9 September 2002 to 28 April 2003

The Assembly was suspended at midnight on 15 October 2002, by virtue of the Northern Ireland Act 2000 (Suspension of Devolved Government) Order 2002. As a result, although it continued to exist, it could neither meet nor pass any Act.

The Assembly was then dissolved on 28th April 2003, by virtue of section 31(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, amended, as it was at that time, by section 1(2) of the Northern Ireland Assembly Elections Act 2003.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 9 September 2002

The Assembly met at noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

NEW ASSEMBLY MEMBER

Mr Speaker: I have been advised by the Chief Electoral Officer that Mr Michael Coyle has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the East Londonderry constituency, filling the vacancy left by the resignation of Mr Arthur Doherty. I invite Mr Coyle to take his seat by signing the Roll of Members.

Mr Speaker: I am satisfied that the Member has signed the Roll and confirmed his designation.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform the House that the Budget (No.2) Bill has received Royal Assent. The Budget (No.2) Act (Northern Ireland) 2002 became law on 12 August 2002. Royal Assent has also been received for the Railway Safety Bill. The Railway Safety Act (Northern Ireland) 2002 became law on 13 August 2002.

RE-DESIGNATION LETTERS

Mr Speaker: I wish to advise the House that on 4 September 2002 I received separate correspondence from Ms Monica McWilliams and Ms Jane Morrice advising that, in accordance with Standing Order 3(8), they wish to change their respective designations to "Other". I remind the House that a change in designation notified in writing to the Speaker takes immediate effect.

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Mr Speaker, it would be helpful if you would inform the House what the Members' designation is now. Are they Unionists, Nationalists, Others, or just rescuers of whatever party is in trouble?

Mr Speaker: I have already advised the House that those Members wish to change their respective designations to "Other".

PUBLIC PETITION

Traffic Problems at Tardree Grove, Ballymena

Mr Speaker: Mr Ian Paisley Jnr has begged leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg leave to present to the Assembly a petition signed by 38 people who are residents of Tardree Grove in my constituency. The petition states that "residents fail to comprehend how widening the road will alleviate the volume of speeding traffic which uses the route as a shortcut to the dual carriageway and call for the installation of speed restriction ramps as a more permanent solution to this on-going problem."

Mr Paisley Jnr moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: I will forward the petition to the Minister for Regional Development and a copy to the Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development.

NORTH/SOUTH MINISTERIAL COUNCIL

Trade and Business Development

Mr Speaker: I have received notice that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council sectoral meeting on trade, held on 26 June 2002 in Belfast.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Sir Reg Empey): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the seventh meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in its Trade and Business Development sectoral format, which took place in the Europa Hotel, Belfast on Wednesday 26 June 2002.

Ms Carmel Hanna and I represented the Northern Ireland Administration. The Irish Government were represented by Ms Mary Harney, TD, Tánaiste and Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Employment. This report has been approved by Ms Hanna and is also made on her behalf.

The Council considered a 'Digital Island' discussion paper, covering information and communications technologies and discussed a policy structure to determine the priorities necessary to exploit the potential that digital technologies can offer in support of increased trade and business development. The Council approved the establishment of a steering group to take the work forward and asked that a progress report be prepared for its next meeting.

The Council considered and noted the work currently being undertaken by InterTradeIreland in the field of science and technology and acknowledged the importance of that work for increasing job creation and economic development. The Council considered the European Union dimension to extended collaboration in this area and discussed the potential for enhanced North/South co-operation in science and technology through a variety of EU programmes such as the science, technology and innovation awareness programme, the European Space Agency and EUREKA — a pan-European network for market-orientated industrial research and development.

The Council asked InterTradeIreland, in conjunction with Departments and agencies, to examine the feasibility of further North/South co-operation and, jointly with Departments, to provide a report for the next meeting on the potential of specific co-operation opportunities.

The Council considered and approved a framework operating plan 2003 for InterTradeIreland. The main activities outlined in the plan included business and economic research, promotion of North/South science and technology research, ICT and e-commerce initiatives, the promotion of North/South institution and business alliances, the development of an all-island business model, knowledge transfer and the promotion of private equity.

The Council asked InterTradeIreland to develop this framework plan and produce a final operating plan for 2003 for Council approval.

The Council considered and approved InterTradeIreland's proposals for the introduction and operation of a performance appraisal system for its employees. The system will introduce modern public sector human resources policy to InterTradeIreland by linking the role and performance of employees to the broader objectives of the body as outlined in its operating plan.

The Council approved the publication of InterTradeIreland's annual report and accounts for the year ended 31 December 2001. Copies of that report will be laid before the Houses of the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Irish Parliament.

The Council received a verbal report from the chief executive of InterTradeIreland on the progress made on implementing the body's work programme. The chief executive updated the Council on recent achievements, such as the equity network programme, which arranged several equity workshops around the island, and a major private equity conference in Belfast in April. Business forums were held in numerous venues around the island, which raised awareness of important issues, including taxation, employment law and the support available from public sector development agencies. The Council will meet again in this sectoral format in Dublin on 1 November 2002.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr J Wilson] in the Chair)

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Neeson): I thank the Minister for the statement and congratulate him on the successful outcome of last week's Washington conference. Will he elaborate on the details of the draft operating plan for 2003 for InterTradeIreland and particularly on the development of an all-Ireland business model, knowledge transfer and the promotion of private equity?

Sir Reg Empey: This is an outline of the main elements that are likely to be included in the draft operating plan, which will come before the autumn meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) for consideration and approval. Other agencies and Departments will be consulted fully to ensure that the proposals do not duplicate what is already available. There is little point in programmes in the different jurisdictions duplicating one another. The key focus of the body is to promote trade and business. I have drawn Members' attention to the huge potential for companies in each jurisdiction to benefit from public procurement. There are public procurement contracts worth between £7.5 billion and £10 billion on the island, and only a comparatively small percentage of that trade is won by companies in Northern Ireland. Our companies should have full access to public procurement in the Republic and vice versa.

The operating plan must take account of the way in which we are able to make progress with these concepts and implement them, because the objective is to enable trade to grow. We also wish to develop e-business so that companies, and small companies in particular, that are located in border areas are able to grow. We wish to encourage that policy throughout Northern Ireland, but it has a particular cross-border dimension.

We wish to deal with a range of issues, but I stress that the Assembly will be able to debate the full operating plan. It must be subject to approval, and I hope that as the company matures, we will be better placed to measure the increased trade and business development that it achieves.

Dr Birnie: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note his comments about exploiting the potential of digital technologies to promote trade. Has the NSMC in this sectoral format considered evidence on the percentage of companies in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland that have constructed web sites as a marketing tool?

Sir Reg Empey: Yes. One of the Council's proposals is to develop portals where people can have access to information, and we must be aware that, under the auspices of the British-Irish Council, work is being done to improve communication and co-operation for building the knowledge economy. What is happening here is entirely consistent with, and complementary to, that approach. The improvement and extension of e-business and e-government is a Programme for Government commitment; we must set an example. There is the opportunity to promote the development of all-island trade via e-business, and the digital island programme would include proposals from either jurisdiction which could achieve that. I support the concept that the Member has suggested.

Dr McDonnell: I congratulate the Minister and my Colleague, Carmel Hanna, the Minister for Employment and Learning, for the significant reduction in unemployment that has taken place over the past few years. I have no doubt that cross-border activity significantly contributes to job creation and has increased — [Interruption].

Mr Roche: Absolute nonsense.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Dr McDonnell: Mr Deputy Speaker, I hear a noise in the wilderness. Can he be removed from the wilderness, or can the wilderness be removed from him?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. If the call had been from the wilderness I would not have called a point of order. The call was from the House, which makes it a point of order. The Member is entitled to be heard.

Dr McDonnell: Before I was so rudely interrupted I wanted to say that I am aware that much bureaucracy and inhibitory factors have to be dealt with and negotiated before we can get full benefit from the North/South negotiations.

I am concerned about the digital island issue. We talk a great deal about e-government — much more so within Northern Ireland Departments — but as the 'Digital Island' discussion paper suggests, e-government affects the North/South dimension. I am frustrated by the inability of our Departments to get to grips with, and exploit, modern communication technology.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Is there a question?

Dr McDonnell: Will the 'Digital Island' discussion paper do anything more than pay lip-service and, if so, what tangible results will we see within three years?

Sir Reg Empey: We have asked a working group to produce specific proposals, and its report will be available to us at our next meeting. In response to an earlier question I said that we are trying to promote the development of trade by e-business. It is not rocket science: it is a perfectly sensible thing to be doing, and it has potential. However, we must ensure that we are operating in an environment that is not going to separate us further from the wider market. Consequently, the British-Irish Council has taken up the matter also. Work is ongoing on a North/South and east-west basis, which is entirely appropriate.

We will be reviewing the report of the working group in the next few months. My next report to the House on the matter will give the Member an opportunity to judge whether there is simply more bureaucracy or whether the specific proposals will achieve something within three years. If the Member would hold his fire until he sees the report after the next meeting, he should be better able to make a judgement then.

Mr Wells: My Colleague, Mr Neeson, referred to the Washington summit, and I assume that there will be a statement to the House or the Committee on the outcome of that important meeting.

As regards digital technology, there is one issue that the Minister has not yet been able to come to grips with. Roaming charges might seem to be a small issue, but it gets up the noses of many people in south Down. If the North/South Ministerial Council is serious about dealing with the problems of digital technology, can the Minister understand the anger of someone living in Rostrevor or Warrenpoint who regularly finds that Republic of Ireland telephone companies are deliberately beaming strong signals into south Down? Mobile phone users are being forced to use their network to make and, even worse, receive telephone calls, and they are then faced with huge telephone bills at the end of the month. While travelling from Kilkeel to Newry, I regularly receive two or three text messages welcoming me to the Irish Republic when I have not even set foot inside it. [Interruption]. Recently, one of my Colleagues received a bill for £1.50 for three text messages that welcomed him to the Irish Republic — and he had not even left Kilkeel. When will the Minister's Department get together with its counterpart in the Irish Republic to tell it to stop beaming these signals into Northern Ireland so that we can avoid incurring roaming charges?

Sir Reg Empey: Despite the hilarity in the Chamber, there is a serious point in Mr Wells's comments — if one can only find it. Telecommunications is a reserved matter and is the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Industry in London and its counterpart in the Republic.

The issue of roaming charges was raised at the last meeting of the British-Irish Council, when we pointed out that it is a double-edged sword. Signals are also beamed in the opposite direction — from Wales into the Republic, for example. Signals have a habit of crossing all sorts of borders. I am happy to take the Member's advice, and I will consult further with my Colleague across the border on how these matters may be addressed.

Dr O'Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. There is an argument for all-Ireland harmonisation of mobile phone networks. That would do away with the problem, given that it is the same country.

How far advanced and how formalised are InterTradeIreland's contacts with all economic development agencies on the island of Ireland, including Invest Northern Ireland (INI), the Industrial Development Agency (IDA), Enterprise Ireland and a range of smaller, less well-known economic agencies?

Sir Reg Empey: InterTradeIreland has arranged and facilitated several meetings. Some organisations had never met before. However, these are free-standing organisations, and it is up to them to determine how often and with whom they meet. We cannot dictate. Several organisations identified the advantages of receiving supplies from companies located a few miles down the road. Previously, they had had no knowledge of the products that those companies sold. The potential also exists for import substitution. If businesses can shorten their supply lines, they can reduce stocks and become more efficient. Anything that can be done in rural areas to ensure that people start to build trade between one another is to our benefit.

The bulk of our trade is with Great Britain, and the other largest markets are the United States and the Irish Republic. Anything that can be done to boost trade and relationships is to be welcomed. As Mr Wells stated, I was in Washington last week, and I will consider how I might best inform Colleagues about that visit.

InterTradeIreland has run a series of roadshows. It meets regularly with the agencies, but it recognises that the agencies are free-standing and have their own remit. InterTradeIreland acts as a facilitator to raise awareness of the economic and social benefits of doing business with companies that are close at hand. One of InterTradeIreland's tasks is to encourage and boost that trade, thereby creating and securing jobs close to home. That function is at the core of InterTradeIreland's existence. However, it cannot dictate how people should conduct their business. It can only facilitate and encourage businesses, and it is doing so effectively.

Ms Morrice: I was interested in the Minister's response to the previous question about how to boost trade on this island. He will not be surprised by my question. If InterTradeIreland is focusing on the promotion of trade and business, why was the euro not mentioned in the deliberations? Surely the introduction of the euro here would be the best and only way to boost trade. What are the practical outworkings of the currency differential for InterTradeIreland? The Minister said that we will be submitting joint bids to the European Union for the EUREKA programme, et cetera. Will those bids be in euros or sterling, and, on a practical level, are InterTradeIreland staff paid in euros or pounds?

Sir Reg Empey: I would never have guessed that the Member would raise that issue. Ms Morrice knows my views on the euro; I have repeated them several times in the House, and I am happy to do so again. I am working on the assumption that sterling will remain the currency of this country for the foreseeable future. I do not believe that the people of the United Kingdom wish to vote themselves into the single currency, so I do not envisage that happening in the immediate future.

However, the issue is not as simple as the Member says it is. Some businesses benefit from having sterling as their currency. Businesses using sterling to buy raw materials in the euro zone, or those that buy with a strong currency in international markets and sell into the dollar zone — as many of our businesses do — do better than those trading in euros.

If 12, 15 or 20 nations are brought together under a single currency, as proposed, not all of their economies will be compatible within a broader macroeconomy. They will not work at the same speed, nor will they have the same degree of development. It is not necessarily acceptable that the blunt instrument of a single interest rate should be used to control the money supply in those economies. Recently, for instance, the German economy would have benefited from a lower interest rate, but the Irish economy should have had a higher interest rate. The result is inflation.

It is horses for courses: some of our companies would benefit from being in the euro zone because the differential would no longer exist. The value of the euro has improved. However, the problem is not that sterling is overvalued; the euro is undervalued because it was created for political reasons. Some of the countries admitted into the single currency should not have been permitted to join. Some have already broken the rules, including Germany, one of the major economies, which cannot meet its targets on budget deficits. Despite that, nothing will happen; the issue will be fudged around. That is why the euro is undervalued; people do not trust that it will be treated equally for economic reasons.

The staff of InterTradeIreland are paid in sterling. I stand to be corrected, but I understand that any European bids submitted to Brussels, including those to the peace and reconciliation fund, are converted into euros.

Mr McMenemy: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I look forward to the publication of the 'Digital Island' discussion paper. Recent research shows that a major digital divide exists in Northern Ireland: 53% of citizens aged 16 and over do not have access to the Internet. I call on the Minister and his Department to address that by providing financial aid for the areas of most need, especially west Tyrone.

12.30 pm

Sir Reg Empey: Oh dear. Team west Tyrone strikes again. I am conscious of the serious point that the Member has made. There is a digital divide, and we are aware of it. My Department is running several schemes to try to ensure that businesses, including those in west Tyrone, do not suffer from geographic isolation. We are running a scheme under which small businesses can apply for grant aid to get broadband Internet access via satellite. That is a way of ensuring an alternative for businesses that are too far away to have a cable service. We hope to connect 200 businesses in the current round, and I will be happy to let the Member know how many have been connected and how many are in his constituency. It is important to note that people must apply for that grant.

Furthermore, my Department has five advisers who go around the client base of Invest Northern Ireland, talk to businesses and draw their attention to the benefits that can be gained from broadband. In Invest Northern Ireland's Lisburn office, all the technologies are on display. People can go to see them at work and receive advice on them.

The Department is technology-neutral. We do not say that one technology is good or that another technology is not good. It is a question of providing people with examples and showing them how they work. There is a great deal of traffic in that office, and we are trying to promote it.

The Member's question goes beyond pure business. As a community, we must take the wider social issue seriously. Some countries, such as the Republic and America, have been more successful than others at increasing the number of people involved. There is a pilot project in inner-city Belfast that plans to connect several people in this way, because there are wider issues. However, our priority has been to get businesses connected, and the Department is running several schemes designed to encourage that.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Minister referred to the 'Digital Island' discussion paper. Before we get to that point, Members remain to be convinced about digital Northern Ireland. The Minister knows that broadband and Bluetooth technologies are essential for the future development of Northern Ireland. Will he consider extending the availability of those services to rural communities in my constituency, such as Cullybackey, Ahoghill, Dervock and Stranocum, which are currently denied access to that network and are, therefore, denied any new incentive for employment? Will the Minister focus on the resolution of that issue before spending money on the bigger picture, which is less important than resolving Northern Ireland's own difficulties?

Sir Reg Empey: There is no question of people being denied access. A variety of technologies is available for broadband. I have just told Mr McMenemy that we are running a scheme under which people can apply for a grant of up to £1,500 or 50% of the cost of installation of a satellite-based broadband facility. The grant also includes a contribution to the first year's running costs.

Any business in any of the areas that the Member mentioned can apply to the Department. It will be visited by a departmental official and its suitability assessed, and a grant can be paid. Anyone in business in the Member's constituency has access to a scheme to enable the provision of broadband. This is specifically aimed at the type of rural situation to which Mr Paisley Jnr referred, where there is no reasonably priced access to cable.

One of the biggest encouragements for the companies to roll out their cabling and other facilities is "aggregation of demand". If the Member can encourage clusters of those involved in district councils, hospitals or schools — areas where there is a potential demand for broadband — to aggregate their demand to one of the companies, the company will then have the incentive to put the infrastructure in place. The Department is trying to do that locally through working with all the district councils.

That point also has cross-border application. In rural areas, particularly around the border, there may not be enough demand on one side, but if the demand on both sides were added together, both sides would benefit. That is the rationale for aggregating the demand and encouraging the cross-border element. That can help Northern Ireland because, on its own, its rural areas will not generate sufficient demand to stimulate the companies to put in the infrastructure.

Another development is the possibility of a wireless-based technology where a cluster can be established. There is £1.5 million available for that from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Industry in London. Mr Paisley Jnr is correct; it is a key issue, but it is being addressed. The facilities and the understanding are there. The key driver is not the supply of wireless-based technology, but the demand for it. It may cost British Telecom between £100,000 and £200,000 to convert an exchange such as ADSL only to find that it has just half a dozen customers. That is of no use to British Telecom, so demand for an exchange must be stimulated, and anything that the Member can do in that regard would be appreciated.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement and for his detailed answers. What progress has been made on the creation of the all-Ireland trade directory in which InterTradeIreland is involved? The Minister said that the North/South Ministerial Council received a verbal report from the chief executive of InterTradeIreland, but surely in 'Digital Island' a report of a different type could have been made available through modern technology.

Sir Reg Empey: The all-Ireland trade directory is not covered in this report. Work on the directory is ongoing, and I will write to Mr Molloy with details.

Inevitably, the Council will receive verbal reports, because the meetings take place up to several weeks after the relevant paperwork goes out. Also, there are other matters on which the Council must be updated, and it will want to question the chief executive of InterTradeIreland when he is there. Not everything can be done in writing, but I accept Mr Molloy's point. However, I think that there will always be a verbal report, and it is appropriate that the chief executive, to be accountable, be available for the Council to question face to face.

NORTH/SOUTH MINISTERIAL COUNCIL

Food Safety and Health

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that she wishes to make a statement.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is mian liom tuairisc a thabhairt don Tionól ar chruinniú den Chomhairle Aireachta Thuaidh/Theas a tionóladh i bhformáid earnáileach in Ard Mhacha Dé hAoine 28 Meitheamh 2002. Ag an chruinniú seo breithníodh ábhair a bhaineann leis an Bhord um Chur Chun Cinn Sábháilteachta Bia agus le comhoibriú ar shaincheisteanna sláinte.

Arna ainmniú ag an Chéad-Aire agus ag an LeasChéad-Aire, d'fhreastail an tUasal James Leslie, Aire in Oifig an Chéad-Aire agus an LeasChéad-Aire, agus mé féin ar an chúigiú cruinniú den Chomhairle san earnáil sábháilteachta bia agus in earnáil na sláinte. Ba é an tUasal Mícheál Martin, an tAire a bhfuil cúram na Roinne Sláinte agus Leanaí air, a rinne ionadaíocht thar ceann Rialtas na hÉireann.

Tá an ráiteas seo, a cheadaigh an tUasal James Leslie, á thabhairt ar a shon chomh maith.

Fuair an Chomhairle tuairisc ar an dul chun cinn a rinneadh ar riarachán agus ar obair an Bhoird um Chur Chun Cinn Sábháilteachta Bia. Bhí cur síos sa tuairisc ar an dul chun cinn a rinneadh ar chomhoibriú eolaíoch agus ar chomhnaisc shaotharlainne agus ar mhalartuithe foirne; an fhorbairt atá á déanamh ar fhóram bia agus cothaithe uile-oileáin; an cur chun cinn atá a dhéanamh ar fhaireachán trasteorann ar ghalair bhia-iompraithe; agus feachtas ilmheáin arb aidhm dó a chinntiú go ngéillimid do reachtaíocht sláinteachtais.

D'fháiltigh an Chomhairle roimh an dul chun cinn a rinne an Bord um Chur Chun Cinn Sábháilteachta Bia agus é ag cur a chlár oibre i gcrích.

Rinne an Chomhairle straitéis chorporáideach 2002-04 an bhoird a bhreithniú agus a cheadú. Déanfar athbhreithniú ar an phlean gach bliain sa phleanáil bhliantúil gnó nuair is féidir spriocanna a uasdhátú más gá. Cuirfear an phlean bliantúil faoi bhráid na Comhairle Aireachta Thuaidh/Theas gach bliain.

Cheadaigh an Chomhairle dréachtplean ag aimsiú riachtanas sóisialta nua an bhoird, a leasaíodh i ndiaidh comhairliúcháin phoiblí, agus scéim chomhionannais leasaithe an bhoird atá le cur faoi bhráid an Choimisiúin um Chomhionannas lena cheadú.

Fuair an Chomhairle cur i láthair ar ghníomhaíochtaí an tionscnaimh comhoibriú agus ag obair i gcomhar.

Maidir le saincheistanna na hearnála sláinte, fuair an Chomhairle tuairisc ar an dul chun cinn a rinneadh ar an chlár oibre a comhaontaíodh ag cruinnithe cheana. Ar na tosaíochtaí a aimsíodh le haghaidh comhoibriú tá seirbhísí taismí agus éigeandálaí, pleanáil le haghaidh olléigeandálaí, comhoibriú ar threalamh ardteicneolaíochta, taighde ar ailse, agus cur chun cinn sláinte.

Chuala an Chomhairle faoin dul chun cinn atáthar a dhéanamh maidir le comhoibriú trasteorann i seirbhísí otharlainne atá faoi cheannas an Ghrúpa Thuaidh/Theas um Seirbhísí Otharlann Réigiúnach. Sa tuairisc seo bhí cur síos ar chúrsaí maidir le nódú orgán sa Deisceart agus conas a b'fhéidir na seirbhísí seo a leathnú ar bhonn uile-oileáin.

Thacaigh an Chomhairle leis an dul chun cinn a rinne meithleacha oibre ar phleanáil le haghaidh éigeandála. Cuireadh an Chomhairle ar an eolas faoi phleananna maidir le comhoibriú agus ag obair i gcomhar ról bainistíochta a ghlacadh chuige féin ag forbairt pleanála le haghaidh éigeandála agus cúram réamh-ospidéal.

Cuireadh in iúl don Chomhairle gur ceapadh sainchomhairleoirí le staidéar féidearthachta a thionscnamh ar na costais agus na sochair a bhaineann le seirbhís míochaine éigeandála ingearáin a chur ar fáil. Fuair an Chomhairle tuairiscí ar an dul chun cinn a rinneadh ar chomhoiliúint seirbhísí dóiteáin thuaidh/theas ar thaismí tráchta bóthair.

Thug an Chomhairle dá haire go bhfuil obair á déanamh i gcónaí in ábhair ina bhféadfaí comhoibriú trasteorann a thionscnamh, lena n-áirítear taighde breise agus anailís le meas cad é mar a rachadh teicneolaíocht tomagrafaíochta astaithe positron ar bhonn uile-oileáin chun sochair don tsláinte.

Hinseadh don Chomhairle go bhfuiltear ag déanamh taighde le fáil amach arbh fhéidir comhoibriú a dhéanamh ar bhonn uile-oileáin ar sholáthar seirbhísí agus ar oiliúint oibríochtúil i seirbhísí taca riachtanacha san earnáil géarmhíochaine.

Thug an Chomhairle dá haire go bhfuil comhoibriú ar siúl sa Chuibhreannas Ailse ar Thaighde Ailse. Thug an Chomhairle dá haire gur fógraíodh maoiniú suntasach breise le haghaidh taighde teiripe ailse agus forbairtí i gcomhordú trialacha cliniciúla ar bhonn uile-oileáin.

Thug an Chomhairle dá haire an dul chun cinn a rinneadh go dtí seo i dtionscnamh chur chun cinn sláinte, lena n-áirítear na torthaí spreagúla ón mheasúnú a rinneadh ar an fheachtas aigéid fhólaigh.

D'aontaigh an Chomhairle gur sa Deisceart i nDeireadh Fómhair 2002 a bheadh an chéad chruinniú eile sna hearnálacha seo.

D'aontaigh an Chomhairle ar théacs na teachtaireachta a eisíodh i ndiaidh an chruinnithe. Cuireadh cóip den teachtaireacht sa Leabharlann.

I wish to report to the Assembly on the meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council held in sectoral format in Armagh on Friday 28 June 2002. The meeting considered matters relating to the Food Safety Promotion Board and co-operation on health issues.

Following nomination by the First and Deputy First Ministers, Mr James Leslie, junior Minister in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and I attended the fifth meeting of the Council in its Food Safety and Health sectoral format. Mr Micheál Martin, the Minister with responsibility for the Department of Health and Children, represented the Irish Government. This statement has been approved by Mr Leslie and is also made on his behalf.

The Council received a progress report on the administration and work of the Food Safety Promotion Board, which included details of progress on scientific co-operation; laboratory link and staff exchanges; the development of an all-island food and nutrition forum; the promotion of cross-border surveillance of food-borne diseases; and a multi-media campaign aimed at improving compliance with hygiene legislation.

The Council welcomed the progress made by the Food Safety Promotion Board on advancing its programme of work. The Council considered and approved the board's corporate strategy for 2002-04. The plan will be reassessed annually in the context of the annual business planning process, during which targets can be updated as necessary, and it will be submitted to the North/South Ministerial Council annually. The Council approved the board's draft New TSN plan, which was amended after public consultation, and the board's amended equality scheme for submission to the Equality Commission.

The Council received a presentation on the current activities of the co-operation and working together initiative (CAWT).

The Council received progress reports on the programme of work on health sectoral matters that it had agreed at previous meetings. The priorities identified for co-operation include accident and emergency services; planning for major emergencies; co-operation on high-technology equipment; cancer research and health promotion.

The Council heard progress reports on the continuing cross-border co-operation in hospital services overseen by the North/South Regional Hospital Services Group (NSRHSG), which included the current position on organ transplantation in the South and the possibility of developing the services on an all-island basis.

The Council endorsed the progress made by emergency planning working groups. It was informed of plans for CAWT to undertake a project management role in developing emergency planning and pre-hospital care initiatives.

The Council was also advised of the appointment of consultants to undertake a feasibility study on the costs and benefits associated with the introduction of an all-island helicopter emergency medical service. It also received progress reports on joint North/South fire-service training for road-traffic accidents.

In addition, the Council noted that work is continuing in several areas that have potential for cross-border co-operation, including further research and analysis to gauge the potential health gain from positron emission tomography (PET) technology on an all-island basis. The Council was also informed that the potential for all-island co-operation on procurement and operational training in essential support services in the acute sector is being researched.

The Council acknowledged the continuing co-operation on cancer research within the cancer consortium. It also noted the announcement of further significant funding for cancer therapy research and the developments to date in the co-ordination of all-island clinical trials.

The Council recognised progress on several health promotion initiatives, including the encouraging results from the evaluation of the folic acid campaign.

The Council agreed that its next meeting in these sectoral formats would take place in the South in October 2002. It approved the text of the communiqué that was issued after the meeting, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I welcome the Minister's report. I am aware of the good work that the Food Safety Promotion Board does across the island of Ireland. The board spoke to the Committee in May about its current programme.

First, as child-protection issues are dear to all our hearts, I would appreciate it if the Minister could expand on the co-ordination of child-protection issues on the island of Ireland, North and South.

Secondly, I welcome the development of emergency planning and the exploration of initiatives such as the helicopter emergency medical service. However, can the Minister comment on the feasibility study that is examining the introduction of an all-Ireland service and on the fact that the Royal Group of Hospitals, which provides key regional services, does not have its own helipad?

My final point is about positron emission tomography (PET), an issue that the Minister has led over the past couple of years. As Members will know, PET technology goes far beyond MRI scanning. Although it is available at Blackrock in Dublin, and now at the Royal Hospital for the people of Northern Ireland, can the Minister comment on the work that has been carried out with regard to that technology on an all-Ireland basis?

Ms de Brún: I welcome the fact that as a result of a significant charitable donation we now have an initial PET scanner at the Royal Group of Hospitals in Belfast. A framework for evaluating the benefits of that new technology will be in place once the facility begins proper operation.

With regard to the North/South Ministerial Council, so far the joint co-operation work has focused on building a framework for the shared learning of the clinical benefits of PET. The development of a PET clinical scanning service would be an appropriate area for North/South co-operation.

The work on child-protection issues is progressing. The lead on that is within the education sector, but I have clearly taken an interest in that too. My officials are members of the working group, and I am delighted with the progress it has made. With regard to the work that I undertook, individuals applying for paid and unpaid work with children are checked through the Pre-Employment Consultancy Service (PECS), which is operated by the Department. As well as checks carried out against criminal records, checks are also carried out against the PECS register. Similar lists held by the Department of Education here, the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health in England and Wales are also checked. The criminal records of individuals moving here from England, Scotland, Wales or the South are also examined, including information on convictions, cautions and bind overs.

As reported, work is ongoing with regard to the helicopter emergency medical service. The consultants have not come back yet with any detail on the options for the locations of such a service and, therefore, have not commented on the specifics of what is available in each hospital.

Mrs I Robinson: Can the Minister confirm that we will be the driving force in any new helicopter emergency medical service and that it will be based in Northern Ireland? Has there been any discussion with her counterparts in the west of Scotland, who would also benefit from the service owing to the close proximity of Scotland's coast?

Ms de Brún: Before looking at the matter on an all-Ireland basis, we investigated journey times from Scotland, and the fastest times were still well outside what is needed here. I mentioned the options for the locations of such a service in terms of the all-Ireland study, which has now been commissioned, because we are not necessarily looking at one single location for such a service, and the group's terms of reference allow it to look at several options.

Ms Ramsey: Can the Minister detail the progress that has been made on health promotion initiatives? I congratulate the North/South Ministerial Council on the successful folic acid campaign. Can the Minister copy the encouraging results of that campaign to Members?

Ms de Brún: I welcome recognition of the success of the folic acid campaign. The North/South Ministerial Council welcomed the televised public information campaigns on folic acid and on physical activity. The Council was also informed about collaboration on smoking issues, about discussions on the introduction of an all-Ireland Healthy Eating Circle awards scheme and on the feasibility of the development of an all-Ireland food and nutrition strategy. An all-Ireland conference on physical activity has been arranged for 27 and 28 November 2002 in the Canal Court Hotel in Newry. The results of lifestyle surveys that compare information on general health and lifestyle throughout the islands will be published towards the end of the year. I have previously reported to the Assembly that consideration was being given to the appointment of dedicated programme managers. A programme manager will soon be appointed by the Health Promotion Agency to help to develop and co-ordinate a strategically planned joint health-promotion programme.

Ms McWilliams: The Minister referred to an all-Ireland physical activity conference — rather than an all-Ireland physical activity and exercise evaluation — which MLAs might be asked to attend.

I have given some thought to a recent case in south Belfast that has some bearing on improving compliance with hygiene legislation. The current legislation is weak, so it would not be much to ask that compliance with that legislation be encouraged. The case involved a bakery that supplied food to local hospitals. It had broken nine food hygiene orders and was prosecuted. The magistrate allowed the case to be adjourned on three occasions, so perhaps consideration should be given to training the judiciary. The bakery continued to do business even though nine prosecution orders had been served. The maximum fine for breaking legislation is only £500, which is minimal for a business that can cause illness. That issue must be dealt with if there is to be compliance.

What is the maximum fine in the Republic of Ireland? Are fines much higher there than in Northern Ireland? If fines were higher, it would make more sense to ask for compliance. Businesses pay little attention to hygiene orders because the fines are not high enough.

I am heartened that research into cancer therapy is being undertaken —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member is taking a long time to get to the question. I believe that you are about to preface a question.

Ms McWilliams: I assure you, Mr Deputy Speaker, that the question is short. I welcome all-Ireland clinical trial activity, because it lends itself well to cancer research. Will the significant funding for cancer therapy research come from the block grant? What is the level of that funding?

Ms de Brún: I am unsure about the precise range of activities in the field of cancer research on which the Member seeks information.

Following a review, funding of 1.9 million euros for clinical trials was announced in November 2002. Six awards were made, including two planning grants. Additional funding of 0.7 million euros was made available by the Department of Health and Children to support the next phase of the initiative in 2002, the call for proposals. A second call to hospitals was issued in February 2002.

1.00 pm

The objective for the appropriate model for the development of clinical trials infrastructure in Ireland is to fund several centres to carry out high-quality clinical research trials to a level similar to that already achieved in Belfast City Hospital and to fund an all-Ireland clinical trials group to co-ordinate the trial activity of funded hospitals.

Regulation and compliance with hygiene legislation is a matter for the Food Standards Agency. I will raise that matter with the agency.

Mr McFarland: The Minister will be aware of concern about cross-border hospitals. In her progress report on continuing co-operation, was there any more enlightenment on where the cross-border development plan for the Cavan, Sligo and Erne hospitals, which has left Tyrone completely bereft of any hospital support, is going? Was that discussed at the meeting?

Dr Hayes's study contained a substantial body of information, especially from America, concerning helicopter transport in medical situations. I understand that helicopter transport has been extensively tested in America. The advice given to Dr Hayes was that light aircraft use was fine, but that helicopters were extremely dangerous in medical cases because of their unreliability in the air. Was that discussed at the meeting? Will she speak to Dr Hayes?

Ms de Brún: The study that has been commissioned is on the feasibility, as well as the costs, of a helicopter emergency medical service. Members will be aware that successive North/South Ministerial Council meetings have discussed that issue and that the Ministers who have attended those meetings have endorsed it. There is, of course, cross-party representation from the Assembly at those meetings. We have decided to commission the feasibility study, including options for the locations of such a service. The study will consider all matters impinging on the feasibility of such a service.

On the question of developing better services, I do not agree with the Member's wording of his question, as frequently happens. I come to it with a slightly different outlook. However, I informed the North/South Ministerial Council health sector meeting that I had, in the plenary session of the Council that morning, referred to my announcement on 12 June of proposals for modernising hospital services and restructuring health and social services and that the strategy was tabled for discussion at the last meeting of the North/South regional hospital service group.

The Member will be aware that the permanent secretary of my Department and the secretary general of the Department of Health and Children have had specific discussions on the potential use of hospitals in the South by people from the Fermanagh and Tyrone areas. Minister Martin and I have also spoken about my proposals for modernising services and have agreed to meet for further discussion on those matters. It is important to note the report that was made at that meeting. As regards the ongoing work, a further meeting with Minister Martin is planned, as I have said.

The North/South Regional Hospital Services Group, which was established to consider the opportunities for developing partnerships, covers the wider regional and supraregional services, as that work is more localised. Minister Martin and I have agreed that the resources required for an examination of the specific use of hospitals in that area can best be taken forward by officials. A small team of my officials will visit hospitals in Monaghan, Cavan, Sligo and Letterkenny to discuss with clinicians and officers of the North Eastern and North Western Health Boards services that those hospitals might provide for people in Fermanagh and Tyrone. I expect the first stage of the work to be completed by the end of September.

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement and the details about the conference. Does the Council recognise the considerable achievements of co-operation and working together (CAWT) with the GP out-of-hours services and its overall work on cross-border initiatives? In terms of the interlinking of hospital services, it is important that the review takes into account not just Cavan and Monaghan, but other counties in Ireland. Under the new proposals, which county in Ireland, other than Tyrone, will not have babies born in it? Will the Minister consider those matters?

Ms de Brún: Given the range of different maternity services that are being proposed, I do not know if it is possible to say that, in future, there will be any counties in which no babies are born. Notwithstanding that, my overall responsibility is to ensure that the best possible services are delivered to the population of a given area. Thus, my proposals offer the best possible configuration of services for the people of Fermanagh and Tyrone and for the entire population.

The Council received a report from CAWT and welcomes its work. A feasibility study commissioned by CAWT on the GP out-of-hours services has been undertaken by the University of Ulster and the National University of Ireland, Galway. The study found that approximately 70,000 people, North and South, are closer to out-of-hours services across the border. Furthermore, up to 70% of that population live in areas that can be classed as socially deprived. A number of detailed legislative, financial and practical issues have been addressed in the feasibility study, and the CAWT management board is considering a proposal to provide further support under INTERREG III for two pilot projects to test the concept of establishing cross-border arrangements to allow people easier access to GP out-of-hours services wherever they live.

Mr Savage: I also welcome the Minister's statement. One of the issues that concerns me is organ transplantation. Will those services be expanded in Northern Ireland?

Ms de Brún: We are examining that area closely. Not only does working together in this way make sense, it also allows us to do things that would otherwise not be possible. I have great hopes for that area.

FAMILY LAW (DIVORCE ETC) BILL

First Stage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 1/02] to make provision for certain general principles in the exercise of functions under the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978; to amend Article 3 of that Order and Article 3 of the Domestic Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1980; to provide for mediation in proceedings under those Orders; and to make provision for the equal treatment of husband and wife in certain cases.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

AREAS OF SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC INTEREST BILL

First Stage

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 2/02] to make new provision with respect to areas of special scientific interest.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

First Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 3/02] to amend the law relating to statutory maternity pay; to amend the law relating to maternity allowance; to make provision for work-focused interviews for partners of benefit claimants; to make provision about the use of information for, or relating to, employment and training; to amend the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

HEALTH AND PERSONAL SOCIAL SERVICES BILL

Final Stage

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Molaim go ritear an Bille Sláinte agus Seirbhísí Sóisialta agus Pearsanta anois.

I beg to move

That the Health and Personal Social Services Bill (NIA 6/01) do now pass.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety supports this important Bill and is pleased that it has reached its Final Stage. I have nothing to add to what I said at earlier stages.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Health and Personal Social Services Bill (NIA 6/01) do now pass.

SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Accelerated Passage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 40(4), this Assembly grants accelerated passage to the Social Security Bill (NIA 3/02).

The Bill is an important piece of legislation, as it makes provisions for Northern Ireland that correspond to the social security provisions that are contained in the Employment Act 2002. The Bill also amends article 17 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 to ensure proper control by the Assembly of Orders that are made under that article.

There is a long-standing principle of parity between Great Britain and Northern Ireland in the fields of social security, pensions and child support. Given that people in Northern Ireland pay the same rate of income tax and National Insurance contributions as those in Great Britain, they are entitled to expect changes in the legislation in Great Britain to apply in Northern Ireland with minimal delay.

The Employment Act 2002 received Royal Assent on 8 July, and the Department for Work and Pensions is introducing several of its substantive provisions, especially those relating to the use of information and to maternity pay, as a matter of urgency.

In addition, clause 7 of the Bill seeks to amend article 17 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 to allow for Assembly control of a proposed carers Order to deal with the deregulation of carers' allowance.

The carers Order will allow carers aged 65 and over to claim invalid care allowance for the first time; it will extend entitlement to invalid care allowance for up to eight weeks after the death of a disabled person; and, to make it clearer that the benefit is for carers and their needs, it will change the name of the benefit to "carers' allowance" from April 2003.

The removal of the upper age limit for claims to invalid care allowance means that carers aged 65 and over without a retirement pension, or with a reduced rate of retirement pension, will be able to receive the benefit, thus increasing their income by up to £42.45 per week. It will also give carers who receive the minimum income guarantee access to the carer premium, which is £24.80 per week.

The provision for carers aged 65 and over to claim for the first time and the extension of entitlement for up to eight weeks after the death of a disabled person are scheduled to come into operation across the country on 28 October 2002. It is, therefore, vital that the Bill be granted accelerated passage so that carers aged 65 and over can enjoy the benefits of invalid care allowance from the same date as their counterparts elsewhere in the country. To do otherwise would be to disadvantage our carers aged 65 and over.

Although the statutory maternity pay changes are not due to come into operation until 6 April 2003, the changes to the period of notice to be given to an employer and the safeguarding of statutory maternity pay from the fifteenth week before the expected week of confinement will apply to women with an expected date of confinement of 6 April or later. For that reason, clause 3 of the Bill must be introduced early to allow regulations coming into operation in November 2002 to be made.

I am, therefore, asking that the Bill proceed under the accelerated passage procedure outlined in Standing Order 40(4) so that we can bring Northern Ireland law on such matters into line with that in Great Britain with the minimum of delay. The use of the accelerated passage procedure means that there will not be a formal Committee Stage. However, I met the Committee for Social Development recently to discuss the provisions of the Bill, including the reasons for seeking accelerated passage. There will be opportunities for Members to make their views known during the Second Stage, Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Cobain): The Minister notified the Committee of his intention to seek accelerated passage at the beginning of August, and he agreed to attend a specially convened meeting on 29 August to explain the reasons behind that request. At that meeting, the Minister said that the Bill is a parity measure because it replicates social security provisions contained in the Employment Act 2002 — legislation that has been enacted in Westminster. The Minister also said that he felt it necessary to make minor amendments to the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996.

We listened carefully to what the Minister said. The Committee welcomed the Minister's assurances that the provisions in this Bill are beneficial. We are satisfied that that is the case. The Committee also accepted the Minister's contention that it is important to ensure that people in Northern Ireland benefit from these changes at the same time as they are introduced in Great Britain.

In the light of the Minister's assurances, the Committee agreed not to object to his request that the Bill be granted accelerated passage.

Mr O'Neill: As the Chairperson and the Minister have said, the legislation is important. The Committee supports the use of accelerated passage because, on examining the Bill, it is clear that recipients would be disadvantaged by delay.

However, as you are aware, Mr Deputy Speaker, there is always concern about the use of accelerated passage. At the Committee meeting that the Chairperson has just mentioned, I suggested to the Minister that he bring early notification of any changes to Statutory Rules to the Committee for scrutiny, and the Minister was agreeable to that idea. Clearly, his Department will be in touch with its counterpart in Westminster about the legislative process. If some early correspondence could be given to us — not necessarily for this Bill, but for other procedures — the Committee could have an opportunity to scrutinise Bills at an earlier stage.

Ms McWilliams: I too was concerned when I heard that accelerated passage was being proposed for this Bill, but having heard the Minister I understand the reason for it, which is that no one should lose out as a result of late payments.

I am heartened by Mr O'Neill's comments that the Committee will be able to scrutinise Statutory Rules as they proceed. I am not a member of the Committee for Social Development, but I made it my business to ask a member about the range of benefits that the Bill covers. The Minister mentioned the carers' allowance. We took that legislation through the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

I heard the Minister say that this will be a devolved matter, and, therefore, I assume that the Minister will produce the rules and regulations himself. Simply put, will parity have the same effect as it does for many other benefits? In other words, will they be paid at the same rates, or will there be discretion in Northern Ireland for variation in the carers' allowance?

Mr Dodds: I am grateful to the Chairperson of the Committee and to Mr O'Neill for their remarks. I was grateful for the opportunity to explain to the Committee why the Department was seeking accelerated passage for this Bill. I would prefer to avoid that process where possible, but we must treat each of these parity measures on their merits, and we will have to return to the issue. The underlying principle must be that because people in Northern Ireland pay the same rates of tax, National Insurance and pension contributions as their counterparts elsewhere in the country, they are entitled to the same rates of benefits at the same time and on the same conditions.

Therefore, I am grateful that there will be no objection to accelerated passage in this case, but at the Second Stage and further stages there will be an opportunity to go into more detail on the substance of the Bill.

In answer to Ms McWilliams, clause 7 has been inserted in the Bill to give the Assembly control over the carers' Order. Social security is ultimately a devolved matter, although under the terms of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, there is for the first time a statutory provision that requires the Minister for Social Development and the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions to agree to implement a single system of social security and to implement parity.

The Northern Ireland Assembly can alter the rates of various benefits. However, whether those benefits are demand-led or paid directly by Treasury, the necessary extra money would have to be found from the Northern Ireland block. In Northern Ireland, the complex social security systems are so intimately tied in with the system throughout the rest of the UK that we would have to fund the costs of separating the computer systems in order to deliver that sort of benefit change. The cost would be severe, and the underlying principle of parity between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK, which has been to our advantage over the years, would be breached.

I ask Members to support the granting of accelerated passage to the Social Security Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That, in accordance with Standing Order 40(4), this Assembly grants accelerated passage to the Social Security Bill (NIA 3/02).

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will receive its Second Stage on 10 September 2002.

SPEAKER'S BUSINESS

Mr Deputy Speaker: In the course of the debate on the Final Stage of the Health and Personal Social Services Bill, I neglected to call Mr McCarthy to speak: I did not spot his name on the list of Members wishing to speak. I apologise to the House and to Mr McCarthy for that omission.

Mr McCarthy: I accept your apology, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was disappointed that I did not get the opportunity to speak. As Members will recall, I introduced a number of important amendments to the Bill in June relating to free personal care.

STRATEGIC PLANNING BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr A Maginness): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 25 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Strategic Planning Bill (NIA 17/01).

The Strategic Planning Bill received its Second Stage on 25 June and was referred to the Committee for Regional Development on 26 June. Although the Bill is primarily technical in nature, it is, nevertheless, an important piece of legislation.

The Committee is, therefore, anxious to ensure that it carries out its responsibilities and conducts a rigorous scrutiny of the Bill. To that end, the Committee wishes to call several witnesses, and it is important that sufficient time be allocated to allow the Committee to consider the evidence. Other Committee work pressures are building up, which will add to difficulties in considering the Bill within the limit of the prescribed 30 days. Therefore, on behalf of the Committee, I seek an extension to 25 November 2002 to allow sufficient time for the Committee to consider the Bill and report its findings. I ask Members for their support.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 25 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Strategic Planning Bill (NIA 17/01).

AD HOC COMMITTEE ON DRAFT FIREARMS (NORTHERN IRELAND) ORDER 2002

Resolved:

That, pursuant to Standing Order 48(7), this Assembly appoints an Ad Hoc Committee to consider –

The proposal for a draft Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2002 referred by the Secretary of State and to submit a report to the Assembly by 17 December 2002.

	SDLP	2
	DUP	2
	SF	2
	Other parties	3

Quorum: The quorum shall be five.

Procedure: The procedures of the Committee shall be such as the Committee shall determine. — [Ms McWilliams.]

The sitting was suspended at 1.30 pm.

2.30 pm

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform Members that question 10 in the name of Mrs Courtney has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

World Summit

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to make a statement on the Executive response to the World Summit on Sustainable Development. (AQO 31/02)

12. Mr Davis asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to give details of the First Minister's recent visit to South Africa; and to make a statement. (AQO 17/02)

The First Minister (Mr Trimble): I went to South Africa to represent Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom delegation at the World Summit on Sustainable Development. The Deputy First Minister had intended to attend also but, sadly, was unable to do so because of his mother's terminal illness. I am sure that the Assembly will join me in extending to him sincere sympathies on her death.

The summit drew up an important international programme for sustainable development. It agreed on actions for, among other things, sanitation; water supplies; the conservation of fish stocks and other natural resources; and the further development of renewable energy. The Executive had begun to tackle those and related issues before the summit. As Members know, sustainable development is a key cross-cutting theme that underpins the work and priorities set out in the Programme for Government. In the coming months, the Executive will consider the summit's implications for us. We shall combine those findings with the outcome of our consultations on the Northern Ireland sustainable development strategy. The Executive have also recently published the Northern Ireland biodiversity strategy.

While I was at the summit, I took the opportunity to develop a sustainable homes project at a township called Ivory Park, near Johannesburg. I also looked at three community development projects near Cape Town. I met the Premier of the Western Cape Province and several of his ministerial colleagues to discuss those and related matters. I also met the Canadian Prime Minister, the Israeli Foreign Minister, the Vice-President of Colombia and a senior representative of the Movement for Democratic Change in Zimbabwe. I also met Cyril Ramaphosa, members of the South African Human Rights Commission and several other interesting personalities.

Mr McCarthy: On behalf of my party, I offer my sympathy to the Deputy First Minister Mark Durkan on the sad loss of his mother last week.

I hope that the First Minister's trip to South Africa was inspirational and that, after meeting so many important people, he has brought home fresh ideas. Does he intend to introduce a statutory duty for sustainable development along the lines of that introduced for the National Assembly for Wales in the Government of Wales Act 1998? If not, what plans does he have? Does he envisage committing this Assembly to the principles of sustainable development by putting it at the heart of our decisions, programmes, policies and ways of working?

The First Minister: I am sorry to say that I am not familiar with the Welsh legislation, but we shall consider it and the Member's proposal.

We shall also consider the implications of the UN summit. We face challenges in several areas, particularly with regard to renewable energy. The agreements reached in Johannesburg on water and related matters are very important for the Third World. They put in place standards that do not exceed those that apply to us under European Directives. As the Member knows, we have much work to do to ensure that the water supply and water services in Northern Ireland meet the standards set by the European Directives, which are higher than the UN-sponsored standards set in Johannesburg. We shall consider the ongoing strategies and responses to consultation papers to establish whether we should take more general action in response to need.

Mr Davis: Can the First Minister comment on development being the main means by which poverty will be tackled in developing countries?

The First Minister: I was particularly struck by the position in some of the townships around Johannesburg and Cape Town. Of course, while one wants development to be sustainable, the key need in the Third World is for actual development. To achieve effective development, there must be a clear opportunity for people to participate in the economy and, indeed, a stable legal order for that to happen. We are conscious of huge opportunities in development. Although we have no direct responsibility for that and it is not something that we can directly assist, Members will want to see the ideas from the UN summit being carried forward.

Mr R Hutchinson: Bearing in mind that the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has no direct responsibility in such matters, was this the best use of your Department's resources — especially when there is such public concern about the number of people it takes to run your Department and the cost involved?

The First Minister: The Member misses the point. We were invited to join the UK delegation, along with representatives from the devolved Administrations in Wales and Scotland, simply because whatever came out of the Johannesburg summit would have to be implemented by those responsible for economic and environmental matters. In so far as that would affect England, the UK Government would be responsible: for Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland the devolved Administrations would be responsible.

The UK Government took the view that it was important to include the devolved Administrations as a way of demonstrating their commitment to implement whatever comes from the summit. Regarding economic and environmental matters, being at the summit gave us the opportunity to indicate our commitment to see that standards set out in the UN summit, and, indeed, European Directives, are achieved. That is important, and attending the summit was very valuable for this Administration.

Countering Sectarianism

2. Mr Ford asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to make a statement on action being taken by the Executive to counter sectarianism.
(AQO 30/02)

Interface Violence

8. Mr Cobain asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to make a statement on the recent interface violence within Northern Ireland.

The Deputy First Minister (Mr Durkan): With permission, I will take questions 2 and 8 together. We deplore interface violence and all manifestations of sectarianism. Such antisocial behaviour is harmful not only to the well-being of local communities but to Northern Ireland as a whole. It destroys the local environment; ruins businesses and employment prospects; drives away new investment; and presents an unattractive picture to the world. We must all support the police in any good efforts to maintain law and order as well as stepping up our own efforts to deal with the underlying causes of sectarianism.

The Executive have committed themselves, in the Programme for Government, to putting a cross-departmental strategy and framework in place for promoting community relations and to ensure that there is an effective and co-ordinated approach to sectarian intimidation. A consultation paper is at an advanced stage of drafting, and it is anticipated that it will be submitted to the Executive for consideration in the near future. Following Executive approval, the consultation paper will be published.

Respondents will have two months to communicate their views.

We intend to ensure that consultation is as broad as possible. For that reason we intend to convene meetings of political parties and social partners, including the churches and community organisations. The specific actions that should be taken to improve community relations will be discussed at those meetings.

The Executive stand ready to support any local initiative aimed at assisting local communities to resolve their differences peacefully. Our office has provided support through the Community Relations Council for a considerable number of groups and projects aimed at improving community relations.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for his reply: unfortunately, coming when it does, it is not terribly credible. On 11 December 2001 I was told that a consultative document on community relations would be issued to interested bodies in April 2002. In April I was told it was imminent. I have just been told, yet again, that it is imminent. When are they actually going to do something about producing this document as opposed to talking about it?

In the meantime, the Executive have collectively failed to take any action on illegal flags and graffiti, action that was supported unanimously in the Assembly. The excuse for doing nothing about those issues was that they were being dealt with as part of the community relations review, which has run completely into the sand. Since then, we have all the difficulties that arose during the summer, followed by Ministers making separate personal visits to either side of the peace line.

Mr Speaker: I must ask the Member to come to the question.

Mr Ford: When are they going to do something collectively?

The Deputy First Minister: As I indicated in my answer, we hope that the draft consultation paper will go to the Executive shortly. It will then be issued for consultation. However, we do not want to rely on merely going through the standard consultation mechanisms, given the seriousness of the issue. Thus, the First Minister and I have decided that we will convene meetings of the political parties and of the social partners to discuss all the implications. We are trying to focus on this in ways that are helpful and that will involve as many people of different perspectives as possible. The issue will not simply be in any one Department's control, and it will certainly not be controlled by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

We have responded in different ways to problems in several areas. We have worked with other Departments to try to ensure that the devolved Administration is able to respond constructively where it can to some of the issues and difficulties that arise. That work is ongoing.

Mr Ford made an inference about people making separate visits to different sides of the peace line. I had planned to be in east Belfast last Wednesday, on both sides of the peace line, but my mother's death meant that those plans had to change.

Mr Cobain: Does the Deputy First Minister agree with the statement by the Assistant Chief Constable for Belfast, Alan McQuillan, linking mainstream paramilitaries with the orchestration of interface violence? Can he confirm the current status of the road realignment project promised to the people of Glenbryn?

The Deputy First Minister: The Assistant Chief Constable gave an assessment of the involvement of paramilitary organisations in the violence. We all have reason to believe that different paramilitary organisations have been active in different ways and at different levels in much of the violence that we have seen. I am in no doubt that, in many instances, Loyalist paramilitaries are the sole aggressor; in other instances, they are the primary aggressor. In other instances and areas there are Loyalist and Republicans involved actively in fermenting and continuing the violence. We want all paramilitaries to desist from orchestrating violence or responding in a violent way.

The Member asked about what he referred to as the road realignment project. Members may be aware that the First Minister and I appointed arbitrators to look at how best to deal with the outstanding issues in relation to community safety matters and community dialogue. Those were the two main issues that we still had to address and make progress on, based on the letter that the First Minister and I issued last November.

There was not sufficient consensus or acceptance of any of the proposals that the First Minister and I had been working on. We referred it to arbitrators, and they have made their report. We received and accepted recommendations. They have been the subject of further feedback, and we now have a further report from the arbitrators. The Member will be aware that there does not seem to be any wider or more enthusiastic acceptance of the arbitrators' recommendations from the community interests than for any of the previous proposals that the First Minister and I worked on.

Mr A Maginness: My point arises out of Mr Ford's question about a counter-sectarianism strategy. Does the Deputy First Minister not agree that there is a duty on us all — the political parties and civil society — and not just on the Executive or on the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to counteract sectarianism, in whatever form?

2.45 pm

I come from north Belfast and represent North Belfast, and we have seen the worst examples of sectarianism.

On Saturday night and Sunday night there were further attacks in the Skegoneill area, so I have some knowledge of the situation. Does the Deputy First Minister agree that the only way to tackle sectarianism is to mobilise society, including the political parties?

The Deputy First Minister: I agree with the Member, and that is why the First Minister and I decided to convene meetings with the political parties as well as meetings with social partners. This needs community-wide mobilisation. It is not enough simply to deplore sectarian violence where it happens: we must confront, challenge and eradicate sectarianism from society. It is not enough for us to be working in shared institutions: we must ensure that we build a truly shared society. We must ensure that people in all walks of life in all parts of this city, and elsewhere, can live in safety and harmony with their neighbours. That is a huge challenge for us all. We can all be good at pointing out sectarianism in others. Let us confront prejudice in all its forms. That will be a significant challenge for us all — not just for the political parties.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I offer my sympathy, and that of my party, to the Deputy First Minister on the passing of his mother, comhbhrón ónár gcroí.

Will the Deputy First Minister comment on the recent initiative taken by the Belfast Lord Mayor, Alex Maskey, as part of his contribution towards the campaign to counter sectarianism?

The Deputy First Minister: I thank Mr McElduff and take this opportunity to thank all Members who have expressed condolences to me and other family members on the death of my mother. That thanks extends to staff and officials in the Assembly and to journalists.

I attended the anti-sectarianism rally convened by the Lord Mayor of Belfast and Belfast City Council. I said then, and have said since, that it was a commendable initiative. In the past such measures have been led by the trade union movement, and it continues to be positively and proactively involved. It was right and proper for the council and the Lord Mayor to step forward as they did. I hope that their work for good relations bears fruit, and I hope that that happens in all council chambers. Sectarianism and sectarian attacks have not been confined to Belfast. Although sectarianism has a profile and concentration in the Belfast area, sectarianism has reigned havoc in the lives of innocent people in Larne, Coleraine and elsewhere.

Mr McCartney: I join other Members in extending my sympathy, and that of my party, to the Deputy First Minister on the death of this mother.

In addressing the issue of sectarianism, and the steps needed to combat it, the Deputy First Minister talked about community involvement. But are not the essential community leaders the leaders of the political parties and elected representatives in the Assembly? The deputy chief constable and other members of the security forces acknowledge that paramilitaries are behind the increasing escalation of violence and confrontation in Belfast and other areas and that those paramilitaries are fronted by political parties in the Assembly among others. Bearing that in mind, is it not time that the Executive and the Assembly brought collective and political pressure to bear on those parties representing the organisations that are fermenting and escalating the violence that we wish to combat?

The Deputy First Minister: In previous answers I expressed my belief that all political parties share a real responsibility to challenge sectarianism and ongoing paramilitary violence. We must be universal, and as unequivocal as possible, in our condemnation of all paramilitary activity. In the past, unfortunately, there has been an element of “whataboutery”, whereby people have tried to excuse or explain one form of paramilitary activity on the back of other forms of it. We must move beyond that, because the whole community wants to know that those who call themselves democrats repudiate paramilitarism in any form and see no justification for it. In a united way, we must make it clear to paramilitaries that they have no right to attack anyone in this society, nor any right to purport to defend anyone.

Discussions with Prime Minister or Taoiseach

3. Dr Birnie asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to detail any recent discussions with (a) the Prime Minister or (b) the Taoiseach.

The First Minister : The last joint meeting that the Deputy First Minister and I had with the Prime Minister and with the Taoiseach was at the British-Irish Council meeting in Jersey on 14 June. In addition to the joint meeting there have been several individual meetings.

Dr Birnie: During any such meetings, did the subject of the implications of the 11 September atrocity arise and hence, by implication, what best Northern Ireland can do to play its part in combating international terrorism?

The First Minister: We approach the first anniversary of the terrible atrocity of 11 September, which crystallised for everyone the tremendous threat that international terrorism has posed for the world. In our own way, I am sure that we are committed to opposing the continuance of terrorism in any form. All the parties that endorsed the agreement affirmed, in its initial paragraphs, their absolute commitment to “peaceful means” and their opposition to the “use or threat of force ... whether in regard to this agreement or otherwise.”

The phrase “or otherwise” is not qualified. If a party here or an organisation in Northern Ireland has been involved in assisting terrorist organisations elsewhere, as has the Republican movement, it is in breach of its undertakings in the agreement. One would want to know whether all such actions in support of terrorism outside Northern Ireland have ceased and whether the party in question has maintained its connections with ETA and the now illegal Herri Batasuna party. It would, of course, be contrary to the agreement for that party to maintain those connections.

Mr Roche: Does the First Minister agree that, in the context of Northern Ireland, the only way to deal authentically with the involvement of terrorists is to make sure that the representatives and leaders of an organisation such as the IRA, which is now operating at the heart of international terrorism, do not continue to participate in the Government of Northern Ireland. Mr Trimble’s responsibility is, if needs be, to end that involvement by collapsing the Executive.

The First Minister: It is open to Mr Roche, if he finds it uncomfortable in the Chamber, to leave it.

Maze Site

4. Mr Poots asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister what discussions have taken place with the Ministry of Defence regarding the removal of contaminated materials from the Maze site.
(AQO 35/02)

The Deputy First Minister: We understand that diesel contamination was found at the Ministry of Defence site at Long Kesh, adjacent to Maze Prison. Remedial work has now been completed, and levels are below those prescribed. A six-month monitoring has recently begun to ensure that the levels remain within the required limits.

The Northern Ireland Office is not aware of any contamination on the Maze prison site.

Mr Poots: I thank the Deputy First Minister for his response. Will he further ascertain whether other contamination has taken place? I have heard allegations that toxic materials were disposed of at the Maze site during the 1970s. I have also been informed that asbestos may have been dumped there. It would be difficult to develop the site unless some form of decontamination took place. I ask that it be fully investigated to ascertain whether there are any materials that might be dangerous to the public if the site were developed.

The Deputy First Minister: I am not aware of the contamination that the Member has referred to or has heard allegations of, but since he has brought the matter to the OFMDFM’s attention, it will be pursued to enable us to be fully aware of what material is on the site and what the condition of the site is.

Mr Attwood: The Deputy First Minister appreciates that one of Belfast’s great natural assets is its hills —

Castlereagh, Cavehill, Black Mountain and Divis Mountain. Mindful that the Black Mountain has been ravaged by quarrying — more for private profit than to meet public need — has the Deputy First Minister raised the issue of the Ministry of Defence's disposal of land at Divis Mountain? What steps can be taken to ensure that public access to that land continues and develops?

Mr Speaker: If the Minister can see a connection with the question he is a better man than I am — but then he is a better man than I am.

The Deputy First Minister: The connection, I assume, is the disposal of Ministry of Defence land. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is aware of the community's strong interest in the future use of the land at Divis Mountain, and it knows that there have been discussions involving the Ministry of Defence, the National Trust and the Heritage Lottery Fund. We support the objective of making land at Divis Mountain accessible in the future. The Department of the Environment has been keeping in touch with those issues. The land was not included in the reinvestment and reform initiative on the basis that the Ministry of Defence believed that the future of the land had been settled through negotiations with the National Trust.

Funding of Women's Groups

5. Ms McWilliams asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to make a statement on its current and proposed policy regarding the funding of women's groups. (AQO 22/02)

The First Minister: Women's groups are an integral part of the community and voluntary sector. A recent position paper on the funding of women's organisations concluded that there was a need to identify an interim measure to support the work of women's organisations. An interdepartmental working group, jointly chaired by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Department for Social Development, commissioned and considered research by the women's support network on potential and actual job and service losses, and it also explored options to secure funding for this measure.

The working group concluded that the most effective way forward was to make an Executive programme fund bid for a share of the £6 million announced in July by the Executive. The purpose of the bid is to maintain important voluntary community sector services that are facing short-term financial difficulties. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Department for Social Development have worked together on behalf of the working group to produce a cross-departmental bid to sustain many services, including those delivered by women's organisations. That bid is supported by several other Departments.

Ms McWilliams: On behalf of the Women's Coalition, I extend my condolences to the Deputy First Minister on the death of his mother.

I am slightly reassured by the First Minister's answer, but nonetheless I am concerned about the delay and the length of time it has taken. Will the First Minister confirm how many meetings have taken place about this urgent issue? Last week, Members may have received, as I did, faxes from a women's centre explaining that it had received a large capital grant to build a brand new building, which opened recently, only to discover last Friday that it was closing its doors. An urgent meeting of the management had been called to tell everyone that they were shutting up shop. Windsor Women's Centre in the Village area, the Shankill women's centre and many others are having the same crisis. We can no longer wait for decisions that take such a long time. When will the money be delivered at ground level? All of the centres could be faced with closure.

The First Minister: The bid to the Executive programme funds for a share of the £6 million will come before the Executive later this month, so something may develop from that. I understand the general point that the Member makes because of the reduction in the amount —

Mr Speaker: I must interrupt the First Minister because the time for questions to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is up. Perhaps the First Minister will give the balance of his answer to the Member in writing.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform the House that question 17, standing in the name of Mrs Annie Courtney, has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Car Theft

1. Dr Birnie asked the Minister for Regional Development what discussions he has had with PSNI regarding the incidence of car theft from on-street car parking in Belfast. (AQO 19/02)

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): Car theft from on-street car parking is a law and order issue and, as such, my Department has not been advised or approached by the Police Service. It may be of little interest to the Member, but a record is kept of the incidences of car theft from off-street car parks in the eastern division. Those records show that three cars have been stolen in the past six months.

Dr Birnie: I have been informed by other sources that many cars stolen in the Belfast city area are from unattended on-street car parking areas and are principally left by commuters during office hours. What is the Minister doing, or what does he intend to do, to promote public transport and/or move towards residents car parking schemes to reduce the number of cars parked on-street, which are particularly vulnerable to theft?

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

Mr P Robinson: As I said, I have no ministerial responsibility in that area. However, the hon Member will be interested to know that I voted against the organisational changes in the Police Service that have left it with a shortfall in finance, manpower and organisation.

Mr Morrow: Dr Birnie touched on the subject of my supplementary question. What plans does the Minister have to introduce residents parking schemes in Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: The Department for Regional Development has the statutory power under the Road Traffic Regulation (Northern Ireland) Order 1997 to introduce residents parking schemes. While the Department has identified some pilot residents parking schemes to test the necessary administrative enforcement procedures, the Assembly will be aware and will appreciate that those schemes will benefit local residents only if they are effectively enforced. In Northern Ireland, unlike the rest of the UK, that is solely a matter for the police or, in some cases, traffic wardens.

Regrettably, during discussions on the issue, the police have stated that they would be unable to undertake the necessary enforcement work in relation to such schemes. It, therefore, seems unlikely that the Roads Service will be able to progress the matter in the short term, and enforcement of residents parking schemes may have to await primary legislation for the decriminalisation of parking enforcement.

Sewerage Infrastructure

2. Mr Poots asked the Minister for Regional Development to detail any forward plans for capital development of the sewerage infrastructure in the Lagan Valley constituency for each of the next four years. (AQO 36/02)

Mr P Robinson: Over the next four years, the Water Service proposes to invest £8 million on upgrading the sewerage infrastructure in the Lagan Valley constituency. That comprises £1.7 million in 2002-03, £3 million in 2003-04, £1.7 million in 2004-05 and a further £1.6 million in 2005-06. The upgrading work includes the construction of 10 new wastewater treatment works at locations including Aghalee, Dromore, Glenavy and Annahilt. In the longer term, the Water Service proposes to refurbish sewerage networks across the constituency at a cost of £12 million. In view of available funding and other priorities, it is likely to be 2007 before the work can commence.

Mr Poots: The basis for my question was the announcement by the Minister of the Environment of a moratorium on development that has not received outline permission. Will the Minister for Regional Development assure us that the matter will be addressed, and that urgently needed development will not be hindered as a result of the Minister of the Environment's statement on the Environment and Heritage Service?

Mr P Robinson: The Minister of the Environment and I met to discuss issues relating to the Environment and Heritage Service, the Water Service and the assessed hot-spot areas. I plan to meet Mr Nesbitt again this Wednesday further to our having jointly tasked our officials to examine the issues involved and to propose appropriate action.

Northern Ireland's infrastructure has been seriously underfunded for many years, and there is a significant backlog in the provision of water and sewerage services. Consequently, we must spend about £3 billion in the next 20 years. That means that an additional £50 million a year beyond the present expenditure estimates will be required. Therefore, it will take a long time and considerable expenditure to solve all the problems.

Programmes have already been scheduled to deal with the hot spots in the Member's constituency of Lagan Valley. Given that there is a programme to deal with issues of concern, it is not unreasonable for the planners to allow development to proceed.

Mr Davis: I welcome the Minister's answer. Is he satisfied that the problem that I raised about sewerage provision in the Glenmore area of Hilden has been resolved?

Mr P Robinson: As I recall, that was an odour problem. The Water Service commissioned a survey, the publication of which is imminent. As soon as the results become available, I will let Mr Davis know the outcome and what action my Department will take.

Mr Close: I thank the Minister for his replies, particularly those concerning forward plans and the areas marked for investment. Did the Minister mention the Fort Road area of the Lagan Valley constituency, where pipes leak constantly and there is no main sewer? If that area is not on the list, will the Minister examine the matter and reply in writing, if necessary?

Mr P Robinson: I am not familiar with the geography of that area, and to tell me that there are leaking pipes there does not help to define the case, because there are so many leaking pipes in Northern Ireland. I will ask my Department for the details of that site, and I will contact Mr Close about it.

Water and Sewerage Systems

3. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister for Regional Development when he will bring forward proposals to the Executive and the Assembly to address the problems in the water and sewerage systems. (AQO 47/02)

Mr P Robinson: The Water Service must invest an additional £500 million over the next 10 years to comply with European Directives on water quality, to respond to increasing demand and to upgrade ageing infrastructure.

I inherited a legacy of more than 30 years of under-investment in water and sewerage services when I took up the regional development portfolio in November 1999. Since then, I have vigorously pursued all possible options to address that historic funding shortfall and to ensure the delivery of efficient and effective water and sewerage services to customers.

The Water Service's total capital investment in the next 20 years amounts to approximately £3 billion. Currently, the Water Service is finalising a comprehensive review of the condition and investment requirements of all surface and underground water and sewerage infrastructure. That exercise takes account of the increasingly stringent European standards for water quality and wastewater treatment that the Water Service must meet.

The data are being used to prepare an asset management plan (NIAMP 2), which will define the level of capital investment required for the next 20 years, together with the associated operational requirements for the next 10 years and how and where that investment should be targeted. NIAMP 2 will be finalised towards the end of 2002. I will present the plan to the Assembly next year, when I will also present my options for funding the strategy. Those options will comprise a combination of continued public expenditure funding, the use of public-private partnerships, alternative funding proposals such as developer contributions and the investment potential offered under the reinvestment and reform initiative's new borrowing powers. I await with interest the outcome of the consultation on the review of rating policy and its consideration of the future funding options for the Water Service.

Ms Lewsley: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answer. Considering Mr Poots's question, there are many more questions that I would have liked to ask. How dependable is the time frame, and how quickly does the Minister hope to bring it before the Assembly?

Mr P Robinson: We are on schedule to meet the timetable that has been set out. The time restrictions that are of greatest concern are those that have been set down by the European Union. Under European regulations, Northern Ireland is in default of a number of Directives, and the majority of infraction proceedings against the United Kingdom from Europe relate to Northern Ireland. The outcome could be a massive imposition on the funding of the Northern Ireland block. It is reckoned that the United Kingdom could face fines amounting to tens of millions of pounds if the infractions are not dealt with.

I want the Water Service to spend its money on improving the quality of its network, not on paying fines, because I suspect that the Treasury would not bear the cost of any infraction proceedings and would be likely to pass it off by way of a penalty on the Northern Ireland block. Therefore, at the very time when we needed more money to deal with the causes of infractions, we would have to spend money on paying fines. We have already passed some of the deadlines without being able to remedy the causes.

Mrs I Robinson: The Minister has touched on some of the difficulties leading to hold-ups in planning permission. Is the Water Service responsible for the refusals?

Mr P Robinson: Ultimately, any development decision is a planning issue, and the decision will have to be taken by the Planning Service. In doing so, it will have to take into account the views of the agencies it consults with. Among those agencies are the Water Service and the Environment and Heritage Service. To the best of my knowledge, in the Member's constituency of Strangford, the Water Service is not objecting to any development on the basis of incapacity in its sewerage network. However, there are serious issues. The House supports the Environment and Heritage Service, as we do not want substandard wastewater treatment, and we do not want effluent on our beaches and around the coast.

Clearly, it is a concern that must be dealt with. The pragmatic approach has to be whether the Water Service has proposals that will, in time, deal with the problem. If there is under-capacity in a wastewater treatment works, and there is a proposal to deal with that under-capacity, the sensible approach would be to allow development to take place providing it does not cause a great problem before improvement is made.

If that sensible approach is taken it will resolve the problem of an overwhelming number of hot spots. It is to be hoped that later this week the Minister of the Environment and I will be able to resolve some of the problems on the basis of a useful meeting that we have already had and the work that has been carried out with officials since then.

Ms McWilliams: The Minister told the House that responsibility for the Water Service lies with him, and him alone. Would he, therefore, explain why he chose not to visit the lower Ormeau Road at the time of severe flooding — when people were traumatised after sewage came into their homes for the third time? Perhaps he would have seen for himself the urgency of fitting pumps that work. In that case there were modern pumps, but they completely failed. Would he assure the community of River Terrace that he will come out and talk to them?

Mr P Robinson: Members are aware that many properties across the Province were flooded. If the Minister were expected to call at every house that is flooded, he would not have the opportunity to remedy the situation. My Colleague, during his time in office, visited the Ormeau Road area. There is no reason to believe that, if time were available, I would not do the same.

As a constituency Member I have seen flooding in many circumstances. I understand the serious concerns that people have when flooding occurs and the upheaval that it causes. I want to resolve those problems. My time is best used doing that, rather than meeting people for public relations purposes. However, I am happy to meet people if the Member wants to bring them to me, or wants to make an arrangement with me. I have no aversion to visiting the Ormeau Road. I am happy to speak to people and to hear their concerns.

Light Rail Services

4. Mr Neeson asked the Minister for Regional Development to make a statement on the development of light rail services in the Greater Belfast area. (AQO 48/02)

Mr P Robinson: The regional transportation strategy for Northern Ireland 2002-12 includes £100 million for the commencement of a rapid transit network for Belfast. The development of that network will be taken forward against the backdrop of the Belfast metropolitan transport plan, which is currently being prepared. I regard that initiative as extremely important. Over the next few weeks I will set up a dedicated project team to begin detailed preparatory work. Part of that work will examine a range of possible options for such a network, including light rail.

Mr Neeson: I welcome the Minister's answer. Although I appreciate that contracts have been signed for new train sets, I must point out to the Minister that extended and improved park-and-ride facilities on the Larne line have been successful. Bearing that in mind, would he agree that the real potential for improving public transport lies with the development of a light rail system in the Greater Belfast area?

Mr P Robinson: With regard to the Greater Belfast area, I believe that the prospects of getting people out of their cars would be vastly improved if there were a rapid transport system. The Member keeps talking about light rail. However, there are several options — guided buses; a tram system of hybrid vehicles that can go on rails and on the road at certain points, and light rail. I am not making up my mind on the options at this time. However, a dedicated project team will be set up to consider which route is appropriate for a pilot scheme — many people have assumed it will be the E-way — to establish the best vehicle for the scheme and, perhaps, leave open the option of upgrading if that seems to be appropriate.

It would clearly be in the interests of the overall project if, along the route of such a rapid transit scheme, there were appropriate park-and-ride facilities. That kind of modern and speedy transport system would be more likely to catch the imagination of people in the Greater Belfast area and, therefore, more likely to get them out of their cars and onto public transport. However, that only deals with the Greater Belfast area, and only part of it at that. We are considering other proposals, such as quality bus corridors, which would go along other routes to assist in encouraging public transport use by providing a more reliable and faster way into the city centre. Therefore, one should not rule out the prospect of more quality bus corridors. The regional transportation strategy draws attention to their potential.

Mr K Robinson: Will the Minister undertake to ensure that proper infrastructural links are in place to facilitate the use of any projected Belfast light railway by those living in the Greater Belfast travel-to-work area? I refer specifically to those who live in east Antrim, who must currently struggle with an inadequate road system, epitomised by the A2 between Newtownabbey and Carrickfergus, and antiquated rail provision, and where the opportunity for a quality bus service does not currently exist.

Mr P Robinson: The regional transportation strategy, even though it only goes up to 2012, showed that in the longer term, within the 25 years of the regional development strategy, there was the potential, not simply to have a rapid transit route, but to have a rapid transit network. One of the illustrative drawings in the regional transportation strategy showed an east-west route and a north-south route. If successful, there might even be an orbital route as well.

If there were east-west and north-south routes, having routes from the outlying areas to feed in to those networks would make good sense and ensure that the full potential was reached. The more customers for those kinds of routes, the better the service can be. The better the service, the more likely customers are to use it.

Mr Shannon: Ards Borough Council and the Strangford constituency are interested in the light rail service. Is the Minister prepared to consider extending any rapid transit system to Comber and Newtownards?

Mr P Robinson: It is intended to run a pilot rapid transit system under the regional transportation strategy, from which we will learn much about the potential for that form of transport, whether it is tram or light rail, to attract the normal road user onto public transport. The more successful the pilot scheme, the greater the opportunity for extending it will be.

The Member's question is along the same lines as that of the Member for East Antrim, Mr Ken Robinson. Even if the rapid transit corridor were not to be extended into Comber and Newtownards, those areas would be ideal for bringing vehicles onto it, if the corridor from Dundonald into Belfast was being used. Whether it would be buses or another form of public transport, it would bring those areas into the rapid transit network, and they would gain from the faster journey times into Belfast from that point.

Unadopted Roads

5. Mr Molloy asked the Minister for Regional Development to detail the number of unadopted roads rejected by the Department in each of the last five years on the grounds that they had not been brought up to the required standard. (AQO 65/02)

Mr P Robinson: I take it that the Member's question relates to long-standing unadopted roads rather than to roads in new housing developments. There are many such private roads and laneways across Northern Ireland that have not been adopted into the public road network. As they are private roads, the Roads Service does not have exact details, but it is estimated that there are about 62 km throughout Northern Ireland.

Over the years, there have been many requests for private roads to be adopted, although details are not tabulated. Unfortunately, very few of them are fit for adoption. To bring all private roads in Northern Ireland up to the necessary standard for adoption would cost approximately £14 million, excluding the cost of land, service alterations and accommodation works, which would substantially increase the sum.

Mr Molloy: The infrastructure of long-standing roads has been neglected for many years in several district council areas. Does the Minister have any plans to bring some of those roads into the circle and improve their infrastructure for the benefit of residents?

Mr P Robinson: I am reluctant to get a reputation for ginning about my inheritance in the Department for Regional Development. However, in addition to the problems with the Water Service, there were also problems with roads and transportation. The regional transportation strategy recognised that considerable work was necessary, which would involve a considerable sum of money. In order to meet the priorities that had been set out for the next 10 years, it was necessary to increase the public expenditure extrapolated over the 10-year period by about £1.3 billion or £1.4 billion. The Assembly would probably recognise that it is better to deal with those priorities, which were unanimously agreed on, before taking on more responsibilities. There would be a local advantage in having some of the unadopted roads adopted. To do so requires them to be brought up to standard. I understand that Dungannon and South Tyrone Borough Council in the Member's constituency had considered the possibility of using ratepayers' funds to make some impact in that area, although I suspect that the Minister of the Environment would not greatly encourage that. In the meantime, I can give no solace about unadopted roads. Our priority must be the programme that the Assembly agreed under the regional transportation strategy.

Mr Beggs: Does the Minister acknowledge that some developers continue to be slow about bringing roads and sewerage systems up to departmental standards and that the Department needs to use increased vigour to force those developers to bring roads, footpaths and sewers up to standard so that the residents do not have to endure inferior utilities? Does he agree that the Department must also ensure that the bonds that are put up by developers are drawn down more readily so that the public are not inconvenienced?

Mr P Robinson: That is a fair point. When completion of roads to adoption standard by developers does not occur within a reasonable period from the date of the occupation of houses, the Private Streets (Northern Ireland) Order 1980, as amended, enables the Roads Service to complete the necessary work at the expense of developers. Such action is normally initiated only after efforts to persuade the developers to meet their obligations have proved unsuccessful, and each case is considered on its merits. My Department has no plan to introduce any further legislation, because it believes that the current legislation is appropriate. If developers have not carried out their responsibilities, the Department usually takes action approximately one year after the date of occupation. If the Member wishes, the Department can examine the appropriateness of that time period and consider whether it can be brought forward.

Belfast to Bangor Railway Line

6. Mr McFarland asked the Minister for Regional Development what progress has been made in relaying the Belfast to Bangor railway line. (AQO 20/02)

Mr P Robinson: Translink has advised me that the relay work between Bangor and Belfast is complete and that full, scheduled services are now in operation.

Mr McFarland: The Minister kindly wrote to me in August setting out details of the project management chaos and the additional costs associated with the relaying of the Bangor to Belfast line, which he has already spoken about in the House. What lessons have been learned from that? What are the implications for future line relaying, particularly the Whitehead line, and is such work likely to incur additional costs?

3.30 pm

Mr P Robinson: Northern Ireland Railways outsourced the project management on that stretch of the line. Last November, it dispensed with the services of the project management team and took over the work itself. It has meant a considerable delay in the initial timescale, and the Member is right to draw attention to the indication that project costs will have been exceeded. I do not yet have a final figure for the cost of the work; it was originally in the region of £9.5 million. It was then determined, however, that a more enhanced scheme should be adopted, and that was estimated at £14.7 million.

The estimates are now rumoured to be considerably in excess of that figure. However, Northern Ireland Railways is considering the possibility of legal action arising from contractual issues, which, if successful, will significantly reduce the amount of the excess.

Mr R Hutchinson: Although I welcome the laying of new track throughout the Northern Ireland network and not only on the Bangor-Belfast line, can the Minister tell us when we shall have new trains?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Minister would be brief.

Mr P Robinson: We shall take possession of the first train in December 2003. That train will be used to commission further trains, and others will follow fairly shortly. I cannot say which line the first train will run on: that is an operational decision.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, time is up. I am sure that the Minister will give Mr Hutchinson a written answer.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mobile Telecommunications Masts

1. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister of the Environment to detail the number of planning applications for mobile telecommunications masts that were (a) submitted; (b) refused; (c) granted; and (d) withdrawn (i) in the six months prior to the introduction of new departmental guidelines, Planning Policy Statement 10 (PPS 10); and (ii) since the introduction of the new guidelines.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): A total of 271 full planning and prior approval applications was received in respect of telecommunication development in the six months prior to the introduction of the new guidelines, under Planning Policy Statement 10, from 11 April 2002. Of those, 37 were refused, 183 were granted and 51 were withdrawn. A total of 185 full planning and prior approval applications has been received since the introduction of the new guidelines. Of these, 18 were refused, 127 were granted and 20 were withdrawn. The remaining 20 applications remain under consideration.

The Planning (General Development) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2002 came into operation on 21 June 2002. That legislation removes existing permitted development rights from telecommunications code system operators and requires full planning permission for new telecommunications development, including masts.

Mr J Kelly: I thank the Minister for his full reply. Given the public's perception of the health implications of masts, as well as their unsightliness, will the guidelines curtail their installation throughout the North?

Mr Nesbitt: My aim is for sustainable development; namely, that Northern Ireland will have a modern telecommunication industry, which industry needs, and that we will protect the environment. With regard to perceptions about the effects of telecommunications masts on health, I remind Mr Kelly that it is his Minister, Minister de Brún, who gives me advice on that aspect. I act on that advice. I am not responsible for health matters, nor have I knowledge of them. I take guidance from others.

Mr Davis: Will the Minister explain what monitoring of emissions from mobile masts has been undertaken? What are the results?

Mr Nesbitt: The Stewart Report, published two years ago, advised that an independent, random audit should be carried out, especially on those masts situated in sensitive areas such as school premises. Last year, masts in the grounds of 100 schools were randomly tested, and the emissions recorded were many thousands of times below the levels recommended by health authorities. This year, tests are also being conducted on masts in the grounds of hospitals. I advise Members who want more information to visit www.radio.gov.uk.

Mr Shannon: The Minister will agree that many people's concerns about telecommunications masts have not decreased. Has the new legislation introduced by the Minister addressed those concerns?

Mr Nesbitt: Residents are mainly concerned with their health — one current application has generated 200 objections, all of which are based on possible health risks. Mr Shannon will recall that when he last spoke on the subject, his mobile phone rang in the Chamber. He will also know that a Colleague of his, Mr Wells, has told the Assembly that he owned a mobile phone and had used it to rescue someone when walking in the Mourne. We live in a society where mobile phones exist, and I must deal with residents' concerns in a pragmatic and balanced manner.

Moratorium on Planning Approvals

2. Ms Morrice asked the Minister of the Environment to outline (a) his position regarding the moratorium on planning approvals due to pressures on the sewerage infrastructure and (b) the specific areas affected in Northern Ireland.

Planning Applications

3. Mr M Murphy asked the Minister of the Environment to detail, by district council area, the number of planning applications affected by the moratorium resulting from objections regarding the discharge of wastewater that does not meet EC standards for water quality; and to make a statement.

Mr Nesbitt: There is no moratorium on planning approvals in Northern Ireland. The Department has a statutory duty to promote the conservation and cleanliness of water resources. It must also take account of the requirements of EU Directives that safeguard water quality.

In recent months, the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS) has highlighted concerns over the quality of discharges and risk of water pollution from sewage treatment plants and sewerage networks at several locations in Northern Ireland. This has raised complex legal, environmental and operational issues. While urgent discussions are held between my Department and the Department for Regional Development, which is responsible for wastewater treatment, decisions on planning applications in the affected areas are on hold as a precautionary measure.

Planning Service and EHS are consulting on 588 planning applications in Northern Ireland, a breakdown of which by Planning Service division is: Downpatrick 257; Ballymena 166; Omagh 95; Belfast 52; Londonderry 9; Enniskillen 4; Coleraine 3; and Craigavon 2. I will write to Ms Morrice when a breakdown by district council area is available. That information will also be placed in the Assembly Library. Planning applications that do not require connection to the sewerage network, such as extensions to houses or garages, continue to be processed to conclusion by the Planning Service.

I am acutely aware of the concerns that the development industry and public representatives have about this precautionary step. I announced recently that the Planning Service would now process to decision stage those development proposals that have received outline planning approval but are being held back as a precaution. I met the Minister for Regional Development, and we tasked our officials to formulate recommendations to resolve the difficulties by mid-September. Those recommendations will specify locations where the sewage pollution problems dictate that particular attention must be paid to water quality issues when planning decisions are being made.

I am determined to achieve an early, balanced and pragmatic resolution that will meet Northern Ireland's development needs while simultaneously protecting the environment, and I plan to make an early statement to the Assembly to that effect.

Ms Morrice: I listened with interest to the Minister's response. It seems that there is a lot of confusion. We appreciate that a resolution is necessary because more and more untreated sewage is flowing into places such as Belfast Lough and, particularly, Ballyholme Bay, and that is disgraceful. I should like confirmation from the Minister that planning approvals have not been blocked anywhere in north Down. I did not hear any specific reference to north Down in his list. I want clarification on that, because the sewerage system cannot be overloaded in places such as Briggs Rock.

I also want to know exactly what discussions are taking place with the Minister for Regional Development, because it seems from a reply that Mr P Robinson gave that the failings of the sewerage systems mean that planning applications are not proceeding is not equally appreciated in both Departments.

Mr Nesbitt: I am sorry that Ms Morrice is confused, although this is not the first time that she has been confused when she has spoken in the Assembly. The Planning Service in Northern Ireland is split into divisions. I told her that there are 257 planning applications in Downpatrick. We learnt in a debate in May that the treatment works in the Downpatrick division are all right again or will be, so I am clear about what I have said. I have also suggested that the breakdown by district council area, which I hope will help Ms Morrice, will be available in the Library and will be sent to her.

Ms Morrice's second point was that the Minister for Regional Development said something different to what I did. I know what he said, and I welcome it. He made it clear at the outset that there has been a difficulty with sewage since direct rule. He talked about £3 billion being needed over the next 20 years, which is £50 million a year. He also said that he wants to support the Environment and Heritage Service. He said that he and I had had a very good meeting, and Hansard will show that. Let us not have people trying to pull the Minister for Regional Development and me apart: we and our officials are working together to try to resolve a problem, and the Assembly is about working together to provide solutions for the people of Northern Ireland.

Let me emphasise this: I concur with the Minister for Regional Development that there is a problem with sewage treatment works in Northern Ireland — only 57 % of them are up to national standard. In Great Britain, 95 % are up to national standard. However, from the EC Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive, it appears that only 35 % of sewage treatment works are up to standard, so there is a problem: money is needed, and we are trying to approach that difficulty pragmatically and realistically.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I wish to remind the House of the importance of brevity in questions and answers.

Mr M Murphy: The Minister is probably aware that Members are being strongly lobbied on this. I understood that a previous moratorium had been lifted, but the Minister has told the House that a precautionary measure has been implemented. Is the Minister aware that many jobs are at stake while that precautionary measure exists?

I brought the matter to the Minister's attention before when Newcastle lost its blue flag status over the sewage works. What has been done as a precaution to get that status reinstated in Newcastle?

Mr Nesbitt: I am glad that the word "moratorium" has been mentioned again. The precise wording that went to the divisional planning offices was as follows:

"no applications are taken to Council with opinions to refuse on the basis of waste management unit (WМУ) advice for the present."

We were trying to facilitate development. If we had acted upon the Environment and Heritage Service's recommendation, refusals would have been made to the council. Our advice was to wait until a further, detailed examination had been carried out. When a planning application is made, further detail is often sought before a decision is made. Therefore, a moratorium has not been imposed; rather a waste management precaution has been introduced. There is no problem with extensions to houses.

3.45 pm

I am conscious of the jobs aspect and have met the Construction Employers Federation and, for example, Derry City Council to explain the situation. Those bodies appreciate the problem and our efforts to resolve the difficulty of inadequate infrastructure while protecting the environment. There are strong needs, and we want to provide solutions.

Mr J Wilson: The Minister is aware of my concern about the matter. His attention was first drawn to it when I highlighted the serious situation in Ballyclare, in my constituency, where identifiable household bathroom waste had been entering the Sixmilewater River for years because the local sewage treatment works was working at 60% overload. When I first brought a deputation to the Minister, he was shocked by the news.

Will the Minister take into account the Department for Regional Development's future capital build programme? A balance should be achieved between the need for environmental protection and the need for development. More importantly, will the Minister inform district councils, when they are being consulted by the Planning Service, if the Environment and Heritage Service and the Department for Regional Development have advised that infrastructure — principally, sewage treatment, but also roads — would not support development? It is at that stage that the public can express its views about local circumstances.

Mr Nesbitt: Mr Wilson did bring the Ballyclare case to my attention. The Department must strike a pragmatic balance between dealing with developers' concerns and preventing pollution.

The Department of the Environment will take into account the Department for Regional Development's future capital build programme, identifying how much capital there is, the level of pollution that might result from development, and for how long development should be held back, taking into account when capital will be available. The Department must marry the capital throughput to the Department for Regional Development with the position as regards infrastructure and the need for more capital.

The second part of Mr Wilson's questions concerned infrastructure not supporting development and informing district councils. I have no problem signing up to that. This is open Government, and I want the problems to be known. Only when district councils and residents know the problems will we be able to address the solutions and progress together.

Contracts

4. Mr Attwood asked the Minister of the Environment to outline (a) how many contracts, to what value, and in what departmental areas, have been forwarded to the public procurement board for consideration and inclusion in the pilot studies for procurement policy; (b) what measures are being undertaken to assess each departmental contract for inclusion in the pilot studies; and to make a statement. (AQO 59/02)

Mr Nesbitt: Further to the procurement board's decision on 3 July 2002 to undertake a pilot study on the use of public procurement contracts to help the unemployed back to work, my Department examined all contracts to be advertised over the next six to nine months. A service contract in the Environment and Heritage Service has been identified as meeting the criteria set out in the pilot study by the procurement board.

The contract is for the recruitment of tour guides to work at various locations throughout Northern Ireland. It is valued at £300,000 and involves the recruitment of permanent and temporary staff. The start date for the contract is expected to be November this year. The relevant details will be passed to the public procurement board later this week.

Mr Attwood: I acknowledge that the Department of the Environment is one of only four Departments that have forwarded possible contracts to the public procurement board. The Minister's answer is helpful, but it is hardly reassuring that, despite the efforts of his Department, only one contract at a total value of £300,000 has been identified as suitable for inclusion in the pilot scheme. Given that 20 such schemes are proposed under the policy, is the Minister satisfied that there are not other areas in the Department of the Environment where contracts of greater worth might be identified for inclusion in the scheme?

Mr Nesbitt: I thank Mr Attwood for recognising that the Department of the Environment is one of only four Departments to submit projects. However, I remind him that there is a financial limitation on contracts. In the construction industry the contracts must be worth between £1 million and £3.86 million, and for projects in the service industry the contracts must be worth between £250,000 and £500,000. That is not an inconsequential amount of money, particularly given that the Department of the Environment is primarily a regulatory body and that, as such, its expenditure is dominated by staff costs and support to counsel. I also remind Mr Attwood that the Department of the Environment's budget amounts to about £118 million a year. Given the magnitude of those figures and that my Department is one of the four Departments to respond, Mr Attwood should say “Well done” and stop at that.

Wake Up To Waste Campaign

5. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister of the Environment to give an update on the Wake Up to Waste campaign. (AQO 46/02)

Mr Nesbitt: Phase 1 of the Wake up to Waste campaign generated an excellent response. Several district councils and contractors reported increases of up to 30% in recyclable materials collected. People want to participate and to have the opportunity to take action to enhance their environment. I am pleased with the approach.

Phase 2 of the campaign starts in October. It will provide guidance on the practical steps members of the public can take in their everyday activities to reduce waste. It will focus on the things that we can all do to reduce, reuse and recycle, such as reusing plastic carrier bags. We are establishing a retail partnership to communicate that message to consumers and to promote sustainable waste management practices.

During the summer the Environment and Heritage Service also completed a pilot education programme, which was delivered to two schools in each of the 26 council areas.

Ms Lewsley: I welcome phase 2 of the campaign, as I know that phase 1 was successful. Some £500,000 was invested in phase 1. How much will be invested in the second phase? Given the amount of paper that many Members are gathering, will the Minister’s Department take the lead in using recycled paper?

Mr Nesbitt: I like the second part of the question — we lead by example. A total of £1.5 million over three years has been committed to the public awareness aspect of the campaign. One would think therefore that £500,000 is available to be spent each year. However, I am very conscious that the public must be made aware of the problem. Ten per cent of households in Northern Ireland responded to the questionnaire. Those who responded clearly want to play their part, and we must therefore provide a solution for them.

We will continue to educate the people of Northern Ireland further on that.

Regarding recyclable paper and public procurement in general, I agree that this Administration should lead by example in a whole raft of ways. It is difficult for us in the Administration to ask others to do things that we are not prepared to do. I sympathise and empathise with the second part of the question.

Mr Hamilton: Will the Minister give assurances that his Department will ensure that community-based initiatives, as opposed to just individual ones, will play a major part in this programme?

Mr Nesbitt: Individuals make up the community, and the community is very important. Commencing in October, and building on what we did last year, we will have regular meetings with the regional communication co-ordinators and the local authority recycling officers, who are the people with links to the community. We will continue to work with the community, and we plan to produce a community guide to waste management, aimed at community groups, which will contain practical information on how to reduce, reuse and recycle.

Mrs Nelis: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am delighted to hear the Minister being so enthusiastic about the issue of waste paper. You need look no further than the Assembly to see the amount of waste paper going through our offices. In phase 2 will the Minister address the issue of introducing disposable paper bags and doing away with the plastic bags that clutter our environment and cost so much money to clear — a scheme which has been introduced successfully in the South of Ireland?

Mr Nesbitt: I am tempted, but I will not say anything about the waste paper caused by the number of languages we use. The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is here, so I shall refrain from making any reference to that and to the paper it may or may not use — and I say that with a smile to the Minister.

Regarding the central point about the success of disposable paper bags in the South, as I indicated in my first answer, we are working with the retail industry and anticipate bringing forward an aspect of that after various meetings over the summer. I plan to announce this in a number of weeks. Views are split on whether or not we can tax plastic bags, as happens in the South. The best legal advice at present is that we cannot say that we cannot do it. However, even if we can, there is a certain gestation period, and it could not be done in the life of this Assembly. In the autumn I plan to do something with plastic bags in conjunction with retailers and others. The community has wakened up to waste — we have to build on that and deliver something.

Ring of Gullion

6. Mr Fee asked the Minister of the Environment what progress has been made in implementing the recommendations made in the designation guide booklet for the Ring of Gullion area of outstanding natural beauty. (AQO 58/02)

Mr Nesbitt: The implementation of the recommendations in the guide to designation falls to several public bodies and community groups, including my Department. Progress has been greatly helped by the appointment of a liaison officer funded by the Environment and Heritage Service in my Department, Newry and Mourne District Council and the Regeneration of South Armagh Trust. Among the steps taken are the establishment of a Ring of Gullion waymarked trail and the development of interpretative panels and published guides on historic and traditional buildings in the area. Several improvements to the agricultural landscape have also been achieved through the environmentally sensitive area scheme, administered by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development.

Mr Fee: I thank the Minister for the work done by his Department and other agencies over recent years to promote a very beautiful part of Northern Ireland — south Armagh.

Will the Minister specifically address the issues raised about military installations in relation to part of the designation guide, because one of the policy objectives is to diminish the impact of the military installations on public enjoyment of the rural amenities in south Armagh and the Ring of Gullion?

I ask him to redouble his efforts to ensure that that impact is eradicated completely.

4.00 pm

Mr Nesbitt: I shall be brief in my answer to this question. I want to see the day come rapidly when the military installations to which Mr Fee refers are not here — namely, when we have peace, stability and a normal society in Northern Ireland.

Mr Foster: Having had an interest in areas of outstanding natural beauty both as a councillor and as a Minister, I would like to know what progress has been made in considering the need to designate national parks in Northern Ireland?

Mr Nesbitt: That has been pressed upon me by various quarters. I am conscious that two national parks have been created recently in Scotland and that there are national parks in the South of Ireland, England and Wales. I have commissioned Europac, an independent agency, to advance principles by which we consider national parks in Northern Ireland. It will report to me within the next few days, and I will make a statement on the way forward before the end of the month. However, I remind Mr Foster and others that anything we wish to do needs money, and money requires commitment. National parks could make a significant contribution to tourism and to Northern Ireland's economy. Therefore, we should find some money for that if we discover that that is the way forward.

Consultation Process

8. Mr Paisley Jnr asked the Minister of the Environment to outline the consultation process his Department engaged in with the Construction Employers Federation before imposing a moratorium on planning permissions.

Mr Nesbitt: I have already stated that a moratorium has not been imposed on planning permissions. As a precautionary measure, decisions on planning applications in several areas affected by concerns over the risks of water pollution from sewage treatment plants and sewerage networks have not been taken pending the outcome of discussions between my Department and the Department for Regional Development. Those discussions involve the consideration of complex legal, environmental and operational factors.

I am acutely aware of the concerns of the construction industry and others about the precautionary steps that my Department has taken in those areas where the risk of water pollution is significant. My officials have had regular contact with the Construction Employers Federation, both on specific applications and on the generality of the issue. I also met with senior representatives of the Construction Employers Federation to hear their concerns at first hand on 22 August 2002. I repeat the commitment that I gave them to seek a balanced and pragmatic solution with sustainable development as the guiding principle. The federation accepts that principle.

FIREFIGHTERS' PAY

Mr Deputy Speaker: I wish to advise Members on how I propose to conduct the debate, which has been allocated two hours by the Business Committee. Three amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. Speaking times will be as follows: the mover of the substantive motion will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to wind; the mover of each of the amendments will have seven minutes to propose and five minutes to wind; the Minister will have 20 minutes to respond to the debate; and all other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes each. The amendments will be proposed in the order in which they appear on the Marshalled List. When the debate is concluded, I shall put the Question on amendment No 1. If amendment No 1 is made, amendments Nos 2 and 3 will fall. If amendment No 1 falls, I shall put the Question on amendment No 2 and so forth. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the valuable and courageous work undertaken by the Fire Service and calls for an immediate review of pay and conditions for firefighters to ensure that these accurately reflect the highly skilled and professional role undertaken by firefighters and fire control staff.

I welcome the opportunity to bring this most important matter before the House. It is a reflection of the professionalism of the firefighters of Northern Ireland and of the high regard in which they are held by the public that the House has agreed to make the subject of the first debate of the new term the pay and conditions that we ask these professionals to labour under. The number of amendments also indicates the great interest in the issue.

(Madam Deputy Speaker [Ms Morrice] in the Chair)

It should not go unnoticed by the men and women of the Fire Service — and some of its representatives are in the Public Gallery today — who put their lives on the line every day they put on a uniform that we consider their efforts so important that we wish to debate this matter of urgent public concern.

My first duty as an elected Member of this House was a very sad and deeply distressing visit to the Glebe housing estate in my North Antrim constituency. A horrendous house fire had been started deliberately and had taken the lives of three little children. The local fire service, assisted by another unit, worked for hours and put their lives at risk trying to rescue those little boys. I remember standing in the burnt-out surroundings of that housing estate with firemen, police officers, residents and politicians silenced by the tragedy and weeping. I remember thinking of the grim and awful task that we ask those brave men and women of the Fire Service to do for us.

We call those officers brave, but if we look at how we pay them, it is as if their bravery is cheap. The House must send out a message that firefighters and the control staff who guide them deserve, and have earned, better pay. The Assembly has already acknowledged the role of the firefighters by awarding the Fire Service its own official recognition. We must take that forward by demanding that the Government get real in their negotiations with the Fire Fighters' Union and come up with a pay formula that will satisfy and reward fairly the work of those people.

For that reason I am prepared to accept the amendment to my motion tabled in the name of the Rev Robert Coulter and Mr Tom Hamilton as it adds to the substance of the motion. I am rejecting the amendment tabled by Mr Ervine, the Member for East Belfast, because stating an actual amount will tie the hands of those engaged in negotiations. The motion is not prescriptive. It allows for the necessary flexibility to enable employees' representatives and employers to agree a pay and conditions formula that will work.

The Sinn Féin/IRA amendment adds nothing of substance to the motion. Rather, it reflects its earlier failure to get a motion similar to mine debated today. I hope that it will not use this debate to try to pose as champions of the Fire Service but will withdraw its amendment to my motion.

Given the history of the last 30 years, perhaps Members sitting under that Gallery could tell us about the actions of the IRA that put the lives of firefighters at risk and resulted in nine members of the Fire Service being killed while on duty. I hope that it is not the intention of Sinn Féin/IRA to sully and sour today's debate with a trite amendment — I hope that it will be withdrawn.

We read in the press daily about the bravery and professionalism of firefighters. While I was preparing for this debate last week, the 'News Letter' reported an injury sustained by a firefighter at a fire at Yolande's farming service yard at Wellington Road, Enniskillen. He was injured when he was hit by pieces of an exploding corrugated sheet of asbestos. We cannot get away from the routine of a firefighter's job, which is to risk his or her life on behalf of this society.

It is important that I take time to outline the negotiations on pay. They have been taking place between the national union and the national employers since June this year. The Fire Brigades Union was informed that it was the intention of the employers to make a substantive offer on pay and a new formula as far back as 9 July. It has proof that it was planned to offer the fighters an increase in pay from £21,500 to £25,000 for a trained officer with four years' service. However, it is believed that an intervention by a senior Government Minister meant that that offer was never formally tabled. Instead the Government started talking about making a substantial pay increase of 4% and proposed an independent inquiry into the entire service.

On 2 September the employers' spokesman, Phil White, conceded that there was a real case for a pay increase above the Government's so-called substantial 4% increase but argued that central Government funding was required. The Assembly must avoid being sucked into the Government speak of agreeing to a "substantial" pay increase that in real terms means 4%. The union has correctly rejected that as insulting and derisory. A typical firefighter, after four years of training, has a take-home pay of £280 a week. The hourly rate for part-timers, for whom the dangers are no different, is £6.20 before tax. Some 11% of their salary goes towards the occupational pension. That pay formula dates back to 1977, when firefighters' pay was linked to low-skilled manual workers. It is outdated and inappropriate.

By its actions today, the Assembly must determine that it believes firefighters to be highly skilled professionals. Therefore, the Assembly must endorse the call to give them professional levels of pay and conditions and a formula to reach those conditions. The motion is not about special treatment; it is about fair treatment for those professional officers.

Tony Blair's deceitful comments must also be highlighted. He claimed that an increase in pay and conditions would hurt the economy. That must be challenged and nailed as a lie. The total UK claim to increase pay to acceptable levels would amount to around £459 million. That is the equivalent of around 41p for each household every week. Surely that is not an unreasonable cost for the remarkable job that those officers do. I hope that the House unites behind the motion and accepts the amendment that I have advised.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call Mr David Irvine to propose the first amendment on the Marshalled List.

The following amendment stood on the Marshalled List:

Amendment No 1: In line 2 delete

"and calls for an immediate review of pay and conditions for fire fighter to ensure that these"

and insert

"and supports the Fire Brigades Union in its call for a professional wage of £30,000 to". [Mr Irvine]

Mr Irvine: I offer the amendment for a simple reason. The Fire Brigades Union itself decreed that a reasonable figure for firefighters to earn was £30,000 a year. I cannot imagine how, by including that figure in the amendment, I stultify the negotiators' position, when it was the union that introduced the figure of £30,000 to the negotiating table. That dismisses any foolish comment that my proposed amendment is flawed.

Ian Paisley Jnr has hit the nail on the head, but he has not been as definitive as we must be on what is happening. We are talking about a process of negotiation on pay and conditions that was stymied, not by those in management, but by the Government. We can see that there is clear political manipulation in trying to peg the wages and conditions of firefighters — people whom we value.

This year alone, the Fire Service has rescued 110 people from road traffic accidents. In many cases, those people's lives were saved. Some 147 people have been rescued from house fires, and more than 100 other rescues have taken place. We should think about that when we drive home, or when we turn out the lights and go to bed at night. We should think about who is at the end of the telephone, offering us help in our time of need. We should be aware that, in our society, those same people not only run a grave risk by having to speed to assist us, but they are attacked by recreational idiots as they do so. The Fire Service and the security services have had to put up with the nightmare that is the interfaces. It is not an easy job.

Would any of us easily come to terms with the rest of our working day, the rest of our working week or, indeed, the rest of our working life, if we had to carry a child of two, three or four years of age with lovely flowing hair, without a mark on her, who had asphyxiated in a fire? How would we live with that trauma when we went home?

What do we do to recognise the suffering of those who rush to the aid of victims? What would we do were we to face a road traffic accident that involved a decapitation and then had to go home to be offered a meal? What goes through firefighters' minds?

This is not only about the physical abilities that they undoubtedly show in their professionalism and training — they pay an unbelievable psychological price. If they are fathers, mothers or members of a family, they must relate to others after going through such difficulty. That is the job that we ask them to do, and then we pay them, in relative terms, a pittance for doing it.

Then we find out that we have a "Socialist" Government who try to control the management in order to make sure that it pegs the levels of pay to the workers. It used to be the other way round. Socialist Governments used to try to encourage management to look at the best interests of the workers and to look at the circumstances in which they might create a greater income rather than a lesser one. We live in a strange world.

My amendment is definitive and clear and would consolidate the concept of political support in our small society to stand as a bulwark against the Westminster Government. It is fair to say that neither the motion nor the amendments contain any opposition to a better deal for firefighters. Why not make it simple and clear and support the level of pay that the Fire Brigades Union is asking for? I did not pluck my figure out of the air. It is the figure that the Fire Brigades Union has tabled to management. In accepting and supporting that figure, Members would be saying that the shameful behaviour that has taken place in the six negotiations to date must end. In the words of my Colleague Mr Paisley Jnr, the Government must "get real" about dealing with this issue.

I was once a negotiator in the trade union movement. It is not unreasonable to ask for the sun, the moon and the stars. On the level playing surface that can be created in the negotiating process, one expects that a compromise will be found. I fear that what has happened to the Fire Brigades Union is nefarious. The involvement of the Government has created the conditions that not only polluted the negotiations that have taken place but potentially pollute the negotiations that the other amendments and the motion call for in the future. Would it not be better for the House to say — clearly and simply — that the firefighters say they are worth £600 per week and that, because of the behaviour of management and the Government, Members determine that that is what they should have. That would allow the firefighters to go into a proper negotiation with at least some sense of political support, as opposed to what they consider to be the manipulation by politicians in the background.

Amendment No 2: In line 2 delete

"an immediate review of pay and conditions for"

and insert

"a significant increase in the salaries of" —[Ms Ramsey] [Mr Kelly]

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. On behalf of the firemen's union, I must say that the comments of Paisley Jnr do not help the Assembly to have a unified approach to trying to put a sympathetic face on what the firemen's union is looking for. My Colleague Sue Ramsey and I have met the firemen's union on a number of occasions and have a fruitful and constructive relationship with it. It is out of place for the proposer of the motion to indulge in a diatribe against those in the Assembly who are attempting to support the firemen's union. [Interruption].

You may snigger and laugh, you are good at that; that is all you are good at.

Nick Raynsford said:

"We all greatly value the contribution that Fire Service staff make to public safety".

He also said that the new formula worked out by the Government equated the firemen with the top 50% of manual workers.

I am not deriding manual workers, but can anyone tell me how you can evaluate the work of the Fire Service on the criteria of manual workers? From the very outset, the Government have done the Fire Service a disservice. I speak as an Assembly Member and as a longstanding and current member of the AMICUS trade union, which was the old engineering and boilermakers' union. Therefore, I have some knowledge of trade unions and negotiations and how we evaluate the work of trade unions in the workplace and in society. Those who have never had to put their hand to manual work perhaps do not understand what it is to work in the workplace and do not understand what it is to attempt to earn their crust of bread there. You have got your money from the backs of an electorate that you have seduced for the past 50 years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the Member address his remarks through the Chair?

Mr J Kelly: Madam Deputy Speaker, if you would exert some influence over the rabble here on the left —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the Member address his remarks through the Chair?

Mr J Kelly: I will, yes — [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr J Kelly: Again we see the hypocrisy of a group that introduces a motion for firemen and tries to disrupt the debate on that motion: it is a disgrace. They talk about withdrawing — they should withdraw their motion and leave it to the rest of us to consider how we approach this serious matter — [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr J Kelly: The Secretary of State said that it is nothing short of a disgrace that people such as firemen who come into public service and the protection of life — the mouse Morrow is indulging in his squeaks — are subjected to an increasing number of attacks as they try to carry out their jobs. He goes on to say that we should all be proud of emergency workers such as firefighters who put their lives on the line to save others.

As Davy Ervine said, it is a Socialist Government. However, the Secretary of State cannot stand up and say that he supports the claim of the firefighters. He cannot say that he supports this trade union as a member of a party that comes from a trade unionist background — a party that the trade unions keep in office by their contributions. The Government are treating the representatives of that union, and their attempts to achieve a decent wage comparable to the professionalism that their members bring to the job, in a shabby manner.

I support the firefighters, my party supports the firefighters and my Colleague Sue Ramsey, who is a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public safety, supports the firefighters in their attempts to achieve their just rewards and recognition not through fine words but through take-home pay. That is what counts at the end of the day, week, month and year — that is what puts the bread on their tables. In order to have unified support, I will not be moving our amendment.

Amendment No 2 not moved.

Rev Robert Coulter: I beg to move amendment No 3:

In line 2 delete

“an immediate review of pay and conditions”

“the introduction of a new pay formula together with a commensurate level of pay”.

In proposing the amendment my intention is to make the motion being debated before the Assembly today more specific as to the real problem and the remedy required for the firefighters' situation. The heart of the problem lies within the present pay formula for firefighters. Only two substantive grades exist in current pay scales for ordinary firefighters — that of firefighter and that of leading firefighter.

The second grade relates to those who have over 15 years' service. In short, the pay scales provide no real possibility for promotion, except for the few firefighters promoted to management grades. The pay scales should contain promotion possibilities for ordinary firefighters, which recognise skill and experience as well as experience, but which do not reserve pay and promotion for purely managerial functions.

There is deserved, widespread public support for the firefighters. I support them too. They deserve a decent pay scale and expressions of public support. We should not be niggardly in that matter. We should be open and generous to those brave people who regularly risk their lives.

No one could fail to be moved by the scenes of last 11 September in New York, when 350 firefighters lost their lives while trying to evacuate the twin towers of the World Trade Centre. The whole world admired the courage and heroism of the firefighters of that great city.

Our firefighters are no less courageous. They are in the same league, because, during the 30 years of the troubles, they were at their posts in impossible and horrendous situations, and many people owe their lives to them. Let the House record our deep appreciation to them in this debate.

A recent poll showed that 82% of all voters believe that ordinary firefighters should be paid in excess of £25,000 a year, as opposed to the existing maximum of only £20,694, which can only be achieved after 15 years' service. The same poll showed that 47% of all voters support a national Fire Service strike over pay.

The Prime Minister's statement that giving the firefighters what they are asking for will somehow put up mortgages is totally unacceptable. The link between the two issues escapes me entirely.

It is a shame that brave people have been reduced to taking strike action. It is an indictment of our society that they need to go on strike after having done so much for that society. We know that it goes against the grain of their profession. I want to sound a note of warning to Her Majesty's Government; their treatment of the firefighters should be fair and generous, not penny-pinching.

The pay of part-time firemen must also be mentioned. They are no less at risk in perilous situations, but their rates of pay are worse than those of the full-time firefighters, and that situation must be properly addressed also.

For all those reasons, I deliberately worded the amendment to include a pay formula, as opposed to simply calling for a pay increase. The Fire Service, with all its skill and expertise, needs a proper pay structure that adequately reflects the high level of training, skill and expertise required of ordinary firefighters. I welcome the fact that the Members who proposed the motion have accepted my amendment. That alone reflects the widespread community support for the firefighters.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): Having spent many years at the political front line in west Belfast, I have the most profound admiration for the courage and professionalism of the Fire Service in Belfast and beyond.

4.30 pm

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety has a direct interest in the motion because of the Health Minister's responsibility for public safety and the Northern Ireland Fire Service. The motion is an opportunity for everyone to acknowledge the outstanding work of firefighters. The Committee has always recognised their valuable and courageous service, and we all agree that the Fire Service is a vital asset to the community.

The events of 11 September last year, and the sacrifices made by the Fire Department of New York, emphasise that firefighters everywhere put their lives in danger daily to save the lives of ordinary people. We can be proud that our Fire Service is manned by some of the most professional and dedicated firefighters, officers and staff to be found anywhere. The Committee visited the Fire Control Centre in Lisburn and saw how the Fire Service responds to the needs of ordinary people 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. We talked to the men and women who man the fire appliances about the skills and expertise they need to do their jobs properly. We have also heard from the Fire Brigades Union about the personal dangers that firefighters face daily when responding to emergency calls.

Members of the Health Committee raised the issue of the firefighters' pay dispute in a Committee meeting last week, and it was agreed that firefighters' pay should adequately reflect the skills and expertise needed to carry out their jobs effectively. As with other essential public service workers, firefighters should receive a level of pay that reflects the nature of their job. If they are currently underpaid and require a substantial pay increase to bring pay into line with the proper rate for doing a difficult job, that is what should happen — and they are grossly underpaid.

Pay constitutes the biggest cost to the Health Service and consumes 70% of its budget, which is already overstretched. Some of my Colleagues may be sympathetic to the call for a review of the pay and conditions of firefighters to establish what they should be paid. However, as other Members have pointed out, I understand why firefighters are opposed to the general review called for by the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister.

It is a national dispute, and we have limited influence over its outcome. However, in supporting the call for a substantial increase, the public needs to know that it is justified, and I am sure that the Minister can make that point strongly.

Nick Raynsford has appointed Sir George Bain to conduct the review, a man for whom we all have great respect. However, I appreciate the points made by the Fire Brigades Union. The Health Committee will keep a close watch on the situation in the days and weeks to come, and I have sought an urgent briefing from the Department about the current position and the progress of the national pay negotiations.

I appreciate Sinn Féin's withdrawal of its amendment. I understand the point David Ervine is making in his amendment and the reason for a professional wage of £30,000. However, it is not for the Assembly to name a figure in negotiations other than to say that they deserve a substantial rise, and I am pleased that Mr Paisley Jnr has accepted Mr Coulter's amendment.

Mrs E Bell: I support the motion. I am glad that the proposers have accepted the Ulster Unionist amendment, which I also support. I support Mr Ervine's amendment; however, Alliance will abstain from the vote for two reasons. The Fire Brigades Union has proposed a sum of £30,000, but the Government and the Prime Minister have not listened, and I doubt whether they will listen to us at this stage.

Unfortunately, I missed the start of the debate. However, I believe the proposer of the motion said that there might be a problem in putting down an amount. By creating a ceiling of £30,000, we may prejudice any future pay formula that would recommend a higher salary. I applaud the withdrawal of the Sinn Féin amendment. Members should stand up to speak for the firefighters, and only for the firefighters.

Last year, the Assembly presented Northern Ireland's firefighters with an award and a plaque in recognition of their bravery over the years, from the Blitz until the present day. I was shocked to learn that the salaries of those brave men and women have not been negotiated since 1977. An unacceptable number of firefighters with young families have to apply for income support or "do the double". I know someone who has been a firefighter for 22 years. His 27-year-old son earns much more than he. That is also unacceptable. As Rev Robert Coulter said, the whole structure must be examined.

Firefighters have saved countless lives, have prevented many incidents from becoming more serious and have put their lives on the line every time that they "go out on a shout". Television programmes do not convey the tension and fear that have been described to me by firefighters and which are present every time they go out. Members are aware of the recent upsurge in attacks on firefighters reporting to fires or other incidents.

Modern firefighters must tackle not only the flames but fumes from drugs and explosives; yet their salaries have not been examined for over 20 years. That is why my party feels that rather than start another review, talks on the introduction of a new pay formula and structure that reflects the arduous nature of the job should commence as soon as possible, despite what the Government and the Prime Minister say.

I have written to the Prime Minister about the pay dispute and have been told that the Government are considering a review. I am afraid that my reply may not be accepted; however, I asked what the point of another review would be and whether it was necessary when it is clear that firefighters' salary levels — apart from anything else — are outdated and do not in any way reflect the true nature of the job.

The firefighters of Northern Ireland have never willingly turned back from any situation, however dangerous. They deserve more than the plaque that the Assembly awarded them last year. They received it gratefully. However, we must give them more practical support. I would certainly endorse a review of the Fire Authority, which clearly does not hold the confidence of the fire crews, who feel that their interests are not being best served by that body.

We remember the brave deeds of the firefighters of New York who were killed or injured on 11 September 2001. Last December, I visited survivors and families of the deceased. Their stories were harrowing. However, as Dr Hendron said, even at that time they told us about the great practical support that Northern Ireland's firefighters gave them and said that firefighters could never be paid enough for the difficult task that they are asked to do. What price do the Government put on the salaries and conditions of people who daily save lives, protect businesses and work for every citizen in the community?

Not a high price, obviously. It is up to the Assembly to ensure that they listen.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Can the Member draw her remarks to a close?

Mrs E Bell: Members have a duty to send a clear message to the Government. The whole salary and management structure must be dealt with head-on. If that is done, the £30,000 figure, or above, will become a reality. There will then be no need for firefighters to consider strike action, which they will only do as a last resort.

Mr Boyd: The Northern Ireland Unionist Party supports the campaign for improved pay and conditions for the Fire Service. The party believes that firefighters carry out a vital and dangerous role in Northern Ireland, and it appreciates the fact that Fire Service personnel daily put their lives at risk to preserve lives and property.

The dangers faced by fire officers in Northern Ireland are well known. They continue to play a front-line role in the face of ongoing terrorist activity, despite the denials of some in the Assembly. Members of the Fire Service have to cope with the aftermath of appalling atrocities. They continually have to deal with disgraceful attacks on vehicles and staff by thugs engaged in street violence.

The formula by which firefighters' pay is determined is outdated and no longer appropriate to deliver adequate pay and conditions for them and other emergency fire control staff. Given the level of training, the operational duties of firefighters and the circumstances in which they must work, the present level of pay — typically around £280 per week — is inadequate.

There has been a vast and dramatic increase in the workload of the Fire Service in the past 30 years as regards calls received, incidents attended and fire safety duties. There has also been an increase in the range and specialist features of equipment, technology, skills and knowledge required. Therefore, firefighters' claim for a review of pay and conditions is wholly justified.

In 1981, 15,838 calls were made to the Fire Service. Twenty years later, in 2001, the service attended 39,055 calls.

There are four aspects to the Fire Brigades Union's pay claim: a pay increase to £30,000 for full-time professional firefighters; pay parity for emergency fire control staff; pay equality for professional firefighters working the retained duty system; and a new pay formula to reflect the professionalism of firefighters and emergency fire control staff.

The Northern Ireland Unionist Party believes that the Fire Service has a very strong case for an immediate review of pay and conditions to ensure that the professional role undertaken by highly skilled firefighters and fire control staff is adequately reflected. I am sympathetic to the firefighters' claim for a significant increase in salaries and better working conditions. It is therefore vital that their essential contribution to society be fully recognised and accordingly rewarded in order to maintain the Fire Service's high standards and professional service.

Ms McWilliams: It is clear from what we have heard and the information that we received from the Fire Brigades Union that there has been an enormous wage drift. I was appalled to learn from the union, when it met me, that there has not been a review of firefighters' pay formula since 1977. How did that situation arise in the first place?

Firefighters' pay can be compared to that of police officers, ambulance staff and nurses. It is clear that police officers decided a few years ago to adopt a salary scheme that included an annual increment for young constables, who could then progress to the rank of sergeant and further up the career ladder. It seems, however, that firefighters do not have that prospect. The main problem seems to be that they cannot move beyond the £21,000 mark, making their career prospects pretty bleak unless they move on to restricted categories, where numbers are quite small. Many — indeed, the vast majority — reach a ceiling after 10 or 15 years.

Everyone agrees that a review is both necessary and urgent. The absence of a review to date makes one wonder what the Fire Authority of Northern Ireland was doing and, indeed, what happened to the negotiations with the National Joint Council and the employers' bodies.

The only other group that appears to have fallen so far behind are nurses. Strangely, nurses' salaries have always been explained on the basis that the profession suffered because the majority of staff were women who entered the profession for vocational reasons, motivated by a caring responsibility rather than salary. Those days are long gone, and people ought to be paid for the skills that they put in.

Student nurses from the Royal College of Nursing who visited Parliament Buildings today told me that they receive only £5,000 per annum during their three years' training and that for many years thereafter they can expect to receive only £15,000 at the most. Therefore, like the firefighters, they end up asking one part of Government to ask another part of the Government to top up their wages. In this case, the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is responsible for firefighters, and Nigel Dodds, the Minister for Social Development, is responsible for family credit, tax and other benefits.

As we have joined-up Government, it seems reasonable to examine how firefighters can avoid depending on benefits to top up their low pay. A review of the pay formula is long overdue and should be agreed urgently. Firefighters do not need to make any further case when we consider the comparisons between ambulance staff and firefighters. Firefighters have now moved on to professional grades, yet their salaries are still associated with that upper quartile of male manual workers. What antiquated language. I am glad that they were not equated with female manual workers — how much worse off they would have been then.

We fully support pay parity for the emergency fire control staff, most of whom are women. They in turn earn even less — 92% of qualified firefighters' wages — yet the firefighters and the union tell us that they could not do their jobs without that highly skilled, professional group of workers. I also argue for pay equality for the retained fire officers, of whom there seems to be an equivalent number in Northern Ireland.

It is good that the entire Assembly is throwing its weight behind this. My only difficulty with the PUP amendment is that a starting salary of £30,000 would put firefighters' salaries clearly beyond those of police officers, ambulance staff and nurses. We do not want to move in that direction. Given how shockingly poor their starting salary is, I agree that it was right to pitch so high, knowing that that pitch will not be successful. I understand the sentiments behind that. Nonetheless, I urge everyone to throw his or her weight behind the motion today. If the PUP amendment falls — and it appears that it will — the Assembly must send out a unanimous message that this matter should be given urgent attention.

Mrs I Robinson: As a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I congratulate my Colleagues on bringing this timely motion to the Floor of the House. Fire Service pay is determined by a formula that has kept industrial peace since 1977. That formula was agreed following the only national strike by the British Fire Service, but it has not maintained Fire Service wages in line with those of other workers.

A professional firefighters' job has changed dramatically since the 1970s. I shall highlight how their role and responsibilities have changed by comparing statistics from 1971 with some from 2001. Last year, Northern Ireland's firefighters were called out eight-and-a-half times more than they were 30 years ago. Actual fires have increased almost 10-fold, with false alarms up by a factor of 16 to almost 13,000 last year, which is a worrying trend. In 1971, special services, which deal with road accidents and chemical spillages, were called out 85 times. The corresponding figure for 2001 was 1,615. In 1977-78, there was a national strike by firefighters over pay demands. Everything possible must be done to prevent that happening again.

Despite its high-profile public campaign, there appears to have been little effort on the part of the National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades and its standing subcommittee to address seriously firefighters' demands. We must be responsible about pay demands. I want firefighters to be paid what they deserve, not to be given preferential treatment. I do not advocate overpaying firefighters but rather a pay structure that reflects the demands of a skilled and often hazardous job. We, as a society, must be careful not to allow ourselves to be put in a position where, on a whim, we can be held to ransom by strike threats because the role of some groups is so crucial to the health and safety of the public. Having said that, the Fire Brigades Union has exercised a great deal of restraint over the years. Many others, such as nurses and ambulance crews, are also underpaid; I do not want them to threaten strike action, but that does not diminish the fact that they too deserve salary increases. Firefighters do much more than put out fires. They are involved in water rescues and incidents which involve radiation, contamination and the spillage of chemicals. They cut victims free from road and train crashes, as well as doing what we all saw so graphically almost exactly a year ago. Furthermore, they assist bravely when buildings collapse or when people become trapped.

The duties of firefighters and the levels of skill demanded of them have increased. There is a greater range and specialisation of equipment and technology involved. Firefighters rightly believe that the salaries of emergency fire control staff should be raised to match their own. In addition, they want a better deal for part-time staff. Currently there are hundreds of part-time firefighters in the province. Without them, stations such as Newtownards, Carrickfergus and Portadown would not be able to function. They deserve more than the current meagre annual retainer and merit the same rate as full-time firefighters when they deal with calls.

Firefighters in Northern Ireland deal with the same dangers as their counterparts throughout Great Britain. They have the added fear of coming under attack when called out to a fire. Over the last 30 years in Northern Ireland we have never been short of mindless violence. However, the increasingly common attacks on firemen and paramedics in emergency situations here defy belief. How can it be explained to visitors to the province that emergency services, while risking their lives in order to save the lives of others, can come under attack from the very community they serve? No amount of money could adequately pay firefighters for enduring the risk of a brick coming through the windscreen, or worse.

On 4 September at the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Members from all parties were supportive of the firefighters' demands for a pay increase. The firefighters have had my support throughout the campaign.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member will please draw her remarks to a close.

Mrs I Robinson: I have written to the Prime Minister, asking that he support a substantial increase in pay for firefighters throughout the country. I hope that that will be the case, despite his unhelpful comments on 3 September at his press conference.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I too welcome the opportunity to discuss the serious issue of the pay of both firefighters and staff. Members have already highlighted the concerns. The Minister and Members recognise the commitment and acknowledge the courageous work of the firefighters, and there is an opportunity for the Assembly formally to highlight that and to thank them again.

Members have mentioned that the matter was discussed at the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, where it was agreed that the Chairperson should write to Tony Blair to outline our concerns and support the concerns and issues raised by the Fire Brigades Union. It will be interesting to see his response.

The Chairperson, Dr Hendron, highlighted the fact that pay is the single biggest cost to the Health Service. Something approaching 70% of the budget goes on pay. However, pay and associated costs are not negotiated locally, and that must be examined. I do not want to go over the flaws in the formula which has been in use for some 20 years. It is outdated, and there are flaws.

I agree with Ian Paisley Jnr who said that the Assembly should sing from the same hymn sheet. Perhaps he could influence his school friends and ask them to settle down, because in the interests of Assembly unity Sinn Féin agreed not to move an amendment to the motion.

Moreover, I agree with David Ervine that it is wrong that there has been political input into negotiations with senior management and the union.

Bob Coulter was absolutely right in his message to Tony Blair that the Fire Service's pay increase should be generous and not penny-pinching.

I point out again that, in the interests of Assembly unity, Members are agreed and show that they are united in support of the Fire Brigade. Our amendment was not moved for that reason.

We demand a first-class service from the Fire Service, and, therefore, it is only right that it should demand first-class salaries from us.

Mr Foster: I apologise for my absence earlier; I was at an important meeting.

During more than three decades of the most dangerous circumstances, often amid violence and difficulty, the Fire Service has given outstanding service to our community. Firefighters were often at the forefront of trouble, unsure whether a bomb would explode or a building would collapse on them as they went to fight a fire. The events in New York on 11 September last year highlight the great and imminent danger that firefighters face in their valiant work.

It is sad that, despite firefighters' admirable bravery in overcoming such danger, thugs in our community attack them when they attend fires during incidents of communal strife. As I read in a local daily newspaper, it is incredible that firefighters attended more than 500 civil disturbances between January and August 2002. Outrageously, 84 appliances were damaged and many firefighters were injured. What is wrong with people that they should attack firefighters, who provide our community with such an invaluable service? Do they not realise that when they injure a firefighter or damage an appliance, they increase the risk of death for someone's loved one and, if they have any, their own nearest and dearest?

The dedication and commitment of Fire Service personnel in peace and strife are admirable, and they deserve thanks and appreciation for their valued and unstinting service, often under the most undue danger and pressures. I am sure that all Members join me in commending them for their sterling work.

As I stated in July, I will support any improvement to the terms and conditions of Fire Service personnel, commensurate with their undoubted skills, value and service to our community. Over the years, the service rendered to this community has been so commendable, admirable and vital that we could not have done without it. We must be as considerate in our support for the Fire Service, as it, in recognition of its role, will be in its requirements. I fully support the motion as amended. The work of the Fire Service is outstanding, even amid such adversity. The bravery of Fire Service personnel must be rewarded and acknowledged.

Mr A Maginness: At this stage of the debate, little remains to be said. Despite the little frissons between Sinn Féin and the DUP, there has been a remarkable degree of consensus. However, it is the first day back at school, so Members should make allowances for that. It is remarkable — [Interruption].

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Would you like to join in the spirit of the first day back?

Mr A Maginness: Pardon?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr A Maginness: The consensus is impressive and reflects the respect that people have for the Fire Service. It is important that Members support firefighters, especially at such a crucial time in their discussions with the Government. The Government's review, which is under way, evades the central issue: firefighters should have a proper pay formula, as adumbrated in the amendment tabled by Rev Robert Coulter, and should receive a significant and immediate pay increase to reflect the increasing risks that they face. The risks to firefighters, especially to their health, and to firefighting equipment increase each year, and society owes the Fire Service a tremendous amount.

5.00 pm

I am baffled by the Westminster Government's penny-pinching attitude, which has been seen in many other things that they have done here. One would think that a Labour Government in particular would support the firemen's just demands, especially when that Government are about to embark on an adventure in Iraq on which they will waste millions, if not billions, of pounds in armaments. I cannot understand for the life of me why the Government do not fairly address the firemen's just and reasonable demands, and that opinion is reflected in the House.

When the motion is inevitably passed as amended, it will be a morale booster to the firemen's trade union. I hope that it will help to strengthen its position, bring the Westminster Government to their senses and avoid the disaster for the community that a firemen's strike would be. That can be avoided through negotiation and through the Government's coming to the firemen's trade union with a reasonable proposition before any sort of industrial action is either proposed or taken. I hope that that will result in part from this united motion.

Furthermore, the SDLP fully supports the emergency fire control staff and the retained firemen in their quest for equality. The central point to which I return is that industrial peace, which has existed in the public sector for so long, is the result of the establishment of a just and modern pay formula, and that formula will properly reward firemen financially. The central issue is not a mere pay increase, but the implementation of the actual formula.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Berry: I support the motion proposed by Mr Paisley Jnr and Mr Shannon. I also support the amendment tabled in the name of the Rev Robert Coulter, and I welcome the debate.

Of all the occupations that schoolchildren want to follow, that of a firefighter probably tops the list. Their uniforms, equipment and, indeed, the professionalism that they have displayed over the past 30 years or more give charisma in children's minds. However, regrettably, maturity brings a sobering appreciation of the hazardous nature of firefighting. Tragically, in Northern Ireland that job is more hazardous than elsewhere. Unlike in New York, where firefighters are looked upon as heroes, in this country they are stoned, and their equipment is destroyed. Too often fire engines are vandalised out of action. Last year alone, over 30 firefighters were injured — not from fighting fires, but as a result of civil disturbances, which is a polite way of saying that thugs deliberately targeted them. That is, of course, unsurprising, because we have an ethical system that applauds the pursuit of power through the barrel of a gun. It is only to be expected that the drip feed of that reaches the streets and makes stoning firefighters quite rational.

The firefighters' request for a pay increase is reasonable. I subscribe to the principle that the labourer is worthy of his hire. Few would reject the sensible case that the Fire Service puts before us, and the failure to agree a mutually acceptable level of remuneration is tragic.

This matter has been on the table since April 2002. It is acknowledged that the Fire Brigade provides an essential service and that the pay formula requires modernisation. Firefighters' workloads have increased dramatically, and the current rate of pay does not reflect the nature of the job. The course of action to be taken about a pay rise must be heard. Is an inquiry necessary? We do not need an inquiry that postpones facing up to the issue. Why was an inquiry not set up before now rather than waiting until the last minute? Will setting up an inquiry be an excuse to change conditions in order to avoid giving a decent pay rise? Those questions indicate the haphazard and lax nature of the treatment of the issue. If undertakings were given, why were they not kept? These and other issues appear to be clouding the negotiations and must be dealt with immediately. Will firefighters be told that they do a wonderful job and that the risks involved are appreciated but that they have to claim state benefit if they need more money? That is unfair and unreasonable. The firefighters are asking for £30,000 a year. If that is not considered realistic, they will have to be told so and why. If £25,000 a year is affordable, it should have already been paid out without all the friction. Nothing is gained by issuing misleading press releases and causing confusion.

There has been no strike, or threat of a strike, since 1978; that is a remarkable tribute to both the firefighters and the pay formula that was worked out at that time. Surely the same can be achieved again, without the need for a strike. Why can the issue not be dealt with without firefighters becoming so frustrated and disgruntled that they consider strike action to be their only recourse?

With many others, I support the motion wholeheartedly; I also support the firefighters in their call for a pay rise. We must commend the firefighters across Northern Ireland for their professional and skilled work on behalf of both sides of the community. I support the Fire Brigades Union, commend it for its lobbying and look forward to working with its members in the future. The motion will send a clear message to the Government that enough is enough and that more needs to be done for our male and female firefighters.

Mr Davis: I congratulate Mr Paisley Jnr for proposing the motion and also my Colleagues for tabling an amendment that Mr Paisley Jnr has agreed has added substance to the motion. I am glad that we are united on this subject. Before the end of the debate I hope that Mr Ervine will withdraw his amendment, and then we will have total agreement.

In the aftermath of 11 September, society reflected on the dangerous but vital role of firefighters. It is terrible that it took that tragedy in the United States to bring home the value of the Fire Service to the Northern Ireland community. As a result of the troubles, Northern Ireland firefighters have had to operate in more dangerous circumstances than their counterparts in the rest of the UK. Over the past few years, we have all been sickened by attacks on the emergency services, including the Ambulance Service and the Fire Service. Instead of appreciating the dedication and commitment of those services, a minority has attacked these workers. The attacks on the Fire Service have been well documented in Belfast and Londonderry, and the Fire Service has advised that many of the attacks were pre-planned; that is worrying.

Nevertheless, it is probable that one day the same thugs will call upon the professional services of our emergency teams. More than 800 firefighters have been injured in the past five years, and nine of their colleagues lost their lives during the troubles. Two years ago in the Chamber I mentioned that one of the first to lose his life was my friend, Mr Wesley Orr, from Lisburn. The award that the House presented to the Northern Ireland Fire Service last July in recognition of its services to all members of the community was justly deserved.

I have pleasure in supporting the merits of the motion, and I urge all Members to support the amendment. There is no doubt that the present formula is out of date; after all, it was established at the end of the nine-week strike in 1977. The formula served the Fire Service well until recently. However, due to the acceleration of the labour markets and occupational change in the workforce in recent years, the pay formula is no longer effective in providing firefighters with a salary that they deserve. A pay structure linked to their skills and experience must be implemented. There should be a differential in pay, depending on the number of years of service and the skills of the individual. It is not simply a matter of awarding a universal pay increase, but of introducing a pay structure that is focused around a firefighter's career steps.

It is important that any agreement be implemented quickly, as the matter has been in the public domain for some time. It is not in the interest of firefighters' morale to prolong the process. I support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Hilditch: I support the motion. I have the greatest admiration and respect for firefighters, whose highly dangerous and skilled work should command appropriate remuneration. Their work must be put in the context of their devotion to duty: they risk their lives to save others and others' property; and they respond to a variety of difficult situations, from civil strife and road accidents to saving the family pet. A firefighter's normal shift may incorporate more heroic deeds than many people achieve in a lifetime.

The Fire Service comprises several components. The first component is the whole-time firefighters who work an average 42-hour week for a take-home pay of £21,000 a year after four years of service. That equates to approximately £9.83 an hour. Training drills and practice are incorporated into the normal working week. The staffing level in the Fire Brigade, as of 31 March 2002, recorded the number of whole-time firefighters as 869. The establishment figure for the same date was 919.

The second component is the retained firefighters, who work when required. They are committed to two hours a week for drill purposes. A retained firefighter can expect remuneration at an hourly rate for attendance at fires and a Northern Ireland allowance. Their total pay before National Insurance and income tax ranges from one hour's work at £15.17 to nine hours' work at £64.77, which equates to £6.20 an hour. The job of a retained firefighter is classed as a part-time occupation. How long can we expect people to continue to be on call 24 hours a day, seven days a week, particularly as they must often take time out from their main jobs, and, therefore, incur financial losses by fighting fires? There were 910 retained firefighters on 31 March 2002, but the establishment figure for the same date is 980. This is in addition to the whole-time service level of 869 firefighters, making this essential service totally dependent on both whole-time and retained firefighters.

The third component is the control room staff. On 31 March 2002, 55 such staff were recorded, while the establishment figure for the same date was 59. These workers are expected to operate up-to-date equipment for salary scales from yesteryear. The pay structure dates from 1977 and is linked to the old male manual workers' agreement, long since unacceptable for obvious reasons.

Today the Fire Service is linked to associated professional and armed technical groups of workers such as the police and armed forces: that is the right category for such an essential service. The problem is that their pay scales have not been brought into line. Something must be seriously wrong when a member of the Fire Service with 32 years' service has a weekly wage of £300.

There are eight volunteer firefighters for Rathlin Island: the establishment figure is 12.

At 31 March 2002 there were 128 fewer firefighters than the established figure for the Northern Ireland Fire Service. A further 283 members of the service were in temporary positions, and a hot fire training unit at Boucher Crescent, Belfast, built in July 2001 at a cost of £56,000, was used just 28 times before being closed by Belfast City Council. Surely such resources could have been better used in resolving the pay dispute and creating better working conditions.

In my opening remarks I also referred to civil unrest. Up to 31 August 2002 the Fire Brigade, given its current circumstances, attended 500 calls, resulting in 84 appliances being damaged and many firefighters being hurt. That is the working environment these people have to endure: it is part of their ongoing conditions and must not be allowed to go underestimated. The Fire Brigades Union has spent considerable time and effort in trying to resolve the dispute. I ask the House to support this essential service in its efforts to ensure that those who have served their communities so well get the remuneration to which they are totally justified.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá mé buíoch den Uasal Paisley as an cheist thábhachtach seo a ardú. Aontaím ó chroí lena bhfuil ráite faoi obair luachmhar mhisniúil na dtrodaithe dóiteáin — cuireann siad a mbeatha i mbaol ar son na sochaí, agus caithfear seo a aithint mar is cuí.

Caithfidh mé seo a shoiléiriú ar dtús: déantar idirbheartaíocht ar arduithe pá do phearsanra na Seirbhíse Dóiteáin i gcomhar idir Ceardchumann na mBriogáidí Dóiteáin agus na fostóirí a dhéanann ionadaíocht thar ceann na mbriogáidí anseo agus sa Bhreatain Mhór. Ní bhíonn baint dhíreach agamsa ná ag mo Roinn leo.

Is chun leasa cách go gcomhaontaíonn fostóirí agus Ceardchumann na mBriogáidí Dóiteáin socrú cothrom ar an éileamh pá. Tá sé tábhachtach chomh maith, áfach, go mbíonn aon ardú pá d'fhoireann na Seirbhíse Dóiteáin réasúnta, tharla an brú ar chaiteachas poiblí, agus go socraítear é i gcomhthéacs an nuachóirithe agus an fheabhsúcháin.

Creideann Ceardchumann na mBriogáidí Dóiteáin go bhfuil méadú de 40% inchosanta, agus tá na fostóirí den tuairim gur féidir dámhachtainí suntasacha pá a nascadh le sochair shoiléire bhreise don phobal, agus gur chóir an nascadh sin a dhéanamh. Mar shampla, thaispeáin tuairiscí clár oibre nuachóirithe na bhfostóirí a ba mhaith leo é a bheith nasctha le hardú pá. Ar na rudaí a ba mhaith leo iad a bheith nasctha lena leithéid de ardú tá: tuilleadh béime ar shábháilteacht pobail agus ar laghdú riosca á tabhairt chun cinn i gcomhpháirtíocht leis an phobal agus fórsaí saothair dea-fheistithe, oilte fuinniúla a léiríonn a gcomhdhéanamh an éagsúlacht.

I thank Mr Paisley Jnr for bringing this important issue to the Floor of the House. I will begin by saying that I agree wholeheartedly with all that has been said about the valuable and courageous work of the firefighters. Every day they put their lives on the line for society, and this contribution must be recognised appropriately.

Members gave many clear indications and examples of the type of work that firefighters carry out: one talked of their role in attending road traffic accidents. My parents were killed in a road traffic accident in the South some years ago, and my family paid tribute to the local fire brigade that attended the scene. I was aware then, and I am today, of the harrowing scene that must have met them when they went to do their job.

At the outset I need to make it clear that pay rises for Fire Service personnel are negotiated jointly between the Fire Brigades Union and employers representing brigades here and in GB.

Neither my Department nor I have been involved directly. That stated, it is in everyone's interests for the employers and the Fire Brigades Union to agree a fair settlement to the pay claim. However, it is also important that any pay rise for Fire Service staff is affordable given the current pressures on public spending and is set in the context of modernisation and improvement.

The Fire Brigades Union feels that a 40% pay increase is justified, and the employers have taken the view that significant pay awards can, and should, be linked to clear additional benefits for the public. For example, reports have outlined the employers' modernising agenda that they would wish to see linked to wage increases, including an increased emphasis on community safety and risk reduction taken forward in partnership with communities and well equipped, skilful and highly motivated workforces whose compositions reflect diversity. Such aims could be furthered through greater flexibility in terms and conditions and through a pay structure that rewards Fire Service personnel on the basis of the specific additional skills, experience and competences that they have. I note here Mrs Iris Robinson's views on the issue.

Appropriate pay can, and must, be one of the outcomes of a negotiation process that looks at the full range of issues affecting the Fire Service here and the services in GB. While the issue is not solely one of pay, Members must be clear about the implications of the 40% pay claim as it stands. While it is impossible to be definitive about the impact of such a claim in advance of the settlement, it is likely that it would lead to an increase in annual public expenditure of approximately £14 million, with an immediate increase in pension liabilities of £40 million in the first year. Were such a claim to be settled, it must be understood that the additional cost would have to be found from within the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's budget. I do not need to remind Members of the many competing claims for available resources, so I hope that whatever Members resolve today will be reflected, if necessary, in their contributions to the upcoming Budget debate.

John Kelly and Monica McWilliams raised the issue of public sector pay comparisons. The salary of an 18-year-old trainee school leaver who joins as a firefighter here begins at around £18,500 and goes up to £21,000 during the four years of training. When a firefighter becomes qualified, his salary rises to approximately £22,800 a year. Direct comparisons are always difficult. For example, a nurse after earning a degree starts on an annual salary of £15,500 to £17,000. A teacher, who also requires a degree prior to entry, receives £17,600.

Firefighters' pay must recognise the fact that they put their lives on the line. Similarly, paramedics often find themselves in the most difficult and dangerous of circumstances, as demonstrated by recent attacks. After at least three years' training, a fully qualified paramedic here receives an annual salary of £19,000. Simplistic comparisons are often not appropriate, and this in no way undervalues the dangerous and important work of the Fire Service. I again remind Members that neither my Department nor I have been involved directly in the pay negotiations.

Sam Foster, David Ervine, Iris Robinson and others raised the attacks on firefighters. I want to take this opportunity to state again that these attacks on firefighters are completely unacceptable. The Fire Brigade has a working group, which includes members of the Fire Brigades Union, who are progressing their proposals through the authority's appliances and equipment and health and safety committees.

In addition, my Department, together with the Fire Authority, the Ambulance Service and youth engagement organisations, has worked up proposals for funding a community outreach initiative. I will continue to press for funding for this important initiative, and I hope that all Members will join with me in doing everything that we can together to ensure that our firefighters and other public sector workers are allowed to go about their extremely valuable work without such attacks as we have seen recently.

I hope that the pay dispute can be resolved amicably during the current negotiations. It is important that we recognise the risk to life and property that would result from industrial action. I urge employers and the union to explore every avenue to avoid industrial action, and I appeal to firefighters to stay at the conference table to try to resolve their issues through discussion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Hamilton to make a winding-up speech on amendment 3.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I would like you to put to the Speaker a statement made in this debate by the Sinn Féin Member for Mid Ulster in which he used the word "traduce" in accusing Members of carrying out a criminal act, traducing people for their own financial benefits. I looked up the meaning of the word in the Library; it led to the beheading of Lady Jane Grey. It is a serious word, and it was used today about Members of my party. I request that when Hansard is printed you place the statement before the Speaker so that we can have a ruling.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you for that point of order. I will look carefully at Hansard and refer the matter to the Speaker.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Minister for her contribution. Although her Department does not have overall control of this matter, I welcome her desire that the matter be resolved during the current negotiations and that it should not end in strike action. That is the view of the whole House.

Many Members contributed to the debate, and that precludes me, in the five minutes allotted, from referring to what everyone said. If I leave any Member out, it is not intentional, and it is not because I do not think his comments worthy.

I welcome the comments of Dr Hendron, the Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, who referred to the courage of the Fire Service over the years and the experience and problems that arose when he was MP for West Belfast. The House will welcome his commitment that the Committee will continue to monitor the situation carefully.

Mr Boyd highlighted how the degree of professionalism required in the Fire Service has changed since the last pay award, and Iris Robinson expanded on that point in her worthwhile contribution. Sam Foster questioned the mindset of those who attack firemen, and Paul Berry drew a parallel between the esteem in which firemen are held in the United States and the treatment of the Fire Brigade by some people here. I welcome the support of Ivan Davis, who referred to the number of firefighters who lost their lives or were injured during the troubles.

Unfortunately, Alban Maginness has left the Chamber; I was struck by his welcome of the degree of consensus in the Chamber on the issue. He also drew attention to the penny-pinching attitude of the Government and compared the cost of the firemen's claim to the money that could be spent in a war against Iraq.

5.30 pm

This amendment makes the substantive motion more specific and more helpful to the firefighters in their struggle for fairer and better pay and conditions. That is Members' ultimate objective. There is widespread public support for the firefighters and for what is seen as a deserving and long overdue pay review. Our amendment correctly reflects the majority of people's thinking. It is not simply a call for a specific amount of pay; it addresses the underlying problem of the absence of a proper pay structure for ordinary firefighters, whose only hope of a real pay increase is to join the management ranks.

New pay scales should be introduced that recognise not only long service, but the expertise and skill of ordinary firefighters. That would create a proper pay and career structure, anchored not only in management, but in real firefighting skills — because firefighting is a skilled job. With guidance from the Fire Brigades Union's representatives, those skills should be identified and recognised in the pay scales, which should be more diverse and more skills-related. That is the intelligent way to sort this problem in the long term. I commend the amendment to the House.

Mr Ervine: It seems that everyone supports the firefighters but nobody wants them to get £30,000. It seems that we want to give them quite a bit, but not as much as £30,000. Several important issues have been raised, which are equally valid in their own way. John Kelly's suggestion, mirrored by Ivan Davis, of a unified approach by the Assembly warrants significant thought. It is important that, even if we squabble at times before reaching the same decision, that approach is valuable and sends out the right message.

Alban Maginness struck me by identifying that the same Prime Minister who worries about what a pay rise for the Fire Service will do to the economy flew out to meet Perky. Pinky and Perky have together decided to bomb Iraq. Just as a Fire Service strike hits, Iraq is likely to be attacked. That will be interesting.

We must be mindful of the support that we give today when the spin doctors begin to operate in the event of a strike by the firefighters. What are we going to do? Are we going to defend ourselves and say to our constituents that it is perfectly right for the Fire Service to be on strike, or are we going to listen to those who will say that they are putting everyone at grave risk?

Paul Berry made the point that the most recent industrial action to be taken by the Fire Service was in 1978. These are not unreasonable, overly militant people. They ask to be taken seriously; however, when they were in negotiation with management, the Government, through the back door, stymied the possibility of a relationship being formed that would result in a decent sum of money for the Fire Service. That is a terrible circumstance, and signals, for all those in negotiations with managers, the point at which the Government might interfere.

As legislators, Members must consider that. Will the Assembly be tarred by the same brush? Our Ministers will soon be beseeched by various sectors of society for pay increases. What will the Assembly do then? Will it operate the same process as Tony Blair? That is one of the many factors in the debate that Members have not thought about.

This direct political involvement in a pay negotiation smacks of the miners' dispute with Margaret Thatcher. It smacks of scrubbing the long-established circumstances in which management and trade unions could build relationships and create partnerships in the negotiations. That is being jeopardised by the British Government. Members must be mindful of that and take it on board. As the British Government screw down people's wages, the Assembly will be expected to do the same. Given that our Ministers will have opinions on many areas of the wage sector, it is something that the Assembly must pay attention to.

It seems that there is some wisdom in the PUP's withdrawing its amendment. However, I caution with this thought — the amendment tabled in my name could avert a strike if it were listened to. The amendment tabled by the Ulster Unionists could also avert a strike, but the motion and the other amendment could not. Members should think about the inimitable words of Eileen Bell, who said that the Government will probably not listen anyway. That means that there may be strike action by the firefighters.

Last thought — when the media is hounding and vilifying the Fire Service, let us all remember who supported it in this debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr Ervine, will you clarify whether amendment No 1 is moved or not moved?

Mr Ervine: The amendment is not moved.

Madam Deputy Speaker: By leave of the Assembly, amendment No 1 is not moved.

Mr Shannon: I thank Members for their comments. An obvious recurring theme has been that the job of a firefighter is unlike any other job in the country. Over the past thirty years they have had a job unlike those in any other fire service in the United Kingdom or the rest of the world.

If we are all saying that — and we seem to be — we should be asking ourselves whether firefighters are getting an adequate wage to reflect the risks that they take every day to ensure the survival of Members, their families and the people they represent. They are not. The Assembly has not agreed the wage that the firefighters should be paid, but Members have said that there should be flexibility in the wage negotiations. We should not be tied to £25,000 or £30,000. There should be flexibility to go upwards as well as downwards. There must be flexibility in the system to ensure that the firefighters get a maximum wage for the duties and the work that they do. That is why it is important that Members are on the same wavelength.

The Fire Service is one of the three backbone services in the Province. It contributes to the operation of a modern and progressive country, and that should be recognised. Members should be examining a wage that reflects that. Even after a 42-hour week, full-time firefighters are earning £100 less per week than the country's average earnings. That must be reflected on and changed. The Assembly must ensure that firefighters get the wage that they are looking for. They have not had a wage increase since 1978.

Strike action has been mentioned. We cannot walk away from that.

The motion is not only for the benefit of the firefighters; it is for their families as well. Some firefighters are on a wage that depends on their families receiving working families' tax credit. That applies to many firefighters, and it cannot be ignored. On the bar of equality, retained firefighters deserve a realistic wage — not in a couple of years when the Government decide to bring it in as an election gimmick to win votes, but now, when they need it.

The Prime Minister and John Prescott announced that there would be a review of salaries, but as the firefighters stated, they do not need a review — they need a pay rise. They do not need a review to tell them that they need more money, and that they need it immediately. We need that commitment to the firefighters. We need to see the money coming in rather than what we are seeing — the Government playing for time. There is a very real gap between firefighters' pay scales and pay scales in the private sector. As under a previous Labour Government, the Fire Brigade, nurses and police feel that their only option is industrial action.

All the Members who have spoken today mentioned the need for the wage increase. My Colleague for Strangford, Iris Robinson MP, mentioned it, as did Tom Hamilton, Ivan Davis and Alban Maginness. David Ervine spoke very clearly about the need for a wage increase, and industrial action is something that the firefighters really have to consider.

The demonstration in Belfast was attended by firefighters from across the United Kingdom. One statement that stood out in that rally was

“A reasonable reward for a reasonable request.”

If the firefighters needed a headline, I believe that is it. Members should try their best to ensure that they get a reasonable reward for a reasonable request. Let us not turn away from them in this time of need.

The jobs of the men and women of the Fire Service have changed greatly, and they are still the number one emergency service in many cases. As the firefighters have stated, they have stuck to an annual pay formula, which was agreed 25 years ago, and since then they have not asked for a pay increase. As the firefighters have not complained and have got on with the job in hand, they deserve the Assembly's support for their loyalty and their determination to keep the Fire Service going under the obvious manpower and funding shortages that have dogged them since the 1980s. We must support their action, and we must think about them.

How would Members feel if after 30 years of service, injury, dedication and laying their lives on the line they were taking home pay of £280 per week — think of that when you vote! I urge Members to support the motion. I know they will support it, and I believe that the Minister and her Department will fight hard for the firefighters.

Question, That amendment No 3 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the valuable and courageous work undertaken by the Fire Service and calls for the introduction of a new pay formula together with a commensurate level of pay for firefighters to ensure that these accurately reflect the highly skilled and professional role undertaken by firefighters and fire control staff.

Adjourned at 5.43 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 10 September 2002

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Inland Waterways

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure that he wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council sectoral meeting on inland waterways, held on 26 June 2002 in Belfast.

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McGimpsey): The fifth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in inland waterways sectoral format took place in Belfast on Wednesday 26 June 2002.

Following nomination by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, Ms Carmel Hanna and I represented the Northern Ireland Executive. Mr Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs represented the Irish Government. I am making this report on behalf of myself and Ms Hanna who has approved the report.

The meeting opened with a progress report from the chief executive of Waterways Ireland, Mr John Martin. The Council noted that Waterways Ireland's budget for 2002 is £23.44 million, and that the Northern Ireland contribution is £3.92 million.

Mr Martin advised that major capital projects on the Grand Canal and the Royal Canal were progressing satisfactorily. The programme of work on the Shannon Navigation had been delayed as a result of planning appeals, but those have been resolved. Progress was also made on upgrading mooring facilities on the Lough Erne and Lower Bann Navigations.

Mr Martin reported that Waterways Ireland has had a series of meetings with user groups, including the Erne Charter Boat Association and the Irish Boat Rental Association. Consultants are currently preparing a marketing and promotions strategy for Waterways Ireland, and several open seminars are planned to give interested parties and the public an opportunity to express their views.

The Council noted that the relevant Departments, North and South, are considering the updated feasibility study on the Ulster Canal to determine the way forward. A public meeting, organised by the Inland Waterways Association of Ireland and the Ulster Waterways Group to raise public awareness of the potential for restoring the Ulster Canal, took place in Monaghan on 12 March 2002 and was attended by more than 200 people. Those attending indicated widespread support for the project.

The Council noted the progress made on the procurement of permanent office accommodation for Waterways Ireland's headquarters in Enniskillen. Detailed proposals from developers for three separate waterside locations at Ardhowen, Sligo Road and The Brook were subjected to technical and economic appraisal, and it is hoped that the outcome will be announced shortly. Sites have also been identified for new office accommodation for the regional offices in Scariff and Carrick-on-Shannon. The Dublin office has been established at refurbished premises at Ashtowngate on the Navan Road, and staff transferred there recently.

Mr Martin updated the Council on the current position on the recruitment of staff to Waterways Ireland. To date, 236 staff have been transferred to Waterways Ireland from former departments, which include the Rivers Agency in Northern Ireland. Following open competition, four directors have been appointed for operations, finance and personnel, technical services and marketing and communications, and six other heads of functions have been recruited. Competitions are in progress for other administrative staff, and a number of professional and technical posts have been advertised. The Council was pleased by the amount of interest in the positions advertised — almost 1,500 applications were received for 47 administrative posts. However, it was appreciated that that created a lot of work for staff in Waterways Ireland who have to process the applications.

The Council approved Waterways Ireland's draft corporate and business plan for 2002-04, which sets out a comprehensive programme of work on a wide range of policy issues, systems development and the proposed works programme. In terms of organisational development, Waterways Ireland plans to set up a policy steering group, a communications unit and a steering group to implement its new targeting social need action plan. An internal audit section will also be established. The corporate plan includes proposals to review health and safety policies and procedures, an assessment of charging policies and a review of navigation by-laws for the waterways within Waterways Ireland's remit.

The Council approved Waterways Ireland's equality scheme for formal submission to the Equality Commission, and its New TSN action plan was also approved. The Council noted Waterways Ireland's annual statement of accounts for 2000, which was examined and certified by the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland and the Irish Comptroller and Auditor General. Those accounts will be published together with Waterways Ireland's annual report for 2000. The Council agreed to meet again in autumn 2002.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr J Kelly): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's updating us on the work of the North/South Ministerial Council on this important issue. I am glad to know that progress has been made in several areas. However, it has been more than a year since the Minister advised the House that the updated feasibility study on the Ulster Canal was being considered by the relevant Departments in both jurisdictions. Given the level of public interest in that, can the Minister indicate the extent of the progress made?

Mr McGimpsey: The feasibility study has been completed. In 2000 it was estimated that it would cost £89 million to restore the Ulster Canal, and that is before taking into account any work to protect the environment and heritage aspects of the canal's course. The environmental impact statement will be made once we have made the decision to proceed, which we have not done as yet.

Our first task was the feasibility study, which showed a negative economic benefit, in so far as our Department of Finance and Personnel can test such a project. There are wider implications and wider social and economic benefits, which will all have to be considered. It is a large project, and it is actively being considered. However, I cannot say when I will be making the decision about this.

Mr J Wilson: No specific mention is made in the report of any progress that Waterways Ireland has made on zoning designated areas for different user groups on Northern Ireland's larger expanses of water, such as Lough Erne and Lough Neagh. I saw quite a horrific thing happen during the summer. Young children, babies and their parents were bathing in an area that was clearly identified for bathing only. Jet skis were roaring among them at great speed, turning and twirling around and creating such dangerous water movement that a local person had to restrain a jet-skier.

There are genuine user groups. I am not coming down on jet-skiers. There is a place for everyone — for cruising, for anglers, for commercial anglers and for water sports. However, they are all coming together. There is potential for a horrific accident. I hope that it does not happen. I hope that Waterways Ireland is tackling the problem. What progress has it made?

Mr McGimpsey: With regard to zoning and navigational controls at Lough Erne, for example, there is clearly a need to upgrade the by-laws. Waterways Ireland is actively considering that and has discussed the matter with the chief executive of Fermanagh District Council. There has also been discussion with the various district councils along the navigational line of the Lower Bann. There is voluntary zoning on the Lower Bann, which appears to work reasonably well. However, no by-laws are in place. Waterways Ireland is aware that the matter needs to be dealt with and is seeking to do that.

Waterways Ireland's approach is to try to accommodate all responsible user groups. Mr Wilson gave the example of a dangerous situation in which bathers were in water among jet-skiers. That must be dealt with. Perhaps voluntary zoning is not always appropriate. That is why the by-laws for Lough Erne are being examined. There are no by-laws for the Lower Bann, but their introduction is being considered. That will require widespread consultation.

Mr Bradley: Northern Ireland's contribution to the Waterways Ireland budget is just under £4 million, whereas the Republic of Ireland's contribution is about £20 million. Can the Minister tell the Assembly how that ratio was arrived at?

Mr McGimpsey: The authority on the northern side of the border pays 100% of capital costs in Northern Ireland, but nothing towards capital costs in the Irish Republic, and vice versa. By agreement, the Irish Republic pays 85% of non-capital costs, and Northern Ireland pays 15%.

The Department is discussing the provision of headquarters accommodation with its counterparts across the border. After a suitable breakdown of, for example, the offices at Scarriff, Carrick-on-Shannon and Enniskillen, it has been accepted that it is inappropriate for Northern Ireland to pay 100% of headquarters capital costs at Enniskillen; nor is it appropriate for the Irish Republic to pay 100% of capital costs for the offices at Scarriff and Carrick-on-Shannon, which are regional offices that have common usage. The agreement is, therefore, that, with the exception of office accommodation, Northern Ireland pays 15% of non-capital costs and 100% of capital costs on its side of the border.

