 in Northern Ireland. Initially, we aimed for a target uptake of 85%, which equates to 275,000 vaccines. Therefore, we purchased 286,000 vaccines. Last month, I approved the purchase of a further 10,000 vaccines bringing that total to 296,000. The additional 10,000 vaccines arrived in Northern Ireland on Thursday 5 November. Therefore, the reports in the media today that Northern Ireland is almost 200,000 doses short of the flu vaccine for the over-65 age cohort, or that we are unable to complete the vaccination programme, are simply not true. I want to reassure everyone listening that there is no shortage. Further plans are now in place to procure even further quantities of vaccine at a later date, if necessary.

Finally, I would like to thank all of our GPs, practice nurses and Community Pharmacy for their expertise and persistence over recent weeks. This is an incredibly busy and pressurised time for them all, and yet, without them, our flu vaccination programme would simply not succeed.

Mr McGrath: I thank the Minister for coming to the Chamber today. When the news broke this morning, it was deeply worrying and concerning for people who are facing the perils of COVID and who fear getting the seasonal flu, which may put them into a position where they are more vulnerable to other illnesses. This was scaring and frightening people, so it is welcome that the Minister has been able to come here today, put the record straight and send a clear message to people that they will be able to receive the vaccine that they require.

May I ask two questions? First, can the Minister given an assurance that all people over the age of 65 and those with underlying conditions will be able to access that vaccine in a timely manner before, as is projected, the flu season starts in December? Secondly, does he have a sense of the breakdown in communication that led medics in the sector to make that announcement today?

4.30 pm

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his questions. Prior to coming to the House, I had a meeting with representatives of the Public Health Agency (PHA) and the Health and Social Care Board so that we could discuss how that communication failure came about. A meeting of all parties last week seems to have led to what I think has been described as inaccurate reporting by the BBC. Its report incorrectly stated that Northern Ireland did not receive its full vaccine quota. One million doses were ordered; the BBC claimed that between 500,000 and 600,000 were delivered. My first answer has assured the House of the number procured, ordered and delivered to Northern Ireland.

The Member mentioned uptake, and I am due to receive a report by the end of this week on the normal uptake of the different flu vaccines. We use different strains for children, the under-65s and the over-65s. The concern seems to be in the over-65 population, and my original answer details how our order equates to an uptake of 85% in that cohort, which is far in advance of what was used this time last year, when we had an uptake of 74·8%. We have ordered additional vaccines. On top of those, we are getting additional vaccines to ensure that those cohorts can be vaccinated. We are working with GPs to ensure that we can get those vaccination programmes and mass vaccination events back up and running in order to ensure that vaccinations are given in a timely fashion.

Mr Buckley: First, I put on record my sincere thanks to the doctors and nurses who have been implementing a very successful flu vaccination programme to date. We have all seen in our community the level of organisation required.

I came to the Chamber with considerable concern about what is going on in the Department and the PHA. This morning's statement from the PHA said that the demand for vaccine has resulted in a "temporary pause" in the supply of vaccine for eligible people under the age of 65 and that additional controls were in place to ensure fair distribution to all GP practices across Northern Ireland. Dr Gerry Waldron, the PHA's head of health protection, said that he regretted that some flu clinics had had to be cancelled. That is in stark contrast to what the Minister is saying in the House today. In that spirit, Minister, does this build confidence in people who are looking towards how a potential COVID-19 vaccination programme would be implemented across Northern Ireland?

Mr Swann: I do not think that it is in contrast, if you listen to what the PHA actually said. There was a pause in the supply of the vaccine. The Member may not be aware that the delivery of flu vaccines comes in two batches; the initial batch is the one that we ordered at the start of the year; the additional batch is the one that we ordered in the summer. Some clinics were paused to allow for the delivery of the second batch. In the initial set-up of the mass flu vaccination programmes, we saw an exceptional uptake. I referred to that when answering a question from the Member's colleague Paula Bradley in the House last week. Some GPs reported that 499 people attended in response to their sending out 500 letters. In the past, the maximum uptake was in the region of 75%.

The Member's assertion was, I think, an attempt to talk down the programme, but the early uptake was exceptional, as was the delivery and coordination between the PHA, GPs, Community Pharmacy and nurses. Now that we have those structures in place to enable us to run vast vaccination outreach programmes, should they be in community halls, church halls or car parks, including underground car parks, where we have been doing in-car vaccination programmes as well, it sets us up with a sound basis for what the COVID vaccination programme will look like once that vaccine becomes available.

Mr Gildernew: I thank the Minister for coming to the Chamber to answer questions. Minister, you have referred to modelling and planning. What specific modelling and preparation did the Department do for the demand and uptake of the flu vaccine this year? When was that completed and by whom?

Mr Swann: I thank the Committee Chair for his questions. The planning that we did this year was for an uptake target, specifically among the over-65 cohort, of 85%. As I said in an earlier answer to Mr McGrath, last year, we saw a 74.8% uptake and, the year prior to that, a 70% uptake. The numbers that we ordered to target an 85% uptake even allowed for a 7% wastage rate, which is normal in a large-scale vaccination programme. Those calculations were done by the PHA. We ordered that additional vaccine over the summer to complement our original order, which was made at the start of the year to allow for production and delivery.

Mr Chambers: Minister, one of the benefits of being part of the United Kingdom is that the four nations have shared resources throughout the pandemic. Whilst I very much welcome today's clarity from the Minister, which again emphasises the need for accuracy in public reporting at this time, will the Minister contact the Department of Health and Social Care in England if, in the days and weeks ahead, he believes that he will require even greater quantities of vaccine to fully meet the needs of Northern Ireland?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. He makes a valid point. As I said earlier, specifically for the over-65 age group, we had set an 85% uptake target, which is 275,000 people. We approved the purchase of another 10,000 vaccines, which arrived on Thursday 5 November. I can report to the Member and the House that, having contacted Matt Hancock, over the last 24 hours, we have been able to obtain an additional 15,000 vaccines. So, in addition to the vaccines that we had ordered to achieve the 85% target that we set ourselves, we now have more vaccines on the way, which will be put into a further programme of vaccination.

Ms Bradshaw: I thank the Minister for coming to the Chamber. You talked about the exceptional uptake of the flu vaccine. What lessons are being learnt for the forthcoming roll-out of the coronavirus vaccine programme in both operational issues and communication?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. Her last point is bang on the money. It is about communication. As I said, I had a conversation this afternoon with the PHA and representatives of the board about how we get right the communication on how the distributions of the vaccines work, especially the COVID vaccines. There are now two COVID vaccines on the market, one of which the UK has pre-ordered. There are logistical challenges regarding how that is managed because it has to be stored at -70°C for a period before it can be stored in normal fridges for the last five days before its use, so there is a large piece of logistical work.

However, it is also about communication to identify the cohorts that will be eligible in the early stages. We must make sure that GPs, Community Pharmacy and all the other aspects have clearly identified those people and that we put in place a process and locations for doing it safely. I talked earlier about some of the fantastic work that GPs and community pharmacies have done in delivering mass vaccination programmes. I do not think that any of us in the House, even this time last year, would have envisaged flu vaccination programmes being completed in underground car parks, but those have proved to be highly effective and deliverable. In most cases, people were able to do it in the comfort of their car. It is about making sure that we get the communication phase right when the COVID vaccine becomes available.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Health Minister for his attendance. I also welcome the news that the flu vaccine will be made available to those who are most vulnerable. On 12 October, there were 46 care homes with a COVID-19 outbreak. By 12 November, that number had risen to 143. In all that time, hospitality and close-contact services were closed. It makes no sense that, many months into this pandemic, there is no rapid testing or mass testing of staff in key wards or in care homes to complement the vaccines. That should be a daily occurrence for those key healthcare workers. Regardless of what other regions are doing — I have heard that some care settings in England are carrying out daily testing for staff and visitors — I respectfully ask the Minister why he is not testing healthcare staff on a daily basis.

Mr Swann: With respect to the Member, I am aware that this is something that has been raised in a number of press releases from her party, although not connected directly to the flu vaccination programme. What I will say to the Member is that the number of care homes that are currently indicated as having outbreaks is due to our positive and reactive testing programme that we have introduced — something that I know the Member supported. The Commissioner for Older People supported it as well.

The Member spoke of a number of pilot programmes that are currently ongoing in Liverpool and, I think, in a number of care homes in the south-east of England which have been in the media today. One of the things I will say is that we are fully plugged in to those pilots, because that is what they are. They are actually testing the viability of the testing machines, their protocols and their utilisation to make sure that they use them in the best way to support the residents, the patients and the staff.

With regard to testing hospital workers, which I think was part of the Member's question as well, in line with our current testing protocols, testing is prioritised for all our healthcare workers, and that includes hospital staff who are symptomatic or whose household contacts are symptomatic, to help enable those essential workers to return to work as soon as possible. The position with regard to testing of all hospital staff is kept under active review.

With regard to the new testing technologies that I was talking about, there are emerging plans — sorry, it is the technologies which are emerging. The plans are progressing with a range of local partners and experts for testing those pilots across different settings, including healthcare settings. That will include repeat testing for asymptomatic healthcare staff. The new test for asymptomatic people aims to identify those at risk of spreading the virus, reduce the risk of onward infection and to find positive cases earlier to actually reduce transmission of the virus. Those pilots are something we are watching, and watching with interest, to make sure that the equipment is effective and efficient enough to bring benefit to what we want to do.

Ms Flynn: I know that one of the Members touched on guaranteeing that the over-65s would have access and whether there is enough stock of the flu vaccine, but I wonder whether the Minister can guarantee that everyone over the age of 65 will be able to receive the vaccine before the end of November.

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her point. As I said earlier, our original estimates were for an 85% uptake target, which equated to 275,000 vaccines. We actually purchased 286,000. We have received an additional 10,000 and, as I said to Mr Chambers, an extra 15,000 has been agreed by the Department of Health and Social Care for part of the Northern Ireland allocation, so we will have in excess of 311,000. Our current population of over-65s sits at 323,000, so there is enough there — not for everyone, but for the vast majority — and far in excess of the percentage uptakes that we have seen in previous years.

Mr McNulty: I thank the Minister for coming to the Chamber today. First, I put on record my thanks to the healthcare staff in GP surgeries, schools and healthcare settings who have administered the vaccine so diligently and proactively so far. I spoke with one GP last week, and she told me how incredibly, exceptionally hard everyone is working. Have all residents in nursing homes been vaccinated, Minister? What has the Chief Medical Officer (CMO) advised will be the impact on the battle against COVID of not having the flu vaccine administered?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his questions. One of the points that the CMO has been making in the last number of weeks and months is about how vital it is that nobody should contract flu and COVID at the same time.

Our flu vaccination programme is well ahead of schedule of where we would be in any normal year, but, as everyone in the House, including the Member, knows, this is not a normal year. I welcome the Member's acknowledgement of the GPs, community nurses and community pharmacies that have taken forward the vaccination programme.

Everyone over 65 is eligible for the flu vaccine, no matter where they are resident.

4.45 pm

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I ask Members to come to their questions quickly. A number of Members still want to ask questions, so please keep your introductions very brief and to the minimum.

Mr Butler: I very much welcome the clarity that the Minister has given us. It stands in stark contrast to what has been reported up to now. Will the Minister give us a commitment that there will be close monitoring of the development of the additional vaccine by the PHA and the Health and Social Care Board?

Mr Swann: I thank the Members for his question. Following the meeting today, I asked for weekly updates on where we are with the flu vaccination programme, not just on the distribution of the vaccine but on what the percentage uptake has been across all groups. While we are specifically talking about the over-65s today, a number of other groups are also eligible for the flu vaccine, including all pregnant women, all individuals under 65 with current chronic medical conditions, primary-school children and front-line healthcare and social care workers who are employed by a trust. A number of additional groups are eligible for the flu vaccine, and I have asked the PHA and the board to make sure that I receive regular updates on how the remaining part of our flu vaccination programme is progressing.

Mr Carroll: Does the Minister seriously believe that the potential COVID vaccination that is being touted by the media as being available here in December will be available, or was that just a line inserted into an Executive press release last week to save face during the mother of all Stormont shambles?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his question. I am here to answer questions about the flu vaccine, but I am happy to talk about the coronavirus vaccine as well. What we saw in the media was an advance statement by a company that it has a vaccine that is 90% effective. That is one of the vaccines that the UK Government have pre-bought, so we will be part of that uptake, as I reported to the House last week. Off the top of my head, our allocation will provide enough vaccine for, I think, 275,000 individuals in Northern Ireland.

There are reports today of another vaccine coming on to the market, which its makers claim to be 95% effective. That is not one of the vaccines that were part of the UK pre-procurement exercise, but I am led to believe that the UK Government are in negotiation with that company to make sure that, if it becomes available safely on the market, they will have access to it. By default, we will get our share as part of the United Kingdom.

It is widely believed that some vaccine will be available by the end of this year, but it should not be perceived as a panacea for everything or for COVID. Any of the experts who have spoken about the efficacy and utilisation of vaccines have indicated that it will be well into next year before we see the real effect of the vaccines in combating COVID in the community.

Mr Speaker: I ask the next Member who is called to ask a question to relate it to the question for urgent oral answer.

Ms Sugden: Minister, are there any known contraindications of those who have received the seasonal flu vaccine receiving the COVID-19 vaccine? Will patients who have tested positive for COVID-19 make use of the anticipated COVID vaccine? I ask those questions because the answers will help with the management of an expected programme in the winter months.

Mr Swann: One of the points of concern expressed by the GPs that I share is that we need to get the flu vaccination programme out of the way before we can commence the COVID one. There is advice and guidance that there should be at least three weeks between the vaccines being delivered to ensure that both have the maximum effect.

In regard to whether there are any known studies, I am sure that that is ongoing. As we are well aware, neither of the two COVID vaccines that are now reported to be available have gone through the full clinical and safety trials for utilisation in the community, and, until that process is completed, I do not think that they will be used widely in the United Kingdom. That work still has to be done. To back up what the Member said, it is important that any COVID vaccine is safe to use and that we promote it as widely as possible. Those who are eligible to get it should get it. There is no barrier, for want of a better word, and nobody who has contracted COVID in the past or tested positive for COVID will be ineligible for the vaccine.

Mr Frew: The Minister will know — I have corresponded with him about it — about the growing number of vulnerable residents in north Antrim who have been unable to avail themselves of the flu vaccine because they have had to drive into a practice instead of walking in. Can the Minister shed some light on that issue? Is it a growing problem? How does he fix it?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. He has raised that with me in correspondence. We talked about the protocols and the advances that we have seen in GP surgeries. The drive-ins and the underground car parks are great advances, but our GP colleagues, community pharmacy and our practice nurses have always made available the ability to walk into clinics, should they be in community halls or church halls, so that people can avail themselves of the flu vaccine. What is being done at GP level is that, if people do not make themselves known, other ways of obtaining the vaccine will be made available to them. I think that I have given that answer to the Member in writing as well.

Mr Sheehan: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for taking the question. I am surprised to hear him say that the story that was broken by a reputable journalist this morning is not true, because there has been other evidence of difficulties with the roll-out of the vaccine. The Minister mentioned the pauses, and his colleague on the Health Committee told us some weeks ago that there was a delay in the roll-out of the school vaccination programme. There are issues. Confidence in the PHA is not at a premium at the moment given its woeful underestimation of the number of positive COVID cases, so can the Minister explain why he is so confident — he answered a question from my colleague Órlaithí Flynn — that everyone who needs a vaccine or wants a vaccine will get it in a timely fashion?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. He made a comment about the PHA: I noted his exchange with PHA officials in the Health Committee a number of weeks ago, and I do not think that his comments were edifying. I do not think that an elected Member of the House should speak to any official in that way, no matter how much they disagree or want to challenge the evidence that they bring or what they say. I do not think that how the Member spoke to the PHA officials who were before the Committee did him any good.

In regard to my comments about the reporting, I actually said that the BBC report had incorrectly stated:

“Northern Ireland did not receive its full vaccine quota - while one million doses were ordered, between 500,000 and 600,000 were delivered.”

That is inaccurate, and I stand over that comment. It is in Hansard as well.

In regard to the uptake, work is ongoing by GP practices, the Health and Social Care Board, Community Pharmacy and the PHA to make sure that we can roll out the second batch of vaccine, which has now been delivered to Northern Ireland. The programme was paused because of the success of the delivery of those mass vaccination programmes, which were delivered by GPs in the first instance. We actually got in front of the delivery of vaccines that we were expecting and the additional ones that we had ordered over the summer. They are now in Northern Ireland and will be distributed to GP practices, as necessary, to meet the demand. I have gone through the percentages, especially in the over-65s, we had ordered enough for an 85% uptake with a 7% wastage rate, but, on top of that, we have received additional vaccines from the Department of Health and Social Care (DHSC) in the UK.

Mr Speaker: I call Steve Aiken. We have one minute.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister for his comments so far. I speak as someone who has had the flu vaccine and as a cancer survivor. One of the issues mentioned at my local GP surgery is that quite a few people do not turn up at their allotted time. Will the Minister help me in getting out the message that, if you are allotted a slot for a flu vaccine, you should make every effort to be there for that vital health measure, if you can?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. The importance of getting the flu vaccine has been well rehearsed, especially, as I say again, as our colleagues across GP practices, practice nurses and Community Pharmacy go to the effort of organising the flu programmes and flu vaccination programmes that we have seen across the country. I encourage everybody to utilise the slots that they are offered, because they are being delivered in a timely and efficient manner to make sure that we not only get the efficient uptake of flu vaccines here in Northern Ireland but make best use of our professionals' time.

Mr Speaker: That concludes this item of business. Will Members take their ease for a moment, please?

COVID-19: Surge Planning

Mr Speaker: Ms Pam Cameron has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Health. I remind Members that, if they wish to ask a supplementary question, they should rise continually in their place. The Member who tabled the question will be called automatically to ask a supplementary.

Mrs Cameron asked the Minister of Health, in light of hospitals across Northern Ireland operating at overcapacity, for his assessment of whether the COVID-19 surge planning strategic framework has worked.

Mr Swann (The Minister of Health): Mr Speaker, with your permission, I will take slightly longer than the two minutes to answer. I believe that this is an important issue.

When I published the surge planning strategic framework on 6 October, I was clear that our health and social care service was likely facing the most challenging period in its history. That prediction is coming to fruition, with our health service under immense and sustained pressure. The surge planning strategic framework includes 19 key actions. I can confirm that 11 have been completed and eight are ongoing. The trusts are managing the pressures that they are facing within their available capacity and in line with their individual surge plans.

The key issue facing our health and social care service is staffing capacity. Let me be clear: our health service is our staff. Our latest published statistics demonstrate the scale of the problem. As of 30 June, this year, we carried more than 5,000 vacancies across the health and social care system. The largest numbers were vacancies in relation to nurses and midwives, with a total of 1,786 across the system. In addition to those vacancies, the system is experiencing a higher than normal rate of absence due to COVID-19. The latest available figures show that almost 1,900 staff are absent across the health and social care sector, ill with COVID-19 or self-isolating. That adds 2.6% to the absence rate across the system.

I have taken action to try to address that issue through the workforce appeal. The response, to date, has been positive, with more than 5,000 applications, of which more than 3,000 are from Health and Social Care (HSC) staff. I have also taken action to commission the critical care plan through the critical care network. That allows for the potential to flex up to 158 critical care beds through the use of our Nightingale facility at Belfast City Hospital. I have also commissioned an additional Nightingale facility on the Whiteabbey Hospital site. That will be an intermediate care facility that will provide up to 100 additional step-down beds. It will be operational on a phased basis in a matter of days.

The insinuation that not enough planning or preparation for future surges was undertaken is not correct; in fact, it is deeply unfair on our clinicians and HSC managers who produced the plans. During the first wave, our HSC system delivered 12,150 new outpatient consultations in April. There were 29,163 in October. In terms of inpatient or day-case procedures, 4,859 were delivered in April, compared with 13,301 in October. Similarly, there were 39,907 outpatient reviews in April compared with 56,071 in October. I could go on. Overall, there was over 73% more activity in October than April. That was because of our surge plans and rebuild plans.

5.00 pm

Behind what may be construed as party political press releases being issued, that is the truth of the matter. It is testament to the tireless dedication of our Health and Social Care staff. I challenge any Member to stand in the shoes of any of the medical directors across any of the trusts for even a single day to see the level of preparations that they had made and, even with all that, the gravity of the decisions that they now have to make every day. Were we ready? Yes. However, I could never have planned for the situation where the scientific and medical advice given to the Executive was blocked. Only when the spread of the virus is minimised can we hope to reduce the COVID-19 pressures on our health service. That is what is really needed, and it is needed now.

Mrs Cameron: I appreciate the opportunity to ask this question for urgent oral answer in the House today. I thank the Health Minister for his response thus far. I fully recognise the continual challenge that is faced in the delivery of services in these difficult times, particularly in maintaining staff levels. I also welcome the imminent opening of the step-down facility — Nightingale 2 — at Whiteabbey.

The Department's critical care surge plan envisaged being able to cater for the needs of 158 COVID and non-COVID patients in the event of a high surge across Northern Ireland. In recent weeks, the total has reached around 140, which is short of the number set out in the frameworks. If those contingency arrangements have not been implemented in full, why are we hearing reports of hospitals operating over capacity? Have health planners failed to meet that target for available critical care beds?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her supplementary question. It is important that she does not confuse the two issues of bed numbers and overcapacity, including ICU. Since March, the critical care network has had its surge plan in place. Getting to 158 ICU beds involves the utilisation of the Nightingale facility at the tower. It also involves — this is one of the most stressful points for our ICU nurses and specialists — moving away from the 1:1 care ratio. Moving to our high surge and then our critical surge, which allows us to flex up to those 158 beds, means moving away from that 1:1 ratio. No matter how much I am challenged or criticised about what we have not done over the past two or three months, one thing that we cannot do in two or three months is train an ICU nurse. At the start of the pandemic in February, we identified where we were going to need additional skills. Staff members across our health and social care sector started to upskill and retrain in what would be a very critical part of our action against COVID: the maintenance and utilisation of ICU beds and the challenge that that brings those staff members not just physically but emotionally and mentally. That is why we put in place mental supports for those staff as well.

The Member indicated that our hospitals are operating at overcapacity. Much of that is in regard to what are termed our "general medical" beds, which are there for general medical conditions.

Mr Speaker: I ask the Minister to conclude.

Mr Swann: When we have to utilise more of those beds, that is where we see the pressures on the number of beds across our health and social care system.

Mr Gildernew: I thank the Minister for his answers to those questions. I will observe, given the Minister's last answer, that our health service reached 106% capacity some weeks ago. The Minister is aware that the surge plan is to address a surge in hospital cases and transmission in the community; however there also needs to be a plan to suppress the spread of the virus in the first place. The first people who need that plan are the hard-pressed staff on the ground, and we owe it to them to deliver on that plan. I recognise what the Minister said about the inability to quickly scale up the vacant nursing posts or the ICU nursing, but what we could do and what we need to do, in my opinion, is to increase our testing capacity. We could recruit and train contact tracers at a quicker level. Will the Minister commit now to bringing forward a new health strategy to replace the failing test, trace and protect strategy?

Mr Swann: Regarding the Member's criticism of our test, trace and protect system, when the PHA was in front of the Health Committee, he also used language that, I think, was unfair. Last week, I gave an update to the House during Question Time on our test, trace and protect system. At that point, we had 220 tracers employed over three different employment contracts so that we could flex up and flex down the number of tracers who were working at any time. Test, trace and protect works best when we have a low number of cases, and that is where I agree fully with the Chair of the Health Committee. That needs to be our strategy, not how we increase beds or how we improve test, trace and protect; it is how we reduce the number of people with COVID in our community. That is where the real challenge is.

I will update the Chair. In the week preceding 10 November, of the 3,519 cases that were transferred to test, trace and protect, 3,317 were successfully contacted. That is 94.3%, even with that high level. Of the 4,987 close contacts that were identified, the test, trace and protect system was able to complete 4,898 contacts. That is 98.2% of successful contacts being made from those contacts. That far exceeds what is deemed to be an effective system. Most effective systems are graded at being 80% effective or above. Even with the high numbers coming into our test, trace and protect system, it was still achieving high levels of successful percentage outworkings.

In the past, the Member has asked in this place about the protections and the support mechanisms that are put in place for anybody who tests positive. I welcome the announcement today by the Minister for Communities, who is from the Member's party, that she has increased the payment rate for those who are seeking COVID support. That is done through the Department for Communities. As I have said in the past, the response to COVID and test, trace, protect and isolate is a cross-Executive effort, not solely a matter for Health.

Mr McGrath: Managing mental health is contained in the surge plans. It is also Anti-Bullying Week, and I have my odd socks on today to highlight that fact. Given that bullying is a significant factor in youth mental health issues, can the Minister detail what work is being done to deal with the legacy of long waiting lists to get appointments to be able to manage counselling and other psychological services and how disrupted that has been as a result of COVID?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member, especially for his mention of Anti-Bullying Week. I think that the House can send out a strong message that bullying should not be tolerated anywhere. I have never condoned or supported bullying, and, being the height that I am, I can assure you that I have often been in receipt of it. Never mind that, I have been in receipt of it in the past few days, as attempts were made to shift me from my position. Having been in receipt of many a bullying incident in my younger days, I can assure you that it is hard to shift from that mentality. Young people who are on the receiving end of bullying incidents in the early stages of their life carry those mental challenges through into their adult lives.

On 19 May, I published my Department's mental health action plan. That includes the dedicated COVID-19 mental health response plan, which provided immediate action across seven of the themes to support mental health and emotional well-being in the face of the pandemic.

There have, however, been some changes to how services have been delivered, and, unfortunately, many of those face-to-face meetings have changed to accommodate remote working, which includes phone calls and video communication. So, while we approach that service utilising different tools, the problem still maintains. When we get through the COVID pandemic — I believe that we will get through it — there will be a challenge for our mental health systems, which we are already factoring in. That is why it was critical that we put in place in the Department's mental health action plan back in May that specific response plan to COVID-19 because we all know that that is what will face us towards the end of the year.

Mr Chambers: A few weeks ago, the Health Committee received some evidence on nursing homes from a senior official from the Royal College of Nursing. She was asked for her opinion on moving staff testing from two weeks to a one-week regime. She made the point that it would increase the bureaucratic burden on nursing homes and nurses. Also, there was the problem of nurses having to travel in their own time to get the testing done. She finished by questioning how beneficial the move would be, and she thought that it was not achievable. This morning, we read a headline story in one of the newspapers that Sir Jeffrey Donaldson, who serves in another House, was calling for testing to be done on a daily basis for staff —

Mr Speaker: Will the Member come to the question, please?

Mr Chambers: — and, indeed, at the start of every shift. Does the Minister have any views on the practical benefits of such a regime?

Mr Swann: I did not see the headline, but, in response to a supplementary question that was asked during the earlier question for urgent oral answer on mass testing, I said that my Department's expert advisory group on testing is fully linked into the national mass testing programme, which is being led by the Department of Health and Social Care. We will utilise and work with colleagues across the United Kingdom to make sure that any advances that we use when mass testing becomes available are fully utilised to suppress the further spread of COVID-19.

Those plans are progressing, and we are working with a range of local partners and experts on testing pilots across different settings. Those will include universities, meat factories and healthcare facilities, along with repeat testing of asymptomatic healthcare staff and employees.

I await a response from the expert advisory group on testing. I had indicated that we would bring a paper to the Executive on that shortly, so I am not sure if Sir Jeffrey had received advance notice that I intended to bring that work forward to the Executive. Maybe he was asking for it to be brought forward knowing that it was coming.

Ms Bradshaw: Does the Minister agree that the reintroduction of shielding could play a part in reducing pressure on our health service and provide an extra layer of protection for our clinically vulnerable?

Mr Swann: The Member raised that last week during Question Time, and I informed her that the Chief Medical Officer was bringing together the shielding advisory group.

That group has met, and I am awaiting the outworkings of its report. A piece of work that it has completed is comparing what is currently in our advice to those who are extremely clinically vulnerable with what advice was given to those in England who were advised to shield when it went into its advanced stage of lockdown, in order to see what the difference is and what additional advice we need to bring forward. That work is ongoing, and I am looking forward to the Chief Medical Officer updating the guidance based on the advice coming out of the shielding advisory group.

5.15 pm

Mr Buckley: I understand the pressures facing both the Minister and the Department, but I take issue with his comments that for anybody to raise those issues and concerns in the Chamber is to be political. We do so out of real concern for patients, front-line staff and healthcare workers.

I am not the only one with concerns. Today, Dr Gabriel Scally, a professor of public health and planning and a member of the independent Scientific Advisory Group for Emergencies (SAGE) committee, stated:

“There is no plan, there is no strategy, there is no transparency.”

Probably most concerning of all, he implied that, if a public health expert got five days in the Department, they would take it by the scruff.

Mr Speaker: I ask —.

Mr Buckley: Minister, is it the case that the public and, indeed, front-line healthcare workers are having to bear the cost of a failure by a Department to manage and meet its objectives and to implement a detailed surge plan. In the light of Dr Scally’s comments, will the Minister invite an external public health expert to conduct a five-day review of the Department’s plan and offer a prognosis?

Mr Swann: Perhaps the findings of such an expert would be in awe. One of the first things that they may question is the utilisation on the Executive of a cross-community mechanism —

Mr Buckley: That is not the question, Minister.

Mr Swann: — on voting down —.

Mr Buckley: That is not the question.

Mr Swann: Sorry? Let me finish.

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask the Minister and the Member to address their remarks through the Chair.

Mr Swann: Apologies, Mr Speaker, but I will not take a lecture on what the Department should bring forward in surge plans, when I brought recommendations to the Executive over a week ago that we should extend our current regulations and restrictions for another fortnight — another two weeks — so that we could take some of the pressures that we are talking about today off our health service and our healthcare workers. For the Member to try to insinuate that it is a failure of mine or of my Department’s when, if his party colleagues had perhaps supported me and my Department —

A Member: Hear, hear.

Mr Swann: — on the Executive, we might not be in the position in which we are currently.

If I were to bring in a public health professional, I think that one of the things that they would do would be to point out the failure on the Executive to support the recommendations from the Chief Medical Officer, the Chief Scientific Adviser and the Department of Health. Instead, those recommendations were voted down on a cross-community basis, through a cross-community vote that was brought against a Unionist Minister.

Mr Speaker: Justin McNulty is not in his place.

Ms S Bradley: Based on that answer, Minister, do you agree with me that the fundamental external factors that directly affect how efficiently any surge plan can work rely not just on the public playing their part and listening to the Chief Medical Officer but on the Executive hearing that message, acting on it and thus safeguarding everybody.

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her point. Mr Speaker, I apologise for the temperament in which my previous answer was delivered. It is not usual for me in this House, but it frustrating when I hear accusations levelled against the healthcare staff in my Department and the advice that the Department is giving.

What I will say to the Member is that it will take a coordinated, unified Executive response to drive down the rate of community transmission of COVID in Northern Ireland. One thing that we cannot factor into any of the surge plans presented by my Department or the trusts themselves — all six trusts — is the failure of some on the Executive to listen to the medical and public health advice that is brought forward.

Mr Allister: Unaccustomed as I am to pouring oil on troubled waters, may I divert the subject somewhat? Back in 2016, there was a nationwide simulation done to prepare for a pandemic. What lessons did the Minister’s Department learn and action from that, or was nothing done about it?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his question. He refers, of course, to Exercise Cygnus, which was brought forward in 2016. The outworkings of that tabletop exercise are now published on the Department’s website. There is a detailed breakdown of the recommendations and their outworkings as they were carried out by the Department. They were carried out by the Department when this place was not sitting or in being. They are available on the Department’s website. I can forward the link to the Member for his information.

Ms Flynn: Minister, today the Department announced some changes to how emergency and urgent care is going to be delivered. That will obviously affect many areas and patients. The Phone First pilot is being trialled in the Causeway Hospital. Will the Minister outline if that pilot is part of the wider transformation process or is it solely part of the COVID-19 surge response?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her question. She will be aware, as are many Members, that one of the things that was commissioned pre-COVID was a review of urgent and emergency care and how it could be delivered and improved across Northern Ireland. The publication of the 'No More Silos' report was expedited and published by my Department a couple of weeks ago. One of the things that is in it is Phone First, as an option. The pilot will start tomorrow in the Causeway Hospital to see how it operates. Anybody seeking support from an emergency department can phone first to make sure that they can have quick and timely access to the provision that they need.

It is a pilot. It one of the 10 recommendations in 'No More Silos'. If it is successful, the intention is that it will be rolled out across all our emergency departments. We will take this time and this pilot to see what needs to be or can be improved and what does not work.

One of the things that we have seen though the network of clinicians, GPs and those in primary and secondary care who have brought forward the majority of the work and recommendations in this report is that we must see primary and secondary care working side by side. One of the things coming out of COVID is real joined-up work and the breaking down of silos between primary and secondary care. I want to make sure that we can maintain that, post-pandemic.

Mr Speaker: If the remaining Members who wish to ask a question are brief, we might get them all in.

Mr Carroll: Minister, I spoke recently to ICU nursing staff, who are doing incredible work but feel overworked, undervalued and underpaid. Some of those workers have increased stress levels, which you alluded to. Some have left the NHS because —

Mr Speaker: I remind the Member that I have just asked Members to just go to their question, please.

Mr Carroll: They did not sign up for the current situation. What is the Minister's assessment of nursing capacity in ICUs? We owe nurses a huge debt of gratitude, but do we have enough of them?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member because I know that he has raised a number of issues specifically in regard to ICU nurses and the banding and pay grades. Our Chief Nursing Officer is currently reflecting on that to see what can and should be done and how and when to do it.

A lot of the work in the health service is strenuous and stressful no matter where it is, but ICUs are one of the most strenuous and stressful places at the moment. Staff there are under advanced and extreme pressures because of the number of patients that they are working with. That was the additional strain that I referred to earlier in the debate. We are looking at care ratios which are not normal practice. They are being supported by other healthcare workers and other professional workers but there is stress. There is the expertise of those ICU nurses. They are a group of ICU nurses, anaesthetists, theatre nurses out of that original 1,600 that we are short of. They are a group that were specifically targeted and that we asked for in our workforce appeal. They came back and helped us out.

That is where we are seeing and experiencing the majority of the strain. That is why, during the first wave, we made sure that we had psychological and mental health support for our healthcare workers. We know not only in society is that going to be a need, but that it is a need in our current workforce. We want to make sure that they are being provided with all the support they need.

Mr Beggs: Earlier, reference was made to hospitals working at 106%, and that can have implications for ambulance handover. My question is: does the Minister recognise that there is a need for the Executive to come together to ensure that our Ambulance Service, and our entire health service, can operate and treat whoever arrives at our accident and emergency units, irrespective of their needs?

Mr Swann: What the Member highlights is the desire of everybody working across the health and social care system — our nurses, our doctors, our porters, our administrative teams, community pharmacies, GPs, and people in the Department — to make sure that we have a service that can deliver for everyone when they need it and where they need it.

This is a strenuous time across the entirety of our service. Many proposed reviews, from Bengoa to Compton, have been put in place. The transformation process has started and continues in and across our health and social care system, although not at the pace that we need it to go. As I have said before, we are trying to run three health services: our current health service, a transformational health service, and a COVID health service. We are seeing the percentage occupancy of beds because, unlike the first wave when we downturned the majority of our procedures, this time our health service is trying to keep as many procedures and services going. They are really pushing the limits so that we can deliver to the people of Northern Ireland the healthcare that they want and deserve. That is why the House should be indebted to the entirety of our healthcare family across Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: That concludes this item of business. I ask Members to take their ease for a moment.

Members, remember your social distancing.

COVID-19 Business Support Scheme

Mr Speaker: Stewart Dickson has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister for the Economy.

I remind Members that, if they wish to ask a supplementary question, they should rise continually in their place. The Member who tabled the question will be called automatically to ask a supplementary.

5.30 pm

Mr Dickson asked the Minister for the Economy when part B of the COVID-19 business support scheme will open to support businesses in the direct supply chain of other businesses required to close or cease trading.

Mrs Dodds (The Minister for the Economy): In responding to this question, it is worth clarifying that there are two schemes currently in operation. It is unfortunate that some Members of the House have deliberately, or otherwise, conflated the two and have thereby created confusion among many of the people who are seeking support.

The local restriction support scheme is run by the Department of Finance. It was designed to provide support to businesses that are mandated to close and that are operating from premises, so it makes up the vast majority of the support that is available. I know that Members of the House will, of course, be keen to hear the details of the progress of that scheme when the Finance Minister is next in the Chamber.

My Department has put in place a scheme to provide support to those who are not covered by the Department of Finance's scheme. Part A of the COVID business restriction support scheme is for those that are mandated to close, but that are not recorded in the rates database. Therefore, it is a much smaller scheme. It was important to get part A up and running as it is directed at individuals with very small businesses and who are unlikely to have cash reserves. By the end of this week, more than 1,000 small businesses will have received payments amounting to more than £3 million.

Part B is for companies that make up the supply chain of businesses that are mandated to close. It is my expectation that part B will open on Wednesday, and I have asked Invest NI ensure that it has the dedicated and necessary resources to make that happen and to respond as quickly as possible. However, again, to be clear to the House — and I am sure all Members in the House will agree — as custodians of taxpayers' money it is imperative that we have the necessary controls in place to reduce, insofar as it is possible, the risk of fraud and error around the various schemes that Departments are asked to bring forward.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for coming to the House. We really are going to have to stop meeting like this, but we are not going to stop meeting like this until I get answers to questions on behalf of those people who —.

Mr Speaker: On that note, will you come to a question? I would just like to —.

Mr Dickson: I will come to a question. Minister, on 20 May of this year —.

Mr Speaker: Mr Dickson, can you just sit down for a second? Before we move into this session, I urge Members to please move quickly to their question. That is because Members in the last session were not able to get into the queue because people were taking too long to introduce their question. Go ahead, Stewart.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Mr Speaker. Minister, on 20 May, you told the Economy Committee that you wanted to ensure that as much money and support would be extended to as many people as possible. Well, Minister, we are still waiting for many people to be included. There are a group of people who will be described as "excluded", yet some £0.5 billion of Barnett consequentials remains to be spent. The Finance Minister indicated to the House that he is open to bids on that, so when will you finally make a bid in order to allow people to protect their businesses and to stop them from falling over?

Mrs Dodds: I thank the Member for his question. Of course, the Member is very well aware that I have, on any number of occasions, asked the Executive to make decisions in relation to this matter. Since decisions are exceptionally difficult to make on this issue, I have today received a submission about support for those who have been recently self-employed and sole company directors, and I hope to sign it off this evening. Of course, that will then go to the Executive and it will be for the Executive and the Finance Minister to decide whether to support those proposals.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. The Minister will no doubt agree that grants are important, but grants alone will not make up for the loss of earnings for those businesses that have been forced to shut or that are severely impacted by the Executive's restrictions. Does the Minister agree that the best support and help that we can give to those businesses is to allow them to open safely with the proper guidance in place?

Mrs Dodds: Yes, I agree. I am on record as saying, many times in the House, that the best support that we can give to businesses is to allow those businesses to open. I am also on record, Mr Speaker — if I may have your permission to speak briefly — as saying that last week was not the Executive's finest hour. However, having come to a compromise solution last week, which in essence rolls over the restrictions for two weeks, bar close-contact services, which the Health Minister says provides 0.05% to the R rate, and the opening of coffee shops. Other than that, the restrictions are rolled over for the next two weeks, yet the Health Minister again, on television on Sunday, not in the House, said that he would be asking for further restrictions. Today, I have spoken to a number of people in the hospitality sector who are extremely annoyed and disappointed that the rules of this game keep changing all the time. I urge the Health Minister to indicate to the Chamber and, indeed, to the hospitality sector what he wants the sector to do in order to open safely so that we avoid a repeat of last week. If he cannot tell us that they can open safely, what is he saying to the 65,000 people whose jobs depend on tourism and hospitality?

Dr Aiken: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: I cannot take a point of order during a question for urgent oral answer.

Mr O'Dowd: Minister, what would you say to the businesswoman in my constituency who said to me during the week that, if the Economy Minister spent less time doing the Health Minister's work and more time doing the Economy Minister's work, her business may have a future? Will you get the money out the door and to the businesses that require it?

Mrs Dodds: The Member would need to clarify for me whether he was talking to a businesswoman with a rateable premises. If that business owner had a rateable premises, of course, that would be for the Finance Minister to look at. I launched the scheme that we have running whenever we saw the parameters of the Finance scheme. We will of course get the money out as quickly as possible.

However, in answer to the main thrust of the Member's question, I do not see a contradiction between a healthy community and a healthy economy. If we allow that economy to go to rack and ruin and unemployment to grow, we will increase mental health problems and death. Poverty brings incredibly negative health outcomes for people across Northern Ireland. It is a tricky and difficult balance, and I think that you will see the agonies that people genuinely went through last week to try to get that balance. Therefore, I think that we now need to look at how we have a functioning economy and a health service that can service the needs of all patients.

Ms McLaughlin: The terminology that the Minister used to suggest that this is a "game" in any shape, form or fashion is regrettable.

Many businesses in my constituency are small and family-owned, with perhaps two or three members of the same family working in them. To date, they are in their seventh week of having absolutely no support through the part A scheme. Based on the experience with the part A scheme — I welcome the fact that we now have a timeline for part B — can the Minister guarantee that part B grants will be put out very quickly? Can she guarantee that they will be paid before Christmas?

Mrs Dodds: Again, I ask the Member to clarify whether the businesses that she talks about have a rate base. If they employ two or three people, it suggests that they have a rate base. If they have been waiting for seven weeks, it suggests that they are part of the original localised restrictions support scheme that is run by the Department of Finance. If that is the case, I advise the Member to address her questions to the Minister of Finance, as the Minister responsible for operating the scheme.

As I have said and will continue to repeat in the Chamber, part A of the scheme is for those businesses that do not have premises and those that operate on a mobile basis, such as a driving instructor who maybe operates with some ads on Facebook and his mobile telephone number and makes appointments. We are currently working our way through about 2,500 applications to the scheme. By the end of this week, we will have paid out over £3 million through that scheme. We will endeavour to get the rest of the money out as quickly as possible, with as much assurance as we can have, so that the House and I can be satisfied that taxpayers' money is being spent appropriately.

Part B of the scheme is, of course, for businesses that have a number of customers but part of their supply chain is impacted by the restrictions. The Member and the House will understand why we wanted to directly target, first of all, those people who had no income whatsoever.

That is what we have done. Part B will, we hope, be out on Wednesday. Of course, we will pay out as quickly as we can, given the assurances that are required in order to make sure that taxpayers' money is being well spent.

Mr Stewart: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. You rightly say that the businesses that apply for the scheme are ones that have limited cash flow, and that is a serious problem for them, especially given the conditions that they face. I had a phone call just before we came in here from a lady who rents a chair in a salon. After three weeks with no updates by email or from your Department about her application, she received an email today asking for her accountant's details. She does not have an accountant; she cannot afford one. How has it taken three weeks to get to that point? When will they get their money? How is it that, given the accreditation that driving instructors have from the Department to say that they exist, not one in Northern Ireland had received their money as of Friday? Will people who have been asked to extend automatically get a payment, or will they have to reapply?

Mrs Dodds: The particular issue of the extension is one that we as an Executive will have to make a decision on.

However, I would suggest that, since part B is not in operation, it can be extended automatically. Part A will be a more difficult conundrum to deal with, but we should be able to overcome that reasonably quickly. I do not see any particular problems with it.

I do not want to get into an individual case. There is a helpline, and there are people in Invest NI manning the telephones every day in order to iron out those problems. I ask your constituent to contact them to make sure that the issues that she is raising are properly raised with those who administer the scheme and who will point her in the right direction.

Mr Muir: The Minister referred to this as a "game". I profoundly disagree with her: it is a horrendous nightmare. The people of Northern Ireland are looking to this place and to the Executive to come together to safeguard lives and livelihoods, and it is incumbent upon us all to do that.

In relation to part B, will that cover supply chains such as recruitment agencies and extend beyond what the traditional reference to food and produce?

Mrs Dodds: Part B — this is readily available on the NI Business Info site — will apply if the business supplies goods to a business named in the regulations. That includes businesses that supply goods directly to a business named and those that supply via a wholesaler or intermediary. If it is a food business, those food businesses must be licensed and registered by the local council. It can also apply to businesses whose services are provided directly to a business named in the regulations or those that supply a subcontractor. It also can apply to a business that does not supply goods or services to businesses named in the regulations but that is dependent on those businesses being open in order to operate; for example, businesses in the events sector. This is a fairly wide-ranging scheme; it is not intended to exclude. It is intended to be as inclusive as possible, hence the different categories of businesses that we have included, but they must be tied to the local restrictions that were announced on 16 October. That is the main part of it.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for her answers today. I understand that the Finance Minister, Conor Murphy, has £500 million, as has been mentioned, in COVID funding for the various Departments.

Will the Minister for the Economy, once again, highlight the bids that she has made and intends to make in relation to further support for businesses? Will she assure the House that that money will be available before the end of the financial year?

5.45 pm

Mrs Dodds: I thank the Member for his question. Before I answer, Mr Speaker, with your permission, I wish to address a point that Mr Muir raised. I do not consider this a game. Actually, I know so many people who are extremely stressed and anxious, people who perhaps are facing unemployment and people who do not know where to turn to get Christmas over. This is not a game.

I have made a number of bids for additional funding from the Finance Minister, and I will continue to do so. Last week, I wrote to him to ask him to consider extending the 12 months' rates relief to the manufacturing sector. Manufacturing generates about £6.4 billion to the economy and accounts for about 11% of all employees in the economy. While we have the funding to do so, even though we have an unparalleled derating scheme for manufacturing in Northern Ireland — unparalleled throughout the United Kingdom — I think that, in these very difficult circumstances, it would be an easy win for manufacturing and something that we could do relatively simply.

I am also, as I have said, finalising and hope to get Executive approval for a scheme for those who have been recently self-employed. I have been looking at a scheme for tourism support for large tourism businesses that did not fall into the £51,000 bracket in the previous rates schemes and a scheme for bed & breakfast providers. I have been looking at support for some licensed premises that have been continuously closed over the period of restrictions, and I feel that there could be some additional support, through an extension of the hardship scheme, to include companies with more employees than those covered by the previous hardship scheme.

I have made significant bids, and they will all be assessed in the coming days.

Dr Archibald: I thank the Minister for her response, for giving the details of the timeline and for her update on part A of the scheme and what is intended to be paid by the end of this week. However, I am sure the Minister will understand why people were concerned, given that payments under part A are a fortnight late and part B has not opened, and given the financial difficulties and pressures that people and businesses are facing.

Earlier today, the joint First Minister made a statement and outlined additional support being made available for businesses. Will the Minister outline what form that will take and how quickly it will be paid out?

Mrs Dodds: I thank the Member for her question, but I would ask her to clarify whether she is talking about the scheme run by the Department of Finance or the scheme run by the Department for the Economy, which is much newer and has moved reasonably well, given its complex nature. If it is a business in the north-west, as my colleague on the other side of the House has indicated, waiting seven weeks, then it almost certainly relates to the localised restrictions support scheme.

We need to be very clear about the schemes that we are talking about and not conflate the two. Of course, that is easy to do on social media or for a quick sound bite, but for people who actually require support, that is not the best way forward, and I take that very seriously. I have devised a number of schemes for people, right across Northern Ireland, and we try to get money out as quickly as possible with as much assurance as possible, and that is very important.

I have given an indication of the different schemes and the additional supports that I am working on. The Executive will, probably on Thursday, take decisions around further and additional supports, and I am open to looking at any ideas that Executive colleagues bring forward. The Member will know that the Finance Minister has asked for further bids in relation to the £500 million that he is holding, and I have indicated some of those bids that we are currently working on.

Mr O'Toole: Minister, last week your Department published a research paper on the expected economic impact of the four-week closure. It suggested £120 million directly and up to £400 million indirectly. It also states:

"This figure is assuming a swift reopening and 'bounce-back' once restrictions are lifted".

How can that be the case when we still have hundreds of new cases per day, and the highest infection rates in these islands? Can I ask you to go back to your officials and ask them to test the assumptions that they are making in that paper? Could you also, please, give us a numerical update on precisely how much money has been granted under Part A of the Department's scheme?

Mrs Dodds: The paper that the Member refers to is, like much of the work that we are doing, is modelling around the impacts on the economy. It had as its premise that restrictions would be lifted and people allowed to trade in a freer manner.

The compromise solution that the Executive came to last week will see all the restrictions continue bar the one for close-contact services, which the Health Minister indicates adds about 0.05 to the R rate, and the opening of coffee shops. If we are to have a full bounce-back of the economy and not increase that £400 million number, we will have to allow our economy to operate.

I accept that these are very difficult situations for us to be in. I talk on a regular basis to the Health Minister. I accept his sincerity in what he is putting forward, but two things have to happen: we have to know the further restrictions that the Health Minister wants to bring, and the proposals from Health on how we break the cycle of lockdowns. These are incredibly difficult, unpredictable and new circumstances for us all, and the anxieties of last week were a demonstration of that.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister very much for her comments. In her dossier that my previous friend from South Belfast alluded to, one of her officials — I do not think that she would have let this go out if she was a Minister herself, but maybe she would — it states:

“Therefore, it should be noted that the economic and health situation is highly fluid and uncertain and that any estimates are only provided in good faith, to the best of our knowledge. For that reason, the estimates below are intentionally not provided with precision attached”.

Minister, does that refer to your entire approach to helping the excluded of Northern Ireland, and when you say that you are going to get information out on Wednesday, can you give a specific guarantee that that information will come out on Wednesday, and, if it does not, will you consider your position, as you should do?

Mrs Dodds: The paper that was produced last week on modelling the impacts on the economy adopts exactly the same premise as modelling on health impacts that his colleague the Health Minister produces. They are models; they are not precise instruments, just as those from the Health Department around health predictions are modelling. I commend the Member for his persistence but ask him to at least read the paper and the premise on which it is based. [Interruption.] I am unsure which section of society the Member is referring to. The Executive will get a paper from me on Thursday on those who term themselves as excluded. That paper is ready and will be signed off. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Dr Aiken: My apologies, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Mr Aiken, please behave yourself. Minister, please continue.

Mrs Dodds: Thank you, Mr Speaker. No amount of shouting at me in this Chamber will change my mind on how important these issues are and how important it is to respond to people in difficult circumstances.

The Member can shout all he wants in that respect.

On Thursday, the Executive will consider a paper on those who call themselves excluded. Of course, it will be for the Executive to decide what to do on that. There will also be further payments, as I said, by the end of this week under part A, and the expectation is that part B will start on Wednesday. These are important things, and I know that the Member, as Chair of the Finance Committee, would want that money to go out with assurance and probity around it, although his recent statements might not suggest that.

Ms Sugden: I wish to pick up on a point that Mr Stewart made about accountant verification. That in itself has its own cost, and constituents tell me that they have to pay their accountants to sign off forms. I ask the Minister to consider that, particularly for the scheme that she is bringing forward on Wednesday. Also, will the Minister confirm that businesses, further to the new restrictions from Friday past, will get the various business support schemes, whether they are partially closing or fully closing for the two weeks ahead?

Mrs Dodds: Yes, it is fully intended that those businesses will receive those financial supports. It is unfair and improper to ask businesses to close and not to support them. We will endeavour to do that.

Many Members to whom I speak, either individually or in the Chamber, will know that one of the real difficulties in schemes such as this is the verification of applications. Accountants' letters were one way in which we could do that in the absence of HMRC cooperation. I understand that that is difficult for some people, but we must have assurances around taxpayers' money that is being used for the schemes. I hope that that does not put people off from applying. People have told me that they have phoned the Invest NI helpline and have been helped considerably about how to get these things moving. I would advise your constituents to do that and to keep in contact.

Mr Speaker: I call Trevor Clarke. I will try to call one more Member after you, so take one minute, please.

Mr Clarke: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I thank the Minister for the way in which she outlined her concerns for the businesses that have been affected so dramatically by the virus. Given the very difficult position that the Minister found herself in last week, and the counter view on what the Executive should do — I believe that the right thing was done — did any of the other parties that are now concerned about how an extended lockdown will affect those businesses express the same concerns as she has expressed all along about such businesses?

Mrs Dodds: Most Members in here, whether or not they agree with me politically, will not underestimate my grave concerns for businesses that have been told to close, for people who may lose their jobs and for people who, even under a furlough scheme, face having 80% of their salary in the run-up to Christmas. These are incredibly difficult circumstances. The Executive last week, ungainly as the situation might have been, reflected the difficult, tricky balance of issues. It is really important that we have a health service that can function, but it is equally important that we have an economy that can function. An economy that is in poor shape will produce poor health outcomes, more difficulties for communities and individuals, and even death. That weighs heavily on our minds.

Mr Speaker: I call Linda Dillon for the final question — very quickly, please.

Ms Dillon: When the Minister came up with this paper about the excluded, who call themselves “excluded” because they have been excluded since March — these people have not been waiting for a couple of weeks — did she engage with them to ensure that the paper meets their needs?

Mrs Dodds: As many Members know, I have engaged with a wide range of people, including those people who call themselves excluded, over a long time. The issues will not change.

Mr Speaker: Members, that concludes this item of business. Thank you.

6.00 pm

Assembly Business

Mr Speaker: I have received notification from the members of the Business Committee of a motion to extend the sitting past 7.00 pm under Standing Order 10(3A).

Mr O'Dowd: I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 10(3A), the sitting on Monday 16 November 2020 be extended to no later than 11.00pm.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 10(3A), the sitting on Monday 16 November 2020 be extended to no later than 11.00pm.

Mr Speaker: I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments while we change the Chair.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair) —

Executive Committee Business

Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill: Second Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): We now return to the debate on the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill: Second Stage. I call Sinéad Bradley.

Ms S Bradley: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. At the outset, the SDLP acknowledges the reasoning presented surrounding the need for a reformation in the committal process and the objectives presented by the Bill. With mounting political agreements and an independent report spanning a significant time period, all indicating the need to engage in reform, it is regrettable that this matter has been delayed until now. However, we are here now. The proposals contained within the Bill present us with an opportunity to take action on any reform necessary.

There is no doubt that the committal process has its problems and a review is welcome. A reduction in the costly process may be achievable, but the opportunities to support the wellbeing of alleged victims and witnesses are amongst the strongest arguments for proposing reform.

It should be noted that a fair system that reaches justice in a timely manner is in the best interests of all parties. The inclusion of certain offences in the direct committal process, upon early inspection, certainly appears to be a clean and efficient way of reducing the delay that can be experienced under the committal process, as does the proposal to further simplify the process itself. I note the single list of serious offences to which direct committal will apply. Also important is that additional clarity will be given that any other offence that the Magistrates' Court considers to be related to the qualifying offence will also be directly transferred to the Crown Court at the same time.

On the basis of these proposals, it seems reasonable to conclude that the demands on the Magistrates' Court and the committal process could be significantly lightened. However, the additional powers proposed, arguably necessarily, may have the effect of cancelling out or reducing any such efficiencies. The aim of transferring cases to the Crown Court more quickly and shortening the time taken to complete these cases will, in the view of the SDLP, depend heavily on the redistribution of resources. Without a clear business case for the number of cases projected to flow through the proposed new system, the SDLP is concerned that the desired effect of reducing the length of the committal process could lead to new pressure and delay in the Crown Court. Should that be the case, the objective of swifter outcomes could be compromised. We therefore will engage with the Minister and the Department to seek assurance that these proposals are deliverable.

In principle, the SDLP welcomes the Bill and its objectives and looks forward to engaging in the process of scrutiny and building the legislation to ensure that it delivers on all its outlined objectives.

Mr Dickson: I welcome the Bill's Second Stage. I begin by commending the Minister for continuing the programme of reform started by our Alliance colleague David Ford when he was Justice Minister. Our justice system is much improved from 2010. As ever, however, there is much to do to bring it into the 21st century by speeding up justice, improving victims' experience of the system and ensuring value for money for the taxpayer. The COVID-19 pandemic has had a profound impact on all of our lives and put pressure on Departments, but we must not lose sight of the long term. I would therefore like to thank the Minister of Justice's officials for the work that they have done to bring this legislation before us.

Committal reform has been on the agenda for quite some time. In fact, I recall that the abolition of oral evidence at committals was part of the Justice Bill (Northern Ireland) 2015 before it was amended, as was direct committal through differing mechanisms. This Bill brings together a number of recommendations and actions from the Fresh Start Agreement, the Gillen review, the Northern Ireland Audit Office and Criminal Justice Inspection. It will help to speed up justice and improve victims' experience of the system. I welcome that such an evidence-based approach has been taken to the Bill and to understanding what the need is and what our actions should be. Many, not least the Northern Ireland Audit Office, have pointed out that criminal cases in Northern Ireland take significantly longer than those in a similar system in England and Wales. The delays represent additional cost for defendants and victims, and committal reform will be a major step forward in addressing this. It is also worth noting that the committal process was abolished in England and Wales a number of years ago. It took time but, by May 2013, committal proceedings to determine whether there was sufficient evidence had ended. It is vital that we get on with the task here as well.

The first three clauses are quite straightforward, finally implementing the much-needed abolition of oral evidence in the committal process. Clause 1 provides for the abolition of preliminary investigations, which involve the calling of witnesses, oral evidence and associated cross-examination.

These can have a particularly traumatic impact on victims of crime and require them to give evidence more than once more during the progression of the case. However, hearings can also be lengthy, lasting a couple of days, as we see with delays in arranging the attendance of witnesses in the Magistrates' Court. This slows down our justice system, adds cost and potentially creates a traumatic experience for those who are cross-examined, all for little tangible gain.

Clause 2 repeals elements of the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 to abolish mixed committals and evidence under oath at preliminary inquiries. This brings forward another part of the recommendations of the Fresh Start panel for tackling paramilitarism and/or organised crime, and it is to be welcomed. Clause 3 tidies up minor appeals and amendments. Clause 4 is perhaps the most complex element of the Bill, bringing the necessary legislative changes to amend the 2015 Act to provide for direct committal for a range of offences triable only on indictment.

At this point, it is worth looking more specifically at the case for committal reform in Northern Ireland and the range of reports and recommendations which have called for it. First, there was a Fresh Start commitment to bring forward legislation to reform the committal system and remove the need for oral evidence to help tackle organised and paramilitary crime. In 2016, the Fresh Start panel published a specific recommendation for the Department of Justice to:

"bring forward draft legislation to further reform committal proceedings to remove the need for oral evidence before trial".

This was under the aim of "Promoting lawfulness", which the panel agreed could be done:

"in a way that respects the rights of both victims and the accused."

Of course, the intervening period of Assembly hiatus has put this off. I would like to, again, thank the Minister for her speed and efficiency in bringing it forward and for her commitment to such reform. I recall, in fact, that we were here over five years ago trying to remove oral evidence at committal as part of the passage of the Criminal Justice Bill. However, this was altered to continue the practice where the courts thought that it was in the interests of justice.

In 2018, the Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland's 'Without Witness' report recommended that:

"rape, serious sexual offences and child abuse offences be added to the list of specified offences under the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015", so as to allow for direct committal.

Then, the Gillen Review's 'Report into the law and procedures in serious sexual offences' called for similar reform to the system. Specifically, Mr Gillen called for direct committal arrangements to be made for serious sexual offences. These would have the effect of speeding up justice, reducing costs but, most importantly, reducing the potential for additional stressful and traumatic experiences that committal hearings can cause for victims. Reform is clearly needed to ensure that victims have a better experience of the justice system than they currently have. Committal causes impacts for the victims of crime, the slowing down of committal proceedings, and the slowing down of justice. However, it is also important that we consider the costs associated with this system.

In 2018, the Audit Office published 'Speeding up justice: avoidable delay in the criminal justice system'. This report highlighted a number of challenges facing our justice system. One of the most notable was the committal process. The report commented that the committal process is:

"widely considered as providing minimal value whilst imposing onerous demands upon victims and witnesses."

It noted the progress made in the 2015 Act to remove the process, and ultimately made the recommendation that:

"The Department should establish an action plan and timetable for the eradication of the committal process."

This Bill represents a step forward in that regard.

Finally, a commitment in 'New Decade, New Approach' states that:

"The Executive will deliver committal reform to help speed up the criminal justice system, benefiting victims and witnesses."

Again, it is welcome that the Minister is taking action on this New Decade, New Approach commitment, as we are all still waiting for progress on many other aspects and in many different areas in the Executive.

I recall that the 2015 Justice Act contained provision for direct committal in certain circumstances for guilty pleas. However, following engagement and identifying the complexities and risks inherent in this, the system will be simplified to be based on the case. That is a sensible and more workable way forward. Nonetheless, the Bill allows for magistrates to speed up the process in certain circumstances where there is an indication that the defendant wishes to plead guilty by ordering the necessary reports for the Crown Court.

6.15 pm

Of course, when we are reforming our justice system we must always consider the balance between the fundamental right of the defendant to a fair trial and the rights of victims and witnesses. This Bill achieves that. The eventual end of the committal proceedings, including pre-trial oral evidence, has been seen in England and Wales as not having a negative impact on the delivery of justice. In fact, the justice system moves more swiftly there. We must also remember that delays to justice have implications for defendants and their right to a fair trial in a reasonable period, as outlined by article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. My understanding is that the provision will not apply to cases already in progress, nor, indeed, retrospectively, so there will be no unexpected changes for those progressing through the system at the moment.

In closing, I welcome this legislation, which builds upon previous legislation brought forward by former Minister Ford. It takes a clear step towards reforming a part of our justice system that is antiquated and that does not deliver for the defendant, the victim or the taxpayer. It will speed up our justice system. It will ensure that the rights of all are respected and, in doing so, maintain and build vital confidence in the system and in how it will deliver for the people of Northern Ireland.

Dr Aiken: I apologise for our justice spokesman's not being here today, but I support the Bill. The UUP acknowledges the need for the changes and for this Bill. It is regrettable that this has been so long delayed, but we welcome at long last the reform of our justice system that is much needed. Streamlining and improving efficiency is needed, for justice delayed is indeed justice denied. The judiciary, the victims and the whole process of the justice service need to support these changes, and we need to also make sure that we have suitable resources and the ability to support the changes that have to go through our court system, which is in need of reform. The Ulster Unionist Party supports the changes.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak today, as a member of the Justice Committee, on the Second Stage of the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill. There has been a significant amount of work done on this Bill within the Department, and that should be acknowledged. This Bill represents a real opportunity to speed up the justice process, make the justice system more fit for purpose and further support victims and witnesses. There is a strong case for reforming the committal process, and there is a body of evidence from external organisations both within the criminal justice system and outside it. The Gillen report and the Northern Ireland Office report of 2018 both carry recommendations which would, if implemented, significantly reform the current committal process.

This Bill seeks to achieve a number of key outcomes. One of the most significant outworkings of the Bill will be to remove the need for victims and witnesses to give oral evidence twice, first at the committal hearing in the Magistrates' Court and then again at the Crown Court. Giving oral evidence can be very daunting and traumatic for victims and witnesses who may have suffered horrifically, and can often only add to the pain for an already distressed victim.

This will also cut down on duplication and help to streamline the process for the Courts and Tribunals Service, as well as the criminal justice agencies, and, most importantly, improve the experience for the victims of crime in their pursuit of justice. The Bill will also ultimately result in more cases getting to the Crown Court faster than is currently the case. Magistrates' Courts conduct a very significant amount of business, and, often, Magistrates' Court lists are overflowing. However, it is important that we see an integrated approach to these reforms that mitigates the pressures on Crown Courts and ensures a managed, balance transaction approach. We do not want to just see the balance shifted from one court to another. The plan for a phased roll-out is a sensible approach that allows for flexibility and the tools to rebalance resources prudently. Although committal hearings are used to test evidence and determine if cases should proceed, it is very unusual for cases to be dismissed at that early stage, yet significant time and resources, including court time, are required, adding unnecessary costs and time to proceedings. Committal hearings can also often be subject to adjournments and delays for a number of reasons, which are often outside the control of victims and witnesses and which often add to their pain and frustration. We can learn lessons from other jurisdictions and ensure that any reforms are tailored and focused on making our justice system more efficient and effective. It is also important that there is a degree of flexibility with such a significant reform. That is why I believe that the use of orders in the Bill, which would allow other offences to be added, are an important tool.

The ongoing COVID-19 pandemic has presented unique challenges for victims of crime, with some court business conducted virtually during the lockdown and ongoing periods of restrictions. Even today, there are significant pressures on court business and virtual measures can sometimes limit full engagement and participation in the justice system and have an adverse effect on getting justice and, ultimately, support for victims. It is always wiser to consider ways of improving our justice system in a way that benefits victims and witnesses, with the aim of reducing offending and, ultimately, delivering safer communities.

I am content to support the general aims of the Bill, and I think that it has the potential to deliver leaner and more effective justice processes for victims of crime, who should always be the number one priority for the Department.

Ms Dolan: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Second Stage of the Bill. Reforming the committal process and speeding up criminal justice were commitments that were made in the Fresh Start and the New Decade, New Approach agreements. Speeding up justice is a priority for Sinn Féin and, although the Bill will play a part in doing that, it is clear that there are many other problems in the wider justice system that will not be resolved under the Bill. Therefore, there is a responsibility to fix the system as a whole.

The COVID-19 pandemic has added further complications, with a high number of cases having to be cancelled because of restrictions earlier in the year. Therefore, the Department has a responsibility to ensure that any remaining lists are dealt with swiftly.

We are aware of a pilot project that was carried out in Belfast recently, which involved fast-tracking serious sexual-offence cases involving child witnesses under the age of 13. We understand that that was carried out without the need for additional resources and that the pilot was successful. That is an example of the whole justice system pulling in the same direction to improve outcomes for victims and witnesses in an innovative way and is the type of thing that should be implemented and encouraged.

When discussing the Gillen review in 2018, the assistant director of the PPS said:

“We very much understand that the rigour and robustness of the system can be difficult from a victim’s perspective, and this is particularly true of those who are a victim of a sexual crime.”

She also emphasised the need for collaboration between criminal justice organisations. Such collaboration has been seen in a number of other projects that have been taken forward in recent years, including the Working Together project, which required enhanced early engagement between the PPS and PSNI and other criminal justice organisations at key points to improve the quality and timeliness of the investigative stages, as well as improving case files and disclosure. Better cooperation between those organisations is vital if we are to see the improvements to the speed of case progression that is required.

There is also the issue of increasing the jurisdiction of the Magistrates’ Court, which, in 2017, the Lord Chief Justice identified as having a number of benefits, including speedier case progression, the better use of the professional skills of judges and alignment with other proposed reforms, such as problem-solving courts. I ask the Minister whether her Department has done any scoping work on that issue and whether she intends to take it forward.

One of the most important ways of speeding up justice will be the further roll-out of problem-solving justice initiatives. We have now seen a number of successful pilot schemes and initiatives, such as the use of enhanced combination orders. There is a wide range of innovative and expansive thinking options out there, which, taken together, will deliver the radical changes to the criminal justice system that are required if we are to support victims and witnesses. That work needs to be a priority for the Department and other organisations that are involved in the justice system.

Mr Frew: I rise to speak on the Bill. First of all, I welcome the fact that we have legislation coming through the Assembly. That is what the Building and Chamber were designed for. We are legislators. Is it not great to have a late-night sitting, and the atmosphere that it brings, when we could be at home or anywhere else? This is where we are, and this is why we are here.

This is the business end for us as legislators. I am delighted that we can get our teeth into Bills. I thank the Minister for that. Of course, legislation is a bit like buses: you wait for a long time for one Bill to come along and, then, a number of them do. I can only impress upon the Minister to keep them coming. No matter how many there are, let us see legislative change for good.

I think that we all realise how long the Bill has been in the system and has taken to get to this point. I welcome that. I welcome the fact that some good can come out of it. It is only Second Stage. I cannot wait for the Bill to get to the Committee, where we can get into the nuts and bolts of what it is designed to do. It is clear that when one looks back at the catalogue — and it is a catalogue — of reports, there are some from all arts and parts; not only are there reports from the judicial system but from experts who have reported on the justice system of late.

Recommendation 3 from the Northern Ireland Audit Office’s 2018 report on speeding up justice states that:

“The Department should establish an action plan and timetable for the eradication of the committal process.”

Even recommendation 110, I think that it is, of the much-valued Gillen report states that:

“The Department of Justice should make provision for the direct transfer of serious sexual offences to the Crown Court, bypassing the committal process”.

There are even all the political agreements, which I will not go into because they bore me as much as they do everybody else in the public. Then, there is the Intelligence and Security Committee report on Northern Ireland-related terrorism, published in October 2020, which states that:

“we have found that systemic delays in the Northern Irish judicial process appear to be resulting in cases taking months, or even years” — of course, we all know that it is years —

“to come to trial the use of oral committal hearings ... and an absence of rules covering criminal case management do seem to be ... factors.”

Of course, anybody who has had any experience on the Justice Committee will know that it is a problem that has dogged the Committee, the Minister

, the Department and the judicial system for a long time. Therefore, I believe that we are taking a positive step forward in the right direction.

It is a very small Bill. There is not much to it. Most of what it contains relates to abolition of preliminary investigations and the committal process. That brings me to some of the problems that we might see. We have the benefit of hindsight with regard to England and Wales. Of course, they abolished committal proceedings quite some time ago. I think that it was the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 that did away with committal. Therefore, they have had a lot of time. Something that they realised about that — it was in a National Audit Office report — was that, while abolishing committal hearings had reduced waste in the system, getting rid of those hearings had added little value because that had, instead, added to pressure on Crown Courts, where a backlog of cases gathered more quickly.

We cannot have a bottleneck and for people to wait just as long, albeit it would do away with a horrendous stage of the court proceedings for the people who are involved. If outcomes take the same length of time, we will have failed. That is a sobering picture.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Member for taking an intervention. Does he agree that we must ask the Minister to provide assurances on how that will be prevented from happening?

Mr Frew: I hope that the Minister heard that. Yes: I support that intervention and key question. The Committee will want to look at that issue.

There is no point abolishing a stage of a hearing process, horrendous as it is, if we still have the same outcome and it will not assist. We know and are told time and time again by all the experts that justice delayed is justice denied. We will keep repeating that and we have done for years, but we have not seen any change, so here we have an opportunity for real change.

6.30 pm

I note Mr Allister's earlier commentary, and that is why I cannot wait to get the Bill into the Committee Stage. I am sure, given the Member's interest and expertise in this, that he will contribute to the Justice Committee's scrutiny, and I welcome and encourage that from the Member, as I am sure the Minister does. She is nodding her head. The more people we can get to scrutinise the Bill, the better. It is the same as with any Bill in the House.

We will want to scrutinise that issue to make sure that the changes that we are trying to make will bring real reform, real meaning and real positivity.

I thank the officials for coming to the Committee to give us a briefing before the Second Stage. One of the questions I asked was: how will it affect crimes and offences that are carried out by suspected terrorists but are not terrorist-related? With that comes the fear, the presence and the spectre of the fist and, in many cases, worse. We know that there is real fear out there in the population, not only among alleged victims but among the families of alleged victims. We need to ensure that we cover all bases and that, as much as possible, we try to protect the people involved from the gangster, the terrorist and the gunman. That is very important. It is highlighted in some of the intelligence-led reports, and some of the organisations have commented on that over the years. It is very important that we cover and protect those people.

It is not only about the alleged victims and their families but the perpetrators — or the alleged perpetrators, before I get told off. It is quite right that every single one of us should expect swift justice, even the perpetrators. That is hard to say, considering some of the horrendous crimes that have taken place, but everyone deserves quick, speedy justice outcomes. When you read all the reports, you will know that, especially for young people, delayed justice, if it is years in the making, can lead to a lack of responsibility from the perpetrator and that person not linking their crime with their punishment. We need to grapple with that. We need to make sure that that is quicker, slicker and more effective. We should remember that it is not just about punishing people but about rehabilitation, and we will have no chance of rehabilitating if the perpetrator cannot link the offence that they have committed with the punishment that they have been given. That is very important.

I will move on to costs. How will this save money and how much money will it save? That is a hard question to answer, because it changes and is so fluid over the years and, of course, it all depends on the rate of crime and everything else, but we need to see meaningful change in the area of saving money.

Let us not get away from the impact that this might have. Members of the Justice Committee are close to the courts. We should probably be closer, but we are close enough to the courts to know how they work. Many Members will have experienced court proceedings over the years and during their lives, and it is a daunting prospect. Even when you know you are right, if you are involved in a case, the buildings and the process can be alien to everyday life. Unless you are a trained barrister, solicitor or judge, it is alien to you and it is not your place of work, so it is daunting. It should not be the case that an alleged victim is asked to give evidence, and to give evidence again, or that a witness is asked to give evidence, and then to give it again in a different setting. We do not need that. It has been proven in other jurisdictions in the United Kingdom that it is not required. We need to cut away the layers that are not needed and speed up justice. That is the point that I make now. Passing the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill is the start, not the end, of the journey. It is important that we encourage and increase efficiency, even in our Crown Court proceedings. We must ensure that there is no bottleneck as a result of losing this layer, and make sure that our court proceedings are much more efficient than they are currently. That is vitally important.

I also want to touch on the utilisation of our estate — our court buildings and every art and part of those buildings. It is vital that they are utilised and maximised completely and utterly. If we do not have court proceedings, we should maximise the use of that building by using it for DLA and personal independence payment (PIP) appeals. That is what we do in courtroom 3 in Ballymena, and it works very well. We have not had any appeals this side of lockdown, which is wrong, because there is no reason for that, but the buildings and the court setting have to be utilised better. Over the years, they have not been well utilised.

All of those issues are in the mix. Even though the Bill is only five clauses long, the Committee will take its time. It will scrutinise it as only the Justice Committee can. I have been very impressed with the Justice Committee's work on the Domestic Violence and Family Proceedings Bill. We have done an enormous piece of work — a very good piece of work — and we will bear that out tomorrow. I have no doubt that we will do the same with the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill, because I have faith in the Committee members to scrutinise diligently and get to the kernel of the issues and the point of the Bill. We will probably make it better, as we did with the Domestic Violence Bill.

I support the Bill's Second Stage and look forward to its Committee Stage. I would welcome commentary and comments from all Members at the Committee Stage.

Ms Rogan: I welcome the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill. It arose from the New Decade, New Approach deal in January, as part of the reform to direct committal proceedings. It will mean that rape and serious sexual offences are to be added to the list of specific offences under the 2015 Justice Act and, therefore, allow such offences to bypass the committal process and be directly committed to the Crown Court. That was a key recommendation of the Gillen review into the law and procedures in serious sexual offence cases. Recent figures show that the major delays in the justice system disproportionately affect those cases which involve serious sexual offences. It is, therefore, vitally important that such offences will be directly committed under the Bill.

I want to take some time to speak about the Gillen review. The recent Department of Justice figures show that, on average, it took 698 days to complete serious sexual offence trials in 2018 and 2019, which was up from 470 days in 2015 and 2016. The Gillen review stated that the current system:

“causes delay, prolongs the trauma on victims”

— or alleged victims —

“and potentially leads to their withdrawal from the case.”

It also stated that expanding the number of offences subject to direct committal to include sexual offences would reduce the anxiety for victims and should reduce delay in the case progression. Although the Bill, if passed, will go some way to rectifying that problem, it must be noted that behind every statistic is an individual. The victims who are at the heart of this have been subjected to some of the most horrific crimes. Victims have been let down by the system for too long, because too much time has been taken to deal with the case, or there has been a failure to deliver an acceptable outcome. Although the number of serious sexual offence crimes being reported is increasing, the conviction rate remains unacceptably low. The Bill will be an important way in which to support victims, but it is not the only solution; it is merely one piece of a wider problem that must be addressed. To that end, it is welcome that, during the summer, the Department of Justice published the Gillen review implementation plan, which Department of Justice officials briefed the Justice Committee on recently. It includes time frames for processing the recommendations. I welcome the Minister's intention to legislate for a number of Gillen recommendations as part of the Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill later in this mandate. I encourage the Minister to ensure that, even though a high number of Bills will be processed during the remainder of this mandate, the miscellaneous provisions Bill completes its passage during this mandate.

It is vitally important that the other recommendations of the Gillen review that fall under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice are made a priority so that the system can finally begin to treat victims with the respect, dignity, efficiency and competency that they deserve. Although tackling delay in the justice system is an absolute priority, we can do better in how we treat victims, including vulnerable and/or young witnesses. Gillen made two specific recommendations relating to the successful Barnahus system, which the Children's Commissioner described as:

“as close to an ideal system as we have seen”.

It is innovative, it is successful, and it is the type of radical reform that we need to see if we are to truly develop a justice system that looks after the best interests of victims and witnesses.

Ms Bradshaw: I agree with Mr Frew: it is great to see this Bill proceeding through the Assembly. We were all elected as legislators to bring in policy changes and new laws to make our constituents' lives better.

As the Minister mentioned, the principles of the Bill are not new. It is, of course, as she explained, designed to speed up the justice system, which, in many cases, is operating at only half the speed of those in the rest of the UK, and, ultimately, to improve the operation of the criminal justice system. We could probably do with a bit of speed being injected into the political system, too. The principles of the Bill are not new, and previous Ministers have attempted to legislate to implement them, but, as ever in this place, delays have been the outcome. We already have the Justice Act, but its directly relevant provisions have not commenced. What we are doing here was done, for the most part, in England and Wales as long ago as 2001 and was agreed in the Fresh Start Agreement action plan. My colleague Stewart Dickson outlined some of the background of why we have fallen so far behind, so I will not repeat it. We are now following on from what Criminal Justice Inspection, the Northern Ireland Audit Office and 'New Decade, New Approach' all advocated.

One advantage of the delay is that more offences are now included for direct committal. Those include serious assault, serious driving offences, sexual assault, aggravated burglary, human trafficking and firearms possession with intent. It is more essential than ever to get on with the Bill because it complements other legislation that is currently proceeding through the House or is currently proposed. That is because the Bill is about not just speed, as important as that is, but reducing stress on victims and potential victims. The Bill will improve the quality of evidence and will relieve stress by ensuring that evidence is given only once. Indeed, it is the abolition of oral evidence at the committal hearing, which is, primarily, dealt with in clauses 1 to 3, that will follow most swiftly after the passage of the Bill. That is also important following the Gillen review into serious sexual offences. Although that review was specifically about sexual offences, it called for a holistic approach. The cases added for direct committal extend well beyond rape and sexual assault, so the principle that victims should not be further victimised by the length or nature of evidence that they have to provide surely extends beyond them, too. Clause 4(8) is notable in that regard.

I also draw attention to clause 4(4), which enables the direct committal of a case to trial by an order of the court or through regulations of the Department that define which cases must be so committed.

This will help to enable the ultimate goal, which is the eventual abolition of committal hearings altogether. I look forward to this Bill now proceeding swiftly to speed up our justice system and improve the quality of evidence presented in it.

6.45 pm

Miss Woods: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this Second Stage debate, and I welcome the Minister back to the Chamber. As many Members have alluded to, committal reform has been discussed for many years and has featured in a number of reports pertaining to the justice system in Northern Ireland, notably the Gillen review, the Audit Office report and the 2016 Northern Ireland Executive action plan on tackling paramilitary activity and organised crime, which recommended that the Department remove the need for victims and witnesses to provide oral evidence before a trial and abolish committal proceedings in respect of offences most frequently linked to so-called paramilitary groups. There was also the Intelligence Committee report that Mr Frew mentioned.

Also, in 2018, Jonathan Hall QC provided an independent review of terrorism legislation across the UK, and he highlighted a finding that one of the reasons why difficulties are encountered in Northern Ireland in bringing successful terrorism prosecutions could be because of the aggressive adversarial court processes, with all of the defendants requesting old-style committals during which every point is fought over. I am also aware that this formed part of the debate in 2014 with the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, where, at Second Stage, proposals to reform committal proceedings were generally supported. So, this is not a new issue, but I, unlike many other Members here, was not part of that process. Therefore, I initially extend an invitation to, in particular, Mr Allister, who was vocal on this earlier today, to speak with me on this matter and outline his position and his experience with this in practice to me and to the Justice Committee.

As has already been discussed, the primary purpose of the Bill appears to be improving justice procedures by reforming the committal stage of cases moving through the court system. The Department's overall aim is to eradicate the traditional committal process entirely through rolling out direct committal. Fundamentally, it is to make the experience of victims and witnesses better, removing unnecessary steps and improving the speed of cases throughout the justice system. The committal proceedings as they stand have been described as a redundant, unnecessary and traumatising addition to the justice process for victims, and we know that there are fundamental problems that must be addressed.

Sir John Gillen, in his review of serious sexual offences, recommended that current proceedings should be discontinued, stating that they:

“are often listed as a mixed committal, which then turns into a conventional preliminary enquiry hearing on the morning of the matter, after the complainant has suffered the stress and worry of a court appearance, only to be told that they are not required. This is quite unnecessary and that practice should be strongly deprecated, given the additional stress and delay this process is causing.”

He stated:

“that there is no justification for continuing with the present system of committals in serious sexual offences”

I am glad to see this being part of the Bill and the additional offences added to the list of direct committal. I also note other Members' commentary on the delays in the system for sexual offences along with the conviction rates, and I agree that it must be addressed. So, there is much more to do as well as this Bill.

With preliminary enquiries, the situation is even more traumatic for victims and witnesses, as they are called to give evidence in what is experienced by them as an actual trial, leaving them hostage to a system that claims to be intent on ensuring that victims of crime will have to give evidence only when it is necessary. So, do we actually need a dress rehearsal of the case or are there other safeguards in the system that could prevent this? The oral committal system can add an additional layer of evidence, given that it has been recognised by the Department of Justice and those working in the criminal justice arena as unnecessary, not least because of the physical and emotional toll that giving evidence at this stage has on those who have already had to live with the after-effects of criminal activity. This has most loudly been advocated by groups and organisations such as Victim Support, and I look forward to engaging with them further on this. Perhaps the Minister can outline in her closing remarks what recent engagement she and her Department have had with organisations such as Victim Support, which I know was incredibly active on this issue even when the Assembly was down for some years.

Committal hearings add to the already significant delays and mammoth costs of our justice system, but, unfortunately, the Department was not able to provide any assessment of the costs of these proposed changes to the Committee during the oral evidence session. I note that, in 2012, when the Justice Committee was presented with the consultation on early guilty pleas and committal reform, the Department had not conducted detailed costings on abolishing the committal process altogether. I hope that that information and the other effects of the Bill will be provided at the earliest possible stage to the Committee.

I welcome information, from a purely financial perspective, on how much the current system costs and any projections of what those reforms would save and where the finances would be redirected to in the courts process.

I would also appreciate information on what lessons have been learned from other countries that have implemented committal reform, such as Scotland and England, as well as lessons from Australia on the different approaches taken there. In Canada, too, this has come up in much discussion, and recent issues have been raised with committal proceedings around the country's extradition laws. Have any studies and research been done to make sure that this legislation will do what it says on the tin, that is, remove undue delay?

In 2012, the Justice Committee was also told that part of the issue with abolishing committal in its entirety was that so many consequential changes would be required if it were uprooted and got rid of entirely. I am aware that it will be done in a staged process through this Bill, but the Committee was told that there would be a queue of cases waiting to get to the Crown Court, and there would be a fear that if the rest of the system were too slow, the Crown Court would end up becoming a remand court.

So, where are we now? Eight years later, have we got the necessary changes in the court system that mean that there is no queue? What front-loading has occurred to prepare for the changes? What safeguards are in place already? Do we need to go further? Is a trial sufficient to safeguard the rights of the defendant and scrutinise evidence? If it is — and, surely, that has been suggested in Gillen with regard to sexual offences, as well as reforms to proceedings elsewhere in the UK and Ireland — this Bill needs to address that. We must go beyond this Bill to do our best to sort out the speed of justice.

Overall, I welcome the introduction of the Bill and look forward to scrutinising it as part of the Committee to get the best possible justice system for victims.

Mr Allister: The removal of a citizen's liberty through incarceration is the most severe step that the state can take against any citizen. Therefore, over centuries, we have built up a hedge of protections against injustice resulting from that situation so that we are sure that before the state dares to remove the liberty of any citizen, be he the most odious terrorist charged with the most odious terrorist crimes, be he charged with the most sickening of sex abuse crimes or be he charged with theft or robbery or anything else, that it is sure that it has a process that is foolproof, as far as it can be.

We built up a number of matters to hedge that about. The ultimate one is that no one can be convicted of any crime without proof beyond all reasonable doubt. I trust that none of us would want to tinker with that or change that. That is a bulwark, but, as part of the hedging about of protections for citizens over the centuries and decades, we have established a committal process to ensure that, before a case goes for trial, there is at least a prima facie case against the accused. That is the difference.

In committal, the test is not whether there is proof beyond all reasonable doubt. The test is whether there is prima facie evidence that the person who is charged committed the offences with which he is charged. Only if there is prima facie evidence is that person committed for trial.

Anyone can see the vast difference in the scale of what is required. What is required at committal stage is very modest. It is to show only a prima facie case. It is quite different from what is required for conviction.

What are we looking at therefore at committal stage? What we are looking at in 95% of committal cases is the papers in the case. How do the papers evolve? Are they sworn statements? No. Are they statements that have been sifted and tested by any interrogation? No. Papers at committal are witness statements taken, almost invariably, by a police officer. They may reflect the actual words of the witness; they may not. They are the words framed by the police officer to convey what the witness is saying.

The statement is then signed by the witness. It is not sworn; it is signed. What this House is therefore being invited to do is to say that it is OK with us to put people on trial, for perhaps the most serious of crimes or the least of crimes, in the Crown Court, without the evidence against them ever being sifted or tested or sworn. That is the effect of abolishing committal proceedings, because most committal proceedings involve the production of what is called a bundle of preliminary enquiry (PE) papers, which the magistrate reads. Based on those papers, he decides whether there is a prima facie case. He is applying a judicial process before someone is sent for trial.

This Bill wants to remove that. This Bill wants ultimately to remove that from every single crime that ever goes to the Crown Court. This Bill wants ultimately to create the circumstances in which the state can do the greatest possible injury to citizens, namely to deprive them of their liberty. This House wants to create a situation in which someone can be put on trial for whatever it is, without those papers ever passing through any judicial sift or ever being sworn to be the truth. It is just enough that it says it there in black and white. I do not think that that is wise. I do not think that it is sound. I do not think that it is in the interests generally of society.

I have to say that the process does not cause delay in the criminal justice system. The regular committal, which is over 95% of all committals, is a paper exercise that does not cause the delay that is pretended in this House today. What of the other 4-5%? They come either through what is called a preliminary investigation (PI) or, more likely, through a mixed committal. That is to say, at its initiative, the defence can ask for all the evidence to be called. It would be very unlikely that you would do that. You do not really want to hear from the mapper or whomever. Or it can ask for key evidence to be called. Why would it do that? I can tell you. In my experience, I do not think that I have ever read a set of committal papers that would not leave you believing, "This probably is the truth", and yet, when you get a witness in the box, you can discover that it is anything but the truth.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment. You can discover that it is fabrication. You can discover that there were motives that produced the fabrication. That is why a defence counsel or solicitor would say, "We know that to be fabricated. We know the motive of that person. We know the frailties of that evidence. To save the need the need for a trial, we are therefore going to try to expose that at this point by asking for a mixed committal or a PI".

And if they succeed, what happens? They save the public purse the cost of a trial. In 2014, when we last debated this, in that year 18 preliminary investigations/committals resulted in no committals. That meant that there did not have to be tens of thousands of pounds spent on 18 trials. That is only a drop in a very big ocean but it needs to be taken account of.

7.00 pm

Ms Dillon: I thank the Member for taking the intervention. I agree with Rachel Woods. In scrutinising this Bill we will listen to many witnesses. I would be happy to meet the Member to hear his side of the argument, along with my colleague on the Committee and anybody else who wants to be part of that conversation, because we do want to make the best law and we want to ensure that these issues are dealt with. I would like to hear some alternatives as to how we make this process less difficult for those alleged victims.

Mr Allister: If the Member continues to listen I hope that I will be able to assist.

Why have we got a committal process? Think of it. I have tried to deal with that. We have a committal process as a sift. Let me remind the House that in the Continental system, for example, committal is done by the magistrate presiding, interrogating the witness and deciding whether or not they are believable and then they go to trial. We have a much more modest system here. It simply requires the statements to be sifted in 95% of the cases and for the magistrate to be satisfied that there is something here, that it is prima facie and needs to be tested by a jury, and so they are committed.

You have the very few cases where the defence say, "We would like to challenge the evidence at this stage". Very often, the defence strategically decides not to, because they want to keep their powder dry, so to speak. Every time you call your witness and show your hand in your cross-examination they are more ready for you the next time, if there is a next time, so very often the defence will keep their powder dry and agree to a committal on the papers and not ask for it. However, in cases where it is crying out for challenge I do not see why this House would want to remove that.

We had this debate in 2015 and this House, with the votes of Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists, if I remember correctly, preserved the right for oral hearings at committal, not on a blanket basis — we removed that — but in the interests of justice. What this House arrived at as a compromise in 2015 was that if the magistrate presiding is persuaded that in the interests of justice he should hear some oral evidence, then he hears it. What this House in 2020 is being asked to do is to liquidate the interests of justice, to take away from this process the opportunity for the interests of justice to be served.

I could understand this House's stance if this was a choice between everyone can have a PI or a mixed committal and it is an absolute right, or nobody has it. I can understand that, but when the choice is between this House having reached a settled view in 2015 that those who can persuade a magistrate that is in the interests of justice that evidence is heard, then they can have a committal.

Really, we are saying — there is no dodging of this for this House, and there will be no dodging of this for the Committee — that the question that you are being asked in this Bill is, "Do you want to remove the protection that says that committal happens, and only happens, if it is in the interests of justice?" If your answer is, "I don't care about the interests of justice; I just want to remove it", you will vote this Bill through, lock, stock and barrel. However, if you do care about the interests of justice, you will ask yourself what is wrong with a magistrate having to be persuaded that oral evidence can be called if it is in the interests of justice. What do the courts exist for, if not the interests of justice? I find it quite surprising that we want to arrive at a situation where mere statements — no sifting, no rigour, no testing — are enough to send one to trial. Indeed, we want to do more than that. We do not even want to have a process; we just want to send them for trial.

I was astounded when I read the explanatory and financial memorandum. I hope that all Members have read it, because we discover in it that, for this proposal, the House is being asked to rely on a consultation from 2012 — eight years ago. Is that good enough for this House? A Minister is bringing a proposal with a backup document that relies on a consultation from eight years ago. It recites what the great and the good think and what some very knowledgeable politicians think and Fresh Starts and New Decades and all sorts of things. However, the obvious gap is that, not once, in this document is it indicated that the solicitors' organisation, the Law Society, was ever asked for its opinion or that the Bar Council was ever asked for its opinion. It is so selective that it seems to be interested only in views that might agree with it. What sort of a tawdry document is it to accompany a Bill that eschews consultation, other than that which suited in 2012; which eschews the democratic decision of this elected House in 2015?

Members are, of course, fully entitled to change their mind, but I have reminded you what some of you voted for in 2015. Have the fundamentals changed? Are the principles different? Are your principles different from what they were in 2015? Do you now think that it should be an easier process? Do you think that article 6 of the European Convention, which still applies, now allows shortcuts in the process of justice? That is what you are being asked to legislate for.

Paragraph 30 of this document goes on to say:

"After revisiting the 2012 consultation within the context of the current criminal justice arrangements, the Department remains convinced that the proposals brought forward in 2012 represent the most appropriate approach to delivering the recommendation."

So much for the Assembly. There is something of the arrogant about that. The Assembly debates and decides, it has its Committee Stage, it takes amendments and takes a view, but the Department has produced a document that relies on a consultation from 2012 and says, "We are still convinced that that is the best, and we don't bother to ask those who might take a contrary view". I do not think that that is how we should make legislation in this House. Two thousand and fifteen was an honourable compromise. It removed the wholesale right to committal, but it preserved it in those circumstances where it was in the interests of justice. I do not think that that is something that is open to abuse. What you are saying is that if that is abused, there are magistrates in this country who have a wrong view of what is in the interests of justice.

Is that what you are saying? If a magistrates decides that it is in the interests of justice to hear some oral evidence then who are we, in this House, to go behind that to say "Oh no, we know better. We do not like this notion of the interests of justice so we are going to exterminate that from the Bill". Of course, it is clear, in paragraph 17 of this document, that the ultimate aim is to liquidate committals altogether. So, everyone is returned; there is no sworn evidence, tested evidence or sifted evidence, just return them. Whoever said it is right, that will create an inevitable logjam in our Crown Court. It will just push it down the pipe, as far as that is concerned. Of course, as the game plan is for no committals, you have to get rid of the opportunity for oral evidence in clauses 1 and through clauses 1, 2 and 3. Then the Department wants to give itself the power by order to extend the list of offences. Maybe it is in here, but it was not clear to me whether that has to be done by affirmative resolution, negative resolution, any resolution or whether it is just an arbitrary power for the Department. I think that the Committee needs to look at that.

There is something else that it wants to take out; in the 2015 Act we made a provision that there was a right to call evidence at the application — in what was the old no Bill process. So, when you get to the Crown Court and the lawyers for the defence think that there is not the evidence to stack that particular charge up — it is more likely to be out of a number of charges — and, therefore, they want to call some evidence — it is going to be defence evidence — to help to knock that out. Again, the 2015 Bill said that you could do that if it is in the interests of justice, whereas the 2020 Bill says “you cannot do it; forget about the interests of justice, you cannot do it”. So, Members, that is the critical question in this Bill: are you prepared — each and every one of you — to take a step which removes something which is premised on the interests of justice from our legislation? If you are then vote this Bill through, but if you are not then think again. Thank you.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I call on the Minister of Justice, Mrs Naomi Long, to conclude and wind on the debate on the Second Stage of the Bill.

Mrs Long: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am pleased to be able to wind on the debate today. This is another significant piece of legislation from the Department. Although it is a relatively short Bill with only six clauses and one schedule, the changes that it proposes will deliver a much needed and long awaited reform of the criminal justice process in reducing delay and improving the experience of victims and witnesses.

I thank all of the Members today for their constructive engagement, and for the useful discussion on the elements of the Bill. As the Bill moves through its stages in the Assembly, I hope that we can continue in this spirit to ensure that this important piece of legislation reaches the statute book as soon as possible, and that we can start to deliver these much needed changes in reality.

I appreciate that much of the content of the Bill is technical in nature. However, in summary, the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill seeks to, first, expand the use of direct committal to a wider range of offences, and to bring more offences more quickly to the Crown Court. Secondly, it will remove the need for oral evidence before trial. Finally, it will smooth the operational outworkings of direct committal. In doing so, it will help to deliver on the commitments from the New Decade, New Approach deal, Fresh Start, the Gillen review of serious sexual offences and a number of other scrutiny reports by Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Audit Office. However, most importantly, it will help us to fulfil our responsibilities to victims, witnesses and defendants for fair and speedy justice.

7.15 pm

I turn now to some of the issues raised during the debate. The Chairman of the Committee, Paul Givan, mentioned in his remarks that this became an Assembly Bill when it came before the House. Mr Speaker, as you will be aware, no such thing exists. It remains an Executive Bill, albeit Justice-led, and the Assembly and Committee process is an important one, which I respect on principle and in practice, because it allows it to improve the Bill. However, where that is most likely to succeed is where the Committee approaches its duties with equal emphasis on the scrutiny and on the cooperation and support for the Minister.

Furthermore, my responsibility and that of the Executive parties is set out in guidance note 2 when it comes to Executive Bills. As a former Minister, the Member will be fully aware that the guidance note states that Ministers should obtain Executive agreement at key stages of the legislative process. Paragraph 4(d) specifically refers to amendments to the Bill involving policy changes, not technical or presentational amendments, by the Minister or by the Committee or a private Member, which the Minister intends to accept. Where it is proposed to resist amendments from a Committee or private Member, the sponsoring Minister should write to ministerial colleagues explaining the reasons for that approach and reminding them of the need to support the Executive’s previously agreed policy.

That in no way diminishes my respect for the role of the legislature, but it simply reflects the fact that it is incumbent on the Executive and on me, as a Minister, to seek to ensure that proposed amendments either from a private Member or a Committee are competent and do not deliver outcomes that may have unintended consequences, such as obligations on a Department that, due to resource or capacity, cannot be delivered, or the creation of additional financial liabilities that the Executive, as a whole, may have to bear.

It is not true to say that it simply becomes no longer an Executive Bill. As members of a five-party coalition, it is incumbent on Members to be cooperative, as I will be with the Committee, as it goes through the stages of the Bill.

The Deputy Chair of the Committee asked some questions.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Minister’s giving way and her outlining her role in the Executive. Does the Minister accept that it is the Assembly that is the final authority on legislation, not the Executive? The Assembly passes law, not the Executive.

Mrs Long: Yes, that is correct, Mr Speaker, and I am well aware of that. My duty is to bring forward legislation on the basis of agreement at the Executive. I gently remind the Member that we are part of a five-party coalition, not a 10-Minister one.

I want to address the questions raised by Linda Dillon. First, I will outline the expected outcomes. It is impossible to put a specific figure on it, but I expect that cases will reach committal more quickly than at present and, consequently, arrive at the Crown Court at an earlier stage. If the Bill achieves both the abolition of PIs and mixed committals and the direct transfer of all indictable-only cases, it will mean that victims and witnesses will not be required to attend the Magistrates’ Court at all to give evidence. That will reduce stress and worry, and it will also save on the costs of having victims and witnesses taking time out of their schedules to attend court. It will also save time in the Magistrates’ Court. Whilst the number of PIs and mixed committals is relatively small, in some cases, they can take days or even weeks to complete.

Linda also asked about the level of engagement that there had been with victims groups, and that was echoed in the queries from Rachel Woods. Victims groups are supportive of the current proposals in the Bill. They were consulted during the original proposals around the 2015 Act, but they have been further consulted. Victim Support NI has been invited to work alongside the Department as part of the committal reform programme of work. Our most recent engagement with them was in the last month.

Sinéad Bradley raised a number of points and was broadly supportive of what we were trying to do in the Bill. However, she asked how much it would cost and whether we had the funding to deliver. The Department of Finance approved a business case for £1.3 million in November 2017 for the capital cost associated with the IT changes required to implement direct committal. That expenditure is largely complete, and any remaining costs will be met from existing capital budgets. The main aim of direct committal is to transfer cases to the Crown Court more quickly than at present and, therefore, shorten the overall time that it takes to complete the cases. In effect, there will be a rebalancing of resources: less work will be done in the lower-court tier — the Magistrates' Court — but more work will be done in the higher-court tier — the Crown Court.

A business case that is being prepared will capture the relative rebalancing of costs and resources between criminal justice organisations. It is not expected that the changes will have a negative impact on costs, including legal aid costs, and should therefore be affordable. On that basis, any resulting costs will be prioritised by my Department in future budget periods.

Stewart Dickson and Steve Aiken both made very supportive speeches about what we are hoping to do, and I have to commend both of them for their support and particularly Mr Aiken for his brevity and succinctness.

Gordon Dunne, whilst broadly supportive, queried whether direct committal will just shift delay from the Magistrates' Court to the Crown Court. That point was also made by his colleague Paul Frew, Linda Dillon and others during the debate. The aim of direct committal is to move cases to the Crown Court at an earlier stage in the criminal justice system, which is expected to result in shorter overall end-to-end case times. Whilst it is possible that some cases will spend longer in the Crown Court, that will be offset by cases spending less time in the Magistrates' Courts. Transferring those cases to the Crown Court at an earlier stage will also allow the trial judge to have oversight of the case from an earlier point. That will help the court, with the assistance of the prosecution and defence, to identify the key issues in each case, resulting in a more efficient and quicker process. It will also help to ensure that cases are in the appropriate venue to take pleas at the earliest opportunity and to deal with exceptional circumstances such as issues of capacity. A key part of working to implement direct committal will focus on the rebalancing of resources between the two court venues.

Jemma Dolan also raised the issue of problem-solving justice. As she will be aware, last month, we presented a problem-solving justice five-year strategic plan to the Justice Committee that set out how we plan to roll out problem-solving justice, subject to affordability. It is a very important way of dealing with offending behaviour and makes a valid contribution to speeding up access to justice, which I believe is hugely important.

In Paul Frew's contribution to the debate, he was thrilled and delighted to be detained so long whilst legislating.

Whilst perhaps we are not all quite so thrilled to be here at this point in the evening, I am nevertheless glad that I was able to bring some joy to his life today. However, on a more serious point, I agree entirely with him that this is, indeed, what the Chamber is for: legislation. For three years, we had no Assembly, and people questioned what the value of the Assembly might be. Perhaps, over the last week, they have questioned that again.

However, it is our job and our primary responsibility to legislate, and it is good that we are debating real laws and real changes, so I very much welcome his enthusiasm for getting on with the legislative programme. I assure him that I will keep him busy, if I can.

Mr Frew also asked how the Bill would impact on terrorist-related offences. As he will be aware, those are not a particular cadre of offences that are easily identified. What it will do, though, is deal with some of the more serious offences that normally go through the Crown Court. When we move to abolish committal reform and the committal process entirely, obviously, those more serious Crown Court offences will go automatically to the Crown Court. So, whilst it is not specific, a significant number of paramilitary-related and terrorist-related offenders would go through that mechanism. That is how it meets the Fresh Start recommendations.

Mr Frew raised two other issues about bottlenecks and speed. This is not the only improvement that we are making to speed up justice, although it is a very important one. The priority for me and the Criminal Justice Board is to see that we have a more effective and efficient justice system. In 2019-2020, the median time taken to complete cases fell to 149 days. That is an 11% reduction on the previous year. We need to do more, and this will make a contribution to that, but it is fair to say that it is not the only tool in our armoury.

Mr Frew also raised the enhanced jurisdiction of Magistrates' Courts. Committal is a complex issue, and roll-out is intended to be on a staged basis. We will consider the jurisdiction of the Magistrates' Court in parallel with that roll-out, and should we decide that changes need to be made in that regard, we will require additional primary legislation. Emma Rogan asked about Executive approval and when we will be in a position to deal with the miscellaneous provisions Bill, which will bring forward the next tranche of Gillen recommendations. I am hoping that tomorrow we will get Executive approval for the drafting of inclusions to the miscellaneous provisions Bill, and it will then go to the Office of the Legislative Counsel for further, detailed drafting. We are hopeful that that will happen, if not tomorrow, certainly in the very near future. It is a priority for me, and it is absolutely crucial that what was intended by John Gillen is rolled out, not just in the Department of Justice but across every Department in the Executive, because I believe that many of the issues that he highlighted relate not only to the delivery of justice but to the change of culture that is required to deal with serious sexual offending at a much earlier stage to make people safer, which, I think, is something that we all desire.

Paula Bradshaw raised a very important point about achieving best evidence. We talked a lot about the stress and anxiety that victims and witnesses can be under when they have to give their evidence twice. However, there is also an issue about that stress and anxiety preventing them from giving their best evidence in court, and that, in itself, can lead to miscarriages of justice.

It can also create difficulties if victims and witnesses, having gone through the committal process, then feel unable to go ahead and give their evidence in the Crown Court. That is why, in some cases, we have high attrition rates for some offenses, where victims, by dint of delay and fear of giving evidence in open court, end up pulling out of the process completely. That is not in anyone's interest. We need to make it as simple as possible for people to give their best evidence. Mr Allister is correct; that also includes defendants. They, too, have the right to give their best evidence. However, in this case, the stress seems to be mainly transferred to those who are waiting to be witnesses or to the alleged victims of these crimes, and it has a serious impact.

Rachel Woods was broadly supportive of the Bill, and I think that I addressed some her questions as we were going through the issue.

Then we heard from Mr Allister, who was not supportive of the Bill. That is not surprising, because he was not supportive of the Bill on the last occasion it came forward, and Mr Allister is not known for changing his mind.

Mr Allister: Then convince me.

Mrs Long: I will do my best.

I understand the points that are made. I do not, in any way, dismiss the validity of them. I think that it is important that we listen to those points, but we must also weigh them against the evidence that we have from other justice inspectorates' reports, from other sectors, from the Criminal Justice Board and from others who are invested in the system and are concerned about victims' rights.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Minister for taking an intervention. Does she agree that those independent reports must be given, not all the weight, but greater weight than reports from those who might have a vested interest in the process?

Mrs Long: I absolutely agree with that. I had a rather lighthearted conversation with Mr Allister outside, where I suggested that some of those people may wish to have multiple hearings in court because some of their payments will depend on it. However, he countered, just as justifiably, that if they are successful in getting the case against the person in court dismissed, they lose out on the payments for the Crown Court case. None of these things are about vested interests alone. That is important. We need to listen to the experience of those in the defence business as well as those in the prosecution business, and I think that is important.

That is why we approached the Law Society and the Bar Council, which were not comfortable with the previous recommendations. We briefed them both on the committal reform proposals and invited them to join a stakeholder group at the point where we start to roll the reforms out. In general, there is broad support for reforming committal, but the Law Society and the Bar Council have expressed reservations in the past, and I acknowledge that.

I have already dealt with Mr Allister's earlier intervention on the length of time that cases take. One of the issues that he raised today is an important one that we should address, and it is this: does abolishing oral evidence as part of the traditional committal process affect the rights of the accused?

That is an important point because the accused also have rights within the system. One is innocent until one is proven guilty, and it is important that we do not prejudice the outcome of any case or trial.

7.30 pm

Overall, these proposals provide a fair balance between the rights of the defendants and the rights of victims and witnesses. They will tackle delay in the criminal justice system and ensure that an accused can receive a fair trial within a reasonable period, and that, too, is required by article 6 of the ECHR.

There are sufficient safeguards in place through the no bill, as it used to be called, application process to allow the defendant to challenge the evidence at an early stage in Crown Court if the defence genuinely feels that the available evidence is insufficient to disclose a case for trial.

The Department is satisfied that the rights of an accused to know the case against them, and to call and cross-examine witnesses, are secured at the trial stage of the criminal proceedings. It is telling that now there is nowhere in the UK that has a committal process in the way that we have in Northern Ireland.

The other issue that Mr Allister raised, and, again, it is a valid one, was about the powers he is concerned that the Justice Department is taking onto itself to be able to add offences to the schedule at will. I want to reassure people that we put that in not in order that we will be able to roll out the committal reform process without coming back to the Chamber. We expect that there will be two further points at which primary legislation will be required for this to be able to proceed, so we expect that the Committee and others will have the opportunity to look at it.

The reason we are allowing for additional offences to be added by affirmative resolution is because we may create additional offences over the next couple of years that would fall into the same category of offence as those that we are putting on the schedule now. Rather than having to wait until the next tranche of the roll out, we will be able, by affirmative resolution of the House, to add those. I am thinking, for example, of some of the more serious cases around stalking and the more serious end of offences that we will be dealing with.

It would be by way of an affirmative order, and it would give people the opportunity to scrutinise and have a say in what happens. It is not about trying to take power for the Department; it is about trying to ensure that we are responsive in the justice system and have looked ahead and scoped out what may be necessary over the next weeks and months.

In conclusion, — and everybody bar Paul Frew will be delighted that I have said "in conclusion" — [Laughter] I am encouraged by many of the comments and issues that have been raised. I, like all of you, am eager to take forward these changes, and I want to see a timely passage of the Bill through the Assembly.

We have seen already the detailed scrutiny that the Committee has done, and I will be able to elucidate more on that tomorrow for the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill. I hope to work in the same spirit of collaboration and cooperation with the Committee to deliver the best possible Bill for the people of Northern Ireland.

I am asking again, however, for your support in keeping the Bill focussed on its current provisions in relation to the reform of committal proceedings. The Bill has been carefully designed to provide the necessary clarity to practitioners within the criminal justice organisations, to whom it will fall to implement these complex changes.

I ask Members who have material policy and legislative amendments to delay those until a future legislative vehicle in order that this legislation can be enacted as soon as possible, and with as little disruption to the criminal justice system as possible.

I thank everyone who contributed to what was a useful and constructive discussion, and one that will continue. I commend the Bill to the House for approval, and wish the Committee well in its scrutiny of the Bill. I and my officials stand ready to assist it in any way that we can.

Mr Allister: On a point of order. Miss Dillon, in her last intervention, seemed to infer that I had some sort of vested interest in these matters. I make it plain that I am now a non-practising barrister. I have no vested interests, financial or otherwise, in any of these matters, and I would like Miss Dillon to consider withdrawing that suggestion.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I thank the Member for that, and that is firmly on the record. I did not hear her specifically mention you by name, but that categorisation is firmly on the record, unless you wish to make a point of order, Linda.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill [NIA 11/17-22] be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): That concludes the Second Stage of the Criminal Justice (Committal Reform) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Committee for Justice.

Members should take their ease while we change the Chair.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Ammonia Levels in Northern Ireland

Ms Bailey: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with concern the scale and complexity of the ammonia problem in Northern Ireland; further notes that critical loads of nitrogen deposition at which ecological damage occurs have been exceeded at 98% of Northern Ireland's special areas of conservation, in some cases by 300% or more; recognises the need to halt further overloading of critical thresholds; notes Northern Ireland's legal obligations under article 6 of the EU habitats directive; and calls on the Minister for Infrastructure to conduct an urgent review of approved planning applications for ammonia-emitting projects that are within 7.5 kilometres of a Natura 2000 site; and further calls on the Minister to implement a moratorium on planning approvals for any project that proposes to increase discharges of ammonia into the environment until such time as a report is produced by the Department for Infrastructure that determines whether article 6 of the EU habitats directive is being complied with in Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one and a half hours for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. One amendment has been selected and is published on the Marshalled List.

Ms Bailey: Members will be aware of the current scale of the ammonia crisis in Northern Ireland and its impact on human health and the environment. Health-wise, ammonia pollution is linked to lung damage, heart disease, diabetes, problems with memory and thinking, cognitive decline, respiratory issues, higher death rates and lower birth rates. Members do not need to be reminded that we are in a pandemic. COVID-19 is a virus that affects the lungs, heart and respiratory system. We know that ammonia pollution can have a significant impact on the rates of serious illness and death from COVID. This is not something that we should be taking lightly.

Some Members will also be aware of the scale of the ecological crisis in Northern Ireland. The number of breeding sows has gone by 24% to almost 48,000, broiler chickens up 41% to almost 17,000,000 and hens up 89% to almost 4,000,000; whilst the number of wetland birds has fallen by 19% and the freshwater bird population by 42%.

95% of our lakes now fail water framework directive quality standards. 78% of our shellfish water bodies now fail water quality standards for E. coli. It is not a pretty picture, but I would argue that it is no accident either.

The policy of agriculture intensification that has been pursued by the Executive through its Going for Growth strategy since 2013, has resulted in pollution that sits in our air, soil and our water. Nature, and our communities are paying the price. How did we get to this point? Amongst other issues, with indifference and inaction across several Government Departments, we are seeing systemic planning failures that omit legal environmental considerations from planning application processes.

The Green party have been examining, in depth, how the planning system works and where it does not work. Through our research, we have found that habitats regulations assessments, which are a legal requirement for projects within a certain radius of protected habitats, are sometimes not being carried out.

I will use the example of anaerobic digester (AD) plants which produce vast quantities of ammonia. The Green party mapped each of the 79 active AD plants in Northern Ireland and we found that 49 of them should have had that assessment carried out. To date, we have only found one instance and evidence in that one case of this actually being done.

We wrote to all 11 councils. So far, we have received five responses. From those responses, we know that 34 of their AD plants have no planning approval, yet they are getting public subsidies. This has been stated in the recent Northern Ireland Audit Office report.

I cannot say it any more plainly: this is unlawful and it contravenes our legal obligations under the habitats directive. These assessments are systemically not being conducted and potentially illegal projects are systemically going ahead.

When we do assess the impact of ammonia on protected habitats, existing ammonia levels at that site are not taken into account. We now have situations where sites exceed critical levels of ammonia by over 300%, year-on-year-on-year. The fact is, that this is actual planning policy and that is astounding. Current confusion around the system has left farmers unable to upgrade or replace existing sheds, even where the building of more modern sheds would result in the falling of ammonia levels because, under planning, these are considered to be new developments.

The overall picture is of a broken planning system that enables the non-stop intensification of our agri-food sector, rapid and extensive species decline and irreparable damage to protected habitats, not to mention 500-600 premature deaths in Northern Ireland every year.

Let me be clear, this is not the fault nor the responsibility of the farming community. This is the result of deliberate and informed Government policy to expand, grow and intensify, in the full knowledge of the facts around environmental and health impacts. They cannot say that they did not know, because they did. As demonstrated, time and time again through answers to written and oral questions, ammonia seminars and the Department's own planning policy documents, the information is there and they have known it for a long time.

The facts tell us that ammonia pollution is causing mass species extinction, harming public health and ending lives early. The Executive's Going for Growth strategy has resulted in, on one hand, the creation of Northern Ireland plc, and we have seen big companies such as Moy Park, Thompsons and Dunbia smash through the annual £1 billion sales target, with directors paid salaries as high as £2.6 million. Good for them. However, we also see the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, the very government body charged with protecting our environment, signing prosperity agreements with these same corporations, which have direct links to the Agri-Food

Strategy Board and the drawing up of the Going for Growth strategy. I would like to know where else in the world the environmental protection authority would sign prosperity agreements with some of its biggest polluters.

7.45 pm

On the other hand, we see an industry that has become increasingly hostile to those working within it: the key workers who have shown just how vital food production is to our economy and our people. Rural poverty is at an all-time high, with one in four farming families living in poverty. As the costs of production have gone up, farmgate prices have been driven down so that farmers are operating at a loss or barely breaking even.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Ms Bailey: Yes.

Mr Beggs: The Member has highlighted planning failures with regard to anaerobic digesters. If only a very specific grouping is causing the problem, why is she suggesting a moratorium on all planning applications?

Ms Bailey: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I will explain as I go through. I thought that I had made clear that AD plants were operating even without planning permission. There are problems in the system. However, we also have a situation where the number of full-time and part-time farmers is dropping year-on-year, which indicates that, for many, it is no longer possible to make a living in the industry. I would like to quote what one farmer told me:

"A friend of mine told me, just after the death of a farmer who fell through the roof of a rundown farm building, that, if it hadn't been for COVID-19, they would be attending their eleventh funeral since 2000 of farmers he knew across Northern Ireland who had died falling through farm shed roofs while up trying to repair them themselves".

Traditionally, when times were good for farmers, they called in professional builders to replace or repair their buildings. We always say that a cash-strapped industry is never a safe industry.

Further down the production line, the COVID-19 crisis has exposed just how precarious jobs in the industry are. We have seen outbreaks of coronavirus among meat factory workers, many of whom are on poor contracts and unable to self-isolate or take sick leave. We have seen employers flouting the 2-metre social-distancing rule and putting public health and workers' lives at risk for profit. Poverty pay and exploitative contracts are endemic in the sector. You do not have to be a genius to realise that the way in which we do business, and this Executive policy of relentless intensification at all costs, simply does not work for most people. Instead of ensuring the prosperity of some of the most powerful businesses in this sector, we should be focused on ensuring the prosperity and well-being of its workers.

In conclusion, we know that we have a deeply flawed planning regime and a deliberate government policy to disregard environmental law and regulation. That is what has led us to the situation that we face. The scale of this is overwhelming — it is beyond alarming. This pollution is in our waterways, our air and our soil. It is in our rural communities. How long will we allow this to continue? We know that planning is flawed and that the policy that we have in place to assess ammonia emissions is obstructive to farmers. It has not been legally proofed and is, more than likely, not compliant with our legal obligations. We know that good planning could help to fix this. We need to stop, establish exactly where we are and put good practice in place. We need an urgent review of the planning system and of approved planning applications for ammonia-emitting projects within 7.5 kilometres of the habitats protected under EU law.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Ms Bailey: We need a moratorium to allow us to assess the situation.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr McGuigan: I beg to move the following amendment

Leave out all after '300 per cent or more,' and insert:

'recognises the need to reduce further overloading of critical thresholds; acknowledges that emissions do not recognise borders; and calls on the Minister for Infrastructure to conduct a review of the planning application process to ensure planners have all the appropriate guidance on ammonia and are led by science and data to mitigate ammonia emissions; and further calls on the Minister for Infrastructure to consult fully with the farming and agri-food industry and the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs on this review to ensure that the impact on the farming and agri-food industry is fully understood.'

Mr Speaker: The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to wind. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr McGuigan: I share many of the concerns articulated by Clare Bailey on the environmental impact of ammonia. In a unary world, I could agree with her about the solution; we do not live in a unary world, however. In this instance, while agreeing with the problem, I feel that a more nuanced and rounded solution is necessary.

The motion asks for this problem to be dealt with by the Infrastructure Minister through a moratorium on planning. I have some sympathy with the Infrastructure Minister having to be with us tonight because, from my point of view, this is a motion and debate which requires the Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs Minister to be with us. A moratorium on planning is not going to solve the problem. Not only will it not solve the problem, it could exacerbate it in some cases. If, for example, a farmer wishes to redevelop or replace an existing building that would allow for a reduction of his or her farm's ammonia output, a planning moratorium would not allow that to happen and, therefore, no reduction would occur.

Sinn Féin is committed to protecting our environment. We are committed to a climate change Act. We are committed to the reduction of greenhouse gases. We are committed to clean air and health water. We want to see a green new deal, and we want to see a just transition in progressing all of this. A just transition is a framework of measures that Governments and organisations must take to secure workers' rights and livelihoods as economies transition to ones based on sustainable forms of production. Just transition in no way seeks to slow or deter this transition. It is an environmentally positive principle that encourages radical steps towards halting climate change, but also acknowledges that the only way that those steps will be successful is if we can bring people in carbon-heavy industries with us, and assure workers that they will not find themselves unemployed as a result of a shift to, for example, renewable energy.

Agriculture, in this instance, should not be given special dispensation. However, we need to recognise the wider negative impact on this sector, which is so vital to the economy in the North, should a planning moratorium be introduced. It is important to also highlight that our food and drink sector is key to the economy and employment here, with sales of over £5.1 billion. There are too many unknowns for the Assembly to support a moratorium on planning. The solution to addressing our ammonia problem can be found only by working with and not against our farmers. Remember that, in most cases, farmers are the custodians of our countryside and natural environment. Recognition needs to be given to farmers who are currently reducing their ammonia output. Any solution must include leadership from DAERA and be driven by its Minister. This is a cross-departmental issue. Given that the original motion that the Green Party submitted was aimed at the AERA Minister, I think that the Green Party also recognises this fact.

At this point, I should declare that, as an MLA representing a rural constituency, I have been involved, on many occasions over the years, in planning applications on both sides of this argument on behalf of constituents. Ammonia is a form of nitrogen and can lead to the creation and release of greenhouse gas emissions such as nitrous oxide. We need to reduce our nitrogen levels; there are no arguments there. A key driver of ammonia emissions is when urine and faeces mix. This is primarily an issue of the production of livestock and management of slurry. Livestock production is recognised as a key factor in the extent of ammonia admissions. Some 96% of our ammonia emissions come from agriculture. I recognise the critical ammonia levels here in the North and the impact that they are having on biodiversity. The North's ammonia levels are particularly high in comparison to those of our neighbours. None of this is in dispute, so we need to be very serious about addressing the problem. Moreover, we need to do it sooner rather than later. We live on an island where emissions do not recognise borders. Ammonia needs to be considered as a long-range pollutant because of the island's atmospheric and topographical conditions.

Anne O'Reilly from DAERA, who facilitated a recent workshop on ammonia emissions, stated that:

"There is also an ongoing need to improve the modelling covering the South of Ireland, as nitrogen emissions are transboundary and emissions originating in the South are not modelled to the same level of detail as those in the North".

Teagasc, a research organisation for agriculture in the South, stated:

"It is vital that both the North and South maximise efforts to reduce ammonia emissions, if these efforts are not co-ordinated emission reduction efforts in one country may be shadowed by emissions from the other."

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGuigan: Yes.

Mr Allister: Does the Member share any surprise that, when it comes to this issue, there is very little talk about ammonia sequestration? Planting trees is, according to the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology, a very efficient way to sequester ammonia. Why do we not have a strategy? The Agriculture Minister has promised an ammonia strategy, and he is supposed to have a tree planting policy. Should those not be gelled together to deal with the issue rather than talk about moratoriums, which put people out of business?

Mr McGuigan: I welcome the Member's intervention and agree that the issue at stake is the lack of an ammonia strategy coming from the Minister. We need to see that soon, and I will be making remarks later on in relation to that.

Not only do we need a cross-departmental solution, and even, as the Member's intervention shows, solutions crossing within Departments, but we also need an all-Ireland approach to properly tackle this issue and reduce emissions. In recognising that agriculture is the key producer of ammonia, we need to ensure that agriculture is the key driver for reduction of ammonia. I think that our farmers are up for that; however, they need help. Education is key, investment is important and support is vital. There are solutions that will reduce ammonia production and actually make farming here not only more environmentally friendly but also more efficient for the farmers. We need to see the implementation of these solutions accelerated.

We can be optimistic that our ammonia reduction strategies will bring improvements to our protected sites. According to the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI), a 25% reduction in ammonia achieves significant improvements in the nitrogen disposition of all the North's protected sites. We are keenly waiting for the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs to bring before the Assembly his action plan on ammonia. It is required urgently. We have been advised by departmental officials that this draft ammonia plan will be published soon and that it will, hopefully, be an important road map to reducing ammonia emissions here in the North.

We all agree that we need to improve our environment and have a sustainable and prosperous agri-food sector. As I have said already, we need to see financial investment in order to help with this. I welcome the Agriculture Minister's recent announcement of £7.5 million for tier 1 of the farm business improvement scheme supporting the sustainability of farm businesses, a scheme which will support the purchase of equipment and machinery that costs between £5,000 and £30,000. I urge farmers to apply to this scheme. Sinn Féin is also concerned for low-income farmers who cannot afford to buy this low-emission slurry-spreading equipment. The Department must fulfil its statutory equality commitments and ensure equality of opportunity, as well as mitigations for those farmers who will be negatively impacted. It is important to flag up that whatever measures are outlined will have ramifications for hill farmers, whose farm income is already low and whose farmland is currently disadvantaged. Nevertheless, we should be optimistic. There are a lot of measures to reduce ammonia, and AFBI scientists have stated that there could be significant improvements at designated sites in five to 10 years through the implementation of ammonia reduction measures. We need to get on with this.

Miss McIlveen: I oppose the motion. Everyone in this Chamber obviously recognises that more needs to be done to tackle ammonia emissions and protect our environment. This is an issue that is readily accepted by the agriculture sector, which is responsible for more than 90% of ammonia emissions. However, the motion asks for three very specific actions: a review of every planning permission for ammonia-emitting projects within 7.5 kilometres of a Natura 2000 site; a moratorium on planning approvals for all ammonia-emitting projects; and the production by the Department for Infrastructure of a report on whether or not Northern Ireland has complied with article 6 of the habitats directive. From the outset, I must make it clear that I oppose this motion not out of a lack of desire to tackle the issue but, rather, a recognition that the steps being proposed by Ms Bailey and Ms Woods are inappropriate. Unfortunately, my party's amendment, which might have allowed for a more practical and workable approach to the issue to be discussed, was not selected for this debate.

The first requested action relates to the review. There are a number of problems with this request.

It is not time-specific and requests all approvals from any time. A vast range of activities emit ammonia, so that would involve a huge number of approvals. The review also has no scope. If the aim is to revoke or modify approvals, that can only happen if developments have not been completed, which would make the process pointless. It would also require huge resources to assess whether developments have been completed. Is it to assess whether the correct assessments have been carried out? Planning officials will readily acknowledge that they are not experts in environmental law, but they defer to the relevant statutory experts in their appraisal of proposals, which are the NIEA and Shared Environmental Services, bodies that, of course, are outside the remit of the Department for Infrastructure.

8.00 pm

Such a review is, ultimately, a toothless, ineffective and, dare I say it, costly fishing expedition, which does not deal with the problem at hand. It certainly would not be able to assess whether Northern Ireland is in breach of its regulations or obligations under the habitats directive.

The request for a moratorium would apply to all such planning applications, not just those within 7.5 km of protected areas. That, again, is open-ended, essentially, until the Department produces a report, which I will deal with shortly. The impact of such a moratorium on Northern Ireland's fragile economy could be enormous. The motion presumes that the planning process is the means by which a solution can be sought to those problems, but I suggest that it is not. A moratorium would grind the system to a halt. It would have a potentially detrimental impact on major infrastructure projects, roads upgrades and homebuilding schemes, which could have a further devastating impact on the Northern Ireland economy, on top of the devastation that is being caused by the global pandemic. It would undermine projects that all Executive parties have signed up to and the key objectives of the Executive. Therefore, any party that is part of the Executive should not and cannot support it.

Finally, on the report, the Department for Infrastructure is not best placed to determine whether Northern Ireland is complying with its article 6 obligations. With the focus on the planning process, the implication is that tightening the planning process can address the issue in some way. Planners will and do follow the experts. The vast majority of ammonia emissions come from activities that fall outside the scope of the planners and, indeed, the remit of the Department for Infrastructure. As an aside on the habitats directive, developing a process and creating certain obligations have not proven to be effective tools in addressing environmental damage to protected sites. The midterm review of the directive that was carried out by the EU noted a very slight improvement in the number of species in habitats in protected areas, but, by and large, previously noted negative trends continued across the EU and there was a recognition that the EU would not meet its 2020 targets.

There is huge scope for member states in their approach to national conservation measures. Although the European Court has an iron fist in its case law, the European Commission uses a velvet glove in its dealings with member states. Put simply, we can comply with the minimum standards of the directive but still fail its objectives. There is a need to act and for an effective and sustainable plan to address our very real issues, but, unfortunately, the motion is not the way to achieve it.

Mr McGlone: A résumé of the issues that have arisen in the debate include water quality management, habitats, agricultural development, agricultural diversification and poverty in agriculture. Frankly, the wrong Minister is here to be held accountable for those issues and to respond to the debate. Nevertheless, the SDLP welcomes the opportunity to note its concern about the scale of ammonia emissions in Northern Ireland. The party will support the amendment and that will become clear as I speak further.

Although ammonia emissions are not unique to us, by any means, they are a particular problem here. As with other environmentally damaging factors, we do not have specific targets for reducing ammonia emissions and our efforts are expected to contribute to the UK target for reducing ammonia emissions by 16% by 2030. The particular problem with ammonia emissions here is that we are responsible for 12% of the UK total, but we have only 3% of the population and 6% of the land area. The proportion of sites here that exceed the critical level of ammonia concentration is, however, higher than in England, Scotland and Wales. Ammonia emissions were also 19% higher in 2018 than they were in 2010. That is higher than the previous peak that was recorded in 1996. Ninety-six per cent of Northern Ireland's ammonia emissions come from agricultural activity, with all livestock sectors being responsible for most of that figure; largely from manure and slurry management and fertiliser spreading.

Since 2019, those have been regulated under the nutrients action programme, with a derogation available for some grassland farms. However, the current level of ammonia emissions is a barrier to achieving sustainable agricultural development and meeting our shared climate and biodiversity targets. In addition to the ecological damage as a result of ammonia emissions, which has been noted in the motion, the majority of priority habitats and species are now at an unfavourable conservation status. There has been significant and continued loss of biodiversity since the 1970s. In particular, we have witnessed that in the evidence from the past 20 years. It is clear that a big problem with discharges into the environment is imminent.

That having been said, we welcome the work that has been done by the Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs since July 2016 to address the issue of ammonia emissions. We also welcome the efforts by farmers to reduce those levels, which they are responsible for through modernising their farm practices and facilities. One particular concern of mine about the motion that has been proposed by the Green Party is that, in effect, by reopening planning applications, aside from the considerable stress and resource implications that would have for the Department and councils, which, as we know from the figures, have enough difficulties, we would put pressures on farms and farm businesses. I am concerned that uncertainty would be created about their futures, and that their financiers would have that uncertainty about their futures. That is of great importance to me.

The Agriculture Minister has described the strategy on ammonia reduction which has been brought forward by the Department as a comprehensive approach to ammonia, and has repeatedly stated his intention to publish those proposals for consultation soon. It may be that the three-year absence of an Executive has contributed to delay in producing the draft ammonia strategy, but any action by the Infrastructure Minister should clearly be taken in coordination with that strategy and must be complementary to it. I have already mentioned some issues in respect of planning. It is currently the case that DAERA is the statutory consultee on those planning applications. It is the Department that is legally obliged to consider the impact of ammonia emissions and subsequent nitrogen depositions that a proposed building development or development of that nature would have on the environment. Any moratorium could have the unintended consequence of preventing the updating of facilities on a farm and thereby preventing the reduction of ammonia emissions.

It is clear that action is needed to reduce ammonia emissions to prevent further biodiversity loss and help to repair the ecosystem. Such action is essential for the sustainable development of the agriculture industry and improving public health. However, responsibility for that area does lie with the Minister for Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs. It is to be hoped that the motion and debate will prompt the Minister to publish his proposals and draft ammonia strategy sooner rather than later.

Mr Beggs: First, I would like to declare that I have a small agricultural holding, which is let, and that my parents have a relatively small family farm; more of a grate-and-wheelbarrow than large-feeder-wagon operation, I have to say. I rise on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party to indicate its support for the amendment standing in the name of Philip McGuigan, Declan McAleer and others. The motion suggests a nuclear option. Earlier, the proposer justified it because a major flaw has happened with AD units, as has been indicated in the Audit Office report. I am surprised that, if that is where the problem is, the motion does not focus on that area. Its proposal would affect every farm in Northern Ireland, would affect the entire rural community, and may actually have an perverse effect on ammonia levels.

A moratorium on planning approvals for projects that would increase ammonia emissions would be counterproductive. In the long term, would more imported beef be bought that has been produced with lower welfare standards and, perhaps, even higher ammonia emissions? Would cows be fed a high-protein diet, where we would have no control over that?

That would be wrong. It may even involve cutting down more rainforests to feed such a system. We need to be very careful that we do not create perverse outcomes.

Clearly, there is need for a review of the planning system. I note that that is mentioned in the amendment, but a similar view perhaps needs to go in a different direction.

Let me illustrate how the planning system, which is supposed to be improving the environment, has gone wrong, in my opinion, and why I could not support the main motion. First, as others have indicated, the replacement of existing livestock sheds is being treated by shared environmental services and NIEA as new developments. Even if a new building will improve welfare standards and reduce emissions, it may well be rejected. That is crazy. If we want to reduce ammonia emissions, we should allow farmers to —.

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beggs: I certainly will.

Mr McGlone: I thank the Member for making that point. Will the Member accept that that can even happen in cases where the livestock numbers are being reduced and therefore so is the contribution that they are making to extra ammonia in the atmosphere?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Beggs: I am not at all surprised to learn that. We need to be very careful that government and politicians do not propose policies that have the opposite effect to what is intended. We need to be very careful to think them through so that we bring about improvements to the environment as well as to the well-being of our farmers.

Shared environmental services also, on its own, imposed guidance that is much stricter than that of the Northern Ireland Environment Agency. How was that allowed to happen? What happened? Of course, eventually, it was overturned by a court. The Ulster Farmers' Union took that body to court and it backed down at that stage. It is a nonsense that a body can almost, of its own right, change policy and effect significant costs on the farming community. In fact, that policy was resulting in virtually no planning applications being permitted.

We have an overly bureaucratic planning process. Whilst the regulations may be appropriate for larger applications — I do not know how they missed out the AD units because they are major, multimillion-pound applications — they are often disproportionate. What am I talking about? I am aware of a constituent who wanted to build a shed for six cows and six calves. He put his application in and then discovered that he had to have his ammonia assessment. He did not have a clue about it, as most would not, and started to find out how to get that completed. He was quoted almost £2,000 to get an ammonia assessment done for six cows and calves. He will probably have to sell one of his cows and calves to get his ammonia assessment done. Clearly, there is a disproportionate scale of assessment required, and it needs to be downscaled, depending on the size of the application. We need to avoid consultants where possible so that undue costs are not added for hard-working families who toil long hours, often for little reward.

I will turn now to the 7.5-kilometres rule. I recently learned that farmers in Islandmagee, when completing their ammonia assessment, have to reference the Maidens lighthouse ecosystem, which is many miles offshore. Are we for real? How is a farm in Islandmagee going to have an impact on the Maidens lighthouse? I actually did not believe it when I first heard it until it was verified to me, but that is what our current system requires.

We clearly do need to improve biodiversity, but we must make sure that, when we bring proposals, they actually reduce emissions and start to work. There is much to be commended in 'Making Ammonia Visible', the 2007 report of the expert working group led by John Gilliland. We need to communicate with and educate our farmers and encourage mitigation, such as the trailing hose or trailing shoe, which can reduce ammonia emissions by 30% and 70% respectively. It is possible to improve air quality and water quality and reduce ammonia emissions and improve farm efficiency. Let us take everybody with us and give them the knowledge, the information and the financial support to enable them to do so. I support the amendment.

8.15 pm

Mr Blair: Other Members have pointed out, and it is worth repeating, that Northern Ireland ammonia levels rose by around 20% in 2010, compared with around 5% in the rest of the UK, and, more crucially, 98% of designated special areas of conservation are exceeding critical levels of pollutants. That can seriously impact such protected sites as peatlands. Additionally, ammonia emissions can cause the depletion of our treasured natural landscape and lead to marked reductions in plant biodiversity. There is no doubt that action is required to address the issue. In the context of that reality, I understand the principle of the motion, but we need to schedule and plan the suggested changes to make the motion practical for those most impacted. The motion, if successfully followed through, would introduce change, with immediacy — there is no doubt about that — but with no consultation with, or preparation for, those most seriously impacted.

As has been mentioned, it comes as no surprise that the planning moratorium, essentially, that is being held with the Infrastructure Minister present will have a deliberate focus on agriculture matters. That is because we have to consider the potential severe and immediate impacts on our crucial agriculture sector — those who contribute such a proportionally high amount to our economy, and who are responsible for putting food on our tables. If the motion and its outworkings were to succeed, farmers who have plans to upgrade existing facilities could, potentially, face a backlog of farm planning applications in Northern Ireland caused by questions, perhaps, understandably, about their environmental impact. That is a problem not unknown to those in the sector who faced a similar backlog in recent times when around 166 applications were stuck in the system as officials tried to agree how to assess them for ammonia emissions. On that occasion, ministerial intervention was required. That reinforces the need for consultation and careful consideration before we confront that sector, without warning, with restrictive measures, especially when they are already facing uncertainties and potential problems surrounding the EU exit process and all of the issues involved in that.

Effective measures to reduce emissions of ammonia into the atmosphere have already been trialled. A range of methods through which it is possible to reduce emissions of ammonia by at least 50% have been developed and field-tested. They include mitigation strategies such as separation of sensitive receptors from local sources and the use of shelter belts to enhance dispersion through increasing turbulence and capture of ammonia close to source. Those actions are already taking place in the agriculture sector, and valuable work is being done by such organisations as the Nature Friendly Farming Network and the Dairy Council Northern Ireland. As has been mentioned, the Department is also working on an ammonia action plan. We await and urge further progress on that.

Northern Ireland Environment Agency figures, and other analysis, show that ammonia emission levels from local agricultural sources are a problem. I do not seek to deny that. I suggest that we set frameworks, structures and goals with the sector. It is essential that we support our agriculture industry and make necessary changes to tackle ammonia emissions, with the industry on board.

The ammonia problem is not exclusively, or generally, caused by traditional family farming on a small scale, but, mostly, by larger developments and intensive processes, such as large-scale pig farms — something that I know a bit about in my constituency. We might, therefore, seek to look at scale as well as practice. I cannot support the motion, but I will support the amendment, which offers schedule and structure to buy more time to consult properly with the industry. On behalf of the Alliance Party, I support the amendment.

Mr Irwin: I declare an interest as a partner in a farm business. I rise to oppose the motion. Although the motion highlights an ongoing issue facing the wider agriculture industry in Northern Ireland, it does not in any way assist the industry with its contents, but halts development through the idea of an unwelcome moratorium. That is not the way in which to deal with this issue, as, for a variety of reasons, it would be detrimental to agriculture.

As we fully realise, farming in Northern Ireland is, by no small measure, crucial to the economy here. We are talking about an agri-food sector with a value of almost £5 billion, and it supports in the region of up to 100,000 jobs in Northern Ireland. Those are not insignificant figures, and they point vividly to the importance of the industry to the economy and, by default, the well-being of everyone in Northern Ireland. We are in the midst of a pandemic that has required unprecedented financial support to be given to many sectors of our economy, including agri-food production. A motion that seeks to halt important progress on farms is most unwelcome. Farming in this day and age is certainly much more complementary to the environment, with farmers spending much of their day-to-day lives working the land and producing the food that we all enjoy. The effort that is expended on caring for the countryside is very clear for all to see as you drive around this great Province. The way in which our countryside is maintained is down, in the main, to the hard, tough graft of our farming community.

The motion that has been brought to the House today by the Green Party gives the impression that simply halting the approval of very necessary measures for the welfare of animals will have a direct impact on ammonia emissions. That is simply not the case. As has been my previous position on these types of matters, which are now regularly brought before the House, the issue is about balance. That is something that the farming industry tries to seek at all times. There is a balance to be struck between curtailing the level of unavoidable emissions and the need for farming to continue to be sustainable and for food security and supply to be met domestically. Both of those issues require ongoing and significant investment. We are in a global market for food. We cannot continue to push the idea that we can put significant and costly restraints on any industry in Northern Ireland while ignoring the fact that the obvious increases in production costs would make goods more expensive. That would all be unravelled by the importation of goods from countries with vastly inferior standards and commitments around emissions and food safety. That is the reality of the proposal before us today. Although I support the need for Northern Ireland to play its part in reducing global emissions, we are, globally, on account of all the statistics, one of the lowest emitters. That, of course, does not mean that we should sit back and do nothing. Indeed, legislatively, that is not possible, given the commitments that we are working towards already. Farmers are behind those efforts.

The motion focuses on planning applications and calls for the halting of approvals despite the fact that all planning applications in that instance must already comply with strict criteria on ammonia. That, in itself, has been a source of significant concern for farmers who may wish to erect only a structure on their farm to replace an old, worn shed, for example; that is treated as a new development by shared environmental services and the Northern Ireland Environment Agency. I have represented a number of farmers who have been waiting for many months on progress on their farm development and improvement. That very issue is the cause of the delay.

Given the lengthy delays that have been experienced by farmers who have entered the planning system for various projects on their farms, it is very clear that there is a need for a fresh look at the system. However, a moratorium is not the way forward for agriculture in Northern Ireland. It would place the sector at an unfair disadvantage compared to, for instance, the Republic of Ireland. I would very much like to see a joined-up approach from the Minister for Infrastructure and the AERA Minister to try to address the issues around ammonia and reach a consensus that is practical and economical for our agricultural and food industry and which continues to recognise the importance of protecting the natural environment.

Mr Boylan: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this debate. We have this one slightly back to front. I have some sympathy for the Minister in that regard; maybe he will comment on that. We are going through the review of the Planning Act. There may be something in there that we will be able to do in terms of working across the Departments. Sometimes, the Departments operate in silos.

Most of my remarks will be about ammonia and supporting the rural community. Obviously, I represent a large rural constituency. People tend to forget about the contribution that the rural community makes to the economy; as some Members have mentioned, it is up to £5 billion. Most of my remarks will be about farming and ammonia, which is the basis of the motion. We need our farmers to farm in an environmentally sustainable way. Our planning system must work with DAERA to identify a process for verifying emissions that helps farmers to develop their farms in a more sustainable, greener and efficient manner.

Ammonia needs to be considered as a long-range pollutant because of the island's atmospheric and topographical conditions. There are challenges to accurately establish levels of atmospheric ammonia and to test the validation of the model ammonia emissions. The 'Making Ammonia Visible' report recognised that challenge and made the following recommendation 1b:

"Establish an enhanced regime for the monitoring of atmospheric ammonia and nitrogen deposition across the North on a daily basis, with the simultaneous recording of the weather, so that the results are sufficiently detailed to define the causes."

Modelling is an evolving process, and it is acknowledged that there are deficiencies in prevailing models. The Inventory of Ammonia Emissions from UK Agriculture notes the following on modelling of emission factors for cattle housing:

"It is recognised that slatted-floor slurry systems also exist for dairy and beef systems, particularly in Northern Ireland and Scotland, and that the current slurry housing system EF is not representative of these systems. Emission measurements being undertaken on such systems in the Republic of Ireland may provide useful data from which the UK can derive a system-specific EF."

The modelling of emissions needs to be on an all-island basis, as ammonia does not recognise borders.

The need to address ammonia will present challenges to our current food strategy, Going for Growth. In any potential future food strategy, particularly the word "growth" is a key objective of any such strategy. This was recognised in a report produced by Teagasc, which is the Agriculture and Food Development Authority in the South. It has future scenarios for Irish agriculture and implications for gas and ammonia emissions.

The bottom line is that scenarios that involve increased levels of agricultural activity in the future will require either one or all of the following: a wide-scale deployment of available mitigation actions, moderation of the level of ambition for emissions reduction within the sector and a re-examination of the growth ambitions for the sector. We need to understand what impacts this will have on the agrifood sector. Our food and drink industry is worth £5.1 billion, as was said earlier in the debate.

It is important to recognise the complexity of ammonia emissions from agriculture. The creation and amount of ammonia emissions are influenced by a multitude of factors. DAERA hosted three online events on ammonia emissions on what will be expected from our farmers to meet international targets. Low-emission slurry-spreading technology will reduce ammonia emission quite significantly, but other measures are required in tandem. Other mitigation measures include the grazing season for cattle to be extended by two weeks, lowering the crude protein in diets of all livestock, covering 30% of above-ground slurry stores and a 100% switch from straight to protected urea.

Mr Speaker: Will the Member conclude his remarks?

Mr Boylan: Farmers know that change is coming, but they will need financial support to make that change.

Mr Harvey: I rise in support of the amendment to the motion tabled by the Green Party. Whilst the motion deals with an important issue, it fails to strike the right balance. In fact, it fails to strike any meaningful balance between ammonia reduction on the one hand and protection of future sustainability of the agri-food sector in the other. The motion seeks to place a ban, albeit in part, upon activities that would overload critical thresholds in relation to the production of ammonia within specific geographic locations. The outworkings of such a proposal would be a direct attack not just on sustainable food production but on other Executive priorities, something I could not support.

First, we must acknowledge that ammonia production is a fact of life.

Its production, both naturally and from man-made sources, cannot be eradicated. As such, the net zero position adopted by the Green Party on the proposed moratorium is neither proportionate nor pragmatic.

8.30 pm

In Northern Ireland, approximately 94% of ammonia emissions come from agriculture. I am sure that this Assembly does not need reminding how vital the agriculture sector is for Northern Ireland's economy, environment and people. Northern Ireland farmers and growers are a central part of rural economies and communities, providing secure jobs and driving growth in food production and diversified industries, such as renewable energy and tourism. Indeed, throughout the COVID-19 pandemic, farmers have played a vital role in feeding the nation, and we all gained a greater appreciation for our local produce.

Some 70,000 livelihoods depend on the agri-food industry, which is worth £5 billion to the Northern Ireland economy. Those jobs also support many more in ancillary industries, such as transport, animal health supplies, construction and many more. It is no exaggeration to state that the local economy relies on our food production, which is known for its quality across the world. It is therefore vital that, instead of placing unworkable burdens on the sector around ammonia reduction, we must work with the industry on this issue and support it in what is already being done to tackle it.

Local research around the Making Ammonia Visible strategy is already providing Northern Ireland with relevant science to help tackle ammonia emissions on farms and inform the best course of action for the industry. As the Ulster Farmers' Union has stated, it was the industry's lobbying that resulted in an additional 28 ammonia monitoring stations being established in 2019 across Northern Ireland to help measure and understand the impact of ammonia emissions. I believe that credit must be given for the willingness being shown by those in the sector to engage and be proactive on the issue.

The Department is also aware of its obligations in the habitats directive, and recent actions have attested to that. Some £7.5 million of the farm business investment scheme has been allocated to capital investments. That will reduce ammonia emissions. Research into soil health and the outworkings of the green growth strategy will also address ammonia. I am aware that the Minister's Department is working on a dedicated ammonia strategy, and I welcome that. A discussion paper for consultation would be beneficial to formally engage with stakeholders and interested parties prior to such a strategy. The UK Government are currently engaged in a live consultation process on ammonia for England.

The motion also touches on the planning process. In many cases, delays with planning approval are hampering the ability of farms to reinvest and replace new buildings, thus reducing emissions. Contrary to blocking planning and construction, we should be encouraging the development of more energy efficient and environmentally friendly buildings.

The motion could have far-reaching consequences for major infrastructure projects, and its call for a review of approved planning applications may not only be totally unworkable but is unlikely to be even legally possible. For those reasons and others, I support the amendment.

Ms McLaughlin: I support the amendment, as I believe that we need to have a cross-departmental solution to reducing ammonia levels. I do not believe that a moratorium on planning will solve the current problem and, indeed, it could do more harm than good.

We currently find ourselves on a very dangerous path with ammonia pollution. Northern Ireland is going in the wrong direction. Where the three nations of Britain are cutting their ammonia emissions, here emissions have increased over recent years. DAERA has admitted that ammonia emissions increased by 20% from 2010 to 2018. As has been noted by other Members this evening, ammonia pollution is known to have a damaging impact on both biodiversity and human health.

Since it is a major issue in my constituency of Foyle, I would like to focus on the key role that ammonia plays in the formation of PM 2.5. By speeding up atmospheric reactions of sulphur dioxide and nitrogen dioxide, ammonia leads to larger concentrations of those very damaging, minute particles. Prolonged exposure is associated with increased mortality from lung and heart disease and is also linked to conditions such as dementia. It is therefore hugely concerning that Derry has been identified by the World Health Organization (WHO) as exceeding safe levels of PM2.5. Across Northern Ireland as a whole, research by the British Heart Foundation (BHF) projects that poor air quality leads to 500 premature deaths each year.

It is also estimated that millions could be saved on healthcare costs if we were to reduce air pollution. Prevention is better than cure, both for human and economic cost. We need action that supports air quality and agriculture, but I have to tell the Assembly that I have received representations arguing that agriculture policy has gone in the wrong direction: specifically, that the Going for Growth strategy has promoted farming methods that have caused increases in ammonia emissions. We need to listen to the science, just as we need to be led by the science when it comes to the COVID health crisis.

Agriculture accounts for 94% of total ammonia emissions, yet Minister Poots recently dealt with a backlog of farming applications by increasing the ammonia levels at which applications could be passed. That is certainly not to demonise the farming community: far from it. I have far too many family members involved in farming here in Northern Ireland, and they would not be too long in letting me know that I was not doing my job properly on their behalf. Farmers are the backbone of our local economy. Allowing such levels, however, raises the need to engage constructively with the sector to reduce emissions. DAERA recently opened tranche 3 of the farm business investment scheme, which will primarily fund ammonia reduction equipment. I am told that the farmers have been largely receptive to it. That is a welcome step, but it can be only one part of a long-term strategy that must also include a clean air strategy that sets legally binding limits on air pollution, with targeted interventions to address the sources. It is also imperative that DAERA publish its ammonia action plan as a matter of urgency.

Our poor quality of air in Northern Ireland is not only a result of high ammonia emissions. Our air is seriously damaged by the relationship between ammonia emissions and other polluting emissions. Those include nitrogen oxides from road traffic emissions, especially from diesel vehicles, and particles from residential burning of solid fuels, particularly the burning of smoky coal, which, amazingly, is still permitted in Northern Ireland.

My colleague Minister Mallon has set out her determination to support the switch from diesel and petrol engines to electric and hydrogen vehicles. Even the British Government are taking increasingly strong action in that regard, as we heard over the weekend. It is time for Minister Poots to show the same level of commitment and to prove that he is not just the Minister of Agriculture but equally the Minister of the Environment. At present, he is simply allowing an environmental —

Mr Speaker: Will the Member conclude her remarks, please?

Ms McLaughlin: — and public health disaster to unfold before our very eyes, and we certainly do not need another one.

Ms Mallon (The Minister for Infrastructure): First, I thank Clare Bailey and Rachel Woods for tabling the motion. I have listened with interest to the comments made and issues raised by Members. I appreciate and share all Members' concerns about the scale and complexity of the ammonia problem in Northern Ireland and the need to protect human health and our natural environment.

This is a complex issue, and the situation presents a significant challenge to finding a way to reduce the impacts of this air pollutant while supporting a profitable and sustainable agri-food sector, which is a point that the vast number of Members made. As planning Minister, I want to assure Members that I will do all that I can to ensure that our planning policies are evidence-informed and that our planning system works effectively.

I know that Ms Bailey is passionate about this matter, however, it is important to clarify that policy and statutory responsibility for this area lies with DAERA and that responsibility for determining the vast majority of ammonia-emitting planning applications lies with council planning authorities. Therefore, while my Department is responsible for planning policy, we rely on DAERA, which has the expertise and policy lead when it comes to assessing the impact on our wildlife and our natural ecosystems.

A number of Members referred to compliance with EU requirements. I am aware of the importance for all competent authorities, including planning authorities, to comply with EU requirements. This means carrying out appropriate assessments under the habitats regulations to assess the potential impacts of development on the environment, particularly in relation to European Natura 2000 sites, such as special areas of conservation (SACs) and special protection areas (SPAs). DAERA, as the statutory nature conservation body and consultee to the planning system has an important role to play in ensuring that planning decisions and permit authorisations are well-informed and compliant with European environmental law.

Planning has, at its core, a central focus on delivering sustainable development. That requires the consideration and balancing of environmental, societal and economic interests. My interest, as Minister for Infrastructure, is the health and efficiency of the planning system. I expect DAERA to provide the correct advice, as a statutory consultee to the planning system, and I expect councils in their role as local planning authorities to take that advice into consideration in determining planning applications made to them.

I am aware that DAERA is planning to go out to public consultation in the near future in relation to a proposed ammonia strategy which will include a review of its operational protocol. It is important that that happens quickly. It is my hope that it will further assist DAERA in fulfilling its roles as a statutory nature conservation body in providing advice to competent authorities who are undertaking the habitats regulations assessment required by article 6 of the habitats directive. I know that DAERA has been working with stakeholders to develop this strategy, which aims to deliver tangible and sustained reductions in ammonia. Hopefully it will help reduce the pressure on sensitive sites while facilitating the sustainable development of a prosperous agri-food industry.

I understand that the strategy is likely to incorporate a series of ammonia-reduction measures designed for implementation on farms here and that it will also focus on habitat protection and management to reduce the impacts on nature. I strongly welcome the work in hand to produce this strategy and have already made clear to Minister Poots my readiness to work with him to help deliver the progress that we all want to see in this area. Given his statutory responsibilities in this area I have already written to him on this important matter.

It is important that this new strategy provides clarity and certainty in terms of how the ammonia situation can be addressed effectively. It should also enable greater certainty for planning and allow councils to determine planning applications with confidence. In the interim, it is important that planning authorities and DAERA continue to engage on individual planning applications to keep the system moving and to ensure that environmental obligations and requirements are met.

In relation to the call in the motion to review approved planning applications for ammonia-emitting projects, this would not be appropriate for my Department, particularly while DAERA is working on the ammonia strategy.

I am content with the current planning policy position, as set out in the strategic planning policy statement (SPPS) for Northern Ireland. That makes it clear that planning permission should only be granted to those projects that will not have an adverse effect on protected sites, such as our special areas of conservation and areas of special scientific interest (ASSIs).

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Minister give way?

Ms Mallon: I will.

Mr Beggs: Will the explain why new developments which would replace old buildings, thereby reducing emissions and improving the well-being of such sensitive areas, are being refused?

Ms Mallon: As the Member will know, those applications are determined by councils, as the planning authorities. One of the issues here is that Shared Environmental Services is providing information and responses on planning applications, which is very much relation on more up-to-date information and modelling.

8.45 pm

Difficulties are coming into play as tensions grow between those responses and those from DAERA, which is operating on a more outdated operations protocol.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Mallon: I will.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister explain to the House to whom the Shared Environmental Service is accountable? In a number of cases that I have been involved with in my constituency, it has taken quite a belligerent attitude. When you push it, it says, "We are waiting on DAERA to give us some guidance". Is the Shared Environmental Service accountable to DAERA, to councils or to the Minister's Department?

Ms Mallon: The Member will know that my Department has an oversight role. He will also know that there is a two-tier planning system. He will also know how the Shared Environmental Service operates. However, I come back to the point: DAERA is a statutory consultee in this process; it provides responses and is using data that is not as up to date as that of the Shared Environmental Service. That is the difficulty. That is why I have written to Minister Poots, urging him to bring forward an ammonia strategy — an updated ammonia strategy — so that we can resolve some of those tensions and, as I said earlier, keep our planning system moving.

I note the proposed amendment to the motion calling on my Department to review the planning application process in consultation with the farming and agri-food industry and the DAERA Minister to ensure that planners have access to all the appropriate guidance on ammonia. As I have indicated, DAERA has policy responsibility for the impacts of ammonia; it also acts as the statutory consultee on this issue in the planning application process. Given DAERA's area of responsibility in relation to farming and agri-food, which a number of Members highlighted, I would fully expect those sectors to be closely engaged in that work as it progresses. I am satisfied that planning policy, and the planning application process, remains fit for purpose. It should work effectively in considering the impacts of ammonia emissions, informed by advice from DAERA as the statutory consultee on nature conservation.

I have listened intently to Members, and I assure them that my officials will continue to engage with DAERA officials on this, and on any other measures, to address the ammonia issue at a strategic level.

I want to turn to some of the points that Members raised that I did not address in my opening remarks. Ms Bailey said that the Department for Infrastructure planning policy was not fit for purpose. I suspect that perhaps she was referring to DAERA's operational protocol. Ms Bailey also made a number of points in relation to the Northern Ireland Environment Agency. However, that falls outside my departmental responsibility. Nevertheless, I want to assure her that the strategic planning policy was agreed by the then Executive and is considered appropriate and fit for purpose. It makes it clear that planning permission should be granted only to projects that do not have adverse effects on Natura 2000 sites. Ms Bailey also said that anaerobic digesters are operating without planning permission. That is a matter for the local council planning authorities to investigate, in line with their planning enforcement powers.

Mr McQuigan said that he had great sympathy for the Infrastructure Minister. I hope that that is not the first and last time that I hear a Sinn Féin Member say that, as I have taken those comments close to my heart. He said that he recognised, as did many Members, the scale of the problem and that it required a more nuanced solution. He said that a moratorium would not solve the problem. In fact, it might even exacerbate it by preventing the upgrading work of farmers to adopt more environmentally friendly practices. He said that he was very much in favour of a climate action Bill, the green new deal, and I very much agree with him. He also made the point that there are too many unknowns to agree a moratorium and emphasised the importance of working with farmers and of coordination across the island. I agree with him on those points.

Ms McIlveen worked methodically through the three asks in the motion. She made it clear that she could not support the motion, not because she does not recognise the scale of the problem but because she believes that a more pragmatic solution would be beneficial. She made the point that a moratorium would grind the system to a halt, with detrimental impacts on strategic infrastructure projects across Northern Ireland.

Patsy McGlone said that we were discussing, through the motion, water quality, agricultural diversification, the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, and agricultural poverty. He suggested that it might have been more appropriate for the DAERA Minister to have been with you this evening to respond to the points that were made.

He made the point that we have had a three-year absence of the Executive and that, perhaps, this has played a contributory role to the delay in the publication of a new ammonia strategy. He highlighted that this was clearly the responsibility of DAERA, and that he hoped that we would see an updated ammonia strategy sooner rather than later.

Mr Beggs described the moratorium option as the nuclear option, and he said that it would affect every farm in Northern Ireland and the entire rural community, and that he believed that it would be counterproductive in its impact in the longer term.

Mr Blair also recognised the scale of the problem, but he highlighted the importance of consulting with those who would be affected in identifying and implementing a solution. He framed the approach as one of frameworks, structures and goals, and of working closely with the agricultural sector.

Mr Irwin also described the moratorium as almost a nuclear option, and he said that it would be detrimental to the agricultural community, which is crucial to our economy and supporting up to 100,000 jobs. In his view, a better way forward is one that is in balance. However, he emphasised that this does not mean sitting back and doing nothing. He called for a joined-up approach across Government and I very much agree with that approach.

Mr Boylan raised the issue of the Planning Act, the review of the Planning Act and the role that that might play. As I have said previously, planning permission should only be granted to projects which do not have adverse effects on their areas of special scientific interest and so forth. As I said in response to the comments that were made by Mr Allister, I think that the difficulty here is the outdated operational protocol that is being utilised by DAERA. The difficulty here, with regard to the some 19 applications that are stalled, is the tension between the responses that are coming from DAERA and those in the Shared Environmental Services, which is using much more up-to-date modelling work. That is why I am very keen to see the updated ammonia strategy being brought forward by my colleague Mr Poots.

Mr Harvey said that the solution that was being proposed under the motion was not proportionate or pragmatic. He emphasised the importance of food production to our economy. He also highlighted some of the proprietary work that has been undertaken by DAERA on updating the ammonia strategy and, again, he talked about delays in the planning process. Again, I make the point that those delays are very much around the tension in the responses from the Shared Environmental Services and DAERA, but I hope that that can be addressed.

Ms McLaughlin talked about the fact that Northern Ireland is going in the wrong direction, with our rising ammonia emissions, compared to other places across these islands, and she highlighted that this was a particular issue in her constituency. She highlighted the impact on human health, as well as the environmental impact. She talked about the need for a long-term strategy and also emphasised the role of a clean air strategy as part of the solution.

I thank all of the Members who have contributed to the debate. I suggest, perhaps, that the Green Party has brought this motion out of frustration, and that is why it has very much been addressed at the Infrastructure Minister. However, the important issue here is to ensure that DAERA's new ammonia strategy and the review of its operational protocol is brought forward as quickly as possible to provide certainty and clarity for all stakeholders in the planning system, and to ensure that planning applications are not delayed. That is why I have written to the DAERA Minister to urge this, and I will continue to engage with him on this important matter.

Mr Speaker: I call Declan McAleer to wind on the amendment. The Member has five minutes.

Mr McAleer: I thank the Minister for her response to the motion. Indeed, she recognises the frustrations of the Green Party in bringing forward this amendment. However, I think, if I do a summary around the Chamber, that most Members here recognise that this sort of a blanket ban or moratorium on planning would be detrimental, not just to our farming community but to the wider economy.

With regard to winding up, I do not want to repeat what other people have said because a lot of stuff has been covered here. However, I believe that farmers are up for actually this, and they are up for this for a number of reasons. Farmers are environmentalists. The North, according to the land parcel identification system in DAERA, is made up of a jigsaw of 750,000 fields, which are individual parcels of land, and our farmers maintain those green fields — our emerald island and our green and pleasant land — in the way that they are, which is as carbon sinks and with the natural beauty that we have. You see that in our postcards that you see all around the world. The other reason is that it is not efficient. That is because ammonia is nitrogen and nitrogen blowing off your fields onto other habitats is not very efficient; it is better off in the fields and within the grass to make the grass grow instead of making its way in the wind to other habitats.

Again, that highlights the importance of the cross-border issue. Teagasc made the point that progress will be undermined if one jurisdiction here on the island is making good progress in reducing emissions and the other is not. In areas such as County Fermanagh, where Rosemary, my colleague on the Agriculture Committee, is from, the ammonia might get there by coming across from the South of Ireland on the south-westerly breezes. Indeed, that might happen from North to South as well.

Farmers are environmentalists. They are up for it. It is not efficient for nitrogen to blow off land in that way. The ecological damage that is caused by nitrogen leakage is costly and that is not sustainable.

We supported the views of the expert working group. It said that the way to deliver a strategy is to avoid putting more nitrogen into our production system and to try to retain the nitrogen that is in the production system and not to have it being released into the atmosphere and going across borders and on to ecological sites.

West of the Bann, virtually everywhere is within 7.5 kilometres of a Natura 2000 site. Two thirds of those sites are in counties Derry, Tyrone and Fermanagh. If the proposal was implemented, we would see a moratorium on not only everything to do with agriculture but to do with everything. All soil systems that have nitrogen in them have the potential to create ammonia. We see a blanket ban, effectively, on farming and all types of development. Living in the west, as we do, we do not have a motorway or a railway. The last train left Fermanagh in 1957; the last train left Omagh in 1965; and they never came back. The motorway stopped when it hit the Bann for some reason. We do not have motorways, we do not have trains, and we do not have broadband. Are we going to impose more scrutiny to try to block future development and thwart the Executive's plans as well? That is not going to happen.

There has been progress. I know from the figures that have been quoted today that it does not look like that, but farmers are doing their best. A lot of work is being done through AFBI and Teagasc in the South, looking at the animals' diets and genetics. The farm business improvement scheme is out there at the minute. We are at tranche 3 of tier 1. It is targeted towards ammonia-reducing equipment, and there is a good uptake.

My point is that this type of a blanket ban would be crazy, given the impact on the environment and the economy. We must also remember that farmers are our food producers. During the current pandemic, they are designated as key workers. It does not matter whether you live in a rural area or an urban one; you still go down to your local shop for your milk, bacon, eggs and sausages. Those do not grow on trees; they have to be produced by farmers. Our farmers, as food producers, are key workers. I know farmers. I am from a rural area. I live beside a bog. We all appreciate the importance of maintaining such sites and the biodiversity connected to them, but we must also be mindful that it is important that we support our rural economy and our food security and supply.

Mr Speaker: I call Clare Bailey to conclude and make a winding-up speech on the motion. The Member has 10 minutes.

Ms Bailey: I thank everybody who spoke on the motion and the amendment. It has been an interesting debate. There seems to be a consensus that we need to have a system in place that provides clarity for farmers and that enables them to farm sustainably while being economically viable. There also seems to be a consensus that we have a problem but, over the years, have done little to nothing to fix that problem, which we have created. In order to tackle the ammonia crisis, everything possible needs to be done to encourage and develop good practice. We must, at the very least, ensure that we are complying with our legal obligations in Northern Ireland. I would like Members present to really consider the nature of the policy of agriculture intensification and the expansion being pursued by the Executive and to ask themselves whether they are ready to stand by the threat to public health, the destruction of our biodiversity and the cost to human lives and well-being that comes with that.

9.00 pm

Mr Carroll: I thank the Member for giving way. I want to put on record my support for her party's motion. Does she agree with me that, whilst the Executive parties might have been at each other's throats last week over other issues, they seem to have each other's backs tonight on this issue?

Ms Bailey: That is an interesting one. I thank the Member for his intervention. We will see how it goes.

We have the data, the research and the science. We have all the information that we could possibly need, but what we need to do is act. A moratorium does not need to be a long, drawn-out measure. That is very clear. If we are to get to grips with the harm that we have created and allowed to happen, we need to stop, draw breath and assess where we are. That is called creating a baseline, from which we can start to make things better. That is possible, and it can be quick, but it needs political will, so, on the Member's intervention, let us see.

A number of issues were raised, although I probably do not have time to go into all of them. One of the issues was why the Infrastructure Minister is here instead of the AERA Minister. I was happy to hear others address that. This is a cross-cutting issue, and we cannot deal with it properly if we continue to act in silos. Like any action on climate change, pollution and the biodiversity crisis, this has to be seen as a whole. We know that the problem exists and that we created it, but we have not taken action to address it. We therefore need to try something different and introduce other avenues. That is why we put a focus on planning and not DAERA.

Why a moratorium? A moratorium is needed because we need to see whether we are meeting our existing legal commitments. The debate has, again, been shaped around this being about farmers versus the environment. That is an absolute false narrative. Farmers did not create the problem. Our Executive did, and they did so through economic incentives. We need to reverse that. That has also been pointed out by the sector itself. The Ulster Farmers' Union wrote to every MLA ahead of this debate. Even it has pointed that, while ammonia emissions from farms can be reduced, that can add additional costs to farm businesses, and a balanced way forward is needed to ensure a sustainable future for family farms. That raises a question about why farm businesses are being expected to foot the bill for the harm caused by Executive strategies.

There were other issues and concerns about the impact on farmers. Farmers are asking for help, but we have had an inadequate response so far. DAERA and the Environment Agency have reports, meetings and discussions with the sectors. They wring their hands when they tell us in Committee that they are very aware of the problem and that they know they are not doing enough. What are they going to do? How long will we sit back, hand-wring and rub our chins? We need to commit to reforming our system to get ahead of the problem.

I now come to the amendment. I know that most here have expressed support for the motion as amended, but what the amendment serves to do, compared with the motion, is replace the call for a moratorium — we have to ensure legal compliance, and we know from the Department and its agencies that they are unsure whether their policies are legally compliant — with the call “to conduct a review” so that planners:

“have all the appropriate guidance on ammonia and are led by science and data”.

I would like to reiterate, first, that the problem here is not just that planners do not seem to be aware of the guidance and their legal obligations, in many instances from the start, but that the guidance itself is deeply, deeply flawed, and the Minister has recognised that. It is not appropriate, has not been legally proofed and is open to being legally challenged. Guidance must be led not just by science and data but also by compliance with our laws.

The amendment also calls for a consultation with the farming and agri-food industry and the Agriculture Minister to understand the impact on the farming and agri-food sector. I most certainly welcome such a consultation and point out that the effects of ammonia are not experienced solely by those in the industry. Ammonia is a public health issue. It is an environmental issue too, and we would invite consultation with rural groups, medical professionals and environmental NGOs, as well as the wider public.

Lastly, and most starkly, the amendment removes the mention of the need to be compliant with the law, and that is important for how we do business. It removes mention of the need to avoid further worsening the crisis. For me, that is perplexing, given that we all acknowledge the problem. For that reason, coupled with a lack of action to date from the Department, despite knowing the problem, we looked at how to do this differently, through tightening the planning system.

In July, the House debated and voted in support of a motion acknowledging the climate and biodiversity crisis. I know that Sinn Féin actively acknowledges the urgent need to include biodiversity in climate actions, but that will require far-reaching and radical actions to create the solutions. UUP representatives have openly and publicly spoken about the growing need for, and the duty of, lawmakers to step up urgently and be aspirational in policymaking. Well, we are the lawmakers.

The SDLP stated in its 2019 manifesto that:

“protecting the environment is not an expensive political hobby horse. It is a moral, economic and health imperative... That demands a tough new look at planning policy to create a new approach to development that respects and nurtures local habitats.”

Those are all big ideas and big words, indeed. Yet, it is hard to view them as anything but disingenuous when they are not backed up by action.

Do I need to remind you all of the cross-party Climate Change Bill signed by most parties in the Chamber, which puts legal obligations to address climate change and biodiversity loss?

Mr McGuigan: Will the Member give way?

Ms Bailey: Yes.

Mr McGuigan: Does the Member acknowledge that in the Climate Change Bill there are targets to 2045 and that key to the Bill is, as I outlined, a just transition in that we bring all sections of society along with us?

Ms Bailey: I thank the Member and I agree absolutely with him, which is why, if we go into any consultation process, we should do so not just with industry but with wider sectors, the public and local communities as well.

Environmentally, it seems that we all know how to talk the talk, but walking the walk seems to be a different matter. Members are being presented today with the opportunity to step up and support tangible action and to say, “Enough is enough”. I invite you all to seriously consider how much destruction of wildlife and damage to human health you are prepared to stand over, because this one, simple issue has been going on for nearly a decade, and we have done nothing.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes with concern the scale and complexity of the ammonia problem in Northern Ireland; further notes that critical loads of nitrogen deposition at which ecological damage occurs have been exceeded at 98% of Northern Ireland's special areas of conservation, in some cases by 300% or more; recognises the need to reduce further overloading of critical thresholds; acknowledges that emissions do not recognise borders; and calls on the Minister for Infrastructure to conduct a review of the planning application process to ensure planners have all the appropriate guidance on ammonia and are led by science and data to mitigate ammonia emissions; and further calls on the Minister for Infrastructure to consult fully with the farming and agri-food industry and the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs on this review to ensure that the impact on the farming and agri-food industry is fully understood.

Mr Speaker: I thank all the Members who contributed to the debate. It was very informative and well mannered.

Adjourned at 9.09 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 17 November 2020

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Ministerial Statements

COVID-19: Self-isolation Payment Update

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister for Communities that she wishes to make a statement. Before I call the Minister, I remind Members that, in light of the social distancing being observed by parties, the Speaker's ruling that Members must be in the Chamber to hear a statement if they wish to ask a question has, of course, been relaxed. Members do still have to make sure that their name is on the speaking list if they wish to be called. They can do that by rising in their place, as well as by notifying the Business Office or the Speaker's Table directly. I ask Members to be concise in asking their questions. Thank you very much.

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister for Communities): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Thank you, Mr Speaker. I want to update the House today on some of the measures that my party colleague Deirdre Hargey instigated as Minister for Communities to ensure that the Department for Communities could support people who are affected by COVID-19.

As Members will be aware, as part of the response to the current pandemic, my Department introduced a number of emergency changes to the discretionary support scheme. Those measures included increasing the maximum income that a person can receive before becoming ineligible for discretionary support. This means that anybody with an income of up to £20,405, whether they are in work or receiving benefits, may be eligible for a payment.

We introduced a new discretionary support self-isolation grant for people who have been diagnosed with COVID-19 or are advised to self-isolate in accordance with official guidance. With the introduction of that new grant scheme on 25 March 2020, we ensured that people in the North who are on a low income were amongst the first to be able to access specific financial support. There simply has been no comparable support available to most people in Britain.

I am pleased to note that the rapid response of the Assembly in approving the necessary changes to the discretionary support legislation, alongside the effort of my Department in implementing the changes, has had a very real and direct impact on so many people. That is clearly evident by the extent of the support already made available. The latest available information shows that, between 25 March and 31 October 2020, my Department awarded 14,800 self-isolation grants with a total value of £2.1 million. That is money going directly to people who have found themselves in a crisis situation during the pandemic. However, it is clear that we all continue to face unprecedented challenges as the effects of the pandemic show little signs of abating. Therefore, it is essential that we continue to monitor the support that we can provide to ensure that we help the people who need it most.

I have decided that it is appropriate to introduce some enhancements to the scheme. Those changes do not require new legislation, and I have, therefore, instructed my officials to implement the revised policy immediately. The changes that I have made are designed to enhance the level of financial support that is available through the self-isolation grant. It is hoped that that will be of particular benefit to people who are temporarily unable to work.

In practical terms, my Department will now use higher daily rates of benefit when calculating the amount of an award. Decision makers will also be expected to take into account the impact of the financial shock of self-isolation when calculating the number of days for which to make an award. That is appropriate as a sudden and temporary reduction in normal income levels will mean that a person is at greater risk of experiencing hardship. Therefore, an award of living expenses to cover the whole period of self-isolation should always be considered.

I believe firmly that the discretionary support self-isolation grant offers an enhanced overall package when compared to other areas. For example, the Irish Government have provided support for people who are required to self-isolate that is based on a fixed weekly payment and treated as taxable income. In England, Scotland and Wales, the test-and-trace payment offers fixed amounts of £500 for 14 days, regardless of family circumstances, and the payment is available only to those who have been told to self-isolate by the NHS Test and Trace service. They must prove that they are unable to work and have lost income as a result. The payment is also taxable.

The self-isolation payments that are available here are targeted at those who are in need and are always assessed based on their personal circumstances. That means that, rather than making a fixed payment that does not take account of the size of a family, we will always take into account all dependant children and include them in an award. For example, under the new rules, a couple with three children can receive £683 of discretionary support to cover a period of 14 days. That payment is not taxable and further awards can be made if the family continues to find themselves in a crisis situation. Those payments will also not affect any future applications to the discretionary support scheme. The self-isolation payments can be made if a person is self-isolating because they or someone else in their household is displaying symptoms. Entitlement is not restricted to those who have been contacted and told to self-isolate.

I stress again that if people continue to find themselves in a crisis situation after receiving a self-isolation grant, they can apply for further support. There is no limit to the number of grants that can be awarded. I also believe strongly that the enhancements that have been introduced to the scheme are another important step in strengthening an already comprehensive package of support.

To conclude, the discretionary support self-isolation grant is a very important and accessible means of providing financial support to those who are affected by COVID when they need it most. We know that COVID-19 has widened the gap in our communities and impacted people differently, and it has had a disastrous impact on the people and families who were already struggling. People should be supported to isolate if they need to without fear of going under or being further penalised financially. That is why I have improved the level and duration of financial support that is available to those who are eligible to apply for it. I will continue to keep that under review, and I would welcome Members' feedback as we need to make sure that we keep providing support where and when it is needed.

Ms P Bradley (The Chairperson of the Committee for Communities): I promise that I will be a lot briefer this time than I was the last time, when I asked four questions. I thank the Minister for a very welcome statement and her good manners in calling me last night and informing me of what was in the statement.

The Minister will know that statistics show that 80% of those in part-time employment are female, with some having more than one job and many working in the hospitality sector.

They are already facing real hardship coming up to Christmas, and beyond, owing to the situation with the hospitality sector, without then receiving a notification that they have to self-isolate. This is therefore very welcome, and I am sure that it will help many families.

I want to touch on the issue of fraud. We know that people are missing appointments at our test centres and receiving positive test results from that. Are there any safeguards in here when it comes to fraud? We really want to distinguish between those in need, which is what this is for, and those for whom it is sheer greed.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Chair for her question. She will know that there have been problems with the test-and-trace app. I have to say, however, that the Department is working with people on the basis of need and what they ask for as part of their application process. If, like with any other benefit, it is later found that there were fraudulent claims, we will have to deal with those, but, up until now, most people who have contacted the Department have been genuine cases. As you said in the preamble to your question, a lot of those people are working two jobs — at least — and if they have to self-isolate, this is a lifeline for them. I therefore imagine that most of the claims, if not them all, are completely genuine, and that is the approach that we will be taking.

Ms Ennis: I thank the Minister for her statement and for her continued good work to ensure that the people who need our support at this time are getting it. The support available here far outweighs what is available in other jurisdictions.

I ask the Minister what her Department is doing to raise awareness of the enhanced support available. We want to make sure that there is maximum uptake of the grant.

Ms Ní Chuilín: The first step is to remind people that this help is out there today, because it is quite clear that, although many people — almost 15,000 — have applied for discretionary support, there are many others who are completely unaware of it or who think that it is a loan rather than a grant. We are all hearing that in our constituency offices. From today therefore, having made the statement, I will also ensure that our media outlets, our advice and welfare networks and, indeed, our constituency offices all have this statement, because they, particularly our constituency offices, are usually the first point of contact for many people. When people contact us, particularly about something like this, they are in distress, so we need to minimise that for people who need our support.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for her statement and very much welcome her decision to increase the amount of support that some people in desperate need can get. What we want to see, however, is an increase in the number of people who can get that support. The prohibitively low income threshold of £20,400 a household means that many working families and individuals remain ineligible for financial assistance. Their bills do not stop as a result of having to self-isolate, and many are left with the extremely difficult decision of either to follow the government guidance or to work to feed their family. Will the Minister consider raising the threshold?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He will be aware that Deirdre Hargey increased the threshold, and I am going to look at it again. You are right in the sense that we need to have more people applying for the grant, because they need it, but we also need to make sure that it is going to be supportive: that it will be a help rather than a hindrance. I will be talking to officials again this afternoon, and one of the questions that I will be asking them is whether we can do it without impacting on parity. You will know this as a member of the Committee, but, even though this Assembly accepted legislation brought forward to increase the threshold, I am looking to see what I can do within my vires to make it easier for those people who need it most, particularly going into the winter months and particularly if they are at home, where they are eating more and heating more. We need to make it easy for people, not only to get access to the grant but to ensure that they qualify for it.

Mr Allen: I echo the comments of colleagues around the Chamber in welcoming this much-required enhancement. I thank you for bringing it forward.

Minister, my constituency office team and I have supported many constituents to avail themselves of this grant. As you have highlighted, it is a lifeline for many. With that in mind, can you advise on the average time taken to process the claims and on any steps that you have taken within the discretionary support system to ensure that claims are processed efficiently?

10.45 am

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am told by officials that applications are being processed as quickly as possible. However, in my constituency office and on social media, I have received reports to say that that is not the case across the board. My commitment to all of you is that I will review this on an almost weekly basis. I need to ensure that those who need access to these payments get them, and get them in a timely fashion when they need it most. I urge Members to please let me know if they hear any reports to the contrary.

Ms Armstrong: Any enhancements to payments that can be made to people who are vulnerable, at this time, are very welcome, so thank you very much. Your statement indicates that your front-line staff are the decision makers. Ms Ennis asked about promotion and the knowledge that people have. How much training will your decision makers have? Do you have enough money for this and have you enough money set aside pay out because, hopefully, people will take it up?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. For each change that is made regarding this or any other support, the decision makers will have it again and again and again, because we need to ensure that consistent information is going out. Yes, there is enough money in the budget, for now. The important thing is that, between now and the new year, we need to try to give people support to self-isolate. As the Chair of the Committee said, there are people who are making the decision to not self-isolate because they cannot afford to. We know that the rate of people who have to self-isolate, or who are impacted by COVID, has not abated in the way that we would have hoped. We need to try to support people to stay at home and it is our obligation to do that.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for her statement. It is a good news story, so well done. Can I reaffirm with the Minister that anybody who has to self-isolate three or four times will still be able to apply for this? Will it also affect those on tax credits?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his sentiments. As I said in the statement, people can apply for this when they need it. Unfortunately, due to the length of the pandemic, some people have had to isolate at least once; others a lot more than that. It is a non-taxable grant. Therefore, it should not impact on tax credits. We need to make sure that what we give on one hand is seen in the other. That is not the case across other jurisdictions and we do not want that to happen. Many people who are on tax credits are already on a low income. We need to ensure that, after their application and when this support is given to them, they know exactly what they are getting and exactly what they have.

Ms Flynn: Mr Allen has already touched on this. Does the Minister foresee that today's announcement will lead to an increase in claims and possible delays in the processing of further cases?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I really hope that there is an increase in people making applications, because, while almost 15,000 have done so up until now, we know that there are many others who are out of work, self-isolating, impacted and affected by COVID. I hope that there are no further delays. As I said to other Members, if you or anybody else has concerns or are hearing reports that there are undue delays, then get in contact with us. That is not what we want, it is not what I or the officials want — they are processing the applications as quickly as they can to get money into people's bank accounts and pockets as quickly as they need them.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for her statement.

The discretionary support self-isolation grant is a lifeline for many people who are on low incomes and who are required to self-isolate. I welcome the news that the daily allowance payable has been increased. Does the Minister agree that these grants are crucial for encouraging and enabling individuals to complete their period of self-isolation? Is her Department working with the Department of Health or the Public Health Agency (PHA) to take the opportunity to provide additional information as to what is actually required around self-isolation?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question, and she is right: it is a lifeline. As MLAs with, I am sure, a busy constituency office, we have all got the distressed phone calls, and our constituency staff have as well. Through the Executive information website and our discussions with colleagues in Health and the PHA we are genuinely trying to ensure that there are no gaps. As I mentioned in response to Mark Durkan's question, that is on my list for discussions with officials just to be sure, to be sure. I have heard too many reports of people still feeling that this is a loan and that is why they did not apply, so something has gone wrong. We need to ensure that any clarification that is needed is provided after the statement this morning and that every aspect of government is aware of it. We are all living in each other's shadow, as we should be, but one Department should not be ringing another Department to find out what this is about; everybody should have the same level of consistency about this information.

Mr Catney: Thank you, Minister, for your statement. It has to be welcomed. I welcome the easier payment method that will be used for the self-isolation payment. I know that 4,800 people were successful with their application up until October, but will the Minister inform me of how many people were unsuccessful?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do not have that information. It is 14,800 people, Pat, so it is almost 15,000. I do not have the information about how many people were unsuccessful in terms of data from the Department. I have the anecdotal evidence. I have the people who are reaching out by email on our Assembly email, my constituency office and, indeed, on social media to tell me different, so there is an issue. When we get through this, we will start clicking through each of the questions that have been raised and will put this one down for clarification. If we have that data, I will certainly share it with the Member.

Ms Rogan: Minister, you outlined how this support compares with what is available in Britain. Will you give us a brief outline on how it compares with what is available in the South?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The support is taxable in other jurisdictions, including the South. It is also for a fixed period in other jurisdictions, which it is not here. Indeed, the difficulty that I have, certainly with the other jurisdictions, is that they are giving it to people with one hand and taking it off them with the other. That is grossly unjust and grossly unfair.

Mr Clarke: Like others, I welcome the Minister's announcement. Those who are on low incomes will welcome it. It is a very worthy statement for the Minister to make. Given that some of those people are on low incomes and will return to work after the two-week period, is any protection afforded to them through their employer, as I am sure that there are cases of employers who do not want to release them? Whilst money is one thing, they are probably looking for job security as well. Is the Department doing anything on that to give them the guarantees that employers cannot move towards them during their periods of isolation?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The issue that I have always had with the fragility of zero-hours contracts in particular is that people are even more vulnerable and more susceptible to exploitation, if any employer is minded to do that, or, for want of a better term, if any employer wants to chance their arm. Employees have rights, and we will remind them of the rights that they have. If there are any indications or examples of workers feeling that they have not been given the due respect or, indeed, the due entitlement from their employer, I will certainly welcome hearing who they are and where their employer is. I would be happy to share that information with the Member's colleague Diane Dodds, because I am sure that she would not have that either.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. The mantra for months now has been that we need a proper test, trace, isolate and support scheme.

We now have in place a scheme that allows low-paid workers to isolate and receive support. The Minister indicated earlier that she was looking at the level of income that a family can have to be able to claim the support. How quickly will she be able to carry out that review?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will carry out the review as quickly as possible and look at the questions that have been raised, and I will put the officials on notice. I want to get the data, and, following Pat Catney's question, I will try to capture the data from people who were rejected.

As the Member will be aware, Deirdre Hargey increased the threshold. If I need to do that, and if I can do that, I will look to do that. People may think that £20,400 is a decent enough wage, but if that is your only income and you are paying all your bills and rearing your kids, it all adds up. So, we need to ensure that people who need the support get the support, and we will find out very shortly if the level of income needs to be increased because if it prevented people getting access to support, it is a problem that we need to look at.

Mr McGrath: The 14-day self-isolation period starts from the date that the message is delivered to the COVID app on a person's mobile phone. That is often not 14 days from when the person was last in contact with somebody with COVID-19. Will the Minister agree with me that an urgent and timely roll-out of the update to the app is crucial? That could see the amount of time that somebody is isolating reduced in some instances by 13 days, which would, therefore, ensure that her Department has more money to spend.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I agree that there are issues with the app even for people who get confirmation of a negative or positive test result. The fact that they have gone to get a test means that they have concerns.

With regard to Trevor's question, we want to make sure that employers are adhering to that good practice because we are asking people who have any symptoms to isolate straight away, but we cannot ask people to follow government guidance and then have their salaries deducted because they have to wait for two days for a result from the app. We need to make sure that the app is better, but I want to make sure that, when people apply for the payment, they get it as quickly as possible and they are not held back by further bureaucracy that is not of their making.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for her much-welcomed statement. It will come as a relief to many, as will her reassurances that she will look at the threshold, which we in the SDLP welcome. There are people out there saying that, when they come into contact with someone and get the alert, they cannot afford to isolate. That is a very difficult place for many to be in. Any support from this Assembly will alleviate that pressure.

The Minister spoke of parity. According to her, this scheme is more generous than elsewhere, but it is much more difficult to access, according to reports. What was the Barnett consequential derived from the introduction in Westminster of the self-isolation grant? Has all that money gone into this scheme?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I received AME, so it is an AME issue rather than a Barnett issue because it is benefits related, so the money is there. If I understand the Member's question properly, there were issues regarding clarity over whether it was a grant or a loan. We all heard too many stories about people who felt that it was a loan and they did not want to get into any more debt.

The issue is that we, as a Government, are asking people to self-isolate, but we cannot ask people to self-isolate and not support them. That is the bottom line. So, that is what we are trying to do. Will there be lessons learned as a result of this? I am sure that there will be. It is like anything that we bring forward. We need to accept the good parts, change the parts that do not work and try to make it better in the future. Rather than waiting on a perfect fit, we need to get it changed, get it out, get it clarified, and, hopefully, people will get the support that they need.

Mr Carroll: I thank the Minister for her statement. The £2.1 million divided out equally amongst 14,800 people amounts to around £150 each. I assume that some people got less and others got more. Is the Minister aware of the average payment that people received? How many people received £500 or more?

11.00 am

Ms Ní Chuilín: The payment is better than £500. The £500 or €350 are fixed and taxable. If £100, €100 or €140 is taken for tax, the payment is less. If, for example, a couple has three children, they can receive £683 for the 14-day period of one isolation. If the same family has to isolate six or seven weeks later, they can expect to receive the same amount of support. That is not the case elsewhere. As long as the pandemic continues and more families are impacted by COVID, at least, once they have to isolate — I have heard of families having to isolate two and three times — we can ensure that we support them. We are asking them to follow government guidelines, so we need to make sure that the support is there, be it discretionary support, business support or whatever. If there is hardship, we need to get support out to people.

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions on the Minister's statement. I ask Members to take their ease for a couple of moments as we move to the next item of business.

North/South Ministerial Council: Special EU Programmes

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Finance that he wishes to make a statement.

Mr Murphy (The Minister of Finance): In compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I make the following statement on the twenty-first meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in special EU programmes sectoral format, which was held in the NSMC joint secretariat offices in Armagh on Friday 30 October 2020.

As Minister of Finance, I represented the Executive and was accompanied by the Minister of Education, Peter Weir. The Irish Government were represented by Michael McGrath, the Minister for Public Expenditure and Reform.

At the outset of the meeting, there was a broad discussion on the implications of the EU exit and the impact of, and response to, the COVID-19 pandemic. The Council noted the commitments and guarantees agreed and put in place as part of the withdrawal agreement and political declaration to allow for the current Peace IV and INTERREG Va programmes to continue until completion, and for a successor PEACE PLUS programme to be funded. Those were recognised and welcomed. The impact of COVID-19 on the current Peace IV and INTERREG Va programmes was noted, and the Council welcomed the actions implemented by the SEUPB to assist project delivery and the measures put in place to ensure the continuation of programme implementation. It is noted that the PEACE PLUS programme will incorporate COVID-19 recovery actions and that the programme development process is continuing.

The chief executive of the SEUPB updated the Council on the progress of programme implementation. Some 96 projects worth €277.9 million, which represents 103.1% of total programme value, have been approved for Peace IV, and 34 projects worth €291.1 million, which represents 103.2% of total programme value, have been approved for INTERREG Va. The Council noted that the SEUPB continues to facilitate participation in the INTERREG Vb and Vc regional and transnational and interregional programmes. To date, approximately €16.5 million has been secured by 64 partners under those programmes.

Progress was outlined on the development of the future PEACE PLUS programme. Work will continue in order to deliver an agreed programme. A public consultation will be undertaken to provide for further stakeholder engagement. The Council noted that further discussion with Departments and Ministers will be required to reach an agreed programme. The final PEACE PLUS programme cooperation document will be submitted to both Administrations, the NSMC and the European Commission for approval.

Ministers noted that the SEUPB had produced draft corporate plans outlining the SEUPB key objectives for 2017-19 and 2020-22, and draft business plans for 2017-2021. The Council then approved those corporate and business plans and noted the budget provision for each. Ministers noted the SEUPB annual reports and accounts for 2016-18. Those were certified by the Comptroller and Auditor General in both jurisdictions and laid before the Assembly and the Houses of the Oireachtas. Ministers were advised that the 2019 SEUPB annual report and accounts will be submitted to the Council and laid before the Assembly and the Houses of the Oireachtas in due course.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

In closing, Ministers noted that the SEUPB's governance structures continue to operate effectively. The Council agreed that options for an independent organisational review of SEUPB will be considered by sponsor Departments and that draft terms of reference will be submitted to the NSMC for consideration prior to the commencement of any review.

The Council agreed to hold its next Special EU Programmes Body meeting in early in 2021.

Dr Aiken (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance): I thank the Minister for his remarks and for coming to the House to give his briefing. The Minister noted in his statement that Peace IV and INTERREG Va are both at 103%. Some of us will be concerned about whether we will be able to brief a project that is already anticipated to be at 103%. Perhaps, in his closing remarks, the Minister will comment on that, and on how that is likely to come through. One might ask where the excess funding is going to come from. Will it be divided equally between the Irish Government, the EU and the United Kingdom Government? How will that be done? I welcome the Minister's remarks about progress towards COVID recovery. Will additional funding come to Northern Ireland as part of the COVID recovery actions and process? If that is the case, where is that funding likely to come from?

Mr Murphy: I thank the Chair of the Finance Committee for his questions. There is an overcommitment on both of those. From our discussions with the chief executive of the SEUPB, I think that that is based on the normal expectation and practice that there has always been an underspend. SEUPB is content that it will manage the overcommitment in terms of the final expenditure on the programme without having to seek additional funding to supplement or complement it.

In relation to future funding, PEACE PLUS currently sits at £650 billion — €650 million, sorry; if only it was £650 billion. If there is an additional commitment from London — there is a discussion ongoing between Dublin and London in relation to this — and the multiplier effect of that commitment is there from Dublin, then, if they match the percentage of that, it will take the figure for PEACE PLUS up to £1 billion, which will be very welcome in the time ahead. That discussion has not yet concluded, but I hope that the British Government will come forward and match the offer that has been made by Dublin.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister and his officials, who gave the Finance Committee a very useful and informative briefing on this last week. Minister, you state that £16.5 million has been secured to date by 64 partners. How much of that money has come to Northern Ireland? Out of the 96 projects for Peace and the 34 projects for INTERREG, how much of that money is forecast to come to Northern Ireland?

Mr Murphy: I will have to get the Member the actual figures; I will ask officials to forward those to him. In terms of contributions, there is a percentage worked out between the Executive, the Dublin Government, the British Government and Europe. The spend always has been largely in the six counties in the North and the six border counties, and I do not believe that there is anything untoward in the breakdown of all that, but I will be happy to get the Member the figures for all of those projects.

Mr McHugh: Ba mhaith liom buíochas a ghlacadh leis an Aire fosta as a ráiteas. I thank the Minister for his statement. As someone who lives ar imeall na teorann — on the edge of the border — I am only too well aware of the significance of the SEUPB and the many projects that have been delivered in our area. I am concerned for the future. What are the implications of Brexit for the current programmes?

Mr Murphy: I share the Member's view on the delivery of that, as a border dweller myself. The prospect is of a very significant delivery through the PEACE PLUS programme, which incorporates, as he will know, Peace and INTERREG as well. We always operate on the basis that this could be the last Peace programme, and I think we need to ensure that it has that impact in those border communities in particular, where some of the issues of the conflict were felt, and that, given the peripheral nature of communities there on both sides of the border, they are supported. Obviously, good work has been delivered, and I look forward to more good work and consultation with all of the stakeholders to ensure that we get the best possible value and outcome from PEACE PLUS.

There is obviously an initial uncertainty caused by the prospect of Brexit, but the guarantees included within the withdrawal agreement and the political declaration confirm the joint commitment of the EU and the British and Irish Governments to the continuation of the current Peace IV and INTERREG Va and the successor PEACE PLUS programme. Those guarantees will allow the current programmes to continue as normal and to be financed from the EU budget until their formal closure dates. In light of the coronavirus outbreak, the EU has also extended the final declaration dates for projects to fully spend their allocated funding as some recover from delays enforced on them. A financing and administrative agreement that will set out the legal, financial and governance frameworks for PEACE PLUS and, in turn, the SEUPB is currently being negotiated by the EU and the British Government.

Mr O'Toole: I ask the Minister to say a little more about what he just mentioned — that is, the negotiations around the financing agreement and the future structures around this. Is there a worry that, if there is no deal between the UK and the EU on the future trade relationship, there is a risk to the structures in the commitments that were made in the withdrawal agreement and in the political declaration — certain Tory MPs have already cast doubt on many in the political declaration — going forward? Was that discussed at the NSMC?

11.15 am

Mr Murphy: There is always a worry in relation to that. I think that we are right to be cautious, because the process of exiting the European Union has been anything but straightforward with regard to the British Government, and many things that have been — this goes across the whole issue that the Executive have to deal with — committed to and promised by the British Government have been abandoned or there have certainly been threats to abandon them at various stages. While we have the commitments, which were part of that withdrawal agreement and were agreed to, we have to be vigilant and continue to hold the British Government to account in relation to them.

The programme has delivered so much to communities that were so challenged over many years and affected by the impact of partition and then conflict, and that funding was one of the key contributions from the European Union to this part of the world, so we hope that that funding continues and is able to deliver projects that have made such an enormous difference. Both the Peace and INTERREG projects have made such a huge difference in the border area, and we want those to continue. We have to constantly be vigilant and keep a close watch on how these things develop.

Mr Muir: I thank the Minister for his statement and his answers thus far. I remain firmly of the view that Northern Ireland has benefited greatly from its membership of the European Union, and the support funding that has been outlined here is clear example of that. Can the Minister provide an update on the replacement for the EU structural funds in terms of the Shared Prosperity Fund? We are still waiting for clarity on that, and it is an important issue.

Mr Murphy: Yes, the Member is quite right that we are still waiting for clarity on the Shared Prosperity Fund. There is a commitment from the European Union to replace like with like, but we were also operating on the basis, as were Scotland and Wales, that the devolved Administrations would develop the programmes, allocate the money and do all that. There is huge uncertainty because of the legislation that is currently passing through Westminster, and that casts a significant doubt on that.

We have a lack of certainty on two fronts. One is that we have no firm commitment, other than a general one, on how those funds will be replaced, despite repeated requests from me and the Scottish and Welsh Finance Ministers, and a number of meetings where we were to seek clarity on that have been postponed in recent times, which is frustrating. We have not got that certainty, and, as I say, we are very concerned about developments with that legislation at Westminster, because the programmes have been delivered successfully locally by people who know the local issues, know the communities that will benefit most from the programmes and can get that support on the ground. Administering these things, allocating them and applying to programmes in Whitehall will not work for us. Scotland and Wales have the same opinion, and, equally, I am sure that it will not work for them. We certainly want full replacement, and we want the ability to allocate and design the programmes that will replace the EU funding.

Ms Dolan: Minister, thank you for your statement. Will PEACE PLUS see a reduction in the administrative burden on applicants or projects?

Mr Murphy: That is certainly one objective that I have raised consistently with the Special EU Programmes Body, and it has assured me that it will endeavour to do that. I have been about long enough to have been involved in the original peace and reconciliation fund that was developed and delivered through councils back in the 90s. That funding was very accessible to grassroots community projects. I have had engagements over the last number of months with people who work at the coalface of the community and voluntary sector, and their view is that the funds have progressively become more inaccessible to small and grassroots community organisations and that you almost need to be partnered with a local government organisation or some substantial organisation to access the funding. We assume that, each time one of the programmes comes in, it may be the last one, so it is important that it leaves a valuable legacy and that there is accessibility to the programme.

Peace programmes were designed to get down to the grass roots, to communities on both sides of the border that had suffered as a result of the conflict, and a lot of projects achieved that. If PEACE PLUS is to be the last programme we receive, we need to ensure that it gets to where it is needed, and accessibility is something that I will continue to raise with the SEUPB. It will go to consultation, so I encourage all elected representatives and community groups to make sure that those issues are raised with it as well.

Mr Sheehan: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a ráitis. I thank the Minister for his statement this morning. What actions have been taken to protect projects and programme expenditure during the COVID pandemic?

Mr Murphy: There has been recognition that COVID has caused some interruption to delivery, although, given our discussion with the SEUPB, it seems that it may not have been much as we had expected. Programmes have rolled on. However, as I said, the uncertainty around that has been dealt with, because we have some guarantee that the EU has recognised the impact of COVID and has allowed some headroom, if you like, to make sure that original time frames for spending the funds have been stretched somewhat. That will ensure that people can continue to spend on programmes held up by reasons genuinely beyond their control.

There is recognition that COVID has had some impact, though, thankfully not the impact that we expected. The EU has extended the final declaration date in order to allow projects to fully spend their allocated funding, and that is to be welcomed.

Mr Catney: Thank you, Minister, and I thank your officials from the Department for briefing the Finance Committee. Brexit has already been mentioned, and there has been a promise of extra money to increase the total to £1 billion. We hear about the consultation and how we will try to get the money out to our community. Minister, are you fairly confident that the British Government will meet their commitment as promised?

Mr Murphy: The original commitment was for €650 million, and we are operating on the basis that that will be honoured. There is an opportunity to increase that amount. The Government in Dublin have indicated that they will make their contribution, and that creates a multiplier effect on the British Government's contribution and contributions from the Executive and the EU. The key to that is the British Government adding to their contribution, and I hope that they do so, because the overall effect will be to create a much bigger pot for PEACE PLUS — an extra 350 million — which, obviously would be very welcome for the communities that can access that funding. The commitment for the initial amount is there: we are trying to secure expanded funding to allow us to generate a much bigger pot across the board.

Mr McGuigan: I thank the Minister for his statement. It is clear from the information that he has brought to the House, the sums mentioned and from what other Members have said that there is clearly commitment from the EU to Peace programme funding and supporting communities across the island, including my constituency. I have nothing but support for that type of programme. However, one issue that I and some of the groups that I am involved with have is the burden of the application. Will there be a reduction in the administrative burden for applicants?

Mr Murphy: We would like to see that. Of course, there is a comprehensive auditing process for the EU, as the Member will understand. The EU is keen to ensure that the money it allocates and approves through the overall programme is spent in the way that was intended. There is always a balance between meeting auditing requirements to ensure accountability for spending of public funds and making sure that they are accessible, in particular to small, grass-roots community organisations that the initial Peace funding was intended to benefit. It was originally to bring benefit to communities and areas that previously had not received support from government or other programmes. There is always that balance, but I have been discussing that with the SEUPB, because there is a sense that, over the past number of programmes, the balance in the burden of bureaucracy has shifted somewhat to those who access the programmes. I have had conversations with the SEUPB about how to ensure that we get that balance right. As I say, it will go out to consultation. I encourage all groups to come forward with their views, because we want to make sure that we get that balance right and that the money gets to exactly where it is needed and will have most benefit.

Ms Anderson: Minister, following on from that, I acknowledge the fantastic work done by the community sector in Derry. Many of those organisations access the European social fund and are deeply concerned about the loss of that. Minister, you have talked about the consultation. Will there be a role for community organisations in the PEACE PLUS programme?

Mr Murphy: Yes, absolutely. The consultation should be wide and accessible. All those who have issues to put forward or suggestions to make need to make sure that their voices are allowed to be heard in that consultation. That consultation should begin in the not-too-distant future. I encourage Members, particularly those who have a link to community groups, to make sure that, if those groups are not aware of that information, they know when the consultation is happening and how to access it and that they get the opportunity to make their case to it.

Mr McGrath: I thank the Minister for his statement. Minister, in the Executive Office Committee, we met the 11 councils over the last two weeks. Many of them detailed to us their serious concerns about their financial stability and delivering the EU programmes. I welcome your commitment in the statement that the PEACE PLUS programme will continue for the duration of this cycle, but it is not clear whether they will have funding going forward. Would you undertake to meet the 11 councils specifically to try to ease some of their financial concerns?

Mr Murphy: I have no difficulty with that. I meet the councils frequently. I have met NILGA and others. The 11 council chief executives generally come together through the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE).

I am absolutely happy to meet them. The commitment is there to spend out the Peace IV and INTERREG Va programmes. Even with Brexit and all the uncertainties, the commitment is there for €650 million for PEACE PLUS. We want to see that increased to much more. As I said in response to a previous question from your party colleague, despite all the uncertainties that come from Brexit and the negotiations, the posturing and the stands that have been taken in relation to some of the issues, we have to hold to that commitment. We have to be vigilant to make sure that that remains. We, from the European, Dublin Government and Executive sides, want to see these commitments being met. We want to see the funding expanded and being available over the next number of years. I am happy to talk to council groups about that.

Mr McNulty: I want to quickly recognise that it is World Prematurity Day. We think about all the mothers and families who have experienced challenges around early birth and recognise the brilliant support of the TinyLife charity.

Minister, thank you for the statement and for coming to the House this morning. Can you provide an update on the current funding for INTERREG programmes? There are concerns that funding may run out for several programmes; for example, the Carlingford to Newry greenway and the Smithborough to Middletown greenway. Can you provide certainty that funding will be provided for the completion of those projects?

Mr Murphy: The current programmes are to run their course. Allowance has been made to make sure that they are not interrupted by Brexit. On the more capital side with INTERREG, the EU has also allowed an extension to the completion and declaration date of programmes that have been interrupted by COVID and had undue delays. I do not think that you were in the Chamber for my first answer to the Chair of the Finance Committee. There is an overcommitment in funding, but the expectation is that there has always been an underspend. From the discussions that Minister McGrath and I had with the SEUPB at this meeting, we know that it fully expects to spend out the programmes. The SEUPB expects to meet all the programme costs that it has committed to. We will want to continue to monitor that in the time ahead, but those are the assurances that we were given.

11.30 am

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That concludes questions to the Minister on his statement. We are running approximately an hour ahead of schedule. I have been advised that the AERA Minister is about 10 minutes away. He is due to take the next two items of business.

In fact, he has just arrived. I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments.

British-Irish Council: Environment

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs that he wishes to make a statement.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, and in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following report on the sixteenth British-Irish Council (BIC) ministerial meeting in environment sector format, which was held in virtual format on Wednesday 4 November 2020. Declan Kearney MLA, junior Minister in the Executive Office, and I represented the Northern Ireland Executive at the meeting. This report has been endorsed by junior Minister Kearney, and he has agreed that I make the statement on behalf of both of us.

The British-Irish Council, established in 1999, is a forum for its members to discuss, consult and use best endeavours to reach agreement on cooperation on matters of mutual interest within the competence of its member Administrations. The BIC environment work sector is led by the UK Government and has proved a constructive and unique forum for facilitating evidence exchange and practical collaboration since the Council was established. The meeting held on 4 November focused on how the Administrations can work together on climate adaptation, to tackle invasive non-native species and to approach the issues connected with the marine environment.

The meeting was chaired by Lord Gardiner of Kimble, Parliamentary Under Secretary of State in the UK Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA). The Irish Government were represented by Mr Eamon Ryan TD, Minister for Transport and Minister for the Environment, Climate and Communications. The Scottish Government were represented by Roseanna Cunningham MSP, Cabinet Secretary for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform. The Welsh Government were represented by Lesley Griffiths MS, Minister for Environment, Energy and Rural Affairs. The Isle of Man Government were represented by Geoffrey Boot MHK, Minister for Environment, Food and Agriculture. The Government of Jersey were represented by Deputy John Young, Minister of the Environment. The Government of Guernsey were represented by Deputy Lindsay de Saumarez, president of the Committee for the Environment and Infrastructure.

Ministers reaffirmed their commitment to conserve and sustainably use the ocean, seas and marine resources in accordance with UN sustainable development goal 14. The BIC environment work sector has two subgroups to cover the areas of marine litter and marine environment, including biodiversity, marine protected areas and ocean acidification. Ministers discussed priority areas where the two subgroups have been focusing their work and noted progress to date, including on commitments agreed at the BIC marine litter symposium in February 2019. Those commitments are to develop options to help to support sustainable end-of-life fishing gear disposal, support the reduction of plastic pellet loss and raise awareness of marine litter with young people and fishing professionals. Noting the challenges faced by the marine environment in our shared seas, we agreed to continue the ambitious programme of collaborative work, aligned with macroregional and international obligations. Ministers discussed key aspects of the work being undertaken by the BIC climate adaptation subgroup, including to identify and share adaptation research and evidence and examine mechanisms to improve linkages between adaptation researchers across the BIC region; to foster cooperation and promote shared learning on measuring progress to minimise climate risks to critical infrastructure across the BIC region; and to identify and share information on best practice regarding community and private-sector engagement on climate adaptation, adaptation governance models and monitoring and evaluation of adaptation.

Ministers noted that the subgroup had delivered a virtual climate adaptation symposium on 20 October 2020, which focused on the topic of critical infrastructure and was hosted by the Irish Government. The symposium was attended by 80 delegates from the BIC member Administrations. It was agreed that further collaboration and engagement would continue via the BIC Environment work sector and its subgroup on climate adaptation.

Ministers were asked to note that BIC invasive non-native species (INNS) officials have been meeting biannually since 2013 to explore and agree areas of cooperation on INNS. The fourth BIC INNS workshop was held in Cardiff on 20 - 21 January 2020 hosted by the BIC secretariat and the Welsh Government. Ministers committed to an ambitious programme of collaboration, including on the Be Plant Wise and Check, Clean, Dry communications campaigns and on marine invasives such as the carpet sea squirt, as well as establishing an Asian hornet task force.

Ministers agreed that the 17th Ministerial meeting will be hosted in 2022 and that the BIC environment work sector would continue its focus on the marine environment, climate adaptation and invasive non-native species.

Mr McAleer (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): I thank the Minister for his statement. The Minister referred, in paragraphs five and six, to the topic of plastics. He will know that the fishing industry is greatly concerned about that and is prepared to play its part in helping to resolve the issue and protect the marine environment. Will the Minister elaborate on what options are being considered by his Department for the sustainable end of life for fishing gear?

Mr Poots: A decent conversation was held by the Ministers, and it was agreed that we would work with industry to develop solutions for collection and recycling of end-of-life fishing gear from the main fishing ports. There will be engagement with the fishing community to identify the best way forward in each of our areas, but there is a commitment to assisting in ensuring that that end-of-life fishing gear is appropriately and properly disposed of in an environmentally friendly and sustainable way.

Mr Harvey: Minister, I see from your statement that two subgroups have been set up: I assume that they are an Irish subgroup and a British subgroup. What practical work has been carried out to date by the subgroups?

On another point, I see that you are not due to meet again until 2022: would more frequent meetings be beneficial?

Mr Poots: It is for BIC members to decide the frequency of meetings. There are a lot of busy people involved in it.

A series of pieces of work have been done by the subgroups. Developing the issue of plastics and its impact on marine life is a key area: how we better educate the public on the use of plastics and indeed how we respond as individual Administrations in how we deal with plastics to ensure that there is less plastic around to enter the marine system. That is critical. Considerable work has also been done on the issue of invasive species, whether they are plant species or other living organisms. Those issues are of significant concern to us because those things can have a serious detrimental impact on us. There was considerable discussion of the Asian hornet as a consequence of its recent arrival.

Mr O'Toole: Minister, the British-Irish Council is an important forum that brings together some of the smaller jurisdictions — even smaller than Northern Ireland. Did you discuss the climate action plans of the Isle of Man, which has a population slightly larger than Lisburn? The Isle of Man published a climate change Bill earlier this year. Did you discuss how it, a small jurisdiction, managed to do that? Did you raise with Deputy de Saumarez from Guernsey, which has a smaller population than Lisburn, their intention to put climate change reduction into law. What I am trying to get at is whether the Minister discussed with those very small jurisdictions how they were able to put climate change plans into legislation so quickly.

Mr Poots: That was not on the agenda. One of the downsides of a virtual meeting is that we do not have the opportunity to have discussions afterwards, so I did not have that discussion. However, I am having discussions with my officials about climate change legislation, and that is something that I hope to go out to consult on very soon. That is entirely appropriate, because you do not legislate without going through a public consultation process first. That is how it is set out legally. I will seek the permission of the Executive to move forward on these matters quite soon.

Mrs Barton: Thank you for your statement, Minister. You referred to fostering cooperation, promoting shared learning and measuring progress to minimise climate risks. Have you given any thought to the various rules and regulations in Northern Ireland and in the Republic of Ireland? For example, the two jurisdictions have different planning rules and regulations for ammonia.

Mr Poots: Knowledge sharing is critical to all of us. Therefore, where people have engaged in good practice that has delivered better outcomes than we have, we have to learn and develop from that. Education is not a matter of us seeking to educate the public; education is us learning from people who, in certain circumstances, have moved ahead of us. We may be ahead of others in certain circumstances, and they can learn from us. However, education is something that we should all engage in every day.

Mr Blair: I thank the Minister for his statement and welcome the work being done by the environment work sector in setting up the subgroups on marine litter and marine environment. More specifically, is any work being done or being planned to deal with the environmental risk posed by end-of-life or abandoned vessels?

Mr Poots: Abandoned vessels have been less of an issue in recent years than they were some time ago when part of the fishing fleet was scuttled. No grant has been available to cease fishing, so it has been less desirable, with older boats sometimes being kept in harbours for too long. It certainly is a challenge, and I acknowledge that. Because of the poor incomes, there has not been the replenishment of the fleet that should have taken place, and you can see that in our harbours. Consequently, we have a lot of boats that are up to 50 years of age, and we have a lot of wooden boats, which are less safe than the steel boats. I would like to see, as the fishing fleet can actually catch more fish, the fleet being redeveloped. In that event, what happens to the older, end-of-life, boats will become an issue for us to look at. However, it was not an issue discussed at this meeting.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for his statement. Important meetings are taking place on the environment and climate change. In that respect, I know that the Minister is leading on the afforestation programme in Northern Ireland, and I commend him for it. He will know of a project in his constituency led by Lisburn scouts, seeking to acquire land for young people to appreciate. Did the Minister share any of the best practice that he is doing in Northern Ireland with the other jurisdictions?

11.45 am

Mr Poots: Afforestation was not part of the agenda, but I know that there are organisations that are dedicated to ensuring that land that is currently in a forest remains that way. That is certainly something that we should support; if tree planting is taking place and we have created woodland, it should not be taken away. There are those who grow trees to be harvested, which is fair enough because those trees will continue to capture carbon, but we want to encourage the retention of forests with more traditional trees and native species.

Mr McGuigan: Minister, you outlined how Ministers reaffirmed their commitment to UN sustainable development goal 5, one of the key aims of which is an end to destructive fishing practices. Was the issue of super-trawlers in Irish or British waters, and, specifically, in marine protected areas, raised at the meeting?

Mr Poots: It was not raised at the meeting, but the Member has raised a very important issue. We know that there are large trawlers with multiple nets, which harvest large quantities of fish. A lot of those emanate from France and Spain. Of course, they will not be in our waters if we have the right conclusion to the negotiations that are taking place this week.

Ms Sheerin: I thank the Minister for his statement and answers thus far. Minister, you talked in your statement about climate change, and reference was made to best practice for the private sector and the community sector in that regard. What learning did you take from the meeting on that?

Mr Poots: We considered climate change issues particularly around the seas and the impact that they have on the marine side. There is the issue of warmer waters and the consequences that come from that. There was also a strong focus on the pollution of the marine sector. A particular issue that was discussed at length was that of plastics and the beads that can get into our waterways. There is so much more that can be done to ensure that our waterways and marine life are protected from that. There is a course of work for us, as government, to drive forward in terms of plastics. I have already introduced an initiative to remove single-use plastics from the government system.

I want to move forward on single-use plastic bags and reconsider what we are charging at the minute. It is only 5p; I think that that needs to be raised. There are courses of work that we can do to ensure that, in the first instance, considerably less plastic is used and, consequently, less plastic gets into our waters.

Mr McNulty: I thank the Minister for his statement. It is fantastic that the Council is meeting to address climate change and to protect our marine environment. There are wonderful aspirations and ambitions. Minister, can you tell me about anything that has actually been achieved to date? It does not fill me with confidence that the next meeting is not scheduled until 2022. Does that tell us that you understand the urgency of the issue?

Mr Poots: My Department is undertaking a study on end-of-life fishing gear and recycling and waste disposal. That evidence will be provided to the group. DAERA continues to input into the pilot project that is being led by Scotland into a supply chain approach to reducing plastic pellet loss. Northern Ireland continues to have high levels of participation in Eco-Schools, which is something that we were working on. That is about encouraging our young people and educating them on the threat to the marine environment, in particular.

In Northern Ireland, we are developing marine protection areas, looking at ocean acidification and my officials have participated in blue carbon workshops and in sharing examples of cross-border cooperation and work to identify other effective conservation measures. Quite a series of actions are taking place as a result. We do not need to meet all the time to do that. Actions are decided, subgroups are set up and officials are set tasks. I think that you can see from that that many tasks are being fulfilled.

Mr O'Dowd: Minister, paragraph 7 of your statement refers to the fact that various jurisdictions are looking at the risks posed to critical infrastructure by climate change. Has your Department identified such infrastructure and what actions to take to protect it from climate change?

Mr Poots: On managing the environment, one only has to look at what happened in Donegal this week. Something certainly went wrong there, which has implications. Those who were seeking to create renewable energy caused that, so how we do things can have an important impact on our infrastructure.

On our carbon infrastructure, one of the things that were done in previous years was to install drainage in our uplands. We have now discovered that much of that drainage work has led to a drying out of peatlands, which has the consequence of reducing our carbon storage.

It is critical that we do the right things to ensure that we mitigate climate change, reduce greenhouse gases and store more carbon. Those are all courses of work on which my officials are engaged, and I will liaise with the Assembly and the Committee as and when we get qualitative information on that.

Ms Dolan: I thank Minister for his statement. I want to ask him about the paragraph in the statement that deals with native invasive species. In that, there is a reference to "an ambitious programme of collaboration". Will the Minister elaborate on that programme and its likely impact?

Mr Poots: We have a significant problem in a number of areas with invasive species, and we need to meet that challenge head-on. In Northern Ireland, there have been considerable problems over the years with invasive species such as Japanese knotweed. Muntjac deer have also been a problem, although they are becoming less so. Of course, one of the very common invasive species is the grey squirrel, which has led to there being considerably less red squirrels.

More recently, the Asian hornet has developed into a problem and there are issues with the various barnacles that can be picked up by the boats on Lough Erne that travel up and down the Shannon and so forth. Those invasive species do not recognise borders. Therefore, it is very useful to have conversations with colleagues in other areas about how they have identified invasive species and can help to deal with them.

We are looking at issues such as hull fouling, horticultural escapes, contaminants of ornamental plants, ballast water, stowaways on fishing equipment and zoo or botanic garden escapes. All those things pose a threat to us. In addition to assisting GB plans, we are working on a Northern Ireland recreational boating pathway action plan, which will be followed by a horticultural plan. All those final plans have gone through consultation processes and will eventually be published.

We also see a benefit in having a joint approach with the Republic of Ireland in dealing with invasive species, and the joint development of the pathway action plan with Ireland is a two-strand approach.

As well as working with GB on a UK-wide basis, it would be beneficial to manage invasive species collectively. At this point, there is no formal agreement. However, that is, of course, the work that we are doing.

Ms Bailey: Everyone here will be aware that many provisions in the UK Environment Bill do not extend to Northern Ireland. As my South Belfast colleague Mr O'Toole has already mentioned, other regions that are represented on the Council have their own specific climate legislation, with different targets and deadlines. What challenges have been identified that relate to divergence in environmental law and its impact on future cooperation?

Mr Poots: For example, the UK legislation that is coming in sets a recycling target of 65%. I believe that we, in Northern Ireland, can achieve that and more. Whilst the law is set at 65%, and we have to agree to that, my preference is for a recycling target of 70%. I am giving that only as an example. We can all identify what is achievable. We have achieved much higher rates of renewable energy than any other part of the UK. Going forward, it is for the Department for the Economy to drive that.

Ultimately, I would like to see us get to the point of using and producing entirely renewable energy. However, I believe that 70% is achievable in the not-too-distant future. That is a course of work that we can engage in. We will set the targets for all those issues.

We are keen to progress our own climate change legislation. We will want to consult on that appropriately. I would like the consultation process to be shortened a bit in order to give the House and the Office of the Legislative Counsel time to do the work that they need to do. We know that there is public demand for it. Therefore, we will want to consult and see what public expectations are. At the same time, it is necessary for legislation.

Basic Payment Scheme Simplifications and the Direction of Travel for Future Agricultural Policy in Northern Ireland, including Support Payments

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Speaker has received notice from the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs that he wishes to make a statement. We will just give him one moment to get back to his place. When you are ready, Minister.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to talk to the House about my long-term vision for agricultural support in Northern Ireland. I also intend to announce a number of simplifications and improvements that I am making to the rules that govern the direct payment scheme for the 2021 scheme year.

Pillar 1 of the common agricultural policy (CAP) provided £293 million of direct support to Northern Ireland's farmers per annum. CAP payments have been of major importance in sustaining the industry in Northern Ireland and underpinning its competitive trading position. They have accounted for 79%, or £1.88 billion, of the cumulative total income of the Northern Ireland industry over the seven years from 2013 to 2019.

In 2018, my Department undertook an engagement exercise on a potential future agricultural policy framework for Northern Ireland. In that proposed framework, officials, in conjunction with key food, farming and environmental stakeholders, identified four desired outcomes and a long-term vision for the Northern Ireland agri-food industry.

Those outcomes are: an industry that pursues increased productivity in international terms, closing the productivity gap which has been opened up with our major suppliers; an industry that is environmentally sustainable in terms of its impact on, and guardianship of, air and water quality, soil health, carbon footprint and biodiversity; an industry that displays improved resilience to external shocks, such as market volatility and extreme weather events, which are ever more frequent and to which the industry has become very exposed; and an industry which operates within an integrated, efficient, sustainable, competitive and responsive supply chain, with clear market signals and an overriding focus on high-quality food and the end consumer. A number of projects have now been established in the Department to collate evidence, identify gaps and develop policies that will help to deliver those outcomes.

12.00 noon

In June 2020, I announced my intention to bring forward a co-designed environmental strategy, entitled the green growth strategy, on behalf of the Executive. It will align economic growth and development with the protection and enhancement of natural assets. The Northern Ireland future agricultural policy framework has been developed in line with the green growth principles and will help to deliver its objectives. I anticipate launching that new future agricultural policy framework in early 2021, and I will update the House further at that time. Today, however, I want to broadly outline my vision for future support payments.

Leaving the EU provides for an unprecedented level of regional discretion and flexibility with regard to future agricultural support in Northern Ireland. This is the most significant change in policy to affect the agricultural sector in over 40 years. It means that our policies do not have to be constrained by the EU CAP pillar 1 and pillar 2 construct. We need to move to something new that better addresses the needs of Northern Ireland agriculture. It represents a unique opportunity to develop a new dynamic for key stakeholders across the food, agriculture and environmental spectrum to work with the Northern Ireland Government to chart a new way forward with common purpose. For that to be successful, it is vital that the long-term outcomes of productivity, resilience, environmental sustainability and supply chain functionality be kept to the fore, which will demand difficult choices, compromises and strong leadership at all levels.

Those four outcomes complement and reinforce each other, and they are broadly supported by stakeholders. A healthy and sustainable environment secures long-term agricultural productive capacity and underpins resilience. Productive agriculture minimises waste and maximises resource efficiency, which underpins environmental performance and reduces exposure to market risk. Furthermore, an integrated and efficient supply chain ensures that agricultural activity is properly focused on delivering market demands, thereby minimising wasted effort, wasted resource and inefficient supply chains and reflecting broader societal demands for sustainable production methods. The primary tools available to us — science, education, incentivisation and regulation — are applicable in helping to deliver all those outcomes. My focus is now on how we can best deliver the outcomes with the tools and resources that I have at my disposal.

Today also allows me to once again put on record that, going forward, I want to devise support schemes that provide opportunities for all our farmers — no farmer should be left behind. Schemes and support are needed to help farmers to develop their business, no matter where they farm, to become more efficient and to maximise the sustainable returns that they can achieve from the assets at their disposal. Those assets include the environmental assets on their farm. I believe that farms, especially those on hills and other disadvantaged areas, are well placed to play a major role in delivering more of the environmental outcomes that the people who live here want and that we owe to our future generations. I also believe that farmers should be properly rewarded for delivering those environmental outcomes and achieve a return on the environmental assets present on their farms. This offers a way forward where better economic performance and better environmental performance are the inseparable twin goals of any sustainable farm business.

The House will be aware that the UK Agriculture Act gained Royal Assent on 11 November. I very much welcome the Act, because it provides a platform on which we can start to move forward. Ideally, I would like to have had a locally developed agriculture Act taken through this House. However, that was not possible in the time available to us, but the Agriculture Act that we do have provides us with sufficient scope to introduce the changes that will set us on a new pathway.

The current working assumption is that the budget for future agricultural support payments for the remainder of the Parliament will be similar to the current direct agricultural support budget of £293 million per annum, plus a proportion of the pillar 2 budget. That ring-fenced funding will need to cover all the support measures that we wish to introduce. Current direct agricultural support is distributed by a decoupled area-based payment. I do not believe that that mechanism, as it stands, will deliver the outcomes and the agricultural industry that we wish to see. Nevertheless, I want to explore the role for a basic, area-based resilience payment that provides a safety net, but that must not blunt the incentive to become more productive and deliver better environmental outcomes. Careful analysis is necessary to identify an appropriate design of that mechanism that can reflect issues such as scale of operation — that is to say a cap on the maximum payment and, indeed, a minimum lower threshold — activity and so on and that is set in the context of a cross-compliance regime that is designed specifically for Northern Ireland to help to deliver policy outcomes.

That will take time, but it is my intent to move as quickly as I can on that in order to provide the budget necessary to deliver new schemes and approaches.

As part of that package, I wish to use a proportion of the agriculture budget to fund coupled payments, targeting, for example, suckler cow and breeding ewe producers. It is important to stress that that would not be a return to the coupled payments of the past. We need to design in features that will help achieve the goals of increased productivity and environmental sustainability. I have tasked my officials with completing a comprehensive review of the options for coupled support payments, and I hope to consult on it during 2021.

I will say something about coupled support for protein crops. I intend to introduce for 2021 a protein crop scheme for growing combinable beans, peas and sweet lupins. Those crops will create a domestically produced source of protein for animal feed and provide agronomic benefits within arable rotations. I intend to introduce it for 2021 on a pilot basis and then refine the approach for subsequent years to maximise the economic and environmental benefits.

A major part of the new agriculture framework will be the agrienvironment programme. As I have indicated, we need to create a regime that properly incentivises and rewards the protection of existing environmental assets and the creation of new ones. We will work with our farmers, land managers and environmental stakeholders to co-design a new approach to agrienvironment measures that is focused on delivering outcomes and a lasting legacy. We have the opportunity to create an approach whereby management of the environment becomes a profit centre within a farm business rather than a cost centre.

My officials are looking at a range of other issues that will contribute to a new agriculture policy agenda. Those include the role of capital support; generational renewal; upskilling and professional development; opportunities to develop the horticulture sector; and supply chain initiatives. I hope to say more about those in the early part of next year.

Although work is progressing to develop the long-term agriculture support strategy, I want to make some early changes that start to move us in the desired direction. I have therefore asked my Department to review our approach to the current schemes and to implement, where possible, improvements and simplifications that are in keeping with the longer-term direction of travel and that can be taken forward under the Agriculture Act 2020.

Tuesday 17 November 2020

With that in mind, from 1 January 2021, I have decided to implement a number of changes. I have already announced that I will remove the greening requirements for the 2021 scheme year and incorporate the greening payment into the basic payment scheme (BPS) entitlement unit values. I will, however, retain the ban on ploughing or conversion of environmentally sensitive permanent grassland under BPS rules.

As currently designed, the objective of the greening requirements is to address a particular set of problems in cereal-producing regions where there is a predominance of very large fields that are devoid of landscape features and used for monocropping. The evidence is strong that the greening requirements of crop diversification and ecological focus area (EFA) retention have very limited relevance to Northern Ireland. If anything, they seem to have been counterproductive, by reducing the area of cropping and thus the diversity of land cover and habitat. My view is that, rather than persist with that failed initiative, it is much better to focus efforts and resources on developing bespoke environmental measures that will ensure the delivery of environmental outcomes tailored to Northern Ireland that are adequately funded.

Greening rules have added significant complications to the administration of direct agriculture support payments for applicants and those administering the scheme. Removing greening will also greatly reduce the inspection requirement associated with the direct payment regime. Incorporating the greening payment into the overall BPS entitlement values will mean that farmers will see no difference in the funding that they receive. The protection of environmentally sensitive permanent grassland will be enhanced by incorporating those rules into the basic payment scheme rules.

Whilst work on the development of bespoke environmental measures takes place, Northern Ireland's robust set of environmental laws will continue to provide protection against biodiversity loss. It is also important to remember that landscape features such as hedges and sheughs will continue to be protected under cross-compliance.

On the capping of payments, given that the changes for 2021 do not have a primary aim of altering the amount of funding that farmers receive in 2021, it is my intention to make a technical adjustment to deliver a neutral solution on capping. That is for 2021 only, however. I will want to look at capping more closely as part of the longer-term approach to support, and I have asked officials to bring forward options for consideration.

For 2021, for applications from young farmers and new entrants, I am limiting the number of entitlements that can be allocated or topped up from the regional reserve to 90 for each application. That brings the approach into line with the young farmers' payment. The aim is to prevent very large allocations from the reserve to individual farm businesses, which are difficult to justify but which cannot at present be prevented. That change will also reduce the incentive to submit speculative claims or to exploit the reserve.

I will limit over-declaration penalties to 100% of the amount due based on the area determined. That will eliminate the need to apply offset penalties in subsequent years. At present, in some cases where an over-declaration is large, the over-declaration penalty exceeds the payment due prior to penalty. In such cases, the payment is zero, and the outstanding part of the over-declaration penalty is offset against future payments made to the business over the next three years. I believe that the reduction of the payment to zero is an adequate deterrent against speculative claims involving the declaration of a large proportion of ineligible land.

I have asked my officials to review the approach to the application of cross-compliance penalties as soon as possible. My aim is to ensure that penalties are proportionate and reflect the seriousness of the non-compliance identified. As I said, using the primary powers in the UK Agriculture Act, secondary legislation to give legal effect to the 2021 scheme is being drafted. I will bring this forward under the draft affirmative procedure.

I assure the House that, in developing the future agricultural framework and our approach to future agricultural support payments, I will consult with the full range of agricultural and environmental stakeholders and keep you all updated. My ultimate aim is to ensure that we take full advantage of the opportunity to develop a sustainable agriculture industry in which farmers are supported on an equitable basis. That will be underpinned by a set of bespoke measures that will ensure the delivery of productive, environmentally sustainable, resilient and supply chain-focused outcomes tailored for Northern Ireland.

Mr Harvey: Minister, I welcome your statement. You mention a pilot scheme to maximise the benefits of protein crops, beans and sweet lupins. How do you propose to encourage farmers to partake in this scheme, and has it been tried before?

Mr Poots: Such a scheme is currently available in the Republic of Ireland. As I understand it, close to €100 per acre of support is available. It has been used there.

There are three particular advantages to growing protein crops. First, it increases rotation. Protein crops are good for soil in that they break it up quite well. Secondly, protein crops — for example, beans — capture nitrogen from the air. We have an issue with nitrogen deposition into our peatlands, so something that removes nitrogen from the atmosphere is positive. Thirdly, protein crops grown here will displace — I recognise that the displacement will be small — some of the requirement for the importation of grains such as soya, which are grown largely in South America, where an element of that is grown by removing rainforests. On the environmental side, there are significant advantages to growing protein crops in Northern Ireland, which is why I want to take that forward.

Mr McGuigan: Minister, thank you for the statement. It is lengthy and contains a lot of detail. I look forward to going through it in my role on the Committee and to working with you. In total, the annual CAP basic payment is £293 million and represents 79% of the total income of our farmers. Currently, that is wholly funded by the EU. Does the Minister agree that a level playing field on the island of Ireland is critical to the smooth operation of our agri-food economy and that any future policy that diverges from CAP could disadvantage our primary producers and rural communities here in the North?

Mr Poots: Anything could happen. We also could be advantaged as a consequence of moving away from CAP. I indicated that I will remove the greening requirements, which are much more applicable to large grain-growing areas in France, the east of England and so forth and are not of benefit in Northern Ireland.

Moving away from the CAP creates an obvious benefit in that respect without creating any environmental detriment. So, there will be areas such as moving away from the CAP, which was a very broad-based scheme for all of the European Union, where we will be able to make support systems for farming that are bespoke to our needs. Therefore, I believe that we can drive greater productivity and better environmental outcomes at the same time by developing our bespoke scheme, and I look forward to working with the Committee in doing that.

12.15 pm

Mr McGlone: I thank the Minister for his statement. As we are moving forward, basic payments are, of course, crucial to underpinning farm life and providing support income to farmers. With Brexit looming, can the Minister advise us what further assurances have been sought or received from the Westminster Government about additional and continuing support for farmers?

Mr Poots: We, along with other devolved Administrations, continue to raise these issues with the UK Government, so we take the opportunity at inter-ministerial group meetings to raise the issues of continued support. We continue to receive reassurances on that front, but we will continue to keep pressing the case for agriculture and the environment in Northern Ireland.

It was probably a much easier case to make pre-COVID, as there was a fair bit more money in the system, but if the UK Government has to keep borrowing money at the rate that it is — I know that other European countries are in the same position — then that is going to put pressure on every other area, and that is something that we need to be alert to. The COVID crisis is creating unsustainability with regard to the public finances. I trust that the vaccine will allow us to move on from this, but as a consequence of COVID, we are going to be left with debts that are akin to debt that would be achieved by a war. Ultimately, that could put pressures on public finances, and that could impact on us.

Mrs Barton: Minister, you said that a major part of the new agricultural framework will, of course, be an agri-environment programme. Do you foresee that the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) and the Shared Environmental Services (SES) will work with the agricultural community in a more supportive role to enable modern and progressive farming in parallel with the protection of environmental assets?

Mr Poots: I cannot speak for Shared Environmental Services because it is paid for by councils and is independent of the Department. NIEA is responsible to us, although some Members would prefer that we have an entirely independent environmental protection agency. I suggest that the Members who look for an independent environmental protection agency look at the role of SES before considering whether that is what they really want.

In some of the more marginal areas, where the land may not be as productive for the likes of big dairy and beef farms, a lot of people have ensured the renewal of their farms through building chicken houses. If you go into many parts of County Tyrone, for example, you will see that many chicken houses have been built there, and those properties have ensured that people who have an agricultural skill have been able to stay on a farm that would not otherwise have been productive enough to keep them. Sustainability is about having a sustainable environment, economy and food production.

Therefore, on all of this, dealing with a problem is not done through the blunt instrument of planning; it is actually about tackling the issue of ammonia, which needs to be addressed. The Department is working very hard to bring forward proposals on that issue that will make a significant impact on reducing the ammonia emissions and, consequently, will negate the damage that would be done to the environment by further production.

We want to encourage further production, but we want to do it in a way that is sustainable. The Department is working towards that, rather than just saying, "This is a problem, so we will stop doing that and that will end the problem". We need to address the issues that will resolve the problem, but that will still allow sustainable food production to continue.

Mr Blair: I thank the Minister for his detailed statement. Point 13 seems to indicate a preference for a bespoke Northern Ireland agriculture Act. Given the statement by the Minister, the reality of the importance of agriculture to our economy, the particular quality of our farm product and the problem of rising ammonia levels, could such an Act be developed to deal with those issues? Are there plans in place to deal with that and, if not, could such plans be put in place?

Mr Poots: One of the problems that we have is that this mandate runs out in 2022. For any legislation to get through now is going to be particularly challenging. You have the consultation process, there is then work to do with the Office of the Legislative Counsel (OLC) in developing the legislation and then the normal process of going through the Assembly, which can take up to a year.

Whilst I would like to do an agriculture Act — that is something that is desirable — I am not sure that we will have the capacity to do it in the time frame available, particularly given that the UK has just passed its Agriculture Act. Whilst it is not perfect for us, it certainly gives us considerable cover.

I have a number of pieces of legislation that I intend to bring forward, but I do not think that I can achieve an agriculture Act in the proposed lifetime of the current Assembly.

Mr Irwin: I thank the Minister for his statement and his vision for the future of agriculture. It is clear that the Minister has a wide knowledge of grassroots agriculture.

Minister, you said that you would look at cross-compliance penalties. There has been an issue in the past, of which the Minister will, I am sure, be aware, whereby penalties applied to farmers were appealed. The farmers went to an independent panel which, in some cases, adjudicated and supported the farmers, but the Department refused to agree to the independent panel's decision. What is the Minister's view on that?

Tuesday 17 November 2020

Mr Poots: I used to find it incredibly frustrating when, having represented a constituent who, having won a case at an independent panel, received a letter from an Agriculture Minister — generally, the Agriculture Ministers were named Michelle at the time — indicating that they were overturning the decision of the independent panel. I have made it clear to my officials that I will not be overturning the decisions of an independent panel. Why have an independent panel look at these things, give an assessment of how the Department came to its point of view on what the individual who made the claim had done, arrive at a conclusion on the information presented, only then for a pen to be put through that decision? It is entirely inappropriate and I will not be doing that. I have made it clear to officials that, when an independent panel makes a decision, it is the final decision.

Mr McAleer: I welcome the statement from the Minister. In paragraph 32, the Minister made reference to a neutral solution on capping. Can you elaborate on that? I aware that, during the last CAP reform, there was a cap put on the Basic Payment Scheme (BPS), because there was a situation before that where some farmers were getting the best part of a third of a million pounds in a single farm payment per year, which works out at nearly £1,000 a day. There was then a cap put on that. What specifically are you referring to? What are your ideas around the neutral solution on capping in the statement?

Mr Poots: For 2020-21, I do not intend to change the capping that is in place, but I make it clear that I intend to change capping going forward. As we discuss these issues, I do not believe that some of the payments are appropriate. I know that some of the farms are large-scale, but, as we go forward, I would prefer to see the money spread more evenly and to see a greater proportion of farmers who are not just as large in scale receiving it. I would also like to deal with some of the hobby farming that takes place, where there is no real reliance on farming but people maybe keep a small acreage in order to engage in the hobby of farming. I want to support the people who are reliant on farming for a living, and if someone receives large amounts of money that goes into the hundreds of thousands, they are somewhat less reliant than people who operate with perhaps £15,000 of profit in a year. It is hard to feed your family and to keep a home with that sort of profitability.

Mr Gildernew: Paragraphs 7 and 8 of the statement make reference to the European Union. Given that we are still in the EU regulatory zone and, thankfully, retain full access to the EU market, does the Minister appreciate the importance of continuing to align with EU policies in order not to disadvantage our local farmers compared with farmers in the South and in other parts of the EU?

Mr Poots: On the regulatory aspect of it, the answer is yes: we will align because that is part of the protocol agreement. That is somewhat unfortunate because some of the cross-compliance things do not act to our benefit. Nonetheless, that is where we are.

Moving forward, I remind Members that, whilst the protocol kept us in the single market, oddly enough, the European Union does not want Northern Ireland to be a participant in its free trade agreements. I would challenge the European Union on that. If it wants to keep us in the single market, why should it be with second-class citizenship in that single market? If we are producing goods to exactly the same standards as the rest of the European Union, why are we not entitled to be part of its free trade agreement? We will be part of the UK's free trade agreements, but why is the European Union not doing that? I understand that the reason why it is not doing that is because there is too much work involved. I suggest that that be reconsidered, because if we are going to be part of the single market, as the EU desired and negotiated with the UK Prime Minister and as was decided by the Westminster Parliament, we should get the advantages of it, not just the disadvantages.

Mr McNulty: I thank the Minister for his statement. Thank you for educating me, Minister. I thought that "sheugh" was an agricultural slang word, but now I know that it is a real word that has its origins in Irish. Some of my more learned Gaelic-speaking friends might be able to give me more information on it.

A typical farm in south Armagh is 80 acres of land ownership with 40 acres taken and 100 head of cattle that are mixed beef suckler herd, so what were the basic payments that they received and what will be the basic payments going forward as part of your proposals?

Mr Poots: The posh word for sheugh, of course, is "drain". I thought that it was more Ulster Scots than Irish, but perhaps Patsy could educate us on that. Nonetheless, it is a good owl word that is used in the country, and people understand sheugh better than drain. Drains are very often enclosed, and sheughs are always open. Anyway.

I know the farms in County Armagh very well. I visit that area from time to time. I talk to farmers from County Armagh.

I know the land type in that area, and, ultimately, it is more suitable to suckler, particularly in its southern part, than it is to dairy. The more northern part of Armagh is probably more suitable to dairy.

12.30 pm

We are looking at how we take away the broad instrument that just gives somebody a payment and does not reflect a lot on the work that they do and at how we make that instrument one that encourages people to engage in keeping appropriate numbers of livestock for their farms and ensures that they are supported to do that.

Support for the suckler cow is key. The Livestock and Meat Commission (LMC) has put forward proposals, along with the Northern Ireland Meat Exporters Association (NIMEA) and a number of other organisations, that look at support for suckler cows, beef finishing and so forth. It is important that we throw these things open to discussion and set out an element of it that will go for that type of support. That will be removed from the basic payment and be shifted over to the other pillar, which will allow us to particularly encourage younger people to engage in farming.

I know a lot of young people who would love to farm but they do not have the land. There may be land in the family, but they just cannot make enough money to get going at it. I would love to encourage more young people to go into farming because it is a great way of life. It is a great career, but young people need to be able to put bread on the table and provide for their family if they go into it.

Ms Sheerin: I thank the Minister for his statement. He reiterated the point in paragraph 11 that he wants no farmer to be left behind. It is an unfortunate reality that many decisions that the Minister has taken this year have left a lot of farmers feeling left behind, notably the decision to stop the transition towards a flat rate, which would have allowed farmers operating below the regional average an expected pay increase of about 14%, as well as his refusal to reinstate the areas of natural constraint (ANC) payment against the wishes of the House. What specific commitments can the Minister make today to assure farmers in less favoured and severely disadvantaged areas that they will no longer be left behind?

Mr Poots: If one looks at the payment system for the scheme five or six years ago compared with where it is now, one could not describe those areas as being left behind vis-à-vis others in agriculture. Quite a lot of lowland farms are not particularly profitable, and people need to recognise that. Farming in general is not that profitable. Therefore, we need to encourage farming and farm systems to maximise the value of their product and to market their product in a way that gains the highest income. It is about us providing support to farmers to make real environmental benefits. I am open to ways of doing that, and I am happy to discuss that fully with people in the uplands. They know better than anybody how to make their land productive. I am happy to engage in qualitative discussions with folks in the uplands as to how best we can take things forward, but I do not believe that a flat-rate system benefits agriculture or a lot of smaller farms, and it is not the way forward for the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr Muir: I thank the Minister for his statement. Paragraph 31 states that:

“Northern Ireland’s robust set of environmental laws will continue to provide protection against biodiversity loss.”

Does the Minister agree that, to strengthen those laws and to ensure proper enforcement, we need an independent environmental protection agency to be brought forward in legislation and enacted before the end of this Assembly term?

Mr Poots: I hear about independent environment agencies, and about independence in general, and then I hear Members say that the courts have not fined someone enough. I hear Members challenge the courts over their fining system all the time in the Chamber. The courts are an independent agency. I hear Members discuss Shared Environmental Services and the quality of its planning advice, and they are critical of it in the Chamber. SES is an independent body. I often ask, “What are we elected to do?”. We are elected to be accountable to the people. What is wrong with having a system through which there is accountability to the Chamber for environmental regulation? An independent environmental protection agency would not provide that. I can come to the Chamber and be held to account for the actions of the NIEA. It has a lot of autonomy, but I can be held accountable for its actions in a way that I could not be for the actions of an independent environmental protection agency.

One thing that I will be held accountable for is what I want to do for uplands. One factor that has contributed to the loss of biodiversity is decisions that were made in the past to drain areas in the uplands, which made farmland more productive there. We now know, however, that the most harmful factor of carbon capture in our peatlands is a loss of water. The reality is that we need to wet areas around those peatlands once again. One of the things that we need to do with this new scheme is support those farmers. If we are going to wet land that they are not going to be able to use productively, we need to support them financially for the environmental benefit that will be created by wetting the peatlands once again. That is an important piece of work. I am happy to be held accountable for those things. I do not believe that that would be the case if there were an independent environmental protection agency. It would add another layer, but, ultimately, it is for the Assembly to decide.

Mr Lynch: I thank the Minister for his statement, which referred to an integrated and responsive supply chain as one of his desired outcomes for future policy. In the absence of an effective Groceries Code Adjudicator (GCA) and legislation guaranteeing minimum farmgate prices, can you seriously deliver that outcome?

Mr Poots: I agree with the Member that the Groceries Code Adjudicator is not particularly effective. This year, on the back of COVID, there has been a noticeable switch, with more people buying their own produce than eating out. That demonstrates to me that perhaps the grocery supply chain is not the worst problem that we have, albeit the big supermarkets have massive buying power. The public are quite discerning, however, and they like food that is produced locally when they are shopping in supermarkets. You do not have the same opportunity to do that if you go out to a restaurant or a cafe.

There has been a tremendous movement towards buying local. Local butchers’ shops and vegetable shops and so on have been doing well throughout COVID, because people have wanted that reassurance. I therefore want to build on the fact that people know that food that is grown in their own country is generally food that is grown to a high standard. If I import chicken from some of the places in the world from which we are importing it, I do not have the same assurances that the standards are the same as they are here. People talk about chlorinated chicken. The problem is not with the chlorination of the chicken but with the fact that there is considerable salmonella in the chicken. That means that the chicken needs to be chlorinated in the first instance. The reason that there is considerable salmonella is that the stocking rates for the houses for those chickens are far higher than they are here. As a consequence, they produce chicken more cheaply, because the stocking rates are higher, but it is not of the same quality as what is produced locally. We need to be absolutely certain that the public know that what they are buying here is produced to the highest possible standards in eating quality, provenance, traceability, food miles and environmental impact. I believe that, in Northern Ireland, we can produce a product that ticks the A* list on every front. If we can just introduce a few more measures, we will be top rate for every aspect of our food production.

Ms Armstrong: Minister, as you will know, I am from the Ards peninsula, and one of the areas that is extremely important to me is the work of the Ards peninsula coastal erosion group, on which a number of your colleagues work. Earlier today, regarding climate change adaptation, you talked about:

Tuesday 17 November 2020

“identify and share information on best practice regarding community and private-sector engagement on climate adaptation, governance models”.

Has there been any discussion on coastal management? We have a situation at Anne’s Point, outside Greyabbey, where the reclaimed land has been breached. The lough has come in and basically poisoned it. You can see that the trees are dead now. Is there anything on that modelling and governance? For instance, has taking away the Bateman principle and bringing something new on board been discussed?

Mr Poots: While coastal erosion is not part of my statement, it is a very important issue. County Down has a much softer landscape than County Antrim, which has considerable amounts of basalt and so forth. At Portstewart, I always remark on those rocks that have withstood that battering year after year after year. County Down does not have as sustainable a coastline in that respect.

We take coastal erosion very seriously. I am looking at LiDAR mapping all of Northern Ireland. That will involve our coastlines and will be a huge source of information. I want to work with the Department of Finance, which has its own plane, on that, and it will give us a huge amount of information. I want to do it in conjunction with soil analysis, testing every field in Northern Ireland, which will lead to our having a much greater understanding of the nutrient requirements in Northern Ireland as we move forward on an environmental front. I want us to do considerable work on slurry separation and on the pelletisation of phosphates, because we have too much phosphate. Instead of that going onto our land and ultimately into our waterways, it becomes a marketable product to other parts of the world that are phosphate-deficient. We need to look forward to all those things. We cannot stand still. We cannot do everything in the same way for decades and expect the same results, because the world is moving on. Things are changing, and ultimately we can do things that will be not only of considerable environmental benefit but of financial benefit. We need to delve into those areas and ensure that we can support farms and agricultural producers as they move to these schemes.

Ms Bailey: On the issue of the quality of our local food, we should be cognisant of the fact that people will buy the food that they can afford. Given the economic ramifications of the crisis that we are in at the minute, we need to be careful that the potential for cheaper imports to be within the budget of people here does not allow our good quality to be the major export for other markets. That brings me to your response to Ms Sheerin’s earlier question. I hope that you can give us a wee bit more detail on the support schemes to provide opportunities for all farmers. Are you thinking, for example, of specific measures to address farm poverty and the decline in farmgate prices? I ask that because I heard a story from a farmer, who told me that, just two years ago, he invested a £500,000 loan into a new hen laying unit, and he —

12.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has asked her question.

Ms Bailey: — had planned to take 10 years to pay that back and take a £15,000 salary for himself.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has asked her question.

Ms Bailey: A neighbour’s son worked in a local factory and earned more for the same —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. Will the Member come to a conclusion with her question? It is meant to be a short introduction and a question.

Ms Bailey: OK. That was my question. Are particular efforts being made to really get stuck into addressing the disparity in farm poverty?

Mr Poots: Yes, the Member raises that specific case, and that is the sort of investment that is very often required to be sustainable in modern farming. You are looking at investments of hundreds of thousands of pounds just to create something that is viable and produces a way forward. Profitability is key, and how we support our agriculture sector in being profitable is much more important than support packages, because that is how people want to make their living. Where possible, they do not want to be dependent on government handouts. They want to make the money themselves. People who are working extremely hard every day deserve to have a good income on the basis of their hard work. We want to provide a means of ensuring that agriculture remains sustainable, and having an envelope of close to £300 million is a huge asset to us. How we spend and utilise that is incredibly important in ensuring that we get to the point where people are productive in bringing in their own finances.

Mr Allister: I generally welcome the Minister’s statement. I am sure that it is a great disappointment to the many doomsayers, some in the House and some outside, who told us that, after Brexit, there would be no farming and no money because the cash cow of the EU would be no more. What a lot of nonsense that was.

I generally welcome many of the things in the statement, particularly the end to greening, but I notice the pledge that no farmer will be left behind, so I ask the Minister this: when it comes to the application of the environmental policies, can he ensure that that happens? For example, he has talked to the House about introducing a requirement for injection-only slurry spreading. There are many small farmers who will never be able to afford the equipment for that, so, in adjusting those policies, will he, please, bear in mind that no farmer should be left behind?

Mr Poots: I accept what the Member says. Whilst we are moving towards that, and there are very clear environmental benefits from it, there are also agricultural benefits in that there is greater utilisation of the nutrients that are applied to the land and less loss to the atmosphere as a consequence. On particularly steep land, that can be more challenging, and those are issues that we will need to address going forward. Many small farmers will, of course, use contractors, and whilst the contractors have a significant charge per hour for the utilisation of such equipment, they do an awful lot of work in a very short time, so it very often pays better to bring in someone else to do it as opposed to having your own equipment. Nonetheless, the Member raises a valid point. We must ensure that we create schemes and systems that are not punitive but ensure that we can assist the environment at the same time as encouraging good farm practice so that it does not lead to a situation where engaging in that becomes unaffordable for people.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister. I have been listening to the debate this morning, and I have some concerns and interests around the future of the agricultural policy, as you described it in the statement, particularly around the areas of resilience, increased productivity, environmental sustainability and improved resilience. How do you believe that that can be achieved without the support of the European Union, without the ability to sell goods into the European Union, if that becomes a difficulty and a Brexit deal cannot be done, and, indeed, without the support of the common agricultural policy?

Mr Poots: Whilst there are many disadvantages to the protocol, there is one advantage in that we have access to the single market. So, selling to the European Union going forward is not an issue; it is not a problem. Northern Ireland, of course, will have full access to sell to the UK market, which is the strongest market anywhere in Europe. It is the strongest market for beef, for example; it pays a higher price for beef than anywhere in the European Union. We will have access to the UK market, which takes over 50% of our product. The European Union takes around 25% of our product, and the rest of the world takes the other 25%. I am confident that we will be able to utilise and sell well into those markets.

I made reference to the European Union free trade agreements. It is somewhat incongruous that, whilst the European Union is keeping us in the single market and we then have to apply all the rules of the single market, it did not seek to benefit us with the free trade agreements that it is settling with other people. The European Union clearly wants to keep Northern Ireland locked in in many aspects but not in the advantageous aspects. It should reconsider that. I know that it involved work for the European Union; nonetheless, either it plays fair or it does not play at all.

Ms Bradshaw: Thank you for your statement, Minister. Can you please outline how the environmental plans contained in it integrate with payment plans and if any transition is required? Further to that, what conversations will you have with the Department of Finance? Obviously, there is a lot of learning from efforts to get the COVID payments and business support grants out.

Mr Poots: Two issues. On the environmental plans, this was a formative statement that wants to open up a debate as to how best we can do things and how we can better utilise this £300 billion package to support production and the environment. In some areas, farmers will benefit more from environmental aspects than the production end. Whilst farmers would prefer to be engaged in production, for most of them, the bottom line is what really matters. We will focus very heavily on ensuring that we get better environmental outcomes from the money that we invest in single farm payments.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Business Committee has arranged to meet at 1.00 pm. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be questions to the Minister of Justice.

The sitting was suspended at 12.53 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Justice

Anti-stalking Legislation

1. Mr Durkan asked the Minister of Justice whether she is on target to introduce a protection from stalking bill to the Assembly in November or, at the latest, early December 2020. (AQO 1112/17-22)

6. Mr Stalford asked the Minister of Justice when she plans to introduce anti-stalking legislation. (AQO 1117/17-22)

Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice): Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. With your permission, I will answer questions 1 and 6 together. I am committed to ensuring that the law provides the most effective protection for victims of stalking and that it is progressed as a matter of urgency.

I have met with victims of stalking and heard of the horrendous experiences to which they have been subjected. I want to ensure that victims of this insidious crime will be able to get the justice and protection that they so desperately need and deserve. That is why I am pleased to report that the drafting of the protection from stalking Bill is nearing completion, and my intention is to introduce the Bill to the Assembly in December. This stand-alone Bill focuses on introducing a specific offence of stalking and includes a provision for the introduction of stalking protection orders, which will offer victims of stalking immediate protection from the perpetrator.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for her answer. I am delighted to hear of the progress that she is making on the drafting of the Bill. Will the Minister outline to the House her vision of what the central components of such legislation should be?

Mrs Long: First, as I said in my original answer, the intention is that there will be protections for victims of stalking and that those will be included in the Bill. The intention is also that the definition of stalking will be clarified in law. At the moment, as you know, there can be issues with the ability to use harassment laws to prosecute stalking behaviour. This would, I think, set a clearer course by defining a more specific offence of stalking. It would also offer protections, meaning, for example, that it would lie with the PSNI to take forward a stalking protection order rather than the individual having to seek a non-molestation order, which, as most Members recognise, can be challenging.

Mr Stalford: I welcome the fact that the legislation is due to come forward in December. Every person should be free from stalking or harassment. The Minister will know that a crucial element of any such propositions that make their way to the statute book is having a sufficient budget available to allow speedy access to justice. Has the Department estimated what the financial requirement will be to ensure the implementation of this welcome legislation?

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for his question. The issue here is, I think, not one of creating new duties and obligations, which would lead to increased costs. The issue is improving access to law where current access is difficult: for example, by using the harassment provisions that are already in statute. We do not anticipate that there will necessarily be huge costs. One of the issues in delivering this is that, as things stand, when people seek protection from harassment, it can often lead to very complicated and protracted court cases. Simplifying the offence should make it easier for people to get the protections that they need.

There will, of course, be some transfer of responsibility, because the financial obligations of seeking a non-molestation order lie with the person who applies. Whilst applicants may be able to get some assistance through legal aid, depending on their means, this would then fall to the PSNI. That is one of the issues that we will look at when considering how we will budget. We do not anticipate a significant increase in cost.

Ms Dillon: The Minister has highlighted some of the issues that are of greatest concern to us. She spoke about the harassment and intimidation legislation that is available at the moment. We know that the sentences for those offences can be quite lenient. Can the Minister give some assurance that the sentences related to the stalking Bill will reflect the seriousness of the crime?

Mrs Long: It is absolutely crucial that they do. The Member, as a member of the Justice Committee, will have the opportunity to scrutinise the sentences when the Bill comes forward. Indicative of where we are heading is the fact that we intend our stalking offence to be quite similar in structure to the model that applies in Scotland. That model was introduced in 2010.

Therefore, we will have an opportunity to inform policy here through the experience of Scotland.

Ms Bradshaw: Minister, given that Northern Ireland will be the only jurisdiction in the UK with its own stand-alone stalking Bill, how will our offence compare with those in the other parts of the UK?

Mrs Long: It is important for us to seek to build the most robust preventions for stalking that we can in legislation, and we do that by comparing what other jurisdictions already have in statute. From our perspective, this is one way of making sure that our provisions will be more robust, but I am also introducing it as significant but stand-alone legislation. There was the option for us to incorporate it, for example, in the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill that is going through the House today. However, two issues with that caused me some concern.

The first is that it conflates domestic abuse and stalking. Not everyone who is stalked is a victim of domestic abuse. In fact, often stalkers have got nothing to do with the domestic setting and have no prior relationship with the individual who is stalked. That is a very important in terms of clarity for the public. It also would have risked stalking not being given the adequate attention that it needs to be given in order to be properly scrutinised by the Committee. Creating a stand-alone offence also allows us time to ensure appropriate training for the justice agencies that will have to implement and deliver it once the offence has been created.

Fireworks

2. Mr Allen asked the Minister of Justice to outline the number of illegal fireworks that have been seized in each of the last four years. (AQO 1113/17-22)

Mrs Long: The seizure of illegal fireworks is an operational matter for the PSNI and the Chief Constable. The number of incidents in which the PSNI have seized fireworks over the last four years is as follows: 148 in 2016-7; 120 in 2017-18; 129 in 2018-19; and 149 in 2019-2020. The number of fireworks seized in each incident is not counted.

The law is clear on the purchase, possession and use of fireworks. A licence is required to buy, sell or use fireworks. It is an offence to buy or sell fireworks without one. I encourage anyone who has any information about the sale of illegal fireworks to report it to the PSNI or the charity Crimestoppers.

Mr Allen: I thank the Minister for her answer. Minister, I appreciate that you have pointed out that it is an operational matter for the PSNI. However, I, and I am sure many other Members, continue to be contacted by constituents who are raising concerns about the illegal sale of fireworks. It is important that, where people do have information, they pass that on to the PSNI.

We have also seen in the media recent examples of the dangers of fireworks. What engagement have you had with Executive colleagues about educating and highlighting to our young people the dangers of fireworks?

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for his question. To date, I have had no proactive interaction personally with Executive colleagues on this matter. However, I am aware that Belfast City Council, at the request of one of my colleagues, is now taking forward public education about fireworks and on better educating people about the law. That was passed by Belfast City Council's policy and resources committee on 24 January. The council also has a role in developing community strategies through the PCSPs and others to address those issues.

Ms Rogan: My question has been answered.

Mr McGrath: Given that councils and the police carry out a role, I urge the Minister to deliver some sort of policy or overarching strategy to manage this issue. In my constituency, in the Flying Horse and Model Farm estates, from as much as eight to 10 weeks before Halloween, fireworks are being thrown at people and cars. People are being tortured. We need to do what we can to stop the number of fireworks well in advance of Halloween. If it needs an inter-agency approach will the Minister consider that?

Mrs Long: Yes, of course. I am happy to consider any approach and to work with Executive colleagues to address the issue. I was simply making Members aware that the PCSPs and the councils are, in some cases, already doing quite substantive work on community information.

It is an issue that I recognise as serious. I know that, from my Department's point of view, the law is robust in this regard. However, part of the issue, as Mr Allen said, is that we need to get information to the PSNI about where fireworks are being bought and sold illegally, because that would make a huge difference.

However, there are things that central government could do. For example, lower-noise fireworks can be produced. We know the distress that fireworks can cause to young children, to pets and to people with sensory issues. It is incredibly important that all avenues are pursued when looking at the issue of fireworks, including keeping people safe and free from harm and abuse.

Members will be aware that we are reviewing our position on antisocial behaviour, and illegal fireworks are obviously one element of antisocial behaviour that needs to be considered.

HMP Maghaberry: Care and Supervision Unit

3. Mr Chambers asked the Minister of Justice how many prisoners have been placed in the care and supervision unit at HMP Maghaberry for more than 10 days in each of the last three years. (AQO 1114/17-22)

Mrs Long: In 2017, 126 prisoners were held for more than 10 days in the Maghaberry care and supervision unit (CSU); in 2018, 145 prisoners; and, in 2019, 158 prisoners. Some of those prisoners may have been held in the unit on more than one occasion. The figures need to be taken in the context of the number of people committed to Maghaberry prison in those years. In 2017, 3,083 people were committed; in 2018, the number was 3,224; and 3,344 in 2019.

The Northern Ireland Prison Service takes its responsibility for the safety and well-being of all the people in its care very seriously. Care and supervision units play an important role in our prisons as places where individuals can be kept apart from the general population in the interests of good order and discipline or for their own protection or the protection of others. They also provide an environment for tailored care and interaction planning, partner agency engagement, signposting and referrals to assist in addressing underlying issues leading to harmful behaviour.

An individual may be placed in the CSU as a result of breaching prison rules, including engaging in harmful behaviours, violence, disruptive, aggressive, or antisocial behaviour, as well as drug seeking, taking or trafficking. Every case is considered individually, and there is a stringent and transparent process in place to manage and review all cases. The Independent Monitoring Board is also advised when a person is placed in the CSU. Prisoners are held in the CSU only for such time as is considered absolutely necessary, and the initial period of restriction will not exceed 72 hours. Any request to extend that time will be recommended only after a multidisciplinary case review, chaired by a governor, and will include the individual concerned. The request is considered by an authorising officer from outside the prison, who will interview the prisoner as part of the process, should there be a recommendation for extension. All cases are reviewed weekly through the CSU manager's weekly assessment, which allows for any application to be ended if the circumstances change.

Mr Chambers: Thank you, Minister. I welcome the fact that the Criminal Justice Inspection (CJI) will now conduct a review of care and supervision units. It is a shame, however, that it took an article in 'The Detail' to begin such a review. Can the Minister tell us why the number of prisoners held in care and supervision units has increased from 585 in 2015 to 755 in 2019?

Mrs Long: Yes, I can. As the Member will know, the prison at Maghaberry had a very poor record. It was once referred to as the most dangerous prison in Europe. As a result of very hard work by the Prison Service to keep its officers, and the general prison population, safe, the use of CSUs was introduced. This was not, by the way, as some, including 'The Detail', have said, solitary confinement. It is not solitary confinement. People in CSUs still have access to other individuals, they still get exercise outdoors, they still have access to the gym, they still have access to the health trust, and they still have prison visits. This is not, by any stretch of the imagination, solitary confinement.

I correct the Member: the Criminal Justice Inspection has inspected Maghaberry prison, including the CSU, on a number of occasions and has given it a clean bill of health, as it has in every other prison.

We have not invited in the Criminal Justice Inspection in order to placate those who say that the prison is not well run.

We asked it to come in because we are confident that its report will show that the article that suggested that that is akin to people being held in solitary confinement is inaccurate. That is also reflected in the comments of the current Prisoner Ombudsman, who has visited the CSU, as have I. I assure Members that I would not tolerate people being held for long periods in solitary confinement.

2.15 pm

I have witnessed the work of the CSU and the dedication of the officers who work in it in trying to turn around prisoners who not only have very complex needs but are incredibly dangerous to themselves and other members of the prison population. If we are to rehabilitate people, it is important that the context enables us to do so as best as we possibly can. A disruptive prisoner in the main prison fails to allow the normal prison regime to continue and to rehabilitate other prisoners. It also means that we cannot tailor on a one-to-one basis the rehabilitation support that is provided to individuals in the way that we can in the CSU.

Ms Dolan: I welcome the announcement of the CJINI review of CSUs across the North. Will the Minister indicate a time frame for the completion of that review?

Mrs Long: I will have to write to the Member with more information on that; I do not have the time frame in front of me. However, it is intended to be a short, sharp review because CJINI has visited all the CSUs, quite recently, when doing the normal prison reviews.

Mr Catney: What programmes are in place to support those with poor mental health who are referred to the care and supervision unit?

Mrs Long: There are a number of options for dealing with people in the care and supervision unit. There are distraction packs, there is support and signposting to mental health, and there is one-to-one work between the prison officers and the individuals in the CSU. People need to be realistic: we are dealing with a very complex prison population, some of whom have multiple needs that have not been addressed before they arrive in prison. Not all of those individuals are easy to work with. They are often violent offenders or have complex issues. We have to protect our prison staff and other members of the prison population from the risks at which they would be placed. We also have a duty of care to the individuals who have complex needs to ensure that they are not a harm to themselves. I have witnessed, in my discussions with the Prison Service, some of the drugs that people try to bring into the prison system secreted in their body. If those drugs were to make it into the main prison system, there would be carnage for not just prison officers but other prisoners. People have to be held in a dry cell so that those drugs can be retrieved. That, unfortunately, can take a protracted period due to the intimidation and threat that many of those drug mules are under to bring those drugs securely into the prison. Therefore, it is often for their own protection that they are held for longer than we would ideally like; that ensures that those drugs do not make their way into the main prison population. Those are not minor issues; significant hauls of drugs are caught in the CSU.

There are also those with mental health issues. As the Member, quite rightly, said, they need additional care and therapeutic support. I have been hugely impressed by the work of the South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust in how it engages proactively on mental health in prisons generally and how it works with those with very complex needs in the CSU environment.

Miss Woods: Minister, you will be aware that I have been asking lots of questions about CSUs for some time now. I agree that it is a complex issue. Surely the situation with drugs supports the need for body scanners to be implemented in our prisons to weed out the ones who are carrying and those who are not. The Independent Monitoring Board (IMB) was mentioned. It plays a crucial role in inspecting CSUs, monitoring their use and speaking to prisoners, but its volunteers' work is often hampered by their not having remote access to communications facilities; they have to travel to Maghaberry to pick up an email. Minister, when will your Department provide volunteers with adequate, secure, remote IT systems that will assist their work, especially in the context of COVID-19 and your recently announced review of CSUs?

Mrs Long: I am happy to look into the issue and come back to the Member with a time frame. I have to say, however, that it is not just the Independent Monitoring Board that monitors CSUs. As I have already said, CJINI has looked at them. They were also recently described as an example of international best practice by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). CSUs are therefore thoroughly supervised and scrutinised. I am more than happy, however, to increase that scrutiny, because that is in everyone's interests and prevents a misunderstanding about what happens in the prison system.

Review of Civil and Family Justice

4. Miss McIlveen asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the implementation of recommendations from the review of civil and family justice. (AQO 1115/17-22)

5. Mr Buckley asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the implementation of the recommendations outlined in the Gillen review report. (AQO 1116/17-22)

Mrs Long: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 4 and 5 together, please.

The review of civil and family justice is being considered as part of an evolving civil and family justice modernisation programme, which is one of a number of reform initiatives that are being progressed by my Department. Consideration of review recommendations is in itself a significant undertaking. Collectively, the reports contain around 400 wide-ranging recommendations, which vary from minor technical and procedural issues to substantive reforms.

Not all of the recommendations are for my Department. Around two thirds are matters for the judiciary, the legal profession and other Departments. Of the areas that fall to Justice, I want to ensure that my Department prioritises those that are likely to generate the greatest benefits for our citizens. We have made good progress, including the additional protections for vulnerable court users that are being introduced through the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill, and a joint action plan that is being developed with the Department of Health to improve outcomes for families involved in private family law proceedings. That represents a good start. Clearly, however, more needs to be done. I am working with my officials to prioritise future actions within existing resources.

Miss McIlveen: I appreciate the Minister's response. The review reports were published in 2017. Has the Minister costed the recommendations that fall within her remit? A number of the recommendations contain a raft of proposals, which include greater digitalisation and use of modern technology. Given that, with the onset of COVID, the use of technology for virtual court hearings has increased, what steps will the Minister's Department take to enhance the use of technology during the pandemic and beyond?

Mrs Long: As I said, we will have to deal with the Gillen review as we deal with most issues, which is on the basis that we must live within existing budgets. Unfortunately, that is the stark reality that faces the Justice Department and many other Departments. That is likely only to become more of a challenge after the COVID crisis, because I suspect that the Treasury will now look at how it recovers some of the expenditure that it has been forced to use over the past number of months. It is a stark reality, and it does, of course, hamper what we are able to do.

On the particular issue of the use of technology, however, I have to say that that has been a good outcome from COVID, and there have been very few of those. Necessity has been the mother of invention. Instead of there often being resistance from people in the justice system to the use of remote technology, there has been a willingness to engage on that issue in order to ensure that the courts are competent and able to continue to deliver justice over the period. It is certainly my view and that of the Criminal Justice Board, and also, I believe, the view of those who are involved in civil proceedings, that we capture the benefits that we have gained from the development of technology as a result of COVID and ensure that those benefits are embedded in the system going forward.

Mr Buckley: I am sure that the Member for Strangford will agree with my question, as great minds think alike. I know that the Minister will agree that urgent action is required, given the seriousness of the issue, the length of time since the Gillen review and the fact that some of its important recommendations will require specific legislation. Can she give us an absolute guarantee that she will bring the miscellaneous provisions Bill to the House before the end of the mandate?

Mrs Long: Over the past week, I have said many times, although for different reasons, that it is impossible to give guarantees, because none of us can see into the future. Standing here, however, with the longest view that I have, I can certainly give the Member my guarantee that I will do my best to get that miscellaneous provisions Bill to the Committee. My Department is on track to do that. I would hope to have the Bill with the Assembly and Committee early next year, probably, in March. I cannot give cast-iron guarantees, however, because I do not know what will happen.

I want to mention the issue of cost, because it was raised by the Member's colleague. There is also a saving to the justice system if we are able to use remote technology, because, although it requires upfront investment, it saves us money in other places. There is the opportunity for us, within our means, to recoup some of the money that we spend, for example, on transporting people around the countryside for hearings that are then adjourned. We have seen new and more agile ways of working, such as an adjournment now being done on an administrative basis prior to a person's attendance at court. All those things have been long overdue, and, if COVID has delivered them, we need to embed them as part of the system.

I agree with the Member that there is an urgency. However, not all the issues require legislation. I want to reassure him of that. There are many issues where it is about procedures and practice. What we will try to do, through cooperation and collaboration with the other justice agencies, is to ensure that we have the best possible practice in place in order to minimise delay as we take forward those recommendations.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I call Seán Lynch for a question.

Mr Lynch: The Minister has answered my question.

Probation: Politically Motivated Offenders

7. Mr Beattie asked the Minister of Justice to outline the work done by the Northern Ireland Probation Board in dealing with politically motivated offenders within the community. (AQO 1118/17-22)

Mrs Long: The term "politically motivated offender" is not used to describe any specific cadre of offender released on licence in our community. On 8 September 2020, under my direction, the Department introduced multi-agency review arrangements to support the classification and management of the risks posed by individuals considered to be terrorist-related offenders. Those arrangements provide a platform for the Probation Board for Northern Ireland (PBNI), the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Prison Service and officials in the Department to work together for that cadre of offender in order to give effect to the purpose of licence supervision: namely, to protect the public from harm; to reduce reoffending; and to support the rehabilitation of the offender.

Once classified as a terrorist-related offender, individuals will be required to apply through the interim arrangements to secure approval to change address in Northern Ireland and/or the rest of the United Kingdom; to travel to other jurisdictions in and/or outside the United Kingdom; and to resettle permanently outside Northern Ireland.

The Probation Board for Northern Ireland is an integral partner in those arrangements. Probation contributes towards decisions surrounding the classification of individuals as terrorist-related offenders and considers and advises on the potential impact on resettlement and social welfare support relating to decisions surrounding change of address, travel or permanent resettlement.

The interim arrangements provide a basis for relevant information to be shared across justice organisations to enable balanced decisions to be reached that contribute towards protecting the public from harm while supporting the resettlement of the offender into society.

Mr Beattie: I thank the Minister for keeping me right on the terminology. I noticed that I had that wrong. I was calling them "politically motivated offenders", but they are "terrorist-related offenders".

Given that the Probation Board, which provides a fantastic service, finds itself in difficulties when it comes under threat from terrorist organisations, meaning that it has to withdraw its services from certain parts of Northern Ireland, what are we doing to future-proof that so that it does not happen and to ensure that the Probation Board can do its job in areas where threats may exist?

Mrs Long: The Member makes a very important point. Anyone who works in our justice system can face threats and intimidation from terrorist offenders. The reason that I use "terrorist offenders" as opposed to "politically motivated offenders" is that I simply do not accept that those people have political motivation. I think that they are motivated by self-interest and abuse of their community, so I do not think that we should give any traction to the view that they have political ambitions or that political ambitions are in any way a cover for their offending.

Prior to the arrangements that we introduced in September through the multi-agency review approach, the Probation Board was already engaging with terrorist-related offenders to provide resettlement and welfare support. The Member is, of course correct: due to threats and intimidation, that became very difficult. The Probation Board is good at its job, because, unlike in other parts of the UK, its staff are all qualified social workers, so their focus is on rehabilitation and social support, and, because they are from and live in the communities where they manage offenders, they are passionate about doing the job well. Their job does, however, perhaps make them more vulnerable to some who would rather their activities were not supervised when they leave prison.

In any event, for terrorist-related offenders, licensed conditions that support public protection have been monitored by the Police Service of Northern Ireland. In addition to that, we are increasing the use of electronic monitoring to enhance measures to protect the public from the risk of harm posed by terrorist-related offenders. I hope that the robustness of the new arrangements will allow us to do that in a much more effective and equitable way.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Definition of “Harm”

T1. Ms Sugden asked the Minister of Justice to give her assessment of the need for a definition of “harm”. (AQT 681/17-22)

Mrs Long: Mr Deputy Speaker, I must apologise. I did not hear the Member’s question.

Ms Sugden: My apologies. Will the Minister give her assessment of the definition of “harm” in law?

Mrs Long: Without further information as to exactly what the Member is asking, it would be very difficult to answer her question because I am unclear as to the premise of it.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Perhaps the Member would use her supplementary to clarify.

Ms Sugden: I will. I am thinking, Minister, of one of the amendments tabled by Mr Jim Allister in respect of harm versus action, and harm tends to be something that is felt by the victim but there is not necessarily any definition within law. Might it be useful for this law, and, indeed, others, to work towards creating a definition for “harm”, or maybe an index?

Mrs Long: The purpose of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill is to criminalise the actions, not the impact, of the person’s abusive behaviour. If we try to criminalise impact, that becomes very difficult. For example, you would then be saying that it was not an offence to drive your car without wearing a seatbelt or while intoxicated provided that no damage was caused. That would be a dangerous course of action.

Of course, harm is a consideration when it comes to sentencing, but it is the intent to commit an offence and the recklessness with respect to the harm that is likely to be felt by others that we are trying to capture in the Bill, criminalising not the impact but the behaviour.

Northern Ireland Policing Board: Mr Gerry Kelly MLA

T2. Mr Chambers asked the Minister of Justice, who will be aware that the Northern Ireland Policing Board has exhausted its investigation of Gerry Kelly’s outrageous tweet about the Maze escape without reaching a conclusion and that it now falls to the Minister to decide whether to remove him from the board, whether she agrees that public confidence in the board is the most important consideration in her determination. (AQT 682/17-22)

Mrs Long: I am indeed aware that that has been exhausted by the Policing Board, and that they have taken a look at whether or not — as, under their procedures, they should — informal resolution could be reached. No complainant was willing to seek an informal resolution. That is what exhausted the processes of the board.

I said at the time that I found Mr Kelly’s comments offensive and thoroughly inappropriate. I asked that he reaffirm his commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means, consistent with his responsibilities as a member of the Policing Board and a Member of this legislative Assembly.

When the incident occurred, I took the view that any investigation into whether Mr Kelly was in breach of the Policing Board code of conduct was for the board to consider in the first instance. That investigation by the board has now concluded without resolution and has been referred to me for consideration under the powers available to me in the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 to remove a member from the board.

I am considering, based on legal advice, what action I should take. I am not in a position to comment further at this time.

Mr Chambers: The Minister has alluded to the fact that, under the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, if someone is “unfit to discharge his functions” as a member of the board, she has the power to remove them. Given his tweet, and the earlier well-publicised use of bolt cutters to remove a legally placed wheel clamp from his vehicle, in what way does the Minister think that Mr Kelly might be fit to continue as a board member?

Mrs Long: I refer the Member to my previous answer.

Prisons: Centenary of Northern Ireland

T3. Mr Butler asked the Minister of Justice, after thanking her for her recent work with prison staff, whether she has had discussions with the director general of the Northern Ireland Prison Service with regard to marking the centenary of Northern Ireland. (AQT 683/17-22)

Mrs Long: No.

Mr Butler: I thank the Minister for her answer. Would the Minister just give a commitment to open a line of discussion with the director general, perhaps marking the occasion with a medal, for those who want a medal, and seek to ensure that the Prison Service is in line with other emergency services for the Platinum Jubilee medal?

Mrs Long: I am happy to talk to the Member outside the Chamber and get more information on what it is he requires. However, I remind him that the first duty of the director general is to ensure that prison officers and those within his care are kept safe. At the moment, there are considerable pressures in the prison system given COVID and a number of other developments, so I think that we have to prioritise our actions over the next while. However, I am happy to discuss with the Member and see whether there is an appropriate way forward.

Legacy Funding

T4. Mr McHugh asked the Minister of Justice, given the Finance Minister’s confirmation that there is £5 million ring-fenced for legacy, whether she can confirm what it will be used for. (AQT 684/17-22)

Mrs Long: My understanding is that there is some confusion around this issue. There is an amount for legacy that has been ring-fenced for the inquests that were agreed. There may also be additional legacy funding through the work that is done by the Police Ombudsman and by the police in their work on legacy litigation. At this stage, we are working with the Police Ombudsman on an outline business case that she has presented to us, and we will work through the normal processes in that regard.

The issue of legacy, however, is much more complex. Because the Secretary of State has unilaterally changed the proposals from the Stormont House Agreement around legacy and provided no certainty or clarity as to what will happen next, the money, for example, that was set aside as part of the NDNA commitments, which in total would have reached, I think, £250 million, is not accessible to my Department to deal with legacy issues as it is ring-fenced specifically for setting up the structures of the Stormont House Agreement. I have written to the Secretary of State about that, and I have flagged up with the Department of Finance and will continue to do so the particular pressures and uncertainties that face my Department's budget in respect of legacy matters.

Mr McHugh: Quite possibly, you may have answered my supplementary question in your response. I intended to ask you when a business case would be submitted for this money by the Department of Justice. I would not say that it seems clear; I am a wee bit confused as to who might be submitting the business case.

Mrs Long: To clarify, the business case would come from the agencies that are dealing with those particular pressures, and it is the job of my Department to first interrogate the robustness of the business case and then to pass it to the Department of Finance once we are satisfied that it meets the test. Even when the business case is approved by the Department of Finance, that is not a guarantee that we will be successful when we bid for money from the Department of Finance for those issues. It is a challenge, and we have to be honest about that. I also have to say to Members that the challenges that face the Department and the potential costs of dealing with legacy in a piecemeal way will far exceed £5 million.

Prisons: Security

T5. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Justice, with 164 weapons having been found in our prisons over the past five years, what actions she is taking to make sure that our prisons are secure and our prison officers well protected. (AQT 685/17-22)

Mrs Long: Based on the conversation that we had earlier around care and supervision units and other things, it is very clear that we are taking every measure possible to ensure that our prisons are safe. Often, those weapons are found as a result of the hard work of the Prison Service to identify those who either bring weapons into the prison secreted on their person or, indeed, those who fashion weapons within the prison system from materials that are available to them. We do work with complex and often very violent offenders in some of those cases, so we do have to be acute to the risk that they pose to themselves, to other prisoners and to the Prison Service.

I have to say that I am hugely impressed. One of the greatest pleasures of this job is to spend time in our prisons. That may sound like an odd thing to say, but I have the luxury of knowing that I will leave at the end of my visits and that my visits are quite short. I have been hugely, hugely impressed by the work of Prison Service. The dedication and the passion that they have for rehabilitation is second to none, and I really wish that more Members had the ability and the space — it is unfortunate with COVID — to see up close what goes on within our prisons because it is truly remarkable.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for her answer. Another worrying statistic is that 453 items of drugs have been found in our prisons over the past five years. Is there cooperation between the PSNI, the Prison Service and your Department to try to close down those avenues of drugs coming into our prisons?

Mrs Long: Yes, it is a real concern, and, obviously, when those drugs make their way into the prison system, they cause huge disruption to it. They also cause huge danger because, often, those illicit drugs could lead to deaths in the prison system, and they could trigger underlying mental health conditions and a whole host of other things. They are also a trigger for violence in the prison system, because the street value of some of those drugs is multiplied by a factor of 20 when they enter the prison. You then have that contraband passing through the prison and there is a huge amount of violence. One of the great difficulties in detecting drugs is that people are willing to go to extraordinary and exceptionally dangerous lengths in order to get drugs in and out of the prison, and that makes it incredibly difficult. We have to manage that against the right, for example, for people to receive care packages from home, along with other things that might be necessary. We also need to bear in mind that the pressure on people who are put in a situation where they are trafficking drugs into the prison, or attempting to do so, can be extraordinary, and, if they fail in their attempts, they may be at risk. We have to balance not only removing the drugs from the system but protecting those who may have been under duress in bringing them in.

Multi-agency Support Hubs

T6. Mr Storey asked the Minister of Justice, after thanking her for her comments about the Prison Service, with which he concurred, and the confirmation that she is looking at the issue of ensuring that the disgraceful comments made by Mr Kelly are dealt with in a way that is in keeping with the legislation, to outline the current situation with supporting multi-agency support hubs, as concern has been expressed by the Committee for Justice in the House and in correspondence to the Policing Board that funding may be removed. (AQT 686/17-22)

Mrs Long: When the issue of support hubs was initially introduced, we provided additional funding on a three-year basis in order that councils could use that money, along with PCSPs and others, to realign their service provision during that period. The anticipation was that it would lead to a more efficient model of cooperation and, therefore, that there would not be ongoing costs. However, the Department recognises that the ending of that funding during the COVID pandemic, along with all the other challenges that the councils may face, is difficult. Therefore, when we received representatives from some councils that felt that they may not be able to continue with the development of the support hubs in the absence of that funding, we agreed to extend the funding to the end of the year. We hope that that will buy us the time to be able to review how we take this forward, and that is because I remain absolutely committed to support hubs and am very impressed by the work that they do.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for that confirmation; it is welcome. Will the Minister, in the spirit in which she has responded to the concerns that have been raised, engage with the Policing Board, PCSPs, the councils and the other elements of the statutory agencies, until we ensure that we find a funding model that is appropriate? Obviously, the work that has been achieved to date has brought success and is something that we want to build on for the future.

Mrs Long: Yes, I give the Member that assurance. As I said, we recognise that the support hub issue is hugely important. It has shown success, so we do not want to see it fall into abeyance simply because of a short-term funding issue. However, we need to be realistic. As he sits on the Policing Board and, particularly, in looking over the resources, the Member will know that there are real strictures around some of the funding that we have available.

We have already met members of the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives (SOLACE) and others in the council sector, and we will continue to work with the police and others. We want to find a model that is financially sustainable and efficient in delivering the enhanced level of care and support in the community. I think that they are an absolute exemplar of collaborative working, and they bring together key partners to facilitate early intervention. Ultimately, early intervention will reap huge rewards in the finances of the Department, as well as in people's lives and outcomes.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): OK, Members, time is up. Members should take their ease, and then we will move to questions to the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs.

2.45 pm

Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs

Beef Farming: Agricultural Flat Rate Scheme

1. Ms Dolan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs how he will mitigate any disruption to the beef sector as a result of changes to the agricultural flat rate scheme (AFRS). (AQO 1126/17-22)

Mr Poots (The Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs): This refers to valued added tax, which is a reserved matter and therefore the responsibility of HM Treasury and HMRC. The changes that will be made to the agricultural flat rate scheme from 1 January 2021 are that farm businesses can join the scheme if their turnover from farming-related activities is less than £150,000 and that they are required to leave the scheme if that turnover subsequently exceeds £230,000. That brings the scheme into line with the general flat rate scheme.

The agricultural flat rate scheme is intended to provide easement from the administrative burden of VAT registration by allowing farmers to receive a payment equal to 4% of their sales value in lieu of VAT paid on inputs. The vast majority of small beef and sheep farmers will continue to be eligible for the scheme. Where farms exceed the turnover limit, they can still be VAT registered and reclaim input VAT. The flat rate scheme is intended to be fiscally neutral and not to be more generous than being VAT registered.

Ms Dolan: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he acknowledge that changes to the flat rate scheme will cause disruption to the beef sector and could significantly disadvantage our primary producers?

Mr Poots: It should be less of an issue for primary producers. It is something that would have a more significant impact on beef finishers that have been in the scheme. Many of them will move out of the threshold very quickly, because, although their profitability and margins are quite low, their turnover is quite high. I suspect that that is why the Government are doing it: to ensure that the scheme, which is supposed to be a scheme to facilitate making the reclaiming of VAT easier, is cost-neutral. For some of the bigger operators, it is perhaps not cost-neutral. The scheme may have some impact, in that the finished price of beef may be reduced, because of the number of individuals involved who are required to store cattle. Generally, however, sheep and beef farmers will be able to avail themselves of the scheme, if they so desire, because they will fall within the £150,000 turnover threshold.

Mr Butler: Can the Minister tell us what underpinning schemes and information he has put in place to enlighten the farming community about these changes and the support available for those wanting to join the scheme?

Mr Poots: That is being led by HMRC, and it is for it to inform those who are currently in the scheme that they will no longer be able to avail themselves of it. I believe that that has been the case. It is pretty well known within the sector that the scheme is changing at the end of the year. Many of those who have participated in it up until this point will no longer be able to, because of their turnover.

Brexit: Veterinary Officers and Portal Inspectors

2. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs how many additional veterinary officers and portal inspectors does his Department plan to employ before the end of the transition period. (AQO 1127/17-22)

Mr Poots: DAERA is planning to employ an additional nine veterinary officers and 14 portal inspectors in its portal branch at the points of entry into Northern Ireland, which are primarily at Larne and Belfast, from the end of the transition period on 31 December 2020. Those additional posts are being filled through external recruitment competitions and the internal transfer of staff.

Mrs D Kelly: Given the Minister's response, he seems to be fairly confident that the posts will be filled. I do not know whether contingency plans are in place should they not be. Has the Minister had any discussions with his colleague in the Department for the Economy about higher education providing places for veterinary students here in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: There are two issues there. With Northern Ireland receiving official brucellosis-free status, there is capacity in the Department, which is very beneficial, to fill the positions. The second issue is the veterinary school. I would be hugely supportive of a veterinary school. My chief veterinarian is supportive of there being a veterinary school. I believe that the Minister for the Economy is supportive of there being a veterinary school. I encourage the universities to continue to carry out their work on investigating the opportunities for a veterinary school.

One issue is that many young people are travelling not just to Ireland, Scotland and England but to Europe in order to study to be a veterinarian, and, sadly, many of them get a job elsewhere and do not return to Northern Ireland. We then lose that skill; therefore, a locally based veterinary school would help us to keep that skill base in Northern Ireland, where it is very much needed.

Mr McAleer: The Minister referred to the possibility of reassigning some staff from his Department. Does he have any assessment of the impact that that could have on other programmes? He will be more aware than we all are of the challenges that the Department faces in the various strategies and programmes that he is bringing forward.

Mr Poots: As I indicated, because of the brucellosis-free status that we have achieved, staff have been freed up, and organisation can take place in the veterinary division in order to ensure that we will reduce the number of people who need to be recruited as a consequence.

Mrs Barton: Has the Minister had any communications with University College Dublin (UCD) about increasing its intake of students over the next year or two while you, hopefully, get your veterinary school up and running in Northern Ireland and keep those people here?

Mr Poots: I have not, and, traditionally, there has been a slight problem with the recognition of our qualifications at A level, which has maybe made it a little more difficult for top-class students to get opportunities in some of the top universities in Ireland. Consequently, that has led to quite a number of them heading to Scotland and England, where our qualifications are recognised in the same way.

Mr Blair: In relation to inspections at ports, has any progress been made on the provision of a common veterinary area and the medium- to long-term prospects for that?

Mr Poots: The development of the facilities under the programme that is being paid for by the UK Government will not be completed until the middle of next year. They have given some money for the development of temporary facilities, which will be available from the middle of December. Consequently, facilities will be available for the veterinarians who are in place at the various ports.

Forestry: Carbon

3. Ms Flynn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs to outline his plans to restore the status of the forestry sector to a net carbon sink, rather than a carbon source. (AQO 1128/17-22)

Mr Poots: Forestry in Northern Ireland is a net carbon sink. That was recently confirmed in a detailed report published by the UK's National Atmospheric Emissions Inventory (NAEI) on 30 October 2020. The report also projects that that will remain so under a range of scenarios considered in the report.

My Department has received advice from the UK Committee on Climate Change on reducing greenhouse gas emissions in Northern Ireland. It recommends increasing the rate of woodland creation to 900 hectares per year as a simple low-cost option to help capture carbon.

I announced the Forests for our Future afforestation programme in March, aimed at increasing woodland by planting 18 million trees to create 9,000 hectares of new woodland over the next decade. As well as helping to meet the UK Government's net-zero carbon target by 2050, planting new woodland will help us to grow a strong economy, a thriving environment and healthy, active communities.

My Department's Forest Service is continuing to work with the forest research agency of the Forestry Commission in GB. That research will help to contribute to the understanding of the complex carbon balances associated with woodlands as they are established and grow to maturity.

Forests for our Future will become a foundation programme of the Executive's green growth strategy, which is being developed by my Department. Green growth aims to transform our society towards net-zero carbon by 2050, protect and enhance our environment and sustainably grow the economy.

Ms Flynn: I am sure that the Minister will be aware of a recent report by Ireland's forestry accounting plan, which shows that the forestry sector in the North is similar to that in the South, in that both have now transitioned from a carbon sink to a carbon source, meaning that the entire island's forestry sector is now a source of carbon emissions. The Minister outlined some initiatives that he has taken. Has he looked at any island-wide initiatives?

Mr Poots: Some politicians might suggest that this report is fake news. A recent claim that forestry is a net emitter of greenhouse gases was made in a press release issued by Friends of the Irish Environment in response to a report prepared by the Republic of Ireland's Department of Agriculture, Food and the Marine (DAFM) on greenhouse gas emissions and removals from forestry. DAFM has countered that interpretation, commenting that forests remain a substantial and growing store for carbon dioxide and to look at only one subset of the forest estate can be misleading.

The Friends of the Irish Environment press release bases its conclusions on a subset of a report published by DAFM. It focuses on woodlands over 30 years old, which includes tree harvesting from 2021 to 2030, which is estimated to result in a small net source of carbon dioxide. The small carbon dioxide emission is far outweighed by carbon dioxide captured by forests prior to 30 years of age, as is also identified in the DAFM report.

Taking the full forest cycle from planting to harvest and replanting into account, forestry as a whole is estimated to represent a significant store of carbon dioxide. It would be hugely unfortunate if people misconstrued various aspects of a report and conflated things to turn it into something else. It is well known that forestry and trees are a net capturer of carbon.

Ms S Bradley: How does the Department capture that data? In the past five years, how many trees have been planted? Have the Department's targets been achieved? Will the data be captured annually?

Mr Poots: The acreage of trees that have been planted each year has been identified. The forest expansion scheme was launched in June, and we have applications for the planting of some 547 hectares of forest this year. That is approximately double the area in last year's applications. So, we are having some success with Forests for our Future. People are planting trees and taking up the mantle and identifying that they want to be involved.

Considerable acreage has been suggested to us, particularly by NI Water and other public bodies that are looking to participate in making our environment more sustainable by planting trees.

3.00 pm

Mr Allister: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the claims that forestry provides ammonia sequestration. The Centre for Hydrology and Ecology has made that case very strongly. Will that feature in his ammonia strategy? Is forestry, even in and about the bogs, which are the concern and the inhibitor to some growth in the poultry industry, a possibility?

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for the question. There is a positive and a negative to that. The positive is that forestry can provide a break for ammonia, so strategically located bands of trees could do some good. The problem with trees is that they are hungry for water. Using water close to the peatlands leads to them being drier, and, consequently, they lose carbon on that front. Forestry at the appropriate locations may, therefore, be an inhibitor to the spread of ammonia and something that can be considered. That is the short answer.

Agriculture: EU Trade Deals

4. Mr Gildernew asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs to outline the impacts on the local agriculture sector of being excluded from EU trade deals as a result of Brexit. (AQO 1129/17-22)

Mr Poots: The UK Government have been negotiating with countries that have a free trade agreement with the EU, with the aim of putting in place a continuity agreement that would apply equivalent provisions to the UK. Those negotiations have made good progress, and it is expected that a large majority of those countries will have a continuity agreement in place on 1 January 2021. Trade with other countries will be able to take place on WTO terms, as is the case at present. Those measures will limit the impact on local agriculture and Northern Ireland goods being excluded from EU trade deals. I understand that there is the potential for difficulties for cross-border trade. A number of solutions are being looked at, but those will need to await developments in the UK-EU trade negotiations.

Mr Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, agus ba mhaith liom buíochas a ghabháil leis an Aire. What discussion is the Minister having with the Irish Government to mitigate the disastrous impact of Brexit? As he outlined, we are going into World Trade Organization terms in some situations. What discussion is he having to mitigate the impact of Brexit by ensuring that the North can benefit from current and future EU trade deals? I know that Mr Coveney has also raised that issue.

Mr Poots: I would welcome the fact that we would have the opportunity to sell our product in as many places as possible, with free trade available to us. I know that a considerable number of free trade deals will be negotiated by the UK Government, very quickly, and we may have even more access through those free trade deals going forward. However, since we are part of the single market and following the rules of the single market, we should be part of the European free trade agreements as well. It is very disappointing that the European Union appears to be excluding us on the basis that it would involve too much work and that, to include us, it would have to open up negotiations with all of the countries with which it has free trade arrangements. It was the European Union's demand that we be included in the single market, as a consequence of the protocol. Therefore it should carry out its obligations to the full and include Northern Ireland in the free trade arrangements that it has with other countries.

Mr O'Toole: This is a slightly novel moment: I welcome some of what the Minister has just said. I agree that it would be much to the advantage of Northern Ireland producers, particularly in agriculture, to have access to EU free trade deals in order to allow them to take advantage of the opportunities, such as they are, from the protocol. What steps and engagement will he take, further to that, via Dublin or London, or directly via Brussels, to continue to persuade and make the case for our participation in and access to those EU trade deals? I agree with him that it would be great for our producers to have access to those deals.

Mr Poots: Our officials are involved behind the scenes at the negotiations, and, regularly, make the case for Northern Ireland. The First Minister and deputy First Minister wrote to the European Union, directly, expressing the views of the Northern Ireland Executive on a range of issues.

There is a potential solution, but Europe does not seem to be prepared to accept it as yet. It is diagonal cumulation, which would mean that goods with content from the European Union, the UK and third countries which have a free trade agreement with both the European Union and the UK would meet the rules of origin requirements under EU free trade agreements. To this point, the EU has opposed diagonal cumulation.

It is particularly important for the dairy sector that we get a solution, because obviously a lot of our milk ends up being processed in Ireland a lot of it goes to Great Britain and a lot of it is sold to third countries. The Middle East and Far East, for example, receive a lot of this product. Because the product is a mixed product, that becomes more challenging. It is important that the dairy sector in particular gets a solution to this, and I encourage the European Union to take up the solution that we have offered.

Mr Chambers: The Minister has addressed my supplementary question, but I will ask it. What impact does he anticipate that this will have on milk exported to the Republic of Ireland for processing in cheesemaking, with the resulting product returning to Northern Ireland and then going across the Irish Sea to England?

Mr Poots: It is tricky. The movement to the Republic of Ireland is the easy bit. If there is no trade deal, the coming back is slightly more difficult. There can be a solution to that, and it is that the quantities of milk that go and the quantities of cheese, butter or whatever that come back could be measured to have pretty much an equal amount, and the UK Government could receive that without any additional tariffs being applied, should tariffs come into play between the European Union and Great Britain as a result of negotiations not delivering a free trade agreement.

Fly-tipping and Littering

5. Mr K Buchanan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs to outline any recent discussions his Department has had with local councils regarding fly-tipping and the ongoing issue of littering. (AQO 1130/17-22)

Mr Poots: My Department has been working closely with councils throughout COVID-19 to address increased concerns about fly-tipping. Officials have also been in regular contact and have been engaging with council colleagues, through the local and central government waste working group, on the development of a revised Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA)/district council fly-tipping protocol.

While the majority of fly-tipping incidents are dealt with by councils, the NIEA has been assisting with the removal of hazardous wastes, such as asbestos and fuel laundering waste, and will also investigate larger waste deposits. Once agreed, the fly-tipping protocol will formalise this arrangement and provide clarity on the operational roles and responsibilities of the NIEA and the local councils in relation to tackling fly-tipping.

Under the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 and the Environmental Offences (Fixed Penalties) (Miscellaneous Provisions) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2012, dealing with littering is the responsibility of the district councils. However, I am looking at the effectiveness of these current powers and the level of fines. Keep Northern Ireland Beautiful has been appointed to gather data from all councils on their use of fixed penalty notices for both litter and dog fouling offences. This will inform a review of the fixed penalty notice regime which is due to be completed early in 2021. Officials have also separately been engaging with a number of councils on this issue.

Finally, I can advise that discussions have also been ongoing with the councils in relation to commencing further elements of the waste and contaminated land legislation to provide additional enforcement and clean-up powers to both my Department and councils to help tackle the scourge of illegal waste disposal.

Mr K Buchanan: I thank the Minister for his answer. With regard to powers, or to his influence over councils, some councils have a power or a regime with regard to fining people for littering. I am going to name my own council: Mid Ulster District Council had, in a period of one year about two years ago, eight fines, which I think is unacceptable and does not send out the correct signal. What influence can the Minister put on councils across Northern Ireland to take littering and waste disposal more seriously at a local level?

Mr Poots: With the form of government that we have, local government has the responsibility for this, and it is for local government to respond to its board, as such, which is its councillors, who have the responsibility to ensure that public policy is upheld. I suggest that the best way of actually ensuring that the council is enacting its powers appropriately is for the councillors themselves to ensure that officers are ensuring that the regime is in place to have appropriate waste controls, including the nuisance litter that people drop.

Mr McGuigan: Minister, I love nothing more than cycling, running or walking around the rural roads of the North and through towns and villages, and it is a pleasant experience that is often spoiled by witnessing instances of fly-tipping and general littering. I understand the answer that was given to the previous question, but there must be a cross-departmental policy or strategy that can change the culture of people who find littering and fly-tipping acceptable, because it should not be acceptable, and the levels of litter that we have are a disgrace. Furthermore, can the Minister give us an appraisal of how littering and fly-tipping may have changed during the pandemic?

Mr Poots: Yes, I totally agree with the Member: it is very irritating when you are in the countryside and find fast-food-outlet material, cans, bottles, cigarette packets or sweet papers lying at the side of the road. There is a whole panoply of stuff that people throw out of their cars while driving along the roads. I do not understand it, because it is so easy to put it into a small bag and put it into the appropriate bin when you get home. People seem to think that it cannot stay in their car for any longer than five seconds after it comes out of a wrapper.

We are working on developing the removal of single-use plastics on nine different items, and we intend to bring that proposal to the Assembly quite soon. With a lot of the packaging that is involved — for example, with fast-food outlets — we will get rid of the material that does not biodegrade. Work will be done on that. Essentially, this is an educational process whereby people need to recognise that it is wrong to throw out litter and wrong to fly-tip. Everybody knows it, but there is a hard core of people who seem to continue to engage in it, and, as a consequence, they spoil our countryside.

Mrs D Kelly: Minister, is there any way of monitoring and evaluating the amount of fly-tipping? Reports come to me from my council colleagues about the number of tyres that are dumped along roadsides. We all know that there is a premium to be paid when you buy a new tyre so that the other one is safely disposed of. What is the cost, and are reports fed into your Department that will help to inform policy and legislation by local authorities?

Mr Poots: The dumping of tyres is a big issue, and, in my area, quite a bit of that goes on. It is clearly wrong, and, very often, it is left to the landowner, which is entirely inappropriate. Someone dumps on their land and the consequence is that someone who has no role in this is left to deal with the problems arising from it.

There has been an uplift in fly-tipping this year. It is hard to assess it fully yet. It has not been massive, but it has gone up, and we associate a degree of that with the closure of the household waste recycling centres. I welcome the fact that almost all of them are operational again, and it is incumbent upon councils to ensure that they are kept operational going forward.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I have time to call William Irwin for a brief question and to get a brief answer from the Minister.

Brexit: Seed and Ware Potatoes

6. Mr Irwin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs what discussions he has had, in particular with the UK Government, on the enabling of importation of seed and ware potatoes from Great Britain following the end of the transition period. (AQO 1131/17-22)

Mr Poots: I wrote to Minister Eustice on 30 October highlighting the significance of this issue to the Northern Ireland agriculture and food services sector and urged him to expedite agreement with the EU on third-country listing for GB to enable seed and ware potatoes to be marketed in Northern Ireland. I have also asked for a derogation to the prohibition that will apply to seed and ware potatoes from GB due to its classification as a third country. I have highlighted the need for a commitment to secure a proportionate easement to the EU legislative phytosanitary certification requirements and associated costs.

My officials have written to DEFRA requesting that specific sanitary and phytosanitary (SPS) issues affecting plants and plant products moving from GB to NI, including seed and ware potatoes, are addressed urgently with the EU to enable continuity of essential trade from GB to Northern Ireland in plant and plant products after implementation period (IP) completion day.

I have also written to Minister McConalogue in the Department of Agriculture, Food and the Marine in Dublin asking for his support in seeking EU agreement to the UK application for GB third-country listing, which would allow the continuation of the important and integrated trade in potatoes among GB, NI and ROI.

3.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): That ends the period for listed questions. We move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Trader Support Service

T1. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, given the Ulster Farmers' Union (UFU) webinar yesterday evening on the subject, for his assessment of the Trader Support Service and the rationale for it. (AQT 691/17-22)

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for the question. The Trader Support Service is a device of Her Majesty's Government and HMRC. It is a new and unprecedented service. It is a free-to-use, end-to-end service that will guide traders through any changes to the way in which goods move between Great Britain and Northern Ireland and into Northern Ireland from outside the UK. Essentially, the Trader Support Service will act as a customs agent and complete declarations on behalf of traders. We encourage any business that moves goods between GB and NI to register for the service and get advice on the new processes being introduced as a result of the protocol.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for that. Given that farmers here have to sign up to the service to bring goods from, say, Scotland into Northern Ireland, does he accept that that proves that, although we may all have joined the EEC as one, we are not all leaving the EU as one?

Mr Poots: I entirely agree. We are not leaving the EU as one, which is an irritation to the likes of me. That, however, is an arrangement that has been arrived at between the European Union and Her Majesty's Government. Westminster has sovereignty on these issues. Consequently, we have to live with the outcomes, be they good or be they ill. We can protest and seek to moderate and make changes, and I have been very busy in seeking to moderate and make changes for the benefit of Northern Ireland to mitigate the more damaging aspects of the protocol as it is applied.

Farmers' Marts: Health-check Vans

T2. Mr Gildernew asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, after acknowledging the Minister's indication that health-check vans are back at marts, which is very welcome, given that many farmers welcomed the announcement on the vans because of difficulties accessing GP services, to outline his plans to develop or even enhance the service. (AQT 692/17-22)

Mr Poots: That service has been run between the Department and the Public Health Agency (PHA). There are significant benefits to having the vans there at the current time. Appropriate arrangements are being made to ensure the safety of both staff and users. One of the things that the vans are there to help with is people's mental health. They do physical checks, but they also have conversations around mental health.

We all know that mental health is a significant issue in rural areas. Over the period of COVID, there has been a substantial deterioration in mental health across the country generally, and particularly for people who are more isolated. As a consequence of that isolation, those people have less and less opportunity to interact and engage with other human beings face to face. It has particularly impacted on our older population, and many of our farmers and users of the service are from among the older population.

We therefore really need to ensure that the services that we provide go way beyond just looking at COVID. We still need to look for cancers, for example. It is very concerning that Cancer Focus has indicated that around 1,000 fewer cancers have been detected this year than had been at the same time last year. I am therefore absolutely delighted that the services that are provided at the marts and in other rural locations are up and running again.

Mr Gildernew: Are there plans to bring that service to locations other than marts or to some of the harder-to-reach rural areas, Minister?

Mr Poots: I am happy to discuss how we could expand that service with the PHA and the Department of Health. One of the big issues in health that we are all aware of is that early detection saves lives: early detection of cancers, circulatory illnesses, blood pressure problems and so on, and the prevention of heart attacks. The more we do this, the more conditions we will detect early and, consequently, the more we will avoid something that would be much more expensive for the healthcare system and, more importantly, far more damaging to the individual. I am happy to work with the Department of Health and the Public Health Agency on identifying how we can expand the service. I am happy to prioritise money for that because it has to be an absolute priority. I am happy to commit to that.

Glenelly Landslides

T3. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, who will be aware that he has been lobbying him in recent years on the issue of the needs of farmers who have been impacted gravely by the landslides in the Glenelly area, whether he has given further consideration to supporting those farmers. (AQT 693/17-22)

Mr Poots: I have asked officials to look at that. There are two sets of farmers in Glenelly: those with upland farms; and those who are further downstream. The Department has indicated that it has already provided a lot of support. Through the Loughs Agency and the environmental farming scheme, it has provided fencing. We need to look at that area to ensure that, if we were to provide support, we would not be double granting. Other areas that we will look at include the desilting of land, the reseeding of land and the other damage done to properties. I have tasked officials to look at that, and they will bring back a report to me, hopefully in the not-too-distant future.

Mr McAleer: I very much welcome the fact that the Minister is still considering this and that he has been consulting his officials.

On a not totally unrelated topic, the Minister is due to bring out a draft ammonia strategy soon. Areas such as Glenelly and other hill areas are not particularly well suited to some of the low-emitting slurry-spreading equipment. If the Minister could factor that in to the equation when the new strategy is coming out, I would be grateful.

Mr Poots: Earlier, when I was reporting on how we will implement the new single farm payment system, that point was raised by another Member, and we certainly need to keep it in mind. While we want it to happen and ensure that it is utilised as much as possible, we recognise that, on certain land, the weightier the machinery, the more difficult, and sometimes more dangerous, it is. We need to take that into account, so I thank the Member for that point.

Fisheries Local Action Group

T4. Miss McIlveen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs what scope he and his officials will have to review the spending limits of the Fisheries Local Action Group, once the grant scheme has been opened. (AQT 694/17-22)

Mr Poots: Once outside the European Union, we will have considerable scope. We are in discussions on state aid to maximise the money that we can have for agriculture and fisheries. State aid for fisheries is still being extensively debated. I hope that we will get an outcome that ensures that we can provide good support to fisheries and enable those local groups to provide support to the industry.

Miss McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his answer. I understand that the South East Area Fisheries Local Action Group (SEAFLAG) has handed back £483,418 of a £2 million pot. A Portavogie scheme worth a quarter of a million pounds is ready to go. Some £200,000 is needed from the fund. However, they have been told that there is a cap of £120,000. The limited grant means that the project will fall. I appreciate the Minister's response, but I would further appreciate his looking at that policy in its current form.

Mr Poots: We recognise that, at present, there is an underspend of around £1.5 million under the community-led local development (CLLD) measure. Even if all 24 applications under assessment are supported, a maximum of £1.1 million European Maritime and Fisheries Fund (EMFF) funding would be required for those 24 projects. That is where the £400,000 comes from. It is unlikely that all applications will be successful, so the underspend is anticipated to be between £400,000 and £600,000. However, it is proposed to open the CLLD scheme for applications on 2 January 2021 and for it to remain open until 31 March 2021 to attract further applications that can utilise that underspend, with the full budget being committed by 30 June 2021. These target dates are within the permitted timescales for the EMFF programme.

SEAFLAG staff are confident that there are further potential applications that will be submitted, should the scheme reopen, and which will utilise much of the current underspend. Should a surplus remain on 30 April 2021, the options are for a further opening of the scheme to 31 May 2021 or the movement of funding from the CLLD measure to other measures within the Northern Ireland EMFF programme that have achieved or are nearing full commitment and there are project applications in place to utilise the funds.

Approval for moving CLLD funding to other measures, which is permitted by the UK managing authority and the Commission through an EMFF operational programme amendment, will be sought through ministerial submission on the proposed variations with the Northern Ireland EMFF programme that are required to ensure that all EMFF funding available to Northern Ireland is fully utilised and not returned to the Commission. It is anticipated that the submission will be made in April 2021.

Planning Applications

T5. Mr Irwin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, who will be aware that farm planning applications are being held up by slow responses from the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA), whether there is anything that he can do to speed the process up. (AQT 695/17-22)

Mr Poots: Like a lot of organisations, NIEA has quite a lot of staffing pressures, and COVID has not helped things. Nonetheless, we still have targets that have been set for good for good reason and which we should be seeking to fulfil.

We also have the complication of what we are going to do about ammonia. I have indicated that, at the moment, we should use the 1% threshold, as opposed to the 0.1% threshold that the Shared Environmental Services (SES) referred to, while we produced the ammonia strategy, which is almost ready to go out. It is entirely reasonable for us to do that, given that the ammonia strategy is a plan to significantly reduce the amount of ammonia in the atmosphere. Consequently, it would be a better instrument to deal with the issue than planning.

Mr Irwin: I thank the Minister for his response. The Minister will be aware of the seriousness of the situation. Many farms are trying to re-do existing old buildings and re-roof them, but they are being held up by NIEA. I am sure that the Minister is fully aware of the importance of this matter being addressed.

Mr Poots: Absolutely. One of the issues that is holding back the farm business investment scheme from being rolled out further is the ability of people to actually get planning approvals to carry out the investments that they wish to make. The remarkable thing is that, in some instances, the refurbishment or replacement of existing buildings would lead to lower ammonia emissions, yet the planning refusal recommendations still exist. We really do need to have a practical, common-sense approach to this, and as I indicated very clearly, planning is not the means of doing it. Having an ammonia strategy that is effective in reducing the amount of ammonia getting into our atmosphere is the way forward.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I have time for a brief question, from Paula Bradley, and a brief answer.

Honeybees

T6. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure that the honeybee is protected in Northern Ireland and what practical measures he may explore in doing so. (AQT 696/17-22)

3.30 pm

Mr Poots: The honeybee is an incredibly important aspect of our environment and biodiversity. I have spoken to officials about developing a strategy on honeybees and worms, as both species make a massively important contribution. Some people perceive them as just tiny insects, but they have a vital role in the successful production of our food. It is certainly something that we are cognisant of. America has lost about a third of its honeybee population through the production of almonds, because people think that they are helping the environment by drinking almond milk. However, the consequences of doing that are devastating.

We are very supportive of the honeybee population, and we will be looking at measures to increase the numbers of honeybees in Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I ask Members to take their ease while other Members and Ministers to enter the Chamber.

Executive Committee Business

Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I call the Minister of Justice, Mrs Naomi Long, to move the Bill.

Moved. — [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): By way of explanation of the grouping of the amendments, Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the provisional grouping of amendments selected list. Members should note that the Marshalled List is dated 17 November, and both it and the grouping list supersede those issued for the postponed debate of 10 November.

Members will have received printed and electronic copies of the documents, but additional printed copies are available in the rotunda, if needed for the debate.

There are four groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendments Nos 1 to 8, 10, 16, 17, and opposition to clause 3 stand part, which deal with the information on the offence. In that group, amendment No 7 is mutually exclusive to amendment Nos 5 and 6.

The second debate will be on amendment No 9 and Nos 11 to 14, which deal with additional protection for children, as well as support for victims of domestic abuse.

The third debate will be on amendment No 15 and Nos 18 to 26, which deal with the implementation and operation of the offence. In that group, amendment Nos 15 and 21 are mutually exclusive. There are three amendments to amendments. Amendment No 22 is an amendment to amendment No 21, and amendment Nos 25 and 26 are amendments to amendment No 24. Have you got all that? [Laughter.] The fourth debate will be on amendment Nos 27 to 34, which deal with measures for civil court proceedings.

I remind Members who intend to speak that, during the debates on the four groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group has been completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

We now come to the first group of amendments — information on the offence — for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 8, Nos 10, 16 and 17, and the opposition to clause 3 standing part. I call Mr Jim Allister to move amendment No 1 and to address the other amendments in the group.

Clause 1 (The domestic abuse offence)

Mr Allister: I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 1, line 12, leave out paragraph (a) and insert “(a) that B suffers physical and psychological harm, and”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In clause 8, page 5, line 24, leave out “constituting the offence” and insert “by virtue of which the offence is constituted”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 3: In clause 9, page 6, line 6 after “if” insert “(any or all)”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 4: In clause 9, page 6, line 8, after “directed” insert “, or threatened to direct”.— [Miss Woods.]

No 5: In clause 9, page 6, line 11, at end insert

“, or

(c) both of these apply—

(i) a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour, or an incident of behaviour which A directed at B as part of the course of behaviour, to be likely to adversely affect the child (including likely to cause the child to suffer fear, alarm or distress), and

(ii) the child usually resides with A or B (or with A and B).— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 6: In clause 9, page 6, line 11, at end insert

“(2A) Subsection (2) does not require there to be evidence of some detrimental impact on the child that is attributable to A’s behaviour (or of the child’s awareness of, or understanding of the nature of, A’s behaviour), but nothing in this section prevents such evidence from being led in proceedings for the domestic abuse offence.”— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 7: In clause 9, page 6, line 11, after “behaviour.” insert

“Or

(c) a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour, or an incident of A’s behaviour that forms part of the course of behaviour, to be likely to adversely affect the child.

(2A) For it to be proved that the offence is so aggravated, there does not need to be evidence that a child –

(a) has ever had any awareness or understanding of A’s behaviour, or

(b) has ever been adversely affected by A’s behaviour.

(2B) Nothing in this subsection prevents evidence from being led about—

(a) a child’s observations of, or feelings as to, A’s behaviour, or

(b) a child’s situation so far as arising because of A’s behaviour.”— [Miss Woods.]

No 8: In clause 10, page 6, line 38, leave out “course of behaviour would constitute the domestic abuse offence” and insert “domestic abuse offence would be constituted by virtue of the course of behaviour”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 10: In clause 13, page 7, line 40, at end insert “(3) This section is without prejudice to section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 (alternative verdicts on trial on indictment).”— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 16: In clause 25, page 13, line 28, leave out “may” and insert “must”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 17: In clause 25, page 13, line 30, leave out “other matters” and insert “such other matters as it considers appropriate”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): I call the Chairperson of the Committee for Justice, Mr Paul —. Sorry. Excuse me, Mr Allister. I moved too quickly there. I beg your pardon. I call Mr Allister.