Mr Shannon: Over 200 people attended a meeting in Monaghan on 12 March. Can the Minister confirm that some of those were involved in tourism? It would be interesting to know that, because if people involved in tourism do not attend such meetings, they should. There is a tourism potential to be realised.

Secondly, 236 staff have been transferred to Waterways Ireland. Many of us feel that that is an excessive number. Can the Minister confirm the full remit, responsibility and workload that Waterways Ireland is tasked to do? Can he also confirm whether 236 staff will be the final number, or whether more staff will be employed?

Mr McGimpsey: As far as the meeting in Monaghan and tourism representatives are concerned, water-based tourism is very much part of the thrust of Waterways Ireland. Water-based tourism is also very much part of the raison d'être for replenishing old canals that have fallen out of use, and, as I have said many times in the House, it has demonstrated large economic benefits in the Irish Republic, on the mainland and in Europe, where that activity is popular among tourists. Therefore, tourism plays a key role.

Waterways Ireland has set up a section specifically for marketing and communications, under a director who is looking to sell the product at all times. Indeed, through recent consultation between the two tourist boards and the various providers, a booklet called 'Ireland's Welcoming Waterways', was produced. That is a preliminary project as they begin to sell the product. Tourism is very much a part of the picture as far as Waterways Ireland is concerned.

The anticipated complement of staff is 380; it currently stands at 300. For example, there are currently 50 staff in Enniskillen, with an anticipated complement of 70, which is the number of staff required. As far as the remit is concerned, I refer Mr Shannon to the corporate plan, the action plan and the various background documents to Waterways Ireland. However, it is essentially a navigation authority concerned with taking over navigable waters within the island and managing them for users, tourists and the local population.

Although replenishing canals in the Irish Republic is very advanced, virtually nothing has been done in Northern Ireland. Much of the work lies ahead, and I anticipate that much of it will be done in Northern Ireland, not least on the Lagan Navigation and the Ulster Canal.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I take into account Jim Wilson's points about users and the safety of lakes, although I do not want any groups excluded from either the upper or lower parts of Lough Erne or confined to areas where it is uneconomical for users to travel.

The Minister said that the Council noted progress on procurement of permanent office accommodation for Waterways Ireland's headquarters in Enniskillen. What progress has been made? I would have expected a decision much sooner than now. Has real progress been made to allow a decision to be announced shortly, or is some sort of foot-dragging taking place on either side of the border?

Mr McGimpsey: The process of providing offices in Enniskillen has been ongoing for a couple of years. A development brief for the premises, in which there was a great deal of interest, was issued. A robust process was required to ensure that the decision was the best possible one for the taxpayer and for Waterways Ireland.

We honed it down to three possible sites: Ardhoven, Sligo Road and The Brook. We are now at the next stage — a site has been chosen, and an economic appraisal has been completed. I am satisfied that the process has been robust. The selection has been completed, and we are clarifying the legal position. I will make an announcement when budgetary considerations can be addressed. I have to be certain that we are ready to spend the money when I make the announcement, and I anticipate being in a position to do that in the near future. It would be premature to make an announcement today. The process is completed, but we must be certain that we have the correct answer. We are now ensuring that that is the case.

Mr A Maginness: I compliment the Minister on his comprehensive report and on the steady and sensible progress that has been made on this. I am interested in the potential of inland waterways to attract tourists. The report says that consultants are preparing a marketing and promotion strategy for Waterways Ireland. When will those reports be ready for publication and discussion by the Assembly?

Mr McGimpsey: It is difficult to give a precise date by which the reports will be ready. A marketing and communication system has been set up within Waterways Ireland under the control of a director, who is specifically tasked with selling the product as a tourist attraction, and he is working closely with both tourist boards. The first brochure, 'Ireland's Welcoming Waterways', has already been published. That is the beginning of the process, but I am not sure when it will be completed. I can find out and write to the Member with details of the precise date for publication. There has been great interest in this, not least from the providers of the cruising craft and so on and from the local authorities around Lough Erne, the Lower Bann, and the canals in the Irish Republic. We consider the matter to be important and urgent and have given it priority.

Mr Gibson: The Minister said that the feasibility study on the Ulster Canal is being considered by the relevant Departments to determine the way forward. Is serious consideration now being given to a reconstruction project for the Ulster Canal and, if so, is there a vague timetable for its delivery?

Mr McGimpsey: I attempted to relay the position on the Ulster Canal in an answer to a question asked by Mr John Kelly. The matter is being considered, and a feasibility study has been completed. We know the cost of the project, based on prices in 2000. We will have to find inventive ways to fund such a large capital project. The Ulster Canal and Lagan Navigation capital projects should proceed, resources allowing. It is not simply a matter of making a case in the Assembly and then receiving the money in a cheque from the centre. That would not be possible. We must look at other sources, such as public-private partnerships and possibly the reinvestment and reform initiative.

Those matters are being considered, and we take one step at a time. Old feasibility studies on the Ulster Canal have been examined, and environmental scoping has been brought up to date. The last scoping was carried out in 1998. I have been trying for the last couple of years to get close to a position of being able to make a proposal on the Ulster Canal, and we are coming to that point. Members will appreciate that it is a very large project and that we must step carefully.

Mrs Carson: I thank the Minister for his report and I welcome it, especially given the employment of 50 people in Enniskillen, which is an unemployment black spot in my constituency. I welcome the upgrading of mooring facilities on Lough Erne, which are needed by tourists and boat owners.

In his comprehensive works programme, will the Minister include an audit of the water quality of the Erne system? I am concerned that there has been a visible growth in weeds along the supposedly navigable and deeper waters. Is the increased growth of eel weed in clear water due to the infestation of zebra mussels? The Republic of Ireland's report on the water quality in its rivers shows that the headwaters of the Erne are the second most-polluted system in the Republic. Does the Minister have that report to hand?

Mr McGimpsey: Although water quality is very important, Waterways Ireland has no responsibility for monitoring or policing water quality. That lies with another Department.

Zebra mussels were spread by boats and became widely established in the 1990s. No biological control for them has yet been identified. With regard to such matters as the Ulster Canal, that factor must be taken into account to ensure that the mussels are not carried further into our system.

In respect of Mrs Carson's other concerns, I am not clear about the water quality of the headwaters in the Irish Republic. I can make enquiries if she wishes, but, strictly speaking, Waterways Ireland is an authority responsible for keeping waterways navigable, and water quality issues are outside its remit.

SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Second Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Social Security Bill (NIA 3/02) be agreed.

This Bill makes provisions for Northern Ireland which correspond to the social security provisions made for Great Britain by the Employment Act 2002, which received Royal Assent on 8 July 2002. The Bill is, therefore, a parity measure.

In yesterday's debate on accelerated passage for the Bill, I mentioned that there has always been parity between Great Britain and Northern Ireland in the area of social security. That is as it should be. People in Northern Ireland pay the same taxes and National Insurance contributions as people in Great Britain. They are, therefore, entitled to receive the same benefits. In addition, parity enables Northern Ireland to use the Great Britain computer systems. That is much more cost-effective than having to set up separate computer systems here, which would have to be funded from the Northern Ireland block.

Parity does not only cover the content of the legislation; it also covers the timing of its implementation. New provisions have always been introduced in Northern Ireland at the same time as they have been introduced in the rest of the United Kingdom, and that arrangement should continue.

11.00 am

Clauses 1 to 4 of the Bill cover statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance. The period for which statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance are payable is being extended from 18 to 26 weeks, and the standard rate is being increased from £75 to £100 a week, or to 90% of weekly earnings where they are less than £100 a week.

These are significant changes for working mothers. The increase in maternity benefits to £100 a week from April 2003 is the biggest in real terms since 1948. It comes on top of a substantial increase in April 2002 from £62.20 to £75 a week. Combined with the extension to the payment period, the new rate of pay means that compared with now, most women who receive statutory maternity pay will gain about £1,250.

Clause 3 introduces two important changes: it safeguards a woman's entitlement to statutory maternity pay from 15 weeks before her baby is due and increases the period of notice that a woman must give to her employer from three to four weeks before starting her paid leave. If a woman decides to leave her employer in the 15 weeks before her baby is due, for a reason unconnected with her pregnancy, she may not receive statutory maternity pay. Clause 3 introduces changes that ensure that if an employee meets the conditions for statutory maternity pay and notifies her employer properly, she will receive maternity pay, even if, for any reason, her employment ends after that point.

Employees must provide three weeks' notice before starting paid maternity leave. The period of notice has been extended to four weeks, which will give employers a longer period over which they can arrange cover for the absence of the pregnant employee. As now, clause 3 also provides a power to modify the entitlement in notice provisions in certain cases, such as premature birth.

Clause 4 increases the standard rate of maternity allowance so that it mirrors the new standard rate of statutory maternity pay. A woman will receive the standard rate of £100 a week, or 90% of her average weekly earnings if that is less than the standard rate.

Most pregnant working women receive statutory maternity pay from their employers, but maternity allowance is aimed at those employees, such as self-employed women, women with a more variable employment record, and women who are on low earnings, who cannot receive such pay. Working women have no choice but to take time off work to prepare for and recover from childbirth, and it is important that we help as many as we can during that time.

The Welfare Reform and Pensions (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 introduced the requirement for certain benefit claimants to attend work-focused interviews. Clause 5 of the Bill extends that requirement to the partners of recipients of social security benefits that include an amount for the partner. Benefit sanctions may be applied if the partner fails, without good cause, to take part in an interview. The work-focused interview will concentrate on job potential and provide the partner with access to help and information on work benefits and services such as childcare. However, any action that a partner may choose to take, beyond taking part in the interview, will be entirely voluntary.

Clause 6 makes further provision for the exchange of information between my Department, the Department for Employment and Learning, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Housing Executive. In particular, it allows for the exchange of employment and training information.

Clause 7 of the Bill amends article 17 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. The substitution of paragraph (4) arises from the need to make the proposed carers Order, which will address the deregulation of carers' allowances, correspond with an equivalent Order made in Great Britain under the Regulatory Reform Act 2001. Drafting of the carers Order highlighted a technical problem relating to the Assembly control of Orders made under article 17, and legal advice is that Assembly control cannot commence until paragraph (4) is amended.

The carers Order is significant because it will make several changes to invalid care allowance, including changing its name to carers' allowance in April 2003. The Order will provide for carers aged 65 and over to claim the allowance for the first time and will extend the entitlement period for up to eight weeks after the death of the disabled person. In keeping with the long-standing principle of parity in social security matters, the provisions are required to be in place by 28 October so that claimants in Northern Ireland are not disadvantaged, particularly as the same provisions will apply in the rest of the country from that date.

The opportunity has also been taken to make consequential amendments to article 17(1) and 17(2) of the Deregulating and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, to take account of the enactment of the Regulatory Reform Act 2001, the Social Security Fraud Act 2001 and the Child Support, Pensions and Social Security Act 2000.

Clause 8 and schedules 1 and 2 of the Bill make minor and consequential amendments and repeals that flow from the changes being made by clauses 1 to 6.

The Bill is an important step in the ongoing process of welfare reform, and I commend it to the Assembly.

Mrs Nelis: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome those clauses of the Bill that facilitate an improvement in the provision of statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance by increasing the period of payment from 18 weeks to 26 weeks and by increasing the rate of maternity allowance. As the Minister stated, those provisions are contained in clauses 1 to 4 of the Bill. That will be good news for expectant working mothers and fathers.

However, the subsequent clauses, which the Minister has outlined, are more contentious — the potential impact of the Bill on partners could be described as the good news coming before the bad. The later clauses propose to change the Social Security Administration (Northern Ireland) Act 1992 so as to make provision for work-focused interviews for partners of benefit claimants by inserting a new section after section 2A entitled:

The partners of claimants who receive income support, jobseeker's allowance, severe disablement allowance and invalid care allowance will be subject to that condition. Previous legislation, such as the Welfare Reform and Pensions (Northern Ireland) Order 1999, introduced a requirement for certain benefit claimants, including lone parents, to attend work-focused interviews. The provisions in this Bill propose to extend that requirement to partners of benefit claimants. If they fail to do so, the legislation will prescribe benefit sanctions. One can argue that there may be an advantage in encouraging partners who lack confidence or who believe that their role is to stay at home as the home keeper. Women in particular might derive some stimulus from work-focused interviews especially if the latter, according to the explanatory and financial memorandum, cover

“previous employment records, capacity to undertake work, the in-house financial support available and help in areas such as childcare, housing and training.”

On the other hand, partners of claimants may feel that the requirements will eventually be enforced, and that is why they may see the Bill as contentious. They may be seeking work or taking up training even when they have family or other domestic responsibilities: there is also concern about the difficulties for claimants whose partners are claiming severe disablement allowance. The Bill does not recognise that many partners of claimants who stay at home are work-focused: work in the home requires many skills.

The other concern about these provisions is the impact that they may have on carers of children, the elderly or the sick. It needs to be made clear that such people will not be penalised by the provisions and that work-focused interviews will not be extended by subsequent legislation to include compulsory attendance at training or compulsory job seeking. The major difficulty for the Committee for Social Development is that the requirement for legislative parity means that once again there is insufficient time to fulfil a proper scrutiny role adequately.

We are not given sight of the passage of such Bills through Westminster. Are we expected to rubber-stamp those Bills which are given accelerated passage, without proper consultation or scrutiny? The Committee for Social Development and the Assembly deserve better. If we are to legislate on parity Bills, we should at least be given sight of the debate and amendments to such Bills, as they travel through Westminster.

We are not “as British as Finchley”, and our constituents have different needs. Our social situation is widely diverse, with higher levels of unemployment and deprivation and more people on income support — 68% more than in England. We have a low-wage economy and serious health problems. It is time that the issue of parity in relation to social security matters, child support, pensions and all those needs are investigated in legal and in policy terms.

Mr Speaker: I get a sense from what some Members have said that there is a lack of clarity about parity. There is no such legal thing as “parity legislation” — it merely describes a political decision to keep legislation here the same as in the rest of the United Kingdom. The term “parity legislation” has no legal standing whatever.

There is no description or definition of it — it is purely a political decision. The Assembly is at liberty to take whatever course of action it chooses in relation to parity. The Minister made that clear when he pointed out that there were certain economic and political reasons why he supported that stance.

I wanted to make that clear, because when the term is used there is sometimes an impression that it has a legal standing and that the Assembly is not free to make its own decision in that regard. From a procedural point of view I point out that the Assembly can do more than it might imagine.

Mr M Robinson: I acknowledge that the Minister has taken the time to ensure that the Committee for Social Development has been fully briefed on the legislation, in view of the fact that his Department would be asking for accelerated passage for the Social Security Bill to ensure that the principle of parity was adhered to, as the Chairman, Mr Cobain, outlined yesterday. Two weeks ago, the Committee reached the conclusion that the measures being proposed would be of benefit to many more applicants than was previously the case.

I therefore welcome the Second Stage of the Social Security Bill, which will, once fully implemented, provide benefits to some of the most needy and vulnerable in our society. In particular, I want to emphasise and, indeed, to welcome the changes made to maternity payments, which now include the provision for statutory maternity pay in relation to rate, period and entitlement. That is a major step forward in providing real and tangible assistance and benefits to working mothers.

The changes made in the invalid care allowance, including the change of its name to carers allowance, widens the scope of those who are eligible to claim, by allowing people over the age of 65 to benefit from the scheme. Once the Bill is implemented in full, more people than ever before will become eligible for this type of benefit.

The inclusion of the state pension credit Bill will ultimately benefit the most vulnerable and needy pensioners in our society. The Bill’s aim is to create a system that is easier to access and will therefore encourage pensioners to make a claim to which they are entitled. Once implemented, the changes will bring Northern Ireland into line with Great Britain and will allow pensioners in Northern Ireland to have access to the new state pension credit and thus a more generous income. This provides the opportunity for bringing more people into the realm of eligibility with regard to receiving benefits. With the passage of this Bill through the Assembly, the people of Northern Ireland will not lose out on any benefits to which they may be eligible.

Mr Dodds: I appreciate the way in which the Bill has been handled over the past two days. I listened to Members’ points, and I wish to address a couple of those. The introduction of these benefits at the same time and at the same rates as in the rest of the country is good news for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker, you made several comments about parity legislation, and you are right to point out that it makes sense to maintain parity for several political and economic reasons. There is now some statutory relevance and provision on this issue. Before 1998, there was no statutory basis for the application of the principle of parity. Section 87 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 gave legislative expression to aspects of that principle for the first time. It requires the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the Northern Ireland Minister to run single systems of social security, child support and pensions to the extent agreed between them.

It must be emphasised that parity has worked to the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland for many years. It means that people here who pay the same rates of income tax, National Insurance contributions and so on are entitled to the same benefits, at the same rates, at the same time as people elsewhere. That is right, and if it were not the case, our constituents would rightly accuse us of depriving them of something to which they are entitled.

Parity works to Northern Ireland's advantage. For example, contributory benefits such as retirement pension and incapacity benefit are funded from National Insurance contributions. The amount raised through those contributions is, and has been for a long time, insufficient to meet the demand for such benefits, and the shortfall in the Northern Ireland National Insurance fund has to be made up by a transfer from the Great Britain fund. Non-contributory benefits are financed from taxation revenue. Expenditure is demand-led and is outside the managed block grant. If we interfere with that, we must bear in mind the consequences to the expenditure that will be required from the Northern Ireland block grant, and the expenditure that will be required to manage and implement any breach of parity with regard to computer systems and other matters. Anyone who examined that option in any detail would quickly see that it is to our benefit to continue to implement parity provisions.

Members raised several points about work-focused interviews. I must make it clear that this is simply the implementation of a principle for welfare reform. If a claimant has stated that they have a partner, that partner will be called to attend an interview. All that is required is that they discuss their personal circumstances. There is no requirement to find work. It is a means of exploring with the individual their needs and circumstances, and of giving them advice, support and help. It has been found to be very helpful. Not everyone will find work, but people can explore the opportunities for fulfilling their potential. That is all that is being asked of them, and that cannot be described as bad news. The Bill is good news for the people of Northern Ireland. It will bring benefits to those who are entitled to them.

Yesterday I said that I was grateful for the opportunity to speak to the Committee for Social Development about the Bill, and to give our reasons for seeking accelerated passage. Some time ago officials appeared before the Committee to discuss the content of the proposed legislation, and members were provided with a copy of the draft Bill. I have searched the records, and there has been no correspondence from some Members who spoke today — I refer to one Member in particular — about any aspect of the Bill. People who speak about scrutiny and consultation should take this matter seriously. If Members have points to make, they should make them, and we could then discuss those points and deal with them as we go through the Bill, rather than Members making spurious points about consultation at the end of the process when they have not bothered at any stage to make those points directly.

I am pleased with how the Bill has been debated. Mr O'Neill made a useful point in yesterday's debate, and I have made an undertaking with the Committee that officials will endeavour to keep members informed about the progress of legislation through Westminster. Members will be able to discuss issues and reflect on them, but they should remember that legislation may be changed at Westminster. It is sensible and correct that Members who are interested in issues should have the opportunity to be briefed. All Members can acquaint themselves with what is happening at Westminster. The information is in the public domain and is not a secret.

I thank the Assembly for its speedy and expeditious consideration of the Second Stage of the Social Security Bill.

ASSEMBLY OMBUDSMAN FOR NORTHERN IRELAND (ASSEMBLY STANDARDS) BILL

Second Stage

The Chairperson of the Committee on Standards and Privileges (Mr McClelland): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland (Assembly Standards) Bill (NIA 25/01) be agreed.

This is a historic piece of legislation because it is the first Committee Bill to be introduced to the Assembly.

The main purpose of the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland (Assembly Standards) Bill is to enable the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland to fulfil the role and functions of an Assembly commissioner for standards. The Committee on Standards and Privileges is responsible for the consideration of any matter that relates to the conduct of Members, including complaints about alleged breaches of the Assembly's code of conduct and the guide to the rules relating to the conduct of Members.

In September 2000 the Committee embarked on its first inquiry into the possible appointment of an Assembly commissioner for standards. The key recommendation in the Committee's report was that there should be an independent mechanism for the investigation of complaints against Members, and accordingly that an Assembly commissioner for standards should be appointed. It was envisaged that the commissioner would investigate complaints against Members and submit a report to the Committee on Standards and Privileges on any investigation undertaken. In turn, the Committee would submit a report to the Assembly on all complaints investigated, and could recommend the imposition of sanctions on Members. The Assembly, in plenary sitting, would be the final arbiter on each complaint and on the determination of sanctions.

The Assembly approved the report and its findings in April 2001.

After publication of its report, the Committee considered various methods of appointing a commissioner for standards and concluded that the Office of the Ombudsman for Northern Ireland was particularly well placed and equipped to discharge the functions of such a commissioner. The Committee was satisfied that the Ombudsman's office had all the investigative infrastructure, skills and experience to investigate complaints against Members.

In taking this approach, the Committee was keen to maintain the independence of the commissioner by ensuring that neither the appointment nor the tenure of the commissioner would come within the authority of the Committee or of the Assembly itself. Our intention was that the independence of the commissioner for standards should be analogous to that of the Comptroller and Auditor General.

The approach developed by the Committee was also based on a belief that the independent investigation of complaints by the Assembly Ombudsman, who is appointed through the public appointments procedure, would promote additional transparency in the investigative process and thus secure greater public confidence in the work of the Committee on Standards and Privileges and the Assembly itself. For reasons of economy, efficiency and effectiveness, the Committee decided that this was the most attractive option by far.

The investigation of complaints against Members will be in addition to the Assembly Ombudsman's present functions of investigating complaints against Departments and other public authorities that are referred to him by Members.

In carrying out his function of investigating Assembly standards, the Assembly Ombudsman is not subject to the direction or control of the Assembly. However, where the complaint relates to a Member's conduct, he must have regard to any code of conduct or guidance agreed or approved by the Assembly. To give effect to the proposals to have complaints investigated by the Ombudsman, the Committee concluded that primary legislation would have to be introduced and that the most appropriate method of advancing the relevant primary legislation would be by means of a Bill sponsored by the Committee on Standards and Privileges.

The Committee went to consultation on its proposals through advertisement in the local press. No responses were received, and having to start its responsibility in this area, the Committee has taken the view that there appears to be no objection in principle to this approach. With that in mind, the Committee decided to proceed with the introduction of legislation.

As I stated at the outset, the Bill enables the Assembly Ombudsman to fulfil the roles and functions of an Assembly commissioner for standards. The primary function of the commissioner will be to carry out an investigation into matters relating to the conduct, interests and privileges of Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly at the request of the Committee and to submit a report on any investigation conducted. The commissioner will report to the Committee on his or her investigation but will not make any formal recommendation regarding the imposition of sanctions or penalties.

The Committee will subsequently report its findings on the complaint to the Assembly. The report will contain a recommendation on whether to impose sanctions on a Member. The full report, submitted by the commissioner to the Committee, will be appended to the Committee's report to the Assembly. The Committee's report may be the subject of debate in the Assembly, and the Member or Members complained about will have the opportunity to take part in that debate. The Assembly meeting in plenary, will ultimately decide whether to accept the Committee's findings. The Assembly will also decide if any of the Committee's recommendations on the imposition of sanctions on the Member should be accepted.

The Bill is necessary to enable the Assembly Ombudsman to fulfil the role of Assembly commissioner for standards. For these reasons, I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mr M Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. We welcome the introduction of investigatory powers for the Assembly Ombudsman. It is essential for the credibility of the Committee on Standards and Privileges that the investigation of Members who have allegedly breached the code of conduct be carried out by an independent person.

It is important that the Ombudsman should have adequate powers to guarantee independence and that due regard be given to his reports. Such a duty should be added to the Bill, and I look forward to seeing it passed. Go raibh maith agat.

11.30 am

Mr McClelland: I have no further comment. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mr Speaker: The Bill now stands referred to the Committee of the Centre.

ASPERGER'S SYNDROME

Mr Fee: I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Ministers of Education and Health, Social Services and Public Safety to instigate a comprehensive review of the services provided for people, adults and children, with Asperger's syndrome and the training of professionals specialising in the treatment of such individuals.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this important, complex and difficult issue. Mr Speaker, as a layman I speak with trepidation, in the full and certain knowledge that you and other Members may know infinitely more about this topic than I do. Nonetheless, this motion is more about raising awareness and keeping the matter to the fore with the relevant Ministers. I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is in the Chamber.

This matter is to do with fair play, equality and basic human and civil rights. There are people with Asperger's syndrome and autism of different forms, and they may not be getting the support, care and attention that they deserve and are entitled to.

Some Members have eyesight disorders, and they expect to get a speedy diagnosis of their problem, access to medical care and the glasses they need readily and easily. There is an induction loop system and other aids to support people with hearing difficulties who work in or visit this Building.

There are people with Asperger's syndrome whose needs are not visible and whose condition is not easy to diagnose, and when it is diagnosed it is not always clear what the best treatment is, so we must continuously update our knowledge of that syndrome, and of autistic spectrum disorder, and use best practice in treatment and education. We must ensure that the public have an understanding and awareness of the range of problems faced by those with Asperger's syndrome and their families.

The main characteristics of the syndrome are to do with how individuals communicate, understand the world around them and relate to their environment and to the people they live and come in contact with. Many people with Asperger's syndrome are just like the rest of us; they want to make friends and interact, but they find it very difficult to communicate. Non-verbal expressions and social rules and conventions are quite often beyond them. That creates a high level of anxiety and isolation, difficulties with communication and severe learning difficulties.

In those circumstances, their needs for care and attention, one-to-one education, and precision in the use of language and how one relates to the individual are much greater than ours. Therefore, we must find the mechanisms and supports that will allow sufferers of Asperger's syndrome to live their lives and participate in society to the full. We must protect them against the almost inevitable danger that is depression, which looms somewhere in the back of their minds and is often one of the most debilitating symptoms of the disorder.

No professional medical practitioner would disagree that there are many differences in diagnostic procedures across the education and library board and the health board areas. There does not appear to be a single professional view of what is the most effective diagnostic method. Highly skilled professionals often must choose the type of treatments that should be given. Their decision is based more on personal experience than on any empirical research or proven methods. The situation is made more difficult by the fact that there is no defining biological marker or medical test on which to base a diagnosis. Furthermore, there is no co-ordinated or standardised approach to the making of assessments or diagnoses, or how treatment can best be delivered.

The scale of the problem must be clarified. There is no accurate information about the numbers of school-children or adults who have the disorder. Figures that I have obtained from the Southern Education and Library Board show that the number of people diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome or autism almost doubled between 1999 and 2001. In 1999, 126 sufferers were diagnosed; that figure rose to 248 in 2001. Nobody in the Southern Education and Library Board or the health board was willing to stick his neck out and say that the figures were accurate. We do not know how many people have Asperger's syndrome, either because they have not been diagnosed or because the problem is not discovered until the early teenage years.

Before we go much further, we must recognise that finding a mechanism for early diagnosis and intervention is crucial in helping sufferers from Asperger's syndrome to live their lives to the full and in giving support to their families. We must have properly trained specialists from across the range of professionals in the education and health spheres who can recognise the potential of Asperger's syndrome, and the language and learning skills that are needed. Those specialists can draw in key professionals such as members of education boards, social workers and specialist teachers, and can put together the type of multidisciplinary response that will allow sufferers of Asperger's syndrome to live their lives to the full.

Several organisations work with Asperger's syndrome sufferers, and I am particularly grateful to Parents and Professionals & Autism (PAPA) for its support and for the information it has provided me with.

The report from the task group on autism, which was commissioned by the Department of Education, is well thought out and well researched, and much of what I am saying today reflects the contents of that report. However, structure and formality must be put on interdepartmental responses to autism and Asperger's syndrome. Dedicated resources must be invested in the training of professionals and the delivery of supports to families. A common response should be developed by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education, and also by the Department for Employment and Learning, because an autism-specific employment programme should be established to try to help sufferers of Asperger's syndrome and other forms of autism to integrate into their environment.

Many Members wish to speak, and I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Education has arrived in the Chamber. I am grateful to the two Ministers for attending, and perhaps I will get an opportunity to make a winding-up speech at the end of the debate.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I welcome the opportunity to speak to this motion. The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety is aware of the problems posed by Asperger's syndrome. Representatives of concerned parents from PAPA and other organisations have spoken to the Committee about the difficulties faced by the parents of sufferers. They have spoken eloquently about the heartache parents face in trying to discover what is wrong with their children and of the lack of understanding of the condition among professionals and Health Service managers.

I am grateful that the Minister of Education and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety are present for the debate.

As a GP with more than a few years' experience — I will not say how many — I know of the difficulty of identifying Asperger's syndrome in young people and adults. The condition was only described in the 1940s, and health professionals are still unsure about the causes of the syndrome. It is an autistic syndrome disorder and it is a lifelong condition. Many people remain undiagnosed until they are adults. Only now are professionals becoming more familiar with Asperger's syndrome and the real difficulties faced by people with the condition, especially children and young people.

It has been estimated that 36 children in 10,000 definitely have the syndrome and another 35 children in 10,000 have similar social impairments. Many of those children may have above-average intelligence, but they face difficulties with social interaction, communication, understanding, and imaginative play. People with Asperger's syndrome may suffer from severe depression, anxiety, impulsive behaviour and mood swings. Early diagnosis is therefore important.

Mr Fee has rightly said that Asperger's syndrome is a condition that requires a shared understanding and a shared approach from health and social care professionals and education professionals. The suitability of provisions in schools and at home for people with Asperger's syndrome would be much improved if there were good links between health and education professionals. Health monitoring must be applied consistently to ensure that the disability is diagnosed early. Lack of early diagnosis will only increase problems such as lowered self-esteem and poor mental health.

The future lies in the hands of our children, and I ask the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Minister of Education to ensure that disorders such as autism and Asperger's syndrome are properly resourced and funded. I welcome the Health Minister's commitment, given to the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, that she will introduce a review of mental health policy and improve adolescent mental health services. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Social Services Inspectorate will also undertake other work that may affect children with Asperger's syndrome.

Examples of work to improve services, such as the new Southern Area Children's Services Plan for 2002-05, are also welcome. The plan identifies the need for a coherent and integrated approach to family support to ensure that children reach their full potential. We need a coherent and comprehensive approach throughout Northern Ireland, irrespective of administrative boundaries, to sufferers of conditions such as Asperger's syndrome. That must happen if we are to take seriously the Programme for Government, especially its focus on improving service delivery and addressing cross-cutting policy development.

As Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety I ask the Minister of Health and the Minister of Education to instigate a co-ordinated review of the services provided for people with Asperger's syndrome and related disorders. I support the motion.

Mr Berry: I support the motion wholeheartedly. Mr Fee clearly outlined the concerns and problems relating to Asperger's syndrome that must be addressed. The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety also outlined the problems and what needs to be done. Parents and Professionals & Autism (PAPA) has lobbied very hard on this distressing matter. The motion states that a comprehensive review must be instigated as soon as possible to deal with the issue.

Parents are concerned by the perceived lack of understanding of Asperger's syndrome among health professionals and others, which results in anxiety for parents and children. The Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety must recognise the problems surrounding the illness.

Some parents discover that their children have the syndrome only when they start school. The syndrome can cause grave concern for parents and deep depression for children who are severely affected. A comprehensive review and the training of professionals to specialise in treating such individuals are vital. We must back that wholeheartedly, and I believe that all Members will do that. However, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety must also focus on early intervention and treatment. I hope that both Departments will work collectively so that the anxiety of parents and children who are affected by the illness can be eased immediately.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the motion. This is an opportunity to increase public recognition of Asperger's syndrome and to focus on what needs to be done to address it. In 1999-2000, the Education and Training Inspectorate carried out a survey of children with Asperger's syndrome. It found that "The area boards' figures indicate that there are approximately 160 pupils who have been officially diagnosed as having Asperger syndrome."

The figures reveal wide variations between area boards and suggest variations in the diagnostic approach to the condition. The figures generally fall into the lower end of the nationally recognised ratios, which suggests that the condition is not widely recognised in the North.

The inspection team's view is that the present numbers appear to be significantly underestimated. The task of agreeing diagnostic criteria and applying them uniformly across the boards is urgent. Only when that has been done can the Department of Education evaluate the resources required to provide appropriate education for the children concerned.

I am pleased to note that the Minister of Education and his Department have not been idle. The task forces on autism, both North and South, met and reported earlier this year. The report of the task force in the North noted that a wave of autistic spectrum disorder is rising through the school system and that, as it progresses, there will be large increases in the numbers of pupils, students and trainees diagnosed as having autistic spectrum disorder. There will also be a large increase in demand for appropriate services and educational provision.

The report recommended that significant improvement be made in three areas: access to multi-agency, multi-disciplinary diagnostic and assessment services; training for parents of, and people who work with, children and young people with autistic spectrum disorder; and school-based and home-based educational and therapeutic provision.

The treatment centre in Armagh will be a centre of excellence and an all-island facility. It will provide expert advice and access to the latest research. In order for the centre to be successful, it must harness the energies of all concerned, including health and education services, parents and academic and medical research, to deliver the best and most effective provision. The hopes of all the families of autistic spectrum disorder and Asperger's syndrome sufferers are invested in it.

Recent developments suggest that we are on the right road, and we must continue down it to improve the situation.

Ms Lewsley: I thank John Fee for bringing the issue before the House. Asperger's syndrome is a form of autism that is often described as a display of odd behaviour. It affects sufferers' ability to communicate and the way in which they relate to others. As a result, they frequently cannot display appropriate social behaviour. They may be clumsy or awkward and have a lack of common sense. Many sufferers are dyslexic and have problems with mathematics, while others have language disabilities or sensory difficulties. They are often obsessive about routines, and, in order to avoid anxiety and stress, they need an extremely structured and supportive system with the minimum of change.

Sufferers frequently feel isolated because they are aware that they are different from other people. Several Members said that increasing numbers of people are being diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome. What information or education does the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety provide about the condition for parents, carers or the wider community? Public awareness of the condition must be raised.

Are the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and her Department communicating with the Minister of Education to ensure that teachers and healthcare professionals can be trained, so that skilled people are available to provide treatment and support for Asperger's syndrome sufferers and their carers?

The fact that this debate has come before the House proves the need for the Minister of Education to bring forward the special education needs and disability Bill as soon as possible.

Members have identified a wide range of needs that are not being met, and the situation will deteriorate unless they are addressed immediately. I suppose that inadequate funding is the main reason for the lack of action. Although Asperger's syndrome is pigeonholed under health, it is not only the responsibility of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, but also of several other Departments, including Employment and Learning, and Social Development.

A serious issue that affects people with Asperger's syndrome is disability living allowance (DLA). Although DLA is aimed at improving the quality of life of those with disabilities, some people are wrongly denied it. Parents and carers of people with Asperger's syndrome find it increasingly difficult to access DLA because of the guidelines in force. The right to choose is vital, so people with Asperger's syndrome and their carers should have as many choices as possible. It is important that they be facilitated to take control of their lives and to achieve a level of independence commensurate with their condition.

There is also a social aspect. Every individual is part of the community and, as such, has the right to the opportunity to develop a social network. People with Asperger's syndrome deserve those opportunities. I support the motion.

Mrs E Bell: I support the motion; it is good that Mr Fee moved it. Although the Assembly has debated autism, this motion raises awareness of the difficulties experienced by people with Asperger's syndrome, which is a growing problem. Members must send a clear message to the families who are directly affected by the dreadful and, at times, terrifying ordeal of having children or young people with Asperger's syndrome or autism.

During the Assembly debate on autism we agreed that it was vital that all Departments co-ordinate their approach to autism and Asperger's syndrome, which is an autistic spectrum disorder. We were delighted that the Department of Education, at the request of the Minister, set up a task group and a centre for autism sufferers. I am pleased that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has had similar work carried out and that improvements will be made.

Autism and Asperger's syndrome affect the families of sufferers, and it is essential that there be an urgent review, initially by the two Departments continuing the work that they have started, and then incorporating other Departments.

I have been trying to convince the Minister of Education to ring-fence funds for special needs so that children, young people and adults can be given support and practical help appropriate to their situation. I hope that special-needs legislation will be introduced soon so that these changes can be made.

People with Asperger's syndrome are usually highly intelligent but have many problems with social interaction and trouble with at least two of the following: a marked impairment in the use of multiple non-verbal behaviour, such as eye-to-eye gaze, facial expression, body posture and gestures to regulate social interaction; a failure to develop peer relationships appropriate to developmental level; a lack of spontaneous desire to share enjoyment, interests or achievements with other people, which is characterised by a failure to show, bring or point out objects of interest to other people; and, most importantly, a lack of social and emotional interaction.

I am dealing with a child who suffers from Asperger's syndrome, and the whole family of that child must deal with the situation hourly. Sufferers' quality of life is impaired, so we should emphasise to the Executive that they should not be allowed to slip through the net of the system without help, treatment or support. Given the intelligence of those with the syndrome, it is often difficult to detect it during a child's early years, and in the past children have been labelled as disruptive without any attention being paid to the causes of their behaviour. Research must be carried out to find out how best Asperger's syndrome and autism can be detected early and specific treatment given.

Therapy aimed at teaching social and pragmatic skills can remedy many weaknesses. Anxiety leading to significant rigidity can be treated medically. Although it is harder for them, adults with Asperger's syndrome can have relationships, families, and happy and productive lives. Therefore the Assembly must stop the practice of passing such people from education to health; from having a learning disability to having a mental illness. Staff must be trained to deal with the problems adequately. The aim must be the development of a co-ordinated action plan and the provision of proper resources so that patients and their families can have a better chance in life.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the motion, and the opportunity to speak briefly about Asperger's syndrome and autism. I agree with Mr Fee who said that most Members probably know little about Asperger's syndrome and autism. However, the Assembly can raise awareness: it has a duty to do so.

I am heartened by the attendance of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Minister of Education: it sends out a clear message that they both take Asperger's syndrome and autism seriously and that they are committed to providing appropriate services.

Some time ago, the Minister of Education announced to the Assembly the development and opening of a centre of excellence in Armagh. Mr McHugh said the centre would be an all-island facility that would provide expert advice, and the latest research, training, support and development for teachers and parents and for individuals who suffer from the disorder. However, it has been shown that in order for the centre to carry out that work, there needs to be commitment not only from Minister de Brún and Minister McGuinness but also from the Minister for Employment and Learning and from the Minister for Social Development. Ms Lewsley highlighted issues that are the responsibility of the Minister for Social Development and his Department such as disability living allowance. All such issues are interlinked.

Most Members mentioned the task group, which made comprehensive recommendations with regard to interprofessional co-operation, the need to involve parents and the need to improve school and home-based education and therapy. Its report provides a road map for the Assembly's approach to children and young adults who suffer from Asperger's syndrome and other forms of autism. I welcome the task group's report, which supports educational provision for children and young people with autism. I hope that the report's main recommendations will be adopted as soon as possible. There have been several developments, such as the opening of the centre, that suggest to the Assembly that we are on the road to providing key services to people who suffer from the disorder. I suggest that a copy of the Official Report of this debate be passed to those Ministers who are not present, as the issue concerns them. I believe that the Assembly is on the right road and should continue down that road.

Mr Speaker: It has been drawn to my attention that we have a technical difficulty. I understand that the computers that run the annunciator service have frozen. I have seen quite a number of Members coming in during the debate, who may have had an interest in this subject and expected it to be a little later on. They may not have been assisted by the fact that the annunciators are frozen. Colleagues are working on this matter, but, obviously, it is not very helpful at this particular juncture.

The second problem is that relatively few Members indicated a wish to speak at the start of this time-limited, one-hour debate. No less than two Ministers are present. They are referred to in the motion and will, therefore, wish to speak. I appeal to all Members to be as brief as possible. I will try to allow everyone to speak, but I may not be able to, simply because of the difficulties that have arisen. I ask Members to be as understanding as possible.

Rev Robert Coulter: I apologise for not being present, owing to other responsibilities. I also apologise to Mr Fee for missing the beginning of the debate.

It is fair to say that Asperger's syndrome is not as well publicised as autism, so I congratulate Mr Fee for tabling the motion. I welcome the opportunity to debate the topic. It will, I hope, help to raise the condition's profile with the public, statutory bodies and others who may come into contact with those who suffer from it. I have already told the House that I have a personal interest in autism, having a grandson who suffers from it, and I can identify hands-on with Asperger's syndrome.

Experts will debate whether Asperger's syndrome should be classified separately from autism. The task group on autism made it clear that there is a difficulty in differentiating between the two. There are two parts to that problem, namely those who suffer from the condition and the professionals who treat it. A division must be made between the two. For instance, care is taken of young people with autism up to the age of 19, but there is absolutely no provision after that. The problem with the professionals is that very little has been done to prepare for a diagnosis of the condition.

In my meeting with PAPA, the problems in obtaining statistics about the number of people who suffer from Asperger's syndrome were explained to me. The task group report argues that the lack of training for professionals in an organised assessment and diagnostic procedure makes it difficult to obtain data on those who have Asperger's syndrome.

The report speaks of an autism wave hitting services in Northern Ireland. Since 1999, the Southern Education and Library Board has recorded the number of children with Asperger's. The data show that there has been a recorded increase of 158%. That could be due to several factors, including greater awareness. I was interested in a recent report on the BBC programme 'Newsnight', where it was stated that in California, 3,000 new cases of autism are identified each year — a tenfold increase from the 1970s.

PAPA has made it clear that resources are not in place in the Department of Education or in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to deal adequately with the problem. The problem is not simply with Asperger's syndrome, but with all autism conditions. Through the motion, I hope that the two Departments will take the problem seriously. I welcome what has already happened. Working together gives hope to those who suffer from this terrible condition.

Mrs I Robinson: I apologise to Mr Fee for missing his contribution to the debate and congratulate him for bringing the motion to the Assembly Floor.

There are 30,000 diagnosed Asperger's sufferers in the UK. However, diagnosis is very subjective and is based on behavioural patterns rather than on any single test. Some Asperger's sufferers are very successful — they often excel in academia — but are regarded as eccentric, clumsy or absent-minded. They do not like transitions and prefer routine. They fail to respond to non-verbal cues or body language and struggle to make relationships with their peers. Although there is no delay in language developmental milestones, people with Asperger's syndrome may have a different way of using language. They tend to have a good vocabulary but do not appreciate the nuances of language.

They may have decreased social skills, including the avoidance of direct eye contact. Some sufferers can become very successful, with a tendency to immerse themselves in one subject. They often seem rude, but they simply have a different perspective on life and relationships. They become obsessed with complex topics in the fields of music, history or the weather, and they thrive on details that others would regard as obscure or irrelevant.

Their speech can be monotonous, repetitive and lacking in emotion and their conversations tend to revolve around themselves rather than anyone else. Many sufferers have dyslexia or have difficulty in writing. They can appear to have no common sense. In severe cases, sufferers can become depressed or aggressive.

The condition was first described by Hans Asperger, a physician from Vienna, who in the 1940s noticed marked deficiencies in social and communication skills in several young boys with normal intelligence. The condition seemed slightly more common in males, with many children diagnosed between the ages of five and nine.

Treatments vary and no one therapy works for everyone. Ritalin has been tried by some sufferers, but its use is controversial. It is crucial that diagnosis is prompt and early and that it is followed, as quickly as possible, by intervention at home and in school. The number of children diagnosed will continue to rise rapidly, so the planning of future resources must allow for the existence of many more sufferers than we are aware of today.

Training for parents and those working with children with autism spectrum disorders will become increasingly important. Society is ill-equipped to deal with the special educational needs of those children. A task group on autism set up in the Province produced its report earlier this year, after a comprehensive information-gathering process. I am not sure whether, by tabling the motion, Mr Fee wants to start a similar process. That would not be wise; I am not sure that anything new would be revealed. Although Asperger's syndrome undoubtedly falls within the more able end of the autism spectrum, the key components in the management of all autistic children are the same. The task group report gives detailed guidelines on how to proceed. The difficult part will be the implementation of the recommendations, many of which are merely aspirational. The nuts and bolts needed to deliver those goals are crucial. All the best theories in the world are irrelevant until those with the condition and their families can recognise significant improvement in their daily lives. I support the motion.

Dr Adamson: I also apologise for not being present at the start of the debate. I reiterate my support for the motion, which covers the full differential diagnosis of infantile autism, including Asperger's syndrome, idiot savant, developmental dysphasia and dyslexia, and developmental right-hemisphere deficit syndrome. There is no evidence of normal development of particular functions with these conditions, which may involve partial disability. However, with other conditions there is evidence of normal pre-morbid development, for example, disintegrative psychosis, which may involve generalised disability, and childhood schizophrenia, which may involve partial disability.

Mr Speaker, I will not keep the House any longer, because you are more eloquent and well versed in this subject than I am. I support the motion.

12.15 pm

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo bhuíochas leis an Uasal Fee as deis a thabhairt dúinn riachtanais páistí agus aosach le siondróm Asperger a phlé. Thóg Comhaltaí ceisteanna agus ábhair inní tábhachtacha le linn na díospóireachta. Tá mé tiomanta dona chinntiú go mbeidh teacht ag páistí agus ag aosach a bhfuil neamhoird speictream uathachais orthu, lena n-áirítear iad siúd le siondróm Asperger, ar na seirbhísí agus an tacaíocht atá de dhíth orthu. Cuimsíonn seo comhoibriú idir mo Roinnse agus an Roinn Oideachais.

Léiríonn na figiúirí is deireannaí a sholáthraigh iontaobhais sláinte agus seirbhísí sóisialta gur diagnósíodh 400 páiste agus 114 aosach le siondróm Asperger. Tá 159 páiste eile ag fanacht le diagnóis.

I thank Mr Fee for providing the opportunity to discuss the needs of adults and children who have Asperger's syndrome. Members raised several important concerns during the debate.

I am committed to ensuring that children and adults with autistic spectrum disorders, including those with Asperger's syndrome, have access to the necessary support and services. That includes co-operation between my Department and the Department of Education.

Several diagnostic tests for autism can be useful in particular cases. However, the absence of a test which is reliable across the spectrum of autistic disorders has caused professionals to be cautious of introducing universal screening for autism in children. The effects of Asperger's syndrome may become apparent only as children become older or in adulthood. Improving professional awareness of the condition results in earlier diagnosis of the syndrome, which can now be detected in a child's early years. The latest figures from the health and social services trusts show that 400 children and 114 adults have been diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome. A further 159 children await diagnosis.

Professional awareness helps to inform improved service provision; however, the pace of service development has been dictated by the availability of resources. Current service provision is typically met from learning disability and mental health programmes. Some £233 million was spent on those programmes in 2000-01. Although there are as yet no specific services for those with Asperger's syndrome, health and social services boards report the development of generic services for people with autistic spectrum disorders. Examples include Down Lisburn Trust's assessment and diagnostic team for autism, the establishment by Homefirst Trust of an autistic diagnostic team, autism diagnostic services at the Child Development Centre in Lurgan, and a specialist Asperger's clinic run by the child and family psychiatric team.

Community-based child and adolescent mental health services have been developed in each trust in the Southern Board area, and a model of care for children with an autistic spectrum disorder has been developed in the Western Board area, through collaboration with the Western Education and Library Board, PAPA and the Foyle and Sperrin Lakeland Trusts. That is a start, but more work is necessary.

All trusts report that professional awareness is being addressed through training, and the Department is working with PAPA on the development of further training services. Professionals in community and specialist services provide support to parents. My Department funds projects run by PAPA, and I take this opportunity to pay tribute to PAPA's work. Officials from my Department are working with their counterparts, particularly on the implications of the task group report.

In this autism awareness year it is important to pay particular tribute to PAPA's work in raising local awareness of autism in all its forms. The organisation has worked closely with health and social services in securing development and has been particularly successful in achieving the adoption of a special education programme, the treatment and education of autistic and related communication handicapped children (TEACCH), in several trust areas. At the same time, the organisation explores with healthcare professionals how awareness training might be improved.

The motion calls for a comprehensive review of services for people with Asperger's syndrome. That work is being taken forward in the following ways. The report produced by the task group on the education of young people and children with autistic spectrum disorders, launched earlier this year by the Minister of Education, sets a comprehensive agenda for our two Departments to develop services and support for these children.

My Executive Colleague, Martin McGuinness, will say more about that.

I welcome the centre of excellence, which is a significant development. I understand that detailed proposals for that project are being developed, and officials from my Department are involved in that work to ensure that the necessary healthcare support is provided.

After the publication of the task group's report, the Department asked the health and social services boards to assess its implications for health and personal social services, and to quantify the additional resources likely to be needed to develop relevant services. That work is nearing completion and mirrors work undertaken by the education and library boards. There is no doubt that a multi-agency and multi-professional approach is required to meet the holistic needs of people with Asperger's syndrome.

Significantly, the Department's Social Services Inspectorate has commenced an inspection of services for children with disabilities. The inspection will cover children with all types of disability; it will include children who have been hospitalised for three consecutive months and those who live in the community. The inspection team's report is due in spring 2003.

Officials are in discussion with PAPA about the best way in which training for professionals should be implemented. Those discussions will also identify the financial support and any other support that the Department might be able to provide.

Children and adults with Asperger's syndrome should be able to access the services and support required to meet their needs. Since I became the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the development of child and adolescent psychiatric services, learning disability services and mental health services have been high on my priorities for action. Expertise among health and social services professionals in that field is developing, and a range of specialist services are being put in place to meet the identified needs.

I shall continue to highlight the case for the necessary resources and to do all that I can, in conjunction with Executive Colleagues, to ensure that services are available as soon as possible.

The Minister of Education (Mr M McGuinness): I thank John Fee for highlighting the issue of services for children with Asperger's syndrome and for providing Members with the opportunity to discuss recent developments. I was interested to hear several Members articulate what Asperger's syndrome and autism are. The best example that I have witnessed was that of a 10-year-old boy called Kenneth Hall, who visited me at the Assembly. He has written a book in which he explains how autism affects him. I encourage all Members, and everyone who is interested in special educational needs, to read that book. It is a fascinating read; it has only around 100 pages and could be read in two hours, yet it gives a fantastic insight of a child who is affected by the syndrome.

As Minister of Education, I have repeatedly made clear my commitment to special educational needs. I remain committed to the development of high-quality services for children with special needs, their families and their schools. I have placed a strong emphasis on interdepartmental working to effect improvements in that area, not only between my Department and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, but between health and education Departments throughout Ireland and through collaboration with the voluntary sector.

John Fee, Paul Berry and Joe Hendron spoke about the need for a comprehensive review of the services that are available to people with Asperger's syndrome. The Department is undertaking work on educational provision for children with Asperger's syndrome in several ways. The task force on autism, which I launched earlier this year, has produced a comprehensive and hard-hitting report on the education of children and young people with autistic spectrum disorders. The report sets a challenge for those of us in the education and health sectors to work together to improve the diagnosis, assessment and educational provision for children with autism. The task force found that, in the past few years, education, health and social services provisions for children with autistic spectrum disorders have entered a period of rapid improvement.

The report made recommendations for significant improvement in three main areas: access to multi-agency and multi-disciplinary diagnostic and assessment services; training for parents of and people who work with children and young people with autism spectrum disorder (ASD); and school- and home-based educational and therapeutic provision.

My Department is planning a major conference, which will take place in a few weeks, for relevant education and health professionals who are involved in service planning and provision and for parents and representatives of voluntary organisations. That event will provide a focal point for discussion on how best to proceed with the recommendations of the task group's report. Last year, my Department's Education and Training Inspectorate published a survey of pupils with Asperger's syndrome. Rev Robert Coulter mentioned that there is a perceived increase in levels of autism. In many ways we are satisfied that that increase can be explained by improved methods of detection. I have asked that the findings of that survey be considered in the light of the task group's recommendations.

As well as those local developments, my Department has actively engaged in cross-border work to help improve ASD provision. It is significant that my Department and the Department of Education and Science in Dublin are actively involved in the establishment of a centre of excellence for autism which will be located in Middletown, County Armagh. All of us who are interested in this field are excited about what can be done at that centre. Detailed plans for the operation of the centre are under development, and we are trying to get it up and running by the autumn of next year.

The centre will provide diagnostic support and assessment services, training and advice for parents and teachers, an individual learning centre and ASD research and information services. Among other activities, my Department has worked with the voluntary organisation, PAPA, which has been mentioned several times in the debate and with which I met last week, to produce an information video for parents of children with autism as well as an awareness-raising digital versatile disc for teachers in mainstream schools who may be encountering autism for the first time.

Rev Robert Coulter also mentioned the interesting issue of what happens to children with special educational needs when they leave the education system after the age of 19. That affects children other than those with autism or Asperger's syndrome, such as the many others who have special educational needs. I have been conscious of that, and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Minister for Employment and Learning and I met last week with our officials to tackle the matter head on. The three Departments have established a group of officials to deal with the difficulties outstanding.

I am determined that the education and library boards be equipped to deal with the issue and to enable children in the autism spectrum, including those with Asperger's syndrome, to access the educational provision that can best meet their educational needs. Special educational needs remain at the top of my agenda, and I will use my best endeavours to secure the resources that are necessary to develop those important issues.

Mr Speaker: I should like to indicate my appreciation, not only of Members' and Ministers' general conciseness, but in particular of the proposer who volunteered to reduce his own comments to a few brief remarks so that all other Members who wished to speak could do so.

Mr Fee: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I appreciate the fact that the two Ministers were here and gave such comprehensive commentary on what is going on. I should explain to Mrs I Robinson that the motion was originally tabled last October, but Members across the Chamber have accepted the spirit of the motion.

The thrust of the work of the two lead Departments, as well as the other Departments, must centre on three goals: early assessment, early diagnosis and early intervention. Everything must be subordinate to those goals. From what I have heard this morning, I am convinced that the two Ministers are heading in the right direction, and I appreciate that.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls on the Ministers of Education and Health, Social Services and Public Safety to instigate a comprehensive review of the services for people, adults and children with Asperger's syndrome and of the training of professionals specialising in the treatment of such individuals.

The sitting was suspended at 12.30 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr J Wilson] in the Chair) —

ANTI-SECTARIANISM

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will advise Members as to how I propose to conduct the debate, which has been allocated two and a half hours by the Business Committee. Three amendments have been tabled and published on the Marshalled List. Speaking times will be as follows: the proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to wind up; the proposers of each of the amendments will have seven minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up; and all other Members will have five minutes each.

The amendments will be proposed in the order in which they appear on the Marshalled List. When the debate has been concluded, I shall put the question on amendment 1. Whether or not amendment 1 is made, I shall put the question on amendment 2. However, amendment 3 may not be called if either of the other amendments is made. The Speaker's ruling on this matter has been explained to the Business Committee at its lunchtime meeting. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr G Kelly: I beg to move that

In its belief that all sections of our community have the right to exist and all people have the right to live free from violence and intimidation whether at home, at school, or the workplace, this Assembly expresses its sympathy to all those who have been the victims of sectarian murder, violence and intimidation in recent times, and rejects sectarianism and commits itself to providing leadership on this issue in practical ways. That this Assembly also re-affirms its commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means to resolve disputes.

Go raibh maith agat, LeasCheann Comhairle. The motion should have been easy to pass — we kept it simple, to the point, easy to agree and non-controversial. We made every effort to get cross-party support. What does the motion say? It says simply that we express our sympathy to all victims of sectarianism and that all of us reject sectarianism and commit ourselves to practical means to eradicate it. Regardless of our political differences, the motion was designed to be a united and public voice of anti-sectarianism from the Assembly.

The Lord Mayor of Belfast, Belfast City Council, the trade union movement, and the Churches have all spoken out against recent sectarianism, and there is a movement towards anti-sectarianism building momentum, which must continue and grow. It is our turn to show leadership and strengthen the message.

As we all know, sectarianism is not a new phenomenon; it has been with us all our lives. However, in the past two years, the body of it has sat heavily on the so-called interfaces of Belfast, with its stinging tentacles reaching further afield into Larne, Derry and Antrim and to isolated families in all parts of the Six Counties. Sectarianism has been unrelenting in interface areas.

For those who may not know it, life for people in Alliance Avenue, Newington Street or in the Parkside, Clondeboy or Serpentine areas is a living hell. There is a constant expectation of a stone, petrol bomb, bullet or bomb coming through a kitchen or bedroom window. Family homes have rooms which cannot be used — beds are abandoned and kids sleep on camp beds, sofas or chairs in sitting rooms. Back or front doors are never used: nerve tablets are overused.

Sectarianism is the growing nervousness that never leaves: it is the alienating and isolating experience that is hard to comprehend, even if you live just a couple of streets away. It is living with buckets of sand and hose-pipes and not redecorating the house because it is not worth it, and it is the deep anxiety every time your child or your spouse leaves the house.

What has made the problem stand out over the past few years is that it has been concentrated 24 hours a day on the same groups of ordinary families. I have been in their homes and know that others in the Assembly have been there also. The challenge often heard being offered to visitors or observers is to spend some nights living there: “Come and live with me in these homes and see what it is like.”

That challenge is not made by people who wish to be clever or smart alics. It is made because of the frustration felt by the victims of sectarian attacks. No matter how they describe their lives, they feel that others must experience them to understand how bad the situation really is.

In the past two years, six people have been killed by Loyalist attacks — four were Catholics and two were Protestants who were unfortunately mistaken for Catholics. There have been hundreds of gun and bomb attacks and innumerable other sectarian attacks on people and property. There is documented evidence of more than 360 sectarian attacks in a single three-month period. In north Belfast, since the Loyalist Commission’s “no first strike” statement on 15 June, we have seen at least 25 gun attacks, 29 bomb attacks and more than 66 other attacks, including stabbings, petrol bomb attacks and massive damage to property in the Nationalist part of the community.

Churches and schools have been far from immune, with the Holy Cross blockade serving as a dark monument to bigotry. Other Members, Unionist and Loyalist, can supply their own horrific lists. Although I can speak of the consequences and experience of anti-Catholic sectarian attacks only, I am not blind to the suffering of many Protestants over the various walls. The majority of sectarian attacks are against Catholics and Nationalists.

However, the fact that Loyalists carry out the most significant proportion of attacks does not help Protestants who suffer from similar attacks. Therefore, we must make it crystal clear that we are against sectarianism, regardless of where it emanates from and whoever the victim may be.

The debate may turn into a dogfight. I hope that it does not, and it is certainly not the intention of the motion. People are suffering. They are watching this debate, and they want to know whether the Assembly can do anything to help them. A unified, anti-sectarian voice would go some way towards assisting them. Our parties are already meeting in a subgroup to try to find more practical ways to make progress. For example, agreeing a series of cross-community communications would be a practical step. Let us show our leadership today. Let the pro-agreement parties demonstrate their belief in dialogue as a process for resolution. We must lead by example on an issue that we can all support.

I call on the Assembly to support the motion. Go raibh maith agat, LeasCheann Comhairle.

Dr Birnie: I beg to move amendment No 1: In line 4 delete all after “victims of” and insert:

“terrorist murder, violence and intimidation, rejects Republican and Loyalist sectarianism and commits itself to providing leadership on this issue in practical ways. This Assembly re-affirms its commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means and calls upon all parties to actively support and co-operate with the Police Service of Northern Ireland in securing evidence against those involved in violence and in default of their ceasefires.”

The UUP has tabled an amendment to Sinn Féin’s motion because that motion seems to mix pious aspiration with a complete abdication of responsibility on its part. Yes, sectarianism as it has developed in Northern Ireland is an evil. It is wrong that people’s views are warped by brutal prejudice. It is wrong that there is an inability to tolerate difference. Notice that I said “difference”, because it is inevitable that there are differences in a plural society. It is wrong that parts of this city, and indeed the Province, are cut up into a patchwork of zones, between which many fear to move.

However, the Sinn Féin motion falls prey to a fallacy, which is that, in a sense, everyone is to blame, so that therefore no one in particular is to blame. The motion, from Sinn Féin’s point of view, does not face the uncomfortable truth that paramilitaries’ activities have often been major drivers of sectarian tension. Alas, such terrorist groups are still active, and, in many respects, the Loyalist groups are often as bad as, and sometimes worse than, Republican groups. The wording of our amendment tries to reflect that point.

I am not an exponent of some notion of collective or communal guilt. However, in moving the amendment, I recognise that sometimes parts of Unionism — broadly defined — have not met its high ideals, and that they have had a nasty underbelly in their treatment of other sections of the population.

The UUP is certainly not soft on Loyalist paramilitarism. I do not distinguish between those terrorists who are considered to be “our terrorists” and, therefore, by implication, excusable, and other terrorists — “their terrorists” — who are deemed to be inexcusable. They are all simply wrong.

The record has been dismal, and, sadly, it is not yet a history on which the book has been definitively closed. Since 1969, as is well known, almost 3,700 lives have been lost. Of these, about 59% were the responsibility of Republican terrorist groups, and a further 28% died at the hands of Loyalists. There were up to 50,000 injuries, too. If one is to be seriously anti-sectarian then one must call for a halt to all paramilitary activity, and for this to be done in transparent and verifiable ways. For example, there must be an end to the exiling of unfortunate individuals from their homes in Northern Ireland. There must be an end to torture beatings — the so-called punishment beatings. The August 2001 report titled ‘They Shoot Children Don’t They’ by Prof Liam Kennedy says that during the three years 1998 to 2000 there were 636 Loyalist shootings and 496 Republican ones — one fifth and one third of these victims, respectively, were under the age of 20.

The Sinn Féin motion, which we are attempting to amend, concludes weakly by asking the Assembly to reaffirm its commitment to peaceful politics. That is all very well, but is an evasion of responsibility on its part. The Westminster Government have responsibility for applying adequate standards for the maintenance of the rule of law. In this regard, one might contrast and compare Prime Minister Blair’s pliable approach to that of his Spanish counterpart, Mr Aznar, who has recently banned the political apologists of the Basque terrorist grouping, ETA. As we saw last autumn, international public opinion — especially American — has a crucial role in the restraint of terrorism in this part of the world, as in other parts.

Ultimately, Sinn Féin should recognise its own responsibility. Will it, as our amendment suggests, accept that the PSNI has a majority support in public opinion, and is the sole legitimate force to apply the rule of law? Finally, how does the motion, with its various pious exhortations, compare with the recent IRA apology? Will Sinn Féin now be in a position to condemn all deaths inflicted by paramilitaries since 1969, which would be a constructive step towards improving the climate for reducing sectarianism?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I beg to move amendment No 2 standing in my name and the names of my colleagues: In line 2 delete all after “intimidation” and insert:

“this Assembly expresses its sympathy to all the innocent victims of terrorist attack, murder, violence and intimidation, notes the continued participation by all paramilitary groupings in a campaign of violence and street disorder thus confirming the breakdown of their ceasefires and therefore calls upon the community to support the Police Service of Northern Ireland as part of the battle against all types of terrorism and continuing disorder. This Assembly affirms its commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means.”

At the outset it is interesting to note that neither of the Members who have spoken has made an attempt to define the word “sectarianism”, and it is here that we have to come to grips with the motion before the House today. The word “sectarian” comes from the word “sect”. I looked at the Catholic encyclopedia to find out what it had to say officially, as a Church, about this matter.

To the Catholic the distinction between Church and sect presents no difficulty. For him, any Christian denomination that has set itself up independently of his own Church is a sect. According to Catholic teaching, any Christians who banded together and refused to accept the entire doctrine, or acknowledge the supreme authority, of the Catholic Church constitute merely a religious party under human, unauthorised leadership. The Catholic Church alone is that universal society, instituted by Jesus Christ, which has a rightful claim to the allegiance of all men. It is the sole custodian of the complete teaching of Jesus Christ, which must be accepted in its entirety by all mankind. Its members do not constitute a sect, nor will they consent to be known as such. The word “sectarian” was coined in Reformation times to label those opposed to the claims of the Roman Catholic Church.

2.15 pm

When I was being brought up in the Province, Nationalist politicians labelled everything that was Protestant as sectarian. The Orange Institution, Protestant churches, the police, the old House of Commons here, and so on, were labelled as sectarian.

We see the hypocrisy of a party that represents those who have murdered and wrought mayhem through our Province; who, in their bloodlust, have slain men, women and children; and who have also laid their hands on their co-religionists because they associated in any way with Protestant people. Sinn Féin then tells us that this is a simple resolution. Of course it is — because in its interpretation, its members are not sectarian. I have heard them boast in the House that they are not sectarian. We are asked today to give them an excuse — to join with them in an absolutely meaningless resolution.

The word “sectarian” must be defined. I ran into one of the leading Protestant clergymen of the Province the other day. I did not have a confrontation with him; I met him in the British Airways lounge in London. I asked him why clergymen do not tell people what sectarianism is. He said, “Ian, it is a very convenient word; we like it.” We should not be dealing with conveniences in the House; we should be dealing with realities. It is a reality that this word, with which Nationalism and Republicanism has branded Protestantism for a long time and to this day, should be set in its proper context.

I was struck recently by the contents of the report on children. I am sorry that the full report was not made available to us by our information services; part of it was omitted. However, it is interesting to note that when children were asked whether they liked the police, three-year-old Roman Catholic children were more than twice as likely to say that they hated the police as were Protestant children of that age. The seeds that IRA/Sinn Féin has sown are bearing fruit, as it has brought its people up to hate the police. Hence, there is no mention of the police or support for the police in the motion.

The Official Unionist resolution is not strong enough; it should have been far stronger. We must affirm, not reaffirm. What is the use of calling people who say they have already affirmed this resolution? There has been no real affirmation that everyone in the Assembly is committed to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means. The acts of those who proposed the motion and lead the debate today give the lie to that very effectively.

We need only to look at IRA/Sinn Féin's record. It has been updating weapons and bomb techniques in Colombia; exchanging tips with its colleagues in the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) movement; rearming from Russia and Florida; and targeting leading political, judicial, security, forensic and Loyalist figures using updated intelligence files. It has been identified as the major line of inquiry into the break-in at Special Branch headquarters in Castlereagh; has murdered dozens of individuals in Northern Ireland since the signing of the Belfast Agreement; and has been consistent in its role as judge and jury in the community to say who will be beaten, shot, murdered and intimidated. Recently, it has orchestrated terrible violence against the Belfast community. Let us throw out this hypocritical and treacherous motion.

Mr Attwood: I beg to move amendment No 3: In line 3 delete all after "school" to line 6 "in practical ways" and insert:

"in workplaces, in local communities and in political and policing institutions, this Assembly expresses its sympathy for all those who have been murdered in the course of the current conflict, to all those who have been subject to violence and intimidation from whatever source, rejects sectarianism and commits itself to provide leadership on the issue in practical ways, including: support for local efforts to develop opportunities for good relations; by calling on political parties to oppose any words, actions or displays of a sectarian nature; and by emphasising the importance that the police ensure that vulnerable communities are adequately protected and that those who direct or are involved in criminal or sectarian activities are prosecuted."

I will outline the SDLP's two-phased approach to the motion and the amendments. First, if the political leadership of Northern Ireland is to demonstrate its political calibre, it should do more than simply talk; it should take practical steps to confront sectarianism, and it should begin to outline what those steps should be. The SDLP's amendment is the only one that outlines a strategic approach to deal with sectarianism and to see that it is dealt a body blow.

Secondly, the motion and the other amendments are, to a greater or lesser extent, partial or selective in the treatment of sectarianism. The Assembly should be holistic and inclusive in dealing with sectarianism. Whatever sectarianism is, we must pursue, prosecute, penalise and purge it from wherever it resides in society. We should not ignore or forget the fact that that includes the political parties and Members.

However, where there is genuine alienation and dissent, and where people are genuinely distressed or in conflict with the state, we must interpret and understand that dissent and learn from it. That balanced approach, and a ruthless confrontation of sectarianism and an understanding of what is genuinely alienating in our communities, is the prescription to deal with the problem.

The SDLP proposes a three-pronged offensive against sectarianism, part of which has already been put in place at interfaces and through the political institutions. However, it must be upgraded and fast-forwarded.

The first of those three dimensions is security, which requires that the PSNI provide adequate protection and vigorous prosecution of those involved in sectarian tensions and interface violence. It requires mechanisms at locations of tension and disorder so that people in the community, and those working in the institutions of the state who are trying to manage tensions, can deal with them better. It also requires mechanisms, probably put in place by third-party agencies, to ensure that, even though there is mistrust and differences at those interfaces, a third party can maintain communication between the communities.

The second dimension involves a community element, which would include putting mechanisms in place to manage interface and sectarian tensions better. It would also involve the creation of a community mechanism, whereby people can begin to process the issues that have given rise to their worst fears and which fuel sectarian tensions and interface violence. That is a medium-term structured approach to dealing with sectarianism and bad community relations.

The third dimension is the political element, and requires sustained dialogue not only between parties but also between parties and Government in order to understand what is happening on the ground and to begin to develop shared strategies for confronting sectarianism. In the longer term our understanding is upgraded, and economic, social and community strategies are put in place to ensure that all expressions of sectarianism are dealt a body blow.

It is the three-pronged security, community and political strategy that in the immediate, medium and long term can begin to address the issue. However, we still have a long road to travel, and that is evident in some of the content of the motion and the amendments, which are selective and partial. That ill informs this debate and ill informs our community as it struggles with the excesses of sectarianism.

Why are the motion and the amendments partial? It is because, as we might have anticipated, Unionism sees sectarianism arising from features and factors in our society other than from the past nature of the state and the past conduct of agencies of the state. That has caused people to have worst fears rather than best hopes about elements within the state and has seen them experience bad practice and conduct at the hands of the state. If we do not acknowledge that, then we are not acknowledging all of the truth.

Similarly, the Sinn Féin motion is partial because while it condemns intimidation, Sinn Féin refused to condemn the intimidation of PSNI trainees. It condemns threats and disorder, yet Sinn Féin members, in a council chamber in the North in the last 10 days, openly threatened SDLP people who are taking part in district policing partnerships. They asked if the people concerned had spoken to their families about what they were doing, whether they would be carrying firearms, whether they knew that posters of them would appear on lampposts all over Newry and if they knew who was going to pay for the damage caused to their houses while they sat on the district policing partnerships.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member's time is up.

Mr Attwood: When it comes to intimidation, we should all be honest about what we are doing.

Mr Close: If we had a normal society that was based on trust and tolerance, and in which we all worked together in good faith for the benefit of all, such a motion, even as tabled by Sinn Féin, could probably be passed unanimously without debate. Yet, four years after the Good Friday Agreement, we are using such a motion and three partial amendments to demonstrate the lack of trust that exists in the House and, thus, in the wider population. Today we are exposing the tribal divides that exist in Northern Ireland.

Sectarianism is rife. The intolerance that goes with it is part of the daily diet throughout Northern Ireland. Hardly a day passes without some graphic reminder of some group or individual vomiting intolerance upon another. It is indisputable that this intolerance is primarily orchestrated by the bigotry of thugs and gangsters collectively referred to as paramilitary organisations from both Loyalist and Republican factions.

Their quest to gain and maintain control of areas and people through terror is a scourge, which can be used to the potential gain of some who will constantly blame the other side and ignore the faults of their own. If all the elected representatives in the House were genuinely opposed to all violence and to the use or threat of force by others, I do not believe that we would be witnessing the level of intolerance that exists on our streets today. We are supposed to represent the community.

Let us look at the statistics. In 1999-2000 there were 131 shooting incidents. In 2001-02 there were 358. In 1999-2000 there were 66 bombing incidents, and in 2001-02 there were 318. Each and every one of those incidents is an example of bigoted, tribal sectarianism that underpins intolerance.

Four years ago, Members who supported the Good Friday Agreement reaffirmed their opposition to any use or threat of force by others. Is the political leadership in this House so weak that it has no impact upon the society that we are supposed to be leading — or is a blind eye being turned to violence for political reasons? Even worse, are some political parties happy to ride on the back of the terrorist monster and help to feed its insatiable appetite?

2.30 pm

It is not only security statistics that highlight bigoted sectarianism: our cities, towns, villages and estates provide colourful evidence of intolerance. There is the illegal painting of paths, kerbs and roadways with green, white and gold or red, white and blue. There are the illegal murals glorifying murderers on gable walls and depicting some murderous exploit by thugs — inviting the gullible to join illegal organisations. There are the slogans informing us that we are entering Loyalist or Republican estates; the scrawled messages that the police are not acceptable, and the flying of an assortment of flags from every possible post or pole. This is the overt evidence of intolerance and a warning to the "other side" that they are not welcome. The desecration of churches and graveyards and the burning of schools are further examples of sectarianism at its worst.

All so-called paramilitary organisations — be they the UDA, IRA, UFF, Continuity IRA, real-fat IRA or low-fat UDA — are by their nature and existence sectarian, bigoted and intolerant. They exist to instil terror and thus promote their bigoted and sectarian cause.

The motion refers to providing practical leadership on sectarianism. Let us start by supporting the PSNI. Policing cannot work effectively without the support of the entire community. If you are not part of the solution then you are part of the problem. Those who threaten the police or withhold their support from the police or who are seen to be anti-police are demonstrating bigotry in adherence to their political doctrine or intolerance: they are sectarian.

How can one claim to reject sectarianism while at the same time refuse to support a cross-community police service whose raison d'être is to provide effective, good policing throughout the community — the word “hypocrisy” springs to mind.

Another example of political leadership would be to call for the immediate disbandment of all paramilitary organisations.

Mr Roche: Before I address the IRA/Sinn Féin motion I want to reiterate the NIUP's rejection of paramilitary violence. The Republican movement and the so-called Loyalist terror groups are mirror images of each other with a common commitment to criminality, murder and barbarity. Despite those considerations, the NIUP also rejects the motion tabled by the members of IRA/Sinn Féin because it is shot through with gross moral hypocrisy. I say that for four reasons.

First, the motion is being tabled by members of IRA/Sinn Féin, an organisation that is a murder machine that has been responsible for the murder and injury of thousands of people over many decades. Secondly, the active membership of IRA/Sinn Féin is sustained by the driving force of a political sectarianism — a denigration and hatred of fellow citizens because of their religious and political commitments. That is what drives IRA/Sinn Féin. Despite that, the motion asks Members to express sympathy to all those who have been the victims of sectarian murder. It is difficult to conceive of a more blatant example of gross moral hypocrisy.

Thirdly, the motion is being tabled by members of an organisation whose leader is an unqualified apologist for IRA murder. In the ‘Politics of Irish Freedom’ Gerry Adams states without the slightest indication of moral scruple:

“The tactic of armed struggle”, that is, IRA/Sinn Féin terrorism,

“is of primary importance because it provides a vital cutting edge. Without it the issue of Ireland would not even be an issue.”

The Sinn Féin leader's commitment to armed struggle — that is, to IRA bombing and murder — is entirely incompatible with any genuine commitment to what the motion refers to as non-violent and exclusively peaceful and democratic means to resolve disputes.

Fourthly, the motion requiring the Assembly to express its sympathy to all those who have been the victims of sectarian murder is signed by a member of IRA/Sinn Féin who is a convicted murderer. In 1973, Gerry Kelly was convicted, along with Marian and Dolores Price, for planting four bombs in London, two of which exploded, killing one person and wounding 180 others.

Mr G Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Member is wrong. He is absolutely erroneous, and he should not be allowed to continue with the accusations that he is making. It is not the first time that he has made accusations in the House.

Mr McCartney: What did you do?

Mr G Kelly: Are you making a point of order?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. It is the convention in such circumstances to ask Members to clarify their remarks so as to remove the objections to them or to withdraw them. If he or she is not prepared to clarify or withdraw his or her remarks, further action may be unavoidable. I ask the Member to clarify.

Mr Roche: I am quoting directly from the explicit reference to Mr Kelly in Liam Clarke's recent book on Martin McGuinness, and if the Member has any problem with that he has access to the courts.

The UUP amendment fails to grasp the real strategic intent of the IRA/Sinn Féin motion —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member who made the point of order has refuted the allegation. I ask the Member who made the allegation to clarify it again.

Mr Roche: The Member has not refuted the allegation. He may have denied the allegation, but he certainly has not refuted it. You need to make a distinction between a refutation and a denial.

Mr G Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. There has been no charge against me at any time in the past of murder, and I was not convicted of murder. It is erroneous.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I invite Mr Roche to withdraw his earlier remark.

Mr Roche: My remarks are based on a book written by a leading authority on the IRA. This gentleman has denied that, but he certainly has not refuted it, so there is no reason for me to withdraw the remark.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That being so, Mr Roche, I have no option but to take action under Standing Order 60(1) and ask you to withdraw immediately from the Chamber and its precincts for the remainder of today's sitting.

The Member withdrew from the Chamber.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I do not understand your ruling, Sir, and I would like clarification on it. An accusation which has been published and widely circulated and has never been challenged by the Member has been read to the House, but because the Member against whom the allegation was made denies it, you say that the Member who made the allegation must withdraw. Is it the rule of the House that anyone who makes an accusation against any Member, which that Member denies, has to leave the Assembly? Is that the effect of your ruling?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I was in the course of giving my ruling. I referred to guidance that was given by the Speaker on earlier occasions, and I quoted from that ruling verbatim. However, as the Member has questioned that ruling, I will consider what he said and advise him of my ruling later.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is all very well, Sir, for you to say that. However, the sentence has been carried out. You put a Member out of the House for quoting hard evidence from a book that has never been challenged. If that is the sort of ruling we can expect in the House, we cannot expect democracy.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

The Member who was accused refuted the accusation. I stand by my ruling. The sentence has been carried out, and I call Dr David Ervine. Sorry, Mr Ervine.

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Mr Roche, Member for Lagan Valley, referred in certain terms to a Mr Kelly from north Belfast. When pressed, he elaborated upon his source material. If there is a problem with the source material and a successful appeal against it in the courts, the person who used the material may be asked to withdraw at that point — but not until then.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have given my ruling.

Mr Ervine: I have been elevated. It seems that I am now Dr Ervine — among many doctors in this place.

We heard an academic qualification of sectarianism from Dr Paisley. I can only comment on what I understand it to be: namely the degree of brutality and irrational division that exists in this society. It is not a one-sided situation.

We should consider the fact that there are people who hate each other, yet they know not the person whom they hate. That to me seems alien to the human condition, yet we seem to be pretty comfortable with it. Having listened to the debate so far, one would think that sectarianism was happening only today for today, and that it did not lay the foundations of this society, and that we were not all generated in an atmosphere of hate and bitterness.

That was amplified by the amendment proposed by my Colleague, Esmond Birnie, which says that the House “rejects Republican and Loyalist sectarianism”. What does it say about sectarianism in the schools and on the street corners — not just that on interfaces or involving paramilitaries? There is no mention or hint of the sectarianism that is expressed in drawing rooms.

The three amendments seem to suggest that if all the bad people would just go away, Northern Ireland would be a wonderful place.

In fact, the bad people come from the womb of this society. The politics of this society influence the way in which they live their lives — the divisive, hateful politics that guarantee that the politicians will never want a single community, because they benefit so much from a divided one. There is no question that we in this Chamber luxuriate in sectarianism, because there is great merit in, and benefit to be gained from, attacking the other side.

Some people might suggest that the demise of the Alliance Party is a result of its argument that two communities should come together and function as one. Recent electoral performances suggest that the extremists on both sides benefit from the tensions and bitterness of this sectarian, divided society. We have a problem that has not been defined by the motion or the amendments: our people are sectarian.

Since I have been on this earth — and my appearance belies my 49 years — I do not remember anyone, certainly no one in the political arena, trying to deal with sectarianism. All those who have been politicians for a long time — or even a short time — should look at their failure even to address the issue let alone deal with it.

There are places in Northern Ireland where there are few paramilitaries but a great deal of sectarianism. Of course, there are places where there are plenty of paramilitaries and plenty of sectarianism: it would be foolish to refute that. Our communities, which have been led by many in the Chamber, are sectarian, and one could argue that they are encouraged to be so. In many ways drawing-room sectarianism is more insidious and frightening than working-class sectarianism. At working-class level it is brutal, and we see it all the time. However, we can deal with it. Many people in the Chamber come from places where drawing-room sectarianism is at its worst, and they have luxuriated and benefited as society, divided more and more, crashes on the rocks.

Ms Morrice: People have said that the Assembly is out of touch when it comes to responding to sectarian trouble on our streets: we are not. We are deeply concerned about sectarian violence, and we must be deeply involved in the fight against it — a point made by David Ervine.

This debate shows that we are at least starting to face up to sectarianism, and that is why it is important. However, we are disappointed that there are so many variations of wording before the House today. What kind of message does it send to the public? This debate should not be about ownership of the fight against sectarianism — that is very important. It must be about a united front against sectarian bigotry. Through unanimity today we can show that we are ready to move forward together. It is only if we act together that we can truly fight sectarianism.

I recall the debate on the motion on firefighters' pay. The DUP supported the UUP amendment. Sinn Féin and the PUP withdrew their amendments to support the DUP motion amended by the UUP — that is called co-operation.

A Member: It is not the real world.

Ms Morrice: It may not be the real world, but it was the Assembly yesterday. Firefighters' pay is an issue we all believe in. Why can we not do the same thing as regards sectarianism? I accept that perhaps we are not ready to co-operate to the same extent; however, we must move towards that.

We need action, not just fine words. Members should be aware of their responsibilities because just as leadership against sectarianism can calm a situation, inflammatory rhetoric can make divisions more bitter.

Alex Attwood talked about the three phases of dealing with sectarianism. In the short term, we must tackle and control the naked violence that results from sectarianism. However, in the long term, we must also tackle the drawing-room sectarianism that Mr Ervine mentioned. Therefore we propose that politicians adopt a code of conduct for dealing with interface violence; that they commit themselves to that code and do not play the blame game or seek to score points, which makes divisions worse. They must try to meet or to visit all sides in a conflict if they are to get involved.

I agree with Séamus Close that we must have support for the PSNI. If we ask the police to protect people on all sides and contain the violent clashes on our streets, they must have the support of all politicians.

Political dialogue must go beyond scribbled sectarian slogans on walls or megaphone diplomacy using loudhailers and the media. Politicians must get together in a room and look for practical steps that they can take.

The Women's Coalition welcomes the initiative of the Northern Ireland Office Minister, Des Brown, to tackle the problem and to get all parties involved. However, my party recognises that sectarianism will not disappear overnight; it would be unrealistic to expect that. Sectarianism must be challenged on all fronts — in education, the media, community relations, schools and churches, and by politicians.

The recent report produced for Barnardo's by the University of Ulster, which cites three-year-olds who use sectarian language, proves a point that I have not heard mentioned in the debate — the value of integrated education. Where is integrated education in the Assembly's long-term strategy of trying to understand one another? The integrated education model is superb for those reasons, but where is the political support for it? Where are the resources for integrated education?

Advertising campaigns and more support for community workers are required. The work of community workers in interface areas is praised, but why must they scramble for money to get the resources that they need? There have been amazing initiatives that have provided much help, but much more is needed. Experts must be gathered together in a forum so that they can tackle sectarianism together.

The Women's Coalition welcomes Sinn Féin's reaffirmation of its commitment to non-violence and to the resolution of disputes through exclusively peaceful means. However, the motion should go further, and although my party believes that the SDLP's amendment does go further, it does not go far enough.

Mr McCartney: The tabling of the motion by members of IRA/Sinn Féin represents a new height in monumental, gut-wrenching hypocrisy. Mr Adams might like to tell the House what contribution he made against sectarianism when he carried the coffin of a man who murdered nine innocent people in a fish shop. The Minister of Education might like to inform the House of the part that he played in the death of Mr Gillespie at a checkpoint in Derry. Various others could make contributions about the La Mon House Hotel, Kingsmills, the Droppin' Well and countless other atrocities.

The truth is that every party in the Assembly has its own definition of sectarianism, and every party thinks that sectarianism comes from the other side. Therefore, no party has any difficulty in condemning sectarianism, as the various shades of condemnation in the motion and the three amendments demonstrate. The only dispute is about the exact form of words to be used in that condemnation.

The truth is that the Assembly is a cathedral of sectarianism. That is shown in the institutions, the communal designations of Unionist, Nationalist and Other, the d'Hondt principles for the selection of Ministers, and the ritual and dogma of the sectarianism that is practised in the Assembly. The truth is that no one wants to admit that the Assembly is founded on institutionalised sectarianism. No one should be surprised that a political system that is based and built on sectarianism encourages and magnifies that sectarianism throughout society. That is happening on the streets as the relationship between the two communities deteriorates.

The Belfast Agreement has not brought peace. It has not brought reconciliation. It has brought into being institutions that are guaranteed to increase division and community hatred, and to foment the sort of confrontation that is seen on the streets. The public is entitled to be dissatisfied with the efforts of a political class that aggravates a problem and then blames everyone else because things are getting worse. I referred to that yesterday in a question to the Deputy First Minister during Question Time.

Mr Attwood spoke about purging and prosecuting everyone, including parties and Members. What has the SDLP done about Sinn Féin? It has protected Sinn Féin on every occasion that an attempt was made to purge it.

What have the Ulster Unionists done about the PUP? They utilised their votes to have the First Minister — an Ulster Unionist — elected. The truth is that sectarianism is rife and manifest throughout all the institutions of the Assembly.

An American politician was once asked, "What is your position on sin?". He readily replied, "I am agin it."

In a similar way, all parties in the Assembly are piously queuing up to condemn sectarianism.

Mr Ervine, whose usual performance is an amalgam of Martin Luther King, Mother Teresa and the local probation officer, tells us of dreadful sectarianism in the drawing room while the organisation that he fronts is shooting, murdering, beating, exiling and intimidating its own co-religionists. Exactly the same thing is happening among the party and Members of the group represented by that other newfound member of the piety association, Gerry Kelly.

The truth is that the Assembly should be leading the way by purging those representatives in the Assembly who front the paramilitaries, who in turn benefit from the exploitation of the people on the street. That must be our first step.

Mrs Nelis: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the Sinn Féin motion, which simply seeks the support of Members in rejecting sectarianism and committing ourselves to provide leadership in practical ways on that issue. All three amendments seek to avoid the issue by turning the debate on sectarianism — the sickness that has afflicted the north-eastern part of Ireland for hundreds of years — into a debate on whether the RUC, or whatever name it now goes under, is acceptable.

Should we be surprised? Politicians who have refused to acknowledge their part in the sectarian violence of the past years and have abandoned any attempts to address the issue can only seek to hide behind an organisation founded on the sectarian headcount of a Protestant state for a Protestant people and a Protestant paramilitary police force, whose inbuilt allegiance was to uphold that state.

The ethos is still the same. Where else in the world would an assistant chief constable unequivocally state that an illegal organisation, the UDA, is behind the sectarian violence in north Belfast, which resulted in shots and blast bombs being fired from Tiger's Bay at the police and army, and do nothing about it? There were no house searches or arrests, and no UDA leaders were even questioned.

Can you imagine what would happen if the Assistant Chief Constable said that the IRA was responsible for throwing blast bombs at the police? Unionists would be fighting their way to John Reid and the media demanding action, and we would be picking the bodies of Nationalists off the ground.

People looking into the communal disturbances, which are the essence of the motion, may wonder at the utterances from Unionist politicians who, rather than confront sectarianism, are seeking to excuse the violent excesses of their community that Alan McQuillan talked about, and which they euphemistically describe as law-abiding citizenship.

What's new? Religious violence, sectarianism and Unionism are inextricably linked — it has been that way since 1830. If people want to understand the connection, they should read Andrew Boyd's book, 'Holy War in Belfast', which says a great deal about sects and even more about clergymen fermenting sectarianism. He attributes the rise in sectarian violence then as a reaction to the tolerant and liberal alliance between Catholics and Presbyterians in the early 1800s; an alliance that the English and the wealthy landlord class sought to destroy through the vehicles of Orangeism and class conflict.

The Orange Order generated the first religious sectarian riots in Belfast, and it still generates them.

3.00 pm

The essayist Robert Lynd once wrote that all history is but a repetition of the same story, with variations. We can trace the history of sectarianism and violence from the Sandy Row riots in 1835 to Drumcree, the Ardoyne, Tiger's Bay and all the interface violence that has inflicted so much suffering on those communities that have been on the receiving end. Sectarian murder, intimidation, threats and violence, whether against school-children, workers or community leaders, are evils that must be eradicated.

It is sad to see a new generation of Loyalist paramilitaries — many of whom are no more than young people — involved in violent sectarianism that does not even attempt to disguise itself as a political front. Why should people be surprised if the pathological nature of sectarianism, especially in the working-class Unionist population, is worked out against that small Catholic enclave in the Short Strand, Skegoneill or Holy Cross Primary School? It merely carries on the tradition of Harryville, Garvaghy Road and the burning of the little Quinn children in Ballymoney. After all, they are carrying on the tradition of the north Belfast community that spawned the Shankill Butchers. It is not surprising that the majority of sectarian violence takes place in the traditional Unionist strongholds of north and east Belfast, Coleraine and Antrim, which are areas represented by DUP Assemblymen — [Interruption].

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member will resume her seat.

Mr K Robinson: I support the UUP amendment, which seeks to address the democratic view of civic society, namely that sectarianism from any quarter deserves to be rejected. The amendment affords every party and every individual who believes in the democratic process an opportunity to publicly register their rejection of sectarianism. It will also provide Members with an opportunity to expose the blatant hypocrisy of the Sinn Féin motion, which has revealed the party's true agenda, highlighted its failure to grasp the central tenets of democracy and exposed its political bankruptcy. It has shown Sinn Féin's inability to decommission that bunker mentality that leads it to deny that those to whom it is inextricably linked are up to their necks in the orchestration of sectarian violence where and when they want it.

Perhaps the pertinent question is why they want it and, more specifically, why they want it now. Could the scandal of sectarian attacks in Cluan Place literally have provided a convenient smokescreen to divert attention from those embarrassing adventures in Castlereagh, Cuba and Colombia? Could the Sinn Féin/IRA dilemma be so serious that, not content with 200 serious attacks on Orange Halls and with preventing Orange parades passing along major thoroughfares, the only way that it can find to employ its foot soldiers is to engage them in physical attacks on Orangemen and isolated Protestant communities?

Perhaps it is a cynical attempt to divert media attention from the continuing failure of Sinn Féin/IRA to honour its commitment to decommission fully. I am sure that the mover of the motion can offer an insight into that situation. After all, he appears to have been present at more Orange parades than the Grand Master himself.

The continuing Republican pogrom against the elderly and vulnerable residents of the White City, Glenbryn and Twaddell Avenue was suddenly switched, as if by magic, to include the isolated communities of Thistle Court and Cluan Place. Why? Perhaps it was not for the reasons that I have outlined. Perhaps Republican habits die hard and the tactics that led to the expulsion of Protestants from the border areas, the west bank of the Foyle, and Churchill Park, Ballyoran Park and Garvaghy Road in Portadown are too engrained in the Republican psyche.

Perhaps they are not democrats at all, but are merely pursuing their war by other means. That is why they have such difficulty saying that the war is over. Today presents an opportunity for the mover of the motion and his Colleagues to assure the House that they totally and unequivocally reject attacks by Republicans on those besieged communities. They may also avail themselves of the opportunity provided by this debate to call for the immediate and total cessation of those attacks.

At this point I should mention that when a Catholic workman in my East Antrim constituency was murdered by Loyalists I, together with the local community, unreservedly condemned that killing. On President Clinton's second visit to this Building, I referred to that killing to illustrate the need for total decommissioning by all paramilitaries, using the following words:

"Mr President, anyone, anywhere, at any time with access to illegal weapons can commit the sort of murder that was recently perpetrated in my constituency. It must stop!"

Needless to say, President Clinton agreed to work towards the cessation of such acts.

I was under the impression that every Member was pledged to remove such violence from our streets. Sadly, it is obvious that some still cannot decommission that mindset and are willing to pursue the "blame game" approach. They remind me of the alcoholic, whose first step towards salvation is to admit that he has a problem. Until Sinn Féin members admit that they have a problem, they are caught in their straitjacket. They blame the Loyalists, the Unionists, the Orange Order, the RUC and the PSNI. Only last night, they blamed the police ombudsman. It is no wonder that they oppose the installation of closed-circuit television cameras at interface areas, or that existing cameras are subject to sustained attack to put them out of action. Why the sudden reluctance to use the power of the media, after so many successful years of manipulating it? The video cameras and other evidence from the White City and Twaddell Avenue show a very different face of the real Republican approach to sectarian violence, and it is not a pleasant sight.

Moreover, Mr Maskey, whose name is also on the motion, has failed to grasp that the activities of his organisation over the years have led to the perception of the flag which he recently installed in his office as a sectarian symbol rather than the flag of a neighbouring European state.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr K Robinson: It is seen as a shameless symbol of sectarianism after decades of misuse at the hands of Sinn Féin — incidentally, a point which the Republic of Ireland has failed to grasp.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr Gibson: The origin and definition of sectarianism have been stated clearly. Sectarianism is the creation of Roman Catholicism. In Ireland, that was always a stated doctrinal position. Some Members will remember the slogan repeated in this generation: "A Catholic school for Catholic pupils by Catholic teachers". Cardinal Connell got it right. He was stating the sectarian, domineering position that the Church always aspired to hold. That meant that, although it could be lax in its doctrine, it was always intolerant of the legitimate demands of others.

That is the hallmark of sectarianism, and it has been injected into the political life of practically every century of our history. The greatest sectarian position was taken in universities and schools. It was followed, however, by the very serious destroying, disestablishing and dismantling of anything that was considered an obstacle to the Church's domineering position.

That pursuit and that position are being repeated. Violence, intimidation and all other expedients can be accommodated as long as they assist in the pursuit of domination. That is the theological equivalent of those who moved the motion today, a political statement of a theological position. In 1904, "Ourselves alone" was the political equivalent of the theological position of the proposer's church. More recently, the term "Tiocfaidh ár lá" may have been used, but it has the same meaning and domination and is the sectarian equivalent.

Mr Haughey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Gibson: No, I have only a few seconds left.

There are those who try to escape and deny their sectarian heritage. I was amazed to hear some of the statements made here today. Robert McCartney was right to say that the Belfast Agreement is institutionalised sectarianism, and Members must accept that, because it was the wish of many. Advocates of the Belfast Agreement view it as the road to their aspiration of a united Ireland, whether under the slogan “Tiocfaidh ár lá” or “Ourselves alone”, or through another sectarian creation of the church. Perhaps the greatest example of this last occurred just over two decades ago when, on the command of the Sinn Féin/IRA leadership, the hunger strikers committed suicide to order. The church could not allow such sectarian domination to be hijacked and, therefore, it provided the golden cross of absolution.

Institutional sectarianism is a part of their church, but it is also practised in their politics and enunciated in every slogan. Just as, then, I had nothing whatsoever —

Mr J Kelly: Did Patsy Kelly get absolution?

Mr Gibson: The Member should confess his sins to someone else. He will have a long list.

Mr O'Connor: I support the amendment in the name of Alex Attwood. I have some reservations about the motion, which addresses sectarian murder only. I would like to expand its remit to include all murder, because all murder is wrong, regardless of the circumstances in which it occurs. The words “in recent times” also cause me concern. Has a line been drawn in the sand under a time before which murder was acceptable? Murder is wrong, regardless of when it is committed or by whom.

Other Members who spoke mentioned hypocrisy, which has been plentiful. The DUP has attempted to blame the Catholic Church for everything that is wrong with society. Did the Catholic Church make the death threats that stopped Neil Lennon playing at Windsor Park? Sectarianism has been institutionalised since this state's foundation in a Protestant parliament for a Protestant people. Robert McCartney rightly said that the Assembly was founded on sectarianism, but the institutions are seeking to change that.

Mary Nelis was right about the institutionalised sectarianism of the Orange Order. When it realised that Catholics and Presbyterians could unite under the common name of an Irishman, it did what it could to divide and conquer by admitting Presbyterians for the first time.

3.15 pm

I have the greatest respect for Ken Robinson, but his speech disappointed me. He spoke about Twaddell Avenue, the White City area, Glenbryn and other Loyalist communities in north Belfast. Mr Attwood's amendment mentions the protection of vulnerable communities everywhere. Mr K Robinson and I represent the East Antrim constituency, but he has not said one word about Greenisland, Carrickfergus or Larne. There have been hundreds of attacks against Catholic communities in those areas over the past few years. In the 1970s, over 400 Catholic children attended a school in Greenisland, but that school closed in 1992 with only 27 pupils. That is ethnic cleansing. We have seen —

Mr Boyd: What about White City?

Mr O'Connor: I do not represent that area — I am concerned about the area that I represent.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Members should understand that in a debate of this nature it is reasonable to expect some cut and thrust across the Chamber. However, I shall only tolerate that up to a point.

Mr O'Connor: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker — my apologies to the Chair for disregarding that.

Mr Attwood's amendment seeks to protect vulnerable communities. Some of what has been cobbled together to protect vulnerable communities actually benefits those who live in ghettos. For example, the Department for Social Development, through the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, has cobbled together schemes that allow people who live on interfaces to receive £1,500 to support the security of their homes. However, minority communities living in majority areas receive nothing. I would like to see such schemes being extended to everyone to ensure that proper community support is available to all: we have a duty to promote good relations.

We must oppose sectarian displays such as those mentioned in Mr Attwood's amendment. People begin by marking the kerbstones in their colours, be they green, white and orange or red, white and blue. Then flags go up on lamp-posts and murals appear on walls to create a chill factor for the minority living in those communities. The institutions and Departments are reluctant to intervene and remove such symbols of hatred: that must be addressed.

However, the underlying issue is sectarianism. It is a cancer in our society, and it must be rooted out if we are all to move together to a more prosperous and beneficial society.

Mr Foster: After all that has been said today, sincerity may be a big word to consider. I must ask whether the Sinn Féin motion represents a road to Damascus conversion or is merely for the optics. It is difficult to comprehend the mindset of the Republican movement, particularly because it has been associated with so much terrorism over the years and still jumps to the defence of terrorists when the net is closing in on them. Is Sinn Féin involved in mere oratory; making deep noises from the chest sound like important messages from the brain? Take, for instance, the Colombia trio, Castlereagh, and the commemoration activity that occasionally occurs for those who terrorised this community over the past three decades.

Terrorism occurred all over the Province, but I refer to my own constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. When we talk about peace, I must ask if people who live along the border in my constituency had the right to live free from violence and intimidation whether they were at home, school or work. In Fermanagh alone, terrorists who were on a mission to put British citizens out of their homes, farms and businesses murdered 106 people. There was never a cheep about ethnic cleansing then — I wonder what Mrs Nelis has to say about that?

I could read a litany of deaths, but I do not have time to do so. However, can we ever forget the Enniskillen bomb of 8 November 1987? Twelve good people were murdered by the infidels whom members of Sinn Féin would pay tribute to for fighting a war, as they wrongly call it. Let us not forget that after 15 years nobody has been made accountable for the atrocity in Enniskillen. That is shameful and disgracefully hurtful to those in the town who lost their loved ones on that fateful day.

I also feel hurt personally, and I know that the wife and family of my cousin, Charles Johnston, are heartbroken at the murder near St Anne's Cathedral in Belfast in 1981 of a dear husband and father. To this day nothing has been seen or heard of the murdering scum who, for no reason, committed that terrible act against someone who did a decent day's work for a decent day's pay. That family, like many others in the community, never enjoyed a long life together, because terrorism roamed the streets and byways of our country, and murdered and maimed remorselessly.

Sectarianism is still being perpetuated by the continued thrust of Republicanism despite the Belfast Agreement, which committed those who accepted it to recognise Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland so long as the majority so declare through the ballot box. By hoisting the tricolour in the city hall, Alex Maskey further perpetuates sectarianism, and Alex needs to realise that there is equality and parity of esteem within the system, but not of the system. There is but one sovereignty — that of Her Majesty The Queen. There is but one sovereign flag — the Union flag. Alex should try to fulfil the agreement fully, and he should not try to claw back what he and his party have accepted, or said they accepted, in 1998 — or perhaps he is as insincere as this pretentious motion really is.

In my home town of Enniskillen, Sinn Féin, along with the SDLP, is taking down all emblems of Britishness in the town hall. That is sickening. It even extends to removing Somme and British Legion certificates, which is disgraceful. I hope that the motion is genuine, although Sinn Féin has still to convince me, because, on past and present experiences, there is no spectacle as ridiculous as Sinn Féin in one of its periodic fits of morality.

It is common knowledge that Sinn Féin, over the years, has associated itself with those who have burned our towns, doomed Northern Ireland to destruction and murdered our people. It is said that "by their fruits ye shall know them". Why does Sinn Féin not declare its intent to recognise the state of Northern Ireland, as provided for in the agreement? Regrettably, it instead continues to perpetuate division by its continued thrust against this jurisdiction, and hence sectarianism arises. Why can we not all work together peaceably so that all our citizens can enjoy better times ahead?

There are four freedoms that should apply throughout the world. The first is freedom of speech and expression. The second is freedom for everyone to worship God in their own way. The third is freedom from want, and the fourth is freedom from fear. Who wants violence? We should never think about violence or war again, no matter how necessary or justified it may seem. Some say that it is not a crime, but ask the infantry or ask the dead. Ernest Hemingway wrote:

"But in modern war there is nothing sweet nor fitting in your dying. You will die like a dog for no good reason."

All good citizens should speak for Northern Ireland and be good citizens —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member will resume his seat.

Mr Poots: This is an obnoxious motion put forward by IRA/Sinn Féin. It states that it expresses "sympathy to all those who have been the victims of sectarian murder, violence and intimidation in recent times".

That is disgraceful. It is saying that only those who have been murdered and terrorised in recent times should receive sympathy, and should receive it from this source. Sinn Féin wants to forget the past and introduce political amnesia. It is saying that sectarianism is not all right today, but it was all right yesterday. According to Sinn Féin, sectarianism was fine before April 1998, and it was all right to terrorise and to murder up to that date. IRA/Sinn Féin would not want to condemn the La Mon House massacre or those of Bloody Friday, Teebane, Shankill, Claudy, Whitecross or Kingsmills, to name a few, because Sinn Féin was up to its eyeballs in it. There are people sitting in this Chamber who helped to organise, and who were involved to the highest level in setting off, some of those bombs, murdering people simply because they were Protestants. Here they are today, crying crocodile tears about sectarianism and terrorism, after they have terrorised the community to get what they want over the years. That has not just affected Protestants. Roman Catholics have been, and still are being, terrorised by IRA/Sinn Féin.

If people wanted to see what was in the heart of IRA/Sinn Féin today, they had only to listen to the sectarian bile pouring out of Mary Nelis as she made her sectarian speech. Sinn Féin/IRA recommends that the Police Service of Northern Ireland be treated in the same way that the RUC was treated. What happened to the RUC? More than 300 members lost their lives, and almost 10,000 were injured in attacks by the IRA and their cohorts. Sinn Féin tells us that the Police Service of Northern Ireland should be treated in the same way, and in the next breath it tells the Assembly that it is against sectarianism and violence. It is up to its eyeballs in violence right now.

I have obtained some information about how the conflict began in the Short Strand area. The Army and police moved in to make several house searches in Short Strand. Sinn Féin was concerned because weapons were being held in safe houses in that area, and immediately instigated a riot to divert the Army away from its legitimate business. That riot began the sectarian conflict at the Short Strand interface.

Sinn Féin deplores Protestants and says that the Protestant UDA is up to its eyeballs in the conflict. However, it claims that the Roman Catholic IRA has nothing to do with it. I use that term because Sinn Féin introduced the term "Protestant UDA" earlier in the debate. The facts are that of the 22 houses in that east Belfast area that have been vacated, 19 were vacated by Protestant families, and three by Roman Catholic families. All five people shot in that area were Protestant — none were Roman Catholic. Sinn Féin/IRA has been involved in that. It is responsible for starting the sectarian tension in Short Strand and for a great deal of the sectarian tension that exists.

The DUP amendment is best placed to state Northern Ireland's position. The Assembly has not previously affirmed its commitment to non-violent and exclusively peaceful means, and therefore it is not appropriate for Members to reaffirm something that they have not already affirmed.

I encourage everyone to support the DUP motion, and to reject the crocodile tears of Sinn Féin/IRA, which is the most sectarian party in Northern Ireland and in this Chamber.

Mr A Maginness: This has been a disheartening and disappointing debate. The issue of sectarianism goes to the very heart of our political problem, and therefore it is perhaps not surprising that we have had such a disappointing debate. We heard from the DUP that the Catholic Church has stirred up sectarianism, and we heard from Sinn Féin that this is primarily a Unionist problem that stems from Loyalist paramilitaries. Others have cast blame on other sections of the community. The fact is that our society is structurally sectarian. That sectarianism is endemic, and if we were all honest enough we would accept that we all, to some extent, have a degree of sectarianism in our lives.

We must face up to the realities of sectarianism. We must admit that it exists, and, rather than deny it, try to address it. Bob McCartney said that the Assembly represents institutionalised sectarianism. There may be some truth in that. However, if we are to free ourselves of the problems of our society, we must learn to manage that sectarianism in order to transform our society. I hope that the Assembly and the Executive will address sectarianism in a concerted fashion so that we can change this society.

The means for tackling sectarianism are in the agreement and in our hands. We can transform this society by creating a living partnership based on friendship and justice between the two political traditions in our society.

Unfortunately, what we have at present is not true partnership. We have cold co-existence — some might even refer to it as benign apartheid. However, that is unacceptable. We have to build a partnership between both traditions to get out of the quagmire of sectarianism. Our amendment puts forward practical ways of doing that. I welcome the Sinn Féin motion, but I cannot agree with it all because it is selective: it qualifies murder, and it emphasises the recent instances of sectarianism. However, at least it is a step forward for Sinn Féin to now commit itself to non-sectarianism, because, unfortunately, its history as a party is one of extreme sectarianism. The Republican movement became an engine of extreme sectarianism in our society. That is the reality.

If we see an end to the daubing of streets, the misuse of flags, sectarian graffiti and hostile language, then we can go forward and redeem our society. Sectarianism is a disease — a pathology that affects every aspect of our society. Dr Dunlop, the former Moderator of the Presbyterian Church, said that sectarianism was a sick form of communal identification. If we realise that we have more in common with those on the other side of the sectarian divide, then we are taking a step in the right direction. Reconciliation must be the goal of the Assembly. Today, at least, may be a start in examining the problems of sectarianism — bad-tempered and negative though some of the comments have been. Perhaps we have taken a step forward.

Dr Adamson: I welcome the debate as it gives us the opportunity to focus on the root causes of sectarianism in Ireland and to set in context the interface violence in my constituency, East Belfast.

On Saturday 15 June 1991 Portadown District LOL No 1 held a mini-twelfth Orange pageant in commemoration of the drowning of Protestants in the River Bann in November 1641. Portadown bridge, coupled with the contemporary massacre of 17 men, women and children in the parish of Drumcree, has come to epitomise for them all that occurred throughout Ulster in the year of the 1641 rebellion. It was at that time that the sectarian battle lines that have dogged Ulster to this day were drawn.

It is often forgotten today that towards the end of the 18th century Belfast Protestants first promoted the idea of an insular Irish nation to unite all classes and creeds, while fully supporting Catholic emancipation and attempting to revive the ancient music and literature of Ireland. However, after Daniel O'Connell's campaign for a Catholic parliament for a Catholic people, Irish Nationalism became identified with Catholic Nationalism. By the middle of the 19th century, writers of romantic fiction had incorporated the ideal into medieval Gaelic Ireland and fostered the mythology of Gaelic patriotic racialism into a new Gaelic Nationalism.

In 1926, de Valera formed his Fianna Fáil (Warriors of Destiny) party. The Free State Party (Cumann na nGaedheal) lost power to Fianna Fáil in 1932 and changed its name to Fine Gael (Tribe of Gaels) the following year. How many of either party were Gaels in language, culture or ethnic origins is open to discussion. However, de Valera's basic Catholic Nationalism was highlighted by a radio broadcast on St Patrick's Day, 1935, when he said:

"Since the coming of St Patrick... Ireland has been a Christian and a Catholic nation.... She remains a Catholic nation."

According to Conor Cruise O'Brien, this statement demonstrates

"the peculiar nature of Irish nationalism, as it is actually felt, not as it is rhetorically expressed. The nation is felt to be the Gaelic nation, Catholic by religion. Protestants are welcome to join this nation. If they do, they may or may not retain their religious profession, but they become as it were, Catholic by nationality."

There has been a widespread diffusion of the Irish Nationalist mythos, which has progressed from being a political to an intellectual and finally a spiritual ideal. Genuine Loyalist and Unionist fears for their ancient British heritage, for their economic well-being, for their religious freedom and, last but not least, for their fundamental right to self-determination have been dismissed by Nationalist apologists as sectarianism.

Furthermore, the basic failure of the Northern Ireland intelligentsia to promote the Ulster identity has led to an inevitable clash between the two sections of our community. Thus, Ulster Protestants have been left to relive their past instead of using it to build up a normal national consciousness for the present. Derry has been besieged and the Battle of the Boyne fought in Belfast over and over again, with Ulster Catholics still fighting for Ireland. The complete expression of a native Ulster tradition, broader than Irish Protestantism and Catholicism and populist in sentiment, could assist our political development of a new Ulster based on co-operative democracy. That and that alone would allow the consensus in Government necessary to end at last sectarianism in Ireland.

Mr Durkan: Sectarianism is ugly and unacceptable in all its forms. That does not need declension, categorised definition or qualification. In this debate, and using every means at our disposal as an Assembly and at our respective disposals as parties, we should make that unambiguously clear. Sectarianism attacks the vulnerable — vulnerable communities, families, workers and children. Sectarianism does not just hurt its victims; its also corrupts its carriers. We see the corrosive effect of sectarianism in the divisions and tensions in the community. We also see sectarianism in the arrogant strut of paramilitary violence.

This debate has involved some heated exchanges. We must ensure that in our work in the Assembly we respond to the violent divisions that are apparent in our community. We will not do so through pointing the finger in blame at each other, nor by engaging in "whataboutery" in relation to different aspects of sectarianism but in making clear that we repudiate and renounce all aspects and forms of sectarianism.

It is not a matter of trying to use a debate such as this to define sectarianism as belonging predominantly in one end of the political spectrum. It is not a matter of using this debate to say how clear and pure each of us is from sectarianism and that the problem really belongs to someone else. It is not a matter of deciding in this debate or elsewhere that sectarianism is confined to those streets and areas that most graphically suffer from violent sectarianism at the hands of paramilitaries. It is not good enough for people in some areas to smugly decide "Thank God we are not like some of those interface areas in Belfast where people cannot get on."

We must recognise the scale and nature of sectarianism, and of the response needed from political leadership.

I welcome much of the content of the motion and the amendments. I will be supporting the SDLP's amendment, as it gives the most rounded, truly balanced and clear-headed response to sectarianism. The motion and the other amendments are more pointed and partial in different aspects.

Nevertheless, I welcome these declarations that Members are opposed to sectarianism and want to stand against it. That may be new light out of old windows as far as some parties are concerned. When I hear the statements and the renunciation of sectarianism I am tempted to recall the observation of Groucho Marx that he knew Doris Day "before she was a virgin". People cannot bathe publicly in the waters of a new interest in reconciliation while continuing to shower in sectarian attitudes at other levels and on other fronts. Many of us can stoke sectarian sentiment in our own community by how we say and do things. Let all parties ask whether, in some of the things that we have done and said, we have been stoking sectarian sentiment inside our own communities.

Our words and actions can stoke sectarian resentment in other communities as well. Instead of lecturing each other, let us question ourselves and lay down markers and standards that we and our parties can adhere to.

Sectarianism manifests itself in many ways. Not least is the clutter of flags, symbols and ugly, violent graffiti that is passed off as a normal and acceptable expression of community identity and affinity. It is not. We should not allow national flags that mean a unity of different territories to one community, and a unity of different religions to another, to continue to be abused and used as visual aids to sectarianism in the way that parties in this House do.

Mr Attwood: Mary Nelis has shown that she never lets the truth get in the way of her speeches. I will correct her. She said that there had been no searches or arrests in north Belfast, and that is wrong. The figures from January to May show that there were 66 searches in north Belfast — 55 in Loyalist areas and 11 in Nationalist/Republican areas. That search policy is not enough to reassure people about what is going on there, but it is also unhelpful and inaccurate to say that there were no searches and no arrests in north Belfast when the evidence — whatever that may be — flatly contradicts that. The sooner we start to tell the truth, rather than a collection of lies to sell some party-political approach, the better it will be for us all.

It is a similar story with Gerry Kelly, although he made a speech that was markedly dissimilar to that of Mary Nelis. Sinn Féin must reconcile itself to its opposition to “violence and intimidation” as stated in its motion. Even the best speeches will ring hollow until it can reconcile its warm words with what is actually happening in parts of the North, where Republicans are involved in the intimidation of PSNI trainees and of future SDLP and civilian members of district policing partnerships; and until it can demonstrably confirm that it is opposed to that intimidation.

Several others suggested that people should simply support the police. That has not been, and is not now, the approach of the SDLP, even now that it is represented on the Policing Board. The rigorous and correct approach is to acknowledge the police when they get things right, and to criticise and challenge them when they get it wrong. If Unionism in particular would take that perspective in this debate, we might be better informed and better placed to deal with policing and sectarianism.

How does this debate end? It ends with Sinn Féin condemning sectarianism and blaming the Protestant community for it. The DUP condemned sectarianism and blamed the Catholic Church for it. The UUP condemned sectarianism and listed constituencies under threat — all of them were Unionist. As Mark Durkan eloquently pointed out, sectarianism infects all sections of society. Each side is guilty of it, and each side has suffered from it. Combating sectarianism has to begin with an acceptance that none of us, inside or outside the Chamber, can afford to adopt a high moral tone on sectarianism. All of us, to a greater or lesser extent, have contributed to the position that we are now in, and we must all contribute to its undoing.

Mr Morrow: I have listened to much of today’s debate — some of it was good, some bad and parts of it downright bad. I was interested to hear Mark Durkan’s condemnation of paramilitaries. What a pity that he was not as forthright when the Belfast Agreement was signed. It would never have been signed if it had not been propped up by the paramilitaries who are being castigated today for their sectarianism.

Of all that we have heard, however, I suspect that the rant by Mary Nelis will take some beating. I think that she lives in cloud cuckoo land, because she certainly does not live on this planet. Some of the stuff that she comes out with beggars belief. I wonder at times where she is. She belongs to a party that is inextricably linked to the most ruthless killing machine in the whole of the Western world. For 30 years, it has carried out a naked sectarian terrorist campaign in this country. It waged war along the border and drove the Protestants from it. It waged war at La Mon, in Enniskillen, Teebane, Darkley and Warrenpoint; on Bloody Friday, in Omagh, at the Droppin’ Well, on the Shankill, and on police stations, including Newry RUC station; with human bombs, ethnic cleansing, and against civilians working in Army bases.

Yet they sit here today, and some of them would make a powerful stand-in for Worzel Gummidge. They have a pious look on their faces, yet they are at the cutting edge of naked sectarianism that has been waged in this country for 30 years. This debate has been brought about as a result of their hypocrisy. Members on the Benches opposite them realise that they are looking into the face of sectarianism in its most ruthless form. [Interruption]. I can understand why you would not look in the mirror.

Jane Morrice also mentioned the clergy. Will she cast her mind back a few weeks to an incident in Randalstown when a minister led his congregation with the news of the Gospel? How was he treated? He was treated in a most ruthless, sectarian manner; the congregation was taken apart and its instruments smashed into tiny pieces. That was done in the name of Republicanism. What support did he get from those who tell us that, in this ecumenical age, we are all together? One minister phoned him and apologised. Where were the hundreds and thousands of others? What were they doing? I suspect that by their silence they were giving consent to what happened.

The DUP’s amendment contains what is missing in most of the others. Mr Attwood from west Belfast is a member of the Policing Board. I am amazed that he cannot bring himself to state publicly that Members should throw their lot behind the agencies of law and order. He has not said that because it would not be politically expedient for him to do so, and, on occasion, the SDLP want somehow to out-Sinn Féin Sinn Féin. Instead of drawing a definitive line between the two and saying that the SDLP is different, what does it do? It sidles up to Sinn Féin and gives it succour and support when it should be treated as the cast-out of society. Remember what Sinn Féin has been involved in over the years, yet its representatives come to the Chamber as if they were statesmen, as if the past 30 years never happened and was all just a bad dream.

I urge Members, before they cast their votes, to consider what the DUP is trying to achieve. The Assembly has been sectarianised because there has to be a sectarian headcount for every important vote — sectarianism has, in fact, been institutionalised.

Dr Birnie: The SDLP amendment corrects at least some of the flaws in the Sinn Féin motion; the DUP amendment correctly notes that ceasefires have been breached; and in the UUP amendment the word “re-affirms” could be replaced by “affirms”. With regard to the motion, it is not for the Assembly to affirm its commitment to non-violence — that is for the IRA and Loyalist paramilitaries to do. It is Sinn Féin, not the Assembly, that must demonstrate that it truly believes that all sections of the community have the right to live free from violence by encouraging IRA inactivity.

The Assembly does not need to express its sympathy to victims of violence by means of this orchestrated, manipulative and insincere motion. It is the IRA by its terrorism, and Sinn Féin by its continued hypocrisy, who have proven themselves to be institutionally sectarian. To support the motion would be to mock the victims of the troubles since 1969.

The wording of the motion bears striking similarities to the so-called “apology” from the IRA of a few months ago. There is no mention of the security force members who were killed by the IRA and whose deaths were not at that time, or this afternoon, condemned by Sinn Féin. That is one of the most disturbing features of the motion.

With regard to the PSNI, the Sinn Féin president said:

“I think they will be accorded exactly the same treatment the republican movement accorded to the RUC. No more, no less.”

His words stand testimony to the residual sectarian element in Sinn Féin.

I support amendment No 1.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Maskey to respond and to conclude the debate.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First, I want to return to the motion in my name and in Gerry Kelly’s, to make the point that it is in the spirit of sub-priority 2 of section 2.4, entitled ‘Growing as a Community’, in the Programme for Government. The motion was deliberately designed to allow Members to give support and encouragement to the public, to offer some way out of the sectarianism that we face and to help to bring an end to the discrimination, death and destruction which afflict many communities in the North. Therefore, the motion, by its very nature, is not prescriptive or partial, and it is open-ended.

Sinn Féin rejects and opposes all forms of sectarianism — be it murder or whatever — for ever and a day. We oppose sectarianism totally, and we will stand accountable, like any other political party, to the public on that stance. I remind the public that all parties present had the opportunity to propose a motion this week, or at any other time, but none of them saw fit to do that. People can draw their own conclusions from that.

The Sinn Féin motion is designed to have a debate about sectarianism. Although listeners to the debate may find it hard to detect, sectarianism is a problem that transcends Republicanism, policing, and it transcends any one section of our community.

I commend the Deputy First Minister for his contribution, and for his acknowledgement of the issue and of the fact that sectarianism is all-pervasive. It is regrettable that the First Minister and other Members of the Executive have not contributed this afternoon. No one here can say that they have no responsibility or that they have all the answers. We need an inclusive, rational debate on sectarianism in which Members can put their analysis and solutions on the table. Regrettably, I have heard very few solutions this afternoon. All our constituents want answers and solutions. They do not want the finger-pointing which, for the most part, is simply an excuse for those who make those allegations and arguments to do nothing.

It is also clear that there is a need for a forum for all sections of society to participate in and to shape a campaign that will tackle sectarianism in all its forms. If the motion is passed today — and even if it is not passed — it shows that the Assembly can provide that forum. Sinn Féin has an analysis of what may or may not constitute sectarianism. The substance of the amendments today is simply that if Sinn Féin were to support the PSNI, our problems would no longer exist. That is not the simple answer. Unfortunately, if you believe Alan McQuillan’s comments last week — and you do not have to — the bulk of the violence came from Loyalists. That community very strongly supports the police and all their policing structures.

In recent months, the SDLP has not stopped running to the NIO, delegation after delegation, to complain that the PSNI is a part of the problem in so far as it is not giving protection to vulnerable communities. Regrettably, policing is still part of the problem, and that is why we did not include it in our motion. However, we stand ready to debate all forms of sectarianism and all solutions to tackle it, because the people that we all represent deserve and want much better.

Today very few Members made any specific proposals, other than some generalised suggestions such as telephone link-ups, which are being dealt with at implementation group level. Sinn Féin made some of those suggestions during discussions. Many Members spent their time criticising Sinn Féin, and none of them have accepted that they are responsible for any of the attitudes, policies or actions that ferment sectarianism in society. If you are listening to this debate or you were listening to a radio programme at lunchtime, you would be forgiven for thinking, four years after the establishment of the Assembly, "is this the best that they can do?"

We should be debating the strategy that the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was supposed to introduce this year. That strategy ought to lead to a cross-departmental plan to tackle sectarianism and offer solutions to our communities.

It is now September 2002. We are a long way behind schedule in our attempts to deal with one of the biggest scourges of our society — sectarianism — and the death and destruction that it has caused in the streets. Although I commend the Deputy First Minister's contribution, we should be debating a fully thought-out, advanced strategy for solving the problems.

I want to be positive. Despite the negativity that was displayed today, Belfast City Council carried out good work in July when the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister was on holiday. The political leaders and the Departments were not available to tackle the many difficulties that faced communities. I spoke to Loyalist residents in east Belfast, the NIO, the Housing Executive and many other organisations about repairing houses and reinstating tenants. No senior officials were available from any Department.

Despite Belfast City Council's history, local councillors were able to meet in July and organise a rally with the trade union movement, the Churches and the private sector. They agreed to form a working group on sectarianism, which will meet for the first time later this month. Despite what some politicians said today, their party colleagues on Belfast City Council have been working together. They organised a programme of work and sought nominations to the working group. That sends out an encouraging and positive message. Despite difficulties, various analyses and differences of opinion about the origins of the conflict and the causes and definition of sectarianism, councillors did come together. That contrasts with today's debate. I hope that Belfast City Council will be able to demonstrate to the people of Belfast — perhaps for the first time and belatedly — that it is starting to agree on steps to tackle sectarianism.

We will all stand in the spotlight, all stand accused. Today I heard lily-white, halo-laden people deny that they had anything to do with sectarianism and say that it was not their problem. As Mark Durkan and other Members said, sectarianism is all-pervasive and has existed for a long time.

Despite all the nonsense that has been spewed out this afternoon, let us agree that there is a period of relative calm in some areas in Belfast. That is because many people have worked hard behind the scenes to bring a lull to those areas and achieve peace and respect in both the Unionist and Nationalist communities. Those communities deserve better from their political leadership.

If I was not a politician, and I listened to some of the contributions, I would advocate closing the Assembly, because if that is the best that Members can offer, they should not be here. I am delighted that the parties whose Members are here and have offered nothing but negativity and criticism are given much better and more mature leadership in local councils. Sinn Féin rejects the amendments, because they are not a total solution.

Mr Morrow: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Having listened to what Dr Birnie said about his amendment, I propose to withdraw the DUP's amendment. My party will support the UUP's amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That may only be done by leave of the House. It will not be possible to withdraw the amendment if there are dissenting voices. Do I have the leave of the House?

Members: No.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Given that there are dissenting voices, the amendment must be put to the vote.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. During yesterday's debate on firefighters' pay, several amendments were withdrawn without taking a collection of voices in the House.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will look at Hansard, but I understand that it was stated. To be fair, Mr Kennedy, by now we should all know the rule that amendments may only be withdrawn by leave of the House.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. If our amendment is not moved, you cannot do anything. It must be moved.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I understand that it has been moved; you may only withdraw it. However, I will take advice on that.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I led the debate on our amendment. I did not say that I was moving it. I thought that you would ask us in the usual way if we were moving our amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Dr Paisley, I have taken advice, and in all cases we will have to check Hansard. However, I am advised at the Table that the amendment was moved, so it may only be withdrawn by leave of the House.

Question put, That amendment No 1 be made.

The Assembly divided: Ayes 47; Noes 33.

AYES

NOES

Amendment No 1 accordingly agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will now put amendment No 2 standing on the Marshalled List. All those in favour say "aye"; contrary, if any, "no".

No Members responded to either question

[Laughter]

Mr Deputy Speaker: They do not pay me enough for this. The amendment falls.

Amendment No 2 negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

In its belief that all sections of our community have the right to exist and all people have the right to live free from violence and intimidation whether at home, at school, or the workplace, this Assembly expresses its sympathy to all those who have been the victims of terrorist murder, violence and intimidation, rejects Republican and Loyalist sectarianism and commits itself to providing leadership on this issue in practical ways. This Assembly re-affirms its commitment to non-violence and exclusively peaceful and democratic means and calls upon all parties to actively support and co-operate with the Police Service of Northern Ireland in securing evidence against those involved in violence and in default of their ceasefires.

Dr Hendron: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. What happened to amendment No 3?

Mr Deputy Speaker: It was clearly announced in the Chamber at 2.00 pm that if either amendment No 1 or No 2 was made, then amendment No 3 would not be put.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker]

4.15 pm

CONDITION OF A-CLASS ROADS IN WEST TYRONE

Mr Byrne: Before the Assembly rose for summer recess, the Minister for Regional Development presented his Department's 10-year regional transportation strategy (RTS) to the Assembly. I participated in that debate, broadly welcoming the RTS and its many positive aspects, which, if implemented, would improve the transportation infrastructure of Northern Ireland. However, there was insufficient time to address aspects of the RTS relating to the West Tyrone constituency, in particular the upgrading and maintenance of A-class roads.

It is not the purpose of the debate to castigate Roads Service, which has had to make do with limited resources and has completed several worthwhile schemes in the Omagh District Council and Strabane District Council areas designed to calm and relieve traffic congestion. The intention is to discuss flaws in the RTS in relation to West Tyrone's A-class roads, and to contribute to the wider debate on the future of the transportation infrastructure in that part of Northern Ireland.

The issue is important because it raises questions about the Department's commitment to social justice and equality in border constituencies such as West Tyrone, and to balanced sustainable development across Northern Ireland. It also raises issues about the Department's commitment to working with the National Roads Authority in the Irish Republic and the need to achieve a truly integrated transportation network on the island. Therefore, despite its many positive aspects, there have been serious omissions from the RTS, particularly in relation to A-class roads, an issue of concern to many in West Tyrone.

Geographically, West Tyrone is the largest of the constituencies, with a population of over 140,000. In terms of transportation infrastructure, the constituency is totally dependent on roads due to the non-existence of a rail network. It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the condition of roads to the social and economic life of the constituents. West Tyrone is served by the A5, the main arterial route and a designated trans-European network (TEN) route that runs between Ballygawley and Derry and passes through the towns of Omagh, Newtownstewart and Strabane. It also has two further A-class roads; the A32 connecting Omagh to Enniskillen, and the A505 that runs between Omagh and Cookstown.

I welcome the importance attached by the RTS to such TEN routes as the A5, which are essential to European integration, economic prosperity and generating employment. The TEN routes have an important role in ensuring the free movement in the European Union of goods, services and people, which reinforces social and economic cohesion.

I welcome the work currently being carried out on the A5. That includes stage 2 of the Strabane bypass, the Newtownstewart bypass and stage 3 of the Omagh through-pass, which has fallen in the list of priorities since the Chancellor's 1998 initiative and awaits the completion of the remaining statutory procedures before construction can begin.

I am, however, disappointed that the A5 TEN route, although one of the five designated key transport corridors in the RTS, may not get the capital investment necessary to upgrade it to dual carriageway standard. West Tyrone has not a single mile of dual carriageway or motorway. The RTS proposes to widen the A5 only at selected points. Those are merely gestures, and the road between Omagh and Ballygawley remains treacherous. The recognition of the A5 as a key transport corridor in the RTS will remain an illusion if the necessary capital investment is not made to upgrade it.

Currently the A5 is a 7.3-metre-wide single carriageway, and it is inadequate for the volume of traffic it carries. Furthermore, it makes a mockery of the RTS objective of decreasing public transport journey times. That is unacceptable, given the importance of the route to West Tyrone's local economy and the need to facilitate cross-border trade via the N2 in the South. In the common chapter of the Northern Ireland structural funds plan and the Republic's National Development Plan 2000-06, the co-ordination of transport planning and construction is a key area for co-operation. If we are to develop a socially-inclusive economy in Northern Ireland, we must invest in transportation infrastructure which is safe, accessible and integrated on an all-island basis.

Madam Deputy Speaker — I am sorry if I earlier called you Mr Deputy Speaker — in the RTS there is no reference to the A505 and the A32 roads in West Tyrone, and I draw the attention of the House to that. The condition of both roads is unacceptable, since they are the main routes between three major towns. That the RTS contains no proposals for upgrading those routes is a glaring omission. The A32 between Omagh and Enniskillen is frequently used by ambulances, often in emergencies, to take patients to the Erne Hospital's maternity unit. The A505 between Omagh and Cookstown is used by road haulage traffic travelling to the port of Larne.

I do acknowledge the great improvement to the A32 at Dromore with the new inner ring road which was completed last year.

Ignoring those roads is contrary to the principles of balanced regional development across Northern Ireland and the stated objective of the regional development strategy, the RTS's mother document, to achieve a modern, sustainable, safe transportation system which benefits society, the economy and the environment and which actively contributes to social inclusion and to everyone's quality of life.

It is essential that these routes be upgraded, for safety reasons as well as for economic ones. The RTS highlights the fact that Northern Ireland has the highest number of road deaths — more than in any other region of the UK. Both the A505 and the A32 are hazardous in many areas. Their narrowness effectively reduces the maximum speed to around 40 mph. Many road traffic accidents in rural areas can be attributed to that narrowness, and many people have lost their lives unnecessarily or have been injured.

That brings me to the matter of the maintenance backlog of West Tyrone's A-class roads, which received only 9% of the Department for Regional Development's spending on road maintenance during 2001-02. The RTS recognises that it is essential that the roads network receive substantial investment to upgrade key routes and to deal with the massive maintenance backlog, which is particularly acute in rural areas. For example, in the Omagh and Strabane districts the most recent figures, from a survey carried out in 2001, reveal that the maintenance backlog on A-class roads totals almost £8.5 million.

It is totally unacceptable that the amount required to address the maintenance backlog is more than twice the total funding of £4.126 million that has been allocated to major capital works, minor capital works and road maintenance during the same period in those district council areas. That situation cannot continue, and I ask the Minister to take the necessary action to clear up the road maintenance backlog in the Omagh and Strabane District Council areas.

4.30 pm

Successful regional transportation strategies are based on a close relationship between the improvement of transportation infrastructure and economic development. The provision of an accessible transportation infrastructure is a key factor in attracting new inward investment, the siting of new industry and the survival of indigenous firms. Transport costs have a major effect on the profitability of many businesses, especially the food and textile industries, in west Tyrone. Therefore, the uneven development of Northern Ireland's transportation infrastructure increases the economic disadvantages experienced by peripheral border areas.

For many years, my party has expressed its grave concerns about the lack of a co-ordinated and balanced approach to the development of the region's road infrastructure. Unfortunately, those of us who live in rural areas have tolerated inadequate roads for many decades. The historic underinvestment in west Tyrone's road network continues to have a detrimental effect on the area's ability to generate further economic growth and employment.

In 1964, Northern Ireland's Minister of Home Affairs stated that the continuation of the motorway to Derry, and the upgrading of the routes from Omagh to Enniskillen and Omagh to Derry, would be a priority. Of course, aside from piecemeal improvements, that did not happen. Now that we once again have locally elected Ministers and the opportunity to, as the Programme for Government states, "make a difference", it would be a tragedy were we to repeat the mistakes of the past.

The need in my constituency does not stop at road maintenance. West Tyrone needs a transport system, albeit road-based, that is capable of supporting social and economic development.

Mr Hussey: Thank you, Deputy Speaker — to avoid Mr Byrne's problem, I left out the terms "Madam" or "Mr".

Although I support Mr Byrne's comments, I am mindful of the investment that we have seen in west Tyrone, and I thank the Minister for it. We are also aware of proposed future investment. The main tenet of Mr Byrne's Adjournment debate is that, although we welcome that investment, we realise that the bulk of the capital will, necessarily, be spent on one route. I thank Mr Byrne for joining me in highlighting that, as the Minister knows, the A5 should be a dual carriageway. The Minister is well aware of my views on that route, and I appeal to him that, when roadworks are undertaken on the A5, he should consider allowing land purchase to facilitate its dualling when funds become available.

Yesterday, the Minister stated that he is often hindered by the 30 years of democratic and financial deficit that we were plagued with in Northern Ireland. Members appreciate that and the efforts that are being made to overcome it. It is, however, a great pity that Members from Fermanagh and South Tyrone and from Mid Ulster did not stay to hear the debate, because Mr Byrne mentioned factors that will assist their constituencies when we deal with the Omagh to Enniskillen route and the Omagh to Cookstown route. I congratulate Mr Byrne on bringing those routes to the House's attention.

I am a little disappointed that the debate has been limited to a discussion of A-class roads. There are so few of them in West Tyrone, and many of our people use the B-class and C-class routes.

Mr Byrne referred to the maintenance backlog: it is a disgrace to see the state of some of our B-class and C-class roads. I am sure that the Minister is aware of the backlog, and I urge him to listen to what Mr Byrne has said and to hear the pleas of the officials in the western division of the Roads Service. That division is pleading for the tools to do the job. That is the main tenet of the motion, and I support it.

Mr Gibson: I support my Colleagues in bringing pressure to bear on the Department for Regional Development to seriously consider the A5, particularly as it has been designated a trans-European route. I am grateful that the other representatives of West Tyrone have already highlighted the desperate condition of the B-class and C-class roads.

We must bear in mind that the constituency covers a large area: it is over 65 miles long and 49 miles wide. Despite that it has only 55 miles of A-class roads. The other 1,500 miles of road, which represent 95% of the total, are B-class and C-class. In a fortnight, councillors from Strabane and Omagh are joining me to meet the Minister for Regional Development to discuss those roads. This has been a burning issue for many years.

I should like to congratulate the Minister, because for the first time in 30 years the infrastructural deficit and backlog that we suffer in west Tyrone have been recognised. The complaints that I receive in the constituency office refer to the miles of pipe laying that is taking place for the new water mains that are being laid all over the countryside. Many delays are being experienced on the A5 because major road schemes are under construction.

We should recognise that improvements at Magheramason, Bready, Burndenet Bridge, Ballykeel, the Newtownstewart bypass, and the Garvaghy crossroads, as well as the expected Omagh throughpass, are the result of a major infrastructural input. I thank the Minister, because until two and a half years ago, we in Omagh and Strabane lobbied vigorously, but unsuccessfully, for funds. Therefore I recognise that our present Minister is the first to have seriously attacked the infrastructural backlog.

I should also like to thank the Minister and his Department for recognising that the backlog existed and for skewing funds westward. Approximately £850 million will be available over 10 years. However, a significant amount of the money has already been earmarked for many of the major projects I just mentioned.

We must seriously consider improving the A5, because it was designed 40 years ago when the maximum number of axles allowed for a lorry was two and the maximum weight was 18 tons. Nowadays, we struggle to overtake six-axled lorries with 40-ton road weight. At that time, roads were built and engineered to a totally different specification than that required today. Therefore the Minister and his Department face a dilemma as to how to utilise the existing infrastructure. Is a trans-European route to be considered because it is not as costly as a dual carriageway? Throughout the world, the broad four-lane road with two inside crawler lanes used for slower traffic — an old concept — has done away with the massive amount of kerbing. Instead, the reliance is on white lining, directional lines and road signage for road safety. In countries where four-lane roads have been constructed they have proved safe and successful and have increased traffic through-flow by approximately 28%. That is something the Minister and his Department might consider. A four-lane road from Dungannon, with a branch to Enniskillen, to the Maiden City would have to be costed, but would prove to be more cost-effective. The design of the present A5 from Ballygawley to the Maiden City means that about 250 projects would have to be undertaken to improve safety. It would be single carriage each way, which would limit the traffic flow, as it can only proceed at the speed of the slowest vehicle.

It will benefit everyone if we recognise that there is a backlog and that it will take a fair amount of finance to resolve the problem of overworn, dilapidated road systems that we have inherited. The Department has struggled over the past 30 years to maintain those roads, but now the B- and C-class roads are punishing our transport systems. I have been lobbied continuously by the Western Education and Library Board. It is having to change the routes its buses take because it will no longer permit its new fleet to travel some of those B-class roads and all of the C-class roads. The condition of those roads is too sore on the bus system. The private transport sector, which is becoming more involved in the transport of children, has also complained about those roads. My recommendation emanates from those two sources. The construction of a four-lane road, all the way from Dungannon, with one branch to Enniskillen, right through to the Maiden City would cut out many of the major schemes still outstanding. Serious consideration should be given to the suggestion. I thank Joe Byrne for giving us the opportunity to debate this matter.

The deficit was created by 30 years of mayhem and destruction.

We had to replace and compensate; now we are playing catch-up. I am delighted to say that the Minister has made an honourable attempt to give some shape to the future of roads in the west.

4.45 pm

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the debate. I disagree that the problems are attributable to the past 30 years. It is more a matter of 80 years of institutional neglect of that part of County Tyrone, dating back to before the 1920s.

This is a useful opportunity to articulate the urgency of improving and upgrading class-A roads in County Tyrone, particularly in the western division area of the Roads Service. County Tyrone's legacy of underinvestment and the deliberate policy of discrimination practised there have only accentuated its sub-regional peripherality in the North, Ireland as a whole, and Europe. Since the demise of the railways in the 1960s, roads are the sole mode of transportation. This situation places people in the greater north-west at a distinct disadvantage — the debate is more about people than it is about roads. The situation requires commitment from Departments, and from the Department for Regional Development in particular. I acknowledge that the Department has been getting to grips with the road situation in west Tyrone recently. Schemes such as that in Dromore are very positive. Good projects have been carried out, and several are in the pipeline, such as the A32 realignment scheme.

The Minister for Regional Development should look beyond the Assembly for roads funding for the greater north-west, to the European Union, and the Government in the South. He should seek a peace dividend to address our infrastructural deficit. The A5 is a priority requiring major funding to realign the road to accommodate its high usage. It has been identified as part of a major trans-European route that links, for example, citizens in Omagh to Belfast via the A4 and M1, and citizens in Donegal and Derry to Dublin via the A5 and N2. The road carries a great deal of cross-border traffic. I remind the Minister of a question that I asked some months ago, to which he replied. I asked how many miles of dual carriageway there were in County Tyrone.

Funding is required from the Assembly and other political institutions, although I appreciate the financial constraints on the Department. A more holistic approach is needed for the upgrading of the A32, which is the main road from Enniskillen to Omagh, or Omagh to Enniskillen, if someone were so inclined. I appreciate that positive steps have been taken with regard to the Dromore bypass and several realignment schemes. I urge the Minister to dig the channels and make provision for a dual carriageway in the immediate to mid-term future.

The A505 from Omagh to Cookstown is an important route linking the county town of Tyrone with another principal town in Tyrone, and beyond to the M2. The A505 also requires major realignment, not least at an important point known locally as the Seven Sisters.

The cake needs to be made larger in general. I urge the Minister to listen to the combined voices of the councils and the representatives of the people in those areas affected, including Donegal, Omagh, Strabane, Cookstown, Dungannon and Fermanagh.

I wish to make the political point that the Minister should take his seat at the Executive table, because his absence when funds are being distributed is to the detriment of the citizens of west Tyrone.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): At the outset I find myself agreeing with many of the points that Members have made, particularly their calls for improvement to the strategic highways in west Tyrone, just as I would for other parts of Northern Ireland.

There can be no doubt that a modern and effective transport system is the lifeblood of any modern society. For that reason I developed my regional transportation strategy, 2002-2012, covering transportation strategy for the next decade. It proposes significant improvements to our roads, buses, light rail and railway infrastructure, and I was delighted when in July 2002 the House unanimously approved the strategic direction of its underlying principles. I stress “unanimously” because, as we have seen today, it is not always that our decisions in the House are unanimous. The strategy identifies the transportation priorities and the investment needed to provide — your words, Madam Deputy Speaker, because you endorsed them along with the rest of the House when we passed the regional development strategy for Northern Ireland 2002-2012, the mother of the regional transportation strategy. Such a programme will require significantly enhanced investment, yet the strategy is pitched at a level that can be realistically achieved.

However, I do not wish to leave the impression that west Tyrone has, in any way, been neglected for funding for major road schemes in recent years, and I will review some of my Department’s recent achievements in that area. In the last two years we have seen the completion of the £2.1 million scheme to provide overtaking opportunities on the A5 at Leckpatrick; the provision of the A32 Dromore inner link at a cost of almost £1 million; the £800,000 bridge replacement and realignment scheme at Burdennett; and, of course, the £500,000 widening scheme to provide overtaking opportunities on the A5 at Tattykeel, south of Omagh, which has recently been completed.

I also have to say that west Tyrone is faring reasonably well in major road schemes currently under construction, as was shown by the appreciative remarks of some Members. We are at stage 2 of the Strabane bypass, which will provide 2.6 kilometres of single carriageway, at a cost of £4.2 million, to bypass one of the most congested stretches of the A5. There is also the £8 million Newtownstewart bypass, which will provide just under three kilometres of new carriageway. In addition, stage 3 of the Omagh throughpass, which will complete the throughpass of Omagh at a cost of some £5 million, is going through the statutory procedures.

Regarding trunk roads in west Tyrone I am pleased to be able to make three important announcements today. First, I can tell the House that I expect the Newtownstewart bypass to be completed in November 2002, some four months ahead of schedule. This will be a welcome early boost to motorists on the Omagh to Londonderry road, eliminating the considerable delays to traffic currently experienced at that point.

Secondly, I am pleased to advise that all objections to the direction order for stage 3 of the Omagh throughpass have been withdrawn as a result of the Roads Service's negotiations with the objectors. This clears the way for us to proceed with land acquisition and brings us a crucial step nearer to starting this important scheme.

Thirdly, I can announce that in the next financial year the Roads Service proposes to construct a further overtaking opportunity on the A5 by widening the section from Ballygawley roundabout, heading north, to three lanes for a distance of approximately 1.3 kilometres. That will again provide better opportunities for overtaking. That proposal will be assisted by the recently announced investment in road maintenance from the reinvestment and reform initiative.

Despite the number of schemes recently finished or in progress in west Tyrone, I assure the House that major work schemes are chosen on an impartial and objective basis with the aim of benefiting Northern Ireland as a whole.

Although a major road scheme on a strategic route may be located in one county or one district council area, the scheme's purpose is to improve access to locations along the entire route. Mr Hussey made that point to some extent when he stated that he wished that Members from Mid Ulster and Fermanagh and South Tyrone had attended the debate. He recognised that what happens in west Tyrone can affect adjoining constituencies. Equally, what happens in adjoining constituencies can be to the benefit of west Tyrone. There is a recognition that the purpose of the scheme is also to improve access to other locations. For example, the £2.2 million scheme to improve the A4 at Eglisish and Cabragh on the main Belfast to Omagh road will also benefit West Tyrone. For this reason it is sometimes misleading to compare spending on major road schemes on a constituency or district basis.

I advise the Member for West Tyrone, Mr Byrne, who is happily smiling at present, not to refer to "only" 9% of the maintenance budget's being spent in West Tyrone when any of his Colleagues from other constituencies are around. If he multiplies 9% by the 18 constituencies in Northern Ireland, he will see that West Tyrone is probably receiving over 50% more than the average would permit. The figure is based on the principle that is adopted fairly by my Department: money goes where the need is. I hope that the Member will recognise that the 9% he mentioned in somewhat derisory terms is recognition that even though West Tyrone contains approximately 5.4% of the total population —

Mr Byrne: Will the Member give way?

Mr P Robinson: I will, though I know what Mr Byrne is going to say. I will let him have the opportunity to put it on record. Although West Tyrone contains only 5.4% of the total population, it is getting about 50% more than that for spending on maintenance.

Mr Byrne: The Minister will accept — and other Members have made reference to this — that West Tyrone is the biggest constituency geographically.

Mr P Robinson: That is one of several factors. If we want to add a few more to the debate, one of the key issues that my Department must consider is the amount of use on any road. That was one of the factors that militated against the west of the Bann generally. It was one of the key reasons for not simply extrapolating over the next 10 years the amount of money that we would put into our regional transport strategy and for determining, even from the draft, that I would have to lift that up. Only by lifting that bar considerably higher was it going to have the spread right across the Province that West Tyrone and the other constituencies west of the Bann deserved.

In addition to the major road schemes over the past few years, the Roads Service has invested a similar amount on minor road improvement schemes across Northern Ireland. The resources available for minor capital schemes are allocated to the four Roads Service divisions and, in turn, apportioned across district council areas on a needs-based priority approach using indicators such as population, weighted road lengths and the number of accidents. As far as possible, that ensures an equitable distribution of funds across the country, and I am satisfied that West Tyrone has received an equitable share of those resources.

Mr Hussey spoke of the feeling among western division staff that if they were given the tools, they could do the job.

5.00 pm

I have no doubt that the confidence would be well placed in my colleagues in the western division. Equally, there would be those in the Department for Regional Development who would ask the Assembly for the tools to do the job. We are willing to do all the work required across the Province, but we need the resources to do that. If the Assembly gives unanimous approval to the regional transportation strategy and backs it up with the necessary financial support, the western division will show that it, and the other divisions, will do the job if they are given the tools.

The improvements to the A32 at Lettergesh were completed in May this year at a cost of over a quarter of a million pounds. In addition, the result of the reform and reinvestment initiative bids announced before the holidays in July will give an additional £20 million over the next two years for structural maintenance improvements on the regional strategic transportation network. The Roads Service has already programmed schemes for west Tyrone using those additional resources. They include improvements to the A32 at Clanabogan near Omagh — I hope that I pronounced that correctly for the hon Gentleman — starting in October 2002 and costing £220,000; improvements to the A32 at Lisdoo between Dromore and Irvinestown starting in November 2002 and costing £495,000; and improvements to the A5 at Melmount Road, Strabane starting next year and costing £220,000.

Mr Byrne argued that the regional transportation strategy should have proposed a dual carriageway for the A5, or parts of it, rather than bypasses and overtaking opportunity schemes. Any investment must make economic sense, and the significant capital cost of a dual carriageway must be offset by time savings and other benefits for the traffic-using public. Experience shows that on inter-urban roads the minimum traffic volume that normally justifies the provision of a dual carriageway is about 11,000 vehicles a day. The typical traffic on the inter-urban sections of the A5 is just over 9,000 vehicles a day, and at times that stretches to 11,000 vehicles a day. That barely reaches the minimum threshold where the provision of a dual carriageway could be economically justified.

Mr Hussey: Will the Member give way?

Mr P Robinson: The Member may want to hear my next sentence. The schemes shown in the regional transportation strategy were for illustrative purposes and to give some idea of what might be delivered by the additional £375 million envisaged for strategic highway improvements across Northern Ireland in the 10-year period. The illustrative map shows several improvements relevant to County Tyrone on top of the schemes already in the programme. Therefore the Member cannot say that there would not be a change to the illustrative case if he had an argument that convinced the Roads Service.

Mr Hussey: I thank the Minister for giving way. I understand the objective figures he is working with. However, as my Colleagues and I travel to and from Belfast from the western area we are aware of the subjective nature of the traffic encountered. We are dealing with rural and slow-moving traffic, and an economy that is totally dependent on roads. Mr Gibson pointed out that a considerable number of large commercial vehicles use that road and slow down the travel time.

Mr P Robinson: I have given the Member an opportunity to make his point. My officials, who will ultimately make recommendations to me on these matters, have heard the case. Mr Hussey does not have an argument with me, or my Department, about the need for road improvements. If I had not put the illustrative map into the regional transportation strategy, many Members would be asking whether that meant that schemes would go ahead in their areas. We have tried to give some indication of what can be done were £375 million to become available in the way that we have outlined.

I also pointed out that the illustrative map showed several improvements for County Tyrone as a whole, on top of the schemes that are already in the programme, such as selective widening. That scheme will provide further overtaking opportunities on several stretches of the A5, as well as the dualling of the Dungannon to Ballygawley road.

The schemes to be delivered under the regional transportation strategy have yet to be finalised, and will be progressed through three transport plans. Of those, two are relevant to west Tyrone. The regional strategic transport network plan will determine a programme of initiatives that includes strategic highway schemes, and the sub-regional transport plan will do the same for the non-trunk network. The third plan covers the Belfast metropolitan area.

I can assure Members that, in preparing the regional strategic transport network plan, my officials will consult the Committee for Regional Development and elected representatives, and will screen all single carriageway roads on the trunk network to identify those that would benefit most from dualling.

It is only fair to make it clear that the funding for road schemes, or any other element of the regional transportation strategy, is not unlimited. I have already proposed significant increased investment over the 10-year period of an additional £1.37 billion. If it is determined on the basis of analysis and other considerations that any particular route should be improved over and above the illustrative proposals in the regional transportation strategy, it stands to reason that other schemes in the illustrative proposal would have to be withdrawn, or additional funds would have to be found. That is the difficult balance that my officials and I will have to strike.

The single most critical factor in delivering the regional transportation strategy, whether it is for strategic highway improvements, or for better bus services or railways, will be the availability of the significantly increased levels of investment. Therefore I welcome Members' support for the strategy, and for individual schemes. I hope that that strong support across the House will result in my Department's being allocated the necessary funding increase in future Budget rounds, whether from normal public expenditure, the reinvestment and reform initiative, or the underwriting of payments related to public-private partnerships. I trust that the investments that I have mentioned for the road network in west Tyrone illustrate my Department's ongoing commitment to that area in particular, and that the regional transportation strategy, if fully funded, is the way forward for Northern Ireland in general.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 16 September 2002

The Assembly met at noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ASSEMBLY BUSINESS

Withdrawal of Statement by Mr Roche

Mr Speaker: Mr Roche has requested, and has been granted, an opportunity to withdraw a remark that he made during the anti-sectarianism debate on Tuesday 10 September 2002.

Mr Roche: In the debate on 10 September I referred to a named Member as a “convicted murderer”. I now know that that statement was incorrect, and I withdraw the statement.

Mr Speaker: I think that the statement referred to Mr Gerry Kelly. I ask Mr Kelly whether he wishes to accept the withdrawal.

Mr G Kelly: I welcome the fact that the remark has been withdrawn. It is not the first time that Unionists have abused privilege. In the scheme of things, and considering the speed at which some Unionists are moving forward regarding dialogue, perhaps this is a small step forward.

Mr Speaker: A good precedent has been established by other Members that, when a Member discovers that something that was said was incorrect, it is withdrawn on the Floor of the House. That is a good and proper way to behave.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

First Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 4/02] to make provision for and in connection with a new social security benefit called state pension credit; and to amend section 43(1) of the Pension Schemes (Northern Ireland) Act 1993.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS BILL

Consideration Stage

Clauses 1 to 16 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

OPEN-ENDED INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

Consideration Stage

Clauses 1 to 5 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Open-Ended Investment Companies Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

CHILDREN (LEAVING CARE) BILL

Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List, which details the order for consideration. There are two groups of amendments for debate. The first group contains only one amendment, which is amendment No 1. The second group comprises the Committee's opposition to clause 6 and amendment No 2 and amendment No 3, which are consequential to the opposition to clause 6. The amendments, therefore, will be called only if the Assembly agrees that clause 6 should not stand part of the Bill. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, and there is no objection, we shall proceed. I propose to call clauses en bloc, to which there has been no signified objection.

Clauses 1 to 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Representations)

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 8, line 38, leave out "(if any)".

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety scrutinised the Children (Leaving Care) Bill during every Stage of the Bill. The Committee's report details the scrutiny of the Bill. We took evidence from a wide range of key groups that work with young people leaving care. Clause 5 deals with representations made under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. It establishes arrangements for dealing with complaints about services provided under the Order. Each health and social services trust will be required to have procedures in place to hear complaints from young people who qualify for support arrangements under the Bill about the way in which the trust carries out its functions under Part IV of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. The Committee welcomed that requirement. It is a positive and much needed step that will give young people a stronger voice in their affairs.

Members recommended one minor amendment, which was that the phrase "(if any)" should be removed from clause 5. That amendment would give the Department authority to make Regulations under article 34 of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. It was agreed that the phrase was unnecessary.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Éilíonn alt 5 go mbunódh iontaobhais sláinte agus seirbhísí sóisialta nósanna imeachta oiriúnacha le hionadaíocht agus gearáin a mheas maidir le hurscaoileadh a bhfeidhmeanna faoi alt 2 agus alt 4 den Bhille.

Beidh mionsonraí na nósanna imeachta ionadaíochta agus gearán leagtha amach i rialacháin arna ndéanamh ag mo Roinn. Níl aon deacracht agam dá bhrí sin glacadh leis an leasú seo.

Clause 5 requires health and social services trusts to establish suitable procedures to consider representations and complaints about the discharge of their functions under clauses 2 and 4 of the Bill. The detail of those procedures will be set out in the Regulations made by my Department. Therefore, I accept the amendment.

Dr Hendron: I am happy with the Minister's comments.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I wish to speak on the amendment.

Mr Speaker: I received no indication that the Member wished to speak on the matter. We have listened to the Minister's response, and the Chairperson has wound up the debate.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: That is all right.

Mr Speaker: However, if the Member wishes to speak in the second debate, I shall make a note of his name.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I shall indicate my wish to speak at the appropriate time.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (Exclusion from benefits)

Mr Speaker: Amendments 2 and 3 are consequential on clause 6 not standing part of the Bill. Several Members have indicated that they wish to speak on their opposition to clause 6, and on the amendments. Therefore, we shall debate those matters together.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In clause 9, page 10, line 14, leave out subsection (3). — [The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron).]

No 3: In clause 9, page 10, line 16, leave out "or subsection (3)". — [The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron).]

Dr Hendron: Clause 6 will remove entitlement to jobseeker's allowance, income support and housing benefit from care leavers who have not yet reached the age of 18. The intention is that the resources currently deployed by providing such benefits for that group be transferred from the Department for Social Development to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

The transferred resources would be used by health trusts to provide support for 16- to 17-year-old care leavers. Around 220 young people are likely to be affected. The clause will place a duty on health trusts to act in place of the parent to safeguard and promote the welfare of young people by providing financial assistance, as well as by giving advice and support. The cost, although difficult to gauge, may be around £1 million to £2 million a year.

The Committee took evidence from leading voluntary bodies, and from health and social service trusts, both of which have direct daily involvement with young people aged 16 and 17 who have to leave care. Many witnesses registered serious concern about the policy and the likely impact of clause 6 on the young people who will be affected by having their right to jobseeker's allowance, income support and housing benefit removed.

Barnardo's stated that

"Access to benefits is a fundamental right for 16 and 17 year olds."

To remove that right will stigmatise those young people. It will make them different from their peers by denying them the same access to benefits.

The Housing Rights Service was also concerned that the blanket removal of the right of young people to claim benefits could impact negatively on those who have become estranged from social services and depend on financial support.

Organisations such as the Children's Law Centre and the trade union NIPSA echoed those sentiments. They also stated that the proposed financial arrangements would change the ethos of the relationship between the young people and the trusts' social workers.

Some trusts registered their concern about the impact of clause 6 on the relationship established between the young person and his or her social worker.

They said that young people would become dependent on their social worker or personal adviser for financial help, as well as for advice and support. Witnesses said that that might impose extra stress and pressure on that relationship.

The Family Bar Association asked whether financial penalties would be imposed should the young person not co-operate with the needs assessment. It suggested that the level of control being passed to trusts under the new financial arrangements might raise human rights issues. In fact, several bodies raised that point.

Witnesses queried the consistency of the delivery of financial packages across different trusts, each of which would have a degree of freedom in developing specific support arrangements. Many organisations referred to their unhappy experiences of finding that sufficient funding had not been made available to fully support new statutory responsibilities under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. An important point is that the Order has been around for a few years, and there have been problems in financing its provisions.

Moreover, there was concern that, in moving from a needs-based social security system to a cash-limited social services system, budget considerations rather than individual need could become the basis for decision-making. Trusts would be made responsible for an area of work in which the expertise lies with the Social Security Agency. They would need to create a new administrative framework to manage the extra duties.

We do not doubt that the objective behind clause 6 is well meant. However, the young people involved have already lost the security and sense of belonging that being raised in a stable home environment brings to their peers. They already feel different and stigmatised, and clause 6 increases that feeling. To remove the clause from the Bill will leave 16- to 17-year-old children who leave care in the same position as regards their entitlement to social security benefits such as jobseeker's allowance, income support, and housing benefit as any other 16- to 17-year-old young person who leaves the family home. Except for some changes to avoid duplication of financial responsibility between the Department for Social Development and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the other provisions for young people leaving care will remain.

There is much good in the Children (Leaving Care) Bill, and I commend the Minister and her officials for introducing this important legislation. Witnesses who submitted evidence to the Committee eloquently argued for or against clause 6. However, having carefully considered the arguments, the Committee decided on balance, last June, to recommend opposition to clause 6. The decision was strengthened by the absence of a cast-iron guarantee from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that all resources transferred from the Department for Social Development would be defrayed exclusively for the support of care leavers — and that is a key point.

Members were acutely aware of the legacy of historical underinvestment in family and childcare services, especially during the Committee's inquiry into residential and secure accommodation.

Since June, the Committee has continued to think long and hard about clause 6. Some Members have voiced worries that opposition to clause 6 may have an unwanted adverse impact on the financial position of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, as well as on the Northern Ireland block grant, if parity with England, Scotland and Wales were affected.

Clause 6 is important, and the Committee has taken great pride in making the best decision, which is in the best interests of those young people who are affected by the Bill. On 11 September 2002, the Committee agreed by a majority vote to continue to oppose clause 6: the Committee is divided. The ongoing consideration and divergence of views on the Bill reflects the hard work that all Committee members have continued to put in to determine the best course of action on the clause and the Bill.

A key word in this matter is “mandatory”. I understand the arguments for retaining clause 6, and we have had discussions with senior officials from the Department. We have put this point strongly to officials, and have asked them whether they can give a guarantee. I understand that money has been ring-fenced under the English legislation. Bearing in mind the difficulties that were encountered in financing parts of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, and the stigma effect, which is also important, the Committee asked several times whether the Department could guarantee that funding that is to be transferred from the Department for Social Development to boards and trusts would benefit young people. The Committee did not get that guarantee. The word “mandatory” would have been key, had it been used. I wait with interest to hear what the Minister says.

Mrs I Robinson: I shall try not to be repetitive. I welcome the Bill’s aims and objectives. However, it has caused the Health Committee many headaches. At its meeting on 11 September 2002, the Committee was divided on how it should proceed. Had other Committee members attended that meeting, the decision might have been different. The vote was four to three in favour of removing clause 6.

Before the recess, the Committee was inclined to oppose the inclusion of clause 6 in the Bill. It was concerned that clause 6 would remove the right of care leavers to social security benefits. It was suggested that a single financial package might simplify care leavers’ management of their affairs. The Committee was concerned that no guarantee was forthcoming from the Department that resources transferred from the Department for Social Development would be used exclusively for those leaving care.

However, my views and those of my Colleagues have changed since then. I am now absolutely convinced that clause 6 should be retained, mainly due to its financial implications. Without clause 6, funding that is required for care leavers might have to come from the devolved health budget. There are already an extraordinary number of worthy issues that make compelling demands for their portion of precious health funding. Therefore, we are in no position to be extravagant.

Traditionally, there has been parity between the social security systems in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Since power was devolved in 1999, social security legislation in Northern Ireland has proceeded in step with Westminster. I fear that clause 6 will divorce the Province from Great Britain on social security, and will bring parity to an end. I hope that Colleagues — especially in the Ulster Unionist Party — will see the significance of retaining parity with the rest of the United Kingdom.

Without parity, there would be no transfer of social security funding. That would result in money having to come from the Northern Ireland Executive’s Budget. Who would suffer then? If the Health Department had to make up the shortfall, that would involve money that would otherwise have been spent on reducing waiting lists, purchasing medical equipment or boosting staffing levels. I am unsure as to how much money would be involved, but, presumably, it would pay for several heart operations or would provide extra acute beds for the Province.

Furthermore, the system in England and Wales has been working effectively. Why, when its health budget is so limited, would the Assembly choose to pay for something that would otherwise be funded through the Treasury?

Obviously, there are other advantages in retaining clause 6. For example, continuity of responsibility for those young people is desirable. To drop clause 6 would be to risk those vulnerable individuals losing contact with their trusts. There is a responsibility on trusts to ensure that care leavers receive their support swiftly and in its entirety. The money must pass down smoothly to young people. That must be a priority. Those individuals are in need; money for them must not be delayed or swallowed up by other projects. The Health Committee was united on that issue. I support the retention of clause 6 in the Bill.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As other Members have said, the Committee considered the Bill in great depth, gathering both written and oral evidence. One of the main issues that jumped out at us was clause 6. A sizeable amount of evidence came from children’s organisations, including organisations that work directly with children in care and children on the verge of leaving care.

Clause 6 gave the Committee — and me — the greatest concerns. Like the Chairperson, I thank the officials, both from the Committee and from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, for their work in trying to find common ground on clause 6. It is unfortunate that no agreement could be reached, but I place my thanks on record. The Committee has seen more of its officials during the consideration of this Bill than of any other.

Clause 6 will remove the entitlement to jobseeker’s allowance, income support and housing benefit from care leavers who have not yet reached the age of 18. In an ideal society, young people should not be leaving care to go straight on to benefits. That is an issue that must be examined. That is what is happening to a percentage of young people, some of whom leave care with few or no educational qualifications.