Mr Allister: I am obliged. When the recently retired Attorney General, Mr John Larkin, gave evidence to the Committee, he said:

“Good law is clear law and straightforward law.”

I would like the House to remember that when debating these issues.

When we come to clause 1, we are, of course, in the business of creating a criminal offence. A criminal offence is normally expected to have certain clear component parts. In any law school, probably the first lecture or tutorial for a criminal law student is on the subject of what comprises a criminal offence. The law student will be told that there are two key components to any criminal offence: what, in law, is called the mens rea — the guilty mind — and the actus reus — the act that does the harm. Those two phrases are not just obscure Latin phrases that are plucked from long ago. They are from long ago; they originate from just over 400 years ago, when the famous jurist Sir Edward Coke, who went on to become chief justice of England, expounded the phrase that a criminal offence involved both the actus reus and the mens rea.

When we come to look at clause 1 and the creation of this criminal offence, I invite the House to look at and examine the mens rea and actus reus of the offence. The mens rea is quite straightforward. It is in clause 1(2)(b), which states:

“that A —

(i) intends the course of behaviour to cause B to suffer physical or psychological harm”

etc. That is the guilty mind. That is the intent. That is the mens rea. When we come to the actus reus of that offence, we are into much greater obscurity and difficulty. We are into that obscurity and difficulty even though the offence is titled “The domestic abuse offence”, which, naturally, causes you to think that we are looking for actual domestic abuse. Clause 1(1) states:

“A person (‘A’) commits an offence if—

(a) A engages in a course of behaviour that is abusive of another person (‘B’) —

that is not difficult —

“(b) A and B are personally connected to each other at the time” —

that is not difficult —

“and

(c) both of the further conditions are met.”

Here comes one of them:

“that a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour to be likely to cause B to suffer physical or psychological harm”.

Note that it does not state that the further conditions are that B suffers physical or psychological harm. It is that “a reasonable person would consider” B:

“to be likely to ... suffer physical or psychological harm”.

You cannot read that without reading clause 3(1), which states:

“The domestic abuse offence can be committed whether or not A’s behaviour actually causes B to suffer harm of the sort referred to in section 1(2).”

It is quite remarkable that you can create a criminal offence without there actually being any harm. You call it domestic abuse, but you do not have to prove any harm. Let us take any other offence. Let us take the offence of theft. “Theft” is defined as the dishonest — that is part of the mens rea — appropriation of:

“property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving”.

The mens rea is:

“dishonestly ... with the intention of permanently depriving”.

The actus reus is the taking of property that belongs to another. It has the two components. It does not state that you can commit theft without taking, but, apparently, you can commit abuse without causing harm. Take the offence of murder.

Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice): Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes. Certainly.

Mrs Long: I am loath to interject, because I realise that you are building your case, and I do not want to interrupt that. For the mens rea, however, the act has to done with intent or have a reckless nature to it. I think that we both agree that that is the case. The actus reus in this case is that a course of action or behaviour has been established. The harm is the potential outcome of that course of behaviour, but the action will have taken place regardless of whether the harm is caused. If, for example, someone chooses to drive while under the influence of alcohol and does not cause any harm, that person has still committed an offence that is reckless because of the harm that it might have caused. It is therefore not as clear-cut as the Member is suggesting.

Mr Allister: I respectfully disagree. I believe that it is exactly as clear-cut as I am suggesting, because the course of behaviour has to have a product. Theft has to have a product. Take homicide. What is homicide? It is the unlawful killing with the intent to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm. That is the mens rea — the intent to kill or cause GBH — but the actus reus is the product: the killing. The actus reus is the product. Where is the product here? We are expressly told in clause 3 that there does not have to be any product. I find that astounding, that you can create an offence where the person, yes, must have the intent and the guilty mind and must want to do it, but, if they fail to cause harm, no matter how much they wanted to try to cause harm, they are still guilty as though they had caused that harm. How can that be right?

3.45 pm

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: I will in one moment. How can that be right? The premise upon which they would be guilty is because some mythical reasonable person says that they would consider their behaviour to be likely to cause harm. Sorry: it is not about what your neighbour, someone else or some reasonable man thinks. The fundamental question is this: was there harm? If there was no harm, while it might be utterly reprehensible behaviour, the intent of which might be odious — it clearly is — there was no harm. Yet, the law here is trying to say, “Never mind that. Without harm, you can be guilty as though you had created harm”.

Ms Bradshaw: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr Allister: I was to give one down there. If there is time, I will.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Member for giving way. I want some clarification. To be honest, I really would have appreciated it if the Member had come and made some of those arguments to us, as Committee members, as Rachel Woods did with her amendments and the Minister and her officials did with departmental amendments, because it is helpful to be able to ask questions and have those conversations before we get to this point. With regard to the Minister’s analogy about drink-driving, where is the harm when the drink-driver has not actually done any harm? They have still driven when they have been over the legal alcohol limit.

Mr Allister: I made those points in the Second Stage debate, so the Committee had the opportunity to hear them. Had I been invited to do so, I would gladly have expounded on them further.

With regard to drink-driving, quite clearly, the offence — the actus reus — is the act of driving. The act of driving is in itself inherently dangerous because of the drink involved and, therefore, the risk involved. That is intertwined in the act of driving. However, when we say that we will create an offence of domestic abuse, as surely as night follows day, we would look to see what abuse or harm was caused. When one looks, one sees that there is a blank page. In fact, there is not just a blank page: one is told that there does not need to be anything on the page. There does not need to be any harm.

Let me just develop the point, if I may, before I take a further intervention. I have a situation. Let us say that a man — it does not have to be a man — intends to inflict the most horrible abuse on his wife, partner or whomever, but his wife or partner suffers no harm. Some might ask whether he should then walk away. No: the law has covered that. The law provides the offence of attempt. Under the Criminal Attempts and Conspiracy (Northern Ireland) Order 1983, it states:

“If, with intent to commit an offence to which this Article applies, a person does an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence, he is guilty of attempting to commit the offence.”

It further states:

“This Article applies to any offence which, if it were completed, would be triable in Northern Ireland”.

It also states that, for such an offence, a person guilty of attempt shall be liable on conviction to the same penalty that he would have had if he had committed the actual offence.

There you have the answer already provided in the law. If someone attempts to abuse their wife and has the intent to abuse their wife, either they can be charged, in the first place, with attempting, or they can be found guilty, having been charged with the actual abuse of merely the attempt. On either, they can get the same penalty. We are talking about an offence that can reap 14 years in jail. You can reap 14 years in jail for the same attempted offence, so why are we in the business of corrupting the law by taking out of this offence the very core of what is the offence and saying, “No harm required. Still an offence. He might have failed in his mission. Still guilty”? That is like saying that a thief who went to steal but was not able to steal anything is still guilty of theft. Yes, he is guilty of attempted theft, and that is what the law already provides, but he is not guilty of theft.

By the same token, the miscreant husband who seeks to abuse his wife and who has that necessary intent but fails to cause physical or psychological harm can still be guilty of the attempt, but he cannot be guilty of the actuality that he never obtained. That is the distinction, and that is why I say that to pretend that he is the same position as though he had actually created the harm is a corruption of the very components of what is a criminal offence.

Ms Bradshaw: Thank you, Mr Allister, for giving way. At lunchtime today, I took a phone call from a lady who was in a mother-and-baby home years ago. She has hit 60 now. When she escaped from the mother-and-baby home, she was just delighted to get out of the place, and it was not until years later that she recognised the emotional abuse that she had suffered. She did not feel the harm at that point, but now that she is 60, she is in a dreadful state. Now, it is a slightly different context, but are you saying that the harm, because she did not recognise it at that point but did so years later, did not take place?

Mr Allister: No, I am absolutely not saying that. My amendment says that I want to make the offence in clause 1(2)(a):

“that B suffers physical and psychological harm”.

If that lady suffered psychological harm, there is the essential component of the offence. There is no limitation on those matters. She suffered psychological harm. That meets with what I am saying in the amendment. It can be physical or psychological, but the Bill says that it need be nothing — nothing.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. He is being very generous with his time.

The purpose here is not to criminalise the attempt of abuse through a course of action of behaviour. The course of action of behaviour will have happened. This is not someone who attempted a course of action and was not able to complete it. It is somebody who undertook a course of action — a real course of action, like the person who drinks alcohol and gets behind the wheel of their car. They made that decision, reckless and indifferent to the harm that it might cause or in full knowledge of the harm that it might cause. The fact that they did not cause harm is not the fundamental issue. The fact is that they commissioned and completed a course of action. That is the test for whether the abuse offence has happened. The issue of harm is secondary and is one that would be considered at the point of sentencing, with a judge deciding how serious or otherwise the offence might be.

The Member has recognised that by bringing together the drinking of alcohol and the driving of a car, you create a risk. It is exactly the same when a person commits a course of action and finishes that course of action to cause harm. As my colleague has said, it may be many years before the person subject to that course of action realises the harm that it has done. However, it may be possible in advance of that for a reasonable person to recognise that that course of action could cause harm.

Mr Allister: With respect, where I think the Minister is falling into error is this: if she says that the key issue here is the course of behaviour, why do we have clause 1 (2) at all? If that is the offence, a course of behaviour, why do we say:

“The further conditions are—

(a) that a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour to be likely to cause B to suffer physical or psychological harm,”

In saying that, the Minister has embraced the need for harm, and she is filling the vacuum of the lack of harm by putting it on the shoulders of a reasonable person, and getting out of the finding of harm by saying, “but a reasonable person would think it’s harm”. You cannot have it both ways.

You cannot say that this offence is about a course of action, end of, and then say, “but we need to tick a box about causing harm, so we’ll tick it by having some reasonable person say it would be likely to cause harm”. It causes harm or it does not, and that is the fundamental choice for the House. Are we going to create an offence that causes harm or not?

Certainly, causing harm is the essence of any offence of violence, abuse or anything else. You cannot say, “We duck and dodge that by simply saying, ‘Ah well, never mind, there was no harm, but any reasonable person would think there would’ve been harm’”. Would have been is not good enough. Should have been is not good enough. It has to be the causing of harm, and if it is not the causing of harm, it could still be the attempt to cause harm.

Ms Sugden: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes, I will give way to Ms Sugden.

Ms Sugden: I thank the Member for his contribution. I am somewhat sympathetic to the points he makes, and I will come to that in my own contribution.

In this case, would we have to define what “harm” is given that coercive control as a criminal offence is a relatively new concept? Who decides what is “harm” if we were to put forward what his amendment suggests?

Because we are creating a criminal offence, it will have a practical outworking. When this goes through the criminal justice process, how do you see it, as it is drafted, Mr Allister, given your experience, being successful in seeking a conviction in court?

Mr Allister: There are two points. The first is a bit shorter, so I will take that first.

My amendment suggests that B must suffer physical and psychological harm, so that is a jury question. Did the victim suffer harm? That can be physical, it could be a broken arm, it could be the torturous mind that Ms Bradshaw referred to — it can be either. It is a question of fact: did they or did they not suffer harm? If they suffer harm, and they have the guilty mind, the offence is complete.

The second question is: if we leave this offence as drafted, what prospect is there of any jury ever convicting anyone? My goodness, you are going to say to a jury of 12 people, “We want you to convict Mr X because he intended harm, abuse towards Mrs X, but he failed in causing harm to Mrs X, but never mind that, you convict him anyway”.

I would not like to be the prosecutor who would have to put that case to a jury. I would love to be the defence counsel who had to answer that case. It is so preposterous a suggestion to say that you should invite a jury to convict on the basis of, “Here’s a victim with no harm, but because he wanted harm,” —.

4.00 pm

Miss Woods: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment.

Because he wanted harm and he intended harm and you might think that there would have been harm, we do not have to prove that there was harm, and that is for an offence for which you can get 14 years. Really, I do not think that that is a prospect that this Assembly should entertain, particularly when it knows that the attempt defence is always there. It is always an alternative under the Criminal Law Act 1967. It can be an offence in its own right under the Criminal Attempts and Conspiracy Order 1983. It is there either way, so why on earth would we create an offence of this sort?

You might recall that, in the Second Stage debate, we were told that this was modelled on the Scottish system. So, I wrote to the Scottish Justice Minister and asked, effectively, what success Scotland had had in getting convictions where no harm was caused. I have his reply. He had to tell me that they do not have any statistics like that. I am not surprised. Members of this House, do you really think that any jury is going to be impressed, to the point of being satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt, that an offence has been committed where there is no manifest harm, no claim of harm? It is not that somebody is saying that they feel psychologically damaged or that they had a broken wrist and there is a question of fact on whether that is right or wrong. It is not even that that is the case. It is that you do not need any harm, as long as a reasonable person would think that there should have been harm. It beggars belief, I think, that we would be contemplating that.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for giving way again. I appreciate that the Member has outlined his position very clearly. Can he account for the conditioning of victims of coercive control and psychological abuse not to recognise behaviour that has occurred? I have a practical question for Mr Allister, given his inherent experience. Is there a requirement for B in this case, where A is the perpetrator and B is the victim, to recognise or claim the harm caused for prosecution?

Mr Allister: Not as drafted, I do not think there is. I think that you could probably bring a prosecution on this without B ever being a complainant or B ever giving evidence, I suspect. You are depending on the mythical reasonable man. Let us call the “reasonable man”. We need not bother calling the “victim”. They do not matter here. It is the reasonable man. That is how preposterous this is.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I appreciate the Member’s giving way. I do intend to cover all of these in speaking about how the Committee considered it. The Member made the point earlier in proceedings that the Committee engaged extensively on the points that were raised and reached a considered view on it, and I will elaborate on that. The Member for East Londonderry asked for the definition of harm. Clause 1(3) refers to psychological harm, including, not exclusively, “fear, alarm and distress”. So, there is commentary in the Bill on what that harm is. The offence is also around the aspect of the course of behaviour, and, again, clause 4(4) states:

“A course of behaviour involves behaviour on at least two occasions.”

So, it is not the one-off event that Committee members are concerned about. This is a course of behaviour. The Committee also looked the abused person who had been institutionalised to the point where they considered this to be normal behaviour.

We also looked at what the protections are, given what the Member has said. Obviously, he will know about the PPS tests, the public interest tests and the evidential tests that are required before a case would end up being taken. We also looked at clause 12, which talks about the reasonableness defence. Of course, some people did not want that included, but we looked at this Bill in the round, and that is where we reached a position in respect of all of this. I intend to cover that in much more detail whenever I get to my contributions, however.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Mr Allister: I simply make this point: why would we want to go around the houses with all those pedantic examples when the answer lies in the existing law, namely the alternative prosecution for or the alternative conviction of “attempt”? Why would you want to create this mythical situation when you could, very simply, charge attempted abuse, and, because you have not got a victim who claims abuse, you can acquire the conviction?

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mrs Long: The Member continues to make the mistake of conflating “attempt” with “no harm”. This is not about someone who attempted and failed to abuse another person. This is about someone who undertook a course of action that a reasonable person would believe was abusive. It is not unusual in law for a reasonable person test to be applied. As the Chairman of the Committee has rightly said, that includes at the point at which the PPS makes a decision on whether to prosecute. The key issue here that is not about “attempt”, however, because we are not saying that the person in this case did not complete the course of action: the person did. The question is whether that course of action, which we believe should be criminalised, has caused harm, and that is a different question.

Mr Allister: That brings me back to the central point. The Minister is inviting the Assembly to create a criminal offence, where the critical component of the actus reus of causing harm is absent. Clause 3(1) could not be clearer:

“The domestic abuse offence can be committed whether or not” the course of behaviour actually causes harm. It is up there in lights: you do not have to cause harm to be convicted of causing harm. That is the essence of it. What is domestic abuse if not harm? You cannot say that domestic abuse is something out in the ether. It is real, except when you get to the Crown Court, where it does not have to be real to have caused harm. It can be mythical, provided a reasonable man says, “Ah, but it should have caused harm”. Really? I really think that the House needs to examine that. That is why I was not surprised to read that the Bar Council cautioned about the objective test. It said that you should consider:

“whether the offence should require evidence of harm to B”.

It told you:

“reliance on an objective test is problematic”.

All of those points were raised with the Committee, yet we arrive today where we started, which is with an attempt to push through the novelty of an offence without the essential component of the actus reus. “A guilty mind is enough” is really what we are saying here. I respectfully suggest to you that a guilty mind can never be enough to convict anyone beyond all reasonable doubt of a serious offence or of any offence. This is an offence for which the awaiting sentence can be 14 years. I therefore say to the House that we need to pause. There is nothing to lose by putting amendment No 1 into the clause, which requires:

“that B suffers physical and psychological harm”, and by taking out clause 3, which is the one that really distorts the whole issue of the essence of criminality: the mens rea and the actus reus. Those are my points, and I put them before the House.

Mr Givan: With your indulgence, Mr Speaker, before I address the amendments, I wish to make some general remarks about the Bill in my capacity as the Chairman of the Committee for Justice.

The Committee supports the Bill, including the creation of a new domestic abuse offence that covers physical abuse as well as psychological abuse, which, as Committee members heard directly from victims, is just as harmful, if not more so. The Committee supports the aggravator clauses and the associated changes to improve criminal procedures evidence and sentencing in domestic abuse-related cases. The Committee supports a number of the Minister’s amendments, and it has tabled six amendments in order to improve the legislation.

During the Second Stage debate on the principles of the Bill, I outlined that, in the 12 months from 1 January 2019 to 31 December 2019, Police Service statistics indicated that the highest number of domestic abuse crimes in any 12-month period had been recorded since 2004-05. The number of crimes had increased by nearly 15% on the previous 12 months.

During the COVID-19 lockdown, from March onwards, calls to the police for domestic violence and abuse incidents increased by around 15% compared with calls for the same period in the previous year. Cases involving domestic abuse generally account for nearly 20% of the Public Prosecution Service caseload each year. In the past financial year, the PPS issued just over 8,000 decisions in cases involving domestic abuse. Those figures are staggering and clearly illustrate the need for this legislation, which is long overdue. Domestic abuse can affect anyone, regardless of gender, age, class or sexual orientation, and should never be excused or tolerated.

On the restoration of the Assembly in January, one of the first things that I did, along with the Deputy Chair of the Committee, Linda Dillon, was to encourage the Minister to bring this legislation through the Assembly, rather than continuing to use the Domestic Abuse Bill that was going through Westminster as the legislative vehicle. I am very pleased that the Minister agreed to do so, which has enabled the Bill to be scrutinised in depth. It has provided the opportunity for the statutory and voluntary organisations, and, most importantly, those who have suffered domestic abuse to have a voice in shaping the legislation and ensuring that it meets the specific needs of Northern Ireland.

While this approach was widely welcomed, there was some concern that it would take longer for the legislation to be passed. The Committee, however, prioritised the Bill, and I am very pleased that it is on track to complete its passage through the Assembly ahead of the Westminster Bill.

As well as the Bill’s clauses and a wide range of related amendments, the Committee considered the need for effective implementation of the legislation and a range of issues relating to domestic abuse, highlighted in the evidence that we received, which were not covered through the legislation. A consistent theme running through the evidence related to the importance of ensuring that the legislation, once passed, is implemented properly and effectively. I will return to that when we debate the group 3 amendments.

A wide range of issues relating to the domestic abuse offence and the provision of support and assistance to victims, which are not currently covered in the Bill, were brought to the Committee’s attention. The need for progress in those areas, in conjunction with the legislation, was repeatedly emphasised. Some issues require legislative provision, while others are operational in nature. Some issues fall within the responsibilities of Ministers other than the Minister of Justice, which highlights the fact that a number of Departments, including the Department of Health, the Department for Communities and the Department of Education, have a role to play in supporting victims of domestic abuse, and a cross-departmental response rather than simply a Justice response is required.

The distinct criminal justice purposes of the Bill limited the opportunity to take forward many of the aspects that require legislative provision. However, the Committee intends to continue to make domestic violence and abuse one of its key priorities and will continue to consider the issues in that context. The Committee has tabled amendments to progress two of the issues, to which I will return later.

Given the interest in the Bill and the Committee's wish to ensure that the legislation is as robust as possible, the Committee spent a considerable time in undertaking detailed scrutiny and sought a wide range of views to assist its deliberations. Written evidence was sought from interested organisations, and the Committee particularly welcomed the views of victims of domestic violence and abuse.

4.15 pm

We used four different social media platforms, which were the Assembly blog, Facebook, Twitter and Instagram, to raise the awareness of the public and to engage with them by disseminating information on the Bill using a range of methods including text, graphics and videos.

The Committee received 66 written submissions from organisations, including the Committee for Health and the Committee for Communities, which both provided very helpful comments on aspects of the Bill and other issues that are relevant to their respective Departments, and from the Minister of Health. Eleven oral evidence sessions were held with a range of organisations, and the issues that were raised in the evidence that was received were explored with the Department of Justice and the Police Service in writing and through oral briefings. The Committee also discussed the legislation with representatives of the Public Prosecution Service, given that it, together with the PSNI, will be responsible for applying the new legislation. Several research papers were also commissioned to assist the Committee's consideration of specific issues, and we sought further clarification and information from the Department for the Economy and the Department for Communities on specific issues that fall within their responsibility.

The Committee received written views from 45 individuals, many of whom outlined their personal experiences of domestic abuse. The Committee held nine private informal meetings with a number of individuals in order to discuss their personal experiences of domestic abuse and their views on the legislation.

In order to assist scrutiny of the technical aspects of the Bill, the Committee also sought advice from the Examiner of Statutory Rules on the range of powers in the Bill to make subordinate legislation and to receive legal advice on issues relating to clause 10 and legislative competence.

The Committee considered the Bill and potential amendments at no fewer than 17 meetings before agreeing its report on the Committee Stage of the Bill at our meeting of 15 October.

I thank the members of the Committee for their contributions to the detailed, robust and careful scrutiny of the Bill and the issues that were raised in the evidence during the Committee Stage. This was the first Bill that a number of members had to consider, and they showed forensic attention to detail. Committee members showed a collegiate approach. We debated robustly the issues, and then we reached consensus. It is through the strength of the Committee and that unity of purpose that amendments will be passed today, when they are voted on later, because of that work across the different members and across the different political parties.

All that scrutiny work was achieved despite the restrictions that COVID-19 has placed on the Assembly and members and our ability to gather evidence. I might be biased, as Chairman of the Committee, but I believe that the Justice Committee is an exemplar to other Committees in the Assembly. It is the engine room for the changes that take place in legislation, and I thank all the members for the way in which they approached this legislation. There is no doubt that the Committee considered all aspects of the Bill, the range of proposed amendments and the other issues that were brought to our attention in a full and thorough manner.

I also thank all the organisations that provided very helpful written and oral evidence and the departmental officials who provided additional information and clarification throughout the process. Most importantly, I place on record the Committee's thanks and appreciation to those individuals who responded in writing and, indeed, who met privately with Committee members and shared their personal experiences of domestic abuse. We know how difficult it was to relive those experiences, but their contributions greatly assisted the Committee in understanding the insidious nature of coercive and controlling behaviour and the impact of domestic violence and abuse not only on the victim but on their children and wider family.

The Committee also appreciates the support and assistance provided by Assembly staff, including the researchers; the legal adviser; the Examiner of Statutory Rules; the communications and broadcasting staff; indeed, the staff from Hansard; and, in particular, the Bill Clerk. They all played an important role in supporting the Committee to undertake its legislative scrutiny role in general and the Committee Stage of this Bill in particular.

I also commend our Committee staff, led by Christine Darrah. She is a gem in the Assembly whom we are proud to have supporting our Committee.

Christine has been there since the start of the devolution of justice. I have had the opportunity to work with her on this, my second occasion, as Chairman of the Committee. I place on record my appreciation of her work and dedication and that of her team in supporting Committee members.

I move to the amendment to clause 1 tabled by Mr Allister and his opposition to clause 3. There is overwhelming support for the new offence that is provided for by clauses 1 to 4 amongst the organisations and individuals who submitted evidence to the Committee, with many of the view that it better reflects the realities of how domestic abuse is experienced and will better protect victims of domestic abuse. The Women's Aid Federation believes that an offence that includes coercive control will lead to a criminal justice system that more accurately reflects the realities of domestic violence and abuse. Relate NI particularly welcomed the "reasonable person" test as a means of adjudicating whether an offence is committed. Victim Support NI supports the framing of clause 3 and the view that the offence can be deemed to have been committed regardless of whether the behaviour has been proven to have had a particular effect and agrees with the view of the Men's Advisory Project that proof of the act of carrying out the abusive behaviour should be sufficient without having to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the abuse had a particular impact. The Probation Board also welcomes the recognition that an offence can be committed regardless of whether harm was actually caused and that the provisions will apply where the behaviour of the alleged perpetrator was intentional or reckless to its effect. The Public Prosecution Service stated in its evidence to the Committee that the new offence means that it will now have the ability to prosecute perpetrators for the more subtle forms of controlling behaviours that previously have fallen short of a criminal offence yet are common in cases of domestic abuse received by them. It supports clauses 1 and 2 and notes that clause 3 will ensure that perpetrators cannot take advantage of resilience or acceptance of an abusive situation.

A number of organisations raised some issues regarding the framing of the new offence with the Committee. In relation to clause 1, the Evangelical Alliance noted that the offence can be committed regardless of whether harm is actually caused to an individual and was concerned that, if there was a lack of safeguards, the legislation could be used maliciously or vindictively by either partner in a difficult or toxic relationship and sought assurances that it would not be inadvertently applied to unintended situations or personal disagreements that do not amount to domestic abuse. The Bar of Northern Ireland commented on the proposed reasonable person test and the fact that psychological harm includes fear, alarm and distress with no requirement to demonstrate the actual impact on the victim and stated that this is a low bar and potentially gives considerable discretion to the PPS when making decisions around which complaints should be prosecuted. It also highlighted that, when coupled with the broad list of family members in clause 5, this would potentially allow a considerable range of behaviours in intimate and family relationships to fall under the ambit of the legislation. The Bar, however, recognised that a fine balance must be struck between ensuring the safe prosecution of alleged perpetrators of domestic abuse and, at the same time, ensuring that victims of domestic abuse do not endure further trauma as part of a criminal trial by having to prove to the court that the behaviour has caused them psychological harm. It appreciated that the rationale behind the legislation was a genuine attempt to improve the operation of the system and recognises the very difficult experiences of victims.

The Bar also commented specifically on clause 3 and indicated that it seemed possible that the absence of a requirement to show harm could arise in cases where a person is not the instigator of the complaint, where they are not harmed and where the person does not consider the conduct abusive, and, in those instances, employing an objective test may cause difficulty. The Bar questioned whether consideration should be given to whether the offence should, in fact, require evidence of harm, which Mr Allister's amendment addresses today. Mr Allister also drew to the attention of the Committee correspondence between him and the Scottish Justice Secretary, which he referred to in his opening remarks, and highlighted that any suggestion that there had been successful prosecutions in Scotland where no actual harm was caused is not borne out by actual data.

In considering clauses 1 to 4, the Committee took account of the evidence of the Department, which, I am sure, the Minister will cover in detail later in the debate. In particular, the offence operates on the basis of checks and balances, and it will have to be considered that abusive behaviour has taken place for the offence to apply. The behaviour must occur on two or more occasions; be considered abusive, with a range of effects that have been set out; be considered by a reasonable person to be such; and be likely to cause the person to suffer physical or psychological harm. The offender must have intended to cause harm or been reckless as to that. The test for prosecution, including the public interest test, will also have to be met, and further safeguards regarding the defence on the grounds of reasonableness, provided for by clause 12, which the Committee considered in detail and supports, as it provides the necessary balance, given the scope of the new offence and the wide personal connection, will apply.

The Committee also sought further information and clarification in relation to clause 3, particularly the no-requirement-to-cause-harm aspect of the provision, from the Department. Officials outlined that the provisions focus on the actions of the perpetrator, the intention to cause harm or be reckless as to that. The purpose of clause 3 is to ensure that a case can be taken forward where an individual may have suffered considerable abuse over a period but, due to the extent and nature of the abuse, the behaviour has become normalised or the person has become resilient to the abuse. As a result of that, the person may not necessarily be of the view that harm has been caused to them, but a reasonable person looking at the information in those specific circumstances would be of the view that harm could be caused to the individual, and it would be deemed to be abusive behaviour, in accordance with the requirements of clause 1. They also advised the Committee that Scotland, whose legislation is framed in a similar manner, has not encountered any practical difficulties with the operation of its offence and that, if clause 3 is not part of the Bill, there will be no opportunity to take these types of cases forward. The police also advised that the clause could be used to good effect but it would be helpful to have clear examples to ensure, from an operational perspective, that the organisations involved in progressing cases all have a similar understanding of how the provision should be applied.

The Justice Committee acknowledges the difficulty of legislating in the realm of human relationships. It noted that the two key criminal justice bodies that would be responsible for applying the new law — the Police Service and the Public Prosecution Service — noted in their evidence that they will benefit from the legislation when prosecuting perpetrators for the more subtle forms of controlling behaviour and in having the ability to better protect victims of domestic abuse. They did not raise any concerns regarding the framing of the offence or clause 3.

It is clear that the current law does not adequately recognise that domestic abuse is not limited to physical violence. The Committee received compelling evidence of the harmful effects of psychological abuse and the manipulative, subtle and, at times, covert nature of the behaviour. It can leave victims feeling humiliated, degraded and belittled. As one individual said:

"It stripped me of my ability to be me".

The Committee is of the view that the new offence addresses gaps in the current law, captures domestic abuse in its myriad forms, will enable more effective action to be taken against perpetrators and will enhance the protection and access to justice provided to victims by the criminal justice system. That includes cases in which an individual may have suffered considerable abuse over a period but, due to the extent and nature of the abuse, the behaviour has become normalised or the person has become resilient to it and does not recognise the harm that is being caused to them. The Committee, therefore, supports clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4.

I turn to clause 9 and the amendments tabled by the Minister, Rachel Woods and Paul Frew. The Committee welcomed the aggravator provided by clause 9 but noted that, in the evidence received on the clause, a number of organisations raised concerns regarding whether the wording properly reflected the fact that a child can be aware of and impacted by domestic abuse in the home even if they do not see or hear the moment in which it occurs. They also questioned why the wording differed from that in the Scottish legislation by not including a “reasonable person” test and the reference that there does not need to be evidence that a child has ever had any awareness of the behaviour or understanding of the nature of the behaviour for the offence to be aggravated.

4.30 pm

The Committee spent a considerable amount of time discussing the wording of the clause, particularly subsection (2), with departmental officials and requested further information regarding whether the aggravator would apply in a situation where a child did not directly witness the abuse, and on the Department’s rationale for adopting a different approach from Scotland to the wording of this clause and not including the “reasonable person” test. The Committee was concerned that the wording of clause 9 was not specific or clear enough and that it needed to be strengthened to reflect the fact that, for the offence to be aggravated, there does not need to be evidence that a child had ever had any awareness or understanding of A’s behaviour or been adversely affected to ensure effective enforcement and prosecution. The Committee proposed amending clause 9 by either adopting the Scottish wording, unless there was any specific reason not to use that wording, or wording that provided the same sort of clarity.

The Department responded, advising that the child aggravator applied if, at any time during the commission of the offence, a relevant child sees, hears or is present during an incident of abuse, if they are used to abuse another person, or if abusive behaviour is directed at them. The Department emphasised that the clause does not provide that the child has to have an awareness of, be adversely affected by or understand the behaviour, and that therefore it considered that an amendment akin to the Scottish legislation was not necessary. The Department also stated that it considered that the child aggravation offence in this Bill is wider than the Scottish offence, in that there is no requirement for a reasonable person to consider that the behaviour would adversely impact on the child or for the child to have to live with either the victim or the offender.

The Committee was not convinced and was still minded to amend the clause. It sought the views of the Department on the text of a draft amendment that, in its view, clarified that there was no requirement for the child to have an awareness of, understand the nature of or ever be adversely affected by A’s behaviour, and also asked the Department whether it would consider providing greater clarity in relation to these aspects of this clause in the explanatory and financial memorandum that accompanies the Bill.

The Department responded, saying that the Scottish legislation provides that their offence is aggravated if a child sees, hears or is present, plus a reasonable person would consider the behaviour to be likely to adversely affect the child. Proving the aggravation is then subject to a condition that, for the offence to be aggravated, there does not need to be evidence that the child has been aware of, understood or been adversely affected by the abuse. Our offence is aggravated on the basis of an objective fact — simply that the child sees, hears or is present — unlike the Scottish provision, which requires this and a consideration of adverse effects. According to the Department, the Committee’s amendment would have introduced an unrelated adverse effect provision which was unnecessary and would add nothing to the clause, but could risk giving rise to confusion by casting doubt on its effectiveness, and, on that basis, the Department would not support the amendment.

Following further discussion, the Department advised that, given the ongoing concerns of some members that the wording of clause 9 did not make it clear that a child need not be aware of, have understood or have been adversely affected by abusive behaviour in the context of the provision that the child had seen, heard or been present when the abusive behaviour occurred, it would consider what further clarification could be provided in the explanatory and financial memorandum in relation to clause 9(2). The Department subsequently confirmed to the Committee that it was proposing to amend the EFM so that, in relation to subsection (2), it would read:

“there is no requirement for the child to be aware of or understand the nature of the behaviour, or for the behaviour to give rise to some detrimental impact on the child. Any involvement of the child could also be unwittingly or unwillingly”.

The Department also advised that its understanding of the Scottish provisions and the advice that officials had given to the Committee in writing and during the oral evidence session on 24 September was, in fact, incorrect. It apologised for the error and clarified the position, but indicated that this did not change its view in relation to the position regarding the clause 9 “sees, hears or is present” provision. It again confirmed to the Committee that there is no requirement that the child be aware of, understand or be adversely affected by the abuse. With the caveat that the Department would amend the explanatory and financial memorandum to ensure that there was greater clarity regarding subsection (2), the Committee agreed, with the exception of Rachel Woods, that it would support clause 9 as drafted. Ms Woods indicated that she was still not satisfied with the wording of clause 9 and intended to move amendments, which are in front of the House today.

I have set out at some length the Committee's in-depth consideration of clause 9. The Committee questioned the wording of this clause with the Department on multiple occasions and received advice and assurances from officials that the wording was sound and adequately covered the issues that members raised. We were also told that the text of the proposed Committee amendment would add nothing and could bring confusion but that, to address members' ongoing concerns, officials would provide further clarity in the explanatory and financial memorandum to make it clear that the child does not have to be aware of or understand the abuse or to have been adversely affected by it.

The Minister then advised the Committee that she intended to table amendments to clause 9. The Department outlined that the amendments were to ensure the robustness of the provision, make the provision explicitly clear for the avoidance of doubt and add an additional limb to the clause, meaning that the aggravator would also apply if a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour, or an incident of behaviour that the accused directed at victims as part of the course of behaviour, to be likely to adversely affect the child and that the child usually resides with the accused, the victim or both.

I will leave it to the Minister to fully outline her position, given that she has indicated that, following discussion with the Committee last Thursday, she does not intend to move amendment Nos 5 and 6. Likewise, Rachel Woods and Paul Frew will no doubt outline the aim of the proposed amendments to the clause.

I will briefly outline our party political position. We had reached an agreed position at the Committee, as I outlined when speaking in my role of Chairman. The Minister's subsequent actions, in my view, undermined the information and the basis on which that Committee position had been reached. Therefore, we were left to consider that in light of the intervention by the Minister through her amendments, because it created doubt in my mind in respect of the information that the Committee had been provided with on multiple occasions. On that basis, the DUP will support the amendments in the name of Paul Frew and Rachel Woods. We would have been voting against the Minister's amendments, but I note that she will not move those.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. In an attempt to clarify the situation: what is in the EFM is not part of the Bill. It says at the beginning of the explanatory and financial memorandum that it will not form part of the Bill, and, therefore, I did not believe, when we reconsidered this having listened carefully to the Committee's issues, which is part of this iterative process to develop legislation, that it would provide the robustness that the Committee was seeking. On that basis, we decided to table amendments to give that robustness.

I listened again to the Committee last Thursday and it was very clear that those amendments did not find favour with the Committee, and, therefore, I do intend to move those amendments today. I am happy to accept amendment Nos 4 and 7. To clarify the position: it was an attempt to address the issues raised by the Committee. I have to say gently to the Chairman that it is appropriate that a Minister should try to accommodate the wishes of the Committee to improve the Bill in as far as it does not harm the intent of it.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Minister's intervention. I will not dwell on this area, because my colleague Paul Frew will speak at length on this issue, but I gently say to the Minister that, whilst it is an iterative process, there was a lengthy Committee Stage, extensive engagement with the Department and we sought information on multiple occasions. That Committee Stage concluded and, subsequent to that, the Minister provided amendments. I will say this again because it is relevant to the Minister's other amendments: the process for that direct engagement is at the Committee Stage, when it is open for the Minister and the Department to reassure members. This is now the Consideration Stage, and the Committee is bringing forward its amendments. I will leave it —.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way on that specific point?

Mr Givan: I am happy to give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: I appreciate the Member's patience on this matter, but the truth is that, when Members submit amendments, it is often not clear at the Committee Stage whether Members intend to submit further amendments. It is entirely appropriate that a Minister, with the backing of the Office of the Legislative Counsel and the additional resources that it has, would look to those amendments and see if they are able to provide an amendment that is perhaps more robustly drafted in the terms of the Bill. That is not unusual. The use of probing amendments to test the Minister on issues is not an unusual process. This process does not end with Consideration Stage; there is Further Consideration Stage and Third Reading. I accept that it moves at pace, which is why I offered the Chairman an extra week for the Committee to consider my proposed amendments. He said that that was not necessary. I would not want anyone to leave the Chamber today thinking that the Committee was bounced on these issues in any way.

Mr Givan: Again, I thank the Minister for the intervention. I say gently to the Minister that the Department was aware of the Committee amendments weeks before we concluded our formal consideration of this; weeks before. The Department regularly receives the minutes of those meetings, and it was there. The Department chose not to reveal its hand until a number of weeks later. Now, that is a more procedural point. The Minister has outlined why she took that position. I beg to differ as to whether or not that is the right approach to how the Committee conducts its business. It is a generic point that is also applicable to a number of the amendments that the Minister brought forward and has subsequently decided not to move. You are right: we will have Further Consideration Stage, when some of these aspects will be tidied up. I welcome the Minister's approach to some of the further amendments that will be brought subsequently.

I move on to some of the other minor and technical amendments left in group 1. The Department advised the Committee of the Minister's intention to bring forward amendment Nos 2, 8 and 10 and provided the text of them during the Committee Stage. Noting that they are minor drafting changes to tidy up the wording of clauses 8 and 10 to reflect the position that "course of behaviour" under the main offence is not the sole element of the domestic abuse offence and, in relation to Clause 13, to make sure, for the avoidance of doubt, that there is no risk of implying that the provisions in the Criminal Law Act 1967 are ousted by what is contained in this clause, the Committee is content to support these amendments.

Finally, in my capacity as Chairman of the Committee, I want to address amendment Nos 16 and 17 of this group, which the Minister has brought forward at the request of the Committee. Clause 25 provides that the Department may issue, and may revise, guidance in relation to the domestic abuse offence or any other matters as to criminal law and procedure relating to domestic abuse. The Committee questioned why the wording of the clause provided that the Department “may issue” rather than “must issue” guidance and also sought information from officials on when the guidance would be available, whether it would be periodically reviewed and whether the requirement for reviews should be included in the legislation. The guidance on the new domestic abuse offence will set out examples of types of abusive behaviour and provide clarification on a range of areas, which will assist the Police Service and the Public Prosecution Service from an operational perspective and ensure a common understanding of how the new offence should be applied. The Committee considers the provision of the guidance to be a vital component in the training of the criminal justice agencies and to ensure the consistent and robust implementation of the legislation. While the Committee acknowledges that it may be common legislative drafting terminology to use the term “may issue” and the Department is in the process of developing guidance in conjunction with key stakeholders, the Committee is of the view that there should be no room for doubt regarding the provision of guidance and, therefore, that clause 25 should be amended to change “may issue” to “must issue”.

The Committee welcomes the Minister’s agreement to bring forward amendments to provide that the Department must issue guidance on Part 1 of the Bill and such other matters as it considers appropriate. The Committee, therefore, supports amendment Nos 16 and 17 and amendment No 19 in group 3, which provides for the guidance to be kept under review and to be revised if necessary.

Ms Dillon: I do not propose to repeat everything that the Chair of the Committee said. I concur with many of his comments, particularly in thanking those who came before the Committee, both the organisations and groups and the individuals. I particularly thank the individuals who bore witness to their experiences, which was not easy for them to do. To be perfectly honest, it was not easy to listen to either; it was very difficult because those are people’s very personal and very difficult experiences. We were tasked with the job of scrutinising legislation that will, hopefully, address those issues for people in the future.

It was a big responsibility for the Committee. As somebody dealing with legislation for the first time, and for it to be such important legislation, I certainly felt the weight of that responsibility. From the bottom of my heart, I thank all on the Committee, the Minister, the officials and the Committee staff, all of whom were a great help. They certainly helped guide me through this legislation. I go back to the witnesses, because it is from them that we get the information that helps us decide which clauses and amendments we will support.

4.45 pm

I will speak to the first group of amendments. We oppose amendment No 1, which is Mr Allister’s amendment, on the basis of the Committee’s position on the issue. I also oppose Mr Allister’s opposition to clause 3. These clauses go to the very heart of what the Bill is about: addressing the gaps and ensuring that, where we did not have legislation before to protect the most vulnerable in our society, we will have legislation. I will not go over the numbers of people who suffer and report domestic abuse, particularly in this time of COVID. Those statistics have been borne out, and I am sure that they will be borne out again later in the debate. It is not about statistics. This is about not only every single victim of abuse but their children, their family and everybody around them. For every single person who suffers domestic violence, many others will be affected. The Bill is about trying to embrace that, particularly the effect on children. I will talk more about that when speaking to later amendments.

We will support amendment Nos 2 and 3, which are minor amendments to terminology. We will support Rachel Woods’s amendment No 4, which would make a minor change to wording. We queried whether it would add anything to clause 9, but it certainly does not detract from it, and putting “or threatened to direct” explicitly in the Bill will do no harm. For that reason, we will support the amendment.

I thank the Minister for saying that she will not move her amendment Nos 5 and 6 following conversations with the Committee on Thursday. I am sure that other Committee members will talk more about clause 9. Rachel Woods tabled amendments to it, and Paul Frew added his name to them, so I am sure that they will speak extensively about it. Clause 9 was of real concern to us, and we wanted to ensure that we got it right. It is about the impact on children, not only at the time of the incident but for the future. There is an impact on children who live in a home where there is domestic abuse, even if they do not witness it and even if they do not realise that they have been affected. Whether they see the acts of domestic abuse, those acts will have an impact on them. They will suffer harm and adverse effects that will last into the future.

The Chair of the Committee is right to say that the issue is cross-departmental. This is a Department of Justice Bill, so I will not go into any detail on that. We do need a cross-departmental approach to be taken, however. We need every single Minister and Member of the Assembly to take it on as the serious issue that it is. In the way in which we have addressed the legislation, we have shown that we take it seriously. The Committee has said that, even when, hopefully, the legislation has passed, it will still view this issue as a priority in the future. For that reason, we will support Rachel Woods’s amendment No 7 to clause 9.

The Committee had a particular focus on the child aggravator and the adverse impact on the child as a result of domestic abuse. I will speak more to that later. In particular, I will speak about Operation Encompass, which I raised during my first days on the Committee and have raised at the Policing Board over the past couple of years. It is vital that we address that gap. Again, I will not speak to that at this point, because it is more relevant to later groups of amendments.

We will support the remaining amendments, which are amendment Nos 8, 10, 16 and 17. That ends my contribution on this group of amendments.

Ms S Bradley: At the outset, I thank the Chair of the Committee for putting together such a comprehensive explanation of the Committee's work to date. It was a very fair synopsis of the work that has gone on to this point.

At this stage, I will not engage in thanking everyone — maybe I will leave that for later — but I will single out those people who stepped forward, told a personal story and gave a personal account to the Committee. There was nothing more sobering in making the Bill a reality than listening to the voices of those victims. I commend them. It was courageous, and I put on record the fact that it helped my thinking on where we took the Bill.

As the SDLP representative on the Justice Committee, I will open on the group 1 amendments. Amendment No 1, which we will oppose, proposes to leave out the reasonable person test. I heard Mr Allister's words, and I have sympathy for much of what he said. However, it is not as black and white as some of the legislation to which he referred. We are trying to pin down a complex issue in legislation. Unfortunately, that challenges minds and thinking on what has happened previously in a legislative process, which may not fit. It is a challenge and it is difficult. I appreciate Mr Allister's contribution, and I certainly have an open ear about the solution, if there is a middle ground.

Given the strategic and escalating nature of coercive control, it is important that there is a reasonableness test in legislation. The demeaning gaslighting and persistent behaviours that evolve over time often result in a victim feeling ashamed, with low self-esteem and low self-worth. The stripping of that individual's confidence and self-worth can lead to their believing that the behaviours of the perpetrator are in some way justifiable. At the depth of such oppression, it can be deeply challenging for a victim to see, with any real clarity, the extent of the wrong to which they are being subjected.

The SDLP supports clause 3. It recognises that it has been determined that a reasonable person has considered the coercive behaviour by the perpetrator to be likely to cause person B to suffer physical or psychological harm. Furthermore, clause 2 speaks of the reasonable person's assessment that one or more of the relevant effects of that behaviour is likely to be triggered.

The SDLP shares the Committee view that current legislation does not adequately recognise the fact that domestic abuse is not limited to physical violence and believes that the new offence addresses gaps in legislation, captures domestic abuse in all its myriad forms, will enable more effective action to be taken against perpetrators and will enhance the protection and access to justice provided to those victims by the criminal justice system. To achieve that, it is critical that clause 3 be retained.

A number of conditions must be met for the offence to be committed. Importantly, a defence on the grounds of reasonableness offers safeguards throughout the Bill.

Clause 3 speaks directly to the darkest, less well understood effects of domestic abuse, particularly in its psychological form. The manipulative, coercive behaviours of the perpetrator can deliberately set out to normalise the sinister intention behind their acts.

Throughout the deliberations, reference has been made to the much-publicised Hart case, with brothers Ryan and Luke giving voice to their much-loved mother, Claire, and sister, Charlotte, who were, after much abuse, finally murdered by their abusive father and dad. Luke Hart said in an interview:

"He created the conditions to be seen as our saviour when he was in fact the abuser."

Clause 3 reaches that point. It exposes the behaviours of perpetrators and removes any tangled web of emotion and shines a light directly on perpetrators' behaviours and allows them to be judged in the cold light of day. It is clause 3 that should keep abusers awake at night.

The SDLP recognises the points raised by Mr Allister. However, I put it to him that the issues are not as black and white as we might like them to be.

On amendment Nos 2 and 3, the SDLP will support the Minister, as the amendments appear largely technical. I acknowledge the explanation given by the Minister and the Department to date.

We will also support amendment No 4. I appreciate that the explanatory and financial memorandum is guidance, but in relation to clause 9 it states that:

"This could include the accused threatening violence towards a child to control or frighten the partner/connected person or being abusive towards the child."

The amendment proposes to place that in the Bill, and the SDLP has heard no reason why that should not happen or any limiting implications that it may have.

Clause 9 has been the subject of huge debate during the Committee Stage and on the Floor, and rightly so. I appreciate the Chair of the Committee putting on record the very long sequence of events that has moved thinking through our time on this. I appreciate that, even at this point, the Committee report may not now reflect the views across the Committee, and for good reason. It is important to place on record the letter dated 5 November from the Department to the Clerk of the Justice Committee for members' attention. The content of the letter, however late, has served as a key document in understanding the Department's objectives behind amendments relating to the threshold for parental responsibility and aggravation where a child is involved. It is also important to place on record that the newly evolved departmental position in the letter departs significantly from an earlier steadfast position held by the Department, an official position that requires mention because it strongly influenced thinking at Committee Stage and in our final report.

This is a legislative process, and, as debate matures and we develop our thinking on certain concepts and ideas, we should at least record the pathway that brought us to those final points of agreement. The shared objective that we have in the House of developing good law demands that we consider and scrutinise the process of building legislation as it evolves. To that end, the SDLP recognises the value of the proposal to introduce a reasonableness test in clause 9. Amendment Nos 5 and 7 made that proposal. However, the second part of amendment No 5, which, I understand, may not be moved, departed from that and introduced a new notion of residency.

I will move on from that because if the Minister is not moving amendment No 5, I expect that we will be able to pick up on it at Committee and explore the reason and rationale behind it. I am also eager to know what, if any, impact that would have on clause 5.

At this stage, we are minded to support amendment No 7, on the basis that it serves as a base for developing thinking and conversation on the withheld amendment Nos 5 and 6 in case there is added value that we should not overlook.

Finally, I want to put on record our support for amendment Nos 8 and 10 and acknowledge the Department for listening to the Committee and bringing forward amendment Nos 16 and 17, which the SDLP also support.

Mr Beattie: I have to start by thanking the Minister for bringing the Consideration Stage forward. An awful lot of blood, sweat and tears has gone into the Bill so far, and there is more to come. The Minister and her staff have worked extremely hard. I also have to say thank you to the Chair and the Deputy Chair of the Justice Committee and my fellow Committee members for their scrutiny of the Bill so far.

It has been exceptional. I have been an MLA for over four and a half years and this is the first legislation for which I have gone through the scrutiny process. It was a real eye-opener for me in many ways. You can probably see that: I have paper all over the place, and half the time I do not know how we are doing it. I am picking it up as we go along.

5.00 pm

I want to address some of the amendments. I would say one thing before I do, and it is important for people to understand it. Of course, there will be some disagreements between the Minister and the Chair or the Committee and the DOJ, but those frictions are healthy and are what makes legislation work. We have to understand that. We should allow those frictions and deal with them as and when they come up.

I cannot support amendment No 1 for the simple reason that I read it and look at it in primary colours. Some people might say that that is a simplistic way to do it, but that is the way that I do business. I look at that amendment in simplistic colours and find:

“a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour to be likely to cause B ... harm”

That is absolutely reasonable. You could look at various reasons why that is reasonable because what we are trying to do is to look at every possible scenario that that might affect. That includes those with mental health issues who do not know that they are being abused and do not see that that course of behaviour is affecting them. However, others will see it, and they must be able to intervene. That is reasonable. Therefore, although I understand the points that have been made, I cannot support that amendment.

I have some sympathy with Mr Allister’s objection to clause 3, and there may be something to look at in its wording. In all this, we are trying to be proactive on domestic abuse, but there may be something to look at at Further Consideration Stage. We should not just disregard that as someone else’s opinion and say that we will not use it. I think that Mr Allister raised some valid points about clause 3, and I will certainly raise those in Committee so that we can tie it down and get it right. I do not want us to get it wrong at the last hurdle after all the good work that we have done. We will look at it and make sure that we understand it.

Of course, the Ulster Unionist Party will support amendment Nos 2, 3 and 4. I do not want to dwell on them; we have an awful lot of work to go through. The Ulster Unionist Party will also support amendment No 7. The reason that it will support it is an issue that appears throughout the Bill and one that I raised at Committee Stage: parental alienation and how children are used to abuse other people. Although it does not appear in the Bill — I asked for it to be included, and we had long discussions about it being included — departmental lawyers made it clear that the various clauses in the Bill, including clause 9, will make sure that parental alienation will result in a charge of domestic abuse.

Parental alienation happens to so many people in our society. It is not just about denying one parent access to a child; it is about denying a parent access to key milestones in a child’s life or their school reports. It is about using a child as a weapon. In its unamended form, clause 9 deals with that in part, but the amendment that has been tabled by Rachel Woods and Paul Frew nails it down for me and makes me happier. Parental alienation is scattered throughout the Bill and is not just in clause 9, but amendment No 7 ties it down for me, and that is why I and my party will support it.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Member for taking an intervention. Does he agree that the issue with clause 9, which was outlined by Sinéad Bradley, is highlighted by the Hart case? We probably all use the Hart case as an example because they are among the very few who survived to tell the tale. Very often, in a murder-suicide, the entire family is killed. The end of coercive control situations can often be the death of those who have been coercively controlled.

Mr Beattie: You are absolutely right. Thank you for that. We cannot shout loudly enough about that or stop saying it. That is the worst possible case.

Clause 9 states:

“A made use of the child in directing behaviour at B”.

That can come in any form. We must be mindful of that. That is why I said that, although I was happy with clause 9, the amendment ties it down an awful lot more. That is why I support amendment No 7. Of course, we also support amendment Nos 8, 9 and 10.

It is a complicated Bill. There is a lot in it. You can read it one way and really twist your mind in a certain direction, only for it to be flipped back when somebody brings in another scenario. We are trying to cast the net as widely as we can to catch all the available scenarios. Some of the amendments tabled by the Justice Minister and certainly those of the Justice Committee do exactly that. It is about trying to capture all of those things. That is why I have been so impressed by the work of the Justice Committee over the past number of months. I will certainly support all of the amendments that have been tabled by the Committee.

Ms Bradshaw: I oppose amendment No 1 and the opposition to clause 3 and support all other amendments in the group. I very much appreciate the opportunity to respond on behalf of the Alliance Party to the Consideration Stage of such a much-needed and long-awaited Bill.

Before I comment on the amendments, I place on record my thanks to the Justice Minister, her department officials, members of the Justice Committee and the many stakeholder groups, charities and individuals for the tremendous amount of work that has gone in to getting the Bill to this point. The campaign by organisations such as Women's Aid, the Men's Advisory Project and Nexus, to name but a few, for a robust legislative framework through which the courts, the PSNI, the Public Prosecution Service and social workers can operate has been long, and I hope that the Assembly will deliver a law that addresses gaps in provision and, ultimately, provides appropriate protections and remedies for victims of domestic abuse.

Before I address the amendments — this is the first time that I have spoken about the Bill during its passage — I will place on record my thoughts about parental alienation and address some of the concerns that some people have about aspects of the Bill that, they think, could be used to further abuse victims. Others feel that the provisions do not go far enough in stipulating an offence. I am stating my personal opinion of that misunderstood term.

It is about when a man or woman has the strength or opportunity — it is not always about strength — to leave an abusive relationship. They leave behind the coercive control, they regain financial autonomy, they are able to reconnect with family and friends, maybe they can get back to work, and they are able to build their life away from the perpetrator. In many instances, the only link that they retain with their ex-partner is their child or children. Their abuser can no longer control them, and their abusive behaviour is no longer a factor in their life. However, when there is still contact between both parents, the abuser has the ability to perpetrate the abuse through the one thing that, they know, will have most emotional impact: their child. In that way, the abuse can continue.

Furthermore, by weaponising the child or children and using them to punish the victim for leaving, they are also abusing them. The innocent child or children are caught in the middle and left confused and conflicted. That is why they must be factored into the Bill. Indeed, it is why some of the amendments strengthen that aspect of the Bill. We are all aware of adverse childhood experiences (ACE), and the impact that childhood trauma can have. It can lead to negative lifelong emotional and poor physical outcomes. I think that Linda Dillon touched on that as well; that it is not just about Justice, but is a cross-departmental issue. ACE include domestic violence or being the victim of physical or mental abuse. Therefore, even from a public health prism, we must ensure that the legislation provides safeguards, as much as possible, to stop children's experiences of parents' abusive behaviour, no matter to whom it is directed, having a lifelong impact on them.

Amendment No 3 to clause 9, on aggravation where a relevant child is present, is a minor but significant change, as it will ensure that aggravation can be applied if any or all aspects of the subsections of the clause are present. For similar reasons, my party is also happy, at this stage, to accept the enhancements to clause 9 and amendment Nos 4 and 7. In some ways, the Bill is substantially different from the Domestic Abuse (Protection) (Scotland) Act. However, the basis for determining how a reasonable person might consider the behaviour is fundamental and important to both. I think that we can all agree that it needs to be explicit in the legislation.

Amendment No 1 and the notice of opposition to clause 3 would fundamentally alter the offence and, therefore, the point of the Bill. The judgement, as in Scotland and elsewhere, must be that a reasonable person would consider harm to have been caused. That is the whole point of the legislation, as it refers not just to physical but, vitally, to psychological harm. Not to grasp that is not to grasp the fundamental point of domestic abuse and, importantly, coercive control.

Let the House be clear: when people normalise controlling behaviour just because it is ongoing does not mean that no controlling behaviour has taken or is taking place. Also to be clear: where a court is presented with a case where there is no intent, no harm and none of the effects of abusive behaviour, it is simply not going to arrive at the position where someone could be prosecuted and jailed for 14 years, as Mr Allister mentioned. Those who suggest that are trying to remove the idea that controlling and coercive behaviour should be a crime. They are also trying to remove the idea that a child can be harmed without being immediately aware of the harmful impact. Sadly, again, it is a basic principle of child protection, for example, that the impact may come and be acutely felt years later in life.

The requirement in the legislation is that a reasonable person would consider harm to have been caused, and that it has been carried out intentionally or recklessly. We must also remember, as some have chosen to forget, that the draft legislation also contains a provision for defence on the grounds of reasonableness if the behaviour is reasonable in certain circumstances; for example, somebody's safety.

In conclusion, amendment Nos 16 and 17 are useful to add clarity; the former as requested by the Committee. I am content that they add to the Department's ability to ensure that the legislation is used to the fairest and best effect.

Mr Frew: I rise to welcome this stage of the Bill. It has been a long road. Before I get into the Bill and amendments in depth, people need to be acknowledged. As the Chairperson has already said, they are the Committee staff. MLAs can populate a Committee. We can do as much hard work as we can in the hours that we are given. However, when we leave the Committee, it is the staff who continue that work until we, again, hit that room and function as a Committee. I want to give my deepest thanks to the Committee Clerk and team, who I have known for considerable time now, and who, I must say, are at the top of their game. There is absolutely no doubt about that. The detailed report that they have helped MLAs to produce is second to none. They have helped and facilitated us, as MLAs, to scrutinise the Bill as best we can. That is vitally important. Without that support, we cannot do our job properly and provide legislation that is fit for purpose. We do not stand a chance.

5.15 pm

Thanks also have to go to — this has already been alluded to today — the many victims and many people who have been impacted by domestic abuse, domestic violence and coercive control. Those are horrendous activities. For the first time in our history, domestic abuse will be an offence, and that is really, really important. The Assembly should shine a light of hope to not only the victims who suffer but their families, who watch it, sometimes in slow motion, and feel as though they cannot do anything to help or assist or to change the course of events that take place. That is horrendously hard for anyone to watch, even if it is indirect. Even neighbours who watch it on a daily basis cannot effect change, but maybe they will be able to do so now.

Acknowledgement must also go to the former Justice Minister, Claire Sugden. When Claire first took office, she made this her number-one priority. When I first took office as the Justice Committee Chairperson, I, too, made it my number-one priority, along with the issue of stalking. Very quickly, the former Minister and I came to an arrangement that she would push forward with a domestic violence Bill and the Committee would work on a stalking report that we could hand to the Minister when she had developed her domestic abuse Bill. She would then pick up our report and run with it to produce stalking legislation too. I commend and thank the former Minister Claire Sugden for her priorities, her activities and her work in that regard. That was right, and it was needed, so I thank her for that.

I cannot let go of the fact that I stand here today with a sense of regret, because the Bill should have been passed three years ago. This Bill should already be in statute. We should already be seeing reports about how effective the law is and what the crime statistics are, and such reports would maybe suggest that we need to introduce a second Bill to ensure that the legislation is fit for purpose. We have been deprived of that up to now, and so have the victims. That is unforgivable. Three years? Unforgivable.

I also stand here today with a sense of regret about the suffering that people had to go through while this place did not meet over those three years. Just think about that. This is only aspect of law. It is only one Bill. It is only one subject. You think about those people sitting in their home really suffering while this place was not meeting. It is unforgivable — it really is — but we are here now. What do we have to do now? We have to make sure that this law is the best law that it can be.

I must admit that I have struggled with the Bill, because of the way in which it is written and compiled. I have sympathy for the Department, but there was so much that I wanted to do and so many amendments that I wanted to add. Most Members know me by now: I would not shy away from that. I try to test things, to form things and to persuade people into my way of thinking. I wanted to try to attach a stalking offence to the Bill, but that was ruled out very quickly. When you read clause 1, you see very clearly that it states:

“A and B are personally connected to each other at the time”.

I know why that is in there. That is the reason why I could not attach even one clause on the stalking piece. I wanted just one clause to give those victims some succour and hope in the future, but, of course, we have stalking legislation coming forward as promised. It is nearly at the door of the Assembly, and I cannot wait until I see that legislation also.

I wanted to do something on strangulation, and I reserve the right to do something on strangulation at the next stage. It is important to talk about it to engage people's minds. Strangulation is one of the most horrendous crimes in domestic violence. It is not coercive control — I will talk about that later.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. I share his concerns, particularly about non-fatal strangulation. There is a mounting body of evidence that it is a precursor to domestic homicide. Judge Barney McElhone has said clearly that he is very concerned about strangulation. Often, it can be difficult after the event to detect whether someone had been subjected to strangulation because it does not necessarily leave marks or signs of abuse.

For that reason, as you will be aware as a member of the Committee, the Department is taking forward work around strangulation to build policy development and to find the best way to put that into a legislative mechanism. It is important that that policy development work, and consideration of and consultation on that work, is able to proceed to build the body of evidence. However, I absolutely acknowledge and share the concerns.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for that intervention and for putting that on the record, because that is very helpful. I await to see how that plays out.

Another issue is the rough sex defence, and I looked at doing something around that. However, the departmental officials were concerned, so we were concerned, that to add in such a defence on specific matters could hurt the Bill because of the way that the Bill is formed. So, I take that point, but I reserve the right on that, too, and will keep people on their toes.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. Great minds think alike, and we will just stop it there, but I am also concerned about the idea around rough sex defence. That issue has been raised with me by a number of Members. There is now consultation on that issue, and we are hopeful that it can be dealt with in the miscellaneous provisions Bill. It would be at amendment stage, because it has come onto the radar later than some of the other measures that we hope to incorporate in the original Bill. However, it would be my intention to develop the drafting as quickly as possible, so that it could be considered by the Committee during the normal Consideration Stage and that we could incorporate that, if required, into legislation.

Mr Speaker: I ask Members to stay within the scope of the debate. These issues are important, obviously, and the Member is creatively putting them on the record, but please return to the amendments in front of us.

Mr Frew: I apologise, Mr Speaker, and I accept your ruling on that. I thank the Minister for placing that on the record also, because that, again, is useful and commendable. So, I thank you, Minister, and I thank you, Mr Speaker. I accept your ruling and will try to resist further distortion of the debate on the Bill.

We are talking about the formation of the offence. My experience of this issue goes back to when I was first on the Justice Committee. When I met groups of barristers and judges, even solicitors and everyone else involved with the legal world, it was clear that everyone was grappling with how we could deal with coercive control. That has played out today with Mr Allister's interventions and his moving the debate. I understand that — I get his arguments 100% — but what we are trying to do is something completely different. Although we need to ensure, and satisfy ourselves, that this is the best legislation possible and that there can be no unintended negative consequences, I think that clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4 speak of coercive control in a way that has never been legislated for before.

Mr Allister talked about other offences and other legislation that can and could have been used, but I simply say to him at this point that that legislation has not been used. There are so many victims and, before he tells me off, alleged victims who suffer this on a daily, weekly and yearly basis who have never, ever received justice. The perpetrators and the alleged perpetrators have never, ever been brought to justice. That is why we have been moved in this House by the Minister and the previous Minister to move on a Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill. It is because it is required. When you get to the point at which you know that it is required, you have to piece it together. When you piece it together, I struggle to find how you could leave out clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4.

This is a mystery to me yet, and perhaps the Minister will refer to it in her remarks. We have a Bill that is titled the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill, but what we really want to do is create an offence of coercive control, yet not once in the Bill is that mentioned. Not once in the Bill is parental alienation mentioned, yet we are told that it is covered. I read the clauses, and I can see where what I believe to be coercive control has been captured. I can see that. The Bill does not necessarily have to mention it to encapsulate it and capture it, so I guess that that has satisfied me in that regard. I have a fear, however, that removing any of the first four clauses would diminish that strength and remove the coercive, controlling nature of domestic abuse that we are trying to capture.

That brings me on to my point about harm. It is human nature to tend to move away from harm wherever we can. If it is a hot ring in a kitchen, we try to remove ourselves from that. It does not mean that we leave the kitchen but that we stand clear of the hot ring. It has an effect and an impact, and you will function differently around that hot hob. You will beware, change tack and change direction. That is a bit like harm in this sense, where you will modify your position and your daily habits and be conditioned because of that harm. It is not just the harm that can be inflicted but the threat of the harm. There are times that people can threaten you with the most horrendous thought that you can ever have in your head, and you will comply. You do not need to be told twice. You will comply.

To me, coercive control is the little digs, the little things and the manipulative behaviour that makes you change your course because you are reasonable, because you want to make peace, because you do not want to create a fuss and because you do not want your child to experience anything robust or even horrendous. That is at the start, but then it becomes much more than that. There is the full spectrum here. Imagine being threatened by the perpetrator not that you will be raped but that a child will be raped. Your own child, your niece, your best friend's child or your next-door neighbour's child. You are threatened with that.

That has not caused you harm, but you will comply because you know that the perpetrator is deadly serious. That is coercive control at one end of the spectrum, but it happens, and we need to capture it in the legislation. There is absolutely no doubt about that.

5.30 pm

When you are a victim of coercive control, you do not know whether you are up or down. You do not know what day it is or what is normal practice. You become conditioned and immune to the very abuse that you are suffering and living with daily. You live with it. That is why we need these clauses and the reasonable person clause to capture this. Your life is in despair and is not your own, because by that point you are trying to protect yourself as best you can, and, more than that, you are probably trying to protect someone whom you love. You have out-of-body experiences when you feel that you do not even own your body. That adds another layer. Every one of us in the Chamber will go home for a rest. We might be here late — I suspect that we will — but we will go home for a rest. You cannot rest if you live in a household where you are a victim of domestic abuse and coercive control. You do what you have to do to move away from harm. That is why this must be captured in the way that the legislation is drafted and is why I support clauses 1 to 4. I hope that I have illustrated why we cannot support amendment No 1 and the removal of clause 3.

That brings me on to amendment No 3. I see it as a tidying-up exercise, and I get that. I do not know why it is needed because I thought that clause 9 was strong enough in the way that it is drafted. However, it does not do any harm, so I absolutely support it. There is no issue there.

I now come to the clause 9 amendments. The Chairperson outlined quite well the procedure that we went through and the horrendous task of the forensic detail that we went into on clause 9. At this stage, I commend the work of the Committee. The Chamber can be quite a bear pit. I am still getting used to the robust language and am still honing my skills. However, it is in Committee that the work is done. If we are to be proud of something about our job, it is the work of the Committees. We not only scrutinise Ministers and hold them to account — let us face it, we have no opposition so Committees are the opposition — but we work together as a team. If Committees do not work as a team, something is badly wrong and they are not functioning properly. When a Committee works as a team, it works as a dream. It works well to help to scrutinise and produce legislation. I thank every single member of the Committee for their work on the Bill. Rachel Woods asked questions and persevered with a determined vigour to keep going and to push and press officials until we got to this point today, so credit where credit is due. I support her 100% and applaud her. She and I pushed and pushed. There were times when we did not think that the officials got it. We tried to formulate an amendment and were helped by the Bill Office. The Committee produced an amendment, and the Department said, "No, you are adding confusion to the Bill. It is not required". We saw straight away that it was required. There was real hole in clause 9 where it states:

“For the purposes of subsection (1), the domestic abuse offence is aggravated by reason of involving a relevant child if —

(a) at any time in the commission of the offence —

(i) A directed behaviour at the child, or

(ii) A made use of the child in directing behaviour at B”.

It then states at 9(2)(b):

“the child saw or heard, or was present during, an incident of behaviour which A directed at B as part of the course of behaviour.”

I will go into that in a minute, but when you read the EFM, it helps you to get an understanding of the clauses. That is why it is essential at this stage.

When you read clause 9 — and I do believe that there is a hole there — and then read clause 9 in the EFM, you will understand that it helps shed some light on it but confirms that there is a hole where it says:

“A directed behaviour at the child” and the EFM states that 9(2)(a)(i):

“provides that the aggravation applies where it is shown that, at any time in commissioning the offence, the accused directed behaviour at a child. This could include the accused threatening violence towards a child to control or frighten the partner/connected person or being abusive towards the child.”

That is fair enough. That is important. However, at 9(2)(ii) it states:

“A made use of the child in directing behaviour at B”, and the EFM states:

“provides that the aggravation applies where it is shown that, in committing the offence, the accused made use of the child in directing behaviour at their partner/connected person. This could apply where the accused encourages or directs a child to spy on or report on the day-to-day activities of a partner/connected person. The involvement of the child could be unwittingly or unwillingly.”

I always struggle with that word.

That confirmed to me and to Rachel that there was a hole in this clause. Again, we thrashed this out at the Committee, week in, week out, and we talked about the EFM and the officials said, “If we add “unwittingly and unwillingly” to the whole clause, would that help?” I replied, “Yes, that would help”. I would have been satisfied with that — although I do not know, because if Rachel had put down her amendment, I probably would have signed it anyway — but I was content at that point.

Then we were told by officials that the Committee’s amendment would add confusion to the Bill. Then, the Minister tabled her own amendments to clause 9, and that did nothing but add confusion to the Bill. I believe that it would have damaged clause 9, and I thank the Minister for not moving that amendment today, but we still have to address it and talk about it because I would not want anybody getting any further ideas before the Further Consideration Stage.

The Minister, in amendment 5, added the words, “suffer fear, alarm and distress”. You can clearly see that, throughout the Bill, it is not being descriptive. Yet, we are adding it here to the child aggravator. The second part of that amendment states:

“the child usually resides with A or B”

No, no. At no time did I or Rachel Woods, or anybody else in the Committee state that that was a requirement. In fact, it is not a requirement, we do not need it and we do not want it. We never did. Why? Because that excludes so many people who could be in danger. You have the perpetrator threatening the alleged victim. You then have their coercive controlling nature and you might have a family member coming around to check on you to make sure that you are OK. Maybe they know or suspect that something is going on, but they are going to be there to check on you and to try to protect you. Then, the perpetrator sets his sights on that person. Not you, the victim, but on your loved one, who has come to check on you and who has enough knowledge and experience to know that something is going wrong. That person has a child, and the perpetrator will threaten your niece or nephew, and you will comply.

Maybe it is a best friend who checks up on you. They have a daughter or a son, and the perpetrator threatens violence against them. You will comply. Your next-door neighbour knocks on the door and asks, “Are you OK, love?”, or, “Are you OK, sir? We heard a bit of banging last night, and we’re not sure what’s going on. Are you OK?” The victim replies, “Yes, I’m fine. Nothing to worry about”, and closes the door. The perpetrator looks at the victim and says, “Do not tell her anything”, or, “Do not tell him anything. If you run to your neighbour, you will see what happens to their son or daughter”. You will comply. You will not say a word to your neighbour.

That is what we are trying to legislate for. That is why, when we saw the Minister’s amendment, we were horrified, we really were. We were horrified because of all the dialogue, all the work that we had done, all the examples that we tried to give and all the times that we held the Committee up, yet we had this. We could not believe it. I am glad that the Minister has prayed not to move it, and I thank her for that.

What is the hole? Why do we need the reasonable person clause? Again, I commend Rachel for her perseverance and determination and for tabling the amendment. It is quite simply that the child should not need to be aware. In all the scenarios that I painted for the House, the child will never be aware that they have been threatened and that their life is really in danger. That child will never know, and that is why we need to fill the gap and why we need the clause. Rachel will speak on this at length — it is her amendment. I simply put my name to it because I support Rachel Woods, and I argued with her in the Committee right through each meeting, day in, day out.

The amendment adds the dimension that I described. I do not know that I need to go on any further, because Rachel will talk to it. Why is clause 9 in its entirety so important? I received an email from Barnardo’s and the NSPCC. They, Women’s Aid and all the groups that help people and victims in this matter will be listening in. Encapsulating why clause 9 is so important, they said:

“We know from our service delivery experience that children are adversely impacted by domestic abuse, even if they do not see or hear it, or are not present at the time of the offence. For example, they may see their parent’s injuries, feel their distress, or be impacted by the environment of fear; they may experience high levels of anxiety and instability, social isolation, or experience poorer caregiving because of a lack of parental resources or capacity. Living in a home where domestic abuse takes place can have a profound impact on a child’s short and long term physical, mental and emotional wellbeing, as well as their behaviour. The long term impacts on children include a detrimental impact on their mental health, development, risk of harmful sexual behaviour, future cycles of abuse, and the potential of youth offending.”

That cannot be overstated.

5.45 pm

Through no fault of the child, they could be propelled into a world that is alien to them, but, nonetheless, they will live through it and grow up in it, perhaps to offend. It might be other crime, it might be frustration, or it might be a cry for help. It might be all those things. The victim’s world can be normalised; they can become immune to violence and abuse and can be conditioned by coercive control, but so can the child, to the point where the child may think that such behaviour is normal. So, when that child grows up and starts to form relationships, they could become a perpetrator of domestic abuse.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member agree with me that a child can also become a victim because when they see something, it becomes normalised, and they think that if it was good enough for their mummy or daddy, it is good enough for them?

Mr Frew: Absolutely. That is the nature of coercive control: it is a crime that goes into your very soul. That is why every art and part of the judicial system could struggle with this. That is one of the reasons why we need independent supervision and reporting, which we will talk about later. Those are the safeguards that we have to play with. That is why the Committee is strengthening the Bill, and we will talk about that later.

The offence goes right to the soul of a person; it will change everything about that person. It will change their body, their form and their mindset, and it will condition them. They become coercive or they become a victim. Sometimes, they will not even know it because that is normal to them; it is what they have to live with. They get on with it and become immune to it. That is no way to live.

So many people are living like that. That needs to change. We need to support them. Many are supporting those people, but they are fighting as if they had one hand tied behind their back. The Bill will go some way to releasing their second hand so that they can put up a fight and defend those who need defending: the victims of domestic violence and coercive control.

I will move on to the other amendments in the section. I support the change in age from 18 to 16, which the Minister proposes. Changing “may” to “must” is something that the Committee asked for, and I thank the Minister for that. It just makes it a bit stronger. It is tidying-up language, but it is very, very important.

The message that must go out to victims from this Consideration Stage is that we hear them; we know what they are going through and we are trying to fix it. They have an ear in this Assembly, and we are going to listen to them and pass this legislation. Do you know what? We are going to report on this legislation and come back to it when we can and strengthen it if we have to. If we have to make it better, we will in order to safeguard victims. We are saying to the perpetrators, “You must stop this behaviour. In some cases, you might not even know that you are doing it. You might be as conditioned as the victim you are creating, but it has to end. We cannot abide it any more”.

We have failed our people for too long. We need to get this legislation passed as soon as possible and get it into play. We need to get all the arts and parts of the judicial system trained up to cope with this legislation, cutting-edge though it may be. We have to get to a point where we start to protect the victims of domestic abuse, domestic violence and coercive control. I support the Bill 100%.

Ms Rogan: It is a significant day for me as an MLA as I debate my first bill on the Floor. It is legislation that I have been scrutinising along with my Sinn Féin colleagues and my colleagues on the Justice Committee. The Bill will make a real difference to many lives across the North. As many of my colleagues on the Justice Committee have done, I thank those who gave such powerful testimony. At times, it was harrowing and heartbreaking to listen to, but they did it, and they did it with dignity and gusto, knowing that the small glimpses of what they had to suffer that they gave us would shape the Bill. The new domestic abuse offence is what makes the legislation such a transformative Bill and one that will make tangible differences to the lives of many.

Clauses 1 to 4 are a radical departure from the existing legislation that has failed victims for so long. We all know that domestic abuse is not just physical violence but often includes psychological abuse, threatening behaviour and financial abuse. We know that domestic abuse can involve isolating victims from their friends, family and other sources of social interaction, depriving victims of their freedom and controlling their day-to-day activities. There is humiliation, degradation and intimidation among much else. It is usually damaging and repulsive behaviour, so I am thankful that the legislation will recognise it for what it is.

The Hourglass charity deals with the abuse of older people. It warns that over 20,000 elderly people in the North are abused every year. Most of the abuse reported was psychological, including threats, intimidation and mockery. Hourglass also warned of a significant increase in the abuse and neglect of elderly across the North due to lockdown and self-isolation during the pandemic. We need to support the voluntary and community organisations that have mobilised during the COVID crisis to assist and protect the vulnerable.

I, therefore, greatly welcome clause 5, which defines broadly the types of relationships to which the new domestic abuse offence will apply. Many view domestic abuse through the outdated and uninformed lens of intimate relationships, but clause 5 ensures that other relationships, including children, parents, grandparents or siblings, are included. It is an important clause that ensures that protections are provided in the Bill. Some organisations raised questions around that during the Committee Stage, but it was established that clause 5 is necessary in cases where an individual may have suffered considerable abuse over a period of time but, due to its extent and nature, it has become normalised and, as a result, the person is unaware that they have been abused.

As Sinéad Bradley said, the Hart case was one of the most stark. Luke Hart said that his father spent most of his time belittling his family. He used money as a way to control, stopped his wife going for a coffee, told his daughter that she was stupid and said that his sons were not real men. Then, after years of abuse, he killed them with a sawn-off shotgun. When speaking to the BBC, last year, Luke said that the violence seemed to come out of nowhere but control had always been growing. Murder is the ultimate act of control. It was the next step on his journey. The domestic homicide review in that case stated that they had been suffering intense domestic abuse for many years and did not know it, but there was no physical abuse. That is a heartbreaking case, but, as we know, that type of coercive control and abusive behaviour happens every day across the country, and there are many victims like Claire and Charlotte Hart who are stuck in abusive relationships and need our protection.

The legislation will create laws that will provide protection from all types of domestic abuse, from sibling to sibling to parents and grandparents. The Bill also includes additional protections for children. Children are the hidden victims of domestic abuse. Research has shown that adverse childhood experiences have long-term impacts on children's mental, emotional and physical well-being. Clause 8 provides for an aggravation of the domestic abuse offence where the victim in the relationship is under the age of 18. Clause 9 provides for an aggravation where a child is involved. I want to note the importance of these clauses. As we know, lots of times the domestic abuse may be targeted at a partner in an intimate relationship, but children often carry a huge burden from the abuse, and they themselves are victims. Such abuse can have a long-lasting impact on the child, and it is only right that that impact be recognised in the law through this aggravation.

I also welcome the fact that this clause provides that a child only has to see, hear or be present during the abuse to constitute the aggravation, and that amendment No 7 will provide that the child does not have to have any awareness or understanding of the perpetrator's behaviour. These clauses will go some distance to protect children from the horrors of this abuse.

Ms Armstrong: I will not be very long with this, because I appreciate that it is a very long debate, and there have been fantastic contributions so far. There have been a lot of thanks this evening, and I thank the Justice Minister, the previous Justice Minister, the Chair and members of the Justice Committee and, of course, all the staff who have been involved in getting this Bill this far. I rise, as my colleague Paula Bradshaw did earlier, to support most of the amendments that have been tabled. Unfortunately, I cannot support amendment No 1 and the opposition to clause 3, and I will explain why.

I am not on the Justice Committee, but I am a constituency MLA. Just to give a bit of an idea and a personal connection — I know that the Committee has been talking to a number of people and will realise the emotion that you can have when you are dealing with the victims of domestic abuse. I was very recently dealing with a case where the victim was a woman whose mother had been the victim of domestic abuse. This was an adult woman who was at her wits' end. We talk about harm and say that it is not defined in criminal law. All I can say is that I witnessed a person who had been absolutely harmed by domestic violence. I will not go into too many details of the case, but her mother had been beaten so badly that she now lives in a care home and has dementia. The daughter has no recourse. She is watching her mother disintegrate, and because of COVID she cannot get to visit her very often. I see her as a very definite victim of harm. She did not live in the house and she was not beaten, but she is now living with the fact that she feels so guilty that she did not protect her parent. She was not able to stop that abuse, and now her mother is dying in front of her.

Harm is horrendous. It is very hard to put a finger on or to define. I know that, when the domestic abuse Bill across in Westminster was being considered, many other options were added in. Mr Frew has mentioned some of them. He talked about strangulation and rough sex. Those are things that are within that intimate relationship between a man and a woman, a man and a man or a woman and a woman, but there are those implications, and this Bill is trying to deal with that when it comes to children of victims. I have to say that, while children of victims may be under 18 and mentioned in this Bill, adults who have been children within a family where domestic violence has taken place carry that with them. Unfortunately, in my lifetime I have spent some time with charities that work with those children who are out the other end. They have grown up and moved away, and you will see the same coercive behaviour happening and the same situations happening within households. Some girls are prepared to put up with so much, and some men are prepared to do so much. It is sickening. That is why, when this Bill is going forward, the importance of clause 3 is there.

As the Minister has said before, this is about criminalising the behaviour as opposed to just the outcome, and that is why it is so important. There are other things that we can say about harm. For instance, there are some things that are not crimes at the moment. For instance — some of the papers from Westminster that I read talked about it — if someone discloses sexual, intimate photographs of a person, that is a crime, but threatening to do it is not. So you can have control over a person without physically doing something to them, and you may have that psychological harm, but there is no criminal offence of saying, "I am going to share photographs of you". Being harmed is not covered in law, but this part of the Bill is about the impact on the victim. In Northern Ireland, we already see things and are doing things to help to protect victims. For instance, in the welfare benefits system, we have already separated welfare benefits because we recognise the threat of harm and economic control, yet we do not have anything in law to recognise the impact on victims. It is right that we have that and right that it is included.

6.00 pm

I thank those who have tabled amendments, including Mr Frew and Miss Woods. The type of considerations that have been made for this Bill are so important. All of you could be like me and be sitting in your office on any day of the week when a victim walks in to ask about something as simple as a food-bank voucher or a school place for a special educational needs student and you end up in conversation with that person and hear what has been going on with them for years. I sincerely hope that the Bill is passed as quickly as possible so that there are no more victims like the lady who was in my office and her mother, who now cannot remember her daughter's name, where she is living or that the abuse actually happened to her. I encourage everyone: let us get this done.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

I know that this will be a long debate tonight. There will be a lot of groups out there listening to this debate and hoping that we take this forward as quickly as possible. I ask all Members to work with the Minister and the Committee and let us get this passed as quickly as possible.

Miss Woods: Like others, I want to begin my remarks by thanking all the individuals and organisations that submitted evidence to the Committee; the Committee staff for all their hard work; the members who scrutinised the Bill in great detail; the Minister for bringing the Bill forward; and Claire Sugden for starting this process.

Paul has probably already made my arguments for me, so I could probably just sit back down, but I am not going to. I will address only the amendments to clause 9, which are amendment Nos 3 to 7. I take us back to what I said at Second Stage, which was that, if we want to give our children the best start in life, we must also look to the effects of domestic abuse on them and ensure that the home is a place of safety for children and young people, now and for the future. Domestic violence, as we know, has a devastating impact on children and young people that can last into adulthood, and Kellie Armstrong outlined her experience with a constituent in that regard.

A UNICEF report estimated that as many as 275 million children worldwide are exposed to violence in the home, and children are often the hidden victims of domestic abuse, and the long-term impact on children includes a detrimental impact on their mental health, child development, risk of harmful sexual behaviour, future cycles of abuse and potential for youth offending. It is important that legislation reflects that a child can be aware of and negatively impacted by domestic abuse in the home, even if they do not see or hear the moment in which it occurs. Children can pick up on a parent's distress or be impacted by the parent's compromised capacity for parenting in the context of fear. Threats to hurt and abuse children are often used as part of the course of behaviour that seeks to control, isolate or frighten the victim. Crucially, that is what the amendments capture.

Clause 9 has been debated extensively by the Committee, and I am sure that some Committee members will be glad when I stop talking about clause 9. I am looking to the Chair, in particular, but, of course, I make that assumption based on my experience of it. Clause 9 provides for the domestic abuse offence to be aggravated where it involves a child. Under the clause, as it is currently drafted, the aggravation would apply where it has been shown that the perpetrator directed behaviour at the child, or the perpetrator made use of the child in directing behaviour at the victim, or the child saw, heard or was present during an incident of behaviour. Therefore, in order for the aggravation to be applied, one of those conditions would have to be met and appropriately evidenced by the prosecution.

The first option to apply the aggravation is clear: where the accused abused the child. The second option, where the accused made use of the child in the abuse of the victim, may include instances where, as mentioned in the Committee report, the accused directs a child to spy on the day-to-day activities of the victim or alleged victim so as to enable the accused to control or monitor their movements and interactions. The third option is also clear: when the child sees, hears or is present during incidents of abuse.

The Committee engaged with many children and young people's organisations as part of its evidence gathering, hearing a variety of concerns about the legislation and ideas for moving forward on children's rights and children's safety and well-being from abuse. That included discussions of abuse in the home, abuse between family members, abuse in youth relationships, parental responsibility and child abuse. Organisations such as Women's Aid also pointed to the realities of domestic abuse in the home and to the experiences of many that involved their children, with perpetrators directing their abuse towards the children to hurt and control them. In effect, Members, that is coercive control. Not every instance of domestic abuse will be heard or seen by a child, but that does not mean that the child cannot be affected by it. It does not mean that a perpetrator's actions are any less harmful, nor should it mean that the aggravator in clause 9 should not apply.

A number of organisations raised concerns over the wording and potential operation of clause 9. I will outline a few of those concerns for Members' consideration. Women's Aid stated that clause 9(2)(b), where:

"the child saw or heard, or was present", does not adequately address the issue or recognise the persistent, ongoing nature of the impact of the abuse on a child living in a home with domestic violence and abuse. It called for children to be recognised as victims in their own right and not as associated persons. Action for Children agreed with that assessment by Women's Aid, noting that the experiences of those children and young people are often overlooked. Barnardo's highlighted the importance of recognising that a child can be aware of, and impacted on, by domestic abuse in the home even if the child does not see or hear it. Barnardo's specifically mentioned clause 9(2)(b) in that regard and suggested that it should be expanded to recognise that children do not need to witness the abuse to be negatively affected. The Children's Law Centre also recommended extra provision in clause 9 to account for circumstances in which the child does not directly witness an incident but has still been aware of, or affected by, the abuse.

The Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People (NICCY) reiterated the fact that children are adversely affected by domestic abuse beyond only occasions when they see or hear an incident and called for further consideration of how that could be reflected in legislation. NICCY also noted that the Scottish Act provides that children do not have to be aware of, or understand the nature of, the abusive behaviour for the aggravation to apply and that the provision effectively captures the impact on children who may, for instance, reside in a different household from that in which the abuse occurs. The NSPCC also noted that the Scottish legislation, on which clause 9 is based, includes a reasonable person test, which means that the aggravation can be applied where a reasonable person would consider the abuse likely to adversely affect a child. It said that that provision was included in the Scottish Act in large part to avoid children having to give evidence in court about their experiences. For that reason, the NSPCC recommended adding the reasonable person test to clause 9.

The Human Rights Commission agreed that children should provide evidence directly to the court only when absolutely necessary and, where that is done, in an age-appropriate manner, with consideration given to alternatives such as live links. It also recommended age-appropriate counselling for the child before, during and after the trial. The Bar of Northern Ireland indicated that the current wording of clause 9(2)(b) suggests, in practical terms, the child being required to give evidence as to their awareness of the accused's behaviour and any adverse impact caused by it. The Bar also noted the similarities between clause 9 and provisions in the Scottish Act. It queried why the Department did not include subsections similar to that legislation that would address the concerns and issues raised, specifically section 5(5) of the Scottish Act, which reads:

"For it to be proved that the offence is so aggravated, there does not need to be evidence that a child—

(a) has ever had any—

(i) awareness of A's behaviour, or

(ii) understanding of the nature of A's behaviour".

In the light of the sheer weight of evidence, the Department's initial refusal to consider properly the concerns and issues raised, not just by me, or by Mr Frew for that matter, but by all those organisations that I have mentioned, is frankly baffling. When the Committee reiterated its concerns and suggested possible solutions, the Department claimed that the conditions for applying the aggravation under clause 9 as drafted were wider in scope than the Scottish provisions because there is no requirement for a reasonable person to consider that the abusive behaviour would adversely impact on the child. The view was that the requirement in the Bill is simply that the child sees, hears or is present during an incident of abuse: in other words, that, in comparison with Scotland, there are fewer hoops to jump through in order to apply the aggravation.

As mentioned in the Committee report, we discussed extensively with officials the wording of clause 9 and particularly clause 9(2). I continually pressed for an explanation of the Department's rationale for adopting a different approach to the Scottish legislation on this clause. To this day, I do not believe that the Committee or I have been given a satisfactory explanation. It was continually reiterated that there were three options for applying the aggravation and stated that they did not consider that an amendment reflecting the additional provisions of the Scottish legislation was required.

In my view, that represents a complete disregard for the evidence that was in front of the Department. Needless to say, the Committee began work on an amendment to strengthen the clause. It also asked whether the Department would consider adding greater clarity by amending the EFM to address the concerns.

After considering the Committee's draft amendment, the Department reiterated its stance that clause 9 as drafted had fewer hoops to jump through to apply the aggravation in comparison with Scotland and that the proposed Committee amendment would be unnecessary, add nothing to the clause and could risk confusing matters.

It was not us who were confused. After further discussions between the Committee and officials on 24 September, the Department advised that its interpretation of the Scottish legislation was wrong and therefore the advice given to the Committee up until that point was incorrect. The Department apologised for the error and clarified how the Scottish provisions work. The crux of the mistake and the misinterpretation of the Scottish provisions had formed the basis of the Department's rebuttal of the recommendations and suggestions, which were based on the evidence provided by all stakeholders up until that point. This should not be glossed over.

The Department correctly claimed that there were three options to apply the aggravation under clause 9 as drafted. It also claimed that that was preferable to the Scottish legislation because, under the provisions of its Act, the options to apply the aggravations were coupled with the requirement of a reasonable person to consider the abuse to affect the child adversely. However, that was wrong. The reasonable person test is, in fact, an additional option to apply the aggravation in circumstances or cases in which the other three may not apply.

A further option to apply the aggravation that exists in Scotland was removed by the Department because it was not understood and was an unnecessary hoop to get through. That meant, with clause 9 as drafted, we would have no option to apply the aggravator where a reasonable person would consider the abuse to affect the child adversely where it is not possible to apply it using the other three options.

To be clear, this provision exists in Scotland, so we would be left, essentially, with a legislative gap. Even though the error was acknowledged, before the Committee finalised its report, remarkably, no solution to this gap was offered, other than suggesting that they would add some wording to the Bill's explanatory notes to clarify that the child did not have to be aware of or understand the abuse. As we know, Members, the EFM is not legislation. We were then left with a suboptimal clause compared with Scotland and weaknesses in the Bill with respect to the operation of the child aggravation.

It is also worth noting that, two days after I published my amendments to clause 9, alternative amendments were tabled at the eleventh hour, so to speak, which, it is important to mention, the Committee had no notice of and was able to discuss only by virtue of the postponement of the Consideration Stage debate. I welcome yesterday's letter to the Committee from the Justice Minister outlining that she will not be moving her amendments today, specifically amendment Nos 5 and 6.

I also put on record my thanks to Mr Frew, who stuck to his word and added his name to the amendments that I had tabled, and for his ongoing commentary, scrutiny and support.

While the Minister's amendments reflect similar provisions in Scotland, it is not clear why a residency condition is included, given that the scope of our offence differs so greatly, in the sense that it applies to a much broader range of personal connections and relationships beyond simply partners and ex-partners, which is captured in the Scottish law. The Minister's amendments added another hoop to jump through, an unnecessary condition that the Department, throughout this whole debate on clause 9, was seeking to avoid.

There is nothing anywhere else in the Bill that states that those involved in abuse or affected by it have to be a resident in a particular place, so why is this in now? What if the child lived with Granny? A child could live with C, visit A and B regularly and perhaps stay over, but does not reside with A or B, or both. Perhaps the child is next door, with the headphones on during an incident. Perhaps A abuses B, but the child does not see or hear it or is not present. What would happen then? Contrary to the further confusion and uncertainty that would ensue with a residency condition, my and, now, Mr Paul Frew's amendments would finally put clause 9 to bed. I urge all Members to support them.

6.15 pm

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Again, I hold that up as an exemplar of how MLAs can work together with a common purpose to achieve something good.

It would also lead to the example that may be common to us all, in that, when granny or grandad sees conflict or a problem in a household, they encourage children to stay with them as much as possible. Even victims would encourage that as much as possible. You then get a scenario in which A and B's child stays with granny and grandad as often as they can to get them away from the scenario and the household where the violence and abuse are taking place. They would not be encapsulated if the clause were left unamended.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for his intervention. We must look at the impact on the children as well. We have so much to do with the Bill, but we have to put the alleged victims and children at the centre of it. I look forward to working together with you again in the future. I am certainly happy to do so, especially when we have common ground.

My first amendment — amendment No 4 — deals with a very specific issue that was raised during discussions between the Committee and officials. Mr Frew, in particular, sought clarity on what scenarios would fall under clause 9(2)(a)(ii), which states:

“A made use of the child in directing behaviour at B”.

The Committee sought clarity from officials that that provision would capture circumstances in which the accused had threatened to abuse the child as part of the course of abusive behaviour that was directed at the victim. Unfortunately, that is a common occurrence in domestic abuse cases in which children are involved. In my view, the amendment provides the required clarity.

Clause 9, as drafted, does not take into account that specific issue explicitly in its wording. It should fall under one of the options to apply the aggravation and, in my view, sits clearly in clause 9(2)(a)(i). The amendment strengthens the clause by making it clear that threats to abuse children will be captured by the aggravator and sends a clear signal from this place that such abusive behaviour should be treated with the utmost severity.

My second amendment to clause 9 — amendment No 7 — resolves the mess and confusion that are tied to the misinterpretation of the Scottish legislation and fills the legislative gap that I have outlined. It means that the aggravation can be applied where the other options do not apply but where a reasonable person would consider the abuse to have adversely affected the child.

Subsection 2(A) of the amendment works in the same way as it does for the offence to reflect that the child may not be aware of how the abuse has impacted on them or even that abuse is abuse. That subsection is also crucial to avoiding a scenario in which the prosecution is forced to rely on evidence given by the child in court in order for the aggravation to be applied.

Subsection 2(B) does not take anything away from that provision but clarifies that nothing in subsection 2(A) prevents people from consulting the child or young person. It is not a requirement for evidence, but a simple clarification. There are times when we need to reflect the child's voice, as well as deploying adequate protections and support that is covered in different parts of the Bill, but there is nothing in the amendment that forces or even encourages children to have given evidence. That is all covered in subsection 2(A)

Not all children see, hear or are present during incidents of abuse, not all perpetrators make use of children in abusing their victims, and not all perpetrators abuse children directly. Yet, there are many ways in which domestic abuse negatively impacts on children, and we must make sure that that is captured and reflected in the legislation and the sentencing. It is about coercive control.

There are victims with dependant children who suffer from economic abuse, which leads to financial strain and an inability to provide for their children. There is psychological abuse or coercive control in which the child has never witnessed behaviour but the effects on the victim have a knock-on effect on the child through the victim's reduced capacity to provide care, support the child's basic needs and so on.

The Scottish provisions are there for a reason. According to one key stakeholder in that jurisdiction, the Scottish clause was a significant compromise in the legislation between those who wanted to see children treated as victims in their own right and those who had reservations about attempting to do so. We cannot and should not accept lesser provisions than those that exist elsewhere. We should bring forward the best possible legislation for the people of Northern Ireland. These amendments would mean that the aggravation could be applied where a reasonable person considered the domestic abuse likely to have a negative effect on the child. They would help to prevent the potential of many children having to give evidence in court, where they would be forced to relive the trauma that they had already suffered. I encourage all Members to support amendment Nos 4 and 7.

Ms Sugden: I noted the Minister's comments at the weekend. I say this to her: keep going. It is certainly not my job to finish the Bill; we depend on her to do that. As Mr Frew said, the Bill is three years too late.

I will speak particularly about amendment No 1 and the opposition to clause 3. I am happy to support all the other amendments. I was going to speak briefly on amendment No 9, but Miss Woods covered all the detail that I intended to cover, so I do not need to go over that again. In relation to amendment No 9, however, I thank the Minister for specifically including in the Bill the aggravating offence in relation to children. We all know — others have spoken about it — that domestic abuse is a form of trauma that can perpetuate a cycle. It could even perpetuate a cycle of domestic abuse if children see it happening in the family home. We need only look at our criminal justice system to see the damage and trauma that it causes. Domestic abuse is a form of that trauma. I commend the Minister for committing to take that forward. I have no doubt that the House will support that amendment this evening.

I do not intend to support Mr Allister's amendment or his opposition to clause 3, but I will talk about them because I recognise and respect his practical experience from his previous career in relation to the application of criminal law. My comments are not meant to be an obstacle to the actions that the House will take; they are about ensuring that we are right in what we are doing. Legislation is one thing — we can get it on to the statute book — but it is the implementation that is really critical. Mr Allister raised valid concerns about the issue of harm and the reasonable person who considers that harm.

Mr Frew, rightly, said that the Bill does not mention coercive control. I am keen to hear the Minister's thoughts on why that was not included. Maybe it was not included because of a practical legal consideration. Perhaps it would provide clarity on the concerns that Mr Allister raised. I will play devil's advocate: we intend to put this clause in assuming that the victim does not know what harm is, but we assume that a reasonable person will. What does that mean? What does "harm" mean? Before the debate, I spoke briefly to the Minister about potentially creating a definition of harm in law. However, I recognise that that could have its own limitations, in that it could constrain the interpretation of what harm is. We need to be very careful about what we mean by that and what the intention is.

I tried to crystallise this group of amendments. Essentially, there are three elements: the intent; the action, abuse, or, as others described it, behaviour; and, finally, the harm. Essentially, it is the last bit — the harm — that conveys the sense of coercive control that is not yet defined in Northern Ireland law. Of course, I support that. That was my intention when I made it my overarching priority, because I recognise that psychological abuse often leads to more serious forms of abuse. Every Member will have heard, "The wounds and scars will heal; it's the mental torture that I have to live with for the rest of my life". That is an impact for not just the individual; it is an impact that has implications for wider society. Having intent linked to harm is absolutely right, but do we need to go further and define that harm so that, when it comes to the practical application of the law in a criminal court, it will be possible to apply this? The worst thing that we can do is give victims of domestic abuse hope, only for them to find that, after going through the awful process of criminal justice, it will not be upheld in a court of law. I do not know. This has not been applied here before. The Minister suggested that it will be on the basis not just of the words that are down on paper but on the basis of precedent and previous decisions. I am keen to hear where there are any examples of that, just to give me comfort that the application of it, as it is written, will actually have a practical effect when it is taken through the courts.

To add a human side, the reason that I cannot, ultimately, support Mr Allister's amendment is that, for me, it would give rise to concerns about the impact it would have on the victim. How do we determine physical and psychological harm in a court of law? Is it something that, for example, a medical practitioner has to be able to state is the case? Are we getting into a situation where the victim becomes the person investigated rather than the perpetrator of the offence? I am keen for Mr Allister, if he wishes, to intervene to share his thoughts on that.

Mr Allister: The harm, as drafted in my amendment, can be "physical and psychological". Physical harm might speak for itself. However, I would have thought that, in any case such as this, particularly of psychological harm, it would be entirely appropriate, just as if it were an assault case, that medical evidence would be called as part of the prosecution. If someone is charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm or grievous bodily harm, one would expect a medical report to be — often agreed, but if not — contested by the evidence called. More particularly, if there is an allegation of psychological harm, it, almost inevitably, would lead, as part of the proofs of the prosecution, to the calling of evidence from a medical expert.

Ms Sugden: I appreciate the Member's intervention. Those are my thoughts looking at the practical application. Yes, I absolutely recognise the sentiment. No one in the House wants it to become law more than I do, although, of course, the Minister wants that, too. I have been advocating for it for four or five years. It is long past time that we need to put it into statute. However, again, we would do a great disservice to victims of domestic abuse if we cannot put into statute something that will actually be workable and which the police and the Public Prosecution Service can understand.

I appreciate that there is an amendment that relates to training around that, but what about the general public? There is no reference in the Bill to a public awareness campaign. Maybe we need to do something to strengthen training. I am not saying that we train the general public. Where I am sympathetic to Mr Allister's comments about the interpretation of that particular line is that we assume that people know what harm is. People do not know what coercive control is, which is why it has been able to keep victims in its grip for so long. I am not saying that we should necessarily object to what is in the Bill. However, I wonder whether there is anything that we could do to strengthen it. Maybe that could be done by adding public awareness, so that the reasonable person would be able to make a reasonable judgement about what coercive control is.

I speak to many people and could nearly challenge them on their own behaviour, and they would be the first to say, "I do not behave like that". However, when that behaviour is described, they start to think twice about it. Therefore, alongside that, I would certainly encourage the Minister to look at allowing the reasonable person, if you like, to understand what coercive control is, and maybe Mr Allister would not have the same objection. I do understand the ambiguity, and we cannot do that to victims.

Ironically, and I know that they are almost mutually exclusive, I do not support Mr Allister's opposition to clause 3 because, to come back to the point, the harm element of that clause is, essentially, the coercive control element. That was the intent and purpose of it. By including that clause, we are creating a new offence in Northern Ireland. That is important, as, hopefully, it will pave the way towards fewer instances of domestic abuse. However, I will come back to that particular line.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. She is right to highlight the fact that it is the first time that we are putting down a domestic abuse offence in legislation. Whilst we want to create the best law possible, we also recognise that other jurisdictions have had more than one go at this. It may be the case here that we need to strengthen the legislation or add something more rigorous. I would not rule that out. That is why the monitoring and reporting of that offence is so important.

6.30 pm

Ms Sugden: I appreciate that. If there is an opportunity to get it right in this instance, we will prevent more victims being created. Other jurisdictions have had the experience of seeing the legislation in action and where its limitations are and have been able to go back and improve it. We are in the fortunate position — if you can call it that — of having seen over the past three years how it has worked in other jurisdictions. Perhaps we can do something to ensure that we do not have to come back to it for a second time. Our mistakes will affect lives. Perhaps there is something that we can do to strengthen it. I am not saying, "Remove it"; I am saying, "Strengthen it". I do not know the answers on this. I have not had the same focus on it as I would have had were I still in the role.

I appreciate the attention that the Justice Committee has given to it. I also really appreciate the evidence that the victims have put forward. I cannot imagine how difficult that has been. To an extent, it may have retraumatised them, but, if they are working towards trying to ensure that it does not happen to someone else, that is the biggest compliment that we can give them. As I said, I encourage the Minister to look at that.

In a topical question earlier, I asked the Minister about harm and how we define that in law. We have to be cognisant of the fact that, perhaps, a reasonable person would not understand what we understand. We are in a position where we have been given requested information, and we understand it, but people outside this Building may not, so is there a way in which we can strengthen their understanding so that what we have here will work in practice?

Mrs Long: If I may briefly, I want to put on record my thanks to the Justice Committee, the Chair and the Deputy Chair for their assistance in progressing the Bill to Consideration Stage, particularly during what has been quite a challenging time. Their scrutiny has been robust and diligent and, as they have said themselves, is an exemplar of best practice in Committee legislative scrutiny.

I look forward to us continuing to work together as the Bill progresses through its final stages in the House. Thanks also are due to the Committee staff for facilitating not just engagement with my Department but the many witnesses, some of whom were victims of domestic abuse, in making their contribution to the Bill. It is for them that we do this.

I thank all the stakeholders and victims and survivors who provided evidence and helped to shape the Bill. I am determined and have been determined since taking up office to deliver for them and with them so that we provide the best possible legislation.

I put on record my thanks to Claire Sugden for her work on the Bill while she was Justice Minister. I also thank my officials, who are passionate and dedicated to addressing domestic abuse. They have, despite challenging circumstances, maintained focus and pace not just in the last few months but over recent years, and legislation is only one part of the work that they do.

I thank the Committee and the Members who have tabled amendments, and I look forward to debating the issues today.

For too many people, home is not a safe place; instead, it is a place of hurt and fear. That situation has been exacerbated during the current pandemic. Now, it is more important than ever that we work together to put an end to domestic abuse and coercive, controlling behaviour. The most recent police statistics from August 2020 show that, from 1 July 2019 to 30 June 2020, there were 32,127 domestic abuse incidents reported in Northern Ireland. That represents a 1.8% increase on the previous year and is the highest level on record since reporting began in 2004-05. Furthermore, the police recorded 18,796 domestic abuse crimes during that same period. That shows an increase of 13.3% on the previous year and is one of the highest levels since reporting began. That equates to 17 domestic abuse incidents and 10 crimes committed per 1,000 of the Northern Ireland population.

It is important to note that those are only the reported figures. Many more victims suffer across Northern Ireland but do not feel able to report that to the police. It is important, too, that we recognise that it is for those people that we do this work. We have also seen an increase in male victims during this period and an increase in victims from younger and older age groups. It is important that we recognise that not all domestic abuse involves a current or former partner, but that it can, in around 35% of crimes, involve another familial relationship. It is important to put that on the record because it is for those people that we are here today.

Before I turn to my amendments in this group, I want to address the amendments proposed by Jim Allister. Amendment No. 1 would remove the condition contained in the domestic abuse offence:

"that a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour to be likely to cause B to suffer physical or psychological harm",

It replaces that with the condition that the person:

"suffers physical and psychological harm"

for the offence to apply.

We had a long discussion earlier in respect of why I do not believe that that is the case, so I am not going to labour the point at this stage. In the same vein, Mr Allister has given notice of his intention to oppose the Question that clause 3 stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3, as it stands, provides that an individual does not need to have suffered physical or psychological harm for the offence to be committed. It also states that it is not necessary for the effects of the behaviour covered by clause 2, such as dependency, subordination, isolation or control, to have been suffered by the partner or connected person for the offence to be committed. That is because a reasonable person test applies in relation to physical or psychological harm and relevant effects.

The proposed amendment to clause 1 and removal of clause 3 would fundamentally and detrimentally alter the nature of the offence, and the Bill. We would be unable to provide protection, and, indeed, to secure justice, in some of the most horrific cases where an individual is suffering ongoing and extensive non-physical abuse but has normalised that within their own mind.

It would also fail to recognise the insidious and invading nature of domestic abuse, and how it fundamentally operates where physical violence is not present. As I advised the House previously, I consider those provisions vital in the fight against domestic abuse and in ensuring that the focus continues to be on the abusive behaviour of the offender and not the harm caused.

It would be a travesty were someone to be not guilty of domestic abuse despite carrying out a prolonged and detailed form of abuse on a person simply because that person was resilient. That would be completely wrong, so it is important that we recognise that, as I said earlier, the action of getting behind the steering wheel of a car and driving when intoxicated with alcohol is, in itself, an offence. It does not have to lead to harm in order for someone to be prosecuted. It is important that we understand that it is the course of action that we are criminalising, not the outcome.

Many people up and down this country are suffering abusive behaviour day in and day out but they have never known anything different. They accept it as normal, and, in some cases, consider that that is just how relationships work.

For those who know anything of this, a prime example is the case of the Hart brothers — a number of Members referred to that tragic case — whose mother and sister were killed by their father. The domestic abuse homicide review stated that they:

“had been suffering intense domestic abuse for many years and didn’t know this ... as there was no physical abuse.”

That illustrates perfectly the types of behaviours that the Bill is intended to cover.

The focus must remain on the actions of the offender, that is, whether there is abusive behaviour that a reasonable person would consider would cause harm, and that it has been carried out intentionally or recklessly to that effect.

It is vital that offenders cannot escape justice because a victim has become so used to having their movements controlled, contact with family or friends restricted, and that it does not necessarily any longer cause them fear, alarm or distress.

In relation to Paul Frew’s comments about why we opted not to state in the legislation terms such as “coercive control”, “gaslighting”, “technological abuse” or “financial abuse”, to do so, as he rightly said, would lead to a defence that because it was not listed in the legislation, it was not an offence. Of course, how people control and abuse individuals is often complex and changes over time. Any list could become dated. It could also become a hierarchy, suggesting that some forms of abuse are more concerning than others.

Mr Allister also previously raised the concern that, even if there is no complaint of abuse and no objective finding of harm, a person could be sent to jail for 14 years and that that would be disproportionate. If a serious and prolonged course of action that is designed to intimidate and threaten has not happened and there is no evidence to suggest that it has happened, a person would not be subject to the maximum penalty. Suggesting that people will end up in jail for 14 years for doing nothing, essentially, or that someone against whom there is no coherent or cohesive evidence will be prosecuted is a false logic.

Ms Dillon: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Long: I will, yes.

Ms Dillon: Will the Minister agree that one of the specific examples of that is when the Hart brothers talked about the point where one of them had a nut allergy and their father brought nuts into the home and sat them on the kitchen shelf, knowing that their mother would know what it meant? That would not be enough to make a case against somebody, but, along with all the other actions, it certainly would. In that circumstance, it was very clear what that was about, but that would not be the case in every home where somebody had a nut allergy and nuts were brought in.

Mrs Long: That is precisely the point. Incidences and activities that may look innocent from outside can, in the context of an abusive relationship, take on a very different colour. We spoke with victims who said that, whenever they are out in company, their partner is absolutely, perfectly fine, but that if they transgress against the rules that are being imposed on them so that they are able to go out in public, the partner will whistle a tune or hum a song. Things that to an outside observer appear trivial have significance to that person because they know the consequences of those actions. We have to capture that behaviour. We have to make sure that people who are being subjected to a consistent and persistent line of abuse cannot have it continue with no law to back them up.

It is also important to remember that inherent to the domestic abuse offence are a number of thresholds and safeguards, checks and balances that must be met before the test for the offence is met. Mr Allister is right. Alleged victims and alleged perpetrators have the right to a fair trial, and it is important that there are, therefore, safeguards, checks and balances. The behaviour must be considered to be abusive, a reasonable person would have to consider that it would cause harm and the person must either intend to cause harm or be reckless to that. Importantly, there are safeguards associated with that defence. Where the defence of the behaviour is considered reasonable in the particular circumstances of the case, it is not considered part of this offence. I do not support this amendment, and I call on the House to reject it. Should the amendment be made, we will have failed in our bid to protect those who suffer from domestic abuse.

I will move to my amendments in this group. Amendment No 2 is a minor drafting amendment to neaten a small aspect of wording in clause 8, which deals with aggravation where the victim is under 18. I propose that the words “constituting the offence” are replaced with:

“by virtue of which the offence is constituted”.

That does not represent a material change to the provisions; rather, it is simply intended to reflect that the course of behaviour is not the sole element of the domestic abuse offence and avoids giving the sense that the behaviour alone constitutes the offence. That is similarly the case with amendment No 8.

Clause 9 deals with an aggravation where a relevant child is involved. I need to make it clear that clause 9 does not require behaviour to be abusive. It establishes aggravation of the offence for sentencing purposes. I have tabled three amendments to clause 9, amendment Nos 3, 5 and 6, on aggravation where a relevant child is involved. The purpose of the three amendments was to make, in discussions with the Committee, the provisions on the child aggravator as robust as possible, with amendment Nos 5 and 6 intended to address concerns that were raised previously by some Justice Committee members. There has been extensive debate on these clauses, including at a Committee session that I attended last week, and I listened to the concerns that were raised by some members that amendment No 6, regarding residency, would damage the Bill; for example, where a child resides elsewhere, such as via kinship care or other arrangements. Having reflected further on that and as I already advised the Justice Committee, I therefore do not intend to move amendment Nos 5 and 6. That means that the decision of the House is on the alternative amendment No 7, from Rachel Woods and Paul Frew.

I welcome the alternative amendment which, with the exception of a residency requirement, makes similar provision to my amendments.

6.45 pm

Amendment No 3 will make it explicit that the child aggravator can be applied if “any or all” of the limbs of the child aggravator are present. That is where behaviour was directed at the child; where use was made of them to direct behaviour at the victim; where a child saw, heard or was present for the abusive behaviour; or where a reasonable person would consider the behaviour to be likely to adversely affect the child. While it is considered in the current draft that any or all of the aggravators could apply, I want to make it explicit and clear that this is the case and that a number of the aggravating aspects may apply at any one time. As I have just mentioned, I will not move my second amendment to clause 9 — amendment No 5 — which provided that the aggravator would also apply if:

“a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour, or an incident of behaviour which A directed at B as part of the course of behaviour, to be likely to adversely affect the child”.

This is, however, captured in amendment No 7, the purpose of which is to provide that where, for example, the abuser controls the victim’s movements to such an extent that they are unable to leave the house to ensure that their children get to school or to get them to appointments with a doctor, then the court can determine that this amounts to behaviour:

“likely to adversely affect the child.”

It can also cover circumstances where the effect of the abusive behaviour is such that a reasonable person would consider it likely that a child’s general well-being and development would be adversely affected.

Again, I do not intend to move my third and final amendment to clause 9 — amendment No 6. As with amendment No 5, I think that it is captured within amendment No 7. This will provide that there does not need to be evidence that a child ever had any awareness or understanding of, or was actually adversely affected by, the behaviour of the accused for the aggravator to apply. However, it does not prevent evidence of this from being laid before the courts. These provisions will have the added benefit of reducing the likelihood of a child having to give evidence at court, although good practice should already seek to reduce that as far as is possible.

The House will wish to note that amendment No 5 would have had a condition that, for the “reasonable person” aspect of the aggravator, the child would have had to live with the victim or offender. This was simply intended to reflect the fact that living in an environment in which domestic abuse is carried out is what is most likely to adversely affect a child. However, having reflected on the concerns raised by Committee members, who viewed that as damaging to the Bill, I am content that this should not form part of the provisions. For that reason, amendment Nos 5 and 6 will not be moved. I consider that my amendment No 3, along with amendment No 7, provides robust provisions to ensure that the impact of domestic abuse on children can be fully reflected in the sentencing that a court may impose, so I ask the House to support those amendments.

Amendment No 4, tabled by Rachel Woods and Paul Frew, amends clause 9 to provide that the child aggravator also applies if, at any time in the commission of the offence, the accused “threatened to direct” behaviour at a child. While I considered that the threatening behaviour aspect is already captured by the offence, with the child aggravator then applying to this, this provision would make that aspect explicit. For that reason, I will support the amendment and ask the House to do the same.

Amendment No 10 makes an addition to clause 13, “Alternative available for conviction”, to state that:

“This section is without prejudice to section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 (alternative verdicts on trial on indictment).”

This amendment is for the avoidance of doubt as to the effect of clause 13 on section 6(2) of that Act, which contains general provisions for alternative verdicts in indictment proceedings, and so that there can be no cross-contamination between the two enactments.

I am proposing two amendments to clause 25 in response to a request from the Justice Committee. The first amendment — amendment No 16 — provides that my Department “must”, rather than “may”, issue guidance. I stress that there was never any doubt that guidance would be prepared, and work is already well under way on this. A second meeting of the multi-agency task and finish group was held yesterday to consider the revised content of the guidance, and good progress is being made with regard to that.

Secondly, amendment No 17 provides that the guidance issued by my Department will include:

“such other matters as it considers appropriate” as to criminal law or procedure relating to domestic abuse in Northern Ireland. At present, the clause only refers to:

“other matters as to criminal law or procedure relating to domestic abuse in Northern Ireland.”

In conclusion, there are a number of issues that cannot be addressed by the Justice Department alone. They will require other Ministers to also contribute. I want to put on record my appreciation for the support and cooperation of other Ministers, not only for the Bill, but for their ongoing support for the wider domestic abuse landscape and the domestic abuse strategy, which will take many of those issues forward. That includes issues such as the public awareness-raising campaign, which Claire Sugden has raised and in which my Department is heavily engaged. That campaign is to raise awareness of domestic abuse in our society, to challenge preconceptions of who may be a victim or perpetrator and to increase confidence from the public that they should intervene and report when they believe that domestic abuse is occurring. Indeed, in response to the COVID pandemic, we invested additional resources in addressing public communications.

This has been a useful and helpful debate. I am happy that that concludes, at this stage, my comments on this group of amendments.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I call Jim Allister to make a winding-up speech on the debate on the group 1 amendments.

Mr Allister: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I hope that I do not have to say this, but I will say it: I am not interested in providing any refuge for any domestic abuser. Domestic abuse is insidious and iniquitous, and it deserves the full rigour of the law. I am interested in the sanctity of the criminal law, and that is why I laid out my arguments. I acknowledge that I have not convinced the House, and I have to accept that. I accept that I have not overturned the predetermined collective view of the Committee. I regret that, but it is reality.

I am glad that I made the points, because there could come a point when this legislation is looked back upon and questions are asked about why we thought that it was right to create an offence where the law requires an intent or a recklessness to doing harm but we decided that you could be guilty of domestic abuse without actually doing harm. I drew the parallel that you would not think that you could be convicted of theft without actually stealing. However, the House thinks that you can be convicted of domestic abuse without causing the harm from such abuse. In that, I respectfully suggest that the House is wrong and that it does a disservice to the certainty and sanctity of the criminal law.

I am not going to labour the point, but I will ask the question, “What is the mischief that we are trying to address?”. The mischief, surely, is that women and men — but women predominately — are abused. That is why we call the offence “domestic abuse”. It says it in there: this offence shall be called the “domestic abuse offence”. Yet, we rush our fences to the point where we decide that we do not actually have to have any abuse in order for someone to be guilty of that offence. If the direction of travel is to deal with coercive abuse, why does this legislation not make an offence of coercive abuse? Why is that not the offence? I could understand that: if that is the target, make it the offence. Make the offence “coercive abuse”, have the evidence that that was the intention, and, in those circumstances, you could lay a path to justifying external evidence that that would be perceived to be coercive abuse.

When you make the offence actual domestic abuse, however, you cannot dodge the necessity, I say, of showing that there is abuse and there is harm. Otherwise, you arrive at the ridiculous situation in which you invite a jury to convict someone who fails in their intent, who fails to cause harm and who fails to cause psychological harm, and nonetheless you say, “Convict”.

That is why I say that we are doing despite to the essence of the criminal law and the need for an actus reus and a mens rea. All that you have in this offence is mens rea and someone else, who is not the victim but some mythical, reasonable person, who believes that there was an actus reus. That is a bit farcical, but I recognise that I have not persuaded the House. I regret that, but you have your view and I have mine, and, in due course, we may see the wisdom of whatever path was trod.

Amendment No 1 negated.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 (Impact of behaviour on victim)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Before I put the Question, I remind Members that we have debated Mr Allister’s opposition to clause 3. The Question will be put in the positive as usual.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 (Aggravation where victim is under 18)

Amendment No 2 made: In page 5, line 24, leave out “constituting the offence” and insert “by virtue of which the offence is constituted”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9 (Aggravation where relevant child is involved)

Amendment No 3 made: In page 6, line 6, after “if” insert “(any or all)” — [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 4 made: In page 6, line 8, after “directed” insert “, or threatened to direct,” — [Miss Woods.]

Amendment No 5 not moved.

Amendment No 6 not moved.

Amendment No 7 made: In page 6, line 11, after “behaviour.” insert

“Or

(c) a reasonable person would consider the course of behaviour, or an incident of A’s behaviour that forms part of the course of behaviour, to be likely to adversely affect the child.

(2A) For it to be proved that the offence is so aggravated, there does not need to be evidence that a child –

(a) has ever had any awareness or understanding of A’s behaviour, or

(b) has ever been adversely affected by A’s behaviour.

(2B) Nothing in this subsection prevents evidence from being led about—

(a) a child’s observations of, or feelings as to, A’s behaviour, or

(b) a child’s situation so far as arising because of A’s behaviour.”.— [Miss Woods.]

Clause 9, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 (Behaviour occurring outside the UK)

Amendment No 8 made: In page 6, line 38, leave out “course of behaviour would constitute the domestic abuse offence” and insert “domestic abuse offence would be constituted by virtue of the course of behaviour”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 10, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Members, it has been a long session. I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 7.15 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 7.03 pm and resumed at 7.15 pm.

Debate resumed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 9, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 11 to 14. I call the Minister of Justice to move amendment No 9 and to address the other amendments in the group.

Clause 11 (Exception where responsibility for children)

Mrs Long: I beg to move amendment No 9: In page 7, line 15, leave out “18” and insert “16”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 11: In clause 17, page 9, line 21, leave out “18” and insert “16”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 12: New Clause

Before clause 21 insert

“Definitions for child cruelty offence

Meaning of ill-treatment etc. in offence provision

20A. In section 20 (cruelty to persons under 16) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968—

(a) in subsection (1), the words from ‘(including’ to ‘derangement)’ are repealed,

(b) before paragraph (a) of subsection (2) insert—

‘(za) a reference to—

(i) ill-treatment is to ill-treatment whether physical or otherwise;

(ii) suffering or injury is to suffering or injury whether physical or otherwise;’.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 13: New Clause

After clause 24 insert

“Interim protection for the victim

24A.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations, within 24 months of commencement, make provision for measures which may be made for the purposes of protecting and supporting the victim or alleged victim.

(2) The regulations may include provisions about —

(a) court orders,

(b) measures other than court orders.

(3) The regulations may not be made unless a draft has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Northern Ireland Assembly.”.— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

No 14: New Clause

After clause 24 insert

“Amendment to the eligibility requirement for civil legal aid

24A. In The Civil Legal Services (Financial) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015, Article 10 (1), at end insert —

“(ab) advice and assistance or representation in proceedings for, or in relation to, any order referred in Article 8(1) of the Children (Northern Ireland) Act 1995 where the client is a victim of domestic abuse in accordance with the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Act (Northern Ireland) 2020.”.— [Miss Woods.]

Mrs Long: Amendment No 9 is being moved as a consequence of amendment No 12, through which the offence of child cruelty will explicitly cover non-physical ill treatment of children aged under 16.

Clause 11 as it stands provides that the domestic abuse offence does not apply where a person has parental responsibility for someone under 18 years of age. I propose an amendment to change the age from under 18 years to under 16 years. That is to ensure that non-physical abusive behaviour of a 16-to-18-year-old by someone with parental responsibility is captured under the new offence. It is necessary, given that section 20 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1968, which is to be amended through amendment No 12 to capture non-physical ill treatment of a child by someone with parental responsibility for them, applies only to persons under 16 years of age. Doing otherwise would mean that those aged 16 to 17 would not be protected from non-physical abusive behaviour.

Clause 17 provides that an offence cannot be aggravated by reason of involving domestic abuse if the partner or connected person is under 18 and the accused has parental responsibility for them. I propose an amendment to the clause — amendment No 11 — to change the age from under 18 years to under 16 years. That is for the same reasons as I have just set out for the previous amendment.

Amendment No 12 inserts a new clause on the definitions for the child cruelty offence. Evidence received by the Justice Committee during its deliberations on the Bill highlighted concerns that non-physical abuse of a child by someone with parental responsibility for them was not captured by current child protection provisions. In order to respond to that, I have tabled the amendment to amend the child cruelty offence in section 20 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1968. The amendment makes it clear that non-physical ill treatment of a child by someone with parental responsibility for them is an offence. The offence applies to those under the age of 16. It will also provide that references to an offence around unnecessary suffering or injury to a child explicitly state that that relates to the suffering or injury being physical or otherwise, again ensuring that non-physical behaviour is captured in the offence. That will enable matters such as isolation, humiliation, bullying and many others to be captured under the offence. Discussions have been held with the Department of Health on the amendment, and the Health Minister is content with the change.

While the ill treatment or abuse of a child or young person falls into the child protection arena, it is important to ensure at this point that the necessary protections are afforded to all our young people. While we can debate whether the child cruelty offence should have a threshold of under 18 as opposed to under 16, it is not possible to provide for that in the Bill. Ultimately, my focus is on ensuring that abusive behaviour against children can be dealt with through whatever means. For that reason, amendment Nos 9, 11 and 12 make it explicit that the child cruelty offence covers both physical and non-physical ill treatment of those aged 16 and under while extending the domestic abuse offence to those aged 16 and 17. Without those three changes being made together, there would not be the necessary protections for those aged 16 and 17. A failure by the House to approve amendment Nos 9 and 11 would mean that protection from abusive behaviour was not afforded to those aged 16 and 17.

In relation to those provisions, I reassure Members that we are not criminalising normal family disagreements or parental responsibility. For example, where a young person is grounded, their allowance is removed or they no longer have access to electronic communications and social media because of their behaviour, that would not be within the scope of the offence. There are more than sufficient safeguards in legislation to ensure that, given that there are three hurdles that must be passed before the offence occurs: these are that behaviour must be abusive and occur on two or more occasions; that a reasonable person would have to consider the behaviour likely to cause harm; and that the accused must intend to cause harm or be reckless as to that. There is also a defence of behaviour being reasonable in the particular circumstances.

I turn now to amendment No 13, which is a Committee for Justice amendment. I understand that the Committee has concerns about the introduction of provisions for new domestic abuse protection notices and orders and that, to a certain extent, the provision is intended to act as a stopgap in case the necessary legislation is not made to provide for these. I have made it clear that it is my intention that provision will be made for this in the justice (miscellaneous provisions) Bill, and, therefore, I consider the amendment unnecessary. More importantly, explicitly stating a restrictive two-year time frame for the introduction of an untested policy that has not yet been subject to public consultation leaves my Department exposed to a successful judicial review and unnecessary levels of risk. There are many factors outside our control that could mean that it is not possible to achieve this, which is particularly important when we consider the current pandemic and the impact that it has had on how all of us work. There are also significant resource implications to an approach that would require my Department to progress through both primary and secondary legislation at the same time. These are resources that we simply do not have.

Inclusion in the justice (miscellaneous provisions) Bill will enable the detail of the provisions to be set out in primary legislation, as well as the necessary policy development and consultation to be undertaken ahead of this. I reassured Members of that in my earlier remarks. I consider that the notices and orders will garner much public interest and that it is only right that a full public consultation be undertaken and the House has the opportunity for the detail to be set out in primary legislation. The approach adopted by the Committee amendment would mean regulating in secondary legislation an issue that takes the form of around 35 clauses in Westminster legislation, which is, effectively, the extent of a medium-sized Bill. I consider that the Executive and the House should be aware of and pass the broad intent of such expansive provisions in primary legislation, setting out clear authority for any such measures. While the provisions will be brought forward at amendment stage of the justice (miscellaneous provisions) Bill, due to the stage of policy development that we are at, and will, therefore, not be subject to the usual Committee Stage process, I have given my commitment that the Department will engage fully with the Committee on the preparation and progress of the provisions in such a manner as the Committee sees fit to ensure that it has the appropriate scrutiny of the clauses. That approach will also ensure that the House has two opportunities at amending stage to debate the detail of the provisions in the Bill finalisation. For those reasons, I cannot support the amendment and ask Members to support me in resisting it.

Amendment No 14 would confer a discretionary power on the Legal Services Agency to waive the financial eligibility test in private family law cases in circumstances where the applicant has been the victim of a domestic abuse offence. I am deeply sympathetic to the intention behind Rachel Woods's amendment. It is clearly a laudable aim to ensure that victims of abuse are supported to establish safe and stable arrangements for the care of their children. Nevertheless, there are three important reasons why the approach taken here is not the right one and why we should seek to provide the support in another way.

First, it is not clear to me that the amendment would provide the right protection for such victims. For example, while a waiver would provide access to legal aid, it would not be free of charge. Victims would need to make an upfront contribution to the cost of the representation. Where a victim of abuse is unable to access their resources — where they are being controlled by their abuser, for example — that would still leave a very vulnerable person without representation. Furthermore, a person who is the victim of abuse but whose abuser has not been convicted of the relevant offence under this Bill would also not be assisted by the proposal. For example, if someone was to be convicted under the alternative options available for prosecution, they would not benefit from the proposal. There is a range of protections that might be afforded to victims and a range of circumstances in which they could be made available. I take the view that the best approach to determining the form of protection is engagement with stakeholders to construct a form of protection that will address the real issues that victims of abuse face. I agree with the Member who proposed the amendment that those issues are real and need to be addressed.

Secondly, at present, I am unable to state with confidence what impact the amendment would have on victims of abuse or on the operation of the family courts generally and nor can I be clear about what its costs might be. Legal aid is a complex and contested area of law, and it interacts in complex ways with the experience of people in contact with the civil courts. Research work is still required to understand the likely impact and cost of the protections that we offer. It simply does not make sense to act hastily by introducing changes with no clear idea of the impact that they will have, unless the situation is urgent.

We are not in that state of urgency because, thirdly, the Department has powers to make secondary legislation to provide the protection that is required. Secondary legislation is the appropriate vehicle for technical amendments of this type. It is not just a question of appropriateness or propriety: by using secondary legislation to provide those powers, we give ourselves time to engage with stakeholders and understand the most appropriate forms that the protections should take and can conduct research so that we fully understand the likely impact and cost of those reforms. Crucially, it also means that we can monitor those changes and their impact and act promptly to make changes to the system if it is not having the impact that we want. If we put that provision in primary legislation, we would lose each of those opportunities, and, almost inevitably, the people whom we are trying to help would be less protected than they might otherwise be as a result. For those reasons, I cannot support the amendment, and I ask Members to support me in resisting it. I am committed to working constructively with the Justice Committee to develop subordinate legislation to address this important issue.

That concludes my comments, at this stage, on this group of amendments.

Mr Givan: I will cover the amendments in this group that were tabled by the Minister and by Miss Rachel Woods MLA, before setting out details of the Committee's proposed amendment.

On amendment Nos 9, 11 and 12, questions were raised with the Committee by a wide range of organisations, particularly those that represent children, regarding the fact that the domestic abuse offence does not apply where an individual has parental responsibility for someone under the age of 18 and whether existing children's legislation provides adequate protection for child victims of non-physical abuse. The Committee discussed the position with NSPCC and Barnardo's representatives when they attended to give oral evidence and requested further information and clarification from Department of Justice officials, who indicated that the Department had given careful consideration to the scope of the domestic abuse offence to ensure that children would be captured within it in their own right where they are in a relationship or are a family member, while preventing criminalisation of parental responsibility.

The officials also outlined that, having considered the matter further and taken account of the concerns expressed to the Committee, discussions were taking place with Department of Health officials on a possible amendment to child protection provisions in health legislation to make it clear that non-physical ill treatment of a child by someone with parental responsibility for them is an offence and to provide that references to an offence around unnecessary suffering or injury to a child explicitly state that that relates to suffering or injury being physical or otherwise, again ensuring that non-physical behaviour is covered. That should enable matters such as isolation, humiliation, bullying etc to be captured. Amendment No 12, the text of which was furnished to the Committee by the Department, provides for that by amending the child cruelty offence in section 20 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1968.

When the Department provided the wording of the proposed amendment towards the end of Committee Stage, it advised the Committee that the child cruelty offence applied only to those under the age of 16. As was explained by the Minister, to ensure that non-physical ill treatment of those aged 16 and 17 in the context of a parent-child relationship could be provided for in the legislation, the Department considered reducing the age threshold for the parental responsibility exclusion from under age 18 to under age 16, as provided for in amendment Nos 9 and 11. Although the Committee was concerned about the gap that the amendment to the child cruelty offence, if made, would cause, it viewed the proposed remedy of reducing the age threshold for the parental responsibility exclusion as a significant change and did not believe that it was in a position to clearly understand the implications or consequences of making it without the input and views of key stakeholders and further time to consider and discuss the issue.

The Department sought the views of the NSPCC and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People to try to assist the Committee, but neither commented directly on the proposal to reduce the age threshold. They remained of the view that children should be wholly captured in the domestic abuse offence and that the parental responsibility exclusion should not apply.

7.30 pm

The Committee accepts that child protection legislation falls to the Department of Health and, therefore, supports the approach taken in the Bill on the scope of the offence. The Committee also believes that the law should be robust and clear regarding the position of non-physical ill-treatment or injury to a child under the age of 16 and is, therefore, content to support the amendment to the child cruelty offence.

The Committee sought but did not have sufficient information to properly consider the proposal by the Department to reduce the age threshold for the parental responsibility exclusion from under age 18 to under age 16 before the Committee Stage of the Bill was due to be completed. Therefore, it noted the proposed amendments to clauses 11 and 17.

The Committee advised the Department that, assuming that the amendment to the child cruelty offence was made, it expected it to ensure that the gap created for 16- and 17-year-olds was fully addressed. It also indicated that it would consider any further information provided on the implications or consequences of the Department's proposed remedy and/or any other options available to address the issue. The Department subsequently advised the Committee that it did not consider that there were other options to address that gap in the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill and that the Minister intended to table the amendments to clauses 11 and 17 to change the age from under 18 years of age to under 16 years of age to ensure that non-physical abuse of a 16- or 17-year-old by someone with parental responsibility is captured by the new offence. The Department also indicated that any wider changes in that area would be the responsibility of the Department of Health and that it understood that no further changes are being considered at this stage.

When the Minister attended the Committee meeting last Thursday, the amendments were discussed further. Following that, the Committee agreed that it was content to support them to ensure that the gap is addressed. However, the Committee is of the view that that is a suboptimal solution and that work will need to be done with the Department of Health to ensure there is better alignment across the board in these areas.

The Committee has not had an opportunity to consider and reach a position on Ms Woods's amendment No 14 about the eligibility requirement for legal aid. Therefore, I will address that later, when I speak in a personal capacity. My colleague Paul Frew will also elaborate on the DUP's position on that amendment.

The Justice Committee has tabled amendment No 13 to provide for measures to protect and support victims and alleged victims of domestic violence and abuse. The Minister has outlined her objection to the amendment, and I want to set out the reasons why the Committee has tabled it and the rationale for framing it in the way that it has. As the Assembly has heard, the Department of Justice took legislative powers to provide for domestic violence protection notices and orders similar to those in England and Wales, in the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015. However, for a number of reasons, the Department has never introduced them. In England and Wales, they are now being replaced by new domestic abuse protection notices and orders under the Westminster Domestic Abuse Bill. The new notices and orders will address the broader definition of domestic abuse that is being introduced there and will make other changes to address some of the operational shortcomings that were experienced with the old-style notices and orders.

In the evidence received by the Committee on the Bill, recognition of the limitations of the old-style notices and orders and support for the introduction of domestic abuse protection notices and orders came from a range of organisations, including statutory bodies, advocacy groups and trade unions, which highlighted that they will soon be available in England and Wales. Although some of the organisations noted that the Department was considering progressing that matter in future legislation, others believed that it should be covered in the Bill.

The 2019 Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland thematic report on the handling of domestic violence and abuse cases by the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland urged progress on protection notices. The Northern Ireland Policing Board, having benchmarked with England and Wales through police performance monitoring on domestic violence and abuse, is also of the view that there is considerable merit in introducing domestic abuse protection notices and orders and would support that in legislation.

The chairperson of the Northern Ireland Policing Board performance committee recently wrote to the Justice Committee highlighting the fact that the performance committee had considered police performance against measures in the annual performance plan for 2020-21, with a focus on repeat victims, repeat offenders and the delivery of effective crime outcomes on domestic violence and abuse. The performance committee had discussed a potential gap in legislative provisions in the Bill before us today to provide for domestic abuse protection notices and orders and how that could impact on the police's ability to protect victims further, and it asked the Committee for an update on progress in that area.

The Committee sought the views of the PSNI on the potential benefits for victims of domestic abuse of such orders. In their response, the police highlighted their concerns regarding the old-style domestic violence protection notices and orders that are in operation in England and Wales and that the Department was continuing to work towards in Northern Ireland and suggested that, rather than introducing them, further formal consultation in determining the most effective way ahead in Northern Ireland would be beneficial.

In August, the Department advised the Committee that it was looking at proposals for the introduction of domestic abuse protection notices and orders and, due to the policy and operational lead-in time required, that would be taken forward at the amendment stage of the proposed miscellaneous provisions justice Bill. The Minister subsequently advised the Committee in September that, given the concerns expressed by the statutory and voluntary and community sector bodies during discussions, and the issues evident from England and Wales, she did not believe that the old-style domestic violence protection notices and orders should be introduced in Northern Ireland, and the Department would instead focus on policy development on the new domestic abuse protection notices and orders. Suffice it to say, it has been a long drawn-out process by the Department to get to this point.

The Committee recognises the benefits of domestic abuse protection notices and orders in providing short-term protection to victims for a time after an incident and giving them time and space to consider their next steps. The Committee also understands that there is a need to develop the policy in this area and identify the most appropriate option for Northern Ireland. Members are, however, concerned and frustrated about how long Northern Ireland has already been without any form of protection notices, and we do not find any reassurance in the fact that legislative provision in this area will be advanced by the Department only during the progress of the proposed miscellaneous provisions Bill.

In order to ensure that progress is made, the Committee agreed to table amendment No 13 to place a duty on the Minister to provide for a scheme within 24 months of commencement of this legislation for the purposes of protecting and supporting victims or alleged victims of domestic abuse. Rather than being prescriptive, the amendment provides for the details of such a scheme to be set out in regulations, thus enabling the Department to identify and progress the most appropriate scheme for Northern Ireland. The Minister advised the Committee on 1 November that she considered the amendment to be unnecessary, and she has set out her reasons for that today.

Let me be clear: the Committee could have taken the detailed provisions in the Westminster Bill relating to domestic abuse protection notices and orders and tabled them as amendments to this Bill. However, we are aware that Scotland intends to introduce a form of protective orders for people at risk of domestic abuse. The Committee wants to provide the Department with the opportunity to develop the most appropriate policy option for Northern Ireland. Therefore, rather than being prescriptive in the Bill and setting out a particular approach or simply lifting a scheme wholesale from another jurisdiction, the Committee amendment deliberately gives flexibility by providing for the details of court orders or measures other than court orders to be set out in regulations.

The timescale of 24 months from the commencement of the Bill is, in our view, entirely reasonable, particularly given that the Department advised the Committee in August that it was already considering proposals for domestic abuse protection notices and orders. Although the Committee notes the Minister's stated intention to make provision in the proposed miscellaneous provisions Bill, as I outlined earlier, the Committee does not find reassurance in that position, particularly as the intention is to do so during the amending stages of the Bill rather than at its introduction. Until we see the proposed provisions and, indeed, the Bill being introduced, there is no guarantee that legislative provision in this area will be available. The Committee therefore sees no reason not to take the opportunity to make legislative provision in this Bill.

The Minister recently advised the Committee that she hopes to introduce the miscellaneous provisions Bill in March 2021. If that happens and the Department introduces relevant provisions for domestic abuse protection notices and orders or something similar at the amending stage, the Department can also repeal the Committee's provision in this Bill, assuming that it is made, as it will then not be necessary. We would be content with that approach. If, however, for whatever reason, the Department is unable either to progress the miscellaneous provisions Bill or bring forward provisions for domestic abuse protection notices and orders during its passage through the Assembly, the Committee amendment will provide a legislative basis on which to progress that issue within a reasonable time frame. If we do not take the opportunity provided by this Bill to put in place that provision, there is the possibility that progress in this area may not be made until a new Assembly mandate. That is totally unacceptable, given the length of time that Northern Ireland has already been without this type of scheme.

The Committee fails to understand the Minister's lack of support for the approach that we are taking and her assertion that it places the Department at considerable risk of successful judicial review if the timescale of 24 months cannot be met, particularly given her commitment that she is bringing forward provisions as part of the miscellaneous provisions Bill, which will be introduced well within that timescale.

Mrs Long: Will the Chair give way?

Mr Givan: I therefore ask the Assembly to support the Committee amendment. I am happy to give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: I am happy to elucidate the reasons that there could be problems. It is an untried and untested policy. There has been no public consultation. There has therefore not been the opportunity for us to shape the domestic abuse protection notices. Although I share the Committee's frustration at the domestic violence protection notices not being able to be proceeded with in a more timely fashion, the risk is that, if we go out to consultation and significant issues emerge about the operation of domestic abuse protection notices in other jurisdictions or there is significant resistance to the introduction of domestic abuse protection notices during that consultation, we will be considered to have acted in a way that is not taking account of those who responded if we are already committed in law to undertaking a course of action.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for that intervention. I will not repeat all the rationale that the Committee considered, because that is exactly what I would be doing, as I have already addressed it. Of course, the Minister will make the winding-up speech on this group of amendments and, I am sure, will be capable of adding more detail. The position that I have outlined on behalf of the Committee has already been stated on the record.

I will speak briefly in a personal capacity. My colleague Paul Frew will address amendment No 14 in more detail. Suffice it to say, as the Minister has outlined, there is a lot of sympathy and, indeed, support for the rationale behind it. The Minister outlined in her comments some concern that there would still be upfront costs to address the impact on victims, even if the amendment were to be made; indeed, she highlighted some concerns around costs. As I said, my colleague Mr Frew will deal with the amendment. If the amendment is passed, some of the concerns that the Minister has outlined could be addressed at Further Consideration Stage. As far as the DUP is concerned, however, we are very sympathetic to the intended purpose of amendment No 14. At this point, I am content to resume my place.

Mr Sheehan: I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate. I was on the Justice Committee when Claire Sugden was Minister, and I was on it when the institutions were resurrected earlier this year. I have since moved on. The issues that I want to deal with overlap with Health. It is clear that there are overlaps in the Bill between the realms of Justice and Health. That is most apparent in clauses 9, 11 and 17, which deal with the child aggravator and the exception to the aggravation where the perpetrator has parental responsibility over a child.

7.45 pm

I recognise that organisations raised some issues about the parental responsibility exception, specifically the question of whether existing child protection legislation provided adequate protection for child victims of non-physical abuse. That was raised by organisations such as the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Victim Support, Barnardo's, the NSPCC, Women's Aid, the Children's Law Centre and many others, and I thank them all for their important contributions. It is directly because of those important contributions to the discourse on the Bill that the Department of Justice decided, in consultation with officials from the Department of Health, to amend the Bill to provide for more explicit protections for children. It is my view and that of my party that, quite clearly, abuse, be it domestic abuse or child abuse, is not limited to physical abuse. It is important that all victims of abuse are afforded the same protections from non-physical abuse.

Such abuse has a stark, damaging and lasting impact on a child, and such adverse childhood experiences — they are known as “ACEs” — can lead to serious damage to a person's life. ACEs are a growing topic in academic and political discourse due to the increasing awareness of the impact that they can have on a child in later life, including mental health issues, addiction issues, educational, social and economic inequalities and more.

The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child must be the baseline used when making decisions on protecting children. More specifically, I want to draw attention to paragraph 1 of article 3 of the UNCRC, which states:

“the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration.”

I believe that amendment No 12, which amends child cruelty legislation to make it explicitly clear that abuse can be non-physical, is important, because it will engage the UNCRC much more meaningfully and provide much greater safeguards for children who may be subject to abuse. The amendment will make it clear that it is an offence to cause suffering or injury to a child, be it physical or psychological in nature; for example, isolation, humiliation or bullying. That goes further than provisions in legislation in all other jurisdictions of these islands, and that is to be commended.

Ms S Bradley: First, I will speak directly to amendment Nos 9 and 11.

The SDLP recognises that the lowering of the age to 16 ensures that victims aged 16 to 18 who cannot seek legal redress through other provisions will be captured in the new offence. We note that the Bill is not intended as the legislative pathway for persons under the age of 16 for domestic abuse offences against them. Unlike 16- and 17-year-olds served by the amendment, they are reliant on the Children and Young Persons Act.

I was going to quote from the letter from the Minister at this point, but I think that that is sufficiently on the record at this stage. In the letter, the Minister talks us through the reasoning behind the Department's thinking, and I accept that. What I will say is that, while I support the Minister's amendment in that regard in wanting to cover all young people, the SDLP shares the concerns raised by others that an inequality in sentencing will arise from that disjointed approach. I appreciate that I had the opportunity to speak briefly to the Minister about that during our last Justice Committee meeting, and I accept that the outcome is not entirely within the Minister's gift to resolve. Although, arguably, it is the correct thing to do, I urge her, along with the Minister of Health, to ensure that, if any inequality is raised at the time, urgent action is taken to swiftly rectify that.

Amendment No 12 would insert a new clause, “Definitions for child cruelty offence”. Again, I see how that is required to ensure that there is alignment on the age factor, so we will support it.

The Chair of the Committee outlined very well the Committee's position on amendment No 13. It is a reasonable presentation at this time, and it allows for a reasonable period for the Department to act. Rather than reiterate what has been said and further to the Minister's intervention, I highlight that the amendment is sufficiently vague about the regulations. The amendment states that: so any consultation process will have sufficient regard to what is heard during that consultation. I do not accept that that is a valid ground not to move and support amendment No 13.

“The regulations may include provisions about—”,

The Member who tabled amendment No 14 will know that I have huge sympathy for it. It was my intention, although that has been unsuccessful to this point, to genuinely try to understand the position of the victim. In very many cases, unless we have right the piece where we talk about supporting the victim, victims may never present themselves. They may never have the confidence to come forward. We had to look at all the empowering tools that we could reach for in order to help those victims to come forward and present their case. One concern that I had and continue to have is that financial restraint — the perpetrator restricting access to finance — could mean the person fails to come forward. That could be the deciding factor in not taking action.

Likewise, the amendment speaks to legal aid. It is that recurring effect, and I know that the Member who tabled the amendment will speak to that. The perpetrator is trying to break the person in every way they can. If one of the tools for them to do that is to continually and persistently bring that person to court over minor and unfounded offences, just the process of having to do that and defend yourself is another form of abuse. I can see how the legal aid system stepping in would prevent the effect that the perpetrator hopes to achieve. The victim who is being dragged to court perpetually will not become financially broke by that if legal aid sweeps in and supports them. As the Minister said, however, this piece has not been developed as fully as it could be. What of those victims who may not run the full course of the Bill but are taking a case outside it? They, too, would deserve that support.

I spoke at length with the Member who tabled the amendment. I am torn, because I see that it is not a perfect piece at this stage. That said, the SDLP will support it because to anchor it now in the Bill is the right thing to do and allows us to tease out those further conversations around it.

Mr Beattie: I will be brief, because a lot of information has come across already that addresses an awful lot. There is no point in talking just for the sake of talking. There are others who I need to listen to before I can make a fully informed choice, if I am really honest.

We absolutely support amendment Nos 9 and 11, which would move the age down from 18 to 16. We understand what it is trying to achieve. It is not ideal, but we will support those amendments.

The new clause proposed by amendment No 12 really is welcome. A definition for “child cruelty offence” is really needed. I am glad that the Minister tabled that amendment, because it will give us so much power to protect children.

I am struck by this line in amendment No 13:

“protecting and supporting the victim”

Clearly, the whole Bill is about protecting and supporting the victim in one way or another, and domestic abuse protection orders and notices are one of the ways to do that.

I guess that nearly everybody in here has come across someone who has been a victim of domestic abuse in one way or another. I certainly have, and the individual whom I know was a male who was being abused by his wife while the children were in the house. When I say “abused”, I mean that he was physically abused. After he had been abused, he would leave the house because that is what men do; they leave the house and leave the children and the wife there. When he went out the door, there was nothing to protect or support him legally. All he could do was traipse back into the house to be abused all over again. That cycle continued until I got him out of the house and into accommodation. I moved him away from there, and I went through a system of getting him access to his children.

The new clause introduced by amendment No 13 is a justified and a good clause, and we should definitely support it. My party will support it. I have absolute sympathy with the Justice Minister, and maybe, in the Further Consideration Stage, we can enhance it. However, it needs to be in the Bill. To use a phrase that has already been used, it needs to be anchored in the Bill.

I am absolutely minded to support amendment No 14. We have discussed it with Ms Woods, and I absolutely understand what she is trying to achieve. However, I need it expanded a little more. I do not think that I have as much information as I want. At the start I said that I want to finish because I want to hear other Members. One of the other Members whom I want to hear from is Ms Woods. I want her to give us some information on this. I think that Mr Frew will talk about it as well. It says a lot for the Assembly that you can listen to other Members and possibly change your mind on a clause. I am minded to support it. It certainly is a clause that we can get into the Bill and enhance at a later stage, but I would like to hear more information about it. I do not know whether this addresses it or not, but we all know of occasions where one parent in an abuse case is getting legal aid and the other is not and one is financially drying the other one out completely. That is another form of domestic abuse. It is an endless cycle, I suppose. A little more information on that would help me out, but I am certainly minded to support amendment No 14.

Ms Bradshaw: I support amendment Nos 9, 11 and 12 and oppose amendment Nos 13 and 14.

Amendment No 9 is an important clarification that non-physical ill treatment of someone aged 16 or 17 will be captured by the offence. It has been placed in the group alongside amendment No 11 to clause 17 because it does the same thing: it clarifies that the domestic abuse aggravator also applies if the victim is aged 16 or 17.

Amendment No 12 is an additional clause that enhances that, based on evidence received by the Committee, making non-physical ill treatment of a child by someone with parental responsibility for them an offence and clarifying that any suffering or injury need not necessarily be physical.

I have concerns about amendment No 13, not because I oppose its intent, but because, in fact, I support it. I do not believe, however, that such an important process — a significant element, amounting to 35 clauses of the equivalent Bill for England and Wales — should be taken forward through regulations; instead, it should be properly consulted on with the public and scrutinised by the Assembly, not least the Justice Committee, as part of forthcoming primary legislation in this Assembly term. In my and my party’s view, the interests of victims are best served by a thorough process, making sure that we get it right.

While I suspect that I have sympathy with the intent of amendment No 14, I am unclear about the wording. I simply do not believe that it would be workable as it stands.

It should be emphasised that legal aid is already available to anyone who needs it to secure a non-molestation order. People with high incomes make a small contribution towards their representation, but no one is paying thousands or even hundreds of pounds for that. Nevertheless, we will continue to look at this, particularly because one common means of control is to remove access to funds. If the intent is to ensure that no one is unable to bring a case of domestic abuse due to a lack of funds, we would like to achieve that in the Bill, via an appropriate amendment, if necessary.

Finally, it is worth emphasising that no one is removing parental responsibility. There is a reasonable behaviour defence, and standard penalties such as grounding or removing access to social media, do not fall within the scope of the Bill.

8.00 pm

Mr Frew: This is the second stage of the debate, which has been a good one, and I have really enjoyed it. This is definitely the business end of our job. We have a certain group of amendments and clauses to look at.

Amendment No 11 reduces the age from 18 to 16. I think that we all recognise the gap, and there is no problem with that. There is no issue with lowering the age in regard to aggravation and also lowering the age in regard to the other issue. We could see the anomaly that had been created, so there is no problem there.

There is no problem with amendment No 12, which is a new clause on the meaning of ill treatment etc in offence provision. Doug told a story about that, and I agree with his assessment.

I will move on to amendment Nos 13 and 14. I remember tabling an amendment in the last Assembly mandate. I think that was an amendment to the Justice (No.2) Bill, but, as my memory is sketchy, it could have been the Justice (No.1) Bill. It was to do something similar with regard to orders. The Minister at the time was Mr David Ford, and he gave me a commitment in this very House that, if I withdrew my amendment, he would carry it on. He criticised the wording and said that it was untidy — I agree with him; it probably was — but I felt that having that amendment on the list and forcing the Minister to talk to it would mean that I could effect change in that regard. That change did not happen. It did not happen anytime soon. I thought that I was doing a good thing by removing the amendment and not pushing it — I had the word of the Minister — but, with all due respect to the Minister, time moves on, things happen and things do not get done. I understand that, and I understand why it was critical that the Committee, having had the opportunity to table the amendment, grasped it.

Amendment No 13, which is a new clause on interim protection for the victim, is a gift for the Minister. It is a gift that the Committee has presented to the Minister. The Committee could have gone down a more arduous route. It could have taken legislation from other arts and parts — other jurisdictions in the United Kingdom — and put it in this Bill. However, the Committee recognised that that would not be the right thing to do, because our Justice Minister and Justice Department needed to make sure that whatever vehicle they use is fit for purpose for Northern Ireland, which is important. It is important that we adapt the vehicle to suit us. That is why it is so vague in the way in which it is written:

“The Department of Justice may by regulations, within 24 months of commencement, make provision for measures which may be made for the purposes of protecting and supporting the victim or alleged victim.”

This is all about protecting and supporting the victim:

“(2) The regulations may include provisions about—

(a) court orders,

(b) measures other than court orders.”

You cannot be any more vague than that.

When I brought my amendment, away back then, during the Justice (No. 2) Bill, I think, to Minister David Ford, it was very prescriptive. I basically nailed my colours to the mast and asked David Ford, who was the Minister at the time, to do something. I withdrew that amendment, and, to be honest with you, I regret it. We should not withdraw this amendment; we should move this amendment.

The amendment should be passed in this House because it is affording the Justice Minister of today the ability to shape the vehicle that she wishes to use to take it forward in a timely fashion. Twenty-four months should not be too ambitious, and, if it is, there is something badly wrong with the system. We know that cogs turn slowly in this place — too slow for my liking — but 24 months to get something that is desperately needed —

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair)

Mrs Long: Will the Member accept that, within that 24-month period, there will be a change of Executive? There will be a general election called in respect of the Assembly. The Executive will have to enter into negotiations to reform an Executive, and that can take a considerable time. During that period, officials would not be in a position to take direction from a Minister.

We also know that, this year, with the onset of COVID, there are other indeterminables and unforeseeables that could happen in that period. Putting in primary legislation a duty to do something within a time frame of two years places the Department at high risk. The difference between us is not whether this needs to be done but whether it is wise to place the Department — not me — at risk of judicial review should this fall. No doubt, it will be a different Minister who will end up having to fight that case in court.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for the intervention. I hear her appeals. If we want to amend this so that it is a shorter time, I am up for that debate. Twenty-four months is enough time. What the Minister failed to point out is this: she has told the Committee and the House that she will bring forward legislation that will deal with the issue straight away.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member again for giving me the opportunity to clarify. This would place a duty on my officials to do two things: to engage in nugatory work to bring forward secondary legislation, which we do not believe is the correct vehicle, and, at the same time, the same officials and the same resource would be split to try to advance primary legislation where the matter can be dealt with properly.

I realise that the Member gets frustrated at the pace of change, but each person has only limited capacity to deliver. If they are to do both those things, one of those things will suffer, and one of them is unnecessary. It is not helpful to ask a small team — it is a small team — to divert all its attention to producing secondary and primary legislation on the same issue and divert them from all the other work, including the domestic abuse strategy. The Member would be the first to criticise us if we were to do that.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for her intervention. She can make all the excuses for her Department that she wants, but the Committee wishes to see the amendment through, and I hope that the House sees the rationale for why we need to see the amendment through.

It is not duplication, and it is not placing a burden on the Department when it is the same thing that we are asking for and the outcome will be the same. Surely the Minister and her officials can see that this is the endgame. This is where we need to get to. For the life of me, I cannot see why the Minister and the Department are so against amendment No 13, which asks her to do that. Her Department shapes the vehicle for her to move forward to protect victims of this heinous crime. For the life of me, I do not see what the problem is with that. It is happening everywhere else but here.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes.

Mrs Long: The Member said that he does not understand why there is a duplication of resources. I know that it is unusual for a Minister to ask a question of a Member, but does he understand that primary legislation is a completely different vehicle, a completely different drafting exercise and has completely different standards from secondary legislation? They are not the same thing. It is not about drafting legislation that will either be primary or secondary: primary legislation is different from secondary legislation. Does the Member understand that that requires us to do two things at the same time and split our resources between them, rather than focus on the one thing that he wants, which is to get these delivered?

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for her intervention. However, she must realise that an amendment to a Bill can be cooked up and produced in hours or in days. That is the process that, the Minister outlined, she will use as the vehicle. We can have a tennis game all we want tonight, but it will not serve any more purpose. I plead with the House to consider the amendment and everything that I have said about my history and my experience in this place in trying to effect change. The Committee gave the Minister as wide a scope as it could. This is a gift to the Department and the Minister. I wish and hope that she takes it.

I will move on to Rachel Woods. This is becoming a habit, and I will have to stop it. I will get into real trouble with my party, because I will have to praise her once again. Here is the thing, and it is very important: Rachel Woods came onto the Committee, and she gets the Bill. I think that this is her first attempt at the legislative process, and she gets it. If every Member was as committed as she is, what a Chamber and Committees we would have. I will really have to stop this. Why am I so passionate about this? I thank Rachel for her amendment because it ticks a very big box. I admit that it has taken me a while to see what the amendment does, and I would suggest that we probably need to go further. I am up for that debate. We are probably a wee bit limited in the time available before Further Consideration Stage, but I put the Minister on notice.

Why is the amendment needed? My colleague Jonny Buckley organised a meeting a number of months ago with a young lady — she will remain nameless, of course — who wanted to meet me and the Chairperson, Paul Givan. She outlined in great detail the absolute devastation caused to her life and her children's lives because an ex-partner would not let her go and tormented her, day in, day out. That was not through nuisance phone calls, stalking, rumour or gossip but through the court. I am sure that Members will know of such experiences and will have heard such stories, but make no mistake: people use the court as a weapon, and it is a powerful tool in the hands of the wrong person. Here is how that can happen: a perpetrator of domestic violence or any other crime can go to court to gain access to children, and they can keep going back. There are meant to be safeguards in place in court. If a certain Member were in the Chamber, I am sure that he would remind me about that, but those safeguards seem to be failing. There are people in this country — female and male — being taken to court over and over and over and over and over and over again. Hansard will enjoy that. People keep being taken to court, and their financial capacity is being reduced to zilch, to zero, to niets. That is not fair. It reduces the capacity for people and their children to move on with their lives.

8.15 pm

Mr Buckley: I thank the Member for giving way and for his particular reference to my constituent's case. I have listened to what the Member has said and seen what the Committee has done on the Bill. I thank the Chair of the Justice Committee and the Member for giving her the opportunity to speak to them and tell her story. She has been empowered by the actions that have been taken by the Justice Committee.

Does the Member agree that the continual attempts to bring her and her family through the courts affected the young lady not only financially but psychologically? They financially crippled her in such a way that her grandmother had to give up so much to ensure that the young lady could keep her family together. I thank the Member for his comments on the case.

Mr Frew: Yes, and you can see the unfairness in that. You can see where hard-earned cash and life savings have been reduced at each stage of the way. Court proceedings are not pretty. It is not a case of going in on the Tuesday and coming out on the Wednesday. A court process has stage upon stage and lasts month after month. There are solicitors to pay and sometimes barristers, and there is no legal aid available. The perpetrator can get legal aid, however. The perpetrator has nothing to lose, but the victim has everything to lose. It is the case that court is being used as a weapon. The house of justice — the very place of justice — is being used against a victim: a person who is a single mum, with, I think, three children. That has to be stopped.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way and elaborating on our party position. I also thank my colleague from Upper Bann Mr Buckley, who brought the lady to see us. Miss Woods will no doubt elaborate on this, but my reading of the amendment is that it relates to victims of the offence that is being created, so there is not a retrospective nature applicable to it, or a wider net for other types of offences. Nevertheless, it could be the catalyst for the wider changes that we as a party would like to see made to support victims of domestic abuse and ensure that the courts are not used for the very reasons that the Member has outlined.

Mr Frew: I could not agree more. I thank the Member for putting that on the record. When the Committee spoke about the issue last week, departmental officials were unclear on what the cost burden of the new clause would be. To be fair, it is not their area of expertise, so we got further clarification. It was cited that it could run into tens of millions of pounds, if my memory is right.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for giving way. I believe the term was "double-figure millions".

Mr Frew: Thank you for that clarification. My memory is not what it used to be. When I heard that in Committee, my mouth hit the floor. If that is the cost burden to legal aid resulting from the Bill, equate that to a single mum's purse, equate that to a single dad's purse, equate that to a nurse, equate that to a spark, equate that to a binman or binwoman. If that is the case, that amount of money is then going out of the hands of people who have worked hard to earn it. The Department cannot have it both ways. If it is millions upon millions — yes, I will give way to the Minister, who raises her hand.

Mrs Long: Will the Member accept that, equally, Members cannot have it both ways? They cannot demand that the Department bring the bill for legal aid under control and reduce it and, at the same time, argue that the bill for legal aid and the rules for legal aid should be changed without due diligence on our part and without checking how much it will cost so that we can quantify the changes and make sure that they are effective, proportionate and affordable.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for her intervention. It was very powerful, and she has hit the nail right on the head. Why is legal aid not protecting people like this? In fact, why are we financing people to use this as a weapon against the victims? Yes, the Minister has indicated by putting her hand up.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for being generous in giving way, because it is important that we deal with the issues as they arise. It is already within the gift of the judiciary to rule that claims to go back to the family courts are vexatious. The judiciary must reach a decision. If a partner continues to drag his partner into court on a repeated basis for no reason other than to cause them harm, the judiciary can already say that they should not be allowed to do that and can exercise that power at any time.

Currently, there is also a waiver in place that will allow people to access legal aid in cases where they do not meet the financial threshold, but that relies on them still being able to make some contribution to the costs, which, at the higher courts, can be very significant. We are not talking about a complete waiver, and it would affect only those who are convicted of these specific offences, not other offences that might also constitute domestic abuse, for which alternative provisions have been made, in terms of prosecution. We discussed them earlier. The reason why some people can do this and others cannot is simply about their means. If you have the money to fund your case, you are expected to do so, and, if you do not, the Legal Services Agency is there to support you in order that you can access justice.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for further clarification, but, as I understand it, this amendment from Miss Rachel Woods allows the director of legal aid services to disapply financial eligibility rules for victims of domestic abuse in family proceedings — for example, child contact and residence orders. This will go some way to providing financial support and access to justice for victims who are having their resources drained and are subject to retraumatisation and further abuse by perpetrators exploiting the justice system. If I am wrong in that, I am happy to give way to either the Minister or the proposer of the amendment.

Women's Aid will be watching this, and I am sure that they are screaming at the TV, because this happens every day. That organisation has to fight tooth and nail for the victims daily. I received an email from Women's Aid not long ago, on 13 November — I have lost track of time — that outlined the cost burden for a victim in this regard. I will not go into the itemised costs, because it would take me all night, but, from May 2019 to October 2020, there were six sittings of court. From May 2019 to October 2020, which has just ended, you can imagine the psychological burden on a victim of having to prepare for the next court sitting. May, November, July, September, October, October: when is there a free month there? When is there a month in that space of time when that victim can get their head showered? Then, of course, you have your counsel fees, your solicitor's fees, your court fees and everything else. The professional costs and outlays for that period were £2,950.50. The person involved is a single mum with a job, trying to provide for her family, with a mortgage, with car payments, with school fees and with lockdown.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: To save the Member and the Chamber some time, I will say that there is no need to convince me that there is an issue. I acknowledged that in my opening remarks. There is an issue. It is a serious issue that I wish to address. However, I do not believe that the amendment has the policy development behind it to ensure that it is adequate for purpose or that, in how it addresses the issue, it allows us to look at all the other mechanisms that are in front of us. There is no need to labour the point about the seriousness of the issue: we, in the Chamber, are all agreed on that. It is simply about the appropriate way to address the problem that we have a slight difference.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for her intervention, but, yes, it is correct that we clearly define the problems that are out there. It is correct because we have a problem here. We have an amendment. You disagree with it. The House will decide. It is important that we elaborate on these issues and stress the importance of this and how it impacts on people's lives so grievously. It is important for the people involved that we lay all that out.

That is only one court session that I described. There was then defending the appeal in the family care centre, which robbed that person of another £1,000. Again, the person involved is a single mum with child maintenance for two children and everything that goes with it. These people are being deprived of their funding and their hard-earned cash. That is money that they were prepared to save in order to ensure that their children get everything that they need — everything that is required for school, for holidays, for breaks away and for food on the table. They are being deprived. Their money is going down, and it is the court and all its legal services that are taking it off them because a perpetrator is using court as a weapon. That is the long and short of it.

That is why I support the amendment. That is why the amendment is needed. I do not think that it goes far enough, but it could be the start of a journey that leads us there. If it takes the whole gamut of legal aid to do it, let us do it. There should be no mountain too big to climb for the Assembly, Executive or any Minister. Let us tackle legal aid once and for all. Let us get it sorted, and let us not beat about the bush. I support Miss Rachel Woods's amendment. Let us see where it takes us. I make this plea to the House tonight: you have the time to support Rachel Woods's amendment No 14 and to support the Chairman, who has tabled amendment No 13. That is important. Do not lose the opportunity. Do not waste the time. Take it now. Grasp it. Do not be like me. I withdrew an amendment on the sound commitment that the Minister made in the House on the record. It did not work for me. Pass the amendments. Let us get this done.

8.30 pm

Mr Lynch: As a former member of the Committee and a current member of the Policing Board, I speak in support of amendment No 13, which is a Committee amendment that would place responsibility on the Justice Minister to make provisions for domestic abuse protection orders and notices within 24 months of commencement or other measures aimed at protecting and supporting victims of domestic abuse.

Current legislation provides for domestic violence protection orders and notices, but they were never introduced. I also note that, as outlined by the Chair, the orders and notices were replaced by new domestic abuse protection orders and notices in England and Wales to address the broader definition of domestic abuse and some operational shortcomings that were experienced in relation to the orders. There is widespread support for the introduction of the new orders; indeed the issue was considered by the Policing Board, which agreed that there would be considerable merit in their introduction and that they would provide victims with protection for a period after an incident. Although there is no outright objection to the introduction of those orders, the PSNI highlighted concerns about existing arrangements and suggested that further consultation prior to their introduction would be beneficial.

It is concerning that victims of domestic violence in the North of Ireland have already gone a considerable time without any form of protection notice and would like to see them introduced. However, I understand the need for more consultation to ensure the best possible form of protection. Victims must be afforded all possible protections to ensure their safety and that cycles of abuse are ended. I welcome the amendment, as it places a duty on the Justice Minister to provide a scheme within 24 months of the commencement of the legislation, and I would welcome its introduction through the justice (miscellaneous provisions) Bill, which, I believe, will come next year.

The success of legislation depends on its effective implementation. Although the reporting of domestic abuse has increased, particularly since the introduction of lockdown due to COVID-19, it remains an under-reported crime. The figures outlined earlier by the Minister are stark. I welcome the proactive focus of the PSNI on tackling the increase in domestic abuse cases seen during the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill will be landmark legislation that, once implemented, will make a huge difference to the lives of so many. I have full confidence in the PSNI's ability to implement the legislation; however, it will need support in its efforts to do so. The legislation will be transformative to the lives of many victims. It must be a priority for the Department to ensure that appropriate resources are dedicated to that work so that the full potential of the legislation is realised.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak today on the important issue of domestic abuse. I welcome the significant steps that have been taken over recent years to get us to this advanced stage. I will not go in to all the details. I am very fortunate, as a DUP Member, to have two colleagues with great experience: the Chair, Paul Givan, and the former Chair, Paul Frew, who have covered the amendments in great detail. I am willing to follow their lead in relation to those issues. I do not always follow their lead, but I will do on this occasion.

I acknowledge all the victims' agencies across the community and voluntary sector and the officials and justice agencies, including the PSNI, that continue to support victims of that most horrific form of abuse and which have constructively engaged in the process to get us to where we are today. The dedication of organisations that work to support victims and survivors of domestic abuse in Northern Ireland must be commended. They have, literally, been a lifesaver to so many people across our communities, giving victims security, safety and hope for the future. There is no doubt that there is greater public awareness of domestic abuse. That is down to the hard work of many groups and organisations across society that work day and night to tackle this serious issue. I pay tribute to North Down and Ards Women's Aid, which is based in Bangor in my constituency. I have had engaged with it and know that it plays a valuable role in supporting victims of domestic abuse.

Considerable work has been done to get to this advanced stage, and we have heard about that in great detail during the debate. That includes work by all members of the Committee, who have worked constructively to tailor the Bill to best meet local needs. From the various evidence-gathering engagements and sessions that the Justice Committee has had, I know that there is a united desire — almost united — to ensure that no stone is left unturned as we seek to eradicate this appalling abuse, which, unfortunately, still happens every day and night across Northern Ireland.

As has been said, domestic abuse can affect everyone, regardless of their age, race, religion, gender, wealth, address or disability. Very often, it has no end point. It is torturous and, sadly, can result in generational harm that can never be repaired. Home should be the safest place for everyone. However, tragically, it can become the most dangerous place to be.

Throughout the COVID pandemic, with the lockdowns and periods of restrictions, places to escape from the home may have been closed, whether that was simply going to a football match or going out for a coffee, a haircut or a chat with friends or family members. Domestic incidents and crimes in Northern Ireland were already at a 15-year high before the COVID-19 pandemic, and data from the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) shows that, in the last year, the number of domestic abuse crime cases rose to 18,796. That is an increase of 13% on the previous year and an average of 51 incidents per day. According to the Department, over 8,300 incidents of domestic abuse were reported to the PSNI during the COVID-19 lockdown period between April and June of this year, and a further 567 domestic abuse calls were made to the police in the final week of March. Those alarming statistics confirm the need for action to tackle domestic abuse.

Those statistics were replicated across the UK, but, alarming as they are, just as alarming, if not more so, could be the number of cases of abuse that were not reported due to the fear of repercussions. Tragically, we will never see that figure — the number who remain silent — in our newspapers or in a Minister's answers, but those people must never be forgotten. That is why we need further progress on the issue.

The PSNI must be given tools that are robust and far-reaching, with legislation to support victims through any form of domestic abuse and, ultimately, bring the perpetrators to justice. I regularly engage with the PSNI in my North Down constituency and often hear of incidents of domestic violence. The fact that we are the only part of the UK that does not have non-physical abusive behaviour, including coercive control, as a criminal offence, limits the powers of the PSNI to tackle the problem effectively.

Operation Encompass was discussed extensively by the Committee. That provides the option of notifying schools when domestic abuse incidents have taken place the night before in a child's home. That tool has the potential to support children who may have directly or indirectly witnessed a form of domestic abuse. However, those notifications would have to be carried out in a sensitive and confidential manner to ensure that children are not further victimised through, perhaps, peer bullying in the classroom, should the PSNI notify the school in a non-discreet way.

Prevention and early intervention are crucial, and domestic abuse can have an impact even on unborn children. Research has identified that domestic abuse is an adverse childhood experience and a contributing factor to a wide range of issues, such as educational underachievement, which our Education Minister, Peter Weir, very much recognises and is working to address through a partnership approach in his Department. Children are often the unseen victims of domestic abuse, and those who are the victims of domestic abuse can suffer from a wide range of long-term mental, emotional and physical effects.

I welcome the progress to date, and I trust that we will continue to see further progress through the House. I look forward to hearing from the Minister, from whom we have heard quite a bit, but I look forward to that as, finally, we seek to support victims of domestic abuse, many of whom suffer in silence.

Mr Gildernew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health): I am delighted to speak tonight on this important legislation. Earlier in the debate, someone mentioned that this is possibly some of the most important legislation that will be considered during this mandate. That is absolutely true. In my previous career as a social worker, I became aware of the hugely pervasive and pernicious nature of this type of offence and behaviour in our society, so I am glad. I am also struck tonight by recalling that the first meeting that I attended officially after becoming an MLA was, in conjunction with my two colleagues here, Jemma Dolan and Seán Lynch, with Women's Aid in Enniskillen. We committed to try to do something, as MLAs, on the issue. I am pleased and proud to, at least partially, do that tonight.

In speaking as the Health Committee Chair, I recognise that the vast majority of the work on this has been done by the Justice Committee. I am impressed by the level, quality and rigour of the debate tonight on every element of the Bill. It is a fascinating process to see the work that goes into that.

As Chair of the Health Committee, I wish to speak to amendment No 13, in particular, in this group. The Committee took evidence from Women's Aid, the Men's Advisory Project and the NSPCC, who flagged the range of areas in which more could and should be done to support survivors of domestic abuse, to ensure that the justice system does not exacerbate an already difficult situation for victims and to reduce the risk of people staying in abusive and dangerous relationships due to practical fears around financial support or losing their home. The regulation-making power proposed in amendment No 13 could create an opportunity to address some of the deficits identified, and I would like to set out three areas where this power could usefully be considered as a means of providing support.

First, the Committee agreed that the case has been made for speeding up and streamlining the handling of domestic abuse cases from start to finish. The victims of these crimes are particularly vulnerable. The abuse has a high and enduring impact, which can be compounded by protracted proceedings. A commitment to a shortened time frame could encourage people to come forward and make use of the new offence.

Secondly, the Health Committee was persuaded by the stakeholder evidence of the need for paid leave to facilitate victims of domestic abuse making arrangements to separate from their partner. For a victim to extricate themselves from such a situation creates enormous upheaval, and worries around finance and job security can tip the balance away from making the right choice for an individual or a family. Paid leave could alleviate that pressure somewhat.

Thirdly, a key concern highlighted by stakeholders is the risk of homelessness. The Committee noted the inherent problem in expecting the victim to move out of the family home — often with children — as a key step in dealing with abuse. There is an added difficulty where, for example, the home is adapted to cater for disability. The Committee also acknowledged that the absence of sufficient refuge places could also limit effectiveness of the Bill. The Committee heard evidence from Women's Aid that refuges are usually running at 100% occupancy, while the Men's Advisory Project stated that there are no refuges for men experiencing domestic abuse. The Committee was concerned that consideration should be given to help to avoid situations where people stay in abusive relationships through fear of losing their home. I welcome, therefore, the indication given in the Chamber that the Minister for Communities is considering that issue.

I thank the stakeholders who assisted the Committee with its deliberations around the parts of the Bill related to health.

The Health Committee has not formally considered amendment No 13 but would wish these objectives to be achieved by that or other means.

8.45 pm

Ms Armstrong: As I did with my comments on the group 1 amendments, I will not take too long. The House has had much debate so far, and people mentioned issues that I wanted to talk about. I stand tonight in support of amendment Nos 9, 11 and 12. However, having listened to the debate, I agree with the Minister and must oppose amendment Nos 13 and 14. With regard to the new clause that is created by amendment No 13, the rationale for my opposition is that the domestic abuse protection notices and orders provisions should be included in future primary legislation. The Minister said that those provisions are being planned for inclusion in the miscellaneous provisions Bill, where the details can then be set out. While it may not intend to do so, amendment No 13 would relegate to secondary legislation provisions that are made under 35 clauses in English and Welsh legislation, as others mentioned.

Moving on to the new clause that is created by amendment No 14, as the Minister said, the judiciary can prevent repeated cases being brought to court. However, we must also remember that that would confer discretionary power on the Legal Services Agency to waive the financial eligibility test in private family law cases in circumstances in which the applicant has been the victim of a domestic abuse offence. While I can certainly understand the intent of the amendment, there are several technical reasons why it would not do what it is intended to do. As the Minister said, victims may need to pay something up front. That makes it very difficult for someone who is on benefits and may have been denied access to money. If we are thinking about the victim here, we need to think about that cost. A victim of domestic abuse whose abuser has not been convicted of the relevant offence would not be helped by that amendment.

Legal aid is complex. I absolutely support Mr Frew when he says that legal aid needs to be sorted out. As much as that needs to be sorted out, unfortunately, the Bill will not do that. More work needs to be done on that to scope out its consequences, including any unintended consequences — for instance, the victim may not be the only person who gets legal aid.

The Department of Justice already has the power to do some of that. To do it more slowly, after engaging with stakeholders and scrutinising it properly, is the way forward. I appreciate the fact that Women's Aid and other groups have put their positions across. I am one of many people whom they have emailed. However, we need to look at the unintended consequences. That is why, at this point, I support the Minister and oppose the new clause that would be created by amendment No 14. There are ways in which we need to help people. I do not believe that amendment Nos 13 and 14 are the way in which to do that.

I am delighted that the group 2 amendments deal with parental alienation. How many of us have dealt with men or women who no longer have access to their children, with children being used as a battering ram against them? The new clause that would be created by amendment No 12 is fantastic. Parents who do not live with their children and are being alienated from them need that sort of provision. I welcome that. I said that I would be brief tonight.

Ms Dillon: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on the amendments in group 2. The Chair and the Minister referred to bullying. This is anti-bullying week. We should acknowledge that in the Chamber tonight. We do not need to go into detail; we have heard on many occasions on the Floor about the impact of bullying. Domestic abuse and coercive control are bullying by another name. I want to make that point and remind Members that it is anti-bullying week, that we should speak out and that, at every opportunity, we should make people aware of it and the fact that we will do what we can to prevent bullying. The Bill is part of that.

The Chair outlined the purpose and intention of amendment Nos 9 and 11, which relate to changing the age from 18 to 16. It is not a perfect solution, as Sinéad Bradley outlined. In fairness to the Minister, however, to deal with it in a more rounded manner, she would have to go outside the scope of the Bill and outside the competency of her Department, because this needs to be done in conjunction with the Health Department. The Minister and her colleague in the Health Department, Robin Swann, have come up the most suitable solution. It is not a perfect solution, but the law is very rarely perfect.

That leads me on to some of my other comments. We want to get the best legislation possible, and we have made that clear. Not the Minister, not one Member, not any officials and not any Committee staff who have worked on the Bill do not want to see the best legislation, but it will not be perfect. It just will not, and we have to accept that. Mr Frew has already said that we may have to come back to the issue. I hope that we do not have to come back to it too soon. In our comments on reporting and oversight, we will probably talk more about the importance, if we indeed have to come back to it, of coming back to it based on good-quality information. That is why the amendments that we will speak to later will be so important.

We also support the Minister's amendment No 12. It is a very welcome introduction to the Bill, in that it provides the meaning of "ill treatment".

Amendment No 13 is a Committee amendment, and it is about domestic abuse protection orders and notices. Although I take on board and accept all of what the Minister said, and, indeed, I have sympathy with what she said about how difficult and challenging a job her Department has, we as a Committee feel that the provision is too important not to be in the Bill. At the beginning of Committee Stage, one of the issues that I personally raised was that of non-molestation orders, the difficulties with them, the difficulties that people seem to have in accessing them and the fact that, within weeks of being given a non-molestation order, a person is back in court to get it removed. My hope is that protection orders and notices give some relief to victims. I hope that that is what they deliver. I urge the Minister to bring forward such a provision. She has already said that she will bring it forward in the miscellaneous provisions Bill. I absolutely welcome that intent. If it is included in that Bill, it will resolve all our issues. We are concerned that the amendment may not serve the purpose that I and the Committee want it to serve, so we look forward to seeing what comes forward. I will be supporting the Committee amendment tonight, however.

I have concerns about amendment No 14, and I have raised those concerns with Rachel Woods. To be honest, I have been back and forth on this one with different Members, including Rachel and Members from our party. I have spoken to other parties, and I have listened to what the Minister had to say. Again, I have a lot of sympathy for what the Minister says about the amendment. My main issue with it is that, as Mr Frew outlined, it does not go far enough. I do not think that it serves the purpose that I want it to serve, much like I fear that the amendment on protection orders and notices does not go far enough. I really am concerned that amendment No 14 does not go far enough, however. To be fair to Ms Woods, she accepts that she would have liked it to go further. I agree with the Minister that the issue needs to be dealt with in the round. In the absence, however, of something else — something better — I feel that we have to support it, so we will be supporting amendment No 14 tonight. I would certainly welcome discussions with the Minister on the issue, as, I am sure, would other Committee members. I do not doubt the Minister's sincerity when she says that it is an issue that she wants to deal with in the round, because it does go much deeper. Very often, it is the working poor and people whom other Members already talked about who are affected.

Paul Frew spoke about the cost being £2,900. For some people, it might as well be £2 million. If you have not got it, you have not got it, so it does not matter how much it is. I can certainly speak from experience, not on this issue of legal cases, but I know many people — my family included and people whom I care about — who have been in that situation. If you do not have money, it does not matter whether it is £30 or £300,000 — you do not have it, and that is it. That is a real issue.

The Committee would probably have liked more time to scope this out and to delve further. I told the officials on Thursday that we would be open to amendments at Further Consideration Stage if it would improve this. As I said, we are open to having that conversation with the Minister to address the issue, because the threshold for people to access legal aid is probably going to be too high. From my understanding, and from what Miss Woods told me, it is similar to accessing help in relation to non-molestation orders, and I outlined that that is a challenge. The threshold is probably too high.

The one effect that we are hoping that it might have is that, if people think that their partner, ex-partner or other person will have access to legal aid, it may well prevent them from taking them to court continually. They do that as a further means of abuse. It is financial abuse and mental —.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Member for giving way. She addresses acutely the point about the crisis that many working poor face. Does she agree that, albeit the lure is to quit their job and become unemployed to follow the legal aid route, the fact that they want to have the ability to break free from coercive control by controlling their own life and family budget is testament to their courage? The fact is that they cannot access fair and adequate treatment from the state in legal aid while those coercive partners try to take them to court to take from them everything that they hold dear.

Ms Dillon: I absolutely agree, and, as the Minister outlined, she is open to the argument. We are pushing at an open door, so I hope that we have a fuller discussion on that issue. There are also those who have had to say, "I'm going to have to give up my job and go onto benefits. That's the only way that I'm going to protect myself, my family, my children". We know that that happens. There is a cost to the public purse, somewhere along the line, when we push people to that stage.

That is our position on group 2.

Miss Woods: I seem to be rising quite a lot, with a lot of Members needing me to clarify things. Hopefully, I will be able to do that.

Initially, I want to speak to the amendments laid by the Minister that deal with necessary changes to legislation residing in the Department regarding the child cruelty offence and the issue of parental responsibility. I hope that further work can be carried out to fill in the cracks that have been uncovered by this, as others have stated.

In response to concerns raised by organisations around the parental responsibility exclusion, the Department stated that it had given:

"careful consideration to the scope of the ... offence in order to ensure that children could be captured within it, in their own right, where they are in a relationship or are a family member".

It was indicated that having considered the matter further, and taking account of the concerns, the Minister was going to table this amendment to make it explicit that, where a child was ill-treated, it would include non-physical abuse. I welcome that.

Discussion on that and how it interacts with parental responsibility exclusion in the Bill raises important issues, essentially due to the fact that the legislation that covered child protection and the child cruelty offence applies only to those under the age of 16. Therefore, amendments to clauses 11 and 17 had to be tabled to ensure that non-physical abuse of 16- and 17-year-olds in a parent/child relationship was provided for and to ensure that there was no gap. It exposed clear differences between the two pieces of legislation on what constituted an offence. The abuse committed against a 14-year-old as opposed to a 17-year-old carries different consequences. Whilst I understand that the amendments in question — amendment Nos 9 and 11 — are necessary right now, they do not address those differences; in fact, they create an arbitrary distinction between children of different ages and mean that abusive behaviour receives different maximum sentencing depending on age. That concern was brought to the Committee by children's organisations, including the NSPCC and NICCY, and I fully support them in seeking to resolve it.

The Department has stated that no other jurisdiction locally provides for criminalisation in relation to parental responsibility under domestic abuse legislation and that the provisions in the Bill covering the offence on children go further than others already provide for.

9.00 pm

Nevertheless, I agree with the view that there should be no such arbitrary distinction in legislative protection or a sentencing ceiling that is based simply on age, and that is why I raised the possibility of introducing an equivalency in the maximum penalty across the two offences. Officials responded by saying that it was not possible to do that in the Bill given that it was a matter for the Department of Health. Even though amendment No 12 would change the child cruelty offence, it is also a matter for the Department of Health. So, I hope that the Justice Minister can work with Executive colleagues to look at that, and I also encourage the Health Committee to gather the relevant evidence in order to consider any possible solutions. I welcome amendment No 12, which would strengthen the child cruelty offence to amend the definition of ill treatment.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

I turn now to amendment No 14 and the need to help victims and survivors of abuse in family proceedings. Again, Mr Frew set it out. I am going to have to stop making a habit of this. I am sure that this will come soon, no doubt, or is that possibly tempting fate? The issue was first raised at the Committee on 17 September during the informal deliberations, when Mr Frew said:

“The other piece is about using the court, itself, as a weapon. You have the scenario where one parent gets legal aid and the other does not. The parent with legal aid goes to court all the time, and it drains the resources of the other parent, who sometimes has responsibility for the child; it drains the family assets or savings. There is a potential conflict around access to justice, which we have to be mindful of, but I think that something needs to be put in here. I am not convinced yet that family proceedings and the other bits cover it at all; I do not believe that it does. For me, the struggle is trying to get something that I have in my head down on paper, but we need to do something.”

I totally agree. We do need to do something to address that, and that is why I tabled the amendment. At the time, I asked the Committee whether access to legal aid was something that we could look at, but I recognise that, with the sheer number of issues that are not covered in the Bill that we explored and deliberated on, somewhere along the line this one was overshadowed by focusing on working out potential improvements that would definitely fall within the Bill's scope. I also recognise that there may not have been the appropriate political consensus for me to try to push the issue further through the Committee's work, and that is why I came to table the amendment on my own.

Returning to the very brief discussion that we had on 17 September, I first want to elaborate on the main problem that the amendment seeks to resolve, which is perpetrators and former abusers exploiting the court system in order to further harm victims. In 2015, Women's Aid published research that looked at women's experience of the family court in Northern Ireland. It found that roughly one in five women did not have access to legal aid and that the respondents reported the cost of litigation as a deterrent to seeking court orders.

Members may be aware that the Department introduced a waiver for financial eligibility limits for civil legal aid through regulations in 2015, which essentially means that those who are above the income and capital threshold who apply for non-molestation orders are still eligible for legal aid. That was an important step and reflected what Women's Aid was calling for at the time, namely the extension of the legal aid system to provide for free legal aid to women seeking protection orders. The study also identified significant wait times, women having to travel long distances in order to attend court and women having to attend court anything from six to 10 times, particularly with child contact cases. Indeed, the vast majority of the women surveyed were in court for child contact cases.

That brings me to the amendment. The Bill in its current form does not address all the difficulties that are faced by victims in the justice system, and many issues remain with how the courts are used by former abusers and convicted perpetrators in order to further harm and inflict misery on survivors. The amendment deals with one of the most common methods used by perpetrators to further the abuse, that is, disputes over children and court proceedings relating to orders under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. The most common court orders made under that legislation are, of course, child contact orders, which are tools that are essential to protect children who have been living in a violent or abusive domestic situation. When orders are made that place restrictions on access, visitation and residence on former abusers, they can, of course, be appealed. That is the nature of our justice system, and it is important to reiterate that the amendment would in no way interfere with the rights of citizens to appeal or to challenge court decisions, nor does it tamper with the rights of appellants to seek legal aid. Those two things remain unchanged. Nevertheless, there is a fundamental problem with the nature of some of these cases and, indeed, others types of proceedings more generally relating to court orders. That is where a perpetrator continuously and relentlessly challenges decisions of the court or seeks other ways to heap pressure and strain on their former victim. This behaviour, which should be recognised as a form of abuse in itself, is deeply damaging on a psychological and emotional level for the survivor of the abuse.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. Part of the reason why this domestic abuse legislation is so important is because it will specifically criminalise that kind of behaviour, which is not captured under the existing law. Therefore, it potentially makes the changes proposed with regard to legal aid unnecessary, as well as peremptory and without the proper research backup. I entirely agree with the Member about how the system is abused, but I reiterate that judges already have the ability to rule such repeat applications to the court as vexatious and to say that they will no longer be heard.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for her intervention. I welcome that. That is why I supported clauses 1 to 4, which include this type of abuse. However, it does not address the point that I will come to, which is the financial aspect. The judicial system has that option, but it is clearly not being utilised enough, which brings me on to a further point that I will make about amendment No 15 in group 3 about the requirement for training.

I am speaking about court cases that are not optional or elective. In fact, if you speak to advocacy and support organisations, such as Women's Aid or Victim Support, you will soon hear the extent to which some victims are dragged through the courts for no clear reason other than to further the abuse. You will read some personal stories and quotes from victims and survivors in the 'Women's Voices' document, which was submitted by Women's Aid to the Committee in June. Here are some of the things that they said:

“Judges need to recognise that the abuser is also using the court to abuse their partner”,

“He's using the system to torture me”,

“My ex had no interest in my daughter, by taking me to court was just another chapter in his game which was to cripple me financially as it cost me to go but not him as he was unemployed. I had to go several times but he did not turn up on several occasions. He thought this was funny. This caused me stress, anxiety and put me into debt paying court fees”.

I also ask Members to consider the evidence provided at one of the informal meetings by someone whom I will call “Joanne” in order to protect her identity. I will quote her directly for the record. Joanne had a very poor experience of the family courts. She has been very nervous in being in the same building as the perpetrator, and she states that:

“Being in the same building as someone who has so much control over you can have an effect on the quality of evidence that you give”.

Her ex just has to give her one of his looks to make her nervous, and he has done that whenever she has been giving evidence. She and her eldest child describe it as:

“A look that still makes them want to run and hide”.

With regard to the evidence of abuse, she was told that the judge would not want to hear details of abusive text messages and was told that financial abuse was not relevant to her case. She said that:

“Victims can be told what they feel is important is of no relevance”.

On an occasion in child contact proceedings, Joanne was told that her evidence regarding domestic abuse, which included details of rape and other abuse, was not relevant to the case and was not proven. When supervised access was discussed, Joanne said that she would ask her child, who was then 12, how she would feel about it. However, the judge called her an “irresponsible parent” and was told that she would be required to ensure contact. The child’s review does not matter, despite their having witnessed traumatic incidents. She feels that if you try and keep your children safe by withholding contact then you are being a bad parent. However, if they go and are subjected to abuse then you are a bad parent for not protecting your children.

Joanne’s ex has taken three cases to the family court, which he subsequently dropped. He gets legal aid, but Joanne is not eligible as she works, so she has to pay the legal expenses and childcare costs and to take time off work. He went through with the fourth case and was allowed unsupervised contact, but he has not gone ahead of the majority of the scheduled contacts. Joanne can apply to prohibit him from bringing any further orders against her to the family courts. Her solicitors are applying for two years, although their normal duration would be for one year, which means that she will face the same situation again and again, and that adds to trauma. Joanne has other examples of the cases that her ex has taken against her that are without merit, and she does not understand how he can continually be able to be funded through legal aid to take those cases. She feels that it is in the interests of solicitors to take the cases and prolong them. Joanne said that, in her view, it would be in her interest for cases to conclude more quickly, but she is so concerned for the well-being of her children that she will fight them. She feels that there is enough evidence to show that he is using the court system to further the abuse, but his parental rights seem to trump everything that is good for the child.

Joanne’s experience mirrors those of other victims and survivors who have no access to legal aid while their former abusers do. That is absolutely abhorrent. It is totally unacceptable that anyone should have to endure that. As one support organisation expressed to my researcher, “They are being bled dry”, and that puts an enormous strain on their mental and physical health and their ability to care and provide for their children, not to mention revisiting all the trauma through having to see and be present with their former abuser in a court setting. I also have friends who have been in that situation. For 10 years, I have had to listen to a close friend who has been dragged through the courts and bled dry to the extent that she had to give up her job. I thank Hannah, which is not her real name, who contacted me yesterday. I thank her for getting in touch with me recently. It is devastating to hear what some victims and survivors have had to endure. Her story is very similar to the one that I have just outlined.

We cannot stand by and allow this to continue. It is an awful, tragic ordeal that no victim or survivor who has done everything that they can to leave an abusive situation should have to endure. Many will have to take time off work to attend court or pay for childcare. As legal costs for their solicitor pile up, the strain on their finances increases, and therefore their means of providing for their children get more squeezed. The amendment, through allowing victims to access legal aid, would go some way to remedy and help to prevent that injustice.

Mr Beattie: I thank the Member for giving way. She has made some really important points, but I want to add a bit of balance, if I may. As we speak, I am getting emails about the very subject that we are talking about. I have received one from a man. It is not always women who are affected; men are affected too. Sometimes, we forget about that. The man who has just emailed me was given custody of his children three years ago but has never been allowed to have access to them. Why? His ex-partner has used the legal aid system to take the case to court in order to keep him away from them. He has had to fight that, and the email that he has just sent to me says, “And now it’s too late. My kids are that old that there is no point in fighting on with it”. I fully appreciate the Member’s point, but I wanted to provide some balance. Men are suffering, maybe not as many, but they suffer in exactly the same way.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for his intervention. Rest assured that the amendment makes absolutely no distinction between men and women. This is a victim-focused amendment, and the Bill should also be victim-focused.

As I mentioned, under article 10 of the 2015 regulations, the director of legal aid services can disapply financial eligibility rules for victims of abuse in the case of non-molestation orders, but there is no such help or support when it comes to child orders. That means that victims and survivors of abuse who have modest incomes or savings are falling outside the financial eligibility limits and have no recourse to legal aid.

The system, as it sits, is, effectively, saying to victims, “We will provide you with financial support to obtain a non-molestation order, but you cannot receive any financial help for child dispute cases if you fall outside the financial limits”. Those limits currently stand at any disposable earnings over £234 per week and disposable capital over £3,000 for the lower courts. We are not talking about people missing out because they have a lot of money.

I appreciate that this might be a catalyst for further reform. I welcome that, and I raised it at Committee. However, what if, on paper, it looks like you are loaded? What if it looks as though you have thousands of pounds in the bank, but you do not because your finances are being controlled by your abuser? I am more than happy to look at expanding this to take into account the reality of financial abuse, which is outlined in this offence.

I will move on to another aspect of the comments on contribution of costs. This aspect misses the point, and it has been addressed. Abusers often leave or refuse work in order to financially abuse and bankrupt victims through the courts. We are talking not about people with a lot of money but about victims and survivors who may be teachers, nurses, admin staff or hospitality staff. Depending on their circumstances, earnings and savings, that could mean that they are not eligible for legal aid, and, all the while, their abuser keeps bringing them to court. Their legal fees continue to rise while the financial and psychological harm to them continues.

9.15 pm

This amendment would grant victims the right to access legal aid and take away some of the burden of what they are going through. I recognise that the amendment does not, and cannot, address the entire issue, but it will go some way to help victims and survivors. It would give the director of legal aid services discretion to disapply the financial eligibility rules for civil legal aid where the client is a victim of abuse and involved in court proceedings relating to the child disputes. This is exactly what currently happens when a victim requires a non-molestation order for their protection. Members, it already exists, it is not new. Many survivors are vulnerable single parents with modest incomes and with mouths to feed and whose job or occupation means that they fall outside of what is currently deemed to be eligible. It is not right that former abusers can use the courts to drain their finances and retraumatise them. I believe that the amendment will go some way to provide the help and support and access to justice that they deserve.

I understand that some Members will have concerns around the cost and who the waiver will apply to, or, to put it simply: how do you define a victim? Clearly, these are issues that will need further work, and, in many respects they are interlinked. I would, of course, welcome further engagement with the Minister, the Department and the Committee as to how these things can be clarified should the amendment be made. I believe that these issues can be resolved, and I urge Members to consider the principle and the merit of the amendment.

First, on costs, I was extremely disappointed to hear the words “double-figure millions” last week. There was no rationale or basis given for that figure other than the fact that the waiver would be uncapped. Guesstimates such as this are unhelpful, but as Paul Frew pointed out at the time, if this really is the scale of the problem, then it strengthens the case to do something —.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Miss Woods: I will.

Mrs Long: Given that the Member has brought this proposal to the House, could she give us her financial assessment of the likely costs?

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for her intervention. No, I cannot. I have been trying to obtain calculations and figures from the Legal Services Agency that could be used to come up with more sensible estimates, but I am still waiting to hear back from it. Again, I would welcome input and help from the Department, the Minister and the Committee in bringing this back for further clarification at the Further Consideration Stage.

Mr Givan: Would the Member give way?

Miss Woods: I will.

Mr Givan: Would the Member agree that every time the Committee raises the issue of legal aid and how we can control the budget, the Department repeatedly advised the Committee that this is a demand-led issue? Therefore, to have a fixed amount of money for the legal aid budget is not possible. Therefore, what the Minister is asking the Member to do is equally applicable to the Minister.

Mrs Long: With respect, if the Member will give way [Inaudible.]

Miss Woods: Yes.

Mrs Long: The issue is not the same. It is, of course, a demand-led service. What the Member is proposing is to add to the demand at the same time as the Committee is asking for the demand to be reduced. You cannot present a fixed budget for something which is demand-led, but you can cap and control the demand. I have no issue with the principle of this, and I have said that tonight in the Chamber. What we are doing here is entering into a situation where we create additional demand, the extent and the cost of which is unknown. That is a risky strategy to take, given that the Finance Minister was clear that he agreed the Bill on the basis that it did not incur additional costs.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member and the Minister for their interventions. To comment on the demand-led service and adding to that demand, it is adding to the demand where it is needed for victims. I do not believe that I have asked for the legal aid services bill to be reduced. That is a different matter.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Access to justice is incredibly important for everybody who needs to obtain it. What we are talking about here is the need for a level playing field. If we are concerned about cost, then hear this: that cost, if it is not on the Department or legal aid services, it is in the hands and the pockets of the victims. I know where I would rather have that cost.

Ms S Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Miss Woods: Yes.

Ms S Bradley: Perhaps it is unfair to ask the Member to give way. However, on the issue of demand, is there not an argument to be made that there is a perpetual habit of bringing the victim to the court and having this system in place would diffuse that? Demand would, therefore, reduce, and costs that are being incurred at the court, which should not be required, would fall. Is it also true to say that, at this stage, nobody can truly put a figure on this, because we have never had a Bill that deals with domestic abuse? How do we measure it? How do we measure the numbers, which we hope will come out of the woodwork and be captured via the Bill?

Miss Woods: I thank the Members for their interventions. Ms Bradley's point brings us into the group 3 amendments and the importance of reporting and having adequate data on the functioning of the Bill. One thing that we are trying to get is the current number of uptakes of the waiver in relation to non-mols. My researcher has been fundamental to this, and I put on record my thanks to him. I would not be standing here today without him. He has found that the take-up of non-mols is not what it could be. I ask the Minister to comment on that. It is my understanding that the Legal Services Agency is trying its best to spread awareness and boost take-up among solicitors, but, clearly, there are victims and survivors who could access that financial support for protection orders but are not doing so.

The Women's Aid research, which I mentioned, noted that 80% of women surveyed in the family courts were receiving legal aid. The study is outdated, and we need more up-to-date figures, but, if we are to assume that one in five of abuse victims who find themselves in the family courts in relation to child orders would benefit from the amendment to introduce the waiver, I do not think that we would be talking about gigantic sums of money. I also encourage Members to reflect on the big difference that this could make to victims and survivors who find themselves in that situation. I do not think that you can put a price on preventing abuse or putting a stop to the awful scenario in which victims are having their finances drained through the legal costs of their former abuser dragging them through the courts.

I understand that Members may also have concerns about how a victim is defined for the purposes of applying the waiver. The text of the amendment is open in that regard. In my view, it is important to be wary of how prescriptive it is, because that would have the potential to exclude. Committee members have had that argument put to them on a number of things that they wanted to be included in the Bill. I pick up on what Mr Frew said about stalking, strangulation and so on. We cannot be prescriptive. We also had that argument about the insertion of coercive control, and that argument was successfully made by the Department. The Legal Services Agency needs clarity on that in order to operate the waiver effectively. I will continue to engage with them on that to ensure that it is practicable.

I note that the power is also written into the Bill by the Department by the insertion of article 11A on future regulations on court proceedings. It is, therefore, already in the Bill under clause 26. It is the prohibition of cross-examination in family proceedings, with the Department having a duty to bring forward regulations that specify what evidence of domestic abuse will be sufficient for the purposes of the court prohibiting cross-examination by the perpetrator. In response to Women's Aid's concern about what a specified defence will be, the Department has stated that regulations will not be drafted until the Bill becomes law and that they will be consulted on. It also said that the types of evidence that might be specified include a letter from a health professional or organisation that provides support services to victims of domestic abuse. The multi-agency risk assessment conference (MARAC) programme could also be used. In that programme, a number of statutory bodies such as the PPS, the public protection unit and the PSNI use a victim-focused meeting to assess risk, identify a safety plan and refer on. I will engage with those groups.

I believe that, if any changes or more detail are required, it can be done at Further Consideration Stage. My argument for its having to go in at Consideration Stage is the same as Mr Givan's argument on interim protection for victims. If it is not in legislation, how will we be guaranteed that it will happen? I encourage all Members to support amendment No 14 at this stage. We must make the Bill victim-focused.

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister to make a winding-up speech on this group of amendments.

Mrs Long: Thank you, Mr Speaker, and I thank Members for their contributions. As I stated, amendment No 12 is to make clear that the non-physical ill treatment of a child under 16 by someone with parental responsibility for them is an offence. Amendment Nos 9 and 11 are linked, reducing the parental responsibility exclusion threshold from under 18 to under 16 in the context of the new offence, as well as the generic statutory aggravator. Together, those close a legislative gap, by ensuring that non-physical abuse of a child under 18 by someone with parental responsibility for the child can be dealt with. I welcome the support for those changes, and I concur that further work is needed on the issue in the health sphere. I commit to working with Minister Swann to support any changes that he may wish to develop.

Sinéad Bradley raised the issue of the difference in offences and penalties that will occur as a result of the means by which we have included 16- and 17-year-olds in the Bill. For the domestic abuse offence provisions, that not only will cover non-physical abusive behaviour but could include serious violent and sexual assaults, and that is reflected in the higher penalty of 14 years.

Children under 16 are being dealt with under Department of Health child protection legislation. The penalties associated with that are a maximum of 10 years and have been in place for some time. As Justice Minister, I cannot alter that, and any changes would have wider ramifications for the Department of Health, which has policy responsibility for the area. It is therefore appropriate that I allow the Health Minister to take the matter forward. I will support him when penalties are being discussed.

I turn now to amendment No 13.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Long: I will, yes.

Mr Givan: Apologies. Before you move on to amendment No 13, I want to make a point. Forgive me for intervening on you, but I ran out of time to raise the point with the Chairman of the Health Committee. At the start of proceedings, I thanked the Health Committee for the work that it did and for its engagement with the Justice Committee, which we appreciate. The Chairman raised an issue around special paid leave, as well the housing issue, which is to do with the Department for Communities. The Committee looked at that issue, and it is in our report. The Minister for the Economy has asked her officials to consider special paid leave for it and other employment issues, and, if provision can be made and consensus reached with the Executive, a suitable legislative vehicle will be taken forward. Minister, I just wanted to address the issue that the Chair of the Health Committee raised and thank him and his Committee for their work with our Committee.

Mrs Long: It is very much appreciated, and I will move on to the issues that Colm Gildernew raised in his contribution; in fact, given that they have now been raised, it may be worth doing that now.

The issues that we have to address span more than the Justice Department; indeed, a number of issues raised this evening extend beyond the responsibilities of the Department of Justice. I did not, however, leave those issues simply to gather dust on the shelf. I wrote to Minister Dodds, because she is, as you know, taking forward a review of statutory leave provisions, and I asked her to look into this as part of her review of employment law. Furthermore, Minister Ní Chuilín, as you rightly say, has said that she will look at the issue of housing and the availability of shelter accommodation, because it falls to the Department for Communities to do so, and I am happy to work with her in that regard.

It is, however, also the case — this needs to be stressed again, because it is often forgotten — that there is already good work being done in this field, and there should not be an automatic assumption that, when someone is subject to domestic abuse or domestic violence, they should have to flee their home. Provision is already in place for someone to be excluded from the home if they are a domestic abuser, and the Safe Places work that is being done with the Department for Communities and my colleagues across the Executive allows people to create a safe space in their own home so that they are able to remain there and in their own community, with the benefit that that brings of having social contact and support that they need. Instead, it is the abuser who is asked to leave the home and made to stay away from it to allow the family to continue living there. The moving of those who are subject to abuse has serious ramifications for, for example, children and their schooling, so there is a genuine challenge around how we deal with the issue. It is therefore important that we do not presume that it is the abused party who has to leave the family home.

I turn now to amendment No 13. I intend to bring forward detailed primary legislation to provide for domestic abuse protection orders and notices. I will resist the Committee amendment for that reason. By stipulating a restrictive two-year period, it places an unnecessary risk on my Department.

I am hugely sympathetic to the views of the Committee when it comes to this matter. I have been clear in my intention that I want to do this under the future miscellaneous provisions Bill, that I consider this amendment unnecessary, and that the risk to my Department is great. I have sought the Executive's permission to add the domestic abuse protection notices and orders to the miscellaneous provisions Bill. Explicitly stating a restrictive two-year time frame for the introduction of an untested policy, which has not yet been subject to public consultation, leaves my Department exposed to a successful judicial review and unnecessary levels of risk, including financial risk. That would impact on not only the Department of Justice but all Ministers because, ultimately, it is for the Executive to bear those risks. Including provision in this Bill does not enable the detail of the provisions to be set out in primary legislation, ahead of which necessary consultation must be undertaken.

9.30 pm

The Committee is understandably concerned — a number of members have referred to it — about why the domestic violence protection orders and notices were not progressed. First, it could not happen during suspension of the Assembly, so there are three of the years that are taken out of the mix. When the Assembly was restored, I sat down with officials to look at what needed to be done to introduce them. However, by that point, we were aware, through operational experience gained in England and Wales, that there were considerable problems with the operation of the notices and orders, and that they were going to be superseded by domestic abuse protection notices and orders in the new Domestic Abuse Bill. It seemed to me to be a waste of resource in the Department to bring forward the domestic violence protection notices and orders when, as part of my programme of work in the Department, I intend to bring forward the new and improved domestic abuse protection orders and notices. It was not that we, as a Department, simply decided not to bother, as seems to have been insinuated by some in the debate today. There was good reason why the Department did not bring these things forward despite the fact that they were allowed for in previous legislation.

The detail of this policy is being discussed with voluntary and community sector partners. Therefore, I hope to be in a position shortly to consult on my policy proposals. As explained, however, given the timings of that consultation and the introduction date for the miscellaneous provisions Bill, which will be an expansive piece of legislation and will take a considerable time to pass through the House, these measures will instead be brought forward as amendments, ahead of the Consideration Stage of that Bill. It is going to take time for us to be able to get the Bill through the Assembly. We also have the pressure on the Office of the Legislative Counsel in the drafting of this legislation and all the legislative pressures that will come at this time. Bringing this forward as an amendment will allow us to do the full policy development that is required and then amend the miscellaneous provisions Bill. I have said that I am happy to bring those amendments forward so that, while they will not be in the Bill as introduced, they will be available to the Committee in order for it to be able to take evidence and to work with us in developing them.

Despite our disagreement on how to proceed at this juncture, I welcome that the Justice Committee and its Chairman have indicated that it is supportive of the development and progression of these measures in due course. I believe that primary legislation is the right place for that to reside. As I have explained, it will not be possible to have formal Committee scrutiny of the provisions on those notices to the same extent as normal. However, I will take whatever steps are necessary in order to ensure that the Committee has the opportunity to consider and comment on those draft clauses ahead of their being brought to the House for consideration as part of the Consideration Stage. The inclusion in primary legislation will mean that there is also Executive oversight of the policy proposals and draft amendments. This House, crucially, will also have the opportunity to debate the details of those provisions during the amending stages of the Assembly legislative process, both at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage. While that might not be as fulsome as is usual, it is certainly better than being relegated to a short clause in this Bill. It will be enhanced greatly by the public consultation that we intend to take forward. In fact, in his contribution, Seán Lynch rightly highlighted the need for further consultation and policy development in this area. Yet, he has indicated that he will support a means of proceeding to secondary legislation at this stage without either being in place.

Members have again said that they do not understand why the Department will not be able to deliver regulations on protections within two years. It is simply not feasible for my Department to work on bringing forward detailed and extensive primary legislation, the size of a medium Bill, while progressing regulations on the same issue. That is the duty that that proposed clause would place on the Department. We simply do not have the resources to do the job twice in two different ways. If we allocated resources to that, they would be taken from elsewhere, particularly from the front-line work that we do on domestic abuse and support for victims. If we are to be victim-centred, we need the officials in my Department who lead on that to focus on it rather than to replicate work that will have nugatory effect. As I said, provision through primary legislation is a more appropriate vehicle for a change of that nature. For that reason, I will not support the amendment.

Amendment No 14 proposes a technical change to the rules on financial eligibility for legal aid. It is well-intentioned; no one in the House tonight believes that that area does not need to be looked at and developed. However, by acting with such haste, we would lose the opportunity to undertake the research and engagement that would result in stronger proposals whose impact we better understand. We would also reduce the ability to evaluate, review and, if necessary, amend the provisions in order to ensure their effective operation in practice, which would be gained if the Committee took it away and looked at it with me as secondary legislation. There is a place for secondary legislation. This is precisely such a place. Placing those duties in primary legislation would create significant difficulties for the Legal Services Agency and the Department. The potential cost of amendment No 14 is unqualified. Without clarity, it could be many millions of pounds annually, and we would not be able to say that it will afford the protection that is required. It is not only potentially expensive and uncosted, which is not the way in which we should do business in the House, but it would not necessarily provide the protection that some Members seem to believe that it will.

We need to make sure that proposals that come here are effective and affordable. The Department of Finance approved the Bill on the basis that it would not require additional resources. The Minister of Finance could not have been clearer about that. If passed, amendment No 14 would drive a coach and horses through that and would have implications for every other Minister, from whom money would have to be taken in order to fund it. It also flies in the face of the Committee's demands that the cost of legal aid be reduced and brought under control because it would introduce uncosted and uncapped demand into the system. That is a serious matter that is in conflict with what has been said all along. Many Members said that, if the costs are not carried by the Department and the Legal Services Agency, they will be carried by someone else. The costs that we are concerned about are a reflection of not just the scale of the problem but of the poor framing of the amendment. The fact is that it may not be sufficiently targeted to deliver the results that people wish. The amendment, despite its expense, would not, as some seem to believe, stop someone's financial resources being drained by repeated court actions. If you have capital of more than £3,000, you will still have to pay a contribution amounting to the whole cost of proceedings in the higher courts. The waiver does not help that person at all.

I understand where Sinéad Bradley is coming from, but she assumes that the only reason that people drag partners through the courts is to financially damage them. That is not true. People will drag their partner through the courts even where there is no financial detriment because they are using it as another means to exert control, fear and anxiety on their partner. It is another form of abuse. The suggestion that removing the financial incentive will remove the behaviour is simply not coherent. They will continue to do that —.

Ms S Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Long: I will draw this to a close.

They will continue to do that. What we need to do and what we are trying to do in the Bill as a whole is to capture that kind of abusive behaviour so that dragging people back to court becomes an offence in itself, therefore placing more pressure on the judiciary to exercise the law that it already has to hand in order to rule against bringing people repeatedly back into the court system. It has the capacity to do that.

In good conscience, and as a member of the Executive, with my responsibilities and duties to other Executive members and Departments, I cannot stand over or support amendment No 14. I agree absolutely that there is a need to reform legal aid, and I remind Paul Frew, who said that there is a need for legal aid reform to be reviewed, that my predecessor tackled legal aid. It was not too big, painful or difficult for Minister Ford. He took it on, and I am happy to take it on — via the correct vehicle. The Bill is not that vehicle. This is not a Bill for legal aid reform; it is a Bill to deal with domestic abuse. By developing secondary rather than primary legislation, we can ensure that the issues are addressed correctly with due diligence, that it captures what Members want to achieve, and that we can refine it in light of the experiences that we have in the courts when we introduce such changes. For that reason, I do not support amendment No 14, and I ask Members to think carefully before they support it. Once it is in the Bill, we will be unable to change or reduce the onus that it will place on the Department at Further Consideration Stage. The duties on the Department can only be increased at Further Consideration Stage, so I ask Members to think carefully about how they vote on the Bill. That concludes my remarks on the second group of amendments.

Amendment No 9 agreed to.

Clause 11, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 12 (Defence on grounds of reasonableness)

Mr Speaker: No amendments have been tabled to clause 12, but the Chair of the Committee for Health, Mr Colm Gildernew, has indicated a desire to speak to the clause standing part of the Bill.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr Gildernew: Before the Question is put on clause 12 stand part, I would like to put two questions to the Minister, based on stakeholder concerns raised with the Health Committee. First, will she outline the safeguards that are in place to protect victims with mental health conditions from the inappropriate use of the reasonable person defence? Secondly, does she have any plans to review the operation of the clause?

Mrs Long: The Department has considered the issue of capability with respect to the abuse of the reasonable person defence. However, that would be one of the considerations that the reasonable person test would take into account. In the same way that, for example, denying children their pocket money or access to their digital devices would not be captured by the defence, if someone is using or taking care of someone else's money for reasons of incapacity, the proposed victim would be captured by the reasonable person defence.

On the second question about the review of the clause, it is intended that the entire Bill will be open to report and review throughout its operation. We will get to the reporting when we discuss the next group of amendments, but it is hugely important. I certainly believe that there is a role for the Department of Health and the Health Committee in reviewing the Bill and feeding into our responses and the changes that may be necessary once it is in operation.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13 (Alternative available for conviction)

Amendment No 10 made: In page 7, line 40, at end insert “(3) This section is without prejudice to section 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 (alternative verdicts on trial on indictment).” — [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 13, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 14 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 15 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 16 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 17 (Exception regarding the aggravation)

Amendment No 11 made: Leave out ‘18’ and insert ‘16— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 17, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 18 to 20 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 12 made: Before clause 21 insert

“Definitions for child cruelty offence

Meaning of ill-treatment etc. in offence provision

20A. In section 20 (cruelty to persons under 16) of the Children and Young Persons Act (Northern Ireland) 1968—

(a) in subsection (1), the words from “(including” to “derangement)” are repealed,

(b) before paragraph (a) of subsection (2) insert—

“(za) a reference to—

(i) ill-treatment is to ill-treatment whether physical or otherwise;

(ii) suffering or injury is to suffering or injury whether physical or otherwise;”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 21 to 24 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 13 made: After clause 24 insert

“Interim protection for the victim

24A.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations, within 24 months of commencement, make provision for measures which may be made for the purposes of protecting and supporting the victim or alleged victim.

(2) The regulations may include provisions about —

(a) court orders,

(b) measures other than court orders.

(3) The regulations may not be made unless a draft has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Northern Ireland Assembly.”.— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 14 proposed: After clause 24 insert

“Amendment to the eligibility requirement for civil legal aid

24A. In The Civil Legal Services (Financial) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015, Article 10 (1), at end insert —

“(ab) advice and assistance or representation in proceedings for, or in relation to, any order referred in Article 8(1) of the Children (Northern Ireland) Act 1995 where the client is a victim of domestic abuse in accordance with the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Act (Northern Ireland) 2020.”.— [Miss Woods.]

Question put, That amendment No 14 be made.

Mr Speaker: Order, Members. Before I put the Question again, I remind Members present that, if possible, it would be preferable to avoid a Division.

Question, that the amendment be made, put a second time.

Mr Speaker: Before the Assembly divides, I remind Members that, as per Standing Order 112, the Assembly currently has proxy voting arrangements in place. Members who have authorised another Member to vote on their behalf are not entitled to vote in person and should not enter the Lobbies. I also remind Members to ensure that social distancing continues to be observed while the Division is taking place. Please be patient at all times and follow the instructions of the Lobby Clerks. Clear the Lobbies.

The Assembly divided:

Ayes 44; Noes 7.

AYES

Mr Allen, Ms Bailey, Mrs Barton, Mr Beattie, Mr M Bradley, Ms P Bradley, Ms S Bradley, Mr K Buchanan, Mr T Buchanan, Mr Buckley, Ms Bunting, Mr Butler, Mrs Cameron, Mr Carroll, Mr Catney, Mr Chambers, Mr Clarke, Mr Dunne, Mr Durkan, Mr Easton, Mr Frew, Mr Givan, Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch, Mr Humphrey, Ms Hunter, Mr Irwin, Mrs D Kelly, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Miss McIlveen, Ms McLaughlin, Mr McNulty, Mr Middleton, Mr Nesbitt, Mr Newton, Mr O’Toole, Mr Robinson, Mr Stalford, Mr Stewart, Mr Storey, Ms Sugden, Mr Swann, Miss Woods.

Tellers for the Ayes: Mr Frew and Miss Woods.

NOES

Ms Armstrong, Mr Blair, Ms Bradshaw, Mr Dickson, Mrs Long, Mr Lyttle, Mr Muir.

Tellers for the Noes: Ms Armstrong and Mr Lyttle.

The following Members voted in both Lobbies and are therefore not counted in the result: Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Mr Boylan, Ms Dillon, Ms Dolan, Ms Ennis, Ms Flynn, Mr Gildernew, Ms Hargey, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mr Lynch, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan, Mr McHugh, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mr O’Dowd, Mrs O’Neill, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan, Ms Sheerin

The following Members’ votes were cast by their notified proxy in this Division:

Ms S Bradley voted for Mr Catney, Mr Durkan, Ms Hunter, Mrs D Kelly, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Ms McLaughlin, Mr McNulty and Mr O’Toole.

Mr K Buchanan voted for Ms P Bradley, Mr Buckley, Ms Cameron, Mr Dunne, Mr Easton, Mr Givan, Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch, Mr Irwin, Mr Newton, Mr Robinson, Mr Stalford and Mr Storey.

Mr Butler voted for Mr Allen, Mrs Barton, Mr Chambers, Mr Nesbitt, Mr Stewart and Mr Swann.

Mr Dickson voted for Ms Armstrong [Teller, Noes], Mr Blair, Ms Bradshaw, Mrs Long, Mr Lyttle [Teller, Noes] and Mr Muir.

Mr O’Dowd voted for Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Mr Boylan, Ms Dillon, Ms Dolan, Ms Ennis, Ms Flynn, Mr Gildernew, Ms Hargey, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mr Lynch, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan, Mr McHugh, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mrs O’Neill, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan and Ms Sheerin.

Miss Woods [Teller, Ayes] voted for Ms Bailey.

Question accordingly agreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the debate on the group 2 amendments. I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 10.25 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 10.15 pm and resumed at 10.26 pm.

Debate resumed.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We have come to the third group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 15, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 18 to 26. I call the Minister of Justice to move amendment No 15 and address the other amendments in the group.

New Clause

The following amendment stood on the Marshalled List:

No 15: Before clause 25 insert

“Requirement for training within relevant bodies

24A.—(1) Each of the following must provide such training on the effect of this Part as it considers appropriate for its personnel —

- (a) the Police Service of Northern Ireland,
 - (b) the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland.
- (2) The Department of Justice must provide such training on the effect of this Part as it considers appropriate for staff within the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunal Service.”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 15 not moved.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I will call the Chairperson of the Committee for Justice, Paul Givan, to move amendment No 18 and to commence the group 3 debate in a moment. Before that can happen, we must dispose of amendment Nos 16 and 17, which have already been debated.

Clause 25 (Guidance about domestic abuse)

Amendment No 16 made: In page 13, line 28, leave out “may” and insert “must”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 17 made: In page 13, line 30, leave out “other matters” and insert “such other matters as it considers appropriate”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We return now to the third group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 18, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 19 to 26. I call the Chairperson of the Committee for Justice, Paul Givan, to move amendment No 18 and address the other amendments in the group.

Mr Givan: I beg to move amendment No 18: In page 13, line 31, at end insert

“(1A) In supporting the operation of Part 1, the Department may by regulations make provision for informing the school of a child who saw, heard or was present during a domestic abuse incident.”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 19: In clause 25, page 13, line 34, leave out from “may” to end of line 35 and insert

“must —

(a) keep any guidance issued under this section under review, and

(b) revise any guidance issued under this section if it considers revision to be necessary in light of review.”.—
[Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 20: New Clause

After clause 25 insert

“Guidance on data collection

25A.—(1) The Department of Justice —

(a) may issue guidance to the relevant bodies about the sort of information which it seeks to obtain from them for the purpose of the assessment by it of the operation of this Part, and

(b) must have regard to information which it obtains from the relevant bodies in relation to the operation of this Part when determining the steps (if any) that could be taken by it for the purpose of ensuring the effectiveness of the operation of this Part.

(2) The relevant bodies are —

- (a) Police Service of Northern Ireland,
- (b) Public Prosecution Service Northern Ireland,
- (c) the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, and
- (d) such additional bodies as the Department considers appropriate.”.— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

No 21: New Clause

After clause 25 insert

“Training

25A.—(1) It shall be the duty of the Department to ensure that sufficient training of policing and criminal justice agencies, including but not limited to —

- (a) Police Service of Northern Ireland,
 - (b) Public Prosecution Service Northern Ireland, and
 - (c) the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, and
- is made available to allow for the effective operation of this Act.

(2) Training must be provided annually.

(3) Training is mandatory for all those involved in the disposal of domestic abuse cases in policing and criminal justice agencies, including but not limited to the agencies listed in subsection (1).

(4) Having identified the relevant staff in subsection (3) at the beginning of an annual reporting period, the Department must publish the uptake of training by each relevant organisation at the end of each year.”.— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

No 22: As an amendment to Amendment No 21, in clause 25A(1) after “sufficient” insert the words “resources and”.—
[Miss Woods.]

No 23: New Clause

After clause 25 insert

“Independent oversight

25A.—(1) The Department of Justice must not later than 1 year after the commencement of this Act appoint an independent person to —

(a) contribute to the development of the guidance under section 25, and

(b) review, report and make recommendations in relation to the operation of Part 1.

(2) The person must produce a report annually on the activities in subsection (1), starting not later than 2 years after the commencement of this Act.

(3) The Department must —

(a) lay the report before the Northern Ireland Assembly, and

(b) arrange for it to be published.

(4) The Department may by regulations set out the date, not less than 7 years after commencement, when the independent person may cease the duties in subsections (1) and (2).

(5) Starting on the date when the independent person ceases duties, the Department must publish a report on subsection (1)(b) every 3 years thereafter.”.— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

No 24: New Clause

After clause 25 insert

“Report on the operation of this Act

25A.—(1) The Department of Justice must prepare a report on the operation of —

(a) an offence under section 1(1), and

(b) an offence that is aggravated as described in sections 8, 9 and 15.

(2) The report must set out, in relation to those sorts of offences —

(a) the number of cases for which criminal proceedings are undertaken,

(b) the number of convictions in criminal proceedings,

(c) the average length of time —

(i) from service of the complaint or indictment,

(ii) to finding or verdict as to guilt (including plea of guilty),

(d) information about the experience of witnesses (including witnesses who are children) at court,

(e) such additional information as the Department of Justice considers appropriate.

(3) The report must, in relation to those sorts of offences, include distinct statistics for each of them.

(4) For the purpose of the report, the Department of Justice must seek information on how court business is arranged so as to ensure the efficient disposal of cases involving those sorts of offences.

(5) The report must also include —

(a) activities and associated timespans for delivering the guidance in section 25 and any plans for review,

(b) strategies to communicate the provisions of Part 1 to the public and to victims in particular, and
(c) any additional activities which support the operation of the Act.

(6) The Department must prepare a report under this section —

(a) not more than 2 years after commencement, and
(b) thereafter, at intervals of not more than 3 years.

(7) The Department must —

(a) lay the report before the Northern Ireland Assembly, and

(b) arrange for it to be published.”— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

No 25: As an amendment to Amendment No 24, in subsection (2)(b), at end insert —

“(ba) the number of cases where it has been –

(i) specified that the offence is aggravated by reasons as described in sections 8, 9, and 15.

(ii) proved that the offence is so aggravated,

(bb) information on A and B as described in Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.”— [Miss Woods.]

No 26: As an amendment to Amendment No 24, in subsection (2), at end insert —

“(2A) The report should also include the number of offences recorded within each police district in Northern Ireland.”— [Miss Woods.]

Mr Givan: I will cover each of the Committee amendments in this group in turn. I know that the hour is late, but this is the culmination of the Committee’s scrutiny process over several months, which I outlined in great detail at the start. We make no apology for giving it proper justice and the Assembly continuing to carry out its role. Members have been doing that, some at length, but that has been necessary. I commend them for the way in which they have carried themselves in the debate so far. They have gone over this in great detail. As Chairman of the Committee, I need to convey the wider issues that the Committee has considered and try to reflect all of that. Therefore, my speeches, necessarily, have been longer than those of other Members. I am doing that on behalf of all of the parties where we have agreed on that. That is why some Members do not need to be as elaborative as I have been. However, I need to keep doing that, despite the hour being 10.30 pm and we are now into the seventh hour of our consideration of this. I will continue the proper deliberations that are required.

10.30 pm

I will begin with amendment No 18. The first time that the Committee became aware of Operation Encompass was when the Chief Constable gave oral evidence in February 2020, not long after the Committee was established. He stated that it was a programme operating in England and Wales that he was familiar with and that he wished to see introduced in Northern Ireland. There were, however, legislative impediments that he hoped could be overcome with the support and assistance of the Committee and other partners.

When providing evidence to the Committee on the Bill, a number of organisations also highlighted their support for the introduction of an Operation Encompass-type approach in Northern Ireland. They believed that it is complementary to the intentions of the Bill and merits consideration, given that it ensures that schools are in a better position to understand and be supportive of the child’s needs and possible behaviours as a result of being notified when a domestic abuse incident has occurred the night before to which the police have been called out. The provision of support in the school environment means that children are better safeguarded against the short-, medium- and long-term effects of domestic abuse.

The Committee requested further information on Operation Encompass, and the Department of Justice indicated that a multi-agency task and finish group was exploring how such an approach could be introduced locally and that the intention was to undertake a pilot project later in 2020. The Department also advised that both the police and the Safeguarding Board for Northern Ireland were of the view that there is currently insufficient legislative cover to enable the sharing of information between the police and schools for well-being as opposed to child protection purposes and that legislative change is needed to facilitate that. Given the absence of the necessary legislative cover, the pilot project would operate on a consent basis. The Department informed the Committee that, in its view, such legislative provision could not be provided in the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill.

The chair of the south-eastern area domestic and sexual violence partnership, which covers the locality where the initiative will be piloted, subsequently informed the Committee that, while the partnership is keen to have Operation Encompass rolled out in Northern Ireland and agreed to the pilot in the Down sector of the Newry, Mourne and Down District Council area, there will be limitations, as the pilot will operate on a consent basis, so the PSNI will be able to notify a school only when there is concern for the well-being of the child if it has the consent of the victim to do so. The partnership believes that there may be fewer notifications made as a consequence and that the victim could be at greater risk if the perpetrator learns that they gave their consent for the notification to be made.

The Committee requested clarification on the legislative gap preventing the introduction of the scheme in Northern Ireland and how it could be addressed. The Department advised that, as the purpose of the information sharing is to ensure child well-being and as the delivery will be in an educational setting, it considers it a matter for Education legislation as opposed to Justice legislation, and discussions were therefore ongoing with officials in the Department of Education to determine the appropriate legislative vehicle for the changes. The Department reiterated that, in its opinion, the required legislative provision in this area could not be provided for in this Bill.

The Committee is very supportive of this type of information-sharing scheme being available in Northern Ireland and believes that legislative provision to enable the PSNI to share information with a school on well-being grounds to support children in the context of domestic abuse should be provided at the earliest opportunity. The Safeguarding Board would welcome the necessary legislative provision being included in this Bill, and the Education Authority also believes that inclusion of such provision would strengthen the Bill.

To provide the necessary legislative cover as soon as possible, the Committee decided to table an amendment. In light of the Committee's amendment, the Minister advised us that, while it was not yet clear that the Committee amendment would be deemed admissible, she was in agreement with the Committee that there is considerable merit in provision being made available to enable information to be shared for the purpose of an Operation Encompass approach. While she considered tabling an alternative amendment to ensure that any provision is as robust as possible and fully provides for the necessary regulations to be brought forward, following further discussion and assuming that the Committee amendment is made today, the Minister now intends to table such an amendment at Further Consideration Stage. It will build on the wording of our amendment and provide increased detail and clarity to ensure that the provision will fully meet its intended purpose. The Committee welcomes the approach now being adopted by the Minister and her support for our amendment. We will be happy to consider further amendments to improve our amendment before the Bill completes its passage through the Assembly.

I will now address amendment Nos 20, 21 and 24. Their context relates to the consistent theme running through the evidence received by the Committee of the importance of how the legislation will be implemented. Many organisations and individuals expressed the view that the legislation will be only as good as its practical implementation and that how the legislation is implemented is as important as what it covers. The Committee believes that for this legislation, and in particular the new domestic abuse offence, to be effective and achieve the desired result of better protection and criminal justice outcomes for victims of domestic violence and abuse, getting right the implementation of training for those involved in gathering evidence, in prosecuting and enforcing the new law, in monitoring and reporting on it and in increasing public awareness of it is crucial. The Committee therefore tabled amendments on data collection, training and reporting. Although the Committee agrees that raising public awareness and recognition of the new offence will be very important and welcomes the work that the Department intends to undertake in that area, specific legislative provision is not required for it. The Committee has, however, included a requirement for the Department to report on the strategies to communicate the new offence to the public and victims as part of the reporting obligations on the operation of the new offence as part of amendment No 24.

Amendment No 20 specifically provides for the Department to issue guidance on the type of information and data required to be collected to assess fully and properly the operation of the new offence. The importance of strengthening data collection on domestic abuse and violence, both generally and specifically, in the implementation of the new legislation was highlighted by a number of organisations. Views outlined a range of gaps, including the nature, extent and impact of domestic violence and abuse on each of the section 75 equality groups and the lack of disaggregated data by sex, gender, ethnicity, disability and age and for children. The need for data — including data on the number of initial reports; on the number of case files referred to the Public Prosecution Service; on how many of those reach the different stages of the court process; on how many reach the prosecution stage; on what the resulting remedy is; and on how many involve repeat offences — to track the journey of abuse investigations through the criminal justice system in order to enable an accurate assessment to be made of how the legislation is working was also emphasised.

The Department advised the Committee that it recognised the importance of robust data and was reviewing how best to secure that for the new offence with partner agencies as part of the operational arrangements. The Department indicated that a range of information is already available, or will be, including information on applications for protection orders and on the number of convictions, as well as higher-level information on the length of processes. The Department further indicated that the PSNI statistics branch currently publishes statistical data on domestic abuse crimes, disaggregated by sex, gender and ethnicity. Information on disability and sexual orientation is not currently available, but the PSNI has been in contact with the Equality Commission about the issue of further data collection on section 75 groups for all crimes. The Committee recognises the importance of the availability of robust data to enable the legislation's effectiveness to be assessed. The data also needs to be consistent across the various criminal justice agencies — something that is not always available — to allow for tracking of cases and analysis at each stage of the process. To ensure that, the Committee tabled amendment No 20 and welcomes the Minister's support for it.

I move now to amendment No 24, which places a requirement on the Department to report on the new offence. The amendment will require the Department to report on the operation of the new domestic abuse offence and the aggravating factors provided for in clauses 8, 9 and 15 in a range of areas, including the number of cases taken; the number of convictions; the average length of time for cases; the experiences of witnesses; the provision of the guidance required by clause 25; and the communications strategies implemented by the Department to raise public awareness of the new offence. The first report must be available no more than two years after the commencement of the legislation. The report must be laid in the Northern Ireland Assembly and published. Further reports are required no later than every three years. The amendment aims to provide for the effectiveness of the legislation to be monitored and assessed in a transparent manner.

The Committee considered including a reporting requirement in relation to the section 75 groups but decided not to pursue that following advice that that may take our amendment beyond the reasonable limits of the Bill's collective purposes. The Committee is also conscious that, although it wishes to place a reporting requirement on the Department, there is a need to consider what the criminal justice agencies can actually deliver in terms of figures and statistics to enable the Department to fulfil its reporting requirements.

The Committee welcomes the Minister's acknowledgement that there is merit in reporting on the operations of the Bill's provisions and her support for the Committee amendment today. Rather than having two amendments that deal with the same issue for the Assembly to consider, the Committee appreciates the approach that the Minister has adopted by not tabling an alternative amendment and is happy to consider any amendments that the Minister wishes to bring forward at Further Consideration Stage that will build on the intent and purpose of the Committee amendment and refine some of the language so that it more closely aligns with practice in criminal proceedings. I am sure the Minister will expand on that when she speaks in this debate.

Rachel Woods has tabled two amendments to the Committee amendment to add additional reporting requirements. The Minister advised the Committee that she intends to support amendment No 26 but not amendment No 25 due to the section 75 element. I am sure that the Minister will elaborate on her reasons around that. Although the Committee did not discuss those amendments, I suspect that it would have no difficulty with supporting amendment No 26, which provides for reporting on the number of offences recorded within each police district. The PSNI has confirmed that that could be provided. In relation to amendment No 25, the Minister highlighted to the Committee last week that the operational partners indicated that they do not have the capacity in their IT and reporting systems to provide that level of data and that doing so would have substantial operational and financial implications and would require major IT changes.

Amendment No 21 relates to the requirement around training. The Committee brought it forward to ensure that the appropriate and adequate training of relevant personnel takes place. The Minister advised the Committee that she could not support its amendment regarding training and that she would bring forward an alternative amendment. Following discussions at last Thursday's Committee meeting, the Minister has decided not to move amendment No 15. In relation to its amendment, the Committee agrees with the views of a wide range of organisations that stated that there is a need for comprehensive training for anyone involved in gathering evidence and in prosecuting and enforcing the new law and that the legislation will be effective only if that takes place. The ability to investigate and prosecute the new offence will hinge on training police first responders to recognise and identify the signs of psychological abuse and coercive and controlling behaviour, which is manipulative, subtle and, often, covert. It will be vital that appropriate evidence is gathered if full use is to be made of the new offence.

A number of organisations recommended mandatory training for the PSNI and the other criminal justice organisations involved in the prosecution and enforcement of the new offence and that the training should cover issues including the impact of domestic violence and abuse on women and children; a wider understanding of men as victims of domestic abuse; the particular needs of different groups of people, including LGBT and other marginalised and vulnerable groups, such as migrant victims; and the obligations to take appropriate action in suspected cases of domestic abuse affecting children. The PSNI advised the Committee that it recognises that officer training on the definition of the new offence and examples of the behaviours that it involves will be pivotal to the successful enforcement of the legislation. When the Chief Constable attended the meeting of the Committee on 24 September, he outlined that training was being developed in conjunction with the Women's Aid Federation to familiarise front-line officers with what coercive and controlling behaviour looks like. The training, which will be a mixture of online and classroom-based training, will be rolled out from December. Particular roles will also receive specialist training where required.

The Public Prosecution Service outlined that it is considering the establishment of specialist domestic violence and abuse prosecutors. It is envisaged that those prosecutors will receive more intensive training on coercive control and the identification of patterns of domestic abuse behaviours and will act as the first point of contact for police to assist in providing prosecutorial advice and ensure that all reasonable lines of enquiry are pursued in order to maximise the opportunities for bringing fair but robust prosecutions.

10.45 pm

During the Committee Stage, the Department outlined that discussions were being held with the Judicial Studies Board about raising awareness among the judiciary of the new offence. That included considering what lessons can be learned from other jurisdictions. The Department also advised the Committee that it recognised the importance of training but did not consider that a requirement for it needed to be placed in statute. The Committee, however, views training for relevant personnel crucial to the effective implementation of the legislation given that the new offence is a course of behaviour offence that will require the exercise of judgement by the police when gathering evidence and a clear understanding and recognition of the behaviours that are associated with non-physical abuse for others who are involved in the prosecution and enforcement of the new law. The Committee, therefore, decided to table amendment No 21, which places a duty on the Department to ensure that "sufficient" and appropriate training:

"is made available to allow for the effective operation of" the legislation.

"Training is mandatory for all those involved in the disposal of domestic abuse cases in policing and criminal justice agencies" and "must be provided annually", and:

"the Department must publish the uptake of training by each relevant organisation at the end of" each annual reporting period given the importance of training to "the effective operation" of the legislation.

The Committee has some sympathy with the point that the Minister made during our discussions last Thursday that it would be more appropriate to place the duty for training on PSNI and PPS personnel rather than on the Department. Therefore, if it is made today, the Committee is content to tidy up the wording of its amendment in order to reflect that at Further Consideration Stage. The Committee does not, however, accept that there is no need for the training to be mandatory and that, by requiring annual training, it could become a tick-box exercise and would place significant problems on the organisations from a capacity perspective. Those were points that the Minister made to the Committee last week. The Committee also questions the Minister's understanding that the PSNI currently does not undertake annual recurrent training in any area, as members are aware of a range of training that it provides annually.

The Committee believes that annual training is an important requirement, and making the training:

“mandatory for all those involved in the disposal of domestic abuse cases in policing and criminal justice agencies, including” the PSNI, the PPS and the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service emphasises the crucial role that training will play in the implementation of the legislation and the new offence.

Mrs Long: Will the Chairperson give way?

Mr Givan: I am happy to give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: Rather than hold this for my speech later, the point that I made is that the PSNI does not provide annual training for any particular offence. It does, of course, have to provide training that is specific to its operational needs, but it does not provide training on any other offences. That could create a precedent that means that newly introduced offences would be subject to annual training, and that could be burdensome if it were to continue in perpetuity.

Mr Givan: That neatly takes me on. Our amendment is drafted in order not only to ensure that appropriate training is provided but to give flexibility to the organisations to deliver different tiers of training as appropriate, including initial training, annual refresher training and specialist training for particular roles. It does not require the same level of training to be undertaken by every member of staff in every criminal justice agency. The framing of our amendment will also provide parameters against which the Northern Ireland Policing Board can hold the PSNI to account. I ask the Assembly to support the Committee amendment today.

Amendment No 23 provides for the independent oversight of and reporting on the implementation of the legislation for at least seven years. The Committee sees great merit in providing independent oversight of the implementation of the legislation for a period of time until it has fully bedded in. Independent input in that way would hold government to account and build confidence amongst the organisations that support victims that the legislation is operating effectively. Such oversight could also provide valuable input, advice and assistance to the criminal justice organisations when addressing any issues that arise.

Many of the organisations that provided evidence to the Committee noted that the Westminster Domestic Abuse Bill includes provision for a domestic abuse commissioner and supported the call from the Women’s Aid Federation for the introduction of such a commissioner in Northern Ireland.

A wide ranging role was envisaged for such a commissioner to include oversight and scrutiny of the implementation of the legislation. While the Committee had sympathy for the calls for the appointment of such a commissioner, and did consider whether it should attempt to pursue this, following further consideration and discussion we decided that the key issue was to provide for an independent oversight function in relation to the implementation of the legislation, and we therefore tabled amendment 23.

The Department can bring the independent oversight function to an end after a period of seven years by regulation, by which time the new offence and the legislation more generally should be well bedded in and any issues or difficulties with its application should have been addressed. The Minister advised the Committee that she agrees with the need for oversight and scrutiny of how the new offence operates. In correspondence to the Committee at the beginning of November, the Minister indicated that she considered our amendment to be akin to a domestic abuse commissioner in all but name.

Following our discussions, I hope that the Minister is now clear that that is not the intention of the amendment; rather it is to create an independent oversight function. Victims of domestic abuse have waited a very long time — much too long — for this legislation. We must ensure that there is confidence that it is being fully and effectively implemented and that any issues that arise are identified quickly and addressed properly.

Yesterday, the Minister advised the Committee that she is now content to support the amendment, which, she has indicated, will, when taken with a range of other oversight and scrutiny arrangements, ensure that there is a robust consideration of how the offence is working in practice. I welcome the change in the Minister’s position and ask the Assembly to support this Committee amendment.

Finally, I want to confirm that the Committee supports amendment No 19 brought forward by the Minister, which I covered in when I spoke in the debate on the group 1 amendments. I do not intend to revisit the issue.

Mr Deputy Speaker, that concludes my remarks as Chairperson of the Justice Committee. My colleague, Paul Frew, will elaborate on the amendments to give the DUP perspective on each of them, so I do not intend to labour the point. However, I will make a couple of remarks.

Operation Encompass was raised by Committee members extensively. The Chief Constable raised it with the Committee, and Linda Dillon raised it at nearly every meeting and pursued it relentlessly, with the Committee’s support, so I am pleased that we can address the issue by way of amendment. Ultimately, the Committee decided that we needed to test whether the Speaker would rule it in or not. I was pleased that the Speaker ruled it admissible.

Ultimately, it is about a case in which a child at home witnesses an event or there is a dispute in the home to which the police are called. It makes sense that the police should have the ability to inform the school the next day, rather than a child coming in with no lunch, or without completed homework and the teacher, unwittingly, challenging the child for not having its homework done or coming in without lunch.

The Committee saw it as a common-sense approach that the police, where they decide to do it, should have the ability to pass that information on appropriately to the school authorities. Issues were raised about the general data protection regulation (GDPR) and information sharing. I am pleased that the amendment, which will be enhanced at Further Consideration Stage, will put that into practice. It is just good common sense and I am pleased that the Committee was able to identify that.

Independent oversight was an issue that my party wanted to see included, because we knew that the role of Domestic Abuse Commissioner was included in the legislation in Westminster, and we have received significant representations about it. However, we recognised that that was unlikely to be within the purposes of this Bill and would be part of wider legislation that would need to be taken forward. Critical to that was having a form of independent oversight. I am pleased that we are going to get that, because for this legislation to be effective it needs to have that level of scrutiny applied to it. Independent oversight can, subsequently, make recommendations, and from that may flow a domestic abuse commissioner. That may well still happen in due course. It is important that we provide that independent oversight.

In respect of the amendments tabled by Rachel Woods, my party is minded to support amendment No 26, which relates to the gathering of data by the PSNI. I was persuaded by the Minister's evidence on amendment No 25 with regard to collecting information. I am sympathetic to what it seeks to do. However, it is important that we are satisfied about the capability to provide that information. The Minister may well touch on that later. At this stage, my party is minded not to support amendment No 25 from Rachel Woods. If it can be addressed at Further Consideration Stage, we would be certainly open to that.

In respect of amendment No 22, which relates to resources, again, I was persuaded by the Department's position on whether it was necessary. Of course, I want appropriate resources to be provided to give effect to what we are trying to do. However, at this stage, my party is not convinced that amendment No 22 is necessary. Therefore, again, on this occasion, we are not minded to support it. We will support the other amendments.

Ms Dillon: I do not intend to repeat much of what the Chairperson has said. However, I would like to thank the Minister for not moving amendment No 15. That has been helpful to us this evening. As the Chairperson outlined, we are certainly open to working with the Minister on an amendment at Further Consideration Stage. Again, that would be helpful to us in making good legislation. As I outlined earlier, at the end of the day, that is what we want to do here.

I want to focus a little on amendment No 18. As the Chairperson said, I raised the issue of Operation Encompass repeatedly. I first heard of it at a meeting with the Safeguarding Board when I was a member of the Policing Board. I was not really sure what it was, but it sounded good. I asked the board to send me more information. I also asked whether we could have further conversations about what it was and how it worked so that I could explore with the Policing Board the potential for how it could be delivered. I did so at every opportunity at the Policing Board, but I was told repeatedly that it could not be delivered because of issues around the General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) and information sharing. The phrase that was used continually was that there was a "legislative gap". On numerous occasions, I asked what the legislative gap was so that we could, hopefully, address it. I never got an answer to that. Therefore, I took the opportunity, when the Chief Constable came to us, knowing that the Bill was coming forward, to ask him about Operation Encompass and what the legislative gap was so that we could, hopefully, incorporate that in the legislation.

I am delighted that the Committee gave its support to Operation Encompass. While it might seem a very small part of the Bill — in some ways, it is, and we were concerned that it would be found not to be within its scope because it also falls within the responsibility of the Education Minister — the fact that it was found to be within the scope of the Bill means that we will now be able to deliver that for children. We outlined earlier in the debate how important it is that we look after children who are impacted by domestic abuse. That is a really important element because, when a child witnesses or is a victim of a domestic abuse incident, and they go into school the next morning, they may well not have slept all night. They may not have been in their own home. As the Chair outlined, they may not have done their homework or have brought a lunch with them. Teachers will challenge them because that is what they do. When a young person at school has not done what is expected of them, on many occasions, teachers challenge them without knowing what that child has been through the night before. Earlier, we talked about adverse impacts. It would make an immeasurable difference to that child if someone in the school were to ask, "Are you OK?" or "Do you need lunch?", said, "Do not worry if you have not done your homework" or "So what if you do not have the correct uniform?", or asked, "Would you like to go to another room for half an hour?".

11.00 pm

Around the time that we were discussing that, I saw a quote on social media from a teacher. I do not often quote from social media, because I do not like it, to be honest, but this is a really good quote. The teacher said, "If you meet a child at the gate who is coming in late, you can make a difference to their life by, instead of shouting, 'Why are you late, Johnny? What kept you?', saying, 'Are you OK, Johnny? Is everything all right?'. You do not know what that child is going through or why they are late to school." I thought that that was very relevant. It certainly had an impact on me. I would love it if more teachers thought like that. I know that we have lots of brilliant teachers, but the truth is that, sometimes, they are under so much pressure trying to do what they have to do that they forget those things, and this might be a way of reminding them. I am sure that lots of teachers in our schools do not realise how many children in their classroom come from homes where there is domestic abuse occurring daily. I have no doubt about that. This could potentially make a massive difference to children's lives. At the end of the day, that is what we are about.

The PSNI has said that it wants to do it, and I welcome that. I also welcome the Education Minister's move to roll out the pilot project. Whilst there are limitations to it, and I accept that, hopefully, when it comes to the roll-out, it will help us in flagging up some of the issues, problems or stumbling blocks. That can only be a good thing. For me, Operation Encompass is an absolutely vital part of it. I welcome that the Minister intends to bring forward an amendment at Further Consideration Stage. Again, I believe that the Minister's amendment will further improve this amendment and the legislation. Again, that can only be a positive outcome.

I just want to say that I will support amendment No 19, which provides for a minor amendment to the wording.

I will now speak to amendment Nos 20, 21 and 24. I do not intend to go over the issues that the Chair has already highlighted. Nobody in the House can fail to know that data collection, training and reporting on anything, be it policy or legislation — it does not matter what it is — are vital, because resources follow information and statistics. If we do not have the statistics, we will not get the resources. We already know that from some of the groups and organisations that have highlighted the fact that there is a lack of resourcing directed towards them. Rachel Woods will speak to some of that later. She has raised, on numerous occasions, the fact that there are groups and organisations, particularly from the migrant population, that do not get adequate funding because we do not have the data and the statistics. It is important that we look to data collection. Again, the reporting feeds into all that. Hopefully, the reporting will answer some of the queries that Mr Allister raised about how many cases will be brought to court. We will know that. If people come to us and ask, “How good is your legislation? How effective is it? How well does it work?”, we will not say, “We’re not sure. We can’t give you statistics”. We will be able to say, “This is how good it is; this is the report on how effective it is on the ground”.

Lastly, I want to speak about training. Training is vital. The PSNI has said that it could take up to a year for it to implement the legislation. I know that some of my Committee colleagues challenged the Chief Constable on that and said that it needs to be quicker and that a year is too long. Maybe it is, or maybe it is not. I do not want quick training. I want good training, I want effective training and I want the right training. When those officers get the training that they need, I want them to be able to implement the legislation in the way in which this House intended. We have scrutinised the Bill. We are debating it tonight. We are giving it every bit of attention that we possibly can to ensure that it will have the biggest impact on people’s lives. We therefore need those who are going to deliver on it at the other end to do the same, and they can only do that with effective training.

I can certainly say that, when the Bill was put down in front of me at the beginning of the process, it looked like double Dutch.

I read through it and understood bits and pieces, but, truthfully, could I have spoken to it on that day and said that I fully understood everything that was in it, its implications on people’s lives and the issues that were raised? No, I could not. However, I gained that through a very steep but good training and learning curve on the Committee.

We had a good mix on the Committee of people who had experience, and those of us who were new to the experience, to say the least. However, we all had life experience and experience of previous roles, my own on the Policing Board, as I outlined, and dealing with constituents. All those things added to the Bill because this is about real people and real life. It is not about something that is pie in the sky or does not affect people every day. The Bill will affect people every day, so we need to ensure that those who will be delivering it will get adequate training.

I would love to support Miss Woods’s amendment No 25 to include section 75. It calls for everything that I just outlined that we need. We need the data and the statistics.

Unfortunately, I know from experience on the Policing Board that it is a requirement that the Department and organisations may not be able to meet. Therefore, I am not able to support the amendment at this time but would like to have further conversations with the Minister and the Department on whether it could be included at Further Consideration Stage. I would like more detail on how it could be done because that is what it boils down to. I want to see it done; I just need to understand how it can be done.

Amendment No 26 is also from Rachel Woods. We will support it, and the Minister has said that she and her Department will support it. It calls for statistics to be broken down by council and policing district, and the PSNI has confirmed to the Minister that it can do that. That is important because it boils down to resources. Where will resources go? They will go to where you have data and information, so you need to be able to break that down. As elected representatives, to break that down to a constituency, council area or policing district gives us information on what we should be focusing on.

All those amendments are positive, and I support them. I say again that I welcome the Minister’s indication that she will add to Operation Encompass. I hope that the PSNI and the education sector buy into that because it will make a real difference to children’s lives. I know that that is what most teachers want to do; that is why they are there. They want not only to give those children an education but to see them come out of school as better and more resilient people — young people who are able to have a better life because of what they did for them.

Ms Hunter: I will speak in support of amendment No 18. I am not a member of the Justice Committee, but I thank its members and the Minister for their meaningful, valuable and insightful contributions to the debate.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on what is a deeply emotive and sensitive topic. Reading the legislation and hearing testimonies from survivors earlier this week has been eye-opening and, frankly, emotional. The detrimental impact that domestic abuse has on victims, families and children has been truly revealing.

There are many aspects of abuse: physical, sexual, mental, emotional, financial and, of course, psychological. Incidents of abuse can be engraved on the minds of victims. Despite how much time has passed, it can be difficult for victims to free themselves from the grasp of their abusers. No sentence sums that up better than: in the mind of the victim, trauma has no timeline. It stays with them.

Many people recovering from a violent domestic relationship can experience complex PTSD, which presents itself in emotional flashbacks. If we turn our eyes to the pandemic, it is horrifying to have read about increased rates of domestic violence during lockdown. The ability to be monitored by an abusive partner around the clock is deeply disturbing. I thank Women’s Aid, the NSPCC, Nexus NI, Barnardo’s and all other community and voluntary organisations out there for their continued efforts to support victims, especially during this difficult and challenging time. I welcome the fact that our Minister, Minister Mallon, has worked closely with Minister Long on providing free transport for victims, which is a key and necessary support for victims right across the North.

While speaking today, I feel that it would be reckless of me to have the opportunity and not use it to address domestic abuse in teenage relationships. I welcome point 82 of the Committee for Justice's report on the Bill, which states:

"Schools and colleges may need to be involved as part of the co-ordinated response to provide education and awareness so that relevant professionals from this sector can understand the risks the young person may pose to other young people."

I welcome amendment No 18 and the discussion on utilising regulations similar to Operation Encompass, the initiative that enhances communication between the police and schools where a child is at risk from domestic abuse. The amendment will help ensure that schools have more information to support the safeguarding of our children here in the North.

Discussing the amendments before us today further highlights the fact that we should enable our young people to acquire decision-making skills, in order for them to have a knowledge base and the skills to interpret what abuse actually is. I feel that it is both a moral obligation and a professional duty on our education institutions to educate our teenagers as they navigate their first relationships and to equip them with the knowledge that will help enable their growth and help them engage in healthy relationships. Having spoken with representatives from Women's Aid prior to today, I know that that organisation reiterates the message to young people that being a victim of domestic abuse is never their fault.

Abusive control is not always obvious. It can be manipulation, gaslighting or someone convincing you that you are not worthy of opportunities, that you are not smart enough and that nobody likes you. Your partner can be one person in a room of many or in front of their parents yet someone very different behind closed doors. Being humiliated and intimidated by your partner is not a natural part of the process. Being told what to wear, where you can go and whom you can or cannot see is not the norm. Let us be reminded that, although the steps taken today with this legislation are to be welcomed, we need a cross-departmental approach to tackle the issue in order to protect potential and hidden sufferers of all ages from domestic abuse.

Mr Blair: Before I begin, I declare an interest as a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, which oversees the Police Service of Northern Ireland and would therefore oversee some of the actions suggested in the group of amendments to which I speak.

I take an opportunity at the beginning, as one of the Members who did not have the chance to contribute earlier in the debate, to express my thanks to the Minister for bringing this Bill to the Assembly and to the departmental officials for assisting in doing that. The Minister has paid particular attention to the issue of domestic abuse, and she should be commended for following through on her pledge to endeavour to deliver on it through this Bill. In addition to her determination to deal with the issue, she has taken on board the incredibly destructive practice of coercive control. Indeed, she has been helpful on that issue in her responses to me and other Members who have asked questions in the Chamber. I also express my gratitude to members of the Committee for their scrutiny and for the detail that they have brought to the debate.

In my remarks, I will refer mainly to the amendments dealing with training and oversight. Training is undoubtedly fundamental to delivering appropriate outcomes on the offence, but amendment No 21 on training does not stipulate the quality or nature of that training. That could lead to the most basic level of training, with it perhaps being as little as online exercises, which, as I hope Members will agree, is not what we want to see. I acknowledge that the Chair indicated earlier that the Committee will look at it again. That is very welcome, because we know that the situation might well be that the practice of practical, in-the-field or inter-agency training biannually could be more effective than basic online training annually.

Additionally, the amendment suggests that the Department of Justice has the power to direct the Police Service of Northern Ireland on that training. As we know, that is not the case. The PSNI reports on such matters to the Northern Ireland Policing Board, whether in full board or through its relevant committees, and it is that body that should work with the PSNI on training. Ministerial or departmental control of those issues is undeliverable and undesirable. Reference to the Department bearing responsibility for training, funding, delivery and reporting for other agencies —

11.15 pm

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Blair: Sorry, go ahead, Linda.

Ms Dillon: Apologies to the Member. Thank you for taking the intervention. We agree with you about who should be responsible for the training. That is why we have spoken to the Minister about an amendment at Further Consideration Stage. However, I am sure that the Member — as a previous member of the Policing Board — knows well that, sometimes, we find it difficult to tie these issues down because they are not there in legislation for us to hold them to account to. When we ask the PSNI about training, we can be given all sorts of reasons why that training cannot happen — that the training has been pushed back, that it will happen, and that it was done three years ago and they will try to do it again in two years. We have real challenges around that. We need to have something to hold them to account to. If this is not the right way to do it, as I said, the Minister will be bringing forward amendments at Further Consideration Stage.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I encourage Members who wish to make an intervention to use their microphone so that everyone can clearly hear it.

Mr Blair: I thank the Member for the intervention. I will not rehearse all the detail of the PSNI's operational independence under the control of the Chief Constable. However, I should point out that all of us in the House who are members of the Executive's parties have representatives on the Policing Board, and we can challenge our wishes on delivery through them.

I have covered the reference to the Department bearing responsibility for training, funding and delivery. There is precedent and established practice that agencies have to prepare for, train for and adapt to new and emerging legislation. There is also policing and criminal justice oversight responsibility through, for example, the Criminal Justice Inspection. That can highlight training need or additional training required, and that has been done previously. The suggestion in amendment No 23 of an additional oversight role is something that could potentially be delivered through existing structures. That would avoid additional time and financial resource, and it requires further examination.

I am hopeful that the Minister and the Committee can look further at the details around the desirable levels of training and at the most effective methods of training, at later stages. That could include scoping the existing training capacity, which is something that the Deputy Chair of the Committee referred to a moment ago.

Speaking generally, I urge caution around amendments that require considerable IT system investment by the PSNI or other criminal justice agencies. We must be careful with the additional capital requirement on time frames for the planning, procurement and delivery of such systems and how that might adversely affect progress on the eagerly awaited aspects of the Bill.

Therefore, my position is that I hope for progress, at later stages, that will reflect the practicalities around the original requirements of amendment No 21. I am opposed to the departmental direct delivery theme of amendment No 22, which is for the reasons that were given previously around accountability and because we expect independent delivery by the agencies involved. I believe that the intention of amendment No 23 can be met through existing resources, and that should be further explored, along with other matters on which a commitment has been made to discuss them further. I hope that the Minister, the Justice Committee and Members of the House can reflect on the matters that I have raised. More than anything else in relation to this debate, I hope that neither our words nor our actions, as the Bill progresses, will divert attention from the original purpose of the Bill and the needs of the victims.

Mr Beattie: We are fast approaching the witching hour. I am not quite there yet, but it is on its way. I think about this time of sitting at home with a nice glass of an Isle of Jura 18-year-old single malt, with my slippers and pyjamas on [Laughter.] It is not a great thought, but that would be me.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beattie: Yes, of course.

Mr Frew: How can the Member ever go past Bushmills?

Mr Beattie: Yes, well.

I am not going to rehearse, but I want to feed into a couple of the amendments. Amendment No 18, which is the Operation Encompass piece, is a two-line amendment, but it is so incredibly important. Ms Dillon has been very articulate and steadfast in support of that. I just wanted to say that, because it is really important. The amendment has only two lines, and we hope that we can develop it at Further Consideration Stage.

Amendment No 20 is on data collection, which feeds in to pretty much everything. We do not know how things are progressing unless we gather the data to see how they are working. It certainly feeds in to Ms Woods's amendment No 14, which is about legal aid. It is incredibly important that a new clause is in there. Without doubt, I will support it.

Amendment No 21 is about training. I am absolutely sympathetic to the first part of it, which would put the duty for training on the Justice Department. We can look at and possibly change that, and I would certainly be happy enough to do that.

One thing that I will say about that proposed new clause is that the Minister came before the Justice Committee, and we talked it through. She took away her clause, so ours stood alone. That, to me, is good collaboration. That is exactly how we should do things. We should talk it through and then make a decision, and we can then change it at a later stage.

I commend the Minister for taking that approach. However, there are two things in that amendment that are incredibly important. The Chair already said this, and I said it at the time, and those two things are the words "annually" and "mandatory". We would have to provide training annually. How we would do that in order to create less pressure on the organisations is something that has to be thought through, but it has to be done annually and it must be mandatory for those people who deal with domestic abuse on a day-to-day basis.

However, the reality is that every organisation would need to be trained from the very top to the very bottom. So, in the police, it would need to be from the Chief Constable all the way down to the new recruit. They would need to have an understanding of how this works, and then, the second tier of training would be for those people who will end up as experts on the subject, so to speak, on domestic abuse. Again, we will support that, but I will be sympathetic to the Minister if she brings forward any amendments to that.

The last amendment that I want to feed in to is amendment No 23. That is another proposed new clause, which is on independent oversight. People said this before, and I will say it again: we had lots of people who wanted a domestic abuse commissioner. They will be incredibly disappointed that they will not get one, and I accept that. Some Members will know that I want a victims of crime commissioner, because domestic abuse fits into crime of all shapes and sizes. It bleeds into financial crime, denial of rights and of freedom of movement, false imprisonment, grievous bodily harm, attempted murder and, in extremes, it gets into murder. Domestic abuse is not a stand-alone thing; it just moves into and blurs with other offences. I believe that a victims of crime commissioner can cover in the long term the role that a domestic abuse commissioner would cover.

This proposed new clause covers the medium term. It covers the first seven years so that we can have oversight in order to make sure that it is working. That is because this is new legislation, and we need to make sure that it is doing exactly what it is designed to do. We need an independent person to look at it in order to make sure that it is doing what it is designed to do.

I will support amendment No 26. I cannot support amendment No 25, unfortunately.

Mr Frew: This is my opportunity to applaud Ms Linda Dillon, another member of the Justice Committee, for her work and determination. I am mindful that my Chief Whip is behind me, and he is always encouraging us to be rough and robust. I am going weak at the knees here on him, but I just want to say that Linda Dillon has done tremendous work pushing this issue right to the forefront of the Committee and into its mindset, because it is important. It is a very small amendment, but it is the little things that count when you are under the cosh and under pressure as a parent or a child. Teachers know their pupils very well; they are caring individuals who want the best for their pupils. I suspect that they can tell when something is awry or that something is up. What this does is assure them that what they are doing and saying is the right thing. I applaud Linda Dillon for her work and her perseverance on this, because it is right that we insert this in the Bill.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will.

Ms Dillon: Does the Member agree that, for this issue, as with all the other issues, training will be vital, because we want to ensure that information is shared in the appropriate way to protect everybody? We want to support and protect those children.

Mr Frew: Yes, absolutely. I will come to training in a wee minute.

For Operation Encompass, the puzzling thing for the Committee was that we identified that there was a problem and that there was a gap — the police, no less, were telling us that there was a gap — but we could not identify the cause of the gap, which was puzzling. Therefore there is absolutely no doubt that it needs to be in to give us a cast-iron guarantee.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. I draw his attention to the fact that the Department wrote to members and set out what the gap in legislation was, but that it was our view that it was primarily an education issue. Subsequently, however, we continued to receive written questions asking what the gap was, after we had sent a letter describing it.

Mr Frew: There is no doubt, and I will admit to the House for the Hansard report, that I am still confused on the issue. On the one hand, we are told by the police that there is no provision and that they worry about information sharing; on the other hand, a live pilot scheme is ongoing. That added confusion to the round as we debated this in Committee. I am glad that the amendment will give the PSNI some reassurance. However, if this amendment does not do it, let us fix it at the next stage.

It is important to note that, because I will have to heap praise on the Minister too, the amendment that she brought forward is very thick and is very good reading. It deserves super merit, and I suspect that that is what we will be looking at in the Further Consideration Stage. I thank the Minister for her input and her engagement with the Committee on this. There is a real spirit of coordination and teamwork, and, at the end of this, we will have a very good piece of legislation, because it is the little things that matter.

When a child who has just witnessed a horrendous scene in the night, or even the hours, before school time, the teacher knows that that child may not come in or may be late, may not have their uniform on or have their homework done and that the child's behaviour may not be appropriate. You can understand all the reasons why that would be. We talk about joined-up government. In the real world, people need joined-up services.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way again. He said that he is not clear about what the gap was. The police already have the power to share information with educators where it relates to safeguarding. For example, where a child has not been fed or does not have a coat, those issues can already be reported to educators, and that information can be shared. They cannot do it for the purposes of well-being, for example, to support a child emotionally through those difficulties. That is where the gap in the law exists.

Where abuse does not lead to actual harm, which is the debate that we had earlier, there may be no vires for the police to share information with schools to allow them to do that. That is the distinction, if that makes it any clearer for Members.

11.30 pm

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister, because it does make it clearer. When you are going through all this in your head, you tend to miss things — I do anyway — so I thank the Minister for that clarification.

There is no doubt that it is a good thing that these services can engage and give as full a picture as possible to teachers and educators. Given the child's experience of adverse behaviour and everything else over the night before, the week before or the month before, getting into trouble in school can only cause them to spiral into even deeper depths. We need the educator to be informed so that they can give the child some support. That is what we need to do, because the child is at the centre of all this legislation. Does Miss Woods want to come in?

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for giving way. I was going to address this in my speech later, but the lack of well-being provision has been brought up. Provision for well-being is already on our statute book. The Children's Services Co-operation Act received Royal Assent in 2015. It was brought to the House by my predecessor, Steven Agnew. The stated aim of that Act is:

“to improve co-operation amongst Departments and Agencies and places a duty on Children's Authorities, as defined by the Act, to co-operate where appropriate as they deliver services aimed at improving” — and this is crucial

— “the well-being of children and young people.”

Mr Frew: I thank Miss Woods for that intervention. Again, it is very helpful.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: I want to clarify that I did not say that it was not possible for the agencies to cooperate. The issue is specific to information and data sharing — private information about families — and that is not, as has been suggested, covered.

Mr Frew: OK. Thank you, Minister. It is great fun being a conduit between two Members; it really is.

That is why Operation Encompass is so important, and that is why we had to put it into the Bill. I am glad that the Minister supports that, and we will no doubt work with her to strengthen it at the next stage.

We support the Minister on amendment No 19.

Amendment No 20 is about guidance on data collection.

We heard earlier from Mr Allister about his angst at this new offence. It is vital that data is collected and that we can use that data in good ways. It reassures all of us that we will be able to test this legislation to ensure that it is fit for purpose. However, there is absolutely no doubt about it: if the training is not fit for purpose, this legislation will not be fit for purpose either.

What do I mean by that? I have experience of this. I brought to the Assembly the child protection disclosure scheme. It was my amendment to, I think, the Justice (No. 2) Bill, or maybe the previous Justice Bill; I cannot remember. I brought that amendment, and the child protection disclosure scheme was passed by the House. It is fair to say that that legislation was ignored by the PSNI. It went nowhere. I kicked up, asked questions, met and fought with the police, and there was also a change of position in the PSNI. After that, two police officers, one male and one female — it is not fair to name the officers, one of whom has moved on — picked it up and ran with it. They relaunched the child protection disclosure scheme through which parents get to find out information about someone who could be a threat to their child. Why is the parent always the last to know? The police ignored that legislation. I am glad to say that it has been relaunched and reinvigorated and is being promoted and advertised on the internet.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Can I draw the Member back to the amendments that are before us at this late hour?

Mr Frew: That is why it is so important that there is training to ingrain the legislation into the mindset of the services that will use it. It is vital that the police, and others, get adequate training. Independent oversight is also important in ensuring that the legislation is being enacted and used, serving the public, serving and protecting the victims, and putting the perpetrators behind bars. That is why we need training and independent oversight.

I move now to the report on the operation of the Act. This is too important, cutting-edge and new for us to let it go into the ether when it leaves the House. We need to keep an eye on it, keep on the ball and ensure that the legislation is fit for purpose and works to serve the people. I would have doubts about that being the case if the training were not sufficient and routine. I get the Minister's point that the police do not train on any particular offence and that this could set a precedent. I say, "Why not?" If an offence is new and fresh, and if it is a new concept, we can see how the judicial system could struggle with it.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will give way to the Minister.

Mrs Long: To clarify, again, I said that the police do not train people annually with regard to any offence. I did not say that they did not train people with regard to new offences.

Mr Frew: I am happy to clarify that position and to correct myself. However on annual training, it is fair. Doug Beattie will have massive experience, and I have a wee bit, of the annual training that the Royal Irish go through to hone their skills, keep them fresh and keep them alert on the presence of the standard operating procedure and, as is the case here, the law. There is no reason why we cannot have a rigorous training routine. It does not necessarily have to be overwhelming. It can be an annual occurrence that keeps everybody on their toes and alert, and keeps things fresh in their mind. That is what we have been asking for. Training, along with the independent oversight, data collection and the reporting on the operation of the Act, is vital. This is key legislation. It cannot, and should not, be ignored. We need to keep on top of it. I will leave it there.

Ms Dolan: I remember clearly the first time I was introduced to the term domestic abuse and what it meant. I was 16 years old, and Fermanagh Women's Aid had come into my school to give a presentation to our year group. What stood out to me from that presentation was hearing that domestic abuse was not just physical. That was about 14 years ago. To this day, that presentation remains one of the more valuable things that I learned in school. In 2018, I went on to partake in training on domestic and sexual violence awareness with Fermanagh Women's Aid. Given that, it has been a privilege to be a member of the Justice Committee and to be able to shape the Bill to ensure the protection of the thousands of victims who, through no fault of their own, are abused at the hands of their spouse, partner or family member.

On this, my first opportunity to speak on the Bill, I commend my fellow Committee members for their thorough scrutiny of it, the Minister and the Department of Justice for bringing it forward in a timely manner and all of the groups and organisations who provided written and oral evidence to help better inform us, and, of course, I give special thanks to the victims who provided written and oral evidence of their experience. It is unfortunate that legislation of this nature is required, but, from listening to those groups and the victims, there is no denying that it is absolutely necessary. Incidents of domestic violence are at an all-time high, but that is not a high of which we can be proud. As shocking and harrowing as the statistics are, in some cases, they are only the tip of the iceberg. As most of us know, it usually takes several incidents before the victim realises that they are being abused or builds up the courage to lift the phone. In some cases, that phone call or plea for help never happens.

'Is This Coercive Control?' was a special one-off documentary on BBC Three comprising a social experiment in which a group of young people aged between 18 and 30 came together to consider whether they truly understand what constitutes coercive control. Seventy per cent of people failed to see the signs of coercive control in that documentary. That highlights the education and training that is required around this behaviour. Therefore, I welcome amendment No 21, which would insert a clause and put a statutory duty on DOJ to ensure sufficient training of policing and criminal justice agencies, including PPS and Courts and Tribunals Service staff.

Throughout the Committee's considerations of the Bill, one of the most prominent recurring themes from organisations was the need for comprehensive training for anyone involved in gathering evidence and prosecuting and enforcing the new law. The success of the Bill will depend on the effectiveness of that training. It is essential that all first responders and criminal justice agencies fully understand what coercive control is and are able to recognise the signs of coercive and controlling abusive behaviour. Indeed, that was recognised by the PSNI in its written submission to the Committee. The PSNI recognised that officer training on the definition of the new offence and examples of the behaviour that it involves will be pivotal for the successful enforcement of the legislation, a view that was echoed by the Chief Constable. That also requires appropriate resourcing of and investment in training, and I fully expect the Minister to step up in that regard.

A great example of this training is Fermanagh Women's Aid's undertaking of an education programme targeted at those in the beauty industry, among other sectors, so that they are able to spot the signs and signpost if a client confides in them that they are a victim of domestic abuse. Similar to the training that I took part in in 2018, that is an invaluable exercise in trying to eradicate domestic abuse. As a society, we should all take some responsibility to educate ourselves. We need to know the difference between abusive and non-abusive relationships. We need to challenge assumptions about gender and power. We need to help young people to understand that abuse is a crime.

It has been mentioned — so, I apologise — that we had hoped to table an amendment proposing a statutory entitlement to 10 days' domestic violence paid leave for all workers. Domestic violence can affect employment, productivity and health and safety. Domestic violence often follows —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I remind the Member that we are debating the amendments in front of us. Those are the appropriate issues to comment on at this stage.

Ms Dolan: Yes, I am coming to a conclusion. There is a growing recognition that domestic abuse is a workplace issue. In the absence of workplace policies, colleagues and managers are not equipped to support victims and ensure that they are safe. Earlier today — yes, it is still today — Sinn Féin TDs introduced legislation in the South that would provide a statutory entitlement to 10 days' paid leave for victims of domestic abuse, regardless of what sector they work in. We were informed that that is outside the scope of the Bill, and we accept that. The Minister for the Economy said that she would bring this forward in the future. I want to make sure that it is brought forward, because it is a vital issue and an absolute priority.

Mr Durkan: My colleague and the SDLP justice spokesperson, Sinéad Bradley, will set out the SDLP's position on each amendment, so I do not intend to take up too much of the House's time at this late, late hour. Suffice it to say, I support the Bill and those amendments that will help to tackle the scourge of domestic abuse. Lockdown has been a challenge for all of us. However, for many victims of domestic abuse who have been confined to their homes when home is not a safe place, lockdown has been extremely dangerous.

11.45 pm

I will focus my remarks on amendment Nos 21, 23 and 26. It was not that long ago — certainly within the lifetime of many of us here — that the prevailing attitude was that these were private matters, but there is, at last, a recognition that domestic abuse is a public concern and a realisation that it requires a strong public response. This group of amendments is crucial to ensuring, monitoring and measuring the effectiveness of that response.

Making psychological abuse and coercive control an offence, as clause 1 of the Bill would, reflects how public understanding of domestic abuse has evolved. Just over four years ago in the Chamber, I proposed an amendment to a motion on domestic abuse, rape and sexual crime, in which I called on the then Minister of Justice to criminalise such patterns of abuse and coercive control that victims are subjected to by their abusers. The Minister, Claire Sugden, was most receptive. I am sure that she and many others in here and outside share my frustration that, due in no small part to a three-year political stand-off that left us with no Assembly, we are able to do that only now. Let us hope that that is all behind us. I do not know how many people follow debates in here at the best of times, let alone those taking place close to midnight, but anyone watching this tonight could not fail to be impressed, and perhaps a wee bit surprised, by the collegiate approach, and even camaraderie, that the parties have shown to legislating on this significant and sensitive issue. Well done. Let us have more of it.

Interestingly, during that debate four years ago, I referenced a pioneering storyline from the long-running radio soap 'The Archers' that highlighted the issue of coercive control in a gripping but sensitive manner. Four years on, all the major TV soaps have done coercive control storylines. They are more than titillating story arcs that grip viewers, however. Those stories save lives. There are people — women and men — who have been subjected to that type of abuse for years without even recognising themselves as the victim of anything. It may not be until they see what is happening to Yasmeen in 'Coronation Street' or Chantelle in 'EastEnders' that the penny drops. That is why it is important that we piggyback such vehicles to get out vital public information, messages of support and, crucially, offers of help to victims.

Sadly, however, domestic abuse is not confined to our airwaves and screens, nor does it manifest only through physical violence. Often, physical attacks occur only after victims have been cut off from support networks, emotionally abused and manipulated to the point at which they are more likely just to accept physical violence or are too afraid to leave. Many of us will know people who have been through that. More worryingly, many of us will know people who are going through it, but we do not even realise it. That underlines, as if it needed underlining, the importance of amendment No 21 and training. If agencies cannot spot abuse, what chance do they have of stopping it?

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

While coercive control can pre-empt or reinforce physical abuse, it is a form of abuse in its own right, with lasting harm to victims. As others have done, I welcome the progress made, but I recognise the particular difficulties that other jurisdictions have seen in securing convictions for that type of abuse, which are not just the difficulties that we already face in securing convictions for physical abuse. There will be other evidential challenges that are particular to the type of behaviour that causes psychological harm. That is why amendment Nos 24 and 26 are so important. They will ensure that the data is there to monitor and understand how this translates from statute into practice.

Victims need to have confidence that their experiences will be recognised as abuse and to have confidence in the process. The opportunity that the Bill presents will be squandered if, first, cases are not brought where appropriate and, secondly, convictions do not follow. Amendment No 23, which provides for independent oversight, is also important in that regard, particularly given the lack of a domestic abuse commissioner.

On another point that I will deal with quickly, I know that the Committee has considered the issue of parental alienation. I also know that La Dolce Vita Project in my constituency has been to the fore on that issue. Many of the cases that the Bill will be relevant to will be those that mean that children will be safer with supervised contact or with no contact at all with a parent. However, there are other cases in which abuse by one parent of another is not the issue, but children's relationships with one parent suffer as a result of a breakdown in the adult relationship. I would be grateful if, in her response, the Minister would confirm the aspects of the overlap between her Department and the Department of Health and, importantly, how the Departments can work together to address that difficult issue, which undoubtedly causes much hurt and harm.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Durkan: Certainly.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Member for highlighting the La Dolce Vita Project. As a Committee, we met its representatives during the process, and I have met them as an MLA. Some of their ideas about how we can deal with parental alienation do not fall in the legislative sphere, but they have some really good ideas about types of pilot projects and things like that that could be done. I think that they have a lot to offer, and I have suggested that they should come back to the Committee and discuss that specific issue, outside of the Bill, and that we would want to look at that as a wider issue. Those issues are not always dealt with through legislation, and I think that that is what the Member had alluded to.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for her intervention. I certainly recognise the complexity of the issue and the importance of how we can work together and Departments can work together to help to reduce the incidence of that form of abuse.

Amendment No 21, with its focus on training, is most positive and will be broadly welcomed by victims and many organisations that work in the sector. I put on record our gratitude to those hard-working and hard-pressed organisations that support victims, including Women's Aid, Victim Support, the Men's Action Network, the Men's Advisory Project, Nexus and the aforementioned La Dolce Vita Project. Those groups need more than warm words, and I think that Ms Dillon referred to that. They also need cold, hard, financial and practical support. We must do more to support them in their work in changing and, without doubt, in many cases, saving lives.

I will conclude by saying that I hope that the Bill sends a strong message to victims of domestic abuse that they have our full support and to perpetrators that there will be zero tolerance. Moreover, I hope that that message is followed through with results. I believe that the amendments that we will support will strengthen our efforts to do just that.

Mr Gildernew: I want to speak to the elements that the Health Committee looked at with this group of amendments. Again, I emphasise that the Health Committee is very much aware that this is largely a piece of work for the Justice Committee and one that the Health Committee has welcomed.

The Health Committee looked at the implementation and operation of the offence and welcomed debate on the need for additional training for front-line workers. The Committee welcomed discrete recognition in the Bill of the damage that can be done to children and young people by their seeing or hearing domestic abuse or by their being involved in abuse, such as when a child is used to contribute to emotional or psychological distress. That connects with the cross-cutting policy area of adverse childhood experiences.

Stakeholders flagged the issue of under-reporting and communication issues around domestic abuse incidents and the fact that the Protect Life 2 suicide prevention strategy acknowledges domestic abuse victims as an at-risk group. The Committee, therefore, recommended that statutory guidance and associated training be provided to front-line responders on the implementation of clauses 8 and 9, in particular. Again, the Committee has not formally considered the particular wording of the amendments that deal with training, but it would support the objective in principle, and I note that the Minister will not move amendment No 15.

If I may, a Cheann Comhairle, I will reflect on some of my experiences of this in order to explain in part why I am so pleased to be part of the debate. I was reflecting on Linda Dillon saying that, while some of us may not be experienced legislators, we have experience in all sorts of ways that are relevant to the debate. I want to share with Members an experience that I had while I was training for my social work role.

I worked with a woman who, as I got to know her and she explained her story to me, set out in detail something that I found truly shocking but that I was further shocked to find out is not as uncommon as many of us would like to believe. This goes back to when the woman got married 25 or 30 years ago. She married her childhood sweetheart. She had known him for many years. In her words, "You could not meet a nicer fella", but that was until the day that they were married. As was the tradition at the time, they returned to the family home after the wedding. He raped her. That woman escaped out of the upstairs window of a two-storey house, ran naked to the police station and told them what had happened. She was wrapped in a jacket and put in a police car by a policeman and a policewoman and returned to the family home, whereupon they knocked the door, got the abuser out of his sleep and asked him whether he had raped her, which he, of course denied. Then, in front of her abuser, they asked her whether she was happy to remain and stay at the home. She told me — this has stayed with me since — that with her mouth she had to say, "Yes, I am happy to stay", but with her eyes she was trying to tell the policewoman to take her with her.

I raise that because I do not think that legislation makes the difference in a case like that. I know that we have achieved much and have much more to do, but I think that training makes the difference in the implementation of many of these types of legislation. I had the benefit of significant and valuable training in my social work role, as part of multidisciplinary teams, in the recognition of domestic abuse and coercive control. I was struck on several occasions by the fact that, around the table in that multi-professional setting, some of the most valuable peer-training experiences that I had were with members of the police, because they got it. They recognised the problem because they were trained in how to recognise it, how to spot it and how to engage with it in order to deal with it.

I wanted to share that in order to highlight the value of training. Legislation is not the complete answer; the training is the part that adds the real value.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the opportunity to speak in the Consideration Stage of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill on behalf of the Alliance Party. The Alliance Party is clear on this matter: domestic abuse is a heinous crime. I welcome, therefore, the leadership that is being shown by the Alliance Party leader and Justice Minister, Naomi Long, to progress this important legislation, and I welcome the work that she is doing to deliver a safe and shared Northern Ireland for all. I also recognise the work of Department of Justice officials and the previous Justice Minister, the members of the Justice Committee and all respondents to the Committee Stage of the Bill.

The focus of the Northern Ireland Executive and the Assembly has necessarily been on the emergency response to COVID-19, but we must continue to progress key priorities such as tackling domestic violence, the impact of which we know has increased during social isolation, as perpetrators have exploited the emergency in order to commit domestic abuse.

Thankfully, this legislation, introduced by Justice Minister Long, sends a clear message to perpetrators of domestic violence and coercive control to say, "You will be brought to justice", and to say to victims, "You are not alone. We will support you". I pay tribute to the many organisations that work to support victims and survivors of domestic abuse in Northern Ireland.

As Alliance education spokesperson and chair of the Assembly all-party group on children and young people, I welcome the response in the legislation to the serious impact of domestic abuse on children. Seeing, hearing or being present during an incident of domestic abuse can profoundly affect a child's physical and mental health for life.

12.00 midnight

Group three contains important amendments in that regard. They include amendment No 18, which would give power to make regulations for the purpose of informing a school that a child saw, heard or was present during domestic abuse. That provision would enable police to share information with schools and to deliver approaches such as Operation Encompass, an approach that has been taken in other jurisdictions and is to be piloted in Northern Ireland. It is my understanding that the aim of Operation Encompass, as referred to by other Members, is for police and education information sharing to enable schools to offer immediate support to children and young people who experience domestic abuse. Information shared by police prior to the start of the school day, after officers have responded to a domestic abuse incident, can help schools to give appropriate and timely support to the child.

As we know, domestic abuse has been identified as an adverse childhood experience that can lead to physical and psychological harm to a child.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr Lyttle: I am happy to give way to the Member.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member, in his role as Chairperson of the Education Committee, keep an eye on that when it comes through and see whether it is working effectively in the manner in which it should? The Justice Committee would appreciate the Education Committee doing that because it would be more difficult for us to keep an eye on that end of things.

Mr Lyttle: Absolutely. I welcome that intervention. Committees must enhance their cooperation on a number of key public policy issues. I will give my commitment as Chair of the Education Committee to ensure that we keep that issue a key priority.

Research overwhelmingly identifies domestic abuse as a contributing factor to school drop out and exclusion, youth homelessness, and risk-taking behaviour. The Operation Encompass approach aims to mitigate that harm by enabling early intervention and immediate support for the child. Responsive support of that nature in the school setting should mean that children can be better safeguarded against the impact of such domestic abuse. Alliance will therefore support the passage of the amendment to Further Consideration Stage for further amendment at that stage.

Alliance will also support amendment Nos 19 and 20, which provide for guidance relating to the Bill's provisions. My party supports the provision of guidance on key aspects of the Bill, including what is deemed to be domestic abuse, abusive behaviour, the new domestic abuse offence, evidence gathering, sentencing and support services. Such guidance will assist those who investigate offences, those who pursue criminal proceedings, and community and voluntary sector partners.

Alliance will also support amendment No 24 on reporting, although I believe that it may need further consideration at the Bill's next stage.

My Alliance Party colleague John Blair MLA has spoken on the other amendments in the group. I will therefore bring my remarks to a close. We must work to ensure that the home is the safest place for everyone in the community. The legislation that has been brought forward by the Justice Minister is an important action to help us to achieve that aim.

Ms S Bradley: I note that we are four minutes past the witching hour that Mr Beattie referred to. However, I have no doubt that the Members who are in the House will, like me, be motivated by the impact that this work can have. It is very much worth our while being here. That will spur us on until whatever hour we need to be here.

I have the advantage that two colleagues have eloquently spoken ahead of me on group three. On account of that and given that the Chair, Deputy Chair and other members have expressed many of the views that were discussed at the Committee, I will aim to make my remarks as quickly as possible.

Amendment No 18 deals with Operation Encompass. Like many good ideas, it turns out to be a simple one. Like, I am sure, other Committee members, I was sent an email with a link to a video that showed us the origins of Operation Encompass. It was really interesting to watch. It showed a couple — he was a police officer, and she was a schoolteacher — coming together at the kitchen table to work out the missing link. It is so simple yet effective. The effect that it has on children's lives, as well as empowering teachers to do the best by a child on the day, should not be overlooked. I commend Ms Dillon for persisting that this needed to be in the Bill, but I recognise that it is just one part of what is required. We are reaching, through the Bill, some children who are involved in that process. This is not the wider piece that we should all do to find out how we reach all the children who may not be covered in the Bill. That simple idea should be rolled out further.

We will support amendment No 19, along with amendment No 20 on the guidance on data collection. The points about that have been well rehearsed on the Floor, so I will not go over them, other than to say that we had a conversation about not just the reason why we need the data but the value of that data as we move into later stages after the Act becomes operational.

Amendment No 21 is on training. I thank the Minister for not moving amendment No 15 yesterday. That helps us to start with a clean slate and to build to where this needs to go. I note that such collaborative work has happened at different junctures throughout the Bill. That has been helpful, because it has allowed people to air a view or express a direction of travel. The amendment sets down the first piece that we can move on with.

On independent oversight, the conversation started with the possibility of a commissioner, but that had to be pared down, and, at times, a bit of realism had to be injected into what resource may or may not be available. However, nobody deviated from the fact that having independent oversight is critical, because, otherwise, how would we know, without that data and somebody somewhere watching, how the Bill has hit the ground and how it is functioning? I welcome the review seven years after commencement. We must set parameters in trying to be realistic about resource.

We will also support amendment No 24, which is about the report on the operation of the Act.

We will also support amendment No 26. It is best to include that data at the outset. If we are gathering data, it is a lot less expensive and labour-intensive to set up the format at the beginning, instead of having to revisit it because we missed out something. We may miss out things, and we may have to revisit them, but the fact that amendment No 26 brings in one of those items is to be welcomed.

In speaking against amendment No 25, the Minister made a compelling argument about operational capacity, which I accept, so, on that basis, we will not support amendment No 25.

Miss Woods: I want to touch on a few things before getting into amendments that I have tabled and others have referenced.

Operation Encompass, as others have stated, is a scheme that is in place in two thirds of police forces in England and Wales, and we need to have it here. I do not need to go into the detail of it, but support in the school environment means that children are better safeguarded against the short-, medium- and long-term effects of domestic abuse, and that is, of course, welcome. Whilst I had queries about the legislative gap, which I outlined, with regard to the Children's Services Co-operation Act 2015, I welcome the Committee amendment, if it does what is needed. If further changes or alterations are needed to make the clause as effective as possible, I look forward to those being made at Further Consideration Stage. I would support the provision being extended to cover other educational settings where children and young people attend such as colleges, preschool, nurseries and so on, if that is deemed to be required. If we need further regulations or, indeed, further amendments to the legislation to cover individual incidents rather than two or more, as set out in clauses 1 to 4, I would welcome those being included in the justice (miscellaneous provisions) Bill or at Further Consideration Stage.

Turning to training and resourcing, during Committee proceedings, a wide range of organisations highlighted the need for comprehensive training for anyone involved in gathering evidence, prosecuting and enforcing the new law, and they expressed the view that the legislation would be effective only if that takes place, and I completely agree. Legislation is only as good as its implementation, the ability to understand it, the resourcing of it and its enforcement. Legislation can be passed but have a limited impact if there is insufficient public awareness and understanding of how it works and what it means. Therefore, whilst we create an offence in the Bill, namely criminalising domestic abuse and coercive control, it is fundamental that the general public, the victims, our Police Service and our criminal justice agencies know about it and, crucially, that our judicial system knows about it.

The Department of Justice advised the Committee that it recognised the importance of training but did not consider a requirement for it in statute. It said that discussions were being held with the Judicial Studies Board to raise awareness, including what lessons could be learned from other jurisdictions. We also discussed the need for consistency in the use of any discretionary power to prohibit cross-examination in person. That was shared with the Judicial Studies Board, and I welcome that.

The Department said that the PSNI continually trains officers in regard to dealing with domestic abuse. As a result of the 2019 thematic inspection of the handling of domestic violence and abuse cases by CJINI, the PSNI is developing a domestic abuse training programme focusing on new officers and first responders.

We were advised that the PPS would deliver domestic abuse training to all lawyers to cover the new aspects of the legislation. It is intended that there will be specialist training, most likely provided by specialist organisations, to focus on the impact and effects on victims of coercive and controlling behaviour. The PPS, in its written and oral evidence to the Committee, said that it was considering establishing specialist domestic violence and abuse prosecutors to dovetail with the new legislation. I welcome that.

The PSNI, too, recognises that officer training on the definition of the new offence, with examples of the behaviour that it involves, will be pivotal to the successful enforcement of the legislation. The Chief Con, attending the Committee on 24 September 2020, outlined the training being developed to familiarise front-line officers with what coercive and controlling behaviour looks like. He said that the training would be online and classroom-based and would be rolled out from December. Particular roles would receive specialist training, where required.

Training of the PPS, PSNI and judiciary is crucial to the effective implementation of the legislation. That was fundamental to the effective rolling out and adoption of the Scottish legislation, the so-called gold standard.

Mr Givan outlined the Committee's view that, given its importance to the effective operation of the legislation, there should be a mandatory requirement in relation to training, and we agreed to table an amendment, which I welcome.

Similarly with the reporting amendment. The Department claimed that placing training on a statutory footing was not required but gave no reason other than to say that it would happen. Saying that it will happen is no guarantee that it will, whereas putting a commitment or a duty to provide training in statute provides something of a guarantee that it will. The question is whether or not it strengthens the Bill, and I believe that it does.

In a letter from the Minister to the Justice Committee on 1 November, the Minister indicated that she would not support the amendment and was going to bring forward her own amendment. She wrote:

“On the issue of training I cannot support the Committee amendment but would propose to bring forward an alternative amendment”

— which we have heard —

“which would place the duty for training on the police and prosecution service rather than the Department. Responsibility for training and its effectiveness needs to rest with the organisations that have key responsibility in relation to criminal proceedings on the new domestic abuse offence, that is the PSNI, the Public Prosecution Service and the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunal Service. There is also a need to ensure that provisions are targeted and proportionate in terms of their coverage and the extent to which organisations will be involved in the delivery and implementation of the new offence. Furthermore, while fully recognising the importance of training it is not for the Department to dictate to other independent entities as to their operational procedures and requirements.”

The Minister's letter to the Committee regarding mandatory training makes a crucial point, and one that I agree with:

“while fully recognising the importance of training it is not for the Department to dictate”

I agree that it is not for the Department to dictate, but those entities, namely the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunal Service and the PSNI, are funded entirely by the Department of Justice. Funding for the PPS is provided by the Northern Ireland Assembly.

All staff, other than the director and the deputy director, are members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service, funded by the Department of Finance. While I appreciate that we cannot dictate to the judiciary how they are trained, I urge training in the new offence to be implemented for each and every member. They did it in Scotland, and they can do it here. My point is that, although it is not for the Department to dictate to independent entities, which covers off the judiciary, but it does not cover off Assembly-funded agencies. I also have sympathy with the Department not being able to dictate the detail. That is, of course, not what we are saying.

12.15 am

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. I have a lot of sympathy for what the Member has highlighted about judicial training. Clearly, an argument has been made — rightly so — about judicial independence, but that does not mean judicial isolation. Therefore, it is important that there is a clear understanding in the Bill. The evidence that we heard from a range of witnesses was that judges, in approaching these cases, need to handle them carefully. There have been occasions on which some of the commentary that has been heard from judicial office holders has been detrimental, and that needs to be borne in mind by everybody involved.

When we speak about how the judiciary operates, consistency in hearing cases is so important. One witness in the informal evidence that we heard spoke about how, in her case, nine judges were involved in those family proceedings. That needs to be addressed as well.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I agree with him entirely. I point to the fact that, in Scotland, it took a year between the passage of the Bill and its implementation to train everyone, and I recognise the efforts that are already ongoing with, say, specialist domestic abuse courts already happening.

To go back to the matter of dictating the detail, we are not saying that in this Committee amendment. However, we are saying that it requires Departments to fund them properly, which is why I tabled amendment No 22. I do not believe that annual mandatory training makes for a tick-box exercise. That is done only when it is made to be that way. Let us take, for example, GDPR, a subject with which most Members here will be familiar. New legislation on that came into effect last year, and I received a lot of training on GDPR in a variety of jobs. That was all different, all required and all necessary. Only two weeks ago, I received additional training on it as a refresher, and I intend to continue to train myself on it and get information from relevant people. It is important and is part of my job. Perhaps I will have some questions, or perhaps something has changed. Perhaps I thought that I understood something differently. While that is a terrible analogy for domestic abuse and coercive control, it shows what may happen if people are not regularly trained on something that is so new and so different to what we had before on such a particular issue, where it may mean recognising harmful behaviour that meets the criteria when the very victim does not recognise it. That brings me back to what Mr Allister said. This requires in-depth knowledge, training, information and practice.

In my personal communications with the lead prosecutor in Scotland, whom I thank for her time over the past few months, and the head of a key stakeholder organisation in that jurisdiction, time and time again, it was reiterated that the successful implementation of the legislation in Scotland and the reason that the new offence is working well all hinged on the extensive training that was carried out. Similarly, in my communication with members of the criminal justice system, when I asked what the ideal outcome of the Bill would be, the key issue that was identified was getting convictions without delay, but the key ask was for training and resourcing.

The need for the amendment is clear. It is essential that people understand what coercive control is and are able to recognise and identify the signs of coercive and controlling abusive behaviour. Otherwise, what changes? The friendly amendment that I have proposed is to add in the word “resources” to Committee amendment No 21, which proposes a new clause on the training of policing and criminal justice agencies. When it comes to tackling a problem as complex and insidious as domestic abuse, passing a law can achieve only so much. Allocating sufficient funding is another way, so, by putting that amendment in the Bill, we avoid a scenario in which underfunding or a scarcity of resources prevents the law working effectively.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Miss Woods: I will.

Mrs Long: The Member is asking for resources to be provided by the Department of Justice to a number of agencies and not only that but that that money be ring-fenced for training. It is not possible under law for me to tell the Chief Constable how to spend money or organise training, nor is it possible for me to do that with the judiciary. I cannot compel the judiciary. It is independent of — not isolated from — my control as the Minister of Justice.

Furthermore, the PPS is a non-ministerial Department. It lies within the Department of Finance’s remit, not the Department of Justice’s. The PPS and the Director of Public Prosecutions are completely outwith any political control or interference and for very good reason. Will the Member therefore not concede that, although she is well intentioned, the reality is that she is asking me to spend departmental money in ways in which I cannot and to achieve results that I cannot compel?

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for her intervention, but at no point did I say that resourcing would be ring-fenced for training. This is about the effective operation of the Act: something entirely different.

If the agencies tasked with rolling out a new offence, enforcing it —.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Miss Woods: I will.

Mrs Long: The effect is the same regardless of whether it is spent on training or on the effective operation of the Act. It is, nevertheless, the same duty that is being placed on me for organisations over which I have no operational control. In fact, in the case of the PPS — Mr Speaker, I will be guided by you on the issue — I understand that, if we were to try to interfere with its operations, that would automatically lead to the triggering of a cross-community vote in the Chamber, because that would be encroaching on a non-departmental body on which I do not have the right to impose duties.

Mr Speaker: I do not know whether you were asking me directly or whether it was rhetorical, but it is not something that I would just make an announcement on in the middle of a debate. It is clear, however, that we cannot interfere with the PPS.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister and the Speaker for their interventions. Mr Speaker, if you wanted to comment on that at a later stage, I would welcome that.

My point is that the finances are provided by the House. I am asking not for specific details of how those finances are designated but that agencies be properly resourced. If the agencies are not adequately resourced but are tasked with rolling out a new offence, enforcing it, supporting it, policing it, getting prosecutions and protecting victims, there will be gaps. It is people who fall through gaps. Of that, we are all too aware.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Miss Woods: I will.

Mrs Long: I apologise for asking the Member to give way again, but the amendment that she is pushing on resource would place on me a duty to ensure sufficient resources and training if it were to be made. I do not have the capacity to do that, because it would be as a result of a process that would have to go through the Department of Finance and the Executive. It is simply not the case that the Assembly allocates resources to anyone: the Executive and the Department of Finance allocate resources to those bodies.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for her intervention. As a relatively new MLA, I may not be familiar with the internal workings of how resources are allocated among Departments for specific issues, but it is my understanding that the Assembly passes the Budget and ultimately decides where resources go.

I go back to the amendment. People fall through cracks when there are some. Vulnerable people fall through cracks. That cannot be allowed to happen. Amendment No 22 would prevent that from being the case or, at least, allow it not to happen.

As we have heard in the debate on the Committee amendments, an overwhelming amount of evidence submitted to the Committee stressed the importance of training and resources in making sure that the law is implemented properly and protects victims. A majority of respondents to the Committee consultation mentioned resources, and, as I said on the Committee amendment, I spoke to key stakeholders in Scotland, where every police officer and judge has been trained in the new domestic abuse law, and they said the same.

In order to ensure that the Executive, future Executives and future Ministers commit to the effective operation of the Bill and to supporting victims, the amendment makes specific reference to the need for sufficient resources to be made available. It is not prescriptive as it does not state an amount or a percentage; it refers to “sufficient” resources — something that is reasonable and proportionate. I cannot stress enough the importance of adequately resourcing all agencies, bodies and organisations — statutory and voluntary — that are involved in the disposal of this new offence in tackling domestic abuse more broadly. It was put to us at the Committee many times. Let us take, for instance, Migrant Centre NI, which stated rightly that the Bill could be the best legislation that you can possibly get on the books, but, if there are insufficient resources for organisations, such as the PSNI, that support victims and for getting information to victims about who can support them, how they can access that support and what it looks like, and without a coordinated and holistic effort, the best legislation will all be for naught. That is reflected in so much of the evidence that I have heard, and that is why I believe that the amendment would strengthen the Bill.

Amendment Nos 20, 24, 25 and 26 are on data collection and reporting on the legislation. The importance of strengthening data collection regarding incidents of domestic abuse and violence, in general, and, more specifically, in relation to the implementation of the legislation was raised by a number of organisations. There is a need for data to track the journey of abuse investigations through the criminal justice system, including the number of initial reports; the number of referrals to the PPS; how many reach different stages of the court process and how many reach prosecution; what the resulting remedy is; and how many involve repeat offenders, to enable an accurate assessment of the effectiveness of the system. I raised that, early on, as an issue for data collection and monitoring of the legislation from an operational side. Indeed, at the Committee deliberations, I explained the need for robust and detailed data collection.

The police collect statistics on certain offences and publish them in a certain way. That is not the same data that is collected by the PPS or the judiciary. For the Bill to be effective, there needs to be a broader data collection about those who are involved in the legislation. That is, for example, those who are A and B, those who have a child aggravator applied, and the circumstances around A and B. If the different parts of the criminal justice system are working to prosecute for an offence in the legislation but are not collecting or collating data in the same way, how can we report on it effectively? Conversations are going on in the Department, the PPS and the judiciary, and I welcome that, but, if we are working to see whether the Bill has been effective in getting prosecutions and the data does not add up across the three bodies that are actually charging the offence, how can we make sure that it is effective and doing what it needs to be doing if we are not collecting the same data and reporting on it in the same way? It also makes our job as Justice Committee members very difficult in the future.

For example, the police collect data on incidents and offences, but that is not necessarily the same data that is collected by the PPS. We need to look at it as a whole system, because it is one. If we cannot track the legislation and its effects — what happens to someone who comes into contact with the PSNI from first contact to ending up in the courts, to see how this has been for them; the time that it has taken; what has happened; how the court's business was managed and arranged; the number of cases and so on — how will we scrutinise its effectiveness?

Scotland has already reported on its Domestic Abuse (Scotland) Act 2018 and on the offence in terms of public prosecution, which is different — I appreciate that they are different systems. However, if we can show through annual statistics how effective the Bill has been in comparison across all the bodies that are working on it, that is something that we need to have; otherwise, we cannot measure it.

The Department advised the Committee that it recognises the importance of robust data and is reviewing this in relation to the offence. How to best secure this and what will be reported on is being considered in conjunction with partner agencies as part of the operationalisation of the new offence. However, the Department has indicated that it is unlikely to be possible to record the detail that some organisations outlined to the level of an individual victim.

I am glad that the Minister is in agreement with the Committee on amendment No 20 and the need for it. I welcome the fact that there will be a regular and ongoing liaison with partners, following the introduction of the offence, to ensure that as much information as possible is used to consider how the new provisions are operating.

I tabled amendment Nos 25 and 26. Again, both amendments are friendly to the Committee's. I will take amendment No 26 first. It adds that:

“The report should also include the number of offences recorded within each police district in Northern Ireland”.

It is self-explanatory; we need to know the number of offences within each police district, as recorded. It is my understanding that the Ministers are supportive of the amendment. I am glad that other Members stated their support for it and that it is possible for the PSNI to report on that after the legislation comes into force. That information already exists, which I welcome.

12.30 am

Amendment 25 has two parts. The first part would add data to be collected on reporting, specifying:

“the number of cases where ... the offence is aggravated by reasons as described in sections 8, 9, and 15.”

That is also self-explanatory. How will we know whether the aggravation is being used in the disposal of the offence? We need to know that the legislation in its entirety is being utilised. We need to know whether it is working and whether it needs to be amended.

The second part of the amendment requests “information on A and B”; that is, the alleged victim and perpetrator:

“as described in section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998”.

That section, as we know, aims to change the practices of government and public authorities so that the quality of opportunity and good relations are central to policymaking and service delivery. The:

“duties aim to encourage public authorities to address inequalities and demonstrate measurable positive impact on the lives of people experiencing inequalities. Its effective implementation should improve the quality of life for all of the people of Northern Ireland.”

Why is it needed here? That, again, is about the operation of the law after the Bill receives Royal Assent. We are saying that we need the data so that we can develop evidence-based policy and responses. We know that resource allocation and funding go hand in hand with proving data and numbers. We know that funding and resources should be granted based on need, in theory and in practice, but we also know that that does not always happen. However, what if we did not have the information to hand to know where the need was? What if the old way of collecting and publishing data and information was not sufficient enough to show the need? What if there were people who did not come forward, or, for example, did not know how to engage with services, let alone report to the criminal justice agencies and go through those processes? What if, for example, we got evidence like the submission that we heard from the Migrant Centre NI? That is a small community organisation that does not have enough budget allocated for the work that it does, in my opinion, but it does fantastic work. In its evidence session, it outlined:

“the need for the Department of Justice and for law and policymakers to reach out to uniquely vulnerable groups, whether they be, migrants, asylum seekers or refugees, LGBTQ groups ... and groups dealing with individuals who have disabilities.”

It stated that:

“We desperately need empirical research commissioned by government to learn about the prevalence, extent, nature and experiences of domestic abuse among those groups in particular. Consideration should be given to what procedures and mechanisms, including specialist domestic abuse services, alone or in combination with conventional law and procedures in a legal system, may”

work:

“for them in particular, given the uniquely vulnerable positions that they are in.”

I am not being prescriptive about who or what agency collects the data or how it should be collected. It might be the PSNI or the PPS that collects it, but it might not. It could be the courts, or it could be done through multi-agency risk assessment conferences (MARAC) involving all the key statutory authorities. It could be done on a collaborative basis, and I will argue that it should be done in a victim-focused and sensitive way. I accept that there might need to be some tidying up at Further Consideration Stage of the second section of amendment 25. I would certainly welcome the help of the Departmental Solicitor's Office or the Office of Legislative Council to do so. I note the Chair and the Deputy Chair's comments and the comments of MLAs on the amendment, and I think that I was tempting fate earlier on ongoing support from Paul Frew. However, as the saying goes, “All good things must come to an end”.

I will again make to you all the argument that we made in the debates on previous groups of amendments: if it is not in the Bill, there is no guarantee that it will be done. If the wording needs to be worked on to make it functional at Further Consideration Stage to get support from other parties, it can surely remain here via passing the amendment at Consideration Stage in order to allow it to be worked on at a later date. If it needs tidying up, let us do that, but that is the same argument that we successfully made in debates on previous groups of amendments tonight.

I want to pick up on amendment 19 before I bring my remarks to a close. The Department is working up guidance with stakeholders, which is crucial to the Bill and its outworkings, and we heard that very loudly and clearly from the PSNI. I know that the Committee does not have a role in drawing the guidance up, but I encourage the Minister and her Department to share it with the Committee for information as soon as possible. We must ensure that the guidance reflects the contents of the Bill and does not focus on one area at the expense of others and that it is a good road map that outlines the specifics needed for various agencies, especially the PSNI, to which the guidance will be crucial. I therefore welcome the Minister tabling the amendment in relation to guidance and that the guidance will be kept under review. Guidance could play a key role in making sure that there are no issues for statutory agencies collecting relevant data and information.

I have taken up enough time, Mr Speaker. I urge Members to support amendment Nos 22, 25 and 26 for the reasons outlined.

Mr Carroll: It has been long but important and essential debate. I rise to speak in favour of amendment Nos 21 and 22. It is clear beyond doubt that there have been failures in the handling of domestic abuse cases in the criminal justice system. Those failures in the criminal justice institutions have ended not only in a lack of prosecutions where domestic violence has taken place and in a lack of faith in the system to deal with domestic abuse generally, but they have caused unknown trauma for victims who have decided to speak up and report their abuse, only to be met with ill treatment, outdated presumptions, gender prejudices and emotionally damaging questions in courtrooms, to name but a few issues.

It is imperative that we recognise the issue and act to prevent it as far as possible. Victims of domestic abuse and violence have the right to treatment that does not retraumatise them or make them uncomfortable as they seek justice. The many societal roots of domestic abuse and gender presumptions are linked to the oppression of women. That must be dug up and done away with, but that will not happen at the hands of the Assembly, and it will not happen when the Bill is passed. However, it is in our power, today, to ensure that the bodies responsible for dealing with the victims of domestic abuse are trained to do so properly, as that would improve the experience of victims and should be a priority in the Bill. I agree with the robust terms laid out in amendment No 21 that such training should be annual and mandated. I endorse amendment No 22, tabled by Rachel Woods, which mandates the Department to provide resources for such training. There is an onus on the Department to ensure that that training takes place, and it is right that the Department would commit to fund it to ensure that it happens. This place has a poor record in providing for the victims of domestic abuse, and this would be a small step in the right direction.

I challenge those who would vote against resources being allocated to training in this area to listen to the voices of people who have had desperate experiences. Listen to such women's groups as Women's Aid, which has issued a plea today for us to ensure that the legislation is appropriately funded to do what it sets out to do.

Mrs Long: Will the Member give way?

Mr Carroll: I will.

Mrs Long: There is no question about the legislation being properly funded or training being provided. However, there is a significant issue as to who is responsible for that in law, and what responsibility they can have for dispersing, ring-fencing or directing expenditure in organisations that are operationally independent. The Patten report requires that policing be operationally independent from my Department and subject to the scrutiny of the Policing Board. Under the 1998 Act, and the devolution of policing and justice, the PPS was made a separate entity and non-ministerial department. I therefore have no vires over the PPS, and neither does the Assembly, other than in respect of funding from the Department of Finance.

The question, therefore, is not whether we intend to provide funding and training; it is how we structure that in the Bill. With respect, it is not good enough for Members to come to the House and say, "I'm not really sure, but let's put it in legislation and then we can fix it up later". We should put nothing in the Bill unless we have certainty that it is correct. In recent weeks, we have seen what happens when things are not correct in legislation. It is a highly risky way to proceed, and it affects victims and witnesses when we fail to do due diligence.

Mr Carroll: I thank the Minister for her intervention. What she has said may be true, but, with respect, she, as Justice Minister, should be supporting the amendment for mandated annual training, but, from her comments, she does not.

Finally, I urge the Minister to answer another call from women's groups and establish a commissioner for domestic abuse victims. That person could scrutinise the outworkings of the Bill to ensure that it lives up to its aim, highlight potential pitfalls in its operation and ensure that there is a properly funded strategy for women and girls that seeks to address the issues that have been swept under the carpet for decades and that urgently need to be addressed.

Ms Dillon: Will the Member give way?

Mr Carroll: I will give way, yes.

Ms Dillon: I am sorry for interrupting you in mid flow. I thank the Member for giving way. We explored this during our Committee scrutiny of the Bill. It is a conversation that we would certainly like to have with the Minister, and I hope that she will be open to that conversation.

You made a point earlier about the House not doing enough to address domestic abuse. I think that that is the case across the board. I do not think that anywhere can say, "We have done enough". We know from the statistics that no legislature has done enough, and that is a fair point to make. However, there is a wider issue in that the wider community does not do enough and does not recognise domestic abuse as a community problem. I have raised that repeatedly in the Committee. I attended a women's event at which there were approximately 140 to 150 women, and each table was asked to highlight the five top issues in their community for the PSNI. We know from the figures that one of the top issues for the PSNI in every community is domestic violence, but not one single table mentioned that even though the three speakers prior to that had spoken to the issue of domestic violence.

We have a duty to express that to our community so that it understands that this is a community problem. This is not a problem that is behind doors and is for others to worry about in their own homes. It is our problem, and, as a community, we have to look after those people.

Mr Carroll: I thank the Member for her intervention, and I certainly do not want to misrepresent her position. It is, unfortunately, an issue that is prevalent in communities, but communities have been trying to deal with this, and this Chamber and other Chambers have failed to introduce the right and appropriate legislation to provide the appropriate funding, training and resources to tackle it.

The Bill can only be a first step, because it is far from being all-encompassing. I will support the Bill in the full knowledge that more needs to be done, by the House in particular, to support all victims and protect them from domestic abuse. We will need to push hard for those changes in the future. Additionally, I lend my support to and speak in favour of the other amendments in group 3 as well supporting amendment Nos 21 and 22, as I said at the start.

Mrs Long: I appreciate the input of Members this evening. Members are aware that there are two amendments tabled on training: my amendment, which is amendment No 15, and the Justice Committee Chair's amendment, which is amendment No 21. I have already indicated to the House that, having further reflected on discussions with the Committee last week, I will not move my amendment.

I think that we are all in agreement on the need for and importance of training for those who are involved in the operationalisation — I am having the same problem as Rachel Woods — of the new offence. That will be key to ensuring that the offence works as intended and that it can be as effective as possible. I do, however, have a concern about the Committee's amendment and on whom the onus is placed to ensure that training is undertaken. I will want to come back to the House on that at Further Consideration Stage. The Committee's amendment would require me and my Department to ensure that sufficient mandatory training is made available to the police and criminal justice agencies on an annual basis. Neither I nor my Department can interfere in the operational independence of these organisations. It is not for the Department to dictate to other independent entities as to their operational procedures, requirements and priorities. Indeed, I would be stepping outside my ministerial powers considerably to do so. That could also set a precedent in relation to duties being imposed on other Ministers that are not within their responsibilities.

In addition, the amendment as currently drafted will likely invoke the need for a cross-community vote on the Bill at Final Stage. That is the legal advice that we have been given by our solicitor, Mr Speaker, and I hope that you will be able to provide guidance for us ahead of that vote, given that it involves another person interfering with the independence of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

I intend to table an amendment at Further Consideration Stage that would instead place a duty on the PSNI and the Public Prosecution Service to provide training to their personnel. That would also place the same duty on the Department of Justice in relation to staff in the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, for whom we are responsible. I consider that the focus, for the purpose of this Bill, needs to be on those who are actively involved in the delivery and operation of the new domestic abuse offence or aggravated offences. It is important that our provisions cover organisations with key responsibility for criminal proceedings on these offences. This will also ensure that operational partners are equipped to investigate the new offence, bring forward prosecutions and facilitate convictions.

12.45 am

Responsibility for training and its effectiveness needs to rest with the operational bodies and should be determined on the basis of operational need. Provision also needs to be targeted and proportionate in terms of coverage and the extent to which organisations and particular staff will be involved in the delivery and implementation of the new offence.