The Committee took evidence from leading voluntary and community representatives, and also from trusts, which have a daily direct involvement with young people. Barnardo's said that access to benefits was a fundamental right for 16- and 17-year-olds. To remove that right will stigmatise those young people. It makes them different to their peers by denying them the same access to benefits. Trusts also had their own concerns. I was struck by the concern that clause 6 would harm the relationship between social workers and young people by changing the nature of that relationship.

I understand and accept that people are entitled to change their minds, but, based on the evidence at the time, the Committee accepted that it would vote against accepting clause 6. [Interruption].

If I am allowed to continue, I shall explain that.

The Committee published a report, which I read carefully at the weekend. However, I am conscious that Committees can receive evidence after reports have been signed off. I am aware that some Committee members, based on the arguments that they have received, have pulled back. I accept that. It shows that, as a Committee, sometimes we may agree as a whole, and sometimes we may not. However, the majority of the Committee agreed and voted that the Committee would still support the removal of clause 6 from the Bill.

I am not for one minute going to speak for the Ulster Unionist Committee members. I am sure that they will tell us how they are going to vote. However, last Wednesday, the majority of the Committee agreed to vote against the inclusion of clause 6 in the Bill. That decision was based not on the benefits issue, but on the stigmatisation that young people will face should their right to benefit be removed, and on other issues that were highlighted to the Committee by leading children's organisations. Therefore, I support the opposition to clause 6.

Ms McWilliams: One reason why I support the removal of clause 6 from the Bill is a commendation of the Department for Social Development and a criticism of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. That might interest some Members who had thought not to support the removal of the clause.

In this country social security payments are still paid swiftly and fully. There would be no guarantee that that would continue to be the case if those changes were implemented.

12.30 pm

Last week, the Minister for Social Development introduced some good new legislation that extended disability benefits in Northern Ireland, especially disability living allowances for people aged over 65. The Minister regularly introduces new legislation regarding benefits that focuses on inclusion rather than exclusion. This Bill is rare in that its subtext is the exclusion from entitlement to benefits of one of the most vulnerable groups in society. I am concerned that if the amendment is not agreed to, Members will tell the House about the many young people in their constituencies who receive benefits and who do not know where their social worker is or to which health trust they belong. That is the message coming from young people in care. We must support the amendment and delete clause 6, not only to avoid stacking up enormous social problems for young people and help-providers but to avoid funding difficulties.

Iris Robinson argued that the money must come out of the block grant; that is correct. However, one way or another, it will come out of the block grant. It will come out of either the social security budget or the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's budget. I would be happier about it coming out of the budget of the Minister for Social Development, from which it may be paid more quickly, than it coming out of the budget of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

The guarantee of preserved rights for the elderly must be borne in mind. Those benefits will now be paid from the budget of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety rather than from the social security budget. However, will those benefits continue to be paid in two years' time, when the transitional period has ended? The answer is perhaps not. There may not be enough money in the budget for those payments to be made to that group of residents in old people's homes. That example applies to this situation too.

The Minister did not seek accelerated passage for the Bill. One would have thought that she would have done so given the benefits issue. The legislation has already been enacted in England, and evidence collected by the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety suggests that it is not working well. It has not had the intended effect — quite the opposite. However, we have continued to pay the benefits out of the social security budget. Thus, parity has already gone, yet no crisis has arisen. Evidence to the Committee suggests that the best approach is to continue to pay those benefits from the social security budget. It is an example of Northern Ireland benefiting from moving in a different direction to England. And why not? After all, that is one of the benefits of being a devolved region. What is best for one region is not necessarily what is practised elsewhere.

A shift in payments from one budget to another would create a further layer of bureaucracy and considerable administration costs for the trusts. We are trying to do away with further bureaucracy. People's rights should be assessed according to need, rather than on a discretionary basis by an office set up to administer the new form of benefit. Those workers would have to be paid accordingly.

Thus, there would be high administrative costs for providing a small number of people with a service that is already provided for adequately under the social security system.

We have made some good changes to social security legislation, especially with regard to lone parents aged between 16 and 18. Changes are also being introduced to legislation that affects carers, which will take on board how their daily circumstances are affected by the fact that the elderly are living longer — an issue that had not been considered previously.

Why is exactly the same not done for these young people? My understanding is that they would receive their basic entitlement and could still rely on social services and their personal advisers for extra funds if necessary. In respect of value for money, efficiency or a needs-based analysis for the most vulnerable group in Northern Ireland, the arguments do not stack up. All the other parts of the legislation attempt to protect those young people, and if we cannot provide for a roof over their heads, for food on the table and for their quality of life, the whole Bill might as well go out the window.

Mrs Courtney: I support the opposition to clause 6 of the Bill. For those who may not be familiar with the Bill, clause 6 deals with changes to social security legislation and the transfer of responsibility for children leaving care to health and social services trusts.

Evidence was taken from various statutory and voluntary bodies, all of which were concerned that the removal of entitlement to income-based social security benefits, and the transfer of financial support to health and social services trusts, would have a direct impact on care leavers. That concern included a lack of commitment from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that all resources due to be transferred from the Department for Social Development would be kept exclusively for the support of care leavers.

Clause 6, of course, will mean changes to the social services legislation, which is the responsibility of the Department for Social Development. On balance, however, the majority view was that the removal of clause 6 would be more beneficial to young people leaving care.

It was further noted that in England similar legislation was accompanied by a substantial addition to the budget, which was ring-fenced. That was achieved by giving additional resources from the special social services grant under the Quality Protects initiative. However, apart from £1.2 million from the social inclusion fund for 2001-02 and 2003-04 for pilot schemes, there is no specific commitment to the overall package of additional resources to assist in underpinning the implementation of the Bill.

Northern Ireland is the only part of the United Kingdom with devolved responsibility for social security, child support and pensions. For a considerable time, parity has applied to the relationship between the social security systems in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and, since devolution, legislation has been enacted in parallel with Westminster. However, I understand that there is no legal definition of “parity” in the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Parity concerns equivalence and equality of treatment. For that reason I have consistently supported the removal of clause 6 from the Bill. Although I welcome the fact that officials put their views to the Committee, I support the opposition to the clause.

Mr S Wilson: Until it is decided exactly how we deal with parity legislation, the Assembly will continually have to address this issue. We pretend that we have the luxury of departing, if we so desire, from legislative parity with the rest of the United Kingdom, especially in respect of social security legislation. Even the devolved Parliament in Scotland, with much wider powers than our own, did not take it upon itself to do that. Scotland realised that to break parity at any stage — especially while being a net recipient in respect of welfare expenditure — is a very dangerous position to adopt. The Social Development Committee has examined parity legislation, and we have been faced with the issues time and time again. People may like to flex their muscles and suggest being different, but, financially, we cannot afford to be different.

The Treasury would love it if we were to break parity, albeit in a small way. Given that we are the net recipients of over £3,000 million for social security, the consequences of breaching that parity are obvious. When considering clause 6, we must decide whether we can consider seriously doing that.

The Assembly spends about £1 million of the Budget on those who leave care. That expenditure is demand-led; it could be less than £1 million next year, or it could be more. As it is demand-led, the money does not, despite what Ms McWilliams thinks, come from the block grant. It is not part of the allocation that was devolved to Northern Ireland, so if Members decide that it is only £1 million and that, for reasons such as stigma, responsibility should stay with the Department for Social Development, they will find that that is the thin end of the wedge.

Ms McWilliams: In response to Mr Wilson’s points, the Scottish Parliament has done an enormous amount of innovative work on the effects of student finance and free nursing care — both of which affect its block grant — on its social security budget. Of course funding for those who leave care does not affect our block grant — I was responding to Mrs Robinson’s comment that it may do so in the future — so whether the funding comes from the social security budget or from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, there must be a variation.

Mr S Wilson: The point about free nursing care and student finance in Scotland is spurious, because those matters were not reserved, and Scotland had the freedom to change its policy on them. Northern Ireland has that freedom also. However, the measures in place for social security payments are different. If we start to breach parity, albeit in small ways, that will open the door for the Treasury to treat Northern Ireland differently, and Members will find that increasingly the burden will fall on the Assembly's Budget.

A second aspect of the debate surprises me; perhaps it will be clarified later. It is my understanding that, although members of the SDLP and Sinn Féin have said that they support the amendment to clause 6, that is not the position that the Ministers from those parties have adopted. The Minister of Finance and Personnel does not want yet another drain on the Budget, which he says he works hard to balance every year, and for which he must find additional finance through measures such as rate increases. Do Members want to place yet another burden on him? It would be interesting if he were to come to the Chamber before the end of the debate and say whether his party Colleagues who support the amendment are rebels or are in line with his thinking.

The same applies to the Sinn Féin Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety who, I understand, was happy to allow her Department to absorb the expenditure. Perhaps the fact that her Colleagues who disagree with her did not hobble in this morning shows that she is not too worried about their decision to support the amendment, but it would be useful to hear her view.

Indications are that the Minister of Finance and Personnel does not want any greater demand on his resources, and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety did not disagree with the inclusion of clause 6, unless she has since been persuaded otherwise by her Colleagues.

For all of those reasons, the House ought to support the Bill as it stands and to reject the amendment, because it has been ill thought out and is perhaps a knee-jerk reaction to extensive lobbying. Even if Members are heavily lobbied, it is important for the Assembly to weigh up these matters before deciding to unnecessarily increase a financial burden.

Lord Kilclooney: Madam Deputy Speaker —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the Member raising a point of order?

Lord Kilclooney: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was about to call the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, but the Member has permission to speak.

Lord Kilclooney: I have listened intently to the debate. Whether a devolved Administration should opt out of parity parameters is highly controversial; when it comes to the social fund and social services, I advise that we should not opt out. First, it greatly upsets the negotiations between the Department of Finance and Personnel and the United Kingdom Exchequer. Secondly, those of us who have been in politics for some time will recall that one of the great breaches in parity was the decision of a previous Northern Ireland Administration to change family allowance levels in Northern Ireland, making them different to those in Great Britain. That created a tremendous controversy. That was not worth trying, and I suggest that this is not worth trying either.

Ms de Brún: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ar an chéad dul síos, aithním na hábhair inní a léiríodh faoin alt seo. Mar is eol do Chomhaltaí, cuireann alt 6 deireadh leis an teideal do liúntas ioncam-bhunaithe do dhaoine atá ag tóraíocht oibre, do thacaíocht ioncaim agus do shochar tithíochta i gcás na ndaoine óga sin a bheidh ag fáil tacaíochta ó na hiontaobhais faoi na socrúithe nua sa Bhille um Fhágáil Cúraim go mbeidh siad 18 mbliana.

Cé go n-aithním na ábhair inní seo, creidim gur chóir alt 6 a choinneáil. Is é aidhm an Bhille go ndéanfaí riachtanais daoine óga atá ag fágáil cúraim a mheas agus freastal a dhéanamh orthu go hiomlánaíoch. Tá contúirt nach beag ann gur cur chuige neamhiomlán a bheadh mar thoradh ar dheireadh a chur le halt 6. Ní cosúil gur chun leasa daoine óga atá ag fágáil cúraim é a riachtanais tacaíochta airgeadais agus tithíochta a mheas ar leithligh óna riachtanais ar nithe eile mar oideachas agus oiliúint.

Is mian linn socrúithe tacaíochta níos loighciúla a chur ar bun a dhéanfaidh freastal ar riachtanais phraiticiúla — lena n-áirítear airgead tirim — daoine óga chomh maith le cabhair eile. Chiallódh na socrúithe nua, don chéad uair riamh, go bhfaigheadh daoine óga pacáiste iomlánaithe de thacaíocht mhothaitheach, phraiticiúil agus airgeadais, lena n-áirítear plean conaire pearsanta agus measúnú riachtanas lena chinntiú go bhfaigheann siad an chabhair chuí ar a mbealach chun an neamhspleáchais. Bhainfí den bheartas seo mura mbeadh tacaíocht airgeadais mar chuid den phacáiste cúraim.

Tuigim gur léirigh cuid Comhaltaí inní i rith Chéim an Choiste den Bhille an gcosnófaí na hacmhainní a d'aistreofaí ón Roinn Forbartha Sóisialta chuig mo Roinnse. Le deireadh a chur le haon amhras faoi sin, glacfaidh mé céimeanna lena chinntiú go gcosnófar na hacmhainní a aistreofar ón bhuiséad slándála sóisialta ionas gur féidir dul i mbannaí nach mbeidh daoine óga 16 bliana agus 17 mbliana atá ag fágáil cúraim faoi mhíbhuntáiste airgeadais ag na socrúithe nua. Tá moladh agam acmhainní aistrithe a chosaint agus tá súil agam go n-áiteoidh seo ar Chomhaltaí gan cur i gcoinne alt 6.

Is é an aidhm atá ann nach bhfaigheadh aon duine óg pacáiste dá chóiríocht agus dá chothabháil — cé acu a dhíoltar sin leis go díreach nó a eagraíonn seirbhísí sóisialta é ar a shon — a bheadh níos lú ná mar a gheobhadh sé dá mbeadh sé i dteideal tacaíochta ioncaim nó liúntas do dhaoine atá ag tóraíocht oibre agus leas tithíochta a éileamh.

Clause 6 will remove entitlement to income-based jobseekers's allowance, income support and housing benefit from young people who would be supported by trusts under the new arrangements made in the Children (Leaving Care) Bill until age 18. I recognise Members' concerns regarding clause 6, but I believe that the clause should be retained.

The intention behind the Bill is that the needs of young care leavers should be assessed and met in a holistic fashion. There is a real danger that removing clause 6 would lead to a fragmented approach. To have young care leavers' housing and financial support needs assessed separately from education and training needs would not be in their best interests. More coherent support arrangements need to be put in place to meet young people's practical requirements, including cash as well as other assistance.

The new arrangements would mean that, for the first time, young people would receive an integrated package of emotional, practical and financial support, including a personal pathway plan and needs assessment to ensure that they have appropriate help on their road to independence. If financial support were not part of the package of care the policy would be undermined.

During the Bill's Committee Stage, members expressed concern about whether the resources to be transferred from the Department for Social Development to my Department would be protected. To allay fears on that front, I will take steps to ensure that the resources transferred from the social security budget will be protected to guarantee that 16- and 17-year-old care leavers will not be financially disadvantaged by the new arrangements. The intention is that no young person should receive a package for their accommodation and maintenance, whether paid directly to them or handled on their behalf by social services, that amounts to less than they would have received had they been entitled to claim income support or jobseeker's allowance and housing benefit. [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There is a general hubbub, which should cease so that the Minister can be heard.

Ms de Brún: The Bill's intention is to strengthen the bond between social services and the young person. I have listened to Members' points about changing the ethos of that relationship. The Department and I consider that the Bill's provisions will aid the development of that relationship, which will be the equivalent to that of a good parent.

No guarantee is being provided for the transferred resources in the equivalent legislation in England and Wales. The arrangements are purely administrative; and we wish to follow that model.

Dr Hendron: The Minister mentioned a guarantee as regards the transfer of social security funding. I have written to her several times about funding for children in care being ring-fenced, and the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety and Members will be concerned that that will be the case. Will the money coming from social security be ring-fenced? We will come to the issue of parity later, but I would appreciate an answer to my question.

Mr Dodds: There is no guarantee of ring-fenced funding.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, the Member will address his comments through the Chair.

Ms de Brún: The process will be carried out through administrative arrangements in keeping with the procedures elsewhere. With regard to the costs of administration, the legislation is concerned with assessing and meeting need. That is more likely to be achieved effectively by a co-ordinated approach than by a fragmented one that would involve a range of agencies.

In the event that the Assembly does not agree that clause 6 stand part of the Bill, I will seek to table amendments at Further Consideration Stage to amend trusts' duties with regard to relevant children.

Clause 2 of the Bill inserts a new article 34C into the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. The article sets out the duties of trusts towards relevant children. Paragraph 8 imposes a duty on trusts to safeguard and promote the welfare of those children. Trusts must provide relevant children with maintenance, suitable accommodation and such other support as may be prescribed in Regulations. If clause 6 is dropped, the provisions of article 34C(8) will duplicate the responsibility of the Department for Social Development for maintaining and accommodating young people.

In other words, primary responsibility for the maintenance and accommodation of such children will remain with the Department for Social Development. To ensure that there is no duplication of responsibility, I will have to consider removing the specific duties of trusts that are set out in article 34C(8) to maintain and accommodate relevant children.

Dr Hendron: I thank the Committee Clerk, the Committee and departmental officials for their hard work. I listened carefully to everyone, including the Minister, and I respect what they said. I listened particularly carefully to Sammy Wilson and John Taylor on parity with Britain. Anyone who has read the recent needs and effectiveness document will know that, compared with England, there is a massive deficit in Northern Ireland's Health Service. I do not have the figure to hand, but I think that it is around 30%. Over the past few years, millions of pounds should have been invested in the Health Service in Northern Ireland, but it did not happen. We are a long way behind England in that respect, and people who wish to promote parity should realise that.

The legislation in England ring-fences funding from the social security budget for young people leaving care. Earlier I saw Peter Robinson shake his head and say that money could not be ring-fenced. It seems to be done in England, and I would like that to be explained.

It is important to note that, under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, the finance for young people in or leaving care has often been found wanting. Young people leaving care are the main concern of every member of the Committee, including those who wish to keep clause 6. Sammy Wilson did not even mention young people; his whole speech was about the issue of parity. I have no problem with the principle of parity, provided that it is genuine parity.

I thank Iris Robinson, Sue Ramsey, Monica McWilliams, Annie Courtney, Sammy Wilson, John Taylor and the Minister for their comments. If the Committee had been sure that the funding from social security benefits would go entirely to young people, that would have been a different kettle of fish. Everyone in the Committee took the time to speak to officials and ask about that matter again and again. Those Members who argue that we should have parity with England should face the truth on this issue. If funding can be ring-fenced in England, why can it not be done in Northern Ireland? I appreciate the difficulty that the Minister of Health faces, and her integrity is beyond question.

A Member made the point that removing clause 6 would make young people more dependent on the benefits system. However, allowing young people leaving care to have access to the social security system is not about making them dependent on it.

Trusts must ensure that those children have every opportunity for further education and access to jobs. In other words, they must ensure that those children are treated equally to their peers who come from a stable family background.

1.00 pm

To delete clause 6 would limit flexibility on how resources are deployed. However, if trusts are to act as good parents, the resources available to help young people leaving care should be used as necessary and should be based on their assessment of need and the pathway plans. The threat of limiting flexibility should not be used as an argument to retain clause 6. To remove the clause will prevent a holistic approach being taken and would fragment the service assessment. Assessment of need should be based on a young person's overall needs. How those needs are met will inevitably be through a variety of agencies, including the social security and further education systems.

Furthermore, to continue to make the social security system responsible for young people leaving care would send out the wrong message about our expectations of them. We do not wish to stigmatise young care leavers; we want to give them the same entitlement to benefit as any other 16- or 17-year-old.

Finally, I listened carefully to the arguments about parity. Nobody would have trouble with parity were it to be genuine parity. All those who helped draft the needs and effectiveness evaluation know that there is not parity between the Health Service here and that in England.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Dr Hendron: I am sorry. Were I not summing up, I would. If I did, I would have to give way to others, and I cannot do that.

We do not have parity with England, and everyone, especially Lord Kilclooney, should take that on board. Our main concern is young people who are leaving care. This is the Bill's Consideration Stage, and the Minister can table further amendments at Further Consideration Stage if she so wishes. I have made the arguments for removing clause 6, and other Members and I still want clause 6 removed for the reasons that we have given.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

Accelerated Passage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 40(4), the Assembly grants accelerated passage to the State Pension Credit Bill.

This Bill is an important piece of legislation. It will make provision for Northern Ireland to correspond to the social security provisions that are contained in the State Pension Credit Act 2002. As Members will be aware from the previous debate, there is a long-standing principle of parity between Great Britain and Northern Ireland in the fields of social security, pensions and child support.

People in Northern Ireland pay income tax and make National Insurance contributions at the same rate as those elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Therefore, I take the view that they are entitled to expect changes in the legislation elsewhere in the country to apply in Northern Ireland with minimal delay. The State Pension Credit Act received Royal Assent on 25 June 2002. The Department for Work and Pensions made Regulations on 11 July 2002 to allow for the early implementation of the proposals from October 2002. From October 2003, pension credit will replace the minimum income guarantee for those aged 60 and over.

For many pensioners who need it, pension credit will not only provide more money. There will also be a fairer system and the decent treatment that senior citizens deserve will be provided. Pension credit will differ from current pension provision in several ways. First, it will guarantee that no one over the age of 60 need live on less than £100 a week, or £154 a week in the case of couples. Secondly, people who qualify will receive a cash reward from the age of 65 for modest savings. Single people can benefit by up to £13·80 a week and couples by £18·60 a week. Thirdly, the rule that excludes pensioners with savings of £12,000 or more will be abolished.

Fourthly, from the age of 60, people will no longer have to report any savings that they have under £6,000. That means that 85% of pensioners who are entitled to the pension credit will not have to report savings. Fifthly, the way in which help is delivered to those aged 60 and over will be modernised, and the rules simplified. There will be a significant reduction in the information that pensioners must provide at the outset and over time as changes happen. That will enable pensioners to get what they are entitled to with much less intrusion and hassle.

From age 65, most pensioners will not have to report changes in income for fixed periods of five years. That will effectively abolish the old weekly means test. Approximately half of all people aged 60 and over in Northern Ireland, some 120,000 persons, will potentially gain as a result of the introduction of pension credit. On average, they stand to gain around £400 a year.

The aim of pension credit is to provide a way to help the least well off and to taper that help for pensioners further up the income distribution. The extent of the changes is such that it is necessary to put in place the required subordinate legislation this autumn to allow time for staff to be trained, and for systems and processes to be designed and implemented.

It will be necessary to begin to reassess the 75,000 minimum income guarantee cases before conversion to pension credit. In some cases, that will involve verification of matters such as age and savings. Moreover, the advance take-on of new claims will start in April 2003, when it is expected that there will be many thousands of cases to be assessed. If pension credit is not in place, pensioners here will face the possibility of not having access to the new pension credit and the more generous income and capital rules at the same time as their counterparts in Great Britain.

Therefore, for the reasons that I have given, I ask that the Bill proceed under the accelerated passage procedures set out in Standing Order 40(4), so that we can bring Northern Ireland law on those matters into line with those in the rest of the United Kingdom with a minimum of delay. To grant accelerated passage means that there will not be a formal Committee Stage, so I have discussed the provisions of the Bill with the Committee for Social Development. Members will, of course, be able to make their views known at the Consideration and Further Consideration Stages.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Cobain): I explained to the House last week that the Committee for Social Development received written notification in August of the Minister's intention to seek accelerated passage for the Social Security Bill. In that correspondence, the Minister said that he also intended to seek accelerated passage for the State Pension Credit Bill. As I said to the House last week, the Minister agreed to attend a specially convened meeting of the Committee to explain the reasons for his request.

At that meeting, the Minister explained that the State Pension Credit Bill is considered to be a parity measure in that it replicates the State Pension Credit Act 2002 enacted at Westminster. The Minister stressed that the introduction of the legislation would offer more generous income and capital rules than those that apply in Northern Ireland at present.

The Minister gave three main reasons in support of his case. He explained that, although the provisions in the Bill will not take effect until October 2003, it is necessary to introduce extensive subordinate legislation to give effect to the new law. The Minister also pointed to the need to make significant alterations to operating systems, especially the computer system, and to undertake substantial staff training programmes to ensure the smooth implementation of the new law. The Minister stressed that it was important to get the legislation onto the statute book promptly so that pensioners here can enjoy the benefits of the new pension credit arrangements at the same time as pensioners in Great Britain.

As Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development, I assure the House that the Committee listened carefully to what the Minister had to say and welcomed his assurances that the Bill's provisions will be beneficial. It seems that the practical arrangements for the introduction of the new legislation are complex, and although I do not understand why accelerated passage is necessary to accommodate changes to the computer systems and to facilitate staff training, I acknowledge that the Department has a sizeable task ahead of it.

If the House agrees to grant the Bill accelerated passage, I hope that the Minister and the Department will use the time granted in an efficient way. It would be disappointing to hear at a later date that there were difficulties with putting in place the new arrangements and that the introduction of the new legislation had to be deferred. That will be especially true when Members come to consider the third main plank of the Minister's argument.

As with the Social Security Bill, the Committee accepts the Minister's contention that it is important to ensure that people in Northern Ireland benefit from the changes at the same time as they are introduced in Great Britain. It is hoped that, by October 2003, the law will be introduced, that transitions to the new arrangements will be seamless and that pensioners will not suffer any inconvenience.

At its meeting on 29 August, the Committee agreed not to register any objections in the debate to the Minister's request that the Bill be granted accelerated passage.

Ms McWilliams: The Minister may have noticed in the media recently that attention has been drawn to the married woman's contribution to pensions, which was known as the "small stamp". However, that contribution has recently been wiped out, and many of the women who thought that they had been contributing towards their pension have been told that it is now irrelevant. Is there anything in the State Pension Credit Bill that will be of comfort to those women? There has been speculation that married women have lost out on their pensions.

Mr Dodds: I thank the Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development for his remarks, and I am delighted with the Committee's approach to the issue. I was glad to be able to go to the Committee and explain the reasons for accelerated passage and to assure the Committee that I shall endeavour as far as possible to keep its members informed — personally and through officials — of parity issues as they arise at Westminster.

The State Pension Credit Bill does not address the issue that Ms McWilliams raised. I am happy to discuss it with her, but it is not relevant to the Bill's provisions.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank you and the Assembly for your co-operation. I look forward to having the provisions implemented as quickly as possible and to meeting the deadline of October 2003 for the implementation of state pension credit in Northern Ireland in line with the provisions in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That, in accordance with Standing Order 40(4), the Assembly grants accelerated passage to the State Pension Credit Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will receive its Second Stage tomorrow, Tuesday 17 September 2002.

REVIEW OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR PUBLIC-PRIVATE PARTNERSHIPS IN NORTHERN IRELAND

The First Minister (Mr Trimble): I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the Report of the Review of Opportunities for Public Private Partnerships in Northern Ireland and the Executive's consultation process on 'Financing our Future'.

The consultation exercise was launched on 21 May and is due to conclude this Friday. It has been based on the report of the working group that was set up to review the opportunities for public-private partnerships (PPPs) in Northern Ireland. The group's remit was to consider all funding opportunities to assist in addressing the major investment deficit in our public services.

We must take a strategic approach towards investment in order to maximise the return from the resources at our disposal as regards quality and level of service provision. The Executive's reinvestment and reform initiative offers an opportunity to accelerate investment in infrastructure and reform service provision.

Through it we can make a difference to the quality of our core infrastructure. A long-term strategic approach must replace the piecemeal ad hoc approach of previous years.

1.30 pm

A key element of the initiative is the creation of a strategic investment body, and we will introduce legislation soon to establish it. The body should combine the best expertise from the public and private sectors. Given the current investment deficit and the ad hoc way in which the issues had previously been addressed, it is vital that strategic infrastructure investment be viewed in the long term. The strategic investment body will advise on the best use of the financing sources available to us from the public or private sector. It must have the necessary expertise and resources to serve the Executive's programme of strategic capital investment. We want to ensure that projects are taken forward by the most appropriate method. We want to achieve high-quality public services to maximise the return on our limited resources and encourage investment additional to that funded by the public purse.

The initiative also provides for the possibility of borrowing, and that would need to be paid for from local revenue sources. The option to borrow should provide a means by which we could accelerate capital investment. There are clearly important links with the review of rating, on which public consultation concludes today.

We announced the reinvestment and reform initiative on 2 May and the initial allocations infrastructure projects on 2 July. The initial allocations will secure significant progress on projects including the regional cancer centre; the widening of the M1; improved investment in water, sewerage and road infrastructure and the replacement of 20% of mobile classrooms. The consultation exercise has been based on the Executive paper 'Financing our Future'.

The reinvestment and reform initiative changes the context within which policy on PPPs will be formulated. No single solution, be it borrowing, PPPs, or the more traditional public expenditure, can be hoped to meet our need alone. Different funding and procurement approaches should provide solutions in different circumstances. Dependence on routine public expenditure alone to fund infrastructure would make it much less likely that we could secure the range or quality of public services required.

Public-private partnerships are one option for helping us to deliver the reinvestment and reform initiative. We must also ensure that all our assets are put to best use. The initial Executive response to the PPP working group report noted that the group's findings were broadly consistent with the view set out in the July 2001 report of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. Both reports stressed the need for an investment strategy, a central investment board and value for money. The Executive will consider those points in greater detail, and they could be brought to bear through the proposed strategic investment board.

The working group report includes a helpful analysis of the scale and nature of the investment deficit, its causes and how best to address them. The group estimated that £6 billion would be required over the next decade to cover our investment deficit. The working group developed a definition of public-private partnerships to suit our circumstances. It states:

"A Public Private Partnership is generally a medium to long-term relationship between the public and private sectors (including the voluntary and community sector), involving the sharing of risks and rewards and the utilisation of multi sector skills, expertise and finance to deliver desired policy outcomes that are in the public interest."

That definition of public-private partnerships reflects its wide-ranging nature and its ability to encompass some potential PPP forms. It is important to emphasise that all types of PPP should be considered. There is scope for new thinking and untried models to be developed.

Public-private partnerships have been developed in some public sectors in Northern Ireland, particularly in health and education. Some 25 projects have been developed across several sectors to the value of nearly £190 million. A further 25 projects have been put out to tender and planning with an estimated capital value of £500 million. Earlier this year, I visited the new Balmoral High School, which is one of the projects that have been completed.

The headmaster told me that, although initially he had had considerable problems with this form of finance, he had had a greater input into the design of the school than he would have had under the normal public expenditure model.

One consequence of PPP development is that managerial problems have been shifted from teachers to the private body. It is commonly said that, in the past, head teachers spent 25% of their time on teaching and 75% on administration. The PPP approach has reversed those percentages; head teachers now spend only 25% of their time on management, without suffering any significant loss of managerial control. Those are just some examples of the benefits of PPP.

Whatever model is adopted, we are limited by the amount of funding that is available. The working group emphasised the crucial distinction between financing and funding of public services. Funding is defined as the source of public revenue to pay for the service, whereas financing is the means used to raise the capital needed for investment. The new borrowing power and PPPs represent alternative options for the financing and delivery of public services — not their funding. Whatever model is chosen to service our investment deficit, it must be paid for. None of the available methods is free; they all require a source of public funding.

In developing a policy framework, we must ensure that our available funds are efficiently and strategically invested to obtain best value for money. Increased investment must be balanced with optimum returns in order to ensure that we achieve the required quality of public services. As the working group's report emphasised, the level of available funding would have to increase significantly in order to provide the required level of public services and reduce the investment deficit.

Given the limitations of available infrastructure funding, we must look hard at all possible sources of ongoing funding for essential infrastructure, but we must also utilise the funds at our disposal to best effect.

The working group concluded that several benefits could be realised from PPP, but there are also several areas of concern. It is important that we recognise and address such concerns when developing our policy. Public-private partnerships are not a panacea for our financing and funding problems, but they can potentially improve efficiency, provide value for money in service delivery and secure lifetime asset maintenance. They also offer one way of achieving earlier service delivery.

Ultimately, we must recognise that PPPs should be chosen as a means of providing public services only where they offer better value for money than conventional procurement methods. The strategic investment board should have an important role to play in advising Departments of the most appropriate means by which to develop individual investment projects.

The Executive recognise the centrality and complexity of the issues of equality and public-sector employees.

Those issues were addressed in the working group's review and in the subsequent consultation exercise. The Executive share those concerns and will address them when formulating policy in that area.

The consultation process lasted 18 weeks, which is longer than usual. We wanted to ensure that interested bodies and individuals were offered as much opportunity as possible to voice their opinions and concerns on the issue, and thus inform the policy process. We endeavoured to have a consultation process that was as proactive as possible. It encompassed debate in the Assembly and discussion with Committees, together with three public meetings that were attended by Ministers. The public meetings were well attended, and a wide range of views was expressed. The Department of Health and the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA), among others, held seminars to discuss the report on PPPs. That supplemented the Executive-led discussions.

The Executive encouraged all organisations and individuals who have an interest in the matter to respond. The review and the consultation involved a social partnership approach. Our policy-making process must be inclusive. Both the review and the consultation exercise included representation from the public, private, voluntary and trade union sectors, and their contribution will be invaluable in assisting the Executive to formulate their policy in that area. We are keen that Members' views should be brought to bear in formulating our policy framework. We realise the importance of the issue for the future provision of public services, and we are all aware of the current deficiencies in public service provisions. All of the options available, as expressed during the consultation and today's debate, will be considered when addressing the inadequacies. We welcome the opportunity for an informed debate on how best we can proceed to address the key issues — considering the options for public-private partnerships and how we might most effectively avail of them.

The views expressed today, and the responses to our consultation, will contribute to our work on a policy framework for public-private partnerships in the coming weeks.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): I thank the Speaker's Office, staff and Members for their expressions of sympathy following my recent bereavement.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel welcomes today's debate on public-private partnerships (PPPs), and I thank the working group for the report that has led to this debate. The First Minister outlined in detail his response to the report and commented on the role that the Committee has played.

The Committee tabled a motion on 3 July 2001 on its report and the recommendations from its inquiry into the use of public-private partnerships. I recognise that the scope of the original debate has moved on, and since the Chancellor of the Exchequer's announcement on the reinvestment and reform initiative in May 2002, it is now focused on public-private partnerships. Taking that into account, the Committee and I see this debate as an opportunity for the Assembly to consider the full range of procurement and financial options available to the Executive on the wider issues associated with whatever method is selected.

I wish to begin by pointing out some of the figures given to the Committee on the infrastructure and public service deficits. All Departments require funding of £4 billion to £7 billion for capital projects in the next ten years, depending on the range of proposals and whether they are accepted. The bulk of the deficit is in three Departments — Education, Regional Development and Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Those Departments have programmes to deliver the priority areas in the Programme for Government. Some £6.5 billion of the infrastructure and public service deficit lies there, and those Departments have a shortfall of £5 billion in their capital budgets over the next ten years as regards the projects identified as requiring capital investment.

Assuming that departmental capital budgets remain the same, the Department of Education will have £1 billion conventional public finance available to meet its assessed need of £2.1 billion over the next ten years. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety will have £0.6 billion available to meet its assessed need of £2 billion over the next ten years, and the Department for Regional Development will have £1.8 billion available to meet its assessed need of £4.4 billion over the next ten years.

In May, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a borrowing facility available in the reinvestment and reform initiative, and £125 million was made available for the financial years 2002-03 and 2003-04. It is worth taking into account that that is approximately one third of the underspend over the past year. The Executive used those resources, some of their own in the Executive programme fund for infrastructure, and underspend resources carried forward through end-year flexibility. In total, £270 million was allocated for capital projects in the next two years. Those allocations will advance other projects in the pecking order for consideration for funding.

The Committee is grateful to the Minister of Finance and Personnel for the early copy of the draft strategic investment and regeneration of sites Bill. The Committee notes that the Bill will be introduced by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and that the Committee of the Centre will undertake the Committee Stage. The Committee will want to consider the relationship between the strategic investment body, the procurement board and the Department of Finance and Personnel. The Committee will also want to be assured that the significant costs of those initiatives will represent good investment and value for money.

It is easy to advocate that we accelerate the capital investment programme. All Members would like that to happen. However, as the Minister said, infrastructure and better public services must be paid for. Many questions about that investment remain unanswered, and the Assembly faces many problems. Which projects will be selected? How will they be prioritised? How will they be financed? How will the financial options be funded? How will funding affect future resource position manoeuvrability? Is the project flow realistic and achievable by the construction industry? That matter was dealt with in the Committee's report. Will projects be properly managed, guided and monitored to ensure the efficient use of resources?

The Committee's report made several recommendations. It considered those issues during its inquiry into the use of public-private partnerships. It investigated a range of financial models, such as bonds and not-for-profit organisations. It also heard evidence from the advocates and opponents of public-private partnerships. The Committee concluded that the preferred financial option is public finance. However, it still sees a role for public-private partnerships in the right circumstances. It concluded that core needs had to be taken into account and that all contracts had to be properly investigated and fully secure.

However, the Committee also decided that public-private partnerships were not the only game in town. One of its recommendations in July 2001 was that a unified, service-wide investment strategy be established for financing and managing the infrastructure deficit. The Committee envisaged that expertise would be brought together to create a centre of excellence, which would ensure that contracts were fully investigated; that one Department would not overlap another; that each Department would not do its own thing; that a partnership would be established to ensure a long-term investment strategy, rather than simply the short-term secondment of civil servants from one branch to another; that the Minister would be given responsibilities for leading and delivering the investment strategy; and that a social partnership would be created to support it. The Committee also envisaged that it might be similar to that which exists in the South of Ireland, where trade unions play an important role in putting together a social partnership.

The working group will have an important role. The strategic investment body will have the role that is described in the report. Its job will be to ensure that public-private partnership contracts are put together properly. The Committee would welcome an explanation from the Minister of the relationship between the strategic investment body and the procurement board.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel will soon provide a substantial response to the Executive's consultation exercise. As the basis of its response, a detailed analysis has been carried out to compare the recommendations of the Committee's report that was published in July 2001 with those of the report of the public-private partnership working group, which was published in May 2002. The Committee will meet on 17 September 2002 to agree a formal response to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. The public-private partnership working group has built upon the findings of the Committee's inquiry. Progress has been made in several areas, including the statement of principles and setting the future direction of PPPs.

When he launched the consultation process, 'Financing Our Future', in the Assembly on 21 May 2002, the Minister of Finance and Personnel correctly pointed out that the reinvestment and reform initiative, which was announced in May 2002, provides a new context for consultation. The draft Strategic Investment and Regeneration of Sites Bill provides some detail of how the investment body will relate to Departments. That relationship will be key in the Executive's development of an effective investment strategy. The Committee is interested in hearing from the Minister whether the reinvestment and reform initiative will mean that less use is made of public-private partnerships and whether the low-cost loan from the Treasury will have any implications for the use of relative-cost private finance. The Committee's report recommended public finance as the best way to secure public administration. If new money is available more cheaply than are PPPs, will it be seriously considered?

The Committee has been disappointed by the slow progress in developing the high-level investment strategy that the strategic investment body took so long to set up. The need for an overarching investment strategy is all the more important given the new borrowing facility and the fact that there are now several games in town. Clarity is required as to the relationships between the Departments, the strategic investment body and the Department of Finance and Personnel, and their respective roles in relation to PPPs.

Although the Committee recommended that a Minister lead the investment strategy, it remains unclear where responsibility lies. It is important that one Minister or Department has an identified lead role so that everyone knows where they stand.

During the inquiry, the Committee found it difficult to determine evidence of value for money. That is not to say that there is no value for money, but it did not come out during the inquiry. There may be good projects that will deliver value for money in the long term — some of the contracts are still in the very early stages — but there may also be evidence to suggest that they will not.

Since the report in July 2001, Departments have retained their capital projects and pressed forward with their own PPP projects, without the significant degree of strategic oversight or planning from the centre, which was one of the inquiry's recommendations.

I will conclude with the main questions that the Committee for Finance and Personnel wants answered. What further detail is available on the reinvestment and reform initiative? What are its implications for funding from the departmental expenditure limit? When will a strategy embracing all the financial options be delivered? What are the relationships between the Departments, the strategic investment body and the procurement board? What are their respective roles as regards PPPs? Will responsibility for investment be delegated to a specific Minister? Do the Executive have further evidence of the value for money achieved by PPPs? Can some light be thrown on the capital resources currently held by Departments? What short-term capital expenditure plans and PPP plans do individual Departments hold, and how do they fit in to the strategic investment plan? Has any assessment been made of the longer-term funding implications of those projects?

I thank the Ministers for the debate. I urge the Committees to take on board the points that have been made and to consider how financing and funding decisions will impact on future Programmes for Government and Departments in the longer term.

Ms Lewsley: Our main goal in this matter should be to attain social justice and sustainable development. Public services cannot be seen as a mere safety net. Rather, it must be accepted that a vibrant economy and a healthy society cannot be built unless we lay essential foundations. Investment of our shared resources will be of benefit to all.

Most Members will agree that the issue is not whether we need to find more money for public services, but how to find it. We must explore the options available to generate greater resources for social and economic development and seek to raise the bulk of the required resources through directing graded taxation. However, spreading society's financial burden fairly, according to means, is not an easy task. The limitations of political powers in the North mean that we cannot raise enough money in that manner.

Everybody is aware that Northern Ireland faces a huge infrastructure problem and needs to examine these issues. Even the most vocal critics of PPPs accept that we need to make significant improvements in roads, the transport system, hospitals, schools and college estates. Yet when we take our own resources into consideration, we simply do not have enough funds to address those issues in the traditional way. Therefore, it is logical to conclude that we need new approaches and ideas when considering our capital needs. In that context, the 'Financing Our Future' review must be welcomed. We must have mechanisms in place that can guarantee public benefit in terms of value for money, transparency and accountability. Such schemes must be compatible with our commitment to social justice and the targeting of social need.

There has been criticism of PPPs, and more will probably be expressed in this debate. It is proper to acknowledge that some of the fears are genuine and should be addressed. For instance, do workers face job insecurity after the establishment of a PPP? If so, we must take that on board and, if necessary, tighten legislation to protect workers. The stability and the future of public-sector employees must remain paramount, and I hope that that will be given priority.

Given that more than 20 PPP projects have been completed in Northern Ireland, it is now time to look closer to home and consider what can be learned from the achievements. Simply to examine the UK experience is not the most appropriate way of establishing which measures are necessary to achieve a successful outcome in Northern Ireland.

We must ensure that the private sector does not have undue influence in determining which projects are suitable for partnership financing. Government policy and strategy must remain in the hands of the public through their representatives, and not become subject to the needs of company shareholders.

The reinvestment and reform initiative seeks to establish a strategic investment body to examine strategic infrastructure and investment in Northern Ireland and to suggest innovative approaches to managing and financing the Executive's infrastructure programme.

We must develop ways of building innovative partnerships across society that can fund the necessary development. We must examine new and different public-private models as well as other alternatives, from Government bonds to options involving the voluntary sector and not-for-profit organisations. That would preclude concerns about benefits for shareholders, plough profits back into services and promote sustainability for provider organisations, many of which provide valuable services to the public.

New models of financing must genuinely lever in additional finances for public services, rather than merely substituting one mechanism for another without clear long-term benefits for the public. If PPPs are to work, they must not replace public spending but add to its capacity. We must seek to combine the best models of social partnership with the best models of financial partnership to deliver better public services to the whole community.

Mr Weir: Much has been made of the changed environment since the last debate on the matter in July 2001, when the Committee for Finance and Personnel published its report on public-private partnerships. Much has changed — the reinvestment and reform initiative has been introduced, and proposals have been put forward to establish a strategic investment body. We have witnessed a poacher-turned-gamekeeper transformation. The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee at that time, who shared the Committee's view, has now risen to become one of the people who will help to implement this. There are also the proposals in the 'Financing our Future' document.

However, while there have been changes at that level, much has remained the same. We are still faced with a large infrastructural deficit, which is as great as it was in July 2001. It is clear that although a range of options could be used to make good that deficit, PPPs have a large part to play. PPPs are not an end in themselves, but a means to an end to ensure that we get the best services. Some would argue that in our efforts to finance that massive infrastructural deficit, not enough is being done to reduce administration costs in Northern Ireland. Leaving that argument aside, it is important that we get the best value for money in our projects and that the right structures be in place.

2.00 pm

In July 2001, the Committee for Finance and Personnel established a range of principles, structures and recommendations, which have remained — more or less — the same. Although it may not be appropriate to pat ourselves on the back, many of the principles established by the Committee are as relevant today as they were a year ago. However, the manner of their implementation has been a mixed bag. Today, we are at the interim stage, and we should therefore indicate what we wish to see emerging from the consultation and what should, ultimately, be carried forward by the strategic investment body. We are still at the recommendation stage.

There has been some movement, such as the public-private partnerships working group that has already been referred to. There has also been movement in setting out the principles of PPP projects; in technical guidance; on the public service comparator; and in the definition of PPPs. However, the Committee feels that progress has been slow in several areas. There were a couple of assumptions running through the Committee's recommendations. First, it was assumed that it is important that we learn from others. I appreciate that it is not simply a question of taking what has happened in England or the Republic of Ireland and transferring it to Northern Ireland. However, as I indicated at the time, a wise man learns from his mistakes: a wiser man learns from someone else's mistakes. It is important that we apply the lessons learned from what has taken place elsewhere, and that from the beginning, through the strategic investment body, we take the opportunity to get the structures right. That is vital.

One principal area of concern not properly answered was the recommendation that one Minister be given overall responsibility for driving the initiative. For example, the motion stands in the names of the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the Minister of Finance and Personnel. I am sure that both Departments have valid reasons to do that, but it is not clear which Department will have responsibility for spearheading the initiative. It is vital that that point is clarified soon.

It is essential that we get the powers of the strategic investment body right from day one. Moreover, there is the matter of the relationship between the strategic investment body, public-private partnerships and the current procurement body. It is important that our structures and practices are correct. According to the evidence that the Committee received, everyone agrees that a strategic investment policy is necessary, and that a strategy must be in place to implement the policy. However, when the powers of the strategic investment body are determined, and proposals are in place for its practice, we shall be in a better position to judge whether that has been achieved.

Furthermore, in the light of the evidence received, and since Northern Ireland has always been behind the rest of the UK and other places, it will be especially important that an appropriate flow of deals is achieved as regards proposals on strategic investment and public-private partnerships. We must not have a situation in which so many projects come on to the market at the same time that companies are overwhelmed and are unable to deal with them, or that they come through so slowly that it will be uneconomical for local companies to bid for them. In such a situation, the level of expertise required for one project would mean that costs were not suitably apportioned among several projects. We must ensure that the balance is correct.

The strategic investment body will provide the opportunity to pool resources, especially those of the Civil Service, so that areas of expertise can be concentrated. A level of expertise will be developed, for example, in contracts, and we shall be able to learn from the range of projects available. A review of legislative powers will be necessary to ensure that no impediment to contracts is caused, for example, by the need for powers that do not already exist.

I am reluctant to comment further because the Committee for Finance and Personnel will make its full response available soon. Today's debate is on an interim level, and to ensure that the right conclusion is reached, the Executive must clarify a range of issues.

Such is the scale of investment needed, through public-private partnerships and other means, that if the issue is handled wrongly — and it is to be hoped that it will not be — the people of Northern Ireland will pay for our mistakes for generations to come. It is, therefore, vital that lessons are learned now; that, in the face of opposition, flesh is put on the bones of the strategic investment body; and that the initiative is got right at that stage.

I urge the Ministers responsible to consider the Committee's report and ensure that its proposals and recommendations are considered, so that the necessary lessons are learnt and they get it right from day one.

Mr Close: The Assembly last debated PPPs in July 2001 in response to a report by the Committee for Finance and Personnel. It is worth emphasising that the Committee made several important, pertinent and salient recommendations on the implementation and progress of PPPs. Today, we are debating a different report that does not take away from those recommendations. It builds on them and is a weightier report. It is not more important, and it does not point in a significantly different direction. It simply deals with the matter in a more colourful way.

It is to be regretted that, in the past fourteen and a half months, progress on PPPs has been slow, and that should be subject to criticism. Even after fourteen and a half months, as the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel has said, several significant questions have yet to be answered properly, and out in the big, bad world, the problems continue to increase.

In his introduction, the First Minister said that it is important to hear Members' views. With due respect to the First Minister, if he is looking for my views, I refer him to Hansard Volume 11, No 10, pages 399 to 401 of 3 July 2001. Those remain my views. I could waste the Assembly's time by regurgitating them but, because nothing has changed, I shall not. The Executive must accelerate the snail-like pace that they appear to have adopted. Our constituents do not want to see more reports. They want, and need, to see action, and that should not be interpreted as my saying that we should rush into PPPs willy-nilly. We cannot be accused of doing that.

The recommendations give the vital building blocks that must be put in place — they should have been put in place before now. However, when I read the report, I wonder whether even a strategic plan, upon which to build, exists, and therein lies my major criticism.

I hope that we shall get answers to those vital questions as a result of today's debate; who knows, the Minister might answer them in his summing up. The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel concluded his summary by posing fundamental questions that must be addressed urgently. The Committee feels that, if we do not get answers to those questions, the matter must be driven forward, and one Minister must be given control of doing so strategically and positively. If that decision has not yet been made, we must ask where we are going.

I hope to lay to rest the myth, which can arise through debates such as this, that PPPs per se can solve the funding deficit. That is a load of rubbish: PPPs do not solve the funding deficit, and I am delighted to see the Minister of Finance and Personnel nodding in approval. The only way to solve a funding deficit is to increase revenue or reduce expenditure. Public-private partnerships are an alternative way to provide facilities.

Fourteen and a half months ago, several Members said that PPPs were not a panacea and were not the only show in town. In those fourteen and a half months, the reinvestment and reform initiative has clearly demonstrated that we should recognise that fact. Public money is the cheapest, and that must be borne in mind. If we decide to use the strategic investment board or other bodies, they must make clear decisions about the selection and prioritisation of the different deficits that must be funded, such as schools, roads, water, et cetera. We must see that prioritisation carried out, and we need it done yesterday. We certainly need it before another fourteen and a half months elapse.

Ms Morrice: When the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister originally announced the establishment of the borrowing facility — the reinvestment and reform initiative that Mr Close mentioned — I said that a large "handle with care" stamp was necessary; that same stamp is necessary for PPPs. That message has been reiterated by all contributions to today's debate.

The public are still confused by pick-and-mix financial policy. They make all sorts of assumptions: that PPPs are confined to the private-finance initiative, which in fact finances only major capital projects, and that PFI offers something for nothing in the context of public expenditure restraint. However, no matter how projects are financed, in the absence of user charges they remain funded by the public purse. Members have made that point repeatedly today. We risk locking the public sector in Northern Ireland into long-term financial commitments that offer poor value for money for the taxpayer. That is the argument of short-term pain versus long-term gain.

It has been recognised today that the infrastructure in Northern Ireland, specifically for regional development, health, and education, is under tremendous pressure and that dependence on public expenditure alone means that the range and the quality of services provided will be insufficient, both now and in future. PPPs may be one way to bridge the gap.

2.15 pm

The assertion that the private sector has skills that make it inherently more efficient than the public sector is not always backed up by evidence. If this were the case, far from there being a preference for traditional procurement, there would be a preference for private sector solutions, with no reference to public sector comparators.

Principles and economics must also be considered. Mr Close stated that public money is always the cheapest money, and we should not forget why that is so. Public money should always have the good of the public at heart, which is why it is the best and cheapest way to progress. Some people think that a public service that is funded for profit by the private sector is incompatible, and that Government should provide schools, hospitals, roads, public transport and sewerage systems. Are PPPs and PFIs a legitimate and cost-effective way to increase the pool of money that is available for those services? The dangerous approach of “buy now, pay later” cannot be overstated or ignored.

PPPs should be chosen as a financing option only when they provide better value than conventional long-term public finance. A holistic approach must be adopted, and an assessment of comparative costs must include the social and environmental impact as well as cost-effectiveness considerations.

We urge the Executive to give priority to the identification of long-term and dependable funding streams to sustain the valuable public services that the voluntary and community sector provides.

Patricia Lewsley and others spoke about the guarantees that are required for a level playing field for employees. Trade unions and Members have expressed fears that a two-tier workforce may emerge. Contractors are employing new workers on poorer terms and conditions than workers who have transferred from the public sector. Ms Lewsley also stated that the legislation must be tightened to take that issue on board.

PPPs have not been highly contentious in the Republic of Ireland, so the Executive should consider the Southern experience and take a broader view.

The partnership approach has been highly successful; for example, between local councils and the not-for-profit companies — the voluntary sector. That approach has been important to our communities, because PPPs are at the cutting edge and work successfully in the voluntary sector. Bryson House provides local councils with valuable expertise and information, and its kerbside recycling schemes are at the cutting edge.

Information on the ‘Financing Our Future’ consultation process and its implementation timetable would be appreciated.

Mr Beggs: Northern Ireland has a huge infrastructure deficit, and different estimates have been made about its extent, which appears to be more than £7 billion over the next 10 years.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel indicated that the preferred source of finance is public finance, because it is generally provided at lower interest rates than those available through the private sector. We should address that important issue, because there would be no point in passing funding over to the private sector if that were the only consideration. However, it is not the only consideration. No one has claimed that we could finance our deficit of some £7 billion over the next 10 years from within existing public expenditure. We shall have to think outside the box and, increasingly, consider alternatives.

Public-private partnerships can bring benefits. We have heard about improvements in the design of schools, and about the ease of the management of ongoing maintenance arrangements. There are also benefits to be had from encouraging Departments and organisations to think outside the box. For example, Departments could perhaps be encouraged to share facilities with other Departments, and to increase the use of those facilities. That form of funding could increasingly encourage communal use, and a variety of other uses.

There are many ways to finance those activities. We have the traditional route of public expenditure; we have the private finance initiatives and public-private partnerships; and we now have the reinvestment and reform initiative. We should not be tied to any one route. We must consider each means of finance on its merits, and decide which one will best address the urgent community needs that exist. As Members have said, we must also bear in mind that, ultimately, as when someone takes on a mortgage or hire purchase agreement, it must be paid for. Therefore, we must consider the long-term implications of each option.

I concur with the Committee for Finance and Personnel’s view that PPPs can be a valuable tool and means of investment, and should not be ruled out. I welcome the First Minister’s comments, which reflect the views of the Committee, that value for money has to be demonstrated clearly over the life of a project.

I joined the Committee for Finance and Personnel only this year, and I have already heard favourable comments about public-private partnerships. For example, I heard some during a visit to the Scottish Parliament, and I also heard about positive experiences in the Republic of Ireland. I learnt that, on occasion, even though public finance was available, PPPs were preferred because of other perceived benefits.

Northern Ireland has had limited experience to date of PPPs compared with other UK regions. We need an advisory group that will consider in detail the overarching investment strategy. I expect that to be done by the strategic investment body.

How can we be assured that that body will have the necessary experience and expertise? That will be critical in determining options for funding. I agree with Patricia Lewsley that we should learn lessons from our existing PPPs. There should be a review of our experience to date. Although it is limited, there must be positive lessons to be learnt. I ask the Minister to ensure that any early lessons are built on in future decision-making.

I welcome the reinvestment and reform initiative and the move to establish the strategic investment body. However, further details are needed, and we need to keep the process moving forward. Ultimately, projects must be delivered. For example, the widening of the M1, which is of concern to many commuters, and the new cancer centre will be financed by the initiative. When will more projects be delivered, and when will our constituents begin to see more benefits from these initiatives?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I call Mr Byrne, I remind the House that we must break at 2.30 pm for Question Time. Mr Byrne will be allowed to resume after 4.00 pm, if necessary.

Mr Byrne: It is generally recognised that public investment needs are a major problem in Northern Ireland. That point has been highlighted since the Assembly came into being. Three Departments in particular — Education, Health, and Regional Development — have major capital investment needs, and we have suffered major handicaps in those areas over many years.

Public resources are insufficient to meet those capital investment needs, and that is regrettable. However, that is the reality that the Assembly faces. Most parties would like to see public capital needs provided for through the public purse, but, unfortunately, that is not possible under the limited devolved Budget. The big question is whether private-finance capital sources can be attracted to finance capital budgets or projects in those areas.

There have been several private finance initiative (PFI) projects, and, more recently, public-private partnerships in Britain and, indeed, Northern Ireland that have resulted in new schools, colleges and offices. That has brought welcome development to different localities and communities. However, it is fair to say that there has been some genuine concern and criticism of how some PFIs have worked, including the accumulated cost of servicing the payback on some projects. Many trade unions are greatly concerned about how workers are often asked to pay a price for such projects.

One of the key principles is value for money, which must be crucial in assessing a PFI or public-private partnership project. The rate of return on a private finance initiative must be sufficient, but not excessive. There has been genuine criticism of some of the excessive returns in some projects, and the rate of return should reflect the prevailing safe loan capital environment — the repayment is assured to the public purse, so that risk is limited and controlled.

The reinvestment and reform initiative outlined by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in May is a welcome proposal that can be used to get necessary, upfront capital investment money for infrastructure projects. The strategic investment board has obvious merit in facilitating private finance schemes for public investment projects. The public wants to see new schools and hospitals as soon as possible, and there is a great imperative that private finance schemes should be processed in a more efficient and effective way. There is genuine concern that the entire administration of projects is long-winded, cumbersome and leads to excessive costs.

Mr Speaker: It would be unfair to ask any of the other Members to start a speech for the sake of a few seconds, only to have to interrupt themselves in full flow. The House will take its ease until Question Time, which is in less than one minute.

EDUCATION

Mr Speaker: Question 7, in the name of Mrs Eileen Bell, has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Burns Review

1. Ms Ramsey asked the Minister of Education to give an assessment of the response to his consultation on the Burns proposals. (AQO 70/02)

The Minister of Education (Mr M McGuinness): We adopted a multi-stranded approach to the consultation to ensure that all sectors of the community had an opportunity to participate, and I have been encouraged by the response. I held 28 meetings with key interests during the consultation period. More than 650 written submissions were received from education partners, churches, schools, parents, teachers, pupils, political parties and the business community. More than 550 detailed response booklets were received from schools, training organisations and community groups. More than 200,000 adults completed the household response form, and research was conducted into the views of young people. I will publish a summary of the responses to the consultation in early October for everyone to see and consider.

Ms Ramsey: I am also encouraged by the response. After the recent media speculation that there has been intensive canvassing by grammar schools regarding the survey, how will the Minister ensure that the outcome is totally representative of all opinions?

Mr M McGuinness: We had a good response to the household forms; 200,000 people represent a substantial body of opinion in anyone's book. However, we must put that into context — it represents 16% of the adult population. The household form is one strand of a multi-stranded approach to consultation. We adopted that approach to ensure that everyone's views were heard. The public's views are also represented in the responses from schools, parents, pupils, the Churches, community groups, voluntary organisations, the political parties and our education partners. All those views will be taken into account.

Lord Kilclooney: Does the Minister recognise that the Burns proposals are particularly controversial? Does he know that more than 1,000 constituents in Strangford have written to me to express their opposition to the proposals? Now that he has confirmed that he will publish his own conclusions in October, he owes it to the public — and I ask him to do it today — to advise us when he is likely to present those proposals to the Committee for Education. Should the Committee reject his recommendations, will he go over its members' heads and bring them before the Assembly?

Mr M McGuinness: It is important that everyone, including myself, take time to consider the responses to the consultation exercise in detail. I want to hear the views of key stakeholders in education on the responses to consultation and how best to progress the post-primary review before I make proposals on the way forward. Any new arrangements and their implementation will be shaped by the responses to the consultation and must build on the growing consensus that has emerged during the post-primary review. I will announce details of the timetable for the next stages of the review when I publish a report on the responses to consultation in early October.

Mr Gallagher: I thank the Minister for the way in which he outlined the handling of the consultation process. The proposals that emerge from that process will be of greater importance. Does the Minister plan to bring those proposals to the Assembly before the end of the year?

Mr M McGuinness: Through the consultation process and my meetings with key interests and partners, there are strong signs of a growing consensus on the need for change. I want to build on that emerging consensus. I am firmly of the view that we can work together to bring about new arrangements for post-primary education, to the benefit of all.

Decisions on the way forward — which is what Tommy Gallagher is asking about — will depend on the outcome of the consultation, and I intend to consult the Assembly and the Executive about any changes. It may also be necessary to give effect to new legislation, and that will be subject to the approval of the Assembly.

Children are the key focus, and they will continue to be my prime concern throughout the review of post-primary structures. The debate should rise above party-political lines and the interests of individual institutions. Any changes, and the timing of their introduction, will depend on the outcome of the consultation. My Department will maintain the existing arrangements and phase in changes in a planned and orderly manner in order to safeguard the education of children in schools.

Throughout this process the intention is to improve the educational experience of children and to improve standards, and my Department will work with the boards, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS), boards of governors, principals and teachers to achieve that.

The Assembly has a critical role to play, and, given the events of the summer, I have been encouraged by the high level of debate and the important contributions from all the political parties and our education partners.

I am pleased how the situation is moving along, and my key object is to continue to build on the consensus that I believe already exists.

School Transport Strategy

2. Ms McWilliams asked the Minister of Education whether he intends to urgently review the current school transport strategy in the light of the inequities that it is causing. (AQO 26/02)

Mr M McGuinness: The current transport arrangements were introduced in 1997 to constrain the escalating costs of home-to-school transport and to release resources to safeguard funding for the classroom. The revised arrangements restrict transport provision to pupils who have been unable to gain a place in any suitable school within statutory walking distance of their homes. Suitable schools are defined as the established educational categories of controlled, maintained, integrated and Irish-medium, and, in the grammar sector, denominational and non-denominational. Parents are not obliged to send their children to the nearest suitable school or to any particular school, but, where they do not qualify for assistance, the responsibility to provide transport falls to the parents.

I recognise that some aspects of the current policy concern parents and public representatives. My Department is reviewing the present arrangements and will consult with all relevant bodies in due course.

Ms McWilliams: A similar answer was given the last time that the question was tabled — namely, that the Department was reviewing matters. We need some urgent action, particularly in the light of the earlier question on the Burns review, given that there is such inequality in the current system. For example, a parent on a low income from the Markets area or the Short Strand sending a child up the Ravenhill Road by bus to school — which has to do for safety reasons and because of the sectarian nature of the area that is passed through — has to pay the bus fare. It costs at least 55p a trip. That amounts to over £200 a year, and if there are three children involved it can add up to £600.

On the other hand, a parent of a child living on Malone Road, or in Carryduff, outside the three-mile area, gets such transport for free. That results in an unequal system, where low-income families have to pay more. Likewise, a parent whose child has passed the 11-plus faces the same problem.

Mr Speaker: The question from the hon Lady is clear.

Ms McWilliams: Could we please have a date for the end of this review and some free school transport in the future —

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr M McGuinness: I appreciate the concerns articulated by Ms Monica McWilliams and, indeed, by other elected representatives. It is an important issue. There will be a wide-ranging review, which will consider the impact of the 1997 policy change, along with other issues that have emerged since then. Ms McWilliams is correct in saying that the review will need to have regard to the report of the review body on post-primary education; it will also need to take account of the recommendations of the Committee for the Environment's report on home-to-school transport.

Mr Hussey: I am concerned, as is Ms McWilliams, that we are hearing words rather than having action. Does the Minister intend to take any action to address the situation in which students over 16 years of age in full-time education and financially dependent on their parents must pay adult fares? Is that not unfair and discriminatory? Their situation has not changed; only their age has.

Mr M McGuinness: The review provides an opportunity for everyone to raise his or her constituents' concerns, and this matter can also be considered during it. However, at the same time, there will be widespread appreciation that it is sensible, when dealing with such issues, for us to recognise that the review must also have regard to the report on post-primary education and the Committee for the Environment's report on home-to-school transport, on which we have had several debates.

Mrs Courtney: I tabled a similar question some months ago, and the answer too was quite similar: there will be a review. I share the other Members' concerns that we still have no date for that review. My worries are about primary schoolchildren and also about 16- to 18-year-olds. I understand that a review is under way involving the Department for Regional Development and the Department for Employment and Learning. Will the Minister consult those Departments when proposing any changes? It is very relevant. I believe that he is proposing a reduction of at least 50%, and for some primary schools that would be of great help.

Mr M McGuinness: We shall gladly consult those Departments.

Nursery Education

3. Mr Ford asked the Minister of Education to make a statement on the development of nursery education. (AQO 92/02)

Mr M McGuinness: In 1997, there were funded places for 45% of children in their immediate pre-school year in statutory settings. As a result of my Department's pre-school education expansion programme, that rose to 85% in the 2002-03 school year in both statutory and voluntary settings. In the 2003-04 school year the programme aims to provide a place for every child whose parents wish it.

Mr Ford: The overall growth in places is obviously to be welcomed. How many places are in existing controlled or maintained primary schools as opposed to in facilities which are seen to be completely open to all sections of the community? Is there not a danger that we have lost a major opportunity to promote integrated education for the under-fives?

Mr M McGuinness: I shall write to Mr Ford with the figures that he seeks. It is also important to point out that in the present provision there are undoubtedly many integrated settings in which children from all sections of the community enjoy a year's pre-school education together. Growth in pre-school education for children in the year before formal education begins has mushroomed over the last few years. We have made tremendous strides, and we must constantly review how we continue that in the light of our having quite a strong integrated education sector. Parents increasingly choose to have their children educated together; I am conscious of and sympathetic to that trend.

Mr Kane: When can Moorfields Primary School have its nursery unit?

Mr Paisley Jnr: He is stumped.

Mr M McGuinness: No, I am not stumped; not yet. My Department has been in contact with the North Eastern Pre-School Education Advisory Group on the subject, and I shall write to the Member about it.

2.45 pm

Mr Beggs: Why has the Minister not taken the opportunity afforded by the Education and Library Bill to close the legislative loophole that allows two-year-olds a funded voluntary- or private-sector nursery place while many four-year-olds do not receive one? Would it not be better if he enabled educationalists to ensure that every child in his or her pre-school year received a funded place? The Minister could do that by moving an amendment, rather than simply hoping that those places will become available. The Minister might be able to give an assurance based on the assumption that a percentage of parents will not take up places, but there will undoubtedly be a spread in different areas.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member's question is clear, and I am sure that the Minister is aware of the arguments.

Mr M McGuinness: Since the early 1970s, places in the statutory sector have been open to children from two years old to the lower limit of compulsory school age. It is, however, my intention to amend the legislation so that very young children, who gain little benefit from attending nursery schools or classes, will no longer be admitted. Such an amendment was not made to the current Bill because of the nature of the legislation. The main purpose of the Bill is to introduce the local management of schools common funding formula.

I am aware, however, that the Committee for Education has raised that issue, and that departmental officials met the Committee last week. I want to await the outcome of the Committee's report.

Centre for Autism

4. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister of Education to give an update on the progress of the centre for autism.

Mr M McGuinness: Work on the centre for autism is progressing well. A project manager has been appointed to co-ordinate the work of all the agencies involved, prior to the appointment of a chief executive. A steering group has been established, including representatives from the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in the North, and the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health and Children in the South.

In particular, the steering group will consider legal issues such as purchase, ownership, governance and management of the centre, professional issues, access and health and safety issues, and ways of including parents and other interests in the planning process.

Ms Lewsley: What is the current state of financing for the project? Have any resources been forthcoming from the Government of the Republic of Ireland?

Mr M McGuinness: We were given some £1.7 million from the Executive programme funds, which will contribute to the purchase of the site at the former St Joseph's adolescent training centre in Middletown. I am confident that the Government in Dublin will make their contribution. I do not have any difficulties about achieving that. Our objective is to have the centre up and running in autumn 2003. Some months ago, people thought that that was an ambitious target, but I am confident that we will meet it. There is still work to be done, and many appointments to be made, but the work is well in hand. We will have to consider funding as we progress.

Dr O'Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What other work has the Minister initiated to address autism?

Mr M McGuinness: I recently reported to the House on the outcome of the previous North/South Ministerial Council meeting. A joint working group on special education was set up under its auspices, which will focus initially on autism and dyslexia. Northern task groups on autism and dyslexia were established, and I launched the reports produced by those groups earlier this year. I welcome their challenging recommendations to all of us with responsibilities for the education of children with autism and dyslexia.

My Department has also organised separate conferences, to be held in September and November, which will progress the recommendations from the reports on autism and dyslexia. Those major events will involve relevant education and health professionals working together with parents of children with autism and dyslexia and representatives of voluntary organisations to help plan for provision. Those events will provide focal points for discussion on how best to take forward the recommendations from each report.

My Department and the Department of Education and Science are supporting a bid made to the Peace II funds by the Centre of Cross-border Studies, which will, if successful, provide cross-border exchange opportunities for teachers, principals, educational psychologists and inspectors working in special educational needs. The programme intends to promote dialogue and the exchange of good practice for professionals working with children with special educational needs.

I have recently become aware of the difficulties that many young people face in accessing appropriate day care or employment when they leave special schools. I therefore met the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Minister for Employment and Learning and relevant officials to consider what could be done. Officials from the three Departments will consider the matter fully, and they will put forward proposals on how best to improve the transition planning process and the options available to the young people.

Attacks on Schools

5. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Education to comment on the series of attacks on schools that occurred over the summer. (AQO 76/02)

Mr M McGuinness: My Department is aware of seven arson attacks on schools since the beginning of June. During other attacks on schools windows were broken — in one case in north Belfast there was a disgraceful attack in which hundreds of windows were broken in a controlled school. I deplore attacks on all schools. Schools must remain sanctuaries and should not be dragged into community conflict. Acts of vandalism serve no purpose and divert financial resources from the classroom, where they are needed most.

All children are entitled to the best possible education in good, modern, safe schools. Vandals try to deny them that right, and it is everyone's responsibility to make it clear that attacks are unacceptable.

Mr G Kelly: I agree that such attacks are reprehensible. Approximately how much funding is being diverted from the delivery of education?

Mr M McGuinness: I appeal to everyone in society to do his or her best to help to create a proper environment in and around schools to ensure that such attacks are stopped. I call for an immediate halt to attacks on all schools.

My Department does not have details of the cost of repairs to the schools affected, but such attacks put further pressure on funds, given the increased need for security measures in schools. For the five years until March 2002, additional resources of £5 million were made available to address basic security measures in schools, and a further £1 million has been made available this year. That money could be put to better use.

Mr Hamilton: I note the Minister's comments regarding pressure and the diversion of funding. Will he assure the House that the schools affected will not suffer financial difficulties because of the attacks, and that additional funding will be provided to address the damage so that resources meant for the classroom will not be diverted from where they are most needed.

Mr M McGuinness: There is a responsibility on Members to ensure that the limited funding available goes directly where it is needed — into the classroom. Undoubtedly, the disgraceful behaviour by a tiny minority in society has a detrimental effect on our children's education. There is a responsibility on me, the Executive and every Member to ensure that we do everything in our power to get as many resources as possible for the education of our children. That is problematic considering the difficulties that many Departments are enduring as a result of the legacy of neglect and underfunding across all Departments over the past decades.

At the same time, the Department will do its best with its limited budget, and I will fight for more resources for the education and library boards, the CCMS and other education partners.

Burns Questionnaire

6. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Education how many postcode areas had not received the Burns questionnaire by the beginning of June 2002, and to explain the reasons for the delay. (AQO 88/02)

Mr M McGuinness: The household response form was distributed to more than 670,000 households. Distribution took longer than anticipated due to the massive scale of the exercise, and, unfortunately, a few postcode areas did not receive their forms by the beginning of June. Those areas were BT1, BT2 and BT3 in Belfast; BT24, which is Ballynahinch; BT25, which is Dromore; and BT40, which is Larne. However, those areas received their forms by the week commencing 24 June 2002. The deadline for responses was 28 June 2002, but, in the light of the distribution difficulties, my Department considered all responses received up until the end of July 2002.

Mr Kennedy: Does the Minister accept that many people found the personal questions on the back of the form intrusive and offensive, and does he accept that this will have affected the response rate? Will he give an assurance that the results of the consultation will take account of all responses regardless of whether these questions were answered?

Mr M McGuinness: I received no information to the effect that society had revolted over the quite legitimate questions that were posed in the household response form. All the responses will receive the important consideration that they deserve given that some 200,000 households saw fit, and were bothered enough, to return the forms. The Department is very pleased with how the exercise has gone, and people should consider that we are evaluating not only the household response form exercise, but the many other strands of the consultation. As a result of the exercise, we have given society a unique opportunity to contribute to the shaping of our future education system. Good work has been done. Let us try to build consensus to ensure that the key people in all of this, the children, receive the best possible education.

Mr S Wilson: Does the Minister accept that a response from 200,000 households out of a circulation of more than 600,000, which is 33%, is a response of over 100%, if we take into account the number of families with children in education? Why has he sought to downplay the responses that he has received and introduce yet another layer of consultation by asking the key stakeholders to respond to a consultation on the consultation? The Minister is ducking and diving because he knows that the people have hampered his drive towards comprehensive education in Northern Ireland. Will he assure the House that when he finally comes up with some proposals, he will seek the cross-community consensus of the House rather than try to drive it through by ministerial decree?

Mr M McGuinness: We have had a good response to the household form. A response by 200,000 people represents a substantial body of opinion, though still that constitutes only 60% of the adult population, and that is why the five strands of the consultation were so important to ensure that everyone's views are represented. The views of the public are also represented in the responses from schools, community groups, churches and education partners. I find it a bit rich that the Member takes it upon himself to speak for the education partners.

I have had 28 positive and constructive meetings with everyone who is involved in the process. Much good work was done over the summer, and I am confident that in bringing about the essential change that everyone knows must take place, I will do so with the full good heart and co-operation of those people.

3.00 pm

They are genuine people; they are good people. They may be on different sides of the argument, but they all want to do everything in their power to ensure that our education system grows stronger no matter what changes are made. No one in the House can speak for the education partners. They are good, decent people, who will work in partnership with me to ensure that change takes place sensibly.

Mr Speaker: I regret that other Members who wish to raise questions will find that we have run out of time.

HEALTH, SOCIAL SERVICES AND PUBLIC SAFETY

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform the House that question 14, standing in the name of Mrs Eileen Bell, has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Antrim Area Hospital

1. Mr Paisley Jnr asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether the casualty unit at Antrim Area Hospital is being used as a makeshift ward, and, if so, what plans she has to improve the bed-blocking system there. (AQO 3/02)

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Bhí sé riachtanach ar roinnt ócáidí d'othair in Ospidéal Ceantair Aontroma fanacht sa roinn taisme agus éigeandála i ndiaidh na cóireála tosaigh go dtí gurbh fhéidir iad a ligean isteach i mbarda. Ba í an phríomhchúis leis sin ná an mhoill i ligean amach othar nach raibh cúram de dhíth orthu a thuilleadh in ospidéal, mar aon leis an líon méadaithe iontrálacha éigeandála.

I mí Iúil 2002, chuir mé maoiniú ar fáil do bhorda breise 24 leaba, agus le trí bliana anuas méadaíodh an bhunáit altranais mhaoinithe i roinn taisme agus éigeandála an ospidéil. Ag tabhairt aitheantais don bhrú a chruthaíonn moill a bheith ar ligean amach, fuair mé £19.1 milliún breise do sheirbhísí cúraim phobail anseo sa bhliain reatha.

It has been necessary, on some occasions, for patients at Antrim Area Hospital to remain in the accident and emergency department after initial treatment until it is possible to admit them to a ward. The principal reason for that is the delayed discharge of patients who no longer need hospital care, combined with an increased number of emergency medical admissions.

In July 2002, I made funding available for an additional 24-bed ward, and the funded nursing establishment in the accident and emergency department of the hospital has been increased in the past three years. I acknowledged the pressures created by delayed discharges, and I secured an additional £19.1 million for community care services here in the current year. That sum will enable boards to increase care home payments, implement free nursing care from next month and support 1,000 more people in community settings.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does the Minister agree with Dr Brian Patterson's comments on behalf of the British Medical Association (BMA)? He said:

"It is not enough to just pour money into the NHS. It must be targeted to where it is most needed, within the context of a coherent strategic plan, otherwise finance disappears".

If she accepts that opinion, will she coherently — not using the gobbledygook that we have heard to date — outline her strategic plan for the Antrim Area Hospital and say how she will provide beds and staff to tackle the bed-blocking and waiting crises? None of the measures that she mentioned in her answer has, to date, solved the problems or fulfilled her promises.

Ms de Brún: I shall continue to make the problem of delayed discharges a priority, together with the restoration of domiciliary care as a cost-effective alternative to institutional care. Studies have shown that that is a fundamental measure in any strategy for dealing with the issue to which the Member referred.

Moreover, each board is committed to examining good practice and innovative schemes. The boards have identified schemes that are specifically designed to reduce admissions to long-term care, prevent inappropriate admissions to hospitals and facilitate early discharge. The Northern Board, in meeting its targets of 1,000 additional people to be treated in community settings, indicated that 75% of the additional support will be made available to elderly people, and that will have an impact on the problem.

There are no easy answers. I have made the case for substantial additional funding, some of which has now been secured and is finding its way into the service. Developing better services will provide a framework in which significant improvements can be made to the provision of acute services here. Significantly, I announced in the summer that Antrim Area Hospital will gain 24 additional medical beds at a cost of £3.47 million, a new chemotherapy unit costing £1.58 million, a new CT scanner costing £0.65 million, and four additional dialysis stations costing £0.35 million.

We must put capacity back into community services and hospitals to ensure that equipment is up to date and that staff are available. Since I became Minister, I have addressed in a sustained and strategic manner issues that had not received significant investment during direct rule.

Dr O'Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline what she is doing to improve community care services, so that people who are able to use such services can do so rather than availing themselves of hospital care, thereby easing bed blocking?

Ms de Brún: I have made a provision of £19.1 million. Each board has suggested ways in which community care can be improved. I carried out a review of community care, which has led to information on good practice being collated. Boards have been asked to take that into account when examining the implementation of the work to ensure that an additional 1,000 people in community settings are supported. That will help to address problems in the community, prevent inappropriate admissions to hospital and facilitate early dismissal.

Mr Beggs: The Minister has advised that some £19 million of additional money has been directed towards the easing of bed blocking. However, does she acknowledge that there is a problem in the Homefirst Community Trust area, which serves United Hospitals, in that it receives less funding for community care per capita? The inability to move patients from hospitals into the community and provide care packages adds to the waiting lists.

Ms de Brún: The £19.1 million is for community settings and will include funding for nursing homes and free nursing care. However, the bulk of the money will be used to ease bed blocking. There are difficulties with delayed discharge in United Hospitals, which, according to provisional figures for the end of June 2002, have the highest number of patients awaiting discharge. I allocate funding to boards, and the boards decide on the allocation of funding to the trusts based on population needs.

Cancellation of Cancer Operations

2. Ms McWilliams asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety how many cancer operations were cancelled last year due to lack of available intensive care unit beds. (AQO 25/02)

Ms de Brún: Níl teacht furasta ar an eolas seo san fhoirm inar iarradh é agus níorbh fhéidir é a fháil ach ar chostas díreireach.

That information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Ms McWilliams: I am disappointed by the Minister's answer. That information should be available because cancer patients are being told to prepare for operations that require intensive care beds, only to be told that their operation has been cancelled.

My question is based on the case of an elderly woman who was admitted to the Ulster Hospital. On four occasions she prepared for an operation by fasting so that pre-operative medication could be administered, and on four occasions her operation was cancelled. She was sent home, told to fast, and to wait for a telephone call. A message cannot be sent out that the Health Service will tolerate such practice. Members must be told how many operations were cancelled in the past year because no intensive care beds were available.

Ms de Brún: That detailed information is not available because of the way in which it is collected and collated.

The cancellation of operations causes anxiety for cancer patients and their families. However, all trusts prioritise patients with suspected or diagnosed cancer, and they take all possible measures to minimise delays. Trusts have reported that cancer operations are rarely cancelled because intensive care beds are unavailable.

That will not be of much comfort to the small number of people who have been affected. However, although the Department does not collect statistics centrally, it is a matter that trusts prioritise and on which they take all possible action. Among other tasks, they ensure that procedures are in place to reschedule operations as soon as possible. Since I became Minister, I have taken considerable care to increase the number of high-dependency beds and intensive care beds that are available.

Mrs Courtney: I share Ms McWilliams's response to the Minister's reply. It is disappointing that those answers are not forthcoming. Anyone who has cancer, or whose life is at risk, deserves a proper explanation as to why his or her operation has been cancelled, whether it be due to the lack of an intensive care bed or to the lack of a surgeon. That came through loud and clear in the latest waiting list report. More operations are being postponed — sometimes for six months. I want the Minister to inform the House of those figures as soon as possible.

Ms de Brún: There is a major difference between patients not being told the reason why their operation has been postponed and my not having that information collected centrally. The fact that such information is not collected centrally does not in any way suggest that patients are not told why their operations have been cancelled.

I wanted to give an answer that was not based on information that trusts were able to give me from their own knowledge. That answer is that operations are scheduled by prioritising patients who have suspected or diagnosed cancer. It is rare for a cancer operation to be cancelled for that reason. Since 1999, when I became Minister, there has been significant expansion in the number of intensive care and high-dependency unit beds. It has considerably reduced the problems caused by the lack of availability of critical care beds. I accept that, occasionally, during peak periods, it is possible that all intensive care and high-dependency unit beds can be filled, which can result in urgent operations being postponed. Although such procedures are usually rescheduled quickly, I am, of course, not happy that any operation can be affected by the lack of such beds.

Mr Hussey: With regard to the lack of intensive care unit beds, will the Minister clarify whether the major problem lies with the facility infrastructure or with the lack of staff? Will she also explain what action she is taking to remedy the problem?

Ms de Brún: As I have said, considerable work has been done to increase the number of intensive care and high-dependency unit beds. One of the first tasks that I undertook to do when I became Minister was to ask the Chief Medical Officer to review intensive care services. All 10 additional intensive care beds recommended by the Chief Medical Officer have been brought on-stream. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is clear that intensive care beds are available and staffed to support patients who require such care. However, the demand for those beds occasionally exceeds availability, and some operations might be temporarily delayed. As I said, immense action has been taken, given the cost of bringing on-stream both intensive care and high-dependency unit beds. It is not simply a question of funding; it is also a question of staff. When the Department examines how it can develop better services and the profile of each of the hospitals, it will also consider where intensive care and high-dependency provision needs to be.

Disabled Young People Leaving Education

3. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what assessment she can make of the difficulties faced by disabled young adults leaving full-time education, and to outline how she intends to address the issue. (AQO 80/02)

Day Care for Young People Leaving Special Schools

9. Mr Ford asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety how many young people who left special schools this summer have been provided with (i) full-time; (ii) part-time; and (iii) no day care by health and social services trusts. (AQO 95/02)

Day Care for School-Leavers with Learning Disabilities

13. Mr Gallagher asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether she plans to provide additional day-care services for school leavers and young adults with learning disabilities in the Dungannon area. (AQO 94/02)

Ms de Brún: Le do chead, a Cheann Comhairle, freagróidh mé ceisteanna 3, 9 agus 13 le chéile ós rud é go mbaineann siad leis an cheist chéanna.

With your permission, Mr Speaker, I shall take questions 3, 9 and 13 together, as they relate to the same issue.

Tá sé tábhachtach go mbíonn teacht ag aosaigh óga mhíchumasacha ar thacaíocht agus ar sheirbhísí fóirsteanacha nuair a fhágann siad oideachas lánaimseartha. Thiocfadh dó gur teacht é seo ar oideachas, oiliúint agus fostaíocht bhreise a bheadh i gceist, chomh maith le teacht ar ionaid lae aosach nó scéimeanna gníomhaíochta lae eile a reachtálaíonn iontaobhais sláinte agus seirbhísí sóisialta.

Éilíonn ‘Tosaíochtaí le haghaidh Gníomhaíochta 2000-03’ ar bhoird agus ar iontaobhais leanstan ar aghaidh ag forbairt seirbhísí chúram lae agus seirbhísí faoisimh do dhaoine le míchumas foghlama. Ar 3 Meán Fómhair bhuaile mé leis an Aire Oideachais agus leis an Aire Fostaíochta agus Foghlama le plé a dhéanamh ar cad é mar is féidir lenár Ranna agus lena ngníomhaireachtaí oibriú le chéile le freastal níos fearr a dhéanamh ar riachtanais na ndaoine óga seo. Iarradh ar fheidhmeannaigh tuairisc a thabhairt dúinn i mí na Samhna le moltaí.

It is important that disabled young adults have access to the appropriate range of services and support when they leave full-time education. That may be access to further education, training or employment, as well as access to adult day centres or other day activity schemes run by health and social services trusts. Priorities for action require boards and trusts to continue to develop the range of day-care and respite services for people with learning disabilities.

On 3 September, I met the Minister of Education and the Minister for Employment and Learning to discuss how our respective Departments and their agencies can work together to better meet the needs of those young people. Officials have been asked to report to us with proposals in November. Information on the numbers of young people who left special schools this summer, and the type of day care provided by health and social services trusts, has been placed in the Library.

As regards the development of day-care provision in the Dungannon area, I understand that the Southern Health and Social Services Board gave Armagh and Dungannon Health and Social Services Trust £68,000 in 1999-2000 for that purpose. A further £75,000 was allocated in 2002-03. The trust advises that the money was used to develop services in each of the four centres in the Dungannon area, especially the Aghnacloy day centre and the Oakridge Social Education Centre. The trust has reported that it is able to meet the day-care needs of special school leavers in that area.

Mr J Kelly: Does your Department require additional funding from the Executive if full day-care services for people with learning difficulties are to be developed?

Ms de Brún: I have bid for additional resources in the next spending round. Additional funding is needed for day care and, indeed, for a whole range of other health and social services. However, I was able to allocate a further, recurrent £300,000 to boards in June for wheelchair and day-care provision.

Given the pressures across the spectrum of health and social services, it is inevitable that difficult decisions must be taken about the allocation of funding. However, it is health and social services' responsibility to provide day care for those young people who are unable, because of their disability, to access further education, training or employment. Many young people do not want a day-care place and aspire to do the same things as their non-disabled peers.

Mr Ford: I thank the Minister for her response to my question, although I regret that she could not supply the statistics for which I asked.

No matter what the Minister might say about young people who may or may not want a place in day care, is it not a fact that there is a huge demand — indeed, requirement — for day-care places, both from young people with learning disabilities and from their parents? It is not a crisis that is thrust upon the Minister at the last minute, as people tend to reach the age of 19 gradually over a period of years. Why can priority not be given to that important area when other services, such as acute hospitals, seem to get a much easier acceptance from the Department?

Ms de Brún: In relation to the Member's regret about the provision of information, I have placed that information in the Library. Members must accept that I am restricted by time when answering questions, and that asking specific questions with more than one part, which requires detailed information, makes that rather difficult.

Six people are currently not receiving day care. Of those, one is due to receive day care shortly, initially part-time, but that will be increased to full-time care as soon as possible; one was referred to the trust only on 4 September and has yet to have a needs assessment; and another person's parents were adamant that they did not want any day-care arrangements.

As I have said, I accept that additional funding is needed, and I have given additional funding to boards this year. Like all other Ministers, I must consistently bid for funding, and I shall continue to do so. I have given much more in that area than has been given for quite some time, although I accept that much more needs to be done.

Mr Fee: I welcome the Minister's confirmation that a cross-departmental approach will be taken. Will her Department take the lead in examining the issue of young people with disabilities who have left full-time education or specialist schools? Will she examine the quality of the accommodation in day-care centres, the facilities and equipment, the number of support staff available, and training provision for staff and parents?

Ms de Brún: The Minister of Education took the lead in organising our meeting with the Minister for Employment and Learning. I am happy to report that the discussion was positive. It was not a case of pass the parcel. We discussed how each Minister could contribute to the future of people who leave special schools.

My Department's remit covers the provision of services for those who are unable to access further education, training or employment because of disability. I have included the expansion of day-care services as a service development priority this year, and some of the additional funding allocated to boards for the development of community services is available for that purpose. However, it is important that we examine how our respective Departments and agencies can work together to better meet the needs of those young people.

Rev Dr William McCrea: Does the Minister agree that no other society forces its young people out of full-time education at the age of 19? Although many of those young people have the bodies of 19-year-olds, they can have mental ages of seven or eight. Where else are children forced out of full-time education at that age? Why are those young people discriminated against by not being allowed to continue in full-time education? Many adult centres are totally inappropriate for children of that age. They fossilize rather than further themselves, while other children are permitted to develop. Can the Minister find a way to give those children the same access to education, learning and employment that other children have?

Ms de Brún: I cannot say who does or does not have the right to education, because that is not within my area of responsibility. However, the Ministers and officials at the meeting made it clear that we want to examine overall needs and centre our work on the needs of individuals to ensure that they do not fall between two stools — or in this case three, given that three different Departments are involved.

I also accept that, although facility-based day care may meet the needs of some people, provision must offer choice. Boards, therefore, prefer to develop a range of day care with several providers, including those from the voluntary sector, to develop innovative, locally based schemes, which have been particularly beneficial in some areas. That is a more inclusive response to the day-care needs of today's young people.

Ambulance Service Grievance Procedure

4. Mr M Murphy asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, subsequent to delays in the processing of a grievance procedure relating to the shift rota at Kilkeel ambulance station, whether the Ambulance Service is required to adhere to any standards for the processing of such procedure. (AQO 78/02)

Ms de Brún: Tá a cuid nósanna imeachta inmheánacha féin ag an tSeirbhís Otharchairr le déileáil le gearáin fostaithe. Leagann siad sin amach amchlár soiléir mar threoirle le déileáil le céimeanna éagsúla na nósanna imeachta.

Tuigim go raibh moill dhosheachanta ann roinnt uaireanta i bpróiseáil gearáin faoi phatrúin sealanna a thóg foireann Stáisiún Otharchairr Chill Chaoil níos luaithe i mbliana. Tharla an mhoill mar gheall ar chastacht na ceiste agus cionnas nach raibh fáil ar go leor foirne le painéal achomhairc a chur le chéile ag an am.

The Ambulance Service has its own procedures for dealing with grievances raised by employees. Clear time-tables are set as guidelines to deal with various stages of the procedures. I understand that earlier this year there were several unavoidable delays in the processing of a grievance about shift patterns that was raised by staff at Kilkeel ambulance station. Those delays were partly because of the nature and complexity of the issue and partly because of the unavailability of key staff to constitute an appeals panel during the period in question. Although the grievance was not upheld, the Ambulance Service has given the staff at Kilkeel an undertaking to review urgently the shift patterns.

Mr M Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answer, and I am delighted to hear of the review. Will the Minister ensure that management listens to those at the coalface of accident and emergency care, and takes seriously their recommendations to improve the service rather than stick to the old, familiar ways? They are inadequate and endanger the welfare of patients.

Ms de Brún: Given the decision to refer the matter of shift patterns to the joint consultative negotiating committee for urgent consideration next month, it is clear that the service wishes to listen to staff, and that it accepts that there should be fair treatment and a consistency of approach for all staff.

Breast and Cervical Screening

5. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether she will consider offering breast and cervical screening to all women over 40. (AQO 93/02)

Ms de Brún: Faoi láthair, tugtar cuireadh do gach bean idir 50 bliain d'aois agus 64 bliana d'aois dul faoi scagthástáil cheirbheacsach gach trí bliana. Ní thacaíonn toradh an taighde atá ar fáil go nuige scagthástáil a thabhairt isteach do mhná faoi 50. Seo dearcadh an Choiste Scagthástála a thugann comhairle do na hAíri Sláinte anseo agus i Sasana, Albain agus sa Bhreatain Bheag.

The programme invites women between the ages of 50 and 64 for breast screening every three years. To date, research evidence available does not support the introduction of breast screening for women under 50. That is the view of the screening committee, which advises Health Ministers here, in England, in Scotland and in Wales.

Ms Lewsley: I thank the Minister for her answer. What was the date of the most recent figures given to her Department? Would new figures not prove that the detection of more women over 40 might be relevant to the question that Monica McWilliams asked earlier about operations?

Ms de Brún: The reason for not introducing breast screening for women under 50 is that, in the view of the screening committee, there is a difficulty. The evidence available was assessed, and it is not at all clear that its introduction would lead to better detection. Mammograms, or X-rays of the breast, in women under 50 are much more difficult to interpret compared to those of women over 50. The breast tissue in women under 50 is more dense, thus making the X-ray difficult to read. Furthermore, the consistency of breast tissue in pre-menopausal women changes throughout each month, and that could result in an unacceptable level of false positives and false negatives.

Ms Ramsey: Will the Minister examine why the breast-screening service does not apply to women over 64?

3.30 pm

Ms de Brún: The extension of the breast-screening programme to women aged between 65 and 70 would increase the workload by approximately 40% and would require additional staff and finance. It is to be hoped that, in the coming year, I will be able to allocate funding for that purpose.

Mr Speaker: We have run out of time for questions to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

FINANCE AND PERSONNEL

Mr Speaker: Question 2, in the name of Mr John Dallat, has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Needs and Effectiveness Evaluation Studies

1. Ms Ramsey asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to make a statement on the current position of the needs and effectiveness evaluation studies.

(AQO 86/02)

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): Five needs and effectiveness evaluations are being considered by the relevant Assembly Committees. They cover health and social care, education, financial assistance to industry, housing and vocational education and training. Further work has been undertaken on English expenditure figures provided by the Treasury. Such figures give us the comparators against which to assess our spending. Departments are being advised of the outcome of that work so that it can be taken into account in the consideration of the material.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

Ms Ramsey: The needs and effectiveness study now with the Committee highlighted that the Health Service is seriously underfunded. Will that be reflected in the forthcoming Budget?

Dr Farren: The needs and effectiveness evaluation reports are important documents to be considered when finalising the forthcoming Budget, and they will help the Executive to make the best use of their resources. Health is an important priority, which has been emphasised in previous Budgets. The priority that we give to health and the results of the needs and effectiveness evaluations must be taken into account when we decide the Budget allocations.

Spending Review

3. Mrs Courtney asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the key elements of the spending review and the implications for Northern Ireland.

(AQO 101/02)

Dr Farren: The Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the outcome of the national spending review on 15 July 2002, and the Executive are considering its implications for Northern Ireland and how best to allocate the additional resources. The spending review provided Northern Ireland with additional resources, based on the Barnett formula, of approximately £148 million for 2003-04; £507 million for 2004-05; and £930 million for 2005-06. Northern Ireland also received non-Barnett additions for ring-fenced items such as the European Union Special Support Fund for Peace and Reconciliation (EUSPPR). A draft Budget containing the Executive's assessment and proposals will be presented to the Assembly on 24 September 2002.

Mrs Courtney: Will additional resources target the Assembly's agreed priority areas?

Dr Farren: The Executive's position report presented to the Assembly on 5 June 2002 outlines the key issues that affect public services. Based on the comments received from departmental Committees and other interested parties, the Executive are considering the best allocation of resources. As I said earlier, the Budget will be presented next week.

I will outline the process thereafter. The draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget will be presented next week. In October and early November the Committee for Finance and Personnel will take evidence from other Committees on the draft Budget. That will be followed by a take-note debate on the subject, and the revised Budget will be presented to the Assembly for debate and vote in early December.

Wet Weather Payments for Farmers

4. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what consultation has taken place with the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development on wet weather payments for farmers. (AQO 99/02)

Dr Farren: I met the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development last week, and she raised the issue of wet weather payments for farmers. Her Department is reviewing the situation and will be unable to assess the position until the autumn, when the growing season has ended. The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and I have agreed that she will keep the issue under review, and, indeed, she has written to Executive Colleagues to advise them of the matter.

Mr Poots: I am surprised that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development raised the issue only last week; perhaps she did so because she knew that there would be a question to be answered this week. Is the Minister of Finance and Personnel aware of the severe problems that farmers have faced, and still face, as a result of the wet weather earlier this year? Does he realise that harvests are substantially down on previous years and that farmers are in hardship and crisis? What assistance can he offer to the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development so that she can deliver help to the rural community?

Dr Farren: I am aware of the situation from my own observation and through direct contact with members of the farming community. I am sure that the Minister did not first consider wet weather payments last week. She advised me that she was reviewing the matter then, but that followed ongoing consideration of the matter by her and her officials in recent months. As I suggested in my initial answer, when the position becomes clear, then, and only then, can decisions be taken about allocations under the wet weather payments scheme.

Lord Kilclooney: The farming industry has suffered badly as a result of various diseases over the past few years, and the situation has been made much worse this year by the atrocious weather. Will the Minister of Finance and Personnel assure the House that if the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development agrees that there should be an application to the European Commission for wet weather payments, she will have his Department's full support? Should such an application to Brussels be successful, will he tell the House whether it will be funded entirely from the European Commission, entirely from the Northern Ireland allocation, or from both? If a wet weather payment scheme proceeds, will payments be made to the agriculture industry generally in Northern Ireland or to individual farmers?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Minister that he should answer only one of those questions.

Dr Farren: I thank the Member for the three invitations to speculate on what action would be sought from the Executive on a situation that might arise. I hesitate to become involved in such speculation, but in my previous response I said that I am aware of the situation that has been affecting the agriculture industry. However, my Colleague, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development must advise me about the precise situation as regards wet weather payments.

Mr Bradley: I will try to ask a question that Mr Taylor may have left out. There are currently no central EU funds from which the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development can bid for aid. Will the Minister, therefore, assure the Assembly that he will be sympathetic to any bids from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to address the problem?

Dr Farren: My role is to consider bids by all my Colleagues. Bids from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development will be given careful and sympathetic consideration, in line with that approach.

Water Charges

5. Mr Molloy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to detail (a) any plans to introduce water charges; and (b) whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed a view on water charging; and to make a statement.

Dr Farren: There are no plans to introduce water charges. The Minister for Regional Development is considering the future organisation of the Water Service. His proposals will have important implications for the future financing and structure of water and sewerage services. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not directly expressed a view on water charging here.

Mr Molloy: Is there European pressure on the Minister to introduce water charges? Will he take into account the TSN policy and the effect of the imposition of water charges on those with larger families who use more water, and those who live in deprived areas? It is important that services should be freely available, as charges would be detrimental to them.

Dr Farren: I am aware of the European Directives, but responsibility for responding to Directives on water quality and sewerage lies with the Minister for Regional Development and the Minister of the Environment. As with all the members of the Executive, I am aware of the need to bear the TSN policy in mind, whenever or wherever policies are being developed.

Mr Close: Does the Minister agree that the introduction of water metering would conserve water? Does he also agree that it would dispel the myth, prevalent throughout Northern Ireland, that people receive their water free of charge?

Dr Farren: That question must be directed to the Minister responsible for the Water Service, not the Minister of Finance and Personnel.

Mr Byrne: Will the Minister confirm that there are no current plans or intentions to introduce a system of direct water metering charges for domestic householders in Northern Ireland?

Dr Farren: The consultation document on the review of the rating system includes a section on the future financing of the Water Service. Having read it, they will be aware that the Executive have ruled out any proposal for the introduction of water meters.

Strategic Resources Shift

6. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what plans are being developed to ensure a strategic shift in resources across Departments in 2003-04 and future years. (AQO 84/02)

Dr Farren: The Executive are considering the development and annual revision of the Programme for Government, which will inform our budgetary decisions, and seek to develop a collective direction involving agreed priorities, based on our assessment of where the greatest needs lie across the 11 Departments. We will take account of the outcome of the national spending review and the responses to the consultation that followed the publication of the Executive's June position report. Next week, a draft Budget containing our assessments and proposed spending plans will be presented to the Assembly, alongside the revised Programme for Government. At that stage, Members and Committees will have a full opportunity to engage in the process before the revised Budget is presented to the Assembly for a debate and vote on it in early December.

Mr J Kelly: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive reply. Am I to take it from his response that this plan will end the large underspending of the past couple of years? Will it ensure that those Departments that need the money will get it, rather than have certain Departments bidding for more funding than they need?

Dr Farren: If Mr Kelly is implying that any funds are allocated without proper consideration of the business plans associated with the expenditure in question, I must dispel that belief. Before the summer, I presented the Assembly with an outline of how I intend to deal with the problem of underspending. Several Members, and the Committee for Finance and Personnel in particular, have been quite exercised about this, and action to address it is under consideration as part of the process of formulating the draft Budget.

Financing our Future

7. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for a timetable on the implementation of 'Financing our Future'. (AQO 103/02)

Dr Farren: On 21 May, I announced to the Assembly the Executive's launch of a consultation exercise, 'Financing our Future', which focused primarily on the report by the working group on the opportunities for public-private partnerships (PPPs) in Northern Ireland. The consultation period, lasting some 18 weeks, has, to date, been proactive and constructive. It has included several public meetings and discussions with organisations, including representatives from the trade union movement, the business community and the voluntary sector. The process continues with today's debate and ongoing engagement with Committees. The consultation period ends on 20 September, when detailed consideration and an evaluation of comments and written submissions will begin. The findings will be submitted to the Executive later this year, and they will make a final decision on a policy framework for PPPs in Northern Ireland.

Ms Lewsley: Has consideration been given to the Committee for Finance and Personnel's report on PPPs?

Dr Farren: I thank the Member for her supplementary question, which reminds us of the significant work undertaken by the Committee on public-private partnerships. The Committee's report made a useful and significant contribution to the discussion on the use of PPPs to fund public services. As part of the consultation process for the working group's report, account was taken of responses to the Committee for Finance and Personnel's report. In formulating their final policy on the opportunities for using public-private partnerships, the Executive will take account of the PPP working group's report and the Committee's report.

Procurement Policy

8. Mr Attwood asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what progress has been made in implementing the new procurement policy. (AQO 102/02)

Dr Farren: Since the announcement of the new procurement policy on 27 May 2001, the procurement board has met and agreed its terms of reference and approved the establishment of a procurement practitioners' group, which will assist the development of policy. It has also approved a work plan for the central procurement directorate for the period up to March 2003. The next meeting of the board is scheduled for early December, at which a plan for implementing all recommendations of the procurement review team will be tabled for discussion.

Mr Attwood: I acknowledge this bold and imaginative initiative by the Minister — an effort to ensure that public procurement becomes a mechanism to address long-term unemployment and disadvantage. However, the Minister will be aware that there were only four proposals for pilot schemes to the public procurement board two weeks ago, despite the fact that 20 were hoped for. Can the Minister reassure the Assembly that permanent secretaries will redouble their efforts to ensure that contracts of sufficient volume, value and impact are identified and forwarded to the public procurement board for consideration as a pilot scheme?

Dr Farren: This is an important issue, and the idea of working through a series of pilot schemes is central to achieving the social dimension to procurement policy — helping the long-term unemployed in particular. As suggested by the procurement review team, Departments have initially been asked to submit capital work projects with a value above the European Union tendering threshold of £3.8 million, or service projects with a value above £500,000. Some Departments have stated that they have no such projects available in the current financial year, and so far only five projects have been identified for inclusion in the scheme. My officials are working closely with all Departments to ensure that we achieve our target of 20 projects.

Mr C Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister for Regional Development, in a written reply to Mr Attwood, appears to be quite sceptical, if not openly hostile, to the idea of using procurement policy for some of the benefits that the Minister has outlined. What authority will the Minister or the procurement team have in this regard, given that the Department for Regional Development is a huge spender and is heavily involved in public procurement?

Dr Farren: Views differ on this issue, but it is clearly set down and endorsed by the Executive that procurement policy should have this clear social dimension. I will be working with my officials and ministerial Colleagues to ensure that this objective is achieved across all Departments. I am conscious of the considerable scale of expenditure for which the Minister for Regional Development is responsible.

Review of Rating Policy

9. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to provide an update on the review of rating policy. (AQO 119/02)

Dr Farren: I announced the launch of the consultation stage of the review of rating policy on 27 May 2002. A dedicated web site has since gone online, and three public conferences have been held. There has also been a series of meetings with groups, organisations and district councils. Furthermore, evidence has been given to the Committee for Finance and Personnel, the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, and the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development. Consultation ends in mid-September, but I have decided to extend the deadline for Committees and district councils until 7 October. The consultation period will be followed by an assessment of responses. I hope to present a report on identified options to the Executive later this year. If significant change is endorsed, the legislative process will commence in 2003.

Dr McDonnell: It is important that the public have a say on the issue. Only last week, I took part in a seminar run by the Federation of Small Businesses in the Long Gallery, at which those present participated eagerly and expressed their views. Can the Minister give us a flavour of the public response to the consultation so far?

Dr Farren: I appreciate the curiosity about statements at those meetings. Members will fully appreciate that it is taking officials some time to collate and tabulate all the reactions, comments and recommendations made during the consultation.

I will, however, give a flavour of what has transpired. In June three public consultation conferences were held in Enniskillen, Belfast and Derry to discuss domestic and non-domestic rating issues. Representatives from local businesses, district and borough councils, public sector bodies and the voluntary sector attended the conferences, as did members of the public. Total attendances were disappointing. However, since the web site went live, it has been visited on more than 17,400 occasions, resulting in the consultation paper being downloaded more than 7,000 times. Clearly, society is availing of electronic communication to a greater extent than it is attending consultation meetings.

Several meetings were held with specific interest groups, including the Association of Local Government Finance Officers, charitable groups, the business sector and trade union groups. Two forums were held during August, with the landed professions — estate agents, valuers and surveyors — and with district council personnel through the Northern Ireland Local Government Association.

In addition, by mid-September the head of the Rating Policy Branch will have addressed council meetings in Fermanagh, Castlereagh and Omagh. Meetings have also been held with the Northern Ireland Federation of Clubs, the Confederation of British Industry, the Northern Ireland Independent Retailers' Association, the Northern Ireland Voluntary Association and the Federation of Small Businesses. A wrap-up conference has been organised for 23 September in Belfast.

We have attempted to consult widely, and many organisations and groups have approached us seeking the attendance of officials to explain the issues. I trust that the consultation process has been as comprehensive as possible during the past few months.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Beggs): The Minister has outlined that a wide range of business interests and professional groups have responded to date. Can he advise Members of the degree of the response from domestic ratepayers to date? Would he acknowledge that a greater public response would be expected if more details were available of how the changes might ultimately affect individual households? Why was such indicative information not included in the consultation paper?

Dr Farren: Although many organisations might appear to represent the non-domestic sector, every representative is resident somewhere, and, I imagine, interested in domestic rates. All aspects of the review were considered. I am reasonably assured that as comprehensive an opportunity as possible has been afforded to both domestic and non-domestic interests to address the issues.

The amount of downloading from and the number of visits to the web site show the high volume of interest across both areas.

4.00 pm

Ouseley Report on the Review of the Senior Civil Service

10. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether he will make public the findings of the Ouseley Report on the review of the Senior Civil Service. (AQO 98/02)

Dr Farren: The report and consultation document on the appointment and promotion procedures for the Senior Civil Service was made available to the public on 9 July as part of the consultation process. It is not a question of when the report will be published; it was published some time ago.

Mr McCarthy: When will the Minister's Department act on the report's findings? The longer it fails to act, the more the staff in the Civil Service will be discriminated against when they reach 60.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is impossible for the Minister to give Mr McCarthy a full answer in the time allowed, and I am sure that he will receive a written answer.

Mr Close: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister of Finance and Personnel to refer me to the Minister for Regional Development to find out whether the Minister of Finance and Personnel agrees with a concept under water charges?

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is entirely appropriate for a Minister to refer you to another Minister if he feels that that is right.

Mr Close: To find out whether he agrees with something?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Mr Close.

REVIEW OF OPPORTUNITIES FOR PUBLIC-PRIVATE PARTNERSHIPS IN NORTHERN IRELAND

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly notes the Report of the Review of Opportunities for Public-Private Partnerships in Northern Ireland and the Executive's consultation process on 'Financing our Future'. — [The First Minister (Mr Trimble).]

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It was heartening to hear the First Minister say earlier that private finance initiatives (PFI) or public-private partnerships (PPP) are not a panacea and to hear other Members say that they are not the only horse or show in town. I was afraid that those of us who opposed PFI might be accused of being Luddites.

The Conservative British Government of John Major launched PFI in 1992, and the original motivation behind it was to reduce public expenditure in Britain at a time in the early 1990s when public borrowing was perceived to be out of control.

The British public sector budget had a surplus of £20 billion in 2001, but that did not inhibit the uncontrolled progression of PFI. One would expect that, with that huge surplus, the critical issue of public expenditure would be well under control. However, it seems that PFI has become a means of replacing public expenditure rather than adding to public services.

There are enormous questions around PFI that have not been studied, answered or resolved. Everyone seems to take the view that "if the money is there, why not use it?" However, they have not considered the serious consequences. The First Minister said that he had met school teachers and others who considered PFI to be praiseworthy, as it allowed them more time to run their schools rather than be concerned about replacing old buildings, about the fabric of the building, or about looking for new buildings.

However, the British Medical Association said that, apart from the evidence on beds and doctor numbers, PFI health provision has led to questioning every service provided. As a result, prolonged and expensive treatments have been withdrawn, and care is concentrated on patients who are broadly healthy rather than on the chronically sick. Expensive treatments such as maternity and accident and emergency treatments are reduced. Those who can afford to buy insurance get private treatment, while those who cannot must wait for services that may never materialise. The number of people who die while on waiting lists for cancer care is a case in point.

In effect, PFI acts to put profit before people. It therefore acts to undermine the very foundations of socialised medicine and social services. That is at the core of my objection to PFI. Trade unions and workers in Scotland have successfully campaigned on the basis of their objections to keep workers out of PFI contracts so that they cannot be transferred to the private sector against their will. In Wales, ancillary workers such as cleaners and meal workers have simply been classified as clinical staff, which enables them to remain in the public sector under existing rules.

Yet officials in the Northern Department of Education are reportedly still telling education and library boards that all PFI projects must include the transfer of employees, who are, once again, primarily cleaners and meal workers. The privatisation of workers is the greatest source of private profit in many PFI projects, and there must be a strong suspicion that those who favour PFI are concerned that their projects will not be attractive enough to the private sector unless workers are transferred or made redundant. The protection of public sector workers may be the most important immediate task of the campaign against PFI.

The unions here said:

“We are still gravely concerned with regard to the insufficient time and resources allocated to exploring alternative sources of funding such as Not For Profit, the USA experience, and Bond Finance.”

Those unions are the most vocal against PFI. Seamus Close said that public money is cheaper, but public responsibility is a major factor in how we approach the notion of PFI. We are not against increased spending on public utilities such as schools, hospitals and roads. However, we question whether it is cheaper to do that through public funding or through PFI. I argue that the latter is certainly more expensive. The evidence so far will confirm the notion that privately financed projects are more expensive than those funded publicly.

The strategic investment body is, I believe, the driver behind PFI. Have the voluntary sector and the unions been consulted on the matter? There are issues of accountability and planning. Where PFI has been introduced, the planning of public services has effectively been carried out by private companies without there being adequate accountability. For example, hospital bed numbers are reduced to make plans affordable without any concern for the knock-on effects for other parts of the Health Service.

The British Medical Association has shown that the health trusts running the first 14 hospitals in Britain that were built under PFI will lose a total of 3,700 beds, and that, on average, bed numbers will decline by 31%. A study carried out by a consultancy company that works for the NHS trusts and the Department of Health found that every £200 million spent on privately financed hospitals would result in the loss of 1,000 doctors and nurses. In essence, PFI drains money away from areas that need it more, thus increasing health inequalities.

We must take a serious view of PFI. There must be more consultation, particularly with the unions involved. For example, the Irish National Teachers' Organisation (INTO) has opposed PFI throughout Ireland. The INTO has not been adequately consulted about the effects of PFI's introduction on its members. Nor has there been sufficient consultation with trade unions in services such as hospitals and the public sector bodies that we have mentioned.

The main conclusion is that PFI is one of the most important social and economic policy challenges that the Irish people face. Attempts by both the Dublin and British Governments to displace public spending on important social projects with private finance would have a damaging impact on the fabric of our society, both now and in the future.

Private finance holds out the politically attractive prospect of “free money” with which to provide popular projects now. That is an illusion, because the profit motive and the bargaining expertise of business, not to mention the possibility of corruption, mean that society will pay greater costs in the future for the “free money” that politicians seek today.

It will be difficult to explain to the people who seek and deserve new hospitals and schools that PFI is an unnecessary illusion, but the resources that are required to provide for social needs must be made available. The Government have those resources, or can get them through more equitable fiscal policies, such as fair taxation, or through alternative ways to raise money, such as the issue of bonds.

We should not be deluded by PFI or PPP into thinking that this so-called “free money” will solve all our problems. Until we have a proper and comprehensive consultation and a thorough examination of experiences elsewhere, we should exercise caution in coming to any definitive conclusions about the benefits of PFI.

Mr A Maginness: The debate has been interesting, and there has been a degree of maturity in the Chamber on the subject of PPP, at least until Mr Kelly's speech. Most Members have refrained from simply opposing a proposition out of financial orthodoxy. We have refrained from applying a sort of financial fundamentalism to public administration and finance. However, listening to Mr Kelly's speech, I became confused as to whether he was a member of Sinn Féin or a member of some other party.

The reality is that the Sinn Féin Ministers are the most dedicated to PPP and PFI. They are the people who have most relied on PPP. It is a matter between Mr Kelly and his Colleagues in Sinn Féin as to whether those differences can be satisfactorily reconciled. Listening to his speech, I could not believe that they could possibly be reconciled. However, that is a political problem for Sinn Féin.

Mr J Kelly: I do not know whether Mr Maginness has been listening. I was attempting to say that we must look at PPP and PFI more critically than we have done before. I am, and will continue to be, a member of Sinn Féin — [Interruption].

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr J Kelly: What I have said does not conflict with anything that the Sinn Féin Ministers have done so far. All we are saying is that we should have a critical look at PFI, and not accept it, as the First Minister said this morning, as some kind of panacea.

Mr A Maginness: I am sure that Mr Martin McGuinness and Ms Bairbre de Brún are relieved that Mr Kelly is now in line with the Sinn Féin approach to PPP and PFI. Alarm bells may not be sounding in Sinn Féin over Mr Kelly's previous remarks, given that he has entered quite a strict qualification on his previous propositions to the House.

Members can check the record on that.

4.15 pm

The SDLP's position on PPPs is not one of financial orthodoxy or financial fundamentalism. We accept that there is a need for PPPs, but it is qualified, not absolute. Strict conditions should be imposed. It is important that there is value for money. There is no point in having PPPs if they only serve to indulge the private sector and allow it to make excessive profits out of the system of public finance.

It is essential that there be enhanced value for the money used in PPPs. That money must be additional to public finances, rather than a substitute for them. The SDLP also believes that the benefits of efficiency and effectiveness should compensate the public for the outlay. Our goal is to see high quality public services that give value to everyone. If PPPs do not deliver that extra efficiency and effectiveness, they are a waste of time.

The SDLP also wants to see the protection of workers' rights in PPPs. We want transparency in how the Government decide on PPPs, undertake the selection process, and agree their contractual terms and conditions.

I share the reservations expressed by other Members in the debate, as does my party. I have reservations about the length, complexity and size of contracts. We want PPP contracts to be properly controlled; we cannot give the private sector contracts that allow it to evade proper responsibility.

The SDLP would like to see the Department of Finance and Personnel and the Executive explore the option of voluntary, or not-for-profit, bodies or companies for the public services. The Executive should also be exploring the use of bonds.

All types of enterprise involve some risk and some burden on our citizens, but there is nevertheless a variety of funding solutions for Northern Ireland.

As Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development, I re-emphasise that there has been an enormous deficit in our road network, public transportation system and water service for the past 30 years. That deficit is grave and challenging, and both Members and Executive Ministers have a duty to address it. That duty includes exploring PPPs and PFIs to find out whether they can assist us in trying to remove that deficit so that we can rebuild public services in Northern Ireland. We need a cocktail of options, not only one source of public funding.

The SDLP also welcomes the creation of a strategic investment body, which will be useful in monitoring what is being done and in targeting what should be done. That body will be crucial in developing future public services.

The reinvestment and reform initiative, which was negotiated by the Deputy First Minister and the British Treasury, has been mentioned. Everyone welcomes that: it gives the Government greater flexibility as regards public finance. It will help us to rebuild public services and our physical infrastructure; however, it will not be the final solution to our problems. It will be of limited use because we need an income stream for it to be used effectively. It is essential that we do not overburden the ratepayer; that would be grossly unfair. Therefore, there is a limit to the reinvestment and reform initiative, and Members should bear that in mind. There are no easy options in relation to public finance. However, the SDLP believes that Members should explore as many aspects of public finance as possible.

We must explore PPPs and PFIs and apply them in the terms that I have outlined. In the Republic, PPPs and PFIs are used to rebuild the roads structure and transportation system. Some 1.2 billion euros, which is 20% of the road building programme, and 80 million euros, which is 13% of public transport, are PPP-based. Therefore, it is not only in Britain that PPPs are being used effectively. Our neighbours in the South also use them effectively, and we should explore that situation further. The Executive and the Minister of Finance and Personnel are right to come to the House to seek Members' views. We should give a guarded welcome to the report.

Dr O'Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It is a pity that a good debate was marred by cheap shots from Alban Maginness — I suppose that has more to do with the fact that Members are in election campaign mode than anything else. The Ministers are, unfortunately, working within financial constraints, and the British Treasury is pushing us down a particular road.

Sinn Féin is not alone in voicing concerns about the move towards reliance on private finance initiatives and public-private partnerships to finance public capital building programmes and the provision of public services. Sinn Féin, through the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, Mr Molloy, instigated an inquiry into PPPs and alternative ways to finance much-needed investment in public services, such as in hospitals, schools and infrastructure. That inquiry found that the best way to finance public services was through the public purse, using funds generated by general taxation, and, fundamentally, that public services should remain under public control.

Unfortunately, neither the review of opportunities for PPPs nor the Executive's consultation on 'Financing Our Future' have explored the full range of procurement and financial options. For example, the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU) statement to the review shows that the trade unions share that concern. It says:

"We are still gravely concerned with regard to the insufficient time and resources allocated to exploring alternative sources of funding such as Not For Profit, the USA experience and Bond Finance."

We can look for explanations from around the world, and we can call the initiative PPP, PFI or anything we want, but it is privatisation of our public services to a greater or lesser degree. The Assembly is being pushed into accepting that option. We must remember the key point, which is that the public sector can borrow at a more favourable rate than the private sector. We must look seriously at alternatives. I shall suggest a few, but it is for the Executive to examine them.

Mr A Maginness: The Member said that PPP was a form of privatisation, but it is an alternative form of public financing. It is really an alternative form of borrowing by the Government. Naturally, it has implications for workers and those involved in service delivery, but we must ask whether we would have the specialist cancer centre without PPP. If that centre is established in Belfast, will you regard it as a privatised cancer service?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that they must put questions through the Chair.

Dr O'Hagan: We all recognise the difficulties and the constraints under which we must operate. Every Minister in the Executive is faced with the choice of whether to go down the road of PPP or PFI to provide essential services. My party and others argue that we should examine alternative means. We should not have to choose between PPP and nothing.

The people who carry out the review must look seriously at alternatives. For example, we should examine the possibility of the Assembly's borrowing from external bodies such as the European Investment Bank.

Of course, that should be subject to sensible economic calculations, such as expected changes in exchange rates. The problem is that British Treasury rules disallow all public bodies here from doing that. In European terms, that is highly unusual, and it is a tight restriction on the autonomy of public bodies, without any economic basis. If special provisions can be made for the North to borrow from the British Treasury, which the 2002 Brown/Blair initiative introduced, they should be extended to allow the Assembly to decide when, where and from whom to borrow.

4.30 pm

Public bonds were also mentioned. Why should the Assembly not be able to sell bonds to the public at a guaranteed rate of return over several years? Public bonds have been suggested as a possible way to fund the London Underground, and they are regularly used by US cities to fund major projects. Crucially for our purposes, the British Treasury recently waived its opposition to bonds in order to allow Wales to modernise its water supply through that source of finance. Glas Cymru, a non-profit public company issued £2 billion worth of bonds to buy the utility that supplies water and sewerage services to Wales.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Dr O'Hagan: I have already given way; I prefer to speak.

Public bonds are preferable to PFIs because lower rates of interest can be charged and public bodies can borrow at lower rates. Most importantly, capital investment projects such as hospitals and schools remain under full public ownership and management. In the case of Glas Cymru, bond funding was accompanied by an innovative management incentive scheme. The emphasis is on reducing the cost of provision by ploughing savings back into lower user fees, and managers are paid bonuses if they reduce costs to the public. That is the opposite of PFIs, which give incentives to managers to realise profits at the expense of the public and the workforce.

All parties here should campaign to persuade the British Treasury that we should have tax-raising and tax-varying powers to give the Assembly much more freedom to operate financially.

Mr J Kelly: Does the Member agree with my earlier statement that, despite a surplus of £20 billion in 2001, the British Exchequer continued to use PFI to replace public expenditure instead of adding to it? Would she also agree, in case I am accused of being a Luddite by Alban Maginness, that professional associations, such as the British Medical Association, oppose PFI? It was described in the British Medical Journal as "perfidious financial idiocy" that could "destroy the NHS". The Chartered Institute of Public Finance Accountants, the National Audit Office and the House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts and the Health Committee have also criticised PFI in Britain.

Dr O'Hagan: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I agree with his comments.

Mr A Maginness: I assume that tax-raising powers will involve taxing people's income or taxation in some other form. Does the Member suggest that taxes here should be increased — that the taxpayer here should pay more than in other places?

Dr O'Hagan: I am not suggesting any such thing. Tax-raising and tax-varying powers would give the Assembly much more financial freedom to operate.

Unfortunately, PFIs and PPPs are central to the British Government's plans for transforming the economy. They are inextricably linked to the Budget, the Barnett formula, the reinvestment and reform initiative, the strategic investment body, increases in rates, and the imminent introduction of water charges.

It is part of an effort by the British Treasury to tighten its control of our fiscal policy and to privatise public services. It is an agenda that is not being effectively resisted by an Executive dominated by the orthodox SDLP and UUP.

We do not have economic sovereignty; unfortunately it is subject to shrinking financial resources and unduly restrictive policy planning rules laid down by the British Government, which seriously compromise the capacity of the Northern Executive to meet local needs. The Assembly merely administers British Government policy within already set and extremely tight financial constraints and guidelines.

With regard to this report and 'Financing Our Future', I ask the Executive to go back to the drawing board, give us more alternatives, and let us try to be more imaginative in our approach.

Mr Hussey: I realise that the best funding that the Assembly can have is directly from the public sector. However, if I needed somewhere to live, but could not afford to pay for a house, I could rent one, take out a mortgage, or seek some sort of finance. There is a tremendous deficit in the overall infrastructure of Northern Ireland, which must be addressed. The Assembly must consider the current review of the possibility of PPPs and the different ways of using them.

I want to deal with four issues that arose during the debate. First, when the Committee for Finance and Personnel visited England, it saw that the Department of Health had a central unit that assisted health trusts to formulate contracts, including specifications, risk transfers, financial models, legal issues, and so on. It had a centre of excellence and expertise. We need to develop such a centre in Northern Ireland.

Many of our Departments have PPP units replicating costs, particularly for consultancy. Would it not be better to employ consultants to provide financial and legal expertise on a permanent in-house basis as in the Department of Health? The development of a centre of excellence, which could develop the necessary expertise, should be wholly cross-departmental.

Secondly, people have referred to the private sector gaining profit through PPPs. Naturally the private sector will not get involved in this for philanthropic reasons; it will seek to make a return on its investment. The private sector will make a profit regardless of whether we use conventional finance, the reinvestment and reform initiative or PPPs. However, we should not allow the private sector to lead the process or tell us when projects should commence. More especially, the private sector should not tell us which projects we should undertake. We must take the lead in all projects.

Thirdly, I want to deal with asset management. Mr Beggs and I have tabled questions about Northern Ireland's assets. The public sector has many various assets and, perhaps, we are not making the best use of them. Some might not be suitable for the purpose for which they are being utilised; others may be doing nothing for us. For instance, are our schools big enough, and will they be big enough in the future? What is the true condition of our water and sewerage systems? How much will it cost to bring them up to standard? There is now a cost to capital through resource accounting and budgeting. We need to know whether the concept that public finance is cheaper than private finance still applies, or how much difference there is. For example, what authority do the Executive have to sell off their assets and to use the receipts for future investments?

Members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel mentioned that little or nothing has happened since the publication of its report on PPPs. I tend to agree, but we must acknowledge what has happened. At departmental level, capital expenditure plans have been ongoing, and PPP plans have been developing. The weakness lies in the lack of a strategic approach at central level. That shows the long-term effects of short-term planning on resource manoeuvrability.

Some of the capital budgets allocated to Departments in the 2001-02 Budget have also featured in end-year flexibility. Would resources available in 2001-02 have been better spent at 2001-02 prices rather than being earmarked as rolling-on, end-year finance?

We need to have a strategic investment body up and running with a remit of examining current PPP and capital plans. The Committee made visits to see how other areas dealt with PPPs; we must learn from the mistakes and, indeed, the experience of others. I know of capital projects where the design, build and maintain concept has been a very effective way of ensuring a first-class product. It is a logical idea; the people who designed and built the project will also maintain it, so they will not do a sloppy job that will cost a fortune to maintain.

Some people are concerned that some projects undertaken in Northern Ireland may be too small. However, there is no reason why we cannot consider bundling projects; that is, bringing projects together to create a larger package that is attractive to the private sector.

Mr Armstrong: I welcome the opportunities for public-private partnerships in Northern Ireland. The motion is particularly timely, as it comes at the end of the 'Financing Our Future' consultation and in the aftermath of the Report of the Review of Opportunities for Public Private Partnerships in Northern Ireland.

The consequences of years of underinvestment in public services can be seen today clearly. Although not the solution in themselves, public-private partnerships have great potential to dispel our huge investment deficit, which is projected to increase over the next decade.

A form of public-private partnership is already operating in the agricultural sector. Today's farmers do not have the same access to machinery or expertise as agricultural contractors do. A type of public-private partnership is formed whereby agricultural contractors employ farmers to do the job that they know best. People are taking the initiative to run a business. As my hon Friend mentioned, the people who erect buildings will maintain them and ensure that they are fit for their intended purpose.

Many European countries have seen a rise in the number of private finance mechanisms as opposed to traditional public procurement methods. However, it has been suggested that public-private partnerships are best suited to areas such as regional development to boost roads and general infrastructure, and for hospital development.

One concern about the use of public-private partnerships is the potential for unaccountability — partners could take on a mind of their own. The best way to prevent such unaccountability is for the public sector to maintain its monopoly of policy responsibility and control. However, the Government must co-operate with private bodies and work with those who often have excellent insight into what is needed.

Members are aware of the investment deficit in water and sewerage services. Problems have reached crisis point and can no longer be ignored. There have been many questions in the House on sewerage problems and the environment.

4.45 pm

Mr Hussey: Mr Armstrong mentioned a crisis situation, suggesting that such crises are forcing us into forming PPPs. Interestingly, when we visited Dublin to explore this issue, one of the contributions was that PPPs were being approached there from a position of strength, with a strong economy. Rather than being forced into the situation, many of the capital projects that led them through to PPP/PFI were a matter of choice. I am sure that Mr Armstrong will agree that we must find a model that suits the system in Northern Ireland.

Mr Armstrong: I agree that we have to explore all avenues and find a model that best suits the Northern Ireland economy. The crisis in our public services is highlighted by the Report of the Review of Opportunities for Public Private Partnerships in Northern Ireland. We must fully explore all alternative sources of financing. PPPs are seen as a more expensive option than conventional financing; however, they offer potential benefits. The working group noted that one advantage is that the contract mechanism ensures that the service is maintained to a specified standard during the lifetime of the contract. For example, penalties can be introduced for breach of contract.

No one solution, including PPPs, is likely to meet the many needs of Northern Ireland, which has higher levels of social disadvantage than the rest of the United Kingdom. I hope that this alternative source of finance for public services leads to the discovery of other such sources in Northern Ireland.

Dr Farren: I found the debate valuable and interesting. I compliment Members on their contributions, whether they were supportive, critical or sceptical of PPPs.

Concerns were raised about the form of consultation. The 'Financing our Future' report was compiled by a representative group, which consisted of members of the trade union movement, the business community and the voluntary and community sectors. A very intense process of discussion and engagement took place, not just within the group, but with others. All aspects of the issue have been thoroughly considered by the working party. In that respect, all interested parties had the opportunity to have input to the report. Members who have read the report will note the reservations expressed by representatives of various sectors about it. Notwithstanding those reservations, however, the report has received broad support.

Since the report was presented to the Assembly in May, public consultation has proceeded. I chaired a public meeting in Belfast in June and found it stimulating and thought-provoking. It was well-attended and the discussion was very lively indeed. Several key issues were highlighted that must be borne in mind. Many were echoed by Members in this debate. In particular, our social partners, including trades unions, expressed concerns about public-private partnerships.

The meeting also provided an opportunity to clear up some of the misunderstandings about PPPs held by the public and other representative organisations. A panel of experts from the public, private and voluntary sectors and trades unions provided assistance. Other public meetings were similarly constructed. The junior Ministers represented the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and assistance was provided by the panel of experts, which was drawn from those who had helped to formulate the report.

The meeting was followed up by a meeting last week to hear the views of a delegation from the Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance, one of the largest trade unions to represent public sector workers. Some were critical of PPPs, and all views will be used to inform the policy-making process on their use.

Furthermore, I recently visited one of our operational school PPP projects to hear at first hand how it operates. It proved to be a valuable visit that allowed me to see the benefits to teachers and pupils of new accommodation with modern and well-maintained facilities. I learned how education is provided in the school and how its ancillary services are delivered.

That visit added to the experience that I gained with the Department for Employment and Learning, which uses PPPs to provide accommodation in the further education sector. Members who are familiar with the project in the North-West Institute of Further and Higher Education in Derry and the Belfast Institute of Further and Higher Education's recently opened Millfield campus, and who have kept an eye on projects to provide new accommodation in Omagh and Dungannon, will appreciate how such PPPs are being developed with the intense co-operation and involvement of the institutions and their representatives, as well as those who have brought the projects to fruition.

Despite our long experience of providing such facilities by the traditional route, we do not reflect on one striking feature of public-private partnerships: the close involvement of those who provide the facilities, buildings and services and those who use them. It is a partnership that potentially gives both sides greater influence and control over the project's development, not just until the doors open but also throughout the lifespan of the project. That contrasts with the traditional procurement route, whereby a facility would be handed over and, in a sense, that would be that. If the facilities were not up to scratch, clients might have to chase contractors for a long time to ensure that things were put right. By highlighting the problems with traditional procurement, I am not arguing that PPPs are always the correct choice. However, I ask Members to reflect on those experiences, to familiarise themselves with projects, especially those in their constituencies, and to learn from people's experiences.

Not everything has gone as well as was expected; however, that is also the case with traditional procurement. I hear frequently about bad experiences across the water from those who are more critical of PPPs. However, 25 projects have been delivered through PPPs in Northern Ireland, and none of the literature published by commentators in Northern Ireland that I have read contains detailed references to the local experience from which we could learn. I am not saying that we should not learn from experiences elsewhere. References were made to the South's experience. We were ahead of the South. In formulating its PPP policies, the South took advice from us and now it is ahead of us. We must take pride in the good elements of our experience and learn from those projects in which the experience was not so favourable.

PPPs have several key features. First, there is a need to standardise contracts. The approach to PPPs has been ad hoc, which is inevitable during the learning phase. However, in recent months, the Office of Government Commerce issued new standard contract documentation, on which Northern Ireland Departments and the other devolved regions were consulted, with the publication of a revised edition of the standardisation of PFI contracts, which is an update of original Treasury guidance. It is to be used throughout the UK and represents a significant step forward in establishing a standard approach to many of the issues that arise in private finance initiative projects. If we decide to make further use of the PPP route, the guidance will ensure that the process leading up to the signing of contracts is more expeditious.

As part of their consultation, the Executive will consider the adoption of the guidance, which is vital to speeding up the procurement process, spreading good practice and minimising development and bidding costs for Departments and the private sector. We must draw on the experience of projects awarded elsewhere, not just across the water but in other countries with extensive experience. Some people suggest that PFIs have been confined to Britain, Northern Ireland and the South. I invite Members to read the relevant literature that shows the widespread use of variations of PPP in many countries with different cultures and economic and social circumstances.

5.00 pm

The phenomenon, therefore, is not peculiar to these islands.

The PPP review clarifies the scale of the deficit in infrastructure investment; almost every Member who contributed to the debate acknowledged that fact. That deficit amounts to £6 billion across all programmes. Innovation and creativity are required to find ways to bridge the gap in order to meet the future infrastructure needs of the region. The way in which we organise ourselves to meet that challenge is critical.

No single solution — be it the use of PPPs, borrowing or more traditional public expenditure — is likely to meet all our needs. In this major consultation on the report of the review of opportunities for PPPs, comments are invited on the full range of possible sources of funding and how those can best meet our needs. Some commentators believe that PPP funding is being promoted as “the only show in town”, and to some extent that was reflected in the debate. However, that is far from being the case. If PPP were to fail to deliver best value and high-quality services, or if it were to put workers' rights at risk, I would not recommend it while I am responsible for the portfolio. PPP should be put into the context of the investment resources and possibilities that are now at our disposal.

The policy framework on the use of PPPs should take account of local needs and circumstances and ensure that continued use is made of the current capital budgets. Would that it could all be done through the current capital budgets. Members address this issue as though the current capital budgets can grow simply at the wave of a magic wand. However, when Members also suggest that we should have some fiscal autonomy such as additional forms of taxation at our disposal, they acknowledge that the only way to get additional money into the public purse is to ask the public to put it there. I trust that that is acknowledged fully when such points are being made.

It is recognised in the review that there are merits in the PPP approach to finding funding options to address some capital investment requirements. Other routes will be used for other aspects of capital requirement.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel raised several issues, including a request for details about the reinvestment and reform initiative and the subsequent funding implications. The practical arrangements regarding the reinvestment and reform initiative are being developed, and the details of the borrowing must be settled with the Treasury. Borrowing to fund capital projects must be paid for from additional revenues.

When the reinvestment and reform initiative is advocated, it cannot be separated from the way in which that borrowing will be serviced. Mr Hussey illustrated that point well when he stated that when we make use of a borrowing facility to finance our homes, for example, we must be able to satisfy the lender that we have the capacity to service the borrowing. If we were to ask the Treasury to grant us a loan, we would be asking somebody else to help us to service that loan. That "somebody else" is the person on the street, whether he or she is in Belfast or elsewhere, or, as one of my ministerial Colleagues put it recently, is "the man in the Central Bar". I am not sure which bar he frequents, but he was referring to one of those kinds of establishments.

Borrowing to fund capital projects will have to be paid for from additional revenues. It would not be funded from the existing departmental expenditure limit, and the level of borrowing will, of course, need to be considered further by the Executive and the Assembly.

As has been mentioned by several Members, the relationship involving the strategic investment body, the procurement board, the Departments and the Department of Finance and Personnel, must be considered fully as we take forward work with the Assembly on the reinvestment and reform legislation and implement the initiative. It is vital that the various public bodies work constructively together to ensure that the infrastructure needs are met in the most effective and co-ordinated manner.

The idea of having a specific Minister with responsibility for leading on the investments was raised. No decisions have been taken on that matter, but Members should bear in mind that departmental Ministers have the responsibility of establishing priorities. We will be seeking advice from the strategic investment body as to the financing of the various projects. The House would not wish a single Minister or small group of Ministers to have the sole responsibility for driving forward a programme of investment that would take the prerogative of establishing priorities away from departmental Ministers. Therefore, teamwork is required, and that must be exercised in the Executive. Ideas will be brought forward when discussion takes place on the legislation associated with the establishment of the strategic investment body.

Mr Molloy asked about a strategy to embrace all the financing options. Some of the main funding issues, including the future of the rating system and the use of PPPs, are currently under public consultation. The Executive will consider the outcome of those consultations, and the work on the reinvestment and reform initiative, when setting their strategic plans.

The investment board will have a key role in advising on strategic planning of infrastructure investment, and we trust that its membership will provide the kind of experience and skills necessary to give the optimum advice to the Executive. In its membership, I expect the investment board also to reflect the interests of the social partners.

All PPP projects must demonstrate that they meet value for money criteria before being approved. The projects have long lives, and, as several Members mentioned, we must learn from experience and keep the projects under review to check that value for money is being delivered.

On the question, raised by Mr Molloy, of the capital resource held by Departments, the Executive are considering the level of capital spending as part of their work on the Budget.

As to the longer-term funding implications, which were also raised by Mr Molloy, the evidence from projects to date is that they are not an excessive charge, as they amount to less than 0.5% of the overall departmental expenditure limit resource Budget. Concerns were raised as to whether an inordinate level of debt might mount up, with the implication being that that would not be sustainable. That is a matter for the Executive, with the assistance of advice from the strategic investment board, to consider. It would be foolhardy of the Executive to simply extend borrowing beyond the capacity to service it. Indeed, if there were any attempt to do that, the Treasury would flash warning lights at a very early stage.

Mr Molloy and Mr Weir raised issues concerning the capacity of the construction industry, and deal flow, which are important points. One of the benefits of our strategic investment body is that it can engage with the construction industry when significant projects in which it is involved are being discussed to ensure that the deal flow can be managed. We do not want a situation to arise where we are signing up to projects that cannot be delivered. Members would be very critical if we were to do so.

Patricia Lewsley and Jane Morrice expressed concern about the potential of public-private partnerships to create a two-tier workforce. We are alert to that matter, and the working group dealt with it in some depth. It is important that we learn from our experience. No evidence of this phenomenon has emerged from our public-private partnerships. In our experience, no transferred workers have been made compulsorily redundant. The number of public-private partnerships is small, and —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, you have only two minutes left to speak.

Dr Farren: Many questions were raised, and if I do not touch on those in the time remaining, I assure Members that I will attempt to deal with them in writing.

Since the consultation on PPPs is the responsibility of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and of the Department of Finance and Personnel, I would like to thank Members for their views and comments on this important issue. We have had other opportunities to hear Members' comments, and I am sure that they will continue to make their views known to us as the consultation progresses. This debate will help the Executive to shape the policy on the use of public-private partnerships, and to deliver value for money and high-quality services. I was pleased to hear the importance of both emphasised strongly in several contributions.

The 'Financing our Future' consultation has helped to promote wide discussion on PPPs with social partners, the general public and the private sector on their potential roles in meeting our investment needs. People have genuine concerns about PPPs, as the working group and the consultation exercise have highlighted. We in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and Department of Finance and Personnel share those concerns, particularly those relating to employee and equality issues. We are determined that the policy that we finally adopt on the use of PPPs will address those fears. We want to achieve a policy framework for the use of PPPs that helps to deliver an investment strategy that will provide a much-needed public sector infrastructure that finds broad support among all stakeholders and social partners.

I thank Members for the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the Report of the Review of Opportunities for Public-Private Partnerships in Northern Ireland and the Executive's consultation process on 'Financing our Future'.

CHANGE OF COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Mr Deputy Speaker: There are four motions on the Order Paper, in the names of Mr Bradley, Dr McDonnell and Dr Hendron. As these are business motions, no debate should ensue. Therefore, I propose, by leave of the House, to put the Questions on these motions en bloc.

Business Committee

Resolved:

That Ms Patricia Lewsley shall replace Mr John Tierney on the Business Committee. — [Dr Hendron.]

Committee for the Environment

Resolved:

That Mr Michael Coyle shall serve on the Committee for the Environment. — [Dr Hendron.]

Committee for Employment and Learning

Resolved:

That Mr Michael Coyle shall serve on the Committee for Employment and Learning. — [Dr Hendron.]

Committee on Standards and Privileges

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 17 September 2002

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence

NEW START FOR PUBLIC TRANSPORT IN NORTHERN IRELAND

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister for Regional Development that he wishes to make a statement on a new start for public transport in Northern Ireland.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): I am grateful for the opportunity to announce to the Assembly the start of a period of public consultation on my proposals to reform the planning, delivery and governance of public transport.

When I presented the regional transportation strategy to the Assembly in July, I stressed the importance that I accorded to the future development of public transport. Of the proposed £3.5 billion investment envisaged in the regional transportation strategy over the next 10 years, some 32% will be allocated to public transport. That represents a doubling of the funding allocated to public transport over the past 10 years. It will require at least this level of investment if we are to achieve the stepped change in public transport strongly advocated throughout the process of formulating the regional transportation strategy. However, I cautioned that the scale of investment required for public transport is unlikely to be met by public expenditure alone. Inevitably, we will have to explore opportunities for attracting private sector finance and expertise.

Today, I am publishing an outline for a new institutional and regulatory framework in a consultation document, 'A New Start for Public Transport in Northern Ireland'. I will outline the key elements of my proposals. The Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its Translink bus and rail subsidiaries would be amalgamated into a new, dynamic, publicly owned operating company, Transport Northern Ireland. An independent public transport regulatory body would be established, initially in shadow form and in due course on a statutory basis.

I propose the progressive injection of private sector finance and expertise to the public transport market, but only in so far as it makes sound commercial sense and is acceptable to the community. I want a new start for public transport in Northern Ireland, and I regard these proposals as important stepping stones to a system fit for future years.

The development of public transport in Northern Ireland has suffered severely from violence, underinvestment and declining patronage. Last year, despite the successful introduction of free travel for senior citizens and the uplift that that initiative brought to ridership, the overall number of Translink passengers fell by 2.5%.

Despite the difficult conditions of the past 30 years, Translink management and staff have managed to provide a regular and necessary service to the Northern Ireland public. I pay particular tribute to the courage and dedication of Translink drivers in dealing with the unwarranted, mindless attacks that have been inflicted on them in recent months. I reiterate my abhorrence of those attacks, which are made against the whole community.

On a wider level, I acknowledge the dedication of Translink staff in keeping services running despite a public expenditure framework that has constrained new investment and innovation. There is a growing recognition that some of the difficulties that we face in reversing the decline in passengers and quality of service may stem from the institutional structures in which public transport operates. It is generally acknowledged that the relationship between the Department for Regional Development, the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and the operating companies — Northern Ireland Railways, Citybus and Ulsterbus — must change.

Unlike the rest of the United Kingdom, the publicly owned Translink companies have a near monopoly on public transport services. They are controlled by the board of the Transport Holding Company, which has a statutory duty to act commercially but is constrained by public expenditure limits on borrowing and expenditure. Although the Department for Regional Development has overall responsibility for public transport policy and grant funding, it has been left to the Transport Holding Company to determine the extent of the network and the standard of public transport services using the resources that are made available to it. The Transport Holding Company has had the tension of trying to plan adequate services to meet social needs while managing the Translink companies in pursuit of commercial objectives.

I propose to address the institutional shortcomings by amalgamating the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its Translink subsidiaries into a new publicly owned public transport company, Transport Northern Ireland. That company would have direct lines of accountability with the Department for Regional Development as its shareholder. It would continue to have a leading role in the provision of bus and rail services but would focus on developing the commerciality of the operating companies, with a view to competing in a market progressively opened up to private sector participation.

The Transport Holding Company's functions of planning a transport network to meet social needs and of setting and enforcing appropriate standards of services would be transferred to a new public transport regulatory body. That body would be appointed by, and report directly to, the Minister for Regional Development. Initially, it would be set up in shadow form in the Department for Regional Development, but once formally established, it would have its own staff and resources and would operate at arm's length from the Department.

The proposal's aim is to make the planning and delivery of public transport more rational and objective, and to give the operating companies an independent challenge. The establishment of a regulatory body would rectify the current conflicting role whereby I, as Minister, am the public owner, policy maker and part regulator of public transport.

Under my proposals the regulatory body would take on the licensing of bus routes as part of the overall economic regulation of the bus network. The Department of the Environment carries out that function at present, and I welcome the Minister of the Environment's agreement that the proposal be included in the consultation paper. The Department of the Environment would, however, continue to regulate the safety and operating standards of road passenger transport providers under a revised licensing system.

I have considered public transport arrangements in other countries. Experience suggests that independent or quasi-independent regulation is essential in developing a market in public transport. However, there is no one-size-fits-all model for the roles and responsibilities that a regulatory body should hold. Although the consultation paper lists some possible functions that a regulatory body might perform, the most appropriate arrangements for the Northern Ireland market have still to be worked out. Ultimately, the precise role of the body will be determined after the public response on how far Translink services should be open to the market. Changes to the functions of the Transport Holding Company and the establishment of a regulatory body will require new legislation. I intend to review the Transport Act (Northern Ireland) 1967 and other relevant legislation and in due course introduce a Bill for the Assembly to give effect to an agreed package of reforms. That is unlikely to happen before 2004. Members will have the opportunity to scrutinise the proposed finer details for the new institutions at that time.

I turn now to how private sector finance might be introduced to the public transport market. There are many models in use across Europe. At one end of the spectrum there is the closed market, in which a public sector operator is protected from competition. Such an absence of competitive pressures can give rise to cost and other inefficiencies and act as a barrier to new forms of finance. However, there are mechanisms whereby the public sector operator can be given scope to franchise services to private sector providers or can introduce private investment through borrowing. Under that model, it may be possible for the public sector operator to engage the private sector in the development of major schemes such as the proposed rapid transit initiative for Belfast.

At the other end of the spectrum is the deregulated free market with minimal barriers to entry by anyone and direct competition between operators. That model operates in the rest of the United Kingdom outside London. Although deregulation has undoubtedly resulted in operating efficiencies, the market turmoil that it has caused is well documented. Between those two models there are various permutations of controlled competition, where operators have exclusive rights to deliver services for fixed periods after the award of a contract through competition. Under that model, a publicly owned public transport company would compete actively with the private sector for tendered services.

In the consultation paper I do not advocate unfettered deregulation as in Great Britain but rather a model that retains a publicly owned public transport company subject to the possible progressive injection of private sector finance in a manner acceptable to the community. Some key strengths in the present model of delivering public transport must be considered when new arrangements are being developed. For example, Translink's near monopoly of bus services enables it to cross-subsidise uneconomic services from profitable services without the need for further revenue support from the Assembly's Budget. Furthermore, through its control of rail and bus services, Translink has the potential to plan and deliver public transport in a wholly integrated manner.

At the same time, we cannot overlook the findings of recent studies of public transport systems in Europe. Those found that cities whose public transport services were regulated under controlled competition experienced higher rates of growth in passenger trips and better recovery of operating costs through fare income than those with closed public transport markets. Those studies concluded that controlled competition helps to maintain stability in the public transport market at a lower cost and with better prospects for permanent involvement.

Controlled competition, in which Transport Northern Ireland would play a major part, has the potential to ensure more transparency in the allocation of the Assembly's resources and better value for money for taxpayers and passengers. I posed the question in the consultation paper of how far and how quickly the public transport market should be opened up to private sector participation. No doubt I shall receive a range of views. Whatever the outcome of the consultation, the timetable for introducing greater private sector participation is likely to be influenced by European Union liberalisation measures now in draft form. EU Regulations on public service requirements and the awarding of public transport service contracts are under consideration. If adopted, they will move us away from the virtual closed market model.

10.45 am

Challenging years lie ahead of us in implementing the agreed vision for public transport set out in the regional transportation strategy. Today's consultation paper outlines a bold new framework to help us to plan and deliver the modern transport services that the people of Northern Ireland deserve. We are faced with the real opportunity of shaping a new start.

I look forward to the paper stimulating a lively debate and encouraging a broad cross-section of the public to come forward with their views. It is my intention to publish the findings of the consultation process by the end of the year. Thereafter, I shall reflect carefully on the responses, and, in due course, I shall introduce a set of detailed proposals for consideration by the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr A Maginness): The Committee for Regional Development has been kept informed of the Minister's views, and for that we are grateful. The nub of the statement is the creation of a new, dynamic, publicly owned operating company, Transport Northern Ireland, and the setting up of an independent public transport regulatory body. Both developments are to be generally welcomed. The detail is for discussion and careful scrutiny by the Committee.

Although the closed market makes people uncomfortable and has not worked to the advantage of public transport in Northern Ireland, many people fear the opening up of the market to private operators, given what has happened in England and elsewhere.

Mr Speaker: The Member must ask his question.

Mr A Maginness: Can the Minister assure the House that the introduction of the private sector into public transport will not affect the quality of service and will not undermine the publicly owned transport system in Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: I shall consider the Committee's views with great interest when I receive them. Committee members may have the opportunity to speak to other stakeholders before making their own comments.

My purpose in introducing the proposals is to approve the public transport service. The principle of opening up public transport to private sector involvement is an attempt to move away from having the service that the provider decides is appropriate to one that is more responsive to the consumer — in this case, the passenger.

There should be no fear of the outcome. The purpose is to improve service delivery in a way that responds to user demand. The consultation paper's underlying principle is that we are not suggesting unfettered deregulation. We are considering a controlled environment. Worldwide evidence suggests that the best results are achieved in controlled circumstances. EU documentation shows an increase in public transport usage in areas with a controlled private sector involvement. It also shows a reduction in public transport usage when there was either total deregulation or total public ownership.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr McFarland): I welcome the paper, and although I recognise the good work done by Translink, it is clear that Northern Ireland needs a new management system for the twenty-first century. Private sector operators will be interested in the most lucrative routes, and that will affect the service on lesser-used routes. Translink subsidised the less valuable routes with the more lucrative ones. How does the Minister envisage private sector involvement dealing with that?

I acknowledge the good work of the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland, but has the Minister given any thought to introducing an independent transport users' group to look after the interests of passengers and support the management of the proposed system?

Mr P Robinson: I will not rule anything out at this stage. The need for a users' group is a legitimate point that can be considered during the consultation exercise. The Deputy Chairperson of the Regional Development Committee will know from his interest in the subject that about 4% of usage on Northern Ireland's roads is by public transport. I stated that 32% of the proposed funding would be allocated to public transport. However, that allocation was increased to 35% between the draft and the final regional transportation strategy, so there is significant development potential in public transport under the regional transportation strategy and opportunities for public transport to progress.

The large scale of investment envisaged requires the Department to examine the model and make progress in institutional terms. I do not want to be prescriptive in how I envisage the handling of various routes, but section 4.5 of the consultation paper acknowledges that Translink can cross-subsidise uneconomic services from profitable ones. That is a key element that the regulator will have to consider, because it is only on the regulator's analysis that any decisions will be taken on the involvement of the private sector. The Department must ensure that the regulator can examine the data, analyse it and make recommendations. Those decisions will be the key to at least two issues — one of which the Deputy Chairperson has mentioned.

Mr Hay: The 10-year regional transportation strategy is a vital component of the regional development strategy. The Committee for Regional Development has stated that new management structures are required to deliver the vision that all Members have for public transport. Does the Minister see any merit in consulting the private operator on the new structures and on the vision that the Department and the Committee have for the future of transport in Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: Private operators will have an interest in the consultation exercise and will want to give the Department their views, which will be considered with all others. However, there is a range of possible permutations from the public sector operator to the possibility of introducing private investment through borrowing and the franchising of services to the private sector and thence right through to the private sector operator. There is a range of possible outcomes. Anyone who has been in my position will have respect for the role that Translink staff have played in difficult circumstances.

The immense new opportunities should be highlighted. The number of routes and trips on public transport will increase substantially, and that will provide a good future for the people who are involved. Public transport will not operate to the detriment of the people who are working in the system.

Mr McNamee: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I welcome the Minister's announcement of the consultation paper 'A New Start for Public Transport in Northern Ireland' and the proposals to improve the management of our transportation system. If we are to have the public transport system envisaged in the regional transportation strategy, we will need a new vision of how that is managed.

The Minister says that he proposes to proceed with his injection of private sector funding into the transportation system. Has he considered proposals that involve public sector finance? If so, can he assure the House that his proposals will represent good value for the spending of public funds? Has the Minister fully considered the long-term implications that private sector finance would have for his Department's spending of public moneys?

Mr P Robinson: One of the first conundrums that I faced in the Department was the issue of trains. I had visits from the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and from Translink. They wanted to lease new trains, but could not do so under the present arrangements. I am not going to be prescriptive about the extent of private sector involvement.

There is a danger that, the more questions I answer, the more it might seem that my mind is closed on the issue. That would reduce the effectiveness of the consultation process. My mind is not closed; I am avoiding responding to some questions simply to leave the issues open, because legitimate views will emerge on a range of issues.

There is a qualification in the statement and in the consultation document in relation to the injection of private sector interest and involvement, which is the extent to which the community in Northern Ireland felt comfortable with it. The key gauge for the consultation exercise is to find out how much the community believes the issue should be opened up.

My experiences of travelling outside Northern Ireland are that the private sector has become increasingly involved in public transport and that higher standards have been created through that competition. That is to the advantage of the consumer, and more people are now using public transport. That is a key objective in the regional transportation strategy. Much of the process flows directly from the regional transportation strategy and its objectives to encourage the use of public transport and to make Northern Ireland transportation less dependent on the car.

Mr Close: Can the Minister guarantee that proposals such as that in section 4.7 of the consultation document would not lead to the further demise of public transport through the closure of uneconomic routes?

In my constituency of Lagan Valley, people are conscious that an axe hangs over the Knockmore railway line. It is ironic that the Minister can talk about a new start while contemplating the closure of some lines. I hope that this is not an extension of a closure policy and that the Minister, who referred to rationality and objectivity, will ensure that lines are kept open, rather than introduce the private sector and allow it to close more lines.

11.00 am

Mr P Robinson: I never cease to be amazed at Mr Close's ingenious inclusion of the Antrim-Knockmore line in every question.

If a consultation exercise were to result in the recommendation that routes be opened up to private sector involvement, that option would be scrutinised by the regulator. Experience has shown that regulators, such as the water industry commissioner, Alan Sutherland, in Scotland or the electricity regulator, Douglas McIlldoon, are friendly to the consumer. Mr Close will find that the regulator is an independent champion of the consumer. I would have thought, therefore, that he would have been applauding me from the Benches for adopting an approach that will surely assist the consumers' case.

Ms Morrice: Undoubtedly, the service is in dire need of a shake-up. I therefore welcome the long-awaited attempt to make a fresh start. However, the Minister admitted that he is the public owner, the policy maker and part regulator of public transport, so he must be responsible for the mess that it is in.

First, how much will the regional transportation strategy cost? Secondly, how long will it take to implement, and, in the meantime, what will he do to ensure that the buses in Bangor link up with the trains and that the trains run on time?

Mr McCartney: Jawohl, mein Herr.

Mr Speaker: That should be “meine Dame”.

Mr P Robinson: I did not confess to operating the trains and buses, so Ms Morrice has reached an unwarranted conclusion. However, she said that the service is dire and in need of a shake-up, and the General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland made remarks about the attractiveness of the service. Even if the Member and the Consumer Council had not made those comments, it is clear that services in Northern Ireland could be improved.

The increased funding, the institutional changes and changes in arrangements, which I proposed in the regional transportation strategy, are precisely intended to give the service a shake-up. However, as to who is responsible for the mess, the Member ought to recognise that the mess did not start in December 1999. It existed before I took responsibility for the Department.

The Department is trying to draw in private finance, thereby reducing the amount of public expenditure required. Until I know what model will be adopted, I cannot say what the reduction in public sector funding might be. The costs of providing the type of public transport system that we require are set out in the regional transportation strategy document, which I am sure the Member has read in detail.

Mr McCartney: I welcome the aspirational aspects of the Minister’s statement — I use the word “aspirational” advisedly, and in no way as a criticism of the Minister. Yesterday, when the First Minister presented the working group’s review of the opportunities for public-private partnership, he said that there was a major deficit in public investment that would require £6 billion over the next 10 years.

Last Monday, the Minister for Regional Development, when answering questions about water and sewerage, indicated that £3 billion would be required over the next 20 years — or £1.5 billion over the next 10 years. If my arithmetic is correct, his Department will require £5 billion over the next 10 years for water, sewerage and transport. That leaves £1 billion for the major spending Departments — Health and Education.

Does the Minister agree that whether the money comes from public-private partnerships, Treasury loans or elsewhere, the capital and the interest on that money must be repaid? Does he envisage that that repayment will come from increasing the rates, with a tap tax on water or possibly a toilet tax on effluent? If not, where will the money come from to meet what the Minister — properly and correctly — described as a major requirement? Are we back to the position where there is no way we can reasonably fund, without screwing the people of Northern Ireland, the terrible deficit left by the British Government, which was accepted by those who negotiated the agreement?

Mr P Robinson: My Department requires £3 billion over the next 20 years. Over 10 years, that is £0.5 billion more than we might get through public expenditure normally, if one were to extrapolate the figures over that period. It is not an additional £3 billion over 20 years — that is the amount we require over 20 years. Therefore, in the next 10 years it would be only £0.5 billion, rather than £3 billion, that would be counted in the £6 billion mentioned by the First Minister yesterday.

The underlying message, however, is accurate: there is no free money. If one borrows from, or involves, the private sector, there is a payback. The private sector is not renowned for being so altruistic that it provides the public sector with services without getting a return. The Minister of Finance and Personnel — and I had better be careful to get my facts right because he is in the Chamber — will tell you that, if the reinvestment and reform initiative is used, a new stream of income must be identified. Therefore, that would be additional to the regional rate.

If a PPP is used, that can be covered under the departmental expenditure limit to the extent that there is room for manoeuvre with regard to additional expenditure. Undoubtedly, if the reinvestment and reform initiative is used, an additional stream of income will be required. Therefore, an increase in rates may be required.

Mr Byrne: I welcome the Minister’s statement, particularly the proposals to set up a single transport company in Northern Ireland and to establish a new regulatory body.

There will be anxiety among the employees of the bus and rail companies, and they need some reassurance. Their fear would be that we might have privatisation of bus and rail by the back door. Can the Minister assure us that that is not his primary intention and that there is a commitment to retain a substantially publicly owned transport system?

Does the Minister favour a controlled competition system for Northern Ireland, so that all areas of the region can enjoy some level of public transport provision? How can the number of passengers using public transport be increased, and will clear targets be set for the new company?

Mr P Robinson: I made it clear in the statement that there would be a public transport company, which would be opened up to private sector involvement. I understand the concerns of those employed in public transport. There is always a concern when someone proposes the consideration of something new. However, if those involved look at the regional transportation strategy and the consultation paper, they will see that there will be an enormous uplift of employment prospects in public transportation.

Expenditure on public transport has significantly increased in the regional transport strategy. Although it accounts for 4% of road usage at present, it has taken about 16% of public expenditure over the past 10 years. That was increased to 32% in the draft and to 35% in the final document. With regard to expenditure, therefore, there has been a massive uplift in the potential of public transport.

If I worked in public transport and saw that the percentage of spend would more than double, that the number of routes in the Province would increase, that the frequency of journeys would improve and that a new rapid transport system had been proposed, I would see opportunities rather than doors closing behind me. There are real opportunities, and people who work in public transport should not be afraid of the document. They should grasp the challenge and the opportunity that it presents and move forward to the advantage of public transport users here.

Mr R Hutchinson: I welcome the Minister's statement and especially his recognition that Translink has had a difficult time during the past 30 years and has made the best of a bad job. How will the new transport body be appointed?

Mr P Robinson: I have views on how it could happen. However, how it will happen is a decision that will be taken after proper consultation. I want to hear the Member's proposals and those of others.

If the new arrangement that he refers to is the overseeing body, Transport Northern Ireland, I expect that it will be established through ministerial appointment. Ministerial appointment has always involved those who are closely connected with public transportation. At present, I am delighted with the equality on the new Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company (NITHCo) board. We have managed to bring in expertise from areas where the interest in public transport has been much wider at a higher level. That body of people immediately responded to the challenge of a new start and has been prepared to embrace it.

If the arrangement that the Member refers to is the regulator, I believe that that body will, at first, be set up in shadow mode under the Department. As the statutory basis of the regulator will go through the House, clearly he will have to be at arm's length from the Department.

Lord Kilclooney: I welcome the Minister's statement and his praise for those who worked in Northern Ireland's public transport services during the troubles, to which must be added the name of the chief executive, Mr Ted Hesketh. I share the concerns of the hon Member for North Down about where the finance for the proposals will come from. We look forward to hearing about that in the months ahead. However, it is great to see new thinking being directed towards our public transport system.

I have, for many years, been interested in the resumption of a rail system linking Dundonald, Comber and Newtownards. I welcome, therefore, the proposed establishment of a public transport regulatory body. I know that it will be a shadow body at first. However, can the Minister give the House some idea of when it will become a separate independent body to which Members will be able to feed their thoughts on new routes that are required in Northern Ireland?

Mr P Robinson: I welcome the Member who is visiting the Assembly today. We are always delighted to have him in the Chamber.

Lord Kilclooney: It was the hon Member for North Down who was not here yesterday. I know that he hinted that that should be mentioned.

Mr P Robinson: The Member for North Down was here yesterday — I had the pleasure of having a conversation with him then.

Mr McCartney: I voted as well.

11.15 am

Mr P Robinson: Having read the Member for Strangford's newspaper, which is going around the constituency, I hope that he will not use the next issue to take credit for this initiative, in the way that he took credit for my decisions on free fares for senior citizens, the Comber bypass and Castlebawn. [Laughter].

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr P Robinson: However, the Member rightly draws attention to the significant role that the workforce at every level of Translink has played over recent years. One is apt to forget, or it may diminish in one's memory, the very difficult role that the workforce has had to perform in the past 10 or 20 years to keep a public transport system going amid the level of conflict on our streets. The community has much to be proud of in its public servants and has much for which to commend the workforce at Translink.

Sadly, the difficulties that the workforce faces continue, with regular attacks on bus and train drivers. I know the view of the House in its condemnation of such activity. I join the right hon Gentleman in welcoming the honour received by Ted Hesketh recently. The CBE was a fitting reward for his services to public transport and to the community in Northern Ireland.

The Member mentioned the prospect of a rail line between Dundonald and Newtownards or Comber. The future for that entire area best lies in the development of a rapid transit network. If a decision is eventually taken to run rapid transit down the Comber railway line from Dundonald into Belfast, there must be opportunities for Newtownards or Comber to link into that line. That is much more viable than any heavy rail options for those areas. There are massive opportunities for people in those areas to benefit from rapid transit should it run from Dundonald into Belfast.