While I remain somewhat concerned that the requirement in the Committee amendment for annual training could materially work against the purpose of the amendment and our shared objective, encouraging a tick-box exercise rather than something more appropriate, I am reassured to a degree by the discussion with the Committee that the intention is to have this training focused on those who are involved directly in domestic abuse cases. Members will wish to note that work is being progressed by both the PSNI and PPS, in conjunction with our voluntary and community sector service providers, as to the form that that training will take. This training will make use of operational guidance that will supplement the guidance that my Department is currently developing under clause 25, also in conjunction with voluntary and community sector partners.

Tied in with amendment No 18 is Rachel Woods's amendment No 22, which relates to the provision of resources to operationally independent entities. This raises similar but more serious issues as the Committee amendment on the duty imposed on my Department. I cannot say this often enough: I cannot dictate to operationally independent bodies how their budgets are distributed or ring-fenced internally. More importantly, this would entail significant and potentially open-ended financial demands on my Department. Let me restate that the Executive have made clear to me that there will be no additional funds for any changes that are made to the Bill. Even if funds were available, it is not within my gift to dictate how those would be used or whether they are ring-fenced for a particular purpose. Furthermore, the Public Prosecution Service is not funded by my Department. Rather, it is an independent entity, a non-ministerial department under the auspices of the Department of Finance. For that reason, I must oppose this amendment. I ask the House to support me in resisting it.

Before moving on to other issues relating to training, I wish to address the issue that Mark Durkan and other Members raised regarding training where it relates to interpretation of the scope of the Bill in respect of parental alienation. I am committed to doing all that I can to alleviate acrimony to improve outcomes for families. The introduction of policy on alienation would, however, be a matter for the Department of Health. I understand that that Department is already taking steps in that regard, with plans to consider guidelines for social services. I am, of course, happy to engage with Minister Swann to scope and support future actions in that regard. Officials are already working with colleagues in the Department of Health to consider how to better support relations between parents and between parents and children. Key to that work will be early intervention. Officials are considering actions that might be introduced to reduce acrimony and negative behaviours at an early stage to improve long-term outcomes for children and families. The provisions of the Bill may assist in cases where alienation is present by providing for circumstances where a child is present during abuse or is used to abuse the victim to be treated as an aggravated offence and for increased sentencing to apply.

The determination of proceedings is, rightly, a matter for the independent judiciary, but the legal framework governing private family law applications makes child welfare the paramount consideration. Court children's officers take account of the evidence and impact of parental alienation when advising the court, and the court will consider all evidence when determining what is in the best interests of the child. The guidance and training provided to the judiciary, however, is another matter on which I wish to elucidate further. As Members will be aware, the judiciary is independent. The issue of judicial independence, as separate from government, is sacrosanct. Judicial guidance and training is a matter for the Lord Chief Justice, not for the Minister of Justice, and is delivered through the Judicial Studies Board. Discussions are being held with the Judicial Studies Board on this, including considering the lessons to be learned from other jurisdictions. The issue of sentencing guidelines will be considered as part of the work being undertaken on the operationalisation of the Bill, and discussions are also being held with the Judicial Studies Board on this. So, the issue is not whether we intend to have adequate training provision but the bodies that have the due vires to be able to deliver it and where those ought to be funded from.

I support amendment No 18 and agree with the intent behind it. It makes provision that will enable information to be shared for the purpose of advising a school of a domestic abuse incident the night before. I withdrew my amendment on that issue following discussion with the Committee Chairs. Members will wish to note that an amendment will be tabled at Further Consideration Stage to further build on and enhance the Committee amendment by providing increased clarity and certainty about what the regulations will contain and ensuring that the provisions are as robust as possible. The expanded enabling powers will be more targeted; they will be explicit that the regulations can set out with and to whom information can be shared; what is deemed to be a school or college; who is deemed to be a pupil or student of a school or college; what a domestic abuse incident is; circumstances in which information can be shared; unauthorised disclosure; and the associated offences and penalties. That will ensure that the enabling powers are as robust as possible and will provide greater clarity and certainty as to what can be done in the regulations, which will ensure that the necessary authority is provided. That is particularly important given that there will be a need to have offences and penalties associated with the provisions to which we need to refer and which would attract the Assembly's affirmative resolution process. It is important, therefore, that the necessary scope and authority are provided to take forward the detail of the regulations, which will more clearly set out what will be provided for in terms of who, what, why and when.

There is also the issue of vires to take forward some aspects of the regulations. Signposting is needed to enable colleges to be captured and to provide for offences and penalties that are associated with provisions. In the absence of that, there may be a question about whether it is within the Assembly's legislative competence, given that consideration is needed of any infringement of article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights: the right to respect for private and family life. While there are ECHR considerations to take into account, they are not considered to pose difficulties in taking forward an Operation Encompass model. However, they require us to have due diligence around how that will be managed. That approach, as you know, is already in place in a number of areas across England and Wales. In taking forward the necessary regulations, my officials, in conjunction with their counterparts in Education and Economy, will ensure that the regulations are framed so that they are proportionate, have safeguards and are article 8 ECHR-compliant on the right to a private and family life. With respect to the assertion that the Children's Services Co-operation Act 2015 could have done that already, the PSNI and the Safeguarding Board for Northern Ireland took legal advice and were clear that the legislation did not provide the legal cover for data sharing of that kind. The Attorney General's office is also willing to advise us on the human rights and equality issues in that regard. In addition to that, the provisions will be in place for the unauthorised sharing of information, which provides additional safeguards and protections. I welcome the Committee amendment, and I ask the House for its support for it and for an amendment to be tabled at Further Consideration Stage to build on it.

Amendment No 20 has been tabled by the Chairperson of the Justice Committee. It provides that the Department of Justice:

"may issue guidance to ... relevant bodies about the sort of information which it seeks to obtain from them for the purpose of ... assessment by it of the operation of"

Part 1. It also requires my Department to:

"have regard to information which it obtains from the relevant bodies in relation to the operation of [Part 1] when determining the steps (if any) that could be taken by it for the purpose of ensuring the effectiveness of the operation of"

legislation around the new offence. I consider that to be a useful addition to the Bill. Therefore, I support the amendment. At Further Consideration Stage, I intend to table some minor amendments to ensure that the correct legislative references to the organisations are listed in the provision.

I have had helpful discussions with the Justice Committee about independent oversight. I am reassured that that independent oversight function does not need to entail an entirely new entity; rather, it is a function that could be undertaken by, for example, Criminal Justice Inspection or a new victims of crime commissioner. It is critical that there is the necessary oversight and scrutiny of how the new offence operates. I am keen to ensure that we avoid, as far as is possible, duplication of effort in doing that. I am keen to make best use of all the resources that we have at our disposal while taking account of current and future oversight functions in the area. On taking forward an independent scrutiny function, it is important to note that Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland already has a particular interest in domestic and sexual abuse and will continue to have that going forward. Its work programme is subject to consultation, and, as Minister, I can ask that it undertake specific investigations and reviews. The amendment will be bolstered by the role of the Justice Committee and the Assembly all-party group on domestic and sexual violence, as well as by the work that will be undertaken by my Department.

I turn briefly to the issue of a domestic abuse commissioner, because that has been raised in the debate. We were confident that it was outside the scope of the Bill, and that was confirmed by you, Mr Speaker. It was raised in the discussion about oversight, however, so it is important for people to understand the rationale behind my approach. Given the common interest of the needs of victims and how they are supported, I believe that having a general victims of crime commissioner, with the ability to focus on victims with specific vulnerabilities, such as domestic and sexual abuse, is a more appropriate approach. An expert reference group is considering an approach to this.

In other jurisdictions, a key role for the commissioner is to ensure consistency of service provision. Locally, however, that is not an issue, given our size and structure, the extent of engagement with statutory and voluntary sector partners and the fact that many key organisations are unitary bodies. Having a domestic abuse commissioner on its own, as head of a stand-alone body, would lead to similar calls for other crime types, including sexual abuse and hate crime, among many others. Having a domestic abuse commissioner could lead to a duplication of effort, putting a drain on limited resources. The estimated cost of setting up a commissioner's office could be in the range of £1 million a year, money that, I believe, would be better directed towards front-line services. In that regard, the Committee amendment on data collection also requires my Department to have regard to information received in determining any steps that can be taken to ensure the effectiveness of the operation of the Act. Committee amendment No 23, which I support, taken together with a wide range of oversight and scrutiny arrangements, will ensure that there is robust consideration of how the offence works in practice.

In going forward, there may, however, be merit in considering whether the first report that is produced under the independent oversight arrangement be perhaps scheduled for no later than two years after the offence comes into operation, rather than on commencement of the Act, given that it will take time for the new offence to bed in and for numbers to be meaningful. I intend to seek the Committee's views on a potential amendment being tabled at Further Consideration Stage for that purpose.

Amendment No 19 was tabled following agreement with the Committee that provision be made requiring my Department to keep any issued guidance about domestic abuse under the clause under review and to revise that guidance as necessary in the light of review. I was content to bring forward that amendment, and we have already agreed that we will bring the guidance to the Committee and keep it informed of progress in that regard.

I have withdrawn an amendment that would have required my Department to prepare a report on the operation of the domestic abuse offence and associated aggravated offences. It was posed as an alternative to amendment No 24, tabled by the Chair of the Justice Committee, and there has been lengthy discussion already this evening about that. Having discussed the matter with the Committee Chair and the Committee in general, however, I think that an amendment can be tabled at Further Consideration Stage to give the Committee more time to consider the detail. While I agree with the Committee entirely on the need for information to be provided, the Committee amendment could benefit from minor drafting changes to the legislative terminology used, which will be provided in the amendment that will be tabled at Further Consideration Stage. It will refine amendment No 24, the substance of which I support, with regard to proceedings terminology and stylistic drafting approach.

Rachel Woods tabled two amendments — amendment Nos 25 and 26 — to the Committee's amendment No 24. Amendment No 25 would require the report on the operation of the Act to provide information on aggravated offences. I consider that that could be captured in the amendment that will be tabled at Further Consideration Stage. The second paragraph of that amendment, however, deals with section 75 information on victims and offenders. I am concerned, first and foremost, about how a victim or offender would feel about being asked for that sensitive information and, indeed, about the merit of collecting that data and what it is intended to show. Indeed, there is a risk that it could undermine confidence in the justice system if it were to appear to victims that they were in some way being racially or otherwise profiled. Furthermore, I understand that a number of operational partners cannot deliver on that without undertaking a complete overhaul of their IT systems across the justice system, the ramifications of which would be significant.

As with other amendments, I remind the House that in imposing additional requirements, not all of which materially benefit victims, fewer resources will be available for measures that are designed to help them substantially. Organisations are, however, looking at their reporting on section 75 and how that can be improved, as a separate piece of work.

1.00 am

Contrary to what was asserted by Miss Woods, it is also not the case that we can restrict further this particular item at Further Consideration Stage. It is an expansive clause, Mr Speaker, and as you will be well aware, it is possible only to add further obligations to those agreed at Consideration Stage, not to reduce them at Further Consideration Stage. Therefore, I cannot support amendment No 25, and I ask the House to reject that amendment.

Amendment No 26, also tabled by Rachel Woods, would again amend the Committee's new clause. I am content with the intent of the amendment, which would identify the number of offences recorded within each police district in Northern Ireland. I, therefore, support amendment No 26.

That concludes, as this stage, my comments on this group of amendments.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. Before I call the Chairperson of the Committee for Justice, I want to address the question about if or when a cross-community vote would be required. The Minister and other Members will know that the Bill has a journey to go yet, with Further Consideration Stage and then Final Stage. It is at Final Stage that that question would arise for me, based on the appropriate legal advice, on the entirety of the Bill as it sits at Final Stage. It does not arise this evening.

Mr Givan: Thank you Mr Speaker. First, let me thank all the Members for their contributions to the debate on the group 3 amendments and, in particular, those who spoke in support of the Committee amendments. Group 3, unsurprisingly, has attracted a lot of attention from Members because these are largely the result of the Committee's deliberations, having heard evidence, in ensuring that the implementation and operation of this offence is as effective as it possibly can be. I thank Members for that.

Some Members took the opportunity to address the wider Bill, which is understandable. I know that there is a lot of interest well beyond the Justice Committee. Members have sought to take the opportunity to provide wider commentary around the totality of what is being put through today. I certainly welcome those interventions.

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I will give way.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not sure that it is understandable at 1.00 am that Members decide to make speeches about the wider scale of the Bill. Please do not encourage them to do so during the fourth series of amendments that are coming before us. [Laughter.]

Mr Givan: The Member will be glad to know — I am sure that everyone will be glad to know — that I anticipate group 4 being relatively straightforward, but there is still a while to go. It is important that Members make this contribution. I take the comment in the spirit in which it is meant, but I know that the Member will also appreciate that we are dealing with vital legislation. It is testament to the huge volume of work that the Committee considered that it is taking this time for the Assembly to debate this issue.

Mr Durkan was right when, in his comments during the debate on this group, he highlighted the collegiate approach that the Committee has taken. Indeed, he said that some people looking on will be quite surprised at the way in which relationships in the Committee have developed in the way that we have been collegiate. It is through that collegiate approach that these amendments are happening today.

Often the work of Committees goes unnoticed. I understand that the media will focus in on other debates that Members engage in and, at times, that is self-inflicted. However, this has largely gone under the radar in terms of the extensive volume of work that we have carried out and the forensic nature with which members of the Committee have carried that out.

Turning to these amendments, I want to again thank the Minister for her decision not to move her amendment No 15 and for her support for the Committee amendments. As was indicated earlier, the Committee is happy to consider any proposed amendments for Further Consideration Stage that build on and improve the amendments that we tabled today, assuming that they are made.

Linda Dillon, in a powerful contribution, highlighted the difference that a teacher can make at the school gate. It is true about having that ability to identify with a child and, rather than chastening, asking, "Are you OK?". That, ultimately, is what this amendment was about. That was touched on again by Cara Hunter in her contribution. She spoke more widely about the need to educate young people about what a healthy relationship is. That is so true, because people talk about a generational cycle that needs to be broken. Sadly, far too many children are being brought up in homes where this seems to be the norm, and then another cycle is created. Therefore, it is right to say that other aspects of society have a vital role to play in helping to educate those young people.

Paul Frew, rightly, praised Linda Dillon for the work that she has done. He also praised the Minister on the detail of the Further Consideration Stage, but I want to be very clear. Had it not been for the Committee's pushing this amendment —. At every stage, the Department made it clear to the Committee that it did not believe this to be within the scope of the Bill. The Committee held the view that that was a decision not for the Department but for the Speaker. That is why the Committee pursued the amendment. It was only at the point at which the Speaker ruled that amendment to be admissible that the Department then came forward with it.

Mrs Long: I thank the Member for giving way. He will appreciate that there were two issues with this. The first is that it mainly pertains to sharing information with the Education Department. At that point in time, we had not seen this as a vehicle to enable us to do that, because we had not engaged the Education Minister on the specifics. However, we had also taken legal advice because, as the Member will appreciate, we do not lobby the Speaker on what his decisions might be. The legal advice that was available to us at the time is what we shared with the Committee, which was that it would not be within scope. Now that we have proven that it is within scope, because the Committee has tested it, I welcome that because, as we assured the Deputy Chairperson during discussions, it was always our intention to move on this issue.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for that. She has made that point before. However, it does not change the material fact that the Committee pursued the amendment, and it was at that point that the Department brought forward its further amendment. The issue goes right back to the start of this. It was during Committee Stage, when amendments were being discussed — and this one was discussed at length — that the Committee would have appreciated much more engagement from the Department, rather than holding to its position that, in its opinion, the amendment would not be deemed to be within scope. The Committee always knew that that would be a decision for the Speaker. Therefore, I hope that the lesson will be learned by the Department to engage at the Committee Stage. Notwithstanding that, I welcome the subsequent amendment that will come at Further Consideration Stage. However, there is a learning process there that I am sure that the Minister will reflect upon when it comes to future Bills that come through the Committee.

In respect of amendment No 20 around guidance on data collection, again, Members touched on the importance of having the information. Mr Beattie talked about how that was vital. Mr Frew stated clearly that it was to ensure that the legislation is effective. Linda Dillon talked about how it is the resources that follow the information. Therefore, if we do not have the right data being produced, that will have knock-on implications. I welcome Members' commentary in respect of those areas. Sinéad Bradley and Rachel Woods also spoke on those issues.

A number of Members made comments on amendment No 21 in respect of training and the importance of it. I will just pick up on some of those contributions. In particular, I want to highlight Colm Gildernew's contribution to this one, because it really did hit home the importance of getting the right training. He gave the example of a couple being married and, on that day, the wife being raped. When the police brought her back, her words were saying one thing while her eyes were saying another. That was a powerful contribution. It really goes to the heart of why training is fundamental to the Bill's effectiveness. Many Members touched upon that: we can have as much good legislation as we want written down on paper, but, unless all the criminal justice agencies are properly trained, it will not actually be effective or do the job that we want it to do. I welcome those contributions. I know that Mr Blair took a contrary view on the requirement, because he was concerned that that type of training, the annual necessity for it and so on would put an undue burden on those organisations, but I think that, in my earlier contribution in opening this debate, I addressed how important that training is.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. Obviously, there has been unanimous support for information sharing between police and schools through the Operation Encompass approach that is provided for by the Bill. To help lead the ongoing efforts of the Education Committee, can the Member advise us whether the Justice Committee has consulted teaching and non-teaching staff with regard to the resources and training that they will need in order to implement the relevant provisions that are proposed in the Bill?

Mr Givan: Can the Member clarify specifically in which area he feels that there needs to be training for the educational establishment?

Mr Lyttle: The proposal is that schools and educational settings will play a role in responding to children's experiences of domestic abuse. Has the Committee consulted educational settings on that provision?

Mr Givan: Amendment No 21 relates to the criminal justice aspect of it. For the Member's benefit, the training will be specifically for the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Public Prosecution Service and the Courts and Tribunals Service. That is what it relates to. I assure the Member that that aspect and the amendment that we are speaking to do not touch upon the Education side of it. I hope that that provides reassurance to the Member.

Other Members made commentary around this. Mr Beattie made a key point that the fundamental difference between the Committee amendment and the Minister's amendment was based on two key aspects: "mandatory" and "annual". The Department has resisted those aspects, so I was pleased by other Members' contributions in respect of that. Mark Durkan also welcomed this group of amendments. He spoke about how vital training is, stating that, if agencies are not trained to spot psychological abuse and coercive control, they cannot spot it. He spoke about the importance of it. Jemma Dolan made an important contribution and highlighted the role that Fermanagh Women's Aid has in providing training. It is not just statutory bodies that have a key role to play in this. It is right that Jemma highlighted the role of Women's Aid when it comes to providing that type of training.

I now turn to amendment No 23, which deals with independent oversight. A number of Members again spoke to that aspect. Doug Beattie asked how it would be delivered in the long term. That is certainly a debate that needs to be had. He was right to highlight the fact that the Committee has gone forward with the approach that it is taking because of the short to medium term. In the future, if there is to be a domestic abuse commissioner or a commissioner for victims of crime, all of that will need to be given proper consideration. What we cannot do in the short term is not have the independent oversight that those organisations have asked for. Again, that was touched upon by other Members, including Mr Durkan and Gerry Carroll.

Amendment No 24, which deals with the reporting requirements on the Department, was touched upon by a number of Members. Linda Dillon highlighted her support for the aim, but also indicated the difficulty in collecting information around amendment No 25. She was supportive of amendment No 26. Rachel Woods has articulated very clearly her arguments in respect of all of this around amendment Nos 25 and 26. I have outlined some of the issues that we need to consider in respect of that. We will take forward some of those at Further Consideration Stage. If amendment No 24 can be reflected in and around section 75 and so on, I will be more than happy to support that, but we need to engage further with the Minister on that.

I thank Members for their contributions on this important group of amendments that have been tabled by the Committee. I commend the Committee amendments to the House and ask for your support in respect of them.

1.15 am

Mr Speaker: Before we start the voting, there are some complications in this, so just bear with us if we have to consult to make sure that we get this right.

Amendment No 18 agreed to.

Amendment No 19 made: In page 13, line 34, leave out from "may" to end of line 35 and insert -

"must—

(a) keep any guidance issued under this section under review, and

(b) revise any guidance issued under this section if it considers revision to be necessary in light of review."—
[Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 25, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 20 made: After clause 25 insert

"Guidance on data collection

25A.—(1) The Department of Justice —

(a) may issue guidance to the relevant bodies about the sort of information which it seeks to obtain from them for the purpose of the assessment by it of the operation of this Part, and

(b) must have regard to information which it obtains from the relevant bodies in relation to the operation of this Part when determining the steps (if any) that could be taken by it for the purpose of ensuring the effectiveness of the operation of this Part.

(2) The relevant bodies are —

(a) Police Service of Northern Ireland,

(b) Public Prosecution Service Northern Ireland,

(c) the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, and

(d) such additional bodies as the Department considers appropriate."— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 21 proposed: After clause 25 insert

"Training

25A.—(1) It shall be the duty of the Department to ensure that sufficient training of policing and criminal justice agencies, including but not limited to —

(a) Police Service of Northern Ireland,

(b) Public Prosecution Service Northern Ireland, and

(c) the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service, and is made available to allow for the effective operation of this Act.

(2) Training must be provided annually.

(3) Training is mandatory for all those involved in the disposal of domestic abuse cases in policing and criminal justice agencies, including but not limited to the agencies listed in subsection (1).

(4) Having identified the relevant staff in subsection (3) at the beginning of an annual reporting period, the Department must publish the uptake of training by each relevant organisation at the end of each year."— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

Mr Speaker: As amendment No 22 is an amendment to amendment No 21, we need to dispose of amendment No 22 before returning to amendment No 21.

Amendment No 22 proposed: As an amendment to Amendment No 21, in clause 25A(1) after "sufficient" insert the words "resources and".— [Miss Woods.]

Amendment No 22, as an amendment to amendment No 21, negated.

Amendment No 21 agreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 23 made: After clause 25 insert

"Independent oversight

25A.—(1) The Department of Justice must not later than 1 year after the commencement of this Act appoint an independent person to —

- (a) contribute to the development of the guidance under section 25, and
- (b) review, report and make recommendations in relation to the operation of Part 1.
- (2) The person must produce a report annually on the activities in subsection (1), starting not later than 2 years after the commencement of this Act.
- (3) The Department must —
- (a) lay the report before the Northern Ireland Assembly, and
- (b) arrange for it to be published.
- (4) The Department may by regulations set out the date, not less than 7 years after commencement, when the independent person may cease the duties in subsections (1) and (2).
- (5) Starting on the date when the independent person ceases duties, the Department must publish a report on subsection (1)(b) every 3 years thereafter.”— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 24 proposed: After clause 25 insert

“Report on the operation of this Act25A.—(1) The Department of Justice must prepare a report on the operation of —

- (a) an offence under section 1(1), and
- (b) an offence that is aggravated as described in sections 8, 9 and 15.
- (2) The report must set out, in relation to those sorts of offences —
- (a) the number of cases for which criminal proceedings are undertaken,
- (b) the number of convictions in criminal proceedings,
- (c) the average length of time —
- (i) from service of the complaint or indictment,
- (ii) to finding or verdict as to guilt (including plea of guilty),
- (d) information about the experience of witnesses (including witnesses who are children) at court,
- (e) such additional information as the Department of Justice considers appropriate.
- (3) The report must, in relation to those sorts of offences, include distinct statistics for each of them.
- (4) For the purpose of the report, the Department of Justice must seek information on how court business is arranged so as to ensure the efficient disposal of cases involving those sorts of offences.
- (5) The report must also include —

- (a) activities and associated timespans for delivering the guidance in section 25 and any plans for review,
- (b) strategies to communicate the provisions of Part 1 to the public and to victims in particular, and
- (c) any additional activities which support the operation of the Act.
- (6) The Department must prepare a report under this section —
- (a) not more than 2 years after commencement, and
- (b) thereafter, at intervals of not more than 3 years.
- (7) The Department must —
- (a) lay the report before the Northern Ireland Assembly, and
- (b) arrange for it to be published.”— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

Mr Speaker: As amendment Nos 25 and 26 are amendments to amendment No 24, we need to dispose of amendments Nos 25 and 26 before returning to amendment No 24.

Amendment No 25 proposed: As an amendment to Amendment No 24, in subsection (2)(b), at end insert —

“(ba) the number of cases where it has been —

- (i) specified that the offence is aggravated by reasons as described in sections 8, 9, and 15.
- (ii) proved that the offence is so aggravated,
- (bb) information on A and B as described in Section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.”— [Miss Woods.]

Amendment No 25, as an amendment to amendment No 24, negated.

Amendment No 26, as an amendment to amendment No 24, made: Subsection (2), at end insert—

“(2A) The report should also include the number of offences recorded within each police district in Northern Ireland.”— [Miss Woods.]

Amendment No 24, as amended, made: After clause 25 insert

“Report on the operation of this Act25A.—(1) The Department of Justice must prepare a report on the operation of —

- (a) an offence under section 1(1), and
- (b) an offence that is aggravated as described in sections 8, 9 and 15.
- (2) The report must set out, in relation to those sorts of offences —
- (a) the number of cases for which criminal proceedings are undertaken,
- (b) the number of convictions in criminal proceedings,
- (c) the average length of time —
- (i) from service of the complaint or indictment,
- (ii) to finding or verdict as to guilt (including plea of guilty),

- (d) information about the experience of witnesses (including witnesses who are children) at court,
- (e) such additional information as the Department of Justice considers appropriate.
- (2A) The report should also include the number of offences recorded within each police district in Northern Ireland,
- (3) The report must, in relation to those sorts of offences, include distinct statistics for each of them.
- (4) For the purpose of the report, the Department of Justice must seek information on how court business is arranged so as to ensure the efficient disposal of cases involving those sorts of offences.
- (5) The report must also include —
- (a) activities and associated timespans for delivering the guidance in section 25 and any plans for review,
- (b) strategies to communicate the provisions of Part 1 to the public and to victims in particular, and
- (c) any additional activities which support the operation of the Act.
- (6) The Department must prepare a report under this section —
- (a) not more than 2 years after commencement, and
- (b) thereafter, at intervals of not more than 3 years.
- (7) The Department must —

- (a) lay the report before the Northern Ireland Assembly, and
- (b) arrange for it to be published.”— [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 1.30 am. I commend Members for their contributions so far. I will say a few more words when we complete the last session.

The sitting was suspended at 1.21 am and resumed at 1.31 am.

Debate resumed.

Mr Speaker: We now come to the fourth group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 27, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 28 to 34. I call the Minister of Justice to move amendment No 27 and to address the other amendments in the group.

New Clause

Mrs Long: I beg to move amendment No 27: Before clause 26 insert the following new clause:

“Factors relevant to residence and contact orders

A26.In the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, in Article 12A (residence and contact orders and domestic violence) —

- (a) in paragraph (1), after ‘in favour of’ insert “ —
- (a) any person, the court shall have regard to any conviction of the person for a domestic abuse offence involving the child,

- (b) ”,
- (b) after paragraph (1) insert —
- ‘(1A) For the purposes of paragraph (1)(a), a domestic abuse offence involving the child is —
- (a) an offence under section 1 of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Act (Northern Ireland) 2020 if —
- (i) the offence is aggravated as provided for in section 9 of that Act, and
- (ii) the aggravation of the offence relates to the child, or
- (b) an offence of any kind (apart from one under section 1 of that Act) if —
- (i) the offence is aggravated as provided for in section 15 of that Act, and
- (ii) the child is not the person against whom the offence was committed but the aggravation of the offence relates to the child.’,
- (c) in paragraph (2), for ‘paragraph (1)’ substitute ‘paragraph (1)(b)’,
- (d) in paragraph (3), after ‘Article 3’ insert ‘(and in that paragraph neither sub-paragraph limits the effect of the other sub-paragraph).’.”

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 28: In clause 26, page 16, line 3, leave out “‘provision’ means a statutory provision or any other” and insert “‘corresponding provision’ means a corresponding statutory provision or any other corresponding”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 29: In clause 26, page 17, line 5, leave out “(2)” and insert “3(2)”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 30: In clause 26, page 18, line 3, leave out “family”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 31: In clause 26, page 18, line 6, leave out “family”.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 32: After clause 26 insert the following new clause:

“Special measures directions in family proceedings

26A.—(1) In the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, after Article 11J (as inserted by this Act) insert —

‘Special measures directions in family proceedings

Special measures in family proceedings: victims of abusive behaviour

11K.—(1) Rules of court must make provision enabling the court to make a special measures direction in relation to a person (“P”) where —

- (a) P is a party to or witness in family proceedings,
- (b) P is, or is at risk of being, subjected to abusive behaviour by a person who is—
- (i) a party to the proceedings,
- (ii) a relative of a party to the proceedings (other than P), or
- (iii) a witness in the proceedings, and
- (c) P and that person are personally connected.

(2) Rules under paragraph (1) must provide for the court to consider, on the application of a party or of the court's own motion, whether a special measures direction (or more than one direction) should be made.

(3) Provision in rules by virtue of paragraph (2) may include provision about what factors the court is to take into account when considering whether a special measures direction should be made, in particular (but not limited to) —

- (a) the availability of the special measures in question, and
- (b) any views expressed by P.

(4) The following apply for the purposes of this Article as they apply for the purposes of Chapter 1 of Part 1 of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Act (Northern Ireland) 2020 (to give meanings to certain expressions) —

- (a) section 2 (as read with section 3(2)) of that Act,
- (b) sections 4 and 5 of that Act.

(5) In this Article —

'family proceedings' means —

- (a) proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 (family proceedings rules),
- (b) proceedings in a court of summary jurisdiction when exercising its jurisdiction under one or more of the following —
 - (i) the Domestic Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1980,
 - (ii) Article 31B of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1989,
 - (iii) the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995,
 - (iv) the Family Homes and Domestic Violence (Northern Ireland) Order 1998,
 - (v) Schedule 16 to the Civil Partnership Act 2004,

'relative' has the meaning given by Article 2(2) of the Family Homes and Domestic Violence (Northern Ireland) Order 1998,

'rules of court' includes —

- (a) rules of court under Article 12, and
- (b) magistrates' courts rules,

as well as rules of court as defined in section 21(4) of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954,

'special measures' means such measures specified by rules of court for the purpose of assisting a person to give evidence or participate in proceedings,

'special measures direction' means a direction by the court granting special measures.

Power to alter definition of family proceedings

11L.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend Article 11K so as to alter the definition of 'family proceedings' in paragraph (5) of that Article.

(2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under paragraph (1) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.'.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 33: After clause 26 insert the following new clause:

"Prohibition of cross-examination in person in civil proceedings generally

26B. In the Civil Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, after Article 7 insert —

'Prohibition of cross-examination in person in civil proceedings

Prohibition of cross-examination in person:
introductory

7A.—(1) For the purposes of Articles 7B to 7F—

'civil proceedings' means proceedings (other than proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 of the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993), in —

- (a) the High Court, or
- (b) a county court,

exercising its civil jurisdiction,

'witness', in relation to any proceedings, includes a party to the proceedings.

(2) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend this Article so as to alter the definition of 'civil proceedings' in paragraph (1).

Direction for prohibition of cross-examination in person

7B.—(1) In civil proceedings, the court may give a direction prohibiting a party to the proceedings from cross-examining (or continuing to cross-examine) a witness in person if it appears to the court that —

- (a) the quality condition or the significant distress condition is met, and
- (b) it would not be contrary to the interests of justice to give the direction.

(2) The 'quality condition' is met if the quality of evidence given by the witness on cross-examination —

(a) is likely to be diminished if the cross-examination (or continued cross-examination) is conducted by the party in person, and

(b) would be likely to be improved if a direction were given under this Article.

(3) The 'significant distress condition' is met if —

(a) the cross-examination (or continued cross-examination) of the witness by the party in person would be likely to cause significant distress to the witness or the party, and

(b) that distress is likely to be more significant than would be the case if the witness were cross-examined other than by the party in person.

(4) A direction under this Article may be made by the court —

- (a) on an application made by a party to the proceedings, or
- (b) of the court's own motion.

(5) In determining whether the quality condition or the significant distress condition is met in the case of a witness or party, the court must have regard to (among other things) —

- (a) any views expressed by the witness as to whether or not the witness is content to be cross-examined by the party in person,
- (b) any views expressed by the party as to whether or not the party is content to cross-examine the witness in person,
- (c) the nature of the questions likely to be asked, having regard to the issues in the proceedings,
- (d) any conviction or caution (of any kind) of which the court is aware for an offence committed by the party in relation to the witness,
- (e) any conviction or caution (of any kind) of which the court is aware for an offence committed by the witness in relation to the party,
- (f) any behaviour by the party in relation to the witness in respect of which the court is aware that a finding of fact has been made in the proceedings or any other proceedings,
- (g) any behaviour by the witness in relation to the party in respect of which the court is aware that a finding of fact has been made in the proceedings or any other proceedings,
- (h) any behaviour by the party at any stage of the proceedings, both generally and in relation to the witness,
- (i) any behaviour by the witness at any stage of the proceedings, both generally and in relation to the party,
- (j) any relationship (of whatever nature) between the witness and the party.

(6) Any reference in this Article to the quality of a witness's evidence is to its quality in terms of completeness, coherence and accuracy.

(7) For this purpose, ‘coherence’ refers to a witness's ability in giving evidence to give answers which—

- (a) address the questions put to the witness, and
- (b) can be understood, both individually and collectively.

Directions under Article 7B: supplementary

7C.—(1) A direction under Article 7B has binding effect from the time it is made until the witness in relation to whom it applies is discharged.

(2) But the court may revoke a direction under Article 7B before the witness is discharged, if it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to do so, either —

- (a) on an application made by a party to the proceedings, or
- (b) of the court's own motion.

(3) The court may revoke a direction under Article 7B on an application made by a party to the proceedings only if there has been a material change of circumstances since—

- (a) the direction was given, or

(b) if a previous application has been made by a party to the proceedings, the application (or the last application) was determined.

(4) The court must state its reasons for —

- (a) giving a direction under Article 7B,
- (b) refusing an application for a direction under Article 7B,
- (c) revoking a direction under Article 7B,
- (d) refusing an application for the revocation of a direction under Article 7B.

Alternatives to cross-examination in person

7D.—(1) This Article applies where a party to civil proceedings is prevented from cross-examining a witness in person by virtue of Article 7B.

(2) The court must consider whether (ignoring this Article) there is a satisfactory alternative means —

- (a) for the witness to be cross-examined in the proceedings, or
- (b) of obtaining evidence that the witness might have given under cross-examination in the proceedings.

(3) If the court decides that there is not, the court must —

- (a) invite the party to the proceedings to arrange for a qualified legal representative to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness, and
- (b) require the party to the proceedings to notify the court, by the end of a period specified by the court, of whether a qualified legal representative is to act for the party for that purpose.

(4) Paragraph (5) applies if, by the end of the period specified under paragraph (3)(b), either —

- (a) the party has notified the court that no qualified legal representative is to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness, or
- (b) no notification has been received by the court and it appears to the court that no qualified legal representative is to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness.

(5) The court must consider whether it is necessary in the interests of justice for the witness to be cross-examined by a qualified legal representative appointed by the court to represent the interests of the party.

(6) If the court decides that it is, the court must appoint a qualified legal representative (chosen by the court) to cross-examine the witness in the interests of the party.

(7) A qualified legal representative appointed by the court under paragraph (6) is not responsible to the party except in so far as acting in the interests of the party by virtue of this Article.

(8) For the purposes of this Article —

- (a) a reference to cross-examination includes a reference to continuing to conduct cross-examination,
- (b) ‘qualified legal representative’ means a legal representative who has a right of audience in relation to the proceedings before the court.

Costs of legal representatives appointed under Article 7D(6)

7E.—(1) The Department of Justice must pay such sums as the Department may determine in respect of —

- (a) fees or costs properly incurred by a qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6), and
 - (b) expenses properly incurred in providing such a person with evidence or other material in connection with the appointment.
- (2) Regulations made by the Department of Justice may provide for sums payable under paragraph (1) —
- (a) to be such amounts as are specified in the regulations,
 - (b) to be calculated in accordance with—
 - (i) a rate or scale specified in the regulations, or
 - (ii) other provision made by or under the regulations.

Guidance for legal representatives appointed under Article 7D(6)

7F.—(1) The Department of Justice may issue guidance in connection with the role which a qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6) in connection with any civil proceedings is to play in the proceedings, including (among other things) guidance about the effect of Article 7D(7).

- (2) A qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6) must have regard to any guidance issued under this Article.
- (3) The Department of Justice may from time to time revise any guidance issued under this Article.
- (4) The Department of Justice must publish —
 - (a) any guidance issued under this Article, and
 - (b) any revisions of guidance issued under this Article.

Regulations under Articles 7A to 7E

7G.—(1) Any power of the Department of Justice to make regulations under Articles 7A to 7E includes power to make supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision.

- (2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under Article 7A(2) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.
- (3) Regulations that contain provision under Articles 7B to 7E are subject to negative resolution (except where they are required by paragraph (2) to be laid in draft before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly).:’.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

No 34: After clause 26 insert the following new clause:

“Special measures directions in civil proceedings generally

26C. In the Civil Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, after Article 7G (as inserted by this Act) insert —

“Special measures directions in civil proceedings

Special measures in civil proceedings: victims of specified offences

7H.—(1) Rules of court must make provision enabling the court to make a special measures direction in relation to a person (“P”) where —

- (a) P is a party to or witness in civil proceedings, and
 - (b) P is the victim, or alleged victim, of a specified offence.
- (2) Rules under paragraph (1) must provide for the court to consider, on the application of a party or of the court’s own motion —
- (a) whether —
 - (i) the quality of P’s evidence, or
 - (ii) where P is a party to the proceedings, P’s participation in the proceedings, is likely to be diminished for reasons arising because P is the victim or alleged victim, and

- (b) if so, whether a special measures direction (or more than one direction) should be made.
- (3) Provision in rules by virtue of paragraph (2)(b) may include provision about what factors the court is to take into account when considering whether a special measures direction should be made, in particular (but not limited to) —

- (a) the availability of the special measures in question, and
 - (b) any views expressed by P.
- (4) For the purposes of this Article —
- (a) P is the victim of a specified offence if another person has been convicted of, or given a caution for, the offence,
 - (b) P is the alleged victim of a specified offence if another person has been charged with the offence.

(5) In this Article —
“caution” means —

- (a) in the case of Northern Ireland —
 - (i) a conditional caution given under section 71 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011, or
 - (ii) any other caution given to a person in Northern Ireland in respect of an offence which, at the time the caution is given, the person has admitted,
- (b) in the case of England and Wales —
 - (i) a conditional caution given under section 22 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003,
 - (ii) a youth conditional caution given under section 66A of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, or
 - (iii) any other caution given to a person in England and Wales in respect of an offence which, at the time the caution is given, the person has admitted,

(c) in the case of Scotland, anything corresponding to a caution falling within sub-paragraph (b) (however described) which is given to a person in respect of an offence under the law of Scotland,

“civil proceedings” means proceedings (other than proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 of the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993) in —

- (a) the High Court, or

(b) a county court,

exercising its civil jurisdiction,

“conviction” means —

(a) wherever occurring in Northern Ireland, Scotland, or England and Wales—

(i) a conviction before a court, or

(ii) a finding in any criminal proceedings (including a finding linked with a finding of insanity) that the person concerned has committed an offence or done the act or made the omission charged,

(b) wherever occurring within or outside the United Kingdom, a conviction in service disciplinary proceedings,

“rules of court” includes county court rules as well as rules of court as defined in section 21(4) of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954,

“service disciplinary proceedings” means —

(a) any proceedings (whether or not before a court) in respect of a service offence within the meaning of the Armed Forces Act 2006 (except proceedings before a civilian court within the meaning of that Act),

(b) any proceedings under the Army Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955, or the Naval Discipline Act 1957 (whether before a court-martial or before any other court or person authorised under any of those Acts to award a punishment in respect of an offence),

(c) any proceedings before a Standing Civilian Court established under the Armed Forces Act 1976,

“special measures” means such measures specified by rules of court for the purpose of assisting a person to give evidence or participate in proceedings,

“special measures direction” means a direction by the court granting special measures,

“specified offence” means an offence which is specified, or of a description specified, in regulations made by the Department of Justice.

(6) The following provisions (which deem a conviction of a person discharged not to be a conviction) do not apply for the purposes of this Article to a conviction of a person for an offence in respect of which an order has been made discharging the person absolutely or conditionally —

(a) Article 6 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 or any corresponding provision,

(b) section 187 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 or any corresponding provision.

(7) For the purposes of this Article —

“offence” includes an offence under a law that is no longer in force,

“corresponding provision” means a corresponding statutory provision or any other corresponding legislative provision (and includes an earlier provision or a provision applying in any part of the United Kingdom).

Power to alter definition of civil proceedings

71.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend Article 7H so as to alter the definition of “civil proceedings” in paragraph (5) of that Article.

(2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under paragraph (1) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.

(3) Regulations that contain provision under Article 7H(5) are subject to negative resolution (except where they are required by paragraph (2) to be laid in draft and approved by a resolution of the Assembly).’.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Mrs Long: The amendments in the group all relate to family and civil proceedings. Amendment No 27 is a new clause that would amend the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. It requires a court hearing an application for a residence or contact order to consider any conviction of the applicant for the new domestic abuse offence or another offence where the child aggravator has been applied, because the offence involves a child.

At present, under the 1995 order, a court hearing an application for contact or residence must have regard to any harm or risk of harm to a child through seeing or hearing ill treatment of another person where the party applying for the order has had a non-molestation order made against them or the court is considering making one.

An anomaly would arise if a court is required to consider such harm to the child where the applicant is subject to a non-molestation order but not where they have been convicted for a domestic abuse offence. As the Department of Finance is responsible for substantive private family law, I sought the views of Minister Murphy on the proposed amendment, and he has indicated his agreement.

I move on to prohibition of cross-examination in person in family proceedings. Amendment Nos 28, 29, 30 and 31 will make minor and technical amendments to clause 26 of the Bill, which makes provision for prohibition of cross-examination in person in family proceedings.

Amendment No 28 makes a small technical correction to a definition provision in new article 11B to be inserted in the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993. Amendment No 29 corrects a small error in clause 26 that occurred when the Bill was being processed prior to introduction. Amendment Nos 30 and 31 relate to the matters to which a court must have regard under new article 11E to be inserted in the 1993 order when considering whether to exercise its discretionary power to make a direction prohibiting cross-examination in person in family proceedings. Under the provision made in clause 26, a court is required, among other things, to have regard to any behaviour by the party to the witness, or vice versa, for which the court is aware that a finding of fact has been made in the proceedings or any other family proceedings. The amendments mean that the court would also be required to consider any findings of fact made in criminal or civil proceedings.

Amendment No 32 is another new clause and would require court rules to make specific provision for special measures for victims of domestic abuse giving evidence at family proceedings. The Bill already makes provision for victims of domestic abuse giving evidence in criminal proceedings to be automatically eligible for consideration for special measures.

For family proceedings, court rules make provision for a court to allow a witness to give evidence by video link, and other special measures can be considered on a case-by-case basis. The need, however, for specific legislative provision for special measures for victims of domestic abuse giving evidence in family proceedings was one of the key issues raised in evidence to the Justice Committee.

I listened to the views, and the proposed amendment would require rules of court to make provision enabling a court to make a special measures direction in family proceedings in relation to a party or witness who is the victim of, or at risk of, domestic abuse, where the court considers that a direction should be made.

Amendment No 33 would enable a court, hearing civil proceedings, to prohibit cross-examination in person in certain circumstances. I have made reference to clause 26, which makes provision on the prohibition of cross-examination in person in family proceedings. The proposed amendment will give the court, hearing civil proceedings, a discretionary power to prohibit cross-examination in person where that is likely to diminish the quality of the witness's evidence or would cause significant distress to the witness. That corresponds to the discretionary power that the family courts will have in cases where an automatic prohibition does not apply. Also mirroring the clause on family proceedings, a court will have the power to appoint a legal representative funded by the Department to carry out the cross-examination instead, and the Department may issue guidance on that role.

Amendment No 34, which is the last in the group, is another new clause and would require court rules to make specific provision on special measures for victims or alleged victims of certain offences giving evidence in civil proceedings. Similar to the position in respect of court rules for family proceedings, court rules for civil proceedings include provision for the court to allow a witness to give evidence by video link and other measures, as may be considered on a case-by-case basis. However, as I noted earlier in respect of the amendment in relation to special measures and family proceedings, the need for more specific legislative provision on special measures for victims was raised in evidence to the Justice Committee, and I have listened to those views. The proposed amendment will require court rules to make provision enabling a court hearing civil proceedings to make a special measures direction in relation to a party or witness who is a victim, or an alleged victim, of specified offences, where this is likely to diminish the quality of their evidence or their participation in the proceedings and the court considers that a direction should be made.

While the number of civil cases involving victims where this is likely to impact on the quality of their evidence or participation in the proceedings is likely to be relatively small compared with family proceedings, it is, nevertheless, appropriate to take this legislative opportunity to ensure that, even if one such case arises, the victim has appropriate protection.

That concludes, at this stage, my comments on this group of amendments.

Mr Givan: On behalf of the Justice Committee, I welcome amendment Nos 27, 32, 33 and 34, which will strengthen the protection provided to victims of domestic abuse and a system ensuring that the justice system is not exploited by perpetrators as a means to continue the abuse and to control their victims, as well as enabling victims to be supported to give their best evidence. I do not intend, Mr Speaker — you will be glad to hear — to rehearse what the amendments do, as the Minister has already set that out very clearly and in some detail, but I do want to briefly cover some points.

Amendment Nos 32 and 34 are about special measures directions in family and civil proceedings. Although clause 22 enables complainants of the domestic abuse offence and aggravated offences to automatically be eligible for consideration of special measures, such as the use of live links and screens, when giving evidence is welcome, the need for special measures in family and civil proceedings was highlighted as a gap that should be addressed in the Bill to the Committee by a range of organisations, including the Women's Aid Federation, Victim Support NI and the Bar of Northern Ireland. Women's Aid stated that access to special measures in the family court is so poor that survivors of domestic abuse are being attacked, abused, harassed and left too frightened to effectively advocate for the ongoing safety of their children. Victim Support indicated that this issue needs to be dealt with in the interests of victim well-being. The Bar advised the Committee that judges and legal practitioners are already trying to address this issue as much as possible by improvising with the facilities available in the family courts and that it was unfortunate that the Bill did not include proposals for special measures in those courts.

The Committee referred the evidence that it received to the Department and asked if it was intending to address the gap that had been highlighted. The Department advised that it was considering amending the Bill to require court rules to enable a court hearing of family proceedings or civil proceedings to make specific provision for special measures for victims of domestic abuse and other certain offences. The Committee welcomed the intention of the Department to table amendments that would ensure parity in the court system with regard to special measures and is pleased to support amendment Nos 32 and 34, which were tabled by the Minister today. However, the Committee urges the Minister to ensure that special measures, when granted in any court, are available for witnesses, as measures that were assured but that were not available on the day of the case were raised with the Committee. That is not acceptable.

Turning now to amendment No 33, the evidence that was received by the Committee clearly outlined that the cross-examination of the complainant by the defendant is a key reason why many complainants disengage from court proceedings. That has allowed the continued control and abuse of victims, diminished their ability to give evidence and caused trauma and distress. The Men's Advisory Project believes that domestic violence perpetrators being able to cross-examine their victim poses a direct threat to the victim's safety, access to justice and public confidence in the justice system.

In the Bar's evidence, it highlighted that there has been a growing concern among family barristers for some time that some litigants have chosen to act as personal litigants because they realise that they can exploit their article 6 rights in the court system and continue to act in a controlling and manipulative manner against their former partner when representing themselves. The Minister's decision to table amendment No 33 to provide for court hearing civil proceedings to have a discretionary power to prohibit cross-examination in person in certain circumstances is, therefore, a welcome addition to the Bill and complements the prohibition on cross-examination in person in family proceedings provided by clause 26.

The Department advised the Committee that amendment Nos 28, 29, 30 and 31 are necessary in order to correct a small error that occurred when the Bill was being processed, prior to introduction, and provided the text of the amendments for the Committee's information. The Department also advised the Committee of its intention, with the agreement of the Minister of Finance, to amend article 12A of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 so that a court that is considering an application for a contact or residence order will be specifically required to have regard to the conviction of the party applying for the order of the new domestic abuse offence or another offence where the child aggravator has been applied. As the Minister outlined, that will address any potential inconsistency in family proceedings. The Committee agreed that it is content to support all those amendments. The amendments in this group will receive our support.

Finally, Mr Speaker, I will speak in a personal capacity, and you will be glad to hear that this is the last time that I will be speaking today, albeit the debate started yesterday and led into today. We are now some 10-plus hours into the debate on this stage. I put on record again my appreciation to all those whom I thanked earlier. The Minister has continued to debate robustly on her position. I welcome that. We should never be afraid of robust challenge coming from the Committee to the Minister and vice versa. This has been a demonstration of the Assembly working effectively. It is in the name: the legislative Assembly. That is what we have been doing over the past 10 hours, and it will probably be 11 hours by the time we conclude. The people of Northern Ireland expect us to do that, and, when we do, we should do it with the forensic level of detail that we applied to the Committee Stage and throughout the debate. I thank all Members who have taken part in the debate in the past 11 hours.

Ms Dillon: The House will be delighted to hear that this will be the last time that I will speak tonight. I do not intend to repeat many of the remarks that the Chair made. However, I want to point out that, even though a lot of the discussion has been on the new domestic abuse offence and criminal proceedings, it is equally important that we address the family and civil proceedings. That was borne out by the many witnesses who came before us. Well done to the Minister and her Department for taking that on board and for tabling the amendments. To be clear, we will support all the amendments, which are amendment Nos 27 to 34.

1.45 am

It is a good and important piece of work. It has been highlighted time and time again that what is happening in these cases in criminal courts needs to be reflected in family and civil proceedings, and that domestic abuse that has been proven in a criminal court has to be part of the family and civil proceedings and has to form part of what comes out of that. It only makes sense that a judge should know if somebody who wants access to children has been convicted of the domestic abuse of his or her family. The abuse is not just of your partner but of your family. Everybody is impacted, and we have already outlined that sufficiently today. John Gillen's 2017 review of family justice concluded that it is absolutely essential that steps are taken to address these inconsistent positions in criminal and family law, and, again, I thank the Minister for addressing that through these amendments.

I do not intend to speak any further, because both the Minister and the Chair of the Committee have outlined what the amendments will do, but they are really, really important. Like every other amendment and every clause that we have debated and discussed during this process, these amendments will have an impact on people's lives. We need to be cognisant of that. This is about protecting people, looking after people and, as has already been outlined, delivering for people.

My final words tonight are just to say that, although we have joked about the lateness of the hour, we have talked about how important this is and therefore how we do not mind being here this late. I know that, when I go home tonight, I will go home to a warm, safe home. I will go home to my child, who was minded by her daddy, with whom she was very safe, and I did not have to worry about her being cared for or looked after. I know that, when she gets up in the morning, she gets up in a home with a mummy and daddy who love her very much. Many people will not have that experience tonight, and that is why we are here, why we are doing what we are doing and why we will continue to do what we do. We have a responsibility to look after those people.

I am also cognisant of the fact that I only speak for myself. As we highlighted during this debate, none of us knows who is going through this, and it affects every single aspect of our life. There is no way on this earth that there are not people in political life who are impacted by this. There are people in every single sphere of life, and I would like to acknowledge that, in solidarity with all those out there who are suffering this. I say this to the perpetrators: think, reach out and get help, because you may well have been a victim once yourself, and you should get help, because you are putting your family through what you once went through yourself.

Ms S Bradley: I rise on behalf of the SDLP to support the final group of amendments. They may be the final group, but certainly not the least, because amongst them are the critical tools that can make the Bill work. Many stakeholders who appeared at Committee and who we spoke to as individual MLAs have been asking for these changes, and I want to thank the Department and the Minister for recognising the suite of legislative change that needed to happen beyond the Bill itself to make the Bill effective in that way. I certainly feel that these amendments do that. I note that amendment Nos 28, 29, 30 and 31 are minor technical amendments, but amendment No 32 is on the special measures in family proceedings, and amendment No 33 looks at prohibiting cross-examination in civil proceedings under certain circumstances. These are the tools that will assist people in giving evidence, and that is a critical component of any legislation.

I will not rehearse what has already been said. Although we have thanked the Ministers, the Departments, the staff and the Clerks — rightly so — I will close by thanking the Assembly staff who have stayed to facilitate us here this evening.

Ms Bradshaw: I am not going to read my speech out. I just want to say that we will support the amendments. I acknowledge the work of Justice Gillen on his two reviews, the impact of which is very much felt in the Bill, and the wider body of work that has been undertaken by the Justice and Health Departments. Mr Speaker, thank you very much to you and the staff for your help tonight.

Mr Frew: I will be brief because of the late hour. These are very important amendments, and this is a very important part of the Bill. This is a world that not a lot of people see until they are in the middle of it and it has a massive impact on their life. It is scary. Going through any court process is scary. All the baggage and all the domestic violence and family issues here mean that this has an even greater impact. I welcome these amendments.

I will talk about amendment No 27. I asked questions on this, and officials reached out. Through the Minister, I pay tribute to and applaud the officials for reaching out to explain some of these amendments to me because they are quite technical at times. It is important that the court shall have regard for this offence. I have no sympathy for anyone conducting this behaviour and then trying to gain access to a child. This should reassure and give succour and comfort to Women's Aid and all the support groups out that assist people going through the court process. However, the flip side that I have not mentioned until now is the issue of parental alienation. Some dispute that it is real, but I believe that it is. I see it. I know and have talked to people who have experienced it. Even while we have been having this debate — Doug also raised it — we are getting emails from men who, having not seen their children in years, are in despair. Lockdown has inflicted even greater misery on those people.

Ms Bradshaw: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will give way.

Ms Bradshaw: Will you acknowledge that women are also victims of that?

Mr Frew: Of course they are, but men seem to believe that they are always ignored in this regard. It may be because we have so many support groups out there. It may be that, sometimes, our language around this issue is loose; I am as guilty as anyone. Most of the people whom I have engaged with on the issue of parental alienation over the last couple of years have been men who do not have any convictions for domestic violence and have not committed domestic violence. I have no sympathy for those who have. A lot of men have not conducted themselves in that way, and they grievously miss their children. They need to be part of their children's lives. They need to raise their child and be given time with that child. This is so soul-destroying for a man or for any person. I am talking about men because they have talked to me and told me of their experiences. It is heart-wrenching; it really is. They deserve to have their experiences told. They deserve to have it placed on the record in Hansard that we hear them and will do everything that we can.

We have been given assurances by the Minister and the Department that parental alienation is riddled throughout this Bill, in the same way as coercive control is throughout the Bill. That has to be the case to give those people comfort, to reassure us and to enable us to monitor it through reporting, the collection of data and independent scrutiny. We will look out for and be mindful of that. We need to correct this problem for everyone involved, men and women, because it is very grievous. It is not only about the victim; it is about the child. The child is missing out on a parent, and that is not right. When a parent is prepared to give loving attention, it should not be the case that they just cannot get access to their child. That needs to be addressed.

I support this. It is the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill. The second part of that is a very important aspect, and we should support it. I thank everyone who took part in the debate. I thank everybody who has stuck around. I thank the Minister, who has had to spend all of that time in the Chamber; we can nip out for a time and take breaks, but she cannot. I praise her. I also praise the Chairperson of the Committee for his diligence and work in guiding the Committee through all of the work. I am proud to acknowledge the work of the Justice Committee and the Assembly tonight. We should be proud of it. It is something that we need to see more of with regard to legislation. I welcome that. I am here to do business; I am here, no matter what the hour, to pass legislation that will make a difference to people's lives. I thank and commend every single one of you. I also commend the Department's officials. We give them a hard time at times. Sometimes, it is deserved. We will always be robust. It is nothing personal. Thank you for the work that you guys do in the Department. Without you, the Bill would not have been produced, we would not have been able to scrutinise it and we would not have law at the other end.

Dr Archibald: I will speak briefly, as Chair of the Economy Committee, about an issue that has been raised by the Chair of the Justice Committee and my party colleague Jemma Dolan. It attaches particularly to amendment No 32, which is a proposed new clause. It is an issue that is not specifically referenced in the Bill and is additional to the amendment, but this seemed to be the most logical place at which to speak about it. The Economy Committee is aware of the Justice Committee's report on the Bill; it suggests consideration of 10 days' special paid leave for victims of domestic abuse. That provision is supported by not only the Economy Committee but the Health and Justice Committees and a number of key stakeholder groups, not least the Irish Congress of Trade Unions.

The Committee appreciates that that is a matter for the Economy Minister to take forward, but we believe that it is important that the issue is raised as part of today's proceedings. The Committee has written to the Economy Minister to highlight the Committee members' support for the provision.

I will add some brief remarks in my capacity as Sinn Féin economy spokesperson on the same theme. I felt that it was important to contribute to the debate because it is very important legislation, as Members have outlined. This Bill and others that are being brought forward are bringing much-needed reform to support victims of abuse, harassment and sexual crime. Last year — my party colleague Jemma Dolan referenced this earlier — Fermanagh Women's Aid briefed our Assembly team. I thought that it I was informed on that issue — I, like many other Members, have signposted and supported victims of abuse — but that briefing, particularly the aspects of it in relation to coercive control, really had an impact on me.

Domestic abuse is a particularly insidious crime. It affects all aspects of a victim's life, including their working life.

A victim may have to try to put on a brave face and do a day's work because there is no provision for leave. It may be the case that co-workers or managers suspect that a colleague is a victim of abuse but are unsure of how to support them. I think that we all probably recognise and support the need for special leave for victims of abuse. Such provision would enable victims to take the necessary time off work to seek support, find accommodation or attend court proceedings, as has been outlined in some of the amendments in this group. It would also address unpredictable absenteeism and reduced productivity for employers. Earlier today — yesterday now — my party colleagues Mary Lou McDonald and Louise O'Reilly introduced legislation in the Dáil to make similar provision for 10 days' annual special leave for victims of domestic abuse. It is important that victims, whether or not they choose to access that leave, know that it is there.

That brings me to my final point. It may seem obvious, but, in addition to the provision of special leave, there needs to be workplace policy and guidance. Managers need to have guidance on how to recognise the signs of domestic abuse and how to respond to a staff member's disclosure and support workers who face those circumstances. As I indicated, I raised those issues, including through the Economy Committee, and I am hopeful that the Economy Minister will take speedy action to make provision to support victims of domestic abuse.

2.00 am

Mrs Long: I do not want to prolong the debate unnecessarily. As Members indicated, the proposed amendments will enhance the Bill in order to protect victims of domestic abuse and their children who are involved in family proceedings. They will also offer protection to victims of offences who are involved in other civil proceedings. The proposed amendment to the Children Order recognises the effect that domestic abuse can have on children by requiring a court, when considering applications for residence or contact orders, to consider any convictions of applicants for domestic abuse offences, where the child aggravator has been applied by reason of the offence involving the child. That will ensure that the court will take that into account when deciding the application in the best interests of the child.

I have listened to the views of the many organisations that, in giving evidence to the Justice Committee, said that there should be specific legislative provision for special measures to be available to victims of domestic abuse and other offences in family and civil proceedings. The proposed amendments will ensure that special measures are available to victims across each of the jurisdictions. I recognise that many victims of domestic abuse will be involved in family proceedings with the perpetrator and that that can be a stressful and traumatic experience. Together with the provision in clause 26 to protect victims of domestic abuse from being cross-examined by perpetrators in person, the proposed amendments will ensure that a wide range of protections is available to support them to give their best possible evidence and to participate effectively in family proceedings as well as supporting other victims to give evidence in civil proceedings.

I specifically want to address the availability of alternative measures, which was raised by the Chairman of the Committee. I understand that virtually all courtrooms have videoconferencing facilities, which greatly extend the capability to live link directly to courtrooms. That would enable witnesses to give evidence from a wide range of locations, including from outside court buildings. That capacity has been enhanced not only as a direct response to COVID but in our development of remote witness centres, which we hope to introduce in a graduated way across the different courts. For all those reasons, I believe that there will be enhanced availability of videoconferencing in the courts.

In conclusion, Mr Speaker — I am sure that you are as pleased as everyone else to hear those words — I thank my officials, the Committee and its officials, your good offices and the Assembly staff for their facilitation of the proceedings today and yesterday. This is our job, and it is important that we do it. However, I want to focus mostly on those for whom it is not their job but who have driven my prioritising the Bill as the first legislation that I brought to the House. Paul Frew can rest assured that he will have plenty of opportunities to legislate in this term. I give him that commitment.

Mr Frew: Hear, hear.

Mrs Long: I thank our third-sector partners, such as Women's Aid, the Men's Advisory Project, LBGTQ sector representatives and all others from the third sector who fed into the Bill and improved and honed what it is capable of doing. Above all, I thank the victims who met me and the Committee and shared their often traumatic experiences so that we could collectively make the Bill the best that it can be. It was for them that I brought the legislation, and it is with them that I wish to finish my remarks.

Amendment No 27 agreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26 (Prohibition of cross-examination in person)

Amendment No 28 made: In page 16, line 3, leave out "provision' means a statutory provision or any other" and insert "corresponding provision' means a corresponding statutory provision or any other corresponding".— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 29 made: In page 17, line 5, leave out "(2)" and insert "3(2)".— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 30 made: In page 18, line 3, leave out "family".— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 31 made: In page 18, line 6, leave out "family".— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 26, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 32 made: After clause 26 insert

"Special measures directions in family proceedings

26A.—(1) In the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993, after Article 11J (as inserted by this Act) insert —

'Special measures directions in family proceedings

Special measures in family proceedings: victims of abusive behaviour

11K.—(1) Rules of court must make provision enabling the court to make a special measures direction in relation to a person (“P”) where —

(a) P is a party to or witness in family proceedings,

(b) P is, or is at risk of being, subjected to abusive behaviour by a person who is—

(i) a party to the proceedings,

(ii) a relative of a party to the proceedings (other than P), or

(iii) a witness in the proceedings, and

(c) P and that person are personally connected.

(2) Rules under paragraph (1) must provide for the court to consider, on the application of a party or of the court’s own motion, whether a special measures direction (or more than one direction) should be made.

(3) Provision in rules by virtue of paragraph (2) may include provision about what factors the court is to take into account when considering whether a special measures direction should be made, in particular (but not limited to) —

(a) the availability of the special measures in question, and

(b) any views expressed by P.

(4) The following apply for the purposes of this Article as they apply for the purposes of Chapter 1 of Part 1 of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Act (Northern Ireland) 2020 (to give meanings to certain expressions) —

(a) section 2 (as read with section 3(2)) of that Act,

(b) sections 4 and 5 of that Act.

(5) In this Article —

‘family proceedings’ means —

(a) proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 (family proceedings rules),

(b) proceedings in a court of summary jurisdiction when exercising its jurisdiction under one or more of the following —

(i) the Domestic Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1980,

(ii) Article 31B of the Matrimonial and Family Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1989,

(iii) the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995,

(iv) the Family Homes and Domestic Violence (Northern Ireland) Order 1998,

(v) Schedule 16 to the Civil Partnership Act 2004,

‘relative’ has the meaning given by Article 2(2) of the Family Homes and Domestic Violence (Northern Ireland) Order 1998,

‘rules of court’ includes —

(a) rules of court under Article 12, and

(b) magistrates’ courts rules,

as well as rules of court as defined in section 21(4) of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954,

‘special measures’ means such measures specified by rules of court for the purpose of assisting a person to give evidence or participate in proceedings,

‘special measures direction’ means a direction by the court granting special measures.

Power to alter definition of family proceedings

11L.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend Article 11K so as to alter the definition of ‘family proceedings’ in paragraph (5) of that Article.

(2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under paragraph (1) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.’.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 33 made: After clause 26 insert

“Prohibition of cross-examination in person in civil proceedings generally

26B. In the Civil Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, after Article 7 insert —

Of ‘Prohibition of cross-examination in person in civil proceedings

Prohibition of cross-examination in person: introductory

7A.—(1) For the purposes of Articles 7B to 7F—

‘civil proceedings’ means proceedings (other than proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 of the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993), in —

(a) the High Court, or

(b) a county court,

exercising its civil jurisdiction,

‘witness’, in relation to any proceedings, includes a party to the proceedings.

(2) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend this Article so as to alter the definition of ‘civil proceedings’ in paragraph (1).

Direction for prohibition of cross-examination in person

7B.—(1) In civil proceedings, the court may give a direction prohibiting a party to the proceedings from cross-examining (or continuing to cross-examine) a witness in person if it appears to the court that —

(a) the quality condition or the significant distress condition is met, and

(b) it would not be contrary to the interests of justice to give the direction.

(2) The ‘quality condition’ is met if the quality of evidence given by the witness on cross-examination —

(a) is likely to be diminished if the cross-examination (or continued cross-examination) is conducted by the party in person, and

(b) would be likely to be improved if a direction were given under this Article.

(3) The 'significant distress condition' is met if —

(a) the cross-examination (or continued cross-examination) of the witness by the party in person would be likely to cause significant distress to the witness or the party, and

(b) that distress is likely to be more significant than would be the case if the witness were cross-examined other than by the party in person.

(4) A direction under this Article may be made by the court —

(a) on an application made by a party to the proceedings, or

(b) of the court's own motion.

(5) In determining whether the quality condition or the significant distress condition is met in the case of a witness or party, the court must have regard to (among other things) —

(a) any views expressed by the witness as to whether or not the witness is content to be cross-examined by the party in person,

(b) any views expressed by the party as to whether or not the party is content to cross-examine the witness in person,

(c) the nature of the questions likely to be asked, having regard to the issues in the proceedings,

(d) any conviction or caution (of any kind) of which the court is aware for an offence committed by the party in relation to the witness,

(e) any conviction or caution (of any kind) of which the court is aware for an offence committed by the witness in relation to the party,

(f) any behaviour by the party in relation to the witness in respect of which the court is aware that a finding of fact has been made in the proceedings or any other proceedings,

(g) any behaviour by the witness in relation to the party in respect of which the court is aware that a finding of fact has been made in the proceedings or any other proceedings,

(h) any behaviour by the party at any stage of the proceedings, both generally and in relation to the witness,

(i) any behaviour by the witness at any stage of the proceedings, both generally and in relation to the party,

(j) any relationship (of whatever nature) between the witness and the party.

(6) Any reference in this Article to the quality of a witness's evidence is to its quality in terms of completeness, coherence and accuracy.

(7) For this purpose, 'coherence' refers to a witness's ability in giving evidence to give answers which—

(a) address the questions put to the witness, and

(b) can be understood, both individually and collectively.

Directions under Article 7B: supplementary

7C.—(1) A direction under Article 7B has binding effect from the time it is made until the witness in relation to whom it applies is discharged.

(2) But the court may revoke a direction under Article 7B before the witness is discharged, if it appears to the court to be in the interests of justice to do so, either —

(a) on an application made by a party to the proceedings, or

(b) of the court's own motion.

(3) The court may revoke a direction under Article 7B on an application made by a party to the proceedings only if there has been a material change of circumstances since—

(a) the direction was given, or

(b) if a previous application has been made by a party to the proceedings, the application (or the last application) was determined.

(4) The court must state its reasons for —

(a) giving a direction under Article 7B,

(b) refusing an application for a direction under Article 7B,

(c) revoking a direction under Article 7B,

(d) refusing an application for the revocation of a direction under Article 7B.

Alternatives to cross-examination in person

7D.—(1) This Article applies where a party to civil proceedings is prevented from cross-examining a witness in person by virtue of Article 7B.

(2) The court must consider whether (ignoring this Article) there is a satisfactory alternative means —

(a) for the witness to be cross-examined in the proceedings, or

(b) of obtaining evidence that the witness might have given under cross-examination in the proceedings.

(3) If the court decides that there is not, the court must —

(a) invite the party to the proceedings to arrange for a qualified legal representative to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness, and

(b) require the party to the proceedings to notify the court, by the end of a period specified by the court, of whether a qualified legal representative is to act for the party for that purpose.

(4) Paragraph (5) applies if, by the end of the period specified under paragraph (3)(b), either —

(a) the party has notified the court that no qualified legal representative is to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness, or

(b) no notification has been received by the court and it appears to the court that no qualified legal representative is to act for the party for the purpose of cross-examining the witness.

(5) The court must consider whether it is necessary in the interests of justice for the witness to be cross-examined by a qualified legal representative appointed by the court to represent the interests of the party.

(6) If the court decides that it is, the court must appoint a qualified legal representative (chosen by the court) to cross-examine the witness in the interests of the party.

(7) A qualified legal representative appointed by the court under paragraph (6) is not responsible to the party except in so far as acting in the interests of the party by virtue of this Article.

(8) For the purposes of this Article —

(a) a reference to cross-examination includes a reference to continuing to conduct cross-examination,

(b) 'qualified legal representative' means a legal representative who has a right of audience in relation to the proceedings before the court.

Costs of legal representatives appointed under Article 7D(6)

7E.—(1) The Department of Justice must pay such sums as the Department may determine in respect of —

(a) fees or costs properly incurred by a qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6), and

(b) expenses properly incurred in providing such a person with evidence or other material in connection with the appointment.

(2) Regulations made by the Department of Justice may provide for sums payable under paragraph (1) —

(a) to be such amounts as are specified in the regulations,

(b) to be calculated in accordance with—

(i) a rate or scale specified in the regulations, or

(ii) other provision made by or under the regulations.

Guidance for legal representatives appointed under Article 7D(6)

7F.—(1) The Department of Justice may issue guidance in connection with the role which a qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6) in connection with any civil proceedings is to play in the proceedings, including (among other things) guidance about the effect of Article 7D(7).

(2) A qualified legal representative appointed under Article 7D(6) must have regard to any guidance issued under this Article.

(3) The Department of Justice may from time to time revise any guidance issued under this Article.

(4) The Department of Justice must publish —

(a) any guidance issued under this Article, and

(b) any revisions of guidance issued under this Article.

Regulations under Articles 7A to 7E

7G.—(1) Any power of the Department of Justice to make regulations under Articles 7A to 7E includes power to make supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision.

(2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under Article 7A(2) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.

(3) Regulations that contain provision under Articles 7B to 7E are subject to negative resolution (except where they are required by paragraph (2) to be laid in draft before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly).'.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 34 made: After clause 26 insert

“Special measures directions in civil proceedings generally

26C. In the Civil Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1997, after Article 7G (as inserted by this Act) insert —

‘Special measures directions in civil proceedings

Special measures in civil proceedings: victims of specified offences

7H.—(1) Rules of court must make provision enabling the court to make a special measures direction in relation to a person (“P”) where —

(a) P is a party to or witness in civil proceedings, and

(b) P is the victim, or alleged victim, of a specified offence.

(2) Rules under paragraph (1) must provide for the court to consider, on the application of a party or of the court's own motion —

(a) whether —

(i) the quality of P's evidence, or

(ii) where P is a party to the proceedings, P's participation in the proceedings, is likely to be diminished for reasons arising because P is the victim or alleged victim, and

(b) if so, whether a special measures direction (or more than one direction) should be made.

(3) Provision in rules by virtue of paragraph (2)(b) may include provision about what factors the court is to take into account when considering whether a special measures direction should be made, in particular (but not limited to) —

(a) the availability of the special measures in question, and

(b) any views expressed by P.

(4) For the purposes of this Article —

(a) P is the victim of a specified offence if another person has been convicted of, or given a caution for, the offence,

(b) P is the alleged victim of a specified offence if another person has been charged with the offence.

(5) In this Article —

“caution” means —

(a) in the case of Northern Ireland —

(i) a conditional caution given under section 71 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011, or

(ii) any other caution given to a person in Northern Ireland in respect of an offence which, at the time the caution is given, the person has admitted,

(b) in the case of England and Wales —

(i) a conditional caution given under section 22 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003,

(ii) a youth conditional caution given under section 66A of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, or

(iii) any other caution given to a person in England and Wales in respect of an offence which, at the time the caution is given, the person has admitted,

(c) in the case of Scotland, anything corresponding to a caution falling within sub-paragraph (b) (however described) which is given to a person in respect of an offence under the law of Scotland,

“civil proceedings” means proceedings (other than proceedings which are family proceedings for the purposes of Article 12 of the Family Law (Northern Ireland) Order 1993) in —

(a) the High Court, or

(b) a county court,

exercising its civil jurisdiction,

“conviction” means —

(a) wherever occurring in Northern Ireland, Scotland, or England and Wales—

(i) a conviction before a court, or

(ii) a finding in any criminal proceedings (including a finding linked with a finding of insanity) that the person concerned has committed an offence or done the act or made the omission charged,

(b) wherever occurring within or outside the United Kingdom, a conviction in service disciplinary proceedings,

“rules of court” includes county court rules as well as rules of court as defined in section 21(4) of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954,

“service disciplinary proceedings” means —

(a) any proceedings (whether or not before a court) in respect of a service offence within the meaning of the Armed Forces Act 2006 (except proceedings before a civilian court within the meaning of that Act),

(b) any proceedings under the Army Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955, or the Naval Discipline Act 1957 (whether before a court-martial or before any other court or person authorised under any of those Acts to award a punishment in respect of an offence),

(c) any proceedings before a Standing Civilian Court established under the Armed Forces Act 1976,

“special measures” means such measures specified by rules of court for the purpose of assisting a person to give evidence or participate in proceedings,

“special measures direction” means a direction by the court granting special measures,

“specified offence” means an offence which is specified, or of a description specified, in regulations made by the Department of Justice.

(6) The following provisions (which deem a conviction of a person discharged not to be a conviction) do not apply for the purposes of this Article to a conviction of a person for an offence in respect of which an order has been made discharging the person absolutely or conditionally —

(a) Article 6 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 or any corresponding provision,

(b) section 187 of the Armed Forces Act 2006 or any corresponding provision.

(7) For the purposes of this Article —

“offence” includes an offence under a law that is no longer in force,

“corresponding provision” means a corresponding statutory provision or any other corresponding legislative provision (and includes an earlier provision or a provision applying in any part of the United Kingdom).

Power to alter definition of civil proceedings

7I.—(1) The Department of Justice may by regulations amend Article 7H so as to alter the definition of “civil proceedings” in paragraph (5) of that Article.

(2) Regulations that contain (with or without other provisions) provision under paragraph (1) may not be made unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of the Assembly.

(3) Regulations that contain provision under Article 7H(5) are subject to negative resolution (except where they are required by paragraph (2) to be laid in draft and approved by a resolution of the Assembly).’.— [Mrs Long (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 27 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 28 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Speaker: Members, that concludes the Consideration Stage of the Domestic Abuse and Family Proceedings Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

I wish to add a couple of remarks of high commendation to everyone who has participated in the debate so far to take the Bill to where it is at the moment. Today alone we have had 10 and a half hours of debate. The debate has shown, in some cases, some significant differences in how Members want to proceed with elements of the Bill, but, even given those differences, there has been clear unanimity and agreement on the need to do something radical to tackle the ongoing scourge of domestic abuse. I thank all who contributed, even those one or two who perhaps took the scenic route to get to their final destination in the debate. As I said, it is a job well done. I will not do anything other than echo the comments of all the Members this evening.

On that note, you will be glad to hear that the next item in the Order Paper is the Adjournment. In the light of the late hour, Ms Paula Bradshaw has agreed not to speak to her Adjournment topic of post-primary education in South Belfast. I think that the Members would have supported you for a while [Laughter.] The Whips have agreed that the topic can be rescheduled to a future date. The Minister of Education is also content to postpone his response. I think that he is tucked up in bed at this stage [Laughter.]

Adjourned at 2.09 am.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 23 November 2020

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

New Assembly Member: Ms Nicola Brogan

Mr Speaker: I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that Ms Nicola Brogan has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the West Tyrone constituency to fill the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Ms Catherine Kelly. This morning, Ms Brogan signed the Roll of Membership in the presence of myself and the Clerk to the Assembly and entered her designation. Ms Brogan has now taken her seat, and I welcome her to the Assembly and wish her every success.

Speaker's Business

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed, I welcome the fact that we start our business today with two statements from Ministers on decisions taken by the Executive in relation to the current situation. We are obviously aware that these matters inevitably have an impact on the wider community, and all Members will have heard views from a range of perspectives over the weekend. I think that, right across the House, we all recognise that there are very difficult decisions to be made and that, given the variety of the issues involved, there are no easy choices. Therefore, it is very positive and appropriate that we have Ministers in the Chamber to address the issues and to take questions from Members before we move on to any other matters. Thank you.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Over the weekend, it was confirmed that Sinn Féin had emailed thousands of party members and supporters to tell them that the wake for Bobby Storey would be public. That is at odds with what the deputy First Minister told the Committee for the Executive Office on 1 July: "We actively discouraged people". Mr Speaker, I ask you to inform the House about what sanctions the House has on Ministers who mislead a Committee of the Assembly and show a total and blatant disregard for the rules and regulations of the House during the crisis.

Mr Speaker: The Member will be aware that it is not for the Speaker to adjudicate on comments that people have made or are alleged to have made elsewhere. Therefore, it is not appropriate. The issue has been discussed and, no doubt, will be discussed again; in fact, I have previously taken a question for urgent oral answer to the deputy First Minister that was debated in the Chamber, so it is not as if the matter has not been discussed. I have no doubt that, because it is being looked at and dealt with in other places, it will return to the Chamber at a future date. The Member has made his point on the record.

Mr Givan: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. The Justice Minister slipped out on Friday a decision in which she said that she did not have sufficient information to consider Gerry Kelly's grossly offensive tweet. Has the Minister advised the Speaker's Office of whether she has any intention of providing a statement to the Assembly to explain the position that she has taken?

Mr Speaker: I have not received any correspondence on the matter from the Minister of Justice, or from anyone else.

Ministerial Statements

Health: COVID-19 Decisions

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Health that he wishes to make a statement. Before I call the Minister, I remind Members that, in the light of social distancing being observed by parties, the Speaker's ruling that Members must be in the Chamber to hear a statement if they wish to ask a question has been relaxed. Members do still have to make sure that their name is on the speaking list if they wish to be called, but they can do that by rising in their place, as well as by notifying the Business Office or Speaker's Table directly. I remind Members to be concise in asking their question, as long introductions are not necessary or appropriate.

Mr Swann (The Minister of Health): As the House is aware, the Northern Ireland Executive have decided to introduce tighter restrictions to break the chains of infection of COVID-19. The measures were detailed in a written statement to Members that I issued following last Thursday's Executive meeting. They take effect from first thing this Friday morning for two weeks.

In summary, we will in large part revert to the lockdown situation that applied earlier this year during the first surge of the pandemic. The major difference is that schools will remain open. I will set out the rationale for the new restrictions. In summary, they are essential to preventing a further spike in infections overwhelming our hospitals. The onus is now on all of us to follow strictly the public health advice and to comply with the letter and the spirit of the tightened restrictions. We can each play a part in saving lives and preventing avoidable deaths. That is how serious this is and how high the stakes are.

As a society, we can now look forward to 2021 with some optimism, given the progress made towards mass vaccination. I do not want to have to look a grieving relative in the eye next year and say, "Yes, we could've taken action before Christmas and that would have saved your loved one's life". I do not want to have to say, "I am sorry that we did not intervene. I am sorry that they are not here with us to enjoy these better days".

Today, I make a heartfelt plea for unity around the Chamber. The public are watching and looking to us for united leadership. It is, of course, the duty of the Chamber to hold the Executive to account and to scrutinise policy decisions without fear or favour. That is the Assembly's job. There are strong and legitimate opinions, and feelings have run high. That does not mean, however, that we have to descend into party political point-scoring. This is far too important an issue for that. To say that the past few weeks have not seen devolution at its best is something of an understatement. Frustration and anger are widespread. We could spend hours in the Chamber raking over the ashes of the decisions that were made and not made. I have made my views known both inside and outside the Executive. Nevertheless, I fail to see where another bout of division and recrimination would get us now. What good would it do? Whose cause would it serve? We could also spend hours pointing fingers about years of underfunding of Health and Social Care (HSC) and years of underinvesting in staff, but, again, what would that achieve today?

I trust that everyone in the House is united in wanting the new restrictions to work. We have to give our hospitals and our heroic staff some vital breathing space. If we successfully drive down infection rates, we have the opportunity of having a better Christmas. It will not be a normal festive season by any means, but we all have the power to help change the atmosphere. We can do that by abiding by the new restrictions and strictly following public health advice. I urge all Members to promote public health messaging at every opportunity. Please do not undermine it. Please choose your words carefully, both inside and outside the House, today and in the coming days and weeks.

Let us remember that many countries, including near neighbours and, indeed, large swathes of Europe, are currently in lockdown. Those include countries with health services different from ours. We should not kid ourselves that we are so special or so unique that we can avoid taking similarly tough decisions. We cannot simply wish this virus away.

The paper that I presented to the Executive last week made the case for strengthening restrictions in light of the path that the pandemic is taking. With schools open and existing restrictions in place, the R rate had settled at around 1 by last week. That meant that we had reached approximate equilibrium with regard to community transmission of the virus. There has been a sustained reduction in the number of cases per day since the onset of restrictions, but numbers of cases, admissions, hospital inpatients, ICU occupancy and deaths remain at a relatively high level. In particular, hospital inpatients are at a higher level than was reached in wave 1 and have been declining only very slowly. As a consequence, the hospital system and staff remain under serious pressure.

By last week, we were on the verge of permitting a significant relaxation of COVID-19 restrictions. It was highly likely that that would have resulted in the R rate rising significantly above 1, with a subsequent increase in cases, admissions, inpatients and ICU occupancy in December. That increase in transmission would have occurred from a relatively high baseline, meaning that an already serious situation would have rapidly become much worse. Without decisive intervention, the hospital system would have been at risk of being overwhelmed in mid- to late December. To care for the increasing number of critically ill COVID-19 patients, we would have been forced to halt some, or even all, planned activity for other conditions, some of which are urgent in nature. We would be facing the prospect of a significant increase in both COVID-19 and non-COVID-19 deaths. In such circumstances, it is also likely that even a full lockdown, beginning around 14 December, would have been insufficient to prevent the current levels of hospital pressure being significantly exceeded. That is the bleak picture that the Executive were faced with last week, and that is the context for the lengthy and difficult discussions that we had.

I know that Members will ask whether other measures could have been deployed. The reality is that, given our current position and the rates of transmission, there are no feasible alternatives. As I have stated, other countries with different health services from ours have arrived at the same conclusion during the second surge in Europe. There has been considerable interest in the potential of rapid mass testing to reduce the transmission of the virus. However, it is important to recognise that that is largely based on theoretical considerations and that there has been, as yet, no clear demonstration anywhere in the world that mass testing can significantly reduce transmission in a short period against the background of a high level of community transmission. Modelling suggests that repeated mass testing of most of the population would be required to maintain control of transmission by that means. That would mean a very high degree of population buy-in and would present huge logistical challenges. Slovakia and Liverpool required military logistical support to deliver their programmes and at least a two-week run-in period before the testing was implemented. It remains unclear whether the required number of tests would be available to us in Northern Ireland. However, I have written and spoken to the Secretary of State for Health, Matt Hancock, to request four million rapid lateral flow device tests for Northern Ireland.

I want to see us playing a pivotal role in the UK pilot on mass testing. My ambition is evident. At the same time, it needs to be remembered that we are still at the stage of pilot programmes. They will help us to assess the effectiveness and accuracy of rapid testing technologies. Reliance on mass testing alone would represent a high-risk approach in the run-up to Christmas. It may not be viable for logistical or test-supply reasons. However, there may be scope to target more limited mass testing to high-risk areas. That would be of help, but, again, it would not avoid the need for Northern Ireland-wide restrictions at this time. Mass testing is an exciting development, and, together with a vaccine, it offers great hope for a way out of our nightmare. However, it is not a panacea; certainly not at this time, and certainly not without restrictions in place before Christmas.

Enhancing hospital capacity is also cited in some quarters as the answer. In theory, measures to increase hospital capacity would allow an increased epidemic level to be managed without a further lockdown. However, that would inevitably be associated with increased deaths and might be limited by the need of staff to self-isolate, as a consequence of healthcare-related outbreaks in hospitals, or clusters and outbreaks in the community. It is also the case that the associated levels of community transmission would inevitably result in a further significant increase in outbreaks in care homes, among extremely vulnerable older people, as was experienced in the first wave, which would result in excess deaths in that population.

12.15 pm

For practical purposes, it is simply not possible to increase hospital capacity in the short to medium term. The key factor here is the supply of staff and, given the specialist skill set required, there is a long lead-in time for this. While some marginal gains in capacity can be made in specific areas such as ICU, they come at the cost of reduced capacity elsewhere in the system and involve the redeployment of existing staff. In addition, when doubling times of cases are in the region of seven to 10 days, even a doubling of hospital capacity, were it achievable, would buy only a limited period of relief before intervention was required.

It is, of course, important to give people hope as we face into this most difficult of winters. There are real grounds for optimism, given the progress on vaccines, the development of rapid mass testing and improvements in treatments.

I need to be candid with the public. I will not offer false hope or pretend that there are shortcuts available to get us through these next few months. We all have to hunker down and play our part in abiding by restrictions, staying at home, working at home when possible, cutting our contacts, keeping our distance, wearing a face covering and washing our hands. We can do that. We must do that.

The restrictions that start on Friday will make a difference. We all have to play our part in making them work, by our words and deeds, and that includes everyone in the Chamber. The Executive must now put the last few weeks behind them. These are extremely difficult decisions. Governments around the world are grappling with the same awful dilemmas, but we need a collective spirit and a unified purpose, not just in the Chamber but across society.

Everyone across Northern Ireland must do their bit. We can help change the course of this pandemic. We can help save lives. Hope is on the horizon, and a happier new year stands before us. Let us do all we can to make sure that as many of us as possible get to enjoy much better times in 2021.

Mr Gildernew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle agus gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for his statement, and for discussing it with me and the Deputy Chair of the Committee this morning. I also thank him for acknowledging the efforts that staff are making at present in dealing with the pandemic. When did the Minister first bring these restrictions, closing non-essential retail and hospitality, to the Executive?

Mr Swann: A paper was presented to the Executive for the meeting on Thursday. It was circulated two days or a day before, as is normal practice —. Sorry; I apologise to the Chair. It was circulated to members of the Executive the night before, when the paper was finalised. The Executive met the following morning.

I am led to believe that the BBC had the paper before the Executive had the opportunity to discuss it. I want to make this point. One of the challenges to decision-making in the five-party Executive is enhanced and amplified by the running commentary that comes from the Executive to multiple strains of the media. We should be making those challenging, difficult decisions within a space closed for discussion. However, papers are transcribed and transmitted, often through social media, before our conversation has finished. Whoever it is and whatever avenue is providing that information out of the Executive, it is not helping the cause that we are trying to achieve in coming to a united purpose.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for the statement to the House this morning. We certainly do not underestimate the job of work that the Executive have to do in making these very difficult decisions.

For practical purposes, it is simply not possible to increase hospital capacity in the short to medium term. The key factor in that is the supply of staff, as we know. Given the special skill set required, there is a very long lead-in time for that. What is the lead-in time for the training of staff? Was the eight months, between the first wave and now, not long enough to increase staff numbers? Has the workforce appeal not achieved the supply of additional key staff members who will be required to help during this next wave?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her point. When we talk about the wave, the timeline often gets confused. It is nine months since the first. The first case of COVID in Northern Ireland was in February, so it is nine months since that case. We have been through a wave; we have been through the first pandemic, which lasted for months. We saw a return to a glimmer of normality only in July or August, when our staff were already overwhelmed, over-exhausted and at a point where they needed a break. To train an ICU nurse, an anaesthetist, a doctor or anyone in the short space of a few months is not practical or possible. I am sure that many of the colleges that register professionals will make that same point.

The workforce appeal was launched again in the approach to the second phase of the pandemic. The appeal has been a more targeted approach to the skill sets that we need. As of last week, we had received 3,157 applications, and 516 of those are tentative job-ready offered or actually appointed. Over 600 applications have been rejected as they do not meet the skill set or are not applicable for the position. There is a balance in the workforce appeal working. It is not possible to get an increase in the highly professional skills that we need — that is the ICU nurse, the anaesthetist and the respiratory ward professionals — in that time. We see that across all jurisdictions. In parts of England and Wales, the Nightingale facilities cannot be opened because they do not have the skilled workforce. They have the premises, but they do not have the staff.

As I said earlier — I have said it many times — when this place came back on 11 January, one of the collective achievements was the agreement to invest in our health workforce. The Executive put in an additional 300 nursing training places per year, over the next three years. However, it takes a number of years for them to come through that basic training, never mind getting the enhanced skill set that is needed to operate in our ICUs, with anaesthetists and the additional workforce there. Our workforce really is stepping up at this time, and it is incumbent on us to give it as much support as we possibly can.

Mr McGrath: I welcome the cohesive tone of today's statement. I hope that all Executive Ministers can pick up on that tone and use it. Last week was an embarrassment to us all and was not of our making as MLAs. To have faith in the message, we must have faith in the messengers.

What avenue is the Department taking to explore how to better detail the public message? Families are really concerned about Christmas. They want to know exactly what they can and cannot do, and they need to know that soon. Does the Minister have a sense of how that message will be detailed to the public?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. One of the messages comes from Christmas, and it is not simply about family gatherings; it is about hope, faith and belief. That is the message that we need to portray for this Christmas. How do we do that collectively?

I was involved in a meeting on Saturday with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, our First Minister and deputy First Minister, the First Minister of Scotland, the First Minister of Wales and a number of Chief Medical Officers on how we get what we do at Christmas the same across these islands. I am glad that there has been an ongoing conversation between Her Majesty's Government in London and the Irish Government to make sure that we come to a collective message across these islands to ensure that families get as much continuity of messaging as possible, especially at that time. For Christmas, we should take not only a message of hope and encouragement but a message of faith and trust. We need to instil that message, and our Executive and our Assembly need to put that message out with a unified voice for our people. Although times are tough and will be tough over the next couple of weeks, with everything that is coming, a new dawn is coming, and it will come sooner if we can all work together.

Mr Chambers: I came across something on social media that caught my eye. It came from a doctor in the United States of America:

"We are the healthcare workers, are not your frontliners any longer. We are your LAST LINE OF DEFENCE.

YOU, my fellow people, are the frontliners now.

The war has shifted ... to the community and it is up to you. This cannot be won in the confines of the hospital."

Does the Minister agree that those are wise words that we all need to pay heed to and reflect in all our actions and, indeed, our words, especially those of us who serve in the House?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his comment. I do not spend much time on social media at present, but that is an accurate message. We fight the virus now in our streets, in our shops and in our homes, where transmissions have taken place. As Health Minister, the ask that I make on behalf of our health service is the same as the ask that that doctor makes. If we encourage the people of Northern Ireland to come together and work together to break the chains of infection by following the messages that we have consistently put out of social distancing, good hand hygiene, good respiratory hygiene, wearing a face covering and reducing the number of contacts as much as possible, we can break the chains of infection that lead to hospital and ICU admissions. The message that that healthcare worker put out may have come from America, but I am sure that it will be echoed and replicated by any healthcare worker in any facility that is combating COVID-19.

Ms Bradshaw: From today, weekly testing of domiciliary care workers will begin in England. Is the Minister minded to replicate that in Northern Ireland?

Mr Swann: As capacity increases with the mass-testing programme, we are considering that.

Mr Buckley: Please be assured that this question is not political but is, indeed, personal, as it is, I am sure, for many Members. The Minister's statement says:

"I do not want to have to look a grieving relative in the eye next year and say, 'Yes, we could've taken action before Christmas that would have saved your loved one's life'."

Sadly, I found myself doing that this week not in relation to COVID but in relation to cancer. A GP from north Antrim wrote to me on Saturday saying:

"In our bid to manage COVID, we have unleashed a tsunami of other medical problems into what is already a crippled service. It is now broken, and I don't see how that can change as we tell our patients with potential cancer, 'I am sorry, it will be six months before you can see a consultant for diagnosis and treatment'. It gets to be a harder job every day."

What grieves me most is what has been missed during the lockdown period. The register for general quarterly statistics shows that cancer deaths to date are 3,490. Minister, can you update the House on the establishment of a regional cancer reset cell to oversee the resumption of cancer services to give patients some certainty in the days ahead?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his question, and I know that it is in no way political. I received the same email. I am sure that the Member is well aware that I receive many emails from our healthcare professionals, from families and from individuals who find themselves in exactly the same situation.

12.30 pm

While we are expanding and expending our health service resource on combating COVID, the challenges come in meeting the needs of non-COVID patients. That is why we published our surge plans and rebuilding plans and why we announced the cancer reset cell, which the Member rightly referred to, and discussed how that could approach how we deliver cancer services on a regional rather than simply a by-trust basis.

The work of that cell is ongoing on how we can bring together the operations, diagnostics and care pathways that were operating across trusts almost as silos. Although that is not the correct term, they were operating on a trust basis rather than across the whole of Northern Ireland. I will certainly be able to provide, which I look forward to, an update on the specifics of the outworkings of that cancer reset cell once I receive them. I do not have them with me today, but I will get them for the Member and will update the rest of the House on how that work is progressing.

It is crucial that we allow our healthcare staff to look after the patients of Northern Ireland and provide the care that they need. We can do that by ensuring that the staff do not have to look after more COVID patients and by following and abiding by the regulations that are coming forward from this Friday so that we can break those rates of transmission and many of our healthcare professionals can get back to work on their specialities and the areas of expertise that they trained for and we can provide the best healthcare system that we can.

The Member referred to the email that he received that talked about a crippled service. I do not disagree with it. Our health service has been under stress and strain for many years, but we have a number of things in place that will see it rebuild and rebuild better and not go back to the way it was. It would be a detriment if we allowed our health service simply to go back to where it was. That is why I welcomed, when we came back in January, the Executive's commitment that our health service would be a priority, as would not only the people who need it but the people who work in it.

Ms Flynn: Go raibh maith agat to the Minister for today's statement. My question is similar to another Member's. The statement mentions the request that has been put in for four million rapid-testing devices. Will the Minister detail a bit more how the Department plans to roll those out? Are you thinking more about population-wide testing or about trying to target more high-risk groups like the care homes and meat plants etc?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her question. The four million testing devices would allow us to do the entirety of the population. That would be a massive logistical challenge. This morning, I attended Queens University Belfast, which is running one of our first mass-testing initiatives. It has already been set up in the Whitla Hall. Its intention is to be able to do 6,000 tests per day by the end of the week, which is highly ambitious. That will allow us to work out what that will actually look like and how mass testing will deliver what we want it to. We have been involved at a departmental level in what has been happening in Liverpool and in the outworkings of that, where the wider mass testing of the population maybe is not just bringing forward the results that many would hope for.

In regard to the Member's question of whether we will be or are looking at more targeted interventions in mass testing, I will say that we are trying that initiative in one of our trusts and in care homes. We are putting those testing devices, while they are still limited in number and still new, to the best use and best purpose in order to identify those who are asymptomatic and those who are testing for COVID so that we can get the best support in place.

What I saw in Queen's this morning on that collaborative piece on mass testing was impressive in how it interacted with our test, trace and protect system so that a test positive case there, which can come forward in a matter of hours, was already being contacted by the test, trace and protect system to make sure that it is fully locked in to the entirety of our support programme.

Mr T Buchanan: On the basis of the modelling that the health service uses, the restrictions in place over the past four weeks have not worked. The R factor has increased; not dropped to the level that was expected. What plans has the Minister in place should the R factor still sit at 0.8 or 0.9 at the end of the two-week lockdown that is being brought in? What plans does he have in place to ensure that there will be no further extension of the lockdown and that our businesses, and especially our churches, will be allowed to open? The closure of our churches is a retrograde step.

Mr Swann: The Member makes the point about our four-week intervention not having completely the desired effect that we thought it would have. We saw a decrease in the first two or two and a half weeks, when schools were closed, but, unfortunately, when schools reopened, we saw that rate start to go back up. The Executive policy, as stated in a meeting in May, was to keep the R rate at or below 1, which means a continual decrease in the number of positive cases in Northern Ireland. The deciding factor for the Executive on Thursday was the number of hospital admissions. The severity and depth of the two-week intervention that we are bringing in on 27 November, which will take us through to December, should get us to a point at which the rates of transmission are being driven down and allowing our hospitals breathing space to enable them to discharge a number of the COVID patients who are already there.

As my statement referred to, the next steps are the forthcoming initiatives. The initiatives relating to mass testing are at an advanced stage. This morning, there was an announcement of another vaccine. That will be three vaccines approaching a level of effectiveness of between 70% and 90%. It is about such stages as those and asking the public to re-engage with us when these restrictions end on 11 December. They are time-limited to that date because of their severity. I thank my Executive colleagues for supporting the asks that were made, because they are dramatic and will have an effect on the public of Northern Ireland and our businesses.

Mr Speaker, you referred to an Executive announcement on support packages that will follow this statement. I look forward to that. I left the Executive meeting to come here. I hope that the support packages are as beneficial to the people and businesses of Northern Ireland as the BBC seems already to know they are.

Mr Sheehan: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an ráiteas seo ar maidin. I thank the Minister for his statement. The new restrictions are absolutely necessary. It is a pity that they were not implemented a bit sooner, but we are where we are. It is important that those who need financial support during these restrictions, receive it, and receive it quickly. In October, there was an announcement that £27 million would be made available to care homes for the care partnership arrangements. Will the Minister confirm that none of that funding has yet made its way to care homes?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his question. I announced a new £27 million funding package for the care home sector. The funding was also to support care homes to continue paying staff at 80% of their salary when on sick leave for COVID-19-related reasons. That measure was first announced in June and then extended to the end of the 2021 financial year. The £27 million funding package is in addition to previously announced support packages, and it includes financial support for testing and visiting, to recognise some of the additional management time that is needed to respond to COVID-19. It is widely accepted that a fine balance had to be achieved on care home visiting. I am conscious of the extreme pressures on homes, but I do not want to see their doors totally closed to visits. I was hopeful that the new funding package would facilitate those visits, to the immense benefit of residents and their families.

The way that the funding package works is that expenditure can be claimed back by homes on a number of grounds, which include support for additional staffing because, for instance, there were more acutely unwell residents or there was a need to support individuals who were self-isolating, and also for block-booking of agency staff and continued enhanced cleaning support for changes to the physical environment, and that was to include the support for safe visiting. Trusts were provided with funds to administer applications to this fund in a regionally coordinated and consistent way. Work will be ongoing with the sector to ensure that there is clear guidance on what can be claimed and a streamlined and efficient process for administering the applications. It is about those care homes making claims to the trusts for expenditure that they have incurred, rather than an upfront payment.

Mr McNulty: Thank you for your statement, Minister. I am really worried about the mental health implications of the restrictions for churchgoing congregations, publicans, business owners and their families. That said, Minister, what is the impact of the constant sniping from the sidelines by other Ministers and other parties about the decisions made in the House? It is very easy for us all to say that we are going to have a unified, positive message coming from the House. How difficult is that for the business owners who are on their knees and need help? It is easy for us up here; to quote another elected representative, we are all "well-heeled". How important is it that the grants are forthcoming quickly from the Department for the Economy and the Department of Finance to encourage adherence to the guidelines and restrictions?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his statement. Look, unity, and unity of message, is important. We are united in having one enemy, and that is COVID-19. I have been consistent in my messaging and my position since I took up the role of Health Minister in this pandemic. Have there been opportunities where I could have scored political points? There have been many. Have I taken them? No, because I do not believe that that is how I, in this position, am best served in supporting the people of Northern Ireland who need healthcare, and in supporting our healthcare workers as well. I will say to the Member to be careful that he does not get drawn into the trap of others and criticise their political messaging and sniping by sending political messages and engaging in political sniping. It is too easy; it is far too easy. The difficult messages are the ones that we have repeated consistently about how we combat this virus: good social distancing, good hand hygiene, good respiratory hygiene, wearing face coverings and reducing the number of contacts that you have in a day and in a week. With regard to the financial support mechanisms for not just businesses but individuals, as the Speaker indicated, the Finance Minister will be making another statement to the House, and I will support him in that.

Mr Beggs: Restrictions are put in place not only to help save lives but to protect non-COVID activity within the NHS. Minister, can you confirm that, as a result of the surge plan, non-COVID elected surgery has continued at a much higher level than previously, and that the public can play their part in ensuring that our Ambulance Service and accident and emergency units do not become overwhelmed so that, irrespective of what someone is suffering from, they can receive treatment from our hospital services?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. There was a question for urgent oral answer specifically on surge planning last week, when I addressed some of the misconceptions about the detail of work that has already been done by not just my Department but all six of our trusts, including our Ambulance Service. The point that the Member makes is the main one: while our hospital and care system is supporting COVID patients, those are beds, support mechanisms, specialists, specialities and skill sets that are being taken from elsewhere. To give the Member an indication of where we are with the work that our surge plans have done, I will compare where we were in October, as the last verified numbers, to where we were in April.

Under the three main headings of new outpatient activity, review outpatient activity and inpatient procedures and day-care activity, we conducted in the region of 57,000 procedures in April 2020. In October 2020, when we still had an increased number of COVID patients and increased support for them, the figure had gone up to 98,500. That is nearly 40% higher in those areas of expertise, while we were still looking after a high number of COVID patients, because of the work that was put in place by the Department, by the trusts and by individual care pathways to support their own patients while dealing with an increase in COVID patients.

12.45 pm

Mr Humphrey: The Minister is right: there are difficult decisions that all Ministers have to take on this hugely serious issue.

Apart from worship and prayer, many people attend church for solace and comfort. There is real anger and anxiety at the decision to close churches. Why was the decision taken to close churches despite steps taken by churches across Northern Ireland to purchase PPE and other equipment? What evidence was given for the closure?

Mr Swann: As the Member will be fully aware, there are decisions that I do not take easily or lightly as Minister. In response to his specific question, we saw, through contact tracing, outbreaks and incidents that related specifically to churches. What was very clear in what our Chief Scientific Adviser and the Chief Medical Officer put forward was the data provided to our test, trace and protect system by those who had contracted COVID on where they had been. Those who attend church were more open and up front about where they had been. It was pointed out that there were a number of incidents involving churches.

I have had the conversation with the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser, and I am still supportive of reopening places of worship for acts of private worship, provided that social distancing and hard surface hygiene guidance is followed and face coverings are used. It is important at this time that people be given the opportunity to pray in private if that is their wish. The power of prayer is that it does not matter where it is done; it is the act itself and the belief in doing it that matter.

Ms Kimmins: I thank the Minister for his statement. The role of carers in our society was widely recognised and acknowledged pre-COVID and has been further emphasised throughout the pandemic. The restrictions have had an even bigger impact on support networks for carers, both on a statutory level and in their informal settings. That said, we have seen money provided for care homes and domiciliary care, as Members have mentioned. On the basis of that and the increased role that they have played throughout the pandemic, is the Minister considering a one-off grant payment for unpaid and informal carers?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her question. The role of our carers has been highlighted many times in the House, not least by Ms Armstrong, who has been an advocate for carers, as have many other Members.

The advice document that was specifically developed for carers and young carers was first published on 10 April. Additional funding of £500,000 was provided to trusts via the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) to allow for direct payment flexibility to be introduced, and that option is still there. We have not yet put in a bid for additional payments for carers or the support networks that have been asked for, but I am aware that the Minister for Communities has made specific bids for funding with regard to what the Minister of Finance may announce after this statement — I do not want to pre-empt anything — that would provide additional financial support for those in receipt of some benefits.

Ms Armstrong: It will not come as a surprise to the Health Minister when I ask him more about carers. I thank the previous Member for asking that question; I was going to ask it. Minister, I will say this to you clearly: carers across Northern Ireland, whether they receive extra payment or not, are exhausted, and I ask — plead with — you to go back to your trusts and ask them what supports will be made available over Christmas for carers, before we end up putting more pressure and more challenges on the health service due to the breakdown of older carers, most of whom are women. They are at breaking point. That is not an exaggeration. I have had people in tears who cannot cope any more; they are working 24/7 and are exhausted. Can you, please, confirm that something will be done with the trusts to make sure that there is equitable provision across Northern Ireland to support our carers in the run-up to and over Christmas?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. I know the passion and personal experience that she brings to this. I am fully aware of the challenges that our service users, carers and families face throughout the pandemic, and the Member has raised with me specifically the impact of the closure of day centres. She talks about equality across the region. Day-care centres provide valuable opportunities for people to reach their full potential, but they also provide respite for those with caring responsibilities. In July, the trusts restarted that day-care centre provision in line with the public health guidelines. However, the Member will be aware that there are significant barriers to restoring full-time provision because ensuring the safety of service users, families and carers is also paramount.

I appreciate the frustration felt in the House, by service users, by parents and by carers that day-centre provision is not yet available at the level at which it was accessible pre COVID to bring about that respite. My officials are working closely with the Health and Social Care Board and the trusts to identify ways to increase day-centre provision. In the interim, however, services are continually monitored and assessed so that service uptake is checked and the unfilled spaces are reallocated, where possible, as quickly as possible. Aligned to that process, trusts have been working with families and community colleagues to scope out additional and alternative supports, should that be from direct payments and domiciliary and the respite options. However, as I am sure the Member will appreciate, we can progress to full service in day centres only when it is safe to do so.

Mr Givan: First, let me register an interest with family members who work in the National Health Service, and I pay tribute to those in the health service for the work that they are doing.

We all share the same objective of minimising the number of deaths, but there is a difference of opinion on how best we can do that. On the evening that the Executive announced further restrictions, a friend of mine who is responsible for hundreds of members of staff rang me to say that a vulnerable person in their employment who, they knew, was, because of isolation at home, vulnerable — they were putting in measures to assist — had taken her own life. They put that down to the lockdown measures. We all want to minimise deaths.

In reaching decisions on restricting people's movement and seeking to contain where they can go and what they can do, what analysis are the Executive and the Health Department, which leads the Executive on these policy decisions, doing of the behaviour of the public and how they respond? We all saw the scenes over the weekend of the queues outside multiple retailers across Northern Ireland and the spike in that contact as a result of the decision that was taken.

The decision that was taken on churches is putting people of faith into an impossible position where they are conflicted with their allegiance to an authority higher than civil authority. Is the Minister saying that he will continue to enforce lockdown and allow only solitary prayer as opposed to public acts of worship? My church, for instance, can easily accommodate —

Mr Speaker: Question, please.

Mr Givan: — over 100 people with proper social distancing, and churches take that responsibility seriously. Is he saying that he will continue to recommend that those churches —

Mr Speaker: The Member needs to conclude.

Mr Givan: — have to stay closed?

Mr Swann: On the Member's last point and given the Executive's interaction, through the junior Ministers, with the leaders of the Churches, I think that they all recognise the responsibility that they have and the challenges that they have in following the advice and guidance on how we manage COVID. As the Member will know, they are not easy decisions for me or for the Member's colleagues in the Executive, where the conversations were had. It is not about restricting anyone's freedom to worship or pray, and I am disappointed that the Member would even try to put that allegation to me because it is not in keeping with me.

With regard to the analysis of behaviours, one thing that is increasingly challenging for my Department and the Executive is that there are those who seem intent on undermining our health message by their words or actions. Once you see that happening, it makes it harder for any individual to follow that advice and guidance in good faith. However, I welcome the statements from our Churches and religious leaders on the difficult decisions that have been made by the Executive as we once again try to bring the spread of COVID-19 under control.

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member to speak, I remind Members to keep your remarks very brief please and get to your question. We have a number of Members who wish to ask questions.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for his statement. Just briefly, I ask the Minister and Members of the House to join me in offering our condolences to the family of Bredge and Owen Ward, the husband and wife who died 12 hours apart last Wednesday as a result of the virus. It is completely devastating and a painful loss for the family and the entire community.

In relation to the restrictions in place, there is huge concern among the teaching profession and parents about schools remaining open. Given the spread of the virus and the need to take every possible step to prevent its spread now, in the month of Christmas, what conversations has the Minister had with the Minister of Education on the early closure of schools to ensure that we can enter the Christmas period as safely as possible and to ensure that teachers have a period of isolation prior to meeting with their loved ones, if possible?

Mr Swann: We have all heard some of the heartbreaking stories about those who have lost their life due to COVID, and there are many other stories that we have not heard or seen that are equally tragic and hurtful to many a family who will have an empty chair or chairs around the table this Christmas. I pass on my condolences to all families who have lost loved ones. I have said before that the hardest reports that I have read and continue to read are the daily reports that give us the number of positive cases and deaths. Behind each of those numbers is an individual with a family.

An assessment has been made and a conversation has been had in the Executive on the importance of education and continuing our young people's education as much as it is practicable and safe to do so. One of the conversations has been around early intervention and bringing forward the school holidays by a week. One of the points that have been made and been listened to is that, when schools are closed, if there is no adequate provision for young people to interact, they could end up being in a worse situation when it comes to the spread of COVID than they would be in their places of education.

During the four weeks that we had, the only difference that we saw between the first two weeks and the second two weeks was the opening of schools, and I think that the Chief Scientific Adviser indicated that, where we saw the R rate increase, it was not solely attributable to what happened in classrooms but was associated with schools. That was part of our messaging. It was not just about the activities in the classroom or in the school building; it was about what happened at the school gate, what happened when transporting pupils to schools and what parents were doing when their children were in school.

There is an ongoing conversation. One of the decisions that the Executive have made is to prioritise young people's education. More non-pharmaceutical interventions have been suggested as means to allow education to continue in a safe and practical manner. My Department engages regularly with the Department of Education to bring forward and discuss those suggestions.

1.00 pm

Mr Butler: I thank the Minister for his answers. Whilst it is, by no means, the only solution, advances in testing will play an important role in restricting the transmission of the virus. Can the Minister provide an update on Northern Ireland's participation in pilots of the new lateral flow tests?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member. I touched on the issue earlier. I attended what is the first initiative in Northern Ireland, which is being rolled out by Queen's University. It will see its students and staff tested using the new devices. That is part of the programme of travel corridors that will allow students to return home for Christmas. While mass testing may be part of a solution, it is not the solution, nor should it be seen to be. A lot of work is ongoing. We have considered mass testing of the population, but we have to make sure that it is an appropriate use of those lateral flow devices when we receive them and with regard to the number that we receive. However, it is part of the armoury that we are now building up that will make 2021 a safer place.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his statement. I do not envy him his task. In his statement, he said that it is important to give people hope. What hope can the Minister and Executive give to the person who has recently received a devastating cancer diagnosis and been told by their cancer nurse, who had tears in her eyes, that no date could be given for any of their treatment to commence?

Mr Swann: The message that I give is one of apology to that individual and many others across the community who cannot engage with the services that they need because we are supporting patients who are coming forward with COVID and need to be hospitalised due to clinical decisions and interventions. The challenge — it is not one of a message of hope, because that message would bring little comfort — to us all is to drive down the rate of infection and to break the chains of transmission, so that we can successfully reduce the number of COVID inpatients in the hospital system and people like the person whom the Member mentioned can be brought forward to see the specialists they need to see as quickly as possible.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his statement and commend him on his efforts. Over the past few days, I have been inundated with concerns about the closure of gyms. The Minister will be well aware of the positive, essential role that exercise plays in the preservation and promotion of physical and, even more so, mental health. Can the Minister explain to the House and those anxious people the scientific rationale for the recommendation to close gyms, which have gone above and beyond to ensure that their premises and practices are sanitised and safe?

Mr Swann: Again, I acknowledge the benefits that gyms provide. However — this is similar to a previous answer — through the test, trace and protect system, we saw outbreaks that were associated with gyms. That is why we took that decision and made the recommendation that gyms, too, close for the two-week period. I must stress to Members that it is for a two-week period while we reinforce that key, simple message to stay at home. That is the rationale that was taken. There is little point in a gym being open if the key message is to stay at home. There is still the availability of outdoor exercise that any individual can participate in. When it comes to what we could see through the test, trace and protect system, gyms were indicated as a source of infection. The steps that had been taken are commendable and had broken many a chain of infection, but we were still seeing a number of cases coming through.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for coming to the House today. I also thank all those working in the NHS in dealing with the health of our population. As we know, not all heroes wear capes. There was mention of the opportunity for a better Christmas, yet, over the weekend, we heard from Professor Gabriel Scally, a public health expert at the University of Bristol, who said, on the Prime Minister's proposals, that there was no point in having a merry Christmas only to bury friends and relations in January and February. There seems to be some disconnect. When will details on Christmas be issued to the public? Will the Minister support the establishment of an expert task force to increase transparency and to take the politics out of decision-making on COVID-19?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her two questions. The messaging on Christmas is being discussed with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the First Minister and deputy First Minister, the First Minister of Scotland and the First Minister of Wales to ensure that there is a consistent approach. That conversation also involves the Chief Medical Officers to make sure that there is not a higher price to pay for what we do at Christmas. I look forward to that work concluding and a joint message coming forward. The Government of the Republic of Ireland are also included in that to ensure that there is consistency across these islands for all families.

The Member asked about bringing forward an independent task force to take over in order to take the politics out of decision-making. I know that many individuals are stepping forward to volunteer for that. However, I have always found that, when it comes to such positions, those who volunteer may not be the best people for the job, because they come with preconceived ideas that may not be of benefit. When such people were brought into either the health service, the Health and Social Care Board or the trusts, some of their ideas were not practicable or workable.

Mr Allister: Last week, the Executive Office came to the House to make a statement; this week, the Health Minister has been sent. Is that because the Executive Office wants to keep its distance from the unpopular U-turns and the effect on business?

Can the Health Minister reconcile for me the return to lockdown with the fact that, from looking at the dashboard this morning, it is demonstrably clear that the number of COVID-positive tests is now half what it was six weeks ago, yet we are heading back into lockdown?

As for the Churches, did he even consult them? Does he understand — I am sure that he does — the hurt that has been caused? Will he publish the evidence so that they, too, can know why they are having to close, given that they tried so hard to do all that was asked of them?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his three questions. In regard to the First Minister and deputy First Minister not wanting to be here in case they were tagged with an unpopular decision, one of the things that have become clear since I took up post is that it is not about trying to be popular; it is about trying to do what, I believe, is right not just for the people of Northern Ireland but for our healthcare workers.

The Member rightly indicates the fall in the number of positive cases. However, I encourage him to look on through the dashboard to the number of COVID-19 inpatients who are in our hospitals, and he will see that, since 9 November, that number has not fallen below 400. While that may sound like simply a number, to put it into perspective, I ask the Member to picture in the back of his mind an eight-bed ward, which, I am sure, he will be familiar with from visiting many friends and family in hospital, and then picture 50 such wards solely supporting COVID inpatients. That demonstrates the challenges that our health service faces in supporting not just COVID patients but all other patients.

With regard to the decision on churches, as the Member rightly indicated, it is not one that I recommended or brought forward easily. The Executive, the junior Ministers, the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser engaged with Church leaders after the decision was made about what is necessary and why it is necessary. As I indicated, the Church leaders have made statements. I would not say that they are fully supportive of the decision taken and the challenges that that brings, but they recognise that it was done in order to break the chains of infection.

Mr Carroll: The Minister's statement indicated that mass testing will not be a magic bullet in the crisis as long as community transmission rises. I suppose that is true, but it is important to have a system of mass testing. Does the Minister therefore agree that, until now, the Executive have utterly failed to implement adequate testing and an adequate track-and-trace system when our R rate decreased? Have any lessons been learned as we peer into a two-week circuit breaker?

Mr Swann: My answer to the Member's main question is no, because we made advances in our testing capability and in the ability of test, trace and protect. As for lessons learned, we have instigated a backward tracing programme in which our test, trace and protect individuals are now asked where they have been for the past seven days. That is an enhancement. We have also made technological advances with test, trace and protect so that those who test positive can interact by a text message or online and additional advice can be provided. Steps were taken during July and August to make sure that those systems were more robust.

With regard to the testing regime, by using pillar 1, pillar 2 and now mass testing through the lateral flow, we have an increased capacity that is meeting our current need.

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions on the statement. Could Members please take their ease for a moment or two?

Finance: 2020-21 November COVID-19 Funding

Mr Murphy (The Minister of Finance): I wish to provide Members with an update on the further allocations of COVID-19 support funding for the financial year 2020-21. I offer an apology for the statement being slightly late going into Members' pigeonholes, but, as Members will know, the Executive met this morning and ran on beyond 12.00 noon.

The COVID crisis has created a highly uncertain financial context. We have not known what course the virus would take or what the health experts would recommend in response to the virus, and we have not known how much money we would receive from the Treasury. That uncertainty has made financial planning difficult. The background to the allocations that I am announcing reflects that financial reality. Just over two weeks ago, Treasury provided a further £400 million to the Executive to support our response to COVID-19. I requested urgent proposals from Executive colleagues to use the funding to support businesses, public services and vulnerable people.

Some Members have asked why that funding was not disbursed immediately. Had we, as an Executive, allocated it immediately, we would not have been able to take into account the new restrictions agreed by the Executive last week. It was my view that it was right to have a plan in place to take us to the new year before making the allocations.

It has been argued that the financial package that I am announcing today should have been made at the same time as the new restrictions were agreed last Thursday. The first indication that I had of the restrictions being proposed was that Thursday morning. The proposed restrictions were discussed by the Executive throughout the day and agreed on Thursday night. It was only at that point that a financial package could be finalised, and my officials and officials in other Departments worked over the weekend to put it in place.

COVID is, first and foremost, a global health crisis. However, it has created a global economic crisis, and extensive support to businesses and workers has been provided to protect people's livelihoods. The extension of the current restrictions means that there is a requirement to extend the current support measures. An additional £55 million is being allocated to extend the localised restrictions support scheme operated by my Department. That will be expanded to include the non-essential retail, leisure and entertainment businesses that are required to close for two weeks. The Department for the Economy's COVID restrictions business support schemes will also be extended.

1.15 pm

I understand the frustrations of businesses at the speed at which payments are being made. It is important to understand that schemes that would usually be designed and implemented over many months are being turned around in days. Many Departments have repurposed themselves to provide grant support. Land and Property Services (LPS), for example, which is in my Department, is a rates collection agency. It has transformed itself into a grant-making agency and taken on new powers to do so. Similarly, the Department for Communities has stepped up to deliver a scheme for social enterprise and charities. The Department for Infrastructure has done likewise for taxi drivers. Designating a Department, devising a scheme, checking applications and issuing payments takes time, and we have a duty to minimise fraud and error. The grants are taking longer to issue than I had hoped, but officials are working as fast as they can to process payments.

Today, the Executive have agreed to provide a further £213 million of business support. The Executive provided a full year's rates holiday to the sectors worst affected by the pandemic: retail, hospitality, tourism, leisure, childcare and airports. I appreciate that those sectors will continue to suffer stress into the next financial year. I fully understand this, and my Department is considering options for how best to deliver further rates relief. Therefore, today, I am setting aside £150 million for that purpose while the work is completed as a matter of urgency.

A £95 million high street voucher scheme will give people a prepaid card for use on the high street, which has been devastated by COVID. The Department for the Economy is finalising the details of the scheme. Twenty million pounds has been provided for company directors, a group excluded from previous support. Twenty million pounds has been allocated to extend this financial year's 12-month rates holiday to manufacturing businesses. That will bring the sector into line with what has already been offered to hospitality, tourism, leisure and retail. An allocation of £10.6 million has been made to what are known as "wet pubs". That will support approximately 1,000 licensed premises that are experiencing additional financial hardship as a result of the health protection regulations. Five million pounds will top up the tourism and hospitality scheme, reflecting the extraordinary costs for some businesses that have been forced to close. There is £4.1 million for bed and breakfasts, which is aimed at approximately 953 certified accommodation businesses that were excluded from previous support because they paid domestic rates rather than business rates. There is £3 million for the extension of digital selling capability grants to help local businesses to grow their online sales. The allocations are in addition to the £60 million previously provided by the Department for the Economy-led COVID restrictions business support scheme.

The Department for Communities has been allocated £71.5 million, £44.3 million of which will enable a one-off heating payment of £200 to disabled people on higher rate allowances and older people in receipt of pension credit. That recognises the additional cost imposed on those vulnerable groups by the COVID-19 pandemic. It also includes a further £10 million each in support for councils and sport, £2.25 million for social enterprise support, which will allow the oversubscription to the social enterprise fund to be funded, and £5 million in respect of charitable grants, which will ensure that no charities are left unsupported for the remainder of this financial year.

The Department of Education has been allocated £20.6 million for COVID response measures and £5.8 million for COVID Education Restart measures. That includes vital funding to ensure that the families of young people who are entitled to free school meals will receive food grants during school holidays.

From the £10 million set aside for support for airports, the Department for Infrastructure has been allocated £1.2 million to provide further support to the City of Derry Airport. The Department has also been allocated £26.3 million in relation to lost income across it and its arm's-length bodies.

Today's allocations total £338.1 million. An additional £150 million has been set aside for the consideration of longer-term rate support, and a further £26.6 million is being held in reserve. Previously centrally held allocations, including £6 million for taxis, buses and coaches, £8.8 million for airports and £60 million for Department for the Economy-led schemes, remain pending. I will continue to keep the Assembly informed of funding for further measures as they are agreed.

Mr Speaker: I call Paul Frew. Sorry, I call the Chairperson, Steve Aiken.

Dr Aiken (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance): I rise as the Chairperson of the Finance Committee —.

Mr Frew: For now [Laughter.]

Dr Aiken: You are not going to get it that easy. It is not going to happen.

I thank the Minister for meeting me earlier today and briefing me on the content of his statement before he came to the House. Minister, I thank you for your statement, and we welcome the much-needed funding as a means of supporting businesses. However, those businesses need the payments to be made without unnecessary delays. A number of businesses are still awaiting payments from previous announcements. Therefore, it would be helpful if you could outline what is being done to prioritise the payments for those still waiting and advise whether the applicable Departments have sufficient capacity to ensure that payments are progressed quickly. We note your comments about LPS and how quickly it has managed to repurpose itself. We also ask what commitments you can give to assure those who are eligible for support that payments will not be subject to undue delay.

Further to the announcement of the expected £95 million for the household voucher scheme, whilst it will provide a much-needed boost to local business, it would be helpful if you could outline the rationale for applying the scheme to every household, particularly as many of the households will probably not need it; whether a targeted scheme, offering a higher amount, would have been a more sensible approach to support those most in need; whether any households will be excluded; whether there will be an expiry date for vouchers; and what will happen to money from unspent vouchers. I am looking at the Department for Communities website, and there are 487,000 households in Northern Ireland. If it was approximately £100 each, it would equate to £48 million. Is it to be £200 rather than £100?

Mr Murphy: I thank the Chair for his comments and questions. Of course, the balance has always been between getting payment on the ground as quickly as possible and ensuring that — it is not two or three weeks since we had a debate in the Assembly about payments that had gone awry and the consequence of that. It was a very small proportion of the £10,000 and £25,000 grants, but it draws particular attention and reminds us of the necessity to ensure that public money goes to where it is designed to go to and gets to those most in need. It is a balance of getting payments out quickly. Also, the more focused or selective, if you like, the payment is, the more data is required to isolate it from other, broader groups to make sure that it gets to the right person. That data is not just the LPS data; other data can be required to verify that people are in certain businesses that are entitled to receive support. More focused restrictions from the Department of Health add complexities to the paying out of the schemes. We do not know what the Department of Health restrictions are until they arrive with us and the Executive agree to them. That said, we want to see the schemes get out as quickly as possible. They have been slower than I would have liked or the Executive or, I am sure, all MLAs would have liked. We will continue to encourage that. Certainly, the support scheme that LPS is rolling out has gathered pace and has started to pay out. LPS was well through those payments last Friday when I got the last figures. Obviously, we have been working on this over the weekend, but I will get up-to-date figures before Question Time tomorrow so I can advise Members where that is.

The voucher scheme is being operated by the Department for the Economy, which will, I am sure, expand on the detail as time goes on. It is not meant to support households; it is meant to stimulate the high street. The primary focus of it is to stimulate spending and growth on the high street and to give certainty to businesses. I am told that it is likely to roll out in the new year, because it takes about six weeks for such a scheme to be put in place. I believe that you are correct that it is about £200 per household, and it is intended to be sent out in the months when the high street is at its leanest — in January and February. It is really a stimulus to high-street spend rather than support to the household.

Mr Frew: Minister, what use is the statement to the House when it is completely devoid of any realism and completely disconnected from the real world? What use is the statement to the single mother of three who runs a hairdressing salon and has not received one penny of support from you?

How much money did the Department for the Economy bid for, and what percentage of that bid has it received?

Mr Murphy: The scheme is designed to pay out to the sorts of people whom you reflect: those who own a hairdressing salon. If they have not already received money, they should be getting it in the very near future from Land and Property Services (LPS). Perhaps the Member can take the matter up with LPS rather than grandstand here in the Chamber. Most other MLAs are taking up individual cases and pressing them for people. The Member is saying that an allocation of almost half a billion pounds, when you add in the intent that I have for rates holidays to continue into the new financial year, is not to be living in the real world, but it is largely all of the money that the Executive have at their disposal to provide support. That is what we are doing. I understand the battles that are going on in your party. Those battles are affecting not only your party but the entire running of the Executive, because of the dysfunctionality that they cause. [Interruption.] We are trying to manage as best we can to get all those schemes done —

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Murphy: — to get support on the ground where it is needed and to get Executive decisions taken, and not only taken but supported by Ministers. All of that is a challenge, but we will meet it, regardless of what goes on in your party.

Mr McHugh: Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis an Aire fosta as a ráiteas. Unlike the Member who spoke previously, I welcome the support measures that you have announced, and many other Members will welcome them. I appreciate the time constraints that you will have been subject to when drawing up the proposals and so on. Apart from the extension of rate relief and the £5 million that will be allocated to tourism and hospitality schemes, should travel agents in particular expect any further funding in the future?

Mr Murphy: It is perhaps not a case of providing further funding but a case of getting some support to them. I know that travel agents have been particularly badly hit. Not only have they lost business but deposits that they were paid have had to be paid back to some customers. I had a meeting just a few short weeks ago along with the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, at which we met representatives of their group. It was agreed that they would provide further information on their specific request for support that they want to see from the Executive. My officials have been engaging with them to collate that information and provide me with some guidance. Once that has been put together, it will be provided to the responsible Department to make sure that we can include travel agents in the support given. I am very keen to give them support if we can.

Mr O'Toole: I thank the Minister for his statement. Many of the measures are welcome. Critical for many of the people who are in extreme distress financially and, in many ways, emotionally as we head into Christmas, such as small business owners and people whom they employ, is getting the money out the door. I appreciate that that is the job of the Economy Department, which has, I am afraid, not been very fast at getting the support out. What assurances has the Minister had from the Economy Department that the support that is particularly aimed at some of those businesses will go out before Christmas so that people can spend it on some kind of Christmas for their family? That is absolutely essential.

People will want to understand more about the allocation of £95 million for high street vouchers. Is there any prioritisation of small independent retail over some of the large multinationals? They have online operations, over to which some of their business has transferred. I ask for clarity on those two things: when money will go out the door and whether the £95 million makes any differentiation between independent and large-scale retail.

Mr Murphy: We, of course, want to get the money out the door as quickly as possible. I have encouraged other Departments' Ministers to make allocations to do that, not just the Department for the Economy's. There is a balance to be struck between trying to verify information to support a funding application and trying to ensure that the money goes out quickly. I encourage people who are applying to try to make sure that the details that they give are correct, that they are what is required and that they check in case there are return requests for details. Quite often, people miss emails that ask them to provide additional information. People need to keep a watch on that to assist in our getting the money out quickly, which we want to see happening as quickly as possible.

Some of the detail of how the voucher scheme is intended to operate will have to be expanded on by the Department for the Economy.

1.30 pm

I appreciate what he says about the online presence favouring much bigger business. That is why there is a £3 million fund in this as well to assist local businesses to get more of an online presence so they can avail of that and that it is not just left to the big multinational companies. However, in terms of the target, and how much more can be spent, that is something that the Department for the Economy will have to respond to.

Mr Muir: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the actions taken to help some who are considered to be excluded, such as company directors and B&Bs. Will the Minister confirm that the £26.2 million held in reserve will be considered for those who are still excluded, such as the newly self-employed? Will the Minister consider allocating additional staff resources to ensure that the grant payments are made on time? We need resources to ensure that those payments are paid out to businesses.

Mr Murphy: The £20 million scheme is in addition to the £10 million for the self-employed scheme, which the Department for the Economy has already announced, so those things should be addressed. We are trying to provide additional resources. In my Department, Land and Property Services has a very specialised role; you cannot just put people into rate collection from other sections of the Department. However, we are trying to give them assistance with communication, answering questions and getting advice out to people. I hope that in other Departments, where speed is of the essence in getting support out on the ground, they provide additional resources to the teams that are working on it.

Mr Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I remind Members that they should not ask multiple questions because they eat up valuable time. Other Members want to ask questions of the Minister. I call Christopher Stalford.

Mr Stalford: This has become a pattern, Mr Speaker. The last time the House was warned about that, I was called.

Mr Speaker: Show leadership. [Laughter.]

Mr Stalford: I have seen the annexe with the figure given for the Department for the Economy's allocation of £137.7 million. My colleague from North Antrim Mr Frew asked a question that was not answered. I ask the Minister: what was the total amount requested for the Department for the Economy?

Mr Murphy: The total request was in the region of £390 million, although I stand to be corrected. On top of the figure that you mentioned, there is an additional £60 million, which the Department for the Economy is holding.

Bear in mind that the Department of Finance is also paying out to businesses: there is an additional £55 million, which totals £90 million, which the Department of Finance is paying directly to businesses. It is not just the Department for the Economy that is paying out to businesses. The Department of Finance is paying £90 million, in the business support schemes that we are running, plus the £150 million that we have set aside. We were working closely with the Treasury over the weekend and hope to conclude negotiations very quickly. We hope to provide a rates holiday into the next financial year. That is also business support. It is not simply one Department that has responsibility for business support. A sizeable proportion of that business support function comes from the Department of Finance as well.

Of course, not all the bids can be met. We need to ensure, so that we can cope with bids, that they can be spent in this financial year. When Departments come forward with options, we have to be certain that they can be spent, as the last thing that we want to do is hand money back at the end of the financial year. That was the balance, and the Executive agreed to it.

Ms Dolan: I thank the Minister for his statement. Some very welcome measures are being announced. How does the Minister intend to use the £150 million set aside for rates relief in the next financial year?

Mr Murphy: As I said in response to a previous question, this is one of the key issues that businesses have been pressing us on. We have had lots of engagement with business over the last weeks and months. Those that availed of the year-long rates holiday for this financial year have said how beneficial it was in ensuring that those bills were not an additional cost at a very challenging time. It offered some certainty in the new financial year and gave some early indication of that certainty. We have been trying to work on that, and I intend to use the £150 million for a further six-month rates holiday for those businesses that availed of the full-year rates holiday in this financial year. We are working with the Treasury on that, and I hope to be able to confirm it soon.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for his statement. I particularly welcome the efficiencies brought forward by the Economy Minister, particularly the £95 million high street voucher scheme. That will be a great boost to our high streets. In saying that, the Minister will be aware that it falls significantly short of what was requested. When the details are confirmed for this scheme, will the Minister consider fully funding the request that was brought forward to ensure that we can recover as we come out of the pandemic?

Mr Murphy: As I said, it is a question of getting the right balance of packages. We are supporting businesses that have been closed down. The Department of Finance actually picks up the lion's share of the support because we are providing the scheme for the premises. The Department for the Economy's part is much smaller. It is the rate support scheme that will go on into the new financial year, the high street stimulus scheme and the voucher scheme that the Member has referred to. Of course, if we had more money, and if we do get more money, we can consider additional allocations to any of these schemes. However, it is a matter of trying to get that balance across a whole range of packages.

Ms Ennis: I very much welcome the Minister's statement today. We now need to see every Department getting its finger out to ensure that payments get out to the people who are still waiting for the support that was promised to them.

Mr Givan: It is Finance. Speak to your Minister.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ennis: Thank you, Mr Speaker. Minister, B&Bs that pay domestic rates are now part of what has been termed the excluded group. Why was that group excluded, and what support can they expect in the package that you have put forward today?

Mr Murphy: As you have correctly said, B&Bs that have six bedrooms or fewer are classified as domestic properties and, therefore, were not able to avail themselves of the previous £10,000 and £25,000 support scheme grants. When we spoke to B&B owners, as part of the group that was excluded on a range of issues, they said that they could be identified through community information held by the Tourist Board, their certifying body. We were able to get that data and include B&Bs in the current scheme. So they will be paid during the current restrictions. We also recognise that B&Bs had previously missed out, and £4.6 million has been put into the scheme to assist them with the previously missed payment.

Mr Catney: Thank you for the statement, Minister. It was very detailed. I believe that it will go some way to taking some of the stress and heat from our business community.

Minister, you have allocated £10.6 million to wet pubs, and that is very welcome. I hope and trust that that will be rolled out as quickly as possible. I am sure that the Minister is also aware that there are public houses that have a rateable valuation of £50,000 and above. Is there a specific package to help those businesses?

Mr Murphy: As I say, the scheme for wet pubs is very welcome. I had pressed for a scheme for some time. In my own village, some pubs did not open again. Some pubs were only open for a number of weeks before they were closed again. They have been effectively closed down since March, so that scheme is very welcome. There should be a very clear list of those wet pubs and how to get funding to them. I hope that the scheme can be delivered to them very quickly.

The £10.6 million tourism initiative is aimed at properties and businesses with an NAV over £51,000 that missed out on the £25,000 grants. Of course, how that is allocated will be a matter for the Department for the Economy. However, that is intended to meet the needs of those premises.

Mr Nesbitt: I will be grateful for the Minister's assessment of what more might be done for businesses that are falling through the cracks. I was contacted by a business owner this morning who had missed out on the small business support scheme because they did not have a rates ID. However, they did not have a rates ID because it was a new business, and they did not get an assessment of rates in time. Will the Minister consider some sort of committee that might act as an appeals body to look at specific and exceptional circumstances like that?

Mr Murphy: I know that LPS has been trying to meet the process date to get the payments out very quickly and to deal with businesses that have submitted incorrect information or have a question over them. LPS has been trying to be flexible. On the £10,000 schemes, LPS is trying to be very flexible with businesses that had been in the process of getting valuations and assessments done and to allow space for that to happen. If the Member sends me the details, I will write to the Department and try to ensure that there is a follow-up. I know that they do come back to all those who missed out on the LPS schemes and try to work with them to see if they can be put on a scheme.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his statement. We all share the pain of those businesses, small or large, that are feeling the impact of COVID at this time. A set of bids was submitted by the Minister for the Economy, and they are detailed in your statement. It is very welcome that £20 million has been allocated to the manufacturing sector, and I understand that the money will be on top of any business relief. Will that funding run through until the new financial year that begins in April 2021?

Mr Murphy: The short answer is yes. It is to make up. That is another grant that comes out of the Department of Finance, as we manage the rates system, even though it is a support for the broad economy, not from the Department for the Economy. Yes, it is intended to allow the same rates holiday that other businesses have to the end of the financial year.

Dr Archibald: Minister, thank you for your statement. I think that the point that you made to Mr Muir about the allocation of resources is an important one. There has been some lag time between the allocation of funds from you, as Finance Minister, and schemes being opened and delivered by, for example, the Economy Minister. It is important that resources are put in place to ensure that that happens as quickly as possible.

Is the £20 million that has been allocated for company directors in addition to previous announcements of allocations to the Department for the Economy, for example, for the newly self-employed?

Mr Murphy: Yes, it is. It is in addition to the £10 million that was previously given for the newly self-employed.

Ms Armstrong: Thank you very much, Minister, for your statement. Minister, the devil is in the detail, and there is a lot of information in your statement. I am particularly interested in the allocation to the Department for Communities, where the statement talks about a one-off heating payment of £200 to disabled people on higher rate allowances and older people in receipt of pension credit. I am sure that the detail will come, but do you know, at this stage, whether that is a payment per person or per household? We have many elderly carers who have not received an additional payment of carer's allowance throughout the pandemic. It will be interesting to see whether this, at long last, will be two payments in one household as opposed to just one.

Mr Murphy: I do not have that level of detail on whether it is a household or a person. Particularly with the pandemic, people will be spending much more time at home during the winter and, obviously, running up heating costs. The Communities Minister brought forward a proposal to help that group with its heating bills, and, obviously, I was very happy to support that, as were the Executive. I understand that the payment will be made in January, when the support is needed most, and I assume that the details on who will be eligible will be brought forward before then.

Mr Givan: When I look at the allocations to the Communities, Economy, Education and Finance Departments, I see that they are all from requests to give money out to support people. However, the Department for Infrastructure has an allocation to shore up a failing Department, run by the SDLP. That party needs to focus, Finance Minister, on delivering for taxi drivers and getting people tested. Instead, it pontificates about and lectures others —

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Mr Givan: — on their failings to run a Department. On the need to move forward and get this money out —

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Mr Givan: — the Minister's colleague rebuked him about the need for the Department of Finance to pull its finger out and get the money. Will he ensure that his Department gets Land and Property Services to ensure that it gets this money out? How many applications are waiting to be processed? Will he give two thirds of the allocation to the Economy Minister, who is fighting for businesses?

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Mr Murphy: I am not sure where you get that. The Executive collectively have allocated about half a billion pounds, the lion's share of which is to support businesses across a range of Departments. To suggest that only the Economy Minister is fighting for businesses is a nonsense, and you should understand that. I know that you are making political points. The Department for Infrastructure bids were met in full. I encourage the Infrastructure Minister to get out the door the schemes that she is paying out as quickly as she possibly can, and I encourage the Economy Minister and other Ministers to do that too. Of course, the additional payments that we have offered up today are very welcome, and, when the payments are hitting the ground and the people out there who are suffering as a consequence of the pandemic are feeling the benefit, we will all find that we are in a much happier place. To be quite honest, I am not interested in the sideswipes and the arguments. I am interested in getting these schemes effectively out on the ground.

Ms Mullan: I also thank the Minister for his statement. I particularly welcome the free school meals payment that will apply across all the school holidays, and I commend all those who have worked and lobbied on the issue for many years. Minister, can you confirm for us the period that the free school meals payment will cover?

Mr Murphy: The money that we are allocating is COVID money, so it has to be spent in this financial year. The contribution that I have made for free school meals takes it up to the end of the financial year. Last Thursday, the Education Minister brought a paper to the Executive on the continuation of free schools until the end of the mandate, for which he got Executive support. That is very welcome. We are now working out the budgets for Departments and will have to work with Education to meet that budget, as the Executive have agreed, and we want to do it until the end of the mandate.

1.45 pm

Ms McLaughlin: Thank you, Minister, for your statement and for coming to the House today. I appreciate your acknowledgement of the delays in getting payments out, but those delays have very serious consequences. This morning, I got an email from a constituent. She wrote:

"I have applied for two grants. The first for our premises in the city centre and another one for the outskirts of the city".

She has received emails to say that payments would be on their way, but she has received absolutely nothing. That has gone on for seven weeks, not just a few days. Those payments have not been honoured for weeks. She wrote:

"Our landlords are putting us under immense pressure to get a payment to them or action will be started. This is quite worrying. We have maintenance to be carried out and the money simply is not there to facilitate it".

Mr Speaker: Will the Member get to a question, please?

Ms McLaughlin: She continued:

"We have been in business for 15 years and I am considering closing my salons in January in the city centre".

Minister, what are you doing to ensure that your Department speeds up this process and gets money into this constituent's bank account as soon as possible?

Mr Murphy: We are encouraging LPS to act as quickly as possible. The data that it needs to assess close contact services was not possessed by it alone. A lot was possessed on the councils' environmental health side, so it had to get data transfer and match-ups. That is what caused the delay in the initial phase.

As I said — I am not suggesting that it is the case here — but, in general, if anyone comes back and says that they have not received payment, we need to make sure that the information is correct, it is in and people have responded to requests for further information. That can sometimes hold up a payment. Of course we recognise that people are suffering on the ground and want payments to happen as quickly as possible. We want to see that as well.

Mr McNulty: I thank the Minister for his statement. Minister, I asked you about the number of payments made to applicants over the first four weeks of the restrictions. As of 13 November, 3,418 payments were made out of 11,589 applicants. That is less than 30%. Given that so many of the payments have not been made in the first tranche — the first four weeks of the restrictions — what confidence can you give to businesses that payments will be made this week? Businesses cannot wait. A Christmas tree has been erected in this Building, but I am not finding much cheer, and people —

Mr Speaker: A question, Mr McNulty. Thank you.

Mr McNulty: — in business in my constituency of Newry and Armagh are not finding much cheer.

Mr Murphy: I do not have today's up-to-date figures because I was too busy over the weekend trying to distribute half a billion pounds right across economic and community support. I will get the up-to-date figures for tomorrow's Question Time, but the last up-to-date figures that I had at the weekend show a significant increase on the figure that the Member quotes, which is from over a week ago.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for his statement. While he will be aware of businesses that have not received support payments weeks after they were promised them, he will also be aware that some have fallen through the gaps and have been unable to trade since March. Those people have received no financial help from the Executive. What discussions has the Minister had with the Minister for the Economy to make sure that there are no gaps and that the people who run those businesses get the financial support that they need? Do the new allocations fill those gaps?

Mr Murphy: I have said repeatedly at Executive meetings over the last while that there is a particular urgency in ensuring that the people to whom the Member referred who have received no support get support.

We are now into our second and third rounds of support for some businesses. While that support is clearly vital, it is grossly unfair on those who have not received it. I have met people from different sectors that are not the responsibility of my Department to try to offer assistance and steer them to the right place to get support, and to offer officials to assist them to gather up the right information so that they can take it to the relevant Department to present it and get support. I am keen to get support out. I am acutely aware that, as we roll out further levels of support for business, some people have still to receive it. I encourage those people to contact the relevant Departments to make their case. If they need assistance, I have always offered to meet people in order to steer them in the right direction, to encourage them and to tell them the type of information that they need to present to make a case for themselves.

Mr Allister: Can I seek some clarification from the Minister about whether all of the £338 million that was today is Barnett consequential money from the Treasury, or is it supplemented by any savings that the Executive have made in various Departments? More specifically, what about Belfast International Airport? It is our primary airport, and it is now closed for a number of days each week. I see £1·2 million, again, for the City of Derry Airport, which must be the most over subsidised airport that we have. What about Belfast International Airport? Where is the money for it?

Mr Murphy: This is all Barnett consequential money. We used the October monitoring round savings to allocate to departmental pressures and to keep them separate from these allocations. Of course, I anticipate further surrenders of money in the January monitoring round, which will be used to meet some departmental pressures.

I intend to bring a paper to the Executive next week on airport funding. The Member may know that, when we made a previous payment to airports, the International Airport did not at that stage require any assistance from us. It is clear that it now does, and we are working through that with it. The payment that he refers to for City of Derry Airport is an outstanding payment; it is not new as part of this allocation. It is an outstanding payment that is coming from money that was held in reserves for the airports; it has been sitting in reserves for some time. Some £10 million was sitting in reserves for airports, and I hope by next week to be able to identify which Department is to pay that out — it will probably be Infrastructure — and work it through with Belfast International Airport, the City Airport and City of Derry Airport.

Mr Carroll: The Minister stated:

“We have not known what course the virus would take or what the health experts would recommend in response to the virus”.

I repeat:

“We have not known ... what the health experts would recommend in response to the virus”.

Can the Minister seriously stand over that statement, knowing full well that, as an island, we saw the virus spread across other parts of the world and that his Executive were warned by health experts that reopening the economy too soon would risk a second surge? Is the Minister seriously saying, “Sure, we didn’t know what would happen. It’s not our fault. Nothing to see here. Move on”? Does the Minister think that that is acceptable?

Mr Murphy: I will give the Member the benefit of the doubt and say that he is misunderstanding what I said rather than deliberately misrepresenting it. Clearly, the criticisms that I was referring to and that he would have said had he gone on to quote further related to the people who were saying that we should have a financial package ready to go with the restriction announcements last Thursday. We did not know what the health experts were recommending with regard to non-essential retail until Thursday morning or 11.30 pm on Wednesday. For me, who goes to sleep at that time, it was Thursday morning. We were not aware of it, so we could not bring a financial package to the Executive on Thursday for agreement. As I said, I will give the Member the benefit of the doubt that he misunderstood that, but that is what I was referring to, not the global effect of the pandemic.

Mr Speaker: That concludes questions on the statement.

Mr O’Toole: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Can you advise whether it is in order for the Member for Lagan Valley to make pathetic and inaccurate statements about the Infrastructure Minister’s handling of support schemes given that the Department reacted to the failure of the Economy Department to provide a support scheme for taxi drivers and the continued failure of that Department to provide support for a wide range of sectors? It is worth putting on record that the Infrastructure Minister got the legal powers and was able to get a scheme up and running within 10 days.

Mr Speaker: You will be aware that a number of comments were exchanged across the Chamber; you were involved in them. I will leave that matter for now.

The next item of business on the Order Paper is Question Time. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 1.53 pm.

The sitting resumed at 2.00 pm.

2.00 pm

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Stafford] in the Chair)

Oral Answers to Questions

Communities

Personal Independence Payments: Appeals

1. Mr McCrossan asked the Minister for Communities to outline the average success rate for a personal independence payment (PIP) appeal in the last 12 months. (AQO 1141/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister for Communities): I thank the Member for his question. For the period of 1 April 2019 to 31 March 2020, there were 3,779 successful PIP appeals and 2,201 unsuccessful appeals. Therefore, 63% of PIP appeals were successful in 2019-20. For the period of 1 April 2020 to 31 October 2020, there were 104 successful PIP appeals and 133 unsuccessful appeals. Therefore, for the seven months up to 31 October, 44% of PIP appeals have been successful. As a result of the COVID-19 pandemic, no appeals were listed for hearing between 18 March 2020 and 6 July 2020. Since then, a limited number of appeals have been listed for hearing.

Mr McCrossan: Thank you, Minister, for the answer to that question. The significant rate of successful appeal shows the need for appeals to be heard as soon as possible, and certainly within a reasonable amount of time, yet there is a backlog of over 4,000 people waiting for their appeals to be heard — a problem that has predated the pandemic, Minister. How many appeals does the Minister expect will be heard by the end of the year?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I agree with the Member that there was a backlog prior to COVID and that COVID has not helped at all. I have asked officials to try to expedite ways in which people can have their appeals heard. Many people are not comfortable with a desktop review and are looking for telephony, should that be a video call or a phone call. Some have the opportunity for face-to-face, but it is important that we get not only the pre-COVID backlog addressed, but also the backlog since. I suspect that the figure that you have quoted has actually increased since that response was given.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I welcome Ms Nicola Brogan to her place and wish her all the best in the House.

Ms Brogan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-Leas-Cheann Comhairle; thank you. Minister, which of the different types of appeal available to claimants is the one most favoured by appellants?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I welcome the Member to the Assembly and wish her all the very best. The least favourite — also in response to Daniel McCrossan, as both of you share the same constituency — is probably the desktop. We are looking at video and telephone calls to try to assist people, because it is very stressful applying for this benefit, and it is even more stressful appealing it. We need to make sure that it is as smooth and stress-free as possible when people are applying for a PIP appeal.

Ms Armstrong: Minister, I am glad to hear you talking about an alternative to telephone as a means of communication. Videoconferencing would be very much welcomed for PIP assessments. I ask the Minister whether whatever system she is considering will be hearing-compatible for those with hearing impairments. Can those who are using this new type of system have someone with them? Quite a lot of people have had mental health issues due to the way that they have had to go through assessment so far.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I completely agree with the Member on all of the points that she raised. If people are doing video calls and have hearing impairments, they should absolutely, under disability law, which should be human rights-compliant as strongly as possible, have an interpreter there, even for those who have difficulty communicating. The other aspect is that we need to make sure that, particularly as I said to Nicola, this process is as stress-free as possible, so I am looking at alternatives. I met the Participation and the Practice of Rights group (PPR) last week, and that was one of the issues that was on the human rights checklist that it is asking us to bring forward.

Mr Allen: Minister, can you advise how many of the unsuccessful appeals went on to stage two appeals to the Social Security Commissioner? Also, do you have any data on how many of those within the backlog of appeals are currently in receipt of welfare supplementary payments? Can you give a guarantee that none of those payments will be impacted whilst they wait for their appeal to be heard?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his three supplementary questions. [Laughter.] Fair play to you. I do not have the answers to the first two questions, but I will certainly get the Member the data that he has asked for. It is probably here somewhere, but it certainly did not jump out at me. I will get that response to you.

I have said this to others, but, as the Member will be aware from his constituency, going through the appeals process is very stressful. The last thing that we need is for people's stress levels to be increased, and we do not want the appeal to impact on other benefits and entitlements. We therefore need to make sure that it is done as smoothly as possible. That sounds like an easy thing to do, and it should be an easy thing to do, but the backlog is such that we need to tackle it head-on. We perhaps need to use this opportunity, if it is appropriate to call it that, to do things a bit differently and make sure that there are better outcomes for people who are waiting on good decisions.

Miss Woods: The Minister will be aware that people are much more likely to get a PIP award if they have support from another person or from the independent advice sector. Will the Minister support a list of independent advice sector organisations or advice lines being sent out with the PIP form and the overturn rate for mandatory reconsiderations being made available in the information that is sent out on how best to challenge a decision so that more people can make more of an informed decision about whether to take the matter further?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. That is certainly one of the issues that I am considering. It comes up time and time again from the independent advice sector, as well as from GPs, social workers, family support workers and a whole range of others. I absolutely will consider that, and, as I said to Kellie Armstrong, I think that it would be more human rights-compliant and more humane if that were allowed to happen.

Mr Carroll: I was dealing with the case of a constituent who sadly passed away. My constituent was waiting for a long time on a PIP appeal and a PIP decision and got the award after having passed away. Minister, are you or your Department aware of how many people have tragically passed away from COVID whilst waiting on a PIP appeal or a PIP decision?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am really sorry to hear that, Gerry. Pass my sympathies and thoughts on to the family. I am not aware of the answer, but, when I am asking for the data that Andy asked for, I will ask for that as well. The last thing that should happen is that someone's grief be compounded by a letter, either successful or unsuccessful, coming out after a loved one has passed.

COVID-19: Sports Funding

2. Mr McGuigan asked the Minister for Communities when applications will open for the funding allocated to the sports sectors affected by the COVID-19 pandemic. (AQO 1142/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. In short, early next month is when we hope to have applications for funding open. Following a successful October monitoring round bid, I secured £15 million, and I am sure that the Member heard that I successfully got another £10 million on top of that. The aim of those funds is to ensure that the sports sector, which is representative of such a diverse range of interests right across our community, is not only sustained during the ongoing COVID period but supported.

My officials and Sport NI are working on developing programmes that will deliver a needs-based scheme to ensure that the funding is distributed fairly, with full transparency, to those who can evidence that the financial loss has been incurred as a result of the restrictions. I have met a lot of representatives of governing bodies and have spoken to a lot of clubs, and I am well aware of the financial impact that the COVID interventions have had on the sports sector. It is my intention to launch the fund as soon as possible.

Mr McGuigan: I thank the Minister for her response. I welcome the news that applications for funding will open early next week. I also welcome the financial package that the Minister has agreed with the sporting bodies, her continued engagement with sports governing bodies across the North and, indeed, her engagement with local GAA clubs in my constituency recently. Given that she said that the money will be distributed fairly, can she provide assurances that the money that she has allocated will be accessible by grassroots sporting clubs?

Ms Ní Chuilín: For clarity, the Member said "early next week", but I said "early next month".

Mr McGuigan: No problem.

Ms Ní Chuilín: You are OK. I could see Members' body language change there, so cool your jets and give me a couple of weeks.

Yes, it is really important that the governing bodies, of which there are many, be supported, and it is certainly important that grassroots clubs be supported as well.

Across all sports, grassroots have been part of the first response during the pandemic and are still playing the role of lifeline to people, even though it is not their primary function. They have lost money as a result of the restrictions that we have placed on them. As we all know, in the charitable and voluntary sector, the ability to raise money through these months has been greatly hindered. Grassroots are well entitled to expect some share of the funding.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the much-needed financial aid for sports. When might we expect a restart of grassroots youth sport? Will she be open to reviewing which sport can be included in the elite category?

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, I am very conscious that many young people in particular have been prevented from getting involved in sports and training as a result of COVID-19 restrictions. I have no plans to review what is in the elite category unless the Member has specifics. Some of the correspondence that I have received from people asking for their sports to be categorised as elite will not fit the criteria, but that is not to say that the one that the Member has in mind will not. It may.

As the Member will be aware, I am working on the current health and scientific advice on the restrictions, and I have confidence. I spoke to the governing bodies and the clubs on the measures that they are taking, and I am keen to get youngsters and people like me, who are not so young, back out training.

Mr Buckley: The Minister will understand how critical it is to get funding out to sports clubs as soon as possible, and I welcome the announcement that that will happen at the end of this month or at the start of next. We know that COVID relief funding will not be enough to sustain a lot of clubs, given the serious pressures that they have. With that in mind, will the Minister give an update on the progress of the subregional sports stadia funding and the need to ensure a regional balance to that funding?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There will be a regional balance to that funding. If you listen to some of the clubs in Belfast alone, you will hear that they have it all spent, so I give the Member that assurance. We are working through the business cases and all the outstanding items that we need to get it concluded before I bring it to the Department of Finance and, indeed, the rest of the Executive for approval. It is really important that people who live in the Member's constituency can expect to get some money.

The Member may be aware that, this morning, I received an additional £10 million for the sports hardship fund. That is £25 million in total, which, I am sure the Member will agree, will go a long way to help clubs that are struggling at this time.

Social Housing: Zero-carbon Buildings

3. Miss Woods asked the Minister for Communities what discussions she has had with the Minister of Finance on requirements for new social housing to be zero-carbon buildings. (AQO 1143/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have had extensive engagement with Minister Murphy, particularly on the future of social housing, and I welcome any changes to the construction of social housing if it results — hopefully, it will — in improvements to overall environmental standards. In the meantime, my officials continue to engage with DOF officials. For example, our officials are also represented on the development of DFE's new energy strategy and on DAERA's future generations group on climate change. As the Member will be aware, primary responsibility for introducing a requirement in building regulations for dwellings to be zero-carbon rests with the Department of Finance building standards. However, we are working collectively to have those regulations introduced after a public consultation.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for her answer. In response to a question for written answer to my colleague Clare Bailey, the Minister of Finance indicated on 30 October that his Department was still consulting on technical documents relating to nearly zero energy requirements. What is the Minister's assessment of social housing being built without the relevant regulations and technical documents being in place in the Department of Finance?

2.15 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly, I am on the record as looking at new construction methods. They will look at the best possible environmental standards. The documents that the Department of Finance is working through are quite technical. My understanding is that not only are they technical but there is a substantial volume of them. We want to do our best to get to them as part of the consultation, so that whatever changes are needed to the building control regulations will be done as soon as possible. I assure the Member that I will ask my officials, the Housing Executive and, indeed, housing associations to liaise closely and keep an eye out for the best possible standards. What we do not need is for new houses to be built that will have to be retrofitted a few years later. That is a waste of public money and people's patience.

Ms Dillon: Can the Minister give the House some detail on the difference that it will make to the grant that housing associations get if they are able to achieve zero carbon?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I imagine that that will be part of the total cost indicator that housing associations and the Housing Executive will receive when they get to build. I will just double-check that. Certainly, if there is any increase in construction costs, as there may be, as a result of any improvements in building regulations, I would imagine that that would go into the total cost indicator. I will check that and get back to the Member in writing.

Mr Durkan: Has the Minister assessed the adequacy of the housing fitness standard in providing high-quality, environmentally sustainable housing?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will just let the Member know, through you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, that I have not made a final decision on that. However, with regard to the point that was raised by Rachel Woods in her question, that would almost be signing off on a fitness standard that is old and is not fit for the 21st century. As part of looking at the regulations, we will look at the fitness standards not just for the public sector but the private sector.

Ms P Bradley: I thank Rachel Woods for tabling her question. I absolutely agree with her sentiments on it. Right now, many homes in the social housing sector are not fit for purpose. They have damp, poor heating and no cavity wall insulation. Their carbon footprint is through the roof. Can anything be done about the homes that we have now?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will not be shocked when I say that at least 40,000 homes are in need of serious repair. I consider being able to live in a home without developing a respiratory disease to be a basic ask. That is part of the reason that I made the statement on the reconfiguration of the landlord side of the Housing Executive to a mutual or cooperative. The Member will also be aware, from her previous days in the Committee for Social Development, that the Savills report put it at a cost of at least £7.1 billion; I imagine that the figure is probably closer to £7.8 billion now. Homes need to be safe, clean, warm and dry. We also need to use the proper models, materials and tools to ensure not only that we reduce fuel poverty but that we achieve better health outcomes. For many people, particularly in our constituency, the level of respiratory disease is completely unacceptable.

Libraries: Enniskillen

4. Ms Dolan asked the Minister for Communities for an update on a new library for Enniskillen. (AQO 1144/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. On 14 August 2020, my Department approved the outline business case for the redevelopment of Enniskillen library on the existing site at Halls Lane in Enniskillen. While the project is at an early stage, my Department has already allocated £150,000 in this financial year to Libraries NI to allow it to advance the project to the design and procurement phase. I can also confirm that a design team has been appointed to progress the concept design and the necessary feasibility studies and develop the design for the project. The construction of the new library has been projected to require an investment of £4.5 million. The estimated completion date is 2023.

Ms Dolan: I thank the Minister for that welcome news. I am sure that we will have some happy people in Fermanagh. Can I invite the Minister to come and visit the library when it is safe to do so?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly. During my previous days in DCAL, I visited quite a few libraries in the Member's constituency. I am delighted to see that the library is receiving the support that it needs, because I can remember, from 2012 and 2013, that it needed support.

When the restrictions are lifted and when the time is appropriate, I will be more than happy to visit the Member's constituency and that library.

Mrs Barton: Minister, now that you are on the issue of libraries in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, can I ask for an update on Fivemiletown library?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. I do not have information on that library, but I will get that to her in writing. I should have anticipated a question on at least one library in every constituency. That library was not on the list, so apologies for that.

Social Housing: Ring-fencing

5. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister for Communities when ring-fencing of new-build social housing, as outlined in her statement on housing policy, will come into effect. (AQO 1145/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I am currently considering a range of options to increase the supply of social housing to address demand. A key element of that plan will be to ring-fence and weight the social housing development programme's output so that it is better at providing new social homes in greater numbers in the areas of most need. My officials and the Housing Executive are progressing that work. It is my intention to see the ambition of ring-fencing reflected in the new three-year programme that will be submitted to me in January 2021.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answers up to now. My supplementary question has, to a great extent, been answered. It was about when we will see the beginning of the changes that were promised in the very welcome statement that she made.

The Minister will be aware of damage done to Housing Executive premises in Ardoyne caused by a faulty shower unit. Is there an investigation of that, especially given that, as I understand it, those shower units were on a recall list from 2018? My worry is that we may have a huge problem in social housing throughout the North.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I saw some media reports about that, prompted, I am sure, by the Member. It is very worrying if it is the case that those shower units were recalled in 2018 and a fire has subsequently happened in a home. Certainly, I await the outcome of the initial investigation. To assure you and, indeed, other Members, I will ask whether there were recalls in any other constituency and what has been done since. That is a fairly credible question to ask. If the advice that I get flags up concerns, I will share that with Members.

Ms P Bradley: North Belfast, as we know, will be one of the ring-fenced areas. Minister, when you look at the policy, will you look at North Belfast in its entirety, because, quite often, Newtownabbey is left out of the social housing figures when it comes to reflecting the demand in North Belfast? Can the Minister give me an assurance that Newtownabbey will also be taken into account?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. I will look at the geographical area, but I can certainly talk to officials to ensure that that is the case. There is need in all constituencies. When the details on the policy's progress come back, I will look to see which areas are covered. As the Member will be aware, the issue for me is that, every year, the number of people in acute housing stress grows by 1,000. There are unacceptable levels across — it is right across — the constituency. I will wait to see what I am presented with, but I assure the Member that, if Newtownabbey is not there, I will certainly ask about that.

Mr Durkan: Does the Minister recognise the importance of enshrining flexibility in the reintroduced ring-fencing policy? When the policy existed before, the Housing Executive demonstrated that it did not have sufficient flexibility, which impacted negatively on social housing provision inside and outside ring-fenced areas.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He is absolutely right. I remember when the policy was removed and the consultation on it. Let me be clear: I expect the Housing Executive to present me with proposals that look at the areas most in need. The Member's constituency is, unfortunately for him and for everybody else, at the top of that list, and that has persistently been the case. We need to look at ways to tackle that. A one-size-fits-all approach will not work. We need flexibilities or even the ability to contract in and out because it needs to reflect the true need and have an outcome for those on the waiting list.

Ms Armstrong: Ring-fencing new-build social housing will mean that opportunities for builders will increase fantastically. However, there is an issue about the number of apprentices and younger people going into the industry. Is the Minister working with the Department for the Economy and the Department of Education to identify opportunities so that more people can be brought into the workforce?

Ms Ní Chuilín: When the proposals come back, I will talk to other Departments. I want to go further to ensure that the way in which procurement happens is not open to as much challenge. Even current Housing Executive contracts are challenged at a low rate, which holds back procurement and contracts. I want to make sure that it is done as part of any contract, so social clauses, social benefits and social value need to be built in at the start and completion of a project — not for just a couple of weeks here and there — so that apprentices are fully supported from the day and hour that they walk in to the day and hour that they leave, hopefully with a trade.

In relation to the question from Rachel Woods, I hope that there will be an opportunity for new ways of construction. That is a new market not only for current tradespeople but for new and prospective tradespeople.

Mr Allen: Minister, in the past 10 years, we have been in and around meeting the target for social housing starts. As we discussed in Committee, however, that is clearly not having the effect that is required to house the many thousands on the waiting list across the Province. I appreciate that part of your revitalisation is to increase the number of houses. Are you able to indicate at this stage what a more realistic and ambitious target of new housing starts will be?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Even through the Programme for Government negotiations before this place was brought back, I think that every party wanted the Programme for Government to have a housing indication and, within that, better housing targets.

I have given a policy direction. At the end of January, I will have proposals not just on tackling the ring-fencing but on increasing the number of housing starts. I think that the target was met one year, and that is not acceptable.

Arts: Financial Support for Performing Artists and Tutors

6. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Communities for an update on the support and funding her Department is offering to those performing artists and tutors who continue to be excluded from other support schemes. (AQO 1146/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. From my contact with people across the arts and culture sector, I understand the impact that the restrictions are having on their ability to make a living and the need to continue to provide support to individuals and organisations. As part of a wider package of measures to support the culture, arts and heritage sectors, the Arts Council, on my behalf and that of my Department, has delivered two rounds of funding to individuals working across the arts and creative sectors. The artists' emergency programme was open for applications from 27 April to mid-May, with payments made in May and June. The individual emergency resilience programme was open for applications from 31 July to 17 August, and offers of grant were issued in October. The two programmes have resulted in grant awards totalling £4,400,000 to over 1,300 individuals. I will shortly make an announcement on further programmes to support individuals, and it continues to be my intention that those should be available to as wide a range as possible across the arts and creative sectors.

Mr Beggs: Many music and drama tutors operate from home, are usually self-employed and have been unable to benefit from the furlough scheme. I am aware of a highly successful local arts company that established itself as a company to minimise its tax liability. It has had no income since February. Will the new scheme to which the Minister refers include those who have been excluded to date, or will they, perhaps, have to rely on schemes that the Finance Minister might bring out?

Ms Ní Chuilín: A lot of companies that previously may have gone to the Arts Council got support from, for example, the Department for the Economy and some from the Department of Finance, particularly for rates.

However, the issue for me is that a lot of people who are self-employed have not had access to any public funds, and that is a problem. I encourage the Member to encourage companies and individuals like that to apply to the Arts Council, because that is exactly the sort of support that we are trying to get out, particularly for people who have not had access to any public funds, who may not be eligible to universal credit or anything else and who, in the run-up to Christmas, have been put under additional pressure by not knowing where they will get support from.

2.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Members. That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Musical Instruments: Funding

T1. Mr M Bradley asked the Minister for Communities what guidance she has given the Arts Council about the fund for musical instruments, which is due to close today, in light of the Committee for Communities supporting the forwarding of a letter seeking an extension of the fund. (AQT 701/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have not seen the letter yet, but I am happy to look at it. When I do, I will decide whether to reissue guidance to the Arts Council or ask whether it could extend the fund. As the Member will also be aware, even the Ulster-Scots Agency has access to musical instruments, particularly for bands. It is really important, particularly when people are self-isolating and trying to do tutorials over the internet, that they are given access to instruments to teach with.

Mr M Bradley: Why was that funding open for only 17 days? Many bands have been unable to have meetings, practices or any sort of committee meeting to apply for the funding. Will it be open again for further applications?

Ms Ní Chuilín: To give the Member assurance, I was not aware that it was open for only 17 days, so I make a commitment to him that I will find out what the criteria were, how long it was opened for, what notification the Arts Council gave, and then, if there is the need for an extension, I will talk to the Arts Council about how it can happen. I do not want anybody to fall out of the loop here, particularly if they can use their skills and expertise to help others, especially during COVID.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As a point of house-keeping, I should say that question 5 has been withdrawn.

Social Security: Appeals

T2. Mr Frew asked the Minister for Communities why she is failing the most vulnerable in society because people have to make appeals, which can be horrendous, about personal independence payment or employment and support allowance (ESA) by phone and because the Kickstart programme has not been commenced. (AQT 702/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will take the Member's last question first. First of all, it is not my intention to fail anybody. I just want the Member to accept that.

Mr Frew: You are.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not, so I respectfully disagree.

The Kickstart scheme will not be introduced this month, because we are not calling it "Kickstart"; we are calling it "Jobstart". It will be far better than what the British Government in England introduced. It will be a bespoke programme, and, if I introduced it, it would be done during a two-week lockdown. I do not want that to happen, because, as soon as it is introduced, the clock starts ticking.

With regard to PIP, if the Member had been here — I appreciate that we have to do a skeleton rota because of the restrictions — he would have heard me say — I will repeat it for him — that I am not happy with people just being given the opportunity to talk about their appeals over the phone; I want other avenues to be made available to them. People have said that they prefer that to happen by desktop, phone or videoconferencing. Again, I do not accept that I am deliberately failing anyone. If there are things that I could do better, I am happy to look at them, but I ask the Member to reconsider that.

Mr Frew: I assure the Minister that she is failing people when she cannot use two decent side rooms in Ballymena to have oral hearings for PIP and ESA. A laptop or a desktop will just not cut it, Minister, when you have vulnerable people who are not able to speak or to address other people across the phone or through computer technology. You are failing in that regard, Minister.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will certainly ask officials what happened in the Member's constituency. He can rest assured that I will do everything that I can to ensure that people have a fair hearing, because that is what it is about. I do not stand over anything that did not work or caused more stress. To be fair, the officials in my Department do not want that either, so something is not working. There is a massive backlog, and we need to fix it. We need to fix it so that people who are already going through a stressful situation are not put under additional stress, particularly given that the benefit is for people who need it most. That is my commitment.

Social Housing

T3. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister for Communities what matters she is considering to increase capacity in the social housing development programme to better target areas where there is acute need for such housing. (AQT 703/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He will be aware of the statement that was made here some time ago. Across the North, the need is growing, and it has been growing exponentially every year. For people who live in acute housing need or what is described as “housing stress”, that is completely unacceptable. That is why I introduced ring-fencing. That is just one example, but there are many other ways in which we need to tackle this. I am in discussions and will advance those discussions with housing association and Housing Executive colleagues, as well as councils, to see what land we can develop collectively as part of the local development plans. Then, we need to get houses that are fit for purpose and meet the needs of people in the area where they live. Those are some of the ways in which we hope to address the acute housing shortage.

Mr Sheehan: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Will she tell us what areas have been identified as having the highest need?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Mark Durkan is still here, and his constituency, Foyle, has the highest need, followed by North Belfast and West Belfast. Going back decades, those areas have had the highest need. That is why those areas need to be ring-fenced, and we need to have ambitious plans to reduce the stress that people live in, as well as future-proofing all of this for future generations. It is clear, not only anecdotally but evidentially, that, because the supply is not there and has not been there to meet demand, we need to start lifting the curve. The only way to do that is through proposals that address it head-on and look for opportunities for land development, particularly in areas of housing need. I believe that, up to now, that has not been the case.

Sport: Funding

T4. Mr McNulty asked the Minister for Communities how and when the £25 million that her Department has, which comprises £15 million already allocated to combat sports hardship and £10 million announced by the Finance Minister today, will be spent, particularly as sports clubs and organisations need that money now as opposed to next February or March. (AQT 704/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I agree with the Member. I am aware that, at a recent meeting with Sport NI, governing bodies were told that they would not get any money until, perhaps, the end of March, which sent everybody off in a spin. My intention is that, certainly early next month, those applications will open. I also welcome the additional £10 million that Conor Murphy has given, because it is clear that, without even getting down to the grassroots clubs, the governing bodies could have spent that £15 million themselves. We need to make sure that the money addresses the losses that people have now from a big governing body right down to a small grassroots club with a handful of people. It is important that they all get some money.

Mr McNulty: Minister, I have been contacted by numerous gym owners over the weekend. All are concerned about the closure of their gyms and the impact on their clients physically and mentally. Does the Minister share my view that gyms should be kept open with strict social-distancing guidelines from the perspective of mental and physical health?

Will the Minister indulge me, please, by applauding the achievements and success of Cavan and Tipperary at the weekend? It is extraordinary that Cavan won its first Ulster title in many years and Tipperary its first Munster title in 85 years. It is an extraordinary coincidence that, in 1920 and in 2020 — 100 years after Bloody Sunday — the same four teams were in the semi-finals of the All-Ireland.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I totally agree. I watched the match yesterday, and I watched matches over the whole weekend, whether I wanted to or not, because they were blaring from every TV and radio in the house. I congratulate them all. This is historic, and the way in which it all happened was almost freaky.

I wonder whether you were talking to my youngest son: he is a personal trainer. Even in my home I have one in my family. My neighbours are asking, “Why are the gyms closing?”, and then people understand the restrictions. At the end of the day, people have to earn money. There needs to be some approach, even through the Department for the Economy, to try to get that. There is a walking club in my constituency of North Belfast where the people are 2 metres apart. It is like kids coming from a nursery, but at least they are outside, trying to do a bit of exercise and support each other. Some gym instructors are involved in those as well. They are trying to do their best in very difficult circumstances. I fully appreciate and understand that a lot of them are losing income when they can least afford to, but the ones who I have spoken to also want to keep their clients and customers safe and well.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Looking around the Chamber, I dare suspect that, if the Minister’s son were to come up here as a personal trainer, he would do a roaring trade in the Assembly [Laughter.]

Charity Funding: Royal British Legion

T6. Mr Chambers asked the Minister for Communities whether she will give a commitment that she will consider including the Royal British Legion, if it is not already included, when her Department distributes the £5 million for charities announced by the Finance Minister today, which was welcome, because the Royal British Legion has seen a drastic shortfall in donations compared with what would normally be raised at this time of year. (AQT 706/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I am not aware of it being excluded, but I will certainly check. Charities have had an absolutely horrendous time since March. A lot of the work, the purpose, the companionship and, indeed, the lifelines that those charities give to individuals is second to none. I want to make sure that they are supported as best as possible. Conor Murphy has supported my additional bid for moneys for charities in his announcement today.

Mr Chambers: Thank you, Minister. I am confident that you will be fair in how you distribute that money, and I am sure that all the local charities will have welcomed the news today.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I certainly hope that the charities heard the news today. I know many of them, and our officials have been working with them. I know that the work that they are doing not only during this year but certainly going into the new year is really important. I give the Member my commitment that every charity, regardless of who it is, is respected and valued. I appreciate the work that they do to help so many despite having so little resource and investment. I am personally committed to making sure that charities get as much money as I can afford.

Personal Independence Payment: Appeals

T7. Mr Boylan asked the Minister for Communities, after congratulating Cavan and Tipperary on what was a great weekend for the GAA, how many appeals for personal independence payment remain outstanding. (AQT 707/17-22)

Ms Ní Chuilín: To be honest, Cathal, there are thousands and thousands, which is unacceptable. The number is anything from 5,500 to 6,000. As I said to Daniel McCrossan earlier, the number increases all the time. I assure the Member, as I have done with other Members, that I am committed to trying to get those appeals heard as soon as possible and in a manner that helps the appellants. That is the concern that I have: the stress that they are under because they are not able to have their appeal heard in a way that suits them.

Mr Boylan: I thank the Minister for that. What can she do to dispose of that great number of appeals?

Ms Ní Chuilín: As I said to Paul Frew, I will look again at opportunities to have people's face-to-face appeals heard, as close to their constituency as possible and with maximum confidentiality and sensitivity. At the end of the day, people should feel that they have been given a fair hearing. That is one of the most frustrating things for people who are waiting for an appeal.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask Members to take their ease for a moment. If you are exiting the Chamber, make sure that you give the Bench a wee scrub before you leave.

2.45 pm

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Economy

COVID-19: Airlines

1. Dr Aiken asked the Minister for the Economy what support her Department has provided to airlines to maintain connectivity during the COVID-19 pandemic. (AQO 1156/17-22)

Mrs Dodds (The Minister for the Economy): I thank the Member for his question. He knows that my responsibility is to maintain and enhance Northern Ireland's air connectivity, both domestically and internationally.

I played a key role in securing the £5.7 million support package announced in May for Belfast City Airport and City of Derry Airport and for airlines operating essential flights. That money safeguarded our air connectivity with GB during the initial COVID crisis period. In recent monitoring rounds, I have secured £2 million to fund marketing support by March 2021. That will be delivered by Tourism Ireland. Some £0.8 million relates to cooperative marketing support for airlines operating to all three of Northern Ireland's airports, with £1.2 million for a campaign highlighting all air and sea carriers serving Northern Ireland and their routes.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister for her reply. I will refer to my learned friend from South Belfast on the issue, but there is about £2.6 million in air passenger duty (APD) mitigation that we still return to the Exchequer each year. Will the Minister explain whether she or her officials have been in discussion with Belfast International Airport about supporting new transatlantic or Middle East routes? If so, has she made the necessary commitments for funding for those to occur, thus allowing us to improve our economy and our tourism offer for next year?

Mrs Dodds: The Member raises an important issue. Yes, I have been in discussion with Belfast International Airport on two transatlantic routes, one to New York and one to Boston, as well as another to Doha. The proposal from Belfast International Airport is a reserved matter, as aviation is a reserved matter, falling to the Department for Transport. I have, however, instructed my officials to investigate the idea of having support for routes, particularly to North America, as part of our recovery from COVID, but it is also important for Northern Ireland's centenary year that we can expand our markets, horizons and cultural exchanges to other parts of the world.

I have also engaged with the Department for Transport on the UK aviation recovery plan. I trust that the Government will bring that forward and finalise it as quickly as possible because it is an important part of our recovery plan. Of course, APD on domestic flights is an important issue in the recovery plan as well. I view APD as an unjust tax on travel to Northern Ireland.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. I welcome the fact that the Minister has made £2 million available to support airlines at this difficult time. She will agree with me that more support should be provided by central Government to help with our connectivity, including scrapping APD on short-haul flights, at least in the short to medium term. What emergency support is available for Belfast International Airport — a very large employer in south Antrim — from the Assembly to help in what are dire financial times?

Mrs Dodds: Thank you for the question. I put on record that, tomorrow, I will have a conversation with Sir Peter Hendy, who is conducting the Union connectivity review. Of course, I will be raising the issues of APD, the interconnectedness of our Union, and the importance of connectivity to GB as our main market for both goods and tourism.

On direct support for Belfast International Airport, the Member will understand that it is the role of the Department for the Economy to give support to air connectivity; support for airports relies on the Department of Finance and, of course, the Department for Infrastructure. I note that the Infrastructure Minister has made £1.2 million available for the City of Derry Airport. I urge that recovery packages for both Belfast International Airport and Belfast City Airport come forward as quickly as possible. If we do not have viable airports and connectivity, our recovery will be slower, and that will be more difficult for everyone in the long term. I raised this very important issue in the Executive last week. I expect to see that package come forward as quickly as possible.

Mr O'Dowd: The Minister will be aware that students are desperately seeking information as to when and how they can travel home safely over the Christmas period, whether to here or from here to somewhere else. Will the Minister work in conjunction with the Health Minister to ensure that students have that information?

Mrs Dodds: An interdepartmental group is looking at that issue, and it is being governed by advice from the Public Health Agency. You will have noticed in today's headlines that Queen's University has already introduced significant testing so that students can travel and go home with a degree of confidence. Of course, we have had a constructive engagement on the issue with the Secretary of State for Education, Gavin Williamson, and Michelle Donelan, the Universities Minister.

COVID-19: Business Support

2. Mr Allen asked the Minister for the Economy to outline the total spend by her Department on support for individuals and businesses adversely impacted by COVID-19, broken down by measure. (AQO 1157/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: I have found my glasses; things will look brighter.

I thank the Member for his question. My department has spent £353 million supporting individuals and businesses since the start of the COVID-19 pandemic. That covers the period until 31 October 2020 and includes £243 million on the £10,000 small business support grant scheme; £73 million on the £25,000 retail, hospitality, tourism and leisure grant scheme; and £23 million on the microbusiness hardship fund. I will place full details of the interventions, broken down by measure, in the Assembly Library. In addition to the £353 million to support individuals and businesses, a further £6.6 million has been spent by my Department on COVID-19 interventions for the higher and further education sectors.

Mr Allen: I thank the Minister for her answer. Minister, it will come as no surprise that, repeatedly and daily, constituents right across Northern Ireland are contacting myself and other Members about the business support scheme for the COVID-19 restrictions, pleading for those payments to be made. Minister, can you advise what additional support will be provided to Invest NI to ensure that the money goes to the individuals who desperately need it now?

Mrs Dodds: The Member will be aware, but I think that it is worth reminding the House, as I reminded Executive Ministers this morning, that there are two schemes in operation. One is for businesses that are rates-based, and that is operated by the Finance Minister. That is by far the very largest proportion of the funding that will be able for businesses in the current period of restrictions. The scheme that I am running, part A, is, obviously, for people who do not have a premises. It is a much, much smaller part of the scheme.

I can report that my officials in Invest NI worked throughout the weekend. Around half of those who have applied have now been paid. Everyone who applied and used an accountant's letter as a verification has now been paid, and that means that about £3.6 million has gone into the local economy. We are now down to some of the elements where this is very much a manual scheme and where we are now having to phone to address issues of assurances and verification. I am sure that the House will agree that it is important to get the balance right between getting money out and getting the verification and assurance around that money that taxpayers deserve.

Dr Archibald: Similar to Mr Allen, I know that there is some frustration among businesses and individuals about slower payments. Have you looked at, or will you look at, allocating additional resources, particularly personnel, to ensure that schemes get out quickly, particularly as there are new schemes coming on board to help the newly self-employed? When is that scheme expected to open?

Mrs Dodds: Around 100 officials from Invest NI are working on the two parts of the scheme. As I said, they are complex schemes. They are not one-off payments, and they have to be verified and measured. They are complex schemes and are difficult to get through. Officials will continue to work on those as quickly as possible, but I ask that Members of this House help by getting information out. The more information that we receive about the application, the quicker the response will be. However, I recognise that there are many people who are hurting and who need money out very quickly and that the restrictions, in the run-up to Christmas, are very difficult for people to deal with. We will endeavour to do our bit as quickly as possible, although I do say again that the vast majority of support will be delivered through the Finance Minister.

If I may, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will take the time to deal with the self-employed scheme. I asked for and circulated a paper for those who were recently self-employed and, indeed, for those who were company directors. My initial bid to the Finance Minister was for £70 million for those schemes. I have been allocated £30 million in total, £10 million that I was allocated in a previous allocation and £20 million today. Those schemes will reflect the allocation made to me by the Finance Minister.

Mr Stalford: My question is on the point that the Economy Minister has just made. In questions to the Finance Minister on his statement, I asked how much money the Economy Minister had bid for. I heard a figure in excess of £300 million, but, when I checked the BBC website, I saw that it was recorded as £190 million. Can my colleague confirm that she submitted a bid in excess of £300 million and has received from the Finance Minister £137 million?

Mrs Dodds: I can confirm that we submitted a very wide-ranging number of bids to the Finance Minister. Those were well in excess of £300 million, because we believe that the economy needs to be stimulated in order to recover. We need to offer help to those who have been impacted, but we also need to have the stimulus scheme that the economy, particularly the high street, will require to recover.

Miss Woods: A number of financial assistance schemes were outlined today by the Finance Minister, as we have heard. Can the Minister outline whether any of that funding will be allocated to fill the gap and give support to those who have received nothing to date? If not, why not?

3.00 pm

Mrs Dodds: The Member will have seen the variety of schemes that were allocated today. If she would like to identify the gap that she talked about, of course, we can talk about it.

Coronavirus Job Retention Scheme: Employee Rights

3. Mr Muir asked the Minister for the Economy what actions she is taking to ensure that employees made redundant then rehired to benefit from the extension of the coronavirus job retention scheme do not have their redundancy or other employment rights impacted negatively. (AQO 1158/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: Thank you for your question. My officials are actively engaging with their counterparts in the Department for Business, Energy and Industrial Strategy (BEIS) to ascertain what, if any, changes are required to employment law in Northern Ireland following the extension of the coronavirus job retention scheme.

HMRC is responsible for the scheme and its eligibility criteria. However, I understand that employees who were on the payroll on 23 September 2020, but who were made redundant or stopped working for their employer afterwards, can be re-employed and claimed for. As the scheme is operated by HMRC, any employer requiring information on the extension should contact HMRC directly.

I firmly believe that employers who have been able to take advantage of the scheme should treat staff fairly and respect employee rights, including those relating to redundancy consultation, notice period and redundancy pay. That is why I previously introduced legislation to ensure that employees furloughed under the original scheme would not see reductions in those entitlements.

Any individual who believes that their employment rights have been breached should consider contacting the Labour Relations Agency's workplace information service for confidential and impartial information or the Law Centre Northern Ireland, which continues to provide free, independent, specialist legal advice on employment rights.

Mr Muir: I thank the Minister for her response. The extension of the furlough scheme is something that the entire House could welcome but the lateness of the hour for that announcement — hours before it was about to expire — is a real issue.

Will the Minister consider introducing primary legislation or other rules and regulations to ensure that people do not lose their accrued entitlement as a result of being made redundant and then re-employed? Is the Minister prepared to consider that?

Mrs Dodds: I am. I agree that the lateness of the hour in bringing forward the extension of the scheme has caused significant problems for employees and for employers, who had already made their business plans based on another set of circumstances. I fully agree with you. You will have heard me call numerous times for the job retention scheme to be extended, particularly for sectors that still have and will have a significant tailback in their recovery from the pandemic.

I will, of course, instruct officials to look at any gaps that there may be, but no employee being re-employed should suffer disadvantage. If there are to be redundancies while that person is on furlough, it should not be based on their furlough wage but on their full entitlement, so that people are not disadvantaged in that way either.

Mr Dunne: The Minister will be aware that legislation on domestic violence went through the House last week. That was long overdue, and we really welcome it. Will the Minister advise the House on her views on special paid leave for victims of domestic abuse?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is beyond this question, but, if the Minister wishes to answer, that is over to her.

Mrs Dodds: This is an issue of huge importance, and it is important that the Minister charged with employment rights should take a view on it. I know that there is huge support in the House for this issue. I recognise that some employers already act in a compassionate and progressive way in relation to this issue with people who have worked for a long time in their business. Therefore, I have asked officials to give consideration to this, and I will revert to the House in due course.

Ms Rogan: It is concerning that some employers have recently adopted policies of firing and then rehiring workers under poor terms and conditions, such as zero-hours contracts etc. Will the Minister look to amend the legislation to ensure that workers are not open to that exploitation in such a way?

Mrs Dodds: It is difficult for me to speak of individual circumstances, but employers should not use the pandemic to abuse or negate employees' rights. That is why I introduced the legislation around furlough payments and potential redundancies. I advise any employees who feel that their rights have been abused to contact the Law Centre or Labour Relations Agency where there will be specialist advice and people who will be able to take it further for them.

COVID-19: Support Schemes

4. Mr M Bradley asked the Minister for the Economy, following the publication of the report into the financial implications of the four-week circuit breaker, how her Department will get groups highlighted as being adversely affected back into employment. (AQO 1159/17-22)

6. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister for the Economy, given that she has stated that females, younger workers and those on low pay may have been most adversely affected by the impact of COVID-19, how her recovery plan targets resources at those most in need of support. (AQO 1161/17-22)

14. Ms Bunting asked the Minister for the Economy, further to her Department's report on the potential economic impact of the four-week circuit breaker, how the learning from its findings will be implemented in the consideration of any future COVID-19 restrictions. (AQO 1169/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I will group questions 4, 6 and 14, and I ask for your permission for an extra minute to answer those questions. Were Mr Speaker here today, he would be astounded that I am answering question 14.

My Department has developed a number of packages to support younger workers and those most adversely impacted by COVID-19. An apprenticeship recovery package has been established to encourage the return to work of up to 4,500 furloughed apprentices and their retention through to the successful completion of their apprenticeship. Those apprenticeship skills will play a significant contribution in maintaining the skills pipeline and supporting the renewal of the wider Northern Ireland economy. I have introduced a scheme to support new apprenticeships and an apprenticeship challenge scheme to try to get innovative apprenticeships up and running.

I have also allocated £6.2 million to support the provision of free flexible training for up to 5,000 individuals who have been directly impacted by the pandemic. Courses are available in all of the further education colleges, Queen's University, Ulster University and the Open University. I encourage anyone whose employment has been hit by the pandemic to explore those opportunities.

Members will be aware that I recently launched the COVID restrictions business support scheme to provide support to businesses and individuals directly impacted by the ongoing restrictions and those within their supply chain. The majority of support is being provided to those who occupy premises through the localised restriction support scheme that is run by the Department of Finance.

I have said repeatedly that we need to find ways to live with the virus. Therefore, facilitating the safe reopening of our economy is, of course, the most effective way in which we can help those across society who are adversely impacted by the restrictions. Utilising assessments, such as that produced by my Department on the potential economic impact of the four-week circuit breaker, will help the Executive to take balanced decisions around the timing, scope and duration of restrictions.

Mr M Bradley: Does the Minister agree that, irrespective of what grant support is made available, the best support that the Executive can give is to allow businesses to trade? The Minister previously launched a scheme to help businesses to get online, which will allow smaller businesses to continue to trade, even if they are shut. Does the Minister have plans to continue or enhance that scheme?

Mrs Dodds: I thank the Member for his question. I am on record as saying, over and over again, that the best way to help businesses is to help them to trade in an open, safe and effective way. I deeply regret that we will have two further weeks of restrictions in the run-up to Christmas, but the Health Minister has advised that that is necessary to stop our hospitals being overrun.

It will be difficult for those individuals who are impacted on. One of the ways that we can try to help businesses is to help them have a dual offering through some online presence as well. Back in October, we introduced the digital selling capability grant, which was a small tester grant to see how that would work in the economy. It has been significantly oversubscribed, and I am therefore pleased that the Finance Minister has allocated a further £3 million to that grant scheme, which we will be able to open up again. I have also asked Invest NI to look at the thresholds in that grant scheme so that it is open to a wider range of small businesses.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for her answer and the commitment to apprenticeships and skills training, which target resources at our young people in particular. Will the Minister confirm whether her Department has looked at where job vacancies in the next six to 12 months are forecast for so that young people will be better informed through the careers advice that might be available to them on what options to take?

Mrs Dodds: We already know that COVID has not had an equal impact across sectors of our economy. Sectors like hospitality and the high street have been very adversely impacted by COVID, but some sectors have actually powered ahead in this really difficult and challenging period. We continue to see significant growth in the numbers of people of all ages who are able to gain employment in the digital and tech sectors, for example. We have been looking at how we can help young people to get into those sectors, particularly through the assured skills academy routes. I often mention the academy that we ran with Microsoft, because it was a fantastic way for young people to gain experience of that sector and of employment. Twenty-four young people took part in that skills academy, which was delivered online at the height of COVID, and 23 of those young people are employed today.

Ms Bunting: We have heard a lot in the Chamber today about need and the delays in grants getting out. Unquestionably, it is imperative that people get the money that they so desperately need. Will the Minister confirm the ratio of the delays in grants between her Department and the Department of Finance? Will she also outline what support she receives from Executive colleagues when, in their discussions on restrictions and lockdown, she makes the case for the survival of businesses? Was her Department's report —?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member asked a number of questions.

Ms Bunting: Was her Department's report taken into account by any —?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. Members have asked a number of questions and had a lead-in. I ask the Minister to answer the question. If you want to ensure that your key question is put, put it early.

Mrs Dodds: It will be no surprise to you that I advocate, at all times, for an open and free economy that is able to trade safely in these COVID pandemic times. That is difficult. Many people will have seen the agonies that the Executive have put themselves through with the restrictions over the last period. That is because the balance is very difficult to get right. However, it is also imperative that we recognise that, in closing down our economy, we impair the life chances of our people and our community. That weighs heavily on my mind. I never fail to take the opportunity to advocate on behalf of those people. COVID has disproportionately impacted on the life chances of the young, women and the working poor. We need to see our economy open up again before Christmas.

I do not have the figures for the finance grant, but I have given freely and transparently the figures for the COVID restrictions grant. I will continue to work in a transparent way with the Assembly on this issue.

3.15 pm

Mr Sheehan: Minister, two weeks ago, the DUP vetoed public health advice and created a sense of confusion among the business classes about whether it would be safe to open. Does she accept that the entirely inappropriate use of a cross-community veto created unnecessary confusion and uncertainty among businesses and wider society?

Mrs Dodds: I will, of course, correct the Member and indicate to him that the decision that was taken on the previous occasion was taken with the support of the Health Minister. In fact, it mirrored almost identically, except for close-contact services and coffee shops, the request in the Health Minister's paper.

Furthermore, the decision to close down on 27 November is also at the request and recommendation of the Health Minister, backed up by the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Officer. That is clear and has been respected by the Executive as a whole.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is the end of the period of listed questions. We now come to topical questions.

COVID-19: Business Support

T1. Mr Gildernew asked the Minister for the Economy whether, given that businesses have been kept in the dark for so long and waited for four weeks for the opening of part B of the COVID restrictions business support scheme, as well as the fact that she has stated that part A of that scheme will close to new applicants before payments can be made under part B, she will extend the application dates so that eligible businesses will have sufficient time to apply and receive money before Christmas. (AQT 711/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: I congratulate the Member on a brave attempt to throw confusion over the issue. When I indicated that we would separate the two parts of the grant scheme, it was before we were to have a further period of restrictions. These schemes will, of course, run in parallel, and they will take account of the new timescales for those restrictions to apply.

Mr Gildernew: I thank the Minister for her answer. I am sure that that will be a great relief to business. I ask the Minister to consider extending the scheme to photographers, who are largely unemployed, not directly but due to the businesses that they serve as part of the supply chain.

Mrs Dodds: At my request, part B of the grant scheme specifically indicates that those who are not directly in the supply chain but cannot operate because they are part of the economy that is closed should be considered as well.

COVID-19: Safely Open Group

T2. Ms Bradshaw asked the Minister for the Economy for an update on the safely open group and the work that she will be involved in over the next few weeks. (AQT 712/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: These are issues that the Executive will take forward. I continue, of course, at all times, to have conversations with the wider hospitality industry and the retail industry etc. However, the Executive Office, officials from my Department, the Health Department and the Public Health Agency are involved in the rest.

Ms Bradshaw: I thank the Minister for her response. Given that we know more about the transmission of the virus in enclosed spaces, are you minded to bring forward a financial support scheme for businesses with a large number of employees who are quite sedentary during the day, so that they can improve the ventilation systems in their premises?

Mrs Dodds: That was one of the issues that was raised. I think that, if it is identified as an issue by the Public Health Agency, it is incumbent on the Executive to make money available for that.

Project Stratum

T3. Ms Dolan asked the Minister for the Economy, after welcoming the roll-out of Project Stratum, which will improve broadband connectivity for many in the Fermanagh and South Tyrone constituency, when 575 premises in the constituency that will not benefit initially from the project, despite being in the target intervention area, will be covered. (AQT 713/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: Of course, I was delighted that we were able to announce the beginning of Project Stratum. That is good news for Northern Ireland, and it is a direct result of the confidence and supply arrangement that the DUP had with the Conservative Government. It will be a lasting legacy for Northern Ireland. There are a number of premises that will not benefit in those target areas, and we are committed to working with the Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport to make sure that we can include the vast and overwhelming majority of those premises within the intervention area. This is an exciting project; 76,000 homes in Northern Ireland that are difficult to reach will have broadband and high-speed internet access. That is exciting not just for the individuals and families but for the connectivity and competitiveness of the economy in Northern Ireland.

Ms Dolan: Yes, Minister, I agree that it is exciting, but one of the ongoing issues with broadband and the digital divide has been that broadband providers prioritise urban areas for upgrades and improvements while rural areas are left behind. My fear is that, as technology develops, rural areas will be left behind and will be left with superfast broadband whereas urban areas will move to ultra-fast broadband. Minister, have you received any guarantees that Fibris will upgrade rural broadband services in the longer term so that rural areas can keep pace with urban areas?

Mrs Dodds: First of all, I indicate to the Member that 97% of the target intervention area for Project Stratum is rural Northern Ireland or settlements of less than 1,000 people. As I have said before, that is hugely important for the connectivity of the economy, for the balancing of the economy in Northern Ireland and for making our economy more competitive. In terms of the actual broadband, Fibris has a contract to deliver on the specifics of its particular contract. However, we recognise that these things are changing and moving very fast, and we will try to keep up with that, given the constraints of any particular contract that the company has.

COVID-19: Business Support Payments

T4. Mr Catney asked the Minister for the Economy whether she agrees that the delay in payments made under part A of the COVID-19 restrictions business support scheme is unacceptable and has caused huge distress and hardship; and will confirm that the payments will be made as quickly as possible. (AQT 714/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: As I have said before in the House, the COVID restrictions schemes fall into two parts. One is the local restrictions scheme delivered by the Department of Finance, and I am not aware of and do not have up-to-date details in relation to that scheme. The second one is the restrictions one, which is being delivered by my Department. That grant scheme opened up for business on 28 October and made its first payment on 6 November. Almost half of all its payments are now out, and that represents about £3.6 million of assistance to date. All applications that have had an accountant's letter for verification have been paid, and Invest NI officials worked over the weekend on others that are more difficult to verify. Part B of the scheme opened on 18 November. To date, 111 applications have been received, and officials will be working as quickly as possible to verify those applications and get payments out.

Mr Catney: Thank you, Minister. You have been provided with additional resources today to extend the scheme for the next two weeks. Given — I am going to be hard — the failure of the Department that you oversee to get that desperately needed money out as quickly as possible, can you provide a time frame for the delivery of these grants to the businesses, please?

Mrs Dodds: The business support schemes that are supporting businesses during the periods of restrictions remain the same. I indicated that, because it was so close to Christmas, many of our retail businesses should receive an enhanced payment, but I was told that that was not possible on this occasion and that doing so might even delay funding being paid out. We will, however, continue to work to ensure that businesses receive their funding as quickly as possible. I do not recognise this as being a failure. These are complex schemes that have to be delivered with assurance, as they involve the taxpayer's money.

Connectivity

T5. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister for the Economy, after congratulating her on the announcement of Project Stratum and agreeing with her that we would not be in this position were it not for the DUP and the confidence and supply agreement, to expand on connectivity and the economy, particularly in post-COVID times. (AQT 715/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: Project Stratum is new and exciting. It is not available in any other part of the United Kingdom. It will provide greater connectivity, greater regional balance and help our economy to be more competitive. The current issues with the pandemic and the restrictions have clearly demonstrated how connectivity, and not just by road, rail or air but in the digital sense, is so vital for our economy going forward.

Many of the firms and companies that I talk to about investing in Northern Ireland have indicated, some of them very recently, that access to good broadband schemes is important but that the skills and resilience of our people in dealing with the huge difficulties that we have had are of major importance if we are to attract investment to Northern Ireland. Project Stratum is therefore a very significant and lasting legacy of that DUP-Conservative confidence and supply deal.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for her answer. She will know that many indigenous businesses, local farmers and various other people in our rural communities have poor broadband connection. I do not understand it totally, because I am a townie and have great broadband, but what conversations has the Minister had with other Ministers about the concerns raised? We have had conversations during lockdown with the Education Minister about how children access online learning. What conversations have taken place with other Ministers?

Mrs Dodds: I am sure that everyone in the House will recognise the real difficulties that families with poor connectivity have had. I spoke to one family whose members had to take it in turn to access broadband in their home. That is a very difficult situation, when we have young people wanting to get online, schools trying to teach lessons online and folk trying to work from home. Project Stratum will start to address those difficult issues, and I am delighted that it is being rolled out. For Members' information, I have asked Fibrus to ensure that MLAs are kept well informed about the roll-out of Project Stratum in their area.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Caoimhe Archibald is not in her place.

Real Living Wage

T7. Mr McHugh asked the Minister for the Economy whether, if she is serious about poverty, low pay and employment, she will guarantee that public money will be used to create jobs that pay at least the real living wage, given that she and previous DUP Economy Ministers have not addressed the issue of low pay and work poverty and that, since 2014, Invest NI has supported 2,950 jobs that pay less than the real living wage. (AQT 717/17-22)

Mrs Dodds: I thank the Member for his question. He raises an issue that is very important to me. COVID and the restrictions imposed as a result have impacted significantly on families and the working poor. If you are on furlough, receiving 80% of your salary, that will significantly impact on your ability to pay the mortgage, meet the grocery bill and do everything that a family normally does.

I am concerned that, if we continue in a cycle of lockdown, we will simply perpetuate the difficulties, particularly for the working poor, for women who rely on the hospitality sector for additional family funds and for the many other sectors for which it is a real issue. We need to get to the stage where the economy is open and able to function appropriately. We will do that not only with restrictions but with better testing and the vaccine that we hope to see rolled out in Northern Ireland in the future. I am committed to ensuring that we do not have a race to the bottom either in the jobs that we create or the conditions and restrictions that we impose on the economy.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That concludes the period for questions to the Minister for the Economy. Members may take their ease for a few moments before the next item of business.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Executive Committee Business

Harbours (Grants and Loans Limit) Bill: First Stage

Ms Mallon (The Minister for Infrastructure): I beg to introduce the Harbours (Grants and Loans Limit) Bill [NIA 12/17-22], which is a Bill to amend the Harbours Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 to increase the statutory limit on certain grants and loans for harbour works etc.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Speaker: Members may take their ease for a few moments while we prepare the Chamber for the next item of business.

Committee Business

Committee for the Economy: Energy Strategy Report

Dr Archibald (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Economy): I beg to move

That this Assembly welcomes the special report of the Committee for the Economy on considerations for the forthcoming energy strategy; supports the development of an ambitious, target-driven energy strategy that will decarbonise the energy sector by 2050 while minimising the cost to the consumer; and recognises the strategy's potential to boost our economic, health and social well-being into the future.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members will have five minutes. Please open the debate on the motion.

Dr Archibald: The Committee recently undertook a micro-inquiry to seek views from stakeholders on what they wanted to see in the energy strategy being developed by the Department for the Economy. That is in the context of the British Government's legislative target of net zero carbon by 2050. The energy strategy will determine the future priorities and potential changes needed to achieve that and other targets. During the inquiry period, earlier this year, the Committee asked stakeholders a range of questions about what they would like to see as the key elements of the energy strategy, what the future holds for the renewables industry and whether there would necessarily be a difference in the price of energy for business and consumers in the future. The Committee received over 180 responses from across energy organisations, consumers, individuals, businesses and academics. I put on record my thanks to those who took the time to respond.

The Committee has produced a special report summarising the themes that have emerged. It has shared the inquiry report with the Economy Minister, and it is that report that we are discussing today. In addition to the inquiry, the Committee heard evidence from departmental officials on the energy strategy and has, on the whole, relayed its encouragement of the process for the development of the new energy strategy, the progress of which the Committee will continue to monitor regularly.

Through the micro-inquiry, the Committee identified issues that will need to be addressed in the energy strategy. We are about to go through a massive upheaval of the whole energy system through the electrification of heat and transport systems, and it is important that stakeholders are involved in shaping the design along with government.

First, the energy strategy must have a statutory footing and binding targets that are clear, measurable, ambitious and in line with both the Programme of Government outcomes and the UN sustainable development goals. From looking in more detail at the current targets, we see that there may be scope to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by at least 45% by 2030 on the basis of the Climate Change Committee's (CCC) recommendations, with a view to assessing the feasibility of a 70% reduction by 2030. The energy strategy should implement policies towards those targets while moving towards a target of net zero carbon before 2050. To that end, consideration should be given to establishing an NI climate Act along the lines of those already designed in Scotland and Wales.

The Committee is alive to the fact that the UK Office for National Statistics (ONS) family expenditure survey shows that households in the North spend a higher percentage of their income on energy than those in other regions. More than one in five households here is in fuel poverty, so they cannot afford to spend more on energy bills. To tackle that, we must turn our attention to enhancing the existing energy efficiency schemes to ensure that homes and businesses are as energy-efficient as possible. That will lower consumption and, therefore, bills. In that regard, it is crucial that energy efficiency targets be identified and set, together with new building regulations that future-proof the energy efficiency of new developments. Above all, the most vulnerable must be protected during the energy transition.

Investment is urgently needed in a number of areas. With regard to transport infrastructure and the rise in the number of electric vehicles, there is clearly a need for investment in car-charging infrastructure. That, along with a modal shift to encouraging walking, cycling and using public transport, will have a significant impact on carbon emissions. Investment is also required in the electricity grid, with the successful deployment of large-scale renewables projects. That is becoming urgent, as it is needed to allow renewable energy to enter the system.

Careful adjustment is necessary for the planning system to succeed in allowing forms of energy production such as wind turbines and energy storage areas. Additionally, smaller companies wishing to install renewable energy technology may need to access funding support schemes to help to cover the initial outlay and to reduce financing risks. The ability to store energy will play a significant role in bringing more renewables on to the system. To that end, we need a separate action plan to encourage large-scale storage, localised storage and biogas. In relation to the natural gas network and its expansion, hydrogen is increasingly seen as a green fuel for the future that could replace natural gas. We note that plans are under way for gas networks to transition to hydrogen over the coming three decades.

Some sectors will be able to make a bigger contribution than others to lowering carbon emissions; for example, agricultural practices. The main opportunities for reducing emissions from agriculture are evidenced in crop and soil management and measures to reduce livestock intensity. However, there is a role for increased energy efficiency. To achieve all that, we need the local workforce to develop a suitable skill set to take forward new technologies and infrastructure.

An effective strategy should identify key areas of work for government, local government, educators, businesses and communities and, preferably, should be co-produced to maximise the available expertise and ownership of the changes to take place. There is so much to do. As, I am sure, you will recognise, the energy strategy has the capacity to be one of the biggest issues that our economy can gain from right now. The energy strategy has a considerable role to play in making the North a place that is investable, particularly through having the levers to keep manufacturing facilities here and being able to expand them. The Committee's primary concern, while meeting the carbon net-zero target, is to make energy affordable, so that businesses and consumers can thrive and enjoy higher levels of health and well-being. We have to get this right.

I will now make some remarks on behalf of Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin made submissions to the DFE call for evidence and the Economy Committee's micro-inquiry. Tackling the climate emergency is one of the fundamental challenges of this century. It is an issue that we have discussed a number of times in the Chamber. In January, the first motion that Sinn Féin brought before the Assembly was to declare a climate emergency. Since then, a climate change Bill has been submitted with cross-party support. That is an important basis for dealing with the challenge of climate change. However, the strategies underpinning the legislation will be key to achieving the targets. The energy strategy is one of the most important. It cuts across Departments and sectors. It is also a real opportunity to lay down a marker about the approach that we want to take to the decarbonisation of our economy and society.

Sinn Féin believes that the energy strategy must be based on a number of principles. Foremost of those is a just transition. As we seek to move rapidly away from fossil fuel dependency, there is an opportunity to tackle the economic status quo that has caused and exacerbated the climate crisis and to reshape our economy, creating a fairer, more equal and sustainable society. The COVID crisis has brought into sharp focus economic inequalities. As we plan our recovery, it is critical that a just transition approach is core to economic rebuilding. The second is public and community ownership of energy and renewable resources. Across the island, we have the resources that can be harnessed to provide the energy that we need. Communities and the public should have the opportunity to benefit directly from those abundant resources. Democratising our energy market not only gives communities a financial stake but increases the awareness and buy-in from the public towards the goal of decarbonisation. The third is rural and urban equality. Tackling regional imbalances in energy supply must be part of the energy strategy. On the basis of the principles of just transition, the barriers faced by rural communities — for example, the lack of public transport — must be taken account of. The fourth is a green new deal, which was a commitment in 'New Decade, New Approach'. As I have said, it must be one of the key facets of our economic recovery strategy. The potential of our renewable resources provides huge opportunities for the creation of green-collar jobs through investment in research and innovation, infrastructure and skills development. Finally, the climate does not recognise borders, so, on this small island, there needs to be strong cooperation. Our energy market is already integrated, and we must ensure that our energy strategy takes account of that. It must harness modern technologies to assist in achieving our emissions reduction targets. An energy strategy based on those principles, with ambitious targets that are reviewed regularly and sectoral plans, would go a long way to achieving the progress towards decarbonisation that we need to see in the short, medium and longer term.

I thank those who shared their views with the Committee. The report is available on the Committee's web page on the Assembly's website. I encourage anyone with an interest in the subject to read it and to continue to engage with the development of the energy strategy. I commend the motion to the Assembly.

3.45 pm

Mr Dunne: As a member of the Economy Committee, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important issue.

There is no doubt that energy affordability and security of supply are key issues, and we must ensure that they are kept high on the agenda. The cost of electricity to consumers continues to be a real challenge to domestic and commercial energy users. Energy has been an important issue in the Committee for some time, and the micro-inquiry has been an opportunity for stakeholders in the sector to have their say and to engage on this important issue.

The ongoing COVID-19 pandemic has presented unprecedented challenges for businesses and domestic consumers. While having a strategy in place to ensure that we have a sustainable energy future is important, it is paramount that our short-term challenge is to ensure that energy is affordable. The manufacturing sector has huge challenges with energy costs. Its high energy costs are very challenging for the sector in being able to compete globally in the world marketplace.

Wind energy has been the main source of renewable energy in Northern Ireland, which we all seem to be proud of, and it has achieved its renewable target of 40% by 2020. That was heavily incentivised through the renewables obligation certificates (ROCs) scheme, which has now closed. However, I question the total cost of the scheme, which providers have been tied into with 20-year contracts.

There are, of course, drawbacks with wind energy as wind is not consistent, and many wind turbines are producing surplus amounts of energy, which could be transferred to battery storage units for later use or to be fed into the grid system. However, there are many major challenges in getting sufficient battery capacity to deliver that.

Connections into the grid continue to be a challenge for wind turbines due to weak infrastructure in some parts of the country. There is a problem with most of the generation being in the west of the Province while there is greater demand for supply in the east of the Province.

The gas network needs further support. More needs to be done to encourage consumers to connect to gas. Suppliers such as Phoenix Natural Gas continue to encourage uptake within the greater Belfast area, which ranges from 30% to 60% where networks exist, and gives consumers more value and cleaner energy. Approximately 70% of households across Northern Ireland still have oil-based heating systems, and the current price of home heating oil is relatively cheap in comparison with just a number of years ago as it has an average price, as I understand it, of £235 for 900 litres. It is important to have a mix of energy sources to ensure that no one is left in fuel poverty and to ensure that costs are kept competitive for domestic consumers and businesses.

I recently had a discussion with Phoenix Natural Gas about the use of hydrogen to replace natural gas. I believe that that will work within the existing network and will produce cleaner and more efficient energy. Hydrogen energy has also been described as the main driver for decarbonising the global economy. We have an opportunity here to become a world leader in hydrogen production and technology. Wrightbus is involved in development work on hydrogen buses, and I understand that Dublin is slightly ahead of us — it is hard to believe, but that is true — as it is trialling hydrogen buses. That presents an exciting opportunity for Northern Ireland. However, it will require significant investment, and I know that the Prime Minister has committed to investing in this new technology. There is the potential to create many jobs in hydrogen technology, in the aerospace industry and in advanced materials sectors and supply chains.

There is a role for education in a future strategy to encourage energy efficiency through focused education. We now have the green light for the development of the North/South interconnector, which went through in September. That will help to improve network stability and security of supply for energy users in Northern Ireland.

I look forward to hearing from the Minister, and I know that she is committed to bringing forward a fit-for-purpose energy strategy for Northern Ireland.

Mr Catney: I thank Committee members and the Committee Clerk for the work that has gone into producing the special report and their ongoing commitment to a new green future for Northern Ireland.

I stand here thankful that, finally, in 2020, we have got to the point where, despite some politically charged rumblings, I have heard our Economy Minister and our Environment Minister speak in the Chamber about the need to protect our environment and tackle climate change. In the context of the debate, I particularly welcome the Minister's recognition in her road map, which was published in June, of the central role of the green economy in rebuilding the Northern Ireland economy.

An effective energy strategy must have ambitious targets to tackle decarbonisation in heat, power and transport. It must be recognised that, when it comes to power, we have made some excellent progress. Fifteen years ago, 3% of our electricity consumption came from renewables; today, it is 47%. That is a great leap forward and a success that we should build on. It is good news not just for the environment, with 9 megatons of carbon saved in the last 20 years, but for consumers, with £135 million saved on consumer bills since 2000. I welcome the Minister's commitment to build on that success by setting new ambitious targets for emissions in Northern Ireland, which, she said, should not be below 70%.

Mr Stalford: I appreciate the Member giving way. The Member is right to note the massive progress that has been made through not only the contribution that Northern Ireland has made but through the contribution, more generally, throughout the West. Does the Member agree that it cannot be right that there are countries in the world that are still building coal-fired power stations?

Mr Catney: Yes, I agree, and I have to ask that question, but we are looking at what we are doing here in Northern Ireland. It is good news that has to be commended and welcomed as much as possible.

The suggested target of renewable energy for Northern Ireland of 80% by 2030 would have the effect on the reduction of carbon emissions of every household turning off the electricity for 1-5 years. The key success to our increase in renewable generation has been the increase in onshore wind. The Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO), which was the main support stream for encouraging increased renewable electricity generation, spurred that on. However, the scheme closed in 2017. Any future targets must be accompanied by credible incentive schemes in order to spearhead movement towards our ambitious targets.

However, it is not all good news. Successive Executives have failed to produce a coherent plan to realise the benefits of offshore wind, while all our closest neighbours have shot forward in that area. There must be continued engagement with partners across Government and businesses, including the Crown Estate, to address barriers and ensure that Northern Ireland has the potential to benefit from future seabed leasing rounds.

We need to consider the clear targets on heat that were set by the Government in Dublin to have 500,000 greener homes and 400,000 heat pumps installed by 2030. That goes beyond the structured thinking of just looking at heat, power and transport. It will require us to look at changing behaviour, and a model should be taken from the EU clean energy package's ambition to see citizens put at the heart of the future of energy. That behavioural shift will be key to any effective energy transformation.

We need to keep an eye on emerging transport technologies, which has been alluded to by my colleague. While hydrogen will be the key to unlocking the greener transport system, any energy strategy must have the flexibility to deal with new technologies that we may not have fully considered today. That will not only make the strategy more effective but will add to the longevity of it. I also welcome the work that the Minister for Infrastructure has been doing to develop a green transport strategy, particularly the groundbreaking cross-border work with Minister Ryan that I hope to see much more of.

A new green economy is not only central to protecting our area for the next generations but it is now clear that it is central to the recovery of our economy from the pandemic and will be a key driver for growth in the future. I know that the Committee will continue to work to make sure that any energy strategy realises that potential.

Dr Aiken: I welcome the report and thank the Chair and members of the Committee for it. It is entirely timely.

I need to make a declaration: I was formerly the chief executive of the British Irish Chamber of Commerce, and I was heavily involved in the renewable energy sector. It always struck me that, when I asked businesses in the sector from across these islands why they did not want to invest more heavily in Northern Ireland, they said that there were four reasons that prevented a greater output of renewable energy. The first was the monopolistic position that was, very clearly, held by the Electricity Supply Board (ESB) and EirGrid, the large costs that were involved in connection and the lack of investment in the grid.

The second was the role of the regulator and the fact that, in many cases, the Utility Regulator seemed to prevent moves towards best practice, including in renewable energy. The third issue was the question of whether the Department for the Economy was fit for purpose and whether it had the breadth and scope to deal with the issue of renewable energy. Unfortunately, from what we have picked up from the RHI inquiry and other evidence that has come to light, the Department for the Economy was not fit for purpose and could not deal with that issue. We hope that that has changed.

The final issue was the lack of ambition in Northern Ireland to get to the point at which it could be a leader not only on these islands but globally when it comes to renewable energy. Thanks to our geography, we have an abundance of wind energy. We have the ability to have an abundance of offshore wind energy. We have the ability, because we have suitable scale, to be a gateway between the Republic of Ireland and the rest of our nation, the United Kingdom. In the wider energy field, we have the ability to connect to the new developments that are going on in Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands, and to the very large offshore wind energy fields in the North Sea. All of those things point to how Northern Ireland could be more ambitious.

I thank Dr Archibald very much for the report. My issue is that it talks about 2050. Our Prime Minister is talking about electric vehicles (EVs) being rolled out and being the only vehicles allowed on the road by 2030. That is much more ambitious. That is what we should be aiming for. To decarbonise energy, we need to get to the point where we send a signal to everybody in Northern Ireland who wants to invest in green energy that we are the place in which to do so. How can we do that? One example is biogas and the move towards hydrogen. We have a surplus of biogas. We have heard on numerous occasions about the problems that we have with anaerobic digestion and the waste that comes from our dairy and poultry businesses. We have a real opportunity to strip out that biogas and transform it so that we become a hydrogen economy. We can do that because we have the scale to make it work effectively in Northern Ireland, but there must be a signal to the market to make that happen. That ambition must be part of a strategy to try to make it happen.

The issue with the grid is significant. Many of us will have had many constituents complaining that, when they tried to connect low-energy wind or anaerobic digestion to the grid, they discovered that they were being charged three or four times the rate that they would be charged in the south of Scotland. It is even more galling that the exact same contractors who do this in the south of Scotland are charging three or four times as much in Northern Ireland.

There are also issues with planning. How can it be that, after this length of time, we do not have a planning process that is fit for purpose? I say to the Committee Chairman and the Minister: let us have some ambition in Northern Ireland and set ourselves a target not of 2050 but of 2035. It is ambitious, but it is doable. Let us do it.

4.00 pm

Ms Armstrong: On behalf of the Alliance Party, I welcome this special report and its contribution to the debate on our energy future. I thank Dr Archibald, the Committee and all its staff for the work they have put in on this. It is a really informative document on the choices and issues that we face in energy policy.

When it comes to energy policy, we must always pursue an evidence-based approach. This is a huge issue that affects our everyday lives. We face a climate crisis right now, and we must act to reduce emissions, protect the natural environment and make our ways of living more sustainable for future generations. Northern Ireland has done well in the past in increasing our energy efficiency and, especially, our renewable electricity generation, but we must not consider this to be mission accomplished. We can, and should, be out front, as others have mentioned, leading not only in the UK and Ireland, but in the world, and we have the potential for this. I echo Dr Aiken's point: I see the Department setting an ambitious target for renewable energy generation. Ultimately, we want 100% of our electricity to come from renewables. I note that Scotland is aiming for 100% by the end of this year, so this is clearly doable.

Time is short, so I want to highlight some of the key points made by respondents, if I may. They highlighted the need for energy issues to be interconnected through partnership across government. Departmental silos will harm our ambitions for a better future. Departments, especially Finance, Economy, DAERA, Communities and Infrastructure, must ensure that close and functional working relationships are the norm. Many have already pointed towards a green new deal. The transition to a greener economy must also be clearly interconnected with the relevant skills training. We must not leave people behind as the deindustrialisation of the 1970s and 1980s did, causing massive ongoing impacts on our community today.

One particular area that the report and respondents noted in the decarbonisation of heat was the issue of fuel poverty. That has been a persuasive issue for this part of the world, and must always be a key priority for policymakers. We must make sure that, as we invest in the future of green energy, the costs do not fall on the vulnerable. So much more could be done in home insulation. As communities spokesperson for the Alliance Party, I know that our housing stock does not perform particularly badly, but many of the poorest live in poorly insulated private rental homes. Our entire housing stock will need to be looked at, and serious amounts of easy-to-access funding provided to people to live them to adequately heat and light their homes.

Our public buildings, too, will need improvement. That is why the Departments of Education and Health, which own a huge portion of the public buildings of Northern Ireland, need to be brought in. Let us not forget the roles of the Department for Communities and Department of Finance with the number of publicly owned homes. There are many opportunities in the decarbonisation of heat already, and more needs to be done in integrating these into plans and planning regulations for the future. This will require investment in our energy infrastructure and breaking down barriers that prevent necessary and eco-friendly projects from progressing.

Energy storage will also be key. In particular, as the report highlights, we should be looking at our mix and at whether offshore wind and other marine technologies could play a considerable part in this.

Finally, there is transport. As has been mentioned, we are a heavily car-dependent society. Until COVID, private transport was having a renaissance, more out of necessity, but, when things start to return to normal, major investments in transport will be needed. That needs to be taken into electric vehicles and a hydrogen infrastructure for cars. It should absolutely mean that public transport runs on electricity or clean energies, certainly not petrol or diesel. With the Department for Infrastructure and Northern Ireland Water, we have an opportunity in Northern Ireland to consider whether there are options to develop hydrogen production. As we know, that needs a steady volume of water and, given that Northern Ireland Water is one of the highest users of electricity, it is in their interests to be part of that process. We may even be able to resolve the ongoing issue of the cost of running a water system and keeping it at the required standard by bringing energy production options into consideration through Northern Ireland Water.

Energy policy affects us all, so we have to get this right and ensure that everyone in our society is invested in this. Northern Ireland deserves clean and healthy air, a protected environment and a sustainable and secure energy supply. I look forward to the Department's consultation on an energy strategy, taking into consideration this report in order to secure it.

Mr Frew: I welcome the micro report and thank the Committee for its work. Energy will always be a massive piece of the economy portfolio. I also pay tribute to the Minister, who has met me on the issue.

Let us face it: energy is a massive issue for any devolved jurisdiction, simply because we all pay for it. The problem that we have in Northern Ireland is that our heavy industrial users pay more for energy because of the network charges and everything that goes with them. That has been a massive problem over the years and has led to job losses not only in my constituency but across Northern Ireland. Energy costs have been ranked in the top five reasons that businesses have left these shores. They are therefore a massive issue, and I thank the Committee for keeping it on the boil.

I must speak about my constituency and Wrightbus's work with hydrogen. There are massive energy issues, but carbon is not necessarily the issue, as a good bit of that has been resolved through the use of renewable energy. Where the use of carbon has to be fought is in the areas of transport and heat. By bringing in hydrogen and producing hydrogen buses, two birds can be killed with one stone. Growth can be created in the transport sector that reduces carbon, but wind is also being utilised, and that cannot currently be done, as it cannot be put into the grid because of the inertia issue. We can produce as much wind as we like, but, unless there is a system to back it up and the inertia to keep the energy stable, it cannot be used. There are many ways to do that. Battery storage can be used to contain the energy produced, or that energy can be converted into hydrogen. That hydrogen can then be put into our bus stock and heavy goods vehicles, I suggest. I suspect that batteries are the way to go for small cars, but hydrogen is most definitely the way to go for buses and heavy goods vehicles.

There are times in the energy sector that you stay still and watch and monitor what happens across the world. With hydrogen, I suggest to the Committee and the Minister that now is not one of those times to stop and look. We should go for it, as we have the tools and wherewithal available, and Wrightbus is in the lap of Northern Ireland.

Ms Armstrong: I thank the Member for giving way. One of the outcomes of producing hydrogen is oxygen, and there is a world shortage of oxygen. Northern Ireland not only could be one of the higher producers of hydrogen but could resolve an oxygen problem. Does the Member think that there should be investment in hydrogen production on a massive scale?

Mr Frew: I entirely agree with the Member, I really do.

You can have all the energy strategies and plans in the world, but, unless you have a system operator that is fit for purpose, you will fail. What do I mean by that? The system operator here is the System Operator for Northern Ireland (SONI), and it has massive issues with independence and governance. That hurts Northern Ireland and will hurt Northern Ireland in the future. SONI has been before the Economy Committee only once. I must applaud my colleague Christopher Stalford, who tore them to pieces over the problems in SONI.

I will pick one example, as I know my time is short. SONI's owner is EirGrid. I have no problem with who owns SONI or with who owns the owners; it is the transparency issue that I have a real problem with. Since EirGrid has owned SONI, there has been a sifting of £12 million out of SONI to EirGrid for cross-charging. EirGrid will not tell us what it is for, what it was charged on or what it paid for, and it hides behind its statement of accounts to Companies House. EirGrid uses a model, FRS 101, to justify that secrecy and lack of transparency. If we do not have a system operator that functions properly, is fit for purpose, is at full capacity and is truly and properly independent, we will fail, no matter what strategy we put in place. No matter what plan we have for the future, if we do not have a fit-for-purpose and fixed SONI, we will fail. We will all pay, every one of us, but mostly our businesses and heavy industry users. That will be catastrophic for jobs, business and the economy.

Mr McGuigan: As other Members have done, I thank my party colleague the Chair of the Economy Committee for bringing the inquiry report to the Assembly for debate. Any energy strategy must be placed firmly in the context of the global climate and biodiversity crisis, and, therefore, for us in the North, the strategy must be an ambitious exercise in decarbonisation and radical climate action. The United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has reported that two thirds of all fossil fuels that we know to exist must remain in the ground if we are to avoid irreversible climate change. Therefore, it is madness that we would even allow exploration for further fuel reserves in the North. Ireland's fossil fuels must remain in the ground. That is the view of the Assembly, as expressed clearly and loudly in a recent debate on fracking and petroleum licensing. It is a view that must direct the action, strategies and policies of the Economy Minister.

The Climate Change Committee requires at least a 35% reduction by 2030 to contribute to the fifth carbon budget, and we have modelled for a reduction of up to 45%. That 45% reduction should be the lower limit of our ambition; in fact, given our abundance of renewable resources, it is decidedly unambitious. As other Members have pointed out, the Scottish Government, for example, have committed to 75% reduction against the 1990 baseline by 2030 in their Climate Change Act; in fact, we in the North still do not have a climate Act and are the only jurisdiction in these islands with that dubious claim. That is, again, recognition that we need to catch up. A bespoke climate change Act must be devised and implemented as a matter of urgency to codify targets and lay out clear emission reduction milestones. It should also codify sectoral sub-targets for emission reduction.

To decarbonise rapidly, we must also tackle the issue of demand. The energy strategy should lay out clear sectoral energy-efficiency targets bound by an overall efficiency target, and it must do so in a way that is consistent with just transition principles. Any move to decarbonise cannot disenfranchise workers or their families or make their lives more difficult; otherwise the policy will be resisted and fail. If planned properly, though, a just transition could, in fact, positively transform the lives of people, rapidly reducing emissions while creating high-quality and secure green-collar jobs and warmer homes for all through retrofitting and other measures. It could develop more efficient ways of moving around through investment in active travel and public transport, helping to create a healthier lifestyle. It can produce a world-class digital and physical infrastructure, with an abundance of renewable and more affordable electricity from our common wind and tidal resources.

The Kilroot coal-fired power station, for example, must be closed by 2025 at the latest. However, in line with just transition principles, that should be done only with the necessary employment supports and retraining offers in place for workers and in full cooperation with trades unions. The closure of Kilroot should not leave any worker unemployed or any family worse off.

For both moral and practical reasons, we need an energy strategy based on the principles of just transition. The requirement to urgently transform our society and our economy away from fossil-fuel dependency and wastefulness presents an opportunity to tackle the economic status quo that caused the climate crisis in the first place. As we confront the climate crisis, we must also reshape our economy to create a more democratic, equal and sustainable society. That must be the guiding principle at the heart of any energy strategy.

An energy strategy should, as others have said, be rural-proofed and must take account of the specific issues facing rural areas that result in more carbon-intensive lifestyles, such as sparse connections to the gas grid, poor investment in renewable infrastructure and extremely limited public transport.

We must grow the economy through a green new deal. By 2016, more than 50 renewable energy companies were active in the North; as of March 2020, that figure stands at just five. Less than 1% of the private-sector workforce is employed in the green economy, which is accountable for 1.6% of the total turnover. Given the vast economic potential of our renewable resources and the opportunities for high-skilled jobs, high-value research and innovation, retrofitting and construction of green infrastructure that stem from them, that is a stark policy failure. Prioritising the green economy should guide energy strategy policy. An 80% target for renewable electricity by 2030 could result in £1.1 billion of new investment in the North. Climate change does not recognise borders. To be effective, the island of Ireland must operate together where possible to ensure maximum efficiency gains —

Mr Speaker: The Member needs to wind up on his remarks, please.

4.15 pm

Mr McGuigan: — and most appropriate use of resources. I welcome this strategy and the shift in policy that it represents.

Mr Middleton: Like other Members, I welcome the motion. As an Economy Committee member I thank all of the members who played their role in bringing the report to the House, and I thank the Clerk and the Assembly staff for the way in which they conducted themselves on this and all of the matters. As Members have said, energy has a huge part to play in a very significant and large Economy Department. I thank them for that.

The micro inquiry received a large range of responses from across energy and business organisations, consumers, individuals and academics. There was a lot of good engagement, and it brought together this important report, though, of course, the report is just the beginning of a discussion of the ideas that were brought forward. We know that, as that report has been provided to the Department for the Economy, the energy strategy itself will determine future priorities and the potential changes needed to achieve the targets in it. Whilst we want to see progress as soon as possible, we recognise that there are time frames to be met, and we hope that the energy strategy can be put out to consultation early in 2021.

There is no time to stand still, and we need to continue to make progress. I welcome the fact that the Minister has said that this is one of her priorities. She has, of course, announced the 2030 renewable electricity target as being at least 70%. I, like many other Members, have met many people across the sectors who have welcomed that. There will, of course, be those who say that we need to be more ambitious, but it is welcome that we have that target in place.

We got a range a views on what would or should be the key elements of the energy strategy. It is clear that there is strong support for the principal focus of the energy strategy to be the 2050 net zero carbon emissions target that the UK has adopted. All of the actions in the strategy should, at the very least, promote and be very consistent with the aim of meeting the 2050 target. It was highlighted that this should require cross-departmental working. We all acknowledge and reflect on the fact that all we do in the Assembly requires a certain level of that.

As has been highlighted by other Members, consumers and affordability are key issues. I welcome the fact that the responses brought that very much to the fore, because all of us who represent constituents want to ensure that whatever comes out will tackle fuel poverty and benefit the consumer and businesses.

The infrastructure element is important. There was a strong recognition that we need to see more investment in public transport systems as a way to reduce energy consumption. There was also an important view, which I share, that we need to see more investment in the electricity grid and the realisation of strategic infrastructure in a timely manner. That is crucial as well.

On a final note, promoting the energy strategy and increasing public awareness were important points to come out of the micro inquiry as well. We want to encourage stakeholders to be fully aware of the energy strategy and of the draft energy strategy and of how their role as businesses and consumers is important to its success. It is important as well that we see the involvement in this of communities at every level in our constituencies and Northern Ireland, because this will impact all of us. We all have a role to play.

I look forward to seeing the outcome of the debate on the energy strategy. We look forward to seeing the consultation. There will be many more discussions to be had in the Chamber around all of the details, but this is an important discussion that we are having today. As I said, I very much welcome the motion.

Mr O'Dowd: I apologise to the Chair and to Members who have spoken thus far on the report for not being in the Chamber for most of the debate. It is important work. The Committee Clerk and staff are to be congratulated on the work that has been done on what is proving to be a more important issue each time that we debate it. Of course, we have to move beyond debate to action and to seeing change in how we produce, manage and invest in our energy and, in turn, ensure that that investment is for the benefit of all the people whom we serve.

With the ongoing economic crisis caused by COVID-19 not only here but across the island, these islands and globally, eyes are turning to how we will come out the other side of the economic disaster. Over the weekend — perhaps, over a longer period — we heard talk of higher taxes. I do not object to higher taxes, but I want to know whom they will tax at a higher rate, because experience tells us that it is not always those who can afford to pay most. We hear talk of public-sector pay freezes and cuts to public-sector spending. They are issues of great concern, particularly to those in lower income brackets. When they hear politicians and Assemblies talk about climate action, climate change and new energy strategies, they are quietly concerned and ask themselves, “Who is going to pay for that?”. Will the new energy cost those people, as consumers who are trying to run a family home, a small business or even a large business, more? Will they or their family have to do without other things as a result of a new energy strategy?

That does not have to be the case; in fact, green energy and tackling climate change can be an economic driver, if used properly. If we can invest in programmes that create green energy, jobs and sustainability, why would we not do that? That is the factor and the prism through which all of this has to be looked at. A number of Members have said that the consumer is concerned. Let us allay that concern by saying that we see this as an economic driver and a way forward for change. We, as a society, could be energy providers across these islands, if we invest properly. We could lead the way in how we retrofit our homes. Recently, the Minister for Communities announced a programme of building new social houses. Those houses can and should be built to the highest standards in energy efficiency. I know that the Housing Executive does not build the social housing currently, but those involved in building social housing are fitting out their properties to high standards, which means that there is less cost in heating them, but improvements could be made.

I cannot speak on energy without plugging my Bill, which I propose to bring forward in the near future. It is out to public consultation. That Bill looks at how we allow for the microgeneration of green energy, where we allow farmers, individuals and communities to produce energy and then sell it back to the major producers, and calls on the producers to have a fixed price for it and to ensure that they purchase at least 5% of their energy from those producers. That allows for the production of energy to be brought down into communities.

Last week, we had a well-intentioned debate on how certain elements of agriculture produce harmful greenhouse gases. It is an important area to focus on, but, rather than simply focusing on how agriculture produces harmful gases, we should look at how we can support agriculture to produce energy. If we can get our farming community involved in the production of energy, as many are, along with others, they will not see this as an attack on them. They will see it as an opportunity. Many small businesses and individuals could also produce energy. Hopefully, we will hear more about the Bill during the consultation.

I welcome the report. It is another example of how Committees in this place do important work. They do not always attract the headlines, but they do important work behind the scenes. A lot of work is done in our Committees. I congratulate everyone involved in formulating the Committee report.

Mr Beggs: I find this to be a useful report, although I have to say that it tends to gather information rather than make clear recommendations. I would prefer to have seen clearer recommendations. The motion mentions a wish for ambitious targets. I did not get that in the report. I will illustrate what I am talking about. On the available options, the report mentions that some want 70% renewable energy by 2030, some want 80% by 2030, some want 100% by 2035, some want net zero by 2040, and others want 100% renewable as soon as possible. I do not know what the Committee is recommending. It just reports a series of figures. It would be better if the policy could be further developed with clearer targets. I recognise that this is a cross-cutting issue, so it is not just for the Economy Committee.

There are two sides to reducing our hydrocarbons. Yes, it is about replacing hydrocarbons with renewable energy, but it should also be about reducing energy demand in the first place. I would like to have seen more references to the green new deal scheme. Interestingly, on Friday, I visited a new development that is destined for social housing. It has triple glazing — not double glazing — and a heat ventilation recovery system. All that is built to a high standard. I suspect that the energy loads for those new tenants will be very low. By designing our houses in that way from the start, we can considerably reduce our energy demands.

Members mentioned retrofitting. We need to look at building control standards for our new buildings. Do we need to increase those? It is most efficient to build in that way from the beginning rather than having to come back in five or 10 years' time and add further insulation. I urge that we look at our new builds to see whether we need to increase that efficiency from the start. It is difficult to retrofit some houses, and it can certainly be expensive. However, we need to look at retrofitting insulation to bring about improvements.

Like others, I welcome the change in the Housing Executive. That may enable more houses to be built in a much more efficient way and to a higher standard, for the benefit of tenants. We have to recognise that there may be a slightly higher rent in the new houses because they are built to a higher standard, but look at the total cost. What will the energy bill be? Look at the quality of the environment in which individuals will live. Damp should be a thing of the past. There are thermostats to regulate heat to reduce bills further, so it is possible to improve heating standards.

Bespoke schemes have also been mentioned. I am conscious that Northern Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom — I dare say that it also applies if you take in the Republic of Ireland — with some of the lowest levels of government support to market new energy schemes. I suspect that that is a sad reflection of our past in terms of the renewable heat incentive (RHI) scheme and other forms of renewable energy; indeed, the Northern Ireland Audit Office reported recently that some turbine owners were being paid up to £100,000 a year above what they needed. It is important that we learn lessons and that we deviate from schemes that are applicable elsewhere with great caution. We must make sure that we build in contingency plans from the start in primary legislation, so that any rates that are set can be quickly adapted if that is needed.

Transport is another important area. Yes, the number of electric cars is increasing, as the Prime Minister has just indicated. However, equally, as others said, we need to get into hydrogen. A hydrogen hub needs to be created for Northern Ireland to support our buses and HGVs. For heavy goods vehicles that travel longer distances, hydrogen seems to be the only way to go.

Already, many other countries are taking a step ahead of us. China, in particular, is investing heavily in that, and I urge Northern Ireland to catch up and create its own energy hub for hydrogen.

4.30 pm

Ms Bailey: The Green Party also very much welcomes the motion. We are encouraged by the vast range of views and positive suggestions given by organisations to the energy strategy micro inquiry. We would now like to see those carefully analysed in order to extract the enormous amount of value and level of expertise that has been given to us in the report. Whilst we are hearing the strong common theme of interconnectivity from Members, we feel that there is a gap in the responses, because most are about energy. We heard in the debate that energy is only half of what we should be thinking about. Rather than the focus being singularly on energy, it, rightly, needs to extend to the green economy and to how all the things that are suggested in the micro inquiry can be used to generate more and better jobs, more savings and better and healthier lifestyles while giving us the tools to begin to combat and redress the damage that we allowed to happen to our environment before we reach the point of no return.

We know through previous motions and debates that the House has recognised that we are in a climate crisis and that decarbonising is urgent and essential. If the primary role of a Government is to work for the betterment of its people, one of the primary purposes of an energy strategy should be to provide a healthy, robust and sustainable economy in which all people can thrive.

The Green Party sees that future through a climate change Act, transforming and growing Northern Ireland from a fossil-fuelled driven economy to a green energy economy. With the level of renewable electricity that is being produced and managed, Northern Ireland will become a world leader in the technologies of renewable electricity and smart grid.

A green economy provides for a range of really transformative policies that will help us to rebuild society in a sustainable and ethical way, including, but not limited to, decarbonising our energy systems in order to prevent the worst of climate change and the immense monetary costs that global warming would bring to the people of Northern Ireland. It would also include opening a new range of quality jobs and economic opportunities for the people of Northern Ireland; providing a solid base for our economy to grow and compete on the European and world stage; preserving the biodiversity on which our planet and we depend for our existence; and providing a Northern Ireland that will sustain and nourish our children and their children, physically and economically. However, we really need to focus on the priorities. The proposed energy strategy process of which this micro inquiry report and debate are part, will take another year to be enacted. Only then will the required actions begin to be planned and deployed, which is likely to take another two years post-November 2021. We simply cannot wait another three years, particularly as the existing strategy is 11 years old.

The Economy Minister acknowledged that in her presentation at the energy forum on 29 September. In her responses to my questions for written answer, she said that she would not wait on the energy strategy to take urgent action. I ask the Minister to clarify what exactly those actions are and when she will be carrying them out.

Whilst the Green Party is not in the Executive, nor do we have members on the Economy Committee, I am confident that, as a party, we can offer some very valuable advice on the priorities and actions that should be taken. I am delighted to have the opportunity, through the motion, to put some of them on record. My party's view is that those actions should be based around four key themes. The first is electric vehicle-charging infrastructure. It is obvious that we in Northern Ireland are being left behind GB and ROI in the uptake of electric cars, with the main issue being the absence of adequate charging infrastructure.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Ms Bailey: I certainly will.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member accept that the reluctance to buy electric cars may be more to do with the initial funding that is required to buy them but that there is emerging evidence that the running costs over a number of years can be cheaper? However, with a 300-mile radius, that is perhaps more than adequate for most people in their daily commute.

Ms Bailey: I accept those points, but I have had conversations with electric vehicle owners who have given them up because of bad infrastructure, so that issue needs to be tackled. The existing charging network is outdated, not reliable and needs to be urgently upgraded and extended. We suggest that the Minister for the Economy and the Minister for Infrastructure work together with the owners and operators of the existing network to find a way to get more investment and unlock the potential of electric vehicles in Northern Ireland, because, if we do not build it, they will not come.

Another key area is building regulations, and that has been mentioned. Today, we still build homes that are not adequately insulated and which use fossil-fuel boilers for heating, and we heard a little about that during Question Time. We suggest that we need to move quickly to change the building regulations so that we design and build for the future zero-carbon world. We urge the Minister of Finance to produce immediately the technical documentation on the requirement for any new buildings being erected to be nearly zero-energy buildings. We need this as soon as is physically possible so that the regulations work seamlessly with the Communities Minister's announcement about the Housing Executive and the proposals to build more homes where they are needed. Let us not be content with another issue that we know needs addressed failing to be delivered on time. We are already behind. Until these measures are made and mandated, all we will continue to do is stack up more problems for the future.

Another key area, as has been mentioned, is the grid investment.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up

Ms Bailey: Another one is connecting to the grid, and Mr Aiken made a point about costs. We support the motion and thank the Committee very much for bringing it to the House.

Mr Speaker: I call the Economy Minister, Mrs Diane Dodds. The Minister will have 15 minutes.

Mrs Dodds (The Minister for the Economy): Thank you, Mr Speaker. Apologies for my coughing fit earlier. Rather than anything more sinister, it was because I have a dry throat and, possibly, if a politician can say this, because I was talking too much.

I welcome the opportunity to respond to the motion, and I congratulate the Economy Committee on producing the report. It is an exceptionally important issue. I also thank the individuals, academics, organisations and businesses that helped to provide the broad scope of views contained in the report. My Department has engaged with many hundreds of stakeholders in the development of the energy strategy to date, and it is encouraging to see consistency in the themes being raised in the report. I am struck by the positivity and ambition that come through from our stakeholders, and I would like to use today to discuss how the energy strategy can help to take advantage of the opportunities that are open to us.

Many in the Chamber have spoken of the importance of the energy strategy. I agree. Developing a new energy strategy is one of my top priorities. The strategy will set out the vision for our energy system to 2050, and a major programme of work is ongoing to deliver that. It is important to highlight that our strategy will be a living, breathing document. Once published, it will be regularly monitored, reviewed and updated to ensure that it is future-proof and able to respond to developments. Our future success will be built on many people working together, and a collaborative approach has been taken to developing the strategy.

My Department's call for evidence received over 160 responses from a wide range of organisations and individuals. There were also a number of stakeholder events across Northern Ireland. Five working groups comprising more than 70 individuals from over 30 organisations have been established and are working on developing policy options. That is being supplemented by additional research and inputs from academics and international experts. In developing the strategy, my Department is therefore drawing on an extensive network from across government, the energy sector and a wide range of stakeholders. The report presented today by the Committee will be considered alongside the evidence that has been gathered to date. That will contribute towards the policy options and future scenarios being developed, which will form the basis of the public consultation in March 2021.

The report correctly highlights the need for a joined-up approach across government. I completely support that view, and I am delighted that the energy strategy is now providing that leadership. The energy strategy government stakeholders group brings together central government, local government and the Utility Regulator to ensure that the policies and programmes being taken forward at this time across government are aligned and joined up. There is also significant membership across the five working groups from central and local government, alongside industry and stakeholders, to ensure that the development of policy involves all those who have a role in delivering it from the outset. I welcome the fact that the Department for Infrastructure is leading on the transport theme in the energy strategy, which demonstrates that a cross-departmental approach is being taken. I want this to be a true, Executive-wide energy strategy, and that is reflected in our approach.

I agree and recognise that there is a need for clear and ambitious targets. We continue to work within the context of net zero emissions by 2050. That will guide the focus of the strategy. I am also working closely with the Environment Minister to ensure that any future targets on emissions reductions will be reflected in the energy strategy. The Committee Chair referred to the need for measurable targets. That is a key part of the ongoing work. I have already made a strong statement on my ambition for the strategy to contain a target of at least 70% of our electricity consumption to come from renewable sources by 2030, which is one of those immediate actions that the Green Party leader referred to in her contribution. That provides a clear signal to the industry and wider stakeholders to allow them to begin to plan investment now in advance of the strategy being published.

However, if we are going to meet ambitious targets that will be in an energy strategy, the Executive will need to reflect it as one of their top priorities. I expect to see a prominent role for the energy strategy in addressing climate change and growing a green economy in a new Programme for Government. We will also need to ensure that the ambition within a new energy strategy is backed up by funding to reflect its importance for society, the economy and consumers. There are many steps that we will need to take to decarbonise energy, but our first priority has to be energy efficiency. I welcome the fact that this has been identified as a priority in the report. Energy efficiency can play a vital role in driving down emissions, helping to tackle fuel poverty and providing positive health outcomes. Energy efficiency and retrofitting are also widely being recognised as an important policy lever for green economic recovery, with significant potential for job creation going forward. It reassures me to see that many of the report's findings align closely with the work currently being taken forward to develop policy options in that area.

We will need to look at ways to decarbonise heat, power and transport. Our success at achieving and exceeding 40% renewable electricity targets demonstrates what we can achieve with a clear target and supporting policies. Our renewables base is a fantastic asset to have, particularly as the electrification of heat and transport will feature in our future energy mix. I see a clean, indigenous renewables base being key to our future energy mix. Every kilowatt-hour of energy that we generate from indigenous renewables is a kilowatt-hour that we are not importing fossil fuels. However, I am also clear that there is no single solution, and we will need to deploy a range of technologies and approaches and make use of our other assets, such as our agriculture base and modern gas infrastructure. The options consultation in March 2021 will outline short-term, low-regret options, as well as the long-term potential scenarios that we can achieve our aims.

I want to specifically highlight the crucial role of consumers in this energy transition. Consumers are at the heart of the strategy and will be involved in its development and implementation. We need to enable those consumers who want to be active in generating and trading energy while also protecting others, particularly the most vulnerable.

We need to rethink our relationship with consumers and make that a two-way engagement with the energy sector that brings citizens on the journey with us. The provision of a one-stop shop to provide information, advice and support to consumers came through strongly in our call for evidence. My officials are looking into options for a single delivery body as part of the strategy development.

4.45 pm

Costs are, of course, key for consumers. A long-term energy system based around clean, indigenous renewables that makes use of our abundant natural resources can be cheaper, but there will be investments, with associated costs, along the way. That is why an evidence-based approach is being taken to the development of an energy strategy, to identify the most cost-effective options for domestic and business consumers.

I also want to use the energy strategy to grow a green economy. When I published the medium-term plan for rebuilding a stronger economy in June 2020, which has been referred to in the Chamber today, I identified clean energy as a priority for future investment. We currently have a low-carbon, renewable energy economy made up of 3,500 businesses, around 5,400 jobs and £270 million of exports. It could be so much larger. In the context of our response to COVID, there are real opportunities for economic recovery through decarbonising energy as part of growing the green economy across Northern Ireland. I see those opportunities to lead the way in green hydrogen production and to have a world-class manufacturing base contributing to supply chains for, for example, offshore wind, hydrogen buses and electrolyzers; innovative pilot projects in new energy technologies that can be scaled up and deployed across the world; and significant capital investment in buildings and the new infrastructure needed to generate and distribute low-carbon energy. I also see opportunities for energy entrepreneurs and business start-ups to develop skills in green energy technologies, low-carbon buildings and transport.

I am excited by the developments in the hydrogen economy to date. There is a range of potential projects that can showcase our ability to develop cutting-edge hydrogen technology in Northern Ireland. That was mentioned by Kellie Armstrong and Paul Frew in particular. I am delighted to have been able to provide funding to Northern Ireland Water to trial an innovative commercial-sized electrolyser as part of its waste water treatment works.

Dr Aiken: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Dodds: Yes.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister for her remarks. She will be aware, as will anybody who has visited one of Northern Ireland Water's waste water treatment plants in particular, that many of them were built with or provided with anaerobic digesters that, owing to Northern Ireland Water's contracting arrangements, they have never been able to use and have never been able to use for renewable energy.

Mrs Dodds: I am aware of a number of problems that are associated with the energy sector. What I want us to focus on, however, is the potential going forward. This is an exciting new development in the field of hydrogen energy, and, if we can make it work, not only will we save for Northern Ireland Water but we will be at the cutting edge of how to take the sector forward.

The Northern Ireland Water trial could be part of a portfolio of projects that leads to a real stimulus to grow a local, world-leading hydrogen economy. There has also been reference made in the Chamber today to the work of Wrightbus and the need for that hydrogen hub at Ballymena. I have met colleagues there on a number of occasions. I assure the House that we are exploring the issue. I am also exploring the potential for further funding from central government for that.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for giving way and for the interest that she has shown in that issue. Wrightbus is in my constituency of North Antrim. Can she assure the House that she is aware of the concerns raised by the general manager, Buta Atwal, and Jo Bamford, who presented to the Infrastructure Committee a couple of weeks ago, and their frustration over the lack of progress? They are businessmen. They work in a business environment. They do not, thankfully, work at the pace worked at in this Building or in any other bureaucracy. Can you assure us that there is a degree of haste in trying to bring forward some of those schemes?

Mrs Dodds: I would, of course, like to see the schemes come forward at pace. I received the latest submission from Wrightbus just last week, and I have asked Invest Northern Ireland to look at it with Wrightbus. These are exciting opportunities for Northern Ireland. We have also done some work with the local council to see whether we can have a hydrogen academy on the site, as we believe that that will grow the skills base for Northern Ireland to become a leading-edge contributor in that sector of the economy.

To conclude, I welcome the report by the Economy Committee and the opportunity afforded to me to respond to today's motion. I am excited by the opportunities that will come through a new energy strategy. The report is a welcome addition to the evidence that has already been gathered. I look forward to the publication of the options and the consultation next March, so that we can take this forward and lay down a road map for Northern Ireland's energy needs into the future.

Ms McLaughlin (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for the Economy): I am delighted to wind up on behalf of the Economy Committee today's extremely important debate. As the Chair and other Committee members have indicated, we are keen to engage with the Minister to ensure that Members' and stakeholders' views on the shape of the new energy strategy are acted on. I thank the Minister and all the Members who contributed for their participation today. I also thank the many stakeholders who contributed their views to the Committee's special report, as well as the Committee team for its work behind the scenes.

The forthcoming energy strategy is a key part of our interlocking network of policies. It will help us to bring our economy into recovery and to build it back better than before. The energy strategy will take us decades into the future and will be a key determinant of how we respond to the climate emergency, as well as creating thousands of new jobs in related sectors.

As my party's economy and energy spokesperson, I will now speak on behalf of the SDLP. Today, my party launched an energy policy that is radical, exciting and forward-looking. Northern Ireland can be a world leader in restructuring the energy market to eliminate carbon emissions. We have the right weather conditions and geography to take advantage of the necessity to reform the energy market through wind, geothermal and tidal power, as well as having a role for solar and hydro. Not only can we be self-sufficient in electricity production, but we can use the surplus energy to become global leaders in the essential new technologies of battery storage and green hydrogen.

Northern Ireland has academic researchers and businesses engaged in developing those technologies, promising jobs and wealth for our society. Although we are still blighted by the COVID-19 crisis, it is essential that we consider our economic and social recovery. Investing in green infrastructure provides the basis for future economic growth and jobs in the near term. That is why we want to fast-track investment in electricity and broadband.

We have to move and move quickly. Northern Ireland, particularly my city of Derry, has a serious problem with air pollution that is literally killing hundreds of people prematurely every year. Air pollution is recognised as a major factor in COVID-19 mortality. As well as moving ahead with electric cars and hydrogen-powered buses and trucks, we must act against the burning of coal and wood, promoting instead clean energy sources. Those can also combat fuel poverty, given that coal is an inefficient and expensive means of home heating. We must make progress on the green new deal to bring our housing stock up to the highest standards of energy efficiency and decentralised renewable energy generation. Those policies would create substantial numbers of new jobs, as well as cutting our carbon emissions.

The motion is timely, and I am delighted at the level of debate and the contributions made by Members across the House. There were high levels of synergy around key areas, and I will now reflect the contributions.

Gordon Dunne rightly stressed the importance of energy affordability and security of supply. As well as those key themes, he highlighted the challenges related to weak infrastructure. He said that the gas networks need to be expanded and spoke of a need for a mix of energy sources. He highlighted the opportunities in hydrogen energy and the importance of ensuring that there is a fit-for-purpose energy strategy.

Pat Catney welcomed the cross-party support for bringing together an ambitious energy strategy. The growth of renewables in Northern Ireland is to be applauded, and that success augurs well for the future. He said that targets must be followed by good incentive schemes to support consumer engagement. Pat also mentioned that a lot will be reliant on behavioural changes in communities, and that shift will be important.

Steve Aiken talked about his previous role in the British Irish Chamber of Commerce, in which he outlined the barriers for Northern Ireland in relation to energy. He spoke about monopolies the role of the electricity regulator and whether the Department for the Economy is fit for purpose, on the basis of previous renewables schemes. He also spoke about lack of ambition. We need to stretch ourselves and be more ambitious. He emphasised that we should be recognised as leaders in the energy sector. He spoke in depth about biogas and our biogas surplus but said that we have planning challenges. I agree with him that about that and that we need to be more ambitious. He said that we should look to realising some of our ambitions by 2035.

Kellie Armstrong welcomed the report and called for an evidence-based approach. She said that we could and should become world leaders, and that was a common theme among Members. She endorsed the points made by Mr Aiken. She warned against departmental silos, and that was another theme that many Members raised. She said that the green new deal needs to be interconnected and that there is a need to develop a skills base, which, I know, the Minister is supporting and championing in order to deliver for our economy. She talked about the important part played by the housing stock and the need to look at whether there is adequate investment in heat and light for homes, particularly in the rental sector. Our social housing stock is very good, but our rental sector can have poor energy usage and high energy costs. Kellie also talked about high private car dependency in Northern Ireland, the need to transition to public transport and how we have fallen back on that a little because of COVID-19.

Paul Frew welcomed the report. He said that the big issue facing us is the high cost, particularly for industrial users. That is close to my heart. We are not competitive when it comes to energy costs for our manufacturing sector, so any energy strategy must address that. He spoke of his constituency, Wrightbus and hydrogen development. Close to Mr Frew's heart, as always, was the system operator, and he talked in depth about that and the transparency required in the relationship between SONI and EirGrid. He said that, no matter what we do, if we do not get that right, there will be poor outcomes. He said that we needed to be sure that the system operator functions properly and is fit for purpose. I hope he is happy that I have reflected exactly what he said.

Philip McGuigan discussed the energy strategy in a global context and spoke of the need for radical climate action.

He also pointed out that Northern Ireland does not have a climate Act, unlike the other three nations in the United Kingdom, and that we needed to act on that very quickly. He spoke in depth about a just transition — it was the key theme of his address — and outlined the health benefits of decarbonisation. He was also very much aware of the need to rural proof any kind of energy strategy that comes along and to make sure that there is an all-island approach to energy within this small island.

5.00 pm

Gary Middleton welcomed the wide engagement in bringing together the report. He said that it was an important discussion and talked about there being no time to stand still. He also emphasised the need for cross-departmental working — again, no silos. Fuel poverty was highlighted in his address, as well, as was the fact that the benefit to consumers was very important for business and domestic consumers.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is nearly up.

Ms McLaughlin: Right.

He said that more investment was required in the electricity grid.

John O'Dowd said that the importance of energy is growing each time that the issue is discussed. He discussed the cost of energy transition and the fact that tackling climate change should be an enormous economic driver.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Ms McLaughlin: I say sorry to the Members whose comments I have not reflected. Thank you.

Mr Speaker: Thank you very much.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly welcomes the special report of the Committee for the Economy on considerations for the forthcoming energy strategy; supports the development of an ambitious, target-driven energy strategy that will decarbonise the energy sector by 2050 while minimising the cost to the consumer; and recognises the strategy's potential to boost our economic, health and social well-being into the future.

Mr Speaker: I ask Members to take their ease for a moment or two, please.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Stafford] in the Chair)

Assembly Business

Suspension of Standing Order 10(3A)

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 10(3A), the sitting on Monday 23 November 2020 be extended to no later than 7:30pm. — [Mr O'Dowd.]

Committee Business

Health: Impact of COVID-19 Pandemic

Mr Gildernew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health): I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the negative impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on Health and Social Care (HSC) services, staff and patients; further recognises the impact on the physical and mental well-being of staff, patients and the public; acknowledges that restrictions are a consequence of the inability to suppress transmission rates; urges and encourages every member of the public to exercise individual responsibility by adhering to guidance, washing hands thoroughly and regularly, maintaining social distance and wearing face coverings; further acknowledges recent progress and commitments from the Minister of Health to increase testing and contact-tracing capacity; and calls on the Minister of Health to bring forward a robust, scaled-up find, test, trace, isolate and support (FTTIS) strategy based on international best practice as part of a wider Executive strategy to help avoid a cycle of lockdowns and the particular negative impacts on mental health and well-being.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow two and a half hours for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Gildernew: The Committee for Health tabled this motion for a number of reasons. It is to mark and acknowledge the loss suffered by so many and the extraordinary dedication and service of our Health and Social Care staff; to encourage each of us to recommit, on a personal level, to do our utmost to bring down transmission; to acknowledge the progress made since February; and, importantly, to create a vehicle for constructive discussion on how best we can now move forward, given the difficult situation in which we find ourselves once again in terms of cases, hospital capacity and the resulting socio-economic restrictions that are impacting so heavily on so many.

Since the early days of the pandemic, the Committee has dedicated most of its meeting time to considering and responding to issues connected with this health crisis and, particularly, hearing from and about the most vulnerable groups in our community.

Some of our first sessions focused on care homes and their urgent efforts to cope, the fear and confusion around an early lack of PPE, staff shortages and new and changing advice. The Committee heard about the significant impact on children, particularly those on the at-risk register or in care, as visiting became more difficult and children were out of sight of those adults who normally helped to teach and to care for them. In recent months, while hearing positive news about progress, we have also heard about staff exhaustion and stress across the system, particularly given pre-existing workforce shortages. What has also clearly come across is staff dedication and their continuing readiness to go beyond what we should reasonably ask of them.

The Committee has welcomed regular engagement with the Minister and senior officials, and would readily acknowledge that we are in a totally different place now compared with February. Testing has increased considerably, and contact tracing has been established, is public health-led and supported by an app with international and cross-border interoperability. The workforce appeal has brought significant interest and staff back to the front line, and, for that, we will always be grateful.

Given the high numbers of asymptomatic cases identified through regular staff testing in care homes, we had asked about scaling up wider testing of all Health and Social Care staff. I am sure that Members will welcome the Minister's recent announcement to introduce mass testing.

While the focus of the motion is on scaling up the initiatives that will reduce the need for lockdown measures, it, rightly, reminds us of the role that each and every one of us can play and the impact that our decisions and behaviour can have on transmission. I urge everyone, once again, to wash hands regularly and well, wear a face covering, observe the 2-metre social-distancing rule and cooperate fully with the contact tracers.

Having acknowledged that progress and recognised the role and responsibility of individuals, it is necessary and important to ask this: given our circumstances, how do we still differ from the countries that have had the most success in containing this highly infectious virus? What more can we do to avert or mitigate the need for restrictions in advance of a vaccine? I emphasise that the Committee is putting forward those questions for consideration rather than providing definitive answers on those matters. While differences in testing and tracing might primarily be questions of degree, when it comes to isolation and support, wider differences can be seen. The issues with testing remain the scale and timeliness of getting a result, given what we are seeing internationally in mass and rapid testing, which I know that the Minister is looking into. Mass testing will be particularly important for Health and Social Care and key workers, such as public transport staff, on a regular and ongoing basis.

There are differences of scale in and approach to contact tracing that we could explore. Back in May, Germany had a target of five contact tracers for every 20,000 people, which equates to around 450 here in the North. Other sources indicate that even higher levels may be desirable or necessary in that context. However, by late October, we had only 88 full-time equivalent staff, with more being recruitment. That demonstrates that we still have some way to go. The World Health Organization and the European Centre for Disease Prevention and Control have tools for advising on workforce requirements, depending on a range of variables. It would be useful to hear from the Minister whether or how such tools have been used, to what effect and whether or when we will reach those recommended levels.

Effective self-isolation is, clearly, key to stopping transmission. Committee members have been contacted by individuals who were unable to isolate effectively in their home due to sharing bathroom and bedroom facilities. Given the infectiousness of the disease, sending a COVID-19-positive person home to isolate in such circumstances creates a very high risk of onward transmission in the home. Again, while no support was expressed for any type of mandatory use of dedicated isolation facilities, it is clear that domestic transmission in households remains an issue. Could isolation facilities be explored as a means of addressing that, particularly for larger households and those in multigenerational families or high multiple-occupancy housing or for those with vulnerable family members? Other countries, including New Zealand, requisitioned hotel facilities for isolation purposes or made available dedicated health facilities to support that.

Although the support payments that were introduced here are very welcome, we must consider the level of payments and support versus the loss to individuals due to self-isolation. We know that those in low-paid work are less likely to be able to work from home, more likely to contract the virus and more likely to lose out financially if they have to self-isolate. It is crucial that we address that and communicate clearly as well as deliver effective support to those who need it most.

In terms of the wider Executive, the Committee appreciates that no single element of the motion can defeat COVID-19. It is true to state that the strategy and response to COVID-19 is only as strong as its weakest component. Chains of transmission of COVID-19 can be effectively disrupted only with properly planned, resourced and functioning chains of suppression. We cannot rely on restrictions indefinitely, nor can individuals stop transmission on their own. However, with individuals playing their part on hands, face and space, an effective and well-resourced find, test, trace, isolate and support strategy still holds out the best hope for us to escape or reduce a cycle of lockdowns and ease the pressure on the health and social care system in the context of the wider Executive strategy to support those who are impacted across society.

I acknowledge the collegiate work that has been undertaken by the Committee, including in drafting the motion. It remains committed to providing constructive input based on continuous engagement with constituents and stakeholders. I also acknowledge the frequent engagement with the Minister. He carries a heavy burden on our behalf with integrity and dedication. I trust that he views our scrutiny and advice in the spirit in which they are offered, and I wish him and his Executive colleagues well as they lead us through the days and weeks ahead.

5.15 pm

With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, I will make a few remarks in my role as Sinn Féin spokesperson for health. This motion was agreed at the Health Committee through consensus, and I thank each and every member for that. The benefits of an agreed message, strategy and approach go a long way in effectively tackling the spread and damage of this virus. It helps to protect lives, jobs and our fragile health service.

A new strategy from the Department of Health, which is central to a wider Executive strategy, must place public health as a driving force to avoid further lockdowns and all the negatives that are associated with that. We cannot get sidetracked by attempting to make a pitch that is perfect. We do not have time for that, frankly, but we need to demonstrate and deliver the doable. This means breaking the chains of transmission by finding the virus even where it does not show signs or symptoms. It means increasing testing capacity and increasing the speed at which we get results to people. It means increasing the capacity and effectiveness of contact tracing and ensuring that those who have to self-isolate do so and are fully supported in that.

The current departmental strategy, test, trace, protect, dates from 27 May. It talks about needing an effective strategy to suppress the virus until an effective vaccine arrives. However, in elements, it falls short of a full FTTIS strategy. We are now, for example, on to our twenty-second amendment to international travel restrictions, yet travel restrictions are not mentioned in the overall strategy. I recognise that there are parts of a wider strategy that we need other Departments to deliver and lead on, but it needs to be a public health-focused strategy to protect health services and the economy. This is how health and social care staff are supported, with childcare or adequate PPE, so that they can carry out vital services. It is also how they rely on health and social care services. It is vital, in my view, that any strategy or response from the Executive takes account of how their actions and inactions impact on everyday lives.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am sorry. The Member's time is up.

Mr Gildernew: More importantly, I support the motion because it is the best way to tackle this deadly virus.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Looking around the Chamber, I see many more Members than I have on my list. I will read the names that are on my list. If you want to participate and are not on the list, please rise in your place. I have Mr Buckley, Mr McGrath, Mr Chambers, Ms Bradshaw, Ms Flynn, Mr Sheehan, Mr McNulty, Mrs Kelly, Ms Bailey and Mr Carroll. Pam Cameron is to make the winding-up speech. If anyone is not on that list but wishes to participate, please stand in your place. I see that Mr Nesbitt is standing in his place.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Committee for agreeing this motion, and I am happy to add my support to it.

Plenty of accusations have been made in the House of political point-scoring, from whatever side of the argument or debate, on how best to approach COVID. Let us approach this in the spirit of the Chamber being a safe place, as I believe it should be, to debate legitimately held views and alternative ways of approaching COVID. This is not a political issue, but it is personal. I imagine that it is personal for every single Member. Much focus has been directed at the economic effects, but the Principal Deputy Speaker knows my sincerely held beliefs about the effects of lockdown not only on the economy but on the health service.

Earlier, the Health Minister's statement referred to COVID as the one common enemy. I am sorry to say that that is not true. The common enemies affecting the health service still exist: cancer, cardiac illness, poverty, children at risk, domestic violence and suicide; and I could go on. There is a plethora of issues, and the Committee is all too aware of the effects that the current restrictions and lockdown have on these specific sectors.

Earlier, I mentioned a letter that I received from a GP operating in the north Antrim area. A part of it merits quotation:

"What I am most concerned about is the fact that our beloved NHS is becoming nothing more than a national COVID service. We are turning away other patients and not treating them because of COVID. Our red-flag waiting times for the most common cancer diagnoses in Northern Ireland in the Northern Trust are now in excess of six months."

That is six months before people with a potential cancer diagnosis are being seen by a specialist.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Member for giving way on that point. It is interesting to note that he refers to a GP from north Antrim. Regardless of where the GP is from, recent reports in the media suggest that some GPs and hospital doctors are concerned about coming forward and giving their opinion because of a fear of being disciplined.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Member for his point. There is no doubt that there are differences of opinion among our health professionals. Staff on the front line are worried about the damaging impacts that some lockdown situations have caused. The impact of lockdown measures on health and social care services has had a profound and serious impact on the detection and treatment of routine illnesses.

Between 1 March and 12 September, the number of patients found to have cancer was 23% lower than the average for the previous two years. Urgent suspected cancer referrals dropped by more than 50%. It is a particular concern that people with suspected lung cancer symptoms delayed going to their GPs because the symptoms are so similar to those of COVID. There is a fear there. An extra 10,000 people were waiting for a diagnostic test in June in comparison to the same month last year. Research by the British Heart Foundation found that 41% had a planned test, surgery or procedure postponed during the UK lockdown. Between March and October, almost 13,000 elective appointments throughout the trusts were cancelled.

The tragic reality is that, so far in 2020, cancer deaths are increasing. Sadly, the number of suicides is increasing as well. COVID and non-COVID patients alike deserve a continuity of care, and they need certainty about their pathways to treatment or surgery. There is a genuine concern about the impact that reallocating some staff to fight COVID will have on routine services, including elective care and red-flag surgery, long after this crisis has subsided.

We approach these difficult decisions with the caveat that we know there is no easy answer. However, there needs to be a strategic assessment of the impact this will have on other health services. We are immensely grateful for the efforts being made by our NHS and care staff in the most difficult of circumstances. Many staff are personally aggrieved at having to down tools to redirect their time to COVID pressures. We owe it to them, collectively as a House — and, indeed, to the Minister — to urgently work on workforce planning and give them the additional support and resource that is needed to reduce in-work pressures and maximise the capacity of our health service. I truly believe that we need to learn to coexist with the virus, and increasing the capacity in our health service and ramping up the test-and-trace service is vital for that. We need to build resilience and health service capacity and roll out the mass testing for NHS and care staff. We know that, while the restrictions can help reduce the R rate, the virus is still getting through.

In closing, Minister Swann, I want you to succeed in your job. I want this country to succeed in its approach and fight against COVID, but it will not succeed if we continue on a path that prioritises COVID over other illnesses. We only need to look at cancer, heart disease, strokes, mental health and children at risk.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Buckley: We want you to succeed, but we do not want you to be the Minister who is responsible for excess deaths —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Buckley: — because of failed treatment on other issues.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am sure it was not the Member's intention to offend or malign the Minister. However, I was uncomfortable with the words "that is not true" being directed at the Minister. I suspect the Member had no intention of implying that the Minister was being untruthful, but I suggest that he takes this opportunity to say that he was mistaken, or some other form of words. I did not feel comfortable with that.

Mr Buckley: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I will apologise if that is how that sounded, but it certainly was not the intention. I meant that, in the general thrust of the debate, we have to look at other serious illnesses, not just COVID. I know that the Minister has concerns about that as well, as he has said at meetings of the Health Committee.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you. I appreciate that.

Mr McGrath: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion. There can be no doubt that our healthcare system has been rocked as a result of COVID-19, and I pay tribute to the countless numbers of healthcare staff who have gone above and beyond the call of duty in their work. In these past months, our healthcare staff have worked from morning to night and have often had to put family to the side in their service of caring. They have been pushed to their breaking point, however, and the message that I am hearing loud and clear is that we do not know how much left they have to give.

A good start for a debate on another day would perhaps be how we remunerate our healthcare staff for what they have done and what they continue to do in their work. Another might be to ask the management of various trusts to give consideration to the conditions that our staff are having to work in. As one nurse articulated to me, they have to go out to their car to get a cup of tea, because they are not allowed one anywhere within the hospital. I know of a member of staff who has to get changed at the side of the road in a car park because she has nowhere else to don her PPE. Those are the very real stories of life in the healthcare sector during COVID.

Furthermore, significant stress and pressure is being felt by our local businesses. Those family-run institutions are the lifeblood of our local economy, and we saw at the start of the pandemic that local businesses were able to avail themselves of grants to keep afloat. As time has progressed, however, the cracks have begun to show in the way in which we do things, and we have only to reflect on what we are hearing in our constituency offices, where businesses and individuals are seeking clarity on the restrictions and the guidelines, to understand that the message is not getting across.

The public are asking why. Why is it that our hospitalisation figures continue to rise, no matter what we seem to do? Where is the flaw in the plan? Where is the weak link? We are about to enter a fortnight of intense and enhanced restrictions, and this is all being done to flatten the curve to protect our healthcare system from being overwhelmed and to save lives. At this point, however, we should have been halfway through those restrictions, were it not for the display of division that we witnessed two weeks ago. Where previously this House spoke as one, with a sense of unity and cohesion of purpose, there is now division.

That division is not one that has its roots in a five-party Executive. Rather, it is a division within the DUP: a deep-seated division that has existed longer than COVID. What does it say about the party that, in the middle of a worldwide pandemic, when the Executive met to discuss new restrictions and to listen to our Health Minister and expert scientific and medical advice, it chose to deploy a cross-community vote and veto such advice? If we are looking for a full range of the negative impacts of COVID, the disgraceful behaviour of some on our Executive and the impact of that on our health service, together with the reputational damage done to MLAs in this place, should surely be added to that list. Less than a week later, a bit of a U-turn was pulled, and suddenly the party wanted enhanced measures to be brought in again for a fortnight, but only after a week of restrictions being relaxed. That led directly to the scenes that we saw in Belfast city centre yesterday afternoon, which were beamed all around these islands and served as an embarrassment.

An issue that I want to talk about as being a negative impact of COVID is that of mental health. Mental health figures in the North are absolutely shocking at present, and the stories that I and, I am sure, many others have heard of members of the public being passed from service to service and from one waiting list to another would break your heart. What about our young people, who have suffered as a result of COVID, not just in their education but in their sense of social interaction? Representatives of other parties and I met the Youth Forum last Thursday night. All the parties were represented except one, and I urge the Members opposite to send a representative to be part of the political champions' panel and to listen to the voices of young people, because they can articulate very clearly to us how COVID is impacting on them, and it would be good to hear from them. The Youth Forum told us that three quarters of the 2,500 people surveyed said that they have no faith in the leadership shown by our Government; three quarters said that their mental health has got worse during the pandemic; and nearly 90% said that they feel that they are not being listened to.

5.30 pm

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGrath: Yes, please.

Mr Clarke: If nothing else, it will give you the benefit of an extra minute. Whilst you are on your feet bashing this party, would you like to bash your own party in relation to the lack of funding that Belfast International Airport has got from your party? Five thousand people are employed there, and I am sure that for many of them their mental health is affected greatly by knowing that that airport is the only one that has had to have closures over the COVID-19 period. Ask your Minister what she has done to support them and their mental health.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr McGrath: I am sure that our Minister will help, and she will not take as long as many other Ministers have to get programmes out through the door to help people. I believe that part B is still waiting to be delivered, some five weeks after businesses were asked to close, so let us help everybody and let us all work together.

Let this be our wake-up call. The voices from the past have had their say; it is the voices of the present and the future that are crying out for action and demand genuine leadership. We will find a way through this if we take stock of where we are and see what we have got wrong, if we speak as one with a real sense of unity and find again that cohesion of purpose so that, when a vaccine appears, we will emerge from the shadow of COVID-19 as one.

Mr Chambers: The motion calls on the Assembly to recognise the negative impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on many sections of society. It is an easy call to acknowledge. The number of deaths from this dreadful virus is creeping towards the 1,000 figure, and thousands of our fellow citizens have fallen victim to the serious illness that the virus produces. Many recover quickly, but some require hospitalisation and others need intensive ICU care as their illness becomes life-threatening. A worrying aspect for those who contract the virus is that the debilitating symptoms can persist and affect their quality of life. If we did not have the committed body of people that we have working in our NHS and social care sector, the death count would be much higher.

The other victims of the pandemic are those who have either lost their job or those on furlough who are worrying whether they will still have a job at the end of all this. The self-employed and the small and large entrepreneurs who create and provide employment have also suffered. Many will have put every penny that they have into their business, and many will have handed over the deeds of their family home to secure borrowing from their bank.

Just as the Minister of Health is battling round the clock, along with the entire staff of the NHS and social care sectors to protect and save lives, there is a responsibility on the Economy Minister to devise schemes that can be deployed in a timely fashion to help those who stare financial ruin in the face. Promises and media announcements do not cut it for those people. We hear too many stories of people being left behind. Many have not received a penny of support from the Executive to date. The Economy Minister needs to address that at once: promises do not pay bills.

The motion promotes the importance of adhering to current advice and guidance in relation to personal hygiene and the wearing of face coverings. Regrettably, those simple measures have been undermined on occasion, among the most prominent being the many breaches at the funeral of Mr Bobby Storey. Newspaper revelations that broke over the weekend of emails that allegedly went out from Sinn Féin in regard to that funeral have added to the sense of outrage of those who have had to bury loved ones in accordance with the regulations.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for giving way. Would he agree that, while we can debate all night what might be the best set of actions or policies, there is no debate that, sometimes, some actions are simply wrong.

Mr Chambers: I entirely agree with that statement.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Chambers: Thank you. Elected MPs who should know better have openly rubbished the concept of face coverings. A member of the Executive responsible for making collective decisions has broken ranks on more than one occasion to undermine the vital messages that the Executive are trying to promote. That, regrettably, does nothing to instil public confidence in that message.

The motion also acknowledges recent progress on test, trace and protect measures. From regularly speaking to the Minister about the issue, I am aware that the targets for index cases and close contact are both being widely surpassed. The motion also “calls on the Minister of Health to bring forward a robust, scaled-up find, test, trace, isolate and support (FTTIS) strategy, based on international best practice.”

Recent announcements and innovative programmes should give us all confidence that the Minister will deliver and, indeed, is delivering on a scaled-up scheme. However, it is also important to realise that no TTP service can successfully suppress transmission when community transmission is at a high level. For example, I remember hearing, a few weeks ago, that the system in Germany, which is widely considered to be the best in Europe, was unable to cope due to infection levels that were far lower than those that we were experiencing. Therefore, while it is the easiest thing in the world to grab a headline by blaming testing or contact tracing, the reality is that the experts and scientists are clear that TTP is not a silver bullet to suppress high levels of community transmission.

The suggestion that not enough work was done in the health service to prepare for the second wave is an insult to the clinicians and staff across the trusts who worked so hard on the surge plans. It is also clear that some of the people criticising the surge planning are not aware of the surge plans or, if they are, have not read them. The limiting factor is staffing, but the serious staff shortages in our health service existed long before COVID, and it is an issue with which a series of previous Ministers failed to get to grips. That is the main reason that there are almost 2,000 vacancies across nursing and midwifery alone.

Mr Buckley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Chambers: No.

Those who ask for increased staffing do not realise that it takes years to train a specialist nurse or doctor. Equally, the insinuation from some political quarters that all non-COVID care is being sacrificed is simply not true. The reality is that we have a limited pool of HSC capacity. When looking at the dashboard, one could be led to think that there are around 3,500 general hospital beds across Northern Ireland, but the reality is that many are dedicated to specialities such as stroke, cardiology and maternity. Those beds will be required, pandemic or no pandemic. There are, therefore, approximately 1,600 general medical beds, which means that, suddenly, 450 COVID inpatients become a significant pressure on our medical beds. Whilst I applaud the Minister for committing to maintaining as many non-COVID services as possible, we must realise that the best way to protect non-COVID care is to reduce the spread of the virus and the pressure that it subsequently places on our already overstretched health service.

Ms Bradshaw: I rise to support the motion, naturally. I start by thanking those who work in the contact-tracing service and the Public Health Agency for all of their efforts to this point in the pandemic. I also place on record my sympathies to the families who have been bereaved by this horrendous virus.

While the motion rightly refers to some advances that have been made in the contact-tracing services over the current close-down period, I remain concerned that they are still not sufficiently resourcing the system to do all that it promises to do. There are significant gaps in what we are doing in each of the find, test, trace, isolate and support elements, and they need to be filled urgently.

One purpose of contact tracing — the one that is simplest to explain clearly, perhaps — is that it traces the contacts of those who are affected and asks them to remain at home. The aim is to ensure that people who may have been infected by others restrict their movements so as to break chains of infection and, thus, slow and reduce the spread of the virus. However, it has two other purposes. One is to find people and ensure that they receive treatment early. That remains a flaw in our testing system, because it remains too heavily biased towards people with symptoms, when peak infectiousness is usually before symptoms appear. Another purpose of contact tracing, which is highly relevant, is that it is supposed to help us with epidemiology. However, we can see from the lack of information, including in response to some of my questions for written answer, that contact tracing has not told us enough about the behaviour of the virus in the context of Northern Ireland. We need to do more, particularly with regard to the latter purpose, so that we can target restrictions and drive down transmission much more efficiently, which is precisely what the motion says, and help limit the impact on health service workers and users.

Earlier today, the Health Minister provided information around the restrictions that have been imposed in relation to churches and gyms. I welcome that. Contact tracing needs to be more effective in identifying the actual source of infections and the risk associated with certain types of venue and behaviour. We must remember that most people who are infected do not affect anyone else, but a small minority of infected people infect a huge majority of those who end up infected. They are the so-called superspreaders. Contact tracing needs to be able to tell us much more about them.

Let us make one thing clear: the health service does not close down because of lockdown; it closes down because transmission levels rise far too quickly. We need to get those transmission levels down. That means avoiding crowds, limiting contact and wearing face coverings appropriately. However, another reason transmission levels grew is that the “isolate” in test, trace and isolate was clearly not happening. We do not have figures in Northern Ireland for how many people actually self-isolated when they were asked to; there is no way to measure that compliance. However, the suggestion from King’s College London and NHS research is that perhaps 80% of those asked to isolate after showing symptoms or having a positive test did not do so for the required time and close to 90% of contacts did not do so at all. Part of that was because the rules around how long people should isolate for and exactly what isolation means were unclear. Part of it was because of a lack of support for those who were isolating, as is mentioned in the motion. However, it has to be said that part of it was because not enough people were reached.

I wish to touch quickly on support. We often hear discussion of payments available to those who are self-isolating. Those are, of course, important, but money is not the only reason for someone not to self-isolate when they are asked to. Lack of social contact, fear of falling behind at work, lack of leisure activities or simply lack of clarity about why and how to self-isolate all play a role. Support has to go beyond finance, therefore. This is an area in which I am unconvinced that digital tracing, most obviously contacting people in the first instance by text rather than phone, really works. Contact tracing is about speaking to people and even building a relationship with them to ensure that they are adequately supported. That simply cannot be done on a relatively low budget with a relatively small staff team.

There is a clear need to reform all five aspects of find, test, trace, isolate and support. We have, in effect, just bought ourselves another two or three weeks in which to do that. I look forward to hearing some clear details on what reforms have been implemented and what reforms will now be implemented to ensure, as best we can, that the circuit remains broken from mid-December.

Ms Flynn: I support the motion. I will focus my remarks on a few important areas: one, the negative impact of the restrictions; two, the need for an effective response in isolating; and, last but by no means least, the need to support people who have been affected by COVID and the restrictions. We have heard examples of the various ways in which people have been affected. It should act as a chilling reminder that many if not all of us who speak here tonight will know someone who has contracted COVID-19. I am sure that we all know someone who has been hospitalised with COVID-19. Sadly, many of us will know of someone who passed away as a result of COVID-19. That is just a microcosm of how the infection is spreading among the wider population outside this Building.

The virus is a threat to us all, but, as other Members have said, the restrictions can also have a serious negative impact through, for example, the loss of support networks or the closure of services, whether that be counselling support to help someone with their mental health or a long-awaited screening appointment for a physical health condition. I also cannot help think of the turmoil felt by those who are unable to see a loved one in a care home due to visiting restrictions. These are extremely emotional, personal and invasive issues that we are dealing with. At the same time, logical decisions must be made in an attempt to save lives. Therefore, the questions and scrutiny must focus on what strategy is in place to avoid the need for further restrictions and weeks of lockdown. It is better to fix a problem when it is small than to wait. Could we have had proposals and measures sooner to avoid lockdowns or stronger, more robust public health systems in place to give greater warning?

The key is to break the chains of transmission. That means reducing social contacts, and enabling and encouraging more people to stay at home and to self-isolate. I note the efforts of the Department for Communities on discretionary grants and the advice helpline for those self-isolating, and also the work of the Public Health Agency, the contact-tracing team and the mobile app. I got a notification to self-isolate due to being a close contact of someone who had tested positive. Thankfully, my results came back negative. However, throughout that period, all I received was a text message. No one called me to see how I was or to make sure that I was self-isolating, which is important for compliance.

5.45 pm

There is pressure on those who, financially, are living week to week or month to month. Their worry is not entirely about catching the virus but about receiving the alert and what comes with that, and having to self-isolate for two weeks and the consequences of that for someone with children, who is in a low-paid job and may be struggling to put food on the table. I do not think that statutory sick pay goes far enough to encourage anyone to self-isolate and to help to break the chains in transmission, yet the lack of follow-up calls offering healthcare or financial support or enforcement does little to help.

My concern is not so much about increasing fines but about providing the means and reasons for the public to self-isolate, and for them to feel equipped to do so safely for themselves, their community and their future livelihoods. We need a new strategy that is health-led but that involves everyone and every Department in the Executive. It needs to recognise that the rampant spread of COVID-19 is still damaging, even with the emerging and hopeful news that a vaccine is close to being developed.

Mr Sheehan: I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate. Unfortunately, the narrative around the pandemic has degenerated into a binary choice between those who favour restrictions and those who want to open up.

I am leaving aside the tinfoil hat brigade, the science deniers, the conspiracy theorists and the crackpots, who, unfortunately, seem to be given equal validity when debating this issue. The fact is that there is clear evidence that there is another option. Some countries have been able to keep their economies open and suppress the virus at the same time. That is what we should be aspiring to: the gold standard, not the bargain basement. That is how we should be thinking. There should be ambition and lateral thinking. Some people say, "These countries had previous experience of MERS and SARS", as if that is a negative. However, it is exactly that: they had experience. The experience is there, so let us learn from it. I am very disappointed that, when I question officials in the Committee and ask them if anyone in the Department had been in contact with any of the countries that have been able to keep their economy open and suppress the virus at the same time, the answer is, "No, we have not".

We have a number of weapons in our armoury to fight the virus. We cannot defeat it, but, hopefully, when the vaccine comes, we will be able to do that. In the meantime, we need to look to non-pharmaceutical options. Find, test, trace, isolate and support is the gold standard. Why do we need to find? Depending on the research that you look at, between 50% and 66% of those who get the virus are asymptomatic. They are the most dangerous ones. They are out and about in society, unwittingly spreading the virus, so we need to trace them.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Member for giving way. He has previously mentioned the need for test, trace and isolate. There have been reports that, in Scotland, a target of 2,000 contact tracers has been set, yet, for Northern Ireland, the last figure that we got was around 200. Does the Member agree that there needs to be a plan to scale up the service in Northern Ireland?

Mr Sheehan: Absolutely. I was going to come on to my experience of dealing with the PHA, which is responsible for the contact tracing. On 16 April, the chief executive told the Committee that 500 people were being trained to carry out contact tracing. She appeared at the Committee three weeks later, and when she was asked how that training was going, she tried to avoid the question, but when she was confronted with her own words from Hansard, she had to admit that she had spoken "out of turn".

She appeared again at the Committee on 15 October and said that there were 151 contact tracers. When she was asked to quantify that in full-time equivalents, she either could not or would not. She did not have the answer. It now transpires that there are, apparently, 88. At that time, we were getting nearly 1,000 positive cases a day. The ECDC says that, outside of a lockdown situation, each positive coronavirus case will produce between seven and 20 contacts. That amounts to between 7,000 and 20,000 contacts. How could 88 people do that? They could not. It is impossible. There is a lack of transparency and openness on this, because the PHA was out again saying that there are now 250 contact tracers. What does that mean in full-time equivalents? Somebody could be working part-time for six hours a week.

It was mentioned that Germany has a target for tracers per capita that equates to us having 250. If we benchmark with Wuhan in China, we will need 1,000. We certainly do not need 88. We need a high number of contact tracers to get out and find the people who are positive. They can then isolate, and we will not have to lock down the whole of society. It is that lack of ambition that frustrates and exasperates people, and it frustrates and exasperates people like me in the Committee when I am asking simple questions of the chief executive of the PHA, who is a highly paid official, and she cannot or will not answer them.

Let me say this, Minister: when it comes to rolling out the vaccine, I would like to see at least a skeleton strategy here within the next few weeks, because if it is left to the PHA, somebody will need to put a rocket up its backside or we will be talking here this time next year about a strategy to roll out a vaccine that could not be done because we did not have enough people to do it or we had this problem or that problem.

Those are the issues that we face. As the Minister said, rapid testing will not lead to a reduction in the short term if community transmission is high, and I agree with that.

That is why we need to beef up substantially the number of contact tracers that we have, because if we can do rapid testing, it will throw up more positive cases, and we need more contact tracers to trace the people they have been in contact with.

A Cheann Comhairle, I got quite excited here today about this, but it exasperates me when there is a lack of ambition in the way that we are approaching it, and that needs to change.

Mr McNulty: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion, as we all continue to endeavour to navigate a way through the uncharted waters that the pandemic presents and as we seek to get the virus under control.

The public are being asked to make significant and very difficult sacrifices. For the most part, they are complying, and they deserve enormous credit for their efforts. Whilst COVID-19 and the restrictions have undoubtedly impacted every aspect of our daily life, the toll on mental health is a huge concern. The increased number of constituents I am coming into contact with on a daily basis from every walk of life who are beside themselves with worry and fear as a result of the enormous challenges presented by the pandemic is scary.

We are now nearly nine months into living with, dealing with and trying to cope with the pandemic. COVID-19 has disrupted almost every aspect of life as we knew it. I welcome the Health Minister's statement on the ambition to give people hope. We do not know how long it will be until vaccines are available and deployed or until life returns to something approaching a semblance of normality, but, without hope, we have nothing.

Small physical, mental and emotional things, such as getting to the gym, offered an avenue of escape. Sadly, that has been removed, causing immense distress to many. I understand the steps that the Minister has taken. They all focus on saving and protecting lives. However, I encourage the Minister to ensure that he explains the rationale behind every decision on each sector so that people and sectors clearly understand them.

We must be mindful that the restrictions of recent weeks, and those in the weeks to come, take place in the midst of the winter months, with longer and darker evenings. The isolation, loneliness, fear and worry that many have been experiencing, and will continue to experience, as a result of the lockdown restrictions on their way of life will be very painful and, potentially, detrimental to their mental health.

I feel particularly for those who are the most vulnerable. I feel for the elderly, people living alone and those already suffering from poor mental health. I feel for those who have lost their jobs or whose jobs are at risk. I feel for the elderly in nursing homes who have not seen family for so long. I feel for the business owners and the self-employed. I feel for the families and parents of children with special educational needs or complex needs. I feel for families who are coping with grief. This has been the most difficult year for them all.

I am concerned not only about the pandemic's current impact on the well-being of families, businesses and communities but about its longer-term consequences for mental health. Sadly, I believe that we will continue to see those consequences long after the pandemic has passed. We must all work to ensure that everything that can be done is done so that the mental health crisis that we have been experiencing here in the North since long before the pandemic even arrived does not escalate. In the months and years ahead, our mental health services, from counselling and therapy to crisis intervention, will be under immense pressure — greater pressure than ever. Therefore, I call on the Minister of Health to commit to ensuring that a world-class mental health service is provided here and to commit to providing for its funding. It will be needed more than ever in the coming months.

I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the inspirational NHS front-line staff, including those on the front line of mental health services, who work day after day under the most challenging of circumstances, often putting the health and well-being of others ahead of their own and, indeed, that of their families. I salute them all. Where would we be without them? We must do everything that we can to ensure that staff feel valued and to ensure that their mental health is protected at such a stressful time. I very much welcome the steps that have been taken by the health and social care trusts and partners in recent months, including the development of a framework for leaders and managers to support staff well-being and the psychology helplines that are open to staff.

Despite all the present difficulties, we recognise that the restrictions and sacrifices are an unfortunate necessity if we are to get the virus under control. Whilst the recent news about vaccinations has given us all some hope, we still have some way to go, and I call on the public to dig deep and, as the Minister said earlier, to dig in and continue to adhere to the restrictions and guidelines. Only by acting together will we be able to beat the virus and return to life as we knew it.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up, I am afraid.

Mr McNulty: I support the motion.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I tried to wait for a nice juncture, a nice full stop, before I cut you off.

Mr Nesbitt: Who knew, at the start of the year, that we would need 20/20 vision to figure out the best way through this pandemic? Who knew, on 11 January, when we gathered in the Chamber to reform the Assembly and Executive that, come late November, we would be looking at a second lockdown? Who knew how difficult this would be? COVID-19 has given us a very sharp and unwelcome reminder of just how challenging it is to run a five-party coalition Government, but that, of course, is where we are.

6.00 pm

It has challenged all of us. With personal regret, I must acknowledge that some of us have come up short on occasion. It has challenged us and confused us. I welcome the Minister's reporting earlier that he and the First Minister and deputy First Minister are involved in talks about what we might call an "all-islands approach" to COVID over Christmas. That would be most welcome. The fact that the various jurisdictions are adopting multiple approaches surely goes to underline the fact that there are no right answers as such. What we have are options, many of which have significant upsides but all of which probably have downsides as well, so we follow the medical and scientific evidence. I thank Dr Michael McBride, Professor Ian Young and the Minister for so doing.

I acknowledge Mr Buckley's concern that the health service is turning into a COVID service at a cost to those with needs that relate to mental health, cancer and heart disease. However, I declare an interest here: in August, I had a procedure for heart disease. I do not believe that it was delayed by one hour, never mind a day, because of the focus on COVID-19 — nor, by the way, do I believe that I was fast-tracked because I am an MLA. The last that I heard about special treatment for MLAs was yesterday, when I was told that there is a restaurant chain that, when it finally reopens, will be open to everybody but Members of the Legislative Assembly, who, to quote a famous elected politician, can go and eat "where the sun don't shine".

Mr Buckley: I thank the Member for giving way. I am glad to see that he is back in the Chamber and in good health following that procedure. However, research by the British Heart Foundation has found that 41% of heart patients throughout the United Kingdom had a planned test or surgery postponed because of lockdown. Will the Member accept that, while it may have been the case that he got an appointment, for many others, sadly, that has not been the case?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Nesbitt: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.

Yes. I am not saying that there are not issues. However, I have been in the Chamber for eight and a half years. We have debated consistently that there is a problem of underfunding in the National Health Service in this country and that we need to transform care and implement Bengoa. It comes round again and again. The Minister is entirely aware of the need to do things differently and, therefore, better. I accept that there are issues and that some of the issues may have been exacerbated by the pandemic, but I am also saying that it is not all bleak. Some services have continued, and I am a lucky recipient of one of them.

The Member will know that I have campaigned on mental health since I arrived in the Chamber eight and a half years ago. Therefore, I know that the Minister has done more than most of his predecessors in that area. There has been the appointment already of an interim mental health champion. I have been on many a Zoom and virtual meeting with Professor Siobhan O'Neill, who keeps saying, "Do not judge me until you see what I have achieved at the end of my term". I tell her that I have already judged her, because she has already brought something really useful to the table: positive energy. That is something that people who suffer from poor mental health really appreciate from somebody in a position of leadership, like Siobhan O'Neill.

I also welcome the fact that it appears that, in the spending review on Wednesday, the Chancellor, Rishi Sunak, will announce another £500 million of funding for mental health in England. If my rough maths is right, that means anything up to £15 million of a Barnett consequential. I hope that the Executive will ring-fence that for mental health services in Northern Ireland. The Chancellor apparently thinks that the additional money is needed particularly for young people in schools and for staff in the National Health Service, who are under the most unbelievable pressure. I do not know whether any other Members have spent a night in the emergency department of an acute hospital. The night that I did was a revelation. It was relentless demand met by unfailing professionalism and courtesy.

Mr Sheehan talked about a gold standard, and I agree with him. I also heard a colleague of his who is on the Executive say that we need to react to the pandemic by being agile and flexible, but sometimes I do not think that we have been agile and flexible enough, particularly on the economy.

I finish by wishing the Minister and health service staff well as we continue the fight against this deadly disease.

Mrs D Kelly: I listened carefully to the Committee Chair's appeal as he set out the agenda for the debate. He talked about being collaborative and about people working together, particularly on contact, trace and isolate. It seems to me from listening to other Members and, indeed, the news today that the biggest problem around contact is contacting the Sinn Féin leadership to answer the police investigation of why it did not follow the restrictions and the regulations that the Executive introduced to suppress the virus. Why it chose to disregard that message remains a question that only that party can answer. We on this side of the House lost two colleagues, yet we complied with the restrictions and regulations because we had a public responsibility to do so. I hope that my colleagues gave leadership to the wider public in that regard.

It is a huge issue. Let us not underestimate the loss of public confidence in the messaging on dealing with the pandemic. Minister, you have my sincere sympathy and empathy as you seek to turn that around. There are not many on the Executive whom you can rely on to comply on an ongoing basis, and you are often let down by some of your ministerial colleagues and others.

The pandemic has put the spotlight on where the shortages in the health service have been for many years. There has been repeated underfunding and a failure by previous Executives to take tough decisions on the delivery of health and social care. In the past few days, the Royal College of Nursing has launched another campaign for fair pay for nurses and other healthcare workers. I, for one, very much support that campaign. We know how much money has been spent on agency nurses over many years. We know that, in the surge plans, we are reliant on agency nurses to help fill the gaps on wards when health service staff are moved across to the respiratory and COVID wards. That tells me that, if there is a proper salary and recompense in place, people are prepared to put in the extra hours. Nurses ask me, "Why can't they give some of that money to the people who are on the front line permanently, rather than it going repeatedly to agencies, which take their cut out of that?"

This is not the first time that I have raised the issue of workforce planning in the Department of Health. Of course, that cuts across to the Department for the Economy, which has responsibility for higher education. Earlier today, Minister, you talked about there being 300 additional nursing posts. That will not look at it. Have you given any thought to or considered discussing with the universities and the royal college whether there is a way in which the time taken to train nurses can be compressed into a shorter time than is currently the case? There is a need to look at how universities manage courses and provide training. As I have said before, there are higher education courses in the South of Ireland that enable people who perhaps do not have the academic qualifications that they need to get one of the highly sought after places at university to get there by another route. There is other work that can and should be done on that.

I will touch on mental health. I know that many people who use mental health services are not getting their face-to-face contact. I wonder about the management and supervision of some of those services. I know that staff have had to call with clients and that some clients, because they have, for example, a psychotic illness, have had to go to a clinic to get an injection. If, however, a client does not appear, just how dedicated are some of the staff in going after them? Concerns have been expressed to me about the use of agencies. Agency workers do a great job, but there is a lack of continuity, and, therefore, a lack of accountability in following through on the service. From a service-user perspective, there are questions to be answered. Some older people are being asked to make contact via Zoom.

I know, Minister, that you like to get out on the ground, but I appeal to you to give people at the coalface an opportunity to talk to you or to someone on your team in a real way without fear of retribution —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Sorry, the Member's time is up.

Mrs D Kelly: — for whatever they want to tell you.

Ms Bailey: We need to have a good look at ourselves. The five-party Executive system is not designed to manage crisis; it was a means to create a sense of stability and bring an end to violence. It was never meant to be a long-term solution, and we have lost sight of that. We see each party playing to its base and doing duck and cover to blame somebody when delivery fails. At the outset, we wrote civic society out of the process, and we are feeling that now. We are in a triple crisis, and I cannot see how our governance system will be able to manage a way through it. This is a health crisis and an economic crisis, and we have the climate crisis, with Brexit as the cherry on top. Now is the time when we need to engage with people, with business, with sectors, with ourselves across these islands north, south, east and west to begin to navigate our way through this and to build a stable system from which we can steer a path to the future.

We had a mental health crisis before COVID-19: we did not address it. We had a crisis in the NHS: we did not address it. Our high streets were in crisis before COVID-19: we did not address it. We had poverty before COVID-19, and we did not address it. As for economic crises, how many do you want? We had many before COVID-19, and we did not address them. The COVID-19 crisis is about much more than health. It is about all of the above rolled into one, and, after last week, with the stand-offs and U-turns, people have lost confidence and the advice coming to them is no longer making sense. They are not buying into it any more, so we need to do an awful lot to reach out to people again, because people know that we are not all in this together.

When the Chief Medical Officer gives advice to the Health Minister, the Health Minister creates a set of recommendations and they are then blocked by a single party using a cross-community veto — an abuse of power and privilege during a pandemic — to stop that advice being carried out, we need to have a look at ourselves. Regulations are being announced to the media before they are announced to the Assembly, despite our setting up an Ad Hoc Committee on the COVID-19 Response to deal with such situations. Moreover, they are being announced before the financial package is put in place to give people the assurances that this will be OK.

Wind turbine owners and Sinn Féin offices are receiving tens of thousands of pounds in payments while businesses have received nothing. People are broken and on their knees. Workers put on furlough, taken off furlough, made redundant, kept on zero-hour contracts. Low-paid workers, some valued as key or essential workers, cannot afford to stay at home and self-isolate if needs be. Sure, nobody is checking anyway. Care home deaths and infection rates are akin to what they were during the first lockdown, so what have we been doing since March? Payments to student nurses who are putting themselves at risk to step in and step up have been stopped while they are still being asked to do that. Why? Vital care staff are not being tested routinely, and those are some of the low-paid, essential staff. There is no plan. We are just stumbling from one point to the next in an attempt to crisis-manage, from a five-party Executive that have no track record in getting to grips with crises.

The motion calls for a plan. I noted the words of the Chair of the Committee when he asked each of us to recommit to do all that we can to address this. Well, let us start by wearing a mask. Let us start by not getting into a lift with somebody else in it in this Building where you cannot socially distance. Let us start by washing our hands and sanitising before coming into the Chamber.

We are not all in this together, so if there is any confidence to be regained, let us start acting on our own advice and start setting an example.

6.15 pm

Mr Carroll: As the motion sets out, it is important to recognise the essential work that is being done by our healthcare workers in the middle of a dangerous and deadly pandemic. Without the sacrifice, skills and gritty determination of these healthcare workers — many of whom were forced to live away from their families for weeks on end — what kind of an unthinkable situation would we be in?

It would be remiss of me not to mention that today is the first ever Royal College of Nursing (RCN) nursing support workers' day. On this day, I thank all of those RCN workers and healthcare workers for their roles and work over the last year. It is worth noting how many of these workers now feel as a result of working through this pandemic, working hard and sacrificing so much for the health and well-being of us all. I have spoken to many over the last few weeks, and they have told me that they not only feel exhausted but underappreciated and underpaid. Many of them are disgusted, to be frank, at the fact that they were promised by the Health and Finance Ministers that they would not lose out on pay for taking strike action earlier this year to stand up for safe staffing levels, yet they are still waiting as the issue is ping-ponged by Ministers across the Executive.

ICU nurses are predominantly on a band-5 pay grade despite the fact that a lot of them are doing the work of a band-6 or a higher-banded worker. We need to respect our nurses and medical staff by not only paying them the money that they were promised and are owed, but, in recognition of the essential work that they have done, the Health Minister and the Executive need to urgently begin work to ensure that they are given a significant and worthwhile pay increase, as is in line with their unions' demands. This would not only begin to acknowledge the work that these workers have done in the last year, through a pandemic that none of them signed up for or expected, but it would go some way to encourage these workers to stay here after this pandemic rather than go somewhere else where they are paid a higher wage.

I think that it is also important to mention student nurses, as has briefly been mentioned by some, and to recognise their role during the pandemic. They have worked through the pandemic; they still have to pay their bills, they have no sick pay if they are forced to isolate, and they have a bursary that effectively amounts to being paid £1 an hour for the work that they do. Who here would work for £1 an hour? Who else out there would work for £1 an hour? It is totally unfair, and that issue needs to be addressed to support student nurses and student midwives.

When you compare the role of student nurses and healthcare workers, generally, to the actions of the Executive, then it really is like comparing night and day. While health workers have gone above and beyond, putting the lives and safety of all of us and the community first, the Executive have committed themselves to a dangerous strategy of living with COVID, which, by definition — if it has a definition — means repeatedly going in and out of lockdown without committing to eliminating the virus. The result is, sadly, that we have one of the highest infection and death rates per population across the world.

The motion tonight talks about individual responsibility, and I suppose that that is important in a general sense. However, I hope that the same applies to Ministers, especially when many of them blatantly ignore the glaring and stark medical advice right in front of them. Shame on all of those parties and Ministers who are willing to threaten — and maybe still want to — the health of so many in our communities by adopting a laissez-faire approach to this virus. Many of them feign concern about low-paid workers while doing nothing to help and to protect them, except to implement a strategy of further impoverishing them and throwing them to the COVID wolves.

The motion also talks about the negative impacts of lockdown on mental health, and there is no doubt that this has been a very tough and difficult period for people's mental health, illness and issues. However, we should also avoid believing that simply opening up the doors of the economy again, forcing people back into unsafe or dangerous working conditions before a safe vaccine is rolled out, will do wonders for people's mental health. It will not. It is likely to create more problems in the short and long term. The Executive have the opportunity to now implement plans to ensure that everything is done to avoid a deeper mental health crisis in our communities after the pandemic is over. Therefore, we now need to ensure that people do not wait for months for treatment from counsellors, therapists and so on.

Finally, while we absolutely need to have a robust and improved test, trace and isolate system, it will be pretty ineffective, in the grand scheme of things, if the Executive jump in and out of restrictions based on the fluctuation of the R number, or by putting their finger to the wind. Even a world-class test and trace system, which is what we should have, is pretty useless if the Executive repeat the same mistakes of the past, time and time again.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am sorry; the Member's time is up.

Mr Carroll: OK. Thank you.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister of Health, Mr Robin Swann, to respond to the comments that were made in the debate. I remind the Minister that he has 20 minutes, should he choose to use them.

Mr Swann (The Minister of Health): No pressure. Thank you, Mr Speaker. First, I thank the members of the Health Committee for proposing the motion. It provides us with the valuable opportunity to consider the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on our health care system, the staff who work across that system, and the patients and public whom we serve as we continue to manage and mitigate the impacts of the current pandemic. I have listened very closely to those Members who have spoken in support of this issue today, and I can confirm that I am happy to support the motion. I thank the Chair for the tone and tenure of his opening comments on how he wished the debate to proceed.

In what are, clearly, unprecedented circumstances, our fantastic health and social care service has remained steadfast in its dedication to patients and those in need of care and treatment. All that work, including the continuing efforts of many to maintain services where and when possible while tackling the largest pandemic of the modern world, is testament to the dedication and expertise of our staff across the system.

Following the decision by the Executive last week, we now face a challenging, but totally necessary, period of extended restrictions. I fully appreciate the huge impact that those restrictions will have across so many sectors in Northern Ireland and the many sacrifices that people are making, but it is my job to protect our health service and to save lives. I will not and have not shied away from that. Without this circuit breaker, we would, most certainly, continue on an upward trajectory that would cripple our health service. That is why the additional measures, which were agreed by the Executive last Thursday, are needed and were covered in my statement to the Assembly this morning. I am hopeful that we will come out the other end of this period in a better place and, in particular, that we will be able to reflect more positively on the R number at the end of the two weeks, in order that we can all enjoy some sort of normality, over a short period during Christmas.

I will turn to some specific issues highlighted in the motion. You will recall that our Chief Medical Officer recently spoke about the impact that the current situation is having on mental health right across society. That was raised by a number of Members today. Specifically, Mr Mike Nesbitt talked about mental health awareness in this place before it was seen to be the right thing to do in many other places. Mr Nesbitt has been championing mental health since long before many took up that cause. Thankfully, it is now firmly on the agenda not just of this place but of political discussions across these islands. Since taking up post as Minister of Health, I have been very clear that mental health is a priority for me. To underline that commitment, I appointed Professor Siobhan O'Neill as the interim mental health champion in Northern Ireland. I fully recognise the additional challenges that COVID-19 has presented for mental health, not least for our young people. I will ensure that this area remains front and centre in our response to the pandemic.

There is no doubt that the pandemic is having a devastating impact on our hospital services, particularly in elective care and increasing difficulties in our emergency departments. I take exception when people accuse me or my health service of turning into a COVID-19 service. The assessment and medical support that are given to patients, as they present, are assessed and delivered by clinical need, by extremely experienced and professional health service professionals who have been doing this day and daily.

I am committed to reforming the services that we provide so that we can truly have a health service that delivers for all the people whom it serves. We have made real progress on a number of fronts. Members will be fully aware of the detail, including creating Northern Ireland's first regional day procedure centre at Lagan Valley Hospital, which provides a regional resource for less complex planned day surgeries and procedures.

The health service has rapidly introduced new ways of working, including the regular use of technologies such as virtual clinics, telephone appointments and videoconferencing to deliver services in new and innovative ways. In terms of the tools that we have at our disposal to address the challenges of COVID-19, our testing programme and contact-tracing systems are key. I totally agree that robust systems for testing and contact tracing are critical if we are to try to limit the impact of COVID-19 on our lives, our livelihoods and, importantly, our health and care services. However, I urge caution: neither testing nor contact tracing alone can ever be expected to provide the full answer. They are an essential part of the equation, but no more so than the need for all the people of Northern Ireland to continue to follow the public health advice, which is vital.

I am pleased to advise Members that we are now commencing the implementation of a number of new testing interventions (NTIs). In Northern Ireland, those NTIs are part of the UK-wide population testing programme. As we progress to implement those, we will evaluate the new technologies that are used for testing and realise their benefits for our citizens, services and wider economy. The testing of asymptomatic healthcare workers is due to begin this week. That NTI will enable the early identification of the SARS-CoV-2 virus in healthcare staff who do not have symptoms. That will ensure that those front-line staff self-isolate early, which will reduce the risk of onward transmission of infection. That testing will take place, in the first instance, with staff working in the Belfast Health and Social Care Trust in acute services such as oncology, haematology and nephrology. As I said, testing will commence this week, and roll-out to other trusts will follow in a planned manner.

The testing of asymptomatic students started today at Queen's University using our lateral flow devices. The learning arising from that NTI will be important to help us to better understand how asymptomatic testing can be implemented and extended more widely in the future to other parts of Northern Ireland. It is through undertaking those NTIs that we can develop fully informed plans for the future to everyone's benefit. Plans are progressing to offer testing to the wider population of students who attend Queen's University Belfast, Ulster University and a number of other colleges. In that context, asymptomatic testing will form part of a wider strategy to support and enable students to travel home for Christmas. That will require swift and agile planning and roll-out over the coming weeks, working closely across a number of Departments and other delivery partners.

The testing technologies in those NTIs are based on saliva testing and swabs tested outside of laboratory settings. They use our lateral flow devices, which can produce results for the person tested within 60 to 90 minutes. As I mentioned, those new interventions test asymptomatic individuals — people with no symptoms — with the aim of improving our ability to detect the virus, find positive cases earlier and reduce the risk of onward transmission of infection. I am keen to offer new testing interventions at a larger population level in Northern Ireland as soon as is possible and practicable. Such a programme to test larger populations in Northern Ireland — for example, testing in a local government area — would, no doubt, pose many logistical and implementation challenges. Its success would rely heavily on cross-departmental and multi-agency joint working. However, I believe that it would assist us in further reducing infection and, by extension, protecting our health service and saving lives.

6.30 pm

However, it is important that I highlight that those new testing interventions, which involve new approaches to testing and the deployment of new technologies, are additional to the COVID-19 testing programme that we have established and operate across Northern Ireland. It is also important to highlight that our current testing programme continues. That uses laboratory-based PCR testing and has to date focused mainly on the testing of symptomatic people. It will continue, and my Department will continue to work to further expand both pillars of that programme in the coming weeks and months.

Aligned to our testing programme, I am determined that our contact-tracing system will continue to offer us the best opportunity to identify cases and their close contacts as swiftly as possible and to disrupt chains of transmission between cases and their contacts. It is important to acknowledge the work of our Public Health Agency in establishing the service, which is the first of its kind to be established in the United Kingdom.

There is no doubt that our contact-tracing service has faced many challenges, not least the threefold increase in the numbers of positive cases that were notified to the service over a short period in October. That rapid increase in cases undoubtedly strained our contact-tracing system. It is clear that contact-tracing services in many other countries have experienced similar strains in recent months. Large numbers of positive cases have been notified for tracing as a consequence of increased transmission and disease activity. A number of digitally enhanced solutions have been introduced to our contact-tracing service, including a new digital self-trace platform.

The positive impact of those developments can be seen in the performance of our current service. For example, in the six-day period up to 16 November, 90% of indexed cases were contacted within 24 hours of notification to the service, while in the three days from 13 to 15 November, 92% of those contacts were successfully reached within 48 hours. However, we continue to use any benefit that the current period of restrictions affords us in order to strengthen the contact-tracing service.

The service continues to look for ways to improve and find new solutions to assist in the delivery of its functions. Increased understanding of the service and further developing the public's trust in the service model will continue to be essential to its success over the coming months. Our Public Health Agency is driving forward a mass media campaign to optimise the public's awareness and understanding of the components of the contact-tracing system and, in particular, to increase the public's awareness of the benefits of using the digital self-trace platform that is offered by the service. The PHA is progressing significant work through social media and other media channels in order to encourage our public to stay vigilant in the fight against coronavirus and to ensure that everyone who has symptoms comes forward for a test. It explains the vital role of the contact-tracing system, how it operates in practice and its crucial role in preventing the daily spread of the virus.

In parallel with those developments, the agency has also commenced enhanced tracing for all new cases notified to the contact-tracing service from 16 to November. In association with conventional contact tracing, which aims to identify a case's close contacts and then reach them to advise them of the actions that they must take, enhanced contact tracing ensures that there is a strong focus on identifying the likely source of a case's infection and the potential common exposures that can lead to clusters and outbreaks. That was the issue that Ms Bradshaw specifically raised.

That combination of conventional and enhanced contact tracing will increase the contribution of the contact-tracing service to the control of community transmissions across Northern Ireland and to detecting the source of clusters in community settings. Using that enhanced tracing approach, PHA's contact tracers are working with indexed cases to capture information for seven days prior to the date of their symptom onset or the date of testing if the case has no symptoms.

It is important to highlight that the approach to contact tracing in the future will be based on that hybrid model of service provision. That model will focus on innovative digital solutions to reach and deliver early messages to cases and their close contacts while enabling targeted input from expert, professional healthcare staff who will risk-assess and deal with the more complex cases, clusters and outbreaks. Work to develop and refine this hybrid service model is being taken forward, at pace, through the Public Health Agency, and it is being overseen by my Department.

There is no doubt that more hard work and difficult times lie ahead, but it is important to know that there is hope. You will know that, although still early days, exciting progress is being made on COVID-19 vaccines. They are not yet approved for use in the United Kingdom. However, there is now a very real prospect that we will be in a different place next spring and summer as we deliver our vaccination programme. I acknowledge the enormous work currently in progress to ensure that we are ready to commence our programme as soon as the vaccine is made available to us in Northern Ireland. I hope that that will allay some of Mr Sheehan's concerns about the ongoing work.

Mr Sheehan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Swann: I will.

Mr Sheehan: I take the Minister at his word, and I always have. However, I want to see some outline of the plan for how it will be rolled out and who will be responsible for doing the vaccination. To have confidence, we need to see the plan. I know that I got a bit passionate about the PHA but, after its contact-tracing performance, I have absolutely no confidence in it.

Mr Swann: I am sure that a presentation can be provided for members of the Committee, who have been supportive of the work that we have been doing at a departmental level and of me as Minister. I am appreciative of the multiple engagements that I have had with the Health Committee and the proactive stance that it takes. However, I encourage Mr Sheehan to be challenging but not to get personal when dealing with the departmental professionals who come to present to the Committee. As I said, the vaccination programme will begin as soon as possible after it is made available to us in Northern Ireland.

In supporting the motion, I thank all Members who made contributions. It remains essential that we address the impact of the virus on the population of Northern Ireland and that we protect our healthcare system, the people who work in it and, importantly, the people whom we serve who require care and treatment within it. It is clear from what I outlined here today that much progress has been made to date as we collectively find, test, trace, isolate and support those throughout society who have been impacted on by COVID-19.