HARBOURS BILL

First Stage

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 5/02] to confer functions on the Department for Regional Development in relation to the regulation of certain harbour authorities; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

FAMILY LAW (DIVORCE ETC.) BILL

Second Stage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill (NIA 01/02) be passed.

The Bill deals with two aspects of family law. The first is divorce, which is a sad reality of life for many in Northern Ireland. The second concerns three outdated and anomalous provisions of the law on family property, which I shall deal with presently.

The Executive, in their Programme for Government, are committed to supporting children and their families. The Executive's children's fund has been created to develop services that will help children and their families in Northern Ireland. The Children's Commissioner Bill is another example of our concern for children. Supporting families should be one of our main concerns. However, support comes in many forms, and we must face reality. Sadly, marriages do break down, and all sorts of families are affected by breakdowns that occur for all sorts of reasons. Experience shows that people in Northern Ireland do not enter into divorce lightly. I can assure the Assembly that research commissioned by the Office of Law Reform shows that couples tend to divorce using the separation facts and over a relatively long period. In contrast to the position in England, our divorce rate is around the European Union average. Divorce rates have remained almost the same over the last decade, although, as the statistics show, the numbers fluctuate from year to year.

Divorce law has evolved over many years to cater for the needs of society. In the nineteenth century, industrial injury and the perils of childbirth meant that most marriages were short-lived — often they did not last beyond 10 or 20 years. For those whose marriages broke down, divorce was available only at great cost by a private Act of Parliament. Parliamentarians felt that divorce should be made difficult and expensive to keep it out of the hands of the so-called feckless poor.

Despite that policy, marriages broke down, and people sought different ways of handling the situation. Men in particular simply deserted their families and started a new life in another part of the country leaving their wives and children to be cared for by the local poor law committee. However, society has evolved since then and is no longer prepared to allow people to act in that way. Although marriage breakdown is not a new problem, divorce law must be periodically reviewed to ensure that it meets modern-day requirements and protects people. The Bill follows wide consultation with people across Northern Ireland and is informed by long and detailed research on how people here use the divorce system.

The research and consultation processes showed that the divorce system here works fairly well most of the time. However, there is room for improvement. In particular, the system could do more to promote good post-divorce relationships for the sake of the children and to minimise, in so far as primary legislation can, the bitterness and acrimony of divorce. Children could, and should, be more central to the system, and the law could be made easier for users to understand.

The Bill does not make divorce easier. It seeks to refine the divorce system so that it can better achieve its objectives. It strikes a balance between fears about maintaining family life and ensuring that no one is left outside the law's protection during a difficult period.

The Law Commission for England and Wales made a famous statement in 1966:

"A good divorce law should aim to save saveable marriages and to ensure that where a marriage has irretrievably broken down, the empty legal shell should be destroyed with the maximum of fairness and the minimum of bitterness, distress and humiliation."

I would like to add to that. A good divorce law, like a team of paramedics, is called upon in the aftermath of the disaster of marriage breakdown. It does not cause the disaster, but it will be judged on how well it deals with the aftermath and on how it facilitates the resumption of normal life.

Although some acrimony is unavoidable, an effective divorce system can help to lower the tension between the parties. In many cases, after they cease to be husband and wife they will still be father and mother. A good divorce system does not worsen relationships between them so that they are unable to maintain a relationship as parents for life.

The Bill, therefore, fine-tunes the procedures for divorce in Northern Ireland. I want to ensure that those procedures do not make a difficult situation even harder for the parties and children affected by the breakdown of a marriage.

In the main provisions of the Bill, clause 1 sets out a statement of principles. That is designed as an interpretive aid for the court and for any persons exercising functions under the divorce legislation. The principles are that where a marriage has irretrievably broken down and is being brought to an end, it should be done with the minimum distress to the parties and children affected; that questions should be dealt with in a manner designed to promote as good as possible a continuing relationship between the parties and children affected; and that in those cases where there is a risk of domestic violence, it should be removed or diminished as far as is reasonably practicable.

Currently, the only ground for divorce in Northern Ireland is the irretrievable breakdown of marriage. The Bill does not seek to change that. Under the present law, irretrievable breakdown of marriage is proved by using one of five facts. Those are adultery, unreasonable behaviour, desertion for a continuous period of two years, two years' separation with the consent of the respondent, or five years' separation. Three quarters of Northern Irish petitioners use separation facts, in sharp contrast to England where three quarters of petitioners use fault facts. When people in Northern Ireland use fault facts, they are most likely to use unreasonable behaviour.

Our research showed that the most common behaviours complained of were violence and alcoholism. Although many consultees felt that separation was an appropriate basis for divorce, there was also a strong feeling that the law must protect those who had suffered during their marriages because of their spouses' behaviour. A fault fact, therefore, had to remain available.

Clause 2 of the Bill, therefore, retains irretrievable breakdown of marriage as the sole ground for divorce in Northern Ireland, as evidenced by three facts: two years' separation with the respondent's consent; three years' separation; and unreasonable behaviour.

The periods of separation balance the need for enough time to prove irretrievable breakdown with the need to avoid delay for an unreasonable time in accessing financial remedies and arrangements for children. Consultees thought that the existing two-year period with the respondent's consent was appropriate, and I concur. A wider range of views was taken in relation to the five-year fact, but there was a strong feeling among consultees that five years was too long to deny people remedies from the divorce courts. I have, therefore, chosen three years. That period is long enough to demonstrate that the marriage has indubitably died, but not so long as to deny access to court.

11.30 am

As consultees identified, some petitioners require divorce to be on the basis of fault for religious reasons or because they suffered greatly while married. Some actions so destroy the soul of a marriage that as a result a reasonable person would conclude that the petitioner could not be expected to live with his or her partner. Present law formulates that sentiment as:

"The Respondent has behaved in such a way that the Petitioner cannot reasonably be expected to live with him/her".

In legal shorthand, that is referred to as "unreasonable behaviour", which is broad enough to cover the variety of behaviours that can cause a marriage to break down. I intend to retain that definition as the fault ground.

Members should not be concerned that the adultery fact will no longer appear in the primary legislation. Adultery strikes at the heart of marriage and cannot be tolerated. It is not my intention to detract from the seriousness of adulterous acts or to belittle their effect on the wronged party or on the trust that is the foundation of marriage.

The legal definition of adultery is limited. In the law only the act of full, penetrative vaginal intercourse counts as adultery, and proof of that act is required. Other forms of sexual infidelity are not legally regarded as adultery. Providing proof of adultery is prurient, difficult and often degrading for the petitioner. Under the Bill, adultery will still appear in the divorce petition, but the petitioner could also include any other connected behaviour that he or she had to endure, such as unexplained absences, changes in mood and sums of money spent in mysterious and unexplained ways.

The substantive law, therefore, has not changed. Adultery is still grounds for a divorce. The law takes sexual infidelity seriously and condemns it. Including adultery in the “unreasonable behaviour” fact will make the law easier to understand and will remove the technical and illogical legal differences between acts of sexual betrayal.

The Bill removes the legal fact of desertion, which is infrequently used, complex and difficult to prove. In all but the rarest cases, a petitioner who can rely on the fact of desertion could also use two years’ separation with consent or unreasonable behaviour as grounds for divorce. The exceptional and, perhaps, hypothetical petitioner who cannot rely on those grounds will be able to obtain a divorce using the three-year separation fact.

In line with proposals for divorce, the Bill amends the grounds for judicial separation to maintain parity. To maintain consistency throughout family law, it also amends the grounds on which a maintenance order may be obtained in the domestic proceedings court.

Clause 3 provides that in certain strictly judicially controlled cases, the oral hearing for divorce may be dispensed with. That would be available only in separation cases where arrangements for children are settled and where the respondent consents to that course of action. Consultees indicated that in some cases hearings are a stressful and unnecessary part of the process. However, the correct checks and balances must be put in place to ensure that the system protects parties and their children, especially those whose parents have not settled and made sensible decisions about their future. That is why the court is given discretion to decide whether a case is suitable for the no-hearing route, taking into account the respondent’s consent as well as the children’s interests.

There is also a catch-all provision, which has always existed, that allows a judge to dispense with oral testimony for special reasons; for example, if the petitioner is seriously incapacitated and unable to attend court.

Clause 4 allows the decree absolute, which is the final decree that dissolves the marriage, to be automatically generated after six weeks. That removes the onus from the petitioner to apply to the court office. However, the decree can be delayed by an application by either party under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995 or by the respondent for financial provision in separation cases.

Clause 5 makes provision for suitable cases to be adjourned for mediation. That process enables parties to meet a trained individual and work through the remaining issues in the marriage, such as finances or arrangements for children. It is not reconciliation; it is an alternative dispute-resolution method that is helpful to some, but not all, couples. That is why the court is given discretion to adjourn cases for the purpose of referral to mediation. That power is extended to judicial separation cases and to those under the Domestic Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order 1980.

Clauses 6 and 7 concern the grounds of application for financial provision under the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 and the 1980 Order. The present fault grounds will be amended to reflect the divorce grounds in the Bill. The “failure to maintain” ground will be amended in order to sound less adversarial by adding the words “ought in all the circumstances of the case”.

That takes into account the applicant’s need and the respondent’s ability to pay, and is designed to reduce the acrimony of the proceedings without changing the outcome of the case.

Clauses 9 to 11 address three anomalous areas of family law that must be amended so that the United Kingdom can ratify protocol 7 to the European Convention on Human Rights. The three anomalies are: the presumption of advancement; the common-law duty of a husband to maintain his wife; and the rule on housekeeping moneys. Since protocol 7 requires equal treatment in the law between husband and wife, those technical areas must be changed.

The presumption of advancement between husband and wife is a legal doctrine that affects property ownership between them. If a husband gives property to his wife, it is deemed to be a gift. However, if a wife gives property to her husband, she retains an interest in it, and her husband holds it in trust for her. That doctrine does not always reflect the intentions of the parties and can lead to unfair results in some cases. The Bill abolishes that presumption and will, therefore, allow the parties’ intentions to determine where property ownership lies.

The Bill will abolish the common-law duty that a husband should maintain his wife. That duty has been usurped by more modern primary legislation, such as the 1980 Order, but was never explicitly removed from the common law.

The rule on housekeeping moneys can lead to unfair results. Currently, any housekeeping allowance that a husband gives to his wife remains his property, including property that is purchased from the allowance. Even lottery or pools winnings that the wife wins using housekeeping money will theoretically belong to the husband. Again, that does not generally reflect modern conditions or the intentions of the parties. Clause 11 states that in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, money derived and property acquired from the allowance shall be treated as belonging to each party equally.

The remainder of the Bill's clauses and its schedules are technical in nature and deal with amendments and repeals of the existing legislation. They also contain provisions in relation to interpretation and commencement.

The provisions of the Bill will have an effect on court procedure, so commencement will depend on making new court rules, which are the statutory instruments that govern court procedure. My Department will liaise closely with the Northern Ireland Court Service on this.

The Bill is a reflection of the ever-changing nature of society and the need to review the law periodically to reflect society's needs. It will not bring about root-and-branch reform but will refine and hone existing legislation and make the law easier to understand for those who use it.

Divorce is not a pleasant subject. It is not an option that any of us want to face or have our friends or family members face. However, it happens for all sorts of reasons and to all sorts of people. I want a divorce system that supports people as much as possible during a difficult period in their lives, and I consider that the Bill will achieve that. I commend it to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement and his explanation of the Bill. Its general principles and objectives include an aspiration to minimise the distress to the parties involved and their children.

The Bill's intention to promote good post-divorce relationships between parties and between them and their children and to remove any risk of domestic violence to one of the parties in the marriage or to the children is to be welcomed. The Bill provides practical measures to support those aspirations and includes a provision to make it easier to change a fault-based divorce to a separation-based divorce and thus reduce acrimony. It also empowers courts to adjourn cases to allow mediation and enables couples to agree future arrangements for their children and their finances. The procedural changes enable some people to choose not to have a hearing. In addition to that, the Bill provides for several anomalies in the family property law to be addressed to enable the British Government to ratify protocol 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The Office of Law Reform has briefed the Committee for Finance and Personnel on the principles and details of the Bill. There has also been departmental consultation.

The level of pre-introduction consultation is welcomed, and the Office of Law Reform's treatment of the Bill is a good example for the future.

We all have personal views on the permanence or otherwise of marriage and the issue of divorce. The law permits divorce on the grounds of the irretrievable breakdown of marriage, and that is a reality. Given that, any measures to reduce the associated acrimony and bitterness should be recognised and welcomed.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel will examine in detail the key issues arising from the Bill and will take evidence from interested groups. If the Bill passes the Second Stage, the Committee will place a public notice in newspapers inviting written submissions.

The Committee is concerned about the permanence of marriage and its perception of the ongoing effort of some groups to undermine the sanctity of marriage. The Committee wishes to be reassured that the intention is not simply to provide a facility for quicker divorces but to reduce the inevitable distress and hurt experienced when a relationship irretrievably breaks down. The Committee wishes to see greater efforts made to strengthen the concept of marriage and to support couples in difficulty.

The Committee will examine the Bill and its provisions in detail, report its findings and make recommendations to the Assembly.

Dr Birnie: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Second Stage of the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill.

The aims of the Bill, as expressed, for example, in clause 1, which deals with the effect on parties and any children, are laudable. However, I am concerned about what may be the unintentional by-products of the Bill and their possibly negative social consequences. My concerns relate mainly to the so-called facts — the factors that the courts must consider to establish whether a marriage has broken down irretrievably.

I wish to pay particular attention to clause 2, which replaces article 3(2) of the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978. The proposed new paragraph 2(b) reduces the required separation period without consent from five years to three years. Whatever may be argued to the contrary, that will make it easier to get a divorce, and it will increase the incidence of divorce.

A second change to the facts is made in the proposed new paragraph 2(c), where the categories of so-called fault — adultery, desertion, and so forth — are amalgamated under the single category of unreasonable behaviour. This implies a diminution of the seriousness of the emphasis placed on individual responsibility for actions that may grossly undermine a marriage.

It will be argued that the Bill represents a change to the law as it operates in England and Wales, other Commonwealth countries, and perhaps elsewhere. However, as England has the second-highest divorce rate in the European Union, care and due caution must be exercised with regard to imitating that example. The Minister rightly emphasised the fact that Northern Ireland's divorce rate is substantially lower than that of the rest of the United Kingdom, which leads me to question the need for this series of major changes to the so-called facts that determine irretrievable breakdown. Apart from any consideration of the intrinsic merits of marriage and its permanence, I am concerned by the wider and negative social consequences of any further increase in the divorce rate in the Province. I am sure that that concerns all Members.

Even if the Bill succeeded in its stated intention of reducing the friction between adults who are, sadly, involved in a divorce process, there would remain a legitimate concern that the children involved would have a different experience. There is much evidence to support that concern. In 1994, 'The Exeter Family Study: Family Breakdown and Its Impact on Children' suggested that children involved in a divorce situation often experience more psychological distress as a result of the divorce process than as a result of any conflict between the parents during their time together. That point is made in other similar pieces of research.

I recognise the Bill's good intentions, and, as the Minister rightly said, there is a requirement that certain laws be changed, given various human rights and European considerations. However, with regard to the facts, the Bill contains a fundamentally unsound assumption that it is mainly the divorce process and how it proceeds that determine the degree of acrimony in the marriage breakdown. Surely it is the acrimony that predates and causes the breakdown.

I am pleased to have had the opportunity to highlight some of my concerns about the Bill, and I trust that the Committee will consider these late points.

Ms Lewsley: I welcome the opportunity to speak in support of the Second Stage of the Bill. The Assembly has a duty to provide essential public services and to make provision on essential everyday living issues. It has already been stated, and reiterated by the Chairperson of the Finance and Personnel Committee, that divorce is a sad reality in Northern Ireland, and we have a duty to do all that we can to ensure that people faced with difficult circumstances are protected legally and are supported in rebuilding their lives as painlessly as possible.

Members have raised some concerns, and there are also concerns in the wider public, that, in introducing the Bill, divorce is being made easier. The Minister should clarify whether the Bill does make divorce easier. He should also reassure the Assembly that, in the drafting of the legislation, individuals and relevant groups had a full say on the Bill's contents. Can the Minister outline the type of consultation undertaken, and how wide that was?

The Executive have said that they are committed to promoting the family and to protecting the rights of children. I welcome the inclusion in the statement of principles of the fact that children's interests are important in divorce proceedings, during which the focus is mostly put on the husband and wife. Children are often overlooked. The Minister should tell us what his Department is doing to ensure that mediation is put in place specifically for children caught up in a divorce.

While facilitating those people faced with divorce, we should continue to strive to promote marriage. Can the Minister tell Members what the Executive are doing to promote marriage? I support the Bill.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: We gave notice to the Minister, when discussing the Marriage Bill, that the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill would be more controversial. The Minister is well aware of the controversy that this Bill, and other Bills regarding marriage, is bound to raise.

The Minister has made clear his views on some matters today, but they are not matters that can be brushed aside by saying that the legislation should proceed because of the needs of the people. What are the needs of the people? My opinion is that the needs of the people are not served by legislation that will weaken the sanctity of marriage. The need of the people is to strengthen marriage, not to undermine marriage or to make it easier to depart from the solemn obligations entered into by those who are married. The need of this hour is not legislation for easy divorces, or using legislation to say that something is just a fault when it is far more than that. The current need is to strengthen marriage, and my party would be dedicated to the strengthening of the marriage bond and dedicated to the sanctity of marriage.

It is interesting to note that in the unfallen world, before sin entered and ruined mankind, there were two great ordinances: the ordinance of marriage and the ordinance of the holy day of God. These two ordinances are under savage attack in the world in which we live, and that indicates the sad departure of people from that which is right, true, and divinely revealed. Many people will disagree vigorously with what I am saying, but that matters not. We must realise that in this world we have two great pillars, which I believe are very important. Today, we are discussing the pillar of marriage. When we look at the laws on the statute book regarding marriage, we see how far we have departed, and how we will depart further if the Bill is accepted.

According to page 109 of the third edition of 'Words and Phrases Legally Defined', edited by barrister John B Saunders of Lincoln's Inn:

"Marriage, in its origin, is a contract of natural law; it may exist between two individuals of different sexes, although no third person existed in the world, as happened in the case of the common ancestors of mankind: It is the parent, not the child, of civil society."

That is an important statement for all of us to consider. Marriage is the parent, not the child. The child can be defended properly only if proper defence is given to the parent.

The quotation continues:

"In civil society it becomes a civil contract, regulated and prescribed by law, and endowed with civil consequences. In most civilised countries, acting under a sense of the force of sacred obligations, it has had the sanctions of religion superadded: It then becomes a religious, as well as a natural, and civil contract; for it is a great mistake to suppose that, because it is the one, therefore it may not likewise be the other. Heaven itself is made a party to the contract, and the consent of the individuals, pledged to each other, is ratified and consecrated by a vow to God. Dalrymple v Dalrymple"

I will quote from the case of Bethell v Hildyard:

"I am bound to hold that a union formed between a man and a woman in a foreign country, although it may there bear the name of a marriage, and the parties to it may there be designated husband and wife, is not a valid marriage according to the law of England unless it be formed on the same basis as marriages throughout Christendom, and be in its essence 'the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others'."

Marriage deals with different sexes; it is a union between a man and a woman. I have listened to the attacks made on marriage in the House of Commons, and I have been disgusted by some of the remarks that have been made there on this issue in the attempt to take away the sanctity of marriage.

Amendments must be made to the Bill. I, and others in my party, will be doing that, and we hope to sponsor important amendments in the Finance and Personnel Committee.

I do not support the Minister in taking away the importance of adultery in the present divorce legislation. He is not right when he argues that he can do that and not weaken marriage. The question of adultery goes to the very heart of marriage. Marriage should be a relationship that ties the man and his wife together in such a way that they two become one flesh. When that is violated it is not a fault but a crime, as much as the others delineated in the Ten Commandments of the law.

If it is wrong to do other things, then adultery is certainly wrong. No legislator should think that, with a simple line in a Bill, he can lessen the seriousness of that matter.

I am glad that divorces in Northern Ireland are fewer than in the rest of the United Kingdom. We should be glad of that and should aim at strengthening, rather than weakening, marriage. That is a matter to which we should all attend. This Bill deserves the closest possible scrutiny of every Member in the House. There should also be a thorough examination of some of the implications that will naturally flow from it.

Changing the five-year period to three years has been mooted. That is also a very serious matter. If parties are unable to come to the courts to deal with their divorces on the basis of the law that we are about to pass but, by default, as it were, wait the current five years, it is a break-up. If they must instead wait only three years, that will release the pressure on them. Those matters need extremely careful consideration.

There is a great difference between the view taken by the Bible and by our Lord Jesus Christ on marriage and that which is common in this country today. That is sad, for a happy country is one with happy and permanent marriages. I have been involved in pastoral work in Belfast for 56 years; what a delight it is to celebrate with those who have been married for 50 or 60 years. Their marriages have stood the test of time, and their families have benefited. I agree with the Minister that we must think of the children of broken marriages, for no one suffers more than the child.

We should aim to mend marriages and put our weight behind the movement that we need in our land to re-establish the sanctity and honour of marriage and the solemn obligation of those who marry. The common idea that, if things do not work out, a person can get a divorce, is not the way to enter a marriage. The couple should enter marriage to make it work.

All of us who have happy marriages know that we must work at them. Marriages do not run smoothly, because of the many weaknesses in human nature. However, we should all work to see that we keep one of the most precious commodities in the world, one which means much to the future of our nation because of its effect on the children whom we bring up and train in the ways of truth and righteousness.

I look forward to the amendments that my Colleagues on the Committee for Finance and Personnel will move, to reading the record of the debates in that Committee and to a time when we return to the House to deal with this matter again.

Mr Close: As one who is, if I might use the phrase, firmly wedded to the concept of marriage and the belief that it is the union of one man and one woman, voluntarily entered into to the exclusion of all others for life, I have difficulty with any alternative procedures that might undermine its importance. Marriage, and thus the family, forms the very basis — the nucleus — of any society. It therefore goes without saying that the destabilising of that institution has a profound impact on society itself.

We have only to look around us in today's imperfect world to see the relevance and the truth of that statement. If we further undermine the institution of marriage, future generations will be all the poorer for any failure to adhere to the clear definition, meaning and understanding of what marriage is about.

Having been happily married for more than 24 years, I have some experience of the importance and meaning of marriage, and its immeasurable benefits. Having said that, I recognise that we live in a real and imperfect world. As Members of the Assembly, we have to address unpalatable facts in an impartial manner. With that in mind, I look forward to the line-by-line scrutiny of the Bill and the amendments that have been suggested.

In recognising the unpalatable law of the land that permits divorce due to the irretrievable breakdown of a marriage, we must ensure that bitterness and acrimony are minimised. Although the intent of the Bill may be to reduce bitterness and acrimony, and ensure that any children of a marriage that breaks down irretrievably suffer less hurt, I do not need to remind the House of the old saying that the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

I am conscious that Northern Ireland has a lower divorce rate than other parts of the UK and Europe. I shall, therefore, seek to ascertain why, if that is the case, we want to change the legislation, particularly through clause 2, which could be interpreted as making divorce easy. We have heard the expression “quickie divorce”. We do not need quickie divorces: they are not in the interest of the people of Northern Ireland, for whom we should be ensuring a better future.

Clause 2, which lowers the separation requirement from five years to three, causes me concern. I also share the concerns expressed by Dr Birnie and Dr Paisley about the amalgamation of fault. It is subject to interpretation. How can the great fault of adultery be minimised, dismissed and amalgamated with other problems? That is a gross underestimation of the seriousness of adultery, and, in so doing, the Bill undermines the importance of the state of marriage. That issue must be carefully scrutinised and sorted out.

I do not have any particular problem with clauses 8, 9 and 10, which deal with housekeeping money and duty of maintenance. Many of those matters are anomalous and probably obsolete but do not cause the same concern as clause 2.

In looking forward to the examination of the Bill, I assure Dr Paisley, who has made a plea that it should receive close scrutiny, that as a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, Close will be giving scrutiny to the Bill.

Ms McWilliams: I am glad that Seamus Close recognises that some things are obsolete and must be changed. The spirit of the Family Law (Divorce etc.)

Bill involves looking at what real marriages are like today and trying to provide for them in legislation.

As regards the irretrievable breakdown of marriage, perhaps some Members have not read the Bill. It does not remove adultery from the law — a divorce granted on the grounds of irretrievable breakdown can still be obtained on proof of an act of adultery, just as it is under present law. The Minister, in his opening statement, said that as there are so few people proceeding on grounds of adultery that it does not seem reasonable to make that one of the main grounds for divorce. Most petitioners now cite unreasonable behaviour as the cause of the irretrievable or irreconcilable breakdown of their marriage.

In past years, unreasonable behaviour was something that people kept behind closed doors — as the title of a book on domestic violence once said, ‘Scream Quietly or the Neighbours will Hear’. Those suffering from domestic violence are no longer prepared to scream quietly but prefer to use the courts and the law of the land.

There are 3,500 cases of common assault by one partner on another in Northern Ireland every year. There are on average five murders every year. There is a case of actual bodily harm or grievous bodily harm on one partner — usually the wife — in Northern Ireland every day. Those are the police statistics. However, the police would argue that the figures — other than those for murder, which come to the public’s attention — are a gross underestimation. They estimate that it is more likely that there are about 10,000 cases of common assault in marriages every year in Northern Ireland.

Rather than the words we have heard from some Members about keeping the family together at all costs, they should be asking — for the sake of the children — at what cost should the family be kept together? Is it at the enormous cost of wives — and husbands — presenting to nurses and doctors in the accident and emergency departments of major hospitals with serious injuries sustained within marriage? It is to be hoped that, in addressing this situation, Members will provide the right for those so injured to be able to leave such an injured marriage. A marriage that causes such enormous grief ought to be ended because it is not a marriage of equality. That is what clause 2 is about.

Members who have done any work in this area or who have interviewed those affected will know why the Bill seeks to reduce the five-year requirement to three years. As public representatives, they will have had women in their constituency offices telling how their husbands have said, “If I can’t have you, no one else will”. When those women seek justice and redress through the law they have to wait five years because respondents will not permit them to have their marriages ended after two years. Possessiveness, jealousy, control and power over the partner are exercised, and the law is used accordingly.

That is why many petitioners in Northern Ireland — and in Northern Ireland alone — have had to wait five years.

Why should people who could live independently, walk free from such violence, and raise their children in peace, be made to live like that for longer than they need to?

That is why the terms have changed from five years to three. The condition of consent as it applied in the Matrimonial Causes (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 will remain in the new Bill, but three years of separation will now suffice in its absence, on the grounds that it should not be held over the partner who seeks that redress of the court.

Anyone who suggests that the notion of fault has been removed should read the Bill, because it still allows the petitioner to go to court on the grounds of fault. Research shows that three quarters of Northern Ireland petitioners do not argue fault; they are probably so stigmatised that they cannot publicly talk about why their marriages broke down, and they find other reasons such as the fact and duration of separation. Perhaps the time has come to allow people to come before the courts to speak about what has gone on behind closed doors.

In response to Dr Birnie's concern about the children of divorced parents, the same research points to the fact that they have been enormously disturbed if the marriage continues and if there is violence and abuse. Children studies have said that they can go to bed and sleep in peace at night now, rather than lying awake wondering if they could save their mothers from further injury or death.

Dr Birnie: Such research shows that, on average, children deem that they suffer less psychological distress in the continuing marriage than the reverse. The Member is arguing about the sad and hard cases, which I accept.

Ms McWilliams: I am glad that the Member accepts that. I wish that we could use the word "hard", but that is no longer the case. The children said that the emotional and psychological damage was often as bad as the physical and that it takes more years to recover from what was said than what was done. We are introducing the concept of psychiatric injury into law today to recognise the experience of mental harm as well as that of physical harm.

The requirement for oral testimony to be dispensed with is also a positive step. Research has shown that petitioners have felt no benefit from giving oral testimony where there has been consent. The Bill still allows the court to have discretion. Why are there no savings as a result of that? The changes proposed in the Bill will cost £117,736, but a great deal of money could be saved if there were no longer any requirement for oral testimony, which endures only in Northern Ireland. Most people who have gone through that process agree that it is a waste of money.

Are the figures before us the maximum savings or a rough estimate? The explanatory and financial memorandum states that the right to mediation, as outlined in clause 5, will be cost neutral. However, I warn the Minister in his finance capacity that it will not be done well if there is no cost or if it is cost neutral. People will need to be well trained in mediation skills as it is now written into the legislation. I am glad that it has been recognised that mediation may not be a useful tool where there has been domestic violence. I urge those involved in the clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill to recognise that, because it is often very late in the court proceedings before there is a right to say that domestic violence has taken place.

I welcome clauses 10 and 11, which improve equality of opportunity. Clause 11 replaces the outdated laws relating to housekeeping allowances. The inequality that once existed is summed up by an old Russian proverb:

"I thought that I saw two people, but it was only a man and his wife".

The legislation recognises that the reverse applies: clause 10 addresses the automatic assumption that a husband has a common law duty to maintain his wife, and clause 11 abolishes the husband's right to keep the entire housekeeping allowance. As Mr Close said, the Bill recognises that the law upholds some obsolete practices that must be changed.

Finally, the Minister must address the human rights issue. The explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"In relation to the question of separate representation of children in private law proceedings affecting them (UN Convention on the Rights of the Child Article 12) the Law Reform Advisory Committee is currently seeking the permission of the Minister for Finance and Personnel to consider this matter."

Has that matter been considered seriously? The right of the child to be represented separately is argued in the courts with increasing frequency, especially in acrimonious divorce proceedings.

Mr Weir: I have certain concerns about the Bill. In passing, however, it was brave of a Finance Minister to state that spending money "in mysterious and unexplained ways" could constitute unreasonable behaviour.

The Bill contains several aspects to which I have no objection. Clause 1 contains good statements of intent regarding children and domestic violence. There is no objection to clauses 5 to 8, which deal with grounds for mediation and the use of less pejorative language with regard to financial provisions. Similarly, no one objects to the changes to antiquated legislation detailed in clauses 9 to 11. However, I have severe reservations about clauses 2 and 4.

The DUP recognises that marriages break down and that the state must intervene on occasion. However, it does not suggest, as Ms McWilliams did, that marriage should be upheld “at all costs”. No one from these Benches used that phrase. It would be wrong for the Member to put words in the mouths of some of the people who expressed concerns. The DUP supports the institution of marriage. It believes that society has a duty to support the family unit and the sanctity of marriage. Ms Lewsley posed the key question when she asked whether the Bill would make divorce easier. Undoubtedly, clause 2 will make divorce easier.

Two aspects have been highlighted in particular. The removal of adultery as a separate ground for divorce sends out the wrong signal. I take issue with what Ms McWilliams said; no one on this side of the House has suggested that fault-based grounds have been removed completely. However, the three grounds for divorce have been rolled into one. In this Bill adultery is no longer accepted as a direct cause for divorce. It may be a contributory factor, or an action that might constitute unreasonable behaviour. In essence, the Bill downgrades the seriousness of adultery. That sends out damaging signals to society about morality.

As a barrister with experience of working on divorce cases, I disagree with the Minister’s implication that adultery is a high hurdle. It is not next to impossible to prove, as has been suggested. To put adultery on a level with unusual spending habits is to downgrade its significance.

We will be seeking an amendment to reinstate adultery as a separate ground for divorce. We will not accept the downgrading of adultery, as it damages the concept of marriage.

Reducing the separation period from five years to three years will, undoubtedly, lead to more divorce. It makes divorce easier. At present, there is the option of two years with the consent of both parties, which is continued in the Bill. However, if the divorce is opposed by one party, simply adding on another year renders that consent meaningless. There must be a significant gap between divorce with the consent of both parties and divorce where the desire of one party, however motivated, is to save the marriage. Reducing the separation period will have a major impact on that.

I also take exception to clause 2. In clause 1 there is reference to violence against one of the parties. However, there is no reference to domestic violence in clause 2. It does not change the law on domestic violence by one iota. Preserving clause 2 as it stands will aid no one experiencing domestic violence. If it is passed unamended it will lead to easier divorce. Therefore my party will be seeking amendments to reinstate the grounds of adultery and to restore the five years’ separation without consent.

An amendment may be necessary to the change in the application for the decree absolute. At present, when a decree nisi is granted, a separate application must be made to obtain the decree absolute. A positive act on behalf of the petitioner is required before a decree absolute is made. The Bill shifts the burden so that the petitioner must intervene negatively to stop the decree absolute being granted. It is clear that that will make divorce easier.

In conclusion, we will be seeking amendments on these matters. It is often said that we live in a disposable society — a throwaway society in which things are not valued. The Assembly should make it clear that marriage is not to be part of that throwaway society. We place value on marriage and, as such, some of those changes will diminish the sanctity of marriage. Therefore we will not accept the Bill as it stands.

Mr Speaker: Members have put a substantial number of questions to the Minister, and it would be inappropriate to ask him to respond at this stage, as there remains only a few minutes. I therefore propose that the House by leave suspend until 2.00 pm, resuming with the response from the Minister.

The sitting was suspended at 12.28 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Dr Farren: I am grateful for the contributions that have been made during the debate. Many concerns have been expressed, and I hope, as the Bill progresses through the Committee Stage, and the other remaining stages, that departmental officials and I will have the opportunity to assuage some of those concerns as we explain in more detail the purpose of the Bill and the effects of its clauses.

None of us wants to see the breakdown of marriages that have started with so much hope and promise. Marriage is not usually entered into lightly, and family life forms vital foundations in society. However, in one way or another, all Members have acknowledged that divorce is a fact, however regrettable. Relationships break down to the extent that they cannot be retrieved. That is where the Bill comes in. It deals with a situation in which people's marriages have broken down irretrievably, and it endeavours to deal with the parties involved as humanely as possible.

Mr Molloy referred to the Committee for Finance and Personnel's forthcoming scrutiny of the Bill. I appreciated his acknowledgement of the work of the Office of Law Reform in the pre-introduction phase. The Office of Law Reform has welcomed the willingness of the Committee to engage with it as it moves through the pre-introduction process, and it affirms its commitment to early consultation.

Although Dr Birnie accepts that the aims of the legislation are laudable, he was concerned by what he described as the "unintentional by-products" of the Bill's proposals. Other Members shared his concerns about the reduction of the requirement of five years' separation to three years. After the consultation process, the Department's view was that, when a couple decide to separate, five years was too long a period to deny people access to a court to reorder their financial and childcare issues. Parties will usually have spent considerable time in coming to the decision to end their marriage. The three-year period does not start with the first disagreement. It is the beginning of a legal process, which may follow a significant period during which two spouses have been trying to reconcile themselves. Therefore, I consider that three years of living separately is long enough to establish that a marriage has irretrievably broken down. Once that fact is established, the parties can start to build a new life.

Dr Birnie, Rev Dr Ian Paisley and others expressed their concern that adultery is no longer included on the face of the Bill. In respect of the changes to the fault facts, the current law on adultery is complex, narrow, technical, prurient and difficult to prove. Adultery is, however, a serious matter, and the Bill's proposals do not make it any less serious. It does not remove adultery as a fault fact. The Bill's formulation provides greater protection to the petitioner, and it is less onerous and humiliating for the petitioner with regard to what must be proved.

Dr Birnie and Prof McWilliams referred to strands of research into the effects of divorce on children. Different researchers have come to different conclusions about what is best for children, and I welcome the reference to the research that has been made in the debate.

However, the issue concerns individual family units. What is right in each case will vary. Families must find what is best in each of their individual situations. Marriage support services, the legal profession and the courts all have their role to play in finding the proper course in each case.

Ms Lewsley asked several questions, the first of which suggested that the Bill will make divorce easier. The Bill is not about making divorce easier or more difficult. It does not alter the ground for divorce, as many Members seem to claim. The ground for divorce remains the irretrievable breakdown of marriage. The Bill attempts to streamline procedures, which will help a couple whose marriage has irretrievably broken down to part as amicably as possible. Moreover, arrangements will be put in place for children.

Ms Lewsley asked a question about consultation. I am pleased to assure her that, as always, the Office of Law Reform consulted widely and received well-informed, substantive responses. We were especially grateful for responses from the Churches and the voluntary sector, as well as those from political parties and members of the public. The research commissioned by the Office of Law Reform, which informed its consultation paper, was based not only on an extensive questionnaire survey of the views of people who were in the throes of divorce but on face-to-face interviews with people who had gone through the process, as well as judges and legal and other professionals who operate the system. There was an extensive consultation process, which was supported by comprehensive and wide-ranging research.

I affirm to Ms Lewsley that support for children and their families is at the heart of the Programme for Government. The commitment to putting in place a children's commissioner and a strategy for children and young people demonstrates the value that the Executive put on children and on family life in general. The Bill makes provision for couples whose relationship has irretrievably broken down. The law on divorce already provides that a court can adjourn for attempts at reconciliation if it believes that that is a possibility.

Ms Lewsley raised an important point about children and the mediation process. I shall ensure that the officials who are examining the mediation process will take it on board.

I thank Mr Close for his comments; I hope that I have dealt with many of his points about the period of separation and adultery.

I thank Ms McWilliams for raising the issue of domestic violence. It is a scourge and a cancer in Northern Ireland, and I welcome any opportunity to raise its profile. I intend that the Bill will continue to raise the profile of domestic violence, therefore bringing it out into the open and allowing victims to break free from the cycle of violence and silence that frequently envelops their experiences.

Ms McWilliams mentioned cost savings. I appreciate her observations, but I certainly do not want cost saving to be seen as a purpose of the Bill. The change to the law on hearings will not reduce court scrutiny, which will take place in a different way. Many cases need a hearing, and some people want a hearing. Therefore, hearings must be provided in those cases.

Ms McWilliams also raised a point about the separate representation of children. She will be glad to know that the Law Reform Advisory Committee for Northern Ireland will consider separate representation of children in private law proceedings under the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995. I expect that the Law Reform Advisory Committee will consult, as is its pattern, on that issue, and I am sure that it will be pleased to receive Ms McWilliams's views.

I hope that my comments have dealt with Mr Weir's major points. I shall welcome hearing more of his concerns as to how the introduction of a new process for the generation of decrees absolute will make divorce easier. I regard that as a practical procedural initiative only.

The Bill is a measured response to the needs of society in Northern Ireland. It is not a root-and-branch reform, but an opportunity to review whether the Northern Ireland divorce system — 24 years after it was set down in legislation — has unnecessarily added to the stress and acrimony that accompany divorce. The Bill will support individuals as they face difficult times in their lives and will highlight the needs of children in the divorce process. Those are worthy aims for any divorce system, and the content of the Bill is to be commended.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill (NIA 01/02) be agreed.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

Second Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the State Pension Credit Bill (NIA 4/02) be agreed.

The Bill will make provisions for Northern Ireland corresponding to those made for Great Britain under the State Pension Credit Act 2002, which received Royal Assent on 25 June 2002. Therefore, it is a parity measure.

As I said during the debate on accelerated passage for the Bill and during the debate on the Second Stage of the Social Security Bill, there has always been parity between Great Britain and Northern Ireland as regards social security legislation. I emphasise that that is how it should be. People in Northern Ireland pay the same National Insurance contributions and the same taxes as people elsewhere in the country, and it is right and proper that they should receive the same benefits at the same time and at the same rates. Moreover, parity legislation enables Northern Ireland to use Great Britain's computer systems, which is much more cost-effective than setting up a separate computer system here.

Parity covers the content of legislation and the timing of its implementation. New provisions have always been introduced here at the same time as in the rest of the country, and that arrangement should continue.

Pension credit marks the end of a fundamental unfairness in the social security system. From the early days of the modern welfare state, people who made provision for themselves were penalised for their efforts. I am sure that every Member has met pensioners living on modest incomes who have often struggled to put aside money for their retirement and who feel that they have been let down. They find that they are little or no better off than people who have saved nothing. Although it is necessary to concentrate on helping the poorest pensioners, those who have saved a modest amount for their retirement should be rewarded, not penalised, for their thrift and effort. In addition, the obstacles that put people off taking their pension entitlement must be tackled. Pension credit offers a solution that provides substantial sums to help the least well-off and tapers that help for pensioners at the higher end of the income distribution. Pension credit will tackle pensioner poverty in a precise way, and it will ease the disincentive to save that has been inherent in the social security system.

The State Pension Credit Bill will provide extra help for around half of all pensioners in Northern Ireland. Some 120,000 pensioners stand to gain an average of £400 a year, while some will gain up to £1,000 a year. With pension credit, the poorest one third of pensioners will gain, on average, an extra £8·20 a week. Pension credit will add £50 million to the money that pensioners at the lower end of the income distribution are entitled to receive. By contrast, spending the same amount on increasing the basic state pension would result in a gain of only £3·20 a week, which would be £5 a week less. The least well-off pensioners will gain over two and a half times more with pension credit than if the money were spread thinly by raising everyone's pensions.

2.15 pm

At present, 75,000 pensioners receive a minimum income guarantee. That has increased the incomes of the poorest pensioners by at least £15 a week over and above inflation. Clause 2 sets out how the pension credit will build on that approach and lift pensioners out of poverty.

It is also necessary to ensure that it pays to save, and that is the purpose of the Bill. The pension credit will address a fundamental unfairness in the system. For the first time, we shall be able to tell people that if they save even modest amounts above the basic state pension, they will be rewarded for their efforts. It will pay to save.

The pension credit will work in two ways. First, it replaces the minimum income guarantee as the means to provide a floor below which pensioners' incomes should not fall. In 2003, pension credit will increase single pensioners' entitlement to a guaranteed minimum of £100 a week, or £154 for couples. Clause 2 also provides for a higher minimum income guarantee for carers and pensioners with severe disabilities: £140 for a single person, or £194 for couples. Secondly, and critically, the pension credit will provide an additional top-up to reward pensioners aged 65 or over who have saved for their retirement. Clause 3 will ensure that pensioners aged 65 or over who have a modest occupational pension or modest savings will receive more as a result of their thrift. It will give pensioners a cash addition of 60p for every £1 of their income above the level of the basic state pension, up to a maximum of £13·80 a week for a single person and £18·60 for a couple. The reward for savings ensures that those who have put something aside for their retirement will be better off for having done so.

Although pension credit may seem complicated, it is fundamentally a simple and straightforward concept. To ensure that Members have a grasp of it, and to illustrate the real gains to pensioners from the pension credit, I shall give an example of how it will work in practice. Pensioners with a full basic state pension of £77 a week will receive the maximum guaranteed credit of £23. Their total income will, therefore, be £100. As they do not have a qualifying income from savings or an occupational pension, they will not receive a savings credit. On the other hand, pensioners with the full basic state pension of £77 a week and an occupational pension of, for example, £12 will receive a guaranteed credit of £11 to bring their income up to the £100 maximum guarantee. The amount of the savings credit will be 60p for every £1 of qualifying income above the basic state pension. In that case, therefore, a pensioner will receive a savings credit of £7·20, giving him or her a total income of £107·20.

The guaranteed minimum for carers and severely disabled people would be increased. A single, severely disabled pensioner, with £77 state pension and £10 occupational pension, would receive a guaranteed credit of £53 to bring his or her income up to the £140 personal guaranteed minimum. In addition to that, he or she would also receive a savings credit of £6, giving a total income of £146.

That is fairly simple arithmetic. However, as is the case with any pension entitlement, pensioners do not have to do the calculation. What is important is that they know that they are entitled to apply. In general, pensioners will qualify if their incomes are up to approximately £135 for single people or £200 for couples.

Many pensioners think that there is a stigma attached to receiving income support. The process of reporting changes in income puts many people off claiming that support. They therefore lose out and risk poverty. To tackle pensioner poverty seriously, an income assessment must be undertaken to help claimants. There is nothing new about that.

Under the current rules, pensioners must report every change in their circumstances from week to week. However, with pension credit, they will be asked for the information only when it is needed to work out their benefit. For example, we will only need to know about their savings that are over £6,000.

The pension credit capital rules have been designed to promote saving. The current rule, which excludes pensioners with savings of £12,000 or more, will be abolished. Also, the first £6,000 will be ignored, meaning that 85% of people who claim pension credit will not need to disclose their savings. For savings above £6,000, a notional rate of income will be assumed. It will be set at 10%, which is half the current assumed rate of income in the minimum income guarantee, which stands at approximately 20%. Therefore, if a pensioner saves £10,000, the current minimum income guarantee rules assume an income of £16 a week, whereas under pension credit, only £8 a week would be assumed.

With the introduction of pension credit, the weekly means test for pensioners will be abolished from the age of 65. Most pensioners will have their awards set for long periods, normally five years at a time, which will reduce the intrusion that many of them rightly complain about. It will encourage them to claim money that is rightfully theirs, and it will help to tackle pensioner poverty.

It is expected that between half and two thirds of the pension credit group will remain on benefit for at least five years. By the time pension credit replaces the minimum income guarantee, it is estimated that 120,000 pensioners will be entitled to it.

When pensioners reach the age of 65, the majority find that their income is settled and their circumstances are stable. Therefore, there is no need to continue to impose on them the requirement to report every little change that may happen from week to week. They will be asked to report only major changes in their lives, such as the death of a spouse. However, they will be able to ask for their pension credit to be increased at any time, should their other sources of income be reduced.

Clauses 6 to 10 contain the principles of the five-year awards and the reassessment of income during that period. The Bill will provide more for the poorest pensioners and will help present and future pensioners to avoid poverty. It is a substantial reform that will benefit about half of pensioners in Northern Ireland. It helps to tackle poverty; it rewards thrift and saving; and it will benefit 120,000 pensioners by an average of £400 a year. Therefore, I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

That the Second Stage of the State Credit Pension Bill (NIA 04/02) be agreed.

SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the Social Security Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

EMPLOYMENT BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning (Dr Birnie): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 18 October 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Employment Bill (NIA 11/01).

The Employment Bill received its Second Stage reading on 5 June 2002 and was referred to the Committee for Employment and Learning on 6 June 2002. It is important legislation that will introduce a series of measures designed to help employees better balance their family life with their employment responsibilities, while taking into account the needs of businesses.

The measures include amendments to existing legislation to improve maternity rights, a provision for two weeks' paid paternity leave, adoption leave and pay for parents, and a duty on employers to consider seriously requests from parents with young or disabled children to work flexible hours.

The Committee is committed to ensuring that it carries out its responsibilities fully in rigorously scrutinising the Bill. Members have discussed the Bill at eight meetings, and we have received oral and written submissions from several interested parties.

Several proposed amendments have been debated, and to ensure that due and proper consideration is given to them, the Committee seeks an extension to 18 October to allow it sufficient time to consider the Bill fully and to report its findings. We intend to complete our work as quickly as possible, and I assure Members that we will not take any more time than is absolutely necessary to ensure that all the legislation is in place before the dissolution of the House. I ask Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 18 October 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Employment Bill (NIA 11/01).

HOUSING SUPPORT SERVICES BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

HOUSING BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

Mr Deputy Speaker: As the next two motions relate to the extension of Committee Stages of housing legislation, I propose to conduct only one debate. I shall call the Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development to move the motion, and there will then be a debate on both motions. When all those who wish to speak have done so, I shall call the Chairperson to do the winding-up speech and will put the Question on the first motion. I shall then ask the Chairperson to move the second motion before putting the Question without further debate. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Cobain): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 13 December 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Housing Support Services Bill (NIA 23/01).

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 13 December 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Housing Bill (NIA 24/01). — [The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development (Mr Cobain).]

The Housing Support Services Bill and the Housing Bill, both important pieces of legislation, which passed Second Stage on 3 July after some debate, presently stand referred to the Committee for Social Development.

The Housing Support Services Bill seeks to introduce a new method for funding the costs associated with providing housing support services for vulnerable people who live in supported accommodation. Although the Bill has eight clauses, the Committee is concerned that they are scrutinised fully. We are also anxious to examine that Bill in the context of the Housing Bill before reporting back to the Assembly.

Before the Housing Bill's belated introduction to the Assembly, there was great anticipation and much speculation about this long-awaited legislation. It is substantial in volume and content, having no less than 150 clauses and five schedules. It is the first piece of housing legislation to emerge in Northern Ireland for 10 years, and the Assembly has a duty of care to ensure that its wide-ranging provisions are given the utmost scrutiny.

It attempts to deal with a host of issues by introducing new provisions or amending existing legislation. The main areas to be addressed in the Bill include: the conduct of tenants of premises let by the Housing Executive or registered housing associations; the payment of grants for the renewal of private sector housing; caravan sites for members of the Irish traveller community; the rent register; the allocation of housing; and registered schemes for houses in multiple occupation.

2.30 pm

The Bill is likely to be remembered as the most important piece of legislation considered by the first mandate of the Northern Ireland Assembly. It is regrettable that we have so little time left to give the Bill the consideration that it deserves. However, it is important to acknowledge that the Committee had the foresight to conduct a major inquiry into housing matters in anticipation of the Bill's introduction. We received much evidence and called many witnesses during that inquiry, and two reports on the subject were published in the past year, all of which should prove invaluable as we carry out this enormous task.

I hope that the House will agree that the Committee will be unable to do justice to either Bill in the 30 days prescribed in Standing Orders. The Committee is mindful, however, that there may be a desire for a significant and long-running debate on the Housing Bill after its Committee Stage. Having carefully considered the matter, the Committee believes that it could fulfil its responsibilities only if it met at least twice weekly during September, October and November, in order to examine the detail of the Housing Bill and the Housing Support Services Bill, and subsequently to produce and present associated reports to the Assembly for its consideration.

In seeking extensions on both Bills until 13 December 2002, I recognise that members of the Committee will face increasing and competing pressures in the weeks ahead. I stress how important it will be that Committee members attend the meetings and that everything possible be done to accommodate their attendance.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Cobain, there have been no requests to speak. Do you wish to make a winding-up speech, or will I put the Question?

Mr Cobain: Please put the Question.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 13 December 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Housing Support Services Bill (NIA 23/01).

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 13 December 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Housing Bill (NIA 24/01).

SEEDS (FEES) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

Prayer of Annulment

The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Rev Dr Ian Paisley): I beg to move

That the Seeds (Fees) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 257/2002) be annulled.

The entire Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development has endorsed my speech, so I speak not only as the Chairperson of the Committee, but on behalf of all the Committee members. The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee, Mr George Savage, asked me to apologise for his absence and to make it clear that he supports the motion. He has other urgent business to attend to.

My Committee does not want to pray against Statutory Rules — they are a prayerless bunch. However, the Committee believes that it has no option but to bring the matter before the House. This Statutory Rule, which increases seed growers' fees by 5%, came into operation on 2 September and is a burden that the agriculture industry in Northern Ireland should not be asked to bear at this time.

At its meeting on 24 May, the Committee discussed the proposed Regulations and agreed that it could not make an informed decision without knowing the number of people who would be affected by the proposed increase, and without knowing the outcome of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's consultation exercise. The Committee had an opportunity to consider the Department's response at its meeting on 28 June. Despite concerns raised by the Ulster Farmers' Union in its response to the consultation exercise, the Department was determined — even at that early stage — to proceed with the introduction of the Statutory Rule. The Department's response clearly demonstrates the reason behind that determination. It states:

“not to increase the fees would mean that those in Northern Ireland would be further out of line with those in GB, which would incur adverse comment”.

The Committee did not accept that the fear of incurring “adverse comment” — presumably from Mrs Beckett — was sufficient reason to add to the industry's financial burden. However, it reluctantly agreed that, given the relatively small number of seed growers affected, and the fact that fees in Northern Ireland would remain lower than those in the rest of the United Kingdom, the Department could proceed to make the Statutory Rule.

However, when the made and laid Regulations came before the Committee on 6 September, the situation for the agriculture industry had considerably, even drastically, worsened. In that meeting, the Committee resolved that the Deputy Chairperson and I should seek a meeting with Mrs Beckett. The meeting was urgently required to discuss the impact of unprecedented wet weather on the industry and the need for the United Kingdom Government to apply for EC wet weather payments on behalf of Northern Ireland producers.

In June and July this year, Northern Ireland had 155% and 150% more rainfall respectively than for the average of those months between 1961 and 1990. With that in mind, the members present at the meeting on 6 September could not approve the Statutory Rule, because, by doing so, it would add to the industry's financial hardship. At a meeting on the matter a year ago, the Committee was adamant that, while the plight in the farming industry continued, it should not be asked to vote for an increase in payments from farmers.

My Committee wishes to send a clear message to the farming industry that it recognises its plight and will take action to help in whatever way it can. I call on the House to do likewise. I would be a happy man if I could say that problems will be over by a certain time, but the problems have yet to be solved.

Therefore, I call on the House to support the motion to annul the Seeds (Fees) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 and put this matter on hold.

Rev Dr William McCrea: I concur with the remarks made by the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development. I find it strange that the Department's answer is that it is desiring to have the payments equal to those in the rest of the United Kingdom. On 16 November 2000 I raised a matter with the Minister on pre-basic seed potatoes and Northern Ireland inspection charges, which were not the same as in the rest of the United Kingdom. Payment was being demanded in Northern Ireland, but it was not being paid in the rest of the United Kingdom.

I have frequently written to the Minister, and I have got answers back. I have requested meetings with the Minister since November 2000, but those requests have been refused. I intend raising with the Speaker the fact that a Minister can refuse to have a meeting with a Member of the House on such a basic matter. If fees are supposed to be basic across the United Kingdom, but are not being paid in the rest of the United Kingdom, then the Department is trying to have a bite at both cherries — it wants it both ways, and I do not accept that.

The farming industry is on its knees, and everyone can see that the farming community is facing crisis after crisis. For reasons outside of their control, no sooner are farmers out of the depths of the slough of despond than they are driven back into the depths of despair again. The Chairperson, on behalf of his Committee, has outlined that now is not a time to be putting further weight upon an industry in which farmers, for all their labours, are not even getting the basic minimum wage. That is disgraceful, and the Department must rethink this matter. I hope that the Assembly has the guts to stand up to the Department and say that it will not go along with this rise. We will endeavour to do our part to alleviate the great suffering of the farming community.

I trust that the Minister will renege on her refusal to meet me. I have many letters from her Department on that, and I have made many telephone calls trying to get answers. I trust that, even yet, she will have the decency to speak face to face with people in the potato industry who are aggrieved. Even if the answer is the same, she should at least have the honour to speak to those who are suffering and to tell them the facts, rather than relying on a review that has been promised since 16 November 2000, and which is unfinished. Something is seriously wrong, and answers could easily be provided on this matter. The potato industry, which is suffering like the rest of the farming community, deserves at least that.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Along with the rest of the Committee, I agreed on a position about this particular Regulation. This is little different to many Regulations that come through the Committee, but this is an issue on which the Committee took a stand.

We are looking here at costs that are continually being placed upon producers. Those producers have faced lower returns, a decline in their income and a decline in the entire industry on an ongoing basis over recent years. That is not the fault of the Minister, but it is caused by the fact that Britain, the member state, has policies that do not help farmers here. One of the basic problems is that the policies coming from Europe, or the member state — now led by Margaret Beckett — are damaging to the industry here. This Regulation would place additional costs on the producers of cereals; they have faced problems, as have the producers of milk or beef.

2.45 pm

They have faced BSE and foot-and-mouth disease; tuberculosis and brucellosis have had quite rampant effects in the border counties of Armagh and Fermanagh; and lower returns — especially on milk — have signalled meltdown to many of them.

Many small farmers — and large farmers who years ago would have been sustainable — are now thinking of leaving the farming industry because they see little future in it. We do not like to admit that that is the situation, but it has happened because of increased costs, outside competition and imports that are not subject to the same Regulations or costs as local produce. It is not a level playing field. The push towards world prices and the mid-term review of the common agricultural policy (CAP) taking place in October will put further pressure on the future of the industry in this part of Ireland.

The problem is that farmers are expected to pay every time, regardless of how much has gone before. The Minister may have difficulty with that, but it does not look well for the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development to be adding more costs to farmers. The farmers question how much representation they have in Europe with regard to European Regulations and the fact that it is people such as Margaret Beckett who represent them in Europe and who have the final say. We must fight to be treated as a region with its own agriculture industry and priority. That will not happen while British Ministers represent us on farming matters. All Committee members, including the Members on my right, agreed the position on that, and I cannot see why they are becoming chummy with the Minister. We should not be increasing costs now. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Armstrong: We should accept that there must be an increase owing to the extremely bad weather this year. Changes are made in all sorts of issues, because nothing in life ever stays the same. However, it could be postponed until a later date and no expenses put on the agriculture industry now. We should wait until after the growing season next year, and I ask the Minister to reconsider and hold off any expenses on the farming community until then.

Mr Paisley Jnr: It is always very difficult to follow a speech by Mr Armstrong, as he is so erudite, humorous and lengthy. His oratory has given me something to live up to.

Northern Ireland has had a terrible summer; appalling wet weather has affected the entire country in a very bad and unstable way. It has affected the farming community, who make their living by the land, in the worst possible way. On that basis the Minister should reconsider, and recognise that the potato sector is not grant-aided and does not get handouts like other sectors. It lives and falls by the marketplace, the sweat on the brows of men and women, and on what farmers put into and get out of the land. When that land has been saturated as a result of the wet weather we realise something of the problems and plight that the potato sector has had recently.

I hope that the Minister will accept that changes at this time are burdensome and ought to be rejected for that reason. I hope that she is prepared to stand down this bill, which will otherwise be sent out to potato farmers, and that she will grant them the assistance that they require so urgently. I support the prayer of annulment.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Rodgers): I have noted Members' comments and concerns on this matter, but I must oppose the prayer of annulment and ask for the Assembly's support in rejecting it. Although, having heard the views of the various parties represented, I think it highly unlikely that it will be rejected, I shall make my position very clear.

Like all Departments, my Department is required to recover costs from the beneficiaries of the statutory services that it provides. The requirement that fees cover the full cost of service delivery where a benefit accrues to an individual business has been a justified policy feature of the Treasury and, in our case, the Department of Finance and Personnel for some time.

Northern Ireland sets its own seeds fees, although traditionally those have always been set at the same level as those charged in Great Britain, even though they have not been sufficient to achieve the full recoupment of operating costs. Indeed, on this occasion, the Northern Ireland seeds fees were being increased by 5% instead of 18%, the level required to keep Northern Ireland in line with its counterparts in Great Britain. I was particularly conscious that a decision not to increase the seeds fees for a second year in succession would mean my having to fund the additional costs involved from my Department's resources again. I see no valid justification for rejecting the increase, and I wish to make that very clear. If I cannot gather fees in this way, the costs will have to come out of another part of my budget; something else will have to be cut.

On 13 May 2002 my private secretary wrote to the Clerk of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development apprising him of my Department's intention to consult bodies representative of the local industry on the proposed fee increases. The Committee Clerk responded on 27 May 2002, stating that the Committee had considered the proposal and had resolved to await the outcome of the consultation exercise before commenting. Members also asked for some additional clarification on the proposal.

On 21 June 2002 my private secretary wrote again to the Committee, advising members of the outcome of the consultation exercise and providing the additional information sought by the Committee members on various points. On 1 July 2002 the Committee Clerk replied, stating that the Committee had considered the proposals in the light of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's consultation exercise and the additional information provided. He said that members objected in principle to fee increases and also that a member's proposal to reject the increase had fallen by the narrowest of margins. However, the Clerk further stated that the Committee was content for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to make the Statutory Rule, having taken into account the small numbers affected, the relatively small fee increase and the information that fees payable in Northern Ireland would remain the lowest in the United Kingdom.

I sought and obtained the Committee's approval for the Statutory Rule and proceeded on that basis. The Regulations have already come into effect. An 18% fee increase would have been needed to achieve full cost recovery in 2002-03, but I decided to limit the increase to 5%. Even with that increase, our fees will remain lower than those in Great Britain. For instance, in the case of crop inspection, £12·90 a hectare in Northern Ireland still compares very favourably with £13·20 in Scotland and £13·55 in England. The figure of £12·90 a hectare amounts to an increase of 25p an acre.

My decision to increase those fees should be supported. Annulment of the Regulations will create an unwelcome precedent and will revoke the entire basis for such fees. A new Statutory Rule will be required to reinstate the 1999 level of fees, and that will mean a waste of time and resources.

I apologise to the Chairperson of the Committee for my absence at the start of the debate: the business of the House went faster than expected. However, I have listened to some of the remarks that have been made. I am well aware of the difficult circumstances facing the farming community. My officials, the unions and the veterinary association have apprised me of those circumstances, and on my visits to farms I have seen the damage that has been done and the costs that will be incurred this winter and beyond.

I have done everything possible to help the farming community. My officials and advisers have provided technical advice to farmers from the beginning. My Department is setting winter management options in motion, which will be rolled out from Hillsborough and throughout the North. Workshops will help farmers to manage their difficult circumstances. I have received permission to use set-aside land for grazing, and I am working hard to get permission from Europe to increase the amount of advance beef premium to help with farmers' cash-flow problems. I have also asked for a meeting with the Northern Ireland Grain Trade Association and the Northern Ireland Bankers' Association.

With regard to weather aid, the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and the House know that well before 1 July, when the Committee made its decision to go ahead, we were aware of the difficulties facing farmers. There was twice the normal rainfall in June. The Committee and the House knew that I had already asked the UK Minister, Margaret Beckett, to examine the possibility of seeking wet weather aid from Europe.

I do not wish to give false expectations to the farming community; the last thing they need is to be told things not as they are but as they wish them to be. We cannot begin to build a case for wet weather aid until we reach the end of the growing season. In June, I instructed my officials to monitor the situation so that if there were a case to be made, we would be able to make it. If we can prove that the loss fits the criteria that Europe requires, we will make that case for permission to have wet weather aid. However, there is no European fund to pay for that aid. I shall have to seek it from within the Northern Ireland block grant. I have already spoken to the Minister of Finance and Personnel, who is aware of the difficulties. That is as far as I can go at the moment.

The farming community knows that I have its interests at heart, and that I am doing everything possible. I do not want to be lectured about what the farming community is going through as if it was something I was not aware of. At least Mr Armstrong's comments are always consistent and honest. Sneering at Members, or trying to put them down, is of no use to our purpose, which is to deal with the serious issues facing the farming community.

Mr McCrea, or should I say Dr McCrea — I can never remember these titles — talked about not having meetings with me.

I remember having at least one meeting with Mr McCrea. He will be aware of the serious hiccup in the agriculture industry between 2000 and the end of 2001 when much of its work had to be halted and the serious crisis addressed. Many matters were put on the long finger. I told him then that there was no point in having another meeting until the review was finished and I knew what proposals were being made to the Department. That still stands. I think that Mr McCrea is confusing the fees about which he wrote to me with the fees in question here.

3.00 pm

I do not accept that the Committee's change of mind was because its members suddenly realised that farmers were facing difficulties. I knew that the farmers would probably face a difficult time because of the awful weather in June; the Committee may not have been aware of that, but I knew it was a possibility by the end of June. The Committee said that it was "prepared" — I shall not say "happy" because nobody is happy, and the members said that they were not happy — to accept the small fee increase for a small number of people, but a few months later it changed its mind. It will not do anything to build a good working relationship or increase my confidence in dealing with the Committee if it changes its mind. When I get a view from the Committee I want to know that I can depend on it remaining the view while I go ahead and take action.

I ask for the support of the Members in rejecting the motion to save the Committee, if nothing else, from appearing ludicrous.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development does not think it is ludicrous for its members to be fighting for the farmers, and the farmers are with the Committee all the way. If the Committee was divided and if members of the Minister's party were not supporting it, let them say so. However, that is not what was said to me, and that was not what I was to do as Committee Chairperson.

I bitterly regret the Minister's attitude and her implied threat that it will be hard for her to work with the Committee because its members take a different view to hers. This is a democracy. I am entitled to put the views of those whom I represent to the House.

Ms Rodgers: Will the Member give way?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: No, I want to have my say and then the Minister can come in by leave of the House if she is granted leave.

I take what the Minister says as a threat, and I regret her attitude. I also regret that she implied that one member of the Committee was honest — I do not know what she thinks of the rest of us. Are we dishonest or a parcel of liars? She said at her party conference that I was a liar, so I can expect nothing less from her.

Minister, do not malign the Committee. I made it clear that the Committee had a change of heart. It is entitled to a change of heart, especially when farmers are committing suicide when their income is ludicrous compared with what is required to keep life and limb together. The Committee is also entitled to do what it can in Europe to make Mrs Beckett face up to her responsibilities, and it will continue to do that. The Committee has never raised the hopes in the hearts of the Ulster Farmers' Union or the Northern Ireland Agricultural Producers Association. We told them the plain truth in language that they understood. The Minister should not say that there are people going around and raising hopes.

The Minister says that the farmers should pay the fee. What about her cutting some of the salaries of the fat cats in the Department? Some £80 million are paid out in salaries in her Department. What about telling those people to take a salary cut? Do struggling farmers always have to pay for those cuts? Does the Minister not realise that the industry is on its knees? Does she want it to end up on its face? If the Minister is to have a cutting programme, she should start with her Department rather than with people who cannot even make a decent wage.

The Committee does not want to have to pray to the Minister in this way. It would prefer to argue the arrangements in Committee, but, in a time of dire crisis such as this, it is the responsibility of all Committee members to take their duty seriously. I am amazed that the Minister is stressing that this would cause a great deal of trouble: it is about time that the Department had some trouble. It is about time that the British Government realised that we are in trouble. It is about time that they got the message that farmers in Northern Ireland are not going to lie down any longer; they are going to get up and fight for their existence. What does it matter if the British Government get angry or if someone else gets angry? The poor farmers must be delivered.

I plead with the Minister to change her mind and to get the idea out of her head that everyone in the Committee is an enemy and that she has to fight them as such. I smiled today when I heard that the Minister said that she would have no regrets about getting out of my hair. Well, I will not be in her hair any longer, but the whole Committee is in her hair today. I am only a spokesperson — do not kill the messenger. The Minister should start by killing off the people in her own party who have the same views as I do. She should turn her guns on her own side before she turns them on people who are only trying to do their jobs. I regret that this issue has had to come before the House today. I also regret that, in the midst of the farmers' dire plight, we are arguing over this matter today.

The Minister has every reason to support the Committee. Then she could face up to the row, which would be most profitable, because it would teach people that they cannot continue to whip farmers and not expect them to rise, dig in their heels and say that enough is enough.

I appeal to the House to support the Committee. It is up to Members as to how they cast their votes, but if they were in the same position as the farmers, I know how they would vote. Let us think about the farmers and about the suicides in their community. That is of great concern to me. Let us vote today to say that we are masters in our house, that we are here to help the farmers and not to obey the rules of some people who have never been in Northern Ireland and do not know what we are up against.

Resolved:

That the Seeds (Fees) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 257/2002) be annulled.

HOSPITAL WAITING LISTS

Mr Deputy Speaker: I wish to advise Members on how I propose to conduct the debate, which has been allocated two hours by the Business Committee. Two amendments have been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The mover of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and seven minutes to do the winding-up speech. The proposer of each amendment will have seven minutes to propose and five minutes to do the winding-up. The amendments will be proposed in the order in which they appear on the Marshalled List. When the debate has concluded, I shall put the Question that each amendment be made in turn. If amendment No 1 is made, I shall put the Question on amendment No 2. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with concern the most recent statistics on hospital waiting lists and calls on the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to put in place a policy that urgently addresses the needs of patients by reducing the number of patients and length of time spent on these waiting lists.

On 5 September 2002 the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety issued a press release claiming that she “gets tough on waiting lists”. If her record in recent years is anything to go by, I would hate to see the results of a softly-softly approach to waiting lists, which appear to be totally out of control.

We are used to hearing the Minister make all manner of promises about healthcare — especially on the waiting lists crisis — and failing to deliver. Every quarter, before the publication of waiting list statistics, we hold our breath in anticipation of the ever-increasing numbers of patients on lists. Last March the Minister pledged to reduce the number of people waiting for hospital treatment to 48,000. That promise has never been fulfilled. Today more than 59,000 people are on the waiting list, which represents an increase of almost 9% since June 2001.

The Northern Health and Social Services Board has a massive waiting list; it is the highest outside Belfast. More than 9,000 people are queuing for the treatment that they deserve. Like many representatives, I am bombarded by queries from constituents and the families of patients about what is being done. It has become embarrassing to try to explain to them that I and other Members have voted more money than ever before to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I will vote even more money to it this year, yet it will make no impact whatsoever on the surgical needs of my constituents' loved ones. It is embarrassing, because this place is getting the allocations wrong.

If the figures are staggering, consider how much more staggering they are in the light of the 28% increase in the excess waiting list, that is to say, the number of people waiting to get onto the priority list. Tens of thousands of people are waiting for urgent treatment — they are waiting and waiting and waiting. Given the track record of the Minister's current policy, they will go on waiting.

Trends in waiting lists make an interesting source of study. In 1997 waiting lists decreased steadily. Since the Minister took over, they have risen consistently in every quarter except one. What concerns me most is that the Minister and her minions have no ambition to reduce the waiting lists. The press release of 5 September, which was issued together with the trends, states that her target is to "hold" the waiting lists at these unsatisfactory levels. By the words of her own press release the Minister is condemned.

This year's waiting list is unacceptable, yet the Minister will tolerate it for another 12 months with the weak ambition to "hold" the figures at that level.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I thank the Member for giving way. Wards in certain hospitals are closing because of infections. I was asked to visit Belfast City Hospital, and on the exit stairs I counted around 500 cigarette butts and saw tin cans and all sorts of rubbish. The wards open onto those exit stairs, which are an absolute disgrace. How can hygiene be maintained in a hospital where such conditions exist?

Mr Paisley Jnr: I thank the Member for his observation; it shows that money is being targeted incorrectly.

The Minister has adopted the bureaucratic speak of "acceptable numbers" on waiting lists that are thoroughly unacceptable. I will discuss the trends later. The scandal of waiting lists is somehow robbed of humanity when we speak only about stark statistics. It is only when we meet constituents day to day and hear about their personal trauma that we realise just how harrowing and appalling the situation is.

3.15 pm

I wish to mention two constituency cases. The first is a letter from Mrs W of Ballymoney, who wrote:

"I require breast surgery and went to see my GP in January 1998. I was referred to Coleraine Hospital on 1st February 1998 and seen by the specialist there on the 13th February.

I was seen again on 7th July 1999 and was told then that I would be put on the waiting list. The only contact I have had since then from the Ulster Hospital specialist has been a letter in January 2001 asking if I still want to be kept on the waiting list. On 20th June 2002 I was told that I was still on the waiting list."

That is an appalling example of what it means to be a statistic on a waiting list in my constituency. Yet it is being repeated, and I am sure that Members across the House, representing the four corners of Northern Ireland, would agree.

The second example is from a gentleman from Broughshane, who has written to the Minister's office about his concerns. In his letter to me he states:

"Due to multiple injuries received in a road traffic accident on 4th July 2001, I was transported by ambulance to the casualty department of Antrim Area Hospital. After a cursory examination it was deemed my injuries were not of sufficient serious nature and I was discharged. It was only by persisting with a complaint that I had difficulty breathing that, after a long wait, x-rays were taken. These showed that I had a punctured lung with my broken ribs. A chest drain was inserted and I was admitted."

One of his injuries persists, and he has told me:

"On 8th August I was referred for an opinion from an orthopaedic specialist. My consultant reviewed me again in November 2001. Having waited expectantly for an appointment date, and believing that the NHS was reasonably efficient, I was growing increasingly impatient when I continued to receive nothing, even by way of recognition that I was on a waiting list.

I cannot express adequately how shocked and horrified I was to find that the orthopaedic specialist had not received either of my referrals from my consultant. How can it be possible that two referrals within a few months of each other can fail to reach their destination? What sort of crass, bureaucratic inefficiency does it take to lose, not one, but two referrals?"

Let us be clear about one thing; it is no longer a question of money — the resources are there. More of our Budget goes to health than at any time before. In the words of Brian Patterson, the British Medical Association Northern Ireland representative:

"It is not enough to just pour money into the NHS. It must be targeted to where it is most needed."

If the Minister were called Barbara Brown — and I ask Members to consider setting aside all of the political divisions in the House for a moment — and spoke with an English accent and was here on behalf of the Labour Party or Conservative Party as a direct rule Minister, people would not get near Stormont Castle without tripping over Sinn Féiners calling for her to go because of the way in which the system has been managed. We should draw back and look at the situation from that perspective. We would not let an English Minister run the Health Service in this way, or pump up the waiting lists. Why then are we allowing a person from Northern Ireland, a devolved Minister, to do it? We ought not to; we ought to reject her. The silence of some parties on the issue has been deafening.

The Minister's policy is a disgrace; it has failed. She has turned a trend of decline in waiting lists in 1997 to a consistent increase. However, there is not a squeak from her party about her incompetence or that of her policy. The problems we face are a symptom of the political process. In any other Administration where a Minister had made such a significant mess of a portfolio they would, at best, be reshuffled elsewhere: the Cabinet or the Executive would see to it that such action was taken. This Executive lack the courage, and Sinn Féin the self-respect, to remove an incompetent Minister who has made a mess of a bad situation.

My party can, and will, be accused of many things, but at least our Ministers, all four of them to date, have been quality Ministers doing an efficient job. If they were not up to it, the party, let alone the nominating officer, would see to it that changes took place. Sinn Féin does not have the guts to change the Minister, even though she should have gone a long time ago.

If the Assembly continues with the Government's health policy, the result will be a disaster. The Minister's pledges and words count for little. Her glossy reports, of which there are dozens, do little but delay, procrastinate and confuse the public. I have those reports in front of me, and I will refer to them later. The House must demand that matters are put right or the Minister should be put out.

There are two amendments to the motion. I studied the Alliance Party's amendment, and then I checked the statistics that have been provided. I believe that the Alliance Party's amendment has been accommodated, because in the appendix to those statistics are the inpatient waiting lists by speciality. Perhaps they should be broadened, but that is for another day. I appeal to the Alliance Party to withdraw its amendment for that reason.

With regard to the amendment that stands in the name of Mr Hamilton and Mrs Courtney, I do not doubt their sincerity. However, that amendment just expands upon what I have already said. Let us keep the focus on a single issue. Let us distil it to the real point, which is that the Government's policy has failed. Let us place the blame where it ought to be placed.

Mr McCarthy: I beg to move amendment No 1: At the end add:

"and to ensure that future statistics include waiting times for various ailments."

Every member of society is appalled at the continuing increase in waiting lists for healthcare. All Members must express concern at that rise and emphasise that those statistics represent thousands of people who are suffering physically and psychologically. Waiting lists tell us little about the services that are delivered by the National Health Service, because they tell us little about the care that patients receive while they are on them.

Waiting lists can distort clinical priorities. Doctors have always considered them almost meaningless, as they almost place the same importance on minor surgery as on life-threatening illness. There is much more suffering for one person waiting for a cancer operation than there is for 10 people waiting for treatment for a dermatological or other less life-threatening ailment.

Waiting lists are meaningless to people. However, waiting times have a meaning, as people know how long they will have to wait for their needs to be met. They give patients a time and date to have in their sights, and they do away with uncertainty. Waiting times are a common-sense alternative, and they give the National Health Service a meaningful measure of its progress on improving the service delivered to patients. Waiting times are particularly crucial for more serious procedures such as heart and liver operations, cancer therapy, kidney transplants, brain surgery and so on, as they make the difference between life and death.

Last year the Scottish Executive announced that waiting times, rather than waiting lists, were to be the litmus test of progress in the Health Service. I cannot see why we should not do the same. That would show how much waiting time is due to major surgery on gravely ill patients being cancelled at the last minute for various reasons, causing great alarm to the patients and their relatives. All concerned must ensure that that extra burden on waiting lists is halted at once.

Mr Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No 2: In line 2 delete all after "waiting lists" and insert:

"and, recognising the problems of bureaucracy, lack of resources, wastage of present resources and total lack of decision-making within the healthcare system, calls for the implementation of an effective and co-ordinated strategic plan between the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Health Boards and Trusts to help reduce the number of patients and length of time spent on these waiting lists."

I seek support for the amendment from all parties in the House. The reason for that is simple: I want to see real, effective action taken by the Minister. The Minister has told people repeatedly in Northern Ireland that she has put plans and measures in place to deal with the problem. However, this debate is evidence that her initiatives have, unfortunately, failed.

I congratulate Ian Paisley Jnr on tabling the motion. It is important that the House accept the amendment proposed by the SDLP and my party, because it will help to add more weight to the original motion and to expose the bureaucracy of the system. People want improvements on the ground. The amendment will help to make the Health Minister more accountable to the House and put more pressure on her to implement effective plans.

Two years ago, the Minister told us that her framework for action on waiting lists would help to solve the problems of recent years. It is obvious to everyone that her plans have not worked. It must be asked whether the Minister has the authority and vision to make a real difference to the problem of waiting lists. In a press release issued on 12 September 2000, the Minister said:

"Yesterday I issued a comprehensive framework for action. I am confident that the action flowing from that framework will immediately begin to address the problem, and will bring down waiting lists in the longer term."

Can the Minister be as confident now that the frameworks are having the impact that she intended? Is it not time that she admitted that her plans have been unsuccessful? Only yesterday, my Colleague Robert Coulter drew attention to delayed discharges and bed blocking in the Causeway Health Trust and to the link between bed blocking and waiting lists.

Through my membership of the Health Committee, I sincerely understand the Minister's problems. It is because of those problems that the House has been patient for the past few years and has given the Minister time to tackle the issues. We were told that things would not improve overnight. I agree — no one expected them to. However, the Minister has had more than enough time to make a serious start on improving waiting list statistics.

It was important that the amendment contain a specific phrase on the relationship between the Department, health boards and trusts. There is a growing public perception that the Minister lacks the authority to put effective measures in place. According to reliable health professionals, there seems to be a disjointed and unco-ordinated approach to that problem within the health system.

The Minister often tells us how the Health Service has suffered from underfunding over the past few decades. I do not doubt that there is some merit in that argument, but, enough time and tolerance has been given to the Minister since she took up her post. It is about time that action was witnessed, so that people can see the benefits of a locally elected institution.

I was interested to read the recent comments of Dr Brian Patterson of the British Medical Association, who said that it was not enough to pour money into the National Health Service and that money needed to be targeted to where it was most needed, within the context of a coherent plan. That has been the argument of the Ulster Unionist Party. That is why it has proposed the introduction of an independent health auditor within the health system. Currently, auditors appointed by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety audit the accounts of health bodies in Northern Ireland.

We support the establishment of a robust independent audit of health services, with the Comptroller and Auditor General being appointed the auditor of all health bodies. That must be dealt with as part of the forthcoming audit and accountability legislation in order to best address the combined needs of Northern Ireland's Health Service and local taxpayers. It is no good throwing taxpayers' money into a massive black hole. We need to know that we are getting value for money and the maximum benefits possible. Money must be directed in the most effective way possible.

3.30 pm

I hope that the House will accept the amendment and that the Minister will admit to the failure of the present framework for action on waiting lists. That is not simply my view, but that of health pressure groups, such as the British Medical Association. Real, effective measures and immediate action are needed, not more consultations.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): Mr Hamilton made a point about the Comptroller and Auditor

General, and that issue has been raised with the Minister previously. As I understand it, the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland has responsibility for all Departments, with the exception of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I am not sure whether that historical arrangement has changed, but the Comptroller and Auditor General should have responsibility for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety just as he does for every other Department.

I welcome this opportunity to put the spotlight on the intractable problem of waiting lists. I acknowledge that this is a complex issue, for which there is no easy fix. I thank Mr Paisley for tabling the motion on this important issue and those who tabled the two amendments, which have encouraged serious and worthwhile debate.

The latest waiting list figures of almost 60,000 continue that depressingly familiar upward trend in quarterly statistics. The lists have gone up by an average rate of almost 10% since 1996. Our waiting lists are the highest per capita in the UK and are 60% higher than they are in England. Over 5,000 patients have been waiting for admission to hospital for longer than is acceptable under charter standards. Not surprisingly, those statistics play an important role in shaping a generally negative public perception of the Health Service in the Northern Ireland. There is an increasingly vocal public demand for those seemingly endless increases in waiting lists to be arrested as a matter of urgency.

We are frequently urged to look beyond the headline figures and consider the overall increase in the number of people being treated. Although some 7,000 more patients were treated in 2001 than in 1999, that will be cold comfort for the tens of thousands waiting anxiously for treatment, not knowing when they will receive it. It is completely unacceptable that patients with life-threatening illnesses sometimes have to wait years for treatments — that adds to their stress and increases the risk to their health. Regrettably, the wait will be too long for some. The many people who are waiting for cardiac bypass surgery can pay approximately £14,000 for private treatment. I do not oppose that — patients are entitled to opt for private treatment, if they can afford it.

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Dr Hendron: I will give way shortly.

I object to a person having to use his or her life savings to pay for treatment. It is wrong that someone who may have only a few years left to live should have to pay that amount. Last week, in my capacity as a doctor, I dealt with someone in that situation.

Mr McCartney: Does the Member appreciate that, even with £14,000, it takes three months to have a bypass operation in the Royal Victoria Hospital? One must travel to Dublin.

Dr Hendron: I understand that to be the case, although the wait would be no more than three months. Not everyone can afford that; something is wrong.

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety has for some time monitored the alarming increase in waiting lists and has frequently questioned senior officials about the obstacles to reducing them and the steps taken to increase capacity in the system. The Committee has written to the Minister on several occasions expressing serious disquiet at the escalating numbers who are waiting for hospital treatment. Like many others, the Committee has demanded to know what practical steps are being taken to tackle the problem. There is no doubt that historical Health Service underfunding in Northern Ireland has contributed directly to the crisis. For example, cuts in health resources in 1995-96 led to a 30% reduction in elective surgery that year. The waiting lists for elective procedures have been a major problem in Northern Ireland for several years. The Minister's proposals in the recent document on elective surgery will be a positive step when they are implemented.

The problem has been compounded by a decrease of 18% in bed capacity over the past 10 years; however, inpatient surgery increased by 10% during that period. As a result, many hospitals are working to maximum capacity.

The Committee has the most profound respect for front-line doctors and nurses. We have visited every hospital in Northern Ireland and have seen how hard they and all other hospital staff work in accident and emergency departments and elsewhere. I pay tribute to their commitment, resilience and dedication, and I am sure that every Member would show them great respect and thank them.

The advent of devolution, however, provided a proper focus on health, which has been — deservedly — the Executive's main priority ever since. That has meant a welcome injection of additional resources to reduce waiting lists.

The consensus was that extra funding was required to support an increase in service capacity to meet the demand for elective procedures. An additional £5 million was allocated for that purpose by the Minister in 2000 to support her three-year programme of action to tackle waiting lists. That sum was consolidated in 2001-02, together with an additional £3 million for new actions to deal further with the problem. Some £2 million has been set aside for waiting list initiatives this year, and that has been targeted at protected elective admissions.

Those significant funding increases led to a guarded optimism that tangible improvements would begin to flow from the initiatives in the Minister's 'Framework for Action on Waiting Lists'. I am sure that the Minister will speak positively; however, judging by the figures, the framework for action has signally failed. The Department's priorities for action have consistently included targets for increased capacity, improved access to services and addressing staff shortages. The plan for 2001-02 included a plan to reduce waiting list figures to 48,000 by 2002. However, given the latest figures, the less challenging target of keeping the 2002-03 waiting lists at the level of 2001-02 may seem overambitious.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Dr Hendron, I did not impose a time limit because of the number of Members who wish to speak, but I would be grateful if you would draw your remarks to a close.

Dr Hendron: I shall indeed, Mr Deputy Speaker. I warmly welcome the recent appointment of the regional co-ordinator, Ms Jill Anderson, to provide a focus on waiting lists. She will provide a central steer to trusts' senior managers, who were appointed to develop better management approaches in assessing activity.

The problem is complex. It is very much in the Minister's interests to reduce the waiting lists, and she wants to do that. However, all the structures in Northern Ireland need urgent examination. More must be done to attract trained nurses and doctors into orthopaedics. One of the problems in orthopaedics is that there is not so much a need for surgeons as for appropriately trained theatre nurses. That is a key point.

I have spoken for long enough.

Mr Berry: I commend my Colleague Ian Paisley Jnr for tabling such an important motion. Unfortunately, because the issue of waiting lists has been raised so often, we have run out of words to describe the deplorable situation that exists. The words "crisis", "meltdown" and "Third-World service" have been used before, and it is evident that, regardless of promises to deal with waiting lists, those lists get worse every day.

In 'Framework for Action on Waiting Lists' we read of commitment to reduce the numbers waiting. When the framework was published, a further £5 million was allocated in 2000-01 to deal with the problem. The usual press release trumpeted the great things that would be done. However, many of us would like to know how that money, and the other moneys that were given to deal with waiting lists, was spent. An audit should be carried out to determine where the money was siphoned off to and how much was really spent on tackling waiting lists.

The framework was a gigantic hoax. One of its great suggestions was that boards should describe the situation in their area and what they had done to alleviate it — which, regrettably, were facts that were already known. Further, they were to appoint a manager and submit quarterly returns to the Department. That is all tremendous stuff, but the end result has been that bureaucracy has increased year on year.

Many words such as "targets", "process" and "protocols" and grand phrases such as "strategic case mix planning" and “slot systems” have been used. There was an action plan, followed by board action plans, followed by trust action plans, followed by managers appointed by each board. There has been much activity and paperwork, but waiting lists have still increased. I find it deplorable that the situation is getting worse, but, most of all, our constituents, who are suffering as a result, find it deplorable and disgraceful.

I had discussions with representatives from the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, and, although debates such as this are important, it is also important that we submit ideas to the Department. The phrase “winter pressures” seems to be fading from the collective consciousness as Ministers and managers realise that waiting lists and bed blocking are ever-present problems. Even in a good winter, bed blocking is one of the biggest burdens on the Health Service. However, with good management the situation can improve. For example, physiotherapists in other UK regions have been quick to establish their position as key players in the battles against waiting lists and delayed discharges. A growing number of highly experienced physiotherapists now work in the front line of healthcare. Many of them in England, Scotland and Wales are extended-scope practitioners. Their role includes assessing patients; making clinical diagnoses; referring patients to other healthcare professionals; and treating and discharging patients without their having to see a doctor.

Mr McCartney: Is the Member aware that the acute bed blocking is caused, to a great degree, by the failure of the trusts to pay reasonable fees to nursing homes that could relieve the pressure at a fraction of the cost?

Mr Berry: I agree wholeheartedly with Mr McCartney's comments. The Health Committee raised that issue with the Minister. We asked her to provide temporary funding to enable nursing homes to care for elderly patients until they are fit to be discharged into the community.

Research has shown that more than 70% of patients referred to orthopaedic clinics do not need to see a consultant. In Sheffield, the introduction of an orthopaedic screening service, led by two physiotherapists working as extended-scope practitioners, has resulted in patients waiting an average of 32 working days for an initial appointment, compared to 11 months for a hospital appointment. The problem in Northern Ireland is that, although a national service agreement instructing trusts to make provision for extended-scope practitioner roles for physiotherapists was introduced in 1996, to date no trusts have fully implemented it. Like the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy, I believe that developing more opportunities for physiotherapists to work as extended-scope practitioners would provide more timely care for patients, reduce waiting lists and enable the Health Service to work more effectively.

3.45 pm

To develop those roles, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety should firmly direct all trusts in Northern Ireland to implement fully and wholeheartedly the national service agreement on grading for the professions allied to medical practice.

In the Southern Board area, over £2 million has been wasted as a result of non-attendance at hospital appointments. The elderly, for example, may forget about their appointments. More than £10 million has been wasted in all the board areas in Northern Ireland in that way. A system must be implemented to remind people of their hospital appointments closer to the time so that such a situation can be avoided. The information system on appointments must be investigated so that the people get a better service. I support the motion.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasChéann Comhairle. As a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I am aware of the needs of patients, staff, the elderly, children and the disabled. I am also aware of the community's concerns about waiting lists as well as the strategy that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has implemented to tackle the problem. However, another member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety is unaware of that strategy.

I accept that waiting lists are a concern for everybody and that they must be addressed as other Members have said. However, I cannot accept the amendment that has been tabled by two of my Committee Colleagues because it is disrespectful to those who work in the Health Service.

I assume that the accusation in the amendment that there is a “total lack of decision-making within the healthcare system” is a cheap jibe at the Minister. I am glad that she is here today and will be able to refute that accusation. I should also like to applaud the Minister for her commitment to tackling waiting lists. She has successfully gained funding to put 1,000 extra community care packages in place, which will undoubtedly free beds, and the last Member who spoke reminded us of the problem of bed blocking and how the elderly are kept in hospitals. That must be considered.

Incidences of elective surgery have increased, and the Committee was informed of that last week. That must also be applauded because, as the Chairperson said, we cannot tackle waiting lists in isolation without considering the Health Service as a whole.

I cannot support the amendment. Thousands of healthcare workers have decision-making responsibilities, and I object strongly to its wording on their behalf. People who work in the Health Service make decisions daily, whether they are doctors, nurses, or other hospital staff. They have increased the activity and efficiency of the Health Service over the past 10 years, despite serious underfunding. Statistics show that activity in hospitals has increased while funding has decreased. The accusation that there is a total lack of decision-making in the Health Service is objectionable and an insult to medical workers.

We must take a more serious approach that looks at what has led to the increase in waiting lists, and the Assembly must act as a whole to tackle them. The Chairperson rightly pointed out — and someone of his calibre who has had years of experience in the Health Service will know — that waiting lists cannot be considered in isolation, because they are a complex problem.

One Member said that while waiting lists remain a concern, we can see from the June figures a slight increase, mostly as a result of the new fertility services that were previously unavailable on the Health Service. I can see some Members screwing their faces up at that. The welcome introduction of fertility treatment has caused a slight increase in waiting lists.

Tom Hamilton spoke about developing a strategy to examine where the money goes in the Health Service. The needs and effectiveness study that pointed that up seems to have backfired on the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, as many people have stated that money cannot continually be thrown at the Health Service. The system must be overhauled. Bodies such as the National Health Service Confederation, the British Medical Association and the Health Committee have all stated that the Health Service is underfunded, and now the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has published a study that proves it.

Some Members spoke about staffing and the problem of cancelled appointments. At last week's Health Committee I asked for the figures. Cancelled appointments and people not bothering to attend account for 25% of the total. There is also a shortage of staff, and it will take 10 or more years to fill the quota.

I accept that consultants work extremely hard; however, when annual leave is taken no one is trained to take their place. The acute services review 'Developing Better Services' calls for a single strategic regional authority with a workforce planning remit, which is the sort of change needed, and I commend the Minister on that. Boards and trusts must not take decisions outside their remit while not considering the hospitals or the acute sector as a whole.

Recently, the Health Committee was advised of the 100 additional beds to be provided for the Mater, Craigavon Area and Antrim Area Hospitals. I commend the Minister on that provision. Proposals are in place in the acute services review to reform management structures; the movers of the motion would do well to study them.

I thank Paul Berry for raising the matter of winter pressures, which place extra burdens on our hospital services. However, Ian Paisley Jnr should ask his Minister to grit the roads and footpaths properly this winter to ensure that the pressures on hospital services do not continue.

Ms McWilliams: The statistics for waiting lists are stark. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's press release of 12 June 2001 stated that there was a hope that waiting lists would be down by 25% to 39,000. That figure rose six months later to 57,000, and, as the Committee Chairperson said, they stand now at over 60,000.

I have no difficulty with Mr McCarthy's amendment, which calls for waiting times to be included in future statistics, but we already have accurate information on waiting times. I have been looking through the minutes of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board, which detail its plan. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister that these figures are the returns from some months ago and that there may be improvements since these plans have been introduced.

Last week in my constituency I was told of an elective surgery admission that was cancelled four times over four months. The admission was an urgent referral for a large bowel investigation. The patient had to wait four months for a barium enema, which resulted in an unacceptable delay in the diagnosis of bowel cancer and a consequent delay in treatment. In the case of bowel cancer, any delay is very serious, as a life could be saved by prompt treatment. Only yesterday, I mentioned a horrific case, where a woman had been prepped four times for a bowel cancer operation. Between June and 23 August, the woman had been sent home to fast every Wednesday night in preparation for an operation the next day. She had still not had her operation by 23 August.

These cases are the tip of the iceberg. It is a terrible message to send out that, even in the case of cancer, which is a priority in the Health Service strategy, intensive care beds are not available. A consultant wrote to me saying that he had had to cancel his list of patients waiting for breast cancer operations. The Eastern Health and Social Services Board stated that it hopes to bring forward 180 patients for breast surgery operations with the extra money for waiting lists. This is a serious situation, which is traumatic for people on the waiting lists who have been diagnosed with cancer but do not know when their operations will be carried out. If an operation can be done promptly, a life may be saved. The longer cancer is left, the less likely it is that that life will be saved.

The Eastern Health and Social Services Board attempted to address the matter and to enhance its elective day-care work by reserving a number of beds that were used for emergency admissions for that surgery. I hope to hear that that strategy is working in the Mater Hospital and the Lagan Valley Hospital. The board then had to decide whether to opt for extra activity by the current consultants, for a locum surgeon to carry out more operations, or for additional permanent surgeons. I was taken aback to find that some of the consultants were demanding £500 for each extra operation. That serious matter should be addressed.

The Eastern Health and Social Services Board decided on different solutions for different hospitals. It is good to see that it has provided a permanent surgeon in the Belfast City Hospital, which seems to have the highest waiting list figures. There are 5,460 on the list, with an overflow list of 1,375. Those are huge figures, and I do not know what impact one surgeon might make on those. Nevertheless, it is an attempt to reduce the figures.

It is good to see that the Northern Ireland Chest, Heart and Stroke Association's (NICHSA) regional services improvement co-ordinator, Jillian Anderson, has developed the waiting list handbook and the common management protocols. The fact that different trusts are doing different things is problematic. We need to know what Jillian Anderson has recommended to date. The centrally co-ordinated waiting list and the common management protocols must be prioritised to enable the transfer of patients. It will be good to see whether these protocols are beginning to make a difference.

We have heard from the NICHSA's chief executive, Andrew Dougal, on several occasions about the extensive waiting list for cardiac surgery. The Eastern Health and Social Services Board tells us that the figures for 2002-03 show that there are 268 people still on the list, despite the fact that 33 of those people were transferred outside Northern Ireland and that 44 of those 268 people have been waiting more than 12 months. Other Members have stressed that these extensive waiting lists mean that a long time passes between diagnosis and convalescence; we should set a target of no more than 12 months for that period.

The key is found in what I have said about management protocols, and most importantly, about co-ordination. This is not the first time that I have raised this matter in the House — it is probably the tenth time. The Member for North Down, Bob McCartney, mentioned community care. There is a demographical problem. The elderly are living longer, and nursing homes have closed, so we must find alternatives. I am told that 50 of the Causeway Hospital's 250 beds are taken up by delayed discharges — that is a fifth of the hospital's beds. Such figures clearly represent a crisis, and we must address that problem.

Between 65% and 80% of the 1,000 community care packages that the Minister released across all four health and social services boards went to the elderly.

The problem is clear: the elderly are in great need of these packages, but to distribute 1,000 of them was not enough. If the aim expressed today is to move patients out of hospital so that others can come in, and to increase intensive care capacity for those who require operations urgently, the number of community care packages must be increased.

4.00 pm

I agree with Ms Ramsey's comments about agreeing priorities in the Health Committee. It is with dismay that I note that politics are being played in respect of health issues, but I can understand that. Mr Berry and Iris Robinson were in a difficult position because they felt that they had to deviate from the wording of the Committee's letter about increased funding, which referred to funding as "a priority" and not "the priority". The Assembly must give the clear message that funding is "the priority".

Mr McCartney: Six months ago, I stated in the House that the waiting lists in Northern Ireland were not only the worst in the United Kingdom but the worst in Europe. Since then they have got even worse. Two points must be made about the Minister responsible. First, I agree with Ms Ramsey that health is under-resourced — there is no doubt about that; however, I do not agree that the Minister has made the best use of the available resources, or that she has administered them in the most competent and effective way.

We must look deeper at the cause of the present dilemma in the Health Service. The growth of waiting lists and the general lack of morale in the Health Service are the product of the form of Government endorsed by those who signed the Belfast Agreement. The underlying failure of the entire system is demonstrated. The pro-agreement parties, not just Sinn Féin — it was not the biggest party — but the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party, signed an agreement that made no provision for filling the black hole of capital underinvestment and the under-resourcing of aspects of life here.

(Madam Deputy Speaker [Ms Morrice] in the Chair)

The core problem would exist regardless of whether the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety were from Sinn Féin, the SDLP or the Ulster Unionist Party. The difficulty is that not only was there a failure to negotiate sufficient resources but there was a failure in the institutions. The undemocratic d'Hondt system means that no Minister is really accountable to the Executive, the Health Committee, or even the Assembly. Ministers can be wholly incompetent or ineffective, but only the parties that appointed them can remove them — and that is unlikely in the present state of affairs. The pro-agreement parties were so anxious to get power that they sold out the basic interests of the population in Northern Ireland that is in need of healthcare, whether Unionist, Nationalist or of any other denomination.

The pro-agreement parties in the Executive, including the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists, failed to pass on the extra cash that the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave out over the past couple of years as a share of national increases in health spending. They preferred to spend it on their own priorities — more staff, more offices, more bureaucracy and more Departments like the "Department of the Centre", whose two Ministers have more than 400 staff and advisers.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is not without blame, although there are some extenuating circumstances as regards resources. She has failed to administer her Department and to spend the available money efficiently. For example, there was the decision to close the Jubilee Maternity Hospital and the resultant massive overloading of the Royal Maternity Hospital, the failure to begin the promised new maternity hospital, and the perverse and ideological decision to scrap GP fundholding in favour of a centralised bureaucratic system that is still not properly in place and will probably never work. The GPs — respectable, dedicated doctors in the British Medical Association — are in revolt because the system is not working.

The Minister is also guilty of having a bizarre proclivity for launching inquiries at the drop of a hat, thereby wasting the precious administrative resources of her Department and the limited time she has as a Minister to make and implement decisions. Mr Berry has given Members a catalogue of committees and initiatives, all of which have produced absolutely nothing, except that the Minister's eyes have been taken off the main object, which is the healthcare of the community.

The failure of the Health Minister is just one prominent example of the failure of pro-agreement parties to deliver the joined-up government they promised in the referendum. If it was not so sad, something could be made of the fact that all those folk who promised the people of Northern Ireland more efficient, accountable and effective government have failed to deliver it, and the system has failed to deliver it.

We can talk from time to time, whether it is about health, the environment, roads, sewerage or whatever, of the failure of the respective Minister to deliver, but we must look at the basic system. Unless we have principled, democratic, efficient, accountable government, we get 10 independent warlords without any collective responsibility.

Madam Deputy Speaker, every other Member has been given seven minutes to speak, and you are demonstrating impatience when I am not anywhere near that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The signs from the Chair were not impatience due to the time. I am aware that the Deputy Speaker has agreed that Members should speak for seven minutes, and I am prepared to go along with that. The subject of the motion is hospital waiting lists, and you were straying off the subject. That was why I was questioning you.

Mr McCartney: With the greatest respect, Madam Deputy Speaker, if the basic system of government that produces these waiting lists, inefficiencies and difficulties is not relevant to the waiting lists, it is difficult to see what is. Of course, there are many Members in the House who cannot see the wood for the trees, and who cannot see that the things that are debated in a superficial way are the product of deep-seated constitutional failures to deliver effective government. That is the relevance.

I was going to say that I always find it amusing, if not tragic, to see that when one Minister is under the gun, every Member in the House attacks him or her. There is no question of collective responsibility. Today it happens to be the turn of the Health Minister. Let us blame the Health Minister for what she is culpable of, and remember that most of our problems are directly relevant to the system of government that the major parties that signed the agreement are responsible for.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. [Interruption.] Order, order. [Interruption.] Order. Given the number of Members who still wish to contribute to the debate, and the time that has been made available, I must ask Members to restrict their speeches to five minutes.

Mr Shannon: I support Mr Paisley Jnr's motion and wish to comment on waiting lists. Last week the press announced that they had been banned from entering the Ulster Hospital to ask patients and staff their opinions on the service that is being provided and to give an accurate portrait of what is really going on in the Health Service. Many people approached me and said that they thought that it was an absolute disgrace that the press were unable to ask patients and staff just what is going on so that they can get a fair idea of their problems. The hospital might have tried to withhold the information about long waiting times and people sitting on trolleys for more than eight hours at a time, but no one can hide that kind of dissatisfaction.

The statistics themselves speak volumes before one even begins to talk to those waiting for hip replacements or scans that could diagnose life-threatening conditions. It has been reported that some 140,000 people in the Province are "in the queue waiting to join the queue" for operations and treatment. People are waiting inordinate lengths of time to undergo relatively minor surgery that would have them operating on full power without the need for other forms of care. Patients such as those waiting for hip replacements are prime examples of that scenario. They usually need care packages while waiting for their surgery, but, on the whole, they would recover fully and be active and mobile members of the community were they to receive the surgery that they needed when they needed it. That would also save the system money.

The Health Service is full of people who need surgery, only to have it postponed. Therefore there is congestion, with people suffering pain and distress because they have been waiting so long. That drains resources from other parts of the NHS, such as community care and general practitioners. The waiting list system is a vicious circle, which the Minister and her Department must address. In last week's papers, it was incredible to see the plethora of advertisements selling insurance, private health policies and operations at private clinics on the basis that the Health Service is so bad that it is failing to do its job. One of the captions read, "Worried about NHS waiting times? Phone this number".

I should not say that the country is worried about NHS waiting times. However, waiting times are becoming extremely frightening for those on the waiting lists, especially the elderly, who are now parting with their life savings to rid themselves of the very pain and suffering that they expect the Health Service to try to alleviate. What sort of society do we live in if the elderly have to wait to part with hard-earned cash so that they need not be burdened by pain and suffering at their time of life, when they should be using their savings to enjoy their retirement and to pursue activities that they could not when they were working? The elderly, and everyone else in this country, have to be told that the Minister and her Department will do something other than simply offer platitudes about how seriously they regard the situation or, at the end of this debate, sum up by saying that they agree with what has been said.

What is to happen? Is it not about time that the Minister stopped blaming the Conservative Government for what they did to the Health Service and showed us what she will do about the situation? The problem has reached somewhere beyond crisis point. Around 10% of the population are waiting to see a doctor, never mind have an operation or take their treatment further. The situation is indefensible, and something must be done about it, not in the next financial year but now, when thousands more have joined that same queue waiting for operations.

Several hospitals around the Province were closed down around five or six years ago so that the pooling of resources would benefit the country. The direct result, especially in the Ulster Hospital in Dundonald, was a bigger workload and not enough staff or hospital beds to cope with the larger catchment area that was created by closures elsewhere. Those same hospital buildings, which only five years ago had seen patients getting treatment and the proper level of care that they deserve, are for the most part lying empty.

Another reason that lists are so long is that patients are being sent home early to free beds and reduce the lists, only for them to return with complications that take longer to cure. As a result, they require more time in a hospital bed than the original surgery would have resulted in had the patient been allowed the appropriate post-operative rest time to begin with.

There is no doubt that we have the worst waiting lists in Europe. We are certainly outstripping other areas of the United Kingdom. The breach of charter standards has been going on for a long time, with many patients waiting more than two years for hip replacements when the maximum should be 12 months. Can we imagine how many people are living in pain daily? We see figures on a page that tell us that there is a two-year waiting list for hip replacements, or a year or two for cardiac or orthopaedic surgery.

I urge Members to support the motion, which my Colleague, Ian Paisley Jnr, tabled. It is opportune and applicable, and people wish to see the waiting lists reduced now.

4.15 pm

Mr Armstrong: I welcome the opportunity to speak about the consistently high waiting lists, which are causing concern to many people throughout Northern Ireland. Our health system is cursed with the worst waiting lists in the United Kingdom and Europe. Given the size of the population, we are now the poor man of Europe as far as health provision is concerned.

The most recent statistics show that waiting lists continue to grow at an alarming rate. The rise in the number of people waiting for hospital treatment, whether inpatient or outpatient, started in 1999, around the time that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety took office. In a recent press statement, the Minister said that hospital trusts were being put on notice to deliver on waiting list targets. Surely she should take responsibility for this disgraceful situation that she has presided over as Minister.

Every Member knows of the long-standing effects of gross underinvestment in the Health Service during direct rule. The Health Service has been under the leadership of the Minister for three years now, but the situation has far from improved; indeed, it has spiralled out of control. What is the Minister going to do to reduce the number of patients on long waiting lists? How is she going to reduce the bureaucracy in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety? Her past decisions have done nothing to alleviate wastage and reduce waiting lists.

The number of people waiting for inpatient services grew by nearly 9% in the past year alone. The number of people waiting for more than the recommended time increased by 22% in the past 12 months. The number of people with serious health conditions waiting for treatment increased by one fifth in one year. One of my constituents, who was due to have an operation for a cancer-related illness, was told a few days beforehand that it had been postponed. I had to intervene to have the appointment reinstated. The general public is disillusioned with the health system here. Over the past years, many have seen hospital services decline, not improve.

Last year the Minister made a pledge to reduce waiting lists to 48,000, and she was given an extra £224 million to help her to keep that promise, which has since been broken. The waiting list now stands at a disgraceful 59,000. It is not only inpatient waiting lists that have increased. Outpatient figures have soared to over 140,000 persons, which is another shameful statistic. Each statistic represents an individual suffering, often facing anxiety and unable to get on with his life because he has to wait for an operation.

The waiting list crisis is summed up by the recent comments of the vice-chairman of the British Medical Association's Northern Ireland council. Dr Brian Patterson said that doctors were "impeded by bureaucracy, lack of resources and a total lack of decision-making within the healthcare system".

As elected representatives, we cannot afford to ignore the views of the representative bodies of doctors, nurses and other health professionals. The Minister has shown a marked lack of leadership on the issue of waiting lists. No amount of consultation documents can take the place of firm decision-making. The crisis is such, as illustrated by the highest waiting lists in Europe, that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety should abdicate from her position, as she has failed in her duties.

The Minister told us in March that there would be a reduction in waiting lists, which has not happened. The public have grown tired of broken promises and failed initiatives. We need more beds, more doctors and more nurses in our hospitals.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member will draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Armstrong: There must be a way of monitoring how taxpayers' money is spent and there must be a measure of accountability in the health system. The people of Northern Ireland should not be made to wait any longer.

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Members have heard much about waiting lists, not only today but over several weeks. It is worth looking back. On 13 March 2002, the Department told the Health Committee that "Waiting lists for elective procedures have been a problem in Northern Ireland for a number of years. Cuts in resources for health in 1995/96 led to a 30% reduction in elective procedures that year. There has been a subsequent downward spiral, in spite of substantial non-recurring funds directed into elective surgery."

That was in 1995.

"Over the last 10 years bed capacity has decreased by 18%, while inpatient surgery has increased by 10%; 2001 saw a 9% increase in general medical emergencies, which had a knock-on effect on non-urgent electives."

The report goes on — statistic after statistic. Members could argue all afternoon about statistics.

I listened to Bob McCartney — I see he has left the Chamber — and for the first time he acknowledged that the responsibility for the waiting lists was not all down to the Health Minister. Sinn Féin been saying that since the Minister was appointed. For some Members, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is not a health issue, but a political issue. They manifestly continue to treat health as a political football, and not as something that affects their constituents. They use it as a political weapon against the Health Minister because she is a Shinner — a member of Sinn Féin. That is the basis of their attack on the Health Department, just as it was on Martin McGuinness's Department. That is the fundamental reason why some Members are being destructive, rather than constructive, in relation to health and education.

It is interesting to note the factors about waiting lists. According to the Office of Health Economics:

"Consultants working in both the public and private sectors have a vested interest in maintaining lists to ensure that some patients will choose to be treated privately."

There are vested interests in the medical profession at GP level. The British Medical Association has been mentioned by several Members as the sounding board or benchmark against which a good or bad Health Service can be judged. I ask the British Medical Association and Brian Patterson what constructive input they have made towards reducing waiting lists. What co-operation have they given to the Department to reduce waiting lists? It goes back to the vested interest and to the impact of vested interests on the Health Service.

Since health is being treated as a political football, Members are entitled to ask what influence those who made it so have used on their friends in the trusts and boards to block the system, cause difficulties and use the same kind of politics that they use in the Assembly. The Minister cannot be accused of being solely responsible for the regrettable state of the waiting lists. All Members regret it.

No one can say that the Minister is clapping her hands because there are waiting lists. Are Members suggesting that she encourages waiting lists and is not taking sufficient action to reduce them? Did the Minister not appoint Jill Anderson — whom no one could accuse of being a Shinner — to attempt to reduce waiting lists? That was a positive action by the Department and the Minister to address the waiting lists in a serious, coherent and cogent way.

Unfortunately, Bob McCartney blamed the Good Friday Agreement for the failure of the Health Service. However, the failure is in the reluctance of a major section of the Assembly to accept Sinn Féin Ministers, and their continual attempts to reduce their effectiveness by back-door tactics and by making areas such as health into political footballs rather than something for the good of the community.

Mr Foster: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important issue, which must be one of the Assembly's priorities. I support the amendment tabled by my Colleague Tom Hamilton and the SDLP's Annie Courtney. Although it would be incorrect to say that all is well in the Western Health and Social Services Board, where I live, I must acknowledge the board's recent initiatives to try to reduce the waiting lists. The board has the lowest percentage of ill people on waiting lists in Northern Ireland, and the new day care unit in the Erne Hospital in Enniskillen has contributed to that reduction. Such a move makes the Erne Hospital a valuable asset in the Fermanagh area, and its services to the community could never be dispensed with.

I concur with many Members' comments that this issue is one of the Minister's main priorities and, therefore, that one would expect to see an improvement. However, instead of progress, the waiting lists now have approximately 60,000 people on them. It is easy to quote numbers and statistics, but we must remember that each figure represents one patient. Sometimes we lose sight of that. Each of those patients is suffering unnecessarily because of inefficiency and disorganisation in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. It is worrying to note that we have the longest waiting lists in the United Kingdom, and, more worryingly, in Europe.

The Minister has said that this is one of her main priorities. Two years ago, she established the 'Framework for Action on Waiting Lists'. Although that led to improvements in other services — 200 people had cardiac surgery outside Northern Ireland in the past year — the Minister's plan failed to address the underlying problem of longer waiting lists. Will she now have the honesty to admit the failure of that policy? More importantly, will she set in place a coherent, strategic, effective plan that will make a real difference to people's lives?

An overwhelming majority of people believe that the present structure of the Health Service only complicates matters. There is an overburdened bureaucratic structure instead of an effective decision-making process that is accountable. There are great expectations and greater demands on the health services, but there are also too many areas of administration to contend with. That becomes time-consuming and blocks progress to get a job completed. I acknowledge that this is a complex problem, but enough time has passed for us to see some improvement in the statistics.

An additional £5 million was allocated in 2000, and £2 million was allocated for waiting list initiatives this year. I totally support the call by the Ulster Unionist Party's health representatives for an independent health auditor. It is possible that the health system is under-resourced, but not as much as some people, including the Minister, would like to make out. Too much taxpayers' money is being wasted, and we need an autonomous body to help to regulate the money that is channelled into health. I will be interested in the Minister's comments on that.

Ms Ramsey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Foster: No, I do not have the time. People are weary of hearing excuses for hospital waiting lists not being reduced. The Minister has been in office long enough to implement effective policies. We do not need more PR spin; we need action so that people can see improvements. Good health is vital, and society demands it now.

With reference to John Kelly's remarks, does he accept that many of the problems in the Health Service are a residue of the terrible injuries inflicted on people over 30 years of trouble and strife?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Hussey, and I ask him to restrict his speech to four minutes.

Mr Hussey: I congratulate Mr Paisley Jnr on tabling the motion, but he will understand that I am supporting the amendment. I am struck by the similarity of this motion and that proposed by Mr McGrady on 18 September 2001, which stated:

"that this Assembly views with concern the ever-increasing waiting lists for medical and hospital treatment in our local health services, and requires immediate action to remedy this unacceptable and growing problem."

4.30 pm

We must ask what action has been taken in the past year, and whether the unacceptable and growing problem has been remedied. The answer to the second part of that question must be an emphatic "No". I await the Minister's answer to the first part. As a layman, I cannot see what action has been taken by the Department to stop the growth of hospital waiting lists and cut them back.

In December 1999 there were nearly 46,500 people on the waiting list in Northern Ireland. That figure has risen to just under 60,000 in 2002. It is true that the total number of people waiting at any given time does not tell the whole story, as Mr Shannon said. The length of time spent on the waiting list is probably more important. The situation in that respect is extremely bleak.

We do not need a repeat of the 2001 motion. We must concentrate on action to improve the services. That is why I support the amendment.

Nearly 9,000 people in Northern Ireland are categorised as excess waiters, defined as those who have been waiting more than 12 months for cardiac treatment or more than 18 months for other specialities. The National Health Service Patient's Charter is being routinely breached in this part of the United Kingdom.

Behind the statistics and jargon lies human pain and suffering. I have a big, strong friend at home who is suffering from a hernia. He is being gradually incapacitated by that medical condition, which is not being dealt with by the Health Service.

The problem is not only the number of people on the waiting list, but also the length of time that they must wait. The situation is exacerbated by the ageing population; staff shortages; lack of trained doctors and nurses; fewer hospital beds; delayed discharges caused by the lack of available community care packages; and, in some cases, growing disillusionment among those who are under so much pressure in the Health Service.

The picture that other Members have painted is bleak. I await with interest the Minister's description of her Department's strategy for reducing waiting lists and times. I assume that there is one.

I note that her expectations have been radically downsized. At one time she promised large reductions in the waiting lists. However, her Department's press release of 5 September 2002 states:

"Our target this year is to hold waiting lists at their present levels".

I do not want the buck to be passed. In previous debates the Minister has blamed the Tories, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Barnett formula, the Brits in general and other Members of the Executive Committee, especially the Finance Minister. Her latest press release points the finger at the chief executives of the health trusts.

Given the priority that health has been given in budgetary allocations, and the extra money that has been put into the Department in recent years, the buck must stop with the Minister. I note that her attire today is sombre, in contrast to the colourful dress she wore yesterday. She still stands indicted at the scaffold. The onus is on her to account to the Assembly and the people of Northern Ireland for the crisis in the Health Service —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member will draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Hussey: — represented by the waiting list she presides over.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá mé buíoch de na Comhaltaí ar fad a labhair sa díospóireacht inniu. Dhírigh an díospóireacht ar cheist ar cúis mhór inni í do go leor daoine. D'éist mé go fíorchúramach leis na pointí agus chuir mé an-suim iontu. Tiocfaidh mé ar ais chucu i gceann tamaill.

Aontaím nach féidir glacadh leis go mbeadh ar dhaoine breoite fanacht ar feadh tréimhsí fada le cóireáil. Aontaím go bhfuil tuilleadh infheistíochta de dhíth inár n-ospidéal. Aontaím go gcaithfidh a chinntiú go bhfaighimid an luach is fearr ar ár n-airgead ó na hacmhainní a chuirtear isteach sna seirbhísí sláinte agus sóisialta.

Tharraing Comhaltaí aird fosta ar chúrsaí taobh amuigh dár n-ospidéal. Ní lú sin de chúis inni domh. Tá go leor daoine ag fanacht sa bhaile leis an tacaíocht atá de dhíth orthu lena neamhspleáchas agus cáilíocht a saoil a choinneáil. Is daoine scothaosta go leor acu seo. Mura bhfaighidh siad cúnamh pras oiriúnach beidh ar chuid acu dul isteach san ospidéal. Beidh moill ann ag cur daoine ar ais chun an phobail mura mbíonn na seirbhísí ann le tacaíocht a thabhairt dóibh.

I am grateful to the many Members who contributed to the debate, which focuses on an issue that is of deep concern to many people in our community. I have listened carefully, and with great interest, to the points that have been made, and I will address them.

I agree that it is unacceptable for sick people to have to wait long periods for treatment. I agree that our hospitals need more investment and that we must ensure that we get the best value for money from the resources being put into health and social services.

Members have also drawn attention to the situation beyond our hospitals, and that is of equal concern to me. Large numbers of people — many of whom are elderly — are waiting at home for the support they need to maintain their independence and quality of life. Without prompt and appropriate assistance some will end up in hospital, and there will be a delay in returning people to the community after hospital care because services may not be in place to support them.

We must view health and social services as a continuum of care. We cannot think in terms of one sector's pre-eminence. All four sectors — acute, community, primary care and public health — have to work together, and a shortcoming in one becomes a drag on the others.

Waiting lists must be viewed in context. Over the past five years, hospital activity has increased by 10%. During the same period there has been a 27% increase in the number of community care packages. That pressure might have been manageable in a service that had the investment it needed. However, since the early 1980s, the equivalent of £190 million — in today's terms — was taken out of health and personal social service's baseline budget. It was only this year that significant additional resources became available for reinvestment.

It is a fact that I inherited a service in which the number of hospital beds had been drastically reduced to the point where we have too few beds to cope with demand. Many hospitals are working at over 90% occupancy, and that is not tenable in the long term.

As Paul Berry said, our community services are also underfunded, leading to inappropriate admissions to hospital and delayed discharges. I am addressing those issues urgently together with my Colleagues in the Executive. However, as I have said, we started with a very low baseline, and it will take some time to put things right.

Demand for hospital services is increasing all the time. The number of GP referrals increased by over 4% between 1997-98 and 2001-02. One factor is, undoubtedly, our ageing population; another is the rapid advances in medicine, which offer new therapies for previously untreatable conditions. More people are being referred for treatment than ever before. However, there is no single cause for the increase in referrals.

One of my first actions as Minister was to set out a long-term plan for dealing with waiting lists. The issue has been one of my key priorities ever since. The plan, which involved getting the extra resources that I needed so that hospital and community capacity could be built up, improving the management of the system and putting best practice into effect, is the only way that the problem will be overcome. Currently, that plan is being implemented.

To address the issue of capacity, I have already announced plans for significant expansion in hospital capacity at the Mater, Antrim and Craigavon hospitals — over 100 extra beds. I have also announced plans for a new day procedure unit for the Erne Hospital and for new theatres at Musgrave Park. When those new developments come on-stream, they will be a major factor in getting more people treated more quickly. The number of renal dialysis stations will also be increased this year to meet growing demand.

The units at the Mater Hospital, for example, will involve the creation of a 14-bed elective unit, which is estimated to deliver some 1,500 cases a year. The Lagan Valley Hospital proposal will deliver about 600 cases a year, initially targeting patients seeking routine elective surgery in general and vascular surgery. Alongside those schemes, significant investment is also going into equipment that will have a direct impact on the length of time that patients have to wait. For example, the new linear accelerators going into Belvoir Park Hospital will increase throughput and reduce waiting times. New diagnostic imaging equipment at Musgrave Park Hospital will boost the regional orthopaedic service.

Alongside that expansion of hospital capacity, it is important to improve the way that existing capacity is used. At present, a significant programme of work is under way to tackle that. In April, I appointed a regional service improvement leader to drive the waiting list agenda and to ensure improved access to services. That individual has a great deal of experience in that area of work within the National Health Service, and she is already making a difference.

Improvements are being made in the way that waiting lists are managed. I have made it clear that I expect the service to deliver on waiting lists. For example, at the end of September, chief executives of boards and trusts are being brought together to examine the key initiatives on validation and waiting list management. Staff have been appointed to support, lead and contribute to all aspects of local action on patient access improvement initiatives. Plans are in place for trusts to allocate staff to make the management of waiting lists in hospitals more efficient.

It is important that the service be encouraged to learn from what works well elsewhere. To that end, I have asked boards and trusts to develop several protected elective facilities. Those facilities will not be affected by day-to-day pressures on the service, which will mean that more people will get their treatment on time instead of — as often happens at present — operations having to be postponed because of the pressure caused by emergency admissions. Plans for those facilities are now at an advanced stage, and their effect will be seen in the months and years to come. That is a prime example of people here already making a difference and showing that the things that they have put in place make a difference. Other trusts throughout the North are taking those lessons on board and are driving forward similar plans in their areas.

Members have referred to the recent statistics for the June quarter, on which the debate is based. I want to make several important points about those figures. First, it is worth pointing out that the increase in the number of patients waiting for inpatient treatment was the lowest quarterly increase since 1998, despite the fact that compared with the same quarter in 2001, the service treated over 1,000 more patients. Secondly, the increase was accounted for mostly by the gynaecology speciality. It contributed almost 75% of the overall inpatient increase, primarily because patients waiting for in vitro fertilisation treatment were included on the inpatient waiting list for the first time. Thirdly, the great majority of patients are still being treated promptly throughout the service. No less than 74% of inpatients treated between April and June this year had been waiting for less than three months. Of inpatients admitted for treatment during the June quarter, 94.8% had been waiting for less than 12 months.

The present position needs to be seen against that background. I have made the point before, in the Assembly and elsewhere, that there are no instant solutions to the problem. What is needed is increased investment, more hospital capacity, more capacity in community services, extra specialist and nursing staff, and more effective and efficient management of the service.

There is strong evidence of progress in that area, but it takes time for the initiatives to build.

4.45 pm

It is also important to restate that hospital waiting lists cannot be viewed in isolation. Primary and community care services have a significant role to play in keeping those people out of hospital who do not need to be there and in getting patients discharged as early as possible.

I welcome Paul Berry's appreciation of the need to invest in a wide range of services in the community as well as in acute hospitals in order to address waiting lists. Such developments will cost money, and I look forward to Members throughout the Chamber supporting me in addressing the financing of services in forthcoming debates on funding.

Tom Hamilton suggested that there was an uncoordinated approach to waiting lists. That is simply not the case. All boards are working to a common approach, and trusts are working to the template that I set out in the framework for action.

Monica McWilliams mentioned consultants asking for more money for extra sessions. I have made it clear to boards that I expect the new protected elective facilities to be provided on a normal contractual basis, and staff are now being recruited. In advance of the new arrangements, there have been some discussions with clinicians about temporary initiatives. In some cases, staff may have to work through their holidays. I expect boards to consider carefully any proposals to ensure that all costs can be justified, taking appropriate account of agreed rates for such activity.

Sue Ramsey and others mentioned people not attending appointments and who are designated as “DNA” (do not attend). The outpatient rate for non-attendance is 13%. The inpatient rates are suspected to be much lower, but there is no firm evidence of that. All boards are very aware of the problem of people not keeping appointments. Measures are being considered to ensure that reminders are issued and that checks are made that people still need appointments. The possibility of rerunning a publicity campaign is also being considered.

Monica McWilliams quoted the Eastern Health and Social Services Board minutes concerning people waiting more than 12 months for cardiac surgery. The minutes state that, of 52 people waiting more than 12 months in March 2002, 42 had refused an offer of treatment elsewhere, eight had had treatment but were not yet off the list and two had received a date for future treatment elsewhere. However, I accept that people on waiting lists will not always choose to be treated elsewhere.

Ms McWilliams said that the 1,000 community care packages will not be sufficient. I assure her that there is a bid for future rises in funding to increase the number of people who we want to help in community settings.

I agree with Joe Hendron’s point that waiting times, rather than overall numbers, are important. Indeed, one of the key issues that Jillian Anderson is addressing is the more effective management of waiting lists. I expect that her work will lead to reductions in waiting times. The management of waiting lists, which was mentioned, will be a key performance management objective for the service this year.

Billy Armstrong mentioned the ownership of waiting lists. I have developed an approach that has three components: targeting waiting list money for specific activity; a co-ordinated initiative to review and tighten the management of waiting lists in each trust; and, in collaboration with the Executive, putting additional resources into increasing capacity in community services and several key hospitals.

I, of course, am working to target waiting list money in collaboration with my Executive Colleagues. I look to the service to deliver on the co-ordinated initiative to review and tighten the management of waiting lists. I am working closely with the boards and trusts to ensure that each component is well targeted and closely monitored.

I recognise Members’ desire to reduce waiting lists. I too want shorter waiting times for procedures and treatment that will improve people’s lives. I am very much aware of the effect that waiting times have on the individual waiting for treatment. Two years ago, when I issued the ‘Framework for Action on Waiting Lists’, I said that only management action focused on the long term, coupled with new investment in the service, would improve the waiting lists. That remains my position. It is disingenuous not to recognise that a plan, a policy and a clearly thought out approach exist. Waiting lists are a key priority for me and my Department. I have already taken significant action to build a solid foundation to tackle the waiting list problem. I have secured additional resources for the service this year, although that investment can be only a beginning; much more will be needed to build the necessary capacity for a modern service. I look to Members, especially those who have taken part in the debate, to support the endeavour to get the necessary resources.

I have set in motion a long-term programme of work to ensure that health and social services make the best use of the resources allocated and to strive to improve performance in the key areas that make a difference. We must recognise — as Members have today — that until we get resourcing of health and social services right over a sustained period, the improvements that the public want, and which I have been working to achieve, will simply not be deliverable.

A foundation has been laid, but it cannot bring results overnight. However, we are making a difference. Our approach, which I have again explained in detail today, can, and will, bring dividends and ensure that we tackle the problem and that we deal with its effect on those who want easy access to health and social services.

Mrs Courtney: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the amendment moved by Mr Tom Hamilton. I also congratulate Mr Paisley on bringing this timely debate to the House. Neither Mr Hamilton nor I wish to dilute the debate. We hope that Mr Paisley will accept our amendment, the purpose of which was to strengthen and put in place resources and strategies to make the Department more effective and more accountable to the Assembly.

I worked in the Health Service for more than 20 years. Sue Ramsey, a member of the Health Committee, claims that the amendment contains a cheap jibe at the Minister and that people are trying to get at her. The only people who have made a political football of this debate are Sue Ramsey and her Colleague. It is disgraceful that she has accused Tom Hamilton and me of wording the amendment in such a way as to cause offence to staff. Her remark should be withdrawn.

Ms Ramsey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Courtney: No, not at the moment.

I worked in the Health Service for over 20 years; I was a theatre sister for most of that time. I stood at the operating table night after night, not because of waiting lists, but because of the bombings, shootings and killings on the street. The following day health workers had to suffer the indignity of listening to people who supported such actions. Night after night, we came out to help voluntarily and then went to work the next day. We received no extra money for it, for there was none. I strongly resent the attitude of the two Sinn Féin Members to our amendment, and I hope that the House shares that view.

Mr John Kelly asked what GPs are doing. The GPs at the coalface have suffered throughout. They are the people who have had to try to get patients into hospital. Dr Brian Patterson pointed out that any waiting list meant that someone was waiting for surgery.

There is evidence that the Executive and the Assembly are committed to the Health Service, but we do need to know how the extra £687 million — almost a third of the Executive budget — was spent. We have a responsibility to ensure good management and accountability for the use of resources. Some trusts were able to manage their budgets, while others were allowed to run up large deficits — perhaps to the detriment of their colleagues. They were given an extra £18 million by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. How was that money spent, and what was the origin of the deficits? The Minister must address those issues and respond.

Also, we must see the progress of the Executive. The Department produced 'Framework for Action on Waiting Lists' in Autumn 2000. We have not yet seen that report.

I warmly welcome the appointment of the regional co-ordinator, who will focus specifically on waiting lists and times. The Committee for Health wants to assess the effectiveness of the resources used in tackling waiting lists and to see precisely where the money has been spent. I agree with Mr Hamilton that an audit trail is necessary. It is almost impossible to obtain answers. The money goes into the Health Service, and no one is too sure where it comes out. For that reason, we need answers and an audit trail. Thus, I hope that the mover of the motion will accept our amendment in the spirit in which it is intended. It is not meant to dilute what he said. I welcome his comments and all the constructive comments that have been made today.

It is also necessary to find extra skills and training to assist staff. As I said earlier, I worked for so long in the Health Service that I resent some of the remarks made today. Yes, it is possible that in the past there was wastage in the Health Service. It is also possible that the Health Service was taken for granted.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw her remarks to a close.

Mrs Courtney: Madam Deputy Speaker, I understood that we had seven minutes to wind up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my understanding that the Deputy Speaker made it clear that the mover of each amendment would have seven minutes to propose and five minutes to wind up. Those were the instructions. I shall give the Member leave to finish her last line.

Mrs Courtney: Thank you for that, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I also welcome the commitment of the Minister to address the issues in an effective and coherent manner. With regard to amendment No 1, we find that it is too vague to be of any assistance in tackling waiting lists. It will impose extra bureaucracy on the Department and trusts.

Mr J Kelly: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it not in order that if a Member is named in a contribution to debate, that Member has the right to reply? The Member refused to give way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The naming of a Member, as the Member is well aware, happens often on the Floor of this Chamber. Certainly, it is absolutely the choice of the Member who is on his or her feet whether to give way.

Mr Ford: I welcome this debate, and I support amendment No 1, which strengthens the original motion put down by Mr Paisley Jnr. We support that motion from the Benches, although we do not necessarily support all of the words used by the mover.

I also welcome the Minister's recognition of the continuum of care, which extends from primary care to community care, and of which acute services are only a part. I assure the Minister that, like Paul Berry, I will, wearing my retired social worker's hat, continue to remind her of those facts.

5.00 pm

The point of our amendment, which was dismissed so fleetingly by Mrs Courtney, is to focus the Assembly's attention on the relevant statistics. The number of people on waiting lists is irrelevant; the issue is how quickly they receive treatment. That is why the Scottish Executive have adopted the concept of waiting times rather than waiting numbers as the basis on which statistics in Scotland are compiled, which is a more meaningful way of expressing concerns.

Individuals do not care whether there are 40,000, 50,000 or 60,000 people on a waiting list. They want to know how quickly people are treated. In particular, a statistic that includes various specialities and varying degrees of seriousness of ailments is meaningless. Serious, worrying, life-threatening illnesses are mixed with many other matters. The Minister should give urgent attention to determining a better way of presenting statistics.

At the moment, rather than concentrating on life-threatening illnesses that are of greater concern to the community, the statistics provide consultants with a perverse incentive to treat minor ailments that can be dealt with quickly and cheaply, thus removing one person from the waiting list. That is why we sought to strengthen the motion by referring to “waiting times”, not “waiting numbers”. I trust that if the proposer of the motion cannot accept amendment No 2, he can at least accept amendment No 1.

Although the Minister was unhappy with all criticism of her Department, which is her right, Mr Paisley Jnr’s motion is a moderate, reasoned and sensible method of addressing the issue, just as one would expect from him at times such as these. It is a pity, however, that the words that he used when proposing the motion were anything but moderate, sensible and reasoned.

I am concerned by amendment No 2, which seems to propose merely to tack on at the beginning of the motion a “let’s bung in all we can to make it sound nasty” few words. For anyone who is taking the issue seriously to suggest that there is a total lack of decision-making, when we have heard that people have been appointed to deal with the matter, is rather over the top, and for two Back-Benchers from the parties of the First Minister, the Deputy First Minister and the Minister of Finance and Personnel to propose an amendment that refers to the lack of resources, which is a problem for the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, as opposed to the Executive, is a slightly thin argument. Members on these Benches, therefore, have no intention of supporting amendment No 2, which merely adds political diatribe without recognising the problems that we face.

Mr Hussey said that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety previously blamed the Chancellor, the Barnett formula, the British Government and the Brits in general. Fundamentally, many causes exist, and it is illogical for Ulster Unionist and SDLP Members to pretend that it is the fault of the Minister alone.

The Minister must accept her responsibility, and her Executive Colleagues, who are also concerned with the allocation of resources, should accept their responsibilities as well. That is why the motion, with the addition of amendment No 1 to make the statistics more meaningful, puts realistic pressure on the Executive, whereas amendment No 2 would detract from that entirely.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Whatever David Ford is on, he should perhaps find a dark corner, lie down, keep taking the tablets and, it is to be hoped, it will all be over by the morning. If there is a doctor in the House, perhaps he could help him with his problems. I notice that Dr Hendron is not volunteering his services. The manner in which Mr Ford supported my motion was rather dubious but, if he keeps taking the tablets, it should all be over soon.

Mr Hamilton said that he supported the Comptroller and Auditor General’s view on what he should do. It is disappointing that that is not mentioned in the amendment; if it were, the Assembly could have supported it collectively.

However, I am drawn by the comments of Mrs Courtney and Dr Hendron. Dr Hendron is correct to say that the framework for waiting lists has failed. That has failed along with the other glossy reports that the Minister has published: ‘Building the Way Forward to Primary Care: A Consultation Paper’ — that has failed; the report of the acute hospitals review group, on which we have had incomplete answers, has failed; ‘Investing in Health’ has also failed; and ‘Developing Better Services’ has failed. In fact, the Minister has all the reports but none of the answers. That was proved in the Minister’s address — again we got no answers. If the situation was hopeless before the debate, it is even more hopeless now, because we have heard the same rigmarole and the same tired excuses from the Minister, and that is disappointing.

Mrs Courtney rightly targeted the Member for West Belfast, Ms Ramsey, and the Member for Mid Ulster, John Kelly, for what they said. Ms Ramsey set up a straw man by claiming that the debate is an insult to those working in the Health Service. That is absolute rubbish. In fact, if the debate had not occurred, those who put in the hours in the Health Service would be insulted that we do not care enough to debate the crisis.

Ms Ramsey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Paisley Jnr: No — I am winding up, and the Member is obviously getting wound up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, order.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Ms Ramsey said that she wished to commend the Minister. If she and her party wished to commend the Minister, why did they not table an amendment that commended her for her work on the waiting lists? They are silent on that; they do not wish to commend the Minister because they dodge the issue every time. Indeed, I see that they are getting rather erratic. That is probably because, as John Kelly said, they are Shinnners.

I put it to the House earlier that if Bairbre de Brún were called Barbara Brown, if she had an English accent, or if she were a direct rule minister, we would be tripping over Shinnners at Stormont Castle demanding her departure because she was a disaster. I noted that Sinn Féin dodged answering that tonight. When we search our hearts, we know that the Minister has given us no hope or comfort that we can take back to our constituents, be they in West Belfast or North Antrim. The Minister has sold them out, and that is the stark reality for us all.

John Kelly's speech was a pièce de résistance. He said that it was the doctors' fault and specifically that it was Dr Brian Patterson's fault. Dr Patterson does more in one day than Mr Kelly will ever do in a year to help ailing people. He also went on to insinuate that it was the nurses' fault. The only thing that he did not say was that it was the patients' fault for being sick in the first place. It was ridiculous. All I can say to Sinn Féin is this: keep digging, because you are making a mighty big grave for yourselves.

There are fewer nurses working in Northern Ireland tonight than there were under Margaret Thatcher. That is the indictment on this Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety —

Ms McWilliams: Margaret Thatcher started it.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Ms McWilliams says that Maggie Thatcher started it. It is a pity that the Minister will not improve the situation; all we hear is previous Governments being blamed when this Government do not make any improvements.

I feel drawn back to John Kelly's comments because they were so imaginative. He slagged off the doctors. Dr Terry Magowan, a GP in Ballymena, was quoted in the 'Belfast Telegraph' on 13 September 2002. I will read this slowly so that John Kelly can understand. Dr Magowan said that, since the end of fundholding, his practice had more than 200 minor surgery procedures disallowed each year:

"Although our funding through the General Medical Services budget was only for 60 procedures, we were able to achieve funding for more than 200 additional procedures through the fundholding budget."

That is another failure by the Health Service. Even when it ends one service, the problem of waiting lists is not addressed. The Minister has lost her grip.

The situation should be put in a European context. Northern Ireland does not stand alone in this crisis, although we have the longest waiting lists in Europe. It would be different if we had long waiting lists and everywhere else had even longer lists. There are 15 countries in the European Union; 11 of them maintain national waiting list totals. Taking population sizes into account, all of them have shorter waiting lists than Northern Ireland. The four countries that do not monitor the national trends do measure how long patients have to wait for treatment. Northern Ireland comes at the bottom of the pile. Portugal's queue is 10,000 people longer than Northern Ireland's, but its population is approximately six times higher.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member will draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I have reservations on some points, but I will support amendment No 2 and will not vote against amendment No 1.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put.

Several Members: Aye.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I shall repeat the Question, so that I am completely clear.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put.

Several Members: Aye.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The "Ayes" — [Interruption].

Several Members: No.

Ms McWilliams: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The first time the Question was put it was very clear that there were no "Noes". Surely we should have taken that and moved on to the Main Question?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you for that point of order. In the Chair, I was unclear as to exactly what the position was when the "Ayes" and "Noes" were made. It was not clear to me, and therefore I repeated the Question. I shall put the Question a third time so that I can be totally clear as to what the position is on amendment No 1.

Question, That amendment No 1 be made, put and negated.

Question, That amendment No 2 be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes with concern the most recent statistics on hospital waiting lists and, recognising the problems of bureaucracy, lack of resources, wastage of present resources and total lack of decision-making within the healthcare system, calls for the implementation of an effective and co-ordinated strategic plan between the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Health Boards and Trusts to help reduce the number of patients and length of time spent on these waiting lists.

Adjourned at 5.14 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 23 September 2002

The Assembly met at noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

POINTS OF ORDER

All-Ireland Football Championships

Mr Speaker: Two Members wish to make points of order. I will take Mr O'Neill's, and then Mr John Kelly's.

Mr O'Neill: Mr Speaker, would it be in order for you, as Speaker of the House, to send your congratulations to the victorious Armagh senior and Derry minor football teams on their magnificent successes at the weekend? Could I, as the Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, arrange with you a reception to recognise those wonderful achievements?

Mr Speaker: Mr Kelly, does your point of order concern the same issue?

Mr J Kelly: Yes. Will the Assembly send a message of congratulations to the Armagh senior county team, since it is based in the First Minister's constituency, and to the Derry minor team? We must not forget that the Derry minor team won the all-Ireland minor championship yesterday. Will you send congratulations to both teams?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: Does your point of order concern the same issue, Dr Paisley?

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Yes. People in this House are greatly saddened by what took place in Lurgan yesterday when the supporters, who were supposed to be celebrating their victory, not only attacked the police and the Protestant people, but, to add insult to injury, hung a tricolour on the war memorial. On the previous night, there was a savage attack on places of worship in Keady. The Orange hall was painted over, the gospel hall's windows were smashed, a beautiful stained glass window in the Presbyterian church was smashed, and the Church of Ireland church was also smashed.

Mr Speaker: Dr Paisley, I ask you to come to the point of order.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: This should also be made public at this time.

Dr O'Hagan: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Is it on the same issue?

Dr O'Hagan: Yes, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: It would be sensible to have whatever points of order there are on this issue at the same time. However, I must emphasise that we cannot turn this into a debate.

Dr O'Hagan: On a point of order, Mr Speaker, I wish to correct the erroneous statement made by the Member. I represent Upper Bann. I come from Lurgan and know the situation that occurred there yesterday. The fact is that GAA supporters were attacked by a Unionist crowd. The PSNI — [Interruption].

Mr Speaker: Order.

Dr O'Hagan: We need to correct an erroneous statement. I come from Lurgan and know the situation on the ground. GAA supporters were attacked by a Loyalist/Unionist mob. The PSNI failed to protect GAA supporters in Lurgan yesterday.

Mr Speaker: Order. I must ask the Member to take her seat. Order.

It is quite clear that we have gone well beyond points of order and that we are now into points of disorder in the Chamber.

I will advise the House of my ruling on the issue. First, it is entirely in order for the Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure to bring to his Committee the question of whether it would like to hold a reception to celebrate this event. He knows from previous occasions that if the Committee wants to hold such a reception, but does not have the resources to do so, and he approaches the Speaker's Office, he will get the same positive response to this particular request, should it come from the Committee, as he had in respect of previous requests. That is the appropriate way to deal with this.

Responding to Mr Kelly's point of order, it is not possible for the Assembly to make such a gesture without having a motion for debate. The Member may wish to put down such a motion, but it would, of course, lose something in terms of the timing.

Dr Paisley mentioned some concerns, and Dr O'Hagan mentioned her concerns about the same point. I ask that Members compose themselves, not only on this matter, but also on the general business of the day. It is a funny old place here. I do not suppose I imagined that I would find Nationalists demanding that Stormont have orange flags outside it, and Unionists expressing a degree of concern about that. However, that would be the circumstance if the Armagh team were here celebrating.

I ask members of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure to consider if that is the appropriate context in which to deal with this matter. If the Committee has a view on this, and comes to the Speaker's Office, it will receive the usual generous reply that my Office tries to give to these matters.

Mr Close: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it not wonderful —

Mr Speaker: Is this point of order on the same issue?

Mr Close: It is just an observation. Is it not wonderful how sport —

Mr Speaker: Order. I know the Member to be an imaginative and creative man, which is why I checked in advance.

Mr J Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Is it on the same matter, Mr Kelly?

Mr J Kelly: It is.

Mr Speaker: I am afraid I cannot take any further points of order on this matter.

Mr J Kelly: I was going to suggest that orange flags —

Mr Speaker: Order. The previous Member was close, but you are not. You are not getting a further point of order.

SPEAKER'S BUSINESS

Assembly Commission Visit to Ottawa and Quebec

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform the House that I will be absent from the plenary sittings of the Assembly next week.

Several Members: Aah.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. At the invitation of the Speaker of the Canadian Parliament, I will be leading an Assembly Commission visit to Ottawa and Quebec.

POINT OF ORDER

Scheduling of Assembly Business

Mr P Robinson: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: I assume it is on a different point.

Mr P Robinson: I assure you that it has nothing to do with Armagh, though Armagh will be waiting to hear your response. On 2 September 2002, my Colleagues and I tabled a motion that called for the dissolution of the Assembly to enable an election to take place. We recognised then — as most of the House will recognise now — that the Assembly will lurch from one crisis to another because of the shenanigans in the Ulster Unionist Party.

I understand that to date, the Business Committee has set itself up to vote down the hearing of that debate simply on a political basis. As there is a statutory basis for the motion, Mr Speaker, surely you can use your influence to ensure that a large group of Members who wish to see a motion debated can have the opportunity to do so, and then we can move to elections, negotiations and the possibility of real, stable political structures in Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: It is clearly a matter for the Business Committee to decide what goes on the Order Paper as far as private Members' business is concerned. In the past, I have indicated that — [Interruption]. Order.

When motions are set down and have some statutory basis, which I think is the reference that the Member is making, if there is some reasonable chance of success as evidenced by support within the Business Committee to have the debate, one, as the Chairperson, might well urge the Business Committee to consider the matter. I cannot do more. I am the one member of the Business Committee who does not have a vote, and I do not seek to influence it politically in any way, except to do what is wise for the general well-being of the Assembly.

Of course, the Member's Colleagues are at liberty to raise the matter in the Business Committee, which will meet tomorrow to consider next week's business. Therefore, it will be a matter for the Business Committee to consider. I dare say that its members will consider the question, taking full account, as business managers, of what they judge to be the likely approach of their parties to the matter. That is not a wholly unreasonable way for them to consider the question.

Mr P Robinson: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. I am more concerned after listening to your response. Surely it can never be the Business Committee's role to make judgements either on the outcome of a motion or on the basis of whether it likes or agrees with the principles behind it. The Assembly has the right to consider matters and reject them if so desired. The Business Committee does not have a veto in determining which particular political party policies should be allowed to be aired in the Chamber.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Speaker: Order. Nor did I suggest that that was the case. Since there is a long list of no-day-named motions, the Member is asking the Business Committee to put the particular motion from his party ahead of other motions. I am saying that as far as the Business Committee is concerned, I would certainly urge it to consider an extra degree of significance to motions that bear on the statutory basis of the Assembly. The Business Committee must make its own judgements.

However, I dare say that the Business Committee will make a judgement on the basis of what it believes to be the motion's level of support. For example, since no seconder is even necessary, it would be entirely possible for a single Member to table a motion that was on a statutory matter of the type referred to. The Member would judge it not reasonable that that on its own should take precedence over everything else. Of course the Member is saying that this motion does not involve a single Member, but a significant body. In other words, he is saying that the level of support is significant. That is simply all that I am pointing out also — the level of support is significant and not unreasonably so in the mind of the Business Committee when making a judgement.

It would be wholly inappropriate to bring the discussions of the Business Committee on to the Floor. I am simply ruling on the procedural question. I trust that the Member is at least clear on the question, if not entirely happy.

Ms McWilliams: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I reassure the House that what you have said is exactly what happens. The Business Committee was unable to judge the level of support for the DUP motion because the DUP Chief Whip withdrew that particular motion —

Mr Speaker: Order. I interrupt the Lady at that point because she is about to discuss the conduct of the Business Committee on the Floor of the House. The Business Committee minutes — [Interruption]. Order.

The Business Committee minutes are on record and on the web site once they have been approved. It is inappropriate that further debate takes place on that issue.

DRAFT PROGRAMME FOR GOVERNMENT

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister that they wish to make a statement on behalf of the Executive on the draft Programme for Government 2003-2004. Following a proposal from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister the Business Committee considered the form in which the Programme for Government should be presented to the House and agreed that it should be presented in the form of a statement today. A motion to take note of the draft Programme for Government will be debated tomorrow.

The Business Committee agreed to a different form of statement. As the House is aware, statements are usually followed by a series of questions to the Minister, or Ministers, who make the statement. However, in view of the fact that the Programme for Government is a singular presentation, it was viewed as appropriate — and the proposal came from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister — that party leaders should not be restricted to simply asking questions, but should have the opportunity to make a statement for up to five minutes, obviating the need for questions or response.

The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will make their presentation, and all parties will have an opportunity, restricted to the party leader or a nominee, to make a response lasting five minutes. If that is clear, we will proceed.

The First Minister (Mr Trimble): The Deputy First Minister and I have pleasure in presenting to the Assembly, on behalf of the Executive, our draft Programme for Government covering the next financial year and beyond. At its meeting on Thursday 19 September, the Executive agreed a draft Programme for Government, supported by a draft Budget. We are laying that programme before the Assembly for scrutiny and for future approval after examination in Committees.

The draft Programme for Government sets out the Executive's plans and priorities for the next few years, and will be supported by the draft Budget to be presented to the Assembly tomorrow by the Minister of Finance and Personnel. The Programme for Government is a detailed and comprehensive document, and Members will know that it is not a quick and easy read. We could translate the document and merely present a series of sound bites taking up a few pages, but we believe that it is important that the Assembly and others should see our plans and priorities in some detail and understand the context in which they are to be taken forward. Members should have the necessary information to carry out their role in scrutinising the document.

We have been keen to build on the progress already made as an Executive when developing this programme. We have the experience of developing and implementing two previous programmes that have been endorsed by the Assembly. We want to use that experience and build on our achievements to steer us through the months and years ahead.

We have achieved much, and there is much that we can be proud of. We have shown that we can work together across all four parties in the Administration to plan for, and deliver, good government. We have brought about real improvements in areas as diverse as education, infrastructure and the needs of children. We have demonstrated a commitment to accountability and a readiness to report openly on our progress that is unparalleled.

This is a time for commitment, not complacency. This draft programme demonstrates our commitment to deliver government that makes a real and positive difference to the lives of people here. Reinvestment and reform are the twin elements at the core of this programme; they must underpin our efforts to make a difference in the years ahead. We also want to deliver real progress in tackling social exclusion, promoting sustainable development and building stronger partnerships — partnerships with local government and the social partners in influencing the development of policies and programmes and their delivery. We have highlighted in our draft Programme for Government those key themes that cut across our priorities, and we will say more about them shortly. Members will have received a copy of the document, and the chapter on investing in the future sets out further details.

Another feature of this year's document is our wish to bring out more clearly than before the context in which our economic, social and environmental policies and programmes are developed and implemented. We should not develop new policies or continue with existing ones without a clear understanding of the economy and society, and the challenges which the Executive and Assembly face. Chapter 2 of the document sets out the current position on some key indicators, the improvements which have occurred and the problems which continue to exist. The Executive's programme needs to address the challenges identified.

I wish now to focus on our commitments in this draft Programme for Government on investing in our infrastructure and promoting sustainable development. I also want to say something about our plans for modernising and developing public services. The Deputy First Minister will later pick up the theme of reform and also outline our work to tackle social exclusion and build partnerships.

This draft Programme for Government makes clear our commitment to delivering new and substantial investment in infrastructure. We know from the work on examining the opportunities for public-private partnerships that we have an estimated £6 billion investment deficit in that infrastructure. We must try to remedy that deficit over the next decade. The need to address that problem has been raised by Members, most recently in the debate last Monday.

Tackling that deficit is not just about bricks and mortar, it is also about standards: the standard of education in our schools; the quality of treatment in our hospitals; the quality of our drinking water and the ability of our transport network to carry people and goods safely and effectively. It is about improving the infrastructure to improve the services that we all use.

In May 2002, we announced details of a new reinvestment and reform initiative designed to address the infrastructure problems that we have identified. In July 2002, we made a start in implementing the initiative. At that point we allocated £270 million to improve key areas of infrastructure. The draft Programme for Government reflects the work to date and our plans for the years ahead. We hope that in the first year covered by the programme, we shall have a new strategic investment board in place to assist us in improving the state of our infrastructure significantly.

For example, the draft Programme for Government states our commitment to investing in the road network. We shall work to eliminate 75% of the road maintenance backlog over the period of the regional transportation strategy. We shall undertake improvements to our major routes, in particular building on our earlier commitment to upgrade the trans-European network from Larne to Newry.

We shall strengthen our energy infrastructure. The draft programme contains our proposals in those areas. We are also determined to improve the health and education estates. We have already announced our plans for the new cancer centre — a development that should result in better diagnosis, treatment and care for those living with cancer. The draft programme signals our intention to increase capacity in hospitals, providing 100 more hospital beds by March 2005 to help ease the worst pressure points.

We also set out our proposals to start more major capital improvements to primary and post-primary schools and to deliver a programme of investment to improve the state of our further education colleges. We shall also bring about improvements to our public library network.

One of the big challenges in taking forward this programme of investment is making sure it is sustainable. We have a duty and a responsibility to ensure that the improvements we make to meet our needs now are not at the expense of future generations' ability to meet their needs. That message came across very clearly at the recent world summit in South Africa.

For that reason, we identify promoting sustainable living as a theme which cuts across all the Executive's work — in improving infrastructure and public services and in tackling poverty and social exclusion. In the draft programme we set out many commitments, which reflect that theme — for example, through investing for health and in our approach to securing a competitive economy.

On planning, for example, we wish to develop a more co-ordinated and efficient planning process that integrates our economic, social and environmental needs. That is why the draft programme commits us to modernising the planning process. We are also concerned about transport — and the draft Programme for Government highlights our determination to introduce measures to support public transport.

We recognise the need to reduce waste and tackle issues surrounding its disposal. For that reason, we have restated our intention to promote the recovery, or recycling, of 25% of all household waste by 2006.

If the principles of sustainable development need to underpin our work to address the infrastructure deficit, so too do they need to be reflected in our work to improve public services. The simple provision of more resources to improve our infrastructure will not result in the scale of change that the Executive want. That is why the focus in this draft programme is not just on reinvestment, but also on reform.

We want to deliver reform on several levels.

Mr Speaker: Order. There is a general hubbub in the Chamber, which is unhelpful to Members who wish to listen to the statement. Members should restrain themselves or have their conversations in the Lobby.

The First Minister: First, we want to examine how to finance our work to improve infrastructure and the delivery of public services. Secondly, we want to examine how to improve public services and public administration. Thirdly, we want to reform how the public sector operates, identifying new ways of working that will create real changes.

Of course, change for change's sake is never effective. We are determined that our driving force will be reform that brings real and measurable improvements that people can see, feel and experience. The draft Programme for Government sets out a challenging and ambitious programme that, when implemented, will bring about real change for the better. It contains many specific commitments that are supported by the draft Budget, which the Minister of Finance and Personnel will present to the Assembly tomorrow. It reflects our continuing focus on delivering progress across our five priorities in the context of the Executive's key themes.

The programme is in draft form; it is not set in stone. We want to consult on its content with the Assembly and more widely. We look forward to hearing the views of Members in tomorrow's debate and over the coming weeks.

The Deputy First Minister: The draft Programme for Government represents another step forward in delivering accountable government that meets people's needs.

We launched a consultation on the Executive's position report on 5 June to seek views on this year's programme. We have received responses from Committees, the Civic Forum and other interested bodies, which have helped us to develop this draft. Based on those comments, the Executive concluded that the five priorities adopted before remain valid and should be retained. They are: growing as a community; working for a healthier people; investing in education and skills; securing a competitive economy; and developing relations.

We also identified relevant sub-priorities and specific proposed actions to support our priorities. Any commitments will have to be budgeted for in the draft Budget. It is right that, in all our priorities and at the heart of this Programme for Government, we focus on reinvestment and reform. We want to deliver modern, efficient public services. That will require investment and change.

I wish to outline the areas for reform identified in the draft programme. I will also comment on our commitments on social exclusion and our work to build stronger partnerships.

The draft programme makes it clear that we must take a more innovative approach to managing and financing our infrastructure programme. The reinvestment and reform initiative has already demonstrated our desire to think differently and to challenge the traditional methods of public sector financing. We want to continue in that vein. The new strategic investment board will ensure that investment in our strategic infrastructure is planned and delivered in a way that makes the most of the resources and the expertise available to us.

Our consultation on public-private partnerships (PPPs), which ended recently, is helping to shape our thinking on how to make best use of opportunities for PPPs in financing our future.

12.30 pm

The creation of Executive programme funds has been another important innovation, and we will continue to use them to support actions to deliver progress in the five priorities. The draft Programme for Government makes it clear that there is other work to be done. Agreement must be reached on a fair rating system for Northern Ireland after the rating policy review, and we must continue to press for reform of the Barnett formula to ensure that our resources meet our needs.

We have underlined the importance that we attach to modernising government and to reform. The Executive intend to develop departmental plans to reform service delivery, including efficiency improvements and the use of assets. Those plans will be completed in the coming weeks and will feed into the departmental service delivery agreements to be developed later this year.

We want to improve the quality of our public services and the structures for delivering them and to ensure that our efforts are targeted at those most in need. The draft Programme for Government sets out several commitments that the Executive are ready to make. We will continue our work to improve health and promote healthy lifestyles, modernise our hospital services and introduce new standards of clinical governance — all the while directing resources to those most in need and most vulnerable.

The Department of Education will introduce new curricula in primary and post-primary schools that reflect the needs of our economy and society. We will also take action to ensure that young people leave school with the highest possible standards of literacy and numeracy. We will reduce the proportion of pupils in schools serving the most disadvantaged communities who leave school with no GCSEs and the number of poor attenders. The Executive intend to make changes to how the education system deals with children with special educational needs and to make sure that they can share equally in the planned improvements. The draft Programme for Government underlines the Executive's commitment to having pupils with special educational needs educated, where possible, alongside their peers in mainstream schools.

Another important focus will be welfare reform. The Executive want to play their part in implementing reforms to the social security and pensions systems. The draft Programme for Government commits us to joining up our jobs and benefits services. By March 2004, we will have extended a new jobs and benefits service to 20 combined social security and jobcentre offices across Northern Ireland. In line with a focus on putting work at the forefront of the benefits system, we want to improve services for those seeking work. In particular, we plan to take action to tackle poor literacy and numeracy in adults by helping an extra 2,500 learners to update their essential skills.

The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development is already implementing an ambitious programme of modernisation, focusing on the needs of farmers and the agrifood industry, e-government and the delivery of research and education. We will also implement the recommendations of the vision exercise.

The Executive want to ensure that Invest Northern Ireland provides a new opportunity to improve competitiveness and encourage investment and enterprise. The draft Programme for Government sets out our plans in that area.

We also have key decisions to take over the life of the draft Programme for Government. We must reach agreement on the right structures for our acute hospitals and post-primary schools. We want to make sure that our decisions bring about positive improvements in the quality of service.

We must also reach agreement on the structures of public administration. The draft Programme for Government conveys our intention to introduce by the end of next year a new model for public administration. Our proposals will be driven by a desire to improve the delivery of public services.

The draft Programme for Government also sets out our commitment to improve community relations and tackle division. The need to support the capacity of local communities to deal with matters of dispute or division is particularly important. Our experience in north Belfast and other areas has shown that improved relations can only develop when elected and community representatives work together. By the end of next year, we want to have in place a new policy and strategy on good relations, which will include actions and targets. We also want it to include action focused on local areas with acute community difficulties and action to support the capacity of local communities to deal with issues such as sectarian flags and graffiti.

If we are to facilitate improvements in relations and an end to the trouble on our streets, we need to focus on delivering equality of opportunity for all. One of the greatest inequalities in Northern Ireland is that which exists between the affluent and the most disadvantaged. The draft Programme for Government emphasises, therefore, our determination to tackle poverty and social exclusion. It sets out our work to evaluate and improve our policy on targeting social need. It also highlights our determination to take action to root out child poverty.

The development of a children's fund demonstrates our commitment to supporting children in need and young people at risk, a commitment which is restated in the draft Programme for Government. It also demonstrates the value of a partnership approach: working across sectors to do the best we can for children.

The draft Programme for Government represents what we can achieve by working in partnership in Government. However, we also need to build partnerships between the Government and social partners. It is not enough simply to change the form of government: our goal must be to change the face of the Government, the face of politics and the face of our society. Nor is it sufficient to have the social partners as passive consultees. They must be active participants in the development of policy. It is only by harnessing our collective energies and insight that the soundest solutions to our problems can be found.

The promoting social inclusion initiative and the work of the Economic Development Forum show the value of involving social partners not only in consultation, but in policy formation. We must consider how that can be extended as we consult further and, ultimately, implement the Programme for Government. The draft programme indicates our readiness to do that.

As in previous years, we are also presenting the latest public service agreements (PSAs) for the eleven Departments. The PSAs will support the Executive's priorities and commitments by setting out what is to be achieved from the Budget allocations. They reflect our commitment to openness and accountability to the Assembly and the public, and they focus on improving public services. The PSAs are in draft form, and we invite the Assembly and the Committees to examine them during the consultation period.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

The draft Programme for Government is a manifesto for reinvestment and reform, a pledge to improve public services. In moving forward, our guiding principle must be the desire to deliver a better service to the public. We need to focus on delivery, on the end result and how that can be improved. However, as the First Minister has emphasised, it is a draft Programme for Government. It represents the Executive's current thinking on their plans and priorities for the years ahead. That thinking should now be debated, discussed and, where necessary, challenged inside and outside the Chamber. On that basis, we commend the draft Programme for Government to the Assembly.

Dr Birnie: The draft Programme for Government is an impressive document, not least because it provides a comprehensive analysis of the problems facing Northern Ireland before attempting to outline solutions.

Page 10 shows that unemployment has fallen dramatically in the past decade, although an employability issue remains. Chart 3 on page 11 reveals a crucial economic and social problem: our level of gross domestic product (GDP) per head continues to lag seriously behind the United Kingdom and European Union averages. However, one technical but significant point is that the chart almost certainly exaggerates the extent to which the Republic of Ireland's living standard improved compared with that of Northern Ireland and the rest of Europe in the same period.

The reinvestment and reform package mentioned in paragraphs 3.9 to 3.12 must be a driver to deal, at last, with the long-standing backlog in infrastructure investment, which amounts to around £6 billion. By attempting to deal with the problem, the initiative represents an act of political courage and financial wisdom.

Sub-priority 8 of 'Growing as a Community' identifies a role for museums. I hope that they will be able to show what is distinctive about Northern Ireland and its history, while recognising the substantial east-west links with the rest of the United Kingdom as well as the North/South aspect. I note also the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure's proposal to implement an archives policy.

My party is pleased that the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure will provide support for implementing the football strategy from April next year and that new training facilities will be provided in at least seven sporting areas by March 2006.

Sub-priority 1 of 'Securing a Competitive Economy', which deals with improving and developing infrastructure, is immensely significant for the reasons that I have already given, especially the backlog in investment that developed during the direct rule period.

That chapter's sub-priority 2 deals with modernising the planning process. Hitherto, our planning process satisfied no one. On the one hand, developers argued that economic progress was held up by undue backlogs in the system. On the other hand, residents felt that their vital interests were being overridden. A general debate about planning processes is taking place across the UK, so Northern Ireland's problems are not unique. However, some aspects are peculiar to this region. The Ulster Unionist Party is pleased that the planning process will be modernised.

Paragraph 1.5 of the document points out the progress and achievements made in several areas that were highlighted in previous Programmes for Government, including the expansion of higher and further education and the provision of free public transport for the elderly.

The Ulster Unionist Party supports the draft Programme for Government in the hope that it, and future programmes, will support further achievements.

Mr Dallat: The guiding principle of this draft Programme for Government is "making a difference". Let us reflect for a moment on what that means and how it can be implemented. It means building on what the Assembly has achieved in the past four years. It means no return to the corruption that occurred during the three decades of direct rule, when deals were struck in smoke-filled rooms, and millions of pounds worth of contracts were issued without tenders, or issued to companies that did not tender the lowest bid.

It means a fundamental change to the Senior Civil Service and non-departmental public bodies. It means an end to the soirées and the flagrant abuse of credit cards. However, it means more than that: it means building on the good work of Seán Farren and Carmel Hanna to end the scandal whereby one in four people have poor levels of literacy and numeracy, so that everyone can hold his or her head high when applying for a job or seeking promotion.