Earlier, I said that COVID-19 was our common enemy. I firmly believe that it is our common enemy. It is not just the health service's common enemy, it is the common enemy of our economy and of our education service because, day and daily, we must tackle it not only at an institutional level, an Executive level and an Assembly level but at a personal level.

Ms Bailey: Thank you, Minister, for giving way. If this is our common enemy, why do we not have a common response? Last week, I stood on the street where a friend's young daughter had taken her life. I watched the funeral cortege make its way to an open-air ceremony before an open-air burial that only 25 people were allowed to attend. The very next day, our First Minister gets into a taxi and, with 1,000 others, heads to a football match in an outdoor venue. How is that "common"? How does that show that everyone is in this together?

Mr Swann: I know the point that the Member is making, and I respect the point that the Member is making. However, the common message coming out of this place must be one of encouragement to the people of Northern Ireland that there is hope, if we challenge COVID-19 as a collective. If it is done politically, that saddens and challenges me as the Minister of Health. What I do not want is some of the political commentary that has developed over the past number of weeks and months.

We were able to get Northern Ireland into a very good place during the first wave of COVID-19. We did that because we stood side by side. We did that because we stood shoulder to shoulder with our healthcare professionals, with those who had tested positive for COVID-19 and with those who needed support. In my comments this morning, I appealed for that united approach once again. So I say to the Member, to every Member and to anybody who is listening to this: let us put those differences, those political challenges and those political point-scoring opportunities behind us for the next number of days, weeks and months until we get this virus under control.

I support the motion. In concluding, I again remind all present, and those listening to this debate, about the important responsibility that we all have to ensure that we follow the public health advice to drive down infections. I appeal to everyone: reduce your contacts, keep your distance, wash your hands, wear a face covering and download the StopCOVID NI app. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, thank you for your indulgence.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That is OK. I call Mrs Pam Cameron to wind up on the motion.

Mrs Cameron (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Health): Thank you. From now on, I am just going to refer to you as “Mr Speaker”, because that will save some time.

I support the motion, and I am winding up on it as Deputy Chair of the Health Committee. First, I put on record my sympathy to all of the families who have been bereaved in recent months, whether through COVID-19 or not. We are all very well aware of how difficult it is living with the restrictions, and how much more so it is for those who are living in grief right now. I wish to declare that I have family members working in the health service at this time.

I will move to quickly summarise some of the remarks made by Members. The Chair of the Health Committee outlined the interdependent elements of the motion and the evidence taken by the Committee on the impact of vulnerable groups. All Members who spoke paid warm tributes to health and social care staff, recognising the risks taken, the stress and exhaustion felt and the dedication shown. The Chair acknowledged progress in testing and tracing and put forward suggestions for consideration around increasing the find, test, trace, isolate and support systems. A move to mass and rapid testing was endorsed by many contributors. Colm Gildernew emphasised the need to increase the capacity of the FTTIS system, especially around isolation and support, and he talked about the connection with wider policy such as travel and childcare.

Paula Bradshaw also expressed concern about the adequacy of resources in the FTTIS system, particularly around asymptomatic testing and the capacity to learn more about the origin of infections and the risks associated with certain types of behaviour. Órlaithí Flynn asked if more could be done to build up our public health approach to reduce the need for restrictions, and Mr Sheehan emphasised the need for learning from international experience, expressing concern about local capacity.

Justin McNulty accepted that restrictions were necessary due to the current figures, and Jonathan Buckley raised concerns about the impact on patients awaiting treatment for cancer and other conditions. Alan Chambers countered that much non-COVID work had been maintained in the second surge. The legacy of underfunding of the system was raised by Dolores Kelly, who called for progress on workforce planning and fair pay for nurses, and by Mike Nesbitt, who also recognised progress made under the Minister’s leadership.

Having joined in the tributes to staff, Mr McGrath raised concerns about staff exhaustion and practical challenges facing workers, such as time and facilities to have meal breaks. Dolores Kelly called for better channels for front-line workers to feed through issues to the Minister and senior figures. Turning to restrictions, Colin McGrath expressed disappointment around progress on bringing down transmission.

The wide-ranging impact of the pandemic was acknowledged by all contributors, from mental health, which was raised by Mr McGrath, Mr McNulty, Mrs Kelly and Mr Carroll, to the economic impacts and knock-on effects on well-being described by Mr Chambers and Mr Clarke. Órlaithí Flynn referred also to the loss of social connections and the impact of visiting restrictions and missed appointments.

Several contributors, including Mr Buckley, Mr McGrath, Mr Chambers, Mr Clarke, Mrs Kelly and Ms Bailey, referred to the political divisions and mixed messaging of recent weeks and months, and many called for a constructive and collaborative approach.

6.45 pm

Mike Nesbitt referred to the challenge of having a five-party coalition but pointed to the ongoing work to develop a cross-island approach. Dolores Kelly called for the recognition of the importance of consistent political leadership for public confidence. Alan Chambers challenged the suggestion that not enough work was done in preparation for the second surge and flagged the time required to train additional staff.

Compliance with self-isolation was raised by Órlaithí Flynn and Paula Bradshaw, who also called for additional support to be made available to affected individuals. Making the point that financial support is not enough, Órlaithí suggested that follow-up calls should encourage compliance. She also underscored the need for wider cross-departmental cooperation to tackle the pandemic.

Clare Bailey put the debate in the wider context of the climate crisis, the high-street crisis, long-standing issues of poverty and low pay, and political difficulties. She asked why payments to nursing students have been stopped. Gerry Carroll called attention to the current figures and the particular impact on low-paid workers, and he criticised what he feels is an Executive policy of living with the virus.

The Minister responded and acknowledged the impact of the restrictions and the sacrifices that people would have to make. He outlined the rationale for them and his hopes for progress in two weeks. The Minister restated his commitment to mental health, saying that he would keep it front and centre going forward, and acknowledged the work of Health and Social Care staff throughout.

Members expressed support for the motion, acknowledged public efforts to date and urged everyone to take individual responsibility and to adhere to all the hands, face, space guidance. The Minister also outlined the next steps in mass-testing initiatives and in public messaging, as well as new initiatives for enhanced contact tracing.

In closing, I put on record my thanks to the Clerk and the Committee staff for their tremendous work and support given throughout 2020 to date, and I thank the Committee membership for their contributions on the motion this evening.

With your indulgence, Mr Speaker, I will say a few words of my own as a DUP MLA. First and foremost, it is important to pay tribute to our staff on the front line. Although we may feel that the past eight or nine months have been challenging for this place, it is nothing compared with the challenges and the physical, mental and emotional strain faced by our nurses and doctors. We owe them a great debt of gratitude. It is a debt that should be repaid, in part, by a pay rise, as advocated by the RCN, amongst others. I urge the Health Minister to work with the Health Secretary to deliver that across the UK.

Furthermore, let us not underestimate or ignore the mental health strain on our staff. This has been a hugely difficult time of emotional strain and for having to do things that no nurse has been trained to do. Adequate support structures must be in place. I have heard of nurses who have been working on COVID wards who are now looking for jobs in supermarkets. What a terrible indictment of the lack of support for those professionals and heroes.

This House and the Executive cannot be deaf to the public anger about, and disillusionment with, what they have witnessed from this place in recent weeks. We now face two weeks, at least, of sweeping restrictions, and although the time for asking searching questions and for accountability will no doubt come, it is the job of this place to do better, by coming up with solutions quicker and for those to be more effective, and to avoid the cycle of lockdowns that we all say that we want to avoid but about which we seem to do too little, too late to avoid. That is failing local business, failing workers and failing families. It is simply not good enough.

What we have, outside of this place, is a health crisis, a mental health crisis and an economic crisis. The health crisis is dominated by COVID-19 but goes far beyond that. It is heart disease, undiagnosed diabetes, suicide and undiagnosed cancer. It is the lack of early intervention that will lead to more health misery. Last week, we marked Pancreatic Cancer Awareness Day. How many today are living with that awful cancer and do not know it? How many cannot and will not get treatment in time to help them?

What are we going to do, Mr Speaker? An immediate priority must be to improve our track-and-trace system. Put frankly, it is not up to the job. The mantra has been that it works best with lower numbers. That is a logical assumption, but we have not had low numbers in weeks. As a net, the holes are too big, and too much is slipping through. I am sure that we all know of examples of someone who has been in close contact but no notification was received of any description, and that is helping the virus spread.

I pay tribute to the staff who are working on contact tracing. They are doing great work, but there are not enough of them. The service needs additional resource, and that resource should be available by now. We need innovative thinking on ways to improve how we track and trace to make it even more effective. We have known about the issue for a long time, but here we are talking about it.

We also know about the lack of awareness of the rules on self-isolating. I was told three times whilst having a COVID-19 test that I could go about my business if I received a negative test. That was after being notified by the StopCOVID NI app of a close contact and being told to isolate for 14 days. Just last week, I heard the same story of several other individuals who were given the same wrong advice. I appreciate an emailed apology received from the PHA over the completely wrong information that was given, but it is not good enough. At this stage in a pandemic, we are still being given dangerous, incorrect information on isolation. I question, therefore, whether the PR campaign has been ramped up enough to deal with that, because I do not see it.

If we become a pilot for mass testing, will the test, trace, isolate and protect programme be able to cope? That is the question. The groundwork needs to be put in place now. If the contact tracing is not fit for purpose, mass testing will not be as effective as we need it to be.

It goes without saying that our care homes need a focus, which, to date, has not been here. Over 140 care homes with outbreaks is a damning indictment on the Department's protection of the most vulnerable. We clearly did not act on what we learned from the first wave, if we learned anything, because, sadly, our care homes are under attack from the virus, once again.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to conclude her remarks.

Mrs Cameron: We need staff testing to be as frequent as possible.

I do not have enough time to finish all my remarks, but I want to say that, recently, I have spoken to people who cannot sleep for fear of not being able to provide for their children at Christmas. I welcome that all Members agree with the motion. Thank you for your time.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the negative impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on Health and Social Care services, staff and patients; further recognises the impact on the physical and mental well-being of staff, patients and the public; acknowledges that restrictions are a consequence of the inability to suppress transmission rates; urges and encourages every member of the public to exercise individual responsibility by adhering to guidance, washing hands thoroughly and regularly, maintaining social distance and wearing face coverings; further acknowledges recent progress and commitments from the Minister of Health to increase testing and contact-tracing capacity; and calls on the Minister of Health to bring forward a robust, scaled-up find, test, trace, isolate and support (FTTIS) strategy based on international best practice as part of a wider Executive strategy to help avoid a cycle of lockdowns and the particular negative impacts on mental health and well-being.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The next item in the Order Paper is the Adjournment. Please clean your surfaces before you leave the Chamber.

Adjourned at 6.52 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 24 November 2020

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Ministerial Statement

Urology: Southern Health and Social Care Trust

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Health that he wishes to make a statement. Before I call the Minister, I remind Members that, in light of social distancing being observed by the parties, the Speaker's ruling that Members must be in the Chamber to hear a statement if they wish to ask a question has been relaxed. Members still have to make sure that their name is on the speaking list if they wish to be called, but they can do this by rising in their places as well as notifying the Business Office or the Speaker's Table directly. I remind Members to be concise in asking their questions. This is not a debate per se, and long introductions should not be entered into.

Mr Swann (The Minister of Health): Mr Speaker, it is with deep regret that I inform the House of a further occurrence of serious concerns about the clinical practice of a hospital consultant notified to my Department by one of our health and social care trusts. The incident concerns the clinical practice of a urology consultant, Mr Aidan O'Brien, who retired from the Southern Trust earlier this year.

On 31 July 2020, the Southern Trust contacted my Department to report an early alert concerning the clinical practice of the consultant. The trust informed my Department that, on 7 June, it became aware of potential concerns regarding delays in the treatment of surgery patients who were under the care of the consultant urologist employed by the trust. The trust became aware that two out of 10 patients listed for surgery under the care of the consultant were not on the hospital's patient administration system at that time. As a result of those potential patient safety concerns, an initial look-back exercise in relation to the consultant's work was conducted to ascertain whether there were other areas of potential concern.

The initial look back, which considered cases over an 18-month period of the consultant's work in the Southern Trust from 1 January 2019 to 30 June 2020, concentrated on whether patients had had a stent inserted during a particular procedure and if the stent had been removed within the clinically recommended time frame. The initial look back identified concerns with 46 cases out of a total of 147 patients who had the procedure and were listed as being under the care of the consultant during the period addressed by the initial look-back exercise.

When my Department was contacted on 31 July, the trust confirmed that the following actions had already been taken: discussions with the GMC's employer liaison service had been conducted; the case had been discussed with NHS Resolution, which recommended restrictions of clinical practice; restrictions were put in place by the trust preventing the consultant from undertaking clinical work in the trust and denying him the access or ability to process patient information; the trust requested that the consultant voluntarily undertake to refrain from seeing any private patients at their home or any other setting and that he confirm the same in writing; and a preliminary discussion was undertaken with the Royal College of Surgeons' invited review service regarding the consultant's practice and the potential scope and scale of any further look-back exercise that may be required.

The trust also established a review group to assess the further findings of the initial look-back exercise and to explore the potential need for a further look-back exercise in the context of the emerging concerns. That group has been working diligently since August, and I am now in a position to inform the Assembly of its most recent findings. Whilst Mr O'Brien has worked in the Southern Trust for 28 years, in consultation with the Royal College of Surgeons, the review group has looked at the time frame from 1 January 2019 until 30 June 2020. During that time, 2,327 patients were under his care. The review group identified the most vulnerable group of urology patients in that cohort and concentrated on those patients initially.

There are areas of concern relating to elective and emergency activity; radiology, pathology and cytology results; patients whose cases were considered in multidisciplinary team meetings; oncology; and the safe prescribing of an anti-androgen drug outside established NICE guidance in the management of prostate cancer. Across those areas, to date, 1,159 patients' records have been reviewed, and 271 patients or families have been contacted by the trust. The group's work continues across those areas of concern. Further details of the various review strands are appended to the statement.

So far, nine cases have been identified that meet the threshold for a serious adverse incident (SAI) review, and all nine patients and/or their families have been contacted by the trust to inform them of the position of their respective cases. A further six cases are being reviewed in more detail to establish whether those patients have come to harm.

The consultant also had a significant amount of private practice. Much of that was carried out in private domestic premises and, therefore, sat outside the regulatory framework that requires the registration and external assurance of facilities in the independent sector in which clinicians may undertake private practice. That is also of significant concern to me, as many of those patients may be unknown to the Southern Trust or the wider Health and Social Care (HSC) system.

Following a recent media report about the developing situation, the trust has issued a statement and has advised patients that, if they are concerned about aspects of their urology care and require further advice, they should contact the Southern Trust by email or through its urology information phone line. That information line is available from Monday to Friday between 10.00 am and 3.00 pm, and the number is 0800 4148520.

I am sure that the House will agree that the issues identified by the trust's review group are of the gravest concern. The impact of the concerns will be felt most severely by the patients and families affected, and, unfortunately, we are only at the start of what is likely to become a long and detailed investigation of the matter. As Health Minister, I want first to unreservedly apologise to the patients and their families for any upset and distress that has been caused. I wish to reassure them that I will endeavour to ensure that they obtain appropriate treatment and support and the care that they need over the coming weeks and months.

I propose to take a number of actions to uncover how the situation developed over a number of years without any apparent action being taken by the trust to deal with the practice of the consultant before now. I need to determine quickly whether a further look-back exercise is required that might necessitate a significant review and recall of a larger group of patients, other than those identified to date, who require a review of their clinical care and treatment. In addition to that, given the large number of cases that have been identified as meeting the threshold for an SAI review, particular action will be required to ensure that matters relating to those patients and their care and treatment are dealt with in an effective and timely way.

I have therefore taken the following actions. First, I have established a urology assurance group, chaired by the permanent secretary of my Department, to provide external oversight of the various work streams arising from the initial look-back exercise initiated by the Southern Trust. Specifically, that group will review the progress of the initial look-back exercise; consider emerging strategic issues; commission and direct further work as necessary; monitor the impact on urology and related services in the Southern Trust; ensure coordination with other associated reviews or investigations; and oversee communication across all stakeholder groups, with patient care being the central focus throughout. I have published the terms of reference for the group alongside the statement. Secondly, the Royal College of Surgeons has been commissioned to carry out an independent review of a sample of the clinical cases included in the initial look-back exercise to determine whether a further, more extensive look-back or patient recall by the trust is required. Thirdly, in relation to the consultant's private patients who are not known to the Southern Trust, I have requested that Mr O'Brien's solicitors outline how he intends to provide a similar independent process to ensure that those private patients are alerted to issues arising and that their immediate healthcare needs are being met. While the Department has no explicit duty to take this particular matter forward, as part of our wider healthcare responsibilities, I want to do all that I can to safeguard patients who may have received care or treatment in a private capacity from the consultant.

The remaining issues to be addressed relate to the management of all past, present and future cases that would meet the threshold for an SAI review, as well as establishing why this happened and whether action could have been taken by the Southern Trust to identify and address the apparent deficiencies in the consultant's clinical practice. Given the large number of cases already identified as meeting the threshold for an SAI review and my concerns that there may be more to come, a different and specific approach is required. The fourth action, therefore, that I intend to take is to establish a statutory public inquiry under the Inquiries Act 2005. I believe that that is the best way to ensure that the full extent of the concerns is identified and for the patients and families affected to see that those and all relevant issues are pursued in a transparent and independent way. My officials are preparing the way to get the inquiry up and running as soon as possible. That will take some time, and I would expect that the respective families and patients will have the opportunity to influence the inquiry's terms of reference. I must also be mindful of the statutory duties placed on me to discuss the issues with the appointed chair in advance of establishing the inquiry. Further details will be provided in that regard when they are available.

Inevitably, this type of work leads to a range of statistics relating to patient numbers, records reviewed, patient contacts and so on. Members will know that, behind every statistic, there is a patient, a family and their story and experience. These types of exercise can cause upset, distress and anxiety.

A significant element in all this work, therefore, will be to communicate with and support patients and their families as much as possible in the coming weeks and months. To help with that, the Southern Trust is developing a patient support package to include any counselling and psychological support that is needed, alongside the provision of family liaison and related support services.

10.45 am

Members will be all too aware that these significant concerns come hard on the heels of the recall of neurology patients by the Belfast Trust, and I am sure that Members will be keen to see the outcomes of that inquiry in due course. I recently met patients and families affected by the neurology recall and reiterated my apology to them for how they had been let down by the Health and Social Care system. To address those cases, as Members will know, an independent inquiry was initiated by the Department. That inquiry was established in the absence of Ministers, when it was not possible to constitute the inquiry under the Inquiries Act. To date, the work of that independent inquiry has been largely unaffected by that non-statutory approach, and I take the opportunity to thank Brett Lockhart QC and his team for their immense efforts in recent months. However, to ensure that, in the closing stages of the neurology inquiry, Mr Lockhart and his team have timely and unfettered access to all relevant information, I also announce that I intend to convert the Independent Neurology Inquiry to a statutory public inquiry under the Inquiries Act 2005. It is important to note that the inquiry team is at a very advanced stage of its evidence-gathering process, and I want to be clear that I do not intend this decision to add to or alter the work or timescales of the neurology inquiry team, nor do I expect to see changes in the way that evidence has been gathered or public access has been provided. That would not be in the interests of the patients and families affected. They have already waited too long for answers. My officials will be in contact with Mr Lockhart as soon as possible to ensure that the transition is as seamless as it can be.

The emerging situation in the Southern Trust causes me and my Department the gravest of concerns. While I remain convinced that the experience of patients who use our health service is overwhelmingly that of a safe and quality service, these incidents, regrettably, dent the confidence of service users. I fully acknowledge that, and I will do all that I can to ensure that lessons are learned to prevent situations such as these occurring again. I trust that Members will agree that what I have announced today constitutes robust and timely action in a deeply concerning situation. I commend my statement to the Assembly.

Mr Gildernew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle, agus gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Thank you, Minister, for coming today to make the statement. It is a detailed and concerning statement.

I note your reference to the neurology inquiry, and I welcome the fact that it has been translated into a public inquiry. There will be lessons there. I also welcome the fact that a public inquiry has been called into this issue. I also reference the O'Hara inquiry, which probably has information that will be of benefit in how we move forward with this.

Minister, I welcome the fact that you said, on 27 October, that you would make the statement, and I have met the Southern Trust on the issue. Will you provide us with an update on how the terms of reference for the assurance group were developed and especially whether any urology patient voices are involved at this point? Will you outline the timelines for that urology assurance group and the review by the Royal College of Surgeons?

Mr Swann: I thank the Chair for his comments. I apologise for not being able to give him a personal briefing on this; there was an Executive meeting this morning.

On the terms of reference of the urology assurance group, as I said, the Department received the early alert from the Southern Trust in July 2020. By that stage, the trust had taken initial actions relating to the concerns, including the restriction of the consultant's clinical practice and access to patient information, notifying the GMC and discussing the matters with the Royal College of Surgeons' invited review service to understand the scope. Officials from my Department, the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and the Public Health Agency (PHA) have participated in weekly progress update calls with the trust since 10 October, summarising the current position and including the quantity of patient case notes that need to be reviewed and progress on the SAIs.

The object of the group is to review the progress of the initial scoping exercise; consider the emerging strategic issues; commission and direct further work as necessary; monitor the impact on urology and related services; ensure coordination with other associated reviews and investigations; and oversee communication across all stakeholder groups. As I said, detailed terms of reference and the membership of the group are attached to the statement and will be available to Members.

On the participation of patients, as we are in the early stages of the identification of a number of them, they have not been engaged yet, but they will be engaged in the terms of reference of the full inquiry, as my statement detailed.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Minister for his statement. This will no doubt cause a lot of concern for patients across the Southern Trust. I welcome the establishment of a public inquiry to ensure public confidence, and I reiterate my call to ensure that its chair is independent of the Southern Trust and, indeed, of all the health and social care trusts.

Does the Minister agree that there is a need to look back further and examine Dr O'Brien's entire 28 years at the Southern Trust and in private practice? The review group looked at the time between 1 January 2019 and 30 June 2020, so there is a need to examine his entire time at the Southern Trust. Will the Minister outline whether he anticipates any further disciplinary or police action in relation to Dr O'Brien's actions?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his comments. The chair will be appointed under the Inquiries Act and will, of course, be independent.

As I said in my statement, the first look back was from 1 January 2019 until 30 June 2020, and further look backs will be decided depending on what they find in that, what the urology review group bring forward and the references from the Royal College of Surgeons. That time frame will be looked at, and they will go as far back as necessary. It is important to instil as much confidence in patients as possible to ensure that they come forward, make contact using the number provided by the Southern Trust and seek the help and assistance that they need.

The outworkings of the inquiry with regard to Mr O'Brien will depend on the outworkings of the royal college and the inquiry itself; it is not for me to predetermine them.

Mr McGrath: I thank the Minister for his statement and welcome the fact that the neurology inquiry and this inquiry will be public inquiries with statutory foundation.

The statement refers to significant work being carried out at home or in a non-clinical setting. Will the Minister detail how widespread that practice is? Is he concerned that that may be at variance with the clinical rules, guidelines and accountability that we have? To give people assurance, might the public inquiry investigate that type of practice?

Mr Swann: We do not have specific numbers for that, which is why we have been in contact with Mr O'Brien's solicitor to make sure that whatever provisions are put in place also apply to the private group of patients that he was seeing, sometimes in a domestic setting. As I said in my statement, the Southern Trust does not hold those records, so anyone who has seen Mr O'Brien in a private practice or in a domestic setting should come forward to the Southern Trust and seek assistance from that information helpline, which is now available from Monday to Friday, 10.00 am to 3.00 pm. The telephone number is 0800 414 8520.

Mr Chambers: I thank the Minister for his statement on these two rather distressing and concerning issues, and I welcome his intervention. Whilst noting the increased powers and scope that the neurology review will have following its conversion to a public inquiry, I ask the Minister whether he is satisfied that, to date, the review has not been impeded in its work and that this is instead a case of ensuring that its future work will continue unhindered.

Mr Swann: The basis and need for the neurology inquiry to be converted to a statutory public inquiry is primarily to ensure that the Independent Neurology Inquiry team has access to all relevant information to draw its conclusions and make recommendations to my Department and to support a timely outcome of the inquiry team's report. Even though the inquiry team is at a very advanced stage of its evidence-gathering process, I do not foresee the decision adversely impacting on its work or timescales. As the Member would expect, I consulted the Independent Neurology Inquiry chair in advance of my decision, and he was fully supportive. I know that the patients and families involved are eager to see the publication of the cohort to recall, and I can advise that I expect to make a statement addressing that publication in the near future.

Ms Bradshaw: I thank the Minister for his statement. He will know that some of us have been campaigning for a long time for this neurology inquiry. Those of us who received private political briefings from Hugo Mascie-Taylor and Brett Lockhart know that they wanted this, so I appreciate that we have got to this stage today.

The common factor in Muckamore, neurology, hyponatraemia, this and others is clinical governance. How many times will MLAs be brought to the Chamber to discuss breakdowns in clinical governance? Will the Minister look at a more Health and Social Care-wide process to improve that?

Mr Swann: It brings me no pleasure coming forward to make these statements; in fact, it distresses and upsets me that we find ourselves in the position that we have to make them. When I engaged with the neurology families, the most distressing piece that I heard was that they had lost trust in our health service. That is why I have moved, as the Member acknowledged, for a public inquiry in relation to Muckamore and urology and am now transferring neurology across to that as well to make sure that we get to the root cause of the problems so that we can correct them.

This is not just a recent manifestation that we have to address, but I hope and am sure that the inquiries will bring things to light so that we can really get to grips with what are — I will not go as far as to say that there are systemic failings in our health service, because it is not widespread — distressing incidents. There are many, many good people working across our Health and Social Care system who need support and need the structures to support them, but, when we find cases like this, we need to ensure that we find and bring to light all that went wrong and all that is needed to correct what went wrong, so that it does not happen again. In the outworkings of all the inquiries, there will be a strong thread of recommendations that, I hope, will leave our Health and Social Care system in a far better place from a clinical governance point of view.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his statement to the House this morning on yet another health blow to the public in Northern Ireland and much worry for the people who have been involved in these urology cases.

Can the Minister give a commitment that there will be timely and urgent engagement with the affected patients, given the frustration demonstrated in the past by neurology patients who felt that they were not involved or listened to in that malpractice scandal?

11.00 am

Mr Swann: I give the Member that assurance. One thing that came to light when I met some of the neurology families and the charities was the frustration over communication. That is why I have asked the Patient and Client Council (PCC) to lead on the engagement. It was leading on the work that we did with the neurology families; it will now do similar work with urology patients and families to ensure that they are as fully embedded in the process as possible and kept up to date regularly with each step that is being taken. It is important that they know that the work that is being brought forward by the inquiries is there to support them as well as to identify what went wrong so that we can make sure that it does not happen again.

Mr O'Dowd: This is probably one of the most disturbing and concerning health statements that I have heard in the Chamber in the 17 years that I have been an MLA. Not one but two public inquiries have been announced today. In my opinion, the reason for that is the culture in our health service. Our consultants have far too much power. The vast majority of our consultants are fine people who carry out healthcare and save lives daily, but the culture in the health service means that they have too much power. When someone has too much power, that person is not held to account.

I will give the Minister an example. Six months ago, I wrote to the same trust about a consultant. I made a formal complaint on behalf of the mother of a disabled adult. The consultant wrote back to me and told me that he was doing a fine job. He may well be doing a fine job, but it is not up to him to tell me that. He should have been investigated. Will the Minister agree with me that, until the culture changes and that power relationship between the trusts and consultants changes, we will be back here talking about another public inquiry into a different consultant at some stage?

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for his comments. Unfortunately, I recognise what he says. I stress, however, the point that he made about there being many fine consultants working across our Health and Social Care system. I want to be clear to the Member, the House and the public who are listening that there are very many good people working in our Health and Social Care system. I ask people to put their trust in them.

The relationship between trusts and consultants is a piece of work that will be brought to bear in the inquiries that I have announced today. Health Ministers before me have had the same struggle with that relationship and the same level of concern. It gives me no pleasure to announce two public inquiries on the same day. That indicates the concern that I have as Health Minister that things need to change. I am sure that that will be the outworking of all three inquiries that I have instigated and announced since taking over as Minister of Health 10 months ago.

Mr Clarke: Like others, I welcome the Minister's honesty in his statement and the detail in it. The Member opposite talked about a culture, but there is another culture among consultants, which is for private as well as public work. While the clinical side is referenced, the bit of the statement that worries me is where it states that two out of 10 patients were not on the patient administration system. At this stage, does the Minister know whether that has anything to do with the relationship between private work and trust work, or is there something wrong with the trust's administration itself? Will that be included in that inquiry's scope?

Mr Swann: Again, that came to light when the trust became aware that two of the 10 patients who were listed for surgery with that consultant were not on the hospital's patient administration system at the time, so that will be included in the inquiry's scope. As the Member highlights, the concern then is the relationship between what was being done privately, often in domestic settings, and how that goes unregulated, unrecorded and unnoted. Unfortunately, that leaves us having to contact Mr O'Brien's solicitors to make sure that he brings forward any records or any patient details that he holds.

The reason why, today, I am calling on anybody who has been under the attention of Mr O'Brien in a private capacity to come forward to the Southern Trust is so that, through the terms of the inquiry, we can support them as well and make sure that they get whatever medical and psychological support they need and deserve, even having been under Mr O'Brien's private care.

Ms Kimmins: I thank the Minister for his statement. As others said, what we face this morning raises serious concerns. Supporting governance is a key safeguard in the delivery of services. Can the Minister confirm whether annual appraisals were carried out for the individual involved? They are a way of identifying issues early on, so I am keen to hear whether they were completed in the lead-up to the issue.

Mr Swann: I thank the Member for her point. I do not have that information with me, but I can get it and update the House when we have it.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the public inquiry and declare an interest in that my grand-niece's late mother was one of Dr Watt's patients. Her mum is now part of the campaign to seek answers, and they will very much welcome the public inquiry.

In relation to Dr O'Brien, I must say that I have spoken to generations of nursing and medical staff and, indeed, patients of Dr O'Brien, who are shocked at this. He was held and continues to be held by many in the highest regard. Members have talked about the relationship between the trust and consultants. Is the Minister aware of and will the terms of reference look at events preceding the inquiry by the Southern Trust? Will the terms of reference include Mr O'Brien's grievance and legal action that, I believe, may be under way against the trust?

Mr Swann: If there is legal action, I cannot comment on it, as the Member will be aware. The terms of reference for the inquiry have yet to be finalised and will not be finalised until the chair has been appointed. However, there will be full engagement on how the terms of reference are drawn up to make sure that we get to the root cause of why this was allowed to happen and, indeed, why it happened.

Mr Beattie: I thank the Minister for his statement. I also thank him for his frank and honest answers and his decisive action in ordering a public inquiry. The Minister will know that this will cause deep concern to patients, past and present, in the urology service. Even this debate may cause them concern. Can the Minister give a commitment to patients in the Southern Trust that the urology service is safe and that they are receiving the appropriate treatment?

Mr Swann: I will give that assurance, because one of the things that the Southern Trust has done is make sure that Mr O'Brien's patients are now being supported by other consultants and receiving the treatment and the updates that they need. As I have said before, anyone who has concerns about whether they fall into the scope of the review or, indeed, whether they were under Mr O'Brien's care, can phone that number to seek help, medical or psychological, should they require it. One of the outworkings of the neurology inquiry was an understanding of the necessity to provide support and care. We possibly failed to do that in neurology, but we want to make sure that we get it right in the urology inquiry, given the concerns that have been raised today.

Mr T Buchanan: Like others, I thank the Minister for making his statement to the House today. I know that the thoughts of the Minister and of everyone in the House are with those patients today. I agree with Mr O'Dowd, on this occasion, that consultants have far too much power. They dictate to their employer where they will work, and that has to change. Given the length of Mr O'Brien's 28 years' service in the trust, were concerns raised about his actions prior to this? If not, does that not cause the Minister concern about those in the trust with responsibility, who, apparently, failed to pick up on this until late in the day?

Mr Swann: As I said, that will be the outworkings and some of the work that the inquiry team will look into, as well as how far back it goes and how many look-backs we need to have. As I said in my statement, the initial look-back was at the work completed between 1 January 2019 and 30 June 2020. The trust became aware only when two out of 10 patients listed for surgery under the care of the consultant were not on the hospital's patient administration system at that time. That came to light early this summer. The inquiry will pick up on a lot of that work and answer a lot of the Member's questions.

Ms Dillon: I thank the Minister for bringing the statement to the House and for his answers. Can the Minister outline how this will affect urology services not only in the Southern Trust but across the North? As was outlined, we have delays in normal circumstances, but, in the current circumstances of COVID, we have further delays. The dent in confidence that was alluded to in doctors and urology services may lead to some people not bringing themselves forward for services? What impact will that have? Those patients will have to go to other consultants now.

Mr Swann: The Southern Trust will work to make sure that any of Mr O'Brien's patients who need follow-up assessments or interviews, even in regard to work completed by Mr O'Brien, will be seen by other consultants in the urology team.

The Member is right to raise a concern about the pressures that our urology service is already under. Like many of our health services, it already has vacancies in posts, so it will put additional strain on that service. Should patients be assigned or designated to go to a urology service, I encourage them to take up that offer because, as has been said, there are many good clinicians still working in our health service across Northern Ireland, and they are there to provide the best health and social care that they can.

Mr Boylan: Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire. I welcome the Minister's statement. The Minister may have partly answered in his statement how he will contact patients, including those who were private, who were seen pre-January 2019. What extra supports can be put in place for those patients and their families, and how do we instil confidence back into the system?

Mr Swann: Putting that trust and confidence back into the system is the challenge that I have and that we all have. We have good people working in the system. We have a good health system, and I ask Members to encourage people not to lose faith in all the good people working across our health and social care sector. The Southern Trust has led in providing support mechanisms, and I reiterate that there is a telephone number for people, should they be seeking support. The number is in the statement, and it has been made available.

The concern that we have is the number of people who were seen in private practice. Much of that work was carried out in private domestic services. Therefore, it sat outside the regulatory framework, which requires the registration of external assurances of facilities in the independent sector. That side of the work concerns me as well, and that is why we have been in contact with Mr O'Brien's solicitor to make sure that we get full access and that we provide as much support to the patients he saw privately as we do for those known to the Health and Social Care sector. However, patients seen privately by Mr O'Brien can seek that reassurance and support from the Southern Trust. They will be treated equitably with Southern Trust patients.

11.15 am

Mr McNulty: I thank the Minister for his statement. This will be a difficult day for patients, for the Southern Trust and, indeed, for Mr O'Brien. There are conflicting narratives here, Minister. Many whom I have spoken to, including former patients and colleagues, speak very highly of Mr O'Brien, and that is why this statement is such a shock. I welcome the setting up of the inquiry, as it will ensure accountability, fairness and transparency for all involved.

The Minister stated that Mr O'Brien treated a minimum of 2,327 patients through the trust's services, and then there are private patients, as well. The Minister then advised that 271 patients have been contacted. Minister, I am sure that you will recognise that, after today, many more patients and their families will be concerned. Given that it has been identified that many patients have not been impacted, will the Minister undertake to ensure that those patients for whom concerns have been identified will be contacted with the appropriate care and support as quickly and expeditiously as possible?

Mr Swann: The Member talks about numbers. As I said in my statement, it is important that, when we get into a situation and a process such as this, which is about the numbers of people who are being seen, the records being looked at and all the rest of it, we do not forget that, behind each of those numbers, there is an individual and a family, as well. It is important that we do not just try to look at this in those pure number terms.

With regard to the number that the Member referenced, the more than 2,000 patients were the patients who were in his care during the initial 18-month look-back exercise, which was conducted for the period between January 2019 and June 2020. Of those, 1,159 patient records were initially reviewed and 271 patients were contacted, and, out of that, there was an identification that nine serious adverse incidents would be initiated. That is why I have decided to establish the public inquiry, under the Inquiries Act 2005, to address those concerns.

Ms S Bradley: At the outset, I declare an interest for the part of the statement that refers to the neurology recall, as my husband is one of the patients who have been recalled.

Turning to the urology statement and its contents, I thank the Minister for the assurance that he has given of the current safety in the Southern Trust. However, I refer the Minister to the part of the statement where he says:

"two out of 10 patients listed for surgery under the care of the consultant were not on the hospital's patient administration system at that time."

Will the Minister elaborate on that? Is a consultant personally and solely responsible for ensuring the administration duty of placing a patient on that list? Furthermore, will he give an assurance that the terms of reference of any investigation will be to look at processes such as this and to compare them with how they are operating in other trust areas? Thank you.

Mr Swann: I give the Member the commitment that the terms of reference will be as full and complete as is necessary. I am sure that the trust's becoming aware that two out of those 10 patients who were listed for surgery under the care of the consultant were not on the hospital's patient administration system at that time will also be a major part of the inquiry.

Mr Speaker: Members, that concludes questions on the statement. Please take your ease for a moment or two.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I call Mr Jim Allister to move the Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Allister.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are three groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 9 and opposition to clause 2 stand part, which deal with the appointment, conduct and management of special advisers. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 10 to 12, 21 to 23 and 25, which deal with accountability to the Assembly. It should be noted that amendment No 25 is consequential to amendment No 21. The third debate will be on amendment Nos 13 to 20, 24 and 26 and opposition to clause 7 stand part, which deal with administrative reform and governance. It should be noted that amendment No 26 is consequential to amendment No 15.

I remind Members who intend to speak that, during the debates on the three groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate in each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Question on stand part will be taken at appropriate times in the Bill. If that is clear, we will proceed.

Clause 1 (Amendment of the Civil Service (Special Advisers) Act (Northern Ireland) 2013)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We now come to the first group of amendments — the appointment, conduct and management of special advisers — for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 9 and the opposition to clause 2 stand part.

Mr Allister: I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 1, line 7, after “(2)” insert “(b)”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In page 1, line 12, leave out “involvement or”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 3: In page 1, line 13, before “A minister” insert “Subject to section 3A”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 4: In page 1, line 14, at end insert

“(3A) In section 8 (Code for appointments), after subsection (1) insert the words:

“(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), the code must provide that the appointing minister must -

(a) create a job description and person specification for the post,

(b) set out the requirements to be met by a successful applicant,

(c) achieve a candidate pool from which the minister shall select on sustainable and lawful grounds, and

(d) complete and the department retain documentation associated with the above processes, including recording the minister’s reasons for the selection made.”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 5: In page 2, line 9, after “adviser” insert “by reason of the holding of that post”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 6: In page 2, line 12, leave out “him” and insert “the special adviser”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 7: New Clause

Before clause 2 insert

“Repeal of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order in Council 2007

A2.The Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007 is repealed.”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 8: In clause 4, page 2, line 28, after “Office” insert “under the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007”. — [Mr Allister.]

No 9: In clause 4, page 2, line 33, leave out subsection (3). — [Mr Allister.]

Mr Allister: I will proceed to speak to amendment No 1 and the other amendments in group 1. It is no part of my ambition to beat the record of last Tuesday and to be here at 2.15 am, but let us see how we go.

I begin by thanking the staff, including the Bill Office staff and the Committee staff, who, behind the scenes, do a great deal of work and give a great amount of invaluable guidance and help. I also thank the Business Office staff and the Speaker’s Office staff for their roles in progressing matters to this point. It all fits together in the necessary workings of bringing forward a private Member’s Bill. I also thank the witnesses who came to the Committee and gave of their time and knowledge and afforded us useful insights into much pertaining to these matters. I thank the Committee as a whole for its thoughtful interrogation of the Bill. Having listened to the points made, most particularly in Committee but also outside, I believe that the amendments provide the opportunity for a better Bill than was first drafted.

That, of course, is the whole purpose of a thoroughgoing Committee Stage. I am grateful for that.

It will be noted that not all parties participated as fulsomely as others. Sinn Féin, as was its perfect entitlement, took a different approach. There was, essentially, non-engagement with many of the issues and an unaltered declaration from the beginning that, come what may, it was opposed to each and every clause of the Bill. That is, indeed, its entitlement. It was disappointing to note that the Bill was being judged on the identity of the sponsor rather than on its content. Indeed, Mr O’Dowd made it plain in the Second Stage debate that it was not for me to bring forward a Bill such as this. I encountered that again with Mr Pat Sheehan in the Executive Committee, where there was an attitude that the Bill should be rejected, essentially, because of its authorship, not its content.

The other major party in the Executive had probably greater reason to be stand-offish. It is, undoubtedly, a difficult topic, arising as it does from RHI and all the misdemeanours that that revealed. However, it is to the credit of the DUP that it took a more mature attitude to the Bill. Similar to the other parties on the Committee — the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists; unfortunately, the Alliance Party is not on that Committee — it took an engaging and mature attitude to issues, which cannot have been easy, in some respects.

This is not a green and orange issue. There is nothing about the Bill that is of that nature. It is not about whether you are pro- or anti-Belfast Agreement, as one Sinn Féin Member sought to suggest to me. It is not about attacking these institutions. The House needs no reminder of my view of these institutions, but the Bill is not an assault on the institutions. It is not about attacking the functions of spads. I know that spads have an important and necessary function in government. I am not disputing that; I accept it entirely. It is about bettering government. It is about bringing probity and principle where those have been demonstrated to be deficient. It is, therefore, about improving the standards and principles of the functioning of government, as the title of the Bill suggests.

As we go through today, the single most significant ideological, perhaps, and political issue that Members will have to address is whether codes of conduct are sufficient to deal with the issues that have been thrown up or whether we need legislation. That will be a fundamental dividing line in the debate. It is a dividing line to be drawn and a decision to be taken in light of not just the reality of what we need and what we do not but of the perception of the public. Stormont may be something of a bubble. RHI may have been eclipsed in the public focus by the pandemic. However, the issues that arose are such that the House cannot gloss over them. It needs to address and grasp hold of them.

11.30 am

The primary Sinn Féin approach seems to be that codes are enough. Indeed, there is a certain irony there, in that we have codes only because of the Civil Service (Special Advisers) Act (Northern Ireland) 2013, sections 7 and 8 of which brought in codes of conduct and appointment for special advisers. Yet the party that, today, will tell us that codes are enough was the very party that voted against even having those codes in the 2013 Act. Such was the party's antipathy to the restraint even of codes that it voted against it. We will hear from the Minister today. I cannot accuse him of voting against it because, in 2013, he was furloughed to Westminster. He was not here, but his party vigorously, vehemently opposed the very idea of codes. Yet, today, that party tells us that codes are enough.

Are codes enough? What happened in RHI is the answer. Codes, patently, are not enough. What RHI showed was that the codes were systematically breached. I remind Members that the codes that existed during RHI required confidentiality from spads. Paragraph 24 of their terms and conditions was there, writ large, and it required integrity. Paragraph 5 of the code of conduct also underscored the need for confidentiality. It was all there in black and white:

confidentiality and integrity were required by the codes. Did it work? Anyone who recalls some of the evidence, such as the sharing of official information with family members, will readily reach the conclusion that codes, demonstrably, were not enough. As an adequate control mechanism, codes have demonstrably failed.

Then, of course, we are given the assurance that things will be different now. Will they? Without the certainty of legislation, I seriously doubt that. Why would anyone who is determined to do the right thing fear legislation? Maybe the answer lies in a quite amazing letter that the Finance Minister wrote to the Finance Committee during its scrutiny of this Bill. On 27 April, the Finance Minister wrote to Dr Aiken, the Chair, setting forth his views on the Bill. Let me read a sentence or two from that letter. This is what it says in support of codes:

"But it is also important that those rules are amenable to interpretation and the application of judgement, and that the rules can be developed and enhanced as circumstances require."

We have just passed through RHI, with all its ugly sides and all its plaintive rebuke of how things were being done, and the Finance Minister writes to the Committee and says, "Codes are enough. We do not want legislation, because we want something that is amenable to interpretation. We want something that allows the application of judgement. We want something that can be developed and enhanced as circumstances require." Why would you want a provision in legislation that says you shall not breach confidentiality and you shall behave with integrity — why would we want that to be amenable to interpretation? I say that the House should not want such to be amenable to interpretation.

Indeed, I was sitting in the House waiting for the debate to start, and Mr O'Dowd gave me an excellent line. When the Health Minister was talking about his inquiry into the urology services — and I say this in the context of the Finance Minister wanting to have the power to decide on interpretation — Mr O'Dowd said:

"When someone has too much power, that person is not held to account".

Exactly.

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Certainly.

Mr O'Dowd: There are accountability mechanisms in place here. We are actually sitting in one at the minute: it is the Assembly. The Assembly holds Ministers and their Departments to account.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Can the Member make his comments through the Chair so that the microphone can pick them up?

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry.

We also have our Committees. Our Committees hold Ministers to account, their Departments to account and their officials to account. So there is not an absence of accountability. No one is arguing for an absence of accountability. However, we are arguing that the measures the Member is taking are unnecessary and unwieldy.

Mr Allister: I could understand the Member's contribution if we had not had RHI. RHI is the reason why it is demonstrably clear that codes are not enough. I really do think that there is an element of delusion if Members think that codes can do it.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Sure.

Mr Frew: Will the Member agree with me that the Member who just made an intervention and who talked about democratic accountability was the very Member, at the Second Stage of this Bill, who did not want or see fit that private Members should bring legislation such as this?

Mr Allister: Yes. I should make the point that it is not an either/or choice. It is not that legislation takes everything that could be in a code and legislates for it. The legislation sets the basic parameters. It still —.

Mr McGuigan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment.

It still admits a role for codes. Sections 7 and 8 of the 2013 Act are explicit. They lay down some minimum requirements in codes and leave the rest to the discretion of the Department. So it is not that you have to choose codes or legislation. The question is: are there some matters where codes have failed and you need to step it up a gear and put it into legislation? That is the contention behind this Bill.

I will give way.

Mr McGuigan: Will the Member accept that Justice Coghlin conducted a very fulsome inquiry into this issue that most people thought was conducted very thoroughly and came up with recommendations, none of which required legislation?

Mr Allister: I understand that, and I have read, obviously, the entirety of the RHI report. Lord Justice Coghlin is not the legislator. This Assembly is the legislator, and it is for this House to decide, with the useful guidance and assistance that came out of the RHI report, how it is going to handle that, and whether, in the circumstances where things have failed in the past, we now do need legislation.

Let me be clear. Legislation is binding, in circumstances in which codes are, in the Minister's words, "amenable to interpretation". I told the House at Second Stage about the declaration by Lord Bingham in a case involving a code of practice issued under the Mental Health Act in England. Lord Bingham summed it up very precisely. He said:

"It is in my view plain that the Code does not have the binding effect which a statutory provision or a statutory instrument would have."

There you have it. It is about whether MLAs want the changes arising from the RHI inquiry report to be binding or not. When MLAs vote later today, let this be the compelling thought, "As I express my vote, do I want the changes that need to be made to be binding or not?". That is the defining issue. It is about our durability and the seriousness of our intent on the issue, and it is also a confidence-building measure to the wider public. I do not need to tell anyone in the House that this place suffers from public perception issues. I put it as gently as I can.

The Stormont bubble is not the jury in this matter. It is the wider public who are the jury and who will judge today whether we took the steps that they would expect us to take or whether we bottled it in our cocoon by saying, "We can look after all of this by mere codes that are amenable to what suits our interpretation". That is the defining issue. I have already said that codes and legislation can, perfectly happily, coexist. That is the infrastructure that I am inviting the House today to embrace.

Mr Deputy Speaker, you will be pleased to hear that I am coming to each of the amendments in turn now, having made those preliminary remarks. Amendment No 1 is purely technical, and I hope that we can all have some agreement on that. It is about tidying up a typographical error in the Bill.

Amendment Nos 2 and 3 are about the discipline of spads. My starting point is this: special advisers, so long as they hold office, are civil servants. Temporary civil servants, yes, but civil servants. They are beneficiaries of all the benefits, pension and salary of being civil servants, but, unlike the civil servants with whom they work, they are not subject to the discipline of the Civil Service. That is what I want to correct, because we have had experience in this place of how the discipline of spads worked or did not work. We had an incident way back relating to Red Sky. We had a Mr Stephen Brimstone, a special adviser. He, because of his conduct, was recommended by the Finance Department for formal disciplinary investigation. The Department asked Finance to look at the situation. The Department of Finance and Personnel, as it then was, independently recommended that he should be subject to a formal disciplinary investigation.

11.45 am

Did it happen? No. Why did it not happen? His Minister overrode it. He said, "We will have none of that and no investigation".

The Social Development Committee of the time, of which our current Speaker was the Chair and I was a member, did a report. One of the recommendations of that report was a change to stop the Minister aborting a disciplinary investigation. That was a recommendation in the report brought to the House. Today, I am inviting the House to carry that through by subjecting a civil servant who is a special adviser to the same disciplinary procedures as the Civil Service of which he is a part.

We have to remember that the Minister of Finance's view, which was expressed to the Committee, was that the revised ministerial code makes a Minister responsible for, and accountable for, the behaviour of their special advisers. If a Minister does not take action in response to a breach of the special advisers' code, they can be reported and investigated for a breach of the ministerial code. I do not think that I do any injustice to what the Minister's contention to the Committee was.

The question is this: is that sufficient? I have to say to the House that neither presentationally nor practically does it resolve the problem, because the problem is this: the Minister hand-picks his spad, who acts as a civil servant but who is immune from Civil Service discipline and instead can be held to account by the one who chose him in the first place. One has to ask how many Ministers have ever been held accountable for a breach of the ministerial code.

We are told that you take care of this by putting the Minister in charge and that if he does not act he breaches the ministerial code. That is the theory. The practical question that I have is this: how many Ministers have ever been held accountable for a breach of the ministerial code? In that system, of course, any punishment for the errant spad lies with the one who chose him. It is as farcical as it appears.

We come back to the fundamental point: if a spad has all the benefits of a civil servant, why should he not be held accountable to the Civil Service code of conduct and the Civil Service provisions in respect of discipline? The point is made to me that the present Civil Service codes do not lend themselves to that. With respect, that is not an answer. It is up to the head of the Civil Service to adjust the codes to deal with the spad situation. It is not for me and it is not for this Bill. If this principle is passed, it is for the Civil Service to accommodate it.

I have heard it said that, "Oh, but we are taking away the Minister's entire accountability in respect of his spad".

No, I am not, because clause 1(3) recommends that:

"A minister who appoints a special adviser is" — remains —
"responsible for their management, conduct and adherence to the code of conduct."

All that I am taking away from him is the right to interfere in the disciplinary process. He can still be involved and make the reference, and it might still come back to him, but he cannot interfere. That is the principle that lies behind amendment Nos 2 and 3. It lies there because of the experience of such interference in the past.

Amendment Nos 2 and 3 are worthy of the support of the House because they fill a gaping gap. It is farcical that a hand-picked spad is only ever subject to the whim and discipline of the person who appointed him, even though, as a civil servant, he could drive a coach and horses through their code and only the Minister can do anything about it. That cannot be right. That is why I am saying that we should make them subject to the Civil Service code of conduct and the disciplinary process.

Amendment No 4 deals with the issue of how a spad is appointed. The Department effectively double-crossed Lord Justice Coghlin on that issue. In his report, Lord Justice Coghlin was aghast at the breaches of the then code on the appointment of spads. Let me remind the House what the old code said. It required a job description. There is no surprise there, because we are filling a publicly paid post, so, surely, there should be a job description. The old code also required criteria by which the selection would be made, a candidate profile and the Minister to document the process. You will recall what Lord Justice Coghlin had to say about how some of that matter was breached. I go to volume 3, page 166, of his report. His findings state that:

"It is clear from the evidence received by the Inquiry that both of the two main parties in the Executive, the DUP and Sinn Féin, breached the spirit and/or provisions of the 2013 Act passed by the Assembly and the mandatory codes issued by DFP in accordance with sections 7 and 8 of that Act in one way or another.

At the time of Mr Cairns' appointment as SpAd to Minister Bell in DETI in 2015, some two years after the passage of the 2013 Act and the mandatory appointment code, the procedure was not, as required by the appointment code, by way of a competitive selection from a candidate pool set up after a trawl by Minister Bell, but was instead conducted by the DUP through its then leader, and the then First Minister, Mr Robinson.

Minister Bell accepted that the practice adopted in signing the letter of appointment effectively 'camouflaged' the complete failure to comply with the appointment code."

He goes on to say that:

"The Inquiry finds that the practices adopted by the DUP and Sinn Féin in centralising the appointment, control, and management of SpAds effectively frustrated that purpose of the democratically enacted legislation."

Further to that, he states that:

"The realpolitik observed by some Ministers in these circumstances appears to have produced a number of advisers with wide powers and influence who were appointed and operated in practice outside the code of conduct for Special Advisers.

Nevertheless, it is important to bear in mind that SpAds were civil servants, albeit of a special type, and, as such, there is a public interest in ensuring that the appointment process was operated, and was seen to operate, in accordance with the relevant codes."

What did Minister Murphy do with those findings? Minister Murphy brought a code that had been found to have been breached multiple times in all those aspects — about candidate pool, candidate profile, setting criteria, documenting the process — and rewrote the code of appointment to simply strip all that out. So, the answer to the criticism that the codes had not been followed was simply to take out of the codes that which had not been followed. How perverse is that? Recommendation 41 of Lord Justice Coghlin was:

"that there should be robust compliance".

Mr Murphy's response was, "Just strip it out". So, you deal with the behaviour that was excoriated simply by making that excoriated behaviour no longer a breach. That is not good government. That is what amendment No 4 is all about. Amendment No 4 is about putting it back in because the Department could not be trusted to just work it on codes. Sections 7 and 8 of the 2013 Act gave them wide discretion. The code that was produced back then required a candidate pool, selection process, keeping a note — all the things that are in amendment No 4. We then discovered that Executive parties could not be trusted to do that either in RHI, where they simply breached it, or post-RHI, when they stripped it out. The purpose of amendment No 4 is to put it back in but, this time, to put it in legislation.

Let me quote some of the things that Felicity Huston, the former Commissioner for Public Appointments, told the Committee. She gave of her time. She came and gave evidence, with her vast experience of the basic requirements in public appointments. She said of Mr Murphy's code:

"This Code - published to the surprise of many before Sir Patrick's report and recommendations - omits any process or procedure for the actual selection of Special advisors. It has dispensed with any pretence at selection as would be understood by those commonly applying for a job. No Minister needs to explain what skills, experience etc were either required for the post or how he or she established whether the selected SPAD had those skills".

This is not me speaking. This is a former Commissioner for Public Appointments who stated that:

"As the ... January 2020 Code stands there can be no cause for complaint or lack of compliance because there is no process about which to complain.

A Code for Appointment would normally set out a basic appointment process ... Criteria for selection ... opportunity ... to demonstrate how they fulfil the criteria ... Some form of objective ... process ... Records of the above".

Yet, I repeat this point: all of that, which was in the old code, was systematically and deliberately stripped out. That is what the House is being asked to endorse today. When it comes to amendment No 4, the House will decide whether it is at ease with the fact that what at least, on paper, used to exist, no longer exists. There is no process for a person who has been appointed to a highly paid public office, as a public servant, as part of the Civil Service and paid from public funds. I suggest that Members should ask themselves whether they are content that no process should attend to that or whether they think that there should be a basic process of knowing the job, the job description and the criteria that are required to be met and to keep records of why the decision was made. I suggest that those are so elemental and basic that, as Felicity Huston said, you cannot ignore them. You cannot write them out of existence, yet that is exactly what has been done.

12.00 noon

I have heard it said by some that, if we accept amendment No 4, require a job description, set out the requirements to be met by a successful applicant, achieve a candidate pool and require the Department to complete and retain documentation about the process, you would rob a Minister of his right to appoint somebody politically akin to his viewpoint. That is absolute nonsense. What is in amendment No 4 is not the entirety of the process. It details the basic fundamentals, and the Minister can build further elements around those. There is nothing in amendment No 4 that would prevent a Minister from appointing someone with political empathy to their standpoint.

I say that with the certainty of legislation. The Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 is still the law and will be the law for any Minister making an appointment. It states:

"So far as they relate to discrimination on the ground of political opinion, Parts III and V"

— those are the Parts that prohibit it —

"do not apply to or in relation to an employment or occupation where the essential nature of the job requires it to be done by a person holding, or not holding, a particular political opinion."

Therefore, you can indicate, lawfully and legally, that any applicant needs to be someone who has political empathy with your standpoint as a Minister. There is nothing in law and nothing in amendment No 4 that would stop that. Therefore, it would be a straw man who would suggest that, if we put all that in, it would create a prohibition. Patently, it would not. Indeed, there has been some misinformation about that from the highest level. Minister Murphy wrote a four-page letter to his Executive colleagues on 17 November. In that letter, he stated:

"Where the law currently recognises the political nature of special adviser appointments and allows an exception for that on the merit principle" —.

I had better read the whole paragraph. He stated:

"Ministers will no longer be able to choose the person they want to have as special adviser" —.

Wrong. He continued:

"The code of appointments that we agreed earlier this year requires special adviser appointments to be delivered in line with employment law" —.

Yes, so does the Bill.

"This Bill will require every special adviser to be appointed following a competition".

Not exactly. It does not have to be a publicised public competition. It can be done by gathering a pool of candidates.

He says:

"This Bill will require every official adviser to be appointed following a competition drawing from a pool of candidates".

Yes.

"regardless of the needs for those appointments to be personal appointments".

No, they are personal appointments. The selection criteria can set that out. There is nothing in amendment No 4 that prevents that.

Then he says:

"and where the law currently recognises, the political nature of special appointments allows an exception for that in the merit principle."

You can still do that by saying, "So long as I comply with the 1998 Order, I can have someone of my political affinity". I am not trying to interfere with that. I recognise that spads have to be in tune with their Minister. I recognise that Ministers need spads that they can work with. I am not saying otherwise, but I am saying that, when we come to spend public money on an appointment such as this, with all the privileges that go with it, the public are entitled to know that there was a candidate pool, criteria were set and a record was kept, rather than some huge sinecure being handed out to somebody unknown and secretly. That is what amendment No 4 is all about.

I respectfully suggest to the House that amendment No 4 is worthy of its support and goes some considerable way to restoring some probity to and public respect for the process of appointing spads.

I will move to amendment No 5. I should say before I do, that clause 1(5) — we will be voting on entire clauses — deals with setting salaries. Again, let me make it plain. I am not seeking to legislate that a certain amount should be the salary for a spad. All I am seeking to do is two things: tie the salary to the Civil Service, which is politically advantageous because it depoliticises it; and tie it to the higher level of grade 5. I want to tie it to the Civil Service and to set the upper ceiling. I am not saying within that upper ceiling what any spad should be paid. Any code can set as many bands as it likes, but the one thing that it cannot do is to breach the ceiling. The codes still set the bands. The Minister and the appointment process selects from within those bands who is paid what. All it does is say that you cannot be paid above grade 5 of the Civil Service, which, presently, is something in the order of £81,000 to £82,000 a year. On the current bands, there is no one, apparently, being paid more than that, so there is no prejudice to anyone.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Wells: Does the Member agree that the salary levels up until 2017 were almost obscene? The top spads were getting £91,809 each. You had the situation where a junior Minister on a ministerial salary of £6,500 a year was serviced by a spad on £72,120 a year. Is that not an ‘Alice in Wonderland’ situation?

Mr Allister: It certainly is. The Member reminds me of something. The setting of salaries was so arbitrary — Ministers could change them when they liked — that, in about 2014, the then First Minister and Finance Minister changed the salary upper level to, I think it was, about £70,000 to about £90,000 overnight. Clause 1(5) is necessary in order to set the upper ceiling so that the public know that their money is subject to the restraint of a ministerial whim not being able to change the bands to make the sky the limit because an upper limit is set in statute.

I have heard it asked, “Oh, but what if we need some supercharged individual as an adviser, and we need to pay him megabucks. Are we not allowed to do that?”. Appointing a spad is not the only way. This Government and many Governments depend highly on consultants and go out to a consultant on something. You also have the prerogative powers, and I will come to clause 3 in a minute. The prerogative power will still survive so that, if someone needs to make a case that they need a super-paid whomever at £150,000 a year, they can do it under the prerogative power of clause 3. The only change through clause 3 will be that you have to bring the matter to the House, but you can still do it, so it is not a prohibition on anything like that. However, it is a prohibition on paying your spad more than a senior civil servant at grade 5, and that, I think, is a sensible and necessary proposition.

Amendment No 5 deals with clause 1(6). I have to say to the House that this issue touches a raw nerve with many people. The House will recall that the primary function of the 2013 special advisers Act was to remove from office those with serious criminal convictions following the public outrage at the appointment of Mary McArdle, a convicted murderer, as the special adviser to the then Communities Minister. That might not have been the title then, but it is now. That was the catalyst for my bringing the 2013 special advisers Bill, and that, by virtue of the votes in the House, set in place a statutory provision that such a person cannot hold the position of special adviser.

What did we discover in the RHI inquiry? We discovered that Sinn Féin consciously and deliberately circumvented that legislation by appointing someone referred to in shorthand as a “super-spada”. That person was no longer paid out of public funds but was put in a position to control the other spadas of Sinn Féin and was to be accountable directly to the deputy First Minister. That was a total breach of the spirit of the 2013 Act. Clause 1(6) and amendment No 5 are about blocking that loophole, because, in those situations, what prevailed was that the super-spada had the full run of Stormont Castle, an office in Stormont Castle, and the Civil Service acknowledged him and dealt with him as though he were a spad. That made a mockery of the democratic decision of the House. Therefore, with clause 1(5), I seek to ensure that we close that gap.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Wells: I refer the Member to paragraph 54.34 of the RHI report, where Lord Justice Coghlin says:

“In effect, an individual who could not legally have been appointed as a SpAd and who was not subject to the mandatory code, or other relevant codes, managed and co-ordinated those who were employed and paid from public funds as temporary civil servants and who were subject to the relevant legal structure and codes.”

Can the Member reassure us that his amendment will stop that from happening in the future?

12.15 pm

Mr Allister: Absolutely; that is what it is all about. Clause 1(6) is all about that. The Member beat me to it, because I was going to that exact page in the RHI report. I am going to read a little more of it — this is page 158 of volume 3 — because, back at paragraph 54.32, it states:

“According to Mr Ó Muilleoir” —

he, of course, was then the Finance Minister —

“the 2013 Act, in prohibiting the appointment of Special Advisers with serious criminal convictions, was seen by Sinn Féin as:

‘...an attack on the peace process, as undermining the inclusion which is the foundation of the peace process, and it was not our intention to discriminate against former political prisoners who had helped build the peace.’

As a result, Sinn Féin set up a centralised system under which Aidan McAteer, who did have a proscribed conviction and who was now to be neither appointed nor paid as a civil servant, was engaged to ‘manage and co-ordinate' on a day-to-day basis the work of all Sinn Féin Special Advisers.

It seems that all of the Sinn Féin SpAds were aware that Aidan McAteer was acting as the senior Sinn Féin adviser with the direct authority of the deputy First Minister, the late Martin McGuinness. In his evidence to the Inquiry Sir Malcom McKibbin accepted that when he was first introduced to Aidan McAteer, he was told by the then deputy First Minister that he would be working underneath his (Mr McGuinness's) direction and authority. As such, according to Mr Ó Muilleoir, he was seen as occupying an elevated position with more authority than any of the other SpAds."

And then the sentence that Mr Wells quoted:

"In effect, an individual who could not legally have been appointed as a SpAd and who was not subject to the mandatory code, or other relevant codes, managed and co-ordinated those who were employed and paid from public funds as temporary civil servants and who were subject to the relevant legal structure and codes."

Do I really need to say anything more on the necessity of clause 1(6) and the need to shut that loophole?

It also informs another matter, which is the trust that can be placed in the proper implementation of codes. If a senior party in the Government was prepared to so deliberately circumvent the law of the land, then what confidence can anyone have in mere codes that are then amenable to their interpretation? That is a sobering question for the House, and it is one that needs to be addressed.

Members will recall that the 2013 Act quite properly became known by shorthand as "Ann's law", because of the fantastic work that was done by Ann Travers, sister of the murdered Mary Travers. Members will be aware that just a couple of weeks ago Ann Travers, writing in a local newspaper, identified this clause as being critical for both her and innocent victims who felt trampled and betrayed by the fact that a law that they thought had been established was circumvented in the manner in which it was. This House has an opportunity today to right that wrong, and I urge it not to miss that opportunity.

Amendment No 5 simply adds a few words, which came from departmental — I think it was the Executive Office — recommendations, as it felt that the clause did not have the clarity required. It simply adds words to make it clear that the special adviser being talked about is one:

"by reason of the holding of that post".

That is the limitation that is to be put on such a person. Given that the Civil Service was complicit, in the sense that it accepted the role of a super-spAd in breach of the provisions of the 2013 Act, clause 1(6) puts this statutory duty on a permanent secretary:

"a permanent secretary must ensure that no person other than a duly appointed special adviser is afforded by the department the cooperation, recognition and facilitation due to a special adviser."

Amendment No 5 would then, after "special adviser", add the words:

"by reason of the holding of that post".

If you cannot trust the Minister, you put the duty on the permanent secretary. It therefore does two things. Clause 1(6) states that the Minister must ensure that the duly appointed special adviser, and only he, will exercise the functions of a spAd, but, as a fail-safe, the amendment would put a statutory obligation on the permanent secretary to give no facilitation or cooperation to anyone who is not a spAd in relation to the role of a spAd. That is how clause 1(6) and the amendment seek to shut down that abuse of the system.

Amendment No 6 is a mere drafting amendment. We then come to amendment No 7. It seeks to introduce a new clause. This brings us into the territory of how many spAds there should be in the Executive Office. The House knows from the initial drafting of my Bill that it was my strong contention, and it is still my personal belief, that an Executive Office with eight spAds is way above what is required, when you consider that, at a particular time, that is the same number as there was for the entirety of the Welsh Government. I wanted to reduce the number of spAds to four. Part of the function of a Committee Stage is to have discussions about a Bill, and I have to recognise that I am not going to achieve that. I am therefore now putting to the House an adjusted proposition.

Historically, the First Minister had three spAds and the deputy First Minister had three spAds. That was the position from 1998. That is how it was originally drafted: six spAds in all. That is how it continued until 2007. In 2007, along came a junior Minister, with the emphasis on the word "junior", whose ego required a special adviser, so the law was changed to introduce special advisers for junior Ministers. That was done under the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order in Council 2007.

What I am seeking to do by amendment No 7 is to introduce a clause to repeal the authorising provision, the 2007 order. In other words, I am seeking to remove the right of a junior Minister to have a special adviser. As Mr Muir put it to me rather neatly in conversation, I want to restore the factory settings to what they were in 1998. In other words, we go back to where we were, with three special advisers for the First Minister, three for the deputy First Minister and none for the junior Ministers. I believe that that is right and appropriate.

Up until a few weeks ago — whether it was by consent in the Executive or otherwise, I do not know — there were no junior Minister spAds. Then, suddenly, Sinn Féin maxed out its appointments and appointed a junior Minister spAd. The DUP has not. Indeed, interestingly, through most of this pandemic, the Executive Office has managed with five spAds: three Sinn Féin and two DUP. That has now been evened up, with the DUP having appointed a further one. There are now three each for the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, but Sinn Féin has additionally appointed a junior Minister spAd. I am trying to undo that. I am undoing it in the context that you cannot just remove someone from a job if they have compensation rights, so clause 4 and the appendix will take care of that. However, sustaining eight spAds is way beyond what is needed. By voting down amendment No 7, the message would be that we wanted to sustain the option to have eight spAds. By voting for amendment No 7, Members would indicate that they wanted to have a maximum of six. That, I think, is correct. If amendment No 7 stands, I will propose the removal of clause 2, which is the one that would bring down the number of spads for the First Minister and the deputy First Minister, because I am reconciled to the fact that I will not do better than six, and I have to accept that. Therefore, if clause 7 is passed, I will oppose clause 2 standing part of the Bill. I hope that that is clear. The mission and ambition is to allow for six spads, and the mechanism is to reduce the opportunity for junior Ministers to appoint spads.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Wells: First, as one who served here from 1998 to 2007, it is clear to me that junior Ministers could function perfectly adequately without having their own bespoke spads. I think that I had better name the individual who became a junior Minister in 2007: Ian Paisley Jnr. I do not think that everybody picked up the clue that he was giving us. When he took that post in 2007 and realised that other, senior, Ministers had a spad, he demanded one as well. That is the only reason for it. Of course, when Sinn Féin heard that Ian Paisley Jnr was getting a spad, it had to have one for its junior Minister.

It is interesting that the Independent Financial Review Panel carried out an independent assessment of the role of junior Ministers and decided that, such was their importance, their salary had to be reduced dramatically down to that of the Deputy Chairperson of a scrutiny Committee. That is an indication of the panel's assessment of the role of junior Ministers. Their role is more of a supportive one; they do not make policy, they do not have a vote at the Executive, and they cannot issue ministerial directions. Therefore, if someone is at the level of a Deputy Chairperson, and we would never dream of giving the Deputy Chairperson of a Committee their own personal spad, it is logical that there was never a need for them to have a spad in the first place and, with the demotion of the role of junior Minister, it is a complete anachronism to have them now.

Mr Allister: Yes. That was a comprehensive intervention that set the record straight on those matters. There it is. I hope that the House understands the how and why of what I am trying to do.

I will take the House to clause 3, which relates to the exercise of royal prerogative powers by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. Royal prerogative powers, in the main, died out in the 17th century. However, they continue in some aspects. Amongst those upon whom they are bestowed is the Sinn Féin deputy First Minister when acting jointly with the First Minister to exercise a royal prerogative — a little irony on its own. The exercise of that power is unbridled. As the appointment, some years ago, of Mr David Gordon as Executive spokesman demonstrated, it is a power that can be exercised behind the backs of the Assembly. What happened with the appointment of Mr David Gordon was that the then First Minister and the then deputy First Minister, by decree, changed the law by royal prerogative. They brought in the provision enabling them to appoint David Gordon. The law that they made was called the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2016. Here is the critical point: it was done behind the backs of the Assembly.

The Assembly is a legislative Assembly, but here was a law made not by the legislators. Here was a law made by royal decree. On foot of that law being made, David Gordon was then appointed. The Assembly was never consulted. We were never asked to approve the law. It was just done. In my terms, it was done behind our backs.

12.30 pm

The purpose of clause 3 is to repeal the 2016 Order and then, very importantly, not to remove the royal prerogative power but to say that, if that power is ever exercised again, it must be approved by affirmative resolution of the House. In other words, if the law is to be changed by royal prerogative under the Civil Service Order, the House must be aware of that and, in fact, must approve it. It does not strip out the prerogative power, but it tempers it by making it subject to the approval of the House. In 2021, that is the least that we should expect.

That takes me back to the point about someone saying, "Oh, what if we need a super-paid spad because of his miraculous knowledge?". That is how you would appoint him. You would appoint him under the royal prerogative power, but that would be subject to the House giving that power. I would find it very surprising, even with the antipathy of some to the origin of the Bill, if anyone would really think it appropriate that we should maintain unfettered the royal prerogative power and not subject it to our say-so as a legislative Assembly. That is what amendment No 7 is about.

Of course, amendment No 8 then has to make adjustments to clause 4, because clause 4 was first drafted to keep the legislation in line with my initial proposal that special advisers in the Executive Office reduce from eight to four and that, therefore, all Executive spads would cease to hold office on 31 March next year, and any reappointed, up to the quota, would be reappointed at that stage. That would no longer be necessary because, if we are only removing the junior Minister's spad, it is only the junior Minister's spad who needs to be catered for in clause 4. Amendment No 8 has been proposed to make that abundantly clear and therefore to reduce the impact of that.

That also means, of course, that Minister Murphy's letter —.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I was going to raise this point in my contribution to the debate. Clause 4(1) states:

"Any special adviser in post in the Executive Office shall cease to hold office on 31 March 2021."

Can the Member clarify whether that is now required, given his amendments and the changes to the junior Minister's spad only? Is clause 4(1) required?

Mr Allister: Amendment No 8 will change it so that clause 4(1) reads:

"Any special adviser in post in the Executive Office under the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007 shall cease to hold office".

In other words, it is only the junior Minister's spad. That is what amendment No 8 does. It reduces the need to replace or reappoint all the spads in the Executive Office, which would have been necessary had we been reducing the number from eight to four. We are reducing them in only the junior Minister's office, so only the junior Minister's spad is now caught by clause 4(1). Therefore, the other three of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister carry on unaffected. That is how it is.

Amendment No 9 is simply to take out clause 4(3), because the advice, ultimately, was that it was superfluous and not necessary. The law would speak for itself. Any appointments after 31 March would, obviously, have to be in accordance with the new law. So, clause 4(3) is removed by amendment No 9.

That takes me through all the amendments. I am quite happy to leave it there for now.

Dr Aiken (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance): The Committee for Finance considered written evidence from 22 organisations and individuals. The Committee received oral evidence from seven organisations and individuals, including the Bill sponsor, the Minister of Finance, the permanent secretary of the Department of Finance and the, now retired, head of the Northern Ireland Civil Service, whose post remains vacant. The Committee considered papers and presentations from the Assembly Research and Information Service (RalSe) to support it in its deliberations.

The Committee considered carefully the views of all who provided written and/or oral evidence, and, on behalf of the Committee, I thank all who took the time to provide detailed evidence to inform and support the Committee in its consideration of the Bill. On behalf of the Committee, I also offer my thanks to the Bill sponsor, Mr Jim Allister, for providing oral evidence and for his willingness to bring amendments to address a number of concerns raised by the Committee, witnesses and stakeholders. I am grateful to Mr Allister and all members of the Committee for their input and engagement during the Committee Stage. I formally put on record our thanks to Jim McManus, the Committee Clerk; the Finance Committee staff and RalSe; and the Bill office staff, who worked hard to ensure that we got to this stage. We thank them all for their sterling and conscientious efforts.

Throughout the Committee Stage, the Committee was mindful of the distinction between Mr Allister's role as Bill sponsor and his role as a member of the Committee for Finance. It did, however, prove helpful to have Mr Allister as a member of the Committee, where he could hear at first hand the concerns of other members and respond to those concerns. In some cases, that was to provide clarity on the provision in the Bill, and, in other instances, it was to accept members' genuine concerns and to bring forward amendments that are among those we are considering today.

Before dealing substantively with the proposed amendments to the Bill —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Dr Aiken: Certainly.

Mr Wells: The Member raised an important point, which was raised by the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone during the Committee's consideration, when she made the point that, perhaps, it could be seen as a slight conflict of interest in having the promoter of the Bill as a member of the Committee. In fact, I think that most members believed that that was extremely useful. It was fortuitous and coincidental but certainly made the Bill's passage through the Committee much simpler. What is his reaction to the suggestion that was made that, for future private Member's Bills, the sponsor should be allowed to be an ex officio member of the relevant Committee, so that the other Committees would benefit from the opportunities that ours had during the past two months?

Dr Aiken: I thank the Member not just for his comments but for his work during the Bill's Committee Stage. As was expressed by the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, having the Member there did indeed make it much easier. In future, we should look at allowing Members who are bringing a private Member's Bill to be an ex officio member of that Committee during that stage to enable the smoother passage of legislation.

As Chairman of the Committee for Finance, I will refer to some general issues that were considered by members during the Committee Stage. The Committee report outlines details of the considerable debate during Committee Stage in relation to the need for this legislation or whether codes and guidance were sufficient or, indeed, preferable.

This was an important consideration as it goes to the very heart of the purpose and intent of the Bill.

A former head of the Civil Service informed the Committee that he was expressing the Executive's view that codes and guidance were sufficient to address the issues that gave rise to the Bill. The Minister and the Department of Finance's permanent secretary echoed this view. However, a number of other stakeholders did not support the view that reliance on codes and guidance was appropriate, given the prevailing circumstances here.

The view of the Department of Finance was that many of the provisions that the Bill seeks to introduce are inherent in the codes and guidance that are already in place. The Minister and Department of Finance's officials referred to codes having been strengthened. A former head of the Civil Service informed the Committee that the strengthened codes and new guidance should be viewed as evidence of the commitment of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Indeed, the New Decade, New Approach agreement contains a commitment that the Executive would produce strengthened codes "as a matter of urgency". Yet, as I will outline later, at least one of those codes was stripped of any provisions that would have provided an appropriate level of openness, transparency and accountability.

Members will be aware that the Committee divided on every clause. That was as a result of a fundamental disagreement within the Committee on whether codes or legislation were the most appropriate way forward. On balance, having considered the evidence and the unique circumstances in which we find ourselves in Northern Ireland, the Committee supported the legislative route as an appropriate means of providing the openness, transparency and accountability that the public demand.

The Committee also considered written and oral evidence on the independence of the Commissioner for Public Appointments, or the lack thereof. I am happy to provide more detail on that issue during the Final Stage debate. However, for now, I put on record that the Committee has made a recommendation in its report that the First Minister and deputy First Minister make legislative provision to bring the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments for Northern Ireland to international standards.

I will move on to the amendments. I will speak as the Chair of the Committee for Finance and will confine my remarks to those amendments that were considered by the Committee.

The amendment to clause 1(2), which was brought by the Bill's sponsor, is technical in nature, and the Committee was content with that amendment.

The Committee noted that amendment Nos 2 and 3 to clause 1(3) have been tabled by the Bill's sponsor to address the need to retain and respect the principle that a Minister should be responsible for the conduct of their special adviser. The Committee was content, therefore, to support the amendment.

Clause 1(3) proposes to bring special advisers into the Northern Ireland Civil Service's disciplinary process. Those provisions were drafted under the previous code of appointment for special advisers. The Committee noted that, after the introduction of the Bill, the code of appointment was considerably revised. The revision removed many of the provisions that were in the previous code. The revised code, which is just over one page long, contains little information on any formal requirements. In the view of a former Commissioner for Public Appointments, that is contrary to the fundamental requirements for a code of appointment.

Amendment No 4 provides for the reinstatement of the provisions that were removed from the original code. In noting criticism from the chair of the renewable heat incentive inquiry that the previous code had been ignored, the Committee was of the view that it was not appropriate to remove those provisions. The Committee, therefore, agreed to the amendment. In supporting this amendment, the Committee also noted that the revised code of appointment means that there is now no process for the appointment of special advisers with which to comply. That, in turn, renders the provisions under clause 1(4) largely nugatory. Amendment No 4 would make it a statutory requirement to have a due process of selection for special advisers.

During the Committee's deliberations, it considered the need to keep a job description for a special adviser as broad as possible to assist in appointing the most appropriate candidate for the position. The Committee came to the view that the amendment to clause 1(3) does not prescribe what should be in the job description and was, therefore, content with the amendment.

12.45 pm

In consideration of amendment No 2, the Committee agreed with the Department's view that the term "ministerial involvement" in the Bill was not compatible with the position that a Minister is responsible for the conduct and discipline of their special adviser. The Committee was, therefore, content to support the amendment brought by the Bill sponsor on that principle.

During its deliberations, the Bill sponsor informed the Committee that amendment No 5 would be proposed in order to address a Department of Finance concern that there is a need to ensure that clause 1(6) relates solely to special advisers. The Committee was content, therefore, to support amendment No 5. The Committee also supported amendment No 6, which is a technical amendment.

In its deliberations on clause 2, there was Committee consensus on the assessment that eight special advisers in the Executive Office is too many. There was no consensus, however, on what the appropriate number should be or whether there is a need to legislate in order to achieve the appropriate number. In consideration of the fact that the current complement of special advisers is provided for in legislation through the Civil Service Commissioners (Northern Ireland) Order 1999, the Committee's view was that amending that order, as provided for at clause 2, was the appropriate vehicle for achieving any reduction.

Although there are six special advisers in post in the Executive Office rather than the permitted maximum of eight, it is important to make the distinction between the number in post and the complement. The complement of special advisers in the Executive Office is eight. There is nothing to prevent the First Minister and deputy First Minister appointing up to eight special advisers at any time in the future. The intent of the legislation is, first, to reduce that complement, and, secondly, to establish an agreed smaller complement, whatever that number may be.

The Committee agreed an amendment to the original proposal, which was previously tabled by the Bill sponsor, to remove the provision for junior Ministers to have special advisers. That would reduce the complement of special advisers in the Executive Office from eight to six. The Committee also agreed to a previous amendment to provide for two special advisers each for the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Together, those amendments if passed would result in a complement of four special advisers in the Executive Office.

Although the Committee agreed to clause 2 subject to the previously tabled amendments, there was considerable debate about whether four special advisers in the Executive Office was the appropriate number. When asked for his views on the provision for eight special advisers in the Executive Office, the then Head of the Civil Service stated that the First Minister and deputy First Minister:

"have chosen not to exercise that right at the moment."

That goes back to my point that there is nothing to prevent them doing so in the future.

The Department of Finance's view was that reducing the number does not recognise the seniority or weight of the role. Similar views were expressed by the Executive Office. Neither the evidence from the Department of Finance nor the Executive Office was able to clarify how the seniority or weight of the role of a special adviser in the Executive Office differs significantly to that of a special adviser in any other Department, and neither did it explain how the seniority or weight of the role should be a factor in determining the complement. Surely, weight and seniority should be determined by job evaluation and grading, whilst complement should be determined by workload.

In written evidence, the Institute for Government expressed the view that:

"having a larger number of special advisers was not necessarily something that should be perceived negatively."

It took the view that:

“more advisers are helpful for a multi-party government as more communication between ministers and their teams is necessary.”

The Committee considered that and other evidence, and, having divided, agreed by a majority of one that the appropriate number of special advisers in the Executive Office should be four.

I note the Bill sponsor's proposals to repeal the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007 through amendment No 7, the introduction of a new clause A2 and his intention to oppose the Question that clause 2 stand part of the Bill. While recognising that that will have the effect of reducing the complement of special advisers in the Executive Office from eight to six, by removing the facility for junior Ministers to appoint special advisers, I am cognisant that those amendments were tabled after the Committee Stage. Therefore, I cannot comment further as Chairperson of the Committee, except to say that, if agreed, those amendments would have the overall effect of reducing the complement of special advisers in the Executive Office, which was one outcome on which the Committee achieved consensus.

In consideration of amendment No 8 to clause 4, the Committee accepted the Bill sponsor's explanation that his proposed amendment is, essentially, a technical amendment that relates to drafting issues.

I will now make some remarks about the Bill as leader of the Ulster Unionist Party. The Bill is — I choose my words carefully — a regrettable but necessary measure to restore a degree of confidence in the Northern Ireland Executive; confidence that, through a wide variety of issues, has, regrettably, been much diluted. Some of us hoped that, after a three-year hiatus of the Assembly that was caused by calamitous administration; very questionable, if not bordering on mendacious, practices; a dereliction of the normal processes of governance; and the failure to adhere to the custom and practice of government elsewhere in our nation, or even across the border, there would, at least, be a collective desire to reform from within. However, we have, I am afraid, all been let down.

When gathering evidence on the Bill, I was struck by how Sue Gray, the permanent secretary of the Department of Finance, commented that the court of public opinion would act as an incentive to good governance, as it would in Westminster, and by how other senior officials, including the now knighted Sir David Sterling, said that there was no need for a legislative approach because good behaviour and the commitment to New Decade, New Approach would encourage change. I wish that that were so.

However, the experience and evidence of the RHI inquiry showed that much needs to be reformed, and our lived experience since January of this year has shown us that the belief that change will be embraced by the Executive is, I am afraid, a forlorn hope. Indeed, the flow of information that comes from Departments, the obfuscation of Ministers about issues such as non-orders of PPE, and the paucity and accuracy of replies by some Ministers, such as the Economy Minister, on virtually every issue show that there has been no change in the culture of the Executive. After nearly 11 months, there has been every opportunity to make change, but there has been no, or very little, attempt by the Executive to reform themselves.

The intent of New Decade, New Approach and the RHI inquiry has been not only thwarted but, in effect, buried by some of the political parties that should be embracing change the most. It is our party's firm belief that, without a legislative imperative, no change will occur. That should be a concern for all of us who believe in the devolution of power. It was the belief of our party and the people of Northern Ireland that the Belfast Agreement would ensure that normal checks, balances and controls —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will the Member state which amendment he is speaking to?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask the Member to ensure that he is referring to the Bill.

Dr Aiken: As my remarks unfold, Mr Deputy Speaker, you will find that they refer to the amendments in this group. A significant degree of indulgence has been given on other topics, so I am sure that the Member will understand.

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will you rule on whether the Member is speaking to an amendment?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Mr O'Dowd, I, in my role as Deputy Speaker, endeavour to show a degree of latitude. I encourage Members to speak to the relevant amendments. When I think that a Member has exceeded that, I will intervene.

Dr Aiken: I will be speaking to —

Mr O'Dowd: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Mr O'Dowd, I will take a further point of order, but I hope that you will not persist in this action.

Mr O'Dowd: Mr Deputy Speaker, I do not think that there is any need for that tone, with the greatest respect to you and your office. There is absolutely no need for that tone. Will you please refer me to where Standing Orders refer to latitude to allow Members to speak beyond amendments?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): It is the role of the Deputy Speaker to conduct the debate. It is my custom and practice in exercising that role to give a little latitude to Members, but I endeavour to keep them to the subject of debate. The Member, and all other Members, realise that and have seen me, on regular occasions, draw Members back to the relevant piece of legislation. I ask Mr Aiken to continue.

Dr Aiken: Thank you. I will, of course, refer to issues to do with spads and governance as I continue to make my remarks.

It should be a matter for all of us who believe in the devolution of power, and it was the belief of those like our party and the people of Northern Ireland in the Belfast Agreement, who thought that normal checks, balances and controls, like those available across the rest of the United Kingdom, would ensure that good and uncorrupted governance would occur, but it has not. Indeed, when observers from outside Northern Ireland think that the court of public opinion, or just doing what is right, will suffice, that view is countered by actions like those of the deputy First Minister and other Ministers during Bobby Storey's funeral, undermining the very health message that all of the Executive were pledged to support, or the First Minister, Economy Minister and Agriculture Minister utilising cross-community voting mechanisms to block a non-cross-community health proposal, only to, one —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. I draw the Member back to amendment Nos 1 to 9.

Dr Aiken: Thank you. One week later, they agreed to tighter restrictions. I will get to this point, Mr Deputy Speaker. That shows how far from the norm, and how immature, the Northern Ireland political process is. It is too fragile to be left to best practice and behaviour when clearly, in Northern Ireland, it is anything but. The crux of the issues is whether there is a need for legislation or whether codes and guidance are sufficient, or indeed preferable. The then head of the Civil Service, David Sterling, expressed a view that codes and guidance were sufficient, although this was the same official who, during the RHI inquiry, expressed a view that — I paraphrase — keeping appropriate records of meetings would not be conducive to the wishes of the two largest political parties.

Perhaps Members — this talks directly to the amendments referring to spads — who have read with a sense of incredulity, or even, like me, anger, of the activity of our Ministers, spads and senior civil servants in Sam McBride's book 'Burned' will, outside the diktats of their central committees and councils, realise that, unlike other Administrations, we now have to have a legislative framework. In his book, Mr McBride states that:

"Therefore, some of the worst behaviour set out in this book — which will to many readers appear morally corrupt, even if it is not in breach of the law — is in my experience the exception, rather than the norm."

I wish and hope that that is so but, without a strong legislative framework, how can we avoid the temptation, or worse, of political corruption?

The legislation also deals with detailed concerns. A code for special advisers that is fit for purpose is vital. Curiously, indicating perhaps the sense of commitment from the Executive to reform themselves, one of their first actions was to remove existing safeguards. The words of a former Commissioner for Public Appointments suggested that action was contrary to fundamental requirements for a code of appointment.

Furthermore, having a process for employing a spad, bearing in mind that some parties wish for a salary cap for these individuals to be removed, with a current salary band equating them to that of a Minister, probably says more about the relative power that spads have. Even a cursory reading of the RHI evidence, where Ministers would be directed by spads who spoke with the authority of the party or from offices on the Falls Road, again shows that there is more than enough reason for legislation.

Mr McGuigan: Will the Member give way?

Dr Aiken: Yes.

Mr McGuigan: Does the Member agree with my party colleague who spoke earlier and talked about accountability mechanisms that recently, when he wrote a letter to Committees purporting to come from the Finance Committee, the Committee was able to hold him to account, and that, in fact, his letter was not on behalf of the Finance Committee but on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party?

Dr Aiken: I thank the Member for that. Indeed, in Committee, I apologised for it. While we are talking about that letter, to make sure that there was no break —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. It was a very interesting letter, but can we return to the subject of the legislation in front of us? Mr Aiken, have you finished your contribution, or is there more to come?

Dr Aiken: I have more.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): It is now 1.00 pm, and the Business Committee is due to meet. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the setting until 2.00 pm, after which the first item of business will be questions to the Minister of Education. After Question Time, Mr Aiken will have the opportunity to continue his speech.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 1.00 pm.

2.00 pm

On resuming (Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Stalford] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Education

Bangor Central Integrated Primary School

1. Mr Muir asked the Minister of Education for an update on a new build for Bangor Central Integrated Primary School. (AQO 1171/17-22)

Mr Weir (The Minister of Education): I thank the Member for his question. Through Fresh Start funding, my Department is delivering a hugely significant capital investment of almost £10 million in Bangor Central Integrated Primary School. The business case was approved by the Department in July 2020 and identified the preferred option of a new-build school on a new site on the Balloo Road in Bangor. The project will provide a brand new single-storey school with modern facilities, fully compliant with my Department's school building handbook. The school will be built on a new site 1·7 miles from the existing school in an easily accessible part of the town, with sufficient room for future expansion. The construction work will be able to take place without causing any disruption to the ongoing operation of the school.

In July 2020, the Education Authority (EA) appointed an integrated consultant team to undertake the design, and that work is now in the early stages of the design process. When completed, the new facilities will enhance the provision of integrated education in the north Down area and support the future growth of the sector.

Mr Muir: I thank the Minister for his response. As he has outlined, this will be a new site on the Balloo Road. What assurances can the Minister give that the children and young people who live in Bangor town centre will be catered for as a result of the move to the new site?

Mr Weir: If the Member is talking about transport, there is an entitlement for free school transport to be provided if children live beyond a certain distance from their school. It should be said that, because Bangor Central Integrated Primary School is the one integrated primary school in Bangor, it does draw from a fairly wide catchment area.

As the Member will be aware from the response to the question for written answer that he submitted, the two main wards in the centre of Bangor represent about a third of the pupils who go to Bangor Central, with the other two thirds coming from outside that area. To some extent, the new build will shift, perhaps, the emphasis or the location, but, as happens on all occasions, any movement that children need to make will be catered for.

Miss Woods: The Minister will know that I have many questions on this, but, for now, can he outline what consultation was done with the school, the board of governors, and the parents about this move as well as with the wider community? Will he commit to meet me, a group of parents and interested parties regarding the proposed school move?

Mr Weir: I am always happy to meet the Member. I have met some interested parties on this. There was a project board for each of the Fresh Start projects, and that involved the school directly. Consultation and discussion took place. If the issue is about the location, we should remember that there are at least three separate issues on that. First, the statutory duty on the Department is to integrated education, not to a specific site or location. Therefore, when looking at this, it is about what is in the best interests of the sector as a whole.

Secondly, from the point of view of a business case and public costs, this has a considerable difference from simply building on site at the current location. The Member should also be aware that projects funded by Fresh Start capital require Treasury sign-off, so it is not simply a matter of what the Department feels and, indeed, is about providing a situation that gives best value for money.

Thirdly, looking at integrated education more broadly, there will be more room for the school at its new site. So if, for instance, an additional unit needed to be added to the school, there would be an opportunity for that to happen at a future point, whereas accommodation space at the Bangor Central site, which I am very familiar with, is much more limited. All those factors need to be considered. I am happy to meet the Member to discuss those, but she should be aware that the decision on location has been taken.

Mr Chambers: Minister, I certainly welcome the investment in my constituency. I understand that the board of governors and the staff of the school fully support the move, but there seems to be a body of resistance building against the move. Has your Department had any sense of that?

Mr Weir: It is natural that people see the history tied up with a particular site when a school is moving to a different location. As I indicated, if we were to provide a neighbourhood-specific site for every school that would not be an appropriate way of dealing with it. It is perfectly natural, and I suspect that most people, if they are linked with a particular school, will have a particular emphasis on its location. As the Member mentioned, the project board and the governors have accepted it. There is also, as I have indicated, a wider commitment in terms of a business case and what is provided to the Treasury in relation to it.

It is also the case that, because of the pressure on places in Bangor across the board, even at primary sector level, there is no question of displacement that will create problems, largely speaking, elsewhere, because there is really not much, if any, spare capacity in the system.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question No 2, in the name of Mr Andy Allen, has been withdrawn.

Integrated Schools: East Antrim

3. Mr Dickson asked the Minister of Education when decisions will be made on outstanding development proposals for schools in East Antrim moving to controlled integrated status. (AQO 1173/17-22)

Mr Weir: Development proposals (DPs) for transformation to controlled integrated status for two mid- and east Antrim schools were published on 26 March. They were DP 645 Carrickfergus Central Primary, where the proposal was to transform to controlled integrated status with effect from 1 September 2021 or as soon as possible thereafter, and DP 648, which is Seaview Primary School, to transform to controlled integrated status, again with effect from 1 September 2021 or soon after.

Area planning activity was paused, due to COVID, on 3 April 2020, with the exception of special education provision in mainstream and special school settings, so that all resources, including staff, could be redeployed in the Department's emergency response to the COVID-19 pandemic. As a consequence, the progression of DPs has been delayed. However, we are now in a position where this can restart, and an extraordinary meeting of the area planning steering group was held on 21 October and a decision taken formally to resume all area planning operations and structures from that date.

The Department has extended the statutory objection period — objection can be letters both of support and of opposition — for affected DPs to provide a full two-month consultation outside the suspension period. The revised closing dates for the transformation proposals was 9 November 2020. Work on the assessment of the proposals has recommenced, and decisions on the DPs will be made as soon as possible.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for his answer. I very much appreciate the difficulties that his Department has had during that time, and I very much welcome that it is now back on track to make these decisions. I particularly welcome the one on Carrickfergus Central.

In respect of Seaview, you will appreciate that it is less than three miles away from an already successful integrated primary school that is celebrating 20 years this year. How does the Minister see the development plan proposal, bearing in mind that there are two villages less than three miles apart?

Mr Weir: The Member will forgive me, but I do not know how much he is aware, directly, of the process. Development proposals, while they will be initiated by different bodies and brought forward, ultimately will come down a legal decision that has to be made by the Department and, where there is a Minister, by the Minister directly. Therefore, I am duty-bound, ahead of any decision on a development proposal, to make no comment at all on the merits of that case, either for or against that proposal.

While all factors will be borne in mind with regard to the situation in Seaview and Carrick, I will have to judge all those factors when they come to me. I cannot comment on, for instance, the distance between existing schools at present. Obviously, all factors will be taken into account before there is a decision.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister advise the House, in making decisions about these matters, how far are the wider community ramifications considered? Let us take Seaview, for example. The impact on the like of Carnalbanagh Primary School, which the Minister kindly visited, could be serious, in that a school that is struggling to regenerate itself and to get back going could have the rug pulled from under it by the further advancement of an alternative offering nearby.

Mr Weir: We look at the impact on surrounding schools. It is not simply about the sustainability of the schools. The key focus is on the direct education of the young people. If a school was transforming, for example, or if there was a merger or closure, it is about what the implications will be for the local children. Any school will look at the wider implications for nearby schools. As part of the process, a grid of nearby schools is highlighted. Within that is the distance from the school, and it is broken down by sector and the number of children there. All factors are taken into account, but the overriding considerations are the broader educational implications for those children and what is sustainable. It is rare that any development proposal will be entirely uncontroversial in its nature, apart from, perhaps, a minor indication regarding school numbers. Any decision on a school will have a ripple effect across the board.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 4 in the name of Mr McGuigan, question 7 in the name of Mr Chambers and question 8 in the name of Mrs Cameron have been grouped.

Schools: 2021 GCSE and A-level Examinations

4. Mr McGuigan asked the Minister of Education when the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment will be in a position to provide detailed contingency arrangements for public examinations in 2021. (AQO 1174/17-22)

7. Mr Chambers asked the Minister of Education for an update on his planning for public examinations in 2021. (AQO 1177/17-22)

8. Mrs Cameron asked the Minister of Education, in light of the recent decision by the Welsh Government, what additional steps are being taken to support local students undertaking GCSE and A-level assessments. (AQO 1178/17-22)

Mr Weir: I thank the Members for their questions. As the Principal Deputy Speaker said, I will answer all three together.

It is my priority that examinations to award Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) qualifications should go ahead as planned in 2021. I have already announced a number of adaptations to CCEA qualifications, including the omission of assessments for whole units for most GCSEs and health-related adaptations for AS and A levels. However, I have also said that I will keep the situation under review. My officials have been working with CCEA to develop a range of further mitigations and contingencies to respond to the fluid public health situation. That work is at an advanced stage, and I hope to provide more information very soon.

In these uncertain times, the familiarity with the exam system provides greater certainty as learners know what they are working towards and how it is awarded. Additionally, when looking at the wider implications of examinations, we have to be careful that our students in Northern Ireland are not disadvantaged between one another. It will not simply be a question of what is done in CCEA, because a number of students, particularly at A level, will carry out examinations from boards outside Northern Ireland. Their qualifications must be seen as robust, portable and comparable to those of their counterparts in neighbouring jurisdictions.

Mr McGuigan: In his response, the Minister talked about disadvantage. There is no doubt that the educational experience during the pandemic has varied greatly to date and will continue to vary for as long as COVID is with us. There is no level playing field. My view is that the CCEA proposals do not go far enough. Given the level of disruption to classes, the level of COVID absences and the amount of lost learning time, will the Minister give further consideration to how the exam series in 2021 will be addressed?

Mr Weir: I have indicated that the exams will go ahead. It is important. There has been discussion — sometimes genuine; sometimes false — around when I will give certainty. The certainty is that the exams will take place. One of the by-products of all this is a genuine concern that has been raised that some schools that are concerned that exams will not take place are over-testing their pupils daily. That is negative. Schools should operate as normally as possible and should not place undue strain. One of the concerns with regard to the maintenance of exams is that we do not reach a situation where, if exams are abandoned, pupils are put under a seven-month microscope, effectively, where every assignment and action that they take is highly pressurised.

The Member is right. That is why we are looking at a range of adaptations. We have tasked CCEA with looking at optionality, which would give greater choice to students when they are taking it. It is also about what contingencies will be put in place.

While that may be a particular focus this year, it is not unique to this year. There will be a number of occasions in a normal year when pupils are not able to sit a particular paper — they are ill, perhaps, or disrupted in some shape or form. Those contingencies and what provision is put in place will need to be thought through. We will put in place a series of other adaptations. I hope to bring further clarity very shortly.

2.15 pm

Mr Chambers: Thank you, Minister, for your answer. You have sort of answered the question that I was going to ask. For the record, can the Minister commit to not changing his position so that students and parents at least have clarity about what they need to prepare for with regard to upcoming exams?

Mr Weir: It is entirely my position to ensure that exams take place. Nobody has a crystal ball and can say what position we will be in in a number of months. As even the Prime Minister indicated, there are still some difficult days ahead, albeit the overall position is improving. Exams represent the fairest route by which people can be judged entirely on their own merits. However, there have to be adaptations to this year's examinations because of the disruption that pupils have had and the fact that they have not necessarily been on a level playing field. The reality is that there is no perfect solution. It is noticeable that all jurisdictions are effectively doing exams by one means or another. Even if at least one of them is not saying that it is doing exams, it is doing exams by a different nomenclature.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he outline what steps his Department is taking or could take to further alleviate pressure on pupils facing important assessments under these very challenging circumstances?

Mr Weir: The first thing is to try to give certainty to pupils. When we see the adaptations, we will want to send a clear message to schools. A number of people have raised concerns, less about examinations directly and more about the pressure that children are being put under on a daily basis. Some of that comes from schools. They are worried about parents suing them etc, so they have taken a view that they have to provide evidence of the assessment that they produce. That has led to undue pressure being placed on children.

There has been a range of mitigations; some are driven by health and some will reduce the level of assessment. On a number of occasions, we have enabled a unit to be removed, particularly from GCSEs. It can be that up to 40% of a GCSE is not assessed. Effectively, then, a pupil will be assessed on 60% rather than 100%, which eases the burden considerably. To be fair, while there has been disruption, schools are becoming more adept at remote learning. It is not the case that, if someone is off, no work is being produced, albeit face-to-face teaching is very much to the fore. However, further adaptations need to be looked at. Those will focus on A level and AS level. I look forward to holding that conversation very shortly with CCEA, which is drafting proposals.

Mr Lyttle: I am aware of one school in Northern Ireland that has pupils who are in their fourth period of self-isolation. That entire year group has missed four weeks of school-based learning this term. Of course, there are pupils who, due to COVID-related absence, are physically unable to sit the GCSEs that are taking place this week. Why are contingency plans not already in place to address anxiety caused by those absences and to ensure that all pupils receive fair grades?

Mr Weir: Certain contingencies have already been put in place. CCEA has made clear that, if there is a reason that someone cannot sit this week's examinations, there will be further opportunities in March or July. It is about trying to get things correct. I want to see two things happen. CCEA has to come forward with its draft proposals. We then need to produce a holistic picture. Deloitte had been tasked to look independently at what happened in 2020, and it is due to report fairly soon. It is important that all those lessons are put in place to ensure that we have something that is as fair as possible.

It is about trying to equalise as much as possible. There is no doubt that in the current circumstances there is no perfect solution and no entirely fair solution. However, trying to ensure that our pupils get something that is fair and equally portable, that we have something that links in with what is happening elsewhere and that exams with levels of mitigations, adaptations and contingencies, represent the fairest way forward, particularly as we look towards the robustness of our exams.

If, for instance, we were to abandon exams in 2021, there would also be the consequence that, when you get to 2022, A-level students, who are probably doing, ultimately, the most important exams of their life, would be in the situation of never having sat a public examination before doing those A levels. That would massively disadvantage them when it comes to, for instance, employment or university places.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Minister, most students, teachers and parents are in agreement that the fairest option facing you and our young people is to cancel GCSE examinations this year. In view of the importance, as you clearly stated, of the portability of qualifications and in light of Scotland and Wales unilaterally deciding to change their qualifications, is the Minister mindful not to recognise the Scottish and Welsh qualification in that regard?

Mr Weir: I entirely recognise what is happening in Scotland and Wales. Scotland's Highers, which are, effectively, used for entry into university, are keeping with examinations, as indeed is the layer below. Scotland has made an adjustment that affects about 10% of its pupils, but it has made sure that its pupils are not disadvantaged when it comes to employment and entry into university.

Wales has produced what I call the David Copperfield solution. It has presented a few mirrors and made it look like exams have disappeared. However, as part of its proposals, which have not been particularly well sketched out, it says that one of the key bits of their assessment will be external assessments that are "externally set and externally marked". Presumably, if an assessment is being done externally, there is only one of two ways to be fair: either you allow schools to do that completely willy-nilly, in which case you are not putting them on a level playing field; or effectively, those pupils do it in exam conditions.

Wales appears to suggest that it is not doing exams, but it is doing exams. That is not just my opinion. For example, the National Association of Head Teachers in Wales said that Wales is doing exams under a different title. That is exams under a different name. Let us get to the kernel of the truth: all jurisdictions, including Wales, Scotland, England and the Republic of Ireland, for their main set of students, are all doing examinations in 2021. Northern Ireland is a small jurisdiction. We cannot afford to simply go on a solo run, particularly given that close to 20% of our students at A level do English board examinations. We cannot have a situation where we create that differential between students in Northern Ireland. That would be simply folly.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. The Minister will be aware that one of the key issues arising as a result of COVID-19 in general is effective and meaningful communication to ensure that education can continue in the safest manner for our teachers and pupils. Will the Minister detail what formal consultation he has had with teachers and trade unions regarding exams and school reopening in general since schools reopened in September?

Mr Weir: We met with a range of stakeholder groups, and from that, there are discussions that will take place on a regular ongoing basis with the trade unions. We also have a stakeholder group of school principals, and engagement has taken place on a couple of occasions with our officials and those principals on examinations in particular.

When the issues have been discussed, particularly with school principals, they have agreed that the best way forward is examinations. There is not a level of demurring from that. It is very difficult, and there is no perfect way to moderate centre-assessed grades if we were to use them. It has to be that one pupil in one school is on a level playing field with others as much as possible, given the constraints. It is clear that examinations, however imperfect, represent the best opportunity of a level playing field for students. They are competing not only to get their own grades but against others, particularly for university places and later for employment, and so that their grades can have a level of comparability. That is the case not just with their peers but when they are competing against others of different years, so there should be a level playing field in order that they can have a level of read-across within that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Given the issue, I thought that it was important that a single Member from each party got to ask a question to the Minister. I know that another Member wanted to ask a question, but I will make it up to you next time, Robbie.

COVID-19: Special Educational Needs Assessments

5. Mr Frew asked the Minister of Education, in the absence of face-to-face contact due to COVID-19 restrictions, to outline how educational psychologists provide assessments at all stages of the 'Code of Practice on the Identification and Assessment of Special Educational Needs'. (AQO 1175/17-22)

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for his question. During the period when face-to-face assessment was suspended, the Education Authority's educational psychology service continued to progress stage 3, 4 and 5 assessments, which had previously been consulted on and agreed with schools, and worked closely with EA colleagues in statutory operations to provide psychological advice when requested.

The service was able to gather information from questionnaires and other screening tools administered via telephone or video call; telephone consultations with school sources, such as the school's special educational needs coordinator; previous assessments; scores from standardised tests or other attainment information; and analysis of the child's developmental checklist, with a view that this information may be added to at a later stage, where necessary. In addition, the service provides advice and resources to staff, as well as training to support children and young people who are struggling at this time. The service continued to provide support during the period of school reopening, and face-to-face assessments resumed in September 2020.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for his answer. How will the Minister and the Department manage the backlog, which I am sure is mounting, and how will that be rectified before school placement time, given that some of these children may well have to attend special needs schools?

Mr Weir: The Member says that the backlog "is mounting"; saying that it "mounted" might be a more accurate tense to use. Yes, there is no doubt that some of the pressures from COVID meant that the extent of involvement changed. As I indicated, certain things could carry on, but the involvement was limited. Work continues on managing backlog cases, with the aim of reducing that number. The particular focus is on children who have been waiting longest, and that can include a range of actions to reconfigure processes and workflows across offices.

Reducing the backlog will be achieved through a combination of EA's continuing process improvement work and additional short-term staff resource. A capacity and demand analysis is being finalised to define the short-term resource that will be required and where that short-term resource is indicated. For this year, a couple of days ago, additional money was granted through the monitoring round. There is short-term resource, but there is also a longer-term delivery model to try to ensure sustained performance within the 26-week period.

As indicated, delays have been too long, but we are starting to see an improvement. For example, a year ago today, 107 children were waiting a year and a half for the statementing process. By the end of September this year, no child was waiting a year and a half. Indeed, compared with the 158 children who, a year ago, were waiting a little over a year, that number, within a 16-week period, has come down to 10, and there is an 83% improvement in the number of children waiting over 40 weeks. Action has been taken. There is no doubt that COVID created problems, but there are new processes in place that will help to reduce that further.

Ms Rogan: Minister, has there been an assessment of the impact of reducing statutory obligations in respect of special educational needs to what are best described as best endeavours, and what effect has that had on the children?

Mr Weir: The indications are that what we tried to provide has led to an improving service. There was not really any alternative. What could be provided during COVID was not necessarily going to be absolutely the same as it was under normal circumstances. That is the case across a wide range of services. Our aim and focus is to try to make sure that the backlog is cleared and that we reduce waiting times. We have seen an improvement in waiting times through a short-term intervention, and a longer-term plan has also been put in place. There is no doubt that the longer any child has to wait, the fewer the services that can be provided for them and the more difficult it is for them. That is what we are trying to combat, but we have also got to work, particularly during that peak period of COVID, against practical realities.

2.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions. Before I call Mr Allister, I announce to the House that question 10, standing in the name of Ms Paula Bradley, has been withdrawn.

Primary Schools: Early Closure

T1. Mr Allister asked the Minister of Education, who will be aware that the last week of the Christmas term in a primary school is a particularly exciting and significant week and whom he can imagine maybe excelling in the role of Wise Man, whether, given that, although that week will be different this year, schools will be preparing and children will be full of anticipation about in-bubble, in-class celebrations, he can assure the House that he will not countenance the closure of our primary schools a week early, as some have suggested, thereby bringing devastation to many kids looking forward to the festivities. (AQT 721/17-22)

Mr Weir: It was very nice of the Member, albeit he was probably being slightly tongue in cheek, to refer to me as a wise man. I am just glad that he did not refer to me as Herod. With regard to primary schools and post-primary schools closing, I am aware that there have been rumours floating about at times — I suppose this is Northern Ireland — but there is no substance to them. Schools will continue with their normal Christmas period up until the week before Christmas on that basis. There are no plans to close early. None of that has come from myself, the Department of Education or the EA; it is a little bit of whispering around the place. It is important that schools remain open.

It was also the case that, when the restrictions were talked about by the Executive, it was unanimously agreed by all the parties that schools should remain open. That is important from an educational and a social point of view. The Member is right that, although there will be certain constrained situations this year, it is important that various events around the nativity and a situation that I am aware of where a number of schools have booked a video photographer and suchlike go ahead. A number of things were missed out by necessity towards the end of the last academic year — those school-leaver-type situations — and I am keen to not add to that.

Purely from a health point of view, injecting an extra week's holiday before Christmas and effectively saying, "Here's a large number of children" and expecting them to simply stay at home would not work, with the best will in the world. That would probably create levels of socialisation which would be detrimental from a health point of view, so I am totally opposed to that. There are no plans to close schools early.

Mr Allister: I am grateful for the clarification from the Minister. Can he bring the same certainty in respect of the holding of the transfer tests in January?

Mr Weir: Yes, as far as I can. As the Member is aware, the Association for Quality Education and the Post Primary Transfer Consortium, which hold the transfer tests, are independent organisations, so ultimately it lies within their hands and the hands of the schools that host the tests. Certainly, there have been levels of engagement so that, for example, all the health and safety measures will be put in place. They are perfectly prepared for the tests, so there is no intention for them to be cancelled. The Member makes a very valid point: the more certainty that we can give people, the better, even if sometimes the certainty that we give is not the exact certainty that some others would want in relation to some of those issues.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mrs Dolores Kelly is not in her place and Ms Cara Hunter is not in her place.

COVID-19: School Transport

T4. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister of Education, who will be aware of recent stories of concerns about pupils who are bubbling in their classroom but then get on to buses containing pupils from many schools — an issue that he had raised earlier in the year — whether there had been a scoping exercise to see where that happens and what measures we can take to ensure that it does not. (AQT 724/17-22)

Mr Weir: As the Member will be aware, as part of that we have moved to a situation that will hopefully reduce levels of transmission. For post-primary children, there is a requirement to wear masks on public transport and school transport.

We are up against practical restrictions, as about 80,000 pupils use free transport each day. I have instructed officials to work with Translink, the EA and the Department for Infrastructure. Although some additional money has been able to be levered in for additional transport, there are restrictions, and we need to try to make sure that we use that transport as wisely as possible so that, if there are additional pressures on some routes, buses can be brought in. We would also be happy to embrace some rejigging.

The Member also raises an important point about the threat that is out there. A lot of good work has been done directly in schools, particularly with bubbles. Schools do not represent a particular risk to pupils. The danger comes from the virus being brought into schools as a result of wider community transmission. With anything that can be done around buses and messaging, although messaging lies outside my direct control when it comes to, for example, issues around drop-off and pick-up, there is a role for all of us to be socially responsible. There will, however, be ongoing discussions to see whether any other action, such as rejigging of buses, can be done to ease the situation.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Minister for his answer. The media have to be careful in how they report infection rates associated with schools. They report them as being "in schools", but it is more important that they report them as being "associated with schools".

Have there been any discussions with the Department for Infrastructure on the provision of buses, particularly from Translink? There are also many private coach companies out there that are crying out for work. Is the Minister aware of whether contact has been made with them?

Mr Weir: There has been some contact. As part of that, the Executive have provided a small amount of additional money for additional safety on buses and to ease transport levels. That money is not, by its nature, infinite, so it is about trying to use it as well as possible. I have had good conversations with the Infrastructure Minister, and there is a commitment at departmental and operational level to work together to see whether any additional elements can be put in place.

One of the other issues, as we respond to events, is that the pattern of drop-off for children has adjusted a little. Some parents will have taken a view that they feel most confident delivering their children to and from school themselves, where they would not have previously, so all those things have to be factored in.

On Friday, among a number of schools that I visited, I had the great pleasure of visiting Jones Memorial Primary School in Enniskillen, which won the Fermanagh Sustrans award for active travel. Active travel should be strongly encouraged. I appreciate that active travel is not applicable to everyone or, indeed, given the weather conditions sometimes in Northern Ireland, something that can be done all the time, but, from the point of view of preventing the spread of COVID and creating a healthy body and mind, the more we can do to encourage the embracing of active travel, where possible, the better.

Schools: Well-being Initiatives

T5. Mr Gildernew asked the Minister of Education, who recently announced £5 million for well-being initiatives in schools, when schools will be able to start spending the money on that important field of work. (AQT 725/17-22)

Mr Weir: To give a bit of a breakdown, the £5 million is effectively COVID recovery money. A total of £12 million was given for what I will call the broader academic side, most of which went into the Engage programme. About a quarter of a million pounds of that £5 million will go to youth services. A number of youth organisations have already been notified of an element of grant. The remaining £4.75 million will be divided among schools pro rata.

Given that the money will be spent on mental health and well-being, once individual schools have been notified of the money, which should happen very soon, there will be no barrier to them spending it. It is not an enormous sum for schools, but there will be complete flexibility in how they can spend that money, provided that it is used for mental health and well-being purposes. That might involve getting in some additional talks or counselling sessions. It could be to support the well-being of staff. While, naturally, we concentrate on the children, we need to ensure that staff well-being is also covered. It may be through additional extracurricular activities that they want to take place or even improving the school environment, perhaps, by buying equipment that would help. There is trust in schools to spend that money wisely and to determine, within their own budgets and situations, whether they might want to put additional money towards nurture, for example. They are the people on the ground. We give schools that same level of trust with the Engage programme.

Mr Gildernew: I thank the Minister for that answer. It is an opportune time to acknowledge the work that teachers do on the front line to protect the well-being of staff, the school community and children. How will the funding complement the work of the emotional health and well-being framework next year?

Mr Weir: The idea is that proposals will be brought to the Executive soon. We bid for an annual sum in the budget. To be fair, some money has also been provided by Health because of the linkages with that Department. The anticipation for emotional health and well-being is that £6.5 million will be mainstreamed into budgets that are provided mainly to schools. That will be for a series of projects. Some will be for work on the youth side and some for building resilience through the curriculum. Therefore, the £6.5 million will be for a range of projects, some of which will effectively be piloted because we want to see what works and what does not work. It will probably be more centrally driven, although schools will be able to take advantage of that. The £6.5 million will be mainstreamed in budgets, so what is there in 2020-21 will be there in 2021-22 and beyond. We may reach a situation where that amount of money expands. Nevertheless, it will be there.

The difference between the two is that the £5 million is from the COVID-19 funding. Therefore, it is effectively a one-off payment. To ensure that it is spent in year, schools will have flexibility and much wider discretion in spending that money than they will with regard to the £6.5 million, which will probably be directed into particular projects and processes.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Doug Beattie is not in his place.

Children and Young People's Strategy

T7. Mr Buckley asked the Minister of Education for an update on the children and young people's strategy and to say when it will be announced. (AQT 727/17-22)

Mr Weir: The children and young people's strategy has been created and is now being finalised. It has obviously been a long while coming, and some adjustments have been made down the years. It is now, I think, being circulated to Executive colleagues. To be fair, any comments that I have received from Executive colleagues have been, across the board, largely supportive. It should not be seen as in any way controversial, and therefore I hope that it can be signed off by the whole Executive before Christmas. It will produce a longer-term vision for children and young people.

Mr Buckley: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that, whilst COVID-19 demands a lot of prioritisation from the Minister's Executive colleagues and, indeed, the Department of Education, it is still important that Departments continue to bring forward important existing priorities?

Mr Weir: It is right. Executive colleagues and I have brought forward strategic plans for the longer term. That has been across the board. There is no doubt that COVID-19 has taken up what we might call a "broad bandwidth" in different Departments. At times, that has led to immediate concerns having to be covered. In particular, with regard to the attention that can be given at different levels, it has meant that officials who deal with area planning, for example, have had to be diverted to COVID-19-related activities temporarily.

For all of us, there are priorities that we need to ensure are maintained. They might have been slightly delayed because of COVID-19. However, collectively, in the Department of Education and beyond, there is a determination to work through, from a Programme for Government point of view, a range of those priorities, some of which have already started to be brought to fruition, not just by my Department but by others.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We can have a single question from Ms Martina Anderson.

Schools: Transfer Tests

T8. Ms Anderson asked the Minister of Education, given that parents in Derry and across the North are concerned about putting their children through the transfer test because of COVID-19 and that any other cobbled-together test would be fraught with legal challenges, whether he agrees that we should just use applications. (AQT 728/17-22)

2.45 pm

Mr Weir: Apart from the fact that schools have a legal right to use academic selection, the tests are run separately. I understand that, given the current situation, everybody has concerns. A range of health and safety measures will be put in place. We are talking about gathering together about 10,000 young people across Northern Ireland, when, on a daily basis, around 300,000 go to school. It will not surprise the Member to know that I suspect that she and I have, shall we say, a divergent view on the issue of transfer. People can always make legal challenges on a range of things. I remember one of my predecessors — I think that it was Caitríona Ruane — predicting that the tests, first made by the Association of Quality Education (AQE) and the Post Primary Transfer Consortium (PPTC) 12 or 13 years ago, would collapse under the weight of legal challenges. We are a number of years on, and the tests are still here.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order, Members. That concludes questions to the Minister of Education. I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments while others clear the Chamber. Do not forget to clean the spot where you were before you leave. Thank you.

Finance

New Decade, New Approach: Civil Service Reform

1. Mr McGrath asked the Minister of Finance what progress has been made on Civil Service reform, as set out in 'New Decade, New Approach'. (AQO 1186/17-22)

Mr Murphy (The Minister of Finance): Good progress has been made to deliver the New Decade, New Approach (NDNA) Civil Service reform commitments. The Executive formed a subcommittee on responding to the renewable heat incentive (RHI) inquiry and reform in March 2020. It met in late July and last week and is currently working to complete the Executive's response to the RHI inquiry.

A revised Civil Service code of ethics has been developed, including discussions with trade unions and Civil Service Commissioners. That will be finalised soon and become part of all Civil Service contracts of employment. It has significant changes on working for the Executive as a whole, on record-keeping and on raising and responding to concerns that are raised either internally or externally.

The review of arm's-length bodies is under way, with stage 1 complete. I am discussing with Executive colleagues the creation of a Civil Service reform team in DOF that will develop a wider reform plan. The Procurement Board will be reconstituted to include an expert advisory panel appointed from key sectors in the economy. I will consider last week's NIAO report on Civil Service capacity and capability and its potential for read-across to Civil Service reform.

Mr McGrath: I thank the Minister for his answer. The Northern Ireland Audit Office report on Civil Service capacity that you referred to highlighted major structural problems with the local Civil Service. How can we address those challenges without a head of the Civil Service? Can you tell us when that appointment will be made?

Mr Murphy: Quite a lot of the work that I have just outlined has been conducted without a head of the Civil Service, so the world does not come to an end without somebody being in post as the head of the Civil Service. A lot of work continues on through the Departments and through the Executive Office. Of course, I would like to see a head of the Civil Service being appointed soon. I know that the First Minister and deputy First Minister are looking at steps such as interim appointments. I think that they want to look at the role of the head of the Civil Service, and, obviously, it will be up to them to bring forward that process.

Mr McGuigan: Minister, will review of the recruitment process for senior civil servants be part of the reform process?

Mr Murphy: Yes. A range of issues are to be reviewed in terms of Civil Service reform. It is a significant piece of work, and that is why I am putting together a reform team. It can scope out the broad areas and consult other Departments, Ministers and others on the full scope of issues that we want to see in Civil Service reform. There was a clear commitment in NDNA to do the work. It falls largely to my Department, which has responsibility for the Civil Service, and we are happy for it to be as broad as is considered necessary.

Mr Humphrey: In relation to the Northern Ireland Audit Office's recent reports on capacity, capability and attendance in Civil Service employment, how does the Department plan to take forward the recommendations — is he going to take forward the recommendations — put forward by the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland in those reports?

Mr Murphy: Clearly, we will look at them. We have initiated a process of Civil Service reform. We are putting together a group to take that forward, and the report fits into that discussion. Of course, there will be recommendations in that report that will require to be addressed as part of a response to your Committee and the Assembly as a whole, and I am sure that the Department will look at that. However, it will dovetail nicely with what we intended to do in terms of Civil Service reform, as we agreed under NDNA.

Business Support Schemes

2. Mr Blair asked the Minister of Finance what assessment his Department has made of the potential merits of compensating small businesses that have maintained the salaries of employees even though they were ineligible for support from the coronavirus job retention scheme. (AQO 1187/17-22)

Mr Murphy: I have been concerned that the Treasury's eligibility criteria for its schemes have excluded some businesses, and I have raised that directly and repeatedly with Ministers in London. In particular, given the local restrictions that the Executive put in place in October, I called on the Treasury to make furloughing available immediately for all businesses that needed it. I recognise, however, there was a gap for businesses not eligible before the 1 November extension of the scheme, but that sort of wage support can be put in place only by Treasury. First, the scale of the funding required is huge. Ulster University has estimated that the value of furlough claims in the North up to the end of July was £890 million. That is beyond the scope of our budget locally. Secondly, making those sorts of payments requires access to HMRC taxpayer data and systems that we do not have and nor could we get. That said, I will continue to use all the levers at my disposal to support businesses that are impacted, as I did most recently in putting in place the localised restrictions support scheme, paying double the amounts available under the London Government's scheme.

Mr Blair: I thank the Minister for that answer. Can the Minister provide an update on the number of applications to the localised restrictions support scheme and the number of payments in progress?

Mr Murphy: Yes. The number of applications is, I think, in the region of 12,000; the number of payments is over 5,000; and I think that in the region of over 2,000 have been rejected. More than half have been processed, and we are heading towards £20 million in payout on that scheme.

Mrs Barton: Minister, what was the outcome of the talks with Department for the Economy's officials over the weekend on the matter? Why has it taken nearly eight months to come up with the appropriate package?

Mr Murphy: The Member will know, because her colleague proposed the restrictions last Thursday, that we were not aware until Thursday that non-essential retail was part of the Department of Health's proposition for restrictions. In order to come up with a package to address those issues, you have to know where the businesses that need support are. Over the weekend, we had, in essence, to come up with a package, and that is what we did. Yesterday, I brought to the Assembly a substantial support package across a range of Departments, including the Department for the Economy, to provide that support.

The funding available to us has changed. The furlough scheme has changed at very short notice. We knew just over only two and a half weeks ago that we had an additional £400 million. The restrictions themselves have changed the businesses that are required to close. All that has happened with little notice. As for the notion that we had months to come up with the schemes, I wish that we had had. I wish that we had known what restrictions would be in place and what funding would be available to us. I wish that we had known that the Treasury was going to change its mind abruptly on furloughing with no notice. I look forward to finding out tomorrow what will be in our budgets for next year when the comprehensive spending review is finished. It has not been ideal for planning, but we put together schemes and processes as quickly as we could once we had all the relevant information.

Mr Catney: Thank you, Minister. I realise that we are working to get that money out to businesses. Is there a possibility that the support announced yesterday for company directors could be utilised by small businesses?

Mr Murphy: The Member will know that the scheme to which he refers is being taken forward by the Department for the Economy. The scheme tries to address a section of our business community that has not received any support so far. I have made this point many times: as we are now, perhaps, getting on to the third level of support for some businesses, it is particularly acute for those who have not received any support to date. The Department for the Economy will roll out the scheme. I look forward to seeing the details, and I am sure that, if it can assist some of the businesses to which he refers, it will be of benefit to them.

Procurement: Security of Supply

3. Mr O'Dowd asked the Minister of Finance how procurement policy will reflect the importance of security of supply, given the learning from the COVID-19 pandemic. (AQO 1188/17-22)

Mr Murphy: Security of supply is a fundamental in all public-sector contracts. It is essential that commissioners continually monitor and assess the resilience of supply chains as COVID-19 continues to impact on demand and production in the manufacturing sector. Security of supply will also be impacted by EU exit if the British Government fail to secure a trade deal with the EU. I plan to appoint an expert advisory panel from industry to bring fresh thinking on procurement matters and to advise the Procurement Board of lessons learned during the pandemic to help to build the resilience of government supply chains.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Minister for his answer. He will be aware of many small and medium-sized enterprises that were capable of responding to the shortages of PPE and other equipment in the health sector but were not able to do so because they were disadvantaged by the scale of the contracts. Will the new Procurement Board ensure that there is not only value for money but a mandatory provision for social value?

Mr Murphy: From my perspective, the Procurement Board and the general procurement of contracts has to follow a set of criteria. However, the experience of the pandemic is such that security of supply has to be key whereas, previously, price was king with regard to procurement. The evidence during the pandemic was that there is sufficient capacity, skill and ingenuity in local manufacturing to meet some of the critical supply that is necessary for us on the island. Certainly, with regard to food, pharma and manufacturing, that critical supply exists here. One of the lessons that we have to learn across the island and between these islands is, as a consequence of this, that cheaper prices and goods on the other side of the world may be fine for saving some money, but they do not bring security of supply or assist local economic growth in the way that procurement should be tailored to do. There are a lot of lessons to be learned, and I look forward to the newly constituted Procurement Board getting stuck into the issue fairly quickly.

Mr Allister: The Minister will be aware of the recently exposed scandal of the obscene amounts of money paid to middlemen in obtaining PPE. Will he assure the House that the PPE that was acquired for and within Northern Ireland was free from any of those payments of obscene amounts of money?

Mr Murphy: Yes. Officials dealt with the contracts in China. I spoke to one of them, and he was amused at the amount of money that someone had received when the official was doing it as part of his public service to us. He did a remarkable job. The focus on the first attempt to obtain PPE here pales into insignificance compared with the obscene amounts of money that the British Government were prepared to pay to middlemen to achieve this. I would not say that it was panic, but there was certainly great urgency in securing PPE, and we were not alone in trying to source material in the Far East. That undoubtedly added to costs, but it also added to the complications in accessing those goods. It goes back to the original question from my colleague Mr O'Dowd about security of supply, knowing your suppliers and easy access to them being as important as cheaper prices in the Far East.

Mr Nesbitt: Does the Minister agree with the interpretation of the House of Lords that the protocol suggests that, when it comes to security of supply for those who supply key sectors such as health, we will be subject to EU regulations rather than the will of the Executive?

Mr Murphy: That remains to be seen. There is much uncertainty on the Brexit issue. Legislation is going through the Houses of Parliament. The Lords has taken a particular view, and, from reading commentary, I know that the Commons intends to take a different view when the Bill comes back for further processing through the legislative framework.

3.00 pm

All of it is unsatisfactory as far as we are concerned and, I am sure, as far as the Member is concerned. We should not be in this position a couple of weeks away from the exit date. The mess is not of our creating. It is certainly not the creation of the democratic wishes of the people in this part of the world. It is not of our creation in terms of the negotiations and the processes developed between the British Government and the EU. The sooner it is resolved with a greater degree of clarity, the better for all of us.

Miss Woods: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Security of supply will also be impacted by climate breakdown. Minister, will environmental and climate impact be reflected in procurement processes and policies going forward to ensure that the policy is sustainable? For example, will a sustainability clause or criteria be considered for security of supply?

Mr Murphy: Clearly, one of the first issues is that, if you are not transporting goods from the far side of the world, there is certainly an environmental benefit. Having goods produced on this island in these islands certainly cuts down on transportation costs. I am happy to look at all the issues that the Member has raised and ensure that the Procurement Board, when examining these issues, considers all those matters going forward.

Mr O'Toole: Will the Minister be more specific about issues on security of supply caused by Brexit? Have any orders been taken forward to forestall the uncertainty around 31 December? Will the Minister also briefly give an update on whether he has made any specific allocations or has been asked to make any for the procurement of the vaccine that, we all hope, is closer than we once feared?

Mr Murphy: With regard to the first question, there is huge uncertainty about what our future trading relations will be like. That could challenge significantly the security of supply. We need to bottom out all those issues. As yet, the Executive are still fairly in the dark about how this will eventually fall down. The British Government have not been keen to share information with anybody outside their own narrow confines.

I am advised by the Minister of Health that the vaccine will be procured centrally in the British government system and supplied to us. The logistics of rolling out a vaccination programme will be a matter that the Executive will meet the cost for.

Renewable Heat Incentive: Disciplinary Proceedings

4. Dr Aiken asked the Minister of Finance, in light of renewable heat incentive (RHI) disciplinary proceedings, whether any processes have been put in place to prevent those disciplined from being given official or semi-official roles during retirement. (AQO 1189/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The RHI disciplinary proceedings are ongoing, and I await their determinations.

Dr Aiken: I thank the Minister for that rather short reply. Will the Minister consider introducing legislative changes to ensure that civil servants or those employed by public bodies who have been subject to a disciplinary process but have, subsequently, retired and are, therefore, under the current legislation, exempt from sanction can be prevented from being re-employed as consultants on boards or in any other official capacity?

Mr Murphy: The Member knows that the RHI process is ongoing and affects a certain number of individuals. We do not wish to speculate about what they may do now or in the future until that process has run its course. In general terms, he made a point that is worth looking at: the functions that someone who is subject to a disciplinary process can or cannot avail themselves of, as the case may be, beyond their term in public service, depending on the outcome of any such investigation. That is something that, as part of the review and reform of the Civil Service, we will want to address.

Mr McAleer: Minister, when will the Executive subcommittee on the RHI recommendations conclude its work?

Mr Murphy: The RHI subcommittee met last week and processed further some of the issues that we have been dealing with in the ongoing work on codes. It is our intention to bring that to the Executive in December for approval and clearance before Christmas recess.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 5, which stands in my name, has been withdrawn — Mr Blair, were you rising in your place about question 4?

Mr Blair: Thank you very much indeed, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Will the Minister provide an update on the panel that was due to be set up following RHI to investigate ministerial conduct?

Mr Murphy: The formation of that panel is the responsibility of the Executive Office. I hope that that is taken forward as a matter of urgency. It is an incomplete part of the process that we have been dealing with in the Department of Finance and the RHI Executive subcommittee. I will bring that to the attention of the Executive because, clearly, if we are bringing that proposition to the Executive for completion in December, we want to see that panel in place as well.

Mr Lunn: I go back to the question of discipline. The last case that I can remember of a civil servant being disciplined was quite a serious one, and the punishment was a letter being placed in his file for 18 months. He was not hanged. Does the question of official or semi-official appointments after retirement not depend, to some extent, on the severity of the offence and the punishment?

Mr Murphy: Yes. Clearly, if there were a misdemeanour of some sort, it would depend on the level of judgement attached to that. The question that Dr Aiken posed outlined that that should be looked at. I am not sure that there is clear policy on that or an analysis of what level of misdemeanour would merit disbarment from particular future appointments or roles in public life. It pertains in other jurisdictions in these islands, so we should certainly look at it. Setting aside the RHI experience, I think that there should, in general terms, be a policy for the Civil Service and ongoing public appointments.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 5, which stands in my name, has been withdrawn.

Finance: Centrally Held Funding and Barnett Consequentials

6. Mr Dickson asked the Minister of Finance what actions he is taking to ensure that £500 million of centrally held funding and any further Barnett consequentials are spent effectively in this financial year. (AQO 1191/17-22)

Mr Murphy: Yesterday, 23 November, the Executive agreed allocations of £338.1 million of the £500 million that was held centrally. There is also £150 million that has been set aside for the consideration of longer-term rates support. A further £26.6 million is being held in reserve in case there are further requirements later in the financial year.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for your answer. You are responsible for assessing bids from other Departments and then issuing that funding. It is therefore incumbent on you to ensure that that money is spent, spent well and spent before the end of the financial year. In light of the lateness and lack of ambition of other Ministers, what action is your Department taking to ensure that money that is bid for from you and approved by you is spent appropriately?

Mr Murphy: There is and has been a clear understanding among Ministers and Departments that, when they are asked to submit bids — that is how the process works — this is COVID-related money, so it is to be spent in this financial year and directed towards the three broad pillars of the Executive response to COVID: supporting vulnerable people, supporting the health service and supporting business. Bids must meet one of those criteria. We require Departments to demonstrate the area in which they want to spend the money and that they fully understand the requirement to have it spent out by the end of the financial year. We will continue to monitor that. Of course, the Member will know that the January monitoring of the general departmental spend will be coming through as well, and we may well receive further Barnett consequentials early in the new year. It has been a challenge to manage all of that additional money and deal with the stripped-down resource available to the Civil Service because of the pandemic. Nonetheless, it is incumbent on us to make sure that it is spent wisely in the right areas and spent out before the end of the financial year.

Ms Dolan: Minister, have the British Government responded to your request and the request of the Scottish and Welsh Finance Ministers for greater flexibility to ensure that the funding is spent fully and effectively this financial year?

Mr Murphy: There have been discussions with Treasury right up to recent days, and I intend to speak to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury tomorrow. As the Member may know, we expect an announcement on the comprehensive spending review tomorrow that might give an indication of the finances that will be available for next year's Budget. We have pressed consistently for flexibility. In particular, if we are to receive further Barnett consequentials early in the new year, that will add to our case that this kind of drip feed of money, with no long-term planning attached to it, is difficult for any devolved Administration to manage. It reinforces the general point that we have been making about the need for flexibility in the management of public finances.

Mr O'Toole: I will be brief. Following the results of the spending review, which we expect tomorrow, will the Minister give the Assembly an update on exactly where we are with unallocated new Barnett consequentials, so that we are better able to scrutinise where the finances are at this critical time?

Mr Murphy: We hope to receive that tomorrow. That is the date that we have been given, and I have a call scheduled with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury tomorrow. I anticipate knowing that, and I am happy to come back to the House when we get a handle on it. There have been a series of Budget discussions with other Ministers. A couple are still outstanding because other business has overtaken them, and we need to have those discussions and understand what the budgetary requirements of the Departments are for next year. However, it will depend on the amount available to us. I am happy to update the Assembly and the Member's Committee when we get some answers on all that.

Procurement Policy

7. Mr Chambers asked the Minister of Finance whether he will consider the reform of public procurement policy to allow local and individual public-sector teams to choose the best options for them when it comes to cost-effectiveness and suitability. (AQO 1192/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The Executive's public procurement policy requires public bodies to process procurements under a service-level agreement with Central Procurement Directorate (CPD) or a relevant centre of procurement expertise (COPE) to provide a coordinated and strategic approach to securing best value for money. Recognising that it can be more cost-effective for public bodies to carry out their own procurement of low-value goods and services, the service-level agreement allows for public bodies to do this, if they use established procedures that maintain accountability and transparency in expenditure decisions.

Mr Chambers: I thank the Minister for his answer. A school in my constituency had to pay hundreds of pounds and wait weeks for a simple window repair to be carried out because it had to go through the central provider for all schools in Northern Ireland. The principal could have hired a local independent contractor to do it 75% cheaper and had it repaired the next day. This seems to be a problem for many public-sector organisations, not just schools. Will the Minister consider changes for small-scale expenditure in such areas?

Mr Murphy: As I said in my answer, there is a level at which there can be a degree of discretion. Of course, there has to be accountability for all these arrangements. We need to make sure that work provided by contractors is up to the standard required for a school or any other public building, because it has to serve that building for some time. Of course, standards have to be applied and there must be a level of accountability and transparency in how the money is spent so that it is not going to some favoured contractor or supplier. I am not making any reference to the school that you mentioned, but, in general terms, that should not happen. There has to be a balance in making sure that this is good value for money, that it can be got locally if it is below a certain level and that the person or company that supplies it adheres to a certain standard that is recognised by the procurement people.

Mr Humphrey: I agree with the Member for North Down. As a school governor, I have had to face similar situations.

In the light of the protections that the Minister talked about in value for money for the Northern Ireland taxpayer, does he believe that the Central Procurement Directorate provides value for money for Northern Ireland plc?

Mr Murphy: When we were discussing the question, as an elected representative, I anticipated where the question was coming from. The people in procurement, perhaps, were anticipating wider issues. I am sure that all of you are frequently told, "This could have been got much cheaper, if only you had gone to a local supplier". I get all those arguments as a locally elected representative, and I want to ensure that government spend assists local economic growth. Of course procurement, like all other agencies, has to present value for money. We have initiated a series of changes to the Procurement Board. We are bringing in more expertise from outside agencies. The procurement policies that are followed are, obviously, agreed by the Executive, so there is Executive-wide ownership of them. The responsibility of that board will be to bring policies to the Executive for approval. That is where a lot of these issues can be interrogated, but, of course, as with everything in public expenditure, we want to ensure that it represents value for money.

Mr Dickson: The Minister will appreciate that some of the very best local procurement is done through social enterprises. What action is your Department taking? You have already promised some social value legislation for Northern Ireland. How quickly can we see that on the statute book, and will it happen within the life of this Assembly?

Mr Murphy: In the next meeting that I have with the newly constituted Procurement Board, social value will be one of the main items on the agenda. Like you, I am very much of the view that social enterprises and projects not only provide excellent value for money but have the added value in what they do for people in the community who might otherwise not be employed. They make an added contribution to society, as well as the economy.

I am a keen advocate of social value. It has to measure up to being value for money, but, in my experience, and, I am sure, yours, social value can do that in many ways. We want to see social value be very much part of the procurement make-up, and we have been actively looking at the idea of having legislation. There is a limited time left in the mandate for initiating legislation and taking it through all its legislative stages, but, if there is time, I am willing to look at that.

3.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We have time for a question from Mr George Robinson and an answer from the Minister, but there is no time for other Members to ask a supplementary question.

COVID-19: Furloughed Workers

Mr Robinson: Can the Minister give assurances that reducing the number of furloughed workers as soon as possible will give an economic boost to the Northern Ireland economy? (AQT 730/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The question goes back to the discussion about how we spend our money. I am firmly of the view that we should spend our money as locally as we can in order to support local businesses, workers and the economy. That is why, when I spoke publicly yesterday about the high street voucher scheme that the Member's colleague is proposing, I encouraged families, as we all should, to spend that voucher in local businesses to support our local economy. Anything that we can do on public procurement or that Departments can do with their annual £3 billion of spend has the potential to make a real impact on the local economy and should be used in that way.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you. That ends the period for listed questions. We move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Localised Restrictions Support Scheme

T1. Mr Robinson asked the Minister of Finance how many allocations have been made under the localised restrictions support scheme and how much money has been paid out. (AQT 731/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The Department for the Economy will have to answer about its own scheme. The Department of Finance scheme is administered through Land and Property Services (LPS) and deals with businesses that have premises closed down owing to the restrictions. There have been 12,000 applications, and almost £20 million has been paid out to over 5,000 businesses. About 2,500 applications have been rejected. Some of the applicants applied to the wrong scheme. Business owners will have heard that money is available for a certain business sector and have thought that is where they go, but they do not have business premises and so need to apply to the Department for the Economy scheme. There is quite a lot of crossover with the schemes, with some businesses applying to the wrong scheme or perhaps to both to make sure that they get on to one of them. That is how the scheme has been rolled out. The Department wants to see the scheme gather pace as quickly as possible. As I say, however, upwards of £20 million has been paid out to date.

Mr Robinson: Minister, what proportion is still to be allocated?

Mr Murphy: There have been 12,000 applications, and, judging by the figures, more than half of applicants have either been paid or been rejected. The figures are increasing daily, as some of the data issues that affected the scheme early on have been ironed out. Bear in mind that, from the end of this week, a new element is being introduced to the scheme, and that is the non-essential retail scheme. That will put additional pressure on LPS, and I want to see as much paid out as possible before that additional element of the scheme comes in next week.

Civil Partnerships

T2. Ms Sheerin asked the Minister of Finance whether he can confirm when people who currently have a civil partnership will be able to convert it to a marriage. (AQT 732/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The Marriage and Civil Partnership (Northern Ireland) (No. 2) Regulations 2020, which introduce the ability to convert same-sex civil partnerships into marriages and opposite-sex marriages into civil partnerships, come into operation on 7 December 2020. There will be no fee for signing the conversion declaration in the first year.

Ms Sheerin: Thank you, Minister, for confirming that the fee will be waived for the first year. Given that many people who have a civil partnership would have preferred a marriage if the choice had been available at the time, can the waiver be extended?

Mr Murphy: It will apply for the first year anyway. This has been a key issue for people who have not been able to have their partnership legally recognised, and it is a great advance that it is now the case that they can. As I say, there is no fee for signing the conversion declaration in the first year.

Councils may apply additional fees for the attendance of a registrar at an approved venue, and the General Register Office will bring forward legislation to set the fee for years 2 and 3. We will be able to look at that at the time and see what the take-up is like. If the payment of the fee becomes a barrier, I will make an assessment then as that comes forward.

High Street Voucher Scheme

T3. Ms S Bradley asked the Minister of Finance, who yesterday advised the House of the £95 million high street voucher scheme, what checks he made ahead of the announcement to make sure that the money reaches the high street and is not swallowed up by national or multinational organisations that helped people through the pandemic but have also fared well in the pandemic. (AQT 733/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The checks and balances that are done on any scheme as it is brought forward are done by officials in the Department. The question that you pose is whether the Department for the Economy can ensure that that money is spent in certain business premises and not in others. Obviously, that is a question for the Department for the Economy. I am not certain that that can be done with such a scheme, and that is why yesterday I encouraged people to shop locally, not just for this scheme but over the whole Christmas period and into the future because it is our local economy that needs support. I encourage and expect all Ministers to do likewise. The question of how the scheme would differentiate in that way is not to do with due diligence; it is a policy matter. Deciding that the scheme will pay into certain businesses but will be barred from paying into certain other businesses would be a matter of policy for the Department for the Economy, not a matter of due diligence.

Ms S Bradley: I am sure that the Minister will understand that many local small businesses, for instance in towns such as Kilkeel, Warrenpoint and Rathfriland in my constituency, that have been described as non-essential are vital to our economy. They will not be heartened to find that no due diligence has happened ahead of that announcement. I urge the Minister to put in place strategies that will reach those vital businesses to keep their doors open going into 2021.

Mr Murphy: It is incorrect, given that I have answered the question by saying that it is not a matter of due diligence but a matter of policy for the Department for the Economy on how to target that, for you to respond by saying that no due diligence has been done. Due diligence has been done on the scheme, as I have said. However, it is a matter of policy if the Department for the Economy wants to use that scheme to direct it away from what you describe as multinational businesses and into the local economy. Of course we want to support the local economy. That is why the schemes that will be brought forward are to support local businesses, and it is why the Executive are encouraging people to shop locally and to support local businesses. It is why the schemes that we talked about earlier as being rolled out have been directed at small- and medium-sized enterprises to try to give them that level of support. That has been consistent right through the pandemic.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Ms Joanne Bunting is not in her place.

Business Support: Derry City and Strabane

T5. Ms Mullan asked the Minister of Finance how many businesses in Derry applied for the business support grant specific to the Derry City and Strabane District Council area. (AQT 735/17-22)

Mr Murphy: The Member will know that businesses in Derry have been closed down for much longer than anywhere else and, obviously, have suffered accordingly. The latest figures that I got yesterday showed that over 70% of businesses had received the support that they had applied for. Of course, that scheme will be rolled on now. It was changed midstream to add additional businesses to hospitality, and it has now been rolled on for further weeks. I want to see that money being paid out as quickly as possible to get it to the people who need it in Derry and Strabane over the coming weeks.

Ms Mullan: Minister, thank you for your response and for the support that you have given to local businesses in my area. How many have received the initial payment and subsequent payments as the weeks have rolled on?

Mr Murphy: As I said, the initial payment was for a smaller number of businesses, and we increased the payment level. Of course, the payment level to businesses in Derry had to be upped as well because, if you remember, the original lockdown restriction phase of this was for the Derry City and Strabane District Council area only and the level of payment was increased. Of course, there had to be retrospective payment to some of those who had already received it at the lower level. So, it has been quite complex and complicated, but, of course, the objective has been to get that payment up to the right level and out as quickly as we can, recognising that we now have another couple of weeks to go with that. Bear in mind that all these things have changed, midstream, the programme that we designed. Other decisions came forward that altered it in terms of the amount of money available to us and the additional restrictions and, now, the additional period of restrictions. Those all came in subsequently. It is a matter of trying to catch up with the decisions taken by other Executive Departments.

Business Support

T6. Mr Givan asked the Minister of Finance whether it is not an indictment of his Department that around half of eligible applicants are still waiting to get a payment from Land and Property Services (LPS), for which the Minister is responsible, weeks after the scheme was announced in a fanfare, which will come as a shock to the public, and that, on a crude assessment, approximately at least £20 million is sitting in his coffers still to be paid out and the businesses that need that support still have not got it. (AQT 736/17-22)

Mr Murphy: First, as I have said, the schemes have changed, not only in their scope but in their level of payment, and we have been catching up. I want to see them done quicker. I want to see the rest of those schemes paid out tomorrow, if possible, or certainly in the next number of days, so that all of that money is out where it needs to be. I have to say that if you compare Finance with other Departments and put up a chart, you will find that this scheme has paid out much more quickly and much more favourably than schemes from any of the other Departments.

Mr Givan: Minister, that is exactly the point. You and your colleagues have been incredibly quick to point the finger at other Departments, and yet the Department that you preside over has been failing to get this scheme to pay out. The public want to see the money paid out, and those businesses need it.

In terms of how the rates base is going to be calculated going forward, we have increased vacancies on our high street and pressures on our public finances. Is a review taking place of how there will be a fair share of the burden on the public purse, spread across everyone in society, for the next financial year?

Mr Murphy: Well, first I have not been pointing the finger at anyone. I have been encouraging people to do schemes as quickly as they can, and encouraging my Department to do likewise. I am not interested in the point-scoring that the Member refers to. To be quite honest, I am interested in getting support out onto the ground as quickly as we can.

The Member will have noticed the announcement yesterday that the Executive agreed to set aside £150 million for further rates interventions in the first half of the next financial year. We have been consistently hearing from business that those are vital. If we can get that scheme done and the rates intervention scheme done, it will be of great assistance. Of course it has to be done with fairness, absolutely, and I am delighted that one of the side effects of this pandemic has been the DUP discovering socialism and fairness for all people.

Civil Service: Recruitment

T7. Ms Dillon asked the Minister of Finance how many vacancies in the Civil Service have been filled by the most recent recruitment drive. (AQT 737/17-22)

Mr Murphy: I do have not the figures for the recruitment drive that has been ongoing at all levels in the Civil Service. Clearly there is a significant number of vacancies at the lower levels, and that is why we have been encouraging people who are currently employed by agencies to apply for those. We have improved the terms and conditions of agency workers who have been working for quite some time, particularly in Departments such as Communities. There is an ongoing drive on that.

One of the areas that our review and reform of the Civil Service will look at is the age profile. It is quite clear that we need a much younger cohort coming into the Civil Service and an influx of new ideas and talent, but that has to be achieved in a managed way, and that will be done through recruitment during the time ahead.

Ms Dillon: Speaking as somebody who once worked in the lower levels of the Civil Service and who knows what the pay was like at that level, I commend many of our civil servants who are working at that level, trying to deliver all the schemes that Members have been talking about in the Chamber today. It is not an easy job to do.

Will the Minister outline, given the recent Audit Office report on the capacity and capability of the Civil Service, whether he agrees that we now have an urgent need for a review? He outlined that we need to look at the age profile, but we also need to look at what we are asking of some of our civil servants for the pay that they get.

Mr Murphy: There is a range of matters in that. One is the age profile and the ability to recruit a younger cohort. There are also questions about the level at which people come into the Civil Service and the skills and experiences that they bring. There are questions about the ability to recruit people from other jurisdictions into the Civil Service and the experiences that they can bring from working in other jurisdictions as well. Those are key questions, which, I think, have not been addressed in previous reviews of the Civil Service and its practices. RHI highlighted a number of those, but it is not because of just that. There was an impetus, as there should be, which led to an agreement among all Executive parties on a need for a fundamental review of the Civil Service, and that is what we intend to do.

3.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We have time for one question from Mr McCrossan and one answer from the Minister.

Rates: Reval2020

T8. Mr McCrossan asked the Minister of Finance, given the pressures that businesses face, whether it is his expectation that Reval2020 will go on. (AQT 738/17-22)

Mr Murphy: Yes, there are a number of exercises to do with rates. One that we wanted to try to address very quickly was the ability to continue with rates relief — a rates holiday — for some businesses going into the new financial year. We have the Reval and rates exercises, and we are responding to the pandemic in the middle of all that. A lot of people will not have recognised that, in last year's Budget, we introduced a very effective reduction in commercial rates. They went down by almost 18%, which is something that businesses had been asking for. We will continue to do that work, but we are also trying to respond to the pandemic. That is why the focus has been on trying to secure additional money to take a further rates intervention in the early part of the next financial year.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Members. That concludes questions to —.

Mr Wells: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Either the Minister of Finance has the gift of prophecy and a crystal ball or there is collusion going on, because, during the questions on marriage and payments in Londonderry, I noticed that he had turned to the answer before the questioner had finished the question, and he had turned to the answer for the supplementary questions before they had been asked. I understand that topical questions are supposed to test the Minister's mettle and to find out whether he is on top of his brief. Could it be that Members from his party have been giving him the text of the questions in advance of their being asked? Is that in order for topical questions?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has been here since 1998 — a lot longer than I have been here. I am sure that the Member will accept that such behind-the-scenes chicanery would never occur in an institution such as this.

Mr Murphy: Further to that point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I did, in fact, turn to see if I could find the figures for Derry, but I did not have them in my folder. That disproves entirely the Member's point that the question was set up. I had not got the figures.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: If Members take their ease for a moment, we will return to the Consideration Stage of the Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill. Before you leave the Chamber, please wipe down the surface that you were at. Thank you.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair)

Mrs D Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I apologise to you and Mr Principal Deputy Speaker for not being in my place during topical questions.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Thank you for that. It is duly noted.

Private Members' Business

Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill: Consideration Stage

Clause 1 (Amendment of the Civil Service (Special Advisers) Act (Northern Ireland) 2013)

Debate resumed on amendment No 1, which amendment was: In page 1, line 7, after "(2)" insert "(b)".— [Mr Allister.]

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In page 1, line 12, leave out "involvement or".— [Mr Allister.]

No 3: In page 1, line 13, before "A minister" insert "Subject to section 3A".— [Mr Allister.]

No 4: In page 1, line 14, at end insert

"(3A) In section 8 (Code for appointments), after subsection (1) insert the words:

'(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), the code must provide that the appointing minister must -

(a) create a job description and person specification for the post,

(b) set out the requirements to be met by a successful applicant,

(c) achieve a candidate pool from which the minister shall select on sustainable and lawful grounds, and

(d) complete and the department retain documentation associated with the above processes, including recording the minister's reasons for the selection made."— [Mr Allister.]

No 5: In page 2, line 9, after "adviser" insert "by reason of the holding of that post".— [Mr Allister.]

No 6: In page 2, line 12, leave out "him" and insert "the special adviser".— [Mr Allister.]

No 7: New Clause

Before clause 2 insert

"Repeal of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order in Council 2007"

A2.The Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007 is repealed."— [Mr Allister.]

No 8: In clause 4, page 2, line 28, after "Office" insert "under the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007".— [Mr Allister.]

No 9: In clause 4, page 2, line 33, leave out subsection (3).— [Mr Allister.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): The group 1 amendments deal with the appointment, conduct and management of special advisers. Members should direct their comments to these specific amendments. Mr Aiken was speaking before the debate was interrupted for the lunchtime suspension. Therefore, I ask Mr Aiken to resume his speech.

Dr Aiken: I will conclude my remarks on the group 1 amendments. The Ulster Unionist Party will support the amendments tabled by Mr Allister. I strongly encourage all Members to join us in trying to help to restore trust in our institutions. It is regrettable that the Executive or, indeed, elements of the Executive who should be using their best endeavours to restore that trust are thwarting the efforts at reform. As that is the case, we, as legislators, must do what is right and make the necessary legislative changes that can help to restore that trust.

Mr Frew: This is the second week in a row when I am going to be —

A Member: Brief. [Laughter.]

Mr Frew: No, there is absolutely no chance of that, but that was a great intervention. Thank you.

I will add to the comments from Mr Jim Wells, who, in an intervention on the Chair of the Committee, spoke about the fact that Jim Allister sits on the Finance Committee. While that was by accident, it was very useful. The Member was able to contribute in real time, hear the evidence in real time and engage not only with the witnesses but with the Committee in real time. That was advantageous not only to the sponsor of the Bill but to the Committee as a whole. I tabled an amendment that did not get past the Speaker's Table, which I accept 100%; of course I do. However, Standing Orders should be looked at because there is merit in an ex-officio member being on a Committee during Committee Stage of any private Member's Bill in order to afford the Committee that insight and link to the Bill sponsor. That will provide good government and good legislation, which is what we all want.

I sat through Committee Stage of the Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill and have read it through in great detail. There is no doubt that every party and every Department in this place has a responsibility to pursue reforms that rebuild public confidence in the governance of Northern Ireland: the Executive and their decisions; the policies that they wish to adopt; the behaviour of Ministers; the behaviour of spads; the roles that spads play and the parameters within which they operate; the interactions between Departments, Ministers and spads; the interactions between Departments and Statutory Committees; the transparency of Departments; the information that is offered to Committees; respect for MLAs as individuals, when we ask questions of Departments; and respect for MLAs as they perform their important role on the Statutory Committees and even in the Chamber. We all need to ensure that we are treated with respect and that democracy is as transparent as it possibly can be.

Is it transparent at the minute? It is as transparent as a brick, so we need to do something to reform it. If we have to do it step by step, small as those steps may be, we should all put our shoulders to the wheel to achieve that. I see the Bill as a small step in the right direction. It has increased its footage by the fact that it has gone through a Committee Stage and has been forged in fire, if you like. I commend most of the parties for doing the heavy lifting in that regard because it was very useful. As the Bill's sponsor has admitted, the amendments to the Bill, which, hopefully, will be passed, will make it a better Bill.

I have enjoyed my time on the Committee for Finance looking at the Bill and getting into the nitty-gritty of it. I heard in the media and in commentary by some journalists that, because I sit on the Committee for Finance on my own with regard to the party Whip, I am not involved in some sort of reform agenda or mission: my party is up for reform. My party wants to see reform. My party acknowledges that mistakes have been made in the past, and it is up for dialogue and a conversation on reform to ensure that this place gets better and that we add and inject confidence into the system. In our party manifestos, going back a number of years, we have asked for the development of a Northern Ireland reform plan. The party and I recognise that this private Members' Bill may touch on some aspects of reform, but it will not be able to cover it all, even though, with the best intentions, the Bill's sponsor has added "Miscellaneous Provisions" to its title, which was very useful. Sooner or later, Ministers will have to work on reform, and we would like to see that reform piece.

At Second Stage, I think, Mr O'Dowd commented that a private Members' Bill should not tackle the issue, but I say this: why not? Why should every Member in this place not put their hands to the wheel to make this place better? They are entitled to do that. They are Members of the Assembly and have a seat like everybody else, so why not? Why should it be left to the Executive or to Ministers in the Executive? We are all Assemblymen and Assemblywomen and are all entitled to table legislation.

We have also asked for fundamental reform of the Northern Ireland Civil Service. We have even asked for a review of the number of special advisers and how they are appointed and regulated. We have asked for greater transparency and improved record-keeping. We also acknowledge that the Committees play an incredible role in the work of the Assembly, and that role should be enhanced. Those are all objectives that my party has pushed for over many years, and they are the objectives that are in the Bill. Of course we were going to support the Bill at Second Stage when other Executive parties abstained, and of course we were going to give the Bill a fair wind in a Committee process that would bring it out the other side, forged in fire, in a much better place and in much better shape. We have done that.

If every party in this place is not here for reform, what are they here for? If they are not here to make a positive change to the population, make people's life better and reform the country into something greater, what are they here for? The Bill is just one vehicle through which we can do that. It is just one small step. It is not even a big step — I am sure that the Bill's sponsor would agree with that — but it is a step in the right direction.

I enjoy Committee work. It is probably my favourite bit, and I like the scrutiny most, when I interrogate facts and figures. It is quite enjoyable and good when the departmental officials come to see us, and that is all part of the functioning of government that must be healthy and must exist. However, I am living through two Committees at present: the Justice Committee and the Finance Committee.

It is no reflection on the Chairperson of the Finance Committee, who has done a sterling job — I will thank him now in case I forget to do so later — that there is a marked difference between the two. Do not get me wrong: when it came to the principles of the domestic violence Bill, which we debated last week, most of the parties definitely wanted legislation to be passed; however, with the functioning of Government Bill, that was not the case.

3.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): On that point, may I draw the Member back to discussing the amendments, please?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will, Mr Deputy Speaker.

On that Bill, even with the amendments, there was hardly any dialogue. On amendment Nos 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, there was hardly any real dialogue or input from the Members opposite. I ask this simple question: why? If you do not like the spirit of the Bill, why did you abstain at Second Stage? If you do not like the spirit of the Bill, why did you not seek to amend it? Why did you not interact with the Committee and effect change at that stage, given that, today, we will vote on every single amendment and clause? Why did you keep shtum? One Committee member did not keep shtum, and I will get to that later.

Amendment Nos 1 and 2 affect clause 1. Again, the sponsor of the Bill has gone through this very adequately and helped my understanding, so I will not have to delve too much into that. The first six amendments are to clause 1. Why are clause 1 and those amendments so important? There is no reason why, if you have a spad — a special adviser — in one Department, and his experience and expertise are in that particular Department, a spad in another Department should have any say or control over them. That spad should be the responsibility of his or her Minister. That is one of the aspects of clause 1. You can understand why that would be the case when teamwork is involved: when you are in the Executive Office, and there are multiple spads. It is just good common sense to have some sort of direction and, maybe, even some sort of hierarchy. However, it may well be that, even within that Department, spads will have different expertise, and they will go off in different directions and do different things. That is not an issue.

It is right and proper that, with any job, there will be a disciplinary code. There will be a set of standards. Of course, clause 1 does just that. It states:

"special advisers are subject to the processes and procedures of the disciplinary code operative in the Northern Ireland Civil Service".

Special advisers do not only interact with their Minister, their political party and members of other political parties; they interact daily with the Civil Service. Why would it not be the case that you have some sort of standards and disciplinary code? I have no problems with that at all; in fact, I think that it is good.

Then, of course, we have the ministerial part of this. There is absolutely no reason why Ministers of the Assembly, who are in an Executive, should not be subject to standards. It is perverse to investigate a Member attending a fake graveside oration when standing beside that Member is a Minister who is not subject to a standards investigation. It is just bizarre. Ministers should be subject to the same disciplinary matters as a Member. Why should I fall under more serious rigour than a Minister of this country, no less? Why should the standards be different? Why should the investigatory procedure be different? Of course, we also very much support that.

Then we get to the issue around clause 1(6). I will speak to that. It says:

“A minister must ensure that only the duly appointed special adviser in the department will exercise the functions, enjoy the access and receive the privileges of the post; and a permanent secretary must ensure that no person other than a duly appointed special adviser is afforded by the department the cooperation, recognition and facilitation due to a special adviser.”

It is no way to go — no way to go — to have a figure, shadowy or otherwise, being able to conduct themselves in a sphere where there are serious decisions being taken on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland and not being accountable to democracy or accountable to a Minister but accountable to a higher place, even a secret place or a sinister place. No way should we in this House support anything that even smells like that.

What have we lived through? What have we learned over the last number of years? Well, it has been quite insightful. We heard about our Civil Service — in fact, the head of the Civil Service, no less — sending emails to other permanent secretaries saying that they think their Minister is not in a position to make decisions and that they have to go and speak and dialogue with others who are not democratically accountable, others who are not elected, others who have not been appointed and others who have no disciplinary code or standard to follow.

That is what the Civil Service has informed us of, and that is simply not good enough. It is simply not to be in this place of democracy. We should be a place of transparency. We should be a place of accountability. We should strip away anything that queries or questions that or that puts suspicions or doubts in the minds of our people. We should be completely transparent and completely accountable. Here is the sinister thing about it. The Bill's sponsor has already mentioned his previous Bill. When the Bill sponsor brought a previous Bill that changed the functions of government and how it works and operates, we then had a party that actively went about trying to get by that law, trying to subvert the will of this House and trying to ignore —

Mr McGuigan: I thank the Member for giving way. I have been listening very carefully to his style, content and tone in the debate, and I was drawn to this quote from a famous man that, hopefully, he will enjoy:

“Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.”

I find the comments of the Member from North Antrim bizarre given, first of all, the behaviour of the MP from his party in that constituency in relation to transparency and accountability, and also given the fact that the RHI inquiry has come about because of the misdemeanours, behaviour and wrongdoing of DUP Ministers and spads.

Mr Frew: Even if I achieve nothing else today in the House, I have been able to get my colleague from North Antrim to quote scripture. Amen. [Laughter.] Is that not great? Amen. Hallelujah. [Interruption.] Do you know something? Yes, we should all look at our own houses. Do you know something else? We have done so. We come to this Bill in the spirit of change and in the spirit of wanting reform. Do you know why? It is the right thing to do. I wish that the party opposite would take even a small bit of that reform seed. Would it not be great and mighty for the people of Northern Ireland to see that and not have one party hold this place back?

Here we have a Minister — a Finance Minister, no less — who had to seek approval from senior republican figures ahead of making key decisions. By the way, one of those key decisions was to bring a Budget to this very House. That did not happen, and it left Northern Ireland and the public in dire straits. What good is a Finance Minister if he cannot produce and bring a Budget to this House? It is probably the only duty that a Finance Minister has, but he cannot even do that.

It is not a good place to be in to have secret spads, super-spads, unaccountable spads, and people who are not even called spads running spads. That is no place to be in. Moreover, they were liaising with our senior civil servants, including our permanent secretaries. Here we have a situation in which a permanent secretary ignores or goes over the head of the appointed spad to talk to a super-spada, a secret spad, a do-not-call-me-a spad, and that is the way in which that party has been running government here. That is the way in which civil servants have been conducting themselves. This clause does away with that, and is it not good to see it on this blue page? Is it not good that we will hopefully secure this clause in legislation?

No more Connolly House interference. No more. We are the democratically accountable place in this country, not the army council, not Connolly House and not secretive and sinister figures in the republican movement. No more. This is the reform that we want to see. It is what the people deserve, because they want to see accountable and transparent Ministers being accountable and responsible for transparent and accountable spads, who then will liaise with senior civil servants, including grade 5s, permanent secretaries and everything else that goes with it. That then sprinkles down into a far better and bigger system, a brighter system, a better and more transparent place and something that we can all become proud of. That is what we want to see in Northern Ireland, and that is what this clause — clause 1(6) — does. It helps remove the barrier to that. Let us hope that, when the Bill is passed, if it is passed, all Executive parties adhere to it and adopt it in the spirit in which it is being passed.

Although we will not be opposing clause 1, I still have an issue with putting a cap on the pay structure. That is not because I disagree with capping the figure but because of the inflexibility that may arise from the figure being in statute. It is not to do with the figures, because what the Bill's sponsor is proposing is not far off the pay structure that we have at present. There is only £4,000 of a difference in the highest band ceiling from what the Bill's sponsor is proposing.

We need more dialogue on that, and we need to do a bit more work on that at Further Consideration Stage.

4.00 pm

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Wells: I have no doubt that the honourable Member for North Antrim has been lobbied heavily by spads on this issue. I can think of 91,402 good reasons why spads do not want the present situation to change, but, given the track record of spads in this Building over the past five or six years, how can he justify any system that allows people who are not out of their thirties, who have never secured a single vote in an election in their lifetime, some of whom have minimal experience of the systems of government, earning £91,000 a year? Surely there has to be some limit on that.

I remember being ruthlessly whipped as an obscure Back-Bencher, which, of course, I have remained, and being told that the only way to incentivise spads was to increase their pay from £77,000 to £91,200. I would feel quite incentivised by £77,000, but the spads were putting pressure on their Ministers to increase it to £91,000. Surely, if the Member does not back Mr Allister's proposals today, we will get back to the situation where spads are earning obscene salaries — much higher than the Ministers whom they serve, and we could once again have a situation where a junior Minister on £6,500 a year being looked after by a spad on £85,000 a year. Can he not see the total obscenity of that situation?

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his intervention. We have to remember that when he talks about the accountability of Ministers, spads are not in that place; spads are a public, political appointment. They are also attached to the outside world. They are not attached, or they should not be attached, to the political bubble. Sometimes, it is hard for Ministers, with the busy hours and everything that they do, not to become attached and encapsulated in that bubble, and that is where you need a spad in the real world. In the real world, you are competing with the private sector. It is about the flexibility to attract the right person. We are not talking about the £90,000 that the Member quoted. With Mr Allister's clause, there is a ceiling of £80,847, but, at the minute, the top band is £70,000 to £85,000, so you are talking about just over £4,000. So, whilst I take the Member's point, it is splitting hairs.

He raised a valid point about the codes, saying that they could change more easily than statute. I agree; they could. There is a risk in that, but, moving forward with reform, as an MLA, I would not support that increase. That would be a political decision, but it is the inflexibility that statute brings with it —.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: I will in a minute — that could lessen the attraction for someone who works in a specialist field and would be quite useful to have in a political party and in a political context.

Mr Wells: Take it from me, as someone who was around here probably before the Member was born, the reality is that what we have in this Building is a single transferable spad. We had absolutely no trouble in attracting people to show an interest in becoming special advisers. Indeed, as far as I can recall, only one special adviser has ever left, and he left to become a High Court judge, and a very good adviser he was too. Clearly, he left to take on a very attractive salary, but all the rest stayed. There have been special advisers around this Building for 16 and 17 years.

At Westminster, when a Minister falls, his spad goes with him. Therefore, it is a very volatile and temporary position. Here, you can be a spad for three or four Assembly terms. If your Minister leaves, you take over whoever the new incoming Minister is from your party or you move to another Department. The Member knows the names that I will be quoting later. Mr Johnston, Mr Crawford, etc, went on for years and years. If they were unhappy on their measly £77,000 a year, would you not expect some fallout? Would you not expect them to be headhunted for posts with even better salaries?

Is it not ridiculous that there are spads who are paid more than a Minister? Surely, one has to accept Mr Allister's point of view, which is that there needs to be a ceiling. As Mr Allister eloquently stated, there may be a time when we need some high-flying person to come in, perhaps from industry, but there is provision for that. They do not have to become a special adviser; they can become a consultant to the Department. Therefore, Ministers do not have to break their pay code in order to achieve the expertise that they require. I suspect that even the person who is on £80,000 per year might be motivated. The ordinary man in the street would regard that as an absolute cricket score. What we have been paying spads is just horrendous. A ceiling must be agreed. Mr Allister's proposal is the best way forward in the interim.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I do not disagree that a ceiling is needed; it is a case of what that ceiling should be and where it should be placed. It might well be the case that something needs to be put down in statute. What I am saying is that that still needs to be teased out at Further Consideration Stage. I am still open to debate on the Member's proposal. We will see how that works out. I want to ensure that the Member is aware that I do not oppose clause 1 as it stands at present. I am talking about my party's concern with that subsection of clause 1. We might want to do something at Further Consideration Stage. I am simply putting Members and the Bill's sponsor on notice, if you like, in that regard.

Whilst the Bill works on the function and operation of a spad, and also on the conduct of a spad and Minister, amendment No 4 deals with the appointment of a spad. I have concern about amendment No 4 for that reason. I take Mr Allister's argument on the issue. However, other parties and Members also had difficulty with it and, probably, still do. They will speak to that in their own words. They are quite capable of doing that themselves. If it is a purely political appointment, the chances are that, if you were a Minister, you would know who you wanted to appoint. You would try to headhunt people, to use a term from the private sector, whom you thought could help you to stay in the real world as best they could. If a pool were created of three, five, seven or 10 people, and you could appoint only one person, I doubt whether the other people who did not get the job would be of your political persuasion any more. Therefore, there are issues around the appointment process. The last thing that I want is for us to put something in legislation that any party could circumvent, put up a sham and run a process but come to the same conclusion and outcome.

Ms Ennis: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it not a rule of the House that Mr Frew must address his remarks through you rather than to another Member, in this case, Mr Wells?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): That is true. I am sure that the Member who is speaking will engage with that. However, I realise that he has also been engaging with other Members in the Chamber. I am sure that he will adhere to proper protocol.

Mr Frew: I am sorry. It is just my style. I cannot help it. I am not good at this. Thank you very much for your correction.

Mr Catney: Freestyle.

Mr Frew: Freestyle is correct. You can say that again, Pat.

There you have it. Again, let me be brutally honest with the Bill's sponsor and the House: there will be things that my party wants and things that it does not want. We are prepared to engage, work alongside others, compromise and reform. That is the democratic process.

Mr O'Toole: I thank the Member for giving way. I will come to this issue in my remarks in a moment or two. Specifically on clause 1, is his concern that amendment No 4 curtails the ability of Ministers to make political appointments? He was not entirely clear about that. Under the amendment, which provides for new paragraph 3A, the Minister must create an appointment process, but it is not entirely clear that they can do so on a political basis. I know that the Bill sponsor talked about that in some detail in his opening remarks, but it would be helpful if the Member could clarify his view.

Mr Frew: As I was about to go on to say, I just do not want it to become a sham, shadow process whereby there is an outcome already realised. If you have to go through a process to get to that point, it becomes a sham, and it weakens the Bill.

We are also concerned about subsection 2(d). Again, if that amendment is passed by the House, there is absolutely no bother with trying to work through it with the Bill sponsor. Subsection 2(d) states:

"complete and the department retain documentation associated with the above processes, including recording the minister's reasons for the selection made."

Again, when the appointment of a spad by a party is purely political, that is an interaction with a political party and the Department. Again, whilst the spad will be accountable to the Minister, the standards, the codes, the disciplinary codes and everything else that goes with it, that is a further tier and connection to the Department. I am not sure that that is necessary, and I am not sure that some parties would not try to circumvent that process to advance a desired outcome.

I will move on to the numbers game. This was always going to come down to a numbers game. On that, I thank the Bill sponsor, because he was very gracious in considering amendments that came forward, and that is to be commended. Most of the parties recognise that eight spads in the Executive Office is too many. When we looked at it, it was clear that having three each would be suitable. I know that the Bill sponsor wanted to run with two each — four in total — thereby halving the current allowance. I genuinely think that that is just too tight. It is too tight for the parties that populate the Executive Office. I must commend the Bill sponsor for his adaption of the clauses. I agree with what he has done in removing the junior Minister's spad and allowing the three positions at Executive level to sit as they are. Most of the parties are, I think, content with that.

There was a remarkable intervention at Committee Stage. All through the Committee Stage, members of the party opposite hardly spoke at all. They opposed everything, including the Bill's long title. However, they did make this interjection, or I should say that Mr Lynch, when the Chairperson asked him what he thought of that aspect, made this interjection:

"We believe that six in TEO is the appropriate number."

Why is that so remarkable? It is so remarkable because that was the only time that members of that party gave any commentary on the Bill. They were opposed to everything. I remember it clearly, because I thought, "Oh, here we go. We are getting a wee bit of engagement here", but that was it. Mr Lynch is no longer on the Committee. He was replaced by my colleague from North Antrim. It is good that we have that colleague from North Antrim on the Committee and in the Chamber today. Mervyn was here earlier. He has gone now, but I wish he were here, because then we would have the good team of North Antrim pushing through reform, quoting scripture and everything. It is a great day. I ask the Member opposite, who made an intervention earlier, whether he supports his colleague Mr Lynch, whom he replaced on the Committee, when he said that six in TEO is the appropriate number. If that is the party position, that is fine. That was the only party position that the party opposite ever gave on the Bill. That is why it is so remarkable and why it has been logged in my memory ever since.

4.15 pm

We support the aspect of the Bill that reduces the number of spads and removes the junior Minister's spad. We do not believe that they are required. We believe that three spads each are sufficient for both parties. That does not mean that you have to fill those posts, by the way. You do not have to populate three posts; you can have two spads if they have sufficient expertise. You can have one, two or three spads, but three is the balance. Three spads would assist the Executive Office to perform the functions that it is required to perform on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland.

I support all the amendments in group 1, except for amendment No 4.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes.

Mr Wells: The honourable Member said that he fought a lonely battle. Does he accept that, as an erstwhile colleague, I gave him my undoubted support throughout Committee Stage? On the Committee, his reaction to the Bill was positive, and he supported the Committee's report: he has now raised issues that he is concerned about. Why did he not raise those concerns in Committee? That would have been the obvious vehicle to deal with them. Was he, perhaps, taken into a darkened room by a spad and re-educated on those issues, as I was many times?

A Member: Unsuccessfully.

Mr Wells: Unsuccessfully, indeed, but I still have the stripes on my back to prove that that happened. Was he, perhaps, re-educated by senior spads and told that, particularly on the issue of their pay, he had gone too far and followed his genuine intellect rather than party instructions? Why has there been this hint of an about-turn, and who gave him the friendly word in the ear to change his mind, as I experienced on many occasions?

Mr Frew: The Member knows me well, and I know the Member well, and he knows that we as a party decide these things together. I consulted as many elected Members as I could, along with everyone else in the party.

I will correct the Member in this regard: I have been consistent. In Committee, I raised issues about the flexibility of the pay cap and the appointment procedures for spads, because they are political appointments. The Member is wrong in that regard, and he will have to go through all those Committee meetings to pick out the moments when I raised those concerns. Members will be aware of that because they had the same concerns.

I do not know what sort of relationship the Member had with some of the elected Members and non-elected members in my party, but I can certainly tell him that I have never experienced the horror show that he depicted. I have never experienced a horror show like that, and I suspect that I never will.

Does the Member want another intervention?

Mr Wells: Yes.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Before the intervention, can we stick to discussing the amendments and not the machinations or otherwise in the darkened rooms of the DUP?

Mr Wells: Honourable Members are keen to know what goes on behind the scenes in the DUP. Certainly, when I speak, they will hear an awful lot about that [Laughter.] I have an excellent relationship with the vast majority of ordinary members of the DUP, and I had a relationship with the spads that I will reveal later.

The point is that the Member did not, in my opinion, raise concerns in Committee on the appointment of spads, and he did not express concern about Mr Allister's capping of their salaries. I still believe that, while he does not have the scars to show it, a friendly word has been had with him that certain spads will not accept Mr Allister's cap on their salary. Has the Member had that discussion, and has he changed his tune because of that?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Sorry, can we bring this back, please, to discussion of the amendments rather than, "He said, he said, I think he said" or "I think he did otherwise"?

Mr Frew: Yes, Mr Deputy Speaker. I know that the Member misses the party life, and I would love to see him fully back in the party some day. We all look forward to that. I think that I speak for the Members here and for those who are not present that we would like to see him back, and, hopefully, he will not experience anything similar to what he spoke about today. Yes, Mr Deputy Speaker, we will get back to the Bill.

I have summed up as much as I can on clause 1. We will support clause 1 and all the amendments that have been proposed to it, apart from amendment No 4. I put the Bill sponsor on notice about the pay structure and pay cap to see whether any flexibility can be added to the statute book at any given stage in the process going on to this. I support the Bill, as I said, and I wish the Bill sponsor and the Bill well. I wait to hear other Members speak to the clauses and amendments so that we can get the fullest picture that we can on this.

Mr McHugh: At the outset of the debate, I listened to the proposer, and he was patronising or congratulating all the other members of the Finance Committee who, he feels, are there supporting him. He created the impression that we, as Sinn Féin members on that Committee, were silent or were doing absolutely nothing, but the truth is to the contrary. We participated fully in that Committee in every respect, not just when his Bill was going through but when listening to the people who came to the Committee to give evidence. Quite a number of people were there giving evidence, and we, as I said, participated fully in every respect.

Fundamentally, we disagree with the premise of the Bill. However, in every other respect, we were there as active participants. In fact, we were so active that I can clearly remember the representatives from the Human Rights Commission saying that the objectives on spads as a result of the RHI inquiry could be met in every respect through a code of conduct every bit as easily as they could through legislation. They were the very people who stated that at the time, and they were concerned about legislation and the way that it could end up criminalising and putting spads and parties in a straitjacket. That has to be noted at the outset.

I was listening to the previous speaker, and I note his emphasis on respect. As a member of the Committee that dealt with many of the issues in the Bill, he should listen to his statement and act in accordance with what he says. I have not always experienced respect in that Committee, even to the extent that I had to address it to the Chair of the Committee. That was not only about me as a participant on the Committee but about other people who came to give evidence. That is because, very often, they can be shown total and absolute disrespect.

This section of the Bill that we are here to address at this point —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr McHugh: I will not give way, because, if I do, I could be here until tomorrow, and I do not have that kind of time.

Mr Frew: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Will the Member resume his seat?

Mr Frew: Can the Member prove at any time that I was disrespectful to anyone at the Committee? If I was, I would have apologised there and then. Can the Member give the House any sort of evidence or proof that that was the case?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Before the Member rises, I do not want us to have a round of ping-pong around the Chamber over respect. If we could move on with the amendments and focus on those, please.

Mr McHugh: In fact, I intend to move on, because, very often, when the disrespect was shown to me, it was behind my back. At times, I could hear it like a bull roaring for its turnips. Every time you opened your mouth you could hear some of them coming at you.

This section of the Bill is less about reform and more about fundamentally undermining the role of the Ministers' special advisers. However, we should not be surprised by that, given that the author of the Bill and most of the tabled amendments has consistently set himself against the peace process, the Good Friday Agreement and its institutions. That the code of conduct for special advisers was revised and published in January and the ministerial code of conduct was revised in March means little to Mr Allister. That is despite the fact that those codes were strengthened after much consideration during the negotiations that preceded the New Decade, New Approach deal, which addressed the relationships between Ministers and their spads. Instead, Mr Allister has sought to further his anti-power-sharing agenda by tabling inappropriate legislation that, rather than building on the findings of the RHI inquiry, would undermine them. Remember: the RHI inquiry did not recommend legislation.

Listening to some Members today, you would think that, with regard to the RHI inquiry, the people who were at fault were members of my party; in fact, central to all of that was a culture within the party on the opposite side of the House, a culture that allowed spads to operate in the fashion that they did. Unless that culture changes, a code of conduct or legislation will not impact one way or the other. Legislation in itself or even a code of conduct, if it came to that, would be a bit like putting a block in the way of a river going to the sea: the river will go over it, under it or around it, but it will get to the sea. Unless, in the first instance, that culture changes, it is a complete and absolute waste of time. We can approach this through a code of conduct rather than through the proposed legislation. Taking a legislative route, as proposed, is completely disproportionate. Mr Allister is well aware of that because many who gave evidence to the Committee were at pains to point out the same fact.

Special advisers are political appointments and justifiably so. It stands to reason that elected political representatives have political advisers, as all five parties in the Executive have. We all understand that well. These changes are about fundamentally changing the role of spads and picking apart the institutions. Applying the normal Civil Service process to spads ignores the reality of the role. Again, that brings into play the whole idea of legislation and the fact that people could be subject to criminal charges and the like. We have seen from the RHI scandal and in the case of DUP Ministers and spads what happens when the relationship breaks down between spads and their Ministers. It is important that Ministers and spads can, if necessary, go their separate ways. It is even more important that a Minister can appoint a new spad to take over, within a short space of time, the considerable workload left behind by a previous adviser. If that is not apparent, some people, it seems, have not learned from the RHI inquiry. Given that the Bill is about undermining the functioning of government, Sinn Féin will oppose all clauses of this cynical and counterproductive Bill.

Mr O'Toole: In speaking at Consideration Stage of the Functioning of Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, I am conscious of two things — not just two things but two things in particular. The first is the need to rebuild public trust and confidence in these institutions, which were eroded so painfully by the renewable heat incentive scandal and have not yet been adequately addressed by the Executive; indeed, in some ways, faith in the institutions has eroded further in recent weeks and months, albeit not for the reasons revealed by the RHI scandal. Secondly, it is vital that, in scrutinising proposed laws to improve the transparency and probity of our governance, we use legislation in the right way. That means that the law should be aimed at addressing the serious issues that persist in our politics while avoiding or at least minimising unintended harms to other areas of our governance.

At that point, I will address some of what has just been said by the Member for West Tyrone about legislation. He used what was, in many ways, a very persuasive metaphor, as he often does. He uses language very well and in interesting ways. He talked about a wave choosing to crash around laws. There is some truth to that. It is, of course, even more true of codes and guidance.

In approaching the Bill, we have not sought to be slavish to the idea that legislation is always the answer, but nor do we think that the proposed use of legislation is somehow inherently wrong. I will talk about that in a little more detail.

4.30 pm

The approach of the SDLP in the Finance Committee has been broadly to support many of the intentions of the Bill and the majority of its clauses but not all of them. We retain specific and real issues around some of the clauses and amendments that I will go on to discuss. I will just touch, in parentheses, on the point that Mr McHugh made about the Bill sponsor's intentions. The Bill's sponsor touched on it at the beginning of his remarks. It is almost redundant to say this, but it is worth saying it anyway: although I work with the Bill's sponsor, often productively, on the Finance Committee, there are many things that he and I do not agree on. I am happy to state that I am fairly confident that we will not agree on most things going forward, whether that is about Brexit or any number of other things. Nor am I or my party under any illusions about the Bill sponsor's warm, fuzzy feelings about the Good Friday Agreement, which we helped to deliver and care so profoundly about. If we thought that specific measures in the Bill were about undermining that settlement, you can be sure that we would be very judicious about supporting them. As I have said, we welcome a good deal of the legislation, but we have real reservations about some of the measures. I will talk about both the areas of our support and our areas of concern as we come on to specific clauses and amendments in the groupings that we are discussing in this phase of the debate.

First, if you will permit me, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will talk in slightly wider terms about the Bill, the broader context around transparency and governance in this place and the principles that our party has brought and will bring to bear as we make specific judgements on clauses and, indeed, the final legislation when it comes before us. As I said, the RHI scandal and the subsequent public inquiry and Coghlin report revealed systemic failings across our political institutions and the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Of course, RHI was not an isolated incident. It was distinctive because of the scale of the financial overcommitment and because it demonstrated a remarkable collision of poor political leadership and poor performance at multiple levels of the Civil Service. There are, however, a litany of examples of grubby clientelism and even corruption, that continue to stain this institution, including Red Sky, the National Asset Management Agency and the social investment fund.

I go back to the theme of biblical quotations, which we touched on earlier. I listened to Paul Frew, my Committee colleague. Mr Frew and I have engaged and sparred on many occasions in the Finance Committee. I too am not a religious person, but, having listened to Mr Frew's peroration, a lot of which I agreed with, I am tempted to say, given the context of his party — the DUP — and some of its record over the past decade, that there is more joy in heaven over one sinner who repenteth than there is over 99 righteous persons. We will see how the rest of the debate goes. One may debate whether there are 99 righteous persons in the DUP or the Northern Ireland Assembly.

When the institutions were resuscitated at the beginning of this year, the 'New Decade, New Approach' document acknowledged that strengthening transparency and accountability were "a matter of urgency". The broad response from the Executive and specifically from the Department of Finance has been to say that legislation is not required to achieve the improvements in governance and in public confidence in governance that, virtually all of us recognise, are required. Indeed, it was pointed out again by the Member for West Tyrone, Mr McHugh, as if it were a trump card, that Sir Patrick Coghlin's report did not specifically call for a legislative response. That is true, but nor did Coghlin say that the Assembly should not legislate to improve the standards of governance here. Indeed, his report is clear:

"The recommendations ... may ... not even be sufficient to address the range of shortcomings revealed by the Inquiry."

There is nothing in the RHI report or in NDNA that specifically precludes or advises against legislating to improve transparency and governance here.

The question that we should ask ourselves — we have been asking it as Committee members, and our party has been asking it — is whether the Bill before us, its specific clauses and the amendments offer the best means of addressing the challenges that, we know, exist. Our view is that legislation can do only so much to create a culture of transparency and good government. As I said, I agree with some of what Maoliosa McHugh said about the limits of legislation, but it is also true that, in Northern Ireland, we have seen codes and guidance repeatedly fail to deliver high standards of governance. Without wishing to be too partisan about it, I think that any external viewers watching or listening to Sinn Féin and DUP Members rowing over their relative levels of transparency might conclude that it is a little bit like watching two bald men arguing over a comb.

The past decade has led to a serious crisis in public confidence. Any means of improving standards and recovering that confidence has at least to be considered. To the argument of the Minister and the Department that we should not consider legislation at all, I gently point out that the Minister's party colleague in Dáil Éireann Mairéad Farrell TD has introduced her own private Member's Bill, which seeks to tighten rules on lobbying and the enforcement of public standards; in fact, I believe that that legislation is being moved in the Dáil tonight. The two pieces of legislation are not exactly overlapping, but there are similarities. They are both about lobbying and transparency. If the Minister's issue is with the principle of legislation, it would be helpful to understand why this part of Ireland does not need any legislation to deal with those issues but the other part does. I will not use the word "partitionist", but others might. John O'Dowd said earlier that we had enough transparency here. If we have enough transparency here, why the different treatment? What is different here? I say that not as a facetious party political point, although it might sound like one, but because there is a real question here: why the inconsistency? If, in the view of the Department, some legislation may have merit but this Bill does not achieve what is needed — let me be clear: we have significant reservations about the Bill, and I will go through those reservations in this debate and in the debates on the other groupings — if the position is that this specific legislation does not address in the right way the challenges that we face, it would be helpful to understand why the Department has not sought to amend the Bill or, indeed, give more detail on how we address in ways other than legislation the real issues arising from RHI and other scandals.

I finally come to the clauses and amendments in the group. As we have discussed, clause 1 is largely about the rules, regulations and guidance around special advisers — not "guidance", sorry, but legislation, of course. Before I get on to the meat of the individual amendments and clauses, I want to bring a little of my personal experience to the debate. I was a civil servant in Whitehall. A large part of my job was working with special advisers. I worked with special advisers from all three main British political parties in various Whitehall Departments, so I bring a particular perspective. I want to be absolutely clear about this, because it is really important: special advisers perform an absolutely essential role in all politics, particularly in parliamentary forms of government. I do not agree with everything that Mr Wells said. He may have experience of particular spads in darkened rooms — I am sure that we will hear all of that later on, hopefully after the watershed — but, in principle, there is nothing unseemly about the presence of special advisers in government; indeed, there are strong arguments that special advisers are critical to the effective functioning of government in systems with large, permanent and impartial civil services. That is a critical part of how we have looked at the provisions on special advisers.

One thing that it is critical to understand about the work of special advisers — whether SDLP, Sinn Féin, DUP, Fianna Fáil, Labour or possibly even, one day, Traditional Unionist Voice special advisers, who knows — is that their job is in part to protect the permanent apolitical Civil Service. That is why special advisers exist. If they were not there, private secretaries, press officers and policy advisers would be dragged into giving advice to Ministers that would necessarily shade into party-political territory. It is important that, as we debate this — as I say, the SDLP supports many of the provisions — we are clear about the role and importance of special advisers and uphold their role.

In the 21st century, the pace and demands of modern politics mean that special advisers have an enormously important role to play. As I said, they act as a bridge between Ministers, their parties and the permanent Civil Service. At a basic level and nothing to do with the specifics of our unique institutions, we operate a 24-hour Government. To be fair to the Minister, who is here today and who will be doing a long stint in the Chamber, he will have been working over the weekend. A large part of his having a special adviser will be about having support in what is a relentless job. We should not underestimate or demean the importance of that role. The way we scrutinise the Bill is about protecting and enhancing that role and ensuring that some of the bad practice that existed during the RHI scandal can be repaired. In seeking to improve the way that special advisers function, we should not fall into the trap of implying that special advisers are by nature a bad thing: they are not. Special advisers can be a very good thing. Nonetheless, we know that there are real issues with how they functioned in this place during the RHI period.

What does the clause do? Clause 1 restricts the ability to create a hierarchy of special advisers except in the Executive Office. We support that measure — it is fine, as far as it goes — along with the technical amendment that the Bill sponsor proposes. It will not transform how we do government here, but it is putting in law something that is common sense. Although it removes the ability to form formal hierarchies across spad networks, let us face it: informal seniority will probably still exist between spads of the same party, particularly because some will have more experience and will have served longer in jobs and parties. Hopefully, however, it will clarify that Ministers outside the Executive Office are officially responsible for their spads rather than some other senior spad.

Clause 1(3) amends the Civil Service (Special Advisers) Act (Northern Ireland) 2013 to provide:

“special advisers are subject to the processes and procedures of the disciplinary code operative in the Northern Ireland Civil Service”.

In Committee, we saw merit in that measure and still do. However, there is the outstanding question of whether the measure clouds the capacity of Ministers to be clearly responsible for the conduct of their special advisers, which was, of course, one of Sir Patrick Coghlin's recommendations. The Bill sponsor talked a bit about that in his opening speech. In the Committee deliberations, he said that the fact that special advisers were civil servants but were not subject to Civil Service disciplinary procedures was an anomaly. That is true in one sense — they are temporary civil servants — but they do not enjoy quite the full benefits of Civil Service employment rights as they can lose their job when their Minister does. Special advisers also lose their jobs when an election is called. It would be helpful if the Bill's sponsor could say a little more on that in his winding-up speech. Although we are broadly supportive of most of clause 1, his thoughts on that tension —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Toole: Yes.

Mr Wells: I sat through every minute of the deliberations of the Committee. As with Mr Frew, members had adequate opportunity to raise any concerns that they had, and I thought that the Committee worked well in dealing with scrutiny of the Bill. The Member is now raising issues that he wants to be teased out with the honourable Member for North Antrim: would it not have been better to have resolved those in Committee rather than bringing them at this stage to the Assembly?

4.45 pm

Mr O'Toole: This is the Consideration Stage of amendments, I say with respect. I did raise many of these issues at Committee Stage. The purpose of Bill scrutiny, with respect to Mr Wells, is that we continue to tease out detail. There is nothing illegitimate about asking further questions and asking for clarity. With respect, he seems to be implying that certain DUP spads acted as thought police. He is not thought police for individual members of the Finance Committee, who are entitled to have their own views and their own perspectives on how they debate this Bill. I am happy to give way to him on substantive points, but, if at every point where he is going to ask me to give way he is going to claim that I did not make that precise point verbatim three or four months ago, I will not give way, to be perfectly blunt about it.

Clause 1(3) amends that Act. We are, broadly speaking, sympathetic to that, but, as I said, it would be helpful to hear from the Bill's sponsor on what I have just raised, given that, as I said, there is a danger that we imply that spads are exactly like civil servants. Clearly, they are not. They are political appointees, and there is clear merit in having clarity around the disciplinary procedure, but there is also a risk that we go too far down the road of defining special advisers as exactly like other civil servants, when the fact that we are debating this Bill in this way makes clear that they are not ordinary civil servants.

Amendment No 4 is, in a sense, the first very substantive amendment. It provides for a recruitment process that was previously provided for in the code, but, as the Bill's sponsor said, it was — if I remember the adage correctly — a custom honoured more in the breach than in the observance. In making a judgement on this amendment, we would like more clarity on whether the Bill's sponsor foresees any issues with using party political sympathy as a legitimate recruitment rationale. Put directly, it is not unreasonable for any party in this Chamber to appoint a spad at least partly on the basis of party alignment.

I have spoken to the Bill's sponsor, and he has been helpful on that point. In his opening speech, he mentioned the Fair Employment Order. To get our support for that amendment, we would need to be fairly clear that there would be an amendment at Further Consideration Stage to make the Bill absolutely clear that, in effect, an appointment could be made based on party political alignment. It is really important that we are clear about that. It is one thing to create a process, as the previous code did, and ensure that it is in law that a process happens, but it is another thing to question the ability, frankly, of clear party political allegiance to be the driving factor, or at least one of the driving factors, in those appointments. So, it would be helpful if the Bill's sponsor could make clear that he is willing to amend the Bill at Further Consideration Stage. As I said, if the clause remains as drafted, we will find it difficult, at a later stage, to support it. It would be helpful to get clarity before today's vote, if possible.

Clause 1(5) has been talked about at some length. We view it as sensible tidying up, and we support it. The remaining provisions in clause 1 are fairly sensible, and we do not have issues with the sponsor's remaining technical amendments.

The Bill's sponsor has given notice of his intention to oppose his original clause 2 and replace it with an amendment that would have the effect of providing a limit of six, rather than four, special advisers in the Executive Office. We think that this is sensible. It is, as I think others have said, something of a reversion to what the situation was in 1998.

Clause 3 amends the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order (NI) 2016 and removes the negative resolution procedure. Again, this provision causes us relatively little problem, although I think that it is worth putting on the record that, obviously, this procedure was used famously — notoriously — once, a few years ago. Though I can understand and we support the tidying up of it in legislation, it is also worth putting on the record that there will be legitimate circumstances in which the First Minister and deputy First Minister will want to make exceptional appointments. Those exceptional appointments are provided for via the means of consultancy and the special adviser route, albeit I acknowledge some of the points made around pay limits, but we are supporting that.

Clause 4 relates to the provision of compensation for special advisers who lose their job as a result of new clause 2. That makes sense, in that, if the previous clause passes, it would be very basic good government and decency to ensure that there are proper compensation procedures. It also sets the date at which these Executive Office spads cease to hold office as 31 March 2021. In Committee deliberation, the Bill sponsor talked about whether he is willing to push that date back to the end of March 2022. It would be helpful if he was able to give a bit more clarity on that, given that, even if the Bill passes quickly, it will struggle to receive Royal Assent before Christmas and not long before, if the Bill remained as it was, March 2021. You would effectively be telling these people that they would be losing their jobs in the space of a few months on the basis of legislation in the Assembly.

That in itself rather makes the point that I was making earlier in relation to clause 1, which is that spads are not quite the same as other civil servants. We would simply not be debating the ending of any old civil servant's employment in this way on the Floor, so it would be helpful if the Bill sponsor would indicate that, at Further Consideration Stage, he would be minded to move to March 2022, as a means of, frankly, being fair to people who are in employment at the minute, whatever the fate of the final Bill.

In concluding on this grouping, let me reiterate that there is not only significant merit in some of these measures; there is benefit in demonstrating to the public that we are addressing many of the significant concerns that arose from RHI. Nevertheless, we would like clarity from the Bill sponsor specifically around amendment No 4 and about further amending amendment No 4 to be absolutely clear about the political nature of spad appointments.

At that, I will wrap up my remarks for now, but I suspect that I will have much more time on my feet this evening.

Mr Muir: I speak, on behalf of the Alliance Party, on the amendments and clauses included in group 1: the appointment, conduct and management of special advisers. I say at the outset that this is the second piece of substantive legislation that I have considered as an MLA in my short time in the House. The first was the Executive Committee (Functions) Bill. Dealing with this legislation has been an experience.

Before I address the specific clauses and amendments, I feel that it is important to address the context of the Bill and the Alliance Party's stance concerning the general issues under consideration. I will come to the specific amendments, but I feel that is important to set out the context.

Published on Friday 13 March, just one day after the Republic of Ireland was placed into lockdown as a result of COVID-19, the RHI inquiry report presented clear findings on what happened and recommendations for change, with the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) charged with monitoring and pursuing implementation of the recommendations. A number of Audit Office reports have already been published in pursuit of that duty and will be considered in due course by the Public Accounts Committee (PAC), where I also serve.

The findings of the RHI inquiry should, however, be recognised in the round when considering this Bill. I acknowledge the aims and objectives of the Bill sponsor and what he seeks to achieve, but, as we will debate today and this evening and possibly into the morning, the Alliance Party has to differ on a number of aspects in terms of whether the methods proposed achieve the outcomes desired and are appropriate and balanced.

Today's debate is not about whether RHI conduct was acceptable or not, because, of course, it was not. It is about whether the proposed Functioning of Government Bill will help government to function better. Our view is that, in some aspects, it will not, and, in fact, it will be the opposite.

I do not come in opposition to the principles held, nor as an opponent of openness, transparency and good governance generally. Nothing could be further from the truth. Throughout the years, the Alliance Party has been consistent and robust in its support for openness, transparency and good governance at all levels of government, despite the opposition of some. We are, however, firmly wedded to our adherence to evidence-based decision-making. Populist politics should not be allowed to run roughshod over the need for good policy and correct legislation.

Passing legislation is a serious matter that must be carefully considered before it is voted on and, eventually, becomes the law of the land. That is precisely why we have the relatively long procedures, including Committee Stage, in this place to debate and ponder legislative proposals. I have tried to follow deliberations undertaken in the Finance Committee, but the formal inhibitions in this place concerning access to papers and documents tabled and considered at Committees for those parties not able to secure a place on the Committee remains a matter of concern. I do not have a place on the Finance Committee. I have raised the issue in writing with various people in the Assembly. The issue must be addressed to enable full and active briefing and participation of all MLAs on all Assembly business. I have watched some of the Committee proceedings. I am not attracted to serve on it, but I would like to be able to get access to the papers. I also note that, as a result of the proposed amendments, large elements of the Bill are very different from those that were consulted on originally.

I turn now to the matters under direct consideration in group 1, which is what I intend to focus on. The Alliance Party will support clauses 2 to 4 relating to the reduction of special advisers in the Executive Office. We agree with many aspects of clause 1, but we will struggle to support the clause as a whole, because we believe that it could inhibit the achievement of the overall objectives that the Bill's sponsor seeks to achieve: the better management of special advisers and ensuring that, with regard to accountability, the buck stops with the Minister.

I will begin with the amendments and clauses that we will support. We do not object to the removal of spads for junior Ministers, nor do we oppose the repeal of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2016 or clause 4, as amended. We do not see the need for more than six spads in the Executive Office, and we support the changes proposed to reflect that: taking it back to the factory setting, as Mr Allister said. Furthermore, there are elements of clause 1 that we agree with in principle. We support the capping of spad pay at the rate of senior civil servants. Spads should be paid less than Ministers, who are accountable for taking Executive decisions. We ask the Minister of Finance to confirm whether he agrees with that position.

We do not accept the argument that additional flexibility is needed on spad pay in order to attract particular skill sets. Spads are inherently political appointments, and anyone who is appointed purely for their technical knowledge could surely apply for a position as a senior civil servant through the regular appointments process. However, there are elements of clause 1 relating to the appointment and dismissal of special advisers more generally that we cannot support.

Amendment No 4 proposes additional requirements regarding the appointment of a special adviser. Ministers must be open with the public that the special adviser role is not a normal role. It is already recognised in legislation, so the appointment process is inherently different. That is recognised in other parts of the United Kingdom and Ireland.

There is another essential part of a functioning relationship between a Minister and a special adviser as well as political alignment. Ministers must be able to have full trust in their special adviser. Their relationship is inherently personal in nature, and Ministers will often know the person in a personal capacity in advance of the appointment. To pretend otherwise, as if it is a regular recruitment process, when the nature of the role means that it cannot be, would create a completely false sense of process. One of the major problems identified by the RHI inquiry was what occurred when the relationship between a Minister and a spad broke down — when a spad was appointed by and answerable to not their Minister but another spad and the party hierarchy. The principle should be maintained, as set out in the revised ministerial code, that Ministers are fully responsible for the appointment of their own spad. Another problem and issue that the RHI inquiry raised was that Ministers are responsible and accountable for the actions, conduct and behaviour of their spad.

That should always have been the case. It is right that the relevant codes have been updated, as recommended in the Coghlin report.

Clause 1(3) forbids “ministerial ... interference” in the:

“processes and procedures of the disciplinary code” of the spad. We believe that, when a special adviser breaches the disciplinary code, rather than the spad simply facing a penalty from the Civil Service, the Minister should be fully responsible for the spad's actions and their response to it.

5.00 pm

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Muir: Yes.

Mr Wells: That issue was teased out in Committee. We dealt with the case of the Department for Social Development, as it was at the time, where a spad clearly acted well beyond the rules and caused a great deal of concern amongst Members. The issue led to disciplinary action. The problem was that the Minister intervened and said that the matter should be taken no further. How can the Member rely on the Minister to take disciplinary action against somebody whom they appointed?

Mr Muir: I thank the Member for his intervention. I will cover that in my next remarks.

If we are in agreement in the Assembly that the conduct of the spad is the responsibility of the Minister, it should be the Minister who disciplines the spad when they are in breach of their code. They should be held to account if they fail to do so, and that is the important issue. I welcome Mr Frew's conversion to change and reform; it is very revealing. The use of the petition of concern to block sanctions against and censure of the Minister is something that we will come to later in the Bill; that is a change that we need. Bringing in permanent secretaries not only to determine spad misbehaviour but to enact disciplinary action for what are ultimately political appointments can also place civil servants in difficult and invidious positions.

While there are amendments in the group that we can support, on the appointment and conduct of spads, we believe that the amendments, while well-meaning, are inconsistent with the fundamental link between the Minister and their spad and the nature of that relationship. Two of the fundamental issues that arose during the RHI inquiry were that spads were not accountable to their Ministers and that Ministers did not take responsibility for their spads' actions. We do not for one second question the seriousness of the behaviour that occurred during RHI. We absolutely believe that spads should be subject to a robust code of conduct and held accountable for their actions, along with the Ministers who appointed them. However, we believe that that is best achieved through the recommendations in the RHI inquiry report and not through some of the amendments and clauses in the group.

Mr Storey: Listening to the debate in the House and then upstairs in my office, I was really taken aback by the number of biblical quotations I heard. The Member has just mentioned conversion, so I was reasonably comfortable coming to the House, given that today is the 448th anniversary of the death of that well-known Scottish reformer, John Knox, who famously said:

"When I think of those who have influenced my life the most, I think not of the great but of the good."

We should all take that to heart for this reason: we are dealing with flawed humanity. I will continue the biblical quotations. The apostle Paul said in Romans 7:

"For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh,) dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not."

That brings us to consider the need for any legislation. Why do we need laws? Why do we not just live by our own opinions, ideas and views? Why is there a need for legislation in a modern society? It is because there is a fallen humanity. We are not perfect. We are human. We make mistakes. We err. It is good for politicians to recognise that.

I have been in the House since 2003, and the one thing that I have always struggled with is that it is almost impossible to find a Member on any Bench who will stand up and say, "Do you know what? We got it wrong". It seems as though, every time that there is a debate, we are always right, we always have the answer, and we never have the sense of being able to admit that there is error on our part. The legislation and the clauses —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): May I interrupt on a technical point? The microphone is not picking you up, Mr Storey.

Mr Storey: That would be an awful thing [Laughter.] I am sure that the country will be all the worse for that.

The fact that the Bill was necessary is an indication that we have not got it right. I commend the Bill's sponsor. Just today, I was thinking that it is almost 40 years since I first met him. I was a very young schoolboy, I have to say, and I was going to a meeting of what was then the North Antrim association. As the secretary of that association, I was in absolute fear of the legal mind of a man who would quiz every detail of the minutes of the meetings that I had taken. I commend him, because the Bill recognises that many of us are, like him, totally opposed to the architecture of this place, with the structures that we have to work under and the mandatory nature of our coalition. This is not a normal democracy. This is not the same as any other jurisdiction in the United Kingdom, where the Government are appointed on the basis of who wins the election. Here, everybody is in the Government, when it suits them. Of course, we know that there are times when every party takes the view that some decisions are not collective, and they go their own way.

The Bill is a recognition that there is a need for change. The Member referred to Mr Muir's point that it was about going back to factory settings. I would say that it is about more than that, in that, as originally constructed, the factory had fundamental flaws. Who in their right mind would create a Government with five parties? Really? It is no wonder that we have chaos. It is no wonder that we have all the difficulties and challenges that we do. It is not easy. In the Bill, there is recognition also —

Mr Catney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Catney: The Member has been here since 2003, so I am sure that he will know better than I do that the reason why we have five parties in the Executive is that we had one-party domination here. We all saw the abysmal rule, the misrule and the gerrymandering that came from that. Having five parties in the Executive was a political solution.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member, although I do not agree. Let us remember that, when we had our own Government, we had an education system that was fit for purpose and we made decisions that were for the benefit of all in the community. What happened and what I readily admit to was that there was discrimination against working-class communities, unionist and nationalist. My grandfather had no vote. Why? He had no land. When we come to the context of the reasons why we have —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): May I bring the Member back to the present day and the amendments?

Mr Storey: Yes. I noticed your impatience, Mr Deputy Speaker. As we head into next year, with the centenary of Northern Ireland, we will be able to have that discussion and set right some of the misconceptions that there have been. I heard some on the opposite Benches talking about a failed state.

What are we trying to do with the Bill? We are trying to do what my party has set out previously. I pay tribute to my North Antrim colleague: on this occasion, I refer to Mr Frew. I have other North Antrim colleagues who have worked on it: the sponsor of the Bill and Mr McGuigan, who was eloquently quoting scripture earlier. We are having an influence on him, I trust, for good.

The late John Ramsay, chairman of the North Antrim Unionist Association, a colleague in the Ulster Unionist Party, served with me on the old council in Ballymoney. He said that a political manifesto was only good for the day of the election and that, after that, the world moved on. Sometimes, some have to stick to what they say in their manifesto. I will quote from one. I was going to give my colleague Paul Frew credit for what he has done in bringing many of the issues of the Bill to the Floor today, but let me quote:

"Review of the number of special advisers, and how they are appointed and regulated.

Greater transparency and improved record keeping...

Develop a Northern Ireland Reform Plan to be agreed by Executive parties across all aspects of Government".

Let me pause there, because what the Bill does is to prove the merit of private Members' Bills. It is difficult to get agreement to get anything through the Executive. Collectively, we should take this to heart. Private Member's Bills have a place and a purpose, if they are accepted and found to pass the tests that are set for the acceptance of a Bill. Some of us are working on private Members' Bills on other issues, and we see where the challenges and difficulties arise. When it goes into a Committee of the House, the Bill becomes owned by that Committee and not so much by the sponsor of the Bill. There is merit, and it is good, even for this flawed democracy, that we use the processes that we have.

I thank the Chair of the Finance Committee, and it is probably from a personal perspective rather than anything else. I welcome the fact that he took on the responsibility — very willingly, I have to say. At a Chairpersons' liaison meeting, he put his hand up and said, "We would be happy to take the Bill and take responsibility for its scrutiny". I place on record my appreciation for his being willing, because it is a huge task that the Committee has undertaken.

The Bill is rooted in a desire for change, and change is coming. The party opposite has lectured us for a long time about openness and transparency. What openness and transparency has there been by the party opposite in regard to even something as sacred as a funeral? Really, I think that that raises —.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Can I draw the Member back to the amendments, please?

Mr Storey: Yes, thank you.

Transparency and openness, whether it is in the appointment of spads, the keeping of minutes or what certain people are paid — all of that — should not be anything that any Member of the House should run away from. We should not have to conceal anyone's payments. The clauses that we are discussing give the House an opportunity to make change and not change for the sake of trying to placate some political wish list.

Let us remember why we are here. Are we really here to serve ourselves? That is not what we tell the electorate when we go to the door. We are here to serve the community of Northern Ireland. Addressing the issues through the Bill will help us to give more confidence to people, despite all the scepticism and all the concern in our communities about the very existence of this place. If we make progress on the Bill, it will be to the betterment of the governance of the House and ensure that decisions are made in a way that is open.

5.15 pm

I will conclude, because I can see my colleague Jim down in the corner. I give an assurance to Members that I have not been in a darkened room; I have not been accosted; I have not spoken to one spad; I have not had any arm-twisting; and I have not had anybody from the party come to me saying, "This is what you will say, Storey, and if you do not say that, you will be up in front of the hierarchy in the morning". I am glad to support the comments that outline my party's position on the Bill.

Mr Wells: At the outset, I pay tribute to the Chair of the Finance Committee. When I was appointed to the Finance Committee in April 2015, it was seen as a punishment. Normally, when one errs and strays like a lost sheep — to add to the scripture — in a party, one's punishment, if one has been a really bad boy, is to be appointed to the Finance Committee. If one has been horrendously badly behaved, one is appointed to the erstwhile Committee of the Centre, now the Committee for the Executive Office. I have had that experience, and one of the happiest times of my political career was when my Chief Whip said to me, "I am taking you off the Committee of the Centre".

I have to say, however, that the Finance Committee has been one of the most interesting and rewarding that I have sat on in my 26 years in the Assembly. Every week, we notice that there is a full turnout, which is interesting. Nine out of nine members are always present, albeit perhaps one or two of them remotely, and something very interesting always comes along, so the time flies. If somebody had asked me two years ago whether that could happen on the Finance Committee, I would have thought that it was impossible, but all the Committee members who speak to me find it an extremely enjoyable, interesting and fulfilling body, and that is no doubt down to the expert chairmanship of Mr Aiken.

He and the members have taken the Bill through its Committee Stage, and I think that the Bill has come out much better as a result of that scrutiny. We spent many hours taking evidence from expert witnesses. We teased out the nuances of the various aspects of the Bill. I notice that several members, having gone through that, have suddenly had a Damascus-road experience and have received additional information about where they are going with the Bill. Without wanting to be controversial, that would have been better done in Committee. Although I accept from the honourable Members that they were not spoken to by the spads, perhaps the Chief Whip or the party leader had a little word in their ear and said that they were too constructive and helpful to Mr Allister's Bill in Committee and that it is now time that they had the ultimate Damascus-road experience. That having been said, I think that the Committee worked well together. We were a good mix of youth, good looks and experience, and, as a result, we were able to tease out issues. I am not saying who had which attribute. Mr Allister and Mr Wells certainly did not have the good looks, but we had the experience. The Bill benefited enormously as a result of the scrutiny, however.

People are very critical of the Assembly, and I accept that they have every right to be, but I think that, in two aspects, we do serve the public well. The first is through the role of the Committees, which is often very positive, and the second is our scrutiny of Ministers through questions for written and oral answer. On those aspects, we can stand with all the other legislatures in the United Kingdom and say that we are doing a relatively good job. Other aspects, of course, leave a lot to be desired.

My Deputy Speaker, you will remember that, on 27 April 2015, I resigned as Minister of Health. I did so holding a commitment from my party that, after the dust had settled on the totally untrue allegations that were made against me, which led to one individual getting a three-month prison sentence, I would return as a Minister. That never happened, but little did I know that, when I made that decision to stand down, I would create a situation that would bring about the downfall of the Assembly and lead to the RHI crisis. You may ask, "How is that possible?". By stepping down as a Minister, I enabled one Jonathan Bell to be appointed to the Executive. Had Mr Bell not been appointed, the RHI crisis would never have occurred. It was only Mr Bell's explosive interview that created the crisis in the Assembly, where we moved from a position of wanting a short, sharp, private inquiry to a position of there being demands for the full RHI inquiry under Lord Justice Coghlin, who, in my opinion, did an excellent job. Clearly, had I not stepped down, Jonathan Bell would not have been appointed because there would have been no slot for him and there would have been no RHI crisis. Little did I know what chaos I had created.

That has given me the freedom this afternoon to speak openly and honestly about my experience of special advisers, state my understanding of what I believe has been going on, and say why I am such an enthusiastic supporter of Mr Allister's Bill. I pay tribute to him. He has been tenacious throughout in his work on the Bill and he has listened. We have heard the words "reasonable" and "Jim Allister" in the same sentence. How often do you have that? He has been flexible; he has altered the main tenets of his Bill to meet the concerns of the Committee, which is to be applauded. The Bill is much better as a result of his activities.

If you were to ask me the names of the top five political influencers who have had the most control over the legislators in their countries over the past five years, I would give you this rundown: number five, Vladimir Putin; number four, the chairman of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party; number three, Kim Jong-un, the supreme leader of North Korea; number two, Dominic Cummings; and number one, Timothy Johnston, the senior spad in the Executive Office. [Laughter.] There is not a blade of grass on the DUP lawn that has not been sown, nurtured and harvested by Timothy Johnston. He was senior spad, senior chief executive and Chief Whip rolled into one. Why do I make that comment? To show how we have a system in this country that has led to one individual having such supreme power that there is a need for Mr Allister's Bill. We have only to look at the RHI inquiry report. I note that the Sinn Féin representatives, who have remained remarkably quiet today, have not quoted from the damning remarks by Lord Justice Coghlin throughout his time as chair of the inquiry.

Look at the Aidan McAteer situation. Jim Allister, with the support of the Assembly, in 2013 got legislation passed that would prevent someone who had a criminal terrorist conviction from being appointed to the position of special adviser. As we know, that followed the disgraceful decision to appoint Mary McArdle as special adviser in the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, which then became the Department for Communities. We know the whole situation behind Mary McArdle's appointment. Sinn Féin was so embarrassed by the appointment and concerned about the uproar that, eventually, she was quietly removed from the position and sent to Connolly House.

We saw a genuine attempt by Mr Allister to stop those evil people, who had committed horrendous terrorist crimes, enjoying salaries of £50,000, £60,000, £70,000 and £80,000 a year as special advisers. How did Sinn Féin deal with that? They came up with a cunning plan. They are very good at cunning plans, just as they were very cunning about Research Services Ireland Limited, which managed to siphon £700,000 from this Assembly into a non-existent research company.

Their cunning plan was to make Mr Aidan McAteer the super-spada. Again, if we had not had the RHI inquiry, we would have no understanding of Mr McAteer's role. I am waiting to hear the Members opposite try to justify the existence of Mr McAteer and his role. As the RHI inquiry confirmed, every decision taken by a Sinn Féin spada or a Sinn Féin Minister was referred to Mr McAteer. Mr Aidan McAteer had a controlling role. The reason why, of course, they could not appoint Mr McAteer as a spada in his own right was that he had a criminal terrorist conviction, as mentioned in the RHI report. In the report, you see many examples of frustrated permanent secretaries and senior civil servants saying, "We cannot get a decision from a Sinn Féin Minister because it is lying on Mr McAteer's desk in Connolly House". That was a clever way of circumventing the provisions of Mr Allister's Act. Mr McAteer, unfortunately, was not quite as influential as Mr Timothy Johnston — that would be impossible — but he was an extremely influential character. The result was that the Bill was circumvented, and Mr McAteer ruled the roost.

Then, we had Máirtín Ó Muilleoir. What ever happened to Máirtín Ó Muilleoir? Once the rising star of the Sinn Féin Front Benches, he is now gone. He is like Basil McCrea. Nobody hears anything about him; he has just disappeared. We had this ridiculous situation of Mr Ó Muilleoir — I did not agree with much of what he said, but he was sharp enough — having to wait for the decision of Mr McAteer, who, apparently, did not seem to have any qualifications whatsoever to occupy such a senior position. I inadvertently created the RHI report, and it did, indeed, reveal that.

It also revealed the power of Mr Johnston. It was very telling that, when Mr Bell had a disagreement with Mr Cairns, his special adviser, that led to a slight difference of emphasis in London, Mr Bell, who was the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, made it very clear that he wanted to dispense with the services of Mr Cairns. Mr Johnston made it absolutely clear that he had no right to do so, and that it was he, Mr Johnston, who would make the decision as to whether the special adviser was removed or otherwise. Therefore, Mr Johnston had much greater power than the actual Minister. Time and again, that was my experience with the DUP.

Mr Johnston exercises a role way above his status or position, and that has always been the case. Mr Johnston is still very much a strong individual in the party. He is very intelligent and very hard-working, but he is extraordinarily powerful, with a power that I do not believe should be vested in any one individual.

Then, we had perhaps the most disgraceful incident, which has not been alluded to so far, that was revealed not only by the RHI report but by some very interesting Christmas reading that we had last year — 'Burned' by Mr Sam McBride — and I must pay tribute to Mr McBride for revealing so much of what happened. We had the situation where Mr John Robinson, who, at that stage, was the senior spada in DETI, having taken over from Mr Cairns, decided that, in order to take the heat off his Minister, the First Minister and the DUP in general, he would leak material to Sam McBride implicating two senior civil servants in briefings on the RHI. The clever ploy there was that, by doing so, the attention would be diverted from the senior Ministers.

Even though he was on a salary, at that time, of about £75,000 a year, he did not seem to have enough money for the stamps, so he sent the material with the wrong postage on it, and it did not get to the 'News Letter' until 19 January 2017, when Mr McBride, being his usual shy, retiring self, seized on those emails and published them on the front page of the 'News Letter' on 20 January 2017.

What was unusual about that was that, in that report, Mr McBride did not publish the name of the two civil servants. Andrew McCormick — a gentleman that I know very well because he was heavily involved in Health, and I have the highest regard for him — rang Mr McBride and pleaded with him not to name the two civil servants. Indeed, he was about to meet Mr McCormick when his Minister, Mr Hamilton, intervened and told him not to do so. We now know that Mr Robinson colluded with Mr Hamilton to release that information.

We had the bizarre situation where Mr McCormick came into the office where John Robinson and Simon Hamilton were sitting and said, "This is terrible. Somebody has leaked this information to the press, to Sam McBride. What are we going to do about it?". Little did he know that the Minister and the spad had done that, and he was never told.

I served briefly as a Minister, for nine months, and if I had ever discovered that my spad had behaved in that way — and he would not have — he would have been out the door as quickly as possible. It is absolutely disgraceful behaviour to undermine your permanent secretary in that way and, basically, keep things hidden from him.

That is the sort of thing that was going on, and the problem was that the tail was wagging the dog throughout.

I do not blame any Minister, frankly, for the RHI situation. I believe that our Ministers took their eye off the ball and it was the spads, the special advisers, who created the chaos that brought down this institution for three years. Therefore, there needs to be very strong controls on their activities. In the two major parties, they have behaved appallingly.

5.30 pm

What interests me is that Sinn Féin members are sitting there like little mice in the corner. They are not answering any of these points because they know that they do not have a leg to stand on. They put up Mr McHugh as the big hitter to speak on their behalf. Where are the stars of Sinn Féin? Where are Mr O'Dowd and Mr Murphy? Why are they not speaking out to defend the activities of their spads? The reason is that they know that they are indefensible.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Will the Member start to address the amendments, please?

Mr Wells: Yes. I will address the amendments. With regard to one of the amendments that Mr Allister has, quite correctly, put forward, he said that there must be a limit on special advisers' pay. I agree with him totally. Let us put on record what special advisers in the Assembly were being paid out of taxpayers' money at the time of the RHI crisis. Mr Richard Bullick was paid £91,809 per annum; Mr Timothy Johnston, £91,809; Dr Dara O'Hagan, £89,480; Mark Mullan, who I never had the benefit of meeting, £75,000; Andrew Crawford, who, unfortunately, I met on many occasions, £68,747; and John Robinson, £84,000 a year. Those are staggering salaries, and they are way out of line with what is paid to spads at Westminster and in other devolved Assemblies in the rest of the United Kingdom.

As I said earlier — I will say it again — I remember a time when we paid senior spads only £82,000 a year, and they were having trouble getting by. Life was tough. Those people were in their thirties and forties and, as I said earlier, had never fought an election in their life and had no political experience but happened to be friends with the Minister. They were having trouble getting by on £82,000. I remember sitting in room 315, as a member of the DUP, and being told by the then party leader that we had to support an increase in the salary of senior spads to £92,000 a year. I remember thinking, "This is not right". Then, I thought, "You could pay the price for opposing it". We meekly traipsed through the Lobbies to vote for a £92,000 a year salary for senior spads.

When the Assembly fell in January 2017, each of those spads received a pay-off that was equal to half their salary. Therefore, Mr Bullick got £45,904; Timothy Johnston, £45,904; Dara O'Hagan, £44,700; Mark Mullan, £37,500; and Andrew Crawford, £34,373. The first £30,000 of that was tax-free. Am I wrong? Have I not seen Dr O'Hagan walking around the corridors of this particular institution as a spad? In other words, even though they lost their jobs, they were quickly resurrected.

The point that I made to Mr Frew is that the reason why spads in London, Leinster House, Cardiff and Edinburgh are so highly paid is that, inevitably, with the volatility of politics, Ministers will fall all the time and, therefore, the spad falls. They may be a spad for only two or three years, or they may have transgressed like Dominic Cummings and be a spad for all of eight months before being ordered out the door. That is what can happen in London. However, in Northern Ireland, of course, that does not happen. Spads continue on regardless of their Minister. I have nothing against Dr O'Hagan personally, but she certainly seems to have been around this Building for a very long time. Similarly, Mr Johnston seems to have been around this Building for an eternity. I certainly remember Mr Crawford moving quite happily from one Minister to another. Therefore, the fact is that the pay reflects a volatility that does not exist in this Building.

The only spad who I can remember who moved on because of pay — in fact, he was actually quite a nice individual, which is unusual for a spad — was a gentleman who was here between 2000 and 2002 and moved on to become a High Court judge. He has done very well. We have managed to retain all the rest of them. Therefore, on the point that there needs to be a stupendous salary to motivate and attract spads, it seems that that is not necessary.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I concur with a lot of what he said. However, there is a fallacy that somehow we have more spads, and there have been all sorts of quotations about that. There are 24 spads in the Prime Minister's office. You can look this up, as I just did there now. Dominic Cummings is on almost £100,000. There are four pay bands for special advisers.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): Sorry, but can the Member speak towards the mic, please?

Mr Storey: Apologies, Mr Deputy Speaker.

There are four pay bands for spads. Band 1 is from £40,000 to £60,000; band 2 is from £57,000 to £78,000; band 3 is from £73,000 to £102,000; and band 4 is from £96,000 to £145,000. Sometimes, the generalities expressed about what individuals are paid and how many there are are not always rooted in fact.

Mr Wells: Well, Mr Storey, there is a world of difference between serving a population the size of Leicestershire and serving the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, which has a population of 60 million or 70 million.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: I certainly will.

Mr Storey: That is not how it is portrayed. We have always been told that there are more spads in the Executive Office than there are in Westminster, but that is not the case.

Mr Wells: Again, dealing with somewhere the size of the United Kingdom, along with the number of MPs and Ministers at Westminster, is rather different from dealing with what would constitute the size of a county council in most parts of England.

The point is that Mr Cummings has gone. Mr Cummings was earning less than our senior spads were getting in 2017. Mr Cummings, given the power that he exercised — he was the second-most influential spad in the United Kingdom — yet he was earning less than £92,000 a year. The fact that he has now gone tells you how volatile a position it is. Our spads do not have that problem. Our spads are around for a very, very long time. Therefore, the salary has to be capped.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

I was worried by what Mr Frew said, because what he wants is flexibility. We cannot have anything too rigid, because Ministers must have the discretion to ensure that, if they get a star performer — their best mate — he or she is endowed with a fabulous pay rise. We have to bring that under control. Mr Allister's view that we peg it to a specific level in the Civil Service is a good one. That takes the decision as to what special advisers are paid out of ministerial control. Special advisers will therefore come in knowing exactly what they will get, and they will stay on that level throughout their career. Do remember that, when they do go, they get a very substantial redundancy payment. Indeed, we had a situation where a spad was made redundant because that person had become an MP, and walked out with fabulous severance pay. It cannot be right that someone can do that, but the system here allows that to happen. We simply cannot allow those sorts of pay grades to continue. Therefore, I will support Mr Allister's proposal in its entirety.

To be honest, I think that the Member has been too generous. He must have got up one morning in a very good frame of mind when he decided to set that pay scale. Frankly, given the behaviour of spads in the past, I would like to see 10 years of very good behaviour before I would award them those sorts of pay grades. I accept that, in the interests of getting unanimity, we should, indeed, go along with what he is suggesting. I hope and pray that we can get the Bill through unscathed.

Someone said earlier today that there is a lack of public confidence in this institution. You can say that again. We only have to turn on a radio show from 9.00 am to 10.30 am — I will not name the individual concerned — to hear what the public are saying about us. We are held in the same high esteem as drug dealers and armed gangsters, and that is probably impugning the integrity of other decent armed gangsters in Northern Ireland. The reality is that people have an incredibly low view of us. When they see that we cannot keep our special advisers under control and that we are paying them a salary that none of the ordinary men on the street could ever attain, they think, "What on earth are they playing at?". Therefore, it cannot be in a code. It has to be in legislation, and the numbers have to be restricted. I would prefer four, but I understand why Mr Allister, having taken soundings, has gone for six.

To take up Mr O'Toole's issue, I do not think that there is going to be much of a problem with severance payments, whether they happen at the end of March 2021 or 2022. As far as I know, there are only six spads in position at the moment. If we remove the right to have a junior Minister spad, I presume that the parties will simply move the person affected to become a permanent deputy First Minister or First Minister spad, so I do not see there being any real effect on public expenditure. I think that four is enough, but I can live with six.

Mr Speaker, I reserve the right to come back at the next two stages. I think that we are in for a very long night on the Bill. I congratulate the honourable Member for North Antrim for his tenacity and hard work. I congratulate the Chair of the Committee and the Committee staff, in particular Jim McManus for all his efforts, and other members of the Committee — some of them, anyhow.

There were three members of the Committee who were, obviously, given scripts in Connolly House and told to oppose everything. I have been in this Building for 26 years, and I have never come across members opposing the short and long title of a Bill. You just do not do that. That is like saying that you oppose the fact that this is Tuesday. It just never happened.

I see that Mr McHugh is saying that they are going to vote against every clause and every amendment from Mr Allister. Dear help the Members who miss tonight's sitting, because their voting records are going to be absolutely destroyed if they do not go through the Lobbies. I am going to stick it out, and I will be here to vote for Mr Allister on every aspect of his Bill.

Mr Catney: You will be pleased to know that I have a shortened script and a longer script [Laughter] so I have decided that I am going to go for the shortened script, definitely. I am going to try to keep it as quick as I can.

Mr Speaker: Try the shorter one first of all, Pat.

Mr Catney: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I am supportive of the intent of the Bill, which is to provide clarity on and scrutiny of the appointment of special advisers, how information is recorded and handled and the accountability of Departments and Ministers to the Assembly.

I thank the Bill's sponsor for his work in bringing it forward, and, despite my reservations with parts of the Bill, for his willingness to work with the Committee in order to find consensus and a way forward to the vital reform that it could provide for all. There are clauses that I am happy with, and some, I feel, need some work.

I could go back to the bad government, I could go back to what the people out there want and I could go back to my election in Lagan Valley in order to come up here to try to make changes. It is cumbersome and slow moving up here, but we want change, and I also like to go with small steps.

I know that Matthew, who spoke on criminal sanctions, will rise again to speak on that. Unlike the apparent position of some parties, however, I do not think it is sensible, or, indeed, correct, to oppose every single clause. It is a tough choice, but I think that I could bring myself to vote for clause 15, which is the short title of the Bill. [Laughter.] I thank the Bill's sponsor for his proposed amendment to clause 1, which, for the most part, brings more clarity. I still have concern about amendment No 4 on whether the political nature of the appointment of special advisers needs to be included explicitly. I appreciate the argument that Jim put forward, which was that nothing in the clause prevents including political affinity in the job description, but something needs to be put back in there in black and white in order to secure the principle in the future operation of the Bill.

I welcome amendment No 7 and new clause A2. I know that there was some back and forth at the Committee about the number of special advisers that are required in the Executive Office. Jim has done well to find the suitable number of six. Similarly, I had concern about how the clause operated to reduce the number of special advisers. I support the clarity given in amendment Nos 8 and 9 that not all special advisers in the Executive Office will need to be reappointed by the action of clause 4.

I have set out some points of clarity that will be required going forward. I still hope that those can be provided at Further Consideration Stage and that there is a way forward for the Bill. I think that we can all agree that RHI was only the latest and most publicised issue with the function of the Executive and that change must be achieved.

I thank the Bill's sponsor and everyone who has contributed to it: the Committee, the Chair of the Committee and Jim McManus.

5.45 pm

Miss Woods: I, too, thank the Member for bringing forward this vital legislation. I am glad to speak to its Consideration Stage today.

At Second Stage, we supported the principles of the Bill. Gladly, we also support the amendments in group 1. I note, disappointing as it is, that some in the Chamber will not support the Bill and would rather leave this to simple codes

It was said earlier that it is not the place of a Back-Bench MLA to table legislation such as this and that this is not how anyone should judge legislation and its effects on the running of the House. In response to that, I ask this: why not? When the Executive were restored in January of this year, we all hoped that lessons had been learned and that we would not see a return to the type of governance that brought us RHI, Red Sky, the National Asset Management Agency (NAMA) and a host of other shenanigans that we are yet to know about. We hoped that the lofty words and the wish list in 'New Decade, New Approach' meant just that. Unfortunately, I remain unconvinced, and, crucially, the public remain unconvinced. We need confidence in the institutions, we need accountability, and we must have transparency. I have absolutely no confidence that we would ever see legislation such as this come from the Executive. Who brings forward this legislation is not relevant. What is relevant is what it seeks to do, as many Members have suggested.

I, like Mr Wells, have read the RHI inquiry report. It was light Christmas reading. I note that it concluded:

"The sad reality is that, in addition to a significant number of individual shortcomings, the very governance, management and communication systems, which in these circumstances should have provided early warning of impending problems and fail-safes against such problems, proved inadequate."

It has been made very clear that what happened with RHI was not a one-off mistake; it was merely indicative of a system and culture that failed to put accountability, transparency and effective governance at its root. For these institutions to put this front and centre, there is much more to be done. Transformation must happen.

I welcome the words of the head of the so-called reformist wing of the DUP, Mr Frew, as he makes the case for change, but we must go further. The earlier discussion between Mr Wells and Mr Frew on the internal workings of the DUP was fascinating. However, the RHI report cannot be left to gather dust with all the other reports and strategies that came before it. There is an onus on every one of us to recognise the need for action and to promote transparency and accountability in every action that we take as elected representatives —.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. Does she accept that the RHI inquiry also highlighted serious misgivings about and failings in the Civil Service? Will she, when we are on the issue of openness of transparency, agree that, if you wanted to read the most ambiguous and limited set of minutes, you should go on to the Executive's website and read the most recent iteration of the weekly meeting held by the head of the Civil Service? You will see a large need for openness and transparency.

Miss Woods: I thank the Member for his intervention. Yes, of course, there is such a need. As I said, we need to go further than this legislation. Every action that we take must recognise the need for openness and transparency.

There is an onus on every one of us. The job of governing is not an easy one, and I do not underestimate the role of our Ministers and the work that they must undertake, particularly in dealing with the unprecedented situation that we are in with the pandemic and all that it entails, Brexit on the horizon and climate breakdown looming. However, if we are to tackle the challenges of our time, we need proper oversight processes in place so that our politics are not beset by controversy and crisis.

On the specifics of today, the Green Party will — it will be no surprise — support all the amendments in group 1. The role and dominance of spads in our Executive has been, rightly, viewed with suspicion. Special advisers are a feature of most Governments, and few could argue that the provision of specialist advice to Ministers is not beneficial to good government, but we need to have good government. It is right that checks and balances are in place to ensure that their role and remit is as it should be. Spads are temporary appointments, so it is only right that they are treated like civil servants, both in pay and in their abidance to the code of conduct. As Mr Allister stated, it does not mean that they do not become political appointments. I do not understand how an upper scale of over 80 grand would not be an attractive salary for anyone with experience. We need to have a ceiling somewhere, as an interim, as outlined in the group 1 amendments. It is also right that there is greater transparency around their recruitment and any interests that they might have, given how close they are to the decision-making process. As Mr Allister has outlined, we have codes already. We had codes before, but codes are ignored. It is also right that, perhaps, we know who the spads are.

While I support amendment No 7, repealing the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007, I also would have supported clause 2 as it stood. I stated earlier that I do not underestimate the role of Ministers, and I stand by that. It is complex — the role of the Executive Office may, indeed, be even more so — but I see no legitimate or convincing arguments for having eight spads in that Department. I would have supported a reduction to four as a reasonable and practical level of support for the work of the office, but I appreciate the reason for Mr Allister not moving that today. We fully support the removal of the junior Minister spad allocation. Here is hoping that three is, indeed, the magic number.

I will be short. We will support group 1, and we wish Mr Allister all the best with his Bill.

Ms Sugden: I generally support the group 1 amendments. I bring a level of experience to the debate, having appointed a special adviser. I want to put it on record that not all spads are bad, not all spads are party political: some are there to do the job as interpreted by the Minister who appointed them. My interpretation of the role of a spad was to assist in the delivery of government programmes, to oversee the work of a public-sector Department through strategic external experience, to build relationships with internal and external stakeholders, to be a sounding board to echo back to me the bad as well as the good, and to be someone that I could trust to have my back. Who could I, at 29 years old, know with those abilities and the necessary experience and whom I could trust? Fortunately, I did. I received many CVs from people reaching out to offer their skills, and fair play to them for doing that and putting themselves out there. I considered them, if only to assure myself that the person that I was appointing was the right person for the job.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Ms Sugden: Yes.

Mr Wells: Does the Member accept that, with the salary ranging from £65,000 to £92,000, she did not have any problems attracting suitably qualified candidates?

Ms Sugden: That is an interesting point. My special adviser took a pay cut to take on the role of special adviser and lost out financially. That is how skilled and perfectly capable she was. I was going to come to that point, but I appreciate the Member making the point for me. She will not mind me saying that she took a pay cut. She worked for an international company with the vice president and had worked in New York, London, Belfast and Paris. She was an incredible and unassuming individual, and we really had the opportunity to do wonderful things. Undoubtedly, she was the best person for the job. Interestingly, I have no doubt that, had Mr Allister's Bill and arrangements been in place, she would have been the person who would have got the job on merit. I did not want my special adviser to be political, albeit she was politically astute and had been politically active; I wanted her to help me deliver. I was very clear about that, as was she.

I can only speak from my experience, and I know that that is not how spads are typically appointed. I am in a unique position: as an independent MLA, I am not constrained by political party lines or political party history. For me, the job was always about getting the job done. That is what every Minister's intent should be. That is what they agree to when they accept the responsibilities of being a Minister.

During the sideshows of the RHI mess, I often heard, "Poor Minister Me. The big bad spad made me do it". The spad did not. You made a choice to accept the terms of the relationship when you agreed to be Minister. When I appointed my spad, it was really obvious to me that there was an unwritten rule that the special adviser was my responsibility; that she answered to me; that she was held to account by me; and that she could be removed by me. It was not an equal relationship, and my special adviser was certainly not superior to me. She understood that and had no difficulty with it. If any Ministers, on taking the role, agree to lesser terms than that, that is entirely on them. That is what I, as Minister, understood the role to be. I would not have accepted it had it been any other way. I would not have taken it up, because I would not have accepted the responsibility. Again, I appreciate that my experience as an independent Member will be different from that of anyone who is in a political party, but this is about delivery, government and getting things done. Any Ministers who accept the role and are prepared to relinquish their power lack integrity. If they do that, it is clear to me that they took the job for the title and the salary, and nothing else. It is important that we move the focus away from bad spads. It is bad Ministers who have allowed this to happen.

During my time as an MLA, I have learnt not to pay too much attention to Mr Allister's theatrical performances. The media do a wonderful job of that [Laughter.]

Mr Storey: You are going downhill now.

Ms Sugden: Please bear with me [Laughter.] I suspect that that is why he does it. I do, however, pay attention to his consideration of law, policy, process and detail and to his incredible ability to make sense of those things. I do not share Mr Allister's opinion of these institutions. I recognise the value of the devolved institutions, despite their dysfunctionality. I agree, however, with what Mr Allister said in his opening comments: the Bill is not politically written. It may have had a political intent, but Mr Allister is well aware, as we all are, that the golden rule of politics is that it is the art of the possible. Had the Bill been politically written rather than politically driven, it would not have been possible. The fact that it has been able to get to Consideration Stage shows that it is as much about process and governance as it is about any sort of political intent. Politicians come and go, but these institutions will remain. Why? There is no better alternative. Ironically, the Bill gives me hope. I believe that Mr Allister is seeking to improve these institutions, which leads me to believe that, one day, he might buy into them [Laughter.] I want to speak to only the amendments that give rise to issues for me. That does not mean that I will necessarily stand in their way, but I would appreciate it if Mr Allister would give me some clarity around them. Amendment Nos 2 and 3 would ensure that special advisers will be subject to the same disciplinary process as civil servants. Who would conduct that process? Would it be the Civil Service? Is that appropriate, given that the Minister, not the Civil Service, appointed the person? I would have difficulty if the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, for example, were to discipline my staff as the employer, albeit it pays the wages and sets the terms. Perhaps there is some way of tidying that up so that the reporting structure that is required in any employment contract is made clear. In a way, we would subject individuals to a disciplinary process by someone who is not their employer. How would that look under the current arrangements?

I do not disagree with the intent of accountability. We are all subject to accountability structures. Ironically, Ministers are not subject to the same accountability structures. Had that been an area that was strengthened, perhaps the Bill would not be necessary. As it is drafted, it feels like a blurring of lines in the relationship between employer and employee. I am keen to know whether that upholds current employment law or at least complements it.

Amendment No 4 seems to have given some Members cause for concern. I did not initially like it. I felt that it created a process that could limit the political discretion of the appointment. Having scrutinised the wording, however, I do not believe that it does.

If anything, it puts on record what I believe should already happen, a process similar to that which I would have conducted when I was in that role: seeking the correct person for the job. It also allows for political discretion, in that the Minister creates the job description and person specification. Arguably, if a Minister already has someone in mind, they can write it in a particular way to allow that person to be appointed. All the amendment does is require a Minister to put it in writing and justify their decision. Therefore, while initially I was intent on not supporting that amendment, I do not believe that there is too much wrong with it.

6.00 pm

I agree with the suggestion that we should reduce the number of special advisers in The Executive Office from eight to six. I do not see the necessity for having any more than that, particularly when you compare it with other jurisdictions, where there is not the same representation of spads in Departments.

It is important to put on record what special advisers are there for and what their purpose is. I have outlined that insofar as what I needed to do. It is interesting, because I am almost agreeing with everyone on this side of the House. I believe that, ultimately, the buck stops with the Minister, who is the appointing person. However, if we do not have the appropriate and relevant structures in place to ensure that Ministers are holding to account the people they appoint, maybe Mr Allister's Bill is necessary.

It is disappointing that some Members have chosen not to engage. As I said, we politicians are coming and going. Mr Allister tends to cause controversy and, to an extent, we like him for that. He is not here as Mr Jim Allister, private citizen; he is here representing the people of North Antrim, and when we disrespect him, in his office as MLA, we disrespect the mandate that the people of North Antrim gave him. We are all entitled to have that opinion.

We need to get back to ensuring the integrity of the Assembly and to building confidence among the public. To be fair to Mr Allister, we ask: should this Bill be necessary? No, it should not. I would like to think that people's good intentions drive what should be done. Sadly, however, as we have seen in what has characterised the past three or four years, that has not been the case. There is nothing wrong with putting on record, or putting into writing, what should be the case. Therefore, I support this group of amendments, although I seek clarity from Mr Allister in respect of amendment Nos 1 and 2.

Mr Carroll: I support many parts of this Bill, including the clauses and amendments in group 1, which I now address.

The damning accounts given in the RHI inquiry, Sam McBride's 'Burned', and countless column inches should be reason enough to accept that these changes should be made via legislation. We simply cannot trust Ministers in this Executive to hold to account themselves or their spads via codes that they can tinker with, and have tinkered with, quite freely.

It is clear to me, listening to Mr Allister's opening remarks, that he and I would probably disagree about the remit of spads. If I had my way, we would not have unelected officials, with significant power, swanning around Departments in the unaccountable manner exposed by scandals such as RHI. I find it unsettling that spads are afforded any powers or given privileges far above those afforded to other civil servants and far above what any unelected individual should expect to hold.

It is also clear that, for far too long, the big parties have, with impunity, ridden on a gravy train, at public expense and often at the cost of the public purse. For that reason, I welcome the bulk of what is before us, in particular, those clauses and amendments that seek to curtail such behaviour. For example, I support the reduction in the number of spads by removing them from junior Ministers' offices, as outlined in amendment No 7. I also endorse clause 3. Many will find it humorously ironic that Sinn Féin would endorse or use something called a "royal prerogative" to appoint someone to effectively act as a spin doctor, who was charged with enhancing the profile and image of the Executive. In other words, they sell to the public the benefits of a cosy Sinn Féin/DUP friendship. I do not find that in the least bit humorous; I find it utterly unsurprising. I also find the fact that they used the power of the monarchy to appoint a PR doctor from public funds, without a shred of oversight or transparency, utterly unsurprising. The First and deputy First Minister must not be allowed to engage in such underhandedness in the future.

My party is also inclined to support amendment Nos 2, 3 and 4. It is patently clear that someone paid from the public purse to advise a Minister should be hired with some degree of record-keeping and regulation. The need for this is redoubled by the fact that the current Minister of Finance saw fit to change the code for appointments to remove such measures. What does the Minister of Finance have to hide when he is hiring spads that stops him from supporting basic record-keeping for that process? The legislation does not prevent him from picking the right person for the job, the person who works best with him or the person who meets the criteria outlined in a job spec. I cannot fathom why Ministers are uncomfortable with, or opposed to, explaining their choices to the public, who will be forking out for the well-paid role.

Unfortunately, amendment Nos 2, 3 and 4 apply to clause 1. My party is not content to support that clause in its entirety because of clause 1(6). The simple reason is that my party would not have supported Mr Allister's Bill in 2013, as it disproportionately impacted on ex-prisoners. Therefore, my party cannot support any attempt to enhance or beef up that legislation. To be clear, my party will support amendment Nos 2, 3 and 4, but will oppose clause 1 in its entirety. My party does this in the hope that if it is defeated and clause 1 stands, the Bill will, at least, address the serious issues in the process of appointing spads and discipline them more rigorously.

Finally, what happens in the Chamber today and tonight should be closely watched. Parties that claim to support openness and transparency and claim that they work for their community but cannot bring themselves to slow the pace of the gravy train that they stand to benefit from are acting in their own interests, not the interests of the public. Those parties are not acting with the fervour that scandal after scandal on this hill commands. I suggest that this place needs root-and-branch reform, root-and-branch restructuring and a wholesale break from the shambolic governance of the past. This Bill, in its entirety, does not deliver that, but parts of it certainly help in that endeavour.

Mr Speaker: I call the Finance Minister, Conor Murphy, to respond.

Mr Murphy (The Minister of Finance): I have the task of responding to the Bill because the Executive gave me the task of leading its response to the RHI inquiry, chairing the RHI subcommittee and bringing the matters approved by it to the Executive for approval. Having listened to much of the debate, I could almost think that, perhaps, Sinn Féin is in the Executive on its own; would that it was. However, it is as if the approach agreed for dealing with these matters across the Executive since it was re-formed did not happen at all. The debate today is as if there had been no response at all to the RHI inquiry, no agreed response among the five parties that make up the Executive and no follow through on that response.

The evidence given to the RHI inquiry directly informed the extensive talks on transparency, accountability and the operation of the Executive in the summer of 2019, and that formed the work stream of the talks that led, ultimately, to New Decade, New Approach.

Representatives of the five main parties were involved in the discussion about improvements to the ministerial code, special adviser codes and the NICS code of ethics. The conclusions of those discussions were reflected in New Decade, New Approach. The parties agreed to an ambitious package of measures to strengthen transparency and governance arrangements in the Assembly and the Executive in line with international best practice. The Executive were committed, as a matter of urgency, to produce strengthened drafts of the ministerial, Civil Service and special adviser codes to be implemented immediately.

Mr O'Toole said in his contribution that the Minister of Finance had decided that legislation was not necessary. That is not true at all. The Executive, including your party colleague, decided that legislation was not necessary. The Executive have followed through on every aspect of the work that led to New Decade, New Approach and agreed on every aspect of the work since, without objection as to how that approach has taken place.

He also questioned why Sinn Féin, as a party, supports legislation in the Dáil but not in the Assembly. Clearly, the parties — some of whom are the SDLP's sister parties — in the Government in Dublin have not committed to strengthening codes and increasing transparency. As a matter of fact, some of the recent public appointments justify the call for legislation, because clearly some of the appointments are not transparent. If the party beside me wants to get out of or wriggle away from the commitments that it gave and on which its Executive colleague has followed through, let it do that rather than trying to present this approach to opposition to legislation or a different approach to legislation to me and me alone. I happen to chair the subcommittee, and I happen to lead on behalf of the Executive on this matter, and every aspect of anything that I have brought to the Executive has received full support from every Executive party.

The measures that we agreed included issues addressed in this Bill: making clear the accountability of Ministers to the Assembly; strengthening Ministers' responsibility for their special advisers; publishing details of Ministers' meetings with external organisations; publishing details of gifts and hospitality received by special advisers, of their meetings with external organisations and of their pay; and strengthening requirements for record-keeping and protections for whistle-blowers. The parties also agreed to establish a robust, independent enforcement mechanism to deal with breaches of the ministerial code and related documents.

Among the first decisions of the restored Executive in January was, unanimously, the agreement and publication of the special adviser code of conduct, the revised code of appointment for special advisers. It was not my proposition, as Mr Carroll said, but the Executive's agreed proposition. It is not my code but the Executive's code, agreed among all of the parties in the Executive. There are new arrangements for special adviser pay and a revised model and letter of appointment.

Interestingly, Mr Storey and Mr Allister — sorry, I meant Mr Wells; I sometimes mix the two — majored on the issue of pay. The pay scales did not, in fairness, prevent him from joining the Executive. He knew all about this and objected to it but decided to take the post when it was offered to him. He set aside his principles. The pay scales have been reviewed, and Mr Storey said that the Bill will allow us to see what the pay is. The pay was published. The Department of Finance published the pay. That document, published on 14 February, contains the list of all the special advisers; the bands that they are put in; the restrictions, and the cap that has been put on their pay, which is nowhere near £91,000. It has the details of all of them and which band they are on. I say that to correct the debate, because some of it is as if there is a complete vacuum with ongoing activity on these matters.

The Executive parties, in fairness to them — all of your colleagues — have filled this with the action that we agreed to do, and they did cap the pay of special advisers. They did publish the names and the pay scales that these people are on. It is as if this has appeared out of the ether with Mr Allister's Bill. Our approach to this has nothing to do with the politics of Mr Allister. This is the Executive's agreement, and I am here to represent the Executive's agreement. I think that he overestimates his importance in that regard. The Executive have decided an approach to this, and I have been tasked with chairing and leading that approach and bringing that back to the Executive. Each aspect of this has had full Executive agreement.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Murphy: I am happy to give way.

Mr Wells: I suggest to the Member for Newry and Armagh, the Minister, that, yes, the Executive may well have given him an undertaking that they would oppose this Bill but that, when the relevant Ministers went back to their parties, they received a very clear message from the Back-Benchers that they were going to support Mr Allister's Bill. The party leaders realised that they could not win the argument.

Mr Murphy: If the Member wants to outline some rationale for a kind of duplicitous approach to this, that is fair enough. That is his understanding of it. I had an RHI subcommittee meeting last Thursday, I think it was, in which we progressed further the work that we had already set out to do, with the full agreement of the Ministers who were there. An agreement was made to bring that to a further RHI subcommittee meeting in December, in order to bring it to the Executive for approval in December. If that was the case, Ministers and the Executive that I am dealing with are still on the same course and pathway that they agreed to take, which emerged from the five-party work stream prior to the resetting of the Executive being affirmed in 'New Decade, New Approach' and which was then followed through immediately by the Executive when they were appointed.

Mr Frew: I appreciate the Minister's giving way on this. I recognise what he saying, because his argument is consistent with the argument that he brought to the Finance Committee along with David Sterling, the then head of the Civil Service, and his own permanent secretary, Sue Gray. I can tell the Minister that, whilst he was conducting and relaying that argument to the Committee, it was alien to me because at no time during which I have been tasked by my party to sit on the Finance Committee, at no time during Second Reading and at no time during consideration in the Committee was I ever informed by my party that it was against this Bill and at no time when I asked did it say that it was against this Bill.

6.15 pm

Mr Murphy: The Member and I have had many discussions across the Chamber about the nature of how his party does its business. I cannot get into that any further. I can reflect only the discussions around the Executive table, the agreed approach and the follow-through on that approach, and the approval of the codes. At no stage has anyone in the Executive ever suggested that legislation is required to replace, supplement or complement the work that we have been doing in the Executive. At no stage has any Minister ever suggested that over the last nine months.

Following the RHI inquiry, the subcommittee on reform conducted the review at its first meeting in July. The majority of the inquiry's recommendations have already been fulfilled by the existing revisions to the codes and guidance. The subcommittee agreed to make recommendations to the full Executive for a couple of minor additions that would fulfil the terms of the inquiry's recommendations. Those amendments have been circulated to Executive members without objection, and they will be formally agreed by the Executive shortly.

In summary, the parties in the Executive followed the evidence to the inquiry, committed themselves to act in response through revisions to the codes, and the Executive have followed through on that commitment and satisfied themselves that they have fulfilled those recommendations, including the recommendation to revise the codes.

I will move on to the Bill. As I said, my opposition to it is in order to be consistent with what my Executive colleagues and I have agreed and to follow through on that work. It has nothing at all to do with the politics of the sponsor of the Bill.

Mr O'Toole: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I echo what Paul Frew said about his consistency, and he has been consistent on this point. Speaking for my party, I believe that the work streams inside the Executive are not mutually exclusive with the Bill. As I said, we do not support all elements of the Bill. However, will the Minister reflect on the fact that passing the Bill, either as it is now or with amendments — as we hope — does not preclude positive, constructive progress along with the work streams in the Executive subcommittee?

Mr Murphy: In recent weeks, I accused Mr O'Toole of being a great man for an each-way bet, and he has proved that again tonight. He tends to have an each-way bet on all these issues. He is with the Executive and with the Bill at the same time. That is his prerogative and the prerogative of his party. I can deal only with the people who are sent along to the Executive subcommittee and to Executive meetings, and follow through on that course. As an Executive Minister, that is my job here tonight: to respond to the Bill with the consistent approach that the Executive have taken since they were re-formed back in January.

Mr Frew: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Murphy: May I finish my point? I took issue with the Member on two points. He said that it was my decision not to pursue legislation when it was clearly the Executive's decision not to do so. No one at an Executive meeting has ever proposed pursuing legislation.

The Member then challenged the consistency of my party's approach, even though I am here representing the Executive position. He challenged the consistency of my party's approach in the Dáil, where it is a completely different set of circumstances.

Mr Frew: I appreciate the Minister giving way. I do not need an answer immediately, and I am sure that he has advisers and support staff here. Will he provide dates for when the Executive settled on opposition to the Bill?

Mr Murphy: The Executive were never asked to approve or vote against the Bill formally. The Executive agreed a course of action that they would take in response to RHI. That was around strengthening the codes, the RHI recommendations and the work that your party and four other Executive parties undertook in summer 2019, when they looked at the evidence being given to the RHI inquiry and decided, in advance of its recommendations, the areas that would need to be strengthened in terms of the existing codes, protocols and practices, and they brought forward a series of recommendations. The Executive agreed immediately at one of the first, if not the first, Executive Committee meeting to take forward the recommendation in that area of work. In response to the RHI inquiry report, when it came out some time later, they decided to proceed with that course of action.

The Executive have not been asked to take a position on the Bill, but, as I said, they have consistently concluded that the response to the RHI inquiry and its recommendations would be through the work that they had agreed on strengthening the codes and increasing transparency. At no stage did anyone propose that legislation would be required.

The group 1 amendments aim to reform the function and behaviour of special advisers. The evidence to the RHI inquiry certainly highlighted the fact that things go wrong with special advisers.

The revised code of conduct for special advisers, which the Executive published and agreed in January, already captures a significant proportion of those measures and, indeed, goes further in setting out the parameters of good practice. The revisions to the ministerial code of conduct that were agreed in March by the Executive are equally important here as they have to define the relationship between the Minister and the special adviser.

The Executive have given serious attention to the codes and guidance that cover the standards of behaviour in government. The codes and guidance were subject to extensive discussion during the talks in 2019, as I said previously. They were a significant part of the 'New Decade, New Approach' document and were subject to Executive scrutiny before and after the publication of the RHI inquiry report. The RHI inquiry recommended amendments to the codes rather than legislation. In addition, I am not convinced that the way to bring about the desired change is through this legislation. Putting administrative arrangements into primary legislation makes them difficult to adjust, and it opens up relatively minor matters to legal challenge, which benefits no one, apart from lawyers.

Clause 1(2), which would be amended by amendment No 1, would make it unlawful for a special adviser to be responsible for managing any other special advisers, except those in the Executive Office. Of course, in all other Departments, the special adviser is accountable to their Minister and to no one else. That is inherent in the relationship between the two by virtue of the fact that special advisers are appointed by their Minister. I will add that the appointment process has been the same for all special advisers to the Executive. If other parties felt that there was anything untoward or that a better standard could have been adopted, they could have chosen to go out to public appointment for their special advisers and published the details of who they interviewed. They could have chosen to advertise, but they all chose to appoint their special advisers under the arrangements that were put forward. Mr Wells, do you wish me to give way?

Mr Wells: He knows that that is not true. He has not answered the point — none of his colleagues has answered it — about the role of Mr Aidan McAteer, a super-spada who was not subject to any form of appointment and was not responsible to any form of Civil Service code. He was appointed by his party as a super-spada to control the activities of all the other spadas, who were answerable to their Minister. In fact, Mr McAteer was answerable to Mr Martin McGuinness, the deputy First Minister, not to the relevant Minister. How does the Minister explain that activity by Mr McAteer and how does a code stop that happening again?

Mr Murphy: The codes that have been developed here have been developed since RHI. They have been developed in response to it and agreed by the five parties. We have been criticised for taking away what some people said was a sham process of going through an appointments process on paper and making it clear that the appointment of the special adviser was the responsibility of the Minister alone, that they were accountable to the Minister and that the Minister would be held accountable to the Assembly. That has all changed since the period that he is referring to. The Minister is responsible to the Assembly for that appointment and, under the ministerial code, can be answerable for the activities and behaviour of their special adviser.

I lost my train of thought when responding to the Member. Clause 1(3), which amendment No 2 would amend, requires a special adviser code of conduct to ensure that special advisers are subject to the discipline chapter of the NICS handbook, and the Minister cannot interfere in that disciplinary process. I am glad that the Bill's sponsor has recognised that that clause, as originally drafted, was eternally inconsistent. It would make no sense to insist that the Minister must be responsible for the conduct and discipline of a special adviser and then say that he or she cannot be involved in that discipline. The clause remains out of step with the purpose and function of a special adviser. Special advisers are our personal appointments. They are supposed to be someone whom the Minister has hand-picked, and that is quite right. A Minister is surrounded by officials whom they have no role in choosing. To have one hand-picked political appointment is not going to undermine the effectiveness of the Civil Service, but it provides an invaluable alternative perspective and political support. I heard other Members allude to that when relating their personal experience. Claire Sugden alluded to it, albeit she had a non-political special adviser.

If one has a personally appointed special adviser, one has to be able to treat them as such. If the personal relationship breaks down — that experience that has been referenced — that appointment cannot continue. The Minister and special adviser have to part ways and do so immediately. The breakdown of the relationship between a former Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister and his spada was a contributory factor to the RHI debacle. To expect the Minister to go through the time-consuming path of Civil Service discipline in order to remove a special adviser is ridiculous. A special adviser cannot be moved to another post during an investigation, and the tax-paying public would not thank us if a special adviser was put on paid leave until their disciplinary process was complete. This provision undermines the implementation of the RHI inquiry recommendations. The inquiry wanted Ministers' responsibility for their special advisers to be absolutely clear. Rendering Ministers' responsibilities subject to the NICS handbook compromises that clarity.

Amendment No 4 falls into the same trap. It requires a Minister to conduct an appointments process that reflects the appointments process for civil servants. As I said, as far as I am aware, all Ministers in the current Executive have made their appointments in the way that has been outlined and could have chosen to take other steps had they wished to do so. The Bill sponsor makes the mistake of thinking that special advisers ought to be just like other civil servants. Ministers have plenty of civil servants, and we need a special adviser. Such a process would also mean that a Minister was without an adviser for weeks after taking office as that process was conducted. I would like to correct a misapprehension. When the RHI inquiry concluded that Ministers ought to have followed the terms of the code of appointment, which, at the time, did require a selection process of this kind, the inquiry was not reaching a conclusion that the selection process was necessary. It was observing that, if there were rules, those ought to have been followed. I believe that the current rules are appropriate and proportionate and that they ought to be followed rather than changed, as the Bill would require.

Amendment No 5 seeks to address some unfortunate drafting of clauses 1 to 6 in the original Bill, but it still tries to apply a legislative solution in an inappropriate way. The clause aims to ensure that only special advisers are treated as special advisers and that they are not answerable to anyone other than their appointing Minister, with a couple of exceptions. If we want to ensure that special advisers are treated in accordance with their role and that no one else is given special access to Ministers and Departments, it is a matter of leadership. Ministers have to behave like Ministers, and permanent secretaries have to maintain the correct standards in their Departments.

Amendment No 7 and clauses 2 and 3 all attempt to cut the number of special advisers in the Executive Office. I am interested to note that, where the Bill sponsor originally tried to cut the number to four, he has now cut it to three for the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. The work expected of the special advisers in the Executive Office is significant and heavily weighted. Given the volume of work required to manage effective decision-making in a mandatory coalition, the task of special advisers here cannot be compared with the task of special advisers in the offices of the First Ministers of Wales and Scotland.

In conclusion, I do not believe that any of the provisions in respect of special advisers are required. Of course, there have to be rules for ensuring that special advisers are accountable and responsible but these are already set out in their terms and conditions, including in the code of conduct. The force with which some Members have insisted that these measures are necessary does not give credit to all those special advisers who work hard providing invaluable support to Ministers and fulfilling their essential roles in Departments.

As I said at the outset, we have been consistent in saying that the way to deal with the RHI inquiry was through the strengthening of codes. We have brought those to the Executive. They emerged from the work of the five parties that make up the Executive and whose approach that was. That was reflected in the recommendations of the inquiry. We have consistently taken that work forward in that manner. That is why I, leading the work stream on this issue in the Executive, oppose the legislation.

Mr Allister: I will seek to hone in on the issues that drew most attention and raised the most questions, but I want to start by responding to what the Minister said. The Minister seems to have a very churlish attitude to the Assembly's wanting to consider legislation. It is as if we do not need the Assembly; that we simply have Executive decree. He goes out of his way to tell us how much the Executive, allegedly, are opposed to the Bill and that, effectively, we should not be discussing it at all as it is a matter for the Executive. Sorry, this is a legislative Assembly. This is a legislative Assembly that is here to discuss and decide upon legislation. Legislation ultimately rests with the House; not with the Executive but with the House.

The exercise in which we are engaged is that very exercise. It is a pretty churlish and poor start to imply that, really, we should leave all of this to the Executive and not busy ourselves in these matters. It is not clear to me, in fact, whether Minister Murphy is here, as he proclaims, representing the Executive, when members from other Executive parties seem to dispute that, or whether he is here to represent the Department of Finance, which would have primary responsibility for the oversight of the legislation. I would have thought that he is here in the latter capacity, rather than the former. However, in whatever capacity he is here, he cannot chip away at the right of the House to legislate. That is a fundamental of our very existence.

6.30 pm

All of that revolves around a point that I made in my first speech today, and that point is whether we individually and collectively think that codes that have failed lamentably in the past are a suitable vehicle to exclusively deal with the issues or whether we think that they need the bite of legislation. I was interested to note that some of our foremost commentators had a pretty poor view of dealing with the matter by codes only. Writing in 'The Irish News' at the time that the codes were published, John Manley was quite clear that the codes were disappointing and were not enough. I also noticed that the 'News Letter' editorial headed:

"Code on Stormont special advisers does not go far enough" started with a very compelling sentence, which I think the House would do well to live by. That was:

"For the Northern Ireland Assembly to command the respect and confidence of the public over a long period of time, it must right the wrongs of the previous administration ... One of the key questions, of course, is whether the new code goes far enough and the answer is that it does not."

The 'News Letter' editorial goes on to state that giving the codes true bite is required and that they should be complemented by legislation. Suzanne Breen, another notable commentator, had this to say:

"In terms of the spad code of conduct that Conor Murphy unveiled today, I think it is massively disappointing."

She went on to make some complimentary comments about the Bill's sponsor, but modestly forbids me from reading those out. She then said:

"to continue with eight spads in the Executive Office, that is absolutely ludicrous".

It is not just that some jumped-up MLA, who is a Back-Bencher and should know his place, thinks that he knows better than the Executive and dares to bring to a legislative Assembly a proposal for legislation. It is that some of the most seasoned commentators on our political process seem to hold the same view.

Ultimately, it comes down to the defining issue of whether we are prepared to place our trust on the broken reeds of codes or whether we are going to give them the bite of legislation. I remind the House again that the party that says that we do not need anything but codes is the party that said that we do not even need codes. In 2013, it was the party that voted against the very introduction of codes. Here it is again, fighting that same rearguard action to avoid oversight and restraint.

Of course, one of the most compelling reasons why it is seeking to avoid that is something that Minister Murphy talked very little about: clause 1(6). Why is clause 1(6) there? It is there because, with calculation and deliberation, Sinn Féin set about deliberately circumventing the law of the land by appointing a super spad to oversee everyone else, knowing, conscious and boasting of the fact that it breached that particular provision as it did not regard itself as being bound by it. As Mr Ó Muilleoir put it, Sinn Féin was not going to be told by Jim Allister what it could or could not do. Sorry, it was not Jim Allister. It was the Northern Ireland Assembly that said what it could and could not do the moment that it passed the Civil Service (Special Advisers) Act (Northern Ireland) 2013.

It is the same mentality that then has to inform us when we ask whether codes are enough. The party that said that we never needed codes then set about breaching the provisions of the statute, yet they are the people who are called as character witnesses to say, "You don't need legislation; you just need codes". That is confirmation of why you need to give codes the bite of legislation. I urge that view again on the House.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Wells: Does the Member accept that, if the codes are so wonderful and so enforceable, they have nothing to worry about, because the legislation will never have to be invoked?

Mr Allister: As I said this morning, if one were determined to do the right thing, why would one fear legislation? Legislation is only a restraint from wrongdoing if you are minded to do wrong. It is not a restraint if you are minded to do right. That is a very apt point.

I will home in on two issues in particular that excited most comment from the House and posed to me, very properly, questions. Clause 1(3) is about subjecting the special adviser to the Civil Service disciplinary procedures. I remind the House of two points. First, special advisers are civil servants. They have all the benefits and all the privileges, so they are civil servants. What the Minister wants is that, although they are civil servants, they should be exempt from the discipline of the Civil Service. Secondly, I remind the House that, on the one occasion in our history where a spad was being disciplined, the Finance Department conducted the investigation according to its rules and found that a disciplinary process was justified, but a Minister intervened and said, "No. It will not happen". That is exactly what Minister Murphy wants to continue with.

Mr Murphy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Murphy: I have listened to a lot of what the Member has said, whilst biting my tongue through most of it. First, if I regarded the Assembly as having no role in legislation,

I would not be here. I would not have deigned to come to the Assembly to answer and to explain the reasons that I oppose your legislation. I am not treating the Assembly or elected Members with any contempt at all.

I will say clearly that I am not proposing to continue with that. That is a misrepresentation of the position that I outlined, because the strengthening of the ministerial codes would mean that, if a Minister were to decide not to discipline a spad, thereby refusing to be accountable and responsible for them, they would be held to account. The standard of discipline is higher than in the Civil Service, because someone would not be summarily dismissed from the Civil Service but would go through a lengthy disciplinary process during which they would continue to be paid as they sat waiting for the outcome of the process, and the Member knows that full well.

The Minister being held to account was not the situation when former Minister Nelson McCausland was asked to account for the behaviour of his spad. Like a lot of other Members, including Mr Wells, you present today as if nothing has happened since that time, by alleging things and, quite rightly, drawing attention to issues that needed significant improvement. Those improvements have taken place, however, and the codes are there to hold Ministers to account, rather than simply to try to get the Finance Department to get a Minister to do the right thing.

Mr Allister: Let us consider that. The Minister says that the Minister then, for failing to discipline, could be in breach of the ministerial code. Who decides whether the Minister deserves discipline? The incestuous arrangement is that the nominating officer who put him or her in the post is the very person who then decides whether the Minister has breached the ministerial code.

How cosy is that? How farcical is that? How destructive is that to public confidence in a system? Although, theoretically, a Minister can be held liable in respect of a breach of the ministerial code, he will be held liable only by his own party and his own appointers.

I asked this morning, and I repeat it: has a Minister ever — ever — been held liable for a breach of the ministerial code under this system? I am firmly positive that the answer is no, and the reason is that it is a system that is guaranteed to provide a human shield for the Minister. In each party, there is a human shield of protection under the provisions pertaining to the ministerial code, so the Minister need not talk to the House in glowing terms about how, if he or some other Minister failed to discipline, they themselves would be in breach of discipline. Who is he kidding? He is certainly not kidding the public, because the public know that there is nothing about this system that is capable of that level of enforcement.

On the issue of disciplining a civil servant, the starting point and the premise is that they are civil servants and so there is no exemption, but there is an involvement for the Minister. That is plain in the Bill. The Minister maintains his involvement in that process, and it could well be that the provisions that the Civil Service specifically drafts for the disciplining of spads might involve the Civil Service independent investigation presenting the evidence to the Minister and requiring the Minister to take the decision. There is nothing in my Bill that does not allow that. The Minister is prevented from interfering, from stopping the process, and from meddling in it, but he can still be involved in the sense of making the referral in the first place or dealing with the outcome in the second place. It is a fiction to suggest that this denudes the Minister of any control over a spad.

What control did the Minister have in the past? The Minister, in the past, could have sacked his spad provided he did it in compliance with employment law. The Minister could still sack his spad provided he does it in compliance with employment law. There is nothing here that reduces that right for the Minister. It ensures that any errant spad who is a civil servant must face the rigours of the Civil Service process in respect of his discipline. According to how the Civil Service drafts this, and provided it is all within the code of conduct, that can still preserve a key role for the appointing Minister. That point needs to be very clear. Ms Sugden asked that question, and that is the point that I have been trying to deal with — this blurring of the relationship, as she said.

It is quite possible that, under clause 1(3), the Civil Service does the investigation — it might have been initiated by the Minister or it might have been initiated by someone else — and the outcome is referred to the Minister and the Minister acts accordingly. That is all entirely feasible under clause 1(3). However, clause 1(3) makes sure that there is a process that is proper and fit for standard and one governed by the process that affects other civil servants. What could be wrong with that for a spad who is a civil servant? It is important not to distort what clause 1(3) is about.

6.45 pm

Coming on to amendment No 4, some parties have said that they cannot support it. Can I start by making this point? The Minister said that they had strengthened the codes. Well, you certainly cannot say that about the code of appointment, because, as I pointed out this morning, the old code of appointment required you to consider a pool of candidates, required you to have the criteria for the post and required you to keep a note of why you chose the person you chose. Of course, Mr Murphy came along and stripped all of that out. He did not strengthen the code; he weakened it.

Amendment No 4 seeks to put back in that which was previously in the codes, which Justice Coghlin found was simply ignored, so that it will be given the bite of being in legislation. Create a job description, set out the requirements for a successful applicant, achieve a candidate pool, complete and retain the documentation. That is exactly what Ms Sugden described herself as doing. It does not say that you have to put an advert in the 'Belfast Telegraph' to say, "I'm going to appoint a spad", but it does require a job specification and job criteria. It does require a candidate pool, but the legislation is not prescriptive on how you assemble that candidate pool. You must have a pool, otherwise it is open to the public ridicule that you simply appointed your best mate, with no objective rational explanation and no need to even keep a record of why you appointed them. The first thing that the Department knows is that Joe Bloggs has been appointed. What the criteria for the post were no one knows. What the job description was, no one knows. How that person met any perceived description, no one knows. Was more than one person considered? No one knows. I remind you of the evidence of Felicity Huston: you cannot conduct recruitment to a public post in that clandestine manner.

Mr O'Toole: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I want to make a couple of points very briefly. This gets to the heart of something that concerned several of us who are supportive of other bits of the clause. It is really important that we acknowledge that spads are fundamentally political appointments. If Joe Bloggs is the right person for the Alliance Party Minister, the SDLP Minister, the TUV Minister or the Sinn Féin Minister, that is that.

My party would find it very difficult to support this amendment without a specific insertion in the Bill saying that party political alignment is a legitimate reason for appointment. I ask him to reflect on that and whether he is able to offer that at Further Consideration Stage.

Mr Allister: Yes, I appreciate that. I pointed out this morning that we have, in the Fair Employment Order, that protection; you cannot be guilty of discrimination on the grounds of political opinion if you are making a political appointment. So, it is already there, in a sense. However, if it helps, I anticipate that it would be possible, at Further Consideration Stage, to add to amendment No 4 and align something to the effect of, "For the avoidance of doubt, since these are political appointments, there is no issue relating to making a political choice". I am sure that there is wording that could be much more polished than that, and it seems to be entirely compatible with the 1998 Order and, if it is required on the face of the Bill, it can be put there.

Mr Stalford: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Stalford: Hopefully, the Member will find this helpful. The Member will know that, when organisations such as the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, the Church of Ireland and church groups advertise for paid posts in places like church house or church headquarters, they put in their adverts phraseology such as, "The applicant should agree with the ethos and identity of the potential employer". I am just trying to be helpful with that suggestion.

Mr Allister: Yes, and, if that is required in legislation, that can be in legislation. My point is that amendment No 4 is not prescriptive of everything. You would still have your essential criteria, and you, as the Minister, could put in your essential criteria a requirement that applicants must have a political empathy with the Minister's political stand. That would be entirely lawful. Churches do that sort of thing, and they are not breaking the law. Likewise, a Minister who puts that in here would not be breaking the law.

The point of amendment No 4 is that it is an insult to the intelligence of the paying public that you never even have to have a job description for a job that they are going to pay for; you never even have to have any requirement set forth for a job that they are going to pay for; you never even have to consider more than one person for a job that they are going to pay for; and you never even have to keep a note in respect of a job that they are going to pay for.

That is why I say that amendment No 4, which draws carefully and exclusively on what was in the old code, does not go beyond that and does not expand it. It draws carefully and explicitly on what was in the old code; a code that existed for many years. It simply puts it into legislative form. Why does it do that? It does that because Lord Justice Coghlin said that those codes on appointment needed to be rigorously implemented, having pointed out how flippantly they were treated in the appointment process heretofore.

It is nothing new that suddenly would have to be done. It is something that always should have been done, and now it is being given the bite by putting it in legislation. If it helps the House and others, I do not see the difficulty with a "For the avoidance of doubt" clause, which I will undertake to discuss with those who are interested before Further Consideration Stage and bring that forward as an amendment.

Ms Sugden: I appreciate the Member's giving way. My initial apprehension about amendment No 4 is probably the same as that of other Members. It somehow suggested to me that there was a limitation of political discretion. Can I confirm with the Member — he will know this better than me — that any decisions or process that one Minister adopts will not limit any future Ministers, set a precedent of any sort or suggest that Ministers will be limited in having their political discretion? For me, rereading this, it seems as though you are essentially putting on record what, in your consideration, should already be done.

Mr Allister: Absolutely, and, if it had not been so flagrantly breached, as illustrated in RHI, this would never have been necessary. Indeed, I remind the House that amendment No 4 brings something that was not in the Bill initially, because the Bill was drafted before the new code of appointments stripped all this out. I never for a moment thought, given the evidence at the RHI inquiry, that any Minister would be so brazen as to take out the very criteria that had been breached and had been criticised by a Lord Justice for being breached, and that the answer to that would simply be, "Excoriate the criteria, take them out and then no one can say that we are in breach".

The very fact that this is an amendment and was not in the original Bill is because it took me greatly by surprise that the Minister came forward with a proposition as brazen as he did that the code of appointments should be stripped out of the very things that were in the old code and that, as Ms Sugden said, should be happening anyway, but they did not happen. That is why we now need to put them in legislation. That is why, I believe, the Committee, at that stage, was convinced of the merits of amendment No 4 and voted for it.

The other point that I want to deal with is the point that Mr Frew raised about the cap on pay.

I will make it plain again: all that I seek to do is to insert a ceiling. I am not interfering with the bands or the Department's discretion to juggle the bands or do anything else. I am simply saying that for two reasons: one is because it is good to depoliticise and not have Ministers being accused of upping the salary just to placate their special advisers, which, as we know, happened in the past —

Mr Murphy: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Murphy: The Member should be aware, given that he is the sponsor of the Bill and was present during its Committee Stage, that that is no longer the case. The bands and levels of payment are set by officials in the Department of Finance; they are not set by me but by officials. To correct something that was the case in the past is not correcting something that is the case in the present.

Mr Allister: The Minister is half right; I acknowledge that. However, it is then still subject to a political process of approval. The codes have to be approved. That is where the political imprimatur comes in, whereas, if the ceiling were set with a linkage to a generous Civil Service grade, no one could say that it was politicians looking after their own. That is why it makes good sense to link it to a Civil Service grade. There is nothing to say that, in future, those bands could not be radically revisited. However, under my system, they or the ceiling would be revisited according to the natural progression of grades in the Civil Service. That is how it should be. I have heard no one say that a grade 5 salary is not generous enough. Some have said that it is too generous. I think that it is about right. That takes it out of the political arena. I would have thought that that was highly preferable.

Mr Frew asked whether it was inflexible. The answer, of course, would be to have no ceiling and not have £85,000 in the bands. If one wants maximum flexibility, one must remove everything. However, the principle is about where the upper limit should be set. Should it be set by a Department through its officials and approved by Ministers, or should it be set by a linkage to a Civil Service grade? I think that the latter is the better prospect.

There is, perhaps, a legitimate concern: what if we need a super-duper expert on something or other, and he turns his nose up at £81,000 or £82,000? I have suggested to the House that there are two remedies to that situation: that person could be appointed as a consultant in the Department, or prerogative powers could be used to create an appointment, subject to the approval of the House. Therefore, if the situation were arrived at where maximum flexibility was needed to address an issue such as that, there is a mechanism for it. It is not all or nothing here. A cap on pay, in principle, is right. I do not think that it is inflexible in that it will move as the grade moves. However, if it proved to be less than satisfactory for the filling of a particular post, there is an opportunity to do something about it through the other mechanisms.

I hope that I have dealt with the main points. I have not gone through what everyone did and did not say. That never strikes me as being a fruitful exercise. I hope that I have dealt with the issues. Since no one is seeking to intervene, I will assume that I have done that, satisfactorily or otherwise. Therefore, on that basis, I will conclude my remarks.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Amendment No 2 made: In page 1, line 12, leave out "involvement or".— [Mr Allister.]

Amendment No 3 made: In page 1, line 13, before "A minister" insert "Subject to section 3A".— [Mr Allister.]

Amendment No 4 proposed: In page 1, line 14, at end insert —

"(3A) In section 8 (Code for appointments), after subsection (1) insert the words: '(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1), the code must provide that the appointing minister must —

(a) create a job description and person specification for the post,

(b) set out the requirements to be met by a successful applicant,

(c) achieve a candidate pool from which the minister shall select on sustainable and lawful grounds, and

(d) complete and the department retain documentation associated with the above processes, including recording the minister's reasons for the selection made."—
[Mr Allister.]

Question put, That amendment No 4 be made.

Some Members: Aye.

Some Members: No.

Mr Speaker: Since we cannot determine the outcome of the vote, the House will divide. Clear the Lobbies. The Question will be put again in three minutes. I remind Members that they should continue to uphold social distancing throughout all the votes that may be held this evening and that those who have proxy voting arrangements in place should not come to the Chamber. Thank you.

Members, please resume your seats. Before I put the Question again, I remind Members that, if possible, it would be preferable to avoid a Division.

Question, That the amendment be made, put a second time.

Some Members: Aye.

Some Members: No.

Mr Wells: The Ayes have it.

Mr Speaker: OK. The Ayes have it. [Laughter.]

Before the Assembly divides, I remind Members that, as per Standing Order 112, the Assembly currently has proxy voting arrangements in place. Members who have authorised another Member to vote on their behalf are not entitled to vote in person and should not enter the Lobbies. I remind Members to ensure that social distancing continues to be observed at all times while voting is taking place. Please be patient at all times and follow the instructions of the Lobby Clerks.

The Assembly divided:

Ayes 27; Noes 60.

AYES

Dr Aiken, Mr Allen, Mr Allister, Ms Bailey, Mrs Barton, Mr Beattie, Ms S Bradley, Mr Butler, Mr Carroll, Mr Catney, Mr Chambers, Mr Durkan, Ms Hunter, Mrs D Kelly, Mr Lunn, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Ms McLaughlin, Mr McNulty, Ms Mallon, Mr Nesbitt, Mr O'Toole, Mr Stewart, Ms Sugden, Mr Swann, Mr Wells, Miss Woods.

Tellers for the Ayes: Mr Allister and Mr Wells.

NOES

Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Ms Armstrong, Mr Blair, Mr Boylan, Mr M Bradley, Ms P Bradley, Ms Bradshaw, Ms Brogan, Mr K Buchanan, Mr T Buchanan, Mr Buckley, Ms Bunting, Mrs Cameron, Mr Clarke, Mr Dickson, Ms Dillon, Mrs Dodds, Ms Dolan, Mr Dunne, Mr Easton, Ms Ennis, Ms Flynn, Mrs Foster, Mr Frew, Mr Gildernew, Mr Givan, Ms Hargey, Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch,

Mr Humphrey, Mr Irwin, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mrs Long, Mr Lynch, Mr Lyons, Mr Lyttle, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan, Mr McHugh, Miss McIlveen, Mr Middleton, Mr Muir, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Mr Newton, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mr O'Dowd, Mrs O'Neill, Mr Poots, Mr Robinson, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan, Ms Sheerin, Mr Stalford, Mr Storey, Mr Weir.

Tellers for the Noes: Ms Ennis and Mr Givan.

The following Members' votes were cast by their notified proxy in this Division:

Mr K Buchanan voted for Ms P Bradley, Mr Buckley, Mrs Dodds, Mr Dunne, Mr Easton, Mrs Foster, Mr Givan [Teller, Noes], Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch, Mr Irwin, Mr Lyons, Mr Middleton, Mr Newton, Mr Poots, Mr Robinson, Mr Stalford, Mr Storey and Mr Weir.

Mr Butler voted for Mr Allen, Mrs Barton, Mr Beattie, Mr Chambers, Mr Nesbitt, Mr Stewart and Mr Swann.

Mr Muir voted for Ms Armstrong, Mr Blair, Ms Bradshaw, Mr Dickson, Mrs Long and Mr Lyttle.

Mr O'Dowd voted for Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Mr Boylan, Ms Brogan, Ms Dillon, Ms Dolan, Ms Ennis [Teller, Noes], Ms Flynn, Mr Gildernew, Ms Hargey, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mr Lynch, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan, Mr McHugh, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mrs O'Neill, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan and Ms Sheerin.

Mr O'Toole voted for Ms S Bradley, Mr Catney, Mr Durkan, Ms Hunter, Mrs D Kelly, Ms Mallon, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Ms McLaughlin, and Mr McNulty.

Question accordingly negated.

Amendment No 5 made: In page 2, line 9, after "adviser" insert "by reason of the holding of that post".— [Mr Allister.]

Amendment No 6 made: In page 2, line 12, leave out "him" and insert "the special adviser".— [Mr Allister.]

Clause 1, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 7 proposed: Before clause 2 insert

"Repeal of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) Order in Council 2007"

A2.The Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007 is repealed".— [Mr Allister.]

Question put, That amendment No 7 be made.

Mr Speaker: I have been advised by the party Whips that, in accordance with Standing Order 113(5)(b), there is agreement that we can dispense with the three minutes and move straight to the Division.

I remind all Members to follow the instructions of the Lobby Clerks and to respect the need for social distancing throughout.

The Assembly divided:

Ayes 61; Noes 26.

AYES

Dr Aiken, Mr Allen, Mr Allister, Ms Armstrong, Ms Bailey, Mrs Barton, Mr Beattie, Mr Blair, Mr M Bradley, Ms P Bradley, Ms S Bradley, Ms Bradshaw, Mr K Buchanan, Mr T Buchanan, Mr Buckley, Ms Bunting, Mr Butler, Mrs Cameron, Mr Carroll, Mr Catney, Mr Chambers, Mr Clarke, Mr Dickson, Mrs Dodds, Mr Dunne, Mr Durkan, Mr Easton, Mrs Foster, Mr Frew, Mr Givan, Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch, Mr Humphrey, Ms Hunter, Mr Irwin, Mrs D Kelly, Mrs Long, Mr Lunn, Mr Lyons, Mr Lyttle, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Miss McIlveen, Ms McLaughlin, Mr McNulty, Ms Mallon, Mr Middleton, Mr Muir, Mr Nesbitt, Mr Newton, Mr O'Toole, Mr Poots, Mr Robinson, Mr Stalford, Mr Stewart, Mr Storey, Ms Sugden, Mr Swann, Mr Weir, Mr Wells, Miss Woods.

Tellers for the Ayes: Mr Allister and Mr Wells.

NOES

Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Mr Boylan, Ms Brogan, Ms Dillon, Ms Dolan, Ms Ennis, Ms Flynn, Mr Gildernew, Ms Hargey, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mr Lynch, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan, Mr McHugh, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mr O'Dowd, Mrs O'Neill, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan, Ms Sheerin.

Tellers for the Noes: Ms Ennis and Mr McGuigan.

The following Members' votes were cast by their notified proxy in this Division:

Mr K Buchanan voted for Ms P Bradley, Mr Buckley, Mrs Dodds, Mr Dunne, Mr Easton, Mrs Foster, Mr Givan, Mr Harvey, Mr Hilditch, Mr Irwin, Mr Lyons, Mr Middleton, Mr Newton, Mr Poots, Mr Robinson, Mr Stalford, Mr Storey and Mr Weir.

Mr Butler voted for Mr Allen, Mrs Barton, Mr Beattie, Mr Chambers, Mr Nesbitt, Mr Stewart and Mr Swann.

Mr Muir voted for Ms Armstrong, Mr Blair, Ms Bradshaw, Mr Dickson, Mrs Long and Mr Lyttle.

Mr O'Dowd voted for Ms Anderson, Dr Archibald, Mr Boylan, Ms Brogan, Ms Dillon, Ms Dolan, Ms Ennis [Teller, Noes], Ms Flynn, Mr Gildernew, Ms Hargey, Mr Kearney, Mr G Kelly, Ms Kimmins, Mr Lynch, Mr McAleer, Mr McCann, Mr McGuigan [Teller, Noes], Mr McHugh, Ms Mullan, Mr Murphy, Ms Ní Chuilín, Mrs O'Neill, Ms Rogan, Mr Sheehan and Ms Sheerin.

Mr O'Toole voted for Ms S Bradley, Mr Catney, Mr Durkan, Ms Hunter, Mrs D Kelly, Ms Mallon, Mr McCrossan, Mr McGrath, Ms McLaughlin, and Mr McNulty.

Question accordingly agreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: I pause to make sure that Members are in the Chamber before we move on to the next amendment.

Before I put the Question, I remind Members that we have debated Mr Allister's opposition to clause 2 stand part but the Question will be put in the positive as usual.

Clause 2 disagreed to.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 (Special Advisers in the Executive Office)

Amendment No 8 made: In page 2, line 28, after "Office" insert "under the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order in Council 2007".— [Mr Allister.]

Amendment No 9 made: In page 2, line 33, leave out subsection (3).— [Mr Allister.]

Clause 4, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: By leave of the Assembly, I intend to suspend the sitting for 15 minutes.

The sitting was suspended at 7.43 pm and resumed at 8.00 pm.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McGlone] in the Chair)

Clause 5 (Amendment of the Assembly Members (Independent Financial Review and Standards) Act (Northern Ireland) 2011)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr McGlone): We now come to the second group of amendments, which deal with accountability to the Assembly. With amendment No 10, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 11, 12, 21 to 23 and 25. It should be noted that amendment No 25 is consequential to amendment No 21. I call Jim Allister to move amendment No 10 and address the other amendments in the group.

Mr Allister: I beg to move amendment No 10: In page 3, line 4, at end insert

"(1A) In Section 17(1)(a) after 'Part' insert ' , provided the Commissioner is satisfied the complaint is not frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the complaints process'".

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 11: In page 3, line 11, leave out from "means" to end of line 12 and insert "means Section 1 of the Ministerial Code as provided for by Section 28A of the Northern Ireland Act 1998".— [Mr Allister.]

No 12: In page 3, line 14, at end insert

"(6A) In Section 27(1) after 'Assembly' insert 'or minister'".— [Mr Allister.]

No 21: New Clause

After clause 11 insert

"Accountability to the Assembly; provision of information

11A. Ministers and their departments have a duty to report to an Assembly committee such information as that committee may reasonably require in order to discharge its functions, being information which —

(a) has been requested in writing; and

(b) relates to the statutory functions exercisable by the Minister or their department."— [Mr Allister.]

No 22: In clause 12, page 4, line 30, leave out from "relevant" to "actions" on line 31 and insert "judgements of the courts relevant to the functioning of government".— [Mr Allister.]

No 23: New Clause

After clause 12 insert

"Assembly scrutiny of the Executive's in-year monitoring process

12A.—(1) Ministers and their officials must provide the relevant Assembly Committee with a written or oral briefing on the department's submission to each monitoring round in advance of it being submitted to the Department of Finance.

(2) The Department of Finance shall publish the outcome of each monitoring round within 7 days of Ministerial approval being granted.

(3) Within 14 days of the publication of the outcome of the monitoring round provided for in subsection (1), the Minister of Finance must lay before the Northern Ireland Assembly a statement specifying the changes to each department's net budget allocation as a result of this exercise."— [Mr Frew.]

No 25: In clause 14, page 5, line 10, at end insert

"department' means a Northern Ireland department as set out in Schedule 1, Departments Act (Northern Ireland) 2016."— [Mr Allister.]

Mr Allister: In this group, we come to deal essentially with clauses 5 and 12, plus my suggestion to insert a new clause. Clause 5 deals with the tricky issue of how complaints against Ministers should be dealt with. We all know that we, as Members of the Legislative Assembly, have a Commissioner for Standards. A new person was appointed recently. We all know that, if someone has a complaint to make against us, they are the arbiter in that. They decide whether to uphold the complaint or not and report the matter back to the Assembly. Until this point, within the Executive, there was, of course, not really a process for a complaint against a Minister. It was a bit of a mystery as to how that would be advanced. New Decade, New Approach suggested that there should be a process whereby the First Minister and deputy First Minister would appoint three commissioners who could report on any complaint against a Minister. What I primarily want to do here is compare and contrast how that would work with how my proposal that it should go to the standards commissioner would function; in other words, that we should have a single standards commissioner that deals with you, whether you are a Minister or an MLA. Of course, Ministers are both. At the moment, we have a bit of a ludicrous situation where a Minister can be proceeded against by the standards commissioner but only in respect of his role as an MLA, not in respect of his role as a Minister. Since that essential mechanism and process exists, my basic and simplistic contention is this: why would we reinvent the wheel when all that we have to do is expand the remit of the standards commissioner?

The last motion that the Assembly passed before it fell apart in January 2017 was proposed by Steven Agnew and passed without division. It, in essence, did what I am seeking to do here. It called for the expansion of the powers of the standards commissioner to also deal with complaints against Executive Ministers. When that motion was passed, it gave rise to the then standards commissioner making comment on it in his 2016-17 report. In paragraph 2.3 of that report, he wrote:

"I note that on 24 January 2017, the last sitting day before it was dissolved ahead of the March election, the Assembly, without the need for a division, passed a motion calling for urgent legislation to extend the role of the Commissioner to cover complaints of alleged contravention of the Ministerial Code of Conduct. There is at present no process for the investigation of such complaints. The investigation of such complaints would have many similarities to work already undertaken by the Commissioner. It would be most unlikely to require any significant increase in resources. It would have the advantage that when considering a motion to exclude a Minister or junior Minister from office for an alleged breach of that Code the Assembly would have the benefit of a report of an independent investigation into the alleged conduct."

Here we have the then Commissioner for Standards saying that it would be perfectly feasible to do it and that it would not have many resource implications. In other words, he was saying that the process and the infrastructure are already in place so that he or she could take on the extra work. That seems to me to be eminently sensible.

'New Decade, New Approach' called for something a bit different. Of course, it has not advanced the situation very far. It states:

"Complaints that a Minister has breached the Ministerial Code ... will be referred to the Commissioners for Ministerial Standards.

The Commissioners will decide whether a complaint has sufficient merit to be considered, and will decline to investigate a complaint that is frivolous, vexatious, or made in bad faith.

The Commissioners will number three in addition to the Assembly Commissioner for Standards, and will be appointed by the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

The Commissioners may ask for the facts from the Secretary to the Executive to inform their decision as to whether to investigate a complaint.

The Commissioners' decision to investigate or not to investigate, and the grounds for their decision, will be published. There will be strict, published, timeframes to adhere to for each stage of the process.

When the Commissioners investigate a complaint, they will publish the findings of their investigation. Their findings will include whether or not the Minister has been found to have breached the terms of the Code or Guidance, and the relative seriousness of the breach. The findings will not include any recommendation regarding sanctions. This will ultimately be a matter for the relevant Party/Assembly process."

That is what is proposed there. What I want to do now is to compare the mechanics and usefulness of that process with what the process would be if the powers were given to the standards commissioner. There are many striking distinctions between the two that go to the very heart of the veracity of the process that would be involved.

The first distinction is that the standards commissioner is set up in statute and his function and powers are laid out. It is not clear to me whether the powers of the three commissioners would be in statute, but I have certainly seen no sign of such. The commissioner in question, namely the standards commissioner, is appointed by open competition. He is not an individual hand-picked by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister like the three ministerial commissioners would be. No, he is appointed by open competition. That is in section 19 of the Assembly Members (Independent Financial Review and Standards) Act 2011.

Here comes the real significance. The standards commissioner has the statutory power to compel witnesses and to command the production of papers. That is in sections 28 and 29 of the 2011 Act. He can take evidence on oath. That is in section 30. It is a criminal offence not to cooperate with or answer questions from the standards commissioner. That is in section 31. He has statutory independence. That is in section 18. Compare that with the notion that three hand-picked ministerial commissioners would investigate alleged complaints against Ministers. Those commissioners would have no powers to compel the production of papers, to compel witnesses or to take evidence on oath. Indeed, pitifully, their accumulation of evidence, if we can call it that, is confined to what the permanent secretary or the secretary to the Executive tells them. The commissioners, according to New Decade, New Approach, may ask for facts from the secretary to the Executive to inform their decision. However, in their own right, they have no powers to collect evidence, to interrogate evidence or to take evidence under oath; it is all a sham. They are hand-picked by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister and appointed with no powers of enforcement. Compare that with the standards commissioner. The Executive are saying to us, "You, as mere MLAs, will be subject to the full panoply of investigative powers of the standards commissioner. He can take evidence against you on oath, can compel papers and documents, and can really interrogate the allegation. However, when it comes to Ministers: no, no, we do not want any of that. We do not want commissioners who have teeth, powers and who can take evidence on oath. We just want commissioners to investigate what the head of the Civil Service tells them".

Frankly, why should we, as MLAs, be subject to the rigours — it is right that we should be — of the standards commissioner but Ministers be exempt? That is what lies at the heart of clause 5. We should have an equal playing field: if MLAs are to be investigated for breaches of our code, and so we should, Ministers should be likewise investigated for breaches of the ministerial code. It is a question of a level playing field, equity and fairness. It is abundantly clear that, for the standards commissioner, the whole architecture already exists; the functions and the powers are already there. Why, oh why, therefore, would we come up with some other scheme that was not as vigorous as the one to which MLAs are subject? This is about an essential levelling up of accountability; it is indefensible that Ministers are in this special category. They are the people with the real power; we are the people with lesser power, but we are subject to the higher investigation and they to the lower. That is a preposterous situation for the House to sustain, and clause 5 gives us an opportunity to address it.

Part of the farce is illustrated by the fact that it says in New Decade, New Approach that the existing standards commissioner could assist the three commissioners. If the present standards commissioner was acting as a commissioner investigating a Minister, he would have none of the powers that he has in his real role of investigating an MLA. He would simply be able to go the head of the Civil Service and ask for the facts. What he is told he is told. He could not compel witnesses or documents, and he certainly could not take evidence under oath. He would be second-rate when performing that role, as opposed to the first-rate facility that he has when performing his regular role. I can think of no sensible compelling reason why the Assembly commissioner, as the House decided in January, should not also exercise their powers in respect of Ministers.

The Standards of Conduct Committee at the Welsh Assembly produced a very interesting report in 2018. It recommended the very thing that I am suggesting: Ministers, equally with MLAs, should be subject to the work and oversight of a standards commissioner. That seemed to be sensible to that jurisdiction, and I suggest to you that it should be sensible to this House. So, clause 5 is about a levelling up in that regard.

8.15 pm

Then there are three amendments to clause 5. You will have noted that, in 'New Decade, New Approach', there is a protection at paragraph 1.5 of annex A, which says:

"The Commissioners will decide whether a complaint has sufficient merit to be considered, and will decline to investigate a complaint that is frivolous, vexatious, or made in bad faith."

There is no such protection for you as an MLA, so amendment No 10 is about giving not just you but Ministers that same protection to insert into the legislation that a complaint proceeds:

"provided the Commissioner is satisfied the complaint is not frivolous or vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the complaints process".

It has been said of old that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander, and that applies equally to the process of investigation, so amendment No 10 supplements the levelling-up process in that regard.

Amendment No 11 flows from evidence supplied by, I think, the Executive Office, which helpfully pointed out that, as originally drafted, the Bill embraced the entire ministerial code. There was some stuff in the ministerial code that was not really about conduct but about cooperating North/South and all that sort of thing, so I tabled an amendment that would restrict the ambit of investigations to paragraph 1 of the ministerial code; that is to say, the standards that are required in public office. Amendment No 12 is simply a tidy-up amendment to make sure that the whole thing reads fluently in regard to the legislation and adds a Minister to the ambit of it. That is the essence of clause 5 and the amendments relating to it.

I will move to clause 12, which I thought would probably be the most non-controversial part of the Bill. It simply takes the standpoint that improving the functioning of government is not a one-off event or a snapshot in time. It should be an ongoing process because things change, and that is why clause 12 recommends a biennial report from the First Minister and deputy First Minister setting out matters pertaining to the functioning of government and bringing forward resolutions to any issues that have been thrown up. Every two years, the First Minister and deputy First Minister would bring a report to the House, and that would gather together things that had emerged in the previous two years, maybe from the Audit Office, from the ombudsman, from the Commissioner for Public Appointments and, doubtless, from judicial reviews, because, very often, judicial reviews turn upon the procedures of the issue being challenged, and, very often, judges say, "government should not be doing that in this way. It should be doing it in some other way". There will be many lessons to be drawn, so clause 12 is about drawing those lessons together and setting out what the propositions are and how they will be resolved.

Indeed, the Committee report before the House today identifies one such issue, and the Chair has already referred to it. When the former Commissioner for Public Appointments appeared before us, she drew our attention very compellingly to the deficiencies in the set-up of that office in that its set-up and operation does not meet international standards. Therefore, that will need to be addressed, and if that is still an extant issue, you would expect it to be addressed in one of these biennial reports. With some recommendations, you do not have to wait for the two years — I am not suggesting that you should — to address something; if it is crying out to be addressed, it needs to be addressed. However, there will be issues from reports that are gathering dust on the shelves, and we are all familiar with that. Those need to be taken down and examined, and every two years we need to ask, "Have we ticked that box? Have we done that? Have we improved that? How can we improve that?". That is what clause 12 is all about.

There is another example that might come to this House. I am on the Audit Committee, which is beginning an investigation of the oversight of the Audit Office. It has come as a considerable surprise to some of us that there is no independent board governing the Audit Office; there is elsewhere in the four nations generally, but here there is no such supervision. That is something, subject to what the Audit Committee says, that this House may be advised to act upon.

There will be many unforeseen but inevitable propositions coming forward to make improvements. I make the point again: this Bill, in its own small way, tries to improve aspects of the functioning of government, but it is not an end in itself. Clause 12 can make it a launch pad for keeping those matters under review by making it a statutory requirement that every two years there is a report to this House. That way, we can all see what we have not done and what we need to do. Why would we fear that? Would that not be a good thing? Clause 12 is in those terms.

Mr Frew has an amendment, and I will not steal his thunder other than to say that I generally support the proposition; the more scrutiny opportunities that we have, the better. The other amendment that arises in this group as far as I am concerned inserts a new clause and is amendment No 23 — sorry, amendment No 21; I was about to steal his thunder. Amendment No 21 states:

"Ministers and their departments have a duty to report to an Assembly committee such information as that committee may reasonably require in order to discharge its functions, being information which—

(a) has been requested in writing; and

(b) relates to the statutory functions exercisable by the Minister or their department."

Of course, we have scrutiny Committees, but it surprised me somewhat, when I got down to studying the legislation, that there is no statutory duty to service those Committees with papers that are requested. There is, of course, in section 44 of the 1998 Act, the facility for a Committee that is dissatisfied with the cooperation to go to the point of compelling the production of documents. Any Committee that has ever used that facility knows that it is a last resort, is complex and is laborious, and it eventually falls to the Speaker to make various orders. The idea of this new clause is that by establishing a statutory duty on Departments to do what they should already be doing — in most cases, I suspect, they already are doing it — you would probably dissipate the need to resort to section 44. It is about toughening up the provisions of the legislation and underscoring the accountability to the Assembly of the Executive and the Ministers by imposing a statutory duty to provide information, and it sets the conditions for that. Again, that can only be a good thing; it strengthens scrutiny, and I do not see why anyone would object to that.

When the Carnegie UK Trust, which is much respected in these matters, sent us evidence, it was quite effusive about the idea and thought that it would very much improve openness and transparency. It said this — sorry, this is about clause 12, but I will quote it now that I have come to it:

"Reporting to the Northern Ireland Assembly on a biennial basis will improve accountability, transparency and public awareness of these ways of working, and the progress made towards improving the societal wellbeing outcomes in the Programme for Government."

That was about clause 12. I meant to say that the Carnegie UK Trust had supported that.

This new clause seems to be justified in its own right. If it is what the Department is already doing, well and good, but it puts it on a statutory footing, which means that there is no wriggle room. There is no opportunity to play around with it, so the amendments in this group and the clauses to which they relate are worthy of your support.

Dr Aiken: Mr O'Dowd will be very happy that my remarks will be much shorter and more germane this time than they were the last time.

Concern was expressed in Committee that the provision in clause 5 to bring Ministers under the same procedure for complaints as MLAs could lead to large numbers of complaints relating to ministerial decisions on policy issues that may be considered unpopular. I am grateful to the Bill's sponsor for listening to and acting on those concerns.

The Committee was informed as early as July of the Bill's sponsor's intention to bring an amendment to enable the Commissioner for Standards to sift out complaints against Ministers or MLAs that are considered frivolous, vexatious or otherwise an abuse of the complaints process. The Committee, therefore, welcomed amendment No 10, which addresses its concerns in that respect.

The Committee was content with amendment No 11, which provides for clause 5 encompassing only the Pledge of Office, the code of conduct for special advisers and the Nolan principles. That addresses a concern in the Executive Office that the original drafting included more of the ministerial code than was necessary.

In the Committee's deliberations, it accepted the Bill's sponsor's explanation that amendment No 12 is a necessary but incidental amendment to add Ministers to the ambit of the Commissioner for Standards.

Amendment No 21 introduces clause 11A. During the Committee's deliberations, it noted the intention of the provisions in clause 11A to strengthen the overall scrutiny functions of Committees by providing them with enhanced authority to seek information from Departments without having to resort to section 44 provisions in the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Although the current Committee for Finance has not had to resort to section 44 since its formation, it has had occasion to consider its use in order to receive information to which we were entitled. For that reason, the Committee would like to have taken evidence on clause 11A. However, given time constraints towards the end of the Committee Stage, we were unable to do so. For that reason, the Committee was able only to note the amendment.

The Bill's sponsor informed the Committee that amendment No 22 to clause 12 is essentially technical in nature. The Committee asked him to expand on the phrase:

"judgements of the courts relevant to the functioning of government".

The Bill's sponsor outlined that judicial reviews are, by their nature, challenging processes and that it is most likely that it would be judicial review judgements that criticise government.

As the Bill's sponsor said, the Carnegie UK Trust welcomes the provisions in clause 12 and informed the Committee that:

"Reporting to the Northern Ireland Assembly on a biennial basis will improve accountability, transparency and public awareness of these ways of working, and the progress made towards improving the societal wellbeing outcomes in the Programme for Government."

The Committee was content to support amendment No 22 as an appropriate addition to clause 12.

Amendment No 25 to clause 14 is technical in nature and is consequential to the amendment to introduce clause 11A, on which the Committee did not come to a view.

Mr Frew: I will speak to the amendments and clauses in the group. I will start with clause 5 and the amendments. I thank the Committee and the Bill's sponsor for their work. I echo the sentiments of the Chairperson in thanking the Bill's sponsor for listening to the Committee.

8.30 pm

One of the issues that I pushed on was the fear that Ministers may be more liable to get more complaints than MLAs simply because of the position that they are in and the decisions that they have to take. Even though it is right that Ministers in this place, who were MLAs before they became Ministers and joined the Executive, should be held to the same standards and account as MLAs, there is that difference in the processes, the policy development and the decision-making powers that they have. I would not want to leave any Minister open to a whole raft of complaints to the standards commissioner because of a planning application, policy development or the closure of a school or something of that nature. That is why I asked for that to be included. I am glad that the Bill's sponsor ceded to that. I am sure that he knows that and supports it, most definitely, because it removes that possibility.

Whilst it might add another layer to the standards commissioner's role, it is a quicker and more efficient way, so if there are those frivolous and vexatious complaints, they can be moved to one side and the commissioner can carry on with the work that they have been assigned to do. That is important because we do not want the system to be bogged down for fear that that work will not get done for the other MLAs that there may well have been complaints about. It is, most definitely, correct that a Minister should be held to account by the same standards as us. The Bill's sponsor said, "MLAs do not get the protection that we are now putting into the Bill". However, I think that that is fitting and just because of the reasons that I outlined with regard to the decision-making powers, policy development and, at times, harsh decisions that Ministers have to make. You cannot please everybody all the time.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will.

Mr Allister: The amendment would afford that to complaints against MLAs as well. Any complaint would be sifted to determine whether it was vexatious or frivolous. That is right.

Mr Frew: I had not read that in, but I will bow to the Bill sponsor's wisdom on that. It is his Bill. After all, he knows it best. He knows it better than any of us, so I thank him for that clarification.

I will talk about amendment No 22, which would amend clause 12 on the biennial report. Yes; I see that as the way forward, because laws will be passed in the House that people — I mean individuals, Ministers and parties — could well try to ignore. It has happened in the past. It is very clear that we need a reporting system that monitors things that change, things that are not enacted and things that need to change in the future. I think that reporting is the way to go. We had it last week on the domestic violence Bill when talking about reporting and monitoring that legislation. I believe that that is good practice going forward. I most certainly support laying a biennial report in the Assembly.

I will speak to the new clauses. Amendment No 21 would create a new clause on the provision of information. It is massively important. Once we started to talk about it, I lapped it up and said yes, yes, yes. I am sick of the way that Departments treat Committees. I am sick that we have to wring information out of Departments and Ministers. At times, Departments and their officials treat Committees with great contempt. We have seen it, even since the Assembly came back. It seems as though nothing has changed, nothing went wrong and we are back to square one. That is not where we are at, and it is never where I will be at. I will never go back. I will never go in reverse. I want to see improvements. However, I have not seen those improvements, and I have not seen that culture change. I still see a Civil Service and Ministers prevaricating on information that the Committee has requested.

I will give you one example, Mr Deputy Speaker. In this Chamber, a good number of months ago, I raised — in my gentle manner, as you know I do — the issue of the emails on the PPE order that we had requested but which had not come forward to the Committee. We had asked for all emails and correspondence connected to that. “All” is a very small word. It has three letters: A, L, L. It is very simple to understand, yet we did not receive “all” those emails. We kept asking the same question, but it was treated like a different request. It was not a different request. It was the same one being repeated over and over again until we were provided with the information that we received. It took weeks. In fact, I think that it took months to get that. Then we were able to look at the bigger, wider picture.

The reputational damage that was being done to the Minister, to the officials, to the permanent secretary and to the Department was mighty. It was mighty not because of what was contained in those emails, although that was quite embarrassing, but because a vacuum was being created at will by the Department in opposing the release of that information to the very scrutiny Committee that is designed to scrutinise it. That is no way to behave. That is no way to have a relationship between scrutiny Committee and Department. I hope that lessons are learned. However, I have been in this place long enough to know that lessons do not get learned. That is why the new clause is so important. The legislation is there, and it has to be rigorously applied. This is echoing that legislation, bringing it to a more modern piece of legislation and echoing the fact that we should not be treated with disdain.

Scrutiny Committees fulfil a very important role in this place, not least given the fact that we have a five-party coalition Executive and that we have a very small, fragmented opposition. It is therefore critically important for me as an MLA, even though my party is part of the Executive, to know that there are safeguards and fail-safe mechanisms in place so that, if — God forbid; heavens above — a Minister, no matter which party they belong to, makes a mistake or does something that is not quite right, the scrutiny Committee is there not only to scrutinise but to support — to support — the Department and, sometimes, yes, to fix. I have evidence of that. I have experience of that throughout my career as an MLA, and it is very important. It is also very important that Committee members take that role very seriously. That is why I embraced this Bill when it was introduced. There are things in it that I did not like. I did not like the direction of travel in some places, but I embraced it, and I engaged. I communicated with the Bill sponsor, I communicated with the Chairperson, and I communicated with the Committee members. Hopefully, what we have produced here is a Bill that we in the Assembly can all be proud of.

I therefore support amendment No 21 and the new clause that brings added accountability to the Assembly with regard to the provision of information. That is a no-brainer. It should not even have to be said, and it should not even have to be written in a Bill. However, it has to be, because I have no confidence — no confidence — that a Committee will get everything that it requests. It has also happened in the Justice Committee, so it has not just affected the Finance Committee.

I cannot lay everything at the door of the Finance Minister and his officials. It also happened on the Justice Committee with monitoring rounds. Unforgivable. That is not the place that we need to be. We need to be in a far better place, and let us hope that this, in a small way, goes some way to correcting that imbalance and removing the disdain that some of our officials at the highest level and some of our Ministers have for their Committees. That cannot be abided and should not be abided by anyone in the House, and I will not support anything less.

I move on to my amendment No 23. I will speak to that and then sit down, Members will be relieved to hear. The amendment has three limbs. To be fair, I wanted to do much more, I really did. I tossed and turned, and I really wanted to go after the procedure used in the formation of a Budget. I see the Budget as being a two-yearly thing. I spoke in the House on the Budget Bill a couple of weeks ago on that very matter and laid the groundwork. I served notice that I was going to do this. Quite simply, I wanted to make sure that there was a statutory duty on the Minister to commence a Budget cycle and to lay it before the House in a timely fashion.

We have had experience of a Finance Minister failing to bring a Budget to the House. The Assembly fell, and the country was left without a budgetary process. Civil servants took over, and Ministers in Westminster had to put in place emergency legislation in order for us to get by. That was nowhere near a sufficient process; it was a terrible process. It was a necessity, however, because there had not been a Bill passed in the House. The only duty that I can see on the Minister of Finance is a requirement to bring a Budget by the end of March, before the start of the new financial year. That is an excepted matter, however, so it seems that we cannot touch it. I will keep pushing and probing to see what we can do.

Amendment No 23, which deals with monitoring rounds, is the next best thing. In my experience, not just in this phase of devolution since we came back, but over the past 10 years, I have seen massive inconsistencies in the way in which Departments handle Committees when it comes to providing monitoring round information. It could simply be that a Minister is querying something or is not sure of something or is dotting the i's and crossing the t's and that type of thing. That may delay the process, and it may be just a case of good, sufficient and thorough ministerial governance. That could well be the case, but the Committee should have a role to play in it.

Subsection (1) of my amendment — the first limb — places a requirement on Ministers and their officials to:

“provide the relevant Assembly Committee with a written or oral briefing on the department's submission to each monitoring round in advance”.

They should do that. What I find, though, is that, across Departments, that information can be inconsistent. There might be reasons for that, but I do not know why. It should not be the case, but it is the case. The amendment in some way tries to regulate for a uniform approach.

I have not been too hard on the other Ministers, simply because there is time for things to bed in. There will be a Further Consideration Stage, but there will be other opportunities throughout the legislative life of —.

Mr O'Toole: I thank the Member for giving way. We are considering proposed new clause 12A. In subsection (1), how wedded is the Member to the idea of Committees getting submissions on monitoring rounds in advance of their going to Departments? While we agree with the aim of greater scrutiny and more power for Committees, is there not a risk that you conflate the policymaking role of Departments with the scrutiny role of Committees? If bids are going in in advance, there is a risk of gumming up the policymaking process, because we will then be getting into a bun fight.

8.45 pm

Mr Frew: There is that risk, but there is a balance between accountability and the role of the Committee in supporting, scrutinising and assisting. I do not mean that Committees will have any way of shaping submissions if they are brought to Committees in advance. A Minister signs off on their monitoring round; it is the Minister and Department's monitoring round. They will know best what they need and what they do not. That should not really be the role of the scrutiny Committee at that point, but it is a way of getting that information to members through the vehicle of the Committee, which could then populate the thought process of the parties represented on the Committee. If that were the case, there would be no surprises with regard to bids. Hear this: I am open to amendment. I say this to Members, especially members of the Committee: if you think that you can better the amendment, please do. Please come and talk to me, and we will see what we can do. I am open to that.

The second limb states:

"The Department of Finance shall publish the outcome of each monitoring round within 7 days of Ministerial approval being granted."

Again, that is an attempt to get some speed and consistency into the process.

The third limb states:

"Within 14 days of the publication of the outcome of the monitoring round provided for in subsection (1), the Minister of Finance must lay before the Northern Ireland Assembly a statement specifying the changes to each department's net budget allocation as a result of this exercise."

I point to that last line:

"a statement specifying the changes to each department's net budget".