I am glad that the Programme for Government addresses also the needs of students in serious debt, who are at the other end of the scale. In the past four years, access to colleges of further education and universities has been widened substantially. The threshold above which parents must pay fees has been raised and will continue to increase as a fundamental principle of the SDLP. Pressure will be continued on the British Government for improved central funds.

Will we allow those and other possibilities to be wiped out because a few weeping willows in the “No” camp, particularly the DUP, do not have the stomach to face the challenges of the future and have no alternatives to the Good Friday Agreement? Are we to turn our backs on the Health Service, which is in crisis? Are we to forget about our commitment to decentralisation and cross-border bodies, which bring untold benefits, particularly in west Belfast, Strabane, Derry and other unemployment black spots? I should think not. Those who connive behind closed doors to bring down the Assembly must rethink their actions. It does not seem to matter to them that they are creating a political vacuum, which gives the kiss of life to killer gangs that are long past their sell-by date.

The SDLP will not abandon the people to whom it made a firm promise in the Good Friday Agreement. We will fight for an extension to the free transport scheme for people over 60 years old. We will back our Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development in radically reforming the industry to secure the future of new and existing farmers. We will support her efforts to develop a new vision for agriculture, to improve animal health and to show the British Government that they can no longer treat farmers as they do. However, none of that will be possible if members of the Saturday morning fur-coat brigade continue to vote like turkeys for Christmas. The “No” campers do not give a damn about equality, social inclusion or unemployment black spots. [Interruption].

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Dallat: They seem to believe that they can turn back the clock to the good old days when they reigned supreme. We are not going back to those days: there will be no cap in hand, no begging bowl, and no subservience to our absentee landlords. Will we be left to do it alone? Those who fooled themselves at the weekend that they could turn the clock back should get real with the electorate and begin to tell them the truth. The world is moving on, and so are we, whether they like it or not. Dismantling the political structures to stop the clock is not an option. In a global world, and in a European context, partitionist politics are as dead as a dodo. Let us face the future together, rather than trying to lift the ball and run away with it. It is no longer theirs, but ours to share. If Armagh and Derry can do it, so can the Assembly.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Having listened to the interesting statement of the petty comic, we should now get down to business. Do the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister really think that they can bluff the people of Northern Ireland with the documents that they presented today? The First Minister’s constitutional position is in jeopardy, and his party is stating, in the strongest possible manner, that things will change. We are told that the last date will be 18 January.

The First Minister told us that he was presenting his priorities for the next few years. It is quite interesting that an attempt is being made in this House to sweep the reality of the situation conveniently under the carpet and pretend that all is well when it is not.

As for Mr Dallat, he may have no respect for the electorate, but the electorate will not go away. In fact, the electorate or a Sinn Féin member in his own constituency may tell him to go away. Mr Dallat made as good a speech as any Shinner could have made in the days of absentee landlords and little fairies at the end of an Irish garden.

The report says that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will apply themselves to dealing with the troubles, but the Deputy First Minister did not have the honesty to say that the trouble lies with one member of the Executive, an active member, who takes his seat with us. The Deputy First Minister did not have the honesty to say that that member’s party is dedicated to keeping this country in turmoil. It has the arms to do it, and it has been producing the goods.

The Deputy First Minister says that they will declare war on sectarian flags. I will ask him a straight question: does he think that the Union flag is a sectarian flag? Of all the flags, it has been the Union flag that has been most attacked and removed. Is that what he is after? The people of this country know what is wrong. They have a right to demand the right to live, the right to be free from gangsters and paramilitaries, from whatever side they come, and the right to maintain their place in a democracy.

It is quite amusing to hear the Deputy First Minister talk about equality of opportunity for all. There is no equality of opportunity in our new police service because of his party’s policy that the Roman Catholic minority must have a majority over Protestants. The 50% share that is given to Protestants must also include Jews and Hindus and everyone else. There cannot be equal equality of opportunity for all, yet he unblushingly said that that great target has been set.

This House had better realise that sooner or later, no matter about the dodges of the Business Committee and no matter about the First Minister. I read carefully a statement from the First Minister that said that this would not be a fudge but that there might be flexibility. That was a good get-out. No doubt, he will have to run for shelter and quote that. We are not running for shelter. We believe in direct confrontation with the electorate. Let the electorate speak.

Mr McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. We have only had a limited opportunity to consider the draft Programme for Government in detail and, regrettably, even less opportunity to study this morning's statement.

They can only be properly considered in the context of the draft Budget, the content and detail of which we await. In the past couple of years, we have become familiar with the thematic content of the Programme for Government. In fairness, most people are content with that approach. The devil is in the detail. However, it is time for the Executive to demonstrate clearly their ability to translate the identification of priority areas such as health, education and transport into "deliverables". That is how the draft programme and the accompanying Budget will be judged. The litmus test for the Executive will be their ability, or otherwise, to set aside party political interests and, on a truly collective basis, bring together and deliver on proposals for meaningful change that will make a tangible difference.

It is ironic — some may say surreal — that we are being asked to consider how the Executive propose to make a difference when they are under a cloud and in the midst of the contrived crisis into which the Ulster Unionist Party is driving the political institutions. It is difficult to reconcile what appears in the draft Programme for Government with the general political context being shaped by those in the Ulster Unionist Party who are opposed to change. How do we square the commitment to ensuring that the transfer of political power to our political institutions makes a real and positive difference to our economic and social life with the fact that one half of the Executive now wants to collapse those institutions? How do we reconcile the commitment to tackling the underinvestment that is part of the legacy of direct rule with the Unionist half of the Executive marching down the road to nowhere? How do we square the Executive's strategic objectives to achieve equality, partnership, sustainability and prosperity with the political objectives of half of the Executive, which are based on exclusion? How should we view the commitments contained in section 8 of the draft Programme for Government? Paragraph 8.4 states:

"The Agreement provided a unique framework to develop relations within the island of Ireland."

Yet the First Minister has declared that he will, with immediate effect, act in a way that will significantly damage those institutions. Paragraph 8.4 also says that the Executive will focus on "developing North/South relations and realise the potential for enhanced co-operation".

Paragraph 8.5 begins

"We will continue to work together with the Irish Government to realise the full potential of enhanced cross-border co-operation for mutual benefit. We will take forward co-operation through the North/South Ministerial Council and in particular through the agreed areas for co-operation — (Agriculture; Education; Environment; Transport; Health; and Tourism)."

That was agreed last Thursday. Some 48 hours later, David Trimble contradicted that commitment. He negotiated and agreed with his partners on the Executive while he had in his pocket a proposal to wreck the all-Ireland institutions. When half of the Executive has adopted the policies and politics of the "No" camp, it is time for the public to ask questions.

Those are only some of the questions that will spring to people's minds when they read the detail of the draft Programme for Government — they will think of cloud cuckoo land. When we debated the draft Programme for Government last year, it was clear that it had been developed through agreement between all the political parties against a backdrop of serious political difficulties. However, at least there was a collective approach. Today's draft Programme for Government comes 48 hours after yet another Ulster Unionist Council meeting and against the backdrop of yet another Ulster Unionist Party threat to walk away from the institutions.

Let us be clear: Unionists are fighting a concerted campaign to frustrate and delay the required changes to our society with regard to the equality agenda, the human rights agenda, the all-Ireland agenda, criminal justice, demilitarisation and policing. Unionists have attempted to delay and dilute the progress in all those areas, which are the cornerstones of the Good Friday Agreement. However, my greatest concern is whether the Executive's Programme for Government will be able to deliver on the agenda for change in the light of the political cowardice of the Unionist political leadership.

Mrs Bell: I thank the Ministers for their statement. Like other Members, I received a copy of it late this morning, so I have not had time to read it or the draft Programme for Government. However, I wish to make a few comments that I will expand on in tomorrow's debate.

1.00 pm

There have been real achievements in children's issues and in health matters, such as the cancer centre. Although I do not want to undermine those achievements, the Alliance Party is once again disappointed that, in the key themes of the draft Programme for Government, community relations, which will make our society more tolerant and build on those achievements, are not apparent. I have direct experience that, over the years, community relations projects have contributed greatly towards mutual understanding and tolerance, which is tragically missing in Northern Ireland.

Stronger partnerships must be built, and not only with local government and social partners. Sub-priority 2, which should have been a full priority, states:

"We recognise that we have to deal with the very deep and painful divisions in our society after decades of conflict and that we must tackle the scourge of sectarianism, racism and intimidation."

That sub-priority also states that elected and community representatives must work together. Community relations projects and personnel should be included in that.

A community relations strategy has been delayed time and again, and the draft Programme for Government does not make it clear when, or how, the strategy will be announced or when the consultation process will begin. That must be dealt with in tomorrow's debate. The building of a strategy must be a priority, together with the efficient allocation of resources to community relations councils to ensure that all citizens will benefit from their projects.

No clear account has been given of money allocated, and no questions have been asked about the benefits to the entire community. Four years after the signing of the Good Friday Agreement, people are still being intimidated, terrorised and exiled by men and women of violence who wage their campaigns with ease. That should not be tolerated. It is not solely a matter for the Executive or for the Assembly, and my party and I believe that sufficiently strong, decisive local political leadership has not been shown. That must not continue.

Social inclusion, social exclusion and New TSN are good foundations to help disadvantaged ordinary people. However, those ordinary people deal with dreadful situations every day, and they must be supported and encouraged to come together in a viable and informed way. That can be done only by working with community relations organisations, which have their own confident and sustained strategy. That support and encouragement should be evident in all elements of the draft Programme for Government, which represents a manifesto for reinvestment and reform and a pledge to improve public services. I agree with those sentiments, and I have no doubt that they will be carried through. However, the basic safety and livelihoods of our people, together with their confidence, must be a priority.

I thank the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister for their statement this morning, to which my main remarks have been addressed. Tomorrow I shall refer to the draft Programme for Government, and I look forward to the debate.

Mr C Wilson: As the Unionist community views the proceedings today, it may be bewildered or bemused by the spectacle of the First Minister presenting a draft Programme for Government to the House. He referred to the length of time that it will take for the programme to come to fruition.

However, in Government partnership with Colleagues, as they are referred to by Mr Trimble, are members of the Ulster Unionist Party and the Democratic Unionist Party who represent the Unionist community. They are, by their outward pleadings and statements, declaring that they recognise that the Unionist electorate do not support the institutions. Furthermore, they are exhibiting signs of nervousness as they approach next year's elections.

It is on that basis that Mr Trimble beats his chest and declares that he will not sit in a power-sharing Administration with Members who continue to be inextricably linked with those who are actively involved in terrorism. However, if Mr Trimble, his party and the DUP really were representing those who elected them to the Chamber, they would not sit in the Executive for one more day with those whom they are committed to removing. Mr Trimble will find it difficult to remove himself from his position because, like all his Ministers and those from the DUP, he is pledged under annex A, strand one, of the Belfast Agreement, to "participate with colleagues in the preparation of a programme for government".

That is what we are here to consider today.

Despite that pledge, Mr Trimble knows that he has no mandate, and he knows that people supported the DUP because it pledged to use the Assembly to bring down those institutions it believed to be undemocratic. Mr Trimble has now demonstrated that he also believes that, given the Assembly's track record and the undemocratic structures that are in place, if he were to present his party to the electorate next year, he would face meltdown. However, it is only that prospective situation that is causing concern. There is no degree of recognition that those who front paramilitary private armies on the Republican and the Loyalist sides should not have been allowed to sit in government over the people whom they terrorised.

Mr Trimble also stands indicted of hypocrisy because of his new-found realisation that he cannot sit in government with those who front paramilitary organisations. Of course, he is the same Mr Trimble who walked into the negotiations at Castle Buildings flanked by representatives of Loyalist terrorist organisations and who continues to nominate those people to bodies such as the Civic Forum, to which he recommended a person who is inextricably linked to a Loyalist organisation. At the same time, he has representatives on the Loyalist commission.

Mr Trimble knows well that ordinary, decent people — Catholic, Protestant, Unionist and Nationalist — do not want those people to serve in the bodies and institutions. Also, the Secretary of State has come up with the silly notion of a monitor to determine whether those people are still engaged in acts of terrorism and intimidation and holding the communities to ransom. Ordinary, decent people know what is happening; they do not need a monitor to translate the actions of paramilitary organisations: they want to see an end to them. They want the paramilitaries on both sides put out of business. Mr Trimble's problem is that, although he beats his chest and pretends that he has had a road to Damascus experience in relation to opposing terrorists in government, he continues to sit in government with them, putting off the day on which he will pull the plug on that unseemly gathering of rogues. I appeal to the DUP to lead the Unionists out of the Executive and to leave Mr Trimble isolated.

Mr Ervine: It amazes me how hard people will work to be seen to be even-handed, even though everyone knows that they are not. I have some difficulty with the draft Programme for Government, and, indeed, I have some difficulty with how it was presented this morning. Have you noticed, Mr Deputy Speaker, how two parties spoke from prepared scripts, while the rest of us have to wing it? Two stooges stand up and tell their party leaders that they are wonderful. We keep falling into that trap; it has almost become a form of convention, and it does us no favours at all. The Opposition, for what they are worth, are small, weak and lacking cohesion. They do not even get the chance to have a look at what will be put in front of Members, and they often get only ten minutes' notice about statements that will be made. The stooges with prepared scripts then come out. There is something inherently wrong about that.

However, let us move on. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister said that there is a search for stronger partnerships. The Executive are superb role models for stronger partnership: we have a dysfunctional Executive talking about creating stronger partnership. That Executive have plunged themselves very quickly in the direction of PPP — perhaps soon to be PFI — without being remotely inventive about other possible options for raising finances following the disinvestment here caused by the Conservatives handing us their policies by the back door or by default.

In my constituency, 1% of children will go on to further and higher education, and when I read the draft Programme for Government I wonder how long it will take to destroy the iniquitous process of denying children higher education opportunities. I wonder when the Executive will truly invest the resources necessary to make a difference to those who live in the postal address areas that suffer discrimination every day, whether they are Protestant or Catholic.

When the weekend debacle occurred, we saw the frightened offering the controls of the machinery again to the frightening. Instead of forging ahead with politics that might work by genuinely building partnerships along lines that can build common purpose, we saw an illusion, similar to the decommissioning illusion, in which we hand the throttle, the clutch and the brake to the paramilitaries in Northern Ireland. When will we learn that one should not offer the controls to the lowest common denominator? When will we learn that there has to be a way to get over our fears? That is what this is about — you cannot be seen to be too close to those with whom you are in Government, because one side will shout that you are selling out. Both sides play that game.

How many times have we seen one element of the Executive opposing the very decisions made by the Executive because it is popular to do so? That has happened with issues such as pay rises and office cost allowances. On numerous occasions collective decisions have been made, and individual Ministers have opposed them in the Chamber. Everybody wants to be the Opposition, rather than to take responsibility for decisions.

We are kidding ourselves about this process. The wording, while good in parts, is creating illusions for the people. There is the illusion that the Executive Ministers are going to deal with each other in a way that can make a difference; the illusion that they are going to deal with sectarianism and the illusion that they will deal with the crass and serious circumstances of poverty and disadvantage. Never has the community sector been so weak at a time when the Executive are talking about capacity building and making communities stronger. There are more groups scurrying about, hoping and begging to get some share of the funding provided by the Executive than ever before. We should end those illusions and get on with the practical work.

Ms McWilliams: Given the decisions made at the weekend, it is difficult to anticipate what will happen as regards some of the programme's targets, the legislative framework and our expenditure plans. I am full of questions.

It is good that the document is aspirational while trying to be practical. However, like David Ervine, I wonder where we go from here. The draft programme announces plans to introduce great new legislation on housing, planning and other issues, which people here awaited for years. Until now, we did not have our own Ministers and legislation to take account of local circumstances. The document carries a good message also as regards how we will provide for our children.

However, Members, who are to deliver the programme, must ask what will happen between January and the Assembly election. What will happen if we do not meet the targets for December, as in the case of community relations? Will those targets go to the wall? We may not be able to deliver the whole programme. Let us get real.

We need a contingency plan for the period until January, so that employers will know whether they must make redundancy plans for staff. The gap between the provision of Peace I and Peace II funding resulted in a situation similar to that which we are creating today: plans could not be made, and people could not be told what would happen in the next month, never mind the next three years. We must be fair by telling people that the targets may not be met and that they should continue as before rather than try to meet some of the programme's objectives.

When community relations were discussed in the House two weeks ago, the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister guaranteed that they would carry out a strategy, talk to parties and build partnerships. Members have not even built partnerships in the Chamber, never mind outside it. Parties who wish to be involved in the development of a community relations strategy, including Members with experience of working at interface areas, still await an invitation to participate in the discussion.

If there are plans for December 2003 — and I do see such a target — much work must be done to take account of what we did not get right and to put something different in place.

Major problems exist in communities, where the focus is mostly on paramilitary groups; however, we must focus also on the depoliticised, politically homeless young people who live there too. What kind of targets should we set? Two pages of targets have been set for schools; however, the text of the programme's objective for youths is longer than the target set. The sole aim is to increase, over the next three years, participation in youth organisations by 2%. That is a sad indictment, given our communities' problems.

Surely we could have many more imaginative projects and programmes, such as those listed under the targets for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. There should be a greater link between the projects of that Department and the Department of Education to help young people who do not attend youth clubs and who need to be involved in the community. Good projects and practice that are not funded should have been taken on board. In both its projects on educational disadvantage, and in its document launched last week, 'Could do Better', the Civic Forum described some such good practice models.

When discussing exclusion, partnership and sustainability, we should take a hard look at what can be delivered between now and January.

Mr McCartney: When I was listening to the Ministers' statement this morning, I was tempted to think of the ship of state sailing along, all sails set and loaded to the gunwales with goodies for the future, while, up on deck, the captain and his mate, the First Minister and his Deputy First Minister, fight over the steering wheel about which rock — be it Scylla or Charybdis — they will crash the ship of state on. The presentation was a cross between 'Alice in Wonderland' and a Brothers Grimm story. Not since Orwell's animals decided to take over the farm has there been such a declaration of aspirations. One could hardly think of anything — apart from zip-fasteners on bananas and self-peeling oranges — that is not promised in this great document.

The truth is that there is something in what Mitchel McLaughlin said about the document being long on talk, and very short on "deliverability" — a word I think he must have got from David Ervine. Delivery is the essential issue: what are these people going to deliver, and how will they deliver it? It is said that there is a black hole of underinvestment of £6 billion for the next decade, but the true figures are probably nearer £12 billion to £15 billion. Where is the money going to come from? Any sensible businessman, taking over a company, would get his accountants to look at the books to check the debts and deficits, and his engineers to look at the equipment. Nothing of that nature was attempted by those who negotiated the Belfast Agreement.

Sir Reg Empey: You ran away from it.

Mr McCartney: This talk about running away is like a broken record. It comes from a man who wept in 1992 because he thought that he was going to be excluded from office, and that he might not get his sticky fingers on the levers of devolved power. I am very glad I ran away from that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are promising all these goodies, but how are they going to be paid for? Perhaps they will be funded by public-private finance. However, those who would supply the money for that finance would borrow it on the market and make their profit from the additional interest that they would charge those who are going to involve themselves in a form of high-level hire purchase. Future generations will be burdened by repayment of that debt, because neither the capital nor the interest will be repaid out of the Barnett formula money.

Alternatively, the services may be financed with the new money that the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister are going to borrow from the British Government. Again, the capital will have to be repaid with interest. Where will they get the money to make the repayments? They will get it by screwing the population with a vast hike in rates, including a possible tap tax on water, and a possible effluent tax on sewage. All of this will be done to make good their inefficiency at the beginning.

I welcome all the aspirations of the draft Programme for Government. However, the fact is that Mr Trimble is once again telling the canard and the untruth that Sinn Féin signed up to deliver decommissioning by 22 May 2000. He knows that it did nothing of the kind. The burden imposed upon it was the same as that imposed on all other parties, which was to use its best endeavours to bring about decommissioning by that date. He knows better than anyone else that Sinn Féin threatened to walk away from the negotiations if they were obliged to give any other undertakings. This is not some sort of excuse for Sinn Féin, whose performance has been disgraceful, and whose alleged decommissioning is a farce.

We must tell the people the truth. We must stop telling them fairy tales about the future, such as those encapsulated in this draft Programme for Government. We must remind ourselves that the duty of any Assembly is to serve the interests of the people, and not to delude them with false promises that their children or grandchildren will have to pay for.

AUDIT AND ACCOUNTABILITY BILL

First Stage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 6/02] to provide for access by the Comptroller and Auditor General to information for the purposes of audits and examinations; to transfer to the Comptroller and Auditor General responsibility for the audit of certain public bodies; to provide for the re-organisation of the administration of local government audit; to confer additional functions on the audit committee of the Assembly in relation to the appointment of the accounting officer and the auditor of the Northern Ireland Audit Office; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

HEALTH AND PERSONAL SOCIAL SERVICES (QUALITY IMPROVEMENT AND REGULATION) BILL

First Stage

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Molaim go dtugtar a Chéad Chéim don Bhille Sláinte, Seirbhísí Sóisialta agus Pearsanta (Cáilíocht, Feabhsúchán agus Rialachán).

I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 7/02] to establish the Northern Ireland Health and Personal Social Services Regulation and Improvement Authority; to make provision for the registration and regulation of certain establishments and agencies and to make provision relating to the quality of health and personal social services and to adoption, fostering and children under 12; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

AREAS OF SPECIAL SCIENTIFIC INTEREST BILL

Second Stage

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): I am not exactly firing on all cylinders today, so I beg the indulgence of the House. I have a slight flu, to say the least, and perhaps I should not even be here. I am trying to breathe directly ahead so that I do not spread any germs.

I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Areas of Special Scientific Interest Bill (NIA 02/02) be agreed.

Areas of special scientific interest (ASSIs) are the jewels in the crown of our diverse and rich landscape. They are special places, rich in all forms of wildlife, and almost 200 such areas have been declared to date. I want to see these sites properly safeguarded so that they can be appreciated by future generations. That is why I am introducing the Bill.

The Bill meets the commitment in the Programme for Government to have a policy and legislative framework for the protection and management of ASSIs in place by July 2003. It will also help to address the requirements of the EC Directive on habitats by ensuring that Northern Ireland can better protect sites that, in addition to being ASSIs, have also merited designation under European legislation. I believe that the Bill will avoid the current threat of infraction proceedings from the European Commission and any potential fines that could result.

For some years my Department has been aware of the shortcomings in legislation pertaining to ASSIs, and those shortcomings were also recognised by the Assembly in the debate held on 23 January 2001 when there was strong support from all parties for better legislation. The Bill is the result of an extensive consultation process, which began when my predecessor, Mr Foster, launched the consultation paper 'Partners in Protection' on 2 March 2001.

1.30 pm

It set out 20 key issues pertaining to the protection and management of ASSIs and sought public comment on how best to deal with those issues. Responses were received from a wide range of organisations with strong support for new legislation. On the basis of the comments received, my Department drew up several proposals, which were subject to a further round of public consultation in November last year. There was further strong support for those proposals, so, in bringing forward the Bill, we have endeavoured as fairly and equitably as possible and accommodate the wishes and concerns of all parties that contributed to the consultation process.

The Bill replaces the existing provisions for ASSIs in the Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1985. It builds on many of the features of the 1985 Order, but it also incorporates the new proposals that were the subject of the public consultation exercise.

The Bill has several key features. First, we are improving some of the procedures associated with declaration. For example, by allowing greater flexibility in the ways that amendments to site boundaries or citations can be introduced, we want landowners to be better informed about the declaration in general, so the Department will be required to provide a statement on how it considers the land can best be managed in the interests of conservation. Public bodies, including Departments, must also play their part. The Bill contains provisions that will ensure that the discharge of responsibilities complies with the need to conserve and enhance these valuable sites.

The Bill also contains measures to ensure more effective protection of ASSIs, with measures to address damaging operations that are undertaken by owners, occupiers or so-called third parties and our current inability to react appropriately and in a timely way to these concerns. Neglect or inappropriate management can be equally damaging. We must be equipped to deal with such occurrences, which are, thankfully, rare.

These measures may give some people cause for concern, particularly those in the farming community who feel that they place additional burdens on them. Let me assure them that I do not intend that to be the case, nor do I believe that it will be so. The vast majority of ASSI declarations over the last 16 years have proceeded without difficulty. Good working relationships have developed between my Department and the farming community. My aim is to ensure that the Bill, together with the other measures that I will be introducing, further strengthens those relationships.

Many of the measures contained in the Bill are needed for the small number of landowners who wish to carry out activities or operations that could irreparably damage these valuable sites. That is particularly important for sites whose importance is further recognised by designation under European legislation. The threat of infraction already hangs over the United Kingdom. The European Commission perceives that the UK has failed to implement fully the requirements of article 6 of the Habitats Directive, and the Commission has issued a reasoned opinion letter against the United Kingdom. Action to address that has already been taken in England and Wales through provisions in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, otherwise known as the CROW Act. The measures in the Bill will address the shortcomings in Northern Ireland and ward off the threat of infraction and potential fines.

There are also safeguards built into the Bill for landowners, including the right of appeal to the Planning Appeals Commission against a decision made by the Department.

Another feature of the Bill is the provision to ensure better management of sites. Good management of ASSIs is a fundamental principle of the partnership approach that we have fostered over the past 16 years. There are presently over 250 management agreements in place between the Environment and Heritage Service and ASSI landowners or occupiers.

The measures contained in the Bill create the right climate to encourage and support the beneficial management of ASSIs. They will reinforce the change to positive management agreements that the Environment and Heritage Service has introduced recently. Our consultation paper 'Partners in Protection' recognised the importance of encouraging and rewarding beneficial management of sites rather than merely preventing damage.

We also said that we would introduce our own scheme for the positive management of ASSIs. I am delighted to announce today that a scheme is now in place, and available to all landowners and occupiers in ASSIs, called "MOSS", which stands for "management of sensitive sites". It is an acronym that I hope everyone will find easy to remember. MOSS acknowledges that the wildlife value of sites is the result of sensitive management of the land by both past and present landowners. It aims to build on that by encouraging farmers and landowners to adopt management practices that sustain and enhance the special features of an ASSI. In return, landowners will receive payments calculated to redress income foregone. I appeal to all those involved in the management of land within ASSIs to take advantage of this important initiative, so that the Department, in partnership with the landowners, can further protect Northern Ireland's most important wildlife sites for the conservation of biodiversity and the benefit of society at large.

In conclusion, the Bill can meet the needs and concerns of the wide range of interested parties who are stakeholders in this matter. It will achieve our Programme for Government target for better legislation. It will also bring Northern Ireland into line with comparable legislation elsewhere in the United Kingdom, and it should also meet our EC obligations. The Bill strikes the right balance between the need for effective protection of ASSIs — sites that are vital to the well-being of all our diverse natural heritage — and allows for the continuation of established and sustainable land practices.

I speak especially to the more than 5,000 ASSI landowners across Northern Ireland, who have worked in partnership with the Department over the last 16 years to safeguard those valuable conservation sites. I stress to them that it is my wish that that continues and is further strengthened. There is a need for partnership among the landowners and those in the Administration who give the protection. This Bill will help achieve that aim, and I commend it to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Rev Dr William McCrea): I thank the Minister for introducing the Bill. Given that the Committee is already scrutinising four substantial Bills, the Minister will understand if that thanks is somewhat guarded. Despite their workload, members of the Committee are looking forward to discussing the specific terms of the Bill at Committee Stage, and, therefore, I will keep my comments relatively short.

The Minister will be aware that the Committee has already received several detailed representations on the consultation exercises that preceded the Bill. That demonstrates the importance that the Committee gives to this legislation — indeed, to all legislation — and the Committee's clear determination to come to terms with the details of what, in many instances, is a complex Bill.

There is no doubt that legislation in respect of ASSIs must be updated. Although ASSIs are vital for the delivery of nature conservation and provide real protection for rare and important species of fauna and flora, as well as for those geological and earth science features present in Northern Ireland, it would be wrong to pretend that there have not been problems. Indeed, the Committee considered a letter at its meeting last week that highlighted the problems that 39 landowners in County Tyrone were having in challenging the proposed designation of a huge area of land around Newtownstewart as an ASSI.

Although the Committee will give no opinion on whether the proposal is right or wrong, that letter demonstrates quite clearly how this subject can have an impact on the community. However, I thank the Minister for his assurance to the House that it is his intention to ensure that there is a strengthening of the relationship between the farming community and his Department and that they work in partnership.

In March 2001, the Department issued an initial and broad-ranging consultation document called 'Partners in Protection'. Following a number of presentations and discussions with the Department's officials, the Committee made a formal response in June 2001. The Department received a total of 35 responses to that consultation document. To the Department's credit, that paper was followed by a further consultation exercise in November 2001 on the specific policies on ASSIs that it proposed to take forward. The Committee in turn responded to that consultation paper in February 2002. The outcome of that consultation was to form the basis of the Bill before the House.

My Committee will be particularly interested in how the Bill will seek to address a range of issues such as changes in ownership, powers to refuse potentially damaging operations and to make management orders and the level of fines. The maximum level in some circumstances in the Bill is £20,000, a figure that the Committee has already considered too low to act as an effective deterrent in two other Bills which have come before it.

In March 2002, the Minister appeared before the Committee, and we discussed a proactive approach to co-operating with him to deal with certain Bills from his Department. At that time, my Committee gave assurances that it would co-operate fully with the Department, subject to its being fully satisfied with the specific terms ultimately adopted in the Bills. I affirm that this remains the intention of the Committee. However, I can assure the Minister that, as he would expect, it will be diligent and thorough in examining the details of the Bill and will come back with any amendments necessary at the Consideration Stage.

Mrs Carson: I welcome the Minister's statement that he wishes to ensure the preservation of all our important areas. To ensure that ASSIs are effectively managed, it is important that new owners or occupiers of land be made aware of any conservation designations in place. The Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 could be amended to include a requirement that an owner or occupier notify his or her successor.

I also welcome the Minister's statement that the Department will supply each owner and occupier with a site management statement outlining the conservation objectives and indicating the appropriate management. I very much welcome his new MOSS designation whereby owners will receive payment, and I hope that owners of such sites and areas will take advantage of that. We must have legislation in place so that the Environment and Heritage Service can refuse consent for notifiable or potentially damaging activities. There is a gap in the current legislation that means that ASSIs do not afford protection against acts of deliberate damage by landowners or occupiers, and I hope that it can be plugged.

I agree with the Chairman of the Committee for the Environment, Rev Dr William McCrea, that the present deterrents for wilful damage to ASSIs are much too lenient. I hope that there will be increased fines for those causing or permitting damaging operations and new penalties for those who commit intentional or reckless damage or disturbance — that must be covered.

I look forward to the Minister's providing the Committee with some more information and to a fruitful completion of the next stage of the Bill.

1.45 pm

Mr Byrne: My party fully appreciates the need to protect and conserve our natural and physical environment. However, the proposals, as they stand, could have a negative effect on the farming community and on industrial and residential development in rural areas, especially where ASSIs are sited near to villages and smaller towns.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment mentioned a designated ASSI in Newtownstewart in west Tyrone. That designated ASSI has caused great concern to the local community. The issues raised by the Newtownstewart example will have relevance to the Bill's implementation. Many in the community fear that the proposed Deer Park ASSI will restrict landowners and farmers in the daily management and cultivation of their land at a time when the agriculture industry is experiencing serious economic difficulties. Furthermore, the Newtownstewart community is concerned that the Deer Park ASSI will restrict the land that can be used for industrial or residential development, mainly because the current proposal almost encircles Newtownstewart. It falls right inside the town's inner designated limits.

The Department of the Environment has acknowledged that the Deer Park ASSI includes good quality, productive agricultural land and areas of commercial forest, so it is important that the procedures by which the Department declares an ASSI should be revised to take into consideration the quality of the agricultural land that an ASSI covers. An ASSI can be effectively declared and preserved only if there is proper local consultation, so that communities can work with the Environment and Heritage Service to protect the agreed ASSI in future.

Once an ASSI is declared, objections must be made within three months. As the residents and landowners of Newtownstewart have found, that gives little time for concerned parties to make formal representations to the Department. The three-month time frame must be extended to allow for wider consultation with the community that is affected by the declaration of an ASSI.

In the Newtownstewart case, the Department of the Environment has acknowledged the need to clarify and simplify the list of notifiable operations and those for which consent is not needed. The Environment and Heritage Service has, therefore, agreed to re-consult its statutory advisory body, the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside, on that. That underlines the fact that the Bill must give greater clarity on the matter; it must state to what extent an ASSI declaration will affect normal farming activities.

The concept of designating carefully chosen ASSIs is a good thing. We should be concerned about protecting our natural environment, especially those parts of our region that have significant and special physical features. The purpose of the Newtownstewart ASSI is to preserve a unique glacial feature of that area. However, people who wish to live and work in rural areas must not feel that the imposition of ASSIs, as determined by official bodies, is a conspiracy against them to hinder rural-based development, whether for residential or farm-related business activities.

I welcome the Minister's announcement of the MOSS initiative. That is a step in the right direction.

Mr Shannon: Many concerns about the consultation process have been intimated to me and to others. The Minister outlined a consultation and appeal process. However, ASSIs have created much concern and interest among landowners and farmers. Will the Minister assure us that nothing will take place before consultation with landowners and farmers? People who have businesses in ASSIs are also concerned, especially those who own caravan parks.

I am concerned that this designation comes before consultation, with the result that caravan park owners do not feel that they are part of the process. The caravan industry is geared towards leisure. Designation of ASSIs may mean that caravan sites, which are traditionally by the seaside and involve water-based activities, will be restricted. Caravan site owners, tenants and lessees of the caravan sites will therefore be unable to continue with their businesses.

In the light of all the obvious concerns and obstacles, can the Minister assure the House that the Department of the Environment will adopt a cautious attitude in its approach to ASSI designation? Will he also assure Members that the views of landowners, farmers, caravan site owners and all those who will be affected by ASSI designation will be taken on board? Can the Minister also assure the House that there will be full, positive, transparent consultation with everyone concerned before any designations are made and that their views will be endorsed and encompassed in the Areas of Special Scientific Interest Bill?

Mr Molloy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. All Members welcome the idea of good legislation to deal with the protection of heritage. However, I share the caution of other Members. The farming community, in particular, should have been consulted with, listened to and provided with relevant information. Farmers in my area feel that they have not been involved and that some of the earlier designations have been made with little or no consultation. People feel that the designation of ASSIs are being imposed on the countryside. The Bill mentions "owners", but people feel that they own very little land when the Department decides that it wants to do something with it: the Department makes the decision and the farmer faces the consequences.

Although designation can cause the devaluation of an area, adequate compensation has not been provided. That has been the case in the Cookstown/Kildress area where sand extraction has taken place over recent years. It is an area rich in sand deposits, and the rest of the country has benefited from that in the past. However, because of farm diversification, that area is a honeypot for people to develop and expand a business, and a small area of conservation in the middle of it can be detrimental to those trying to develop it. If it is only a small area, the rest of the land can be landlocked, with damaging effect on the area to be preserved. Therefore, Members must look at the nature and purpose of the conservation and consider what they want to see the Bill develop and protect.

Clause 1(1) mentions the consultation between the Department of the Environment and the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside. Consultation must be wider than that. There must be proper consultation with farmers and the entire rural population. If policies are to be implemented to bring about ruralisation, and rural proofing, as the Minister of Agriculture mentioned, informative consultation must take place. It is hoped that the ASSIs will be properly managed. Members must also look at farm diversification and bear in mind that farmers in some areas do not have any other means of support.

The Environment and Heritage Service played an important role in the drafting of the Bill, but decisions should be made in partnership with the farming community. Decisions should not be imposed on the farming or rural community as they have been in the past. With some exceptions, the rural community has been the best protector of heritage. If you point out the special nature that you are trying to preserve, people will work in partnership with you. It is to be hoped that the measures in the Bill will be used in the proper manner and that decisions will not simply be imposed from the top.

The issue of right of appeal is also important. Those who want to pursue the right of appeal should have proper access and be given support. There should also be a back-up service to ensure that people get a fair hearing. In the past, too many tribunals have merely been about people making representations, while Government Departments have all the legislation and legal and administrative back-up to ensure that it is they who succeed. Those who want to appeal decisions need support to ensure that they have all the information. I welcome the opportunity for further discussion in the Committee and for debate in the House.

Mr McCarthy: I give a general welcome to the Bill, but it is a disgrace that Northern Ireland is so far behind Europe and the rest of the UK in implementing environmental Directives. The Bill is overdue, and the Alliance Party is keen for it to be placed on the statute book as soon as possible. Other Members have spoken about consultations — that is the name of the game. However, the Department has failed dismally to consult properly with landowners and farmers. Some years ago Strangford Lough was designated as an ASSI. There was almost a revolt because landowners were not given the correct information and were being dictated to by the Department. There was a similar situation last year when Grey Point to Ballyquintin Point in Portaferry was to be designated as an ASSI. There were, again, lapses, despite my representation to the Department at a meeting of Ards Borough Council to ensure that consultation was the name of the game.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Dr McDonnell, it is extremely discourteous to turn your back to Mr McCarthy and continue a conversation when he is on his feet.

Mr McCarthy: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Some landowners were informed only by second or third parties, and that does not help the process. Everyone must get involved.

The Alliance Party also welcomes the requirement for the Department of the Environment to provide a statement on the management of the land as stated in clause 1(2). That should be of major benefit to the owner/occupier of the land as well as improve conservation. Another important point is the provision for management agreements, as stated in clause 7, which includes costs being met by the Department. It is wrong that many landowners who care for valuable natural sites do so at their own cost. We also welcome clauses 11 to 13 with regard to the statutory duty on public bodies to promote conservation. However, in some respects, it is less robust than the requirements on private owners.

In paragraph 19 of the explanatory and financial memorandum "modest additional resources" are mentioned, yet the Bill provides for management agreements and payments where consent is withdrawn. Paragraph 2(2) of schedule 1 requires a full management declaration, as in clause 1, for all existing ASSIs within five years. Can the Minister assure us that this can be done with "modest additional resources"?

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Mr Savage): I have listened attentively to all the Members who have spoken, and I cannot disagree with the comments that have been made. I welcome the Minister's statement, especially with regard to the management of sensitive sites.

I am concerned that many people who live in sensitive areas do not want to sign up to the MOSS scheme. What is their situation under the legislation?

2.00 pm

I urge the Minister and his Department to be careful and to try not to force the issue. As Mr Molloy said, if the Department consults with the farmers it will find that they are sensitive to what happens in their areas. No one knows more about the issue than the farmers because they live in the rural areas. Although they understand what the Department is trying to do, they will not be pushed into doing something that they do not want to do.

I hope that consultation takes place. The Department must understand that it is entering into a partnership with the farming community. The last thing that farmers want is to have people turning up on their premises telling them what to do. I am not suggesting that the Minister will take that sort of attitude. However, as a farmer, I know that they will consult the Department if asked to do so. We are talking about a working relationship that will survive only if both partners work together.

Many issues affect rural areas at present, and agriculture has been going through a difficult patch. All those issues now come together. We must introduce a Bill that will protect the farmer as well as the sensitive sites, and that will take on board good farming practices. We are entering into an arrangement that will work, and, provided there is goodwill, it will survive.

The Minister must take all the issues on board. For example, he must address matters such as the farmers who do not want to have people tramping over their land. However, if there is a will, there is a way to address the issues, and I wish him success.

Mr Wells: I remember clearly the Nature Conservation and Amenity Lands (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, because it was one of the pieces of legislation that took a long time to pass through the Assembly that sat between 1982 and 1986, and it attracted an almost record number of submissions.

A main point of that legislation was the issue of areas of special scientific interest. The law has come full circle, because, 16 or 17 years later, we are examining proposals to strengthen the protection of such areas. There is much to be welcomed in the Minister's statement.

In many respects, the Assembly passes some types of legislation because it has no choice. The Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 covers England, Scotland and Wales and has greatly strengthened sites of special scientific interest (SSSI) legislation. We must introduce similar legislation in this part of the United Kingdom in the interests of parity.

There is also the matter of European legislation. We are signatories to many international conventions, such as the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands, the Bonn Convention on the Conservation of Migratory Species and European Directives on special areas of conservation and special protection areas for birds. There is a panoply of legislation and European Conventions. As part of the European Community, we are duty-bound to implement legislation that will protect such areas whether we like it or not.

As the Minister stated, the European Community is concerned that the United Kingdom is not doing all that it can to conserve habitats. A European Union policy, Nature Europa, obliges member states to designate areas representative of nature conservation among the top European sites. The Irish Republic and, to a lesser extent, Northern Ireland are a fair bit behind in meeting their obligations under that policy. It is in that context that the Minister finds himself having to amend and update legislation on ASSIs.

As a civilised, western industrialised nation, we would be hypocritical were we to criticise the Indians of the rainforests or the tribes of Africa for destroying their habitats and important wildlife areas if we have not put our own house in order. The main mechanism that we have to protect our environment is ASSI designation, which is important for nature conservation. That is particularly relevant because we do not have national parks as in Canada or the United States. That being the case, it is incumbent upon us not only to designate all the areas that meet the standard but also to ensure that they are adequately protected. The proposals go a long way to achieve that, particularly in dealing with third-party damage. In my constituency of South Down, ASSIs have been damaged not by the owner or occupier but by fly-tippers who damage sites without the consent of the landowner.

A point that has been overlooked in the Minister's statement and which deserves a fair hearing is the MOSS proposals. They propose grant aid for farmers and other landowners to assist them in the management of ASSIs. That is positive, because we all know farmers' desperate situation. Their incomes are at an all time low, and anything that provides more money for them is to be welcomed. It will change people's perception of ASSIs. Instead of regarding ASSIs as negative and restrictive, farmers could see them as an opportunity to reach management agreements with the Department to work together with the Environment and Heritage Service to manage these important areas and to bring in much needed income. Some farmers would rather have the positive income that MOSS provides than lose perhaps £15 for every sheep they produce.

Mr McCarthy, Dr Birnie and other Members must remember that ASSIs cover only 6% of Northern Ireland. Even when all the sites have been designated, they will probably still cover less than 10%. Therefore 90% of the Province could be farmed in the normal way without any restriction.

It is worth having the special designation, but it is more important to have the funding to reach the agreements. I hope that sufficient finances are made available to the Department of the Environment so that the agreements can become widespread and positive. His constituents might even plead with Mr McCarthy to have their land designated as areas of special scientific interest so that they can avail of the funding.

Strangford Lough is in the constituencies of Strangford and South Down. There was much opposition to designating Strangford Lough as an ASSI. However, there has been little mention of it in the past three or four years, as landowners have realised that it is not the bogeyman that they assumed — it is positive. We owe it to future generations to preserve the 6% or 8% of the best of our nature conservation habitats in Northern Ireland so that they can enjoy these wonderful areas.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): I thank Mr Wells for his beautiful words of help for me. He was not in the Chamber when I said that I look for assistance because I have the cold. I shudder to think what assistance he would have given me if he had heard me ask. Nonetheless, he spoke some wonderful words of support for what I am trying to do.

I thank all Members for their contributions and for their interest. Mr McCarthy and Mr Savage gave the farming point of view. We heard from Mr Shannon, and Jim Wells made a genuine point about the opportunity to protect our habitat. I will respond to some of the comments made. The departmental officials will scrutinise Hansard, and any of the detailed questions that have not been answered will be addressed in due course.

I thank Rev Dr William McCrea for his comments. The legislation requires updating. I entirely agree that it would be wrong to pretend that there are no problems — this very debate has shown that there are. I note the letter he mentioned from 39 landowners. The Member welcomed, as Mr Savage did, the strengthening of the relationship between the Department, in administering ASSIs, and the farming and landowning community.

I will answer three of Rev Dr William McCrea's points. He mentioned powers of refusal. The Department will have entry powers and power to refuse consent for operations that would damage special features of ASSIs. The Department will also issue management notices that will address neglect. That may be viewed as a stick, but it satisfactorily complies with human rights legislation.

The Bill provides for an appeal mechanism for the various aspects where the Department has authority. We must ensure that the powers are not abused, but we, as the public sector custodian, must also have the appeal mechanism and be seen to be using it correctly.

Rev Dr William McCrea mentioned management notices. We want a theme of agreement and partnership. We want to exhaust all possibilities in trying to seek agreement between those who must work the land and those who want to designate an ASSI. The safeguard of the right of appeal remains available if we do not get it quite right.

The Member also mentioned that the maximum level of fines in some cases in the Bill is £20,000. However, as the Member has said before, fines in other Bills have been higher. There is now a parallel. Where a maximum fine was £5,000, it has been brought up to £20,000. A fine of £30,000, which would reflect inflation, has been suggested. We are conscious of that and have been negotiating on it. I also remind the House that that is the figure in the lower court.

As projected under another Bill that the Environment Committee and the Department are considering, there are unlimited fines in the higher court. That will take care of the fines aspect, but I take the Member's points about the £20,000 fine versus the £5,000 and the £30,000 fine, which features in another Bill.

We want fines to be an appropriate deterrent. Like the Chairperson of the Environment Committee, we believe that the current fine is an inappropriate deterrent. That answers Mrs Carson's point about increasing fines.

Mr Byrne mentioned the negative impact on the farming community. He mentioned the deer park at Newtown Stewart. I do not want to address that specific area now, so my officials will address it directly with the Member. I have often said that the farming element is important. Mr Savage said that he is a farmer. I said that I come from a farming background. I empathise with farming and farmers. There are farmers in my family and in my constituency. Therefore, I try to empathise and understand the points raised by the farming community.

2.15 pm

We do not want to place unnecessary burdens on the farming community. Many of the 5,000 people who own the 200 ASSIs are from the farming community, and we need their co-operation. The vast majority of owners work well with us — there are exceptions, but we try to deal with them. Mr Wells said that not enough attention had been paid to the management of sensitive sites. Again, I thank him for raising that point. I see from Mr Wells's facial expression that he is concerned by the fact that I am commending him again.

Mr Wells: It might be in the papers.

Mr Nesbitt: It might well be in the papers. However, it must be noted that I am commending him for commending me.

Mr Dodds: That is even worse.

Mr Nesbitt: That is true.

We will offer payments in return for managing land, and for the purpose of conservation. Thus we hope to give landowners the satisfaction they need. The Bill will provide for the compensation, through management agreements, of landowners who are unable to continue certain activities.

We do not want another management scheme — that is provided for in existing legislation. We would prefer to have an agreement, but, if we cannot do so, we will use management notices, which could be viewed as “the stick”. We prefer to work in partnership, and it is essential that we do so.

Mr Shannon urged caution and sought assurance that nothing would take place until there had been further discussion. We recognise that we must work in partnership with those who manage the ASSIs.

Mr Molloy mentioned sand deposits and farm diversification, which we must examine to see how they can fit in with ASSIs. If land were not part of an ASSI, what would the farming community do with it? In economic terms, what would be the opportunity cost? What would be lost if land were designated as an ASSI? That opportunity cost needs to be considered when making decisions about compensation. Mr Molloy warned that decisions should not be imposed on the farming community. I have tried to convey the message that we do not wish to impose from the top. I disagree with Mr McCarthy's remark that the Department failed dismally to consult with farmers and landowners.

Mr McCarthy: Yes, dismally.

Mr Nesbitt: Two full consultations were carried out, and we tried to reflect their outcome in the Bill. The Bill will go to the Committee Stage, which will involve further consultation and deliberation, before it comes back to the Assembly. We will try to consult and work in partnership with those who will be affected by the Bill.

I apologise for not catching all of Mr McCarthy's point about resource implications. We have sufficient resources to start the implementation work set out in the new legislation, partly because of the recruitment of additional staff, as provided for through the spending review of the Budget 2000-01. Of course, when resources are not available, I will bid for additional resources to ensure the fullest implementation of the work. However, to place a bid is not to guarantee its success. I can but hope, and shall wait to see how the spending rounds go.

The final contributors, Mr Savage and Mr Wells, encapsulated what I had already said. At the beginning of my winding-up remarks, I mentioned tension. Mr Savage spoke of partnership, saying that telling farmers what to do would not work. Both parties must work together. No one tells the farmers in my family what to do; instead, they should be asked to work together to get things done.

Mr Wells spoke of the “panoply of European Union legislation and conventions”. It is our bounden duty — like it or not — to implement those. European Union Directives to protect the environment cannot be disregarded, otherwise we face infraction proceedings. The Bill takes account of the legal imperative, of European Union desires, and the need for partnership with the community in creating areas of special scientific interest. The Bill will bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. I hope that it will be fair to all the interests involved, to those who seek further measures to safeguard the natural heritage, to what EU Directives require of us, and to the owners and occupiers of the land, who continue to use it in a sustainable manner. I hope that it will be fair to the community as a whole, whether land-users or users of those areas of special scientific interest that need protection.

I commend the Bill's Second Stage and look forward to the comments of the Committee for the Environment.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Areas of Special Scientific Interest Bill (NIA 2/02) be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill now stands referred to the Committee for the Environment.

COMPANY DIRECTORS' DISQUALIFICATION BILL

Consideration Stage

Clauses 1 to 27 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 to 4 agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Company Directors' Disqualification Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

Consideration Stage

Clauses 1 to 21 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 to 3 agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the State Pension Credit Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Final Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the Social Security Bill (NIA 3/02) do now pass.

I thank Members for their consideration of the Bill and the speed with which the deliberations took place.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Social Security Bill (NIA 3/02) do now pass.

DRAFT FIXED TERM EMPLOYEES (PREVENTION OF LESS FAVOURABLE TREATMENT) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

PART-TIME WORKERS (PREVENTION OF LESS FAVOURABLE TREATMENT) (AMENDMENT) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I ask Ms Hanna to move the motion, I remind Members that a draft Statutory Rule that is subject to approval by resolution requires the approval of the Assembly before it can be made by the Department.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna): Mr Speaker, these two regulations are closely linked. With your permission I propose to move them at the same time.

Mr Speaker: I am content for you to do that.

Ms Hanna: I beg to move

That the draft Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 be approved.

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 286/2002) be approved — [The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna).]

I express my appreciation to Dr Birnie and the Committee for Employment and Learning for considering the Regulations so promptly. I regret the short time available to the Committee, but, once policy had been settled as to how best transpose European Council Directive 1999/70/EC concerning the framework agreement on fixed-term work in the UK, my officials had little time to process the Northern Ireland draft Regulations.

The fixed-term Regulations will implement European Council Directive 1999/70/EC concerning the framework agreement on fixed-term work. They will also prevent pay and pensions discrimination against fixed-term employees. Most statutory employment rights already protect employees on fixed-term contracts. Part-time workers, however, enjoy additional protection from being less favourably treated than comparable full-time workers.

The new fixed-term Regulations have been designed to give similar rights to fixed-term employees by ensuring that, because of the nature of their contracts, they are not treated less favourably than comparable permanent employees, unless that treatment can be objectively justified. In short, the Regulations' key aims are to prevent discrimination against fixed-term employees and to place a limit on the use of successive fixed-term contracts to prevent abuses arising from their use. Fixed-term employees will be able to compare their conditions with those of employees who are not on fixed-term contracts and are employed by the same employer to do the same, or broadly the same, work.

I realise that there may be occasions when employers may have objective reasons for treating a fixed-term employee differently from a similar permanent employee, and the Regulations provide for that. In particular, they state that different treatment is objectively justified, providing the fixed-term employee's overall package of conditions is not less favourable than those of a comparable permanent employee. Employers will not, therefore, be prevented from giving a fixed-term employee a higher salary to compensate for their not having other benefits, such as access to a pension scheme.

A core aim of the EC Directive is that member states take measures to prevent the abuse of successive fixed-term contracts. The Regulations aim to achieve that by limiting the use of successive fixed-term contracts to four years, unless the use of further fixed-term contracts is justified on objective grounds. For the purposes of that area of the Regulations, service accumulated from 10 July 2002 will count towards the four-year limit.

2.30 pm

There is no limit on the duration of the first fixed-term contract.

Mr Speaker: Order. I fear I must interrupt the Minister in full flow, but Standing Orders do require me to interrupt at 2.30 pm for Question Time. After Questions to the Assembly Commission, which come after Questions to the Ministers, the House will, return to the debate on the two Statutory Rules as requested by the Minister. Other Members who wish to speak may do so, speaking on either or both. The Question will then be put on each Statutory Rule in turn.

FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Mr Speaker: I wish to advise the House that questions 1, 2, and 5 in the names of Mr Gibson, Mr Fee and Mr John Kelly have been withdrawn and will receive written answers. Question 8, in the name of Mr McGrady, has also been withdrawn.

OFMDFM (Staff Numbers)

3. Mr A Maginness asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to detail how the numbers working in its Department compare with the numbers in (i) the Prime Minister's office and (ii) the Taoiseach's office. (AQO 154/02)

The Deputy First Minister (Mr Durkan): We welcome the opportunity to clarify the distinction between a private office and a Department. Thirty-one staff are employed in our joint private office, including our private secretaries, special advisers and administrative support as well as a team that handles the large volume of correspondence that we receive.

Our Department has a wide range of functions that have been conferred on it by statute or that have been added by the Assembly from time to time. The Department's responsibilities go far beyond those of the Prime Minister's office or that of the Taoiseach. Our Department has a unique role and remit, covering equality and community relations policies and programmes, economic policy and European matters. It also supports the Executive as a whole and, indeed, supports and facilitates the work of the full range of Departments and Ministers. That is clearly shown in relation to the North/South Ministerial Council, the British-Irish Council, the work of the Executive secretariat, the Economic Policy Unit and the Executive information service.

On 2 September, 417 staff were in post in the Department. Some 383 are directly engaged in the Department's work, and the remainder are posted to those independent bodies for which the Department is responsible for providing staffing support, such as the Planning Appeals Commission and the International Fund for Ireland. A more detailed summary has been placed in the Assembly Library.

Mr A Maginness: It would appear from the Deputy First Minister's answer — and I invite him to agree — that the number of staff employed means that the people of Northern Ireland are getting value for money. The staff are targeted, deal effectively and efficiently with their work and are by no means disproportionate to the needs of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

The Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre has called for more resources for the Department. Would the Deputy First Minister like to comment on that?

The Deputy First Minister: The Member is correct that the Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre has made the point on several occasions that insufficient resources are being committed to the OFMDFM. He has made that point in relation to e-government and European policy matters. Indeed, the Committee of the Centre observed in a report that more staff and financial resources are necessary.

We must also remember that some people who work in OFMDFM are working on, for example, the review of public administration. Many of those people have been brought in from elsewhere in the public service and will be on our payroll only for the duration of that review.

People misunderstand the comparisons made about OFMDFM, the Taoiseach's office and Downing Street. A fair comparison might be made between the central co-ordination functions of OFMDFM and the Cabinet Office, which has a staff of more than 2,000. The Equality Unit and a range of other services have to be provided for somewhere in the Government, and the Assembly agreed that they would be assigned to OFMDFM.

Rev Robert Coulter: Would OFMDFM's responsibility for functions beyond central co-ordination be better sited elsewhere, leaving a leaner, slimmer Department to discharge its primary all-important function of co-ordinating Government?

The Deputy First Minister: The composition of Departments and the distribution of their functions are determined by the Assembly, having been proposed by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. When departmental functions are reviewed, it is conceivable that some responsibilities that are currently in the remit of OFMDFM could be reassigned to other Departments. However, some OFMDFM functions support the Executive as well as the work of Departments and their impact on other bodies such as the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council. The Executive are working not only to support the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister but to facilitate the work of all Ministers and Departments. Some units lend themselves naturally to central office, such as OFMDFM's role in providing Executive support, while units that deal with other Government work or specialist areas could be considered for reassignment. However, those units and functions will not disappear: many existed before the creation of OFMDFM; some, such as the Equality Unit, are new and required new resources and commitments. Many Members have pointed out that such areas require more finance and additional personnel.

Mr S Wilson: Members will be surprised by the Deputy First Minister's defence of the £13.2 million spent on the creation of jobs for David Trimble's cronies and on UUP election failures.

Is the Deputy First Minister aware of panic in the OFMDFM as staff frantically search through the jobs columns of newspapers at the prospect of being out of work by 18 January 2003, as the First Minister yet again gets tough on the IRA? Or have OFMDFM's employees taken the same cynical view as the rest of the population with regard to another deadline — yet again given before an election — which is never carried through? That deadline will go the same way as the deadlines given before the Assembly elections, the local council elections and the Westminster elections.

The Deputy First Minister: The staff of OFMDFM and the relevant pay and rations bill, involves many civil servants. The Member refers to a budget of £13 million and suggests that it is connected to cronies of either the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister. That suggestion is entirely misplaced. The majority of jobs in OFMDFM existed before the establishment of that Department; it was a matter of which Department those jobs would be located in. The setting up of the Executive, new structures and equality responsibilities meant that new jobs had to be created, which had to be assigned somewhere. There is an argument for a dedicated Equality Unit, which would require many staff. The issue should be treated fairly. Today in OFMDFM people were reading the excellent newspaper coverage of the fantastic success of the Derry minor team and the Armagh senior team rather than panicking and searching frantically for new jobs.

Mr S Wilson: So they do not believe David Trimble either.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Police Training College Location

4. Mr Paisley Jnr: asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister if it has met with the Chairman of the Policing Board to discuss the location of the police training college, and if it intends to support the Policing Board recommendation to locate the college at the site of HMP Maze. (AQO 125/02)

Discussions with Chairman of the Policing Board

9. Mr Poots asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister what discussions it has had with the Chairman of the Policing Board. (AQO 159/02)

The First Minister: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will take questions 4 and 9 together. There have been several informal discussions between Ministers and the chairman of the Policing Board on the location of the police training college. We are aware of the board's interest in the Maze site. However, our use of that site is subject to the terms of our agreement with the Treasury, which cover all the sites to be transferred to the Executive, free of charge, under our reinvestment and reform initiative. Those terms include an undertaking on our part to plan the development of each site strategically, with a view to maximising the benefit of the economic and social regeneration of local communities. To this end, members of the reinvestment and reform initiative project board have recently visited all the sites, and we look forward to receiving their advice. In the specific case of the important site at the Maze, we must also take into account proposals for the development of the adjacent Ministry of Defence site at Long Kesh. As far as I am aware, there have been no discussions with the chairman of the Policing Board on any other matter.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The First Minister deliberately failed to answer the part of the question that interests most people. Does he support the proposal to locate a new police training college at the Maze site? That is critical, given that his party unanimously endorsed that position at a Policing Board meeting. Is it the case that, at a meeting over the summer months with the chairman of the Policing Board, he suggested that the Maze site was worth £1 million per acre and that, as a result, he could not justify giving that land to the board? Does he now stand as the impediment to progress in the creation of a first-class, twenty-first century training college for police officers in Northern Ireland? Will he now commit himself to locating a police college at that site?

The First Minister: I am afraid that, yet again, Junior is misinformed. I have had no meeting with the chairman of the Policing Board. There was a telephone conversation. I did not make the comment that he attributed to me. I do not know who may have said it, but I certainly did not, and I do not know where that invention came from.

I refer the Member to my original answer. The Maze site was transferred to us free of charge. If the Member thinks about that for a moment, he will realise the enormous problems we would face if we subsequently transferred to the Northern Ireland Office property that was given to us free and for a purpose. Clear conditions are attached to the use of the property. We would experience considerable difficulties with the Treasury if we departed from them.

There is a further factor to be considered. The total area, including not only the Maze site, but the Ministry of Defence property, amounts to more than 300 acres. The site is centrally located at a strategic point in Northern Ireland. It is clearly irresponsible to deal with this in a piecemeal manner without considering how to maximise the benefit in the broader sense, not only financially, but socially, for Northern Ireland as a whole. I would have thought that the Member's colleague in the Department for Regional Development would want to reconsider strategic plans in view of the significance of this site rather than fritter the opportunity away. Of course we want to see a first-class police college there, but the Member should be more responsible and not propose to squander significant assets in such a way.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Poots: The First Minister made a very convincing argument for placing the police college at the Maze site. It is strategically placed, in a central location, and there is an abundance of land. Those are all good reasons to support locating a police college there. Is Mr Trimble saying that he is opposed to setting up a police college on a central site? People want more police officers on the streets, and his office is holding back better policing by delaying the opportunity to develop a police college.

2.45 pm

The First Minister: The reason for the delay in establishing a new police college, one of the few proposals in the Patten Report that we favoured, is the Treasury's failure to provide the appropriate finance. That is a reserved matter for the Northern Ireland Office. I support plans for a first-class police college, but its provision is a matter for the Northern Ireland Office and the Policing Board. Many sites in Northern Ireland could be considered. Mr Poots might wish to seek the views of his constituents in the Maze area.

Ms Lewsley: The First Minister must find it at least ironic, and at worst contradictory, to answer a question on a site for a new police training college two days after he threatened the Police (Northern Ireland) (Amendment) Order 2001, to which his party Colleagues on the Policing Board contributed. Is the Policing Board seeking to use the Maze Prison site, the Ministry of Defence site, or both?

The First Minister: I am sure that Ms Lewsley is very glad that on Saturday we managed to save the agreement, to give it another chance to succeed and to prevent it from collapsing, which it otherwise would have done. We need to put that in context.

In response to Ms Lewsley's question, we have only the Policing Board's press release to go on. The board stated that the new police training college could be located on the Maze site, and it made reference to "the extensive site at the former prison". No reference was made to the adjacent Ministry of Defence site at Long Kesh. Any use of part of the Maze site would have to take account of the whole area. The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has not made a decision on the matter because it is unable to do so. However, we have asked the reform and reinvestment initiative project board for its advice, and we think that the matter should be considered strategically.

Mr Speaker: Question 6, in the name of Mr McNamee, has been withdrawn. Questions 1 and 5 were fully withdrawn and will not receive written answers.

EPCU and Republic of Ireland's EU Policy

7. Mr McElduff asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to detail its European Policy Co-Ordination Unit's (EPCU) efforts to ensure that the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland are taken into account in the formulation of the Republic of Ireland's EU policy. (AQO 137/02)

The Deputy First Minister: In December 2001, the North/South Ministerial Council agreed that a working group should be set up to consider the arrangements to give effect to paragraph 17 of strand two of the agreement. Three meetings of the working group, which on the Northern Ireland side were led by the EPCU, have now taken place, and the North/South Ministerial Council has endorsed a progress report. That commits each sector to consider at its next ministerial meeting whether any EU issues require attention, and an assessment will be given at the next plenary meeting.

Future deliberations of the working group will consider how the views of the Council can be reflected appropriately at relevant EU meetings. Provision is also made in the common chapter for joint initiatives, and responsibility for promoting and monitoring that work falls to the Special EU Programmes Body, which will produce a progress report next year.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. Does the Deputy First Minister agree that it would be in the best interests of the people of the Six Counties of Ireland were treated as a single economic unit of a wider European Union? Can he confirm or deny whether the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has met, or intends to meet, Mr Dick Roche TD, Minister of State for European Affairs.

The Deputy First Minister: The North/South Ministerial Council has been examining EU issues in its plenary sessions. In addition, the different sectoral bodies will consider any EU issues that arise. Those matters will be the subject of a further report to the North/South Ministerial Council. Further meetings, involving a variety of Ministers, possibly the First Minister and me, may arise from that. I hope that Mr McElduff appreciates that I am reluctant to get involved in meetings outside the North/South Ministerial Council in circumstances in which a threat or question mark may be placed on the Council format.

We best serve the entire community's interests by maintaining the type of democratic arrangements that we have here, by pursuing our opportunities for North/South and east-west co-operation on a whole range of policy matters and by addressing those EU policy issues that concern us on that sort of co-operative basis. We hope to continue to work in that way and to work for positive development in the EU itself, which the Member may not favour so strongly.

Mr Byrne: Further to the Deputy First Minister's answer, does he agree that all parties in the Executive committed themselves to implementing all parts of the agreement, including the North/South Ministerial Council, which is a vital part of the agreement? Does the Deputy First Minister agree that it would be illegal not to nominate? Can he confirm how he plans to handle the nomination of Ministers to future meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council?

The Deputy First Minister: In the 'Declaration of Support' all the parties involved committed themselves to the full operation of all the arrangements under the agreement. Those arrangements include the North/South Ministerial Council. There are other institutional arrangements — the Assembly, the Executive and the British-Irish Council. There are also other arrangements established under the agreement, such as the Policing Board. I recognise that the agreement committed me, and my party, to all those arrangements. As Deputy First Minister, I continue to discharge those commitments in full.

A schedule of meetings for the North/South Ministerial Council exists. I will play my part in providing nominations for those North/South Ministerial Council meetings. Should there not be nominations for those meetings, we know that that has been a matter of legal consideration previously, and we are also aware of the judgement in that case.

Community Relations Discussions with NIO

10. Mr Beggs asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to detail any recent discussions with the Northern Ireland Office on the subject of community relations. (AQO 147/02)

The First Minister: At a meeting on 13 August involving Minister Haughey, Minister Leslie and Des Browne, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Northern Ireland Office, Mr Browne outlined progress on his initiative on interface violence. That has involved a series of meetings with political parties and other key interests. Subsequently, on 12 September, Mr Browne issued a press release summarising progress on those meetings.

Mr Beggs: Does the First Minister agree that the actions of paramilitaries, both Loyalist and Republican, are fomenting community conflicts and have undermined efforts to improve community relations in both interface areas and the wider community? Has he highlighted to the Northern Ireland Office the adverse effects that paramilitary actions have had on community relations and on public confidence in the democratic process?

The First Minister: There appears to be significant evidence to indicate that community division, particularly in interface areas, is now greater than it has been at any point in the last quarter of a century. The deterioration of the position, which is contrary to what one would have expected subsequent to the agreement, is wholly attributable to the actions of Loyalist and Republican paramilitaries at those interfaces. There is no doubt that the conflict that we have seen at interfaces during the summer has had a dramatic impact on community confidence; that is true to such an extent that as a result of the behaviour of paramilitaries, the future is not good, and these institutions are at risk.

I am sure that the Member listened with me in disgust to Mitchel McLaughlin this morning crying crocodile tears over the threat to the institutions when it is his colleagues and their nocturnal activities who pose the greatest threat.

Mr S Wilson: And you who sit in government with them.

The First Minister: You too.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Review of Public Administration

11. Dr McDonnell asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline what progress has been made on the review of public administration. (AQO 146/02)

The Deputy First Minister: Since the launch of the review of public administration on 24 June, the review team has made significant progress. An initial pre-consultation process with a range of stakeholders began in late August and will conclude on 11 October 2002. That involves more than 60 meetings with representatives of local government, public bodies, health bodies, education bodies, the Civic Forum, organisations that look after the interests of public sector staff, the community and voluntary sector, rural interests, political parties and the business sector, et cetera. It is a listening exercise that will help to inform the development of a formal consultation document that will be published later this year.

The team has initiated a major programme of research. During the summer it commissioned several briefing papers on topics such as accountability, public sector reform and subsidiarity. Those papers will be made available to the public on the review team's web site by the end of the month.

Other elements of the research programme include a major exercise to map the public sector, attitudinal work and focus groups.

Dr McDonnell: The Deputy First Minister has outlined some aspects of the pre-consultation process. However, when does he plan to implement the more public aspects of the consultation, as it is important that we get to that point as soon as possible? Many people who are not members of the bodies to which the Deputy First Minister referred may want to have an input.

The Deputy First Minister: As I have said, the team is already meeting with a range of stakeholders. It is conscious of the need for meaningful engagement with the end-users of public services and, along with a panel of experts, is actively considering the best way to carry that out at each stage of the review. At this early stage, the team is gathering initial public views through the Northern Ireland Omnibus Survey and through the establishment of a focus group project. The formal consultation will then be drafted on the basis of those initial soundings, and that should proceed on the timetable that was outlined when the review was launched in June.

Mr Speaker: I have no further requests for supplementary questions to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. However, as we are a little before the time assigned for questions to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure I suggest that the House takes its leisure — culture and arts to the side — until 3.00 pm.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr J Wilson] in the Chair)

3.00 pm

CULTURE, ARTS AND LEISURE

Football Strategy

1. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline (a) the status of his football strategy and (b) when he hopes to see the strategy fully implemented. (AQO 162/02)

The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr McGimpsey): In my statement to the Assembly on 25 June 2002, I called for a commitment from the Irish Football Association (IFA) to sign up to a package of measures consistent with the recommendations contained in the advisory panel's report, published in October 2001. Since then the IFA, with support from the Sports Council for Northern Ireland and in consultation with others, has been working on the preparation of a long-term development plan for the game. I understand that the plan was discussed by the IFA council on Monday 16 September 2002. I have not yet seen a copy of the development plan but look forward to seeing one in the very near future. Subject to the time frame contained in the IFA's development plan, I anticipate that implementation will take place over the next five to 10 years.

Dr McDonnell: I know that we cannot second-guess or pre-empt the plan, but, if the Minister hopes to see it implemented over a five- to 10-year period, could he give us some flavour of what general progress and advances he would hope to make?

Mr McGimpsey: The progress which we hope to make is the development and advancement of the game. A key thing that the development plan must have is the backing of the wider football community. There must be opportunities and benefits for all levels of football. It is not simply about the international team or senior football but the sport at all levels right down to the grass roots, including boys' and women's soccer and disability sports. It is essential that it be based on fundamental principles of fairness, inclusiveness, accountability, leadership and transparency. That is the goal and the vision that we seek. The advisory panel published 150 recommendations. When I finally get the IFA's plan, I shall carefully examine it to see the correlation with our own strategy; I hope that there will be a very close match. If there is not a close match, I shall have to consider the next step.

Mr Shannon: The Minister has confirmed that there has been a delay on the part of the IFA in responding to the football strategy. Given that delay, does he feel that the football strategy can still be delivered in the reduced timescale and within the lifetime of this Assembly?

Mr McGimpsey: The strategic plan outlined by the panel looks far into the future for implementation. Time is getting short for an IFA decision to support the strategy, and the Member is quite right to point to the fact that the lifetime of this Assembly is drawing to a close. I asked the IFA to give me a response by September. I understand from press reports that it now has a development plan, but it has not yet given it to me. I have not seen it; the Department has not seen it. I should have thought that I might have received it by now. I look forward to getting it, at which time I shall carefully scrutinise it. I shall probably also return to the original panel to seek its advice.

One of the key things that I shall be seeking is support from the wider football family. Only if the entire football family in Northern Ireland is prepared to back the strategy can we make it work.

Mr Foster: In commending the Minister for the initiative and drive he has shown in his football strategy, which contains a great many good and meaningful measures, I trust that the small junior football clubs will not be forgotten in any way, enabling them to survive and so provide encouragement and decent facilities for junior footballers. Such clubs are the heartbeat of soccer throughout Northern Ireland; their survival is vital for football in general to succeed.

Mr McGimpsey: I endorse what Mr Foster has said about junior soccer. As I said in my answer to Dr McDonnell, I see the strategy including the entire football family, with a strong concentration on youth, and on the junior and grass-roots levels as well as the senior game. A sum of £1.6 million has already been made available for youth development, which will provide opportunities for the development of centres of excellence. Nineteen centres have already been announced; there are four more to come, making a total of 23. That shows our desire to concentrate on the grass roots and develop the game not from the top down but from the ground up.

Public Library, Lisburn

2. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to provide an update on progress towards providing a new public library in Lisburn. (AQO 160/02)

Mr McGimpsey: Before I answer the question, I shall take the opportunity to congratulate Lisburn and Newry on being awarded city status in the Queen's Golden Jubilee year.

When I updated the House in March, I said that the South Eastern Education and Library Board was exploring the provision of a new library for Lisburn under the private finance initiative (PFI) and that the project board had initiated the PFI procurement process. That process is continuing and is at the evaluation stage. I am pleased to say that the project is within the indicative time frame.

Mr Poots: Although I am pleased to hear that progress is being made on the Lisburn library, we have been waiting for some 25 years for a library in the area that suits the city of Lisburn. Can the Minister give us more concrete information about when a decision will be made to offer the contract to the company involved? When will work start on the new library?

Mr McGimpsey: The process was initiated by another Administration. It has been a long process, and there have been difficulties about the Linen Hall site. However, the Department funded the purchase of the site, and a project board has been set up. The Department approved the outline business case in February 2001, and a PFI procurement process was initiated. That process is currently at stage 10 of the 14 stages of the process. I did not design the PFI process. It was appropriate that we continued with it as it had been started before we took office. The process appears to be nearing conclusion, and, all things being equal, the project will start in the spring of 2003. In anticipation of that, the Department has agreed to provide additional funding for the library's running costs.

Mr B Bell: At long last it seems that building work on a new library in Lisburn will start next year. However, the city of Lisburn covers a wide area, and there is also the issue of the public libraries in Moira and Dunmurry. At what stage are the plans for those two libraries?

Mr McGimpsey: There are several libraries in the Lagan Valley constituency, and Billy Bell has highlighted two that are in poor condition in Moira and Dunmurry. The South Eastern Education and Library Board, which is responsible for the provision of libraries, with the support of the Department, is progressing economic appraisals on both those libraries, which will take place in 2003 and 2004 for Dunmurry and Moira respectively. Those are the next two steps that the board is taking with regard to the provision of capital. We recognise that the libraries in Moira and Dunmurry are in poor condition and that they require capital investment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I do not see Mr Gibson in his place to put question 3.

Football Stadium Projects

4. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to give his assessment of the proposed new-build football stadium projects announced at various venues in the Province. (AQO 164/02)

Mr McGimpsey: I have been aware for some time of the problems facing soccer and the need to upgrade many sports stadia, especially soccer stadia, in Northern Ireland to modern standards. I have already taken steps to address some of the problems through the interim safe sports grounds scheme, but this proposal prioritises safety issues. Against that background, I welcome the news that some local football clubs are beginning to negotiate partnerships with local authorities and the private sector, not only to develop more modern stadia but to make them more commercially viable.

Mr Hilditch: Does the Minister agree that, to date, the refurbishment of sports grounds has only been a sticking-plaster job and has not been successful, even though it has dealt with health and safety? With new interest, especially from the private sector, does the Minister agree that there is a need to review the funding provided through the safe sports grounds scheme?

Mr McGimpsey: I do not agree that the refurbishment programme is a “sticking-plaster job”. The Executive have devoted £6 million to sports grounds in the past two and a half years. That indicates the support that major sports grounds receive — and, I hope, will continue to receive — from the Executive. That money has been spread across several sports such as soccer, Gaelic football and rugby.

It is important that those involved in football look beyond receiving a Government handout and a Government cheque. That is why I welcome the moves that some soccer clubs are making to find private support and sponsorship, and local authority support. Ballymena United is a prime example of partnership between a football club and its local authority. Bangor FC is looking at a possible partnership with North Down Borough Council to obtain land for a football stadium, and Ards Borough Council has given a portion of land to allow Ards FC to build a new Castle-reagh Park. Those are the types of steps that must be taken.

The problem will not be solved by Members coming to the Chamber and asking for money. Resources are scarce, and money should come from a cocktail of resources. It is pleasing that football is beginning to move forward; it gives a sense of anticipation for better and more family-friendly stadia, which is what everyone wants. Therefore, considering what has been invested, it is unfair to describe the refurbishment programme as a “sticking-plaster job”.

Mrs Nelis: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In the light of the recent sectarian death threats against Neil Lennon and the sectarianism associated with some football grounds, does the Minister agree that any planned projects should proceed only if there is a guaranteed anti-sectarian strategy in place.

Mr McGimpsey: Anti-sectarianism policies are a key part of the grants and revenue scheme that was announced under the safe sports ground scheme. Within that scheme, funding will be available under three programmes: safety management; urgent (first-aid) works; and major works. Soccer, Gaelic football and rugby clubs availing of that support are required to have anti-sectarian policies in place.

Sectarianism is one of the evils — if not the evil — of our society. It has been, and continues to be, the engine for so much misery for our people. Therefore, society, the Assembly and the Executive have much to do. It is wrong to characterise sectarianism and say that it is football’s problem. It is not only football’s problem; it is Northern Ireland’s problem. Problems that appear in football are a reflection of society. They appear in other areas, and the Assembly seeks to address those problems.

Football is a key sport that could heal the problem because it is an interface sport that both communities play and through which both communities meet. However, when they meet, there are occasionally disgraceful and appalling scenes. What happened twice to Neil Lennon was disgraceful, and everyone condemned it without question. However, by and large, that sort of thing is rare. Football is a way of bringing society together, and that is one of the reasons why the Executive and the Assembly are seeking to invest in it and in other sports.

3.15 pm

Mr Armstrong: Does the Minister agree that Northern Ireland could have benefited from the joint Ireland/Scotland bid to host the European Championships in 2008, if it were not for the poor standard of the local stadia? Does he further agree that a national stadium is desirable and necessary soon?

Mr McGimpsey: I was quoted in ‘The Observer’ yesterday regarding the bid to host the European Championships in 2008, but I did not make a statement to that paper, and the quotes ascribed to me are not entirely accurate. Northern Ireland was not in a position to join that bid because it does not have an international stadium with 30,000 seats. Therefore, if we want to get involved in that tournament, our next opportunity is 2012. However, Northern Ireland cannot do it alone; there would have to be some form of partnership. Scotland was going to make its own bid, but then it decided to seek partners, and it joined up with the Irish Republic. It seems, however, there are difficulties in the South in respect of the delivery of large stadia, so their bid is in question.

The next opportunity for Northern Ireland will be in 2012, but it costs a great deal of money to host that type of tournament, and Northern Ireland would have to find its share of it. If we had that sort of sum to invest in sport, would we want to invest it all in a tournament that lasts a couple of weeks in 2012? We will not even be at first base until we have a stadium of international standards with 30,000 seats. I agree that that is essential.

Football (Offences) Act

5. Mr Neeson asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline discussions he has had about extending the Football (Offences) Act 1991 to Northern Ireland.

Mr McGimpsey: My departmental officials and I have had discussions with the Sports Council for Northern Ireland, the Irish Football Association and the Police Service about the practicalities of extending the Football (Offences) Act 1991 and related legislation to Northern Ireland. The discussions have included consideration of the type of legislation that might be appropriate for Northern Ireland to control spectator behaviour in football grounds, which is the main purpose of the GB Act. Those discussions have also taken place in the context of wider deliberations on the soccer strategy process.

Mr Neeson: Once again, the Neil Lennon saga shows the scourge of sectarianism in football in Northern Ireland; unfortunately, it made headlines across the world. The Football (Offences) Act 1991 largely deals with race, but it could be adjusted because it has been shown to be effective in other parts of Great Britain and Scotland.

In reply to a previous question, the Minister recognised that many Irish League football clubs want to improve their grounds and build new stadia. In the Department's efforts to encourage clubs to develop football as a family sport, will the Minister agree that there is an urgent need to deal with all aspects of hatred and sectarianism, not only in football but in all sports?

Mr McGimpsey: As I said in a previous answer and on previous occasions, I was appalled by the Neil Lennon affair. It was disgraceful. I condemned it then, and I condemn it now.

Sectarianism is not simply a problem in football, nor can football on its own solve sectarian problems. Sectarianism is not confined to football. Every activity in Northern Ireland can be marred by sectarian behaviour. Anti-sectarian measures must cover all sports.

The Football (Offences) Act 1991 (c.19) contains regulations against hooliganism and racism. Three of the offences listed are: throwing an object at or towards the pitch or spectators, taking part in indecent or racist chanting and going onto the pitch without lawful authority. The Act was subsequently amended to allow banning orders to ban certain spectators from domestic and international matches, and racist or indecent chanting was specified for acts abroad.

It could be argued that the Act is one person's solution to another person's problem. Northern Ireland has public order legislation matching that of Great Britain but which also outlaws sectarian behaviour. Therefore there are weapons on the statute book to deal with sectarianism.

In addition, my Department has had discussions about football with the Sports Council for Northern Ireland and with the Irish Football Association (IFA). However, there are problems across the board; therefore any solution must cover sport in general.

The Department is considering legislation that would incorporate the experiences of the mainland as far as the Public Order Act is concerned. It will examine how to tackle sectarianism at all sporting venues in Northern Ireland — not just at football matches. Widespread consultation has begun, and we will try to create suitable legislation. I must stress that legislation alone will not solve the problem and that legislation dealing with sectarianism in football only will be inadequate. Although the events surrounding Neil Lennon hit the headlines, sectarianism occurs at other events and venues, and the solution must go right across the board.

Mr B Hutchinson: Does the Minister agree that the football authorities in Northern Ireland have done an excellent job in resolving some of the problems in football? Who will pay for enforcing the new measures if we introduce legislation similar to the Football (Offences) Act 1991? Will it be the clubs? My understanding is that, under the new policing arrangements, the police could not afford to pay for it.

Is the Minister happy with the arrangements between the IFA and the police? Will the police stay outside the grounds and let the clubs' stewards monitor activity inside?

Mr McGimpsey: First, order in the grounds is primarily a matter for those who organise the games, and the police will be called in only as a last resort. Secondly, the Department is some way from deciding the funding to implement any legislation, but it will be examined in the consultation.

I have said several times that steps have been taken to address the issues. It is wrong to think that nothing has been done. Northern Ireland's public order legislation goes further than that of Great Britain by outlawing religious hatred. It is an offence to arouse fear on the basis of religious belief and nationality. My Department is involved with the IFA's football for all strategy, which includes a code of conduct for spectators, professionals, stewards, closed-circuit television provision and the appointment of an IFA community relations officer.

The IFA and the Sports Council take that seriously. I commend the work of both organisations, and the IFA have done an excellent job so far. I also commend the police, and how they regularly manage large crowds.

However, there is an argument that they may need further provision through legislation, and we will look at that. We will discuss the expense through consultation, look at revenue consequences as part of that process and satisfy those in due course.

Mr S Wilson: Will the Minister elaborate on the likely cost of such legislation to clubs in Northern Ireland, after his discussions with the police? Will he confirm that it will not only be football clubs, but GAA clubs and others that would be covered by such legislation?

Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Alliance Party are usually vociferous about sectarian behaviour at football matches. Will the Minister comment on their silence about the sectarian violence perpetrated by those celebrating Armagh's win in the all-Ireland final, or whatever it is called? Will he condemn the attacks launched on Protestant churches, Orange halls, police stations and individuals who were perceived as Protestants, by GAA supporters over the weekend?

Mr McGimpsey: I confirm that the legislation will embrace all sports venues — not just football. As I mentioned in previous answers, it is not a football-only problem; it goes across all sport and all of Northern Ireland society. As I said in my answer to Mr Hutchinson, with regard to cost, we are in the early stages, and we will work out the revenue consequences through that consultation process.

The Armagh team is to be congratulated on its achievement, which is considerable, as is the junior team of Derry. It has been 54 years since two Northern Ireland teams won both titles. It is sad for Gaelic athletics that the success was besmirched by the activities of a minority of fans who behaved disgracefully in Lurgan. I have spoken to officials in Gaelic athletics, and they have no time for that. That type of fan does Gaelic no good, and Gaelic — as with all sports in Northern Ireland — neither needs nor wants them. I also condemn all attacks on Orange halls, police stations and Protestant churches.

All-Ireland Arts Promotion

6. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to detail the nature and extent of all-Ireland co-operation and partnership in promoting the arts.

(AQO 143/02)

Mr McGimpsey: The Arts Council of Northern Ireland and its counterpart in the Republic jointly fund many projects, organisations and individuals. Those include opera, drama companies, poetry publishers, music schemes, art magazines, writers' centres, storytelling, literature, festivals, individual artists and research programmes.

Mr McElduff: I thank the Minister for his assurances of all-Ireland partnership in promoting the arts. However, I digress to his responsibility for sport. Does the Minister have any plans to formally recognise the achievement of the Armagh team?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, you can reply extremely briefly, or give the Member a written reply in due course.

Mr McGimpsey: The arts in Northern Ireland are organised by the Arts Council, and the arts in the Irish Republic are recognised by their respective counterpart.

Those bodies meet twice a year to discuss issues. It is important that Mr McElduff does not attempt to politicise the arts. The arts are specifically excluded from all-Ireland bodies.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up.

AGRICULTURE AND RURAL DEVELOPMENT

Food Body

1. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to update the Assembly on the suggestion that a food body should be established in Northern Ireland; and to make a statement.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Rodgers): If it is in order, I wish to place on record that I have publicly condemned the actions in Lurgan last night. I want to put the record straight. It was a very small minority of fans, with whom the rest of the GAA supporters are disgusted.

The vision group recommended the establishment of a food body, as there was broad support for it in principle during consultation on the vision report. In March 2002, I established a working group to review the case for a food body, to advise on the possible structure, responsibilities and remit of such a body, and to make recommendations on funding, including the balance between industry and Government funding and the extent to which a body might subsume the activities of existing organisations. Janet Trewsdale, acting chairman of the Northern Ireland Economic Council, chairs the working group, which includes representatives of the main stakeholders. The working group is close to completing its work, and I expect to receive the report shortly.

Dr McDonnell: The Minister said that there would be questions about the food body's structure, responsibility and remit. Can she provide more information on the food body's exact remit and how it might function?

Ms Rodgers: I cannot confirm the remit of any food body until I have considered the working group report, which I expect to receive within a week. I notice that the clock has stopped for some reason. Is that an omen?

Dr McDonnell: There will still only be an hour and a half to answer questions.

Ms Rodgers: The vision group report identified food marketing and supply chain issues as the main work areas for a food body, but I cannot give any further confirmation until I have received the report.

Mr Shannon: The Minister mentioned the priorities of the vision group's proposals. How wide-ranging will the consultation with different bodies on those priorities be? Will it be contained in the action plan that is scheduled for November 2002?

Ms Rodgers: Does the Member mean the consultation on the food body?

Mr Shannon: Yes.

Ms Rodgers: There will be extensive consultation with all stakeholders and interested parties on the proposals about the food body. Consultation on the vision document is complete. I shall give my views when I receive the report on the food body. I shall then consult the Committee and other interested parties.

Mr Savage: Would it not be more relevant to farmers if the Minister established a fair price commission to ascertain exactly where profits in the agrifood industry are going? In the light of its findings, a commission could create a fair price tag for goods with farmers and producers being paid a fair price.

Ms Rodgers: A fair price commission is a reserved matter and not one for the devolved institution, so that is not for me to consider. As the Member said, there are great difficulties, concerns and mistrust in the agrifood industry. Farmers feel that they are not getting a fair price for their produce.

That can be resolved through greater co-operation in the chain. The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, of which Mr Savage is the Deputy Chairperson, and the Competition Commission, investigated the matter and found no evidence of price-fixing or unfair practice. I would be concerned if evidence were uncovered. However, competition matters are reserved.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Would the Minister see merit in an all-Ireland food body?

Ms Rodgers: A working group has been set up to examine the viability of a food body and to consider how it should be financed and what its remit should be. It would be inappropriate of me to comment on the matter while the working group is still considering it. When I have seen the report, I will give my views on it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question No. 6, in the name of Mrs Annie Courtney, has been withdrawn and will not require a written answer. Question No. 10, in the name of Mr Fee, and Question No. 20, in the name of Mr Eddie Mr Grady, have also been withdrawn but require written answers.

Agricultural Colleges

2. Mr Hamilton asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development whether she intends to prevent the absorption of the Province's dedicated agricultural colleges into the further and higher education sector, as proposed in the O'Hare Report. (AQO 131/02)

Ms Rodgers: The O'Hare Report's recommendations are the result of a review by an independent panel of the existing arrangement for agrifoods, research and development and education. Among the panel's wide-ranging recommendations is the transfer of the teaching function of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's colleges to the further education sector. I have not yet decided on my response to the report's recommendations. I received the report at the end of April and immediately put it out for public consultation. The consultation period ended on 31 August, and I received more than 180 responses, which I am studying. However, in July, I told the Rural Stakeholders' Forum that a strong case would have to be presented before I would consider integrating the Department's colleges with the further education institutes.

Mr Hamilton: Does the Minister agree that the absorption of the agriculture colleges into further and higher education colleges could jeopardise agriculture education in much of the Province, since further education colleges tend to decide on the viability of courses strictly according to their budgetary requirements?

Ms Rodgers: I am aware of the importance of agriculture colleges to the industry, and their interaction with it, so a strong case would have to be presented to me before I would consider integrating them with further education institutes.

On-Site Testing System

3. Mr Bradley asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what assessment she has made of the rapid on-site testing system used by the agriculture research service of the United States Department of Agriculture when dealing with suspected disease outbreaks in the national herd. (AQO 126/02)

Ms Rodgers: My officials have been in contact with the research service of the US Department of Agriculture to discuss its work on the development of a rapid on-site testing system, which can be transported to the site of a suspected disease outbreak by truck or by helicopter. It combines the speed of the latest disease diagnosis techniques of molecular biology with advanced mobile communication technology. In the event of an outbreak, rapid diagnosis can be carried out on the farm, and the results are immediately transmitted back to the control centre. The system is particularly suited to the diagnosis of major outbreaks of exotic diseases where speedy action is essential. I expect that such advance and the methods available to deal with major outbreaks of disease will deliver benefits in the next few years, should we need them.

Mr Bradley: I thank the Minister for her research into the apparatus used in America. I learned that the time between the test and the result is 90 minutes. Here, the same result took three days. Will the Minister tell us why that system was not deployed here during the 2001 outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease?

Ms Rodgers: It would have not been appropriate to use this system last year because international authorities for the diagnosis of foot-and-mouth disease approved neither the system nor the technology on which it is based. The Office International des Epizooties (OIE) foot-and-mouth disease reference laboratory at the Institute of Animal Health, Pirbright has tested the performance of the diagnostic element of the system. Its reports contain reservations about the system and its use as a portable facility, although it remains positive about the potential of this type of rapid diagnostic technique. One of the problems with portable systems is the real danger of cross-contamination during such an exercise.

Wet Weather Payments

4. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what progress has been made in achieving wet weather payments for farmers.

Wet Summer Conditions

7. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to detail any special measures and actions taken by her Department to assist farmers following the wet summer weather conditions; and to make a statement.

Deteriorating Climatic Conditions

11. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, in the light of the deteriorating climatic conditions in Ireland, what assessment she has made on the impact this has had on agricultural production and what actions she proposes to address this impact

Impact of Bad Weather

19. Mr Coyle asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, in the light of the impact the bad weather is having on production this year, if she will be preparing a dossier for submission to the European Union.

Ms Rodgers: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I shall answer Questions 4, 7, 11 and 19 together. I am acutely aware of the difficulties experienced by farmers as a consequence of the very wet weather over much of the growing season. I have monitored the situation very carefully. Over the summer, my advisers were active, providing technical advice and assistance to producers. Furthermore, an extensive advisory programme is planned for the coming months, starting later this week with open days at the Agricultural Research Institute at Hillsborough.

As well as that practical assistance, I have worked hard to secure a relaxation of European Union grazing rules on set-aside land and achieved a satisfactory outcome last month, together with an increase in cattle subsidy advance payments. The possibility of wet weather payments remains open; however, to release the necessary funds, any such scheme must first secure European Union state aid approval and the agreement of the Executive. In both cases, concrete evidence will be required to support the argument for financial assistance, and such evidence cannot be gathered until the end of the growing season. My officials have made arrangements to meet the European Union Commission to explore the options in the light of the evidence, and I have written to the Executive to brief them on the situation.

Mr Poots: The growing season is coming to an end, the cereal harvest is almost finished, and most farmers say that their cereal crops have been significantly reduced. The potato harvest is about to commence with low expectations from potato farmers. Will the Minister assure the House that as soon as the crops have been harvested, her Department will seek financial assistance for the farming community? Many farmers have suffered greatly over the past few years as a result of foot-and-mouth disease and BSE, and the weather this year has been a terrible blow to the farming community.

Ms Rodgers: I assure Mr Poots, as I did in my first response, that my officials and I have been monitoring the situation. If there is a case to be made to the European Commission we will begin to build it as soon as the growing season ends. However, we shall not seek financial assistance from Europe. In the first place, we will seek state aid approval from Europe; if that is granted, I must find the resources in our own block budget and get the Executive's approval. I have already spoken on this matter to the Minister of Finance and Personnel and to the Executive, and they are aware of the farmers' plight.

There was very wet weather during the 1999 season in the Orkney Islands, yet by the time the case had been made, the EU state aid approved and resources allocated, it was the following June before payments were made to farmers. Farmers should not expect financial assistance before the end of the year. It will take some time for the money to become available.

In the meantime, through measures such as the winter management workshops, the Department is doing everything possible to help farmers cope. I recently visited a farm. I am, therefore, aware of the damage that has been done to the ground by poaching and of the loss and additional costs that farmers will incur if their feed bills increase.

3.45 pm

Mr McElduff: Does the British Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, Margaret Beckett, understand the unique circumstances and difficulties faced by farmers in the Six Counties after the wettest growing season in years, while England enjoyed considerably better weather conditions? Does she understand the massive water shortages and high meal costs in the summer months and the lack of extra fodder available to farmers in other parts of Ireland?

Ms Rodgers: Funding for wet weather payments is the responsibility of the EU Commission. In June 2002, I alerted Mrs Beckett to the situation in Northern Ireland, and I wrote to her in July to update her. If, therefore, we have a case, Mrs Beckett, as the UK Minister to the EU Commission, will make it for us.

Mr K Robinson: Does the Minister agree that the changes to the weather and seasonal patterns seem to be becoming the norm, rather than the exception? In the light of that, does she agree that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development's planning and the pattern of grants on offer may have to change? Will she consider the impact of the changing conditions on the vulnerable rural and urban areas along the east Antrim coastline in the boroughs of Newtownabbey, Carrickfergus and Larne?

Ms Rodgers: I cannot comment on climate change; it is somewhat beyond my remit. The impact of the changing conditions is, however, a growing problem, but, given that the grants and subsidies come from Europe, it is not in my competence to change the payment system.

Mr K Robinson: Will the Minister comment on east Antrim?

Ms Rodgers: Some issues, such as flooding, are in my remit through the Department's Rivers Agency. However, many other issues fall in the remits of the Department of the Environment and the Water Service. A mechanism has been initiated whereby, with the Department of the Environment, the Rivers Agency and other relevant agencies, the Department provides a rapid response team that ensures that, if people have a problem with flooding, they can contact the correct agency and will not be passed from pillar to post. The Department of the Environment is responsible for planning, building and developing flood plains.

Mr Coyle: I recognise that the Minister and her Department have done much in the past to help the agriculture industry cope with the BSE and foot-and-mouth disease crises. The bad weather is compounding the difficulties faced by the farmers who are recovering from those problems. Does the Minister agree that the farming community requires much more help? What questions is the Commission likely to ask regarding the state aid application?

Ms Rodgers: The Commission will wish to verify that the level of loss incurred exceeds 30% in the lowland areas and 20% in the less-favoured areas, which are the minimum thresholds specified in the state aid guidelines. The Commission will also want to be satisfied that any proposed aid is accurately targeted at those losses and that there is no risk of overcompensation or market distortion.

Rev Robert Coulter: The Minister has acknowledged the damage caused by the prolonged period of wet weather, particularly to dairy farmers' land. Will she agree to the introduction of a reseeded scheme to improve the quality of grazing land for next year?

Ms Rodgers: The allocation of any grant, including a reseeded grant, depends on EU state aid approval. I have seen the fields, and I am aware of the problem, but we must go through that mechanism.

Tagging Scheme

5. Mr M Murphy asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to detail any discussions she has had with ministerial colleagues in Britain or the Republic of Ireland about the possible introduction of a Northern Ireland tagging scheme. (AQO 175/02)

Ms Rodgers: The European Union determines the legislative requirements for tagging cattle and sheep. The cattle-tagging provisions have been in place for many years, and the tags must include letters that identify the member state of origin. European Union proposals on sheep identification are to be brought forward shortly. Pigs are not required to be tagged, although they must have an identifying mark or tattoo before leaving their premises of birth.

My officials have raised with the European Commission the possibility of having letters that identify the region of origin included in the cattle-tagging arrangements. Hitherto, the Commission has not accepted that. I will continue to seek that provision for cattle, and for sheep if necessary, and to seek support from ministerial colleagues in Britain and the Republic of Ireland as appropriate.

Mr M Murphy: Why has the Minister not made a stronger case for tagging beef from Northern Ireland? That case should be pushed more strongly than it has been. Beef from Northern Ireland is tagged as British, and it should be tagged as having come from Northern Ireland. That would be of great benefit to the farming community. Why is the Minister not pushing for that in Europe?

Ms Rodgers: I am a little confused, because beef is not tagged — cattle are. Is the Member referring to cattle tagging?

Mr M Murphy: Yes.

Ms Rodgers: I shall, with the support of my ministerial colleagues in Britain and the Republic, seek to secure the European Commission's agreement to have letters that identify the region of origin included in the ear tag. Indeed, I have already raised that. However, the introduction of a single ear tag for Northern Ireland is unlikely, as EU rules require the inclusion of letters in a tag to identify the member state of origin, which in our case is the UK. That is the rule in the European Commission; it allows only the member state to identify cattle. Marketing issues can be dealt with through the method of beef labelling that is eventually chosen, though we must abide by certain rules in that respect also. That is the current position. I have raised the issue, but I am reluctant to say that I have the power to change the European Commission's rules as easily as all that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 7 was grouped, and we should move to Question 8. However, Mr Gibson is not in his place.

Cattle Imported from the Republic of Ireland

9. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to make a statement about the regulations that allow the import of weaning cattle from the Republic of Ireland, cattle subsequently labelled as "Quality British Beef", and the timescales involved in this practice. (AQO 168/02)

Date-Based Export Scheme

12. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to make a statement on the European Commission's decision to relax the date-based export scheme rules for Northern Ireland. (AQO 156/02)

Ms Rodgers: Beef cattle that are born in the Republic of Ireland cannot be labelled as "Quality British Beef". Under EC beef-labelling rules, only beef derived from animals that are born, reared and slaughtered in the UK may be labelled as British.

Mr Armstrong: Does the Minister have any plans to introduce a marketing label device, which will admit weaned cattle imported from the Irish Republic? It was tradition, prior to the establishment of this Assembly, for farmers to buy store cattle from the Irish Republic for fattening. Those cattle came up as weanlings at around six months of age. Would it be possible for such cattle to be labelled for marketing purposes as British beef?

Ms Rodgers: That is a marketing and a commercial issue, and not one for the Minister to address. I am aware of the problem, and I discussed it with the industry. Beef labelling must state where the animal was sourced, slaughtered, and so on. It is a commercial issue as to whether such beef is regarded as British or Irish beef.

Mrs E Bell: Following the French relaxation of the ban on beef from Great Britain and Northern Ireland, will the Minister make representations to the French Minister of Agriculture, Food, Fisheries and Rural Affairs to see if we can get orders in France?

Ms Rodgers: The Member asked if I would be making representations to whom?

Mrs E Bell: Will the Minister make representations to the French Minister of Agriculture, Food, Fisheries and Rural Affairs or the relevant Department?

Ms Rodgers: I hope that the French market will now be available. We expect, on foot of the decision taken by the French food standards agency, Agence Française de Sécurité Sanitaire des Aliments (AFSSA), that the French Government will move very quickly to remove the ban. The indications are that that will be the case. I expect that we will then be in a position to export beef to France under the new date-based export scheme (DBES) rules. I will do all in my power as Minister to encourage support for Northern Irish beef in the French market — within the rules of competition, of course. My officials have been in discussion with some of the meat factories, which are anxious to begin exporting, especially to France, as there is a market for our beef there. That is good news for the farmers.

Mr Byrne: Bearing in mind the Minister's answer to question 9, and noting my own question 12, what percentage of cattle, slaughtered for human consumption, is eligible for the date-based export system, and what steps are the Department taking to improve the percentage of eligible animals?

Finally, does the Minister expect to see an increase in beef and sheep-meat prices to farmers, given that export processors should now enjoy a wider range of markets?

Ms Rodgers: I will take the last part of the Member's question first — yes, I hope to see an increase in prices for the farmers because of wider markets.

In relation to the number of cattle eligible for the date-based export scheme, about 50% or 60% of cattle in a typical month are export eligible under the scheme. Many more cattle would be eligible if notification of animal births and movements were made on time by herd keepers. I am committed to ensuring that the EU rules of cattle identification and traceability are fully implemented. To that effect, I am phasing in additional control measures, including individual animal and herd restrictions for cattle identification and movement irregularities, as required by EU Regulations. Better compliance with animal identification and movement rules should, in turn, increase the date-based export scheme eligibility in the future.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr John Kelly, Mr Hilditch, and Mr Conor Murphy are not in their places, so we will move to question 16.

4.00 pm

Delays — Vision Report Action Plan

16. Mr Kane asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to make a statement on the series of delays which have occurred in the delivery of the vision report action plan. (AQO 166/02)

Ms Rodgers: I note that none of those Members are from Armagh, so there is no excuse for their being absent today.

I consulted widely on the vision group report, after its publication in October 2001. In March 2002, I announced 11 measures, addressing 30 of the vision group's recommendations, which could be implemented without additional resources. My original intention was to release the full vision group action plan at the end of June 2002. However, I decided to delay its publication until November 2002, so that account could be taken of the mid-term review of the common agricultural policy. I emphasise that the delay in announcing the vision group action plan will not cause any delay in the implementation of the recommendations. In addition to allowing me to make adjustments in response to the mid-term review, the delay will enable me to bring all my proposals together in one announcement, which, among other things, will deal with my response to the food body working group.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, your time is up.

ASSEMBLY COMMISSION

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mrs Eileen Bell will respond on behalf of the Assembly Commission. Mr Paisley Jnr is not in his place, so we will move to question 2.

Information Leaflet

2. Ms Morrice asked the Assembly Commission if it has any plans to publish a public information leaflet on the workings of the Assembly. (AQO 128/02)

Mrs E Bell (Commission Member): The Assembly Commission has agreed a wide-ranging information strategy that addresses not only the information needs of the Assembly but the needs of the public for information about the Assembly and its business. The strategy is in the public domain by way of the Assembly web site. The strategy recognises the need to produce and present information in ways that best meet the needs of different groups, such as schools, special interest groups, academics, Departments and the public in general.

In order to implement the information strategy, the Executive Information Office has recently recruited two education officers to develop an information and education programme about the Assembly and its work. As part of that programme, a series of public information leaflets dealing with various aspects of the Assembly's work will be produced. Proposals for the design and content of the first of those leaflets will be put to the Assembly Commission for approval in the next few weeks.

Ms Morrice: I am pleased to hear that, finally, something is being done. I hold in my hand the Scottish Parliament's information leaflets, which have been available to the public for many years. They contain everything from information on the devolved Parliament and guidance for witnesses giving evidence to Committees, to how to approach MSPs. It is an excellent educational information brochure. Given the value of the work being done by our colleagues across the water, I am disappointed that the Assembly Commission did not make it a priority to get information to the public sooner.

Why has it taken so long to produce an information strategy? Will leaflets of the same type and quality as the Scottish Parliament's be available at least before the end of the year? Will the Assembly Commission consider setting aside a budget for educational and/or information tools for younger primary schoolchildren who, after a tour of the Building, leave totally empty-handed? That is not the case in some local councils, where children who visit leave with pencils or rubbers. Will the Commission agree to set aside a budget for such a valuable educational tool for everyone, and especially for young people?

Mrs E Bell: On a personal level, I agree with everything that the Member has said. The Assembly Commission has been considering all aspects of information strategies for young people and the public in general. Education officers will consider some of the aspects relating to young people that you mentioned. We have decided to implement the simple strategy of giving children a pencil. Plans are in the melting pot at present, but we will inform the Assembly of our work as it progresses.

I agree that the Scottish pack is a good idea. I have given the Assembly Commission samples of it, because it hopes to produce a similar pack. Members' points will be noted in Hansard and taken on board as part of the discussion exercise.

Ms Morrice: Will that happen before Christmas?

Mrs E Bell: The Commission has discussed the matter, but I cannot give the Member a timetable.

Press Access

3. Ms McWilliams asked the Assembly Commission whether it has any plans to review press access arrangements to Parliament Buildings. (AQO 127/02)

Mrs E Bell: Before devolution, a press liaison group was established to discuss matters of mutual interest, including media access and facilities in Parliament Buildings. A press lobby system to facilitate access was proposed, but the press did not find that proposal appropriate.

Earlier this year, after a meeting between media representatives and the Assembly Commission, it was agreed that the Commission would consider proposals to enhance press access in the Buildings. It was agreed that media representatives would reconsider the proposal to establish a press lobby and then offer its views to the Commission. To date, that has not happened.

A key consideration of the Commission is the facilitation of Assembly business and the provision of a safe working environment for Members, staff and the visiting public. The Commission values the role of the press in promoting a better understanding of the Assembly and its Committees, and would welcome proposals for improving press access.

Ms McWilliams: I was disappointed at the press fallout after the Queen's visit and other occasions. The Assembly has managed to make an enemy rather than a friend of the press. Media facilities and access do not appear to be a problem in other devolved institutions. I cannot understand why the liaison committee never met; perhaps it could be re-established urgently. I ask the Commission to take the issue seriously, so that the apparent lack of communication as regards press access during the Queen's visit does not arise again. The same approach should apply to press access during visits by other dignitaries, and to the provision of information that we wish the press to report. The Assembly seems to have fallen foul in that regard, and the press seem to end up reporting negatively on it.

Mrs E Bell: I agree; however, the Commission and the press have met to discuss proposals many times. We are considering their proposals for access and better information, and I hope that they are considering ours. The press conference arena in the basement of the Building is rarely used. The Head of Security, the Speaker, and other Members who deal with the press met representatives, and the Commission also met the Chairpersons' Liaison Group. I hope that proposals will result from those meetings.

I take on board the Member's comments; however, the Commission has already tried the approach that she suggested. I hope that the Assembly will be able to establish a better relationship and better communication with the press. The Commission shares the Members hope that the problems that arose in the past do not happen again.

DRAFT FIXED TERM EMPLOYEES (PREVENTION OF LESS FAVOURABLE TREATMENT) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

PART-TIME WORKERS (PREVENTION OF LESS FAVOURABLE TREATMENT) (AMENDMENT) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

Debate resumed on motion:

That the draft Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 be approved. — [The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna).]

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 286/2002) be approved. — [The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna).]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that the Minister has grouped the motions on the draft Fixed Term Employees Regulations and the Part-Time Workers Regulations for debate. When all who wish to speak have done so, I shall call the Minister to do the winding-up speech and put the Question on the first motion. I shall then ask the Minister to move the second motion before putting the question without further debate. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna): I shall continue where I left off.

I am aware that fixed-term contracts are used in sectors ranging from higher education to the hospitality industry. In some instances, sectors or organisations may wish to tailor the mechanism limiting the use of successive fixed-term contracts to suit their needs better. Therefore the Regulations provide for employers and employees to increase or decrease the four-year limit or to agree a different way in order to prevent the abuse of successive fixed-term contracts by collective or workforce agreements. Those agreements could, for example, specify allowable reasons for renewing fixed-term contracts beyond the statutory limit.

It is important that the law does not permit fixed-term employees to be treated less favourably than permanent employees. Therefore these Regulations also amend provisions in certain parts of some Orders, which, unless amended, would allow some or all fixed-term employees to be treated less favourably than permanent employees. For example, the Employment Rights (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 permits fixed-term employees to waive their right to redundancy payments. The Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 will remove that redundancy waiver.

The modest costs associated with these Regulations are more than offset by the advantages that they bring in fairness and the ending of the potential for discrimination. The regulatory impact assessment commissioned by my Department estimated costs to the private sector of about £1 million to £4 million. The Regulations will create an even playing field for employers of fixed-term contract employees. However, it is right that fixed-term employees should be treated no less favourably than permanent employees.

I now turn to the two amendments to the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2000. These Regulations make it unlawful for employers to treat part-timers less favourably than comparable full-timers in their terms and conditions of employment unless different treatment can be justified objectively.

Under the present Part-Time Workers Regulations, part-time workers must compare themselves to full-timers employed under a similar contract. The amendment will allow part-time workers to compare themselves with full-time staff on both permanent and fixed-term contracts. That will ensure that part-time workers on fixed-term contracts are not treated less favourably than permanent workers.

The second amendment also aims at bringing the Part-Time Workers Regulations into line with the Fixed Term Employees Regulations. At present, if an industrial tribunal upholds a complaint from a part-time worker about equal access to an occupational pension scheme, the remedy awarded may not exceed a limit of two years' worth of employer contributions. That reflects the House of Lords ruling in February 2001 in the case of Preston and Others v Wolverhampton Healthcare NHS Trust and Others. The amendment Regulations remove that restriction.

Compliance costs are estimated to be low. Those employers who treat their part-time workers equally to their full-time staff will experience no direct costs. The days where most of the labour force worked nine to five in a job for life are past. It is widely recognised that a more flexible approach is not only good for employees, but it can also enhance competitiveness. In this context, it is particularly important to protect the rights of the growing numbers on fixed-term and part-time contracts. Fixed-term and part-time work allows people to participate in the labour market who, perhaps due to family or other commitments, may not wish to accept permanent or full-time employment.

For their part, employers should see the benefits of greater loyalty and commitment among their fixed-term and part-time staff. Overall, the draft Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 and the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 contribute to improving employment rights in the workforce, and I commend both sets of Regulations to the Assembly.

4.15 pm

The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning (Dr Birnie): I appreciate the Minister's comments about the late delivery to the Committee of the Statutory Rule relating to part-time workers. As Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning, I support both sets of Regulations.

With reference to the draft Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002, the Committee considered the pre-draft Statutory Rule at its meeting on 9 May 2002 and had no objections to the policy implications of the proposed legislation at that stage. The Committee noted that the equality impact assessment on the proposed Regulations indicated that there would be no adverse impact on any of the section 75 groups. The Minister referred to the regulatory impact assessment, and the Committee noted that it estimated a net cost to employers ranging from £1.5 million to £7.6 million, with about half of that falling on the public sector. It was expected that very little cost would fall on small businesses.

The Committee considered the Statutory Rule at its most recent meeting on Thursday 19 September and supported its key objectives, especially the prevention of discrimination against fixed-term employees.

On behalf of the Committee, I urge support for the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 286/2002). These Regulations amend the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2000 (SR 219/2000) and are due to come into force on 1 October. As with the previous Statutory Rule, the original date for implementation was 1 July 2002, but the Department of Trade and Industry in London requested that further time be given to the UK to implement the EU Directive on fixed-term work.

The Committee considered the Statutory Rule at its meeting on 19 September 2002 and supported the key objectives outlined by the Minister. The first is to maintain consistency with the EU Directive on fixed-term work, and the second is to comply with the judgment made by the House of Lords in the Preston and Others v Wolverhampton Healthcare NHS and Others.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion. Given that the amendments have been taken as part of an European Directive, and the fact that many women have to take part-time or fixed-term work due to family commitments, I am glad to see that the prevention of less favourable treatment has been taken on board by the Minister. Could we not do more, above and beyond what the EU suggests, to make working conditions for part-time and fixed-term workers even more favourable to the needs of working parents?

Ms McWilliams: I also welcome the introduction of the Statutory Rules. As Michelle Gildernew said, they originated from European Directives. The people concerned were once commonly known as atypical workers, but the days when we had the typical worker from nine to five on a permanent contract are long gone. Many employees now have atypical working patterns, so the more inclusive our legislation, the better, especially with regard to the prevention of less favourable treatment.

I remember when part-time workers began to secure some rights along the same lines as full-time workers. The first thing that employers did was make their part-time workers redundant, since, they said, they could not implement the Regulation without considerable cost to themselves. Clearly, equality issues were involved. I know of some dispute involving Queen's University Belfast and the University of Ulster. In particular, the University of Ulster's fixed-term employees think that they will lose their jobs before the legislation comes into force.

When the legislation comes into force, what will happen to the employer of a person who has been working for four years on a fixed-term contract — I believe that that is the term in the legislation — if he or she decides to replace them? What are the employee's rights if he or she wishes to take that employer to court or to a tribunal because of unfair dismissal? Those of us who are familiar with labour relations know that many part-time workers did not benefit from previous legislation; they simply lost their jobs as a consequence.

Ms Hanna: Today's workforce is an increasingly diverse entity. I firmly believe that such enhanced flexibility brings considerable benefits to employers and workers alike. It is therefore important that those who wish to work on fixed-term or part-time contracts are not discouraged from doing so by the threat of less favourable treatment. I welcome the remarks of the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning and his acceptance of reassurances.

We are dealing with specific issues in the legislation, but Members are probably aware that an employment status review is under way. I hope that issues outside the legislation will be taken up through that. That probably does not answer the specific question regarding Queen's University, but I do not think I could answer that now, nor would it be appropriate for me to do so here. However, I shall most certainly do so in writing.

The Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 and the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland)

2002 will protect the rights of the increasing number of individuals on fixed-term, or part-time, contracts who might otherwise suffer detrimental work habits compared with their permanent or full-time colleagues. Such workers have an important role to play in helping to meet organisations' needs for more flexible labour solutions which contribute to the creation of high-performance workplaces.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Fixed Term Employees (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 be approved.

Resolved:

That the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 286/2002) be approved.

PLANNING (AMENDMENT) BILL

4.30 pm

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Rev Dr William McCrea): I beg to move

That in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 29 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Planning (Amendment) Bill (NIA 12/01).

The Committee for the Environment formally began its scrutiny of the Planning (Amendment) Bill on 25 June 2002. Members will know that it is the Committee's practice to seek the views of all key stakeholders, as well as those of groups most likely to be affected by any legislation.

This is an important piece of legislation. Consequently, the Committee has canvassed the views of all 26 councils and 17 other bodies, such as the Construction Employers Federation, the Royal Town Planning Institute and the Woodland Trust. Seventeen responses have been received to date. As expected, some have raised interesting and valid concerns, and these were passed to the Department for comment. Over the past weeks, the Committee has received presentations from departmental officials responding to those points, and that process is ongoing.

During the Second Stage of the Bill, some Members spoke of the need for third-party appeals. The Committee has already obtained a commitment from the Minister that his Department will commence a full public consultation on the way forward for third-party appeals by Christmas of this year. The Committee is concerned about the Planning (Amendment) Bill in relation to third-party appeals.

(Madam Deputy Speaker [Ms Morrice] in the Chair)

Although full details will be provided in the Committee's report on the Bill, Members will be pleased to learn that the Committee has persuaded the Minister to take other important issues forward. Two of those require the Secretary of State's approval; namely, increasing the maximum fine from £20,000 to £30,000, and introducing a new offence of commencing development before planning permission is given. Those are significant steps forward and highlight the Committee's hard work on the Bill.

There are more issues for the Committee to explore that will require due and proper deliberation. Consequently, the Committee has considered it necessary to ask the Assembly for an extension. As always, it is the Committee's hope that its work will be completed by an earlier date.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 29 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Planning (Amendment) Bill (NIA 12/01).

LOCAL AIR QUALITY MANAGEMENT BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Rev Dr William McCrea): I beg to move

That in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 29 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Local Air Quality Management Bill. (NIA Bill 13/01).

With your permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I will explain to the House why the extension is being sought. The Committee for the Environment began its formal scrutiny of the Bill on 18 June 2002. Members who have read the Bill will appreciate that it is complex, of a technical nature and requires close scrutiny.

The Committee heard presentations from and held discussions with departmental officials. This included a structured clause-by-clause presentation of the Bill on 20 June 2002. The Committee has also canvassed the views of all district councils together with 12 other interested bodies, such as the Council for Nature Conservation and the Countryside, and the Royal Town Planning Institute. To date, seven responses have been received and, as expected, they have raised some pertinent and legitimate concerns which have been submitted to the Department for its comment and consideration.

It was also agreed that the Department would consult with key stakeholders to ascertain their views on the terms of the Bill. That consultation has taken longer than expected, and the Department has indicated that it will shortly be in a position to come back before the Committee on this Bill. It should prove to be a valuable exercise for all concerned, and it will require due and proper deliberation by the Committee. Consequently, the Committee has considered it appropriate to ask the Assembly to grant this extension of time.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 29 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Local Air Quality Management Bill. (NIA Bill 13/01).

ENERGY INQUIRY REPORT

The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr P Doherty): I beg to move

That this Assembly take note of the response from the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to the Committee's Report on Energy (03/01R).

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his full and comprehensive response to the Committee. May I take this opportunity to congratulate the Armagh team on its fine victory yesterday; perhaps the Chamber is so empty because Members are all down celebrating in the county.

The Committee wishes to see energy remain at the top of the political agenda, so it decided to stimulate a further debate on the energy report and the issues contained in it rather than deal with them by correspondence alone. We hoped that that would afford other Members the opportunity to contribute to this area of public policy. The Committee is looking forward to having a closer look at some of the relevant issues when considering the energy Bill later in the session.

As there are 45 recommendations, I do not have enough time to deal with each one and the Minister's response to them. I will concentrate on two issues which Committee members feel strongly about. I was pleased that many of the Committee's most important recommendations were accepted by the Department: recommendation 3 on consumer protection; recommendation 4 on cross-subsidies; recommendation 14 on Coolkeeragh; and recommendation 40 on postalisation of costs. However, I remain disappointed that Departments were not prepared to think outside the box in some cases. Some responses were negative and lacked imagination, and I will deal with them later.

The Committee made three recommendations regarding the eradication of fuel poverty. It has been said in previous debates, but it is worth repeating, that it is a scandal that 170,000 homes in the North are considered to be fuel poor. The Executive must make every effort to deal with the problem. The Committee recommended that the Government match, pound for pound, the money raised through the energy efficiency levy — £600,000 per year. If such funds cannot be directly obtained from the Treasury, they should be found from the Executive funds. That would reduce the time taken to eradicate fuel poverty from 10 to five years.

Some £600,000 is a small price to pay. The knock-on benefits to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's budget, for example, would be enormous, as it would reduce the cases of illnesses related to fuel poverty such as flu and chest infections and other chest-related illnesses by a huge amount. It would be money well spent.

The Committee was pleased to note that the Minister for Social Development is committed to producing a fuel poverty strategy, and we look forward to examining his proposals. The Committee was also pleased to note that the regulator is introducing plans that will make the energy efficiency levy process more accountable and transparent so that the public can see exactly how and where the funds are being spent.

On the question of renewable energy, the Committee is encouraged with the progress on developing the potential offshore wind farm off the north coast. I agree with the Minister that that development will be crucial if renewable energy targets are to be met. I hope that the Minister will agree that the misinformation being used against the development is extremely unhelpful and that it only serves to breed fear and confusion. The Committee is disappointed that the Minister could not agree with our target of having 15% of electricity from a range of renewable sources by 2010 but has instead opted for 10%. I accept that the majority of respondents to his consultation exercise agreed that 10% was appropriate, but the Committee believes that a target of 15% will encourage greater imagination in research and development of the necessary technologies. That target is challenging, but it is achievable if we put our minds to it. The Committee made various recommendations that sought to encourage greater demand for green electricity. We are deeply disappointed that the Departments responsible for dealing with those recommendations could not be more positive in their responses.

In recommendation 27, for example, the Committee stated that local area development plans should include provision for the location and development of renewable energy sources. The response that we received may have been technically correct, but it did not attempt to address the real issues, which are about helping to plan ahead for the development and use of renewable energy sources.

Recommendation 28 called for the planning and building control bodies to be proactive in the encouragement of low-energy buildings and renewable energy. The response saying that current strategies and legislation do not cover this point is simply not good enough. If the Executive want to take their obligations under the Kyoto protocol seriously, they need to demonstrate joined-up thinking on the encouragement, stimulation and development of renewable energy sources and technologies. It is unacceptable that Departments appear to be unsupportive of one another on the matter.

The Committee is pleased that the Minister and his Department are trying to develop the renewable energy industry in response to recommendations 34, 35, 36 and 37.

The Committee intends to keep plugging away at the issues raised in the energy inquiry report. I am glad that the report will help to stimulate public debate, and I hope that the Minister will be encouraged to look afresh at points raised today.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Neeson): I welcome the Minister's response to the Committee. The energy inquiry was an in-depth investigation that lasted longer than the Committee anticipated. The Committee will soon consider the draft energy Bill, which is very detailed. I assure the Minister that the Committee will approach the task with the same interest that it took in the original investigation.

The major issue is the high cost of electricity in Northern Ireland. In addition, the Assembly must consider long-term contracts. The Committee recently met Jamie Delargy and Sir George Quigley to discuss bonds financing as a possible means of buying out the contracts. Only two weeks ago, I met senior officials from Northern Ireland Electricity to discuss their proposals. The Committee has not decided how it will proceed with the matter. It will examine those, and other, proposals. It must focus on its aim, which is to lower the cost of electricity in Northern Ireland.

I welcome the fact that the natural gas pipeline will go ahead, not only because it will benefit the north-west, but because of its benefit to the South/North pipeline. I sincerely hope that natural gas will benefit domestic consumers as much as businesses and that it will create a level playing field for all consumers in Northern Ireland.

I am still dismayed that people inside and outside the Assembly are trying to impede the project's development. One of the first all-party delegations that met in the Assembly dealt with the provision of natural gas to the north-west. Every party was represented before we even had devolution. Natural gas has widespread support across the political boundaries. I am delighted that the projected commissioning date of autumn 2004 has been agreed for Coolkeeragh power station, which will be one of the main beneficiaries of the pipeline to the north-west.

We must not put all our eggs in the one basket. We must remember that the new combined cycle gas turbine (CCGT) power station at Ballylumford will be commissioned soon. I, and local representatives, will visit that power station in a week or so.

4.45 pm

Combined cycle gas turbine will also power Coolkeeragh, so we must be careful not to put all our eggs in one basket. The future energy uses at Kilroot must be different from natural gas. If Kilroot goes ahead with phase two of the power station, it could use gas, but there must be some diversification.

The Committee took considerable interest in the development of renewable energy, and we welcome the Department's commitment to it. However, I agree with the Chairperson that the larger target of 15% by 2010 is preferable.

It was remiss of me to leave out postalisation when talking about the natural gas pipeline. It is important that all consumers pay the same price for natural gas, regardless of where they live in Northern Ireland. The Committee has a major challenge ahead in dealing with the energy Bill, but we will approach it with the same determination with which we approached the original report.

Mr Armstrong: As a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, I am well aware of the challenges facing consumers and businesses with regard to the higher cost and lower availability of energy resources in Northern Ireland. I commend the energy inquiry report to the Minister; its numerous recommendations can provide a cheaper, greener service for energy consumers, and they suggest means for transforming waste into energy.

When the industry was privatised in 1992, long-term contracts were introduced that will continue until 2012; these have benefited only stakeholders at the expense of consumers. The report recognises the failings in the energy sector and seeks to improve consumers' lot — the ordinary men and women for whom energy is a basic need.

The report recognises the need to make consumer protection a priority when determining arrangements in the energy sector. That is why we suggest that the General Consumer Council be given stronger powers to represent consumers' rights to cheaper, diverse sources of energy.

Some 170,000 householders in Northern Ireland are classed fuel poor. I welcome initiatives, such as the warm homes scheme, which seek to redress people's difficulties in affording energy. The report's recommendation to increase the energy efficiency levy to £5 per customer is one way of eradicating fuel poverty, and the Minister should consider that more closely.

Increasing the efficient use of energy is one way of reducing cost to the consumer. Efficient appliances are vital, as they use energy sources with more care. However, the report also suggests ways in which the price per unit of electricity and other costs can be reduced. It is unacceptable that a 306% rise in output per generation worker has translated into only a 15% productivity gain to consumers. It is unacceptable that consumers are expected to fund long-term contracts while shareholders make large profits at their expense.

The importance of the environment in any future energy strategy is recognised in the report. I suggest that alternative sources of energy should receive assistance through Government funding. The report mentions the recently established biogas scheme in Fivemiletown. I am in favour of such schemes that convert waste products, particularly farm waste, into useful sources of energy. There is great potential for locating biogas digesters throughout Northern Ireland to reduce waste storage difficulties and to provide power for local schools and communities. The Minister will recall that I have written to him on this, and I hope that he will fully consider it.

Northern Ireland depends on traditional energy sources. Much more needs to be done to promote the use of renewable energy. Some 60% of our electricity is produced from gas, as opposed to 38% in the UK as a whole. With volatile worldwide markets for oil and, perhaps soon, gas, we must act immediately to redress our energy deficit. We are aware of the huge potential to generate electricity through harnessing wind power. However, that must be sensibly managed to preserve the natural beauty of our landscape.

Especially in the face of international obligations, the Northern Ireland energy sector must undergo significant changes in the next few years in order to comply with obligations on renewable energy. In the Republic of Ireland, one company supplies green electricity generated by wind at a lower price than electricity generated by fossil fuels. I support an eco-energy tariff that does not impose additional charges on customers who opt for green energy.

It is vital that all parties concerned are encouraged to adopt environmentally friendly measures to generate energy. I hope that the Minister will further consider funding biomass schemes, such as the one at Brook Hall Estate in Londonderry. Willow coppice is a feedstock for producing electricity from biomass. The benefits of introducing such a scheme on a more widespread basis include an aid to rural development in addition to further diversifying the energy mix. There is also the further side benefit of reducing waste because biomass acts as a bio-filter.

I hope that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment will seriously consider the importance of increasing the range of energy sources used to generate power. The report recommends that planning and building control bodies should also show greater awareness by encouraging low-energy buildings to reduce energy consumption.

In planning for the future fuel-energy market, we must give particular consideration to fuel poverty in rural areas. There are no plans at present for the alternative energy source of gas to be extended outside Belfast and the north-west and south-east of the Province, so I hope that the Minister will consider the importance of promoting and funding alternative energy sources, such as anaerobic digesters, in rural areas. The Minister should also endorse postalisation so that more dispersed rural communities can also benefit from renewable energy sources.

Dr McDonnell: Discussions on energy are always timely — we could probably discuss energy once a month. As I said in a debate a few months ago, the future of energy is one of the most important issues that we face. It is a lifeblood of our society not only socially, but economically. We shall have to keep returning to the matter.

Although I disagree with one or two points, I broadly welcome the Minister's response. It is only appropriate that I should pay tribute to the sterling work of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. The Chairperson, Pat Doherty, the Deputy Chairperson, Sean Neeson, and my Colleagues on that Committee should be thanked for the massive amount of work that was put into the original inquiry.

Several issues must be addressed, including financing debt at a lower cost. We must buy out the stranded costs and do what we can to reduce the excessive charges that were tied up in the original scandalous contracts. The legislation must contain, or new legislation must be enacted to provide for, low-cost borrowing mechanisms in the energy industry that will allow for the servicing of debt and for the burden of debt to be reduced. That in itself would create small but significant savings for customers.

I am told that if lending institutions were allowed to use customers' credit ratings, they might rate customers as more creditworthy than do NIE and would charge lower rates of interest, which would benefit the customers. There seems to be no great desire to include a low-cost financing option in the forthcoming energy Bill, but one must be included. If that option is not included in the original Bill, it must be included at Consideration Stage.

My Committee Colleagues have already touched on the scandal of fuel poverty. The Committee Chairman, Pat Doherty, cited the 170,000 homes — 28% of our people — that experience fuel poverty. I welcome the Minister's support for the increase in the energy levy to an average of £5 per customer. The extra money that that will generate will be of great value to the homes affected by that scourge and will go some way towards eradicating it.

However, I also agree with recommendation 10. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Social Development must together develop an aggressive and effective task force on fuel poverty. It is not enough to take action such as raising levies in a passive or semi-active way; this problem must be dealt with aggressively and forcibly. The task force and the Executive must make the rapid eradication of fuel poverty a priority underpinned by legislation.

Like Mr Doherty, I believe that if the Exchequer cannot provide the necessary resources to eliminate fuel poverty, it behoves the Executive to find them as quickly as possible. The longer that that scandal pertains, the longer the Assembly will be ridiculed for not effectively getting to grips with government and the issues that affect people's lives.

Recommendation 38 proposes the consideration of the establishment of a renewable energy agency. If such an agency is established, it will help us to focus on and adopt a much more serious approach to renewables, especially in the light of the Executive's commitment to ensuring that 10% of energy will come from renewable sources. Like other Members, I am not satisfied with 10% — it should be 15%. A much greater commitment to developing renewable energy is needed. In many respects, we pay little more than lip service to it. It sounds nice, and it seems green, reasonable and user-friendly. However, as I told the House before the summer recess, an all-embracing energy agency is needed. I have let the matter rest until other issues have been debated, but if we do not return to it, we will never be in control of our energy resources. We can talk all we like, but there is no evidence that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development is offering farmers effective incentives to produce renewable energy products. Until we have joined-up government that involves the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Social Development, and which pulls in all aspects of energy production, consumption and usage, we will not have the necessary grip on energy issues. The renewable energy debate must be renewed and engaged in with much more vigour than has been the case.

5.00 pm

The Department of Agriculture should be involved. There are problems in the agriculture industry and, if a few people knew that they could diversify into energy products if the market were stable, it would perhaps be a welcome respite. However, I see no great incentive to do that.

I welcome the question of creating an all-island energy market, which was raised in recommendation 42 and in other recommendations in the report. North and South, we are an island community of only five million to six million people. That is not a large number in relation to a stable energy supply from multiple sources, and it is not enough in respect of an all-island energy economy. Greater co-operation with the UK must be obtained, particularly with Scotland. The Moyle interconnector is an excellent example of that. It has been fully loaded and used, and has gone some way towards creating an opening in the market. An open energy market is not possible without the supply. Douglas McIlldoon said:

"The Moyle Interconnector, with a capacity of 500MW, has been developed as a strategic infrastructure project to link the previously isolated NI electricity system to the systems of Great Britain (GB) and the European mainland. The benefits of access to these larger systems for the NI electricity consumer include downward pressure on electricity prices from increased competition in generation along with enhanced security and diversity of supply."

Without adequate interconnecting capacity there can be no market. Our current problem, however, is that because the interconnector is fully used and fully loaded, there is no spare capacity. Expensive as it may be, we may very well need a second interconnector to double the capacity between Northern Ireland and Scotland. We must have a freer, more competitive and relatively open market as quickly as possible. If that is not done, if there are closed shops and restricted supplies, opportunities and choice, we can talk all we like, but that will not bring about change.

I could make other points, but I shall not. Other Members referred to the scandalously high price of the privatisation of the power stations. One primary focus should be to concentrate on the liberalisation of the market to promote as much competition as possible, so that the price of electricity comes down and the economics begin to make sense. They do not make sense now.

Mr Wells: Once again, sadly, the debate on energy has not proved to be the hottest ticket in town. I am delighted that Mr Davis has appeared. At one stage, it looked as if Dr Birnie would be the only non-member of the Committee to take part in the debate, with the exception of the Minister. It is either a tremendous vote of confidence or a sign of apathy with regard to the work of the Committee. Members perhaps feel that the Committee has done such a good job and that the report is so watertight that it is not necessary to scrutinise its work, that it is a five-star Committee and there is nothing to worry about. Either that, or the level of interest in the crucial subject of energy is not what it should be. I am not sure of the reason, but on the three occasions on which this topic has arisen it has attracted very few Members. That said, however, it reveals a slight deficiency in the Standing Orders of the Assembly. There is no provision for a statement to be made by a Committee Chairperson. That provision existed in previous Assemblies and is a neat way of dealing with responses from Government Departments to Committee reports.

Of course, we are required to use the more unwieldy mechanism of a motion, which is often heard late in the afternoon, rather than during the morning's business. Having said that, the Minister has made a steady but positive response to the Committee's report.

If I were asked to describe the Minister in cricketing terms, I would say that he is more of a Geoffrey Boycott than an Ian Botham. Geoffrey Boycott tended to bat steadily and solidly, deflecting the bouncers and chalking up quite a few maiden overs, as opposed to Ian Botham, who nailed his colours to the mast and struck out with the bat. In reading the Minister's report, I realised that he has a deft way of saying no. He reminds me of a young lady whom I asked out many times. Rather than say "No, I think that you are the ugliest person in the school", she offered good excuses that did not upset me, such as "I am doing my hair", "I have to look after my maiden aunt", or "I have to go shopping". The Minister does the same thing. Nowhere does he say that the Committee's report is a load of nonsense or that it is extreme.

He always has a “no, but” reply to the recommendations, which, I suppose, is how Ministers attain the tacit support of Committees on many issues.

The Minister could have been bold and responded to the recommendation on nuclear power as follows: “It is not a transferred matter. It is for officials at Westminster, but my view is: nuclear power in Northern Ireland — over my dead body”. He could have nailed his colours to the mast, made a name for himself, and gained much support from the people of Northern Ireland, who are extremely worried about the health implications of Sellafield and nuclear power production. But, no, the Minister batted steady, sidestepping the issue by saying that it was not a matter for his Department — a neat answer but not, perhaps, the bravest.

The report recommends a radical rethink of the proportion of energy that will be produced by renewable fuel. Again, the Minister played with a straight bat, stuck to previous policy and stated that the proportion should be 10% — no more, no less. He could have said that although he would welcome an increase to 20% or 25% he must comply with the constraints, but, again, he did not comment.

I do not want to be negative, because the Department responded positively to several issues raised by the Committee. The Committee, the Assembly and the Minister are agreed on fuel poverty, an issue that unites the community. It is one of the few situations in which everybody would gain. If there were an adequate programme to tackle fuel poverty, we would lower carbon dioxide emissions, because less heat would be lost up the chimney and less fossil fuel would be used. We would also improve the health of the community, because fewer old people would contract serious diseases and die from cold-related illness. Those measures would result in a saving for the Exchequer, because less money would be spent on treating the ill and less would be wasted on social security payments to provide fuel.

The Committee supports strongly the recommendation to increase the levy to £5, especially as it learnt that the average levy would be £5 a household. The home occupied by Dr McDonnell, the hon Member for South Belfast, a man of numerous incomes, would therefore sustain a much higher levy than the home of a working-class person in east Belfast. The richer members of society will pay a much higher proportion of the levy than poorer people. The Committee also discovered that, as the levy is also taken from industrial and commercial users, it is not spread over 600,000 domestic consumers; it is spread over the entire community. In some instances, therefore, the levy could be as little as 75p a year for households that use little energy. If that is the case, it is a small price to pay to alleviate the scourge of fuel poverty in the Province, especially among the elderly. One of the main obstacles to the increase of the levy was that many people felt that £5 a household was too much. That is not the case, and the fuel poor are not paying the lion's share. Therefore, the Minister's response was positive.

I am also glad that he left the door open on Orimulsion. There is no getting away from it: Orimulsion has been a controversial fuel in some parts of the world. Work on the energy inquiry led to one of the most beneficial and productive visits that any Assembly Committee has ever made; it was to the Orimulsion-fired power stations in Denmark. I was not part of the delegation because I had been there previously, but I can verify the Committee's findings on the efficiency and the high environmental standards of that plant in Zealand.

Indeed, on my visit, we quizzed the representatives of green organisations. I do not mean the SDLP but groups such as Friends of the Earth, the World Wildlife Fund, and so on and their equivalents in Denmark. Having investigated emissions from that plant and having examined the programme that was established to deal with spillage, those groups were extremely happy with the work going on at the plant, and they gave it their seal of approval. If Kilroot were converted to dual-fired Orimulsion and oil burning, it could go a long way to bridging the gap between generation costs in this part of the UK and in England, Scotland and Wales.

I am glad that the Minister kept the door open to the Committee's recommendation, and indeed, this is perhaps the one issue over which the Committee almost came to blows. From memory, the only two issues on which it disagreed were the name of Londonderry and whether the use of Orimulsion should go ahead at Kilroot. Both engendered a great deal of heat and required much energy, but they were both resolved.

The triple lock offered by the Committee gives the Minister a way forward to deal with this difficult issue — and there is no getting away from it, it is a complex matter — but it also ensures that the highest possible environmental standards will apply.

First, the Committee said that the use of Orimulsion should be subject to a planning application, which is, of course, only right. That planning application would be the subject of an inquiry or a similar mechanism that would allow the public to air their views. Secondly, the strictest of environmental impact assessments should be carried out in public, which will enable the public to see exactly what measurements are taken, what statistics are used and how the consultants arrive at their conclusions on the environmental issues.

Particulates and spillage are the two remaining unresolved, yet crucial, issues. There is no doubt that the conversion to Orimulsion burning will lead to a major reduction in greenhouse gas emissions from Kilroot. Sulphur emissions, when combined with flue-gas desulphurisation plant, will fall appreciably. Therefore, we have a win-win situation as far as oxides of nitrogen (NOx) and oxides of sulphur (SOx), as they are called, and emission gases are concerned. However, questions remain about the fine particulate matter, cadmium and vanadium, as well as about the other particulates that can cause some respiratory problems. With flue-gas desulphurisation and electrostatic precipitation it is possible to eliminate the majority of those particulates from the atmosphere. However, there are remaining concerns about that, and the environmental impact assessment must examine it in detail.

More crucially perhaps, although only 11 or 12 tankers a year are likely to come to Kilroot from Venezuela, we must ask what would happen if any of those were to sink in Belfast harbour or along the coast of Northern Ireland. The environmental impact assessment must examine in detail any contingency plans to deal with that should it ever occur. Therefore, the second lock is the environmental impact analysis.

5.15 pm

Thirdly, the Assembly should make any decision on the production of power, because this is an important regional issue that, given those three provisos, should be taken seriously. In the response to the report, the door has been left open for that proposal. I came to the proposed use of Orimulsion with a cynical and jaundiced viewpoint. My impression was that Orimulsion was the last thing we needed in Northern Ireland. However, when I considered the facts, the use of Orimulsion elsewhere and read the literature, I concluded that there was merit in considering the proposal.

Dr McDonnell raised the issue of the lack of legislation to provide a low-cost borrowing mechanism to reduce the real cost to the consumer of the capital tied up in the power industry. A simple piece of primary legislation is needed, which some believe could be included in the energy Bill. It could be used to buy out the Ballylumford long-term generator contract.

The Committee is examining the energy Bill, and some members are minded to suggest an amendment to allow that provision to be included, not as a mandatory provision but as enabling legislation that would allow a proposal to be considered. The Minister would not be compelled to do anything. It would be a question of “may” rather than “shall”. At least the provision would be there if a realistic proposal were put forward.

As Dr McDonnell stated, in pure numerical terms the savings are small, one suggestion being that the figure would be between £1 million and £1.2 million. However, that saving, combined with tackling the long-term generator contracts, and perhaps moving to the use of Orimulsion, would go a long way to reducing the gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. If nothing else is achieved during the Minister’s short term of office, a series of steps would have been set in motion to bridge that gap and the Minister would have made a significant achievement for Northern Ireland. If the Assembly is to mean anything to the people of Northern Ireland, something has to be done on this crucial issue.

The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment is considering industrial derating, and some difficult decisions will have to be taken. Industrial derating was introduced because of the significant difference in electricity prices for industry in Northern Ireland. Many witnesses appearing before the Committee said that the abolition of industrial derating could not be justified until the problem of high electricity costs was addressed. There is much merit in that argument. That does not presuppose one or other decision on the matter, but the two elements are linked.

The energy issue is extraordinarily complex, and no one will pretend otherwise. However, the Committee’s report and the Minister’s response were a step in the right direction and, if we go forward together, many positive changes will be put in place for the people of Northern Ireland.

I welcome most of the response and understand the reasons for saying “no” and “perhaps”. No matter how tactful those responses are, I understand that those decisions have to be made.

We will get a second bite at the cherry when we debate the energy Bill, and these issues will reappear many times. As far as the Assembly is concerned, the book on energy is far from closed.

Dr O’Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Before I make my contribution to the debate, I send my congratulations to the Armagh team and the Derry minor team. I am being very parochial in relation to Armagh. It is disappointing that the erroneous —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you; that issue has been covered.

Dr O’Hagan: I will not discuss all of the recommendations, as the report was substantial, and the response was very detailed. This is part of the continuing debate on energy, and I look forward to further discussion on the matter.

Recommendation 2 deals with the consumer bond. In addition to Orimulsion, this issue exercised the members of the Committee a great deal. There is growing recognition that bonds could be an effective way of reducing prices. The matter certainly requires full public debate and consultation. It appears that people are increasingly coming around to the idea that bonds are a low-cost borrowing mechanism for energy. However, the proposal needs detailed examination, debate and consultation.

Recommendation 9 deals with eradicating fuel poverty. The revised framework for the energy efficiency levy must ensure openness and transparency with regard to how money is spent and the extent to which people are lifted out of fuel poverty. The eradication of fuel poverty must be considered from the inception of any scheme or project funded by the energy efficiency levy. The evaluation of the warm homes scheme will provide some valuable information on the levy contribution. We need a comprehensive, resource-based evaluation of the energy efficiency levy, and this should be formalised and implemented as quickly as possible.

Recommendation 10 concerns the establishment of a task force on fuel poverty. Although a fuel poverty strategy is very welcome, the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment called for the task force in order to inject some political momentum into the situation. I would like to see that established as quickly as possible. The Assembly has demonstrated that there is cross-party support for tackling fuel poverty, but that needs to be harnessed and driven forward. The eradication of fuel poverty in the North of Ireland within 10 years would be a testament to the Assembly's work.

Recommendation 11 seeks greater transparency with regard to the use of the energy efficiency levy. For example, how does Northern Ireland Electricity (NIE) select projects to fund? What criteria are used? Are some organisations refused funding, and, if so, what happens to them? I would welcome clarity and openness on these matters. A panel of independent assessors could help NIE to assess projects.

Recommendation 24, which deals with a renewable energy target, has already been mentioned. I would like to see a more vigorous response from the Department on the promotion of renewable energy. The Committee set a target of 15% of all electricity to come from renewable sources by 2010. That is not impossible, and it would help to drive a more vigorous project forward. I look forward to the implementation of the strategy and to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's plans to promote renewable energy.

Recommendation 38 deals with the establishment of a renewable energy agency. I would like to see that done as soon as possible, in line with the Committee's recommendation.

With regard to recommendation 45, the consultation on the abolition of the Government royalty tax is to be welcomed. However, all parties recognise the need for an all-Ireland energy market. One of the key issues —

Mr Wells: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon Member to mislead the Assembly? The recommendation refers to an all-island energy market, not an all-Ireland one. That is an important distinction, so what is being said is slightly misleading.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you for guiding the Assembly in that way.

Dr O'Hagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Words are certainly important, but my preference is to use the term "all-Ireland energy market".

The promotion of an all-Ireland energy market should benefit consumers as well as businesses, so consumer issues should be a key consideration. I broadly welcome the Department's response. The ongoing debate is healthy and frank, and I welcome that. Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Given the limited time remaining, I must ask Members who still wish to speak in the debate to restrict their contributions to five minutes.

Dr Birnie: I am not a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, but energy issues are so important that we should all take an interest in them.

A key issue in the report and the Minister's response is that of relative energy charges, particularly in Great Britain and the rest of the European Union. Along with Dr McDonnell and Mr Wells, I argue that consideration should be given to permissive legislation for so-called low-cost borrowing mechanisms. Several billion pounds worth of capital is tied up in the energy industry, so a relatively small reduction in interest charges on loans — even by 0.1% — could lead to tens of millions of pounds worth of savings for customers.

Primary legislation — for example, the forthcoming energy Bill — is needed to achieve that laudable objective. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, through the regulator, could commit consumers to repay on loans. Given that there are approximately 600,000 electricity users in the Province, the lending institutions such as the banks would view that as better security, given the current risk, albeit unlikely, of Northern Ireland Electricity's bankruptcy. Consequently, consumers could make savings, as the loan repayment would be at a lower interest rate. I understand that, in principle, the Confederation of British Industry and the Federation of Small Businesses support such permissive legislation.

It might be argued that the systems operator could levy charges on customers within the framework of existing legislation. However, that would not be enough to satisfy the lending institutions. They need assurance, in the form of primary legislation, that consumers would ultimately repay loans. I commend the report and the ministerial response. However, we need to act now to lower electricity prices through, for example, permissive legislation to provide for a low-cost borrowing mechanism.

Mrs Courtney: I welcome the Minister's response, which, for the large part, was positive. Most of the 45 recommendations fall within his remit.

Recommendation 14 relates to the Coolkeeragh development. As regards its support and implementation, all the necessary statutory consent for the construction of a combined cycle gas turbine station has been granted. The projected commissioning date for the project is autumn 2004.

5.30 pm

On 12 February 2002, the regulator granted a gas conveyance licence to Bord Gáis Éireann for the construction of a gas pipeline to supply the new generation station and downstream markets along the route of the pipeline.

The new power station will act as an anchor customer for the new natural gas pipeline to the North and north-west. Over 80,000 new domestic gas connections, including the city of Derry, Limavady, Ballymena, Antrim and Letterkenny, could be made possible in the years after the construction of the gas pipeline, facilitated by the power station.

Developing the power plant at Coolkeeragh will enhance economic activity in the north-west. The development of the new power station represents an inward investment of £150 million in the region, bringing jobs and other benefits. It will provide 600 jobs at the peak of the construction phase, and there will be 40 secure jobs in running the station when it has been built. The local economy is set to benefit significantly from the power plant development at Coolkeeragh. To facilitate local companies being given the opportunity to supply products and service to the main contractor, a unique supplier model initiative supported by Invest Northern Ireland and delivered by North West Marketing has been developed.

I support the report but, as I have a little time left, I would also like to commend recommendation 9 on eradicating fuel poverty. The energy efficiency levy is to be increased to £5 per customer. I also commend recommendation 10 on the setting up of the task force on fuel poverty. The Department for Social Development is already advancing the fuel poverty strategy. Recommendation 15 relates to the climate change levy, which is a reserved matter. We already have a derogation for five years, and I appreciate the Minister's assurance that he will seek a 10-year derogation.

I welcome very much recommendation 22 on waste minimalisation and the Minister's positive response to it. Recommendations 39 and 40 deal with gas to the north-west and the postalisation of costs. The fact that costs will be evenly distributed to all gas consumers must be welcomed. I agree with Dr Birnie, Mr Wells, Dr O'Hagan and my Colleague, Dr McDonnell, who spoke in favour of recommendation 45 — its implementation would undoubtedly benefit all in the electricity market.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Sir Reg Empey): I am grateful to the Committee for the motion, which will help to keep the extremely important question of energy high on the Assembly's agenda. I have listened carefully to a very positive debate on energy, although I share Mr Wells's disappointment that we did not attract more Members. This issue affects every household and business in the Province, so it should be high on the agenda. I will attempt to cover as many of the issues that were raised as possible.

The Committee Chairperson and many other Members spoke about renewable energy. I want to make it clear that the target has not yet been set. However, it will be set in the energy strategy, which will be published later in the year. I understand why the Committee feels strongly that we should have set a higher target, but Members are omitting one issue — most potential renewables will come from wind power. Mr Armstrong and others raised questions about biomass, anaerobic digesters and other forms of renewable energy. All have their place. However, if we are to reach a significant target of 10% or 15%, 95% of it will come from wind. That is the reality. We must also remember the huge cost involved.

A figure of 15% would cost the consumer a further £40 million. That excludes the cost of upgrading the network to distribute that energy, and that could be as much again. Wind energy generators are usually located in isolated areas, and the existing network for wind energy is not equipped to deal with intermittent sources of energy supply and would have to be radically upgraded and changed at a huge cost to the consumer. Members must understand that there is a double cost involved: it may be more expensive to produce, and the high distribution costs must also be taken into account.

My Department is committed to renewable energy. Mr Armstrong and other Members raised issues such as anaerobic digesters, and I am working closely with my Colleague in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to encourage such matters. However, it is not easy to set such a target. In any event, there is no point in setting a target that is not achievable, and I hope that can be avoided. Nevertheless, I take Members' points very seriously, and I know how sincerely held their views are on the subject.

Virtually every Member referred to fuel poverty. The figure of 170,000 people below the fuel poverty line is, in this day and age, a disgrace. However, that is primarily a matter for my Colleague, the Minister for Social Development, and I will draw his attention to the points raised. I have had experience of fuel poverty in my constituency. The staggering fact is that even though we were offering, through the fuel poverty pilot scheme, to convert and insulate properties, to provide modern, efficient gas boilers and to give other advice, an enormous number of people did not apply for it. I found that disturbing. Home helps have to light fires for people who cannot manage solid fuel, and, even though the scheme was available in certain areas and people could get new equipment, homes insulated and free advice, there was still an insufficient number of applicants. That is shocking.

Mr Wells: There were two schemes, one in the Beechmount area of west Belfast and one in Willowfield in the Minister's constituency. The Beechmount scheme was incredibly successful with a very high take-up, but the Willowfield scheme was much less successful. However, that had more to do with the level of community organisation in the two areas rather than the attractiveness of the scheme.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Sir Reg Empey: I accept that to a point. Nevertheless, even though significant efforts were made to draw the scheme to the attention of people in the area, I was disappointed with the take-up. I accept that we must all do more at community level. However, almost every Member has made the point about fuel poverty, and I will draw it to the attention of my Colleague.

Significant bids are being made in the Budget. The Minister for Social Development is bidding for substantial resources from the Northern Ireland block grant to back the increase in the OFREG levy. There is a real chance of making a significant difference on that.

The Chairperson referred to recommendation 27 on local renewable energy plans and recommendation 28 on planning and building control bodies. Again, some of those matters are the concern of the Department of the Environment, and I will draw Mr Nesbitt's attention to them as many Members found them significant.

Mr Neeson, Dr Birnie, Dr McDonnell and other Members raised the issue of the bonds. I am aware of the problem, and I am looking at it closely. A range of issues must be considered, including tax and state aid issues. However, Members have made it clear that they intend to raise the matter during the passage of the Bill. As the Executive approved the Bill at their meeting last week, we hope, with your permission, Mr Speaker, to introduce it this month. It will then move to Committee Stage, when Members will be able to discuss its provisions at some length — we shall see where that leads us.

Mr Neeson and other Members also referred to the high cost of electricity. I have now had two meetings with Sir George Quigley, one the week before last and one some months ago. I am acutely aware of all the major issues, and I assure the Member that not a week goes by without our trying to address them in the Department. They are very difficult and complex, and we shall continue to work at them, for each half point that we can shave off the cost is of advantage to the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Neeson also referred to diversification; I am aware of the percentage of our electricity that we shall eventually produce with gas when Coolkeeragh comes on-stream and when the new combined cycle gas turbine starts to work. Of course, that will be a much more efficient form of generation; we shall use less gas at Ballylumford when the new power station opens than we use with the present facilities because of increased efficiency. Coolkeeragh, as Mrs Courtney is well aware, is a state-of-the-art, highly efficient combined cycle gas turbine. I am aware of Mr Neeson's point, but at least now we have the interconnector. There is also interconnection with the Republic, so we are not as isolated as we used to be, and that is of significant satisfaction to us.

Dr McDonnell spoke about the all-island market. Of course, a population of five million is a small market for energy, and we all know that. That is why interconnection, both North/South and east-west, gives us a platform upon which we can play more effectively. We are working very closely with the regulators both North and South, who meet monthly. The two Departments have a high-level working group, and we had a report in 2001. These reports are accessible on our Department's web site, and one can see there what we are doing. The market is opening up because of the interconnection with Great Britain.

That brings us neatly to the nuclear option to which Mr Wells referred. He used some cricketing analogies, and at one stage he was in danger of putting us in some doubt about how he ever got married; but someone must have said "Yes" to him at some stage. We have an interconnection with Great Britain, and the electricity that flows through that interconnector can come from various sources, including the south of Scotland, which has access to nuclear plants.

I do not favour any such plants being built here, but Sellafield is of environmental importance to all of us, quite apart from the generation of electricity. There can be no guarantee of the source from which electricity comes when it passes through the interconnector; it is not possible to identify that.

Mr Wells also raised the question of Orimulsion. As he says, we are keeping an open mind, but the Member should not forget the significant environmental issues with that fuel. It sinks when it enters water, and I am satisfied that he has no desire to tarmac the bottom of Belfast Lough. We should bear in mind that there is only one source of supply in a very unstable part of the world — there was an attempted coup d'état there some months ago, and we must all take account of that.

However, I know that he and other Committee members were impressed by their visit to Denmark. We shall examine any proposal that comes to us. Apart from the environmental issues, the change in the generating regime will require the consent of the Department. There are other options, such as coal, and a range of issues has been designed to reduce costs. We must take a view based on our regulatory position.

The debate has shown that the Committee has taken a consistent interest; it has done more work on energy than on any other heading in the portfolio. That is important, because the issue affects what is in people's pockets and has an impact on our industrial competitiveness, which is a key area in which the Committee and the Department are engaged.

Together we are involved in evolving policy. I have been able to take on board several recommendations, and when the energy Bill goes to the Committee for consideration we shall examine the consumer issues, which Dr O'Hagan mentioned, and postalisation, which is a huge matter for all of us.

I know that Mr Neeson has been angered by the reactions that we received from some quarters. However, we can post a letter anywhere in the Province for the same price. Every unit of electricity is sold to consumers at the same price, wherever they are. The principle of postalisation is already established. Would it be fair to charge a consumer in south Fermanagh the real cost of electricity that is produced in Larne and transmitted from there? It would clearly cost more than it would for a consumer in Carrickfergus. It would be insane to go down that road. No part of the Province, especially the rural areas, could hope to survive under that sort of regime.

I earnestly hope that the Committee and the House will support the Bill's postalisation element, because that is the only way to deliver what is, in cross-border terms, the largest single project that we have undertaken together since partition. I would like to think that that project could be delivered to benefit thousands of people in Northern Ireland who were denied access to fuel. We used to be the only region in western Europe with no gas supply to its main towns. I hope that we shall have support. I look forward to working with the Committee as the Bill proceeds, and I shall be keenly interested in the Committee's responses and suggestions.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr P Doherty): I wish to thank, a Cheann Comhairle, all my Colleagues on the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment for making a thoughtful contribution to the debate. Those contributions represented our consensus on three different levels: a general consensus on the original 45 recommendations; a general consensus that we would broadly welcome the Minister's initial response; and a consensus that the more innovative recommendations that have been refuted should be pursued. I would also like to thank Esmond Birnie, who was the only non-member of the Committee to speak, for his usual thought-provoking words.

I shall deal with the Minister's points in some detail later on, but his general contribution was very solid and recognised the work in which the Committee has been involved. The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee mentioned bonds, which is an issue with which we are still struggling at times, because a huge amount of money is involved.

The Committee has yet to conclude its views on bonds, but it was right that Mr Neeson should highlight that. Mr Neeson welcomed the work being done on the natural gas pipeline from South to North and the north-west, and he made some historical references to various all-party delegations that tried to bring it all about. He also made a clear reference to the need for postalisation and the work done by the Committee in dealing with the energy Bill.

Mr Armstrong mentioned the benefits of turning waste into energy, which the Committee saw on its visit to Denmark. He also stressed the need for cheaper electricity and energy, and that was what helped the Committee initially to focus on energy.

Every Member who spoke mentioned fuel poverty. Biogas is another notable source of renewables, and the energy savings that can be made by properly implementing building regulations were also mentioned.

Dr McDonnell spoke of the need for Members to debate energy constantly, such is its importance — particularly the cost of electricity and how to tackle it. He also referred to the ongoing discussions on bonds and their implications, and he had clear views on fuel poverty. There are 170,000 households in Northern Ireland living in fuel poverty. Members spoke of the levy paid by each customer, and Mr Wells made detailed reference to how well spread the levy could be if Dr McDonnell paid a bit more than the rest of us. Given the number of people and the enormity of the suffering involved, a £5 levy per customer per annum is very little to ask, and it would eradicate fuel poverty in five years.

The Assembly, the Committees and the Executive have been involved in many enormous projects that take a lot of strategic planning, time and money. However, the report states that another £1 million would wipe out fuel poverty in five years. That can be achieved; the money can be found. If the Exchequer will not give it, the Executive can surely find it.

Dr McDonnell also mentioned renewable energy, the all-island market and the Moyle interconnector which links us up not only with Britain but with the wider EU, bringing about security of supply and the potential for reducing costs. He also referred to the privatisation of power stations; that subject spills over into the issue of bonds.

Mr Wells was concerned about the small turnout for the debate, but I think he answered his own question when he said that the energy issue is so complex that very few understand it. It has taken the Committee over a year to cover all the associated issues. The Committee jokes about Mr Neeson promising an easy inquiry that would last six weeks after completion of the economic inquiry. However, we are still at it. We may not be experts, but we are much more knowledgeable now than when we started.

Mr Wells "praised" the steady and positive response from the Minister and the Department, and referred to the Minister's straight bat response. He also said that the Minister should have said that nuclear power would be used in Northern Ireland over his dead body.

Mr Wells elaborated on fuel poverty. He dealt in huge detail with Orimulsion and said that the debate on the matter was ongoing. He also talked about the triple-lock mechanism, and the Minister dealt with those concerns in his response. The Committee had a huge debate on that, but the door has been left open, as we have not yet made a decision on it. Mr Wells also discussed the buying out of electricity contracts, which is tied to the issue of bonds. He talked about industrial derating, which will come before the House soon, and the fact that the Committee was considering how it would deal with the matter.

Dr O'Hagan, after praising the Armagh team for its fine victory, talked about the Minister's detailed response to the Committee's report. She dwelt on the issue of consumer bonds and the need for a full debate. She elaborated on fuel poverty, the energy efficiency levy and the Committee's target of generating 15% of electricity from renewable sources by 2010. Dr O'Hagan also mentioned recommendation 38 on the establishment of a renewable energy agency and recommendation 45, which would enable companies to trade in a fair and equitable all-island energy market. She also welcomed the Department's response to the Committee's proposals.

Dr Birnie talked about the low-cost borrowing mechanisms that are available and the need to conclude the debate on that issue.

Mrs Courtney expressed support for the Coolkeeragh project, about which the Committee has felt strongly since the beginning. She also spoke about the need for a fuel poverty task force.

I have lost my notes on the Minister's detailed response. He explained why it was difficult to push the target from 10% to 15%, outlining the cost factors, on which the Committee will reflect. The Committee was trying to put Northern Ireland at the cutting edge with renewable resources rather than leave it behind in the game with regard to European Directives and the activities of other countries.

I understand that aspects of fuel poverty related to other Ministries, but the issue could be resolved by means of a collective, all-embracing, cross-cutting response. Bonds and the cost-saving aspects of diversification were discussed. That reminded us that even an all-island market would be small and that energy could flow in more than one direction, for example, from an electricity interconnector linking us to Britain and the EU.

Mr Wells may have been told that nuclear plants were an option, but the Minister rejected that possibility. However, he highlighted the fact that he could not determine from which source energy would be manufactured.

The Minister responded to the question of Orimulsion, and it will feed into the Committee's thorough deliberations. We have had a lively debate on energy, and no doubt we shall return to the issue.

Mr Speaker: Order. Just in case the Member finds his notes, I draw his attention to the fact that only three minutes remain.

Mr P Doherty: Two minutes will suffice.

The Minister recognised the Committee's work, for which I thank him, and also how the Committee worked with the Department. It was an example of the right way for a Committee and Department to work together. The Committee did its best in that regard, because the issue is so serious. I was glad that the Minister said that the principle of postalisation has long been established.

The debate has been useful, although, as Jim Wells said, it was a pity that more Members were not present. However, as we continue to debate and promote the issues, and especially as the Committee scrutinises the draft Bill, everything will be dealt with.

I thank the Members and you, a Cheann Comhairle, for allowing me a little extra time.

DRAFT BUDGET 2003-04

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Finance and Personnel that he wishes to make a statement on the draft Budget for 2003-04.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren):

With permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the Executive's public spending plans for the next three financial years. For the first time, the Executive have agreed spending allocations that will take forward our distinctive priorities for the next three years, with some radical changes from the pattern that existed prior to the agreement and devolution.

The theme of the draft Budget, which I am presenting on behalf of the Executive, is reform. Our intention is that the plans, alongside the reinvestment and reform initiative, should set a new and better basis for the development of effective public services. The draft Budget includes provision for the substantial cost pressures affecting the Health Service, which is the agreed priority of the Assembly, and for some vital improvements in its services. It provides for important new developments in education, sport and agriculture. We have developed a new way to ensure that Invest Northern Ireland (INI) has the resources needed for industrial development. The Budget also addresses the problem of underspend, and it will provide a better basis for the stable planning of public services.

However, that is not the entire story of all the opportunities that the Executive are creating. Later in the autumn there will be new plans, under the reinvestment and reform initiative, to address the infrastructure deficit. Those will be developed more in the light of our consideration of the points emerging from the review on rating policy and the "Financing Our Future" consultation exercise, which are concluding. This will be the main means of enhancing the remaining priority programme of roads and transport and the wider issue of infrastructure, which includes essential provision for water and sewerage services.

I will start by placing my statement in the formal context of the approach to planning that is set out in the agreement. The proposals are made on behalf of the Executive. We have had detailed and, at times, difficult discussions about them. Each Minister who has attended the Executive has participated in thoughtful and constructive discussion on the public services that we oversee. I also had helpful bilateral discussions with the Minister for Regional Development and the Minister for Social Development. The fundamental assumptions that underlie the proposals, and especially the approach that we are taking to the infrastructure issue, have been fully discussed with all Ministers.

In accordance with paragraph 20 of strand one of the agreement, the Executive agreed a draft Programme for Government, incorporating an agreed Budget, at their meeting on 19 September 2002. The spending plans have been designed to deliver the priorities and actions in the draft Programme for Government that was presented to the Assembly yesterday by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and which will be subject to debate later today. The programme has set the context for our budgetary decisions.

In line with section 64 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I am today laying the Budget for 2003-04 before the Assembly on behalf of the Executive, for scrutiny and approval after examination and debate in the Committees and in the Chamber. The draft Budget sets out spending plans for the three years from 2003-04 and shows how we propose to use the funding that is now available following the Chancellor of the Exchequer's announcement about the outcome of the spending review in July 2002.

Obviously, we cannot bind the next Assembly. As required by the 1998 Act, specific Budget proposals for the year ahead will continue to be brought forward each year. However, we hope that the three-year plans announced today will set a more stable framework for planning that will help Departments and other public bodies to make the best possible use of the resources that are available to them — subject to the process between now and December. The plans can, of course, be refined and amended in the light of changing circumstances.

As ever, we have had to live within the resources that are available to us. That means that we are not able to take forward all the areas of work that we would wish to. All Departments face serious pressures in meeting the demands and expectations of the public, and the Assembly, for high standards of public services. However, the choices that we have made will, I believe, provide a good basis for the future.

It is clear from the way that we have worked together on important issues over recent weeks that the institutions work, with strong commitment shown by all Ministers to the services for which they are responsible, including their Departments and the North/South bodies. The draft Budget shows that the agreement and devolution can work, and that means that we can ensure that the decisions that matter most to the people of Northern Ireland are taken in the Assembly and in the North/South Ministerial Council. The Executive have taken a major step forward with the preparation of the three-year plans, the publication of which is a visible demonstration of collective working by a unique Administration. We must act radically to ensure that public services are being delivered as effectively as possible. Reform is a major theme in the draft Programme for Government published yesterday. It is at the heart of the Executive's draft Budget proposals.

The Assembly has enormous responsibilities to ensure that there are real changes in the way in which services are delivered. The agreement sets out some guiding principles that we must promote, such as real equality of opportunity for all in our community. We have to celebrate and sustain the dedication of the public sector and ensure that the contribution that we draw from the private sector is appropriate and that it is accountable. Our view of partnership includes working with the voluntary and community sectors to promote real benefits at local level in social and economic development. Every sector has expertise and commitment to contribute. We need to find ways of working that draw the best from all who can play a part, and motivate them to serve the public interest.

The reform agenda includes looking hard at the scope to cut out waste and reduce bureaucracy. Resources are never sufficient to meet the needs and aspirations of our people. We must manage programmes so that taxpayers can see that they are getting value for money. We need to pay attention to what the Public Accounts Committee says about the delivery of services. The Executive are zealous for action to be taken to improve and reform administration. A key part of the reform agenda will be the review of public administration, which will ensure that we act to modernise our structures and management of public services. That, alongside radical change within the 11 Departments, can and must streamline our ways of working. That is why every proposal in the draft Budget is subject to the preparation of satisfactory reform plans by all Departments by the end of October.

Let me be clear: the allocations for any programme could change upwards or downwards as a result of that further work. That includes the general testing for best value for money that always applies to any spending allocation — through the appropriate use of appraisals and business cases — to ensure that we make the most effective use of all the resources available. We recognise that Departments are already pursuing ideas and practices, but a step change is also needed. Preparing those plans will not be a problem when actions are being developed and pursued. Far from requiring a new bureaucratic exercise, I see that as a combination of new actions as well as a compilation of innovative and creative actions already under way — not least, action to make public service agreements more effective tools to focus management on what the Executive and the Assembly want to see achieved.

I have my own ideas on how to promote the efficient and effective delivery of public services, and I will discuss those with Executive Colleagues in the near future. The approach to reform should include a better and more open definition of how services will be delivered to the highest possible standard by a better focus on outputs and outcomes. To emphasise the links, the targets in the public service agreements are set out in the draft Budget document for the first time.

The reform plans will have to include clear evidence that the problem of rising administrative costs is being addressed. Substantial increases were necessary, given the fundamental changes in the system with the creation of the new institutions and the major workload increases that resulted. We also need to recognise that substantial costs arise as a result of the demands of the Assembly and that some increases are vital as part of how we implement the services that we provide to the public. However, that needs to be examined rigorously, and I have set out clear plans for challenges to Departments on that front.

I, therefore, propose that we take a new approach. We need to differentiate between costs that arise, mainly in agencies, from providing services to the public or in support of those functions and the central functions within Departments that are about the conduct of policy, planning and accountability to Ministers, the Assembly and its Committees, and related support services.

10.45 am

In the case of agencies, we shall require all Departments to show what has been done to ensure that those business areas have become more efficient over the last three years and what is planned for the future, expressed in the form of clear targets. The Executive expect those to show improvements of at least 2% a year on an appropriate measure of efficiency, or significantly more in some cases. In some cases, however, there may be workload increases where savings are reinvested in service delivery.

For departmental cores, we must ensure that there are real improvements in the way we do business, without exacerbating the very real demands that have been placed on the system. The Executive have, therefore, on my recommendation, decided to ask Departments to examine the implications of a 1% reduction in the running costs of departmental cores.

The Executive have decided to take forward positively the opportunities presented by the reinvestment and reform initiative. Projects to the value of £270 million, using the initial funding available, have already been announced, and it is vital to continue the momentum. This draft Budget is the first time that there has been a real choice in how to address the infrastructure issue.

There can be no doubt that a way must be found to resolve the serious deficits that we have inherited. The sewerage system is simply inadequate for a developing society. The changes necessary in the health sector include major hospital developments. The regional transportation strategy sets out a major programme of investment, elements of which are essential to underpin the development of the economy, and too many schools remain in poor and decaying premises. Those are real problems that impact on the people we serve.

We looked hard at the cuts in recurrent services that would be necessary to start a substantial investment programme using only the spending power of the departmental expenditure limit (DEL), without borrowing under the reinvestment and reform initiative or the use of public-private partnerships (PPPs). It became very clear that such an approach was not realistic.

That alternative looked superficially attractive to the Department for Regional Development, in that the DEL would have been skewed significantly towards that Department, which has the largest infrastructure backlogs. It is clear, however, that substantially more could be done for transport and water with the reinvestment and reform initiative than without it.

It is a delusion to believe that we can solve those problems without the use of the reinvestment and reform initiative. Even if we achieve — as we must — substantial improvements in efficiency and delivery of services, and manage public assets much more effectively, the DEL on its own will not suffice.

Thus, a vital foundation for the draft Budget is that the necessary increase in infrastructure investment will come from the borrowing power available through the reinvestment and reform initiative and/or public-private partnerships. The Executive will consider shortly how PPPs, as one — but only one — possible means, can contribute to the solution, assuming that an acceptable policy framework can be set. Such a framework must also take account of the genuinely held concerns about the rights of transferred workers. The outcome of consultation must be considered before that can be taken any further. I am determined that we do not simply operate a hand-me-down PPP approach from London. Moreover, any decision must be based on a very careful consideration of the resources necessary to service PPPs.

Borrowing under the reinvestment and reform initiative will depend on generating sufficient revenue to provide the income stream to service the necessary finance. If the Executive and the Assembly decide to follow the route provided by that initiative, we must meet the Treasury's condition that there must be some change in our level of revenue. It would not, however, be fair to pursue that change through the existing domestic rating system, and, therefore, I reassure Members that the regional rate will not be increased above the pattern of recent years unless, and until, a fairer system is in place. For 2004-05 and 2005-06, we must reflect carefully on the comments on the review of rating policy and determine a fair and appropriate means of securing access to borrowing to ensure that a realistic capital programme can be established.

It is not possible, therefore, to set definitive targets now for the levels of borrowing or for the use of public-private partnerships. Too many important issues of policy and practice need to be considered first. Hence, the draft Budget covers only part of our spending plans, albeit the largest part. Later in the autumn, with the assistance of the strategic investment body, and building on proposals from the Committee for Finance and Personnel, we will follow it up with a fuller Executive investment strategy that will draw upon the outcomes of the review of rating policy and "Financing our Future" consultation exercises.

Thus, the provision in the draft Budget for infrastructure for 2004-05 and 2005-06 is not sufficient or satisfactory, and the allocations shown in the draft Budget document should be seen in that light. More is needed for the capital programmes for roads, hospitals, water and sewerage, schools, further and higher education and economic infrastructure. However, more funds will be made available through the new opportunities created by the reinvestment and reform initiative.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

Reform is also at the heart of the infrastructure programme. The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister will introduce legislation soon to create a strategic investment board. The board will secure innovation and expertise in the development and financing of capital programmes to support and sustain the Executive's most urgent strategic projects and priorities.

The draft Budget represents an important stage, because our foundation for setting priorities is much better than before. Two years ago, it was more difficult to break away from previous patterns, partly because we did not have the necessary analysis of the spending programmes. Last year, we began to chart our own course, and we carved out £125 million from the indicative allocations for 2003-04 to ensure that this year we would retain the maximum scope to set our own distinctive priorities.

Over the past months, the Executive have carried out a series of needs and effectiveness evaluations, covering health and social care; education; financial assistance to industry; housing; and vocational education and training. The relevant Assembly Committees have assessed the findings, and a further study is progressing on culture, arts and leisure. The studies were important in helping the Executive to judge the effectiveness of the delivery of our public services. They have also helped us to determine the extent to which the Barnett formula is meeting our needs and have pointed to areas where there is scope for improving the way in which we deliver services.

Inevitably, there is a tendency to focus on the findings that emerge from these studies on how spending here compares to that in England, and we will provide updated figures on that shortly. However, I urge everyone to look at the other findings just as carefully, especially those that deal with effectiveness issues, and to remember that we have no intention of simply replicating English patterns of public service resourcing.

The needs and effectiveness evaluations help us to judge priorities and ascertain what must be done to improve effectiveness, and they will strengthen our work on reform. In the light of all the evidence, we have agreed that we should continue to prioritise health, education and transport, and we must also take full account of the urgent need to address the funding of water and sewerage services.

The settlement that we have received for the next three years is based on the Barnett formula. Our concerns about that are well known, and we presented a strong case to the Treasury during the spending review. Our case for reforming the Barnett formula rests on the fact that it does not give us sufficient resources to match the level of development of public services that is happening in England, especially in the present period of rapid growth.

However, we should not underestimate the importance of Barnett to the Treasury. We must be aware that many in England see it as far too favourable to Northern Ireland. Their argument is that our spending is the highest of any region, and the revenue raised is well below the English average. Our figures suggest that we will only fall behind English resource levels, when need is taken into account, over the years ahead. Given that, it is wrong to assume that making the case against Barnett is easy. Discussions are, of course, continuing, and I met the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Paul Boateng, again last week during his visit to Belfast. I have also written to him, with the Executive's agreement, to press for further work to be done on some matters between now and the next spending review.

The spending power that is available for services here was largely determined in the Chancellor's spending review announcement of July. That announcement included additions through the Barnett formula of £127 million in 2003-04 for resources, rising to £809 million in 2005-06. There were also capital additions of £22 million in 2003-04, rising to £122 million in 2005-06. Those are the first spending plans to be set on the full basis of resource budgeting, with the opportunity cost of capital and depreciation included in the departmental expenditure limit.

The spending review outcome has provided for 5.9% annual average growth for the Northern Ireland Executive's departmental expenditure limit. While many of the costs that affect public services are rising at a faster rate than general inflation, that builds on the allocation of 5.8% in 2002-03, or around 3% above general inflation, and the 5.5% real-terms increase in 2001-02.

We must leave no room for doubt that we are making the best of the resources that we have available. I have already explained our intentions for reform and review of administration costs. However, we can also act to make better use of assets and address the problem of underspending.

Departments and other public bodies have substantial asset holdings. We are working to bring together improved information about those to ensure that asset management is improved.

The strategic investment board will have a key part to play, and its work must begin without delay. The task will include preparing a useable summary of the asset holdings of Departments to provide a clear picture of all assets that could be recycled or used in different ways. With the assistance of the board, exacting targets will be set to ensure that surplus assets are sold and that Departments and their public bodies retain only those assets that are essential to their core business.

11.00 am

While that work lays the ground for a detailed examination of our asset holdings, action must now be taken to ensure that the scope to recycle assets sales is maximised in the shorter term. It has been agreed that targets for assets sales will be included in the draft Budget, amounting to £9 million in 2003-04, £10 million in 2004-05 and £12 million in 2005-06. Targets will be set for specific Departments in the revised Budget.

The problem of underspending must also be addressed. It has proved useful to have in-year savings to help address new pressures as they arise, such as winter pressures in the Health Service, or an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease. However, the present pattern means that resources are being drip-fed rather than spent on a planned longer-term basis and thus cannot be used as effectively.

The draft Budget sets out a radical approach to the problem. First, the right priorities must be set to ensure stable plans. That has been achieved in the draft Budget this year, due to the improved foundations available from the needs and effectiveness evaluations. I previously placed before the Assembly the key actions the Department will be taking on underspending, which will include a tougher challenge to sectors where high percentage underspends recur.

A further key step is to recognise that a degree of underspending is inevitable. The Executive have, therefore, assumed that that will continue to some extent and have decided, when making allocations to programmes, to anticipate an underspend of at least £80 million in 2003-04 and £75 million in each of the following two years. Spending plans will be set at a level that exceeds the spending power available through the departmental expenditure limits, in the knowledge that Departments will undershoot by at least those amounts. I have weighed this approach carefully and am satisfied that it is prudent.

We expect to have less room to manoeuvre in monitoring rounds, and there will be less end-year flexibility from now on. All Departments must, therefore, manage the resources that emerge from the Budget process on the basis that each allocation is a limit and that resources must be managed so as to avoid any risk of exceeding that limit. The positive effect is that priority programmes will have a better, more stable basis for planning and will not have to rely on a drip feed of resources via monitoring and end-year flexibility.

Before considering the proposals for each Department, I will say a little about the Executive programme funds, which are a key element of the Executive's determined strategy to ensure that spending plans are adjusted from previous patterns and that money is spent in line with the Executive's strategic priorities, as set out in the Programme for Government. The Executive programme funds are designed to promote cross-cutting work to enable proposals and initiatives to be brought forward for consideration by an appropriate group of Ministers, working together. The special allocations from those funds, managed and approved at Executive level, have made a real difference from previous patterns of expenditure.

In the draft Budget, we have decided that some key policy initiatives and developments should be funded from the Executive programme funds, ahead of the routine round of bids currently under consideration. Those include the vision group strategy for agriculture, new action on student support, some key interventions in the Health Service, and the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure's sports strategy. We also agreed that some actions funded originally from Executive programme funds should continue to receive funds from that source in 2004-05 and 2005-06. Although that would leave less money for new proposals, we would seek to restore the Executive programme funds totals if new resources become available.

I now turn to the main features of the departmental allocations. The proposed allocations are driven fundamentally by the priorities that the Executive set, which were agreed by the Assembly, and by our essential responsibilities. The available resources fall short of Departments' bids and of the growth rate of expenditure in England. Although there is substantial growth in the departmental expenditure limit, the extra money is largely required to sustain basic services.

I shall keep my comments on each Department's position brief. More comprehensive details can be found in the departmental sections of the draft Budget document, which Members have received, and Ministers will provide further details in due course.

The proposed allocation to the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development represents an increase of 13% for 2003-04 on the allocations for 2002-03. The Executive decided to allocate amounts from the innovation and modernisation Executive programme fund, rising from £6 million in 2003-04 to £18.3 million in 2005-06 for the implementation of the vision group report. My Executive Colleagues and I are firmly committed to funding adequately the implementation of that significant strategic report. The Executive will consider further the precise details of the action plan for the vision group report later in the autumn, ahead of a fuller announcement by the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development. The aim is to develop a secure, well-trained workforce and a focused agrifood sector that would enable the industry to compete more effectively. The proposals would also provide the Department with a more realistic baseline for its animal health responsibilities.

The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure would receive £96.6 million in 2003-04 — an increase of 9.9%. The draft Budget would enable that Department to develop several key initiatives, including the implementation of its sports strategy, which is important to many in the Assembly. The strategy includes action on safety at sports grounds, measures to increase participation, and a new soccer strategy aimed at developing the game in Northern Ireland.

The proposed allocations for the Department of Education would see expenditure rise to £1528.6 million in 2003-04, an increase of 6.6% on the allocations for 2002-03. That figure includes allocations announced previously from the Executive programme funds and the reinvestment and reform initiative. The allocation would rise further to £1597.5 million by 2005-06. Given that the school population is falling significantly, that allocation shows that we continue to treat school budgets as a key priority.

Further support will be provided to improve the capacity of schools to achieve further improvements in pupil performance, and for the implementation of revisions to the Northern Ireland curriculum.

Recently announced allocations from the reinvestment and reform initiative will help address the backlog in schools' infrastructure needs. Indeed, our schools estate is expected to be a major beneficiary of future funding by the reinvestment and reform initiative.

The draft Budget would provide the Department for Employment and Learning with £669.8 million for 2003-04, representing an increase of 6.2% since 2002-03, and projected to rise to £714.7 million for 2005-06. The allocation would enable the Department to maintain existing commitments to higher and further education and student support, and employment programmes would be broadly maintained. It includes allocations from the Executive programme funds to meet the cost of the student support review, beyond 2003-04, at the levels agreed by the Executive in 2000. The allocation would also provide for improved student support arrangements, to widen access to third level education for students from lower income families through changes to income thresholds and increases in the level of grants. This shows the Executive's commitment to improving equality of opportunity and to targeting social need as our key priority for higher education. We are also providing for further investment in the essential skills strategy, to tackle literacy and numeracy problems as identified in the work of the employability task force.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment suggested a radical approach to the planning of resources for his Department, which we have adopted to reflect the reality that it is difficult to predict in advance its needs and opportunities for industrial development support. Instead of setting a single fixed budget for each year, the plans are expressed as a range.

The approach makes allowance for the fact that much of the selective/financial assistance business of Invest Northern Ireland is subject to volatility, which makes it difficult to fix precise budgetary allocations at the planning stage. This approach is intended to confirm that resources are, and will be, available if projects emerge for which financial assistance would be effective and beneficial, while removing the need to tie up resources that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment may not ultimately require – that would have limited the scope to allocate adequate budgets to other priorities.

The range between the minimum and maximum figures will be £40 million in 2003-04 and £50 million in each of the two later years. For 2003-04, the high end of the range is higher than the budget for 2002-03, and is probably the maximum that could be required in the present economic climate. This commitment would be underpinned by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment having a guaranteed first call on funding in-year up to the high end of the range, to support investment projects offering value for money that would not be otherwise affordable within the minimum Invest Northern Ireland budget. We are adopting a similar approach to the jobskills and New Deal budgets for the Department of Employment and Learning.

The budget for my own Department would provide funding of £165 million for 2003-04, rising to £184.6 million for 2005-06. This would enable the Department of Finance and Personnel to maintain service levels to the public and other Departments, meet inescapable increases in rent, rates and fuel costs, and maintain the overall office estate. It would also provide the resources necessary to ensure the continued effectiveness of key systems to meet the objectives of the Executive for modern public services and ensure fair and efficient systems for raising local revenues.

The largest single programme within our departmental expenditure limit is, of course, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The draft Budget would see expenditure by that Department rise by 13.6% since 2002-03 to £3,060.9 million in 2003-04.

11.15 am

That includes allocations announced previously from the Executive programme funds and the reinvestment and reform initiative. This is undoubtedly the lion's share of the Budget and shows clearly the priority we have given to the Health Service. The year-on-year increase for health in England for 2003-04 is 10%, so we have acted to close the gap. This has meant adding very substantially to the resources read across from the Health Service in England via Barnett — by amounts rising from around £70 million in 2003-04 to over £100 million in 2005-06. This shows both the problem with Barnett and the extent of our commitment to health as a priority. With less, we have done more.

In 2003-04, this would provide an additional £365.4 million — [Interruption].

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr McCartney, if you wish to indulge in a prolonged conversation, please do so outside and not in the Chamber.

Mr McCartney: Go away —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr McCartney, I will not speak to you again.

Dr Farren: In 2003-04, this would provide an additional £365.4 million in resources compared to 2002-03. That is a significant increase, most of which is needed to meet the particular cost pressures facing the Health Service in the coming year. The proposals would enable the Department not only to maintain its services, at an additional cost of £284 million, but also to invest in some key service enhancements, including major capital projects such as the building of the new regional cancer centre. In the future we expect that the Department will be able to make major inroads into tackling the historical infrastructure deficit throughout the health and personal social services and the Fire Authority estate through the reinvestment and reform initiative.

The plans earmark resources to tackle the problem of waiting lists and to invest more in intermediate care and primary care. That would help free up acute hospital beds, easing the pressure in the acute sector. Additional resources are being made available for the care of the elderly, for those with mental health problems and learning disabilities and for children's services. The message of the draft Budget is clear: The Executive are putting the Health Service very clearly at the top of their agenda.

As with other spending areas, the plans for health and personal social services will involve a major programme of reform. This will build on the recent policy and operational proposals discussed by the Executive, including changes in acute hospitals, primary care, the board/trust structures and health promotion.

The draft Budget would provide an increase of 10% in 2003-04 for the Department of the Environment above the 2002-03 allocation. That would enable the Department of the Environment to advance work on the implementation of EU Directives, including those on waste management, thus reducing the risk of infraction proceedings. Increases to the district council resource grant enable the level of support to district councils to be maintained, particularly for those with low revenue bases. That will allow them to maintain services without unacceptable rises in rates.

The draft Budget would provide the Department for Regional Development with £591.2 million for 2003-04, an increase of 4.3% over the 2002-03 allocation. That includes the allocation for that Department announced in July from the first round of decisions from the reinvestment and reform initiative. The proposals for 2004-05 and 2005-06 are affected by the fact that we have not settled precisely how we will continue the reinvestment and reform initiative investment programme for infrastructure projects beyond 2003-04. The draft Budget assumes that the increases in the Department for Regional Development's capital investment requirements for 2004-05 onwards would be met substantially through the reinvestment and reform initiative. That would begin to address many of the pressures on the Department for the improvement of the water and transportation infrastructures.

The proposed allocations would allow the Department for Regional Development to advance some transportation infrastructure improvements in 2003-04 in support of the regional transportation strategy. It would also allow the Roads Service to enhance its Programme for Government targets for structural maintenance and to commence some minor road projects.

The draft Budget proposals would allow the Water Service to improve water quality and waste water treatment to meet public service agreement compliance targets, to construct a cryptosporidium barrier and to reduce water leakage. In the future, the reinvestment and reform initiative should enable significant extra resources to be made available for infrastructure, and I look forward to the outcome of the Minister for Regional Development's continuing study of the future needs and structure of the Water Service.

The Department for Social Development would be provided with resources in 2003-04 of £569.5 million, an increase of 4.2%, rising to £616.3 million by 2005-06. That substantial increase would enable the Social Security Agency and the Child Support Agency to proceed in parity with GB and to deliver the welfare reform programme, which includes the introduction of the new "card at the post office" arrangements for the payment of social security benefits as part of the replacement of existing paper-based systems.

The Department for Social Development would be able to fulfil the requirement to augment its special needs management allowance budget to assist people who require support to live in their own homes. It would also be able to meet its target of new housing starts in the social sector and to make an in-depth study of how well the pilot group housing schemes meet the needs of travellers. There would be provision to help alleviate fuel poverty through the warm homes scheme, which is aimed at people in need in owner-occupied and private rented accommodation, in parallel with the similar initiative in the public sector that is already proceeding under the reinvestment and reform initiative.

For the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, the draft Budget proposes departmental expenditure totalling £38.6 million in 2003-04, rising to £43.3 million in 2005-06. That would fund the review of public administration and enable the establishment of the office of the commissioner for children and young people with the roll-out of the 10-year strategy for children and young people.

It would enable the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to meet the important Programme for Government commitment regarding the needs of victims and to take forward the single equality Bill and the additional duties imposed on the Equality Commission.

Some £3 million a year will be needed to take forward the emerging community relations strategy that deals with the acute problems currently faced in north Belfast. I am not proposing to set aside mainstream provision for that now, as many aspects must be clarified. However, I will be strongly recommending that the necessary resources should be provided from the Executive programme funds when they are required.

Finally, the Budget proposals include provision for the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Assembly Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints and the Office for the Regulation of Electricity and Gas. Provision has also been made for the Assembly itself, though I have not as yet received a detailed breakdown of requirements across the three years. Accordingly, I recognise that some additional provision may need to be made for the Assembly within the revised Budget.

Those are the main features of the spending proposals. As well as the Treasury allocation for Northern Ireland, the plans are supported by the revenue from the regional rate.

This year the Executive agreed to keep increase levels in line with the pattern of recent years. Their proposed increases are 6% for the domestic regional rate and 3.3% for the non-domestic regional rate. That decision recognises that the cost of public services is rising much faster than general inflation. However, it is in line with our commitment not to increase the rates above the pattern of recent years until we have considered in detail the outcome of the rating policy review.

This morning we begin the most important stage of consultation on the spending plans for the next three years. Once again, in response to recommendations from the Committee for Finance and Personnel last December, the Executive have fulfilled their commitment to make Budget proposals straight after the summer recess to maximise the Assembly's opportunity to fulfil its scrutiny role as envisaged in the agreement and in section 64 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The First Minister and the Deputy First Minister presented the Executive's position report to the Assembly on 5 June. The Executive sought views from the Assembly and the community about the key issues affecting public services. Although the timetable has been tight, we received many thoughtful contributions, which influenced our thinking as we constructed the Programme for Government and the draft Budget. I am especially grateful to the Committee for Finance and Personnel for the attention that it paid to those issues. Once again, the Committee's commentary on the position report has been particularly helpful, and other Committees have commented extensively.

I am grateful for the positive contributions that we have received from social partner organisations and other interested parties. We will reflect carefully on the suggestions and look forward to further responses on the draft Budget.

Last year we received valuable input during this phase, and I look forward to further informed discussion, debate, and, in particular, Committee scrutiny of our spending plans and proposals as set out in the draft Budget. The Committee for Finance and Personnel has a role in drawing together and facilitating the consultation. That process will include opportunities for debate in the Chamber on the Programme for Government today, and on the draft Budget in a few weeks' time.

Today's statement is also the start of a wider consultation process. The draft Programme for Government and Budget will be circulated widely to the Civic Forum and our social partners in business, the trade unions and the voluntary and community sector and will be made available to other interested individuals and groups.

The draft Budget marks an important step forward for our new institutions. Our previous Programmes for Government and Budgets marked the beginning of a move from pre-devolution patterns and priorities. This Budget, with its emphasis on reform, represents a radical departure.

In conclusion, I reiterate the four main characteristics of this Budget. First, it is reform-driven. Secondly, it represents a radical departure from previous spending plans to meet the priorities established by the Assembly.

Thirdly, it is developmental. We are doing more than simply maintaining existing services; we are developing new services in key areas. Fourthly, the Budget recognises that we still have unmet needs and inadequate resources. I shall continue to make the case for a full and rigorous examination of the Barnett formula. Taken together, those four elements put in place a framework for our spending plans for the next three years and lay the foundations for the delivery of better services with resources directed where the needs are greatest.

We are determined to introduce and promote reform across Government. That will not be easy. It represents a real challenge, which we are pursuing with determination.

11.30 am

I commend the Budget proposals to the Assembly and invite Members to consider them carefully. I look forward to working with the Assembly to complete the process of settling the spending plans in December 2002. The proposals represent a major step forward for the Administration and are a clear manifestation of the benefits for local people that arise from the agreement.

The plans outlined in the draft Budget represent the outcome of the lengthy and intense process of discussion and negotiations that involve all ministerial Colleagues — those who do not attend Executive meetings as well as those who do. The process and the outcome stand in marked contrast to the negative rhetoric and pressure from anti-agreement forces in our society. The draft Budget offers a powerful challenge to negative forces in the House and to the paramilitaries and political wreckers on the outside.

Instead of flinching before both pressures, all pro-agreement parties should take confidence from what the Budget shows we can achieve together, and they should determine to build and develop partnerships that have brought us to this point. People on all sides are the beneficiaries of what we can achieve together. By working together, many thousands will benefit from improvements in the health and social services; children and their teachers will enjoy better accommodation and facilities in their schools; further and higher education students and trainees will have enhanced support to access educational and training opportunities; people of all ages will benefit from improved sporting and recreational facilities; and the farming and rural community will be offered new opportunities through the vision report.

Mr McCartney: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I shall not take a point of order when the Minister is speaking, but I shall after he has spoken.

Mr McCartney: He has finished his statement.

Dr Farren: I am entitled to comment on my statement. The travelling public will benefit from new and improved transport facilities and infrastructure; the homeless will benefit from better services and accommodation; and the unemployed will benefit from new job opportunities. To put all that at risk through a failure of nerve to persist with the Good Friday Agreement or through failing to meet obligations freely and willingly undertaken to rid our society of paramilitaries would be a profound betrayal of the hopes and aspirations that have been democratically expressed by the overwhelming majority of our people, who supported the Good Friday Agreement. I commend the draft Budget to the Assembly.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his detailed statement on the draft Budget and for his explanation of his plans. I also commend him for the good working relationship that he has with the Committee, as shown during the preparation of the draft Budget. The Committee and the Minister have worked well together.

The draft Budget is one stage of the process, and it is important that each Department's Budget allocation be spread across every aspect of that Department. For example, the Department of Finance and Personnel has rural and urban considerations. It is important that investment be made west of the Bann to ensure that that area has proper facilities and services in future.

The Minister recognises that the draft Budget is not the complete picture. The reinvestment and reform initiative, the strategic investment body, departmental reforms and asset management still have to be implemented. To what extent will those parts of the jigsaw be in place in time for the revised Budget?

What actions will continue to be funded from the Executive programme funds? Are they cross-departmental? The emphasis in the draft Budget is on reform, but to what extent have the findings of the needs and effectiveness evaluations informed and influenced the draft Budget? There must be a major injection of funding for water and sewerage services. In what way has the Chancellor been influenced by the high expenditure that was allocated to water and sewerage services in England, Scotland and Wales? Was that allocation made in here before privatisation in England, Scotland and Wales? If not, was an allocation made to the Water Service here before privatisation in England in 1989? If that money was not spent on water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland, how was it spent? Areas that have been neglected in the past —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Molloy, please draw your remarks to a close. This is an opportunity to ask questions, not to make a statement.

Mr Molloy: I am asking questions.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind you, Mr Molloy, that the Minister need answer only one question.

Mr Molloy: The Minister can choose that if he wishes, but I am quite certain that he will answer more than one question. The draft Budget now goes to Committees for consideration, and I ask the Minister to ensure that they receive all the information they need to enable them to respond.

Dr Farren: Once again, I express my deep appreciation to the Chairperson and members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel for the close co-operation and engagement that they have developed with me over the past months. I particularly appreciate the Committee's contribution to the position report.

Mr Molloy asked several questions. I assure him that all Departments are responsible for ensuring that there is a strong TSN element, and it is an obligation, under the Good Friday Agreement, to maintain that. Therefore, investment in programmes must be directed where the need is greatest, be that west or east of the Bann. Ministers are obliged to meet the needs identified in accordance with TSN and equity principles.

Mr Molloy asked about future spending plans, which are dependent on proposals in the reinvestment and reform initiative. Work is ongoing on the next set of allocations, and they will be presented to the Assembly and Committees before the revised Budget. At revised Budget stage, future spending plans for three years will be clearly identified, and Members will have had the opportunity for discussion and consultation.

The needs and effectiveness studies were used to inform our approach. There are many other considerations that we have to bear in mind, and they flow directly from the priorities set by the Executive and agreed by the Assembly to determine the precise nature of allocations. The needs and effectiveness studies are a new departure, and are currently being examined by Committees. I trust that both the needs and effectiveness elements will be considered carefully.

There has been considerable investment in the Water Service over the years, but it has been insufficient to provide the level of infrastructure needed for a water and sewerage service that complies with European standards. There is, therefore, a considerable deficit. We must address how we can meet those needs most effectively.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I call for the next question, I remind Members that one hour has been allocated for the Minister's statement. Please bear in mind that, if Members ask long questions, and the Minister delivers long answers, Members from smaller parties will have no opportunity to ask questions.

Mr Beggs: The Minister said that Sir Reg Empey, the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, suggested a radical approach to planning resources in his Department by setting upper and lower limits. First, does the Minister of Finance and Personnel believe that the reform will reduce levels of underspending in Departments, thus making better planned use of public finance? Secondly, will the Minister clarify the exact amount of the welcome and significant increase in expenditure on health? He mentioned 13·6%, but the table in the draft Budget statement shows a figure of 11·8%, either of which is significantly above inflation.

Finally, the Audit and Accountability Bill will allow the Comptroller and Auditor General to become the independent auditor of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Will the Minister confirm that that major reform will allow proper scrutiny of, and public confidence in, health spending?

Dr Farren: The proposals for a range of allocations specific to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment developed following discussions between Sir Reg Empey and myself. He is satisfied that the current projected needs can be met. The range applying to Invest Northern Ireland is to allow project proposals that require support that cannot be met from the bottom of the range allocation to be allocated resources to meet their requirements.

New proposals often have a long lead-in time, so their requirements are unlikely to emerge as a sudden pressure on the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Therefore, that approach to budgeting for new investment seemed prudent, and it has the full agreement of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I am satisfied that the Budget framework will allow him to meet the requirements of any forthcoming projects.

The Member asked about the allocation to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The draft Budget provides an uplift of over 13% in 2003-04 compared with this year's allocation. That includes allocations from the Executive programme funds and the reinvestment and reform initiative.

Accountability legislation is a matter for the Assembly to discuss when considering the Audit and Accountability Bill.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I congratulate the Minister on his draft Budget. I appreciate the value of the needs and effectiveness evaluations in helping to judge priorities. Therefore, my Committee and I welcome the fact that health is a top priority.

Will the Minister detail the percentage increase in healthcare spending and outline what new developments will be possible, over and above existing services? I am thinking in particular of the ongoing battle against diabetes in Northern Ireland.

Dr Farren: The first part of the Member's question relates to one from Mr Beggs, which I have just answered. The draft Budget provides for an uplift of 13% in 2003-04 from the 2002-03 allocation to the Department of Health. That increase should enable the Department to maintain a steady state with its current service provision.

I said that pressures are arising from cost increases, which must be met by the Department. Obviously part of the uplift to the Department is because of rises in costs. However, there will be an opportunity — and I think the Minister herself would agree — for a modest increase in service levels to accommodate the pressures from our growing population. The Minister can detail the improvements and developments which she will be able to take forward. It should also enable the Department to invest in key service developments in the areas of cancer, renal and cardiac services, waiting lists, the elderly, intermediate and primary care, best practice, best care, mental health, learning disability and services for children. On Dr Hendron's question on diabetes services, I refer him to the Minister for further information.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Rev Dr William McCrea): I must raise concern at the increase in the Department of the Environment's budget on page 64 — this will hardly enable the Department to meet the inescapable pressures to fund the implementation of EU Directives. I also note that the Department's overall percentage increase in 2004 will dip dramatically to 1·8%. Can the Minister assure the House that the Department's increases will be sufficient to enable it to meet the costs of urgent implementation of the EU Directives?

I now speak as an individual Member. The Minister stated that "we have agreed that we should continue to give priority to ... transport and also take full account of the urgent need to address the funding of water and sewerage services."

How does that sit with a 1·2% increase on the year 2003-04 while the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister receives a 14·5% increase?

Dr Farren: I hasten to assure the Member that the allocations to the Department of the Environment will, as my statement said, enable it to meet its ongoing responsibilities. Where new pressures arise, the Minister will quite obviously draw those to my attention and that of the Executive, and they will be given full consideration.

Regarding the pressures on transport, I said in my statement that the provision of facilities to borrow under the reinvestment and reform initiative will enable us most effectively and adequately to address the needs of the Department for Regional Development, which is of course responsible for transport. In my statement, and again in response to an earlier question, I said that spending plans regarding allocations under the reinvestment and reform initiative would be brought before the Assembly and Committees in the course of the coming weeks.

Mr Close: I certainly welcome the title of the Budget statement, 'A Budget for Reform', and I look forward to the necessary reforms on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland. I welcome the three-year planning concept, which is essential in trying to get our public finances correct, and the other reforms and initiatives that are being examined and put into practice. However, it will come as no surprise that if the Minister stubbornly continues to insist on an inflation-busting increase in the regional rate, then I will continue to stubbornly oppose that, particularly on the domestic regional rate.

Will the Minister assure us that the reform plans will not be an added layer of bureaucracy, bearing in mind that we have public service agreements, service delivery agreements, and so on? I am not knocking the reform; I seek only assurance that it will not become another layer of bureaucracy.

Much emphasis has been put on the needs and effectiveness evaluations, which have been completed and reported to the Committees. Would it not have been helpful to debate the evaluations in the House so that we, as an Assembly, could have had input in assessing the priorities and ensuring that they were correct? Will the Minister advise whether the evaluations were used in his discussions with Mr Paul Boateng, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, as regards assessing our priorities and ensuring that the Barnett formula would be changed? Even a cursory glance shows that the evaluations demonstrate the needs of the people of Northern Ireland. The issues should have been debated on the Floor of the House.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member that it is not an opportunity to make a speech but to ask questions.

Mr Close: Thank you for the reminder, Mr Deputy Speaker.

When does the Minister propose to have a debate on underspend, which he referred to in his statement? It is necessary that the House has a say on that.

Dr Farren: It comes as no surprise that Mr Close highlighted the first issue that he mentioned — and in the way that he did.

There would be an average increase of 26p a week for the domestic ratepayer: it may be more for some and less for others. However, people should consider the extra contribution in the light of the return that the Budget will make available. It will provide support for schools; it will make for a more effective, efficient and developed Health Service; it will provide additional support for students from low income backgrounds; and it will provide support for the rural and farming community. That community needs considerable investment, and it will be helped when the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development begins to implement her vision strategies.

There is a significant level of development. We are not at a standstill; we want to develop services. Members of the House echo and re-echo demands for improved and developed services. The people whom they represent would not deny an additional 26p a week to ensure that some of that development can be taken forward.

The intention with the reform initiatives — and I would like to think that it is obvious — is not to add to layers of bureaucracy, but to ensure that the administrative services which exist in the public sector are operating as effectively and as efficiently as possible, so that we can achieve the highest standard of service delivery.

The needs and effectiveness studies have been released to the Assembly for its consideration. Data is being updated to provide the most accurate figures possible. The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel suggested that officials be made available to meet other Committees to discuss the relevant studies. There is no reason why there should not be a full debate. The studies need to be considered carefully and digested by Members so that debate is well informed.

The Assembly is beginning to consider the draft Budget, so every element, including the underspend proposals, is open for questioning, discussion and deliberation in Committees and in the Assembly.

Ms Morrice: Youth and community relations need greater attention, given the current climate. Page 38 of the draft Budget shows the Department of Education's budget for youth and community relations. It is useful to compare those figures to the information on page 31 of the Budget for 2002-03. Why is the budget for youth and community relations in the draft Budget so small? Why will it be cut by 2005, when the Budget for 2002-03 stated that the provision would increase to £25.5 million in 2002-03? It has decreased to £24.8 million in 2003-04 and will go down again to £23.6 in 2004-05? Does the Minister not agree that that area is in desperate need of attention?

Dr Farren: The Minister of Finance and Personnel does not determine departmental priorities; they are determined by the Ministers responsible for the services in question. It is my responsibility to discuss allocations with each Minister, which I have done. Over the past few months, I have had more than one meeting with nearly every Minister. During those lengthy and detailed meetings each Minister's overall spending requirements were examined. Ministers set priorities in their own Departments. The draft Budget provides for the maintenance of existing service levels and the continuation of provision that was allocated under Executive programme funds. There will be further opportunities to access resources under Executive programme funds if the Minister of Education has submitted bids that apply to the Youth Service.

I do not suggest that provision for young people is adequate, but, given the development of the office of the children's commissioner and other provisions, there is more than that single departmental allocation.

Mr McCartney: The Minister's statement seems to make clear that the Executive have limited resources, that there is a substantial deficit in capital investment and that the Barnett formula allocations are barely sufficient to cover year-on-year planning.

12.00

Paragraph 66 of the Minister's statement reads

"As well as the Treasury allocation for Northern Ireland, the plans are supported by the revenue from the Regional Rate."

If those spending plans were to be supported by public-private partnerships and the reinvestment and reform initiative, financial servicing for the payment of capital and interest would be required. Will the source of those payments be rates? Does the Minister agree that the present system allows for a 6% year-on-year increase? Does he further agree that the purpose of the rating review — although it has been said that it is to devise a fairer system — is to provide additional money to fund interest payments? How much of an increase would be necessary, under a fairer system or otherwise, to support his spending proposals?

Dr Farren: Significant deficits exist, and we must meet them. As I said in my statement, the Department for Regional Development would have responsibility for a large proportion of the required additional investment. Some of the investment needs are met out of that departmental expenditure limit. We could have chosen a different route and suggested that all the capital expenditure should come from within the departmental expenditure limit. However, that would have significantly reduced the allocations for recurrent expenditure. Mr McCartney seems frequently to misunderstand what is required and how the money will be provided. We could meet approximately half of our investment needs — approximately £7 billion or £8 billion — from within the departmental expenditure limit over the next 10 years or so. However, the extra expenditure requirements cannot be met from that source, and that has motivated us to seek out additional, available facilities. The additional £6 billion that is needed could be raised through the reinvestment and reform initiative and public-private partnerships, depending on how we decide to proceed.

Let me make it clear: like anyone who borrows money, we cannot shirk our clear responsibility to service that borrowing. The Executive and all Departments, including the Department of Finance and Personnel, have an obligation to ensure that all borrowing is prudent and that the need for it has been carefully assessed.

I have it made it clear to the House on several occasions that until we have a fairer rating system, there will be no increases in current patterns, so borrowing will be sought from the resources available to us. It is up to the Executive and the Departments to agree on proposals to bring before the House. Ultimately, the House will decide how we proceed.

With respect to some of the major investment requirements, I indicated in my statement that I anticipate the advice and proposals from the Minister for Regional Development, particularly concerning the future needs and structuring of the Water Service. That Minister has already provided the regional transport strategy, which details his requirements and objectives over the next 10 to 15 years, and the same is awaited with regard to the Water Service.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr A Maginness): In general terms, I welcome the properly-titled 'Reform Budget'. There has been tremendous emphasis on the reinvestment and reform initiative in the draft Budget. With particular reference to water, does that depend on the Minister for Regional Development's ongoing study of the future needs and structure of the Water Service?

Dr Farren: The precise answer is yes. I have had discussions with the Minister for Regional Development in the run-up to the draft Budget, and I am aware —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Excuse me, Minister. Mr McCartney, having asked the Minister a question it is a gross discourtesy to move down there to join in a private conversation with Mr Close. I ask you to refrain from it.

Dr Farren: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am aware that studies are taking place in the Department for Regional Development on the needs and future plans for the Water Service. How imminent is their publication? I do not yet know, but until proposals are brought to my attention, it will not be possible to meet any needs identified by going beyond the allocations made in the draft Budget and in the reinvestment and reform initiative allocations that were announced in June.

Mr Weir: There has been much rhetoric, but the Budget will be judged on whether it delivers better public services in practice. Regarding detail, what we have heard has been somewhat disappointing. If the aim is to improve efficiency in public spending, why has no significant change or improvement been envisaged in the amount of underspending in each of the next three years?

In respect of regional development, sewerage and transport have been identified as two of the most pressing priorities. Why has the Department of Regional Development the second-lowest level of expenditure growth? Why is reliance placed only on the reinvestment and reform initiative? That means that the Department will have to work out its spending plans without knowing what its allocation of resources will be and when it will get them.

Will the Minister indicate whether any provision has been made in the Budget for digital hearing aids? That would bring provision here into line with that in many United Kingdom trusts.

Dr Farren: I trust that Mr Weir listened to my comments on the provisions in the draft Budget for the Department for Regional Development. I understand that today's proposals do not match the allocations that he believes should be made to the Department from the reinvestment and reform initiative. However, as I stated, Members will have ample time to consider the revised Budget. Therefore, it must be anticipated that the Department for Regional Development will receive the support that Mr Weir feels is necessary for its investment needs. Nevertheless, we must have some sense of what those needs are and of what reforms, especially in the Water Service, the Minister wants to advance. There is no question that, having recognised the considerable need for investment, the Executive will not make every effort to meet the Department's needs. Therefore, I trust that Mr Weir will take the assurance that my words offer as an indication of the seriousness with which we approach the infrastructural deficit, for which the Department for Regional Development has major responsibility.

Mr Weir referred also to underspend. The Executive's plans assume that there will be less underspend this year.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's unscripted remarks at the end of his statement. They were appropriate considering the weekend's events, which have left us in such an uncertain political climate. The Executive made health the priority in their Programme for Government. Does the Minister agree, therefore, that the increases of 13% for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development; 9.9% for the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure; 6.6% for the Department of the Environment; and only 13.6% for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; are adequate? Given the upcoming, long-awaited and long-overdue Fire Service pay increases, how much of that allocation will affect health in real terms?

I am concerned that in his reference to the allocation for the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure the Minister made no mention of moneys being allocated for the Irish language.

The Minister also said in his statement:

"the key actions the Department will be taking on underspending, which will include a tougher challenge to sectors where high percentage underspends recur."

To which sectors does the Minister refer?

Dr Farren: All Ministers in attendance at Executive meetings agreed the draft Budget. That is not to say that all Ministers did not want additional allocations to be made to their Departments. In my statement, I acknowledged that all of the submitted bids could not have been met; they would have exceeded the departmental expenditure limit. Therefore, last Thursday, after intense and detailed negotiations at ministerial and official level over the last few months, we agreed on the draft Budget.

The increases that have been made mean that, since devolution, and until March 2004, the Executive will have made almost an extra £1.1 billion available for health, social services and public safety. The uplift of 13% for 2003-04, which I mentioned in my statement, is not insignificant. I acknowledged that a considerable proportion of that uplift results from cost pressures that arise from salary and wage agreements, and pressures that are associated with drugs and with essential facilities and services.

Over and above that, allocations are being made that will enable the health services to improve and to develop in several key respects. I have already rehearsed those areas in response to earlier questions, and they are recorded in the Budget statement. I would like to think that anyone who looks objectively at the Executive's determination to meet their responsibilities to health services over the past three years can only conclude that we have worked hard to ensure that health services remain a priority. The Executive also want to ensure that health's priority status is reflected in the additional allocations that we have been making.

The draft Budget provides for a funding increase of almost 9% for the North/South Language Body, a body for which the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure is responsible.

Mr Bradley: I congratulate the Minister for putting his personal stamp on the evidence in the draft Budget.

In outlining allocations for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, the Minister mentioned funding increases for the agriculture industry. What does the draft Budget deliver for farmers? Will he tell the House what is the total allocation to the vision programme?

Dr Farren: The Executive are mindful of the pressures the farming community faces. Our response during the foot-and-mouth disease outbreak last year gave a clear indication of our determination to ensure that those pressures are dealt with effectively and adequately.

The draft Budget statement sets out the total allocation for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development for the three years until the implementation of its vision programme. We begin with an allocation of at least £6 million this year, which will enable it to be launched. The vision programme will bring considerable hope for a more secure future to the agricultural and rural community. It will enable initiatives to be taken on diversification, and it will underpin a strategy that the entire sector has been anticipating and that will bring positive results. That is a further indication of the Executive's determination to address the needs of the farming and rural community as effectively as possible.

Mr Morrow: I have listened with interest to what the Minister has said. He proposes to increase the health budget by 28%, the education budget by 14%, the roads budget by 11%, and the OFMDFM budget by 53·3%.

One could be forgiven for thinking that there is a staff shortage there but press reports give a different impression. It is also disappointing that the Minister has made only slight reference to savings by asking Departments to save 1%. Does he accept that money which could be put into services such as hospitals or into roads or education is being squandered? Will he undertake to take a serious look at the problem and carve out the wastage that has been going on here for years? It is very disappointing to discover that Departments are going to be asked about the implications of a 1% reduction.

Will the Minister also explain why he felt compelled to advise of an increase for OFMDFM? He stated that "Some £3 million a year will be needed to take forward the emerging community relations strategy."

He continues:

"I am not proposing to set aside mainstream provision for that now, as many aspects must be clarified. However, I will be strongly recommending that the necessary resources should be provided from the Executive programme funds when they are required."

Is the £9 million proposed in the Minister's statement included in the draft Budget?

Dr Farren: With respect to the Member's points about OFMDFM, the proposals will provide for an increase of £5 million, or 14·5%, in the amount available during 2003-04 over the previous year, 2002-03. The proposals for 2003-04 will also provide £1 million to take forward the review of public administration — a short-term review, which is a new requirement. They will also provide £2·1 million for the office of the children's commissioner, which a significant majority of Members are anxious to see established, and £0·4 million to take forward the Executive's strategy for Europe. Members frequently ask that we intensify and develop our relationships with the EU. All of the additional provisions are legitimate and will fund the types of development that Members wish to see taking place.

With respect to Mr Morrow's remarks about squandering and wastage, the Executive and I, as Minister of Finance and Personnel, are anxious to have an effective and efficient Administration and to have our public service agreements delivered effectively and efficiently to meet the targets. I reject the suggestion that public money is being squandered or wasted. Perhaps the Member would bring examples of that to my attention.

Mrs Courtney: I congratulate the Minister on his positive and comprehensive report. As my party's spokesperson on health matters, I would like to ask the Minister a question about the increase in the health budget. He, like his predecessor, has allocated extra resources to the health budget, and details of the total increase to the budget since devolution were given in answer to a previous question. What would that increase have been had he simply allocated the money according to the Barnett formula?

Dr Farren: Based on a simple read across, the Barnett increase would have provided no more than a 9% increase. As I said in response to several questions, the actual increase will be 13% or more, so we are clearly making determined efforts to put into effect our words about health being a priority.

Mr Dallat: I particularly welcome the announcement that £34·8 million will be made available over the next three years for the improvement of school standards. What will that mean for the one in four of the population who, in the past, were denied the basic right to literacy and numeracy?

Dr Farren: I recognise the concern that the Member frequently raises with regard to those with poor literacy and numeracy skills. If the Member examines the proposed allocations to essential skills programmes, he will see that strenuous efforts are being made to ensure the implementation of the strategy that Minister Hanna is developing in the Department for Employment and Learning. That strategy will be linked to initiatives being taken by the Department of Education to improve school standards.

Notwithstanding falling numbers of schoolchildren, the allocations to the Department of Education in particular will enable us to implement initiatives for the curriculum, and to ensure that efforts to improve standards continue and will be enhanced. When those are combined with Minister Hanna's initiative on essential skills, we will have a set of programmes that should ensure that we effectively address the scourge of low levels of literacy and numeracy, which is a real barrier to the realisation of potential and the achievement of career goals.

Mr Byrne: How will students' prospects be improved by the Budget? Will the Minister commit himself to continued support for students who wish to make progress in further and higher education?

Dr Farren: When I had responsibility for further and higher education and training, I was anxious to ensure that access would be enhanced, and that students from low-income backgrounds in particular would receive the maximum support. The student finance initiative that was undertaken two years ago bore its first fruits last year for students in further education, with the introduction of grants and bursaries for students at that level. That was followed this year with the introduction of similar grants for students in higher education. We did not stop there. We have continued to develop the support provided for such students, and we are now in a position to raise the threshold below which grants will be payable from £15,000 to £20,000 residual income, and to raise the level of grant assistance from £1,500 to a maximum of £2,000.

Across the community, parents, students and aspiring students of our further and higher education institutions will see that as a major step forward, and as a clear indication that the Executive want to make further and higher education opportunities available to all who have the ability and wish to avail themselves of those opportunities.

My Colleague Carmel Hanna, like other Ministers, will make further announcements on the allocations to the Departments over the coming days.

POINT OF ORDER

Ministerial Statements

Mr Speaker: It has been drawn to my attention that Mr McCartney raised a point of order as to whether ministerial statements may diverge from the published statement that is provided for Members in advance of the statement being made. Standing Order 18(1), of course, indicates that, where possible, a Minister shall make a written copy of the statement available as early as possible. But given that Ministers do, and I have to say in the majority of cases I think Ministers do try to ensure that statements are available as early as possible (they are not personal statements which do have to be cleared by the Speaker), it is not surprising, perhaps, that on occasion - and it does not happen very often - a matter may arise between the point when the statement is made available to Members and the point when it is actually being delivered, where the Minister may have something additional to add, or indeed to change, which may be in the interests of accuracy and of the Assembly. However, that being the case, I suggest to Ministers that it might be useful if, for all statements, there was the advice to "check against delivery". There would then be no misunderstanding on that point. I hope that addresses the Member's concerns.

CHILDREN (LEAVING CARE) BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the Children (Leaving Care) Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the State Pension Credit Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

DRAFT PROGRAMME FOR GOVERNMENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: It may be useful if I outline how I intend to facilitate the debate on the draft Programme for Government. The Business Committee has agreed that four and a half hours should be set aside for the debate. During the debate, I will see the number of Members who wish to speak, and I will then determine if a time limit is to be placed on the speeches.

The Deputy First Minister (Mr Durkan): I beg to move

That this Assembly takes note of the draft Programme for Government.

We presented the draft Programme for Government formally to the Assembly yesterday. It sets out the Executive's plans and priorities for next year and beyond. It is supported by the draft Budget, which the Minister of Finance and Personnel presented to the Assembly this morning. I am pleased that the Assembly has an early opportunity to debate the content of the Executive's draft programme. It is important to have this debate before the detailed work of scrutinising the document begins in the various Committees. I want to underline the importance that the Executive attach to this period of discussion and scrutiny on both the draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget. I will return to that theme shortly.

The Programme for Government is the most significant document produced each year by the Executive. Developing an agreed programme, and an agreed Budget that supports it, is a commitment that we made under the Good Friday Agreement. However, our commitment went further than simply producing a document. Those of us who signed up to the agreement also agreed that it needed to be subject to the Assembly's approval on a cross-community basis after scrutiny in Committees. It is partly for that reason that the document is as comprehensive as it is. It would not be right to expect the Assembly to approve the Executive's work programme without an appropriate level of detail to enable it to give that approval.

We wanted the Programme for Government to be both ambitious and achievable. For that purpose, we have worked to ensure that it reflects the key challenges that must be tackled and the backdrop against which our work will take place. Members will notice that for the first time the document includes a detailed commentary on the economic, social and environmental context. The proposals in the document have been developed and will be implemented in that context.

We have worked to ensure that the document also reflects the suggestions made in response to the Executive's position report on developing the Programme for Government and the Budget. We were grateful to those Committees and others who took time to respond with their views. Working within limited resources, it is never possible to do everything that we would like to do or that others would like us to do. We have not, therefore, been able to reflect in this draft every single suggestion that was made.

That said, we have tried wherever possible to take on board comments made and points raised. We will also be working over the coming weeks to incorporate further suggestions as we finalise the document and the Budget to support it. For example, we have noted the strong support for the five priorities that the Executive identify in their Programme for Government. We also believe that these priorities remain both relevant and important. We want to build on the progress that we have already made in each area. In this draft, we have, therefore, retained "Growing as a Community", "Working for a Healthier People", "Investing in Education and Skills", "Securing a Competitive Economy" and "Developing Relations — North/South, East/West and Internationally" as priorities. We also recognise that those priorities do not stand in isolation from one another. Our work to tackle social division is a key requirement if we are to create the basis for a competitive economy. Economic prosperity fairly shared is a key requirement if we are to heal many of the social problems that we face, including our poor health status.

Education and training are central to economic progress and to unlocking opportunities for individuals. The draft Budget increases health expenditure by 13.6% to more than £3 billion a year, which reflects the Executive's ongoing commitment to the Health Service. The Department of Education is to be given additional support to enhance schools' capacity to further improve pupil performance and to revise the curriculum.

The Department for Employment and Learning's budget has been increased to enable it to maintain and expand its commitment to higher and further education to ensure that, for the large part, employment programmes will be obtained. The Executive have made additional allocations from the Executive programme funds to provide improved student support arrangements and to widen access to third-level education for students from low-income families, through changes to income thresholds and increased grants. The threshold will be raised from £15,000 to £20,000, which will ensure that more than 3,000 additional students will qualify for support, and student grants will be increased from £1,500 to £2,000. We are building on the Executive's progress of several years ago, as we said we would, without recourse to a graduate tax that many others advocated.

Proposed allocations to the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development include resources from the service modernisation Executive programme fund to implement the vision report. Six million pounds have been set aside for that purpose in 2003-04, and funding will increase to £18.3 million in 2005-06.

The Executive are providing for the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to implement its sports strategy. In addition, we have devised a radical new approach to ensure that Invest Northern Ireland has the resources to encourage and support industrial development.

The retention of our five priorities provides an opportunity for continuity and stability. However, we also want change. The draft programme makes clear the Executive's desire to tackle underinvestment in our infrastructure and to reform public service delivery. Reinvestment and reform are core elements that must drive our work on all five priorities.

Reform is a watchword of our programme. We will be working constantly to improve the efficiency of service delivery to ensure that every penny of resources is targeted at where it is needed most, and where it can do most good. We will be challenging all Departments to make real and substantial improvements in service delivery. The reinvestment and reform initiative, which the First Minister and I negotiated, provides us with a unique opportunity to address the chronic underinvestment in our infrastructure. The £270 million that the Executive allocated initially for projects will make a valuable start to vital upgrades of hospitals, schools, transport and water and sewerage systems.

We want to ensure a stronger focus on tackling poverty and social exclusion, promoting sustainable development and building stronger partnerships. The draft programme sets out our thinking on each of those areas. We restate our commitment to open and accountable government. The draft programme contains more than 170 specific commitments that complement those made in our first two programmes. We will come back to the Assembly every year, as we did in July, to report publicly on progress in delivering those commitments.

We have included in the document draft public service agreements for each Department that contain many more specific targets. Again, we will report on the progress of those. We shall ensure that each Department has a service delivery agreement detailing the work to be done to progress the Programme for Government and to meet the public service agreement targets. Those documents will be available in draft form for scrutiny by Committees later this year.

We recognise the challenge of promoting good relations. Members also recognise that challenge, as they made clear in their responses to yesterday's statement. The document sets out our intention to introduce a new policy and strategy on good relations. It will include a focus on targeted action at local level in areas with acute community difficulties. We recognise the importance of local solutions and stand ready to support communities. It is not enough to tell people to sort out their own problems, especially in the most disadvantaged and divided communities.

We must show leadership, and work in partnership. We must harness our combined resources at community level, in local government, in the Executive and in the Assembly. In particular, we must develop the capacity of communities and support them in dealing with dispute and division, including sectarian graffiti, unauthorised flag flying and the erection of memorials, which can lead to local tension. Our responsibility to promote good relations extends to every priority and the work of every Department. We want to progress in a co-ordinated and cross-cutting way, ensuring that such a key challenge is integrated throughout our activities.

Our work to promote equality of opportunity and human rights can contribute to improving relations in and between communities. We recognise that housing and urban regeneration have a part to play, especially in key interface areas. We have identified as a specific sub-priority the need to promote an education and training system that recognises diversity and promotes tolerance. From next year, we shall phase in a new citizenship programme for post-primary schools, and we will support the expected continuing growth in demand for integrated education. Other policy areas, such as economic development and transport, can also contribute by providing opportunities for people to work and live together.

I know that the Assembly takes seriously its scrutiny of the Executive's policies. I stress that this is a draft document. It sets out the Executive's priorities and commitments for the years ahead, but it recognises that we do not have the monopoly on wisdom. We want to work with Members to improve it before we bring it back for final approval in December. If we are to do that successfully, the document must be discussed, debated and, as necessary, challenged in the Chamber and more widely. Today's debate marks the beginning of that process, and we look forward to hearing the responses.

Committees will have an important role in the coming weeks in scrutinising the proposals relating to their respective Departments, and the accompanying draft public service agreements. That twin-track approach should ensure that all Members will have an opportunity to express their views.

We must ensure that our social partners and other interested parties have an opportunity to play their part in improving the document. The draft Programme for Government makes clear our intention to build stronger partnerships. That work must begin immediately. For that reason, we shall be consulting the Civic Forum, local authorities, our social partners in business, the trade unions and the voluntary and community sectors, and other interested bodies. We want to hear their views on the draft document's proposals and its equality aspects. We shall be consulting widely and jointly over the coming weeks, asking people to consider the draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget together. We believe that that approach makes sense.

The draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget that supports it were agreed by all parties in the Executive. There have been hard choices to make, but throughout the process all Ministers have shown a strong commitment to making the budgetary and planning processes work. It is a testament to the Ministers in the Executive and a demonstration that devolution under the Good Friday Agreement works and should be allowed to continue to work. Members should not allow events, and interpretations made, over the past few days to cloud the reality of the democratic dividend that devolution has delivered and will continue to deliver.

2.15 pm

Does any Member believe that under direct rule we would have achieved an almost 60% increase in health spending — over £1.1 billion in four years? Since devolution, the Health Service has received £300 million more than it would have done under the Barnett formula. Therefore, we have allocated more to health than it would have received under direct rule. Does anyone believe that under direct rule the student support package would have seen the light of day in its original form or been expanded, as announced today in the draft Budget? Does anyone believe that the reinvestment and reform initiative — an initiative knocked by people who are now considering it in their plans and programmes — would have been developed under direct rule? Does any Member believe that without a devolved Administration, Ministers would be able to even talk to the Treasury about the difficulties of the Barnett formula?

Enormous strides have been made over the past four years. However, this is just a sound beginning: it must not be put in jeopardy. We have to build on progress made, because, as democrats, Members must stand ready to finance and deliver the types of commitments contained in the draft Programme for Government. They have given such commitments to the people, and the people have the right to expect the Assembly to fulfil those commitments.

We want to make sure that our proposals are effective, evidence-based and able to bring about real and positive change across the economic, social, cultural and environmental responsibilities of the Executive. The draft programme is about improving our public services, hospitals, schools, transport and rural development. It is about strengthening our economy and providing better opportunities for everyone. In short, it is about improving the quality of life for everyone; it is about making a difference.

That is what the community expects of its democratic politicians, and, therefore, it is relevant to all Ministers and the Assembly. That is why the Executive need the Assembly's help. The Assembly's scrutiny of the draft Programme for Government will help in proofing, improving and sharpening the content before it is returned to the Assembly for final approval.

I look forward to the Assembly and the Committees playing their part in scrutinising the draft programme, and to Members playing their part in today's debate. People not only look forward to scrutinising and improving the draft Programme for Government but also to its implementation and delivery as the institutions remain stable and go forward in the interests of the entire community.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received the names of those Members who wish to contribute to the debate. Due to the large number of those wishing to participate I ask Members to limit their contributions to eight minutes — at least in the first round.

Ms Lewsley: I welcome the launch of the draft Programme for Government. As my Colleague Mr Durkan has said, the benefits of devolution can be seen in the draft Programme for Government and in Minister Farren's draft Budget. I am especially delighted that the draft programme reaffirms our commitment to building North/South links. It is essential that those links be built upon to ensure that Northern Ireland becomes an outward-looking region and one that will never be allowed to return to its old introspective and majoritarian ways. Our people refuse to live that way again.

One of the benefits of devolution has been the opportunity to question the approach of Departments and to witness the increased transparency of their actions. If this work is to continue it is vital that we have a reformed and more innovative delivery of our public services. I am pleased that the review of public administration will be pursued vigorously and that we will spare no effort in the pursuit of effective value-for-money initiatives. Will the Minister confirm that, during the lifetime of this Programme for Government, and with the decentralisation of Government, Departments will be more actively pushed and that local partnership, rather than central control, will become the dominant approach?

I support the proposal to develop plans for a more long-term policy for Northern Ireland, to promote sustainable development and continuity in the delivery of services. That is particularly appropriate with the advent of the reinvestment and reform initiative and the potential that it provides for access to significant resources over the coming years. The commitment to produce a report that will monitor and evaluate the Executive's performance each year is commendable, and that is what transparent and accountable government is about. It also gives us the opportunity to reassess and prioritise targets for the following years, thus making them more realistic.

Focus on the reinvestment and reform initiative challenges public sector finance and provides more efficient use of resources. The emphasis on the four main areas of investment in the future — improved service delivery, tackling poverty, social exclusion and partnership — is commendable. By focusing on those areas, the Programme for Government will improve service delivery and increase efficiency. Within improved service delivery, there will still be a need to improve the delivery of social security services for people with disabilities and the elderly. Promoting social inclusion for those people is a step in the right direction — some people are still slipping through the net.

With regard to partnerships, there is still a need for improved co-ordination among Departments, agencies and local government. It is an important aspect of policy and programme development, and it will provide vital links and partnerships between the statutory, voluntary and private sectors and the local community. We need the right resources to improve the Health Service. It is no use funding a system that is inadequate and unable to cope with the demands placed on it, such as shortening waiting lists.

The strong emphasis on equality is an important aspect of the Programme for Government. It is not enough for every child to have an equal chance growing up in our society, although that is important. Every child must also instinctively know that he or she will have an equal chance throughout his or her lifetime. There has been progress on that issue. The Programme for Government shows that inequalities in all groups are declining, which is good news, and is evidence that the policies are working.

The commitment to eradicating community differentials in unemployment is particularly welcome, and that is an important area. It is good to see that not only are unemployment rates in the two communities declining, but unemployment itself is falling. However, we cannot be complacent, and I welcome the new initiatives being pioneered by the SDLP Ministers to tackle long-term unemployment. Sean Farren has introduced a radical new procurement policy to ensure that those who benefit from state contracts do their bit to tackle unemployment. Such an initiative is unparalleled on these islands. Carmel Hanna's task force on employability and long-term unemployment prioritises areas of high unemployment. I hope that the work will focus on unemployment black spots such as Strabane, Derry and parts of Belfast. Those policies, allied with New TSN, will deliver an equal chance for every child in Northern Ireland.

Catholics and women are severely under-represented in the Civil Service. Although the situations of both have improved since the Good Friday Agreement, the measures being taken to ensure equality in the Civil Service are particularly welcome. The commitment to introduce new strategies on race and gender is important. I applaud the fact that OFMDFM has set up a race equality unit and is also core funding ethnic minority groups. It is important to establish a race equality forum as a priority, and I welcome the fact that that is in progress.

The draft Programme for Government gives rural communities their place after 30 years of direct rule neglect. The House should stand firmly behind the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, Bríd Rodgers, in her attempts to provide them with a viable future.

Children are among the most vulnerable in our society, and the Commissioner for Children and Young People Bill is an illustration of the priority accorded to children's issues. I congratulate OFMDFM Ministers on their commitment to that area, in particular Denis Haughey for introducing the Bill.

I welcome the determination to face down those such as the Northern Ireland Office who sought to restrict the Bill's scope. The emphasis on children is correct. The next step must be the publication of the children's strategy, which must focus on child poverty. Therefore, I welcome the draft Programme for Government.

Mrs Carson: I welcome the opportunity to make several points about the draft Programme for Government. I fully endorse the principles of sustainable development, the economic, social and environmental dimensions of which are interwoven. That is particularly true where such development impacts on the environment, which can affect the entire economy, especially tourism.

The environment can impact positively on the economy. When new industries arrived in Dungannon, they examined the benefits of the town and its surroundings before deciding where to locate their factories. I am pleased to say that Dungannon now has a low unemployment level. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said of Fermanagh — a beautiful area for tourism where the environment is of prime importance. I urge the Assembly to channel more investment into that area.

When we examine employment figures we should note that local employers say that they cannot fill 40% of their job vacancies due to skill shortages. I urge the Executive to examine that issue and to channel finance towards solving that problem. Adult literacy programmes are not enough to solve literacy problems; the root causes must be investigated and tackled in the primary schools.

Northern Ireland has a clean, green image, as the draft Programme for Government notes. However, many pressures challenge that image. Our roads, water and sewerage infrastructure must be examined sympathetically and given enormous investment.

Sub-priority 7 of "Securing a Competitive Economy" states:

“We will protect, promote and develop our natural and built environment in a sustainable way”.

That promise will help to develop our tourist industry, which is good news for all. However, the farmers have endured a stressful time since the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and the attack on the World Trade Centre has affected industry. Those sectors must be examined, and financial help must be given to the farmers.

I keep plugging the tourism sector because it has the potential to be one of the largest generators of income in Northern Ireland. We have an unspoilt landscape of world renown, and it must be appreciated and protected. In that context, I call on the appropriate Department to consider designating Fermanagh as a national park. Were that measure implemented, financial help would be provided to farmers who otherwise would lose some of their income.

I am curious as to how the Department of the Environment proposes to comprehensively record historic buildings in Northern Ireland and protect the country's best heritage. What is the position on the replacement grant? That grant is a great incentive to rebuild and is used extensively in Northern Ireland. However, a grant should be available to help maintain historic homes rather than demolish them. Few vernacular dwellings survive in Northern Ireland. The replacement grant is a wonderful help to people who want to build a new home, but people who want to continue to live in older homes should get help also.

I welcome plans to conserve all the main natural habitats. However, large areas of special scientific interest (ASSIs) should not be created at the expense of smaller habitats, which also deserve protection.

I also welcome the proposed review of the sea fishery and aquaculture industry that is to begin in the coming months.

Forestry is also mentioned, and it can support sustainable development through timber production and tourism. I am pleased to note that steps will be taken to ensure the sustainable use of forests; that will help the environment.

2.30 pm

Sensitive work must be undertaken on the problem of farm pollution and the Regulations covering silage, slurry and agricultural fuel oils on farms so that we do not penalise farmers or place an added burden on them. Agriculture has much to offer and can make a positive contribution to the environment.

I am shocked that we still have a 94% dependency on landfill. I note that the Republic of Ireland imposes a penalty on the use of plastic bags. Perhaps we should think along those lines, but that is a tiny solution to a huge problem. We shall have to encourage large stores such as Tesco and Sainsbury's that it is not only plastic bags that are a problem; packaging is also a problem. It is not enough to facilitate and encourage local companies to develop environmentally friendly products; pressure should be applied to make it mandatory.

From an environmental point of view, the attitude in Northern Ireland to the purchase of green electricity extracted from renewable sources is a problem. I should like to express my concern at the number of wind-turbine farms cropping up across the Province. Some falsehoods surround that method of producing electricity. The starting costs are astronomical, and we are at the mercy of the weather. Nothing is set in stone; we cannot be sure about how much electricity will be generated, and such electricity cannot be stored. My greatest concern is for the tourism industry; people come to Northern Ireland to enjoy its rugged, unspoilt landscape, but that is coming under threat because of the erection of such turbines, especially in my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Drinking water must be wholesome, and there must be effective disposal of waste water. The sewerage network also needs an appropriate strategy. There is also the problem of flood risks from river systems, and money must be spent on that end of the infrastructure.

The draft Budget would maintain the level of revenue to support district councils, especially those whose revenue comes from a low rate base, thus allowing them to maintain services without an unacceptable rate rise — something we should all want, especially in the light of the forthcoming election. Funding should also be provided for the compensation due to district councils to cover the loss —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Can the Member bring her remarks to a close?

Mrs Carson: For years we have focused on terrorism and division, and I welcome the opportunity to bring about real change through the new developments in the draft Programme for Government.

Mr Shannon: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the draft Programme for Government and wish to highlight one or two education issues that I think have not been addressed, and perhaps also some issues that have been addressed.

The section dealing with education is titled ‘Investing in Education and Skills’. Although some issues have been highlighted, others have been omitted. This year, in particular, the Programme for Government must highlight education. Every year there are exams; indeed, over the past week or two exam results and their portrayal in the media have been controversial. Many families have been left confused and angry, and many children do not have a clue about which school or university they will attend. The Department of Education must make an investment to oversee matters and to ensure that such a fiasco does not recur. That issue should be addressed in the Programme for Government.

This year some examination boards have been accused of adjusting grades due to Government and media pressure. That scandal has left many of our brightest pupils taking up courses at universities that were not their first choice. In some cases people will be taking different career directions altogether.

The draft Programme for Government states on page 52:

“We will give all our children the best start in life”.

and on page 56 that

“We will equip our young people with the skills and qualifications to gain employment in a modern economy”.

Those are grand words, but in reality we need more focus and more help to ensure that it happens. The future of the country depends on the level of education that we give our children, and, consequently, the opportunities we can provide for the entire population.

Currently, people who wish to avail of tertiary education must pay for university places. That has led, and will lead, to many students across Northern Ireland deciding not to continue their education because they cannot afford it. Students, and parents concerned about their children, have come to our advice centre with that problem. There must be more investment in available student places and a rethink of university fees.

In the 1970s, when there were free university places for everyone who wanted them and grants to aid the purchase of study materials, there was a brain drain. Countries such as America and Australia wanted the cream of the university graduates to leave Northern Ireland and work there. The consequences can be easily seen — many glossy magazines have editors who came from Northern Ireland, and many of our journalists now work for the main news channels. Finance companies across the globe have recruited people who originated in Northern Ireland. We could have a situation like that again. After all, this country tops the league tables in examination results at GCSE and A level. It is time to take a serious look at university fees and evaluate their usefulness. That has not been addressed in the draft Programme for Government: it should be.

Investment in schools must be monitored. For the past few years, it has been the Minister of Education’s remit to invest heavily in Irish speaking facilities for schools. There has not been parity in the funds allocated for education.

Will the entire education budget be invested only in schools that encourage the speaking of Irish? The administration of the school budget must be monitored to ensure that fair and appropriate allocation is made. We noted that the capital spend on schools last year was heavily weighted towards non-maintained schools — that cannot be allowed to happen every year. An independent monitor could ensure that there is equal investment in all children in Northern Ireland.

Many schools have closed down recently in my constituency, yet the school-age population continues to boom, and more people are moving to Strangford. Two schools in the local area have closed — O’Neill Memorial Primary School in Crossnacreevy and Scrabo High School. Subsequently, other schools are now oversubscribed.

Paragraph 6.13 of the draft Programme for Government states:

“major capital investment is required in the post-primary sector to tackle the backlog of urgent priority projects”.

Again, those are only words. When it comes to delivering the finance needed, it falls short.

Investment and new schools are a must. As more people migrate to rural areas, the pressure on existing resources is becoming hard to bear. Some pupils have to travel to other towns because the school that is only a mile down the road from their home is oversubscribed. They have to pass by the nearest school on the way to another because the first did not have space for them. This year many parents have commented and complained about the situation. As taxpayers, they feel that their children should go to the school of their choice; the one that their friends go to, and the one that they do not have to travel miles to get to.

There is a need to invest in school buildings and to build schools to accommodate the increasing child population. However, it must be done in a fair and equitable manner: unfortunately, that is not currently the case.

We also need to ensure that classrooms are adequate and up to acceptable standards. There have been many complaints across the country that schools are in a terrible condition. For example, Regent House had to wait more than 30 years for an extension. Pupils were being educated in mobile huts for 30 years. Similar things are happening in many areas of the Province. We must ensure that our children are being taught in a warm and safe environment. Investment is definitely needed in that area, and again I call for a fair and equitable allocation of funds.

According to the Labour Government, the Minister of Education could look to private investment in schools. Indeed, there have been many suggestions for that over the years. However, investment by private firms in schools should be controlled. Caution is needed to avoid the scenario in which a school is touted in the press like a designer label, and is advertised on posters because a particular company invested in it.

Investment by outside organisations in schools should be matched or, indeed, doubled by the Department of Education. Undoubtedly, investment in education is needed.

However, it needs to come first from the Government as lead investor.

The Assembly has been assured that there will be nursery provision for all three-year-olds. Nursery provision has been the subject of a key debate since the 1970s. Indeed, the people for whom nursery provision was needed then are now our teachers, doctors and builders. It has been said in the Chamber that post-primary education must be developed to meet the needs of young people: I agree. The Assembly welcomes it. However, I want to see how it will be delivered.

A report stated that a nursery education could advance the social experience and intellectual development of children from economically disadvantaged backgrounds. I believe that that is the case. People working in that key area would agree. Nursery education is more than just childminding and teaching the alphabet. It should be a learning experience.

Networking is important at any age. Friendships forged in early childhood can sometimes last a long time. Investment is needed in nursery schools and teachers. The Budget must provide the basis for that investment. I welcome what has been set out for education in the Programme for Government. However, how that will be delivered has not been specified.

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Programme for Government lays out a progressive plan for health, in which the Executive are committed to raising health standards to those of the best regions in Europe and to eradicating inequalities in health. Much of the programme will be channelled through 'Investing for Health', which sets out how public health is to be improved between now and 2010.

The publication of 'Investing for Health' in March signified a remarkable degree of co-operation between all Departments in the Executive. That is to be welcomed. All Ministers signed up to actions to improve the general health of the population. The targets set out in 'Investing for Health' could not be more important. The Executive are committed to increasing life expectancy by at least three years for men and two years for women by the year 2010. They are also committed to reducing inequalities in mortality rates, to halve the gap in life expectancy between those who live in the most deprived areas and electoral wards and those who live in better off areas, and to increasing average life expectancy.

All Ministers of the Executive — whether they belong to Sinn Féin, the Ulster Unionist Party, the Democratic Unionist Party, or the Social Democratic and Labour Party — have committed themselves to a series of actions and policies that will achieve those goals. Those commitments range from improving the quality of water and air, ensuring that all food is safe, reducing accidents at home and on the roads, and improving literacy levels — to name but a few. All those factors are of the utmost importance, and there is a great deal of room for improvement. For example, the charity Brake has stated that in Europe, Northern Ireland has the second highest number of schoolchildren being killed on the roads.

I could use the eight minutes allocated to me to question whether all Departments have lived up to the commitments made in the Programme for Government and in 'Investing for Health'. I could say that if the important goals are to be attained, considerably more investment is needed. I could question whether the targets set by Departments are rigorous enough. In other circumstances, I would make those points. However, those important questions have faded into insignificance following the events at the Ulster Unionist Party conference. It seems that, for its own party political reasons, the Ulster Unionist Party has decided that it will depart from the Executive in January 2003. If that happens, the Programme for Government and everything in it will be just scrap paper.

Plans and targets to improve the Health Service and reduce inequalities could simply go by the board; they will be continued or disregarded according to the whims of British Ministers. I hope that the Ulster Unionist Party is aware of the effect that its actions will have on the lives and well-being of everyone in this part of Ireland. Rather than working together as politicians of every political shade to ensure that people live longer and are healthier, we will become lethargic and allow the public health sector to return to the doldrums in which it languished under direct rule.

2.45 pm

Likewise, plans for the improvement of hospital services, primary and community care, and care for those with disabilities, mental health problems and chronic and terminal illnesses may fall by the wayside. The number of people whose health would be affected illustrates the enormity of what is contemplated. It is a sad day when, for its own selfish internal reasons, a party acts to the detriment of everyone's welfare.

Mr Foster: What could be more unhealthy than the murder of my friends and neighbours in border areas over the years? Mr Kelly never condemned those acts, yet he sounds so virtuous today.

Mr J Kelly: I will return to that point.

I appeal to members of the Ulster Unionist Party to show maturity and consideration in their political thinking and to continue to strive to improve everyone's health, rather than relinquish their responsibilities to the political mongrel foxes in their own community.

The first paragraph of the foreword of the draft Programme for Government states:

"We are pleased to present the Executive's Programme for Government which sets out in detail the Executive's plans and priorities for 2002/03 and beyond."

The last paragraph states:

"Whilst the last year has been a difficult one in many ways, we now have a new opportunity to deliver stable government by a locally accountable administration that can reflect and respond to the needs of people here. We believe that this Programme for Government provides a sound basis for our work as an Executive over the years ahead and look forward to working with the Assembly and with others to deliver the commitments it contains."

David Trimble signed that foreword; I ask the leadership of the Ulster Unionist Party to look at it again, before we reach the precipice of a political disaster.

Mrs E Bell: It will come as no surprise that the Alliance Party notes the draft Programme for Government with disappointment and concern. Although there was merit in the proposals of previous programmes, no serious consideration was given to coupling projects with each Department's proposals, or to including a definitive, effective approach to community relations. The proposals for health, education and social services, although good in themselves, will not create a better society unless the sectarianism that permeates the Province is seriously challenged.

I am heartened by the fact that the Deputy First Minister highlighted the need to involve all Departments. I hope that that will be followed through on. The Secretary of State made some headway in the past week by, among other things, appointing an independent monitor on paramilitary violence. However, the Assembly must direct action and schemes proposed in the Programme for Government to challenge the hatred, distrust and ignorance in society. Managing the differences in Northern Ireland does not make for long-term or permanent success. It simply puts off the evil day.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is known to have received a research paper on community relations in January. So far, the office has failed to publish any draft proposals. If a policy review report, which has already been submitted to Ministers, is not received in the next two weeks, my party will attempt to table a motion calling on the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to publish it. A response was expected before the summer recess; as yet none has been forthcoming. Last week, in an answer to my party leader, the Deputy First Minister said that a paper would go to the Executive in the near future; similar promises have been made to us since April. The review was completed in January, and the response was expected in April. It is still said to be "imminent". Where is it?

For the Alliance Party, the community relations strategy is a crucial part of the Programme for Government. The strategy, and any associated consultation, is supposed to be completed by the end of the year. The process has yet to begin. Given that the Ministers must subsequently reach agreement, that will be yet another missed target or, as it is usually expressed, "slippage" will occur. Last year there was some three months' slippage. What happened to the neighbourhood regeneration task forces that were proposed last year?

Earlier this year, when the Alliance Party pushed the issue of paramilitary flags and graffiti, the strategy was the alleged reason for the Executive's not having done anything about it. That issue will not go away, and the Executive's usual ploy of passing the buck must stop. We must get back on track. Suspicion is growing that the community relations strategy is being put on the long finger. When questions are asked in the Assembly, all we hear are platitudes about the imminence of documents or consultation. That response no longer has any credibility. If the Executive cannot provide a strategy, the Alliance Party will demand that the public is shown exactly what has been done since last year, in addition to the recommendations now being withheld by the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

The Deputy First Minister stated that it is not enough to leave community relations to the people in the areas that are directly affected. The issue is much bigger than simply supporting local initiatives in local communities. A firm strategy is necessary to counter sectarianism and to promote community relations, and it should underpin everything that is proposed by the Executive for every Department. That is clearly not the case, because community relations have not been prioritised properly. Sub-priority 2 states:

"We will improve community relations and tackle the divisions in our society."

Paragraph 4.13 states:

"Our experience in North Belfast and other areas has shown us that improved relations across communities in Northern Ireland can only develop when elected and community representatives work together, especially at local level in those areas which have experienced the most serious effects of conflict.

I contend that community relations officers should be included in the local structure to deal with community relations problems. Community relations are not simply a matter of bringing Protestants and Catholics together, but of keeping them together in tolerance, recognition and acceptance of each other's cultures and traditions. The Community Relations Council has undertaken that task for many years in areas as far apart as mid-Ulster, south Armagh and Greater Belfast, and in organisations such as the Apprentice Boys and the Orange Order. In North Down, it is generally agreed that community relations have enhanced appreciation of, and improved knowledge and information about, a wide range of cross-community matters.

The Alliance Party welcomes the focus on promoting a climate of tolerance and equality of provision. It is also pleased that the expansion of integrated education, both new and by transformation, has been recognised. It is to be hoped that those who are doubtful about this type of education will see that it is not a threat but a significant alternative.

The Minister of Education and his Department will not be surprised if I once again take the opportunity to push for a specific budget for special schools provision and for special units in which children have the chance to realise their potential. There is also the matter of adults with special needs. There are not enough places in resource centres, and I hope that the Minister of Employment and Learning and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety can work together to give those young people an opportunity for high-quality education and training.

I congratulate the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, especially the junior Ministers, for their preparations for the proposed commissioner for children and for their acknowledgement of the situations that victims face.

As was stated yesterday, the draft Programme for Government is, unfortunately, vulnerable, just as we are. Like its Colleagues, the Alliance Party wonders how confident it can be that the proposals, reviews and consultation exercises in the draft Programme for Government can be achieved. The Alliance Party hopes that all Members have the opportunity to see it become reality and that all citizens will feel the full benefit of the local Administration.

Mr McCartney: I never fail to be impressed by the fairy-tale atmosphere of the Assembly, especially when it discusses matters pertinent to its future. The fairy tale that seems most appropriate today is Hans Christian Andersen's 'The Emperor's New Clothes'. In fact, the emperor was in the altogether. The courtiers who had self-interest, like the majority of Members who want this thing called devolution to work, were delighted with his nakedness.

Far from producing an Executive that are, as the Deputy First Minister said, working in harness or that are, as Seán Farren said, producing a demonstration of the collective working of a unique Administration, the Assembly has in fact produced a composition of totally disparate elements. Yesterday, in response to a particularly innocuous speech on the Programme for Government from Esmond Birnie, came the most virulent attack on the Ulster Unionist Party by that well-known political ecumenist Mr Dallat, who, in language that would not have been inappropriate on the lips of Joe Devlin in 1915 or of Harry Diamond in 1956, proceeded to make the most unmitigated attack on his main partners in the Programme for Government.

It is true that many aspects of the speeches that have been made are apposite to the Assembly's future. Today, John Kelly rightly said that, while all the talk about future Budgets and Programmes for Government is going on, the parties are really engaged in a political dogfight over the Assembly's existence. It is the stuff of fairy tales.

Then, of course, we have the suggestion that devolution has been wonderful and has brought untold benefits to the poor electorate of Northern Ireland. What has devolution achieved in more than three years? Despite the suggestion that future moneys will be poured into the Health Service, we have the longest waiting lists in Europe and a GP programme that is stagnating, with the British Medical Association threatening what almost amounts to a professional strike.

In education, which I hope that Sammy Wilson will deal with in more detail, almost none of the targets set last year by the Minister of Education have been met, and the budgets for most of them have been reduced. Our schools and the infrastructure of the buildings and ancillary services are in their worst state ever.

The First Minister has declared that community relations are at their worst level for the past 25 years. Mr John Kelly told us about maturity, and about the need to consider the welfare and health of the people — that coming from a member of a party that is inextricably linked to the murders of 2,500 people and to the mutilation of tens of thousands who, as the result of paramilitary attacks, have swamped the accident and emergency services with broken bones and with destroyed ankles and other joints.

3.00 pm

Do not think for one moment that I exclude from my comments those Loyalists who participate in similar activity; they do not happen to be numerous enough to have representatives in the same elevated position as the two Sinn Féin Ministers.

The public sector in Northern Ireland is a monument to the success of devolution — health, education, vast areas on which houses cannot be built because of inadequate sewerage, and threats of huge fines if the Executive do not implement EU Directives. We have a series of threatened reports. As a result of the delays, the review of administration does not merely have a five o'clock shadow; it has a three-foot-long beard. The rating system will be reviewed to make it fairer, but it will have to produce about three times the current revenue to service the debt that will be incurred in implementing some of those magnificent projects.

Collective responsibility does not exist. Ms Lewsley mentioned SDLP Ministers only, and John Kelly reserved his commendations and comments for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, which happens to have a Sinn Féin Minister. The same applies to other participating parties. As I have stated repeatedly, far from there being collective responsibility, every time a Minister speaks, Members from all other parties become the Opposition. Mark Durkan told us in a “holier-than-thou” voice that the draft Programme for Government is an object lesson in working in harness and in collective co-operation. It is no such thing. Virtually no aspect of life has been significantly improved for the average person in Northern Ireland as a result of devolution, whatever the aspirations may be.

However, bureaucracy has increased vastly. More than 400 additional advisers and staff work for the “Department of the Centre”, which is not even a statutory Department, because it does not exist under the Belfast Agreement. There will be a proliferation of bureaucrats everywhere; this place has become a bureaucrat’s paradise. How many of those packages of utter verbiage are really the product of Ministers and their staff, as opposed to that of civil servants with an unfettered opportunity to enjoy themselves?

The truth must be faced. What have the Executive done? They have done very little except to produce a series of grandiose promises for the future administration of Northern Ireland.

Mr B Hutchinson: Mr McCartney highlighted many realities. If people did not smell the coffee before, they certainly have done since Saturday. Between now and 18 January, Members may ask themselves why they are here and whether they are wasting their time.

We must reduce poverty and educational disadvantage. I accept that we have not yet had much success in that regard, but we can have. We will not create change overnight; it will take years. This Assembly may achieve nothing, but I hope that the next one will achieve something, and that the one after that will achieve everything that must be done.

It will be a long haul. I thank Mr McCartney for reminding us that sometimes we get involved in fairy tales. To me, it is more a case of smoke and mirrors. We can fool some of the people out there some of the time, but we will not fool all of them all of the time. The Assembly parties must wake up to that fact.

I welcome the Programme for Government’s provisions for early years education, such as the support for the Sure Start initiative. Problems such as educational disadvantage begin early in life. We must focus on the provision of lifelong learning. We hear continually about education and lifelong learning. However, that is not reflected in the Programme for Government — there is no such thread running through the document. It is important that children from disadvantaged areas have help at home from birth. At present, they do not always get that help because they come from disadvantaged homes.

The Programme for Government could have gone further. There was an opportunity to define where the real problems lie and to “invest in education skills”, to use the Executive’s term. One difficulty is that when children are born, it is perceived that the Health Service assumes responsibility for them, and the perception is that when they start school, that responsibility transfers to the Department of Education. Unfortunately, that is not true — the two go hand in hand. Where does the cross-cutting occur? In order to offer children the opportunity to develop, education must begin as soon as children are born. However, in Northern Ireland, we feel that the time for education is when children reach the age of three or four. Education must be seamless from the time a child is born, and the Health Service is partly responsible for ensuring that that happens.

Disadvantage in schools must be addressed. We talk about initiatives to prepare 16- to 19-year-olds for employment in the modern world. An indictment of my constituency of North Belfast is that if a young person leaves school with no qualifications, he or she cannot study for, or sit, NVQ Level 3. That young person must leave the constituency to do so. That problem does not arise in any other Belfast constituency — the exam can be sat in West Belfast, South Belfast, or East Belfast. That sends out a message to young people in North Belfast. Another difficulty is that some young people struggle to achieve NVQ Level 1. There is something wrong with the system, and it must be overhauled. The programme’s provisions tinker round the edges and do not deal with the real problems. To introduce such schemes for 16- to 18-year-olds is to leave it far too late. Those provisions must come earlier.

Funding for primary education poses another problem. What is primary education? It is the most important level of education — more important than third-level education. The situation is ridiculous. We need to reconsider where the funding is going and decide what it is that we want.

I have talked to nursery school principals in my area, and they tell me that the children are not ready for nursery school education. If we talk to the primary school principals, they say that when children come either directly from the home or from nursery school, they are not ready for primary education. The post-primary schools will advise that the children are not the finished product and that they cannot work with them. Children enter post-primary schools at the age of 11 yet they only have a reading age of nine. Everyone in charge of those sectors will say the same thing: “How do we prepare those children?”

There is no point sending children on to the next level of education when they are two to three years behind. We must ensure that they are ready for the next stage. A complete overhaul is needed, and we must get to grips with this matter now. We continue to throw money at the problem, but we are wasting it. Education is very important; it gives everyone a start in life, and there is no question that it determines people's socio-economic positions. We must take the matter seriously and tackle the disadvantages.

The Programme for Government gives us some hope for the direction that we wish to take. We should recognise that, and the fact that the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has implemented programmes that would not otherwise have existed.

However, we need to consider the problems that exist not only in urban areas but in rural areas. For example, we must address the educational disadvantage in rural areas and the struggle to keep small schools open and ensure that people receive an education. We must address all of those matters, and, unfortunately, this draft Programme for Government does not do that.

Mr Foster: I commend the motion, but some points concern me. The priorities have remained constant since the first Programme for Government — “Growing as a Community”, “Working for a Healthier People”, “Investing in Education and Skills” — although I am concerned by the aim to destroy our successful grammar school system — “Securing a Competitive Economy” and “Developing Relations — North/South, East/West and Internationally”.

When I was the Minister of the Environment, I considered the North/South Ministerial Council meetings to be an excellent way to work together as neighbours. With regard to constitutional concerns, it was confirmed at each meeting that there are two separate jurisdictions, and that was also acknowledged by the Minister with whom I worked.

The Programme for Government is huge, so I will be able to speak about very little of it. I commend its aims, although whether those are fulfilled is another matter.

On page 32, sub-priority 3, entitled “We will support victims”, states:

“Key to meeting victims’ practical needs are the actions contained in the victims’ strategy, Reshape, Rebuild, Achieve.”

I have a victims’ group in Fermanagh, known as FEAR — Fear Encouraged Abandoning Roots. Good people had to flee their farms; if they had not done so, they would not be alive today. Can I get anything for them to help them reshape, rebuild and achieve? The words in the Programme for Government are hollow. Perhaps the Executive will rethink the matter.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety shows good intent. I hope that her statement concerning the provision of a new hospital in Enniskillen, or slightly north of that strategically located town, will be put into effect. The Minister spoke about the matter in her presentation of the consultation document ‘Developing Better Services: Modernising Hospitals and Reforming Structures’. I cannot imagine the Minister ignoring the grave danger that so many people would face should the hospital be sited elsewhere. It must be recognised that if the new hospital were to be built in Enniskillen, 8,744 people would have to travel for more than 45 minutes for treatment; if it were to be built in Omagh, 24,250 people would have to travel for more than 45 minutes. The difference is shocking, and this is a very serious issue that cannot be ignored.

There is a statement in the document concerning a commitment to combating inequalities, which should never occur. That is a good point, with which I concur. However, many of our responsible citizens had to live with the inequality of receiving no protection from terrorism. So many were murdered and maimed, leaving broken homes galore, yet we hear regularly in the Assembly pretentious humbug from Sinn Féin about inequality. It forgets about the terrorism inflicted by its partners in the IRA, which it has never condemned.

Yesterday, other parties took the opportunity to criticise and abuse the UUP and my party leader. Let it be clearly understood that the UUP does not have to apologise to anyone about its role in the Assembly or at any point in the lifetime of Northern Ireland. The UUP has always worked constructively for this state, while others have tried to do Northern Ireland down. It has been the tactic of the destructive forces in Northern Ireland to hide behind a guise of virtue, while all the time they have been the destroyers.

The UUP is the genuine party in Northern Ireland. It always has been, and it always will be, for Northern Ireland within the Union. [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

3.15 pm

Mr Foster: My former Department — the Department of the Environment — has a responsible role to play in many ways. It must ensure that it fulfils European demands; otherwise infraction proceedings will be actioned. The Department must be given the resources to fulfil that important role.

Another of the Department's many important roles is road safety, in which I took a great interest when in the Department. We must all play a part in reducing the carnage on the roads. Some people appear to be overcome by madness when they get behind the wheel of a motor vehicle; there must be no leniency for careless drivers. The Department for Regional Development has a massive roads’ problem to contend with, not least the vital need for a bypass in my home town of Enniskillen. The Minister must give the go-ahead for a bypass or Enniskillen will be choked with traffic. This projects Enniskillen as a successful growth area and the gateway to Northern Ireland from the west of Ireland. The Irvinestown Road/Chanterhill link with the Tempo Road is also a must to ease traffic at the east end of the town.

In conclusion, the test of our progress and that of the Programme for Government is not whether we add to the abundance of those who have so much, but whether we provide enough for those who have so little. Perhaps I have spoken too long, and I am thinking of Coughlin's law — "Don't talk unless you can improve the silence." I commend the intent of the Programme for Government.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure (Mr O'Neill): I will make a few comments as Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, and, if I have time, I may make some comments of my own.

The Committee is pleased that, once again, the draft Programme for Government recognises the significant contribution that the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure can make to each of the Executive priorities. Although it is one of the smallest spending Departments, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure is involved in supporting actions in each of those priorities. In "Growing as a Community", the Committee strongly supports the four actions proposed for the Department and will try to implement them through developing a cultural diversity policy framework and timetable; the implementation of the soccer strategy for the development of local football from grass roots to senior and international level; the development of an archives policy to ensure that our archival heritage is relevant and accessible to the widest possible audience; agreeing an implementation plan for the development of heritage at the Titanic Quarter; and the development of a strategy that will optimise the use of resources in the museums and heritage sector.

This is how the Committee will attempt to support the Department in delivering those priorities. However, these plans and strategies will ultimately require resources for their implementation. Although the soccer strategy implementation features in the draft Budget, the Committee hopes that future allocations will take account of the positive effect that the others can bring to tackling divisions in our society and to developing a greater understanding and respect for our culture, history and heritage. The Executive's priority "Working for a Healthier People" has obvious implications for the Department and for the Sports Council in promoting the benefits of sport and physical activity. In this regard, the Committee is particularly pleased to see the recognition that has been given in the draft document to next year's Special Olympics world summer games.

In "Investing in Education and Skills", the Committee notes that the sub-priorities continue to recognise the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure's broad partnership role in promoting a culture of tolerance, developing creative potential and providing lifelong learning opportunities. We welcome particularly the proposal to develop a learning strategy to draw together a diverse group of service providers with the aim of pooling resources and exchanging ideas in ways that will allow us to make the most of all our information and of our cultural, educational and sporting resources in promoting the concept of life-long learning.

The Committee is also glad that the draft Programme for Government makes a commitment to the provision of three new electronic library facilities, which will allow our public service libraries to provide better access to electronic information services. The Committee is agreed that if the draft Programme for Government sets out a commitment to the development of electronic access to archives, libraries and museums, the draft Budget proposals must ensure that these valuable resources do not continue to suffer from the effects of pre-devolution cuts and years of underfunding.

It is interesting to note that the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure has no less than four actions under the Executive priority of "Securing a Competitive Economy". The Committee looks forward to the implementation of the interdepartmental action plan for the development of the creative industries sector under sub-priority 3.

The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure also has an important role to play in increasing Northern Ireland's attractiveness to visitors. The Committee welcomes the recognition now given to the activities of the Northern Ireland Events Company by sub-priority 4. Members may have noted the report in yesterday's 'Irish Times' about the Republic's initiative in showcasing Ireland as a golfing destination. Last week's World Golf Championship at Mount Juliet was an unqualified success with regard to visitor numbers and worldwide television coverage. It is virtually certain that the event will return there in 2004. It is worth noting that Bord Fáilte contributed one million euros to the event on behalf of the Government's international sports tourism initiative. Northern Ireland has a long way to go in this area. The Committee is pleased to note that sub-priority 7 reflects the recommendations made in its report on inland fisheries with regard to the need to conserve our wild salmon stocks.

The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure has also an important contribution to make to another priority, "Developing Relations — North/South, East/West and Internationally". The Committee hopes that the support indicated under sub-priority 7 for Imagine Belfast's bid for the European Capital of Culture 2008 will be reflected in future resource allocations.

The Committee looks forward to discussing the specifics of the draft Programme for Government with the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure over the coming weeks and hopes to be in a position to give its full support to the varied and important work that his Department carries out.

I want to make one or two personal comments. Members have drawn attention to the uncertainty that may arise over the Assembly's future. People have expressed concerns, and we can all recognise those. However, as Billy Hutchinson stated, if we do not continue to work, to chip away at the problems and map out the route for progress, we will be failing as public representatives. People should look at the broader picture. It is worth noting the low level of unemployment in Northern Ireland over the past four years — among the lowest ever in any generation. We should also consider the high number of business starts in Northern Ireland over the period. We should consider the confidence that the Assembly's existence has engendered in the community and the faith that the people have put in it.

We should not perpetually snipe, as some people have done for the past four years, without making a contribution. Having just reported as Chairperson of a Committee and knowing the work that people put into Committee attendance, it is laughable to hear someone who never contributes to any Committee work snipe at the work we are trying to do in the Programme for Government. Unfortunately, he is not here to hear me, but I would have put that point to him gladly. He never contributes to any constructive approach —

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr O'Neill: We must adopt a positive approach, and the Programme for Government provides the opportunity to do so.

The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment (Rev Dr William McCrea): I will speak first as Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment and then, as other Members have done, as a constituency representative.

In November and December 2001 I highlighted to Members an important paragraph in the 2001 Programme for Government entitled "Promoting sustainable living". I pointed out that that programme's priorities and sub-priorities fell seriously short in reflecting the Executive's commitment to promoting sustainable living. I detailed several recommendations from the Committee for the Environment in an attempt to rectify that. Unfortunately, as with last year's Programme for Government, the document before us today fails to reflect many of those.

In paragraph 2.23 there is clear acknowledgement of the many substantial challenges that continue to face the Executive and the Assembly across the three dimensions of sustainable development — economic, social and environmental. It goes on to say that those challenges require action to be taken across all areas.

In paragraph 3.51, under the heading "Promoting sustainable living", the challenge is restated. The programme concludes that the environmental impact of all key policies must be considered in an "integrated way, that will embed the principles of sustainable development in the rural and urban economy."

Fine words, but yet again I cannot find the necessary commitment to action to deliver that.

Some commitments to protect, promote and develop our natural and built environment in a sustainable way are given in sub-priority 7 of chapter 7. However, the Committee's suggestions for a more ambitious approach to the integration of environmental themes into economic policy have been largely ignored.

The environment should no longer be viewed as a constraint on economic activity. Instead, it should represent opportunities to support and develop new economic and job-creation activities. For example, the reference to renewable energy in paragraph 7.13 could have been widened to take account of economic development opportunities for new technology research, development and production, and export opportunities. We shall await the establishment and publication of targets for increasing the proportion of electricity generated from renewable sources in Northern Ireland.

Most of the cross-cutting initiatives in chapter 3 bear little relation to the wider vision of sustainable development. For example, the reinvestment and reform initiative should be pursued with sustainable development as a guiding principle for enhancing resource productivity. The Committee for the Environment continues to take a keen interest in the development of effective waste management plans to underpin the waste management strategy for Northern Ireland. We feel that there should be more urgency on that.

Paragraph 7.53 refers to

"assistance to industry to develop markets for recycled materials and to improve its production processes [in terms of] energy efficiency, waste minimisation and recycling."

That is repeated from last year's Programme for Government. There is clearly a need to establish more concrete commitments to, for example, explore the research and development needs arising from the Northern Ireland waste management strategy. Those are just a few examples.

Chapter 7, "Securing a competitive economy", should include many more commitments to actions to mainstream and articulate sustainable development. Members will note from paragraph 7.45 that we still await a sustainable development strategy for Northern Ireland. I trust that when it arrives it will, in practical terms, take forward action "to mainstream the integrated approach to sustainable development into the way all our policies and programmes are developed and implemented."

3.30 pm

On behalf of the Committee for the Environment, I ask the Ministers to respond to those points and revisit the draft Programme for Government to include concrete, practical commitments to genuine action on sustainable development.

I shall make a few constituency-related remarks, because the Programme for Government contains issues that affect the daily lives of all our constituents. The health programme is of particular concern in Mid Ulster, where we have the longest waiting lists. There is chaos in the Health Service and a lack of initiative on the part of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Under the Minister's proposals, the Mid-Ulster Hospital faces the prospect of being downgraded to a glorified health centre. When we look at the equality agenda, we should notice the inequality between Magherafelt and areas such as Downpatrick.

In the area of education, the draft Programme for Government says that it will focus on "giving all our children the best start in life".

That is fine verbiage, but what does it mean? I have invited many Members to see for themselves the situation in Magherafelt. The maintained sector is sitting in new multi-million pound premises, from one end of the town to the other. But in the same town, the controlled sector is sitting in conditions akin to shanty towns. In his own constituency, the Minister of Education has deliberately discriminated against the community that wants to educate its children in the controlled sector. There is no end to the amount of money that can be spent on the maintained and integrated sectors. The controlled sector has been left in abysmal conditions. The statement that we will give

"all our children the best start in life" is rubbish; it is without action.

There is discrimination in allocation. There are schools that could not even open their windows in the summer term. Now that they can get them open, there is so much draught that they cannot get them closed again.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Rev Dr William McCrea: Many of those issues must be addressed. This draft Programme for Government will not bring action; it will limp on from crisis to crisis. It is about time that we allowed the electorate to speak.

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It is bizarre to be discussing a draft Programme for Government when we are in yet another political crisis. That is evident when so few Members are present for the debate.

I wish to speak in particular on the objectives for employment and learning in the document. Levels of adult literacy and numeracy are still diabolical. Targets are scandalous, and real resources must be directed towards that issue. The Department for Employment and Learning's Objective 1 states that it wishes "To work with others to achieve wider access to education and training and to seek the highest standards of learning, research, training and scholarship, thereby contributing to economic development."

Although economic development is an honourable aspiration, the difficulties for people who do not have adequate reading and writing skills, and who therefore suffer social exclusion, are far worse. If we are intent on targeting social need, we must address the issues of low educational attainment, low self-esteem and poor self-confidence. The inability of a parent to help a child with basic homework is like an open sore — it is a continuous source of pain and discomfort.

Student finance affects low-income families. Young people from areas with generational long-term unemployment cannot afford third-level education. Either they are unable to get access to higher and further education, or they leave college with huge debts. All Members know students who are working 30 or 40 hours a week to put themselves through college. At a time when their education is supposed to be most important, some young people are doing a full week's work. More university places for young people are required. Many young people are moving out of the Six Counties to get university places because there is a serious dearth of places here.

The unemployment differential has been well documented, but it continues to be brushed under the carpet when a Catholic is more likely to be unemployed than a Protestant in areas such as Strabane, west Belfast and Derry. In my constituency, Fermanagh and South Tyrone, many people have to travel long distances to work, and many are employed in border counties such as Leitrim and Cavan because there is not enough work in their own area. I am disappointed that the Executive did not make the unemployment differential one of their priorities.

Like others who have spoken, Sinn Féin members are concerned about health, education, housing, fuel poverty, the environment, the suffering of the agriculture and rural community and its many and varied needs, jobs, investment and infrastructure. Everything that each Minister has worked on to benefit everyone in the Six Counties and on the island is now at risk.

For the first time in my life we have direct accountability and local people addressing local problems through the North/South Ministerial Council, the implementation bodies and work being done by such bodies as Waterways Ireland, InterTradeIreland, the Special EU Programmes Body, the North/South Language Body and the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission: but we are on the brink of throwing it away. Sam Foster said how he enjoyed the North/South element of his ministerial duties, so why is his party leader intent on destroying that part of the Good Friday Agreement? He talked about the Health Minister's intention to put a new hospital in Enniskillen. Does Mr Foster not realise that a direct rule minister could close down every hospital outside Belfast and Derry and that there would be nothing he, I or anybody else could do about that? Does he believe that our constituents would be better off in another political vacuum? Our people need Members to work towards a better future for them, not to hanker after the past.

Like many other Members, I cannot understand how the First Minister can reconcile his actions with the needs of the people. Does he think that the achievements of the past few years should be poured down the drain? Does he think that the changes to policing, criminal justice and demilitarisation, although inadequate, are going to be reversed? Does he think that the equality agenda, the human rights agenda and the all-Ireland agenda, all of which Unionists have tried to dilute, destroy and delay, will not still be here when we get back to this point?

Does the First Minister think that by trying to re-write the Good Friday Agreement he will achieve what all Unionist politicians seem to want — a return to second-class citizenship for Nationalists and Unionist supremacy? If he thinks that, he is a more blinkered and intellectually challenged man than Sinn Féin took him for. David Trimble cannot and will not stop us achieving equal rights and the end of discrimination on this island. He, along with the rest of the begrudgers and naysayers, is on a direct route to political obscurity, and the sooner that the Unionist community can produce a leader who can lead, the better for all of us.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am beginning to wonder what the connection is between the Member's remarks and the draft Programme for Government. I ask the Member to keep to the subject.

Ms Gildernew: The context is clear. The House is debating the draft Programme for Government, which will not be worth the paper it is written on if David Trimble achieves his objective of bringing down the Good Friday Agreement and the Assembly. The targets for achievement that the Executive are setting through the draft Programme for Government will be wiped out if David Trimble gets his way. Go raibh mile maith agat.

Mr Byrne: I welcome the debate on the draft Programme for Government. The guiding principle "making a difference" was the primary objective set three years ago, and that is still the challenge as the Executive seek to make devolved Government more relevant and beneficial to our communities. The people across our region want to see social and economic progress arising from the political structures working effectively here. Northern Ireland has a large public sector, which plays a major role in our regional economy. In fact, we have the largest public sector dependency of any region on these islands. The challenge for the Assembly, therefore, is to improve the economic performance of our regional economy to lessen our public sector dependency. However, our regional economy can only become more competitive and enjoy better growth and economic output if our public infrastructure for road and rail transport, water and sewerage provision, and energy supply can meet the needs of modern industry, businesses and households.

The accumulated public investment deficit in infrastructure is accepted generally to be a major bottleneck in restraining development across the rural sub-regions beyond the Belfast metropolitan area. The reinvestment and reform initiative pioneered by the Deputy First Minister, and announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in May, provides an opportunity to tackle the big capital investment needs in roads, water and sewerage. That is good news, and it is hoped that it can be developed into real investment. The business community, particularly the small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), need continued support to make the region more economically sustainable in the future. Invest Northern Ireland must think beyond selective financial assistance packages to be more effective, innovative and helpful to would-be SME promoters.

The business community, including the manufacturing and tourism industries, need confidence in a stable, political environment to invest and grow, to create employment and contribute to the economic growth in our region. Unfortunately, recent political events, including the recoil of the Ulster Unionist Party from work in the North/South Ministerial Council, and the street violence of the past year, have caused great concern and anxiety in our business community. The Assembly and the other political institutions, including the North/South bodies, must work to maximum effect to build a better regional economy and society here.

The Programme for Government addresses some important elements at this juncture in the life of the Assembly. The Executive commitment to invest in transport and in a water and sewerage infrastructure over the next 10 years is welcome, and it is necessary to promote development across the region. I welcome the targeting of resources to help reshape our agriculture industry through the emerging vision for the future objectives. The farming industry needs help and commitment from Government to restructure and become more competitive and market driven. There is positive emphasis on tackling wider access to education and training so that young students or adults will have better opportunities to develop themselves with improved skills or qualifications to enhance their employment prospects. Efforts to increase investment in the student support package are desirable and progressive, as is the targeting of financial support to those students who are most in need.

Hospital provision is a major concern for many communities, particularly in my constituency of West Tyrone. Devolution must mean that all citizens in Northern Ireland have equal access to hospital-based medical and acute services. The issue of hospital provision and the current hospital acute services review is of particular concern to the people of Tyrone and Omagh — a population of almost 25,000. The people of my constituency want devolution to work. They do not want a devolved Health Minister to deliver a bombshell by leaving West Tyrone without a decent hospital. I earnestly hope that "Making a Difference” does not result in my constituency ending up without a viable and sustainable hospital in the future.

3.45 pm

The Chairperson of the Committee for Education (Mr Kennedy): As Chairperson of the Education Committee, I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this important debate. First, I would like to deal with the statements that have been made on political matters, in the speeches of Mr John Kelly and Ms Gildernew of Sinn Féin.

I reject wholeheartedly the criticisms levelled at David Trimble and the Ulster Unionist Party. I remind those Members that the institutions are in a state of confusion because —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

I have had occasion to remind Members to return to the subject matter of the debate. It is only right that I should ask the Member not to refer to issues that are outside the specific subject matter of the Programme for Government.

Mr Kennedy: I respect your authority, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, you allowed considerable licence to representatives from Sinn Féin to criticise severely the Ulster Unionist Party and the First Minister. It is grossly unfair that you are not prepared to allow those criticisms to be countered.

We are in this situation because of the clear failure of the Republican movement, in particular, to honour its obligations under the Belfast Agreement, while events take place in Colombia and Castlereagh and in the interface areas of Belfast. That is why the Ulster Unionist Council —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

I gave the Member an opportunity to continue and he has suggested that the Chair was too lax and allowed Members to go beyond the scope of the debate. I have reminded him already that he is going beyond the scope of the debate also.

Mr Kennedy: I will speak as Chairperson of the Education Committee. The Committee endorses the draft Programme for Government’s recognition of the importance of investing in education and skills.

I welcome the draft Budget announced today, which endorses the commitments outlined in the programme. The Education Committee will wish to scrutinise the programme in detail and ensure that appropriate and challenging targets are set and that adequate funding is allocated to those key priorities.

I am pleased that investment in schools capital building is a priority. In his statement to the House yesterday, the First Minister highlighted that tackling the infrastructure deficit is not only about bricks and mortar; it is about the standard of education that our schools provide. I agree wholeheartedly with his comments.

The Education Committee appreciates the programme’s recognition that the earliest years of learning are the most important. It has stressed consistently that investment in early-years learning is an investment in the future, which will result in long-term savings and reduced need for investment in expensive remedial measures. The Committee welcomes the commitment to begin implementing a new primary school curriculum, which will include a new approach to early-years education. My Committee is carrying out an inquiry into early-years learning, and its report to the Assembly will help to inform Members about the matter.

Special education must be a priority. Therefore, I am disappointed that the target date for the introduction of a special educational needs Bill for Northern Ireland has been revised. The Bill will not be introduced until some time in 2003 or 2004. That matter has been unresolved for too long, and it must be considered urgently.

The Committee’s written response to the Executive Position Report stated that it expected to see targets for advancing the review of post-primary education and the inquiry into teachers’ pay and conditions of service. I read the draft programme quickly, and it did not seem to address those priorities. These obvious gaps must be addressed in the final document.

I should like now to turn to numeracy and literacy, about which the members of the Committee remain anxious. Yesterday, Mr Durkan highlighted the Executive’s commitment to taking action to ensure that our young people leave school with the highest possible standards of literacy and numeracy. Why has the promised launch of a revised literacy and numeracy strategy in schools by September 2002 been put back until September 2003? Why have the targets for numeracy and literacy for 11-year-olds and 14-year-olds in the Department of Education’s draft public service agreement been lowered and the timescale for their achievement extended for two years, from 2004 until 2006?

The targets for achieving level 4 or beyond at Key Stage 2 assessment in English have been changed from 77% to 75%, and in maths from 80% to 77%. Both targets are now to be achieved by 2006 rather than 2004 and, unfortunately, there are other examples. Last year I pointed out that the numeracy and literacy targets had twice been revised downwards. The explanation I received was that information had shown that the targets would not be reached, and that they had, therefore, been revised to make them more realistic. I wonder what the explanation will be this time. I am sorry that the Minister of Education is not in his place. The lowering of targets does not fit with the commitment to tackling the problem that the Executive has outlined, and the Committee for Education will wish to examine the matter very carefully indeed.

There are some other issues that the Committee will wish to look at in more detail, but I should like to conclude by welcoming the recognition in the draft Programme for Government that education contributes to sustainable development. Like you, Madam Deputy Speaker, I took part in a youth parliament debate in the Senate Chamber at which I heard some very articulate students put forward compelling and persuasive arguments on the issue. I trust that political parties other than the Ulster Unionist Party will honour their obligations under the agreement, to ensure that this Programme for Government is implemented by the Administration.

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall not test you as others have in relation to the scope of the debate, but I approach the question as a convinced devolutionist who believes that it is always better for those taking the decisions to be answerable to the people for whom they do so. Everyone knows my opposition to the current type of devolution, and we are always glad when new converts come round to our way of thinking. It seems that the closer we get to the election, the more converts we have to our cause. That is as far as I shall stretch you on that subject, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I say that I come as a devolutionist. When I moved into the Department, I saw what was effectively a shambles. The infrastructure deficit was enormous, and it was clear that there was a major backlog. I do not take it easily when people say that it is a failure of devolution. What then was the failure of direct rule before it? Many of the problems that we are having to address have been the problems of direct rule. When I moved into the Department, it was clear that there was no strategy to develop the important issues. Everything was moving on an ad-hoc basis, with a piecemeal approach to policies.

The first thing that we had to do, right across the board, was to set up strategies in every area of responsibility: the regional transportation strategy; the regional development strategy; the water strategy that is currently out for consultation. We have revised the harbours legislation and made progress with the railways. We did not deal only with the strategic guidance that the Department now has to see it into the future; we have started to cost the proposals necessary to take Northern Ireland forward. We went further, also looking to identify where the funds might come from.

Having gone through that exercise, I agree with much of the comment in the Chamber on the massive need for infrastructure investment in Northern Ireland. I am pleased that the draft Programme for Government acknowledges that need. Paragraph 3.7 states:

“The Executive is committed to delivering new and substantial investments in modernising and improving our infrastructure.”

However, in his opening statement, the Deputy First Minister said that the draft Budget, which was also proposed today, supported the Programme for Government. I regret that the Budget announced by the Minister of Finance and Personnel fails to address our infrastructure needs. Roads and transport are one of the Executive's top three priorities, yet the meagre increase of 1.2% in the Department's budget for the next financial year falls short of what is required to reverse the underinvestment of the direct rule years. That below-inflation increase will damage the long-term competitiveness of the Province. When all other funding sources are taken into account, the increase of 4.3% falls well below the Department's average. It also falls short of the draft Programme for Government's requirement to upgrade our infrastructure.

The hope of money from the reinvestment and reform initiative in future will be cold comfort for desperately needed infrastructure across the Province. The plan of “jam tomorrow” fails to meet the urgent requirement of today's crumbling infrastructure, and it simply stores up problems for the future.

The already overmanned Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister received a 19% increase for one year in the draft Budget. If one adds the money that is not on mainstream funding, it amounts to an increase of over 50% over three years — the largest of any Government Department. That is for a Department that, in my view, shows no visible product. It is difficult not to come to the conclusion that the Executive's priorities are no longer health, education and transport, but bureaucracy, bureaucracy and more bureaucracy.

The draft Budget and the draft Programme for Government do not match. They fail to make a difference in Northern Ireland; they expose those who say one thing and do another. As they stand, the three-year spending plans fail Northern Ireland and will not withstand the outcome of an Assembly election. When Members make their decisions on the Programme for Government and on the Budget, they must remember that the Budget that they will be voting for is incapable of delivering the Programme for Government, for which they will also be voting. Members will have to live with the consequences of failing to invest in infrastructure while extending Government bureaucracy.

Mr M Murphy: How can the Executive propose the draft Programme for Government while there are those in the Ulster Unionist Party who are opposed to change? After all, one half aims at bringing down the Assembly. Where are the strategic objectives to achieve equality, partnership, sustainability and prosperity when there are those in the Executive whose objectives are based on exclusion? David Trimble contradicts himself so much that it is about time he stopped dancing about and got down — [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will you make a ruling on the subject matter of the Member's speech?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you for reminding me, Mr Kennedy. I was about to ask you, Mr Murphy, to restrict yourself to the Programme for Government, which is today's debate.

Mr M Murphy: Unfortunately, Madam Deputy Speaker, this is all part and parcel of the draft Programme for Government. If David Trimble gets his way, the Programme for Government will go out the window. It is gone, judging by what the Unionists did at the weekend.

4.00 pm

Is there any point in debating the Programme for Government, if the First Minister is prepared to end it in January?

How can the Assembly square its commitment to ensuring the transfer of power from Westminster to our political institutions, which will make a real and positive difference to economic and social life, with the concerted campaign by Unionists to frustrate and delay change?

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Why do you give the Member undue licence?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Mr Kennedy, for reminding me of my duty. Thank you, Mr Murphy, for making the clear connection between the weekend's events and the Programme for Government. However, Members' comments must relate to the Programme for Government. I appreciate that many Members mentioned the weekend's events during the debate; however, I have corrected Sinn Féin Members and those from the Ulster Unionist Benches who dwelt on the subject. Mr Murphy, please limit your comments to the Programme for Government, regardless of whether it will be around for much longer.

Mr M Murphy: There is no going back to Unionist rule; Sinn Féin will not stand for that.

When will the allocation to the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure be finalised, and on what baselines will the targets be set? Will there be a target to increase activity in the creative sector? No imaginative response has been made to the need for increased support of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure.

I welcome the shift of resources to focus on areas of greatest need and the development of a creative approach to government that puts people's needs at the core. There must be a partnership approach to government — between social partners, the community and local government.

In targeting social need, the Assembly must deal with poverty, from which some people continue to suffer. Poverty could be tackled effectively by providing proper housing in which children could have the best start in life and where they could grow up to be healthy. If the Executive live up to their commitments in the Good Friday Agreement, our reward will be a peaceful, fair and inclusive community for children to grow up in. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Close: Some three years ago, the first Programme for Government was presented to the House. The passage of time has demonstrated clearly that the first programme was mainly aspirational: how many of its 256 priorities have been delivered? Because of its nature, I believed that the lives of the people of Northern Ireland would be changed only after several years. Unfortunately, I have been proved correct in that respect. Real differences will only happen further down the road.

Unfortunately, the full opportunities that were, and are, afforded by devolution and the deliverance of the full potential of the Good Friday Agreement have been missed because of the failure to bring about real change. The aspirational approach and the attempts to cover too many areas in a specific period have resulted in the butter being spread too thinly, with little benefit for the people of Northern Ireland.

Many reviews have been carried out — reviews into rating, accommodation, the Civil Service, public administration and procurement. Waste issues, usage of assets et cetera are now being considered, and that is all good. However, there has been a slippage of some eight months in the accommodation review and of about five months in the rating review. It is impossible to put a figure on the public administration review slippage because we do not yet know when it will yield results. As a consequence, the people of Northern Ireland question what has happened over the past three years and suggest that those years may well have been wasted.

I, my constituents, and those who support the Good Friday Agreement and devolution, welcome some of the achievements to date. We welcome the commitments, but we want them to be delivered on. We welcome free travel for the elderly, the start on the cancer centre, and the £100 a week towards the cost of nursing care. However, more should have been done in the past three years to improve efficiency, and thus provide the additional resources needed to make a real difference to the lives of the people of Northern Ireland. Three years on, what has been achieved? Our population is still in relatively poor health. Our death rates are higher than other regions in the United Kingdom. Our waiting lists are the longest in Europe; in particular, our waiting lists for inpatient treatment are longer than in any other region in the United Kingdom. That is an indictment of the Executive and those charged with making improvements.

The quality of the drinking water in Northern Ireland is still the lowest in the United Kingdom. Clean drinking water is one of life's necessities. Our sewerage system is crumbling and decrepit — in short, it stinks. The upshot is problems for the economy.

Most Members will have received letters from the Construction Employers Federation. I have received several letters from large construction firms in my constituency that are concerned about the delay created by the planning moratorium. Previous Programmes for Government contained a promise that the Minister of the Environment would reduce planning backlogs, and that they would be cleared by the end of 2002. A cynic would ask whether one way to get rid of planning backlogs is to introduce a moratorium and to stop granting planning permission. Meetings with the Construction Employers Federation et cetera have taken place, but I understand that decisions were supposed to have been made by the middle of this month. However, that has not been the case. Those who support devolution and who want progress and action can accuse the Executive of procrastinating and of not knowing whether they are coming or going. I use the opportunity presented by this debate to suggest that the Ministers involved solve the problem together so that, once again, construction and the economy can flow.

I have been critical of the Executive. The Executive are not being, and cannot be, blamed for all our faults and weaknesses. However, three years on, I insist that people have the right to ask what real changes have been made. People at least have the right to start seeing the light at the end of a very long tunnel.

I referred to the various reviews taking place, which are suffering a degree of slippage. Even in those reviews, opportunities to gain best benefit for Northern Ireland are lost. For example, we are currently involved in the rating review. There have been meetings and consultations throughout Northern Ireland on the necessary changes. For some reason or other, however, the Executive have failed abysmally to persuade Her Majesty's Government to permit the Assembly to have tax-varying powers. I am absolutely convinced — and a weight of evidence from the general public is building up — that a change from the iniquitous regional rate to a fair and equitable system of local income tax, based on the ability to pay, could raise the necessary resources and revenue much less painfully and much more efficiently. That could cut out some of the bureaucracy in the layer upon layer of reliefs in the rating system. It would be easier to collect and could produce the goods, but, for some reason, it appears that the Executive have set their face against a progressive tax and continue to insist on, and opt for, a variation of the —

Madam Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close. The time limit was eight minutes, and I have given a little leeway. You may conclude your remarks.

Mr Close: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. How time flies when one is in good company.

Mr S Wilson: The conclusion lasts five minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

You have a few seconds, Mr Close.

Mr Close: I shall omit my comments on the necessity to get public administration right. That has been covered by other Members. One of the big challenges we face is contained in paragraphs 3.2 and 3.3 of our vision for the future in the Programme for Government, and I must pose just one question to the Executive. What exactly —

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The eight minutes are well and truly up and beyond that.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr A Maginness): Some people have said that the draft Programme for Government is aspirational. Of course it is. It is aspirational until it is put into effect. All Programmes for Government are of that nature. Assembly Members will judge how this Administration puts that Programme for Government into effect.

As Chairperson of the Committee, I welcome the Programme for Government in general terms, and I welcome the specific commitments by the Administration to developing our infrastructure and repairing its neglect. That neglect was made evident on many occasions by myself and by members of the Committee for Regional Development. I welcome the commitment to the transportation strategy and to dealing with the problems that affect the water industry in Northern Ireland. The Water Service should receive the wholehearted support of the Administration. I shall judge the Administration on how it delivers in respect of providing new infrastructures for transportation and water.

The Committee for Regional Development is obliged to scrutinise the Government's actions and to monitor what the Department does with the money that it receives to carry out the two major projects.

4.15 pm

I share Members' concerns that we may fall short with direct funding. However, we have a wonderful opportunity by way of the reinvestment and reform initiative, which the Deputy First Minister negotiated successfully with the Treasury. The initiative revolutionises the funding of public services in Northern Ireland. I welcome also the establishment of the strategic investment board, which will be critical in the delivery of investment to all Departments, especially the Department for Regional Development. I look forward to its proposals vis-à-vis our long-neglected infrastructure. As the Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development, I welcome much in the draft Programme for Government, and, regardless of their political perspective, Committee members should give it a general welcome also.

Members are committed to making devolution work, though perhaps from different political perspectives. Mr

McCartney seems to be the exception to the rule because, essentially, he is anti-devolutionist. Members can criticise the Government and the Administration, but at least all of us, in the main, support the concept of devolution. Of course, devolution has not delivered immediately; there is much in the pipeline, such as the reviews of rating policy and public administration, both of which are vital to the development of administration in Northern Ireland.

An old uncle once advised me to “take one bite of the elephant at a time, son”. Members should heed that advice, because we must operate in a way that gradually implements the things we need to do. The review of rating policy is essential to the future structure of our internal revenue, and the review of public administration is important for efficiency. However, it takes time to implement such measures and to process those reports, and, therefore, I counsel patience.

If we had more political co-operation and harmony, most of our problems would disappear, but, and I tread gently here, the weekend’s events have cast a blight over today’s debate. It seems that, instead of the plug’s being pulled immediately, it will be pulled gradually but inevitably in January. I exhort those who are committed to devolution to think again. To make the Programme for Government work, Members should renew their commitment to the agreement because, no matter what their political perspective, the draft Programme for Government is good.

Having said that, I have at least one serious criticism about the section on community relations: it is not as strong as it could be. I do not detect the necessary urgency required to tackle community relations. Paragraph 4.16 states that

“we will, by December 2003, taking account of a consultation process, have in place a new policy and strategy on good relations...”

That undertaking is not urgent enough to facilitate the development of a good community relations policy that will ameliorate the serious problems on our streets and in our communities. More thought must go into it, because it is at the core of our political problems. We must effect an attitudinal change in political and community values that will transform our community and bring real peace and harmony to our streets.

Therefore, the Executive should reconsider their approach to community relations. I am told that a document was prepared and presented to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister in January but has not yet seen the light of day. That is a matter of deep regret, if true. It is time that the Executive reassessed their position, and it is time that we had a well-worked-out community relations programme to tackle effectively our most serious and pressing problem. I want to see more urgency and more detail.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member will draw his remarks to a close.

Mr K Robinson: I had not intended to speak in this debate but, having listened to its tone, I thought that perhaps I could add some reality to some of the comments that have been made. I do not intend to refer to the events of the weekend because the problems that caused them lie in history. Perhaps some Members can search their consciences about some of the things that they could have done, but failed to do, to help the process.

Turning to education, sub-priority 1 of the draft Programme for Government aims to give our children the best start in life. I welcome that. I am sure that Members would not deny children that start. I commend in particular the development of programmes such as Sure Start, which will give children who live in areas of multiple deprivation a firm foundation for future progress on which they must build. The deprivation of certain areas, particularly in the city, has already been commented on.

I welcome the proposed changes to the early years curriculum, because that is another vital building block in our education system. It will help underachieving primary schools, in particular. All of those are necessary building blocks if we are to build a significant and viable second-level education in the future.

When a school has adopted one of those programmes to help it raise its standards, and those standards have been raised and recognised by the inspectorate, the school may find that, instead of being rewarded for its success, its extra financial and staffing resources are reduced. That reinforces the problem. In such situations, we must ask why we try to improve things.

Skills are important in the curriculum, particularly transferable skills. The examination of the curriculum as it exists, and as it might exist, is welcome. If these skills are transferable, they become relevant to the needs of employers and training agencies, and our economic future depends on them. Sub-priority 4 of the draft programme refers specifically to those needs. It is on these skills that our future prosperity depends.

Looking at the wording of the enterprise, trade and investment sub-priorities, I think that they have missed a great opportunity — an opportunity that we would not have sought, but that is being thrust upon us. We have suffered a downturn in the high-tech and telecommunications sector, particularly in east Antrim. That sector has a highly skilled workforce that is currently underemployed or unemployed. It is incumbent on the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to seize that opportunity.

The Department talks about seizing the opportunity, and it must ensure that the critical mass of research and development personnel and those with high-tech skills are used as entrepreneurs to act as springboards to launch us into new unexplored areas of technology.

On the subject of special education, I welcome the recognition in paragraph 6.8 of the importance of special educational needs provision. That educational area has been neglected for a long time, and capital infrastructure must be upgraded. We must also focus on the needs of those young people who leave special education between the ages of 16 and 19 and for whom adequate onward provision into the Jobskills programme, along with preparation to sustain them in adult life, is not available. I bring that matter to the attention of the relevant authority.

I trust that the programme will not be deflected on sub-priority 2 in that section, because of the ministerial focus on the Burns Report and all that flows from it, but will ensure that that firm foundation of high quality early years learning and properly funded primary education will be maintained. Other Members have referred to the importance of primary education. That is the core of our education system, and it is not funded properly. I am concerned that significant sums have still not been moved in that direction. If core funding, core staffing and a relevant curriculum can be brought together to address children's need, both at primary and secondary level, we will have a firm foundation on which to move forward. That will ensure that the band of well-qualified school leavers, who currently exceed the attainment levels of their peer group in England and Wales, can be expanded.

In paragraph 6.19 growth in enrolments in integrated schools and Irish-medium education is portrayed as desirable, and I do not demur in relation to that suggestion. However, I am concerned about the impact of the enhanced status of those schools upon the management of the maintained and controlled schools sectors. The Department should ensure that there is equity of treatment for all children in all types of schools.

In 2.2 the programme states that "a downturn in economic fortunes can have serious social consequences."

In east and south Antrim, serious social consequences are being experienced, and I ask that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Minister for Regional Development seriously consider how that problem can be tackled.

Extra funding was allocated to the Health Service. However, because of the convoluted management structures, it appears to be a bureaucratic black hole. No matter how much money we pour into it, no significant difference will be made unless we tackle those structures.

The condition of our infrastructure is abysmal. Some of the priority schemes seem to have more to do with political geography than with need and strategic issues. I refer specifically to the A2 between Newtownabbey and Carrickfergus — a road that carries more traffic than parts of our motorway system. It is the vital artery upon which Carrickfergus and its commercial expansion depend, yet the short stretch of one-and-a-half miles is not in the Programme for Government.

Sewerage and water infrastructure present an equally sorry state in east Antrim. The recent flooding episodes and the increasing planning permissions that are being granted in the area point that up. The document refers to a "clean, green" image, and I like to think that a "clean" image could be achieved in east Antrim. It concerned me somewhat that at least one Member commented that we would be expected to take on a "green" image.

In east Antrim, industrial pollution is a problem along with car emissions, and if the proper infrastructure were in place, those problems would be close to being resolved.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member will draw his comments to a close.

Mr K Robinson: Finally, our areas of special scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty are under constant threat from the Department, the very one that is supposed to protect them. I have great concerns for my constituency.

4.30 pm

Mr S Wilson: As usual, and as we would expect, this debate has become a backslapping exercise by those in the pro-agreement parties. Those Members use the Programme for Government as an opportunity to tell people how wonderful the agreement is, how it has delivered better services to people in Northern Ireland, and how much better life is as a result of this institution and its peculiarities. However, sometimes, reality shone through. A few Members have voiced their opposition, including Seamus Close, Bob McCartney and Peter Robinson. Even Alban Maginness admitted that we have been a bit heavy on reviews and a bit slow in delivering. As some old wise man told him, you should "take one bite of the elephant at a time".

I am afraid that the evidence is that the elephant is not even getting a wee nip, let alone a bite, taken out of it.

David Trimble promised his party, and Mark Durkan promised the Assembly that, over the term of this Administration, Assembly costs would be neutral because of savings on bureaucracy in other areas. We are not even at the starting point, and, as a result of some of the measures that have been introduced, we are adding still more bureaucracy.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

I wish to concentrate on education, a subject on which Ken Robinson touched. If each Department followed education's example, we would see the same abysmal failure. Next year, we shall spend £85 million more on education than we did this year. For that, we would expect something more to be delivered. However, many of the measures that the Minister of Education promised last year have not yet been delivered. When we compare the draft Programme for Government with last year's programme, we see that the targets that were set last year have not only been downgraded, but put back for two years. Those are vital targets, not figures dreamt up by someone in the Department, and they affect the lives of ordinary youngsters.

For example, targets were set for literacy and numeracy levels. By this year, 77% of children were supposed to have reached level 4 of Key Stage 2 in English and maths. That has now been downgraded. The target for the number of children passing their GCSEs at grades A to C has been downgraded and put back two years. The target for reducing the number of youngsters leaving school with no GCSEs has been downgraded and put back two years. The target for reducing the number of pupils who have poor attendance records at primary and secondary schools has been downgraded and put back two years. The target for reducing the number of schoolchildren with multiple suspensions has been downgraded and put back two years. I could go on.

Every target that was set last year has been reduced and put back two years. However, the Minister of Education will be given £85 million more to spend on delivering the service. We must ask whether the Minister needs a caning, or whether the Executive need a caning for voting to give him more money when he tells them that he will deliver less. This is hardly a success for the Administration. We give the Minister more, and we get back less. Of course, that "less" means fewer youngsters leaving school equipped for life; more youngsters wandering the streets because of multiple suspensions or bad attendance, and worse conditions in our schools.

The document is full of contradictions. For example, Ken Robinson referred to rationalisation. We have been told that rationalisation is needed in the educational interest of pupils. With that in mind, you would think that there are too many schools and that we need to reduce their number; the number of places should be reduced, and that should be the aim of the Department — not a bit of it. In the same document we read that the Minister is going to spend more money on providing more Irish-medium schools.

The latest Irish-medium school, which opened in September 2002 and caters for eight pupils, cost the Department and the Southern Education and Library Board over £300,000 — that is what is meant by wasting resources. More Irish-medium schools and integrated schools are to be built. In a recent reply to a question in the House, the Minister said that integrated schools got 20% of the resources last year, though on the basis of the needs assessment they deserved only 5%. It seems that the trend is upward. What happened to the idea of rationalisation of schools? Why build more schools if you are saying that you need to cut the number of schools? These are the types of contradictions that are in the Programme for Government.

This is not a success story: this is an example of the Executive pandering to Ministers in the interests of keeping the ship afloat. Regardless of whether Ministers are delivering, the Executive will hand out money to them. That is one of the reasons why I disagree with Seamus Close about tax-raising powers. God help the people of Northern Ireland if the Assembly ever gets tax-raising powers.

I could have talked about other Departments, but I have cited one example from one Department. Money has been squandered already, and we should not be contemplating giving more powers to Ministers, and to the Assembly, to take more money out of the pockets of taxpayers to be squandered in the way in which the Programme for Government illustrates.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Mr Neeson): I wish to make some comments on behalf of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. First, I welcome the commitments given in the draft Programme for Government announced by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister yesterday. When coupled with Dr Farren's Budget statement today, it becomes apparent that, it is to be hoped, there is a commitment to joined-up Government in the Assembly.

The Programme for Government highlights the positive economic factors currently underwriting the local economy: comparatively low unemployment; high employment levels; increased manufacturing output and improved levels of gross domestic product for the local population. However, I must echo the points raised by Ken Robinson in relation to the downturn in the IT industry, particularly in the east Antrim area. That issue has to be taken on board by the Minister.

Undoubtedly those factors are also assisted by the relative stability of our political structures and the recognition that devolution is working. The positive economic indicators mean that the Executive can be more proactive and forward looking in dealing with the problems in our society for which we are responsible. I share all of the concerns voiced by Alban Maginness on the need for greater focus in dealing with community relations, which is not really addressed in the Programme for Government as well as it should be.

This time of relative economic prosperity should not be wasted; the bedrock should be laid now to avoid some of the worst aspects of life when, at some hypothetical time in the future, the economy is less buoyant. I remember one of the big issues that we had to deal with in the last Assembly of 1982-86 — where I held the same position that I hold in the present Assembly — was that unemployment was running at 20%. That was a major problem. Neither the Executive nor the Assembly should be complacent about the present situation.

The draft Programme for Government recognises that infrastructural problems exist, and those problems must be overcome for there to be an effective and competitive economy, so I give a guarded welcome to the continued commitment to the reinvestment and reform initiative, and I hope to see that assist in the continuing development of the economy.

I share the view contained in yesterday's document that the Executive have a proactive role in certain areas of governance and that, in respect of the economy, the most effective role is that of a skilled facilitator. In the light of that, I applaud the Executive's decision, and commend particularly the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, to put the money allocated for inward investment projects on a more strategic footing. To agree that inward investment projects should be funded from within an allocated range and, due to the possibility of underspend on certain occasions, that this vital area should be given priority in monitoring is radical, strategic and forward looking. I suspect that that would not have been agreed in the days of direct rule.

With regard to the specific proposals in the draft Programme for Government, I endorse many of the suggestions contained in the "Securing a Competitive Economy" priority. We must continue with the commitment to invest in research and development. Our economy must compete with other blue-chip economies in bioengineering, aeronautics and information technology. To be at the cutting edge there will require financial support and other commitments from the Executive.

Paragraph 7.7 lists the sub-priorities for this overall priority. They make a challenging and aspirational shopping list. We need better infrastructure to integrate the various planning processes and to be entrepreneurial, creative, innovative and competitive as a society. We must develop the undoubted potential of tourism, untie certain shackles of regulation and protect, enhance and promote the environment.

To achieve what is set out will require a strategic and focused approach. It will be challenging and will require a team effort. I stress that that is important because when we are dealing with the bread-and-butter issues in our Committee — and I hope in the other Committees too — there is a genuine attempt to deal effectively with the issues at hand, and a team effort will be required. Responsibility does not lie with one Minister or Department alone. Departments must continue to work collaboratively and do more to remove the silo mindset.

We in the Assembly must also play our part in scrutinising the Departments' work and ensuring that the challenging targets contained in the draft Programme for Government are met. The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment will not shirk from that task.

Ms McWilliams: I too support many of the proposals in the draft Programme for Government. As yesterday, I almost feel like I am revising for an exam without being sure if it will ever take place, particularly given the announcement last weekend. As I said yesterday, many of the targets are now in question. Some of the legislation given a First Stage reading yesterday may not now progress because of the decisions that may be taken in January.

I am concerned about the message that we are sending to people if they are attempting to plan for the future, particularly the plans around the workforce initiatives.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister has been doing needs and effectiveness evaluations; it has been looking at the workforce in many areas and making proposals and recommendations. However, all of that may now be up in the air.

4.45 pm

I rarely find myself in agreement with Sammy Wilson in his choice of targets. However, if this Programme for Government is about anything, it should be about the future of our children and young people. I am concerned about the number of young people who wander our streets — those with poor school attendance or multiple suspensions — there is an overlap between that and antisocial behaviour. I am concerned also that the targets in last year's Programme for Government have gone down, and not up, for that group of children. I am concerned also that those young people — most of them in their early teens — merit only a few lines in the Programme for Government. This is the draft programme, and the responsibility lies with the Minister of Education, or the Executive, to reconsider the message that they are sending out to youth and to youth workers. We are asking for only a 2% increase in attendance among youth organisations to raise it from 32% to 34%.

We have many innovative projects that we should be sustaining and putting into the Programme for Government. It not only involves children attending youth clubs: it involves outreach youth workers going out onto the streets, finding initiatives to attract young people to keep them away from the antisocial behaviour that we are told is on the increase. I am extremely disillusioned with that section of the Programme for Government if that is the message that we are sending out.

It is good to see that there are some preventative programmes in the Health Service for our young people. There will be 2,000 extra places on Sure Start. However, many on Sure Start schemes do not know whether the schemes will be in place after March 2003 when their funding runs out. There is an anomaly: they will be given 2,000 extra places by December 2003 but they are not sure whether the programmes will be in place.

We should be encouraging these positive preventative childcare programmes instead of putting children into residential care. It is good to see projects on foster care and adoption. However, those targets should be increased, especially for time out and support.

I have just come from the Health Committee's inquiry into child protection at which social workers said that they were under enormous stress at present. There are 300 unallocated places in one trust, which social workers cannot allocate because they are under so much pressure. Nevertheless, we often hear about tragedies, such as the recent death of baby Jasmine McGowan and in which social workers were involved. That poses enormous questions about social services.

We must not take our eyes off the ball by constantly talking about acute care and the modernisation of hospitals while forgetting about the great deal of preventative work that must be done by those in primary care, community care and especially in social services.

I am concerned that there is still no mention of a central maternity hospital — a women's centred hospital for the Belfast area. If the Hayes Report is implemented, the Downpatrick Maternity Hospital and the Lagan Valley Hospital will close, and there will be no anaesthetics at the Mater Hospital. Therefore, many more babies will have to be placed in one hospital. It is open to question whether that will be the Royal Maternity Hospital or the Jubilee Hospital — it does not matter. We must know from the Programme for Government that there will be a new hospital in the next few years; there should have been a line or two about that. Many women were better looked after 20 years ago than they are today.

A message must be sent out to the doctors who are still boycotting the local health and social care groups that commissioning of services will happen. The draft Programme for Government simply states that that may happen in the next year. To be able to say that there is a target for a start to the commissioning of services would be a positive thing.

Sammy Wilson was critical about Ministers, but made no comment about the Minister for Regional Development. The Department for Regional Development will not begin to introduce detailed alternative funding proposals until September 2003. It will take an entire year to find funding proposals to support transportation, water and sewerage infrastructure. I have no doubt that other Members have commented on that. It is important that a message be sent out that those are some of the major problems that we will tackle. However, we will be sitting in the next Assembly before any proposals will even be seen.

I am concerned that there are few details in the draft Programme for Government about careers guidance. The task force report on long-term unemployment was disappointing; its recommendations speak for themselves. I have previously questioned the practice of civil servants being placed on task forces rather than people from outside organisations being brought in. The Department for Employment and Learning has made only limited recommendations about careers advice, especially for those who have literacy and numeracy problems.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I apologise for my absence during the debate. The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety has been meeting all afternoon.

I have studied the section of the draft Programme for Government that deals with health, and I welcome the fact that additional money is being injected into the health budget. At a time of competing demands, it is a welcome recognition of the problems facing health. The emphasis must be on ensuring that the money is invested wisely and used effectively. The Comptroller and Auditor General should have responsibility for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. It is well known that he has responsibility for only nine of the 10 Departments.

Although the money is welcome, not all of it is new money. The funds for the cancer centre have already been announced. The emphasis on reinvestment and reform is important, because the Health Service is crying out for investment. There is also the matter of family care services. People are living longer, and those dreadful words "bed blocking" are disrespectful to elderly people in hospital. However, there are not enough places for them and if nursing homes and residential homes were opened up to make way for people who do not require any further hospital treatment, that could solve the problem of bed blocking and waiting lists.

Monica McWilliams mentioned the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety's inquiry into the protection of children. It would be inappropriate to go into the detail of that major issue. However, it is heartbreaking to speak to social workers, paediatricians and others who deal with the protection of children, and with the lack of resources in all four health and social services boards.

I feel strongly about the minimal funding that goes to health promotion, considering the costs of the whole Health Service. In paragraph 5.4, the draft Programme for Government states that "Evidence is accumulating to support the view that, if we improve matters now, we will need to spend less later".

That is not new evidence. The importance of looking after oneself has been known for a long time. When I was a child, people used to say “an apple a day keeps the doctor away”. That may be a slight exaggeration, but good living and eating properly every day are important for young children. However, that message does not always get through to families. It is more difficult for families who live in social deprivation to concentrate on those matters, and the better-off families seem to have the finance and the ability to pay more attention to that important part of health.

It could be said that we are training our children from an early age to develop heart disease. That is well known by people who look at the coronary arteries of young people. Everyone knows about the high incidence of heart disease in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland’s first positron emission tomography scanner was recently introduced at the Royal Victoria Hospital, and the Minister, Bairbre de Brún, was present at the launch. She has always recognised the need for that machine, and I have mentioned it many times in the House.

Everyone knows what X-rays, CAT scanners and MRI (magnetic resonance imaging) scanners are; positron emission tomography is at the height of that technology. That technology is available to the people of Northern Ireland — there is already a machine at Blackrock in the South of Ireland — to diagnose heart disease and certain cancers, but, sadly, it operates only one day a week. I am not trying to lecture the Health Minister, because I know that she has put in a bid to the Executive programme funds. That scanner must operate seven days a week.

Paragraph 5.6 of the draft Programme for Government states:

“The rationale for action is clear: many conditions — such as heart disease, stroke, some cancers, dental decay — are linked to our environment and the way we live.”

That is true, but when one considers heart disease, strokes and cancer together, diabetes comes to mind. There is hardly an extended family in Northern Ireland that is not affected by diabetes. Diabetes sufferers and those with a family history of diabetes — who are potential sufferers — are more prone to heart disease, strokes and certain forms of cancer. There was a major debate on diabetes in the Chamber last year, and the motion was passed unanimously. It is important that health recommendations contained in the draft Programme for Government are taken on board, because diabetes affects almost every family in Northern Ireland sooner or later. I am pleased that the Minister is in the Chamber for this debate.

Mr M Robinson: In welcoming the opportunity to speak in this debate today, I would like to concentrate on the issues of housing and community infrastructure by examining the relevant proposals which have been laid out in the draft Programme for Government. The issue of housing is an issue that affects every person in Northern Ireland, but unfortunately in our society many people do not have access to a warm and comfortable home. I am quoting directly from the document:

“We will ensure that everyone has the opportunity to access decent, affordable housing”.

Housing policy must be relative to the people and to the locality in its targeting, and it must be responsive to local needs, aiming at all times to helping those in most need.

Good housing provided well is crucial, and I welcome the fact that the Government are committed to making this a fundamental objective. A good home is a basic human right, and no one in the twenty-first century should have to live in sub-standard housing, but, unfortunately, this is a reality for many.

5.00 pm

Statistics show that there are 44,000 unfit properties in Northern Ireland. Some 14,000 properties do not have central heating, and 10,000 are in urgent need of major repairs and improvements. These figures are staggering and, unfortunately, show that housing need here is, in fact, extremely high. The main aim when drafting housing policy should be to target those who are socially excluded and the most vulnerable in society. This objective must not get lost among pointless red tape and bureaucracy. The draft Programme for Government says that

“We want to make appropriate, accessible and high quality housing available to all, especially those in greatest social need.”

In examining the provision of social housing, we have only to look at the housing waiting lists to discover that the requirement for social housing is high. The waiting list has been fairly steady at 20,000 to 21,000 over most of the past decade, although it must be noted that there has been a pronounced rise in the past three years. It is of great importance, therefore, that the supply and demand chain flows at all times and demand is not afforded the opportunity to outnumber supply.

The Government must take into account the fact that there will always be those who cannot afford to enter the housing market and must, therefore, seek to strike a balance between the housing stock which the Housing Executive intends to sell off and the building of new social housing. Current levels show that fewer than 2,000 new social housing units are being built by housing associations each year, while there is an annual loss of over 4,000 Housing Executive properties, so it is obvious that supply is falling short of demand. Studies show that planned levels of housing investment in new build social housing may not be sufficient to meet need over the next decade, which proves that urgent changes must be made to accommodate the demand.

The issue of housing is a major problem in my constituency of South Belfast, in terms of poor condition and disrepair. In fact, extreme levels of deprivation are evident there. As the city of Belfast prepares to bid for the coveted title of European capital of culture in 2008, there is a very sad and disturbing reality behind the glamorous façade of the city centre. This is the reality of traditional working-class communities living with severe deprivation.

Turning to community infrastructure, sub-priority 7 in the Programme for Government says:

“We will renew our most disadvantaged urban and rural neighbourhoods, building community participation.”

The Department for Social Development has identified many core wards in South Belfast as suffering from acute levels of deprivation. These areas are characterised by a lack of inward investment, a skills deficit and a strong dependency culture. It is important, therefore, that these areas are identified and resources are mobilised to tackle the extreme levels of social exclusion and deprivation. Investment in these areas will enable fragmented communities to come together and form a strong community infrastructure. It is imperative that these smaller communities do not become engulfed in the bigger picture. If we are to build a city, which is strong, vibrant and worthy of the title European capital of culture, we must take a bottom-up approach and provide the cement to keep our communities together.

I would like to conclude by touching briefly on finance. It is obvious that all Government Departments are struggling with the resources available to implement their strategies, and, unfortunately, many projects are on the back-burner due to a lack of finance. I therefore ask the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister what commitment they will give to ensure that the necessary resources are put in place to enable the ideals in the draft Programme to be achieved.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Agus mé ag labhairt ar an dréachtChlár Rialtais seo, ar ndóigh beidh mé ag díriú m'airde ar na ceisteanna sin a bhaineann le mo Roinn.

Ba mhaith liom, áfach, an deis seo a fhreastal le haontú leis an bhéim leanúnach atá an Coiste Feidhmiúcháin a chur ar an eisiámh sóisialta. Is trí chomhpháirtíocht éifeachtach, ag obair sa Choiste Feidhmiúcháin agus leis an earnáil dheonach agus leis an earnáil phobail, a thig linn an dul chun cinn atá riachtanach a dhéanamh.

Is léir ó mhórán dár gcuid seirbhísí na deacrachtaí a chruthaigh an easpa infheistíochta san am a chuaigh thart, ach is sa tSeirbhís Sláinte is follasaigh iad. Ní thabharfaimid aghaidh ar na ceisteanna seo tríd a bheith ag útamáil leo ag an imeall. Tá clár de dhíth orainn a chuirfeas athrach bunúsach i bhfeidhm, agus caithfidh acmhainní a dhíriú ar na háiteanna is mó a bhfuil gá leo.

In commenting on the draft Programme for Government, I want to concentrate on the issues that are directly relevant to my Department. However, I personally endorse the Executive's continuing emphasis on the need to tackle the problem of social exclusion. Progress can be made only through meaningful partnership between the Executive and the voluntary and community sectors.

The difficulties created by lack of investment in the past are clearly visible in many services, but they are most obvious in health. We will not address those issues by merely tinkering around the edges. We need a programme of fundamental change, and we must target resources where they are most needed.

I agree entirely with the Minister of Finance and Personnel's comments that we must make the most effective use of all resources and, in particular, with his emphasis on the need to cut out waste, reduce bureaucracy and ensure that taxpayers can see that they are getting value for money.

In recent years my Department, with the active support of boards and trusts, has placed considerable importance on measures to ensure effectiveness in the use of resources and to improve overall financial management of resources. The success of the new management arrangements is reflected in the break-even position achieved last year, and the effectiveness of our services in comparison with those in England was confirmed objectively by the needs and effectiveness study. More can be achieved, and the reform plans, which will be prepared by the end of October, will provide a focus for that work.

“Working for a Healthier People” remains a key Programme for Government priority, and we all welcome that. That chapter identifies some of the key fundamental changes that we must make, including the cross-departmental approach in investing for health, the future restructuring of hospital services, enhanced emphasis on standards of clinical and social care governance, proposals for new organisational structures and the development of primary and community care services.

The key test of the Programme for Government will be the new, improved outcomes and targets, which are set out in the text and the associated public service agreement. The provisions of the draft Budget will enable me to tackle some of the most pressing demands on services, and that is reflected in the specific targets in my Department's public service agreement. I am aware, however, that that will take us only part of the way towards addressing increasing needs for hospital and community services.

I will be able to introduce a series of interrelated measures to reduce some of the pressures on hospitals. Those include allocating additional resources to treat more people in hospitals and, in particular, to expand renal, cancer and cardiac services. I will also be able to support an additional 300 people in community settings to prevent inappropriate admissions to hospital and address waiting in the community. It will also be important to expand the range and volume of schemes and initiatives to give vulnerable people short periods of care outside the hospital environment and to support the development of primary care services.

The resources will also allow me to take some steps to strengthen community provision for people with mental health difficulties and learning disabilities who are currently in long-stay hospitals and expand the Sure Start scheme for deprived children and their families.

Last, but by no means least, the resources will support the implementation of the proposals in the 'Best Practice — Best Care' report, which will establish a framework to raise the quality of services provided to the community and tackle issues of poor performance across health and personal social services.

The problem is that over 90% of the increase in resources for the health budget is required simply to meet the inescapable cost of maintaining existing services and commitments already announced in the reinvestment and reform initiative and the Executive programme funds, which support valuable enhancements to existing services, including much needed hospital capacity.

The scale of existing commitments is such that £27 million is available next year for new service development. That will enable the modest development of services, but it is not enough to meet increasing demands and to provide the level and quality of service to which we aspire. It does little to address the £200 million funding gap between here and England. Although I welcome the additionality as regards the resources made available, the Programme for Government enables only limited improvements to existing services as part of the overall settlement. Those represent only 15% of my highest-priority service development bids.

Robert McCartney and Monica McWilliams asked about local health and social care groups. Those groups have been formally established and are appointing permanent chairpersons and managers. They are already forging ahead with their agenda to develop primary care services and to take responsibility for commissioning secondary care services. My target is for some groups to begin the commissioning of some services from April 2003.

The number of people waiting for treatment is a huge concern. However, I plan to continue to expand hospital capacity over the next one to two years, and the reinvestment and reform initiative has financed an additional 100 beds. I shall then be able to improve cardiology services and cardiac surgery. I shall invest more in community and intermediate care to help to avoid hospital admissions where possible and to provide for patients' earlier discharge. I envisage, first and foremost, ensuring that the position does not deteriorate further as year-on-year demands increase. As the additional capacity and other improvements in hospitals begin to bear fruit, fewer people will have to wait.

The Rev William McCrea and Mr Joe Byrne mentioned hospital services in their constituencies. After a discussion in the Executive, I issued the consultation paper 'Developing Better Services: Modernising Hospitals and Reforming Structures' on 12 June. The paper sets out an agenda for a major modernisation of the acute hospital system and proposals for the reform of the administrative structure of health and personal social services. Consultation will continue until 31 October 2002. No decisions have been reached on any of the proposals, including the position of Mid-Ulster Hospital. All information arising from the consultation will be considered carefully, and I hope that final decisions on acute services will be taken before the end of the year.

Mr Dallat: Most domestic issues have been mentioned, so I will focus on international relations as outlined on page 83 of the draft Programme for Government. I welcome the commitment to strengthening our relationships with North America, and I acknowledge the fine work of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister in that respect. I am sorry that Mr McCartney is not present to hear me praise the Ulster Unionists.

Given the quality of the research and development carried out in our universities, and the investment in our science parks, we are well placed to attract new, well-paid jobs of a sustainable nature in the medium and long term. However, I worry that the present political uncertainty will do nothing to attract inward investors.

I turn now to our international relations in another direction: the Third World. I ask the Minister to consider seriously the benefits of such partnerships, which, I admit, are more likely to be outgoing, but not exclusively so. I believe passionately that we can learn much from Third-World countries in Africa and elsewhere about how to prioritise needs and to respect our environment.

In a global village in which many of our decisions affect people in other parts of the world, it seems appropriate that we should build strong links with the Third World. Last week, my Ulster Unionist colleague David McClarty and I spent a few days with Zomba Council in Malawi, where the average life expectancy has now dropped from 43 years to 37 years, and where half the children will die before the age of five, as a result of Aids, cholera or malaria.

Since our society is renowned for its generosity, it seems appropriate that the Assembly should encourage linkages, which would mean the exchange of technical information; training; sponsorship, and the resourcing of materials to equip hospitals that have no drugs and schools that have no books. Much could be done through local councils, universities and other public services, which would welcome the encouragement of international dimensions.

5.15 pm

Malawi is not the only poor country in the world — but it is one of the five poorest. My colleague, David McClarty, and I have seen the poverty, hunger and disease that are there. We have also seen the country's abandonment by the developed world. The cold war is long over, and Malawi is no longer of strategic importance, so it is forgotten.

We have also seen the opportunities to tackle the problems in Malawi and give hope to people who are desperately trying to help themselves and are crying out for our co-operation. They do not want aid: they want partnerships and help.

Today we discussed the need for improving standards of education in Northern Ireland. In the past week I have seen overcrowded schools with no books, no pens and no desks, yet there are people with a burning desire to learn.

We also discussed the need for a better Health Service in Northern Ireland. I have seen hospitals and clinics that have no drugs or equipment yet there is a commitment to address the needs of the sick and the dying.

In Northern Ireland, universities and hospitals are well placed to create linkages with the people of Malawi and other African nations, which are experiencing famine that is sometimes caused by political corruption, inclement weather or crop failure.

To discuss the draft Programme for Government without including our aspirations and commitment to the Third World seems incomplete. The Assembly has an All-Party Group on International Development, which was initiated by my Colleague, Carmel Hanna. I would like to see the input of that group, as well as its work and encouragement for linkages with the Third World, come to the forefront of the Assembly.

Under the heading "Developing Relations — North/South, East/West and Internationally", I respectfully suggest that we detail our vision for the Third World and set about implementing it over the next few years. To some people that may be a fairy tale; however, it is a plea to extend the principles of partnership to some of the most wonderful people I have had the privilege to meet. When the Programme for Government comes before the Assembly again, I hope that we have definite proposals for international involvement.

The Junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister) (Mr Leslie): My Colleague, Denis Haughey, and I are pleased to close the debate. We will respond to as many points as possible. It has been a useful and informative debate. We listened with interest to the wide range of contributions from Members, which focused on the wide range of aspects in the draft Programme for Government.

The document was agreed by the Executive only last week and was presented to the Assembly yesterday. As Members will be aware, we amended the timetable this year to bring the debate forward to give the maximum possible period for consultation before the Programme for Government is finalised in December. The consultation period gives individual Ministers, and the Executive as a whole, more time to consider the points raised today and those that will be raised during the consultation period.

Although individual Committees are considering the Programme for Government, Denis Haughey and I will oversee wider consultation with the Civic Forum, local government and social partners in business, trade unions, and the voluntary and community sectors.

As the Deputy First Minister stated in his opening remarks, we will be taking this forward as a joint venture with the Minister of Finance and Personnel. That will ensure that the draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget, which supports it, are considered together.

It is important that we do that, because the Programme for Government and the Budget are directly linked. Budget allocations support the programme's policies and activities. We must not commit to actions that we cannot afford.

It is a question of priorities, and we must make choices. Inevitably, some of those choices are difficult. We must explain the prioritisation and decisions that we have made. That is a key aspect of having a locally elected Administration in charge, with locally accountable Ministers taking decisions on how to make best use of the resources available in order to address local needs.

In the draft programme, we have set out to produce a strategic and forward-looking document. We want to ensure continuity and build on the progress and achievements that have been delivered since devolution. However, by the same token, we are not afraid of change. The draft programme makes clear the Executive's intention to reform how public services are funded, organised and delivered in a way that will make a difference to the lives of people in Northern Ireland.

As both the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister have made clear, this is a draft Programme for Government. This debate, and the responses to consultation on both the draft Programme for Government and the draft Budget, will lead to a revised and, we trust, improved document that we will bring back to the Assembly at the beginning of December 2002. As Members will be aware, the Programme for Government is derived from the Belfast Agreement, in which there is a requirement for the Assembly to agree on a Programme for Government and Budget each year.

That is not the only commitment in the Belfast Agreement. Perhaps some of the Members present should familiarise themselves with a range of other commitments in the agreement, some of which are yet to be fulfilled. If, as a result of the lack of fulfilment of those requirements, there is potential uncertainty in the future, it is all the more important to address those outstanding matters, to have Northern Ireland's affairs in good order, and to have a clear road map laid out in the Programme for Government as to what the needs and aspirations are for the good government of Northern Ireland.

I want to cover in detail some of the points that were raised in the debate. I will be followed by my Colleague, Denis Haughey. We have divided the debate into different subject areas, rather than into Members' contributions. One matter that falls to me to discuss is education, on which a considerable number of points were made. During the course of the debate there were guest appearances from the Minister for Regional Development and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. When the points on education started to build up, I found myself hoping that the Minister of Education would show up and deal with some of them. I am grateful to the Minister of Health for her contribution, although my Colleague will be the greater beneficiary of that.

Members expressed concern about low standards of literacy and numeracy. That is a problem with which all Members are familiar. I emphasise to the House that the problem is exercising the attention not only of the Northern Irish Administration, but of Administrations across the UK. A wide-ranging strategy is in place to raise literacy and numeracy standards. We recognise that they are key to the rest of the school curriculum and to equipping people for the world of work. The strategy includes early intervention programmes for pupils who are struggling with reading, a major programme of in-service support and training for teachers, and new support material for teachers.

In conjunction with its educational partners, the Department of Education has carried out an internal review of the literacy and numeracy strategy, and recognises that there is a need for a more co-ordinated approach in relation to the implementation of the strategy, alongside those for a school support programme, curriculum and assessment arrangements, and educational technology. The next stage is to make adjustments to the current policy and to assess what more needs to be done to reduce the number of young people who are failing to achieve basic levels of literacy and numeracy. New arrangements should be in place in schools by September 2003.

Public service agreement targets for the number of 11-year-olds who are likely to achieve level 4 in Key Stage 2 assessments have been reduced from 77% in English and 80% in maths to 75% in English and 77% in maths. The targets for 2006 reflect the expected level of progress that is achievable with the resources available.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Leslie: If Mr Kennedy can bear with me, I will deal with his point shortly.

Ms Gildernew mentioned essential skills. The findings of the International Adult Literacy Survey, in which Northern Ireland was benchmarked against most of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries, indicate that 24% of adults here, 260,000 people, perform at the lowest level of literacy. That partly relates to the matters that concern Mr Kennedy. Research shows that those poor skills levels have serious consequences for individuals, families, society and the economy. That is why the Minister of Education launched a consultation paper on adult literacy aimed at improving the levels of essential skills throughout Northern Ireland. The draft Programme for Government sets out the Executive's intention to support an additional 2,500 people to update their essential skills by March 2004.

The issue of literacy brings me to lifelong learning and help for the most disadvantaged, issues that Mr Billy Hutchinson touched on. The draft Programme for Government sets out our commitments to education for all, from the earliest years throughout their lives. Contrary to what Mr Hutchinson said, our thinking on those issues is joined-up. The interdepartmental working group on early years ensures that policies such as those involving Sure Start, pre-school education, childcare and the role of the children's commissioner work in harmony. The draft programme makes clear our commitment to early-years education. A range of work on lifelong learning is in progress, and I will deal with that later.

Mr Kennedy raised the issue of targets. The public service agreement targets have been revised in the draft programme. They envisage higher levels of academic achievement than the current levels, which are not what we had hoped they would be. Although in some instances the targets are lower than those previously published, our commitment has not lessened. The targets take account of recent trends and what can realistically be achieved with the available resources within a reasonable timescale.

Mr Shannon made several points about education.

Mr Kennedy: I understand that the Minister is not responsible for education. However, I ask him to draw the issue that I raised to the attention of the Minister of Education so that he can explain to the Committee for Education why numeracy and literacy standards are being reduced.

Mr Leslie: I acknowledge that valid point. The Committees can take up matters of detail in the Programme for Government with the relevant Ministers. Ministers will consider it essential to examine the remarks made today to get a taste of what is likely to be raised with them in Committee.

5.30 pm

I shall do my best to ensure that the Minister of Education can discuss the matter with Mr Kennedy and the Committee for Education when the time comes.

Mr Shannon referred to the problems that sometimes occur when pupils cannot be admitted to their local school, while a nearby school closes because of falling enrolment. Account is taken of the physical capacity of the premises in setting enrolment and annual admission numbers. To ensure fairness and openness in admission arrangements, schools must publish their admission criteria beforehand, showing how pupils are selected if there are more applications than places. Parents have the right to express a preference as to which school their children attend and, if the school is not oversubscribed, that choice will automatically be respected. It must be recognised that to predict with absolute accuracy the number of applicants in any one year is an imprecise science. However, when a school has more applicants than places it must apply its admission criteria. Inevitably, if there are too many applicants, some parents will be disappointed that their preference will not be met. In most cases, every effort will be made to ensure suitable places at other schools in the same locality or within reasonable travelling distance.

Some Members were concerned at the allocation of school capital funds. In determining the school building programme, the key objective has been to ensure that the allocation of resources is based on educational need. To suggest that the programme be determined on school sector rather than on educational needs would elevate some schools above others with greater need. Such a system would be inappropriate and is therefore not followed. We do not believe that there is bias in the allocation of funds.

Some Members discussed Irish-medium schools. The Department of Education has a statutory duty to encourage and facilitate the development of integrated and Irish-medium education. Although it does not seek to impose either, it does respond to parental demand for those forms of education. Before they are approved for grant-aid status, proposals for new integrated and Irish-medium schools are assessed against criteria to ensure that they are robust and that they represent value for money. I point out that such schools have closed as well as opened.

Mr Shannon expressed concern about the downgrading of A-level examinations. Our local examining body, the Council for Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA), was not involved in the marking and grading problems, and no concerns have hitherto been raised with the Department of Education. The Department has every confidence that CCEA will continue to provide a robust and reliable examinations service for our young people. There were approximately 12,500 A-level subject entries from Northern Ireland to examination boards other than CCEA in the most recent examinations. That is 45% of the total A-level examinations taken in Northern Ireland. The independent inquiry ordered by the Secretary of State for Education and Skills in Westminster has implications for the national qualifications framework. The findings, therefore, will be of keen interest to us, as they will in England and Wales. The Department of Education will consider the contents of the report and the implications that any recommendations may have for our students.

Sammy Wilson and Monica McWilliams again raised the issue of allocations to education. The Minister of Finance and Personnel referred to that earlier today, pointing out that every proposal in the draft Budget is subject to the preparation of satisfactory reform plans. The allocations for any programme could change, either upwards or downwards, as a result of that further work. The approach to reform should include a better definition of how services will be delivered to the highest possible standards by a stronger focus on outputs and outcomes.

That means ensuring that the targets are meaningful and challenging. As Members know, several school building projects have been financed in ways other than the traditional options, and proposals are being developed for other projects.

Mr Kennedy expressed disappointment at the delay in bringing forward the special educational needs and disability Bill. The Assembly is learning that it takes about 18 to 24 months to bring forward a major piece of legislation in an orderly manner with due consultation and consideration of all the issues. That so many Members are busy in Committees today dealing with legislation confirms that. The special educational needs and disability Bill has not yet come to the end of that gestation period. The Department for Employment and Learning, with the Department of Education, has undertaken to provide legislation that will provide further access and opportunities for children and young people with special educational needs and disabilities in schools, further education colleges and the youth sector.

A joint consultation paper has been produced, and the aim of the proposals is to ensure that the provision of comprehensive and enforceable rights to education for all disabled people is on the same basis in Northern Ireland as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom. The Executive have just granted the Departments clearance to issue the paper for a public consultation that will last until the end of November. It is likely, therefore, that a draft Bill will be available in the middle of next year and, therefore, not within the lifetime of the present Assembly.

Monica McWilliams referred to unambitious targets for the Youth Service. The draft Programme for Government makes it clear that we recognise the importance of the Youth Service and that it is not just about the number of people in youth clubs, although widening access to them is an important commitment. The Youth Service plays an important role in cross-community work, including deploying outreach workers in difficult interface areas, and the draft Programme for Government emphasises our intention to continue to support its work. However, we would welcome suggestions in that area during the consultation period, and I trust that Members will make their opinions known.

Assembly Member Ms Lewsley referred to the location of Civil Service jobs. Commitments were given in a previous Programme for Government about the scope for relocating Civil Service jobs, and the possibilities are being examined through the review of office accommodation. Pending the outcome, opportunities for relocation will be considered as they arise. A recent example is the decision to relocate one of the new pension centres to Derry. Factors that must be taken into account in making an assessment about relocation include the total number of Civil Service jobs in an area in relation to the total workforce; new TSN indicators, including levels of unemployment; the regional development strategy; the effect on equality of opportunity; the service delivery and business efficiency that would be achieved; and a comparison of the likely cost.

Several Members raised concerns about the farming industry and the difficulties experienced in rural areas. That the number of Members who spoke on that matter was lower than in previous years, is not symptomatic of any improvement in the problems in the farming industry. However, the budget for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development totals approximately £780 million for the next three years, which is an increase. It provides £60 million for animal disease compensation; £48 million for the support of hill farmers in the less-favoured areas; £6 million for scrapie eradication; £6 million for beef quality assurance; £27 million for agri-environment schemes; and £33 million for the implementation of the vision action plan. Farmers also receive a substantial amount of support outside the departmental expenditure limits, which the Minister of Finance and Personnel outlined in his statement on the draft Budget. The figure for 2003-04, under the annually managed expenditure, will be £193 million.

The Executive remain aware that there are many problems in rural areas and in the farming industry, and we are working to address them. Indeed, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development has focused on them in its vision document.

Perhaps relating to that — and we have to be careful that we do not contradict ourselves here — enquiries have been made, by Mrs Carson among others, about whether County Fermanagh should be designated a national park. In June, the Minister of the Environment announced that he had commissioned a study into that possibility, and he has now received a report from Europarc Consulting. He will make a statement in the near future. However, I am allowed to give a sneak preview of the report. Its key conclusion is that on grounds of landscape, biodiversity and cultural value, national park status would be appropriate for four areas of outstanding natural beauty: the Mourne, the Ring of Gullion, the Causeway Coast, and the Antrim coast and glens. However, the authors stress that other areas of Northern Ireland may also merit consideration as national parks. In that context, we must seriously think about what should be done in rural areas, because if they are designated in a particular way, there is limited scope for what can be done there.

Mrs Carson also asked whether the Executive will revive the grants policy for historic buildings. As a member of a family that is the custodian of a historic business that could do with a new roof, I have an interest in that. The Committee for the Environment is currently considering a revised historic buildings grant policy. The sheer volume of applications for such assistance in earlier years considerably exceeded the resources, and the processing of new applications had to be suspended from 1999-2001; however, that suspension has been lifted for now.

The Planning (Amendment) Bill, which is proceeding through the Assembly, will introduce building preservation notices. That will increase the Department of the Environment's ability to respond quickly to protect buildings that may be worthy of being listed, but that are at risk. Speaking personally, I recognise that the burden of maintaining some of those buildings can be considerable. However, if we were committed to supporting such buildings on a widespread basis, Members might be stunned at the amount of money that could be consumed.

Mr McCrea, on behalf of the Committee for the Environment, criticised the sustainable development strategy of the draft Programme for Government. I disagree with his criticisms; the Executive are committed to sustainable development, and it is a key theme that runs through the programme. Commitments to it are made several times in the programme, and one of its key plans will be our work to modernise the planning process to make it more effective in helping us to integrate economic, social and environmental needs. We are committed to ensuring that our environment supports healthy living, which is part of sustainable development. The focus on improving health, supporting education, and tackling poverty and social exclusion is relevant to the wider principles of sustainable development, as is our focus on energy, with an emphasis on renewable energy.

I emphasise again that this is a draft programme, and we are keen to improve it. We will consider carefully any further suggestions about how the principles of sustainable development can be articulated in the document and run through it more strongly.

Members tend to side with the applicant in regard to many planning applications. If Members were to change their attitudes and side with those who are concerned with preserving the environment, it would give more evidence than anything else of their commitment to preserving Northern Ireland's clean, green image.

Mr Deputy Speaker, you will be glad to know that I am drawing to a conclusion.

5.45pm

Mr Close returned to his familiar theme of bemoaning the absence of tax-raising powers for the Assembly. That script has been rehearsed quite a few times, as Members will recall. Mr Close should bear in mind that, if we were to have a differential rate of income tax, it could have unforeseen consequences for local employment and affect the attractiveness of Northern Ireland as a place to live and work. It might also make inward investment more difficult to attract. Also, we have no mechanical administrative facility to collect any such tax, and although the Inland Revenue would collect it, if asked to do so, it would charge for the process.

Mr Neeson's comments follow the remarks of the Minister for Regional Development, Mr Peter Robinson, when he addressed the Assembly; remarks that could have been made far more effectively to the full Executive Committee. It is peculiar that Mr Robinson chooses to come to the Assembly, where members of Sinn Féin are in attendance, but neglects to put in an appearance at the Executive Committee, where the cast of representatives is the same. Members will ask whether the Minister is best serving the needs of his Department by behaving in that way.

Mr Robinson told us that the considerable infrastructure deficit within the remit of his Department cannot be addressed through the allocation of funding made to him. He has completely failed to examine other sources of funding or revenue that could be made available to him to cover that deficit if he so chose. The Water Service is funded out of the block grant, which does not happen in other parts of the United Kingdom. Industrial use of water is metered and paid for, but the private use of water is not, and that is a potential source of revenue that the Minister must consider if he is serious about getting more money for his Department.

The same principles could apply in the transport sector to the rolling stock and the road system. Other countries with funding problems have moved to a user pays principle. Recently I met with representatives of industry, who said that if building better roads could reduce the time taken to get their goods to the ports, they would be prepared to contribute to the cost through some form of toll.

I trust that the Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development will take account of my comments in his discussions with the Department. It is extraordinary for the Minister to come to the Assembly to demand more money and yet not volunteer to raise money through the activities of his Department, when that is possible and has been accomplished in other places.

That concludes my coverage of matters in my bailiwick, and I look forward to dealing further with this business over the coming months.

The Junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister) Mr Haughey: The debate in the Assembly begins the period of scrutiny of the Programme for Government. We have made a constructive start. There is no substitute for the vigorous cut and thrust of Assembly debate, with the exchange of witty sallies across the Floor and extravagant excursions into the upper stratosphere of high policy. It is very invigorating.

Members have had an opportunity to express their concerns about the Programme for Government, and Ministers have had an opportunity to listen to those concerns. I stress that this is a draft programme; James Leslie has already said that, but it is worth repeating. The comments made today will inform the work of Ministers as they reconsider the sections of the Programme for Government that are relevant to them. As we seek to improve and tighten the programme, today's points will inform the work of the Programme for Government drafting group that James Leslie and I chair.

The most frequently made point, to which we will have to give careful consideration, concerns the belief of some Members that the programme does not deal adequately with community relations. Eileen Bell, Alban Maginness and others raised this issue. I am not sure that I would go as far as they did. In the draft Programme for Government, the Executive committed itself to implementing a cross-departmental strategy and framework for promoting community relations. We have committed ourselves to ensuring an effective and co-ordinated approach to sectarian and racial intimidation. Those are important commitments.

The consultation paper on this matter is at a very advanced drafting stage, and it is anticipated that it will be submitted to the Executive very soon. After it receives Executive approval, it will be published and there will be two months' consultation for Members, the public and organisations to communicate their views to the Department. We intend to ensure that the consultation paper and the strategy derived from it will have as broad a base as possible. For that reason, the Executive intend to convene meetings of political parties, the social partners and other organisations, including churches and community groups, to discuss the consultation paper and the actions that may be derived from it. Those meetings will form the basis of an effective strategy on community relations.

As the Deputy First Minister made clear this morning, we recognise the importance of local solutions to many of the difficult community relations problems. We will support communities in developing their own solutions to those problems. I refer Members to the agreements reached, after much painful discussion, between the Apprentice Boys of Derry and the Bogside Residents' Association. They reached an agreement that defused a great deal of the tension that arose from marches and demonstrations in Derry. That is an example of a local solution being found to local difficulties. With some capacity building, some effort and some goodwill, local solutions can be found.

The Programme for Government also makes it clear that responsibility for promoting good community relations lies with all Departments and in every part and every priority of the document. There are many actions in the programme that will promote good community relations. The introduction of a citizenship module to the curriculum was mentioned earlier, for example. As children moved through the education system, the module would affect how they saw the community and its institutions.

The Programme for Government contains a policy of support and respect for cultural and linguistic diversity that promotes tolerance in the community.

There are also measures relating to the removal of flags and emblems, sectarian graffiti, and so on.

The Harbinson review was not, and was never was intended to be, the new community relations strategy. The purpose of the Harbinson review was to inform the new community relations strategy and help in its elaboration.

I will now turn to some points made by Bob McCartney and Peter Robinson about overmanning and the huge bureaucracy that had developed within the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. This is a sad example of grossly ill-informed remarks being made by an irresponsible commentator who was completely ignorant of the facts, and those comments being seized upon by enemies of the Administration and the agreement to make spurious and specious points.

The Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister is not comparable with the office of the Prime Minister, the office of the Taoiseach, or, God forbid, the office of the President of the United States: it is a Department of Government. As all Ministers do, we frequently report to our Colleagues on the range of activities carried out in our Department.

I have a pro-forma listing 28 different functions of government carried out by OFMDFM and I will refer to some of them. One is the responsibility for the whole equality agenda, which involves problems relating to the equal rights of the disabled, gender equality, racial equality, as well as equality between the two sections of our community. There is a team dealing with that responsibility, a responsibility that in other Administrations would be dealt with across a wide range of departments.

The Economic Policy Unit within OFMDFM shares certain functions with the Department of Finance and Personnel. In other administrations, economic policy would either be contained in a department for economic affairs or perhaps be housed in a department of finance.

We have responsibility for implementing European policy. Bob McCartney referred to the need to tighten up on the implementation of European Directives — that is our responsibility. We are responsible for co-ordinating such work across the Departments. In other Governments, the function would be carried out within a department of foreign or external affairs.

We have responsibility for the review of public administration; the re-investment and reform initiative; community relations; targeting social need; promoting social inclusion; the whole e-government agenda, which in other Governments would be entirely housed in another department; race relations; ethnic minorities; the Civic Forum; the Programme for Government exercise itself; and so on. It is mistaken and wrong to suggest that a working Department, because it has a staff commensurate to the functions that it performs, is in some way overblown by comparing it with the private office of a Prime Minister or a Taoiseach.

I also want to make a point about European Directives. Bob McCartney cited that as an example of the failure of the Administration. In fact, it is one of the success stories. There had been a chaotic backlog of untransposed Directives deriving from the long period of direct rule. This Administration has finally got on top of that, and is compiling a database of Directives listing the progress of each one in terms of transposition and implementation. The British Government does not have such a database, and, unbelievably, neither does the European Commission. We are compiling a database here, and it is a success story, not a failure of the Administration.

Sam Foster referred to the core funding of victims' groups, and I want to say a couple of things about that. The Northern Ireland Office (NIO) and OFMDFM are working together to develop a new scheme. The scheme will have funding of £3 million over a two-year period, and should be operational around the end of the year. Many victims' groups have been consulted on the development of the new criteria for core funding. The responsibility for core funding of all victims' groups currently rests with the NIO, and we have had no involvement in any decisions about core funding that have been made to date.

6.00 pm

There is no reason why Fear Encouraged Abandoning Roots (FEAR) cannot apply for core funding under Peace II or the new core funding scheme that is to commence before the end of the year.

Mr Foster mentioned the location of new hospitals, which is a serious constituency concern for all Members. It is extremely difficult to provide modern, efficient, high-quality services in a way that is fair to everyone. The organisation of our hospitals must change if people are to get the services they need and deserve. Society here could not afford to sustain 17 or 18 acute service provision hospitals indefinitely, and, arguably, it does not need to. Careful consideration must be given to the distribution of acute service hospitals in the North.

After Executive discussions, the Health Minister issued a consultation paper 'Developing Better Services: Modernising Hospitals and Reforming Structures' on 12 June. That paper sets out the agenda for a major modernisation of the acute hospitals system, and proposals for the reform of the health and personal social services administrative structures. The consultation period will run until 31 October. No decisions have been reached on any aspect of the proposals. All the information arising from the consultation will be considered carefully before any final decisions are taken. It is intended that those decisions will be made before the end of the year.

Seamus Close asked whether we had considered a tax-imposing regime. Mr Leslie has already dealt with that matter. He said that it might not pay to open that can of worms unless it is done carefully.

Sammy Wilson gave us a characteristic bit of good old knockabout stuff. The review of public administration is not a cost-cutting exercise, nor is it necessarily a rationalisation programme. Its purpose is to determine whether it is possible to deliver better, more relevant public services more efficiently and in a way that represents good value for money.

Sammy Wilson also made the allegation — and he is no stranger to making allegations — that nothing has been delivered through the Programme for Government. The programme outlines the Executive's key plans and priorities, which are developed and agreed by all Departments and parties involved in the Administration. Since devolution, much has been achieved in the framework of the Programme for Government. We have provided additional resources to support the Health Service, raised standards in education and introduced new initiatives under both Ministers for Employment and Learning to increase student support.

We have introduced free travel for the elderly on public transport — I wonder why Sammy Wilson did not recognise that provision, because a DUP Minister was quick to claim credit for it. We have also developed many new public health policies. We have contributed a good deal to investment in infrastructure — gas pipelines and roads, including a trans-European network plan for the road from Larne to Newry. The Programme for Government has delivered a great deal that we might not have seen had we continued with direct rule.

Monica McWilliams wanted to know what was being done to address the crisis in the voluntary and community sector. The Executive are acutely aware of the crisis facing that sector, and that is why we decided to allocate a further £6 million of Executive programme funds to be used to address any fresh action deemed necessary to alleviate the continuing funding difficulties in the voluntary sector.

Ministers agreed that we should provide additional funding to help meet immediate pressures in that sector, while at the same time helping to provide space to begin to address the longer-term issues of sustainability in the community and voluntary sector. That is a serious issue that we cannot avoid. We are facing a situation five or 10 years down the line where the availability of funds may not be as extensive as it is now. Therefore, we must look at the community and voluntary sector to see which areas of the service we need and how we provide for those, and also to see how the bodies and associations that provide those services could sustain themselves in circumstances where funding provision might not be as extensive as it is now.

The Executive agreed that resources should be used to try to retain important voluntary and community sector services that might otherwise be lost while the long-term issues relating to self-sustaining capacity are addressed.

Mark Robinson referred to housing provision and housing fitness. Unfitness levels as recorded in the 1996 Northern Ireland house condition survey carried out by the Housing Executive indicated that there were varying levels of unfitness right across the housing sector, including rates of 15% of all private rented housing and 5·8% of owner-occupied housing. It is anticipated that the 2001 survey will show that public spending on housing in Northern Ireland has been effective in addressing policy objectives and unfitness of houses. Public resources directed towards the problem have been used economically, efficiently and with good value for money, with an expected reduction in unfitness levels across all types of tenure. The draft Programme for Government sets out commitments to maintaining the drive to reduce housing unfitness levels across private and social housing.

The provision of new social housing is a matter for the Minister for Social Development. However, I understand that a review is being carried out in the light of new research done by the University of Ulster that showed that we need about 1,500 new housing starts every year. The current figure is 1,400. The Minister has commissioned a review to determine if we are starting enough new houses to meet the need. It is not possible to say what the outcome of that review will be, and, given the studies carried out by the University of Ulster, the suggestion that we are not meeting the need must be taken seriously. That matter is in hand.

Mark Robinson asked if he could have an assurance that there would be money to deliver the commitments in the Programme for Government. The draft Programme for Government is supported by a draft Budget, and actions and commitments set out in the Programme for Government are underpinned by provision in the draft Budget. That is the way they work. However, they are both draft documents, and they will be revised, if necessary, and finalised in the light of debate in the Assembly.

Today's debate has been wide ranging and valuable. We have focused on issues that reflect the Executive's priorities across the range of government, and we have addressed matters that relate to the economic, social and environmental context within which we operate. Members have made suggestions that will inform the process of refining and finalising the Programme for Government, and the Budget that supports it.

All Ministers will carefully consider the points made. We look forward to receiving the views and suggestions that will follow the document's scrutiny by the various Committees and the wider consultation with bodies, associations and groups outside the Assembly structures.

The consultation period will end on 15 November. In the light of responses, the Executive will consider the revisions that will have to be made to the Programme for Government. The revised programme will be presented to the Assembly in early December.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly takes note of the draft Programme for Government.

EDUCATION AND LIBRARIES BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Education (Mr Kennedy): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Education and Libraries Bill (NIA 21/01).

At present, the Education and Libraries Bill, which passed its Second Stage in early July, stands referred to the Committee for Education. The Bill is an important and substantial piece of legislation. It is outlined in four parts, and contains 42 clauses and three schedules. The main purpose of the legislation is to enable the Department of Education to introduce a single common funding formula for all schools funded under local management of schools (LMS) arrangements.

Although there is general agreement that there should be a common formula, its make-up is still to be finalised, and the Committee is considering the Minister's response to the recommendations in the Committee's report on the matter, which was published in early January 2002. The rest of the Bill covers a range of important issues: the duty of best value; the duty on boards of governors to safeguard and promote the welfare of pupils; child protection measures; school discipline measures to prevent bullying; admission to special schools of children resident outside Northern Ireland; consultation of schools by sampling; and the extension of the abolition of corporal punishment to independent schools.

The Committee for Education is committed to rigorous scrutiny of the Bill, which is the first piece of primary legislation in the area of education since the Education (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. We are also keen to provide an opportunity for the main stakeholders to submit their views and comments on the Bill, and we have received detailed written submissions from several organisations and individuals.

Scrutiny of the clauses has already begun, and several issues have already emerged. Those will require full and careful examination. The Committee, therefore, requests an extension until 22 November to provide enough time to consider all the measures covered in the Bill and to produce a report to the Assembly. I assure the House that the Committee is giving priority to the Committee Stage of the Bill and will complete its work as quickly as possible. To ensure that there is no delay, members have agreed to hold several extra meetings.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Education and Libraries Bill (NIA 21/01).

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

ENERGY BILL

First Stage

Monday 30 September 2002

The Assembly met at noon (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

STRATEGIC INVESTMENT AND REGENERATION OF SITES BILL

First Stage

The Junior Minister (Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister) (Mr Haughey): I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill [NIA 8/02] to establish and provide for the functions of the Strategic Investment Board for Northern Ireland; to make provision for certain sites made available under the reinvestment and reform initiative, including provision for their regeneration by development corporations; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

POINT OF ORDER

Business Committee

Mr S Wilson: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. A motion, tabled by the DUP, calling for the dissolution of the Assembly and early elections has not been put on the Order Paper. It appears that due to political bias and fear, this motion has been blocked by the Business Committee. Is it in order for those parties that wish to save themselves from an early political skinning to be allowed to abuse the Business Committee in this way?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Wilson, you know that any decision on what is on the Order Paper is made by the Business Committee, and it is for your party's representative on that Committee to put his or her case.

HARBOURS BILL

Second Stage

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Harbours Bill (NIA 5/02) be agreed.

The need for this legislation arises from the growing interest of the general public and elected representatives in the activities and future development of the individual harbour authorities. In May 2001, the Department announced a series of measures aimed at improving the public accountability of trust ports in Northern Ireland and ensuring that the public interest can be fully safeguarded in relation to their operations. Many of the measures reflected the recommendations contained in the Committee for Regional Development's report on its inquiry into the Titanic Quarter lease arrangements. Since then, my Department has advanced and set in place many of those measures.

The Department for Regional Development has developed and put in place memoranda of understanding in relation to each trust port. They provide for consultation with the Department prior to any disposal of harbour lands. Earlier this year, the Assembly debated and approved harbour Orders for Belfast, Londonderry and Warrenpoint. Among other things, the Orders provided for an increase in the number of elected representatives on each board. The various additional appointments have since been made, and the Department routinely receives copies of board papers and minutes. The Harbours Bill is the final element of the package of measures intended to improve the accountability of the trust ports. It is a short Bill, containing only seven clauses.

Clause 1 designates the Belfast Harbour Commissioners, the Coleraine Harbour Commissioners, the Harbour of Carlingford Lough Improvement Commissioners, the Londonderry Port and Harbour Commissioners and the Warrenpoint Harbour Authority. Thus, all the commercial public trust ports in Northern Ireland are covered by the legislation.

The provisions in clause 2 empower the Department to give directions of a general or specific character in relation to the functions of the harbour authorities. That will empower the Department to act, if necessary, to safeguard the public interest in relation to the activities of the trust ports. However, the Department envisages that such power would be used only after consultation with the harbour authorities. The provision will also be useful in further underpinning the memoranda of understanding between the respective harbour authorities and the Department. Naturally, the Bill also envisages that a duty would be imposed on a designated harbour authority to comply with any directions given by the Department.

Clause 3 enables the Department to require a trust port to provide it with such information as may be necessary, such as details of a specific lease or contract or information about preferential user arrangements. That will apply only to information coming into the possession of the harbour authority after the legislation comes into effect.

The Bill also contains provisions for the imposition of fines and penalties, either for failure to comply with a notice requesting information or for knowingly, or recklessly, making a false statement or producing a false document. Although the Harbours Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 already contains provisions to enable the Department to obtain information, it is of a more specific character and relates to forecasts to allow it to regulate harbours, the compilation of statistics or information in relation to grants or loans made under the Act.

Clause 4 provides for the introduction by the Department of a code of practice for all Northern Ireland trust ports, following on from a similar initiative in Great Britain. The proposed legislation requires the Department to consult with such persons as it thinks fit in relation to its proposals before the issue or amendment of a code of practice. It is envisaged that such a code would address key aspects of conduct, accountability and openness by identifying the appropriate corporate and individual responsibilities expected from the trust ports. The Department is consulting the harbour authorities and the Committee for Regional Development on the detailed proposals for inclusion in such a code.

In developing the legislative proposals, the Department consulted extensively with the harbour authorities, port users in the regions, the Committee for Regional Development, district councils and other bodies. The views expressed during the consultation process have been considered and, where appropriate, taken on board. The Committee for Regional Development has made a considerable contribution to the development of the legislation, and will, with the Assembly's support, have the opportunity to consider the detailed drafting of the Bill and report to the Assembly on it. I welcome the opportunity to hear Members' views, and I encourage them to support this short, but useful, Bill.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development (Mr McFarland): The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development has asked me to extend his apologies for being unable to attend today.

The Bill is, undoubtedly, important, and the Committee has campaigned for it for some time. I thank the Minister for introducing it.

The Committee's interest in, and support for, the Bill results from a public inquiry that took place over a year ago into the circumstances surrounding the signing of the Titanic Quarter development agreement between Harland

& Wolff and the Belfast Harbour Commissioners. During that investigation, the Committee identified several areas in which the public accountability of trust ports could be improved. In particular, the Committee recognised that legislation was needed to give the Department for Regional Development the power of direction over trust ports and to introduce a code of practice similar to that in Great Britain.

When the Committee published its findings in September 2001, it recommended several steps. In brief, those were: that legislation be introduced to give the Department power of direction over the key business activities of the Port of Belfast and other trust ports; that the Department for Regional Development enter into a memorandum of understanding with each of the trust ports, pending the introduction of that legislation; that the number of locally elected representatives on each of the trust ports' boards be increased; that a representative from the Department for Regional Development attend the board meetings of the trust ports; and that the Department consider drawing up a code of practice for all trust ports.

I am pleased to note that the Harbours Bill will ensure that all the Committee's recommendations will be put in place, which demonstrates the professional and constructive manner in which the Committee and the Department can work together. It highlights the positive role that all Committees can play in helping to improve the governance of the country.

Some improvements to the public accountability of trust ports have already been made. The recently approved harbour Orders have provided for the number of locally elected representatives on the boards of trust ports to be increased, and several memoranda of understanding have been established. With the introduction of the Harbours Bill, the jigsaw is complete. A code of practice will be introduced, and the Department will be given the power of direction over trust ports.

The Committee for Regional Development is also pleased to note that the code of practice will require trust ports to brief the Committee formally at least once a year. That provision is welcome, and the Committee can play a positive role in helping to improve the public accountability of trust ports as a means of safeguarding the public interest. I welcome the introduction of the legislation on behalf of the Committee, which looks forward to conducting a careful scrutiny of the Bill during Committee Stage.

Mr Byrne: The Harbours Bill contains the main elements that the Committee for Regional Development considers to be important to safeguard and clarify the status and remit of the functions that trust ports enjoy. The Committee held a public inquiry last year into the issues surrounding the signing of the Titanic Quarter development agreement between Harland & Wolff and the Belfast Harbour Commissioners.

The main issues concerning the Committee were the Department having the power of direction over trust ports, and a future code of practice for such ports. The Committee has been concerned for some time that trust ports have been operating under legislation which does not always seem foolproof. The clauses in the Bill address the Committee's main concerns, and I welcome that. As a member of that Committee, I look forward to detailed scrutiny of the Bill.

Mr Hay: I welcome the Bill. It has its origin in a major review that was conducted in 1998 by the then Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland, when a similar review was going on in Great Britain. There is no doubt that the review raised a number of issues concerning trust ports here. Three of those issues were: examining extended powers for trust ports; easing financial controls to allow them to operate more commercially; and — one of the main issues — improved accountability for harbour authorities. We have certainly taken the route of moving public accountability on with more public representatives on the bodies running the trust ports. I see it as another piece in the jigsaw that is our work on trust ports in Northern Ireland.

We should all agree that, over the years, our trust ports have been very successful. I should even go as far as to say that trust ports have often been the engines which have driven economic development in their areas and across Northern Ireland. The Bill gives the Department power to ask for information and documents and to examine issues pertaining to trust ports.

The memorandum of understanding that all port authorities have now signed governs any disposal of land around trust ports. We in the Committee were all concerned about the disposal of land at Belfast harbour. It is to be hoped that, through this short Bill, the accountability of trust ports has moved on. I am sure that we all agree that trust ports are run for the benefit of all their stakeholders in Northern Ireland.

Will the Minister and his Department examine the question of introducing further regulations for trust ports? With regard to clause 3 of the Bill, which covers the procedures for obtaining papers and dealing with false documentation provided to the Minister and the Department, does the Minister or his Department have any view on the types of financial reimbursement, such as fines, that the harbour authorities should examine?

I welcome this short Bill and hope that it increases the accountability of Northern Ireland's trust ports.

Mr Bradley: I welcome the Harbours Bill and, in particular, the additional powers that will be granted to the trust port authorities permitting them to purchase land for the betterment of their overall business. In Warrenpoint one can see the problems that arise from the non-availability of land. I hope that the Bill will allow the harbour to purchase or lease land which it might identify on the County Louth side of the port. It is only a few hundred yards across the harbour. I say that in the knowledge of the pressure for a new bridge at Narrow Water, near Warrenpoint. If the purchase of such land across from the harbour were permitted, and if the powers allowed, the harbour could get involved in a scheme to facilitate the crossing of vehicular traffic, possibly by means of a toll. I look forward to further debate on that. I come from Warrenpoint and know its geography. The only available land that could be purchased is on the County Louth side of the border, and I hope that such a purchase will be allowed.

Mr P Robinson: I thank Members for their contributions, which make it clear that the legislation is not contentious. As the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development, Mr McFarland, said, the Committee played an important role in the production of the draft legislation. It has had consistent interest in the issue, and the legislation is an example of the Committee's influence with the Department and demonstrates the positive role that it has played. That also underlines Mr Byrne's remarks. The Committee will be studying the Bill thoroughly, and I look forward to its response. However, members of the Committee will not find any surprises in the legislation, given their background knowledge of the subject.

Both Mr Bradley and Mr Hay raised issues about where the Department will be moving with regard to further regulations or legislation. Mr Bradley mentioned the ability of ports to become more competitive and the need to look at what can be done to improve their position. In bringing the Bill forward, the Department is looking primarily at public accountability — a matter that Mr Hay addressed in detail.

The legislation does not in any way reflect a lack of trust in the board members of any of the trust ports in Northern Ireland. In recent years in all spheres of public life, there has been a move towards improved public accountability, and so it should be; that has also happened in the private sector. The legislation is a means of clarifying the respective roles of trust ports and the Department, and that will be beneficial to the relationship between the ports and the Department.

It is necessary to recognise that elected representatives and a devolved Assembly are better placed than the harbour commissioners to assess the public interest that may attach to any development proposals, and the legislation takes that into account. That leaves the harbour commissioners free to focus on the needs of the ports, and on their fiduciary responsibilities.

The Harbours Bill deals primarily with public accountability. The Department remains committed to further extending the commercial powers of trust ports to enable them to compete better with their counterparts in the Republic of Ireland, and to amending and updating our harbours legislation generally. For example, further legislation might make provision for the harbour authorities to promote a company or enter into a joint venture in relation to business activity beyond the scope of the port undertaking. Indeed, it might make provision for the harbour authorities to promote leisure activities and tourism, or to carry out the activities of shipping agents, for example, to promote new routes. It might make provision to empower the harbour authorities to acquire a business or undertaking not directly related to the management or maintenance of the harbours, but which would be of benefit to the port. The Department is looking at all of those issues, but the policy basis for such a Bill is not yet in place. Given the lengthy consultation process necessary, it is likely to be some time before the Department will be in a position to present the next harbours Bill to the Assembly.

Mr Hay mentioned the issue of fines, which is dealt with in clause 3 of the Bill. The clause refers to a fine on summary conviction that does not exceed level 4 on the standard scale. Over the weekend, I may have had cause to examine what the potential fines might be. I have been told that level 4 brings the fine up to around £2,000. In that instance, the Office of the Legislative Counsel has given new advice to the Department. During the Committee Stage of the Bill, the Department will discuss with the Committee making a change to that and, perhaps, bringing forward an amendment that will allow the Department more flexibility.

As I said at the start of the debate, the need for the legislation arises from the growing interest of the general public and elected representatives in the activities and future development plans of the individual harbour authorities. The passage of the legislation will better equip the Department to safeguard the public interest with regard to such matters in future. I am grateful to the Committee for Regional Development for the support that it has given to the Department, to date, in the development of the legislation. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Harbours Bill (NIA Bill 5/02) be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill stands referred to the Committee for Regional Development.

LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the Limited Liability Partnerships Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

OPEN-ENDED INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the Open-Ended Investment Companies Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

STATE PENSION CREDIT BILL

Final Stage

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): I beg to move

That the State Pension Credit Bill (NIA Bill 4/02) do now pass.

The State Pension Credit Bill is, essentially, good news. It is a vital element of the strategy to ensure that both present and future pensioners in Northern Ireland can avoid poverty. It will add £50 million to the money that pensioners at the lower end of the income distribution are entitled to receive. Half of all pensioners stand to gain. The average gain is about £400 a year. In addition, the Bill removes the unfairness of the present capital rules and reduces the intrusion into pensioners' affairs by making five-year awards to those who are over 65 years of age, thus abolishing the weekly means test. All in all, the Bill contains good news for pensioners in Northern Ireland.

COMMISSIONER FOR CHILDREN AND YOUNG PEOPLE BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre (Mr Poots): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Commissioner for Children and Young People Bill (NIA 20/01).

The Commissioner for Children and Young People Bill, which passed its Second Stage in July 2002, stands referred to the Committee of the Centre. The Bill is one of the most significant pieces of legislation to be introduced in the Assembly. Its main purpose is to provide for the appointment and remit of a children's commissioner for Northern Ireland.

Last year, the Committee of the Centre undertook a major inquiry into the role and remit of a children's commissioner, and the Bill, as drafted, reflects many of the Committee report's recommendations. The Committee of the Centre, as part of its rigorous scrutiny of the Bill, sought views and comments from organisations that had a direct interest in the work of a commissioner. The Committee has received detailed written submissions from a wide range of organisations and individuals. The Committee has also taken oral evidence from several of those organisations, including the Commissioner for Children in Wales.

Scrutiny of the clauses is now under way. Several issues have already emerged, and those will require full and careful examination. Therefore the Committee requests an extension until 22 November to provide adequate time to consider all the measures covered in the Bill and to produce a report to the Assembly. I assure the House that the Committee has given priority to the Committee Stage of the Bill and will complete its work as quickly as possible. To ensure that there is no delay, several further meetings, in addition to normal Committee meetings, have been held.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Commissioner for Children and Young People Bill (NIA 20/01).

MARRIAGE BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 4 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Marriage Bill (NIA 18/01).

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Committee Stage of the Marriage Bill is due to conclude formally on 10 October 2002, by which time the Committee is required to report its findings to the Assembly. The Committee has completed its deliberations on the Bill, and a draft report is being prepared.

The Committee is dealing with two other Bills, the Budget and two inquiries. The motion to extend Committee Stage until 4 November 2002 is a precautionary measure to ensure that the Committee is able to approve and publish the report on the Bill. The Committee is content that it will be able to report its findings to the Assembly by the new deadline. I ask Members to support the motion.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 4 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Marriage Bill (NIA 18/01).

FAMILY LAW (DIVORCE ETC.) BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 9 December 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill (NIA 1/02).

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Committee Stage of the Family Law (Divorce etc.) Bill is due to conclude formally on 8 November 2002, by which time the Committee is required to report its findings to the Assembly.

At Second Stage, several Members raised concerns about the Bill and mentioned the need to strengthen the institution of marriage. The Committee has written to many interest groups inviting them to submit evidence and will need time to consider the responses and hear oral evidence within its already overloaded programme. The Committee wishes to consider this important Bill carefully and ensure that the Assembly receives a well-balanced, informed report. As a precautionary measure, the Committee is asking Members to agree to an extension of the Committee Stage to 9 December 2002. The Committee will make every effort to complete the Committee Stage as soon as possible to ensure that there is no delay in the passage of the Bill. I ask Members to support the motion.

BELFAST RAPE CRISIS AND SEXUAL ABUSE CENTRE

Dr Birnie: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the dire financial situation of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre and calls upon the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Northern Ireland Office to provide adequate funding to ensure the long-term future of the centre.

I am grateful for the opportunity to move the motion standing in my name and that of my Colleagues, Rev Robert Coulter and Mrs Carson. I apologise on their behalf for their absence — they have been unavoidably detained. Rape crisis and associated sexual abuse is a serious problem and, as we are all sadly aware, an increasing one. The purpose of the motion is to highlight the response of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and, to a degree, that of the Northern Ireland Office to the inadequate financial support for the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre.

It is worth emphasising the value of the centre and the positive contribution that it has made, and continues to make, despite its fragile financial basis. It provides a wide range of services free of charge. It deals with adults, children, males and females and provides a free phone service for enquiries. The centre has been in operation for 20 years.

The centre receives £32,000 per annum from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and up to £7,000 from Belfast City Council. Because of such limited financial support, the centre has a £20,000 deficit. Arguably, it is not enough simply to clear the deficit; money is also needed to provide an adequate foundation for future work. The centre has only just been able to survive by paying low wages to its two full-time workers and by the extensive use of volunteers. It receives 3,000 new contacts every year — and it helps up to 3,000 people every year. That will give Members some measure of the scale of the problem that the centre is attempting to tackle.

We tabled the motion because we believe that the centre is underfunded and has been since it was set up in the early 1980s. Recently, members of my party and I met representatives from the centre to discuss why support from the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and other Government agencies has been so consistently low. This is an especially pressing question, given that it is the only agency in Northern Ireland providing a full range of free support services to victims of rape and serious sexual abuse.

There has been controversy and confusion about the state of play as regards the recent funding application made to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety: undoubtedly, that issue will be raised again today. The centre's staff believe that they submitted the application on time. Even if it was not received by the deadline, why did the Department not find the situation strange, given that it has had a 20-year relationship with the centre? At that time, departmental officials were meeting representatives of the centre more or less weekly. Surely, the alleged failure to submit an application by the deadline should have been raised in time for something to be done about it.

In any case, the issue of when and if the application was lodged is a bit of a technical distraction, given the crucial point that this important area of support for public health has been underfunded for most of the last two decades. That should have been obvious to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and to the associated Government bodies some time ago.

It might be asked why there is a reference to the Northern Ireland Office (NIO) in the motion in addition to the challenge to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Natural justice requires that the NIO should also provide some support, notwithstanding the distinction between transferred and non-transferred matters. There are two reasons for that. First, the NIO already gives support to various victims of violence: by extension, why should it not provide support for the victims of sexual violence? Secondly, the NIO provides generous support to rehabilitate ex-prisoners. The interests of natural justice require us to ask why the NIO should not similarly support those who have had tremendous trauma imposed upon them through no fault of their own.

I am pleased to move the motion.

Mrs Courtney: I support the motion. The Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre (NI) is associated with the Network of Rape Crisis Centres Ireland. As was mentioned earlier, a helpline is provided free of charge for victims of sexual violence. Some time ago, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety passed an application for research funding to the Minister. Disappointingly, there has been no response to date.

The centre has been in existence for over 20 years and deals with more than 3,000 cases a year. It receives £32,000 per annum. Other organisations deal with similar issues but do not act in conjunction with the centre.

Sexual violence against women, children and men is not decreasing. All the evidence suggests that it is a growing problem. Since the centre's establishment, it has played a vital role in dealing with the problem. Over the years, it has built up an unequalled body of expertise and skills in helping victims of sexual violence through their ordeal, both during police investigations and during subsequent criminal trials. The centre also plays a critical role in counselling victims in the aftermath of criminal proceedings.

The centre has never been adequately funded. In the past, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety provided some funding, and some district councils made contributions; for example, Belfast City Council allocates approximately £7,000 a year. However, the centre has limped along for years on a shoestring budget, which is not good enough. Its recent financial crisis was so serious that its telephones were cut off temporarily; Members may have watched a programme about that on television.

It is unacceptable for such an essential organisation to be constantly in that position. Society could not cope with the problem of sexual violence without the expert help that the centre provides. Given that, the burden of its funding should not fall on the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety alone. This is a human rights issue and has implications for all Ministers who are responsible for children's policies, policies on women's issues and the criminal justice system, so I call on all Ministers and officials in the Northern Ireland Office to consider their responsibilities and produce a funding formula to enable the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre to continue its essential work.

Mr Hay: Rape and sexual abuse are major issues, not only in Belfast but across the Province. People in my constituency who counsel the victims of sexual abuse and rape help about 60 people a week and, because their service is seriously underfunded, there is a serious backlog.

Rape and sexual abuse here are increasing. The proposer of the motion, Dr Birnie, should remember that the funding crisis extends to other centres in Northern Ireland, which employ staff who are equally dedicated to their work. The work, effort and time put in by those people, often in difficult circumstances during which they must listen to people who have been raped or abused, cannot be quantified. Some of the stories are horrifying, and it is a tragedy that none of the centres receives adequate funds to deal with the many problems that result from sexual abuse.

I remind the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that the problem must be tackled, not only in Belfast but across the Province. I would like her to formulate a strategic plan for all the centres. That is not to take anything away from the comments of Dr Birnie and the Member for Foyle, Mrs Courtney, who made a good case for the centre in Belfast. I urge the Minister to begin a strategic review of all the centres in Northern Ireland.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Like other Members, I wish to commend the work that is being done in many rape crisis centres in the North, sometimes voluntarily. The Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre does crucial work with survivors of abuse. Such groups ensure that survivors' voices are heard in places such as the Assembly.

I agree with Mr Hay that that work is going on throughout the North and that many of the organisations carrying out that work are underfunded. However, more crucially, the voluntary and community sectors are also underfunded. I had a meeting in my constituency recently with a funder of a local centre in which great work is being done. Groups such as those are living from hand to mouth because they cannot get long-term funding and do not know where they are going. We must realise the impact that that underfunding has and have a fundamental review of the good work that the voluntary and community sectors carry out.

However, I am concerned about some issues that other Members have mentioned. According to recent media reports, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety received no funding application from the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre. I have had no contact with the centre, but Dr Birnie said that it believes that it submitted an application. I welcome the Minister's presence in the Chamber. Will she tell the House if that funding application was submitted? Will she outline how it is progressing, and will she let us know when it will be resolved so that Members can get a clear picture of what is going on?

As former Deputy Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee, I and other members of that Committee were critical of the previous practice of applications being made willy-nilly with no follow-up mechanism. In fact, the Committee wrote a report on that, so its concerns are on record. I am concerned — and I do not take away from the good work being done in those centres — that we do not go down that road. If criteria are in place, we must implement them.

I ask the Minister again to explain to the House what is happening with that application. Dr Birnie says one thing, media speculation says another, and I have just received a press release from the centre. Again, like other Members, I wish to commend the work, which is occasionally voluntary, that is done sometimes 24 hours a day, seven days a week in many of these centres, and I should like to reiterate Mr Hay's point that this is not just in Belfast; groups throughout the North are doing such work.

Mr McCarthy: I speak on behalf of my Colleague Mrs Eileen Bell, who is elsewhere on Assembly business and cannot attend the debate.

Mrs Bell has actively supported the work of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre for some time. The suffering of rape victims remains unacknowledged by most people. Their trauma and stress is virtually ignored by the public and is certainly not best served by current legislation. The staff of the rape crisis centre have been working with commitment, loyalty and great experience with neither salaries nor, indeed, acceptable working conditions.

Mrs Bell has been in touch with the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister and with the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, who we are glad to see in the Chamber. Those Ministers seem to ignore the urgency of the situation. I understand that no wages have been paid to staff in the centre for several months, and it is ludicrous to say that no payment can be made, even pro tem, because the Department has allegedly not received a revised application. The centre has received core funding for more than 20 years, and is evidently still being used. Therefore why has no money been given in lieu of the arrival of an application for funding?

The Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre's mission statement says that it exists to "provide empowering confidential counselling and other services free of charge for survivors of sexual assault and to campaign with survivors to increase awareness of the need to change the conditions in society which make sexual violence and abuse possible."

The centre's annual report shows that it provides face-to-face counselling in 79% of cases and that the remainder are dealt with by telephone. Survivors tell stories of nightmares, flashbacks and suicidal feelings. The centre provides the only available practical help and support, along with services that are vital to the survivors' encouragement and continued survival.

The low rate of reporting incidents of rape and sexual assault to the police means that, although the PSNI has greatly improved its approach to dealing with such crimes, victims still fear interviews and court appearances. Moreover, the sentences that are usually handed down do not reflect the damage that has been done to the victim. The way in which victims are treated and the lack of sensitive ways in which they can give evidence mean that the legal system for such crimes is utterly horrendous and must be attended to immediately. The Alliance Party supports the recommendations that if the Bar Council is not prepared to implement a code of practice, one must be imposed upon it by statute, and that judges must also use their powers to curb the worst excesses of the legal vultures.

It is accepted that sexual offenders against women and children enjoy a high acquittal rate. If a sentence is imposed, it rarely reflects the gravity of the crime. We must bring such sentences into line with the deep trauma that is inflicted by the guilty on the innocent victim. Some judges must completely change their mindset, and instances of plea-bargaining should be greatly reduced, if not eradicated.

The issue of rape and sexual abuse has been overlooked. Organisations such as the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre have had to deal with it on a totally inadequate budget, with little public recognition or acknowledgement. The Assembly must support the centre's efforts to draw up an effective business plan to provide a clear vision for the future in this sensitive area. Core funding must be made available and be commensurate with the centre's many activities so that it will be able to contribute to the welfare and support of some of our most disadvantaged women and children.

On behalf of my party, I thank the management, staff and counsellors of the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre for their efforts, which have been carried out effectively, in spite of an uncertain future and a lack of funding.

The Alliance Party wholeheartedly supports the motion.

Ms Morrice: I, like others, support the motion. With rape and sexual abuse on the increase in Northern Ireland, and with the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre doing, as we have heard, such valuable work, it is almost impossible to believe that its representatives must come to the Assembly with a begging bowl.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Given the seriousness of the debate, it is depressing to look around the Chamber and see the number of Members who are involved in private conversations and are not listening.

1.00 pm

Ms Morrice: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I repeat that it is astounding that a centre that does such valuable work has to come to the Assembly with a begging bowl.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety says that the funding crisis has come about because someone did not fill in an application form. We all have the details of the question put to the Minister by my Colleague Monica McWilliams earlier this year. She asked the Minister to make a statement on the current level of resources for the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre and to detail proposals for the development of its work. The Minister answered that the Department was making available a grant of up to £33,000, and gave details of the conditions of the award of that grant. No mention was made of the fact that a form had not been received or that there was a potential problem.

Given the contact between the centre and the Department, why was the centre not alerted to the problem, and why was nothing done? There is no point in getting bogged down in a "did they or didn't they" argument. The debate about filling in forms highlights the need for more help for this organisation. We must get that point across to everyone.

I understand that the application has been revised from £32,000 plus £8,000 up to perhaps £136,000, to enable the centre to employ a full-time administrator. An administrator would help to overcome the funding crisis, as he or she would be able to draw up business plans and calculate the required funding.

Questions must be asked about how much paperwork is necessary. Many voluntary and community organisations are asking whether there is a way to reduce the volume of paperwork. I agree with my Colleague Sue Ramsey that organisations must report annually, at the least. As members of the Public Accounts Committee, we realise the importance of accountability. However, there may be a way to ensure accountability while avoiding lengthy forms.

Members have mentioned the centre's workload. It receives 3,000 calls a year. Some calls are from people who experienced sexual abuse 30 years ago and who are only ready to come forward now. There are calls from women, children and, increasingly, men, who come forward because they were abused the previous day. Mr Hay said that the centre receives 60 calls a week.

Two members of staff, Eileen Calder and Eileen Kelly, have to do everything, which involves supporting victims in the courts, answering phones, visiting hospitals and counselling traumatised victims, women and children. The staff need the patience and understanding of counsellors, the therapeutic knowledge of psychiatrists, and almost the same legal ability and dexterity as a High Court judge. We ask a great deal of them.

I was fascinated to note in the research that was prepared for us that incidents of rape have increased from 209 cases in 2000-01 to 252 cases in 2001-02. Indecent assaults on female children have dropped from 342 cases in 2000-01 to 308 cases in 2001-02, and indecent assaults on male children have dropped from 134 cases in 2000-01 to 55 cases in 2001-02, which is progress. However, one of the most shocking statistics was that, overall, sexual offences have increased from 1,176 in 2000-01 to 1,431 in 2001-02. These crimes are on the increase, and we should be doing much more about that.

It is important to note that these statistics mask the reality. Nine times out of 10, the abuser is known to the victim. In many of those cases, the victim will not want to go to the police to get the crime recorded. The statistics that I have given are the recorded statistics. All the additional cases that are handled by the centre are not recorded, and those victims do not want to go to the police.

Another surprising item of information is that an important piece of research shows that 84% of people convicted have previous convictions, one third of which are sexually related. These statistics must be taken more seriously.

Consideration of the localities shows that Foyle has a high incidence, with 144 cases last year. We have all heard of the problems in south Belfast with the student population; that area had 134 cases last year. My own area, north Down, had 79 cases. Those are the three highest incidences in Northern Ireland.

We still have much work to do. There are issues such as the extension of part V of the Police Act 1997 to allow previous investigations to be taken into account when cases are being heard, and the protection of children and vulnerable adults through the setting up of a proper vetting system. All that work is important. With its expertise, the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre can offer much help with that.

I want to turn to one alarming — I am unsure what best to call it — obscenity. It is an Internet obscenity. I have received e-mails during the past couple of weeks that I would not even dare to repeat on the Floor of the House. They all involve the possibility of seeing free pictures of rape. I have contacted the police. People say that one can get eight or nine of these e-mails a day. They are obscene, disgusting and horrific, and children could have access to them. The centre is already working in this area to try to get "cyber police" to stop this type of obscenity coming to innocent and ordinary people, particularly young children. It is a disgusting occurrence in our society, and we must stop it.

Finally, I call for more funding, particularly core funding, for a centre that is doing so much work in this area. We must all work and take urgent action to prevent this type of thing from taking over our society.

Mr M Robinson: As recently as a couple of weeks ago, Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre faced its own major crisis in that it was forced to operate for 24 hours with no telephone lines. This was as a result of the centre being unable to meet payments for a phone bill of a staggering amount. Over this period of time, I am absolutely convinced that those people seeking support from the trained counsellors at the centre were thrown into further confusion and upset due to being unable to access the support which they required. It is obvious that the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre cannot function adequately or to its full capabilities without telephone lines, which are the first point of contact for someone contacting the centre for support and advice.

Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre is one of the earliest established centres in the UK, and it has been providing Northern Ireland with its only free and confidential service for survivors of rape for over 20 years. Right from its inception, the centre has been forced to operate on a shoestring budget. They are allocated the minimal sum of £30,000 per annum from the Department of Health and Social Services. That figure does not even come close to what is required to enable the centre to function properly. The crisis centre is an organisation which must be maintained. The latest crime statistics in my constituency of South Belfast have revealed a 42% increase in sex attacks in that area this year alone. I cannot praise the centre enough and the service that it provides; free, supportive and sympathetic advice and counselling to the victims of the heinous crime of rape.

The centre provides support at all levels: for example, it offers therapy support and Northern Ireland's only free phone line for victims of sexual abuse. The centre is unique in that it also provides court support. Many women do not report rape for fear of the treatment they will receive from the legal system. Women who do go through the courts are often left feeling that they have been raped all over again, as they have to relive the terrifying events and are left feeling traumatised after giving evidence. This is, once again, where the centre becomes involved. Its counsellors offer court support and advise and counsel women on how to cope with their experiences in court. As a result of this support, many women have found the courage to go through the legal system, and many perpetrators of this crime have been put behind bars.

This debate is concentrating on the funding crisis which the centre is facing. The centre is living from one year to the next, not knowing if it will get the finance to allow it to continue its valuable work. The reality unfortunately is that the level of funding is limited and the level of dependency great. The centre needs £150,000 each year to enable it to provide its services properly. The current level of funding totals just £32,000 each year, which is nowhere near the amount required to enable the centre to operate to its full capacity.

It simply baffles me that organisations such as the Belfast centre are forced into this position, when recent patterns of underspending by Departments have emerged. Resources must be managed better, so that the work which voluntary organisations do day and daily is not put in jeopardy. It is therefore essential that the necessary finance is made available to the centre if we are to avert a similar crisis in the future.

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I commend the work of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre in providing support for the survivors of child and adult sexual abuse and assault. Moreover, it is essential that there is a properly funded service to support such victims. I am almost reluctant to take an objective view of the circumstances surrounding the motion, because it is so emotive. I have serious concerns about what is happening in the centre — assuming that the report in today's 'Irish News' is correct — and questions must be asked.

Given the dire financial circumstances of the centre, why was it so tardy in making an application for funding? We have heard different stories about funding, and maybe the Minister will be able to reply to them. Members have, on other occasions, raised the need for transparency and probity. However, on this occasion they seem to be setting those things to one side, which makes it difficult to attempt to be objective about this emotive situation.

The centre was given £6,000 to put together a business plan. What happened to that business plan? Was it ever presented to the Department, and what happened to the money allocated for it? Other centres outside Belfast are attempting to deal with the problem of rape in their own way.

1.15 pm

Why, instead of going through the normal funding channels that every other voluntary organisation adheres to, is the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre using the media and the Assembly as the vehicle for its funding application? I have difficulty with that, and I would like to hear an explanation from it and others.

I do not wish to discount the work that is going on, but we must try to be objective. I would be the first to accept that, if a voluntary organisation feels that a Department has treated it unfairly, it should have recourse to MLAs. However, on this occasion, the organisation did not take the opportunity to speak to me or to my Colleague Sue Ramsey. Why, if no funding application was made, do we have the motion and all the publicity surrounding it?

Given that the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre received substantial funding to prepare a strategic plan, why did it not deliver that plan? We might also ask whether there has been a proper audit of the centre's finances to ascertain exactly how the organisation has used the not inconsiderable amount of taxpayers' money that has been allocated to it over the years. How has it arrived, year after year, at this situation of dire financial straits, without it being flagged up in a substantive way to those of us who share the concerns of survivors of rape and child sexual abuse? We deal with those issues on an ongoing basis in our constituencies.

It is essential that those centres carry out their voluntary work efficiently. However, we must also have a sense of probity about the financial structures with which those organisations surround themselves.

Mr Shannon: Members have highlighted the needs of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre. Most of the issues have been mentioned; I do not wish to repeat them. The centre looks after several cases in my constituency of Strangford and in the Ards Borough Council area.

I have become aware of the number of people that have been abused and the need for the centre over the past 12 to 15 months. It is not just a question of those who have been abused in the last few months and years; several people have come forward for help who were abused 10, 15, 20 and even 25 years ago. Those people are still traumatised by what happened to them.

As a result of the numbers of people who asked me about this issue, I met the chairman of the Ulster Community and Hospitals Health and Social Services Trust to see if he could get funding to address the needs for such services in the Ards Borough Council area and, specifically, on the Ards Peninsula. He agreed that assistance was required, but if the money were granted, other services would suffer. My frustration was apparent to the chairman and his officials, but more apparent to my constituents, and to the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre.

That is an example of the difficulties faced. The small way in which this issue is being addressed touches only the tip of the iceberg. The organisation supplies two hours of counselling in the Ards Hospital. That comes nowhere near to meeting the needs of people, most of whom have to travel to Belfast for assistance. Even then, the necessary funding was not apparent.

Although I support the motion, there should be a strategic review to help the people and organisations within the Health Department who look after rape and sexual abuse victims. It is important that that strategic review address all related issues, not just in the Strangford constituency but in all others. My Colleagues William Hay and Mark Robinson mentioned the need for assistance in their constituencies of Foyle and South Belfast.

We want a strategic review and a plan of action on the whole process, to zero in on where the problems are and give the necessary financial budget. If, God forbid, the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre stopped its work tomorrow, the Government could not jump in, take over and continue its work, and that is a problem.

Members should recognise — and I think that the Assembly will recognise — the work of the centre. However, Members want the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Government to take on this case and to provide the necessary financial assistance to help the dozens, hundreds and even thousands who need help. In a small way, I realise the needs of some people, because my constituents come to me as other people go to their Assembly Members. The cry coming from Members is for more finance and help for those people. That can only happen if the finance is there and the Departments are doing their best to help.

Mr Kennedy: It was not my intention to make a contribution, but I was astonished at that made by Mr John Kelly, the Member for Mid Ulster. After serving up the usual platitudes and paying due tribute to the work of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre, he proceeded to put the boot in in a highly political manner.

Mr J Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: No, the Member will not give way. Mr Kelly, you got your opportunity to speak.

Mr J Kelly: On a point of order, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Kelly, I hope that this is a point of order.

Mr J Kelly: Is it relevant to use “put the boot in” in these circumstances?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr J Kelly: Is that a valid comment to make?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am not sure whether it is parliamentary.

Mr Kennedy: “Put the boot in” is the only apt term that could be used. Clearly, Mr Kelly is being used as a noble cat’s paw, the ministerial spokesperson or the warm-up person to the Minister. It will be interesting to hear what the Minister has to say about the applications submitted by the centre, how they were processed and what assistance — if any — was given to it in its funding difficulties.

It is interesting that Mr Kelly concerned himself with issues of probity and questions which ultimately served to undermine the alleged comments of support that he promoted in the early part of his contribution. The manner in which Mr Kelly sought to undermine the credibility and attack the integrity of the centre left many Members with a bad taste in their mouths. It is almost unbelievable that that would happen in a debate in which members of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre have no recourse to respond as to how they dealt with applications. It is unfortunate and wrong of the Member for Mid Ulster to have made his contribution as he did.

I will be interested to hear the Minister’s response on what help was offered and how she will address the various points that are now in the public domain. This essential service has been reduced to having to come to the Floor of the Assembly to beg for financial support to remain operational. Perhaps the Minister will reflect that if she wasted less money on some of her personal crusades, such as the promotion of the Irish language, groups such as the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre might not face such unfortunate difficulties.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mr Deputy Speaker, I am grateful to Dr Birnie for tabling the motion, as it allows me the opportunity to clarify my Department's position regarding the funding of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has been providing financial support to the organisation for many years. All organisations receiving this type of financial support are required to make written application and provide the Department with annual monitoring information as a condition of the grant.

Unfortunately, in recent years, the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre has continuously failed to provide annual monitoring information. As a result, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety placed the centre's funding on an annual footing, rather than the three-year cycle that normally pertains.

The motion specifically addresses the long-term future of the centre. My officials have been trying to work with the centre for some time to establish a clearer picture of its financial position and to determine what might feasibly be done to help the centre to address its current difficulties and then to focus on the key issue of long-term sustainability. To that end, my Department allocated an additional £11,000 to purchase computer equipment and develop a strategic business plan. It was envisaged that the proposed business plan would develop a three-year action plan; create a structured and practical funding strategy; establish a clear accountable management structure; and improve image and marketing to the end user and the potential funders as a professional organisation.

Unfortunately, the business plan has so far failed to materialise. The Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre has experienced ongoing difficulty in complying with the terms and conditions applicable to grants, with the late submission of the requested monitoring information — audited accounts, annual reports, details of how the grant has been attributed and an organisational forward plan.

I reiterate that it is a measure of the Department's commitment that, in March 2001, it awarded the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre £6,500 of the additional £11,000 in funding to employ an independent consultant to help it to develop a strategic plan to turn it into a creative organisation that could ultimately achieve sustainability. To date, that plan has not materialised.

1.30 pm

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister give way?

Ms de Brún: No.

Issues have been raised about adequate funding. The compact between Government and the voluntary and community sector, which was published in December 1998 and endorsed by the Assembly in early 2000, recognised the need for a more co-ordinated strategic approach to the funding of the voluntary and community sector in general. To address that matter, my Department is participating in a major cross-departmental review of Government support to the voluntary and community sector. It is hoped that the outcome of that review will ease the funding situation. In the interim I will continue to seek additional funding.

With regard to funding for the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre, the Department awards grants of up to 75% of the amount requested. The centre has not submitted a case for increased funding. However, it received additional funding of £11,281 in 2001 and £3,500 in 1998-99.

Questions were asked about the Department's strategic approach. My Department and the Executive are concerned about sexual abuse and its impact on the individual, and we are committed to tackling the issue. Until now, most developments and services for survivors of sexual abuse have been included in wider service developments, such as child protection arrangements or the mental health services. However, the Department accepts the need for a strong, coherent policy, and officials are discussing the matter with their counterparts in Scotland.

The Department supports survivors of sexual abuse directly through grants to voluntary organisations and indirectly through boards and trusts. The health and social services boards and trusts provide a range of services, including specialised children's units, initial response teams, direct counselling by social workers and home visits to survivors of rape and sexual abuse.

The Department provides core funding for central administration costs to voluntary organisations that tackle issues, such as rape, sexual abuse, domestic violence and relationship counselling.

Members asked how funding is assessed and whether it is based on the organisations' application forms. The application form is essential, but, in order for the Department to make a proper assessment of the funding required, the application must also contain certain information. For example, it must demonstrate how the organisation intends to meet the Department's objectives in respect of the services to be provided. A regional organisation must show how it represents the region and how it proposes to achieve the aims set out in the application.

Until this morning, the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre had not made an application to my Department for funding for the current financial year, although my Department had issued application forms and invited the organisation's representatives to meet officials.

An e-mail version of the application form arrived at the Department this morning, a full 11 months after the first application form was issued. It is the responsibility of both the Government and their social partners in the voluntary and community sector to ensure the effective and efficient use of public moneys. It would be remiss to allocate resources without due care for accountability, and I am certain that the Members who have constantly questioned the use of funding in the Assembly would not now wish to suggest that accountability is not an issue. I am astounded to hear a Member who has raised the question of accountability again and again refer to an application form as “a bit of a technical distraction”.

Mr Kennedy: Will the Minister give way?

Ms de Brún: No. The departmental procedures for grants are a basic matter of completion of application forms — forms which the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre has been completing since 1989. I am aware of more general concerns in the wider voluntary statutory organisations about the onerous task of completing some assessments. However, our departmental procedures for grants are a matter of the basic completion of application forms; something that the organisation in question has been doing for years.

It is important to note that in the absence of verifiable evidence of need it is no easy task to assess what funding would be adequate. To establish a realistic level of funding, it is necessary for organisations to establish need; identify what is to be achieved; quantify the additional value to be gained; and commit to the monitoring and evaluation of the work undertaken. That is why those procedures exist, and that is why the Assembly again and again asks Departments and others to stick to proper criteria and procedures. My Department must consider all funding against competing priorities and financial constraints. I am aware that the junior Ministers have been in contact with Jane Kennedy about funding from the Northern Ireland Office.

I am committed to funding this type of service; I am committed absolutely to playing my part with others in providing what is needed to a vital section of society. Funding, however, is dependent on all organisations adhering to the terms and conditions of Government accounting procedures. It is also important that organisations are evaluated to ensure that they are delivering appropriate services in an effective and efficient manner. I therefore urge the organisation in question to complete the business plan, ensure that it maintains proper records and comply with the terms of any grant funding provided to it.

Dr Birnie: I should like to begin by thanking all those who spoke and, indeed, the Minister for her response. Mrs Annie Courtney rightly referred to the expertise of the centre and, like several Members, mentioned the recent problem when it had its telephone lines cut off.

William Hay pointed out some of the problems dealt with by the centre, particularly in his own constituency. He highlighted the need to support all such centres carrying out this good work. Sue Ramsey commended the centre for its work and stated that there was a need for a strategy in that area of public health. Kieran McCarthy pointed out the practical help provided by the centre. Jane Morrice asked why the Department had not been alert to the fact that the centre had been tardy with its application forms. She also referred to some of the frightening statistics of rape and sexual abuse and raised the question of new and growing developments on the Internet. Mark Robinson also referred to the cutting off of the telephone lines and said that it was very significant, since the centre provided a free advice service over the telephone to people across the Province.

John Kelly commended the centre for its work. However, he asked why it had been, in his view, tardy in its application processes. Jim Shannon stated that the centre was carrying out needful work and referred to his constituency of Strangford. My Colleague, Danny Kennedy, outlined his astonishment, particularly at Mr Kelly's comments.

The Minister attempted to clarify her Department's position. She referred to money granted to the centre for its business plan, which she said had not yet been produced. The business plan is delaying an obvious conclusion that we can already come to: there is substantial underfunding in this case and that the work is immensely valuable. It is a chicken-and-egg situation. On one hand, for two decades the centre has been on a shoestring budget. However, on the other hand, it probably has problems with administration and housekeeping.

I appeal to the Minister to look favourably on better funding for the centre when the business plan and applications are produced. It can be argued that, in the long run, funding spent in this way represents good value for money: the centre and similar bodies deal with problems and counsel people in trauma at an early stage. Such help prevents their medical, psychiatric and mental health problems from worsening and stops the individuals appearing at another part of the Health Service with an even greater demand on resources to pay for treatment.

I would have thought that the Minister would have found it possible to be more supportive of the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre, given her, and her party's, professed attachment to political radicalism and certain varieties of feminism. On 23 September, Eileen Calder of the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre referred to the “iron law of oligarchy” in the ‘Belfast Telegraph’. She felt that it had influenced the attitudes of the Department and hence, by implication, the Minister in supporting that needful work.

I said that the need for additional moneys is obvious even without the business plan. One way to prove that is to contrast the situation with that South of the border. I am sure that the Minister is well aware of that. In the Republic of Ireland, rape crisis centres operating in cities much smaller than Belfast, such as Galway and Limerick, receive much higher public support — sometimes two to three times higher.

As many Members have said, there is a need for a good strategy to deal with the victims of rape and sexual abuse.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the dire financial situation of the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre and calls upon the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Northern Ireland Office to provide adequate funding to ensure the long-term future of the centre.

The sitting was suspended at 1.44 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr J Wilson] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers To Questions

ENTERPRISE, TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Mr Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform Members that questions 2, 7 and 9, standing in the names of Mr John Fee, Mrs Joan Carson and Mr David Hilditch respectively, have been withdrawn and will not receive written answers. Question 13, standing in the name of Ms Michelle Gildernew, has also been withdrawn but will require a written answer.

Lough Neagh Tourism

1. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to give an update on his policy to develop and promote Lough Neagh as a major tourist attraction. (AQO 212/02)

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (Sir Reg Empey): It is fully recognised that the Lough Neagh wetlands, as an activity destination, are a greatly underutilised resource. The Lough Neagh management strategy, launched in June 2002, provides the necessary framework for the wise use of the resource, including its development for tourism. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, through the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, is committed to working with relevant partners to ensure its implementation.

Mr Armstrong: Does the Minister agree that Lough Neagh has the potential to be a major tourist attraction, contrary to what is suggested by the low number of visitors there this summer? Can he ensure that when the area is developed, its environmental assets will be conserved?

Sir Reg Empey: With regard to the Member's last point, the conservation of the area must, of course, be a guiding principle in how it is developed, because no one wants to see the area ruined. I was in the area on Saturday evening at the opening of an equestrian centre. Given the reports that the Department has received, and the potential that clearly exists, the area is undoubtedly underutilised. Water sports-related activities, wildlife-related activities and equestrian activities have the potential to promote the lough as a significant destination.

At present, few people visit the area. Those visitors tend to come on day trips. The predominant use of the area is for informal recreation, as one would expect. The area has tremendous potential. Six local authority areas border the lough, and I believe that through working with them, and with the Lough Neagh Partnership, which is a new company limited by guarantee, the Department will be able to develop and implement projects, attract investment and market the area in a strategic manner. Although it is not envisaged that the Lough Neagh Partnership will carry out the statutory obligations of any agency, it will be well placed to manage strategic projects.

Mr Kane: Members know that Lough Neagh has valuable tourist attractions. Can the Minister outline the Department's policy for the development and promotion of established tourist attractions, such as the Giant's Causeway and the Glens of Antrim?

Sir Reg Empey: I have no doubt that the Member is well skilled. If he sits in the Chamber until the end of Question Time, he may find that there is a question coming up on that particular subject. With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will decline to fall into that trap at this stage.

NITB's New York Bills

3. Mr Close asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, pursuant to AQW 389/01, how many of the New York hospitality bills listed were paid with the credit card issued to NITB's New York manager.

(AQO 190/02)

Sir Reg Empey: None of the bills referred to were paid with the credit card that was issued to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's New York manager.

Mr Close: I am delighted to hear that. However, can the Minister advise the House as to how he is so certain that that is the case? As I understand it, thousands of pounds worth of unaccounted bills are still outstanding, for which no receipts have been issued?

Sir Reg Empey: The bills were paid either through the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's cheque journal, in accordance with normal supplier payment arrangements, or through expense claim forms, which were then processed in accordance with normal procedure. The payments have either been repaid centrally by the Tourist Board or subsequently claimed and repaid through the normal process. That is how I am able to give the Member that particular answer.

Mr Dallat: The Minister will agree that chairmen of public bodies and those charged, as accounting officers, with safeguarding the use of public money have a particular duty of care in incurring substantial expenditure on hospitality, such as that which occurred in New York. He will further agree that it is essential that such expenditure is fully in line with best practice guidance and that it can be fully defended as regards value for money.

Mr Kennedy: Get to the question.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: Question.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I do not need to be prompted. Are you coming to a question, Mr Dallat?

Mr Dallat: Yes, indeed. I find it rather interesting that such anxiety is expressed from across the Floor about this question.

Mr Kennedy: Get on with what you were going to say, ye bigot ye.

Mr Dallat: Withdraw that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: This really is unfortunate.

Mr Dallat: Yes.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Dallat, I was right to call you to order.

I ask Mr Kennedy whether he cares to withdraw that remark.

Mr Kennedy: Mr Deputy Speaker, the remark is withdrawn.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you.

Mr Dallat: Is the Minister satisfied that the chairman and accounting officer met expectations during the visits and events detailed in his answer to question AQW 389/01? What criteria were used to assess that?

Sir Reg Empey: I am not absolutely sure that I quite understand what the Member is getting at. He said that accounting officers and chairmen have a duty of care for public expenditure. I entirely agree. The purpose and rationale for having an accounting officer is that there is a person designated as being responsible for the dispersal of public funds. I entirely accept that, and it is absolutely appropriate that such a person is clearly identified.

The Member also mentioned substantial expenditure on hospitality. That must be put into perspective. Going back to 1997, there were amounts of $123·13 and $27·54, up to larger amounts such as $3,689·24. However, we are talking about the promotion of Northern Ireland in New York, which is a very expensive city. Even at its peak, average expenditure was $500 a week. At that time, Northern Ireland was a very difficult place to promote. People forget just how far we have come since then.

People must have some sense of proportion. Whether it is $27 or $3,000, accountability must remain quite clear. In the first part of my answer, I said that the accounting officer must be answerable for, in this case, every cent that is spent from the public purse. However, we must also remember the purpose of spending that money. We are up against heavy expenditure from other places. I am not altogether sure if amounts of that scale would be subject to questions in the Irish Parliament — maybe they are. However, it is important to keep everything in proportion.

The chairman and the accounting officer must ensure that the Department's policy on expenditure of public moneys is adhered to, and, if it is not, that those involved are answerable to the Department. I am absolutely clear about that. However, as I said to Mr Close, I have been informed that in this case there was clear accountability and that the credit card in question was not used. There was a "shock, horror" reaction to the use of credit cards. Many car drivers use credit cards to pay for petrol; they are a perfectly legitimate means of dealing with public expenditure provided the procedures are in place to ensure accountability. We should not get ourselves into a twist about the use of credit cards or charge cards, because they are a good way to settle bills without using cash. The core issue is to ensure that the people who use them are accountable and answerable.

Mr McClarty: Am I correct to say that any manager who uses credit cards must submit receipts for any expenses claimed? Does the Minister agree that the number of questions that are being asked about the use of credit cards has reached epidemic proportions? Some of the questions are extremely petty. How much does it cost the Department, and thus the people of Northern Ireland, to answer those questions?

Sir Reg Empey: Other Ministers and I have a clear obligation to answer, to the best of our ability, any question asked by a Member, irrespective of the number of questions asked. However, perhaps Members do not always appreciate fully how much time is devoted to answering questions. I do not know the exact cost of answering questions on the use of credit cards, but I would be happy to try to find out.

I am more concerned by the fact that certain sections of my Department have to deal with many Assembly questions, which means that at peak times a client executive can spend up to 50% of his or her time answering them. That is a huge problem for the Department because it means that the officer is unable to work on other matters — [Interruption].

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Sir Reg Empey: Irrespective of the question asked, I will continue to endeavour to give as full and frank an answer as possible. However, there comes a point when cost-effectiveness has to be taken into account.

Stress at Work

4. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to make a statement in response to the launch of the European Agency for Safety and Health at Work's campaign to raise awareness of the causes of stress at work. (AQO 213/02)

Sir Reg Empey: My Department, through the work of the Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland, recognises that the campaign provides an excellent opportunity to raise awareness of work-related stress. I am sure that many Members would agree with that. The European Week for Safety and Health at Work, which will run from 14 October to 20 October 2002, is the cornerstone of the campaign. Locally, the Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland is pursuing a comprehensive promotional programme.

Mr J Kelly: Does the Minister agree that greater co-operation with the Department for Employment and Learning is needed to help to raise awareness of stress in the workplace and to help people to find a balance? In other words, perhaps an educational approach should be adopted.

Sir Reg Empey: The Health and Safety Executive is committed to addressing the issue of work-related stress. The Member may find the following statistics interesting. It is estimated that at any time in Northern Ireland some 12,500 people experience work-related stress, anxiety or depression. In June, the Health and Safety Executive launched the European Week for Safety and Health at Work at Maydown. It used that opportunity to encourage all organisations in Northern Ireland to address the issue of work-related stress. As part of a wide-ranging advertising campaign, over 13,000 information packs have been distributed to organisations in the Province.

2.45 pm

The information packs describe the causes of work-related stress and provide information on how it can be prevented. Furthermore, specific information from the European Agency for Safety and Health at Work has been included. A European week awards scheme is being co-ordinated, which aims to recognise organisations that excel in their efforts to support the working on stress initiative. Local winners will be recognised during a European week awards ceremony to be held early in 2003.

Mrs Courtney: I welcome the emphasis on stress-related illnesses and the European Agency for Safety and Health at Work. People often suffer disadvantages resulting from the appearance of such illness on a medical certificate. Will the Minister ensure that employees are not put under further stress by having that information on their employment record?

Sir Reg Empey: In my answer to Mr Kelly I omitted to mention the relationship between my Department and the Department for Employment and Learning. We have regular discussions, and training forms a key part of the activities.

Mrs Courtney made a very good point. Undoubtedly, there is a degree of prejudice about certain illnesses. It would be interesting to see how these matters are treated, particularly in the Civil Service. I cannot confirm anything for the Member at the moment; however, I shall make enquiries about the matter and I shall write to the Member, rather than give her an off-the-cuff response.

Mr Shannon: I thank the Minister for his response in relation to the launch of the European campaign. However, he omitted one point, which is the issue of those who are bullied at work. It is a big issue for many people who are off as a result. Will any help be available in the campaign he outlined for those who are subject to that type of abuse?

Sir Reg Empey: There are several issues here. First, we must define “stress” and how it is categorised. For instance, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development carried out a social survey of farmers and farm families in 2001-02 to investigate the scale of work-related ill health in the farming community. The study found that 15% of the 3,400 people interviewed suffered from work-related ill health, with 5% of those interviewed reporting that stress, depression or anxiety was caused — or aggravated — by their work.

Furthermore, the situation varies between industries. Some people are continuously “off”, as Mr Shannon put it, and it must be determined whether they are fit to return to work. People can be permanently disabled by stress-related illnesses. It is very difficult to be clear about stress-related illness. If someone has a broken leg, that is obvious. It is less obvious if someone is suffering from stress, and it can become progressively more difficult to analyse. The purpose behind the week of health promotion and the activity of the Health and Safety Executive is to raise awareness among employers, as well as workers. Taking Mrs Courtney’s point, people should not be discriminated against because they suffer from that disability rather than from any other.

Lagan Valley Tourism

5. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what plans he has to provide greater support for tourism projects in the Lagan Valley constituency.
(AQO 228/02)

Sir Reg Empey: The Northern Ireland Tourist Board and Invest Northern Ireland administer several financial assistance schemes aimed at developing visitor attractions and facilities, marketing projects, events support and business support in general. Applications for assistance under those initiatives are welcomed from projects in Lagan Valley. Support policies are continually under review and will be adjusted according to sector needs and tourism policy.

Mr Poots: Officials from Lisburn City Council recently met the Minister and outlined the funding that the area has received from the Tourist Board in the past few years. I assume that the Minister agrees that that funding is minuscule. When will the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Tourist Board realise that there are areas between Belfast and the north coast, and between Belfast and Fermanagh, that attract tourism spend? When will the Department support events in those areas?

Sir Reg Empey: The Tourist Board is very conscious that events happen throughout the Province. In fact, it provides East Belfast with less funding than any other constituency. In the past 10 years, £2·85 million has been offered to 19 projects in Lagan Valley. The constituency is not ignored.

Applications are vital. The Tourist Board and the Department can only give assistance for which they are asked, and the objective of my meeting with Lisburn City Council was to attract a hotel project to Lisburn. The then mayor and some of his officials referred to the Department’s moratorium, which has a radius of 10 miles from central Belfast. They felt that, were a hotel project proposed, the moratorium would be discriminatory because Lisburn would not qualify for grant aid. I made it clear that the 10-mile zone was an administrative decision, not a legal or statutory requirement. I also said that future projects would be considered carefully to determine whether they fulfilled the Department’s overall policy objectives and that they would not be ruled out on the basis of the moratorium.

Last month, officials from Invest Northern Ireland met a potential developer to discuss the establishment of a hotel in Lisburn. Those discussions are ongoing.

Mr McMenamin: Last week, the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment held the second of its tourism inquiry conferences in the heart of west Tyrone. During a workshop, the Committee was told that the domestic market generates the same amount of tourism revenue as visitors from the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the rest of Europe — some £66 million per annum. I am very much in favour of attracting foreign visitors to our islands —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Do you have a question, Mr McMenamin?

Mr McMenamin: Yes. Does the Minister agree that, if the home market were promoted more rigorously, it could attract even more revenue, especially in areas such as the Sperrins and west Tyrone?

Sir Reg Empey: I made a point when the Member for North Antrim, Mr Kane, asked me a question that did not relate to the question on the Order Paper, and my response to Mr McMenamin falls into the same category. Mr McMenamin’s question does not relate to Mr Poots’s question about Lagan Valley. I have answered Mr McMenamin’s question in the past. I have no doubt that he will ask me it again in the future.

Enterprise Zones

6. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline his policy on designating enterprise zones that attract grant-aided incentives.
(AQO 195/02)

Sir Reg Empey: The Department has no plans to designate enterprise zones that attract grant-aided incentives. It uses other measures that are based on the new TSN maps, as well as a comprehensive series of policy initiatives that involve Invest Northern Ireland, to stimulate economic activity across Northern Ireland.

Mr Byrne: I pay tribute to the Department's work in creating more industrial parks in Omagh and Strabane. However, in order to promote the small and medium-sized enterprise (SME) sector, especially in provincial areas, will it seriously consider incentives beyond selective financial assistance? Will the Minister assure Members that, to encourage economic development, the Department and the district council will seriously consider support for Fintona, which does not have an industrial park?

Sir Reg Empey: You know what they say, Mr Deputy Speaker: if west Tyrone does not get you one way, it will get you another.

Past policy has been to focus on industrial land and parks in centres of significant population in each district council area. Therefore, as Mr Byrne said, not every town or village necessarily has such a facility. That would spread resources very thinly over a wide area, rather than concentrate them on a limited number of areas.

We have pushed hard in the past few years to attract investment to west Tyrone, with some success in Omagh and Strabane. The Member will recall the recent investment by Rixell Ltd at Doogary Road near Omagh.

As far as incentives other than selective financial assistance are concerned, we offer industrial derating, which is not given anywhere else in these islands. Other incentives include help with training, professional advice, and advice on broadband services. I am prepared to consider suggestions for other forms of assistance. It is something that must be kept under review and should not be curtailed because of bureaucratic requirements.

If the Member has specific ideas that would help his constituency, the Department will be happy to consider them. The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and I have other strings to our bow, be they based on European funds or LEADER, to help promote development. The combination of those incentives ought to give us a significant package to offer.

Mr K Robinson: I am taken by the Minister's specific references to aid. Given the loss of over 2,000 jobs in east Antrim, and in the light of the severe ongoing job losses there, will he urgently consider declaring east Antrim a strategic employment location in which innovation and entrepreneurship can be fast-tracked to arrest the serious and ongoing decline in the manufacturing sector there?

Sir Reg Empey: In view of my responses to the Member for North Antrim, who is no longer in the Chamber, and the Member for West Tyrone, I shall not answer the Member's question specifically, because it does not relate to the question tabled. I understand his point and I shall write to him about the particular matters he referred to, but he has strayed considerably from the original question.

Mr C Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Has the Minister had any discussions with the Tánaiste and her Department of Enterprise, Trade and Employment in the South about any potential benefits that could be gained from cross-border industrial parks on both sides of the border, given the economic decline there? What benefits might be accrued from such an establishment?

Sir Reg Empey: Tax incentives are not a matter for this Administration; they are a reserved matter for London. Therefore, I do not hold discussions with Ms Harney about tax incentives. I am not in a position to deal with them. However, we co-operate in other areas, and we have been working closely together, as have Invest Northern Ireland and IDA Ireland, particularly in the north-west, where an initiative is under way.

Offshore Wind Farm

8. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what assessment he has made regarding the local government consultation by the B9 Company about the proposed offshore wind farm.

(AQO 180/02)

Sir Reg Empey: It is premature to make any assessment, because the private consortium responsible for the current proposals has only recently initiated comprehensive studies and consultations. It has distributed detailed information on a wide range of environmental and other studies, entered into discussions with local government, and made presentations on its proposals at four north-west council meetings and to the North West Region Cross Border Group.

Mr Campbell: The B9 Energy Group has spoken to several councils about the consultation process. Given the responses it has received, and the concerns that the residents of the north coast have voiced about the outcome of that process, can the Minister confirm that those concerns will be taken on board when the consultation process ends and if there are alternative sites that he will consider?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, can you limit your response to about 30 seconds?

Sir Reg Empey: The question of sites is for the Crown Estate to determine — it owns the seabed. The Department's role is to license the generation of electricity; it does not deal with the site. The site in question is the only suitable one around the shores of Northern Ireland. The consultation must be comprehensive, and the Department will determine whether the site is appropriate and adequate, but it is too early to decide that yet.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, you dealt with that subject with perfect timing.

3.00 pm

EMPLOYMENT AND LEARNING

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 1, 12 and 14, standing in the names of Mr A Maginness, Mrs Carson and Ms Gildernew have been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Questions 2, 4, 6 and 13, standing in the names of Mr Hilditch, Mr Fee, Mr Hamilton and Mr Dalton, respectively have also been withdrawn but will not receive a written answer.

Review of Further Education

3. Mr Close asked the Minister for Employment and Learning when she proposes to introduce education maintenance allowances for 16-to-19-year olds.

(AQO 189/02)

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna): Officials are examining the evaluation reports of the pilot schemes, which have been running in England and Scotland. In conjunction with the Minister of Education, I will consider the options which best suit Northern Ireland and bring forward joint proposals to the Executive in due course.

Mr Close: I am disappointed in the Minister's reply. Those I represent, most of the 16- to-19-year olds and their parents and I would have appreciated a more definitive answer. If the scheme is to be introduced from September 2004 in England, that will be unfair to our 16- to-19-year olds as they will be disadvantaged. Will the Minister give a more precise date, bearing in mind that the draft Budget which passed through the House last week allocated to her budget a 6.2% increase, which amounts to £40 million or £50 million?

Ms Hanna: I am open to considering any scheme that will widen access, and I will do my best to ensure that financial constraint is not a barrier to further education. The Member stated that it will be at least September 2004 before the scheme is introduced in England, and if it is suitable, I hope that we will introduce it here.

Mr Byrne: Does the Minister accept that the education maintenance allowances, which allow 16- to-19-year olds to continue at school rather than seek employment, are important for some families? If education maintenance allowances are to be introduced here, can the Minister say when?

Ms Hanna: If it is decided to introduce education maintenance allowances, and I am open to any suggestions that will widen access and ensure that finance is not a barrier, it would not be before the academic year beginning September 2004. I appreciate that that weekly allowance will be a considerable help to 16-to-19-year olds from low-income families. My Department and I will give careful consideration to the thresholds and eligibility conditions.

Mr Hamilton: Can the Minister confirm that the educational maintenance allowance was a factor in the failed business plan of the West Belfast Springvale campus?

Will the Minister explain how she proposes to deal with the uncertainty that many will experience as a result of her sudden decision to pull the plug on this major initiative?

Ms Hanna: I am very disappointed by this setback; I am totally committed to the Springvale project. However, the two main promoters of the project — the University of Ulster and the Belfast Institute of Further and Higher Education — have concerns about its financial viability and sustainability. It would be foolhardy for anyone to proceed until those concerns have been addressed. I have asked the board of the Springvale project to review the situation urgently, to provide me with an update and to come back to me as soon as possible with alternative options, if necessary.

Strategy for Essential Skills

5. Mr McMenamin asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to give an update on the strategy for essential skills.

(AQO 200/02)

Ms Hanna: The Department for Employment and Learning has analysed feedback from the 'Essential Skills for Living' framework and consultation paper. A strategy and an action plan will be published by the end of September 2002. I am very pleased with the response to the consultation document. The strategy will improve greatly the lives of many people, and it will have a positive effect on society as a whole. It sets challenging targets to build capacity across providers of literacy and numeracy courses, and to engage a significant number of adults in improving their essential skills.

I am pleased that resources for the strategy were allocated in the draft Budget last week. However, the amounts are considerably lower than those allocated to similar strategies in the Republic of Ireland and in Great Britain.

Mr McMenamin: Essential skills are a key issue that needs to be addressed in projects throughout Northern Ireland, particularly given that about one in four adults in Northern Ireland have the lowest levels of literacy, which, at best, is a reading age of 11. How will the essential skills strategy be funded?

Ms Hanna: The essential skills action plan is a cornerstone of my Department's work. I certainly appreciate how vital it is that we address the awful situation in which 24% of the adult population have low literacy. As I said, although I am pleased that the draft Budget allocated resources to the essential skills strategy, the funding is less than the amount required. There is a need for significant resources to put in place a quality infrastructure in the curriculum, the assessment qualifications and tutor training, and to engage the target number of learners in the strategy in the first year of its budget. However, insufficient resources have been allocated for the second and third years to meet the needs of the large number of adults with poor literacy and numeracy skills. My Department will continue to submit bids for funding in annual Budget rounds to sustain, and, I hope, expand, that capacity.

Promotion of Entrepreneurship

7. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what discussion she had with her Executive Colleagues regarding the promotion of entrepreneurship. (AQO 205/02)

Ms Hanna: Lead responsibility for the promotion of entrepreneurship rests with my Colleague Sir Reg Empey in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I have discussed the issue with him in the context of the Economic Development Forum, and I attend the meetings that he chairs. My officials work closely with, and support, officials in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, the staff of Invest Northern Ireland, and officials in other Departments, on the development of a business birth-rate strategy. I do my best to ensure that my Executive Colleagues are aware of what the Department for Employment and Learning is doing to encourage entrepreneurship, by embedding the concept in everything that we do, including skills development, careers guidance and employment services.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for a very full answer, and particularly for her reference that was supposed to illustrate joined-up government.

However, will she undertake to set up urgently university-level courses with entrepreneurship as their base specifically to target the over 2,000 highly qualified employees laid off by high-tech firms in east Antrim to ensure that these people create new high-tech businesses and to ensure that these skills are not dispersed across the globe? Will she undertake to work closely with her Colleague, Sir Reg Empey, to ensure that an imaginative response to this serious situation is urgently forthcoming?

Ms Hanna: I certainly acknowledge the serious situation there. I am sure that the Member is aware that we work closely in that area with employers and trainers. Some work is already being done in the universities. If the Member wants to put his suggestion in writing, we will consider it.

Mr Dallat: I congratulate the Minister on her work in encouraging entrepreneurship, particularly among young people. Given that 90% of businesses in Northern Ireland are small- to medium-sized, can she give us an assurance that the priority that she has given to encouraging entrepreneurship among young people will continue in the future?

Ms Hanna: Yes, I agree that it is essential that we concentrate on that. We do not have a great culture of entrepreneurship in Northern Ireland, and we must encourage and develop it. Although I do not wish to pre-empt the outcome of Invest Northern Ireland's work in the development of the business birth strategy, I envisage my Department's playing an important role in increasing the number of new business starts as set out in the Programme for Government 2002–05. Entrepreneurship is increasingly integrated into courses in our universities and further education institutions with the aim of contributing to an enterprise culture in Northern Ireland.

Modern Apprenticeships

8. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what plans she has to increase the number of modern apprenticeship places by 2004. (AQO 204/02)

Ms Hanna: Modern apprenticeships are demand-led, work-based learning. They rely on interest from young people and the willingness of employers to employ and train them from day one. My Department is actively publicising the benefits of modern apprenticeships and raising awareness of them generally among young people, employers and employer representative bodies. I intend to set a target for 2003–04 of increasing participation in apprenticeships by 10%. The funding is there, and we want to work closely with employers. However, we are dependent on their co-operation.

Mr Beggs: The Minister said that modern apprenticeships are "demand-led". Will she be examining carefully why the money that has been allocated has not been drawn down? Is she aware of, and will she be taking into account, the target in Great Britain to raise the number of young people entering modern apprenticeships before the age of 22 to 28% by 2004? Does she accept that, like higher education, technical and craft skills are vital to our economy? Will she be giving increased measure to the development of modern apprenticeships in Northern Ireland?

Ms Hanna: I agree with everything the Member has said. We do all we can, and we will work with people to encourage the take-up of modern apprenticeships. The funding is available, but we are dependent on employers' co-operation to some extent. Working with employers is vital.

Mrs Courtney: I welcome the Minister's response. How successful is the modern apprenticeship programme in Northern Ireland in attracting young people and employers?

Ms Hanna: As I have already said, I would like it to be more successful. It is excellent. However, we rely on young people's interest, employers' willingness and probably also on good careers advice so that young people are aware of the opportunities available.

We work as closely as we can with young people and their parents, schools, further education colleges and employers.

3.15 pm

Mrs Nelis: I am pleased that the Minister intends to increase the number of modern apprenticeships. However, can she say how she plans to encourage more employers to engage in the scheme? In the Foyle constituency, which has the highest rate of youth unemployment, there has been a marked decline in the number of modern apprenticeships, especially electrical training apprenticeships. There were just 14 in 2001 and about 30 the previous year.

Ms Hanna: We have commissioned a review of the effectiveness of the arrangements for modern apprenticeships in Northern Ireland that will examine the respective performances and roles of the sector training councils, the training organisations and the employers' organisations in the delivery of the programme. That review should be completed in December 2002.

My Department is doing all it can to promote modern apprenticeships; they are excellent, and funding is available. However, it is vitally important to have the employers on board.

The Beeches, Aghalee

9. Mr Poots asked the Minister for Employment and Learning when she intends to visit the vocational learning unit at The Beeches, Aghalee. (AQO 227/02)

Ms Hanna: I intend to visit the Beeches vocational learning unit at Aghalee on Wednesday 16 October 2002, and I look forward to that visit.

Mr Poots: I thank the Minister for confirming her visit. I had written to her earlier in the year, and she said that she intended to come in the autumn. However, she needs to bring more than herself; she needs to bring some assurances about the European funding that was withdrawn. The Down Lisburn Trust is sustaining the unit, but that cannot continue indefinitely. Her Department has a role to play in providing funding for the unit.

Ms Hanna: Regrettably, I do not have the resources to continue to support projects that were not successful in their applications for EU funding. However, the Executive have agreed that £6 million will be made available from the Executive programme funds to ensure that critical services provided by projects are not lost. I have had a meeting with the Minister of Education and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, and officials from my Department are involved in a cross-departmental working group with officials from the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. We are actively looking at transition from special schools to further and higher education.

Switch from ACE to Worktrack

10. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how much funding was allocated in the switch from ACE to Worktrack; and to make a statement on any improvement in efficiency. (AQO 224/02)

Ms Hanna: ACE was closed and Worktrack introduced in the 1999-2000 financial year. In that year just over £11 million was expended on ACE and £1.6 million on Worktrack. Worktrack's allocation in the present financial year is £9.4 million. At the end of Worktrack's first full year of operation, its performance, with regard to participants taking up sustained employment, was about the same as that of ACE. However, as Worktrack is a six-month programme, while ACE lasted a year or more, there is a considerable gain in efficiency, and I am looking at ways of raising the performance levels.

Mr J Kelly: Does the Minister agree that the work done by ACE is not being reflected in Worktrack? Indeed, there may be confusion about the transition from ACE to Worktrack. The systems that people were accustomed to in ACE do not seem to be reflected in Worktrack.

Ms Hanna: Unemployment in Northern Ireland fell from the start of the 1990s, and by the end of 1997 it was below the average level for the European Union. The greater number of people finding jobs and the continuing fall in unemployment, combined with the introduction of New Deal, made it necessary to re-examine the ACE programme.

ACE was introduced during a period of relatively high unemployment. The programme provided temporary employment opportunities for the long-term unemployed in projects of community benefit for up to 12 months, and could be extended to 18 months in the case of disabled persons. However, since New Deal is now the Government's main instrument to help the unemployed to get back to work, Worktrack complements that approach by providing temporary employment opportunities of up to 26 weeks in advance of New Deal thresholds.

Dr Hendron: I appreciate the Minister's comments about the switch from ACE to Worktrack, and about the improvements in efficiency. Will the Minister assure us that areas such as west Belfast, where many hundreds of young people are unemployed, will benefit from that improvement?

Ms Hanna: Earlier this year, independent consultants evaluated the Worktrack programme and found that there was a continuing need for it. Several recommendations on improving its effectiveness were made, including the increased use of private and public sector organisations to provide a wider range of job placements. My Department is considering those recommendations. From information gathered by the task force on employability and long-term unemployment, we learned that examining the barriers to employment would help us to tailor our programmes more successfully.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 15 and 17, in the names of Mr Mick Murphy and Ms Sue Ramsey respectively, have been withdrawn.

Literacy in the Agriculture Industry

11. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what steps she has taken in partnership with the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to address the low levels of literacy among those in the agriculture industry. (AQO 210/02)

Ms Hanna: I have briefed the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and other ministerial Colleagues on the development of the essential skills strategy. My departmental officials are working closely with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to ensure that the essential skills provision is integrated into their training and development programmes.

Mr Armstrong: The Minister's answer does not go far enough. What steps is she taking to provide training for the many people who have had to leave the agriculture industry in recent years because of low income, and who have little or no qualifications, other than knowledge of the trade of farming the land, grazing livestock, and crops, which has resulted in the success of highly profitable supermarkets?

Ms Hanna: The consultation on the essential skills strategy consisted of 18 seminars, and 195 responses were received. We consulted widely, in urban and rural areas, and all the key stakeholders were represented. The international adult literacy survey, which highlighted the fact that 24% of our adult population have literacy problems, showed that workers such as machine operators, and those in repetitious jobs, were often performing with low literacy. As part of the essential skills strategy, we shall establish a steering group to explore all those barriers and to discover how the most disadvantaged and excluded adults can be reached. I shall be chairing that group, and I assure the Member that I intend to progress the strategy.

Mr Bradley: I agree with Mr Armstrong that low literacy is prevalent among those in the agriculture industry. Some young farmers are unable to obtain driving licences because of their inability to complete the written part of the driving test. However, the solution to that is not within the remit of the Minister for Employment and Learning. What assurances can the Minister give that the needs of the agriculture industry will be fully met?

Ms Hanna: As I said in my response to Mr Armstrong, the Department for Employment and Learning consulted people in the rural and urban areas on the essential skills needs of those involved in the agriculture industry. The Department was looking for the main barriers to literacy. I will do all in my power to ensure that the Department, through the essential skills action plan, targets those who need help. That is a huge challenge, but I am determined that the Department will meet it. We have set ourselves high numbers. A new curriculum has been introduced, and the Department wants to ensure that the tutors are well trained and that the teaching is esteemed. I want to ensure that the Department for Employment and Learning will meet its own challenge.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We should be moving to question 16, but Mr Alex Attwood is not in his place. I call Mr Gerry McHugh.

Achievement of NVQs

18. Mr McHugh asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to detail the achievement rate for NVQs in each of the last 3 years. (AQO 222/02)

Ms Hanna: The NVQ achievement rate in the Jobskills programme is measured on a cohort basis, namely young people who enter Jobskills between 1 April each year and the following 31 March. The NVQ achievement rates for 1998-99 were 41% at level one and 49% at level two; for 1999-2000 they were 46% at level one and 51% at level two; and for 2000-01 it was 21% at level one. There is only one figure for 2000-01 because the Department looked at the key skills together.

Mr McHugh: I thank the Minister for her answer. Those achievement levels could be improved. Does the Minister have any innovative ideas to improve the grades? Levels one and two were mentioned, but many jobs in the higher sector of industry require level three. What is the possibility of increasing rates of achievement at level three?

Ms Hanna: I do not think that that is a problem. The problem is that those at key skills levels one and two are sometimes having difficulties caused by the requirement since 1999 for trainees to attain both an NVQ and the specified key skills. Although there has been an improvement in the key skill achievement rates, it is recognised that the recent introduction of the external test in key skills has exacerbated the problem for some young people. I have asked departmental officials to consider how the difficulties presented by key skills might best be addressed and to submit proposals for dealing with young people who are not ready to undertake a full framework.

We are doing better than Great Britain, but the NVQ rate has been somewhat depressed. Some school leavers are already demotivated and are not comfortable to be back in the classroom. The Department for Employment and Learning wants to get the balance between the essential key skills — which are set by employers — and the NVQ level.

Task Force on Employability and Long-Term Unemployment

19. Mrs Courtney asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to give an update on the progress of the task force on employability and long-term unemployment. (AQO 201/02)

Ms Hanna: The draft report is with the Committee for Employment and Learning for consideration before submission to the Executive for approval and subsequent publication. I am looking forward to feedback from the Committee and to taking the draft report to my Executive Colleagues and on to publication.

3.30 pm

Mrs Courtney: How will the Minister ensure that the work of the task force continues once its action plan has been produced?

Ms Hanna: The report signals the beginning of an interdepartmental approach to addressing those vital issues, and the task force recognises that more needs to be done. It is committed to ensuring that the recommendations contained in the action plan are taken forward.

Additionally, as Minister, I will lead the implementation of the employability task force action plan. I will seek support for the action plan from the Northern Ireland Executive, the Assembly, the employer representative bodies, the trade union movement, education and training providers, and, not least, the community and voluntary sector. An interdepartmental implementation group, which will report to me, will ensure that those parties take responsibility for delivering on their commitments in the action plan. Progress towards action plan targets will be further monitored through the publication of New TSN action plans. Those will reflect individual Departments' commitments to the employability task force action plan. The implementation group will also put in place a local consultative process in each targeted area.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up.

SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform Members that questions 4 and 8, standing in the names of Mrs Carson and Ms Ramsey, have been withdrawn and will receive a written answer. Questions 5 and 12, standing in the names of Mr Malloy, Mr Fee and Mr Hilditch, have been withdrawn and will not require a written answer.

Dromore: Urban Regeneration

1. Mr Poots asked the Minister for Social Development what assistance he can give to the urban regeneration of Dromore. (AQO 220/02)

The Minister for Social Development (Mr Dodds): My Department has prepared a strategy for town centre reinvigoration, which forms part of our new strategy for neighbourhood renewal in Northern Ireland. The town centre element has been drawn up after widespread consultation, including comments from district councils and other Government Departments. It will highlight a range of policies and incentives, which together will create the best climate within which regeneration of town centres can be accomplished. The Department for Social Development will offer advice on best practice for reinvigorating town centres and will continue to use existing policy instruments, such as environmental improvement and comprehensive development schemes, as appropriate.

Finally, and importantly, our policy will highlight the need for a unified approach by Government to ensure that all our policies complement each other with regard to promoting town centre reinvigoration. With that aim in mind, this morning I met Mr Nesbitt, the Minister of the Environment, to discuss how we could act jointly to promote regeneration in Dromore.

The Department for Social Development, which takes the lead on regeneration matters, will provide advice and general assistance to Banbridge District Council and to the local established groups in Dromore. The Department will also continue to work with the International Fund for Ireland, as agent for the urban development programme, and with the heritage lottery fund, which has appointed a project officer to run the townscape scheme in Dromore. Those practical measures will go a long way towards ensuring that Dromore is given the best opportunity to develop a town centre of which it can be truly proud.

Mr Poots: Does the Minister's Department recognise the scale of dereliction in Dromore? Will the Minister visit the town to see the dereliction? Can his Department provide financial assistance to the Dromore area, in conjunction with the International Fund for Ireland and the heritage lottery fund, to ensure that the schemes that are being processed by the Dromore regeneration group come to fruition?

Mr Dodds: I am happy to visit Dromore in my official capacity as Minister. My officials are well aware of the extent of the problems there and of the need to work with the local community, the local council and other interested groups to regenerate the town centre.

It is essential to have a proper plan from which to work. It will be difficult to commit a figure for funding until such a plan is in place. However, when it is formulated, potential sources of funding will be approached, and I shall decide what funding can be made available from the Department's budget.

As a result of this morning's meeting, I expect that a senior official will meet a representative of the local council. It is essential that the Department speak to the various interest groups in Dromore to develop a co-ordinated approach, so that the opportunities that will exist when the new town centre reinvigoration policy is published can be grasped.

Mr Watson: Will the Minister update the House on the measure for town centre regeneration under Peace II?

Mr Dodds: Further to my Department undertaking a review of town centre regeneration and reinvigoration policy as part of the neighbourhood renewal strategy, it has also been examining the possibilities of funding town centre regeneration under Peace II. That measure has specific qualification criteria, and the majority of local councils across Northern Ireland have bid for assistance. As only £1.75 million is available, I anticipate that approximately only one third of the applicants will be successful. I hope to be able to announce the successful bids soon.

Deprived Communities

2. Mr McElduff asked the Minister for Social Development what action he has taken, in the past 3 months, to assist socially deprived communities, address the legacy of conflict and encourage reconciliation. (AQO 184/02)

Mr Dodds: I have recently announced several programmes and measures that are aimed specifically at assisting the most socially deprived communities in Northern Ireland. For example, in July, my Department announced a £12 million European Union Peace II funding package, which will benefit 12 communities in Northern Ireland that suffer high levels of multiple deprivation and the worst effects of recent troubles.

That funding is in addition to the £11 million URBAN II funding package for inner north Belfast that was announced earlier this year. Moreover, under the auspices of the North Belfast Community Action Project, my Department has been contributing to developing a plan of short-, medium- and long-term actions to address social and community issues there, particularly actions that are aimed at building and strengthening community capacity. Specific housing strategies are being developed to provide decent homes for those living in the worst areas of conflict. Furthermore, £1.5 million was allocated recently to projects in the most deprived areas of Londonderry, two of which aim to address the legacy of conflict and encourage reconciliation.

Mr McElduff: Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister meet representatives of the voluntary and community sector in Omagh, the county town of Tyrone? Will he listen to the experiences of groups, such as Focus (Forum in Omagh Community Understanding and Support) and Omagh Community Support Forum — amalgams of town-based and rural community groups — and the Omagh Women's Area Network, about funding difficulties and discuss measures aimed at building their capacity?

Mr Dodds: I am aware of the contribution that the voluntary and community sector makes in delivering vital services to some of the most socially and economically deprived communities in Northern Ireland.

I recently met representatives of the Community Foundation for Northern Ireland — formerly the Northern Ireland Voluntary Trust — and I have met the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action and other community organisations that provide advice and assistance throughout Northern Ireland. I am always happy to talk to representatives of the community sector.

One of the messages that people from Omagh would undoubtedly bring to a meeting would be similar to the message that such groups could bring from other parts of the Province — namely, that the community and voluntary sector is currently under some pressure. However, we are working as hard as possible to try to alleviate that through long-term strategies and also by making a bid for Executive programme funds to secure extra funding for the sector. We will continue to work on that, and I shall be very happy to meet community and voluntary sector representatives from Omagh or elsewhere.

Mr McMenamin: Does the Minister agree that the most efficient weapon to deal with conflict is the existence of democratic institutions? Does he agree that those who wish to pull them down are the best friends of paramilitaries who want anything but reconciliation?

Mr Dodds: Mr Deputy Speaker, the Member's question goes somewhat beyond the subject before us. However, with your permission, I will nevertheless be very happy to answer it. Before I come to the more political aspects, I would like to put on record in the Assembly that, in the coming months, as well as the measures which I outlined previously, I expect to publish a new urban regeneration strategy for Northern Ireland generally, which will provide a new framework for targeting resources at neighbourhoods suffering high levels of deprivation and social exclusion. I expect to announce shortly the Peace II funding package that I referred to earlier. We have also secured funding for a new community outreach programme. Those are practical measures which demonstrate our commitment to helping those who are most socially deprived in Northern Ireland.

As for the Member's rather silly comments, he would be better spending his time concentrating on those sorts of issues and trying to develop truly democratic institutions in Northern Ireland. If he believes for one minute that what is unacceptable in the Irish Republic — where the Government and the leading parties have said that they are not prepared to have representatives of an armed terrorist group in government — should be forced on us here, he should talk to some more of his friends down South and see what the difference is.

Mr Shannon: The Minister has confirmed the contribution of voluntary and community groups in socially deprived communities, not only in west Tyrone but all over the Province. What moneys are available for such voluntary and community groups to assist the point of view which the Minister has put forward?

Mr Dodds: My Department utilises various funding programmes to support the regional and local community infrastructure in Northern Ireland. There is support for regional voluntary and community bodies such as the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action, the Northern Ireland Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and the Association of Independent Advice Centres.

There is also, of course, the district councils' community support programme, of which, as a local councillor, the Member will be aware. That in turn funds local voluntary and community groups, advice centres and resource centres. We have increased funding to that programme to allow local councils to make the decisions on where the resources should go. I believe in local democracy, and that is what local democracy really means — letting people have the decision on where such funding should go.

We also have programmes in place to support active citizenship and volunteering. The active community initiative was launched by the Prime Minister in January 1999, and its aim is to help rebuild a sense of community throughout the United Kingdom by encouraging and supporting all forms of community involvement. We also have EU measures under the programme for building sustainable prosperity. In addition, my Department has secured funding of £3 million for a new outreach programme which has been developed in conjunction with other Departments; eligible activities will include one-stop shops for advice on such issues as funding, exchanges and secondments. Priority will be given to those areas of highest social and economic need.

Warm Homes Scheme

6. Mr Armstrong asked the Minister for Social Development to give an update on the uptake of the warm homes scheme. (AQO 211/02)

3.45 pm

Mr Dodds: The warm homes scheme is demand-led. Since it began in July 2001, more than 12,000 referrals from eligible applicants across Northern Ireland have been processed, and more than 8,300 clients have received energy efficiency or heating measures. To date, spending on the warm homes scheme exceeds £9.6 million, and we are on course to assist 6,250 households this year.

Mr Armstrong: Does the Minister agree that more than 170,000 households are classed as living with fuel poverty, and that the warm homes scheme, although a positive initiative, will not go far enough to eradicate fuel poverty?

Mr Dodds: I agree that the warm homes scheme, on its own, will not eradicate fuel poverty. However, it is a major leap forward from where we were two or three years ago, and I am sure the Member will agree with that.

Since it began operation on 2 July 2001, over 6,500 insulations have been fitted, over 1,700 heating systems have been installed, and £9.5 million has been spent. The allocation of funds for this year is £7.98 million, and that will be supported by a contribution from the NIE customer levy. Therefore, much is being done on that front, which is very welcome. The Member will know, as I do from dealing with constituents, the valuable and important improvement it makes to people's lives.

The recent study in Beechmount, which was one of the pilot areas selected by my Department, the Housing Executive and others, showed that people are saving an average of £10 a week as a result of those measures. If we were to eradicate fuel poverty in Northern Ireland, it would save the Health Service £30 million a year — and that is year on year. We talk about dealing with the crux of the problems; that shows the importance of putting money into that scheme, as it will solve a range of problems.

We are also funding an extensive programme of heating upgrades by the Housing Executive and registered housing associations. Through the social security system, a winter fuel payment of £200 a year is made available to pensioners, and a cold weather payment is also available in severe conditions. Housing unfitness, which is a major contributory factor, is being tackled through a regime of grants. We are dealing with that in the Housing Bill by introducing a more flexible regime and targeting the areas most in need, particularly rural areas where there is much unfit housing in the private sector.

I agree that fuel poverty is a multifaceted problem. It requires a cross-departmental approach, and that is why I intend to issue a fuel poverty strategy for consultation by the end of the year.

Mrs Courtney: The Minister has pre-empted my question. During the Committee for Social Development's energy inquiry, we discussed fuel poverty, and I understand that the Minister's Department is setting up a fuel poverty task force. I wanted to ask when that would begin, and when the result is likely to come out.

Mr Dodds: I know of the Member's interest in that area. As I have said, we intend to issue the fuel poverty strategy for consultation by the end of the year. I mentioned the benefits of dealing with the issue comprehensively, and the tremendous benefits that accrue for householders lifted out of fuel poverty and for the general budget, due to the knock-on effects in health, education and other areas. I intend to move on that as speedily as possible.

I will ensure that there is proper consultation with everyone who is interested, not least the Members and Committees, who have a relevant input in the Assembly. I will continue to press the Eaga Partnership in delivering that on the ground, although they have done an impressive job. We will continue to closely monitor where the uptake is coming from. As it is demand-led, there is a need to ensure that those areas that may not be making full use of the scheme make as much use of it as they can. That must be done through publicity and highlighting the benefits of the scheme. Given the benefits that I have outlined, it is important that we continue to make progress, and the strategy to which the Member referred to is an important aspect of that.

Mr Morrow: Does the Department have any further plans to enhance public awareness of the warm homes scheme? The scheme has been greatly appreciated across the Province. However, not everyone is aware of it.

Mr Dodds: The demand-led nature of the scheme means that there will be variations in uptake from one area to the next. As I have said, the Eaga Partnership has developed an effective promotional campaign, which involves general local media advertising and the use of mailshots in co-operation with the Housing Executive and the Rate Collection Agency.

It also involves the employment of a network liaison manager to develop referral mechanisms, which includes the constituency offices of Assembly Members. I am aware that Members from all sides come across the problem when dealing with constituents on a daily basis. It is important that they have a point of reference through which to channel enquiries and get them dealt with as quickly as possible.

Those mechanisms are in place. However, Eaga and the Department continue to monitor the situation closely so that marketing activities are targeted at areas where people are in need. By and large, the uptake across the Province is good. Some areas could certainly benefit from greater uptake; others are above average. However, every part of the Province is benefiting.

Housing Associations

7. Mr J Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development to detail, for each of the last 4 years, the grant aid awarded to housing associations for the provision of social housing. (AQO 218/02)

Mr Dodds: Housing association grants paid to registered housing associations for the provision of new-build social housing over the past four years were £55.9 million in 1998-99; £58.2 million in 1999-2000; £54.8 million in 2000-01 and £54.8 million in 2001-02.

In addition, housing associations attracted private finance of £25.1 million in 1998-99; £35.5 million in 1999-2000; £30 million in 2000-01, and £30 million in 2001-02 into the programme. Had that private finance — around £121 million — not been available, then the equivalent of around 1,800 new houses would not have been provided at no cost to the public purse.

Mr J Kelly: Notwithstanding the pivotal role that housing associations play in providing social housing, does the Minister agree that the massive increase of around 58% in the building costs of housing associations needs to be examined? Is there a connection between that and the amount of private finance initiative money that they are getting?

Mr Dodds: The general cost of public housing has been measured against the comparative rise in England. Figures were taken from a needs and effectiveness evaluation that was leaked and misinterpreted by members of the press and some Members of the House. There has, indeed, been misplaced and misguided comment on those figures.

Comparisons with the cost of providing new social housing in England are misleading for several reasons. Land costs, especially around Belfast, have risen sharply in recent years. Northern Ireland's social housing is built to higher standards and lower density.

Of course, my Department is always acutely aware of the need to deliver value for money. It has commissioned detailed research into several issues that have arisen from the evaluation — including the reason why house prices have risen so dramatically — so as to ensure that it gets the best possible value for investment in the housing programmes, as it has done in the past. The review of needs and effectiveness on housing concluded that public spending on housing in Northern Ireland has generally been effective in meeting its objectives and has delivered acceptable value for money. The suggestion that the housing budget is somehow overfunded is completely spurious. I am glad that many people in the Province share that view.

Dr Hendron: The Minister and his Department have spent substantial sums of money on social housing. However, in areas such as Greater West Belfast, hundreds of people have been waiting for meaningful consideration of housing, many since March 2000. Has the Minister any plans to increase funding for housing in west Belfast?

Mr Dodds: I can only operate within the budget available to me. Dr Hendron and other Members will have a critical role in that when voting on the Budget in the coming months. I have made pleas before, in the House, outside the House and elsewhere, for increased funding for housing.

With more funding, more houses can be built, not only in west Belfast, but in other areas of housing need. That is why I was so alarmed — indeed, annoyed — at the misreporting and nonsense in the papers recently about the needs and effectiveness evaluation. It made no sense at all. It is simply nonsense to suggest that we are somehow overspending because more has been spent in Northern Ireland than in England on maintenance and housing, especially when billions of pounds are now being invested in England to catch up on the investment that we have made over the years — a tacit admission that we got it right all along.

We must accept that, just as I said in answer to Mr Armstrong that warm homes can have effects on the health budget and educational standards, decent, fit and quality housing can have a wide range of knock-on effects for people's educational status, health, environmental improvement and so on. It is essential that extra resources be put into housing generally — in west Belfast and other areas of the Province. I will commit myself to doing everything that I possibly can to do that, and I look for the support of Members on that issue.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Has the Minister any evidence, anecdotal or otherwise, to suggest that one reason why building costs are so high in Northern Ireland is the awful extortion, by members of the Provisional IRA and other paramilitaries, from companies that are trying to provide the social housing that he mentioned?

Mr Dodds: Rising land costs are an issue, especially around Belfast. In other areas of the Province, the scarcity of land at the right price has a knock-on effect on the ability of housing associations to acquire land for new social housing. We compete for that land with the private sector and others. Anything that contributes to higher costs is an additional problem, be it extortion demands by paramilitary groups or whatever.

Our ability to deal with homelessness, longer waiting lists, severe housing need and severe social and economic deprivation is hampered, hindered and set back when, for instance, funding that should be used to tackle those issues must be diverted into buying homes under the special purchase of evacuated dwellings scheme to transfer people threatened out of their homes by paramilitary groups. We are now looking at an underspend of well over £15 million in this year's budget as a direct result of the Castlereagh break-in, and we know where the responsibility for that lies.

Benefits Payment Arrangements

9. Mr M Robinson asked the Minister for Social Development what steps are being taken to ensure that claimants who do not wish to open a bank/building society account in order to receive pension and benefit payments, will, after April 2003, retain the option of receiving such payments directly from a Post Office.

(AQO 182/02)

Mr Dodds: Payment by credit transfer is being introduced to modernise the way benefits are paid, to reduce social and financial exclusion by giving access to basic bank accounts, and to reduce the fraud and abuse associated with the current paper methods of payment.

Negotiations are proceeding between the banks and the Post Office to ensure that people who open basic bank accounts will be able to access those through the Post Office. Thus it is my clear policy that people in Northern Ireland will be able to continue to collect their benefits at post offices.

4.00 pm

(Madam Deputy Speaker [Ms Morrice] in the Chair)

Mr M Robinson: Will the Minister give an assurance that any switchover will not be compulsory?

Mr Dodds: I assure the Member that people can collect their benefits in cash from the Post Office if they so wish. The purpose of the reforms is to tackle social and financial exclusion and to reduce fraud and abuse. Clearly, provision must be made for those who cannot or do not wish to avail of that system. There is no question of people being forced to use it, and people will still be able to receive their money weekly. They will not have to make different financial arrangements for their own accounting purposes.

Mr Bradley: Has the Minister had discussions with Consignia, or has he plans to meet the company regarding the retention of services in rural areas to ensure that residents in those areas continue to have a service equal to that available to urban residents?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Time is up.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn.— [Madam Deputy Speaker.]

NURSERY PROVISION AT MOORFIELDS PRIMARY SCHOOL

Mr Paisley Jnr: During the summer, I received correspondence from the board of governors of Moorfields Primary School outlining the battle in which the school has been engaged with the North Eastern Education and Library Board. That battle concerns the provision of a nursery unit in that locality and has been ongoing for several years. It began as a result of the complete absence of statutory and voluntary provision for children of nursery age in that area.

Glenwherry is a large rural ward outside Ballymena. Its vastness is one of the reasons that dedicated nursery provision is required at Moorfields Primary School. Members who are unfamiliar with the area may find the following statistics helpful. Moorfields Primary School is more than five miles from nursery provision in Ballymena and 10 miles from provision in Ballyclare, and both facilities are oversubscribed. Provision in Larne is 13 miles away. Assuming space were available at any of those locations, the distances involved make it unlikely that parents would seriously consider provision offered there. Imagine the frustration felt by the school and the residents at being denied nursery provision despite the obvious need in the area, when smaller areas and the maintained and integrated sector are catered for and receive preference in funding and provision. At best, that is discrimination; at worst, it is a sectarian policy that deprives parents and children of their rights.

The outworking of Government policy has discriminated against children in that area and deprived them of the opportunity to avail of nursery education, which the Government claim should be available to every child.

Furthermore, it makes a nonsense of this Government's intention to target social need. Women and children from rural areas are being disadvantaged by the outworking of that policy. A policy that does not target those in real need is not a policy at all. Immediate action must be taken to address that obvious need. The Government's pledge that there will be a place for every child rings hollow at Moorfields Primary School. Immediate action is required.

The facts make for stark reading. Despite the greater number of pupils and new places in the controlled sector of the North Eastern Education and Library Board over the past four years, most Pre-school Education Advisory Group (PEAG) programme places have gone to the maintained and integrated sectors. In real terms, that is 598 places as opposed to 520. That has an obvious funding implication and can affect the future of primary provision in certain areas. Departmental statistics alone prove that no part of Glenwherry's need is met. The calculations used by the board are in error, so the Department should open afresh the allocation procedure.

Let me explain. The board estimates the shortfall at Glenwherry to be 40 places. That number results from subtracting the total pre-school provision — 44 places — from the number of P1 children, which is 84. Accordingly, it is assumed that existing provision, to some extent, meets local need. The fallacy of that approach is revealed by an analysis of the two wards served by the pre-school providers, the Country Playgroup and the Tiny Tots Community Playgroup. It emerges that Glenwherry is served by neither of those two excellent providers. Glenwherry, therefore, is not catered for and should be near the top of the list of areas requiring assistance. However, it is fifth on the list and unlikely to receive assistance.

The plain truth is that the North Eastern Education and Library Board (NEELB) and the Department of Education make no provision for pre-school children from the Moorfields area. When will that provision be made? In November 2000, Gordon Topping, the chief executive of the board wrote to the board of governors of Moorfields Primary School admitting that there is

“a shortfall in pre-school provision in the Glenwherry area and that this will be addressed as and when additional resources become available.”

It is now 2002, and no identified resources have come to Moorfields to address its obvious need.

Will the Minister put his money where the board's mouth is? A unit at Moorfields Primary School is urgently required and will go some way towards meeting local need. My questions demand serious answers, and I hope that the Minister can provide them. What resources will be allocated to Moorfields in the current financial year for a nursery unit? Secondly, what is the total provision in respect of money and the number of places for pre-school children in the Glenwherry ward? Thirdly, with no provision in the Glenwherry ward, how does the Department of Education intend to meet the Government's promise of a place for every child whose parents want it? Fourthly, does the Minister accept that there are flaws in the PEAG process report, given how provision has been calculated for Moorfields? Fifthly, will the Minister amend the PEAG programme to accommodate need at Moorfields?

The need at Moorfields is real and will affect the opportunities that its children will have in later life. The sooner they are in nursery school, the better rewarded they will be. Depriving them of that opportunity deprives a massive rural hinterland of rights which can be expected in other parts of Northern Ireland. Depriving those children, rather than those in the minority whose parents choose other sectors, is woefully wrong. The Minister should provide the necessary funds for Moorfields to enable it to keep up with the opportunities offered to children elsewhere.

The Rev Dr Ian Paisley: I support the subject of this Adjournment debate. The Member who has brought this matter to the attention of the House has made it known that a parent in the Moorfields area who asks for accommodation for children in a nursery school is told to go to Ballymena, three or four miles away. In Ballymena every place has been taken, and the parent is told to go to Ballyclare, 10 miles away. Again, in Ballyclare, every place has been taken. The nearest place in which there is a likelihood, and only a likelihood, of a child's receiving nursery care is 13 miles away in Larne. There must be something frightfully wrong if children in the Moorfields Primary School catchment area are discriminated against and cannot participate in that which was promised to them by the Executive.

It is discrimination because, if money is not given, nursery places cannot be provided. Money must be given. Although other education sectors receive funding, this sector does not receive enough funding to supply adequate nursery places and fulfil the promise that was made. It is surely the duty of the Minister to ensure that that matter is rectified.

Anyone who knows the religious breakdown of the population of the Glenwherry area knows that it is largely Protestant. Why are children from that large Protestant population not given the opportunity that is afforded to other children of another faith who are provided for by a different system of education? Of course, all children are legally entitled to provision under the scheme. However, the Protestant people there are not getting their entitlement, and, because it is such a vital issue, it is only right that the House is informed and the Minister pressed on the matter.

Members know how difficult it is to rear families in Northern Ireland, which is largely due to unemployment. Sometimes it is mothers who are employed and earn the money necessary to keep the home. However, a mother can do that only if nursery provision is available for her children. It is wrong to expect a mother to travel 52 miles a day — 13 miles from Glenwherry to Larne to leave her child at a nursery school and then back again to work and the same again to collect her child when she has finished her work — to avail of the nursery place to which her child is legally entitled. That must be remedied immediately, which means that money must be made available and planning started straight away.

I am speaking on behalf of those children who deserve, are entitled to, and ought to have nursery provision, and the House is where such matters should be raised. The Department of Education must ensure that it fulfils its promises and meets its legal requirements. Therefore I urge it to consider the situation carefully to ensure that the discrimination ceases and the matter is remedied so that there is equal opportunity for all children, no matter what faith they may be of or to which school system their parents want to send them.

Mr Kennedy: I am glad to have the opportunity to speak on such an important subject, and I congratulate Ian Paisley Jnr for raising this at the Adjournment. I apologise for the absence of my Colleague, Rev Robert Coulter, who is on important Assembly business elsewhere. He has made representations to me, as Chairperson of the Committee for Education, on this important matter. It might be useful to Mr Paisley Jnr and other Members to know that I have written to the chief executive of the North Eastern Education and Library Board expressing concern and asking for details of the situation at Moorfields Primary School. When a reply is made, I shall copy it to interested Members. I do not want to spend a great deal of time outlining the case; obviously local Members are in a much better position to do that. However, the matter has been raised with the Committee for Education, and it will pursue the issues involved. It is to be hoped that the Committee can come to a more satisfactory conclusion than that which pertains at the moment.

4.15 pm

The Minister of Education (Mr M McGuinness):

The Department of Education is responsible for the implementation of the pre-school education expansion programme, which has been one of the most significant educational developments here in recent years. It has been planned at local level by each education and library board's pre-school education advisory group, or PEAGs, as they are known. I am grateful to these groups for their expertise and extensive local knowledge, and for the vital role that they play in implementing the programme. I wish to pay tribute to them for their hard work.

Throughout the programme, the PEAGs have been responsible for identifying those areas that have a shortfall in funded pre-school provision and for determining whether that shortfall should be addressed by creating new places in the statutory or voluntary sectors. I emphasise that the resources that are available under the programme allowed only for a specific level of capital investment, and the PEAGs carefully assessed areas for which capital resources should be used.

That assessment took into account factors such as the existence of providers in the voluntary and private sectors, as well as future viability. The expansion programme is an integral part of the Department of Education's new targeting social need action plan, so levels of social disadvantage were also taken into account.

I mentioned the voluntary and private sectors to emphasise that provision of the programme is not confined to the statutory sector; indeed, the programme has established a partnership between the two. The Education and Training Inspectorate's report 'Begin with Quality', which I launched 10 days ago, reported favourably on the quality of the non-statutory centres. The North Eastern Education and Library Board's PEAG decided that, taking all relevant factors into consideration, and within the capital funding that was available to it, the provision of a nursery unit at Moorfields Primary School was not a priority. Therefore it was not included in the PEAG's development plans.

Additional funded pre-school provision in the Glenwherry and Kells ward cluster was created instead, by the allocation of 60 funded places for two playgroups in the area. Inspections by the Education and Training Inspectorate have shown that parents with children in those playgroups are being provided with high-quality places.

I am aware that there has been correspondence between the North Eastern Board's PEAG and the school about the establishment of a nursery unit. My Department has asked that PEAG to consider the need for a statutory nursery unit at the school and to give its view of the matter.

I do not accept for one minute that the controlled sector has been inequitably treated by the PEAG or by the board. I refute any allegations of discrimination by the PEAG or the board against any section of our community. The maintained and integrated sectors have, historically, had less nursery provision than the controlled sector. However, all sectors have benefited from the creation of new provision under the expansion programme. The PEAG continues to deal with the matters that the school raised, and the North Eastern Education and Library Board and my Department will receive their advice in due course.

The expansion programme has been successful, and I anticipate that provision will rise to approximately 95% during the school year. That is over the estimated provision of approximately 90%. Therefore I am confident that the target of a place for every child whose parents wish it will be met.

We must also recognise that local issues remain in any large-scale programme. Those will usually have local causes and will need local solutions. The PEAGs and my Department will continue to work together to find those solutions.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Tuesday 1 October 2002

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr J Wilson] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

AUDIT AND ACCOUNTABILITY BILL

Second Stage

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Audit and Accountability Bill (NIA 6/02) be agreed.

Last week, I introduced to the Assembly my draft Budget, which outlined how the Executive intend to spend almost £7 billion of taxpayers' money. It is a fundamental principle of public life that the Executive are accountable to the Assembly and the people of Northern Ireland for the way in which that money is spent.

The Audit and Accountability Bill deals with the mechanics of public audit. It is a technical Bill, but it is important, as public audit is a key link in the chain of accountability that gives the public confidence that their money is properly spent.

The Bill relates to public audit structures and powers and has two main components. First, it reorganises the structure of public audit in Northern Ireland. Secondly, it is a central component in our implementation of the recommendations of Lord Sharman's report, 'Holding to Account: The Review of Audit and Accountability for Central Government', following public consultation in Northern Ireland.

I remind Members of the Bill's context. The restructuring of public audit was originally included in the legislative programme for the previous session, as the audit reorganisation Bill. In that session, wider debate took place about public audit during the passage of the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001. The Sharman Report was also published at that time. Accordingly, my predecessor Mark Durkan undertook to withdraw the audit reorganisation Bill and to reintroduce it as the Audit and Accountability Bill, a vehicle to implement aspects of the reforms recommended in the Sharman Report. I shall outline the proposals in the Bill to restructure public audit.

The Comptroller and Auditor General is responsible for most public audits in Northern Ireland. The main exceptions are local government and the Health Service. Health Service audits are carried out by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. In order to enhance the key principle of the independence of public audit, my Executive Colleagues and I intend that the Comptroller and Auditor General should assume responsibility for the statutory audit of Health Service bodies. The Department of Health staff who audit the Health Service will transfer to the employment of the Northern Ireland Audit Office.

Local government audits are different, as district councils are directly elected and local government is primarily funded by the rates, not by central Government. Independent auditing is still a fundamental requirement, but constitutional propriety means that local government should not be the responsibility of the Comptroller and Auditor General, who is an officer of the Assembly. It is, therefore, more appropriate that the responsibility for the audit function should remain with the Department of the Environment. However, for employment purposes, local government auditors should avail themselves of the enhanced career development and training prospects open to them as a result of their being part of a bigger organisation — the Northern Ireland Audit Office. We intend that those staff will be employed by the Northern Ireland Audit Office but will continue to be appointed to local government audits by the Department of the Environment.

It has been a matter of concern, especially to the Public Accounts Committee, that, in the course of his audits, the Comptroller and Auditor General should be able to follow public money to ensure that it is being spent as intended and in a proper manner. That means that he must have proper access to documents. The Sharman review emphasised that the Comptroller and Auditor General should have the full range of powers necessary to do his job properly.

In carrying out statutory audits and value-for-money studies, the Comptroller and Auditor General needs the power to obtain relevant documents. Those are normally available from the public body that he is investigating, but occasionally he will require access to third parties who may hold information that he needs. We could give the Comptroller and Auditor General that power if my Department were to make an Order. However, the principle of independence comes into play again. It is important that the Comptroller and Auditor General's powers should not appear to be dependent on the very Executive that he is auditing, and that is why we have chosen to include access rights in the legislation.

At present, the Comptroller and Auditor General often obtains information from third parties voluntarily.

The Bill will mean that people and bodies that have a financial relationship with Government will be required to provide access to information relevant to that relationship. The Bill, therefore, goes further than both the Sharman review and the UK Government's response to it. It requires not merely grant recipients and contractors, but also those benefiting from other kinds of financial assistance, including loans and guarantees, to provide relevant documents to the Comptroller and Auditor General. The Bill, therefore, ensures that he has the necessary powers to do his job.

The Bill also ensures that those powers do not impose too great a burden on those who hold relevant documents. It takes account of the Human Rights Act 1998 and the European Convention on Human Rights. In particular, the Comptroller and Auditor General will be aware of the rights of third parties, under article 8(2) of the Convention, not to have the state interfere unreasonably in their private lives and correspondence. The Bill provides a legal framework to cover that and states that the Comptroller and Auditor General can use the power only where it is necessary and reasonable for him to do so. He will also draw up a more detailed code of practice to explain to those likely to be affected how he will use the powers.

There are some situations in which it simply would not be reasonable to expect people to provide information. The most important of those is where a person is in receipt of a social security benefit or a similar grant for their maintenance.

It is reasonable to expect someone who received a grant to insulate a house, for example, to be able to provide receipts and papers. That is what he got the money for. However, it is unreasonable to expect someone on benefits to be able to produce receipts for every item of groceries or clothing he buys, so people on benefits will be excluded from the legislation.

Bodies under the remit of the Comptroller and Auditor General at Westminster will also be excluded as a matter of technical jurisdictional courtesy. If the Comptroller and Auditor General requires information held by such bodies, he may obtain it on consultation with his Westminster counterpart.

The Bill then deals with the extension of the number of bodies that will be subject to public audit. The Sharman review recommended that the Comptroller and Auditor General should be the auditor of all major non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs). That is a sound principle of public accountability, and the Executive intend that, where he is not already auditor of such a body, steps should be taken to appoint the Comptroller and Auditor General as its statutory auditor. The Bill is one necessary step to ensure that that happens.

However, legislation is only necessary for some NDPBs. The Comptroller and Auditor General is already statutory auditor of many executive NDPBs. Other NDPBs are not founded in statute, so statutory amendment is not required to change their audit regimes. To fulfil the Executive's policy, statutory amendment is only part of the picture. Accordingly, the Bill lists those major NDPBs that have a foundation in statute for which the Comptroller and Auditor General is not already the appointed auditor, and for which legislative action is necessary.

It is also important to recognise that some NDPBs are advisory in nature or are small and do not have enough funds to make it desirable that we apply the full rigours of a statutory audit regime. Others are limited companies, set up under companies legislation. European Directives govern those who can audit limited companies, and that does not include the Comptroller and Auditor General. Officials in the Department of Trade and Industry in London, in conjunction with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment here, are considering the best way forward on that difficult issue.

The Bill's final measure again reinforces the important principle of independence. To ensure that the Executive cannot be seen to fetter the work of the Comptroller and Auditor General, the power to appoint the auditor and accounting officer of the Northern Ireland Audit Office is being transferred. My Department will no longer exercise that power; the Assembly's Audit Committee will do so.

The Bill does not comprise the entirety of the Executive's response to the Sharman review. It comprises the element about which it is possible and desirable to legislate. We are actively considering several of the other Sharman proposals.

As regards the timetable for implementation, we intend the new proposals to apply to statutory audits and value-for-money studies taking place in the new financial year — after 1 April 2003. We also intend the transfer of audit staff to take place on that date.

The Bill deals with technical and complex matters, but its aim is simple — to ensure that our Comptroller and Auditor General's independence is not compromised and that he has all the powers that he needs to ensure that those who are responsible for handling public money are held fully accountable for the use of that money. By enhancing his powers, we enhance accountability both to the Assembly and to the citizens of Northern Ireland. The Bill reorganises audit structures to enhance independence, and it is central to our implementation of the Sharman recommendations. Accordingly, I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

10.45 am

The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Molloy): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister and his Department for the regular briefs and updates on the Bill that they have given to the Committee. The Committee has taken a keen interest in financial accountability, audit arrangements and the role of the Comptroller and Auditor General since the passage of the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001.

The Committee successfully moved several amendments to the Government Resources and Accounts Bill and accepted an assurance from the then Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Mark Durkan, that its concerns, as well as those of the Public Accounts Committee, on the Comptroller and Auditor General's right to follow public money would be addressed in the Audit and Accountability Bill.

The Committee welcomes the Bill and looks forward to the detailed examination of its provisions at Committee Stage. It especially welcomes the inclusion of all non-departmental public bodies within the remit of the Comptroller and Auditor General and the decision to grant him statutory access to documents held by third parties, including subcontractors, in receipt of public money.

In its response to the Department's consultation document, the Committee accepted the arguments in favour of the reorganisation of the health and personal social services audit and the local government audit, and the greater powers given to the Comptroller and Auditor General in that respect.

The Committee has not commented on the proposed transfer of powers to the Assembly's Audit Committee and will be seeking the views of Committee members on that before compiling a report. The Committee will also be consulting the Assembly's Public Accounts Committee on the Bill's general provisions and on the role envisaged for the Public Accounts Committee, which is not made explicit in the Bill.

The Committee would be grateful for clarification on several issues, and the Minister may wish to respond today. Will the Bill provide the Comptroller and Auditor General with access to all organisations that receive public money? If not, what rules will govern access? For what purpose will access be provided, and what powers of inspection will the Comptroller and Auditor General have?

What are the implications of transferring the appointment of the Northern Ireland Audit Office's accounting officer and auditor to the Assembly's Audit Committee, and what views has the Audit Committee expressed on that proposal?

The Committee for Finance and Personnel will issue a public notice inviting views on the Bill. It will target organisations and individuals that provided input to the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001 and will be requesting further views and information.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel (Mr Beggs): I also welcome the introduction of the Bill, both as Deputy Chairperson and a member of the Assembly's Public Accounts Committee.

It is important when handling public money to ensure that it is well used, and that there is value for money and traceability. I welcome the fact that the Bill will widen the Comptroller and Auditor General's remit to include the Health Service, local government and non-departmental public bodies. That should bring about significant improvements.

Although the Public Accounts Committee has not gone into the detail of the accounts presented to it, the Comptroller and Auditor General has not been the main auditor and has not had the same control in directing the audits. Therefore I welcome the increased responsibility and independence given to him through the Bill.

That will be particularly significant given the increased expenditure allocated to the Health Service. There is concern that money has not been well spent there: the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety has had trouble, because of the complexities of the Health Service, tracing where money has been spent. I hope that, as a result of further input from the Comptroller and Auditor General, constructive suggestions come forward that may assist the Assembly in providing better services to all.

As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I have experienced unfortunate occasions when non-departmental public bodies have handled public money poorly. The Bill will give the Comptroller and Auditor General an increased remit to ensure that proper standards are applied not only to Departments but to every non-departmental public body. That should have been happening. However, incidents that have been drawn to the Public Accounts Committee's attention have made us aware that that has not been happening in the past. I hope that this development will increase the level of public scrutiny and increase the public's confidence in how their money is being spent.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It seems that a live mobile phone in the Chamber is interfering with the sound system. Members should check their phones; it is not the Deputy Speaker's.

The Chairperson of the Audit Committee (Mr Dallat): As Chairperson of the Audit Committee and a member of the Public Accounts Committee I warmly welcome the Minister's announcement of the new legislation. Increased powers for the Comptroller and Auditor General will enable that office to conduct audit trails that will send out a clear message, particularly to non-departmental Government bodies and, as Mr Beggs said, to the health boards and trusts, that the gravy train has at last run out of steam. The legislation has the potential to put the fat cats out of business once and for all.

The new legislation has the full endorsement of the Audit Committee and the Public Accounts Committee. Members of those Committees recognise that it will elevate public accountability to a new level, where nearly every pound of public money can be scrutinised to see whether it was spent honestly, wisely and in the best interests of those who matter most — the people. Increased Audit Office powers mean that additional resources will have to be found to pay for the additional work. Nevertheless, I am certain that the return to the taxpayer will be at least tenfold.

One of the greatest tragedies of direct rule was the inability to ask questions about accountability. Even when the Assembly came into being and was allowed to get on with the business of scrutiny, the Public Accounts Committee had only a limited involvement. Many large bodies that guzzled huge amounts of public money were outside its remit.

The impression has been created that the health boards and trusts are bottomless pits that consume hugely increased budgets, only to provide a service that is getting worse. The Comptroller and Auditor General's increased powers mean that Assembly Members, if we are allowed to, will be much better able to ask why we have increased waiting lists for operations, why the trolley waits have become a national scandal, and why bed blocking is now the most fashionable medical term in common use. I do not, I hasten to add, single out the Health Service. There are other equally important examples that I could use, as, no doubt, other Members will.

The new legislation will allow the Assembly to delve into the affairs of many other public bodies. I hope that those who in the past foolishly described members of the Public Accounts Committee as begrudgers, because they dared question how public money was spent, will draw their horns in. I hope that they will lend their full support to ensuring that never again will we have the scandals that have gone before, and that the services provided are the very best and serve the interest of nobody but the long-suffering public.

All that depends on our ability to defend the institutions of democracy. I hope that the weeping willows who are undermining the Assembly at present, and who do not show a great deal of interest in such mundane matters as increased powers for the Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee, will prove me wrong. Meanwhile, I thank the former Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mark Durkan, and the current Minister, Seán Farren, for their total co-operation with the Audit Committee in ensuring that the legislation has the broadest possible impact on how public money is accounted for.

Mr Weir: As the previous Member laid down the challenge of avoiding begrudgery — a trap into which he himself occasionally falls — I shall try to look at the Bill constructively. We cautiously welcome the Audit and Accountability Bill.

It is welcome because of the need to increase the Comptroller and Auditor General's powers. We live in an era in which money can be moved around more quickly than before — and with more hidden quality to it, we live in an electronic age in which powers so extensive are important to ensure that public money is spent correctly. Moreover, we live in an era in which the public, rightly, has a greater expectation that their money is well spent. As such, the principle behind the Bill that greater audit and accountability powers be given to the Comptroller and Auditor General is right.

I also welcome the principles outlined in some aspects of the Bill. The fact that audit control seems to have been given to all non-departmental bodies is welcome. An increase in statutory access to documents that are held by third parties was highlighted in the Committee for Finance and Personnel by DUP members and others when discussing the Government Resources and Accounts Bill. Therefore I welcome those changes.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel, the Public Accounts Committee and the Audit Committee have also stated that the Comptroller and Auditor General should be given a proper degree of independence. The proposals contained in the Bill that afford that person the required level of independence to properly carry out his or her work are also welcomed. It makes sense that the Comptroller and Auditor General is the overseer of all Government activity. Therefore the movement of the health and local government functions into the hands of the Comptroller and Auditor General is logical.

However, I do strike a note of caution — and I mean no disrespect to the Minister or the proposals — because the Audit and Accountability Bill deals with complex financial arrangements. As such, it would be foolhardy for members of the Committee for Finance and Personnel to rubber-stamp what is before them now. The Committee will want to scrutinise the Bill to ensure that the key test is met, and, as the Minister rightly said, that test should be whether the Comptroller and Auditor General will be able to follow the money.

When discussing the Government Resources and Accounts Bill, the Finance Committee expressed reservations about the Department of Finance and Personnel's apparent proposals. At that stage, the Committee looked at several proposed amendments. The Committee did not move those amendments in the end, because assurances were given that the concerns that they addressed would be dealt with in the Audit and Accountability Bill. It appears that those concerns have been met and that the Department of Finance and Personnel made moves to ensure that that was so. However, it is important that the Committee looks at the fine detail of the Bill to ensure that the assurances given during discussions on the Government Resources and Accounts Bill have been fulfilled. I hope that that is the case, because it is important to get it right now.

I am glad that we have taken the best aspects of the Sharman Report and seem to be implementing them. However, there is an indication that the Bill rightly moves beyond the Sharman Report. In Northern Ireland — above all parts of the United Kingdom — there is a need for close scrutiny of audit and accountability. There has not been close enough scrutiny of audit and accountability for 30 years because of direct rule. However, the people of Northern Ireland are concerned that devolution has not made sufficient difference to their daily lives, and that their money is not being as well spent as it could be by this institution. It is important that Members satisfy people's interest in this matter.

Northern Ireland's public sector is larger than that of any other part of the United Kingdom, with regard to its expenditure and the vast range of bodies that can spend that money. Therefore, there is a particular need for scrutiny in Northern Ireland.

11.00 am

It is important that the Bill give greater powers to the Comptroller and Auditor General to provide sufficient scrutiny to ensure that people get value for money. The key test for any Bill is how it impacts on people's daily lives. If the Bill ensures that money is better spent and that it reaches people, rather than being wasted and spent corruptly, it will be a valuable contribution to society.

We give the Bill a cautious welcome. However, we wish to ensure that the details match up to the principles that have been outlined. We hope that, when the Bill comes back for consideration, our questions and concerns will be properly addressed. Then we can move forward together with a Bill that satisfies the vast range of opinion in the Assembly Chamber, so that people are properly represented and their money is properly spent.

Mr Close: I welcome the general principles enshrined in the Bill. In short, it gives the Comptroller and Auditor General greater access to follow taxpayers' money. One of the greatest responsibilities of an elected representative in a body such as the Assembly is to ensure that taxpayers' money is properly spent, in a manner and for the purposes for which the House voted it.

Over the past few years, it has come to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee that there has been a bad attitude towards the expenditure of taxpayers' money. In the past, I have characterised that attitude as "Well, it is coming off a broad back, and, therefore, it does not really matter." However, the challenge of every Member and the officials in Departments that have the onerous responsibility of accounting for taxpayers' money comes in the following questions: if it were my money, would I spend it in that fashion? Would I adopt the same attitude, or would I be more cautious about how I spent it? If they can answer those questions in the affirmative, the chances are that the taxpayer will receive good value for money and that it will be spent for the purpose for which Members voted it.

However, that has not always been the case. Yesterday, we had a discussion wherein some Members suggested that it was not necessary to fill in little pieces of paper and that money should have been poured into an organisation because the cause underlying that body was good, and I accept that. However, we are responsible for every penny of taxpayers' money, and, therefore, we should abhor any shortcuts.

Reference was made yesterday to credit cards, which we will discuss later today. There is an attitude that must be changed. The sentiments and principles in the Bill will go some way towards changing attitudes, because it is all about the independence of auditing. It is all about transparency and accountability, and, if those factors are fed into the system, we can, and should, have a better system.

I concur with Mr Weir. We are charged with the responsibility of scrutinising the Bill in the Committee for Finance and Personnel and of ensuring that, to the best of our ability, it properly fulfils the functions that we, as elected representatives speaking on behalf of the taxpayer, require and demand. I hope that the Bill will fulfil those functions, and, at a cursory glance, I believe that it will.

I thank the Minister of Finance and Personnel and his predecessor, Mark Durkan. I recall the Finance and Personnel Committee's discussions of the Government Resources and Accounts Bill. I had profound doubt about whether the avoidance of producing a Bill that would implement the recommendations of the Sharman review had more to do with expediency than with a desire to move forward. The Department has honoured its commitments, for which I commend it. I look forward to the Committee's forthcoming scrutiny of the Bill.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren): I thank all the Members who commented usefully and positively on the general principles of the Audit and Accountability Bill. The Assembly is working together towards a common goal. I pay tribute to the Committee of Finance and Personnel's efforts to ensure that we work closely towards the goal of ensuring that the Comptroller and Auditor General will be as independent as possible and will have all the powers necessary to ensure that those responsible for handling public money are held fully accountable for its use.

It is important to appreciate that the Bill does not stand alone. It is part of a web of accountability procedures, laws and structures that have been discussed in the debate and that bring us closer to the goal of ensuring proper accountability for the use of public funds.

Several Members expressed concern about the possibility that public money is not being spent properly. The Bill, on its own, does not provide a fail-safe guarantee that mismanagement, laxity and fraud will never again occur in the public sector in Northern Ireland. Those who seek to perpetrate fraud will continue to scheme and devise the means to do so, but we can try to develop mechanisms to prevent fraud, laxity and mismanagement as far as humanly possible, and, if they do happen, to detect them.

Although evidence of mismanagement, laxity and fraud emerges from time to time, we can be proud of the standards of accountability that existed in the public sector, notwithstanding the absence of the scrutiny by local politicians that is now possible under devolution.

My experience and the evidence demonstrate that there are high levels of probity and responsibility in all sectors of public service. We should be proud that our public service operates, by and large, to very high standards. That notwithstanding, it is the Assembly's responsibility to ensure full accountability, which is as transparent as possible.

I shall touch on some of the points raised by Members. Mr Molloy, speaking as Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, asked for what purpose access is provided. The clear purpose is for statutory audit or value-for-money studies, particularly in the case of third parties. He also asked what powers of inspection are given. The powers are to request documents that are relevant to the audit or the value-for-money study in question from persons or bodies in certain relationships with the Government.

Mr Molloy asked about the implications of the transfer to the Audit Committee. That will give the Assembly rather than the Executive the power to appoint the accounting officer. It will enhance the independence of public audit, and the Committee for Finance and Personnel will discuss that with the Audit Committee.

Mr Beggs touched on the audit of the Health Service. The Comptroller and Auditor General is already the statutory auditor of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. This Bill will make him auditor of health trusts and boards. At present he reports to the Assembly on the findings of the primary auditors of those bodies. The auditors are frequently from the private sector. This Bill makes the Comptroller and Auditor General the primary auditor of the whole health sector. I assure Mr Beggs that the public can continue to have full confidence in the statutory audits and value-for-money studies of the health sector in the same way as before the reform.

Mr Molloy raised a point that I should have touched on regarding consultation with specific Committees, one being the Public Accounts Committee. My predecessor gave an undertaking during the passage of the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001 to consult on further steps to improve audit and accountability arrangements in Northern Ireland and revisit the subject of further legislation as we are doing. He said that we should carry out a consultation exercise in that regard on all the matters covered in this Bill and on the wider issues in the Sharman review of audit accountability from September 2001 until the end of November 2001.

We received 56 written responses, including those from Departments, local councils, voluntary and community organisations, professional bodies, audit bodies and individuals. The Public Accounts Committee held a public hearing on the Sharman review on 13 June 2002, and the Committee for Finance and Personnel has also taken a very keen interest in the subject. A summary of responses to the public consultation has been prepared and is due to be published very soon.

Other Members said that they would be scrutinising the Bill in greater detail during the Committee Stage. I accept and acknowledge the compliments paid to my predecessor regarding his commitments, on which we are now attempting to deliver. That is why I feel that Members will see, in the final stages of this Bill, that the legislation will be effective and ensure that the objective of full and proper accountability will be achieved.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Audit and Accountability Bill (NIA 6/02) be agreed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Bill now stands referred to the Committee for Finance and Personnel.

HEALTH AND PERSONAL SOCIAL SERVICES (QUALITY, IMPROVEMENT AND REGULATION) BILL

Second Stage

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Molaim go dtugtar a Dhara Céim don Bhille Sláinte, Seirbhísí Sóisialta agus Pearsanta (Cáilíocht, Feabhsúchán agus Rialachán).

Sa chaibidil ‘Ag Obair d’fhoill Pobl Níos Sláintiúla’ ina chéad Chlár Rialtais, thug an Coiste Feidhmiúcháin gealltanais creat a fheidhmiú le cáilíocht na seirbhísí a sholáthraíonn na seirbhísí sláinte, pearsanta agus sóisialta a ardú. Mar chéad chéim leis an ghealltanais seo a chomhlíonadh, chuir mé mo chuid moltaí, dar teideal ‘An Cleachtas is Fearr — An Cúram is Fearr’, faoi chomhairliúchán poiblí in Aibreán 2001. Léirigh na freagraí ar na moltaí seo go raibh tacaíocht leathan ann d’fheidhmiú na socruithe nua le taca a chur faoi cháilíocht na seirbhísí sláinte, pearsanta agus sóisialta agus le feabhas a chur ar rialú na seirbhísí agus leis an rialú sin a leathnú.

Foilsíodh torthaí an chomhairliúcháin ar 11 Meitheamh 2002. Ar an dáta céanna, d’fhógair mé mo chinntí ar phríomhghnéithe an chreata nua a leagadh amach le cáilíocht na seirbhísí cúraim agus sláinte a sholáthraítear anseo a chur chun cinn. Go bunúsach, is féidir príomhghnéithe an chreata a achoimriú mar seo leanas: córas le caighdeáin agus treoirilínte nua a fhorbairt nó na cinn atá ann cheana féin a chur i bhfeidhm; rialú na seirbhísí a leathnú le réimse i bhfad níos leithne seirbhísí a chlúdú; caighdeáin íosta cúraim a fhorbairt do sheirbhísí rialaithe; dualgas reachtúil cáilíochta a chur ar na seirbhísí sláinte, pearsanta agus sóisialta; córas rialachais ar chúram sóisialta cliniciúil a thabhairt isteach; comhlacht singil rialaithe agus cigireachta neamhspleách — údarás feabhsúcháin agus rialaithe na seirbhísí sláinte agus sóisialta — a bhunú ag a mbeidh an dá ról de sheirbhísí a rialú agus cigireacht a dhéanamh ar rialachas sna seirbhísí sláinte, pearsanta agus sóisialta; creataí forbartha seirbhíse cosúil le creataí na seirbhíse náisiúnta i Sasana, in Albain agus sa Bhreatain Bheag a fhorbairt nó a oiriúnú lena n-úsáid anseo; agus creat bainistíochta ar fheidhmiú a fhorbairt.

I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Health and Personal Social Services (Quality, Improvement and Regulation) Bill (NIA 7/02) be agreed.

In the chapter “Working For A Healthier People” in their first Programme for Government, the Executive made a commitment to put a framework in place to raise the quality of services provided to the community across health and personal social services. As the first step to fulfil that commitment, I presented my proposals entitled ‘Best Practice — Best Care’ for public consultation in April 2001. The responses to those proposals demonstrated widespread support for the introduction of new arrangements to underpin the quality of health and personal social services and to approve and extend the regulation of services.

The results of the consultation were published on 11 June 2002. On the same date, I announced my decisions on the main elements of a new framework designed to promote the quality of health and care services delivered here. The main elements of the framework can be summarised as follows: a system for developing new, or implementing existing, standards and guidelines; regulation of services to be extended to cover a much wider range of services; minimum care standards to be developed for regulated services; a statutory duty of quality to be introduced in health and personal social services; a system of clinical and social care governance to be introduced; a single independent regulation and inspection body — the health and social services regulation and improvement authority — to be established, with the twin roles of regulating services and inspecting governance within health and personal social services; service development frameworks, similar to national service frameworks in England, Scotland and Wales, to be developed or adapted for use here; and a performance management framework to be developed.

The Bill will give effect to the elements of the overall quality framework that require legislative backing. The Bill’s various provisions need to be considered in the context of the overall quality framework. It provides for a statutory duty of quality to apply to all health and personal social services bodies that deliver services. It establishes a health and social services regulation and improvement authority, which will be responsible for monitoring the quality of services delivered by the health and personal social services by reviewing clinical and social care governance arrangements within those services. It provides for the new regulation and improvement authority to be responsible for the regulation and inspection of an extended range of services.

Every year, hospitals here provide more than one million outpatient treatments. There are 500,000 admissions to hospitals or day procedure clinics every year. Every day, 30,000 people see a doctor or practice nurse, and 120,000 people will visit a community pharmacy. An average of 180,000 people contact social services every year. More than 20,000 elderly people are supported in their homes. The vast majority of people receive the quality of services that they require. Regrettably, however, some service users do not.

The challenge that the health and personal social services face is to guarantee a quality of service that the public can expect to receive, regardless of where they go for treatment or care and regardless of which organisation provides it. The many medical, professional and technological advances, and increased public expectation of the standards of services delivered, make it vital that health and personal social services modernise and improve in the future, to enable those services to deliver a fast and effective high-quality service. Part of the emphasis on quality agenda is on ensuring that services and treatments are delivered safely and that steps are taken to reduce risk and to avoid problems.

At present, many health and social care services, including those to children and vulnerable adults, are not subject to independent regulation and inspection. Regulated services are often not delivered according to common agreed standards, and that leads to unacceptable variations in the standard of care and treatment.

Publicity surrounding recent scandals in England, such as the Shipman case and the Bristol Royal Infirmary inquiry, combined with instances here, such as revelations about organ retention, and recent concerns about the storage of embryos and sperm samples, have shaken public confidence in our services. The introduction of a specific framework for clinical and social care governance will mark a major change for health and personal social services.

Governance arrangements are, of course, already in place to ensure overall probity, transparency and adherence to public service values. Clinical and social care governance, backed by a statutory duty of quality, will mean that, for the first time, health and social services boards and trusts will have to place the provision of high-quality services to the forefront of their statutory duties in the same way as they must adhere to statutory financial probity.

A framework for clinical social care governance will bring together all the existing activity relating to the delivery of high-quality services, including education and research, audit, risk management and complaints management. Many health and personal social services organisations have already begun to develop their own systems, based on systems elsewhere. The Bill's intention is to ensure that a uniform set of principles will be applied to our unique organisational structures, and to take account of how services are delivered here.

Health and personal social services organisations will be accountable for continuously monitoring and improving the quality of their services, and safeguarding high standards of care and treatment. Organisations will take corporate responsibility for performance and for provision of the highest possible standard of clinical and social care. The new arrangements will build on and strengthen existing activity relating to the delivery of high-quality care and treatment, including audit activity; identifying, promoting and sharing good practice; risk assessment and risk management; quality standards; complaints management; clinical and social care effectiveness; evidence-based practice; research and education; and effective leadership and management.

To ensure independent monitoring of clinical and social care governance, a single body, the health and personal social services regulation and improvement authority, will be created. Its core functions will be to regulate and inspect services, provide advice, conduct reviews of clinical and social care governance arrangements, carry out systematic service reviews and undertake investigations. The new authority's powers will, therefore, be wide ranging.

In addition to its regulatory function, the authority will take the lead in conducting reviews of clinical and social care governance arrangements. Through a rolling programme of local reviews of health and personal social services organisations, it will independently scrutinise the clinical and social care governance arrangements developed to support, promote and deliver high-quality services.

It will also help organisations to identify and tackle serious or persistent shortcomings in clinical or social care delivery, with the ultimate goal of supporting organisations in the delivery of high-quality, safe services. The authority will have a key role in providing users, the public, the Assembly and me, as Minister, with the assurance that systems are in place to ensure that the highest possible standards are adhered to and that the risk of something going wrong is greatly reduced.

Many initiatives are ongoing to promote continuous professional development through lifelong learning and strengthening professional regulation. My proposals will bring together those initiatives so that they can be managed and monitored in one framework for improving the quality of services.

Staff must also share ideas and good practice and take responsibility for the quality of services that they provide. Staff skills represent a significant investment that organisations must maintain by enabling employees to develop their skills and practice. A highly trained, competent and confident workforce is fundamental to securing the delivery of high-quality services.

A summary of the Bill's provisions is in the explanatory and financial memorandum. The Bill is in five parts. Part I deals with the establishment of the new authority and its general responsibility. Part II covers regulatory procedures. Part III deals with the statutory duty of quality and the new body's responsibilities. Part IV lists the new body's functions. Part V deals with the authority's powers of inspection and review and the departmental power to introduce minimum standards.

I want to hear Members' views, and will, therefore, conclude my remarks. The Bill represents a radical agenda for the Executive, the Assembly, my Department and health and personal social services. Service users will benefit from the extension of regulation to cover a wider range of services, including those delivered to the most vulnerable users — the elderly and children.

Much work is being done on those arrangements that do not require legislative backing, and much work will need to be done in the future. It will take time to achieve all that we plan to achieve. I will try to answer as many Members' points as I can at the end of the debate. If there is anything to which I am unable to respond today, I will write to the Member concerned. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

11.30 am

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I welcome the Bill. It follows through on proposals contained in the consultation document 'Best Practice — Best Care' to set clear standards for, and to improve the monitoring and regulation of, health and personal social services. I also welcome the Minister's presence in the Chamber today.

There is an increasing and justifiable focus on how money is spent and on whether value-for-money services are being provided. That is a burning issue, especially for the Health Service, which has an annual budget of some £3 billion that accounts for some 40% of Northern Ireland's block grant. The demographic trends in the preliminary census results that were published yesterday underline the increasing pressures that the Health Service will face in years to come. It underscores the need to test the effectiveness of the services provided by all Health Service bodies and to focus on areas in which performance can be improved.

The Bill's aims are positive, but they must lead to the introduction of more economical and effective work practices, minimise bureaucracy and improve quality standards. It is imperative that the Minister take the necessary steps to demonstrate that limited resources are being deployed in the most effective and efficient way for the maximum benefit of the population. Patients who use the Health Service are entitled to expect quality care that is delivered consistently across board and trust boundaries.

I am glad that the legislation has been introduced to the Assembly. It will establish a new, independent body that will assume overall responsibility for the regulation of services and for the inspection and monitoring of the clinical and social care governance arrangements in health and personal social services. We have been told that it will cost £5.6 million a year to operate the body, which is £2.8 million more than at present. The Minister must demonstrate that that investment will provide a better regional service. She must convince the public that the new authority will not simply add another layer of bureaucracy, but that it will play a key role in ensuring that healthcare standards are being met and that the issue of clinical and social care governance is being addressed.

I welcome the establishment of clinical and social care governance. For many years, the teaching profession has been subject to inspections, and many of us can remember inspectors visiting schools. As someone who practised medicine in west Belfast for many years, I often wondered why teachers should have had to undergo inspections when doctors did not. I welcome the fact that all health professionals will be subject to clinical and social care governance.

The recent inquiry into the use of human organs highlights the clear need for the establishment of a watchdog to check that corporate organisations have best-care systems in place and are adopting the right practices. The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety understands that the new authority will produce an annual report for the Department and will publish the results of its inspections. As always, much of the detail will lie in the Regulations that are to follow, which the Committee will scrutinise.

The Minister, as the authoriser of the new body's work programme, must demonstrate clearly that her Department will hold the body to account. That is important. I am pleased that the Bill will give powers to the authority to assess the quality of some unregulated services that are provided by trusts, such as fostering and adoption. The Committee wants service provision in those areas to be improved to ease pressure on the children's residential care sector. It is important that the statutory duty to deliver quality be applied equally to all services that are delivered by health and personal social services, whether they are provided by the statutory, voluntary or community sector.

The Bill does not set out a timetable for the regulation of services, which will undoubtedly depend on resources. The explanatory and financial memorandum indicates that the cost of running the new authority will lead to a net increase in expenditure of £2.8 million a year. Assumptions are made about the estimated income from the services to which regulation is extended. It is also pointed out that the level of fees has not been decided, and the minimum standards for the regulated services have not been developed. Extensive consultation on those matters is needed because they will directly impact on the minimum standards for healthcare providers such as nursing homes.

The Committee will focus its attention on the funding arrangements that the Department puts in place to support the Bill's provisions. Those arrangements must ensure that the worthy aims of the legislation translate into genuine action to promote the quality of health and social care services, and that those aims do not founder because the necessary resources have not been committed. That is important. We do not want to be in a position in which, although proper minimum standards are set, staff cannot deliver them as a result of resource constraints. The Health Committee recently heard from Northern Ireland Public Service Alliance (NIPSA) officials of the deep frustration of social workers who cannot meet the quality standards set in respect of their statutory duties towards children. Although that is the case across Northern Ireland, it is especially so in the Foyle area, as we were recently informed by social workers. I trust that any resourcing gaps that are identified by the systems put in place to establish clear standards will be immediately addressed.

The introduction of a Bill that provides a framework to improve the quality of healthcare by establishing consistent minimum standards as well as establish a system of clinical and social care governance and improve monitoring and inspection, must be welcomed. My Committee Colleagues and I look forward to exploring the provisions of the Bill in detail at Committee Stage.

Ms Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In the previous debate, almost every Member touched on accountability and value for money in all Departments. I agree 100% with that, but it must happen across the board. That is why I was surprised at the attitude of some Members today to yesterday's debate on the Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre. With that in mind, I welcome the Bill and agree with the Minister that it introduces a radical agenda. It aims to develop overall standards in the Health Service and secures local accountability for the delivery of services. Moreover, it will improve the monitoring and regulation of those services.

Like the Minister and the Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I welcome the proposal to establish a single health and social services regulation and improvements authority. Trusts and boards will have a statutory obligation towards equality, and, during the Bill's Committee Stage, I intend to ask officials exactly how that will be introduced and whether there will be sanctions against the chief executives of trusts that fail to meet that obligation. The Bill's impact will be beneficial for clients, service users and Health Service personnel. It should end the postcode lottery that can exist with quality care and that Members have referred to time and time again. The Bill will have a positive effect on protecting the rights of vulnerable people, whether in children's homes or in homes for the elderly.

I also welcome the legislation and look forward to its Committee Stage.

Mr McCarthy: Alliance supports the Bill to establish an authority to oversee the delivery of services by health and personal social services, as well as by our independent and voluntary private sectors. The Bill will go far towards achieving the goal of securing local accountability for the delivery of services and will improve their monitoring and regulation.

The Bill closes a variety of loopholes. Previously, some health and social services were exempt, for one reason or another, from proper regulation. For example, wholly private GP call-out services will be included in the regulatory framework as will private primary-care practices.

The House will not be surprised to hear of my particular interest in the section of the Bill that deals with personal care. I endorse the inclusion of residential care homes in the proposed regulatory scheme. I am pleased that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety considered the 1999 report of the Royal Commission on Long Term Care for the Elderly.

Personal care is defined in the Bill as:

- “(a) action taken to promote rehabilitation;
- (b) assistance with physical or social needs; and
- (c) counselling”.

Such assistance can include help with bathing, toileting, dressing and eating for people who cannot perform those tasks for themselves. The Bill recognises the distinction between the services provided in residential care homes and in nursing homes, and that is incorporated in the Bill.

Furthermore, I welcome the fact that domiciliary care agencies are to be included in the proposed regulatory schemes. Domiciliary care agencies provide vital services for people in their homes. Given the significance of personal care that is recognised in the Bill, and the services provided by nursing homes, why can the House not vote at an early date to provide personal care on the same terms as nursing care?

Nevertheless, I welcome the Bill. That such a breadth of health and social services is being amalgamated in a singular, regulatory framework will help everyone involved to deliver the best possible care and practice.

For the Alliance Party and for me, the recognition of personal care only serves to underline its significance in our society. If the Bill is passed, I shall continue to campaign for free personal care in the new regulatory scheme. The Alliance Party fully supports the Bill.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): I thank Members for their attention to the detail of the Bill and their warm welcome to its provisions. Several Members who spoke referred to the added value that will result from the establishment of the new authority, which will provide an independent check of the quality of the services delivered by the health and personal social services (HPSS) and the independent sector.

The new authority will provide service users with greater safeguards on the services that they receive; reduce inequalities and improve equity by ensuring that services are delivered consistently across the North to meet the same minimum standards, regardless of where people live and whether services are delivered by the HPSS or the independent sector; and ensure that systems are in place to address poor performance. Therefore, it will also help to reduce the clinical negligence bill, which is an important factor for Members.

The new authority will mean that, for the first time, the quality of services provided by HPSS will be independently monitored against agreed minimum quality standards. To ensure that effective clinical and social care governance arrangements are in place, the new authority will regulate more of the services delivered to children and vulnerable adults, including some that are provided by HPSS.

Providers will not be able to register those services that are to be regulated unless they meet minimum standards, and failure to register will mean that providers may not legally continue to provide those services. The new authority will also review the quality of, and access to, services across the North.

Between 1991 and 2001, £55 million was paid in compensation for clinical negligence. It is to be hoped that the work of the new authority will reduce that amount. Its work will also ensure that people have the assurance of minimum standards against which all services will be judged.

Several Members referred to the Regulations. I agree that further work will arise, and I look forward to hearing the points that Colleagues raise during Committee Stage. It is to be hoped that I shall be able to provide further assurance then. Once the Bill's principal Regulations have been drafted, we shall consult on them before they are laid before the House.

11.45 am

I hope that I have dealt with Members' main points. As I said, I shall try to deal in writing with any points that I have not covered. I shall ask officials to look at the record, and I look forward to working with the Committee on the Bill.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Health and Personal Social Services (Quality, Improvement and Regulation) Bill (NIA 7/02) be agreed.

REGIONAL CHAMBER OF THE CONGRESS OF REGIONAL AND LOCAL AUTHORITIES OF EUROPE

MLA Appointment

Mr Ford: I beg to move

That this Assembly appoints Seán Neeson MLA as its nominee to the Regional Chamber of the Congress of Regional and Local Authorities of Europe.

The Congress of Regional and Local Authorities of Europe is one of those bodies that rejoices in having an unpronounceable acronym. It was established in 1994 by the Council of Europe — not by the European Union. As a result, it represents 41 countries, which range from Portugal to the Russian Federation and from Cyprus to Iceland. It is significantly larger than the European Union, with which the Assembly deals more often.

Two chambers represent regional and local authorities. There are 291 full members, 18 of whom come from the UK. Of those 18, one Member of the Scottish Parliament, one Member of the National Assembly for Wales, and one Member of our Assembly sit in the chamber of regions.

The congress advises the Committee of Ministers and the parliamentary assembly at the Council of Europe, and provides a forum in which the experience of members of local and regional authorities across the continent is pooled. In doing so, it organises conferences and prepares reports on local democracy, especially that which is developing in central and eastern Europe. The congress also monitors the European Charter of Local Self-Government, to which the UK signed up in 1998. The Assembly has some catching up to do in terms of the powers and responsibilities of local government.

I have already said that one MLA sits as a full member in the chamber of regions. Cllr Jim Dillon of Lisburn City Council represents district councillors from Northern Ireland in the chamber of local authorities.

I have pleasure in proposing Mr Seán Neeson as the Assembly's nominee to sit in the chamber of regions. He has had a keen interest in European matters, which dates at least from when he was elected to the previous Assembly in 1982. Before devolution, he regularly attended meetings of the EU Committee of the Regions as a representative of Northern Ireland. He has the ability to represent the range of opinions that are in the Assembly.

I am grateful to David Trimble and Mark Durkan for supporting the concept that this nomination should go to a member of a party that is not in the Executive. I am unsure whether they acted in their capacities as the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, or merely as party leaders, but I welcome the support of the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP. As well as taking party considerations into account, Mr Trimble and Mr Durkan also readily agreed to my suggestion that Mr Neeson would be an excellent choice personally.

I frequently criticise the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, which is my function as an Opposition Member. However, it is appropriate that I should generously praise the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP for their support.

Mr Morrow: Is the Member apologising to them?

Mr Ford: No. I am happy to accept anybody's support when they show some grace, but that is not always forthcoming.

As for the amendment, it is for Members to choose how they view the two candidates. It is certainly not my position to criticise Edwin Poots. However, I was slightly surprised when I read the amendment, specifically because Mr Poots was described as "Chairman of the Committee of the Centre".

I accept that that Committee has a remit to shadow OFMDFM in all aspects of its work, including European matters, but that remit overwhelmingly refers to European Union matters, not wider European issues.

Mr Paisley Jnr: That is rubbish.

Mr Ford: Mr Paisley clearly wants to talk about waste, but we shall wait to hear what he says later on.

It should not be assumed that the Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre should be automatically proposed as the Assembly's nominee on a matter that concerns the Council of Europe, as opposed to the European Union.

Mr Poots is a member of the same city council as Mr Dillon, who sits as a representative of local authorities, and whom I mentioned earlier. Although the relationship between Mr Poots and Mr Dillon appears to be fractious, they both belong to the Unionist family. To provide a more balanced representation for Northern Ireland, and taking into account Mr Neeson's personal qualities, it is appropriate that he should represent the Assembly in the congress. I have pleasure in proposing Mr Neeson as the Assembly's nominee.

Mr Morrow: You were a Unionist for a while too, David.

Mr Ford: Not for long.

Mr Paisley Jnr: I beg to move the following amendment: In line 1, delete "Seán Neeson MLA" and insert

"Edwin Poots MLA, Chairman of the Committee of the Centre,".

Edwin Poots had hoped to be in the Chamber for today's debate, but he is chairing the subcommittee of the Committee of the Centre's EU inquiry. He will endeavour to join us at some point during the debate. In chairing that subcommittee, Mr Poots has the confidence of the House. It is nonsense to say that neither the House nor the Committee of the Centre has any interest in a widening Europe, and I shall put that argument to rest. The European Union is widening and it is essential that Northern Ireland, as part of a member state of the European Union, play its role and contribute to that debate.

I agree with Mr Ford's analysis of the history of the Congress of Regional and Local Authorities of Europe. However, it would be wrong to accept that the Committee of the Centre has no interest in a widening Europe. It does have an interest in that important issue, and the Assembly must continue to play its role.

My party leader has received the largest share of the European election vote in Northern Ireland not once, not twice, but on five occasions. In 1999, 192,762 people put the DUP and its leader first in the European election, because they recognised that the DUP's voice was essential to represent Northern Ireland authentically in Europe.

My party's voice must also be heard in the appointment of the Assembly's nominee to the regional chamber of the Congress of Regional and Local Authorities of Europe, and it would be wrong to set it aside in this matter. The DUP was kept off the Committee of the Regions, on which the Alliance Party had a member. The Northern Ireland representation on that committee was woeful and disappointing, and the voice of Northern Ireland was not properly heard. It is our hope that that situation will not be repeated in such an important body as this.

Both the SDLP and the UUP already have representation in the regional chamber of the Congress of Regional and Local Authorities of Europe through council. Given the support that my party enjoys on European issues in the Province, it must be represented. It would be wrong to put a party into that body that would be boxing above its weight.

I do not want to participate in a slanging match or a history lesson about the Alliance Party's stand on European issues. However, in the European election in 1999, the people of Northern Ireland gave the Alliance Party 2% of the vote, because its voice was not authentic on European issues and was unrepresentative. Mr Neeson was the candidate who received that 2% vote. We would be doing the House a disservice if we ignored what the people of this country said only a few years ago on that issue.

Our nominee, Mr Edwin Poots, has been a local councillor for the past six years. He has distinguished himself as the Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre, an appointment that was supported by the House. He led the Committee in its most recent European report, which demonstrated an in-depth knowledge of European matters in the context of the European community and on the issue of a broadening Europe. It is essential that the person appointed has such experience and knowledge, and, as I said, he has led that Committee on European matters. That report received the endorsement of the House, and it follows that the person best placed to take on this role is the Chairperson of the Committee of the Centre, which has a brief to consider European issues.

Edwin Poots is young, and it would send out the right message to appoint a young person, irrespective of party background, to represent a young and dynamic Ulster. It would be wrong to overlook that important point, because Northern Ireland has one of the youngest populations in Europe. Too many people would dismiss that, but it is one of our strong points.

It gives me pleasure to support the amendment. I hope that Members will consider the political and non-political arguments and will appoint the candidate who is capable, has the required knowledge and expertise, and has had the Assembly's support when dealing with European issues. If that happens, this body will be able to genuinely represent people's wishes and concerns.

I spoke to the SDLP and Ulster Unionist Party Whips, and it was made clear that neither of the nominees had the official support of those parties. It seems that something was said to Mr Ford to indicate that Mr Neeson would be regarded as the unofficial nominee of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. That is what was imparted this morning. The Whips said that the parties would not be voting on this, but they should vote, and they should vote for our amendment.

Members should not be left with the impression that Mr Neeson is the official nominee of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. If he is, Members may wish to consider whether they want to support someone who may be in the pockets of the First and Deputy First Ministers because of that. That would not send out the right signal. Mr Poots, however, has the support of the Assembly because he has been Chairperson of the Committee with responsibility for European issues.

Mr McCartney: When I was listening to David Ford's eulogy, in which he spoke of the UUP's and SDLP's support for his nominee, I was minded to warn him of the exhibition that he made of himself when he became the back end of a horse for a day and produced the sort of political material that, in equine terms, the back end of a horse might produce. He was then totally shafted, because, having received some sort of a promise of a review, he got absolutely nothing. He displayed a degree of political judgement that would make one wonder.

David Ford's candidate was formerly the leader of the Alliance Party, and, curiously enough, was succeeded by Mr Ford, who is now attempting to hand out some sort of consolation prize. Mr Neeson, who we are about to suggest should represent us, displayed even more monumental political misjudgement than his new leader when he decided that the Alliance Party would withdraw its candidates from contesting certain constituencies, including North Down. I make no apologies, not so much for pointing out what happened to Bob McCartney, but for pointing out the dire consequences of that decision for Mr Neeson, whose position was rapidly usurped by his current benefactor.

Now we are required to support Mr Neeson. However, what support has he received from his own party? It failed to put him forward as a parliamentary candidate, despite his being party leader, and subsequently it gave him the bullet when it came to his continued occupancy of the august position of leader of a party that —

A Member: He still has a party.

Mr McCartney: He may have a party, but it seems to dissolve itself when elections approach. Mr Paisley Jnr has mentioned the debacle of his European representation in rather kinder terms than I would employ.

Let us look at who the Assembly is intending to send forth as its representative — a person who has not distinguished himself in his own party, who has been dismissed or discharged as being suitable for the party leadership, and who has not enjoyed the support of the rank and file of the people who voted in the European election. He is now being offered some sort of consolation prize as the party representative. If the Assembly wants to send forth as its plenipotentiary in these matters such an exhibit of political success, so be it. However, before it does so, Members should take stock of just what this candidate has offered in the past and what he now has to offer in what may be the autumn of his political career.

Mr O'Connor: I support the motion and Mr Neeson's appointment. Mr Neeson is a decent, honourable man with a pro-European attitude. He would do the Assembly proud as its representative in Europe. Are we seriously to believe Mr McCartney and those from the DUP who suggest that we should send an anti-European to Europe to represent our interests? The DUP leader went there to destroy Europe. We want someone who can represent us in a more positive manner. Seán Neeson is the person for the job, and I will support him.

Mr Hussey: Is Mr O'Connor suggesting that the majority in the House is pro-Europe?

Mr O'Connor: I suggest that the majority in the House would be happy to accept all the money, jobs and benefits that come from Europe.

Mr Morrow: I suspect that all the useful things that need to be said have already been said. However, some of Mr Ford's remarks require comment.

It is ironic that the Alliance Party has made a nomination, bearing in mind some of the comments of my Colleague Ian Paisley Jnr. It must be remembered that when Mr Neeson — who, by definition, is a decent individual — submitted himself to the electorate, he was able to achieve only around 2% of the popular vote. I am sure that he has reflected on that, and I am surprised that he has let his name go forward in the light of his performance in the European election.

For 20 years or more, my party has consistently topped the poll in European elections. Would it not be right and proper for that to be reflected in the Assembly's nomination?

Mr Ford said that it would be verging on a tragedy if two Unionists, namely, the one —

Mr Ford: It was not I.

Mr Morrow: Mr Ford inferred it. He said that Mr Jim Dillon from Lisburn City Council was one of the nominees, and that there would be another nominee from that council. Mr Poots would not be nominated as a member of Lisburn City Council; he would be going forward as the nominee of the Assembly. Mr Ford found it — [Interruption].

Ms Morrice: Does the Member not think that it would be more appropriate if the nominee were pro-European rather than anti-European? Or, perhaps I am wrong in that it is not from an anti-European stance that the DUP is making its nomination.

Mr Morrow: I hear what the Member says. However, she is an intelligent lady and she has been watching the results. She knows who has topped the poll consistently. The leader of my party has taken a stance on Europe, and we should not try to walk past what the people say. Ms Morrice may want to do that in the Women's Coalition, and that may be why it secured such a mammoth vote. However, what Ms Morrice is trying to say goes past me; I do not accept her point. It would be a total irony if Mr Poots were not the nominee of the Assembly.

Mr Neeson is a member of a party that is decreasing by the day, and, as Mr McCartney said, under his leadership it decreased even more — and that was because of him. It is imperative that Mr Poots be the nominee. After all, Mr Ford became a Unionist when it was politically expedient to do so, and I am sure that Mr Neeson will be pro- or anti-Europe whenever it is politically expedient to be so.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Kieran McCarthy to make his winding-up speech.

Mr Ford: Wrong name, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr David Ford.

Mr Ford: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

It does not take too long to respond to the positive comments in this debate, and I thank Danny O'Connor for making nearly all of them. It is bizarre that all the examples cited by DUP Members about Europe dealt with the European Parliament, which was precisely the point that I made earlier. This motion relates to the Council of Europe and not to the European Union.

When the DUP had a party member on the Committee of the Regions in the European Union, he managed to attend about one meeting in four. We could all indulge in petty sniping.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: No. I sat and listened to the Member's rubbish earlier — [Interruption].

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. When a matter of factual inaccuracy is stated, even in a winding-up speech, the Member should, in all conscience, give way so that the accurate position can be given on the Floor of the Assembly.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is entirely up to the Member whether he will give way.

Mr Ford: I will bow to the former Minister's advice.

Mr Paisley Jnr: The Member should be aware that the DUP's nominee at that time was an alternate member who was never entitled to go to any of those meetings. When the person from the Benches over there who was supposed to attend meetings did not go, he did not inform the DUP's nominee of his right to go, so he was not entitled to do so. That should never be allowed to happen again.

Mr Ford: I accept that I failed to use the word "alternates", and I apologise for that. It was certainly my understanding at that time that, rather than Mr Paisley's pointing the finger in this direction, the DUP member was an alternate to an Ulster Unionist, and the Alliance member was an alternate to an SDLP member. Mr Neeson, as the Alliance alternate, attended at least as many meetings as either of the full members. I cannot understand why other members did not speak to their alternates on those occasions.

The debate started off with some moderately sensible comments but degenerated into petty sniping from the Benches on my left. I applaud Seán Neeson's courage in stating the case for Europe, and, when he has had the opportunity, in playing a practical part at European level, principally in European Union institutions. He has shown that he can stand up for what is right for Northern Ireland, and he deserves the confidence of the Assembly to represent us.

CREDIT CARD ABUSE

Mr Dallat: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the recent abuse of credit cards used in the payment of expenses by personnel in Government agencies, as contained in the reports by the Comptroller and Auditor General, and calls for a comprehensive review of how Government Departments and their agencies settle their accounts.

I tabled this motion because, as Chairperson of the Audit Committee and a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I am concerned that the practice of issuing credit cards in the public sector is becoming a threat to the normal financial controls that must operate when taxpayers' money is being spent. The threat to financial controls leading to misuse and abuse of credit cards is at two levels. First, there is evidence, which I shall deal with later, that credit cards are being used to subvert accountability to the Assembly for the spending of public money. That is happening because credit cards can be used to circumvent the provision of financial details in invoices and receipts, which are normally used to verify the integrity of transactions.

Secondly, it is also clear that the credit cards are particularly open to abuse in the area of travel and hospitality expenses, which are notoriously difficult to control, even in the best of systems. When there is extensive use of credit cards, there is a correspondingly significant increase in the risk of impropriety. It is important for the Assembly to highlight that problem at as early a stage as possible and to challenge Departments to provide us with assurances that they will tackle it vigorously before more harm is done to the public's perception of financial integrity in the public sector.

To gain some idea of the usage of such cards, I have submitted written questions to all Departments and the Assembly to seek details of the number of cards issued and the expenditure incurred on them during 2001-02. Some very interesting statistics emerged from my enquiries, many of which raised more questions than answers. For example, throughout the public sector, 201 credit cards have been issued, with expenditure of more than £1.5 million having been incurred on them. In other words, approximately £7,500 was spent on each card. The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development has incurred the most on its cards — almost one third of the total credit card expenditure. In contrast, some of the larger Departments have no expenditure and have not even issued any credit cards.

One surprising finding of the exercise was that the Assembly had issued more cards than any other body. In 2001-02, it had 45 cards in use, which was more than all the main Departments put together. It has also spent vastly more on credit cards than any other Department, excluding the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development — some £230,000. I highlight that because, as everyone in the House will agree, we must be absolutely sure that, when we exercise our scrutiny role over the Civil Service Departments, our own practices and procedures must be beyond reproach and fully transparent. I recognise that, if properly controlled, there are benefits from the use of credit cards. That is worth repeating. Credit cards can have benefits, if they are properly controlled.

The Government Purchasing Agency operates a card system for Departments that is intended to reduce the cost of purchasing transactions. That is eminently sensible, as the scheme is firmly underpinned with careful guidance on how and when the cards can be used, and I fully support that. It is not my intention to try to turn the clock back and stop the use of credit cards; my concern is that they must be properly controlled. Credit cards are open to abuse, therefore the operation of those controls must be subject to careful safeguards and checks. At present, the problem does not receive sufficient priority from some Departments.

Let us review the evidence to date. The first time the abuse of credit cards came to my attention was during the Public Accounts Committee's review of the Fire Authority. During the evidence session, the Committee heard that a Fire Authority official had used the departmental credit card to cover travel costs incurred by a member of his family — he used the card for personal purposes. To compound the error, the official subsequently forgot to pay the amount due, until it was drawn to his attention. That incident drew my attention to the potential pitfalls of using credit cards.

The next time that I came across misuse of credit cards was during the Public Accounts Committee's review of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. Once more, there was evidence that an official in New York was using a card for personal purposes. However, I shall not bore Members with the details, as the Committee will report on the matter later in the session.

The latest case of credit card misuse is in the "Into the West" project. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is carrying out a review of the matter and will produce a report soon. However, such are the alleged abuses in the scheme that they have already reached the newspaper columns. I shall not comment any further on those cases because the allegations have yet to be formally reported. The Public Accounts Committee will undoubtedly consider any such report.

However, common themes emerge from each of the cases to which I have referred: the use of credit cards for personal purchases; poor controls in the monitoring of credit card expenditure; and poor backing papers in support of payments.

One of the strengths of the Northern Ireland system is that the average man in the street has confidence in the integrity of public administration — I cannot emphasise that enough. That confidence must not be taken for granted. It is a fragile plant that could wither in the face of repeated failures of financial control and impropriety. Therefore I call on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to give the problem the highest priority before it does more extensive damage to the credibility of our beloved institutions. I would not be surprised to be told by the Minister that a great deal of work is already under way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, Mr Conor Murphy.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee (Mr C Murphy): I welcome today's debate. It is interesting that we are back to debating financial probity and accountability as, earlier today, the Audit and Accountability Bill was given its Second Stage. It appears that Members are back on track with such matters, as measures to ensure that financial probity, accountability and transparency were described as technical distractions yesterday, when we wanted money thrown at projects without any such safeguards.

I support Mr Dallat's motion, and I echo his sentiments that credit cards when used in the right circumstances can be beneficial. The Public Accounts Committee has already raised the issue, and its concerns are well documented.

During the Public Accounts Committee's evidence session with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board on 30 May, the Chairperson stated:

"Public bodies issue credit cards without proper control or guidance, and the cards have become a mechanism for bypassing the normal careful treatment of hospitality and expenses. They are given to staff who, for the most part, are not trained to use them; some officials, when they get their hands on a piece of plastic for which they are not personally paying the bills, seem to lose all sense of value for money and, in some cases, all sense of propriety."

Although I was not a member of the Committee at that time, I share those concerns. However, the problem is not unique to us. The trend towards increased use of credit cards is happening everywhere. There have been cases in Britain, which have been dealt with by the Public Accounts Committee at Westminster, in which credit card misuse has featured.

What is interesting about those cases, and cases that have been dealt with locally, is that credit card misuse is almost always associated with other major problems of impropriety — lack of financial control or poor standards of administration. It is generally a symptom of more serious administrative malaise, which is why it is always important that it be fully investigated and vigorously tackled.

The Public Accounts Committee has asked the Comptroller and Auditor General to be especially vigilant in examining credit card expenditure in his audits of all public bodies in the North. I am glad to report that he has undertaken to do that, which is reassuring. However, it is not enough, as audit — by its very nature — is retrospective. That is why the real burden of dealing with the issue falls on those who have responsibility for financial control in the day-to-day operations of Departments and their subsidiary bodies. That applies especially to the Department of Finance and Personnel, which, I am sure, shares the Public Accounts Committee's concerns.

In the course of its work, the Public Accounts Committee requested the Department of Finance and Personnel to issue further guidance on the control of credit cards. I would like to hear an announcement from the Minister that adequately addresses the Committee's concerns.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologise to the Member for calling him as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, when it is the Public Accounts Committee of which he has recently become Deputy Chairperson.

Mr Close: Like Mr Murphy, I commend Mr Dallat for tabling the motion. It comes at a particularly opportune time, as reports are being prepared that highlight what can only be referred to as "dubious practices". As elected representatives, Members have a duty to taxpayers. At Budget time, Members vote to allocate taxpayers' money to various Departments, to be spent on legitimate purposes agreed by the Assembly. It is, therefore, incumbent on Members to ensure that taxpayers' money is properly accounted for in all cases.

Earlier today, the Assembly agreed the Second Stage of the Audit and Accountability Bill, which will help to open up more accounts to the scrutiny of the Comptroller and Auditor General, enable him to better follow taxpayers' money, and demonstrate transparency and accountability. This debate highlights the potential abuse of credit cards. Today, therefore, the Assembly is sending out a strong message that abuse of taxpayers' money will not be tolerated. Indeed, zero tolerance will be the benchmark.

Credit cards are, undoubtedly, a convenient and less painful way of spending money — even one's own money. However, a piece of plastic can make some people feel like millionaires. They can be tempted to dispense largesse as if there is no tomorrow, with the foolish belief that the end of the month is merely a mirage.

As guardians of the public purse, the Assembly must make certain that meaningful controls are in place to ensure, as far as possible, that abuse or careless expenditure cannot take place. It is equally important, should careless or inappropriate expenditure take place, to take strong action against any transgression. Those who have credit cards issued to them by Departments, or by the Assembly, need to remember that it is not their money. They should therefore think at least twice before using such a card. They must be in no doubt that they will be held accountable for its use and, certainly, for any abuse.

Regrettably, my experience on the Public Accounts Committee has shown me that, at times, a distinct lack of control seems to exist in the minds not only of those who have use of a card, but, more alarmingly, in the minds of those who have a financial control function. At times, they appear to have been remiss in exercising control and authority. A crazy situation arose in the Public Accounts Committee where attempts were made to convince the Committee that expenditure on a certain credit card was totally justified even though thousands of pounds worth of receipts were missing.

2.15 pm

A credit card can fuel a bad attitude towards taxpayers' money, and we need to change that. We must put the brakes on and rein in the big spenders by ensuring that proper controls are in place. A duty of care exists not only on those who have a credit card, but on those who issue them. They too are accountable, and they must realise that.

Credit cards can be and, at times, are a temptation. Those entrusted with them should learn the lesson from the Lord's Prayer:

"Lead us not into temptation".

They should be assured that they will never be delivered from having to account for their expenditure.

I regret that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is not in the Chamber. Yesterday, I asked a pretty innocuous question about credit card use for hospitality in New York. I want to make it abundantly clear to all Members that the reason so many questions have been asked of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) is, unequivocally, the reluctance of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to answer fully questions posed by the Public Accounts Committee.

There is a lesson therein. When an accounting officer appears before the Public Accounts Committee, he has a duty to answer questions clearly and unequivocally, and to get directly to the point. There must be no attempt to avoid the issue, because that leads to many questions. That is why many questions have been asked about credit cards, and of the NITB in particular.

Mr McClarty raised the cost of such questions. The cost of those questions pales into total and absolute insignificance when compared to the damage the public's confidence suffers when they realise that Departments have failed to exercise control over how taxpayers' money is spent.

Let us examine some of the Public Accounts Committee's reports. The 'Report on Internal Fraud in the Local Enterprise Development Unit' uncovered £200,000 of fraud.

The 'Report on the Brucellosis Outbreak' at the Agricultural Research Institute found that more than £1 million had been wasted. A report on the community regeneration schemes has found some £8 million of loans. In the 'Report on The Rural Development Programme', the sum of money was some £50 million. The common thread that runs through those situations was a lack of control. The motion is about trying to impress "control" as the watchword and about emphasising that there is no moving away from the need to follow clear guidance and controls.

I welcome the Minister's comment yesterday that credit cards

"are a perfectly legitimate means of dealing with public expenditure provided the procedures are in place to ensure accountability." [Official Report, Bound Volume 18, p283]

The core issue, as the Minister said, is to ensure that the people who use credit cards are accountable.

Given that the Tourist Board did not even know that its New York manager was using the card and that the Minister's Department did not know whether instructions to stop using it had been issued or whether there had merely been discussion on the matter, I fail to understand how Sir Reg Empey can be satisfied that proper procedures were in place and that the manager was accountable. Control, control, control will lead to accountability. As elected representatives, we should settle for nothing less. I know and trust that the Minister will treat the issue with the importance that it deserves, and will introduce the necessary controls on the use of credit cards and the spending of public money.

Mr Kennedy: I am pleased to contribute to the debate and will not speak for too long. It was unfortunate that Mr Close seemed to pre-empt the Public Accounts Committee's report. That report will eventually make its way to the House where it will be given due and serious consideration.

Mr Close: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Public Accounts Committee has already dealt with the issues to which I referred. The reports are in the public domain, and if the Member doubts that, I shall gladly provide him with copies.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr Kennedy: At least Mr Dallat showed some caution when discussing the matter in the absence of the appropriate Minister. It might have been more reasonable for Mr Close to have waited until the Minister at whose Department his criticisms were aimed had the opportunity to respond in the Chamber. However, I understand that Dr Farren is the Minister who takes the lead on those issues, and he is in the Chamber today. I look forward to his response.

On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I stress that the abuse of credit cards is inexcusable and indefensible. It cannot be justified in any circumstance, and any impropriety must be investigated and dealt with appropriately. We should allow the systems and procedures that have been put in place by the House, and by Ministers who are accountable to the House, to be followed before we establish ourselves as judge, jury and, perhaps, executioner. To ensure accountability, staff who are responsible for carrying a credit card should be given appropriate training and should take care to provide receipts for transactions whenever possible. I hope that the Minister will include such measures in any proposed new scheme or approach.

When commenting on this, people have a tendency to make allegations without producing evidence to back them up. There has been much public comment on the matter, and it cheapens the debate when Members resort to making such allegations in public. Members should not use the issue to promote themselves or to start a political vendetta. Unfortunately, the evidence suggests that some Members are intent on doing just that. I hope that such behaviour will be avoided in future. I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr C Murphy: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Mr Kennedy referred to political vendettas and possible motives. Has he ever declared an interest when Northern Ireland Tourist Board issues have been discussed and allegations made in the Assembly? He has frequently attacked some Members and defended others who have questioned those matters; however, I have yet to hear him declare an interest, in that he was a member of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member knows, as a former Chairperson of the Committee on Procedures, that Members' interests are declared in advance in the Register of Members' Interests. I am assuming that Mr Kennedy has done that.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is important that I establish the fact that, as far as I know, I have registered that interest with the appropriate body.

Mr Carrick: In my circumstances, I can honestly claim not to be publicly or politically profiling myself for any forthcoming elections. Anything I say, therefore, is in the interests of the voter, the general public and — as Mr Close indicated — accountability. That is how it should be when it comes to the use or misuse of public funds.

In some ways, it should not have been necessary to table the motion. The vast majority of Government officials and agency staff observe the highest standards of financial propriety and are fully compliant with the guidelines for the use of credit cards. However, the issue has come to the attention of the Public Accounts Committee, and I want to emphasise to Mr Kennedy that there is ample evidence of credit card misuse in the public sector. It is clear from the Comptroller and Auditor General's reports that the public sector's use of credit cards is a growing problem.

Other Members referred to specific cases that have come to the Public Accounts Committee's attention. Those cases reveal two weaknesses about the way in which some public bodies have handled the growing number of credit cards in use. First, cards appear to be issued without proper guidance for staff on their use. That is surprising. In those circumstances, it is little wonder that some staff have abused cards and attempted to circumvent the public sector's normally strong controls for ensuring that payments and refunds of expenses are incurred properly and accounted for fully. That is strange. The evidence suggests, however, that in some cases there was a lack of knowledge about policy. It might be thought unnecessary to spell out to public servants that office credit cards should not be used for cash withdrawals or for personal expenses. However, as Mr Dallat said, experience shows that that does happen.

Moreover, credit cards are often issued to senior management, and it is especially regrettable that people in management positions were responsible for several of the recent lapses — not the tea maker or the canteen lady. They have no excuse for their actions. Their personal standards should have told them that they should not misuse or abuse public funds. Senior management should set an example in how to account for expenditure.

I am concerned about a second issue. Departments must realise that it is not good enough merely to issue guidance on the use of cards. It seems that, although comprehensive guidance was issued, procedures were not in place to ensure that staff were familiar with it and that they followed it. To monitor guidance and policy is insufficient. Action would have ensured that problems were identified earlier. Indeed, it might have prevented problems from escalating to a point at which they were so worrying as to threaten to discredit the use of credit cards altogether.

I do not want it to become necessary to ban or severely restrict the use of credit cards in the public sector. There is a good case for using credit cards for some transactions, so long as the normal trail of accountability for public money is not undermined. That must be emphasised.

Sustaining accountability is a challenge for Departments, and, by drawing attention to the problem today, it is to be hoped that Members will ensure that the Minister acts promptly to put the use of credit cards in the public sector on a sound footing and so prevent the escalation of the worrying problems that we have seen in the past two years.

It should not have been necessary to have this debate. However, the Public Accounts Committee has accumulated sufficient evidence on credit card abuse to support its call for a comprehensive review of how Departments and their agencies settle their accounts.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel (Dr Farren):

On behalf of the Executive, I welcome the opportunity to respond to the motion. I listened carefully to the Members who spoke. In the past few months, I have noted the concerns of the Northern Ireland Audit Office (NIAO) and the Public Accounts Committee about the use of credit cards by public bodies.

I emphasise that propriety and proper standards in public life are vital for those who are involved in the work of Government. The Audit and Accountability Bill, which Members discussed this morning, demonstrates clearly the Executive's intent to strengthen mechanisms for effective and stringent forms of accountability. The general welcome that the Bill received confirms that that intent is widely shared in the House.

The integrity of the processes of the institutions in Northern Ireland must be supported by the proper control by officials of the handling of public money, and that applies equally to the use of credit cards.

Several Members acknowledged that there are certain significant benefits in using credit cards for some types of transaction. Their use can be more cost-effective and efficient than other methods of payment, and it is important to remind Members of that. Therefore, in principle, I have no objection to their use, and I am not necessarily concerned about the number in circulation. However, the controls that are associated with their use are key, whatever their number.

There are potential problems with credit cards if they are used inappropriately or if there are inadequate internal controls. I agree with Mr Dallat's comments about the need to properly control the use of the credit cards. It is important to have rigorous safeguards, because the nature of credit cards means that those controls must be watertight. The Department of Finance and Personnel has issued guidance that makes that abundantly clear.

Mr Dallat referred to the procurement card scheme that my Department's Procurement Service operates; I encourage its use. The Government procurement card provides all the benefits and facilities of the more traditional corporate credit card, but, importantly, it can provide more security and more controls. Those include enhanced indemnities and restrictions on the monthly accounts and categories of spend. It is for those reasons that the use of the Government procurement card is recommended for all public bodies.

Mr Dallat mentioned the case of credit card misuse in the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland. In that case, the Chief Fire Officer incurred personal expenses. That was wrong, which he has acknowledged. Subsequent to the publication of the Public Accounts Committee's report, my Department wrote to all Departments and advised them that personal expenses must not be charged to credit cards.

More recently, concerns about the use of a credit card by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's New York office manager were highlighted in a Public Accounts Committee evidence session. The report on that case will be published shortly, and I await it with interest. I trust that it will be a further spur to addressing issues that are in the public domain, and my Department will follow up on relevant matters.

During the Tourist Board evidence session, my Department gave a commitment that it would revisit the guidance on the use of credit cards to ascertain whether it could be further strengthened and developed. My Department has now prepared revised guidelines on the use of credit cards, and those will be issued shortly to all Departments and public bodies.

Training courses already exist in matters regarding financial recording and control, and those will also be reviewed to ensure that they meet the needs of proper accountability for, and the recording of, all public expenditure.

I assure Mr Dallat and other Members that the Executive are committed to high standards in the handling of public money in Northern Ireland. Important lessons have been drawn from the cases to which I referred, and those are being taken on board in Departments by accounting officers. My Department is supporting the Public Accounts Committee in its work on the matter. Problems have been identified, action has been taken, and there will be other follow-up measures.

Let me make it clear that I welcome the work and the reports of the Public Accounts Committee in that area, and I commend the Committee for drawing our attention to several important issues.

Mr Dallat: I thank everyone who participated in the debate, and I especially thank the Minister for his positive response. The misuse of credit cards to date, together with the potential for further abuse, must be dealt with head-on — we have received that assurance. The incidences of credit card abuse that were described have been extremely embarrassing to the Departments involved and have greatly undermined public confidence in the Administration.

Key questions were raised today, which the Minister addressed. Are the cards required? A question that has been emphasised repeatedly is: are adequate controls in place? More importantly, have the controls been implemented? Are the cards being used only when appropriate? Where cards have been misused, have lessons been learnt? Have controls been introduced to prevent further abuse? The Minister has taken appropriate action to ensure that.

The only downside to the debate was Mr Kennedy's negative attitude — I am extremely disappointed that he has not stayed for the summing-up — and his use of words and phrases like “vendetta” and “judge, jury and, perhaps, executioner”, although the language is more moderate than that used yesterday. I am sure that I speak for every member of the Public Accounts Committee and for every Member of the Assembly when I say — and if Billy Bell were present today, I am sure he, too, would agree — that we do not want these issues to become a political or sectarian football. Accountability to the taxpayer is too great an issue to become embroiled in petty point-scoring and name-calling. I thought that the Assembly was mature enough to deal with such matters in a reasonable and pragmatic manner. Unfortunately, some Members still have to climb out of entrenched positions. They fail to recognise that the Assembly has a prime responsibility to safeguard the taxpayers' money.

It may surprise Mr Kennedy to know that I listened carefully to Sir Reg Empey's response to questions yesterday on the credit card issued to the Tourist Board's New York manager, and, believe it or not, I agree with most of what he said. I welcome particularly the Minister's comment on credit cards that

“the core issue is to ensure that the people who use them are accountable and answerable.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 18, p283]

Words must be matched by deeds, and the evidence suggests that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment was perhaps the most guilty in its failure to properly control credit card expenditure.

I do not, however, want to end on a negative note. I thank again those Members who made a valuable and positive contribution to the debate, and I welcome the Minister's response, which clearly demonstrated that the Assembly is mature enough to ensure that every single penny of public money is accounted for and well spent.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the recent abuse of credit cards used in the payment of expenses by personnel in Government agencies, as contained in the reports by the Comptroller and Auditor General, and calls for a comprehensive review of how Government Departments and their agencies settle their accounts.

VICTIMS' MEMORIAL GARDEN

Mr Foster: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the heartache and suffering of the families of victims who perished as a result of the September 11 terrorist attack in the United States and welcomes Her Majesty's Government's funding for a memorial garden in remembrance of those victims. Accordingly, this Assembly calls upon Her Majesty's Government to extend the same respect to the victims who died as a result of terrorism in this part of the United Kingdom by financing the creation of a similar memorial garden in Great Britain.

Much comment has been made about victims over the years, and, of course, that has caused a great deal of heated discussion. The tabling of this motion comes on the back of recent press coverage of Rita Restorick's request for Government funding for a memorial. Mrs Restorick is outraged by the refusal of Her Majesty's Government to provide financial support for a memorial garden in Great Britain to commemorate soldiers who died as a result of terrorist acts during the Northern Ireland troubles.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

Mrs Restorick asked the Government to pay for plaques for the trees in the Ulster Ash Grove at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire, at a cost of £72,000. At the moment, a plastic label engraved with the name of a victim is tied around each tree. There are 719 trees, each one representing a British soldier murdered in Northern Ireland. However, the Government said that they had a policy of not providing state funds for such memorials because "it would not be fair to be seen to support one group rather than another."

One can appreciate the difficulty that the Government face when dealing with the many requests for assistance. However, there is a clear lack of consistency in their actions, and they seem to have disregarded their policy.

On 13 August 2002, Tessa Jowell, the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, announced plans for a memorial garden to commemorate the victims of the 11 September attacks in the United States. The Government are contributing £1 million to the memorial at Grosvenor Square Garden in London. It is important to say that the victims of those terrorist attacks have a right to remember their loved ones that should not be denied. However, we should also be sensitive to the hearts of the victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Essentially, the motion calls for equality of treatment: we wish to see parity of esteem. The families of the victims of 11 September should be able to remember their loved ones through a Government-financed memorial, and so too should the families of the victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland. Security personnel and civilians who died as a result of terrorism should be recognised.

What have our Government done to remember the two people killed in the London docklands bomb in February 1996? In April 1993, an IRA bomb in Bishopsgate in London killed one person and injured 44. Just one year before that, three people were killed by an IRA bomb outside the Baltic Exchange in London. As far as I am aware, the Government have not directly funded any memorial for military personnel or civilians killed during the troubles.

There may be some confusion about whether we are calling for a separate memorial garden for civilians killed as a result of terrorism. The primary reason for the motion is to call on the Government to consistently adhere to their policy. For example, they should fund the plaques that Rita Restorick has been calling for. However, there is an argument that a memorial garden should be set up for civilian victims, funded by the Government.

While I was drafting this speech, I was amazed to find that the Government had consulted the families of victims of 11 September. What consultation have the Government undertaken recently with the families of the victims that I mentioned? The Government should not add to the pain and suffering of those families; they should be proud of those who, despite what some may suggest, lost their lives protecting everyone in Northern Ireland, regardless of which community they belonged to. I have a duty to those who were murdered because they paid the price for protecting me and you in this Province. Ironically, those soldiers protected the lives of people who will undoubtedly be opposed to the motion for political reasons. I hope that we will be able to have a sensible debate, and that we will not be dragged into the sectarian gutter.

It is vital to point out that, for the 719 British soldiers murdered, few murderers have been convicted. Families find it hard to deal with that pain, and our Government's hypocrisy and double standards are only another kick in the teeth. While Her Majesty's Government marked time, and, in doing so, offended many good and broken-hearted citizens, an event took place that was most offensive to those who had lost loved ones in the terrorist campaign. A gala dinner, held in Dublin some months ago, was organised by the IRA and graced — wait for it — by Sinn Féin's Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness. Relatives were presented with a gold Easter lily for each of their dead.

That shows that an illegal army grouping is admired and recognised. Those terrorists who destroyed so many and so much over the past 30 years are seen as heroes because they destroyed so many people and broke so many hearts and homes. Meanwhile, all those innocents who suffer and sorrow over their loved ones wait in vain for some official recognition of the ash grove. That is due to an entrenched Ministry of Defence culture that says that when in the slightest doubt, it is best to do absolutely nothing. Nobody would ever say so publicly, but some officials, officers and politicians are bending over backwards not to offend the paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland.

I think specifically of the many innocent victims who went out to do their daily chores and never returned to their loved ones. They had no intent to murder and maim. They did not go out in a premeditated fashion to murder anyone, whereas terrorists go out to destroy by whatever means.

I think deeply about the atrocities at La Mon House; Teebane; Greysteel; my home town of Enniskillen some 15 years ago; Kingsmills; Claudy, currently in the news due to the allegations coming to the fore; and Omagh, the worst atrocity in size. Those were terrible acts and inhumane deeds against a community. Are they ever pardonable? They are but a few of the brutal acts of aggression perpetrated against this community. Concentrate your mind on the blood, broken bodies and broken hearts in the aftermath. Those hearts and minds were torn asunder, never to be the same again. What a horrible thought. What an affliction upon so many innocents, yet recognition of those victims is begrudged.

All compassionate people will support the motion. Innocent victims are those who suffered at the hands of terrorists. Innocents do not go out in a premeditated fashion to murder and to destroy. It was not because of any commission or lack of commission on their part that they became victims.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received one amendment to the motion, which is published on the Marshalled List of amendments.

Mr Berry: I beg to move the following amendment: In line 6, after “respect to the”, insert: “innocent”.

I commend our Colleagues for tabling the motion.

It is right and proper that we discuss this sensitive issue. The events of September 11 have drawn worldwide attention to terrorism as a gross and wicked evil that must be eradicated. When bin Laden and his cohorts blew up the twin towers on September 11, he also blew up the polite fiction of romantic terrorism, which was widespread in New York regarding the ferocious, murderous and bloodthirsty campaign of Sinn Féin/IRA. We had to suffer that murder campaign for 30 years, but, sadly, many turned a blind eye to those activities. It seems that the innocent who were made to suffer so much are at last getting some deserved recognition. However, even in this, we must tread carefully.

The amendment in the name of my Colleague Maurice Morrow and me seeks to make clear precisely who the victims are, and there is a need to do so. As one writer put it:

“this is in part because the mind-twisting of the terrorist feeds the moral confusion of the West’s — the UK’s — “corrupted liberal orthodoxy. This sees a moral equivalence between terror and measures to protect against it. Believing there is no such thing as truth, it embraces lies instead and cannot distinguish victims from their victimisers.”

There is a moral imperative to distinguish between those who perpetrate crime and those who are the innocent victims of that crime. Failure to do so leads to, and creates, injustice and moral confusion. The current vogue for making everyone a victim is a direct result of the denial of moral absolutes, which is the key feature of our post-modern age.

There is a difference between those who were murdered at Greysteel, Kingsmills, Narrow Water Castle, Claudy, Omagh and, regrettably, a host of other atrocities, and those who committed such crimes. Those murdered were people going about their normal activities, whether at the shops, at work, in their church or in a pub socialising. Those are the kinds of people who were hated by terrorists no matter what side of the community they came from. They were considered as legitimate targets and were thus killed or maimed. They deserve our tears, and they deserve to be remembered.

People who set out to kill, maim and destroy deserve no tears. Whatever political logic led them to such acts did not, and does not, justify the murder, death and destruction of our innocent people. Their names should be held in contempt, as they are by decent and honourable people. They committed atrocities and heinous crimes against innocent people, and their names should not be recorded on any memorial bearing victims’ names. Many people find it sickening that those who have been active in terrorism, or who have supported it, try to excuse themselves by claiming an affinity with, and to be included in, the concept of a victim.

There is no moral equivalence between a bomber and a victim. We hear the sentimental nonsense that we are all victims. That is nothing but an attempt to excuse the perpetrators and to shift the blame to the innocent victims — as if they were partly responsible for the crime. It is to say that victims were responsible for their own deaths or injuries at the hands of terrorists. That does a double disservice to the victim and is morally repugnant to all right-thinking people.

It is imperative that a distinction be made clearly today. If it is not, the Assembly will demonstrate that it lacks the moral principles to distinguish between right and wrong. Are we to say that there is a similarity between the terrorists and the workmen murdered at Teebane, or those murdered in the bookie’s shop on the Ormeau Road? I do not think so. So long as the command not to murder remains, the distinction between the victim and the perpetrator will also remain.

I have spoken to victims' groups on many occasions. It always came across clearly that they did not want to be remembered alongside those who claimed to be victims but were really perpetrators of heinous crimes. It was also clear that terrorists, from whatever side of the community, had a choice. People in Greysteel, enjoying a pint with their neighbours and friends, did not have a choice about being murdered: it was placed on them, and crime and murder prevailed.

Terrorists do not understand exactly what has happened. They had the choice to go out and kill, or to not go out and kill. Sadly they went out and killed innocent people. Victims — from whatever side of the community — did not have a choice, whether they were worshipping God in Darkley Gospel Hall, or having a pint in Greysteel or anywhere else across the country. Gunmen came in and murdered them in front of everyone.

I support the amendment.

Dr Hendron: On Friday 28 June I held my last surgery in primary care — I had been in practice for around 40 years. I could go on for hours, as could many Members, about the victims who were slaughtered and about the families who are still trying to pick up the pieces.

Like other Members, I attended the funerals and looked into the graves — some of the people had been my patients. I remember attending to a young soldier on the Falls Road as he breathed his last breath. Everything that I have been taught and every feeling that I have makes me deeply resentful of taking human life, no matter whose life it is. No person has a right to take anyone else's life — whether inside or outside the womb — and I feel very strongly about that.

In all my years in primary care I had much experience of dealing with families who have had someone taken away. It was usually the father who was taken, although occasionally it was the mother. We had the case of Jean McConville, the mother of 10, who has been mentioned again recently.

3.00 pm

I also deeply resent the fact that young families are reared without their fathers every day of the week and every week of the year. It is not surprising that some of those young children, partly because of what happened to their fathers, become involved in the wrong activities, even paramilitary activities. I could go on for hours about that.

I have talked about those who have died; but there are also the injured bodies. I have known several policemen who have suffered horrific injuries. One or two of them are in wheelchairs, and their suffering continues. Children who are now adults still carry scars. However, it is not only about the scars on people's bodies, but about the scars on people's hearts and on the two communities in Northern Ireland. I think it was Churchill who said that the alternative to peace was war. However, the reverse is also true: the alternative to war is peace.

The Assembly has no control over demands made of the Government in Britain. The idea of a memorial garden for all the victims of the troubles is a good one in principle, but it must be achieved through a broad political consensus. The location of such a garden, its nature and style, and whom it should commemorate are important considerations. That consensus should involve Nationalists, Republicans, Unionists and Loyalists; otherwise it becomes a points-scoring exercise. We have only to think of Loyalist and Republican memorials and the strife, division and hatred that they cause. Consensus has not been reached, because the community has not come to terms with its history. Therefore, the question is premature.

All victims of the troubles should be acknowledged, both individually and collectively. We have supported the Executive's extensive proposals for assisting victims. We have advocated the establishment, from public funds, of a centre for reconciliation, which would contain a state-of-the-art audio-visual archive in a central public building. Such a centre would allow visitors to hear testimonies from victims or their families. That has happened in South Africa. Moreover we would see what was happening in the process of cross-community reconciliation, and we approve of an annual day of reconciliation.

I often wonder what we can do for those who have died. My party has made proposals in that regard. However, some people would say that the mightiest voice of all is the voice of God, and I accept that. As a Christian, I remember the words of the old song:

"If those lips could only speak
If those eyes could only see".

If only those who have been killed could speak to us. I have no monopoly on what they might say, but I feel in my heart that they would not want revenge or war. They would want peace for their families and a future for their children. It is important to remember the dead, but let us help those who have suffered. I know that many are trying to do that.

Above all, the biggest tribute that we could pay to the dead of Northern Ireland — whether soldiers, police officers or civilians — would be to make the structures of the Assembly work. The Assembly is the future for the people, especially the children, of Northern Ireland.

Mr McNamee: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá cúpla focal le rá agam. While the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement head for collapse, we have yet another selective motion on victims from the Ulster Unionist Party.

There are two parts to the motion. The first part deals with the events of 11 September. I have no difficulty in recognising the heartache, suffering, loss and grief of the families of all the victims of the attack on the twin towers. That part of the motion makes no distinction between any of the victims of that terrible event. It equally recognises Irish Americans, English Americans, other nationalities and ethnic groups; it makes no distinction between blacks, whites and people from other ethnic backgrounds; and it gives equal recognition to the manual workers who were carrying out maintenance work on the building and to the company executives who worked there — all of whom perished.

Dr Birnie: Does the Member accept that the point about the memorial in London is that it does draw a distinction? It draws a distinction between those who died in the twin towers as a result of terrorism and those who were sadly responsible for flying the aircraft into the towers — the terrorists. That is the crucial distinction. What the Member says, therefore, is not relevant.

Mr McNamee: I do not accept that my remarks are not relevant. All the victims of the events of 11 September are equally recognised in the terms of this motion. There should be no distinction between the victims. All the victims and their families should receive equal recognition.

However, the second part of the motion calls for the finance to create a memorial garden

“to the victims who died as a result of terrorism in this part of the United Kingdom”.

Who will define terrorism? Members know what the Ulster Unionist Party and others mean by the “victims” of terrorism. They focus first on the victims of IRA and Republican actions and then, selectively, on the victims of other paramilitary groups. In doing so, they exclude the victims of British state forces and the victims of British collusion in this part of Ireland and in the rest of Ireland. The motion refers to victims in this part of Ireland and, in doing so, excludes victims in the rest of Ireland and in Britain.

The motion excludes the families of the victims of the Monaghan and Dublin bombings. That exclusive approach to victims is part of a wider and deeper problem in Unionism. We are eight years into the peace process, yet Unionists seem not to be prepared to accept that conflict resolution means a recognition of all victims of the conflict equally. There can be no hierarchy of victims.

The section of the Good Friday Agreement titled “Reconciliation and Victims of Violence” states that “it is essential to acknowledge and address the suffering of the victims of violence as a necessary element of reconciliation.”

“Acknowledge” and “address” are the key words.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Please bear with me, Mr McNamee. Yesterday, during the debate on the Belfast Rape Crisis and Sexual Abuse Centre, which I thought was a crucial issue, I was disappointed that some Members were indulging in private conversations while Members spoke. This debate is also on a serious issue and, again, I am disappointed to find some Members carrying on private conversations.

Mr McNamee: Mr Deputy Speaker, I assure you that I am not engaging in a private conversation. What I have to say is for the public to hear. The Good Friday Agreement states that it is essential to “acknowledge” and “address” the issues of all victims. Republicans have publicly acknowledged the suffering of all victims, but I do not hear anything from Unionists thus far that recognises or acknowledges all the victims of the conflict.

In my constituency of Newry and Armagh, Peter Cleary was abducted and shot dead. He was unarmed and had been searched, and he was shot dead by members of the British Army. Majella O'Hare was a schoolgirl when she was shot dead by members of the Parachute Regiment.

The motion seeks to exclude the families of those victims and to deny their loss and suffering. Many people are observing the current situation, the Ulster Unionist Party and the political institutions that arose from the Good Friday Agreement. There is a belief that Ulster Unionism is walking away from the agreement before it walks away from the institutions in January. Another paragraph in the Good Friday Agreement says that

“It is recognised that victims have a right to remember as well as to contribute to a changed society. The achievement of a peaceful and just society would be the true memorial to the victims of violence.”

The DUP has tabled an amendment that seeks to exclude victims' families further. It wishes to reduce the recognition of victims to “innocent” victims. Who will determine whether victims were innocent? Will the DUP decide? The DUP seeks to label some victims as innocent and, by implication, others as guilty. We have heard a great deal about the victims of Republican violence, and I acknowledge and accept the suffering that the actions of Republicans and the IRA have caused to the victims and their families. However, in recent months, Loyalist violence has been responsible for taking people's lives, and for making women widows and children parentless. That violence represents the greatest threat to the peace process and the process of reconciliation.

I support a call for the British Government to finance a memorial garden to acknowledge all the victims of the conflict here over the past 30 years. Sinn Féin is willing to acknowledge the suffering of all victims, including those to whom Mr Foster and Mr Berry referred. However, it will not support a motion that seeks to remember some victims and exclude others.

Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Boyd: It is right and proper that Her Majesty's Government provide and fund a memorial garden to commemorate the victims of the 11 September attacks. They were victims of appalling acts of terrorism against democracy and freedom. On 13 August, Tessa Jowell, the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport at Westminster, referred to the memorial garden for the 11 September victims. She stated:

"Our intention is to provide a garden that will be simple, dignified and designed to the highest quality. It will also allow for privacy and seclusion for visitors. The families affected have, of course, been consulted and the design draws on their suggestions."

However, the same rights should apply to the innocent victims who died as a result of terrorism in Northern Ireland. It is essential that Her Majesty's Government treat them equally. Regrettably, instead of the victims being treated with dignity and respect, Her Majesty's Government are treating them in a disgraceful way for political expediency. It is a scandal that relatives of servicemen who were murdered in Northern Ireland must pay £100 each if they want a permanent memorial plaque erected in memory of their loved ones. A date has not even been arranged for the dedication of a memorial garden at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire. Some regiments have agreed to pay for plaques, but others have said that the cost is prohibitive, as they have lost so many men.

It is appalling that the victims' families have been left to pay for memorial plaques for their loved ones who made the supreme sacrifice for their country against the evils of terrorism. A special dedication service for the innocent victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland was due to have taken place in September 2001 at the Ulster Ash Grove Memorial, but Her Majesty's Government have yet to arrange it.

According to the 'Daily Express' of 29 April 2002, an Army source claimed that Ministry of Defence officials are worried about sending out the wrong signals by holding an official ceremony while the peace process is at a delicate stage. The Army source added that no one would ever say so publicly, but there are officials, officers and politicians who are bending over backwards not to offend the paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland. That is a scandal. It is essential that the innocent victims who were murdered as a result of terrorism here receive the same respect from Her Majesty's Government as the victims of 11 September.

3.15 pm

I support the amended motion. A distinction must be made between the innocent victims murdered by the evils of terrorism and the terrorists who perpetrated such atrocities. All decent, law-abiding people know the difference. However, the tablers of the motion displayed grave hypocrisy. They compounded the hurt of the victims of terrorists and their families by placing the political wing of the Provisional IRA in the Government of Northern Ireland.

The families of those murdered by terrorists are justifiably angry that their loved ones have died in vain. The tablers of the motion and their party must recognise that we have a duty as democrats to uphold the principles of democracy and the rule of law. It would therefore be a fitting tribute to the memory of the innocent victims and a fundamental requirement of democracy to exclude terrorists from the Government of Northern Ireland with immediate effect.

Mr Shannon: I support the amendment proposed by my Colleague Paul Berry. It gives me an opportunity to highlight the issue on behalf of the innocent victims. There has been a shortfall in the Government's attitude towards the victims of terrorist attacks in Northern Ireland. I wonder what the reasons are for not acknowledging people here; perhaps we are too far away. Many people think that the Government feel that they do not need to bother with us.

The catalogue of callous disregard for the innocent victims of terrorist activity in the Province is highlighted by the compensation procedure. Widows and parents of police officers were offered a few hundred pounds in compensation for the loss of their spouses or children. We recently heard how surviving victims who tried to obtain compensation have been treated for years. It should, therefore, come as no surprise that the Government have never offered to build a memorial garden for the innocent victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

There is no sign to future generations of the hurt and pain that this country has felt for the past 30 years, except the feelings in the hearts of those who have lost loved ones. There is no monument to the people who were butchered for someone else's cause, some by people associated with this Chamber, according to the headlines in yesterday's papers.

I, and many Members, have lost friends at the hands of people who stated that the deaths and carnage were acceptable war losses in their fight for patriotism. What is sickening is that I can see the faces and names of my friends and many others. I have an RUC poster on the wall of my office — Members may have similar pictures in their advice centres — that has the pictures and names of all the police officers who gave their lives in the service of Queen and country, the people and their families. Each picture tells a story of sacrifice.

Neither outsiders who visit this country nor future generations will be able to recall the names or faces of the victims. That situation must be rectified now. We must have a more significant memorial than the poster in my office.

There is no Christian way to deal with the pain other than to respect those who lost their lives in this country by establishing a lasting memorial of some kind. The bombs and bullets used against the people of this country shattered not only lives and families, they fractured communities. Every gramme of Semtex and every ounce of lead used against the people of the Province deepened the polarisation of the country.

The Labour Government have not aided the healing process; they have snubbed the hurt, the bereaved and the angry. Many people are angry about their treatment of victims. The Labour Government recognise Her Majesty's subjects who died in America — as do we — or those who died in other war-torn parts of the world. However, they have never proposed such recognition of the people from all parts of the United Kingdom and Europe who were murdered right on their doorstep. There is no difference between the victims of al-Qaeda, ETA or the IRA. We must ask why the Government have never proposed a memorial to the victims of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Words alone cannot explain to others the pain and hurt experienced when a loved one has been brutally snatched from a loving home. However, a place of reflection and sanctity that honours the victims gives families a focus for their healing, or their anger at what has taken place. It is a permanent reminder of those who have been killed, so that their sacrifice is not forgotten and the abhorrent actions of those who work for a mythical cause are not brushed under the carpet and overlooked in all the rhetoric of the peace process.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Is it not significant that, in the British House of Commons, there is no memorial to the Rev Robert Bradford, although there are such memorials to Airey Neave and others? When a motion was tabled by some Unionist Members acting across the board, it was rejected.

Mr Shannon: I thank the hon Member for his contribution, which puts matters in clear perspective. There is selective recognition at Westminster. The murders of Airey Neave and Robert Bradford were equal in their horror and the impact that they had on their families, and they should have been recognised and remembered equally at Westminster as many of us remember them here.

In January 1970, during the Vietnam War, Major Michael Davis O'Donnell illustrated succinctly the thoughts of the ordinary citizens of this country when they are asked whether there should be a memorial to the victims of the troubles. His troubles were in a different place, and yet he opposed a faceless danger that was similar to that which the security forces and the innocent victims of this country have faced here over the years. The danger that he faced was similar to that faced by the ordinary people of Northern Ireland who died on our streets and thus became our heroes, and who remain in our past as a testimony to how much we have all suffered and how much we have lost. Major O'Donnell wrote:

"If you are able,
save for them a place inside of you and save one backward glance when you are leaving for the places they can no longer go.
Be not ashamed to say you loved them,
though you may or may not have always.
Take what they have left and what they have taught you with their dying and keep it with your own.

And in that time when men decide and feel safe to call the war insane, take one moment to embrace those gentle heroes

The veterans of the Vietnam War had to fight hard for many years — and I draw the comparison with Northern Ireland — before their memorial was built, 20 years ago this year. I do not want the families or the innocent victims of terrorism in this country to have to fight for long years to get an appropriate and lasting memorial to their loved ones.

Memorial gardens in different towns have been subject to the horrors of the troubles, and some of those memorials, especially those of soldiers, have been vandalised. That has happened to a memorial to four UDR men from the Strangford constituency who were murdered by the IRA some years ago outside Downpatrick. The IRA — scum that they are — destroyed and desecrated that memorial, which the families had visited regularly and at which they had laid flowers. For a short time it was a memorial to their loved ones in that part of the country. The IRA destroyed that; they are the sort of people who have no respect for the memories of those who have given everything for this country.

We seek a place that is dedicated to those whom we have lost along the way — one place to which anyone can go to learn about the horror visited upon us for more than 30 years on the pretext of patriotism but which showed us how palpable evil really is. It is only right that the Labour Government afford the people of Northern Ireland the same respect that the victims of 11 September have been afforded in England, Wales, Scotland and elsewhere. After all, those victims have all been killed at the hands of terrorists, just as they have in this country. I support the amendment.

Mr Armstrong: I am honoured to support the motion. It is an important issue for the thousands of victims of 30 years of terrorist murder and mayhem, which blighted the landscape of Northern Ireland and which left many without a father, mother, brother, sister or other relative. As a former member of the security forces, I have long recognised the work being carried out to protect everyone in Northern Ireland. Today, memories of past atrocities are still vivid in the minds of many people, despite the imperfect peace. Although people can move forward, they can never forget their loved ones who died as a result of cowards and terrorists; nor should they.

I have not had the opportunity to visit the Ulster Ash Grove at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire — established by private funds and largely the work of David Childs — but one day I would like to make the trip. However, I have been reading some comments about its appearance and the effect that it has had on some people who visited it. Rita Restorick commented that a figure or statistic on a piece of paper, which represents the number of military killed, does not hit the mind hard enough. She said that when one sees the small forest of trees, the loss and murder hits home much more.

Our Government's policy on the matter of a permanent memorial to honour those who gave their lives is shameful. In Northern Ireland, more than 700 military personnel gave their lives on behalf of their country. However, our Government — the Government of their country — does not fund a memorial. That is hurtful and disingenuous to their memory.

Her Majesty's Government recently announced their intention to create a permanent memorial to commemorate those who died as a result of the 11 September terrorist attacks. Although I do not object to that decision, the Government should look closer to home and seek to honour our own who lost their lives because of terrorists. We heard recently how the Ministry of Defence failed to fund permanent plaques on memorial trees in the National Memorial Arboretum.

In March, I was disgusted to hear that the families of IRA terrorists had been treated to a gala dinner in honour of members of the Provisional IRA. Imagine how the families of those brutally murdered by the same IRA men reacted when they heard those reports. They would have felt betrayed and disgusted.

In a recent newspaper article, SDLP Member Patricia Lewsley said that a traditional memorial would be too controversial. I refute that argument unreservedly. What is controversial about honouring those who died for the sake of their country in the war against terrorism? Certain officials have been quoted as saying that an official memorial would send out the wrong signals. It is time that our Government stood up for what is right and stopped courting paramilitaries.

In 1998 the Bloomfield Report, titled 'We Will Remember Them', recommended a memorial to victims in the form of a beautiful building with a peaceful garden. I reiterate that call and demand that our Westminster Government honour all those who have honoured us. They have let the law-abiding people of Northern Ireland down yet again. It is time to create a memorial garden.

Mr Campbell: It is always a privilege to follow the vivid and lucid arguments of Mr Armstrong. I thank the proposers of the motion and the amendment, and I add my support.

The critical words of the motion are "heartache and suffering"; there has been much of that over the past 34 years, and it continues. Another important word is contained in the amendment, and that is "innocent". That word is a crucial part of the motion. Earlier in the debate we heard an attempted defence — if there could be one — of the spurious argument to equate those who plant bombs with those who suffer because of them. That argument attempts to say that he who pulls the trigger is as much a victim as the person who receives the bullet, which is nonsensical. If we took that to its logical conclusion, we should ask the American Government to pay tribute to the suicide bombers in the planes, as well as to the innocent victims who suffered in the World Trade Centre. That is utter and total nonsense.

However, there is, of course, political reasoning behind that.

It is one by which they try to ensure that people will eventually be persuaded that this was a conflict of equals — that the farmer who farmed the fields was as guilty as the person who hid in the hedgerow to kill him. They try to say that the bus driver in Londonderry was as guilty as the mob from the Provisional IRA — not the Continuity IRA, or the Real IRA — who stepped on-board his bus and attempted to kill him a few days ago. Their guns were anything but silent on that occasion.

3.30 pm

The crucial word is "innocent". The community demands that the Assembly distinguish between people who suffer as a result of violence and those who perpetrate violence. There cannot be any equivocation in the moral argument between perpetrator and victim. I, therefore, heartily endorse the motion. I hope that the House will endorse it and that Her Majesty's Government will fund such a memorial garden.

Mr Morrow: The tenor of the motion and the amendment was never to be that all victims were on one side. I recognise that there were innocent victims on both sides of the religious divide in the community. Many people from the Roman Catholic tradition were murdered. I condemn those killings with the same ferocity as I condemn the killing of those who are perceived to come from my community.

During my time in public life — around 29 years in Dungannon District Council — I have never sought to take the easy path of only condemning the killing of members of my own community. I condemned all killings. I live in what was then deemed to be the "murder triangle", where many innocent people were killed simply because of who they were.

I never differentiated in my condemnation. When I condemned killings, I did not insert any "ifs", "ands" or "buts". I was clear and unequivocal in my condemnation of the killing of people whom I believed to be innocent and who were killed simply because of who they were.

I welcome the fact that the proposers of the motion have agreed to include the one-word amendment — "innocent" — because Members on this side of the House make a difference between innocent victims and those who perpetrate terror. I want to make it clear that there is a distinct difference. There must be a clear demarcation line between people who perpetrate such crimes and those who are on the receiving end of them.

I listened with interest to what Mr Armstrong said, although, I confess, I did not pick up everything. However, one point struck me. He said that the Government must stop pandering to terrorists. I agree. However, was it not his party that went arm in arm into the talks with those who have been fully engaged in terrorism during the past 30 years to hammer out the Belfast Agreement? The Belfast Agreement brought about the Assembly. Therefore, those who were engaged in acts of terrorism have helped to keep Mr Armstrong's party leader in Government. Had those two supporters, who would be aligned to a particular organisation, withdrawn their support, then Mr Armstrong's party leader would not be in place today. I see that Mr Armstrong is telling me that he supports emphatically his party leader. Therefore, he is part of that pandering to terrorists.

In my estimation, 11 September 2001 was the defining moment for the free world. On that dreadful day, the world saw the awfulness of terrorism at first hand. Was it not ironic that terrorism should hit a country that has, to say the least, been ambivalent in its condemnation of terrorism in Northern Ireland? We have repeatedly seen television coverage of that awful event. Hardly a month goes past without its being reshown to remind us. As we watch the footage of those planes crashing into the high-rise buildings, the awfulness, rawness and dreadfulness of terrorism, whether in America or Northern Ireland, is brought home vividly.

We have had to endure 30 years of terrorism. I do not remember many presidents getting worked up about what was happening here. Indeed, I hold the previous President, Clinton, more accountable than any other world leader for giving encouragement, succour and support to terrorists in Northern Ireland. He helped to build them up, and they are now recognised as statesmen. They have been elevated to the same level as those of us who passionately believe in the ballot box — and the ballot box alone — to put people into power.

Some people sit in the Assembly and in the Government by virtue of the barrel of a gun. The rest of us do not have any private armies. Until those private armies are destroyed, we cannot hold out much hope for the future peace in this country.

I will be delighted when steps are taken to recognise the innocent victims. Not all victims are dead: many are still alive. The town of Claudy is back in the news headlines this morning. We have heard about a young nine-year-old lassie who was blown to pieces while cleaning the window of her father's shop. If anyone was an innocent victim, it was that wee lassie. She epitomises what we are trying to say through the motion.

I urge everyone to support the amended motion, without any ifs, ands or buts. I say to those on the opposite Benches that we have no hidden agenda in bringing the amendment. We do not isolate victims and say that they all came from our side of the community, for that was not the case. There were victims on both sides of the community. All innocent victims should be recognised equally.

However, we draw a clear distinction between perpetrators and sufferers. It is imperative that the two are not mixed up, because to do so would be to be highly offensive. It would be an insult for the real victims if those who perpetrated crimes were remembered by the same memorial as those who are now in their graves because of those crimes.

I use but one illustration; I could use hundreds of others. For instance, how would the families of those killed in the fish shop on Shankill Road feel if the person who planted the bomb and the victims of that bomb were all classed as victims? It is not acceptable. We want to recognise the real victims, irrespective of which section of the community they came from, and I urge the Assembly to follow suit.

Mr Kennedy: I am slightly disappointed at the attendance in the Chamber for this debate. Although I accept that the matter is not the direct responsibility of the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, the junior Ministers have some responsibility in that regard, and I am disappointed that they are not present.

I thank all the Members who contributed to the debate, particularly those who endorsed the motion and those who proposed the amendment. This issue is clearly important and deserves the attention, not only of Members, but of Her Majesty's Government, within whose remit it falls. The motion refers to the tragic events of 11 September 2001 and Her Majesty's Government's entirely appropriate response to them, which involves providing a memorial to the British victims murdered in that atrocity. I was pleased that many Members agreed that such a memorial should be provided to commemorate that dreadful event.

The motion is also intended to encourage and persuade Her Majesty's Government to recognise the great sacrifices made by the people of Northern Ireland and by all those who died as a result of terrorism, in whatever form, in the conflict here. As was mentioned in the debate, recommendations were included in a report by Sir Kenneth Bloomfield, but action has yet to be taken on some of them. I thank my Colleague Sam Foster, who has already said that the amendment should be included in the motion. The amendment helps to convey the intended message to the Government.

Many victims' groups are exploring ways to create lasting memorials to reflect the pain and great suffering that has been endured in the past generation, and many of those plans are advanced. Given the importance of this issue, it might be practical to build several memorial gardens in Northern Ireland so that relatives could access them easily. Memorial centres would complement any national or regional memorial dedicated to the innocent victims who were caught up in the conflict here. I trust that, as groups advance their local proposals, they will receive practical and financial support to construct those memorial gardens.

It is essential that soldiers from regiments based in the UK mainland and Commonwealth countries who died defending the law-abiding people of Northern Ireland be remembered in memorials created here. I represent a constituency in which many members of the security forces lost their lives, and I recognise that the memory of everyone who died should be cherished.

Some have questioned the purpose of memorial gardens. I see them as a place for quiet reflection, where relatives could express their grief, but also gain comfort, great support and encouragement as they seek to rebuild their lives. They would be seen as symbols of renewal and reconciliation and would generate hope and inspire people to look to the future. They could provide opportunities for training and employment, as well as allowing others to share the great deep emotions that the victims have unfortunately experienced.

3.45 pm

In his opening remarks, Mr Foster referred to Mrs Rita Restorick's campaign for a memorial in the Ulster Ash Grove. Bessbrook Mill is the main base for the security forces in south Armagh, and in its inner courtyard, memorial trees have been planted and named, and plaques have been erected to commemorate the past generation of soldiers who lost their lives. Unfortunately, given the nature of that installation, public access is restricted.

I thank Mr Berry, whose moral distinctions were correct. He outlined that there was a choice between right and wrong.

I thank Joe Hendron for his almost lone presence on behalf of the SDLP, and acknowledge his well-known opposition to all levels of violence, especially in the constituency that he represents here, and that he has represented in Westminster. I should like, at the very least, to acknowledge his presence and his contribution.

In respect of the comments of the Sinn Féin Member, Mr McNamee, if these institutions are heading for collapse, the fault clearly lies with the Republican movement. There is a very great difference between innocent victims and the victims of self-inflicted violence, which has been the pattern of Northern Ireland's history in recent years. Furthermore, Mr McNamee referred to the Dublin and Monaghan bombings. I remind him that the text of the motion leaves that area outside this jurisdiction.

I thank Mr Boyd, and agree that it is scandalous that the Ministry of Defence does not move forward, even in respect of memorial payments in other parts of the United Kingdom.

I acknowledge the support of Jim Shannon, and I share his concern that the recognition of this issue is, in some places, highly selective, especially at Westminster.

My Colleagues Billy Armstrong and Sam Foster condemned the recent jamboree organised by the IRA, at which, apparently, medals were handed out. It remains to be seen whether that is the clearest sign so far that the war is over, but it seriously offended the law-abiding people from both of Northern Ireland's main traditions.

I thank Mr Campbell and Mr Morrow for their clear support for the motion and for the amendment. Mr Morrow reminded the House that the Ulster Unionist Party had co-operated to some extent with what might be termed the Loyalist parties in the House, and he criticised the party for that. I remind him that when the Loyalist paramilitaries announced their ceasefire they expressed abject remorse to the victims of their violence. Rather unfortunately, Mr Morrow criticised my Colleague Billy Armstrong. Mr Armstrong wore the uniform of the security forces — something that cannot be said by every Member of the House — and helped — [Interruption].

Mr Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: I am almost finished. He helped to play his part and was, in fact, involved in an incident that almost claimed his life and those of his colleagues. It is unfortunate — [Interruption].

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. There was an implied criticism of Mr Morrow. Mr Morrow was a member of Her Majesty's security forces; therefore, I do not want to hear any snide remarks from Mr Kennedy. He ought to have given way like a man.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Dr Paisley. Strictly, that was not a point of order.

Mr Kennedy: I did not address my remarks to Mr Morrow alone. I simply said that not every Member could say that he or she wore the uniform of the security forces. I have no record of service in the security forces but I do, at least, recognise that Mr Armstrong made a contribution, as did other Members. Therefore, that was an unfortunate misunderstanding.

The support for the debate heartens me. It has been conducted in a mature fashion. I am sorry that attendance levels were not high. However, the issue is important, and it is to be hoped that the Government will take note; take speedy action to resolve the situation; and move in this spirit to create a lasting memorial to the innocent victims of the conflict.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the heartache and suffering of the families of victims who perished as a result of the September 11th terrorist attack in the United States and welcomes Her Majesty's Government's funding for a memorial garden in remembrance of those victims. Accordingly, this Assembly calls upon Her Majesty's Government to extend the same respect to the innocent victims who died as a result of terrorism in this part of the United Kingdom by financing the creation of a similar memorial garden in Great Britain.

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. During the debate on credit card abuse, Conor Murphy questioned whether I had registered an interest as a member of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board between 1996 and 1998. The relevant Clerk has advised me that there is no need for former members of the Tourist Board to be listed and that the register lists current or expected interests.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That was not a point of order, Mr Kennedy, but it was proper to give you the opportunity to put that on the record.

Adjourned at 3.53 pm.

NORTHERN IRELAND ASSEMBLY

Monday 7 October 2002

The Assembly met at noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

ROYAL ASSENT

Health and Personal Social Services Act (Northern Ireland) 2002

Mr Speaker: I wish to inform Members that the Health and Personal Social Services Bill has received Royal Assent. The Health and Personal Social Services Act (Northern Ireland) 2002 became law on 4 October 2002.

EVENTS OF 4 OCTOBER 2002 IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr Speaker: It is clear that several Members wish to raise points of order, which is understandable, and I shall do my best to accommodate those requests. However, I caution Members and remind them that in criminal matters the sub judice rule applies strictly from the moment a person is charged until the verdict and sentence have been announced. Members must also be aware that as regards parliamentary privilege covering what they say in the Chamber, it applies to the law of defamation and not to other matters. It will not give them protection, for example, in matters of contempt of court, and I draw that to Members' attention.

Several Members have indicated that they wish to make points of order and I will now try to take them. I will be unable to take them in the order that Members wish, but I shall do my best to accommodate them. I noticed Mr Conor Murphy's hand first, then Ms Lewsley's, Dr Paisley's and Mr Foster's. I shall take those points of order first, then continue.

Mr C Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will you confirm that your Office is investigating the breach of Parliament Buildings last Friday morning by armed police who did not have a warrant? In that investigation will you address the fact that members of my party were not informed by the police or Assembly staff that our offices were being searched, sealed off and raided?

Mr Speaker: I confirm to the House that I received notice of events taking place here, and briefed the Assembly Commission, whose members were with me at the Quebec National Assembly, as soon as was possible that morning. At the end of the briefing, we agreed that an emergency meeting of the Commission would be held today, after Question Time, when a report would be made.

I also made it my business to request a meeting with the Chief Constable, and that meeting was held at 3.00 pm on Saturday. The Chief Constable has subsequently corresponded with me, and that correspondence was received this morning. I expect further meetings to take place.

Those various matters are for the Speaker and the Assembly Commission to attend to, and we are doing so with all possible speed and, I hope, with conscientiousness.

Mr Beggs: Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Order. I am trying to take the points of order in sequence.

Ms Lewsley: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Did you have any prior knowledge that the police were coming here?

Mr Speaker: As I said earlier, we must be careful about the question of sub judice. I understand that charges have been preferred, and obviously Friday's events may bear some relation to that. Therefore, I will seek to be as open as I can with the House, but it is also my view that when there is a cliff one drives as far away from, not as close as possible to, the edge of it. I will, therefore, be careful with regard to matters of sub judice. I trust that the Member will understand if I do not give an answer on the Floor of the House.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Mr Speaker, when you were absent, events took place at one of the Doors of the House. Two Members of the Assembly were seen on television hastening journalists and television cameras into disobeying the order that on entering the House, their machines should be checked. The Members were then seen escorting the media representatives upstairs to their room, without their cameras being checked. That is a breach of the security of the House. Anything could have been brought in inside those cameras.

The two Members, Mr Gerry Kelly and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, then made statements, which were clearly heard. It was clear that they were justifying what they had done in advocating a breach of the security of the House. If the security of the House can be breached in that way, nobody's safety can be guaranteed or provided for. If we do not have security of entrance to the House, then we have no protection in our offices.

The other matter I wish to raise is that the House should have the opportunity to debate the matter. Everyone is debating it — in the streets, in homes and schools, and in places that people frequent. The House should be discussing this urgent business. Mr Speaker, have you called a meeting of the Business Committee for it to advise Members when it will let us have an immediate discussion and proper, open-ended debate on the matter within, of course, the sub judice rules that you mentioned?

Mr Speaker: On the question of a breach of security and, indeed, breach of privilege that the Member referred to — an alleged breach of security and an alleged breach of privilege — I have asked for, and have received, some initial reports, which I am pursuing. I trust that it will not be out of order to say that I have received from Dr Paisley's Colleague, Mr Peter Robinson, a specific letter in relation to the question of breach of privilege. I have met the Chairperson of the Committee on Standards and Privileges to advise him that he may expect questions of privilege to be raised, and I will forward Mr Peter Robinson's letter to him.

There are complex matters involved. Several bodies in the Assembly may have responsibilities with regard to this matter. The Assembly Commission is one, the Committee on Standards and Privileges is another, and the Speaker's Office is another. Those are just three examples. I take the matter that the Member raises very seriously, and it is being pursued. His Colleague has done that in writing, which is entirely proper.

I have called a meeting of the Business Committee for 1.00 pm today, and a meeting of the Assembly Commission for after Question Time this afternoon, to address the various issues. It is for the Business Committee to decide precisely how it handles the requests before it.

I have noted that there has been debate and discussion about these matters in all sorts of places and in the press. I have also noted some of the comments reported in the press to be factually completely incorrect. Some of those were in relation to the House and its staff. It is important to have an early debate, but it is also important to have an informed debate on the Floor of the House — informed by proper law and procedure and by the proper facts. I know that that is what the Member and the House in general would want. There is a balance to be found between expressing the quite proper feelings of anxiety, concern, and indeed anger, which I sense in the Chamber and the community, and ensuring that, as is right and proper, it is tempered by proper process and by the facts, insofar as we are able to discern them at this stage.

Mr Foster: In the light of recent serious developments, particularly the implications of the potential threat to Members of the House, and being aware that the First Minister will meet the Prime Minister tomorrow, I propose that the proceedings of the Assembly —

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member will resume his seat. He knows perfectly well that what he is doing is not a point of order — it is entirely out of order, and I am not prepared to accept it. I shall say no more about that.

I will say that, when I met the Chief Constable on Saturday, I received an assurance that the security of the House had not been prejudiced, or rather, the most accurate way to put it is that there was no evidence that that was the case. I trust that that is of some small assistance to Members, in view of what the Member alleged earlier.

Mr C Wilson: Mr Speaker, some two weeks ago, I brought to your attention my concerns about security in and around Parliament Buildings at Stormont. In light of that, Mr Speaker, and as an interim step while these matters are being considered and discussed, I ask you to approach the Police Service of Northern Ireland to ensure that it has a greater presence — or, indeed, a presence per se, because police officers are not presently in evidence — in the Building. Without any slur on the work of the doorkeepers and those responsible for internal security, given the grave situation that we face, I suggest that there should be a greater police presence.

The referral of this matter to the Business Committee and the Assembly Commission creates a dilemma, because Sinn Féin is represented on those bodies. That causes me grave concerns. Can I just say —

Mr Speaker: Order. I think that I have been reasonably flexible with regard to points of order. I am assuming that the point of order that the Member raises is in respect of whether it is in order for him to ask for some review of security.

With regard to matters of security, the Assembly Commission has responsibility, but took an early decision to devolve that responsibility to me, as Speaker. I take that very seriously. I take seriously the concerns that the Member raised with me some time ago, and the question of proper security arrangements here. That has been a matter of ongoing and regular discussion, meetings and correspondence, and substantial and energetic activity by our staff internally. I take on board the concerns that the Member raises, but it would not be proper for me to discuss security on the Floor of the House. Indeed, that would be particularly inappropriate to the Member's point of order if he considers what he has said.

12.15 pm

Mr P Robinson: Last Friday's events were dramatic and significant. They could not be justified unless there was significant cause for the police to enter the Building. I do not believe that the police would have acted without that just cause. It seems to be imperative that there is a debate in the Assembly at the earliest possible moment to consider those issues. I assume that in the interrupted attempt by the Ulster Unionists to make a contribution, there is a willingness on their part to have a special recognition of the impact of those events felt in the Assembly. Therefore, I trust that they will support the Democratic Unionist Party in the Business Committee today.

Moving to the —

Mr Speaker: Is there a point of order?

Mr P Robinson: I wrote to you, Mr Speaker, pursuant to Standing Orders, which require a Member to indicate to you an intention to raise a breach of privilege and to give some indication of the nature of that breach.

On Friday, two Members encouraged — and indeed pushed through — several members of the press and media past a security check, without their being checked in person and the proper arrangements being made. They rushed them into a lift, took them through parts of the Building that are not specified for that purpose and engaged in activity that is not allowed to any other Member.

Mr Speaker: I must ask the Member to bring it to the point of order rather than recounting the detail of the substance.

Mr P Robinson: I understood that in advancing a breach of privilege, I must convince you that there is a prima facie case to be referred to the Committee on Standards and Privileges.

Mr Speaker: That is true, Mr Robinson, but there is no requirement for you to do so on the Floor of the House.

I have accepted your correspondence, on what I regard as a very serious matter. I have met the Chairperson of the Committee on Standards and Privileges, and the matter will be pursued. If there is a further point of order, I am prepared to take it.

Mr P Robinson: I am content if you are saying that the Committee will consider the matter. Your earlier comments implied that you had indicated to the Chairperson of the Committee on Standards and Privileges that the issue would be raised. If you are saying that you are happy to refer the matter to the Committee, I am content to leave it there. That would be the appropriate place for it to be dealt with.

Mr Speaker: I am happy to confirm that I will refer it. I cannot guarantee that the Committee will discuss it; that is a matter for the Committee itself. However, I can confirm that I will refer it.

The Member raised one or two other points. He referred to a point of order that I aborted earlier. The reason that I did so is that it is not in order to simply stand up on the Floor of the House and propose a motion, which is what was being attempted. That is not in order; nor is it in order — as the Member knows because he has on occasion tried it in the past — for an emergency debate to be proposed on the Floor of the House. What is possible is for the Business Committee to meet and to address the question of whether it is agreeable to business being taken. That is the purpose of the meeting today at 1.00 pm. What the Business Committee itself decides is another matter entirely.

Mr Attwood: Mr Speaker, you have rightly pointed out that there are concerns inside and outside the Chamber about all the events that occurred on Friday. It is certainly serious for anyone — any organisation or any party — who plays fast and loose with the Good Friday Agreement. That extends to more than one person and to more than one party in the Chamber.

Mr Speaker, in your capacity as Speaker of the House and in your particular responsibility for security in the House, you referred to conversations that you have had and correspondence that you have received from the Chief Constable. Would it be in order for you to share further with the Assembly the content of both those conversations and any letter or correspondence you received from the Chief Constable on events that occurred in the Building on Friday? If you are not now in a position to share that with the Assembly, when will you be able to share the content of the conversations and the correspondence?

Mr Speaker: It is in order for the Member to put the point of order, but it would not be in order for me to divulge the contents of the conversations or the correspondence at this stage, not least because the matter is sub judice — as he, being a lawyer, will know — and also because there are certain conversations on matters of security which it is inappropriate to address in any case. There will be a meeting of the Commission this afternoon; I will, again, brief the Commission as fully as I am able. I have referred to an earlier briefing, and I will keep the Commission as informed as I possibly can.

It is not unlikely that at some stage, when issues of sub judice and so on are not around, it may well be that I will have to make reference to the implications of such events in my capacity as Speaker, as Chairperson of the Assembly Commission and as having responsibility as the Member describes. I trust that he will understand that I am being as open as I possibly can, but there are certain things that it is neither right nor proper for me to speak about on the Floor of the House, particularly at this time.

Mr Beggs: Will you confirm that being a Member of the House, or working in Parliament Buildings, gives no one immunity from criminal investigation, and that such persons are subject to the law within the United Kingdom?

Mr Speaker: I confirm that that is the case, and all Members would be wise to understand that. I have, by my comments at the start of these points of order, tried to draw the attention of Members to some of those points of law from which they might be vulnerable in this context. What the Member said is, of course, absolutely the case. The next Member is Mr John Kelly, and then there are a series of other Members.

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Since you are the first and final arbiter of what happens in the House, were you presented with a search warrant, or was a warrant proffered to you, on the morning of this search, and if not, why not? Did any member of your staff accompany those people who searched the Sinn Féin support offices on Friday morning? Was any member of your staff present when that happened?

Mr Speaker: I understand the Member's questions and the import of them. I am not in a position to respond, because of the sub judice rule that I have already mentioned. The Member will not have to think very hard before he finds the connection between charges that have been preferred and the question of sub judice. It is not in anyone's interests for interference in the proper due process to be embarked upon.

In respect of the second aspect of the Member's question, he and his Colleagues will know that we have procedures when any search is taking place, either in this context or in other more prophylactic contexts. I am assured — because I have asked — that those proper procedures were followed by our staff. I cannot say further than that.

If the Member has concerns on that, or on any other score, I would welcome his bringing those directly to my attention. I did receive a formal complaint from one of his Colleagues on behalf of his party, and that matter is being taken very seriously. I have subsequently met the Member to advise of some of the actions I have taken in regard to that.

Mr J Kelly: Further to that point of order, a Cheann Comhairle. Was a search warrant —

Mr Speaker: Order. I fear that the Member has not been listening quite so acutely to what I have said as he normally does. There are matters that I cannot speak about because they have a bearing on proceedings.

Mr Hussey: You have rightly referred to anger in and about the Chamber, and the integrity of the Chamber is in question, as is the case with the calling of a meeting of the Business Committee and of the Committee on Standards and Privileges. There is also the issue of the First Minister seeking a meeting with the Prime Minister. In the interests of good order, can I urge you, Mr Speaker, to suspend the business of the Chamber until those negotiations and meetings have taken place?

Mr Speaker: The question of a meeting that the First Minister, in any of his capacities, may have with the Prime Minister does not have a direct bearing on proceedings here. The Member knows that it is not within the power of the Speaker to simply suspend the proceedings. Standing Orders are clear on when suspensions may take place. It is not simply a matter for the Speaker to suspend proceedings of his own volition. What the Member asks as a point of order is not in order.

Mr Hussey: Further to the point of order, I did say "in the interests of good order". That is within your remit.

Mr Speaker: I trust that the Member is not implying any threat to good order. Such an implication would itself bring down the sanction of the Chair.

Mr Gibson: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I note your careful handling of the situation this afternoon. Would it not be the greatest contribution that you and the Business Committee could make that an immediate motion for the removal of the gangsters of Sinn Féin/IRA be debated immediately?

Mr Speaker: Order. First, it is not possible to have an immediate debate. That is clear. The Member's Colleagues have explored that question substantially. Secondly, if there were any question of exclusion, there are clear Standing Orders requirements for an exclusion motion. Those relate to exclusion from ministerial office, not exclusion from the House. I trust that no one will mislead Colleagues or the public whom we serve by suggesting that the legal situation is otherwise. I trust that I have answered the Member's point as fully as I can.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Mr Speaker, I hope that you agree with me that it is shameful that certain Members of the House would try to turn alleged criminality onto the police, at a time when the police have tried to defend the interests of democracy. Will you confirm that on Friday the DUP sought from your Office and the Business Committee a debate on Friday's raid of the Sinn Féin offices in the Building and the wider implications? Was that relayed to you while you were on business in Canada? Did any other party contact you at that time to make a similar request? If they did not, does that not make the claims of other parties in the House, saying that there would be dire consequences for the process, sound very hollow indeed?

Mr Speaker: I received a request and I am not prepared to confirm or deny in respect of any other parties, save when they raise the question for themselves. I can confirm that I was apprised of a request for a meeting of the Business Committee. However, when I asked for the specific motion or point upon which the Business Committee were to be recalled, I did not receive it. That is why there was no earlier meeting of the Business Committee, because a specific request on the point, motion or otherwise was not received. What was received was effectively a request to set aside business that had already been agreed and set down on the Order Paper. As Speaker, I was not at liberty to do such a thing; nor, indeed, would the Business Committee have been at proper liberty simply to disregard procedure. However, the Member and his Colleagues met me this morning to make a specific request, which has been acceded to. There will be a meeting at 1.00 pm.

Mr Dodds: In the light of Friday's events, both here and elsewhere in the Province, have you instigated any review of security vetting procedures for officials of the Assembly, and if you have not already done that, would you consider it? Should that also be extended to cover staff employed on a temporary basis by parties here? Clearly there are grave implications if the least of the allegations made is proved to be correct.

In the light of the tremendous interest that there is in the country in relation to those issues, it is clearly the desire of some Members that we should not simply proceed in the normal way.

I therefore propose that Standing Orders be suspended, particularly Standing Order 10 and such other Standing Orders as are necessary, to allow forthwith a debate in relation to the issues which have come before us, particularly as it would make no sense to proceed with business as normal.

12.30 pm

Mr Speaker: With regard to the Member's first question, I do not feel at liberty to discuss all that we are doing on the security side. I try to reassure the House that we are doing all that is appropriate, but one must handle things in a proper fashion, and that is what I am trying to do. I trust that Members will, for good reason, feel reassured as to how we are handling things.

I must remind the House of what I said earlier. Simply because one finds reports in newspapers does not mean that they are the truth. There are certainly a number of reports with a bearing on recent events that I know to be completely and factually incorrect — to my certain knowledge. I trust that that in itself is of some help to Colleagues.

Mr Dodds will know that even a proposal to suspend Standing Orders is a motion which must be presented in the Order Paper — and I think that he may have done so in the past, for various reasons, in his ministerial capacity. I hear what the Member says, but the order is that it must be on foot of a motion and, therefore, it is not possible at this stage.

Rev Dr William McCrea: Is it in order that Sinn Féin — which the dogs in the streets know is inextricably linked to a violent terrorist organisation, namely the Provisional IRA — should remain in ministerial office over the law-abiding people of Northern Ireland? The demand of the public is that action be taken now to remove Sinn Féin/IRA, and surely the Assembly has a duty to act.

Mr Speaker: The Member makes assumptions about duty, but there is also order. The Standing Order is quite clear. The Member may table an exclusion motion if he has sufficient support. If he checks the Standing Orders and he has sufficient support, he knows very well the route to my office, because he and his Colleagues take it from time to time. The provision for the presentation, and the requirements for the passage, of any such motion are present in Standing Orders. The Member is aware of it and has experience of doing it. It is all there. It is not a question of duty or anything else. It is there, and if the Member and his Colleagues wish to pick it up and run with it, they know the Standing Orders and the procedures that are there.

Rev Dr William McCrea: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it not a fact that you have received such a motion, signed by Members of the House? In fact, the DUP is just waiting for the other Members, namely the Ulster Unionists, to sign the exclusion motion.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member knows perfectly well that what I have received is not adequate under Standing Orders in terms of the amount of support required. If he can use his good offices and undoubted charm to encourage other Members to back him, so be it, but I cannot do anything further at this stage.

Rev Dr William McCrea: Mr Speaker, which Standing Order states that the number of signatures is not adequate for the exclusion motion to be tabled?

Mr Speaker: The Member will resume his seat. He knows perfectly well which Standing Order it is.

Mr S Wilson: Mr Speaker, perhaps you could confirm to the House whether the correspondence you obtained from the police was as a direct result of a request that you made to them for information regarding the events on Friday. If that has been the case, have you made a similar request to the leadership of IRA/Sinn Féin in the House as to their behaviour in the breach of security on Friday? Is it not odd that members of Sinn Féin are so concerned about proper search warrants when they do not seem to have any difficulty when their crowd break into Castlereagh and other places?

Mr Speaker: I trust that the Member has been as careful as I cautioned. I understand that many Members feel happy to sit in a judicial position, but it is not necessarily one that is backed by law.

Mr Dodds: Judge, jury and executioner across the way.

Mr Speaker: Order. I had a meeting with the Chief Constable, and I think that Members would have deemed it irresponsible for me not to have sought such a meeting. The Chief Constable was most constructive in the conversations that we had. He then responded to me in writing as an interim to further conversations that we intend to have, and I trust that they will be held soon. No one should jump to conclusions about any of these matters.

Mr S Wilson: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. Can you confirm whether you have had similar contact with Sinn Féin about its behaviour and about alleged breaches of security, raised by my Colleagues, on Friday?

Mr Speaker: Order. Is the Member suggesting to me that he regards these as equal matters? I have the greatest of respect for all Members, but, on security matters, I do not put any of them in the same position as the Chief Constable of the police, who has particular responsibilities in these matters. As far as questions of privilege, and breaches of privilege by anyone in the House, are concerned, I have already advised the Member's Colleagues that I am addressing that matter. That, therefore, is not a new point of order. However, if he really wants me to regard the Chief Constable in the same light, and with the same responsibilities, as others that he has mentioned, I am afraid that he is mistaken — I will not.

Mr S Wilson: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: Order. I will take this further point, and, if it is not a point of order, the Member may have some difficulty getting a further one at another stage. Does he wish to make a point of order?

Mr S Wilson: I wish to pursue the matter further. Have you made any contact with the leadership of IRA/Sinn Féin regarding the breach of security at this place on Friday?

Mr Speaker: Order. I have already advised the Member that I was approached by Sinn Féin and have had discussions with Sinn Féin about the matter.

Mr S Wilson: About the police?

Mr Speaker: I am not prepared to say what I have had discussions about, but the Member should not assume that that is a "No".

Mr Paisley Jnr: Under Standing Orders 61 and 63, the Keeper of the House is entitled to take action against intruders not only to the Assembly precincts but to the Building. What steps did the Keeper of the House take to prevent the intruders who were invited in by Minister de Brún and Gerry Kelly — who appeared to break every rule in the book — from entering the Building? What investigations followed?

Mr Speaker: Order. I have been generous in my acceptance of points of order. This matter has already been addressed, and there are internal inconsistencies with what the Member raises. People are not intruders if Members have invited them in.

Mr Paisley Jnr: According to the Standing Order —

Mr Speaker: Order. The way in which visitors enter the Building may be a breach of privilege or order, but the Member's Colleagues have already clearly raised that, and I have advised on this. I am very satisfied that they raised it properly. The Member may not think that they have done it well enough, but I think that the matter has been addressed fairly fully.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Further to that point of order, Mr Speaker. I would like to make it clear that until the House can have a debate, and a time is announced for it, my party will not deal with the regular business of the House.

Lord Killelooney: Since a staff member of Sinn Féin in the Building is now the subject of prosecution, and since Sinn Féin also has an office in the national Parliament of the United Kingdom, would it be a matter of courtesy for you to officially advise the Speaker of the House of Commons of the circumstances that arose here on Friday?

Mr Speaker: I am astonished that the Member thinks it necessary for me to give advice from this place to the Speaker of the sovereign Parliament. However, it would also be unwise for me to make any remarks about a matter that is sub judice.

Lord Killelooney: There is a danger — [Interruption].

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Neeson: Will you confirm that the business in the House this afternoon will be as printed on the Order Paper? Will you also confirm that all the Ministers will fulfil their ministerial responsibilities and present themselves to take questions at Question Time?

Mr Speaker: The Member knows me well, but I suspect that he overestimates my capacities in those regards. The House will follow the Order Paper as best it can. However, the idea that I can control anything other than the order of business, such as Members themselves, is what I, in my professional role, would call a wish fantasy. I trust that Members will act with decorum, but I cannot ensure the presence of any particular Member.

Mr P Robinson: Will you clarify, or reflect upon, the response that you made to my Colleague Mr Paisley Jnr about your definition of an intruder? Your definition, as recorded in the Official Report, may have implications for the work of the Committee on Standards and Privileges. Surely, anyone who enters this Building without having made proper arrangements, whether invited by Members illegally or not, is an intruder and must be so considered.

Mr Speaker: I wish the matter were so simple.

Mr P Robinson: It is as simple as your response.

Mr Speaker: I remain with what I said: I wish the matter were so simple. Members should not forget that we are talking about pass-holders.

Mr Boyd: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it the case that, under Standing Orders, the only way of excluding IRA/Sinn Féin from ministerial office is with the support of the SDLP, and that in reality the only way of removing IRA/Sinn Féin from the Government is for all Unionists to resign from the Executive and collapse this charade of government?

Mr Speaker: The Member has described one way of addressing the matter. However, I would like to think about whether it is the only way. There are many creative politicians here and many different ways in which things can be achieved.

Mr Molloy: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. One expression of the creative nature of the politicians here was the view that David Trimble would be saved by the storm troopers who were put in here on Friday. Will you confirm that you will ask the head of the storm troopers — the direct descendants of the B-Specials — if their weapons were put through the Assembly's scanning equipment? Will you treat them as intruders?

Mr Speaker: Order. I listened with care to what the Member said. I would be cautious to confirm very much, given some of the references that he made, save to say that I take seriously the concerns which underlie what he said, and they form part of our exploration of matters. As I said, an initial report will be brought to the Assembly Commission. However, it will be only an initial report because there are legal and other complexities which require further investigation.

Being patient is not a problem for me, but, in all fairness, the Minister of Agriculture has been patiently waiting to make a statement to the House.

12.45 pm

Mr Paisley Jnr: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: I have taken a substantial number of points of order. If this were more important than the rest, it should have been taken as one of the earlier points. It is time for us to move on. If the Member wishes to bring the matter to my attention outside the House, I invite him to do so. We have had three quarters of an hour of points of order, and he has been on his feet on a number of occasions. [Interruption].

Order. I am not prepared to take the point of order at this juncture. The Member has had a number of opportunities to raise a point of order. If this point is more important than the rest, he got the order wrong.

NORTH/SOUTH MINISTERIAL COUNCIL

Agriculture

Mr Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development that she wishes to make a statement on the North/South Ministerial Council sectoral meeting on agriculture held on 27 September 2002 in Downpatrick. I ask Members leaving the Chamber to do so as quietly as they may.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Rodgers): Before I make my statement, I should like to say that I very much regret that the DUP has withdrawn, since the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development will not be present to fulfil his duties to the Assembly, his Committee and the agriculture industry.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

The seventh meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council in its agriculture sectoral format was held at the St Patrick Centre, Downpatrick on Friday 27 September 2002. I chaired the meeting and was accompanied by Mr James Leslie, junior Minister in the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, who has also agreed the content of this statement. The Irish Government were represented by Mr Joe Walsh TD, Minister for Agriculture and Food, and Mr Éamon Ó Cuív TD, Minister for Community, Rural and Gaeltacht Affairs.

The recent restructuring of Government Departments in the South meant that the majority of items discussed at the September meeting fell within Minister Walsh's area of responsibility. Minister Ó Cuív's Department has specific responsibility for the item relating to cross-border rural development.

The Council considered a paper on co-operation in the field of animal health and noted that it had previously agreed to the establishment of an animal health steering group and some working groups tasked with examining specific issues. In relation to those issues, the Council noted a paper stating the principal policy differences, the possibilities of convergence and the timetable for action to achieve such convergence. The Council endorsed the paper as a further contribution to the development of an all-island animal health strategy and acknowledged that further progress on aligning policies and measures was fundamental to the development of the strategy. The Council noted the indicative timetable for convergence and also agreed that officials should seek to finalise discussions with the authorities in Great Britain before final agreement of the strategy by the North/South Ministerial Council.

The Council also considered a progress report on the work of the steering committee on cross-border rural development. In April 2002 the Council endorsed the principle of an area-based approach to cross-border rural development, and at the September meeting it was agreed that the steering committee should initiate action to invite applications from partnerships for the selection of four or five geographically defined border areas under INTERREG. The Council noted that the steering committee would have to give further consideration to an appropriate response to the recommendations arising out of the cross-border education, training and research study. The Council was pleased to note that the Rural Community Network and Irish Rural Link have been successful in their application to deliver the cross-border community development measure of Peace. The total aid being provided amounts to 970,000 euros. The aim of the measure is to provide support for the development of a cross-border strategy to address the problems of weak community infrastructure and marginalisation in border communities.

The Council then considered a paper on plant health, pesticides, diagnostics and research co-operation and noted the continued level of cross-border activity in that sector since the last meeting and new developments with the pesticides monitoring and registration review. The Council also noted the proposal to organise reciprocal familiarisation visits, workshops, training and ring tests for diagnostic purposes as a means of improving cross-border scientific and technical co-operation in plant health, including forestry.

The Council agreed that Departments, North and South, should explore the establishment of a plant health risk assessment panel and approve the identification of lead figures in each jurisdiction to initiate and develop effective cross-border action.

The Council had an initial discussion of issues relating to EU matters and areas of co-operation within each sector that could be proposed for the future North/South Ministerial Council work programme. Those discussions arose from a commitment reached at the fourth plenary meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council, which was held in Armagh on 28 June 2002.

The Council then considered salary increases for chief executive officers of North/South implementation bodies, and, subject to the approval of Finance Ministers, approved salaries and salary range increases for chief executive officers based in Northern Ireland, with effect from 1 April 2002. It was proposed that this year's annual increase for all chief executive officers based in Northern Ireland should be based on Senior Northern Ireland Civil Service pay increases.

The Council also agreed that its next meeting would take place in the South, in December 2002. The text of a communiqué for issue after the meeting was agreed upon, and a copy has been placed in the Assembly Library.

Mr Savage: I welcome the Minister's statement. The Rural Community Network and Irish Rural Link will need the finance that is available. When will applications and schemes be assessed? When will there be real development in those rural areas of high unemployment?

Ms Rodgers: With regard to the Peace II programme, the Rural Community Network, in partnership with Irish Rural Link, was successful in its application to deliver the measure. Those organisations will establish the cross-border network, which is expected to be operational in December 2002 and January 2003. Applications will be accepted then.

Mr McMenamin: When will the cross-border community development measure of Peace II be operational?

Ms Rodgers: I have answered that question in my answer to the previous one, which was about the same issue.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for the progress of the important meetings of the North/South Ministerial Council.

I have particular interest in the convergence and harmonisation of animal health policies, of which there are many, on both sides of the border, so that there is an all-Ireland system. The steering group on animal health was to produce an animal health policy by 31 September. Is that still on course?

What was the pay increase for chief executive officers? What are their salaries now?

Ms Rodgers: It is hoped that the steering group will finalise the all-island animal health strategy by the end of the year. The differences between North and South are outlined in the matrix. There are differences of approach in dealing with brucellosis and tuberculosis. I will take account of the consultation on the review of brucellosis and tuberculosis and of the policy in the South.

Northern Ireland differs in its approach to sheep identification. I am considering bringing forward proposals on that issue later in the year.

In the South, measures are being introduced to mirror the action taken to control Aujeszky's disease in Northern Ireland.

Salaries for chief executive officers differ from job to job and are a matter for the Department of Finance and Personnel.

Mr Ford: Further to Mr McHugh's question, how soon does the Minister expect full co-ordination of brucellosis and TB health measures, North and South, given the major problems that they create for both farming economies?

With regard to the plant health risk assessment panel, has the Minister taken any note of the grave concerns in Northern Ireland about the introduction of genetically modified organisms, given that some testing is ongoing in the South? Will she do anything to ensure that Northern Ireland can maintain its current green image and remain GM-free?

Ms Rodgers: There is no question of introducing GM organisms into Northern Ireland. The Executive have not taken a position on that. I can only give my party's position, which is very much opposed to the introduction of GM organisms into Northern Ireland. The Executive have not yet discussed the matter, but I do not imagine that there will be much enthusiasm for it.

To answer the Member's first question, I hope that the final common strategy will be agreed by the end of this year. The working groups have been considering all the areas involved. Did the Member ask for any other details?

Mr Ford: What is the timetable for action rather than strategy?

Ms Rodgers: My policy review on brucellosis and TB is currently out to consultation. There are points of difference between here and the Republic — the capping of compensation payments, for instance. Those are quite controversial issues. When I get the result of the consultation, I will consider it carefully and discuss it with the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and the Assembly before making a final decision. Given that disease does not recognise the border, I want to work towards having similar, converging policies, North and South. There are implications for both sides if there are different policies.

Mr Bradley: In view of the current political climate, would the collapse or suspension of the institutions have implications for the work in hand in the North/South Ministerial Council, especially on the negotiations preceding the mid-term review of the common agricultural policy (CAP)?

Ms Rodgers: I would be extremely concerned if the institutions were to collapse, and the agriculture industry would have particular reason for concern. The Member asked about the mid-term review of the CAP. It is no secret that Northern Ireland and — I was going to say UK, but — English interests have very different priorities. The UK Minister will have different views, and a Minister appointed through direct rule to represent Northern Ireland will, of course, take the UK Minister's line. To put it mildly, that would not be helpful to us in the run-up to those negotiations, especially considering the dynamic that has been introduced through the North/South Ministerial Council, whose agreed priorities have been endorsed by the Assembly and in the South. Again, those priorities are not similar to those expressed by the UK Minister.

A return to direct rule would rob Northern Ireland of the important opportunity to have its own voice in negotiations and to articulate the priorities for the industry here. That is not a political point; rather it is one that indicates the practical reality that the farming community will face.

WATER QUALITY AND PLANNING

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have received notice from the Minister of the Environment that he wishes to make a statement on water quality and planning.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): I am putting the following remarks on the public record for at least two reasons. First, the construction industry, potential householders and other sectors need clarity and certainty. Secondly, this is a matter of genuine and general public interest to elected representatives and their constituents.

Downpatrick provided an early example of an unfolding problem, and Members may recall the debate in the Assembly. At that time we sought, and achieved, a solution to the difficulties experienced in the Downpatrick area. As I did not want that situation to be constantly repeated across Northern Ireland, thus giving rise to continued uncertainty, I implemented the following approach to address the wider issues across Northern Ireland: to analyse the problem, thus providing a context for developing a solution and, in the meantime, holding applications recommended for refusal by the Environment and Heritage Service (EHS); to consider what we should do, how we should do it and to set a clear timetable for achieving an outcome; to provide a mechanism to evaluate and review progress regularly in striving to meet that timescale; and, having agreed the way forward, to inform the House and the public fully and promptly.

Members are well aware that Northern Ireland's sewerage infrastructure falls well below modern standards. As the environmental regulator, I have worked with Mr Peter Robinson, because the operation of the sewerage system is the responsibility of the Department for Regional Development. The Department for Regional Development also has a clear duty through its Water Service to comply with EU and domestic water-quality standards.

Members are also aware that the Department of the Environment's Planning Service has been holding — I emphasise not refusing — some applications in some areas as a result of concerns expressed by the Environment and Heritage Service about the environmental compliance and pollution implications of further development pending urgent consideration of the way forward by both my Department and the Department for Regional Development.

I take this opportunity to do two things. First, I would like to explain why it was necessary to hold some applications. Secondly, I would like to explain the agreed way forward. I have already referred to deficiencies in the sewerage infrastructure. It has been recognised that they are not the fault of this devolved Administration; rather they reflect the decades of underinvestment before the matters became a local responsibility. As environmental regulator, I am concerned about those deficiencies. Peter Robinson and the Department for Regional Development, as operators of the system, are also concerned.

The deficiencies exist within an increasingly stringent legal and environmental framework. In particular, the EU Urban Waste Water Treatment Directive introduces increasingly demanding standards for sewage treatment and effluent discharges to our watercourses. Domestic environmental standards are also tougher. The Assembly will recall the Public Accounts Committee report on river pollution that called on my Department, and the Environment and Heritage Service in particular, to take a much more rigorous approach to environmental regulation, not least in respect of discharges from waste water treatment works. The law is now much less tolerant of pollution than it was before, and that trend is continuing.

To illustrate the point, I will use two important indicators that are monitored by the Environment and Heritage Service in its role as environmental regulator. First, compliance of sewage treatment works with EU standards fell from 53% in 2000 to 35% in 2001. Secondly, compliance with domestic standards fell from 81% in 2000 to 57% in 2001. That compares with 95% compliance in England and Wales for at least the past five years.

It is important to note that the situation reflects the increased stringency of the regulatory standards and not an overall deterioration in the system's performance. This forms the background against which the Environment and Heritage Service and the Planning Service operate.

Furthermore, it is important to understand that my Department has a statutory duty to promote the conservation and cleanliness of Northern Ireland's water resources and waterways. In that context, and in the light of the significant reduction in Water Service compliance with EU and domestic standards, the Environment and Heritage Service expressed concern about the implications of further development with regard to environmental compliance and pollution risks in 56 locations across Northern Ireland. The concerns identified by the Environment and Heritage Service were sufficiently serious to raise complex and far-reaching legal, environmental, operational and resource issues. Those issues touched on the functions of the Department for Regional Development's Water Service as well as those of the Department of the Environment's Environment and Heritage Service and Planning Service.

Initial legal advice emphasised the need for a precautionary approach, taking account of both European and domestic law, and for careful consideration of the issues. The Planning Service therefore decided to hold — again, I emphasise “hold” and not “refuse” — planning applications for developments that the Environment and Heritage Service had recommended for refusal pending detailed examination of the issues.

That examination has proved more complex and has taken longer than we wished. It has, undoubtedly, been a source of real difficulty and concern for the construction industry as well as for actual and potential householders. I have met with representatives of the industry several times, and the Quarry Producers Association, and have apprised them of our deliberations. I have kept the Executive and the Committee for the Environment fully apprised, and I have met several delegations regarding the issue.

Needless to say, the linked issues required the Department of the Environment and the Department for Regional Development, Peter Robinson and myself to work closely together, as well as consideration by the Executive as a whole. The essence of that work has been a location-by-location examination of the compliance problems and the work needed to resolve them together with a comparison of the projects and priorities in the Water Service capital works programme. The aim was to determine whether the necessary improvement work is programmed and over what period. I am grateful to Peter Robinson and his staff for their efforts in undertaking the work.

I am glad that that co-operation has allowed us to develop a pragmatic approach, designed to balance the need for physical development with the need to protect the environment. It is important to emphasise that balance — or compromise, if you like — is at the heart of the issues I am reporting to the Assembly today. The approach that we, as Executive Ministers, have adopted reflects an acknowledgement that an absolute constraint on development in those areas with a significant degree of non-compliance with environmental standards until such time as the deficiencies in the sewerage infrastructure can be corrected would have a crippling effect on physical development across Northern Ireland. Such an approach, despite the high level of environmental protection it would have afforded, would have carried a high price in respect of constraints in economic growth and social progress.

I shall now turn to the agreed way forward and address four aspects of the issue. First, there are the environmental considerations. The joint Environment and Heritage Service/Water Service examination of the 56 locations identified 14 areas where the environmental impact is low. Remedial works in the current Water Service capital works programme should be completed within three years at five of those locations, and within five years at a further seven locations. No remedial works are planned for the remaining two areas. However, because of the low environmental impact, the Environment and Heritage Service will not object to the granting of planning permission. The Planning Service will complete the processing of the affected applications and will issue decisions. Where the decision is to approve the application, development may normally begin immediately.

In the remaining 42 locations, where the environmental impact is medium or high, remedial works are scheduled for completion within three years at 23 locations and within five years at a further 19 locations. In those cases, the Environment and Heritage Service will alert the Planning Service to the environmental issues, but will not object to the granting of planning permission. Moreover, in those cases the Planning Service will complete the processing of affected applications, issue decisions and, if approved, work may normally begin immediately. A complete list of the 56 locations, together with an environmental comment, will be available at the following web site: www.ehsni.gov.uk.

I emphasise that, in the context of development control, the Environment and Heritage Service provides advice; it does not direct the Planning Service. The Planning Service will, as it must, determine each planning application on its merits, taking into account all relevant factors, including the Environment and Heritage Service's advice.

The result of that approach is that those planning applications that have been held on a precautionary basis pending an examination of the issues, and future planning applications in all 56 locations, will be processed to decision. Although I appreciate that that will be welcome news to the construction industry and more generally, I also acknowledge that it means that developments will continue to connect to the public sewer in areas where the current inadequacy of the sewage collection and treatment systems is having a high or medium environmental impact, and will continue to do so for some years, pending completion of the Water Service's capital works programme.

As environmental regulator, that situation does not rest comfortably with me, nor does it, I am sure, with Members. The Executive have adopted that pragmatic approach to protect people's jobs and livelihoods and to ensure that the objectives for economic growth and social progress outlined in the Programme for Government are not jeopardised.

In the first instance, our approach is based on the Water Service's commitment to deliver the capital works programme as currently planned, subject to the completion of statutory processes. In considering future funding, the Executive have not agreed any increase in the capital budget for the Department for Regional Development's Water Service. At my request, and to inform the Executive's discussion, the Minister for Regional Development, Mr Peter Robinson, provided a paper outlining the additional resources that the Water Service would need to provide interim solutions at some locations in advance of the main schemes, to settle the advance plans' start dates at other locations, and to undertake by traditional procurement some schemes currently comprising a public-private partnership/private finance initiative package. The Executive noted the paper and agreed to consider the way ahead in Water Service investment as part of the infrastructure strategy to be developed between now and the final Budget in December.

To assist their consideration, the Executive agreed to commission from Peter Robinson further details of the costs that he provided and his proposals for meeting them, including his plans for re-prioritisation and restructuring.

My officials in the Environment and Heritage Service will monitor progress carefully in the capital works programme and the continuing environmental impact of development, especially in the high-and medium-impact locations. They will work closely and at senior level with Water Service officials. My aim is to avoid any serious exacerbation of pollution in those areas. I therefore caution that, in the longer term, it may not be sustainable to continue to connect developments to non-compliant sewerage systems in which remedial works remain some way off. However, I will keep the situation under continuous review, considering the balance between environmental protection and facilitating development, and will do so in an open and transparent way, fully involving the Chamber and the industry.

Peter Robinson and I have agreed that developers should also introduce proposals to meet infrastructure deficiencies, and we will encourage them to do so. It is to be hoped that my statement provides certainty and clarity for the construction industry and actual, or potential, householders who have been affected by the problem. I am mindful that continuing to hold up planning applications could have drastic implications for house supply and house prices and could potentially destabilise the housing market, which is a vital element of the Northern Ireland economy.

Therefore, we have identified the source, level and nature of the environmental and legal risks, established a clear timetable to deal with funding issues, which is a vital element of the approach that I have outlined today, established clear monitoring and review mechanisms by way of a close and clear relationship between the Department of the Environment and the Department for Regional Development, and sought to encourage opportunities for the construction industry to assist in the solution of those problems. I commend the statement to the Assembly.

1.15 pm

Mrs Carson: I welcome the Minister's statement, which is much needed. The Minister has made the best of an extremely bad job in trying to make some sense of the issue.

We must comply with the stringent — the Minister's word — European legal environmental framework, which is enshrined in the EU Urban Waste Water Directive. Our almost-obsolete sewerage systems hold effluent that goes into the river system; that concerns me. Eutrophication of our rivers and lakes is a problem, and in the Lough Erne system we have not only our own system, but the problem of pollution coming from the Republic of Ireland. I ask the Minister to consider that, because it concerns me greatly. Water is abstracted from the Lough Erne system and goes into domestic water, so I hope that the Minister will consider all those standards.

I welcome the Minister's report, and I look forward to its being implemented as soon as possible.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for saying that I am making the best of a bad job. However, it is the usual saying: you cannot control the hand of cards that you are dealt; it is how you play that hand.

Mrs Carson mentioned eutrophication and pollution from the Republic of Ireland. Under the EU Urban Waste Water Directive, we are considering river basins and how water should be standardised. Part of that process involves cross-border work, because at least one of the basins is transnational between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. All those issues will be dealt with in due course. There is no quick fix to the problem of river pollution.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his statement, which everybody welcomes. The statement and the proposed action aim to create certainty and clarity. However, I am not certain that that will have been achieved as a result of the statement, because it is so dependent on getting a clear timetable for the Department for Regional Development to deal with the funding issues. Clarity and certainty are also dependent on the creation of monitoring and review mechanisms.

Will the Minister assure the Assembly that that timetable for funding can be reached fairly quickly to provide clarity and certainty for the public?

Mr Nesbitt: I thank Mr Alban Maginness for saying that everybody welcomes my statement. I am beginning to worry whether people from all sides welcome it, but I take the point.

As regards certainty and clarity, we all remember the debate about development in Downpatrick. I did some interviews then, and the word "widespread" was used. The question was asked about where the next development would take place. I said that we should put a hold on development and ascertain the depth of the planning problem. I am clarifying where the 56 problems are, their depth from an environmental perspective, and when there is likely to be a capital works programme to rectify those difficulties.

Mr Maginness said that he was unsure about the clarity of the matter. There are two financial elements. There is the capital works programme to which the Department for Regional Development agreed. It was on that basis alone that I gave the chronological listing of up to three years or up to five years. Having said that, the reinvestment and reform initiative and various other programmes are necessary, and the Executive have commissioned the Minister for Regional Development to introduce further information. I cannot answer that.

I have identified the problem from a planning point of view, brought it to the public domain and made everyone aware of the implications. I have no doubt that Members often hear about constituents' housing concerns on this. I have given the issue a space for planning development to take place, and I look to the Department for Regional Development to bring forward that additional capital programme and to discuss and agree its funding in the Executive. That will bring the certainty and the clarity that are required. We all agree that sewerage infrastructure is behind that of the rest of the United Kingdom, never mind the rest of Europe.

Mrs Nelis: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement; it is better late than never. Was he aware that sewerage infrastructure was well below standard and that the Department of the Environment was required to comply with the EC Directive in January 2001? If he was aware of that, why were planning restrictions introduced a year and a half later in May 2002?

Will the Minister give clarification on the Culmore sewage treatment works, which was given planning permission in 2001? Even if that proposal proceeds now, it will take three years to complete. The Water Service's representative stated on television some weeks ago that the money was available to proceed with the Culmore sewage treatment works. However, the Minister, Mr Robinson, contradicted that some weeks later in the Assembly. Will the Minister say when the Culmore sewage treatment works proposal will proceed and what possible restrictions developers are likely to encounter as a result of the delay? Has the Minister discussed with his counterpart in the Department for Regional Development the alternative that developers will have to resort to, in the form of modern cesspits and packaged treatment plants, which will have a far more serious environmental impact than the current discharges to water, worrying though they may be.

Mr Nesbitt: The Member said that my statement was "better late than never". I stress that this is an extremely complex issue because of the geographical breadth and depth of the environmental risk that the Department is taking on these sewage treatment works. I maintain that it was worth stepping back to identify the magnitude of the problem. Unless or until we quantify the problem, we will not be able to identify the proper solution.

The Member said that the sewerage infrastructure is "well below standard" and that it was supposed to comply with the European standard in January 2001. She is correct. That was the date when the European Directive raised the bar and 200 extra sewage treatment works were brought into the reckoning. That led to a lowering compliance level, and only 35% of our sewage treatment works are now in compliance. However, consider the chronology: only when the figures were brought together in March 2002 did the proportion of non-compliance become apparent. Statistics for a specific year apply only after the year has run, at which time they are analysed. It is similar with balance sheets and public accounts; the balance sheet for the year ending 2001 would not be presented until, perhaps, March, April, May or June of the following year. There is a time lapse.

In March 2002, when the magnitude of non-compliance became known, which paralleled the debate in the Assembly about Downpatrick, action kicked in to identify the problem and find a solution and a way to monitor the situation, and we had to be clear about what we were doing.

I do not plan to get into a discussion about an individual sewage treatment works, and I hope the Member understands that in relation to her third point on Culmore sewage treatment works. That is why I made sure that the information is available on the Department's web site. People can search for Culmore waste water treatment plant. It will be categorised as having a high, medium or low environmental impact. The web site will define simply each of those categories. If anyone wishes to ask me, I will explain them. The web site states when the capital works programme is meant to be completed, because only when the programme is complete will the risk of pollution be eliminated. There is clear information on the Culmore waste water treatment plant on the web site, because it was one of the 56 hot spots.

I hasten to add that there is a small complication. It has been said that there are infrastructure problems, and there are. Effluent may be entering a river, but, depending on the speed of the flow and the volume of the water, the dilution of the sewage may take place very quickly. Therefore, there may not be pollution.

As I said, the information is on the web site, but I will help the Member. I am told, and I thank those who told me, that the plant at Culmore will take up to three years to meet the standards. However, there is no significant impact on Lough Foyle at present. The problem is the sewerage system.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have granted some licence with regard to the length of questions and answers because of the relatively small number of Members who have indicated that they wish to speak.

Mr Hussey: I welcome the co-operation at ministerial level on this issue. We all realise that that was absolutely essential. The Minister spoke about having to work with the hand that he was dealt. The Minister's flush was facing a royal flush from European Directives.

The Minister referred to compliance with EU standards. What are the compliance levels in other European countries? I share Mr Alban Maginness's concerns about the timetable of infrastructure improvement that will be needed. I trust that, to achieve the timetable, we will not consider short-term fixes that would cause problems beyond the five-year period. Does the statement take immediate effect?

The Minister also stated that it is important to understand that his Department has a statutory duty to promote the conservation and cleanliness of Northern Ireland's water resources and waterways. We all understand that and support his Department's efforts to achieve its aims.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I hope that you will forgive me for speaking slightly at a tangent. Will the Minister make every effort to consult with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the agriculture industry with regard to future legislation on water cleanliness, particularly in relation to the disposal and spreading of slurry? Will he ensure that a practical approach is adopted that will not further disadvantage our agriculture sector? Furthermore, will he ensure that any decisions are based on sound scientific facts and figures, and that conclusions will also follow that pattern?

I understand, as I am sure the Minister does, that, with regard to pollution, there are concerns that nitrate levels are being studied, when there is a suggestion that phosphate levels should be studied.

Mr Nesbitt: I am conscious, Mr Deputy Speaker, that you mentioned the length of questions and answers. This matter has been exercising people's minds and, therefore, I wish to exorcise it from their minds.

Mr Hussey mentioned the statistics for other European countries. I do not have those to hand, but they will be supplied to Mr Hussey when I can obtain them. I share his concern, and I have placed that fact on the record. We want to get the matter right because of those concerns.

I cannot read the writing for the next answer, so I will move on.

Regarding the statement, it is having immediate effect.

1.30 pm

Mr Hussey mentioned a third point. It is rare for me to be on my feet without being asked a question about agriculture. I share the Member's concern. I wish to, and do, work co-operatively with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the farming industry. He mentioned scientific fact. Policy should be based on evidence, not emotion. That applies to many issues, not just this one. I am conscious that he mentioned nitrates, phosphates and the causes of eutrophication. I am also conscious that John Gilliland, the president of the Ulster Farmers' Union, has made this point clearly to officials and to me. I will ensure that the decisions to be taken on slurry, sewage and the causes of the problems will be based on scientific evidence.

Mr Dallat: I also thank the Minister for his statement and compliment him on the high priority that he attaches to environmental issues. I want to introduce the issue of flags — not the controversial kind, but blue flags, which are critical to our tourism strategy. Given the restrictions on upgrading our sewerage system, will the Minister assure us that we can retain our blue flag beaches in the interests of tourism?

Mr Nesbitt: I am conscious of the debate about a certain sewage treatment works discharging effluent into a certain part of the coastline in Mr Dallat's constituency. Thus, I can understand the angle from which he comes. I wish to see the blue flag dimension maintained and enhanced here. We want to see our beaches protected and preserved, and that is all that I need to say at this juncture.

Mr M Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I also welcome the Minister's statement. In recognising the high price of constraints on economic growth and social progress, the Minister has agreed that the risk of pollution is not a comfortable one. Will he assure the House that any planning application will be adhered to, that the environmental risks will be considered and that no short cuts will be taken by the construction industry?

Mr Nesbitt: I am sorry; I missed a key part. Mr Murphy asked me to ensure what?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Perhaps you could clarify, Mr Murphy.

Mr M Murphy: Will he ensure that no short cuts are taken by the construction industry?

Mr Nesbitt: I missed the words "no short cuts". I also thank Mr Murphy for his commendation. I am getting worried about this approval.

Mr Murphy pointed out an environmental aspect that we all recognise exists. I will ensure that no short cuts are taken. I have made it very clear that one of the four key elements is to monitor and review. It is no good identifying a problem or trying to find a solution unless there is monitoring to ensure that that solution is answering the problem, a normal and natural business practice.

We have also established a close relationship between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, akin to what happens in Britain where the environmental regulator and the Department work together. I am, or I represent, the environmental regulator, and I assure Mr Murphy that no short cuts will be tolerated in this context. We all recognise the difficulties, and we are all trying to move forward, mindful of the poor level of infrastructure we have for sewage works in Northern Ireland.

Mr Savage: In the Ministers press release this morning, he stated that this is a problem that he and his Department inherited due to underinvestment in former years. I note that he said that many planning applications are on hold. Is that because the sewage treatment works are not up to scratch and cannot cope? When will all the plants in rural areas be able to cope and be brought up to an acceptable standard?

Farmers in the Lough Neagh area have had difficulty getting onto their land due to the wet weather during the past year. Will steps be taken to lower the water level?

Mr Nesbitt: The sewage treatment works are performing as they have been. The proportion of non-compliance has been increased by the EU Directive raising the standard and the fact that some sewage treatment works were brought into the reckoning during our assessment. Some may not be up to standard. Sewage discharge can lead to pollution, depending on whether it dilutes quickly in the river.

However, there is a problem, and we have tried to identify it and to find a way forward. We have tried to make the problem and the solution known in the public domain. That will require careful monitoring. It is also an integral part of the process. The situation will be monitored, and those sewage treatment works that are not up to standard will be brought up to standard fairly quickly — the number of years is estimated. We wait to see what further capital provision comes through the various strategic investment initiatives that are planned over the coming weeks with the Department for Regional Development. I have given the lead from a planning point of view, and I look to the Department for Regional Development to play its part.

The water level in Lough Neagh is a matter for the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. I am conscious of the other aspect of pollution referred to by Mr Hussey.

Mrs Courtney: The construction industry, planners and developers have been waiting for this news for a long time. I also welcome the Minister's response to Mr Hussey that it would take effect immediately. That will be good news for those who may be in the process of laying off workers, and it is good news for the construction industry as a whole.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank Mrs Courtney for her comments.

EMPLOYMENT BILL

Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshallled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. There are five groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn, as indicated in my grouping list. I remind Members intending to speak that, during the debates on the five groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each particular group on which they wish to comment. Once the initial debate on each group is completed, any subsequent amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the question on each will be put without further debate. The questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Clauses 1 to 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate — amendment No 1, with which it will be convenient to debate amendment No 2.

Clause 4 (Statutory adoption pay)

Question proposed, That the Clause stand part of the Bill.

The Minister for Employment and Learning (Ms Hanna): I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 21, line 32, after "Act" insert "(except section 167 ZP(1) to (3))".

The following amendment stood on the Marshallled List:

No 2: In clause 8, page 24, line 16, leave out paragraph (a) and insert —

"(a) after sub-paragraph (f) (issues relating to entitlement to statutory sick pay or statutory maternity pay) there shall be inserted —

"(fa) subject to and in accordance with regulations made for the purposes of this paragraph by the Department for Employment and Learning with the concurrence of the Board, to decide any issue arising as to, or in connection with, entitlement to statutory paternity pay or statutory adoption pay;"'. — [Ms Hanna.]

Ms Hanna: Amendments No 1 and No 2 cover clause 4 and clause 8 respectively. I have tabled the amendments in order to clarify the Bill's powers to make Regulations. Clause 4 inserts provisions on statutory adoption pay into the Social Security Contributions and Benefits (Northern Ireland) Act 1992. It provides my Department with the power to make Regulations on statutory adoption pay. However, statutory adoption pay may have effects on social security benefits such as incapacity benefit. Therefore, the Department for Social Development also needs powers to make Regulations in that area. Amendment No 1 confers that necessary power on the Department for Social Development.

Clause 8 inserts provisions about decisions and appeals on statutory paternity and adoption pay into the Social Security Contributions (Transfer of Functions, etc.) (Northern Ireland) Order 1999. The Department for Social Development normally makes Regulations under that Order. However, it is right that the power to make Regulations about entitlement to statutory paternity pay and statutory adoption pay should be vested in my Department, which has the policy responsibility for those matters. Amendment No 2 confers that power on my Department. The amendments ensure that the Regulation-making powers in question are conferred on the appropriate Department. The amendments are purely technical in nature, and I seek the Assembly's approval of them.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning (Dr Birnie): Both amendments are of a technical nature. They are necessary to provide enabling powers to the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department for Social Development. I urge the House to support them.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 4, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 (Decisions and appeals)

Amendment No 2 made: In clause 8, page 24, line 16, leave out paragraph (a) and insert —

“(a) after sub-paragraph (f) (issues relating to entitlement to statutory sick pay or statutory maternity pay) there shall be inserted —

“(fa) subject to and in accordance with regulations made for the purposes of this paragraph by the Department for Employment and Learning with the concurrence of the Board, to decide any issue arising as to, or in connection with, entitlement to statutory paternity pay or statutory adoption pay;”’. — [Ms Hanna.]

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 9 to 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13 (Flexible working)

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members should note that amendments No 3, No 4, No 5, No 6 and No 7 are inter-dependent. If amendment No 3 is not made, I shall not call the remaining amendments.

Ms McWilliams: I beg to move amendment No 3: In page 28, line 14, after “child” insert “or disabled dependant”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 4: In page 28, line 24, after “child” insert “or disabled dependant”. — [Ms McWilliams.]

No 5: In page 28, line 27, after “Article” insert

“which is made in respect of a child”. — [Ms McWilliams.]

No 6: In page 28, line 29, leave out the words from “or” to the end. — [Ms McWilliams.]

No 7: In page 28, line 39, leave out from beginning to “child” in the second place it occurs and insert

“In this Article any reference to a disabled dependant is to a dependant”. — [Ms McWilliams.]

Ms McWilliams: Amendments No 4, No 5, No 6 and No 7 are consequential to amendment No 3. The lead amendment arises from our concern about parents with disabled children, and the eligibility of those disabled dependants beyond the age of 18 years.

The Employment Bill does not make it clear if the right to flexible working will be extended to parents with disabled children who are 18 years or older. There are 7,000 children under the age of 18 with disabilities in Northern Ireland. The statistics for those over 18 years were queried, but there may be approximately 14,000 adults with some kind of disability between the ages of 18 and 44. However, how many of their parents are working and would benefit from access to flexible working? In practice, some but not all might benefit from that. As the Bill stands, the parents of disabled children who depend on them beyond the age of 18 are not entitled to the provisions of the Bill.

1.45 pm

Parents of disabled dependants have great needs, and extensive research has been carried out by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation, which has done admirable work over the years, on the role of carers. However, the research to which I refer is a study of parents with disabled children who are now adults. The study is called ‘Juggling Work and Care: the experiences of working carers of older adults’. As part of the study, the foundation interviewed 40 families who have tried to combine employment with caring for disabled adult children. They point out the difficulties that such parents have in sustaining secure but flexible work and how, as a consequence, many such families are trapped into poverty. Some had to give up work and were then dependent on benefits, but they do not want to be on benefits; they prefer to be out working to avoid feeling isolated and vulnerable, but they cannot reconcile the two. Now, for the first time, we have a Bill that is concerned with parental rights on flexible working, but it denies those rights to one of the most needy groups of all — the parents of disabled children who are over 18 years of age.

There was a widespread assumption about the mothers of disabled dependants being available for work at any time, if they were in work. As a consequence, that group was often afraid of being labelled “in need” and therefore needy. They did not want that to continue. They wanted to be able to speak about their special needs as parents of disabled dependants. When they were out of work they suffered excessive personal and financial hardship. If this Government can do anything about linking up pieces of legislation and preventing poverty — particularly the poverty of those with disabled children or disabled dependants — let them do it in the Employment Bill.

The foundation's study concluded that if the Government were to give employees a right to ask for flexible working arrangements, it would greatly help the parents of disabled dependants, since employees would have a legal right to have that request considered seriously by employers.

The Committee for Employment and Learning asked an official if there was any forthcoming legislation to take on board the role of carers. I am talking about the parents of disabled dependants, not other carers, although I hope that some day the Assembly will have legislation to deal with carers' responsibilities and rights in work. The official said that as far as he was aware no such legislation was being considered, so this amendment must be incorporated into the Employment Bill. If it is not, it will be lost.

The Committee for Employment and Learning took evidence from Ms McSorley from the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland, who said:

"The Commission certainly feels that the right should be made available in relation to disabled children while they remain dependent."

Likewise, Prof Barry Fitzpatrick of the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland said:

"The reconciliation of working and family life makes for better workers. If people are not given this sort of leave it will affect how they work. A sensible leave system covering the purposes for which people want time off is better than them taking leave regardless of the rules."

I have no doubt that that was the purpose of the legislation in the first place, and, therefore, it addresses the needs of parents whose children are under the age of six and parents who have disabled children up to the age of 18. Those disabled children will remain, to all intents and purposes, children, as in the word "dependants" of their parents, beyond the age of 18. Ann Hope, from the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, rightly said:

"The key issue should be the needs of the child and the parents and not an artificial age barrier."

Why is age 18 the cut-off point for disabled dependants? A departmental official responded to the Committee's inquiry. He stated:

"I do not recall whether the Department used statistics or whether it simply came to a conclusion following the consultation and suggestions made in that about the age of disabled and non-disabled children whose parents should be entitled to flexible working hours."

Consensus emerged that the appropriate age was six for non-disabled children and 18 for disabled children. The next words are extremely important. He said:

"The decision was probably not made in a scientific way."

Given all the scientific and empirical evidence about the needs of parents who have disabled children over the age of 18 but with the same needs as children under the age of six, I urge the Minister to become more scientific and extend them that right in this legislation. What will happen to parents whose children have reached the age of 18 by the time that the Bill is passed? Given that it is going to be prospective, they may have exactly the same needs as they previously had. We must address those needs.

The Bill implicitly states that if the contractual rights were there before they reached the age of 18, they may still have those rights after the age of 18. What happens to those who can be regarded, to all intents and purposes, as dependants — who are entitled to disability living allowance, which is the eligibility criteria — but who will be denied that right?

Given that the evidence was rather unscientific, it may lead to cases of indirect discrimination. Equality legislation under section 75 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 proves that people with or without dependants are not discriminated against in that category. The Equality Commission tells us that there is currently much confusion about the role of carers, particularly women who have caring responsibilities. If we do not include this amendment, we will add to that confusion. For example, if I were working and had a child who was under 18, and someone were working with me whose child had just turned 18 and had become incapacitated as the result of an unfortunate sporting accident, those two parents would have entirely different rights, yet that person's needs might be greater than mine.

With that mind, I am concerned that the Bill is unclear about what will happen to the group who are under the age of 18, after they become 18. However, it is equally important that Members should address the needs of those in poverty, particularly given that it is a priority in the Programme for Government, allow them the opportunity to work, give them flexible working rights and the same rights as those who have dependants under the age of 18.

Dr Birnie: I thank Prof McWilliams for raising this issue, which was discussed at length in several Committee meetings. It is sufficiently important to merit being raised again today.

The Bill, as it stands, states that the right of parents to request flexible working should be limited to cases where the child is aged under six or, if the child is disabled, 18. In a desire to be as helpful as possible to parents of disabled children, the Committee considered the possibility of removing the age limit of 18. However, the majority of Committee members determined against that course of action. The Committee identified two main problems, which seem to be attached also to the amendments.

First, the use of the term "disabled dependant" in amendment No 4 will widen the measure to include all dependants, not simply offspring. That is an important distinction that will widen the provision, no matter what the original intention of the amendment was. If that amendment is accepted, it will significantly change the nature of the Bill.

Secondly, there is a concern about the compliance and budgetary cost of the measure. When taking evidence, the Committee detected a certain lack of precision on the part of the Department about how many parents of disabled children would benefit from the provisions as they stand. That, in turn, makes it difficult to estimate how a wider casting of the net might increase eligibility and cost. That said, on page 74 of the Committee's report there are figures provided by Assembly Library and Research Services which include the number of people claiming disability living allowance plus attendance allowance, and which show that up to 211,000 people could be affected if we went for a form of words such as "disabled dependant".

If the Assembly is to go down that road, it will constitute a major policy change. It can be argued that that change should be considered, whatever its merits. It does have some merit, but such a change should be considered in its own right, rather than being introduced through amendments to the Bill.

Although I am bound to restate the view of the majority of Committee members on the subject, I appreciate that the amendments raise important policy issues. The position of carers other than parents must be considered, and I urge the Minister to do so, because it is part of the general theme of tackling the so-called work/life balance.

The Bill is concerned with granting the right to request flexible working. In the case of parents of disabled children, that right exists until the child reaches the age of 18. However, as Ms McWilliams pointed out, if flexible working is granted, there is a question about whether that right continues after the child reaches the age of 18. As I understand it, it would continue. However, given that that is a sufficiently important issue, it would be useful if the Minister would clarify the position of such cases.

In other words, once flexible working has been granted to a parent, does that continue once the disabled child has passed the age of 18? In previous discussions, a majority of the Committee came down against this group of amendments, although I concede that there was another view.

However, I should certainly like to hear the Minister's views this afternoon regarding some of the issues raised by Ms McWilliams, particularly on two points. First, what does the Department propose regarding equitable treatment of carers in the round — other than simply those who care for children? Secondly, what happens once the right to flexible working has been granted but the child is no longer under the age limit specified in the Bill?

2.00 pm

Ms Gildernew: Go raibh mile maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the amendments. The issue was discussed at length on several occasions, as the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning has said, and we took a vote on it. Although the Chairperson kept talking about the majority of the Committee, that majority was of only one. Committee members were, by and large, very sympathetic to the view that a person who has a disabled child under 18 years of age and who is entitled to flexible working arrangements should be able to continue those hours after the child has turned 18.

We all know families with children who are over the age of 18 but who are still very much dependent on their parents. Those families have many problems to deal with. People come to me about matters as simple as lowered kerbs in the town centre so that they can get about adequately in a wheelchair. They come to me about the benefits system and the disabled living allowance for their children. They come to me about transport and educational arrangements. Often an entire family is disabled by the circumstances in which it finds itself with a disabled child.

If we are to do something good to benefit the wider community, we must be more imaginative and creative in bringing about legislation that will make a real difference to people's lives. Extending the flexible working arrangements to families who have children over the age of 18 who are still dependent would make a huge difference.

The Committee has discussed the issue at length. I agree with much of what Monica McWilliams said on the issue and support her amendments. It is critically important that we try, in the limited time that we have left in this Assembly — and it might be even more limited today than it was last week — to pass legislation that will improve people's lives. These amendments, if carried, will do that, and I support them. Go raibh mile maith agat.

Ms Hanna: I understand that, in proposing these amendments, the Member intends to give the parents of disabled children the statutory right to continue with flexible working arrangements when their child passes the age of 18. Secondly, she would like the right to flexible working for the parents of disabled children who are over 18 years of age when the parents request flexible working arrangements.

I fully support the Member's sentiments. Indeed, I have worked for many years with the parents of disabled children. I share their concerns. After all, just because a disabled child turns 18 years of age does not mean that it is no longer dependent on its parents. Parents of disabled children still require the right to flexible working arrangements when their children become adults.

The Employment Bill confers on parents of disabled children the right to request flexible working arrangements, not just until children reach six years of age, but throughout the childhood of a disabled person. Although the request for flexible working hours must be made before a child with a disability reaches the age of 18, the flexible working arrangement does not end at that point.

I want to clarify what would happen in practice with regard to flexible working arrangements under the provisions of the Bill. When the parents of a child under the age of six, or of a disabled child under the age of 18, request flexible working arrangements, the employer and employee will enter into dialogue to explore how the request can be accommodated without there being a detrimental effect on the employer's business. I am confident that the request can be facilitated in most cases and that a mutually suitable arrangement will be reflected in the permanent employment contract between employer and employee.

The permanent contract would continue indefinitely until an event occurs, such as the employee leaving, the employer ceasing to operate, a new contract being established or a contract being varied. A contract can only be varied, or a new contract entered into, after due consultation involving both parties. The contract would continue indefinitely. Therefore, a situation would arise in which employees who are parents of disabled persons over the age of 18 would continue with that flexible working arrangement.

I cannot agree with Ms McWilliams's amendment. It would confer the right to request flexible working arrangements beyond the targeted beneficiaries of the Bill. I sincerely appreciate the fact that parents of disabled children over the age of 18 when the application is made for flexible working arrangements will miss out: that goes beyond the targeted beneficiaries of the Bill. However, the Department will review the legislation and if it is working successfully for employer and employee, the Department may extend its scope. I hope that the Member will feel able to withdraw her amendment.

Ms McWilliams: I am pleased that it was clarified that much debate took place in the Committee and that the majority was only one. Had the Committee considered the issue at greater length, certain members might have been won over by some of the arguments. It is good to have the Minister's clarification that the contractual arrangement could be varied for those who have the right and are beyond the age of 18.

However, I was taken by the Minister's own words when she said that a disabled person's dependency does not necessarily end at the age of 18. I am heartened that the Minister, having worked with the parents of disabled adults, understands their needs. I believe, therefore, that it is possible for the Assembly to work on the amendment. I am not referring to the wider interpretation that covers all carers of dependants. I agree that that may require further legislation. I am referring to the working parents of a disabled dependent child or adult who is beyond the age of 18. The Assembly must legislate for that group. Therefore, the amendment must stand. If it is passed, the Assembly can agree upon the legal wording that will accommodate that group.

Given the current political situation, it would not serve us well to leave it out of the legislation and to have to tell interested groups that we may return to it one day. The time is now, and it is a good time to include the amendment in the legislation.

- (ii) after head (vii) insert—
- '(viii) Article 112G(1) or 112H(1)(b) (flexible working);' and
- (b) in sub-paragraph (e) at the beginning insert 'under, or'."
- [Ms Hanna.]

Ms Hanna: Amendments No 9 and No 11 have the effect of enabling the Labour Relations Agency both to conciliate in disputes about flexible working and to extend its binding arbitration scheme to such disputes. A key principle behind the flexible working provisions is that of promoting dialogue. It is important to encourage employers and employees to find solutions that suit both. Conciliation and arbitration can help to achieve that. It is in everyone's interests to ensure that disputes be settled to the satisfaction of the parties without recourse to the tribunal system. The flexible working provisions lend themselves well to conciliation and arbitration, which are well suited to resolving straight-forward cases. Essentially, the issues to be resolved are factual rather than legal. The Labour Relations Agency has much expertise in the areas of conciliation and arbitration. The resource should be made available when disputes arise over flexible working. To that end, I have tabled the two technical amendments.

Dr Birnie: The Committee supports the principle of this group of amendments, whereby individuals can choose to use the Labour Relations Agency instead of industrial tribunals. I therefore urge support for them.

Amendment No 9 agreed to.

Ms Hanna: I beg to move amendment No 10: In page 39, line 1, leave out lines 1 to 3 and insert

"in sub-paragraph (e) after '134' insert ' , 135C'."

This amendment will have the effect of exempting members of the armed forces from the Bill's flexible working provisions.

As drafted, those provisions apply to all employees, and that, by and large, is how it should be. However, if national interest requires it, members of the armed forces are placed in the unusual position of being deployed at little or no notice. Those unique working conditions make it impractical to apply flexible working arrangements to service personnel.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces and the Ministry of Defence requested that I accept their proposed amendments, and for the reasons given, I decided to agree. The Ministry of Defence intends to explore how it can, nevertheless, comply with the spirit of the legislation, subject to overriding operational requirements.

Dr Birnie: The Committee considered the proposed amendment and sought clarification from the Minister, whereby it was pointed out that the exemption would not apply to emergency services such as the Ambulance Service or the Fire Service. The Committee supports the amendment in principle.

Amendment No 10 agreed to.

Amendment No 11 made: In page 39, line 7, at end insert —

- (ii) after head (vii) insert—
- '(viii) Article 112G(1) or 112H(1)(b) (flexible working);' and
- (b) in sub-paragraph (e) at the beginning insert 'under, or'."
- [Ms Hanna.]

Ms Hanna: I beg to move amendment No 12: In page 39, line 7, at end insert —

"The Employment Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 (NI 9)

In Article 24 (1) (power to confer rights on individuals) at the end add—

- '(g) the Employment Act (Northern Ireland) 2002.'."

Amendment No 12 will enable my Department to extend the rights conferred by the Employment Bill to additional classes of workers. The Committee for Employment and Learning has expressed concern that the Bill's provisions do not cover the relatively small group of workers not classed as employees. The right that the Bill confers applies to employees for several practical reasons, which have been accepted by the Committee.

I am sympathetic to the Committee's interest in the rights and benefits afforded to workers. My Department recently issued two related consultation documents on employment status and working conditions for temporary and agency workers. I look forward to hearing views that may arise from the public consultations on individual employment rights, including those introduced by the Bill. The Employment Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 gives the Department the power to extend the rights contained in some existing employment legislation. Some of the rights introduced by the Employment Bill will be covered by that power because they are inserted in existing legislation. Other rights are, however, only contained in the Bill, and to ensure that they can be extended, I tabled amendment No 12.

Dr Birnie: Amendment No 12 is especially significant in the context of the two consultation exercises that the Minister mentioned. As she rightly said, the Committee urges that this opportunity be used to consider whether “workers” could in some cases be given rights equal to those that apply to people who are defined as “employees”. The Committee supports the amendment in principle.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Oral Answers to Questions

FIRST MINISTER AND DEPUTY FIRST MINISTER

Reinvestment and Reform Initiative

1. Mr Beggs asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) what provisions have been made, in the draft Budget, for the Office’s plans regarding the reform and reinvestment initiative. (AQO 250/02)

The First Minister (Mr Trimble): Our office is taking the lead in developing legislation on behalf of the Executive to establish the strategic investment board and to allow for the regeneration, through the reinvestment and reform initiative, of former security and military sites. The draft Budget does not contain specific provision for the strategic investment board or for the costs associated with the transfer of sites because we were unable to quantify those meaningfully when proposals for the draft Budget were drawn up. The situation will be reviewed when the final Budget is prepared and when work on the initiative is taken into account in the next few months.

The provision in the draft Budget for infrastructure for 2004-05 and 2005-06, which was announced on 24 September, is insufficient to tackle our infrastructure deficit. More is needed for our capital programmes, but more will come through the reinvestment and reform initiative, which we hope will be announced later in the autumn.

Mr Beggs: Does the First Minister agree that the reinvestment and reform initiative provides an important financial opportunity to address the water and sewerage infrastructure deficits which exist throughout Northern Ireland and which are restricting development in my constituency? Does the Minister agree that the reinvestment and reform initiative could play an important role in maintaining existing jobs and, perhaps, in creating new ones?

The First Minister: The Member is correct; the object of the exercise is to address the infrastructure deficit and to provide resources for it. We already have a significant increase in resources, thanks to the immediate measures that we negotiated with the Treasury, and we expect legislation to be forthcoming from Westminster that will give us a substantial borrowing power that will greatly add to our available options. Of course, the Administration and the Assembly must consider carefully how those options are exercised.

Mr S Wilson: Will the First Minister confirm that all the infrastructure work that was referred to in the last question could be carried out by the existing Departments, without setting up an expensive strategic investment board or expensive development corporations, as proposed in the Strategic Planning Bill? Will he tell the House whether setting up new quangos is consistent with the promises that he made to sweep away quangos as a result of administrative reform? Does he not find it grotesque that, while talking about tumbling the institutions, he is in the process of putting through a Bill that is designed only to give him more opportunities to promote his cronies?

The First Minister: The Member is tempting fate by using the word “grotesque”, and I shall not pursue that further. There is substantial underinvestment in infrastructure, and a substantial job must be done. The initiative is not merely about reinvestment; it is about reinvestment and reform. The intention is to improve how we do things, and the Administration has not been as effective as we would have liked in pursuing public-private partnerships and exploring the options there. We are centralising expertise so that the 10 Departments do not each have to reinvent the wheel. That is why we want to attract skills and disciplines from parts of the private sector to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of the system. It will be cost-effective, but working through the existing Departments — the old silo-type system — has clearly been inadequate and is unlikely to be adequate for our current situation. I am sorry that the Member is such an old stick-in-the-mud.

Mr Speaker: I wish to advise the House that question 5, standing in the name of Mr Fee, has been withdrawn and will receive a written answer.

Equality Commission

2. Mrs E Bell asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to give an update on the implementation of the Equality Commission’s legal services’ audit report recommendations; and to make a statement. (AQO 244/02)

The Deputy First Minister: In January 2002, the Department queried the Equality Commission’s increasing expenditure on legal fees. The Department asked the Commission to carry out an internal audit of its financial systems and procedures relating to the legal services budget. We agreed the terms of reference for the audit, which covered three distinct areas: the reasons for the increasing expenditure on legal fees; a review of the processes for commissioning and paying legal fees and budgetary financial management and approval systems; and a review of systems and processes in the legal division as a whole, with reference to the integration of services across all the legislative grounds.

The auditor’s final report on the first two areas was presented to the Equality Commission on 5 July, and the Department asked the Commission to draw up an implementation plan for the recommendations. That has been accomplished and is being monitored by the Department. Significant progress has been made on implementing those recommendations.

The third part of the review, which will include benchmarking the legal services directorate against other organisations carrying out similar functions, is due to be completed by the end of November.

Mrs E Bell: I thank the Deputy First Minister for his answer to that important question. Does he agree that recent newspaper reports on this, which I understand are generally inaccurate, must be dealt with, so that staff morale is not further undermined?

The Deputy First Minister: I recognise that concerns have arisen over newspaper reports. Staff morale is a significant factor, and the Department hopes to ensure that any damage is compensated for by progress. As well as that, those who want the Equality Commission to be available to give support must have their confidence in and concerns about the Commission addressed.

Mrs Courtney: Is OFMDFM concerned that some people have had legal assistance withdrawn at short notice, and was it aware that that would happen? Does OFMDFM agree that the Equality Commission is well funded, and can it say what support it provides?

The Deputy First Minister: I agree that the Equality Commission is well funded. It gets £6.7 million each year while the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission gets only £750,000 and the South’s equality authority gets 5 million euros — about half the funding for twice the number of people. The Commission may spend up to £1.8 million on legal assistance this financial year. That is well over budget. Last year it is estimated that the UK Disability Rights Commission spent £220,000.

OFMDFM was not aware that the Equality Commission had started to withdraw assistance at short notice, and as it was concerned about that, it met with the Equality Commission. OFMDFM is monitoring the situation to see what additional resources should be made available to it this year to ensure that important aspects of its work are carried forward, while dealing with increased expenditure on legal fees. OFMDFM wants to ensure that assistance is not withdrawn at short notice and that the large increase in expenditure and legal aid do not prevent the Commission from carrying out other important aspects of its work. OFMDFM has also agreed measures to assist the Commission to manage its legal aid strategy. The Equality Commission is not a legal aid body and should not be expected to act as such. At a personal level, I would like to see legal aid made available for such cases.

Mrs Carson: Will the Minister agree that, in the past, the Equality Commission has been too willing to back every case brought to it and that that has been the cause of its financial problems? That policy has also discredited the Equality Commission in the eyes of the public.

The Deputy First Minister: Unlawful discrimination is unacceptable. The Equality Commission is a strategic enforcement body that enforces existing anti-discrimination law and uses its resources to ensure the development of legal issues. Support to complainants is one of the ways in which the Equality Commission can fulfil its functions to eliminate unlawful discrimination and to promote equality of opportunity.

Last year, in recognition of the increasing proportion of its budget that was being taken up by legal fees, and of the need to bring a more strategic focus and coherence to the consideration of requests for assistance, the Equality Commission undertook a review of its legal assistance strategy. The review identified the need for a more strategic use of its legal budget. Again, I make the point that the Equality Commission is not responsible for providing legal aid and cannot be expected to act as if it is. Legal aid is a reserved matter, and it is the Lord Chancellor's policy not to provide legal aid to tribunal cases. I have already given my view on that matter.

Executive Meeting

3. Mr McClarty asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline the date of the next Executive meeting and what will be on the agenda. (AQO 251/02)

The First Minister: There is a schedule, but unless there are some dramatic developments, I have great difficulty in seeing how the Executive, as presently constituted, can meet again.

Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McClarty: Is it conceivable that, had security matters rested with the Executive, infiltration to the extent admitted by the Secretary of State would have happened under the First Minister's watch?

Mr S Wilson: He helped it.

Mr McClarty: I will get back to my point and leave Flipper to get on with it.

Furthermore, would the question of concealing stolen documents to that scale of for more than three months have arisen?

The First Minister: The Member raises hypothetical points, and some of those matters may be unknowable. However, there is no doubt that serious questions must be asked about how the Northern Ireland Office conducted its business and the level of regulation that it imposed. I hope that, at an appropriate time, in the not-too-distant future, the Secretary of State will institute a proper inquiry into what happened on his watch and put the findings in the public domain.

Dr Hendron: Will the First Minister or the Deputy First Minister ask the Executive, if and when they meet, to recall the Minister for Regional Development's triumphant statement to the Assembly on 20 May this year? The Minister announced approval for development at Harland & Wolff's harbour estate of land that was no longer required for shipbuilding, permitting the financing of a new business plan. Will he establish whether the proposal of 200 redundancies is part of that business plan, or whether it is an attempt to free up even more Harland & Wolff land for disgraceful speculative profit at the expense of those unfortunate workers?

The First Minister: There was a brief discussion of those matters at the Executive's last meeting. Sir Reg Empey gave the Executive an account of the development of the situation. As I recall — and I hope that I recall accurately — the protective notices with regard to redundancy were necessitated by the state of the construction of vessels at Harland & Wolff; the second ship is about to be completed. He also told us about discussions on the development of the harbour estate. Plans are being prepared, and these matters will be brought before the Executive again, when appropriate. With regard to the redevelopment of the estate, an effort is being made to include more light industry and commercial development as a means to replace the jobs that are threatened and the jobs that have already been lost.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Will the First Minister speak and act with caution — as a lawyer, he ought to know to do so — so as not to further prejudice legal proceedings against an individual who works in this Assembly?

The First Minister: The phrase about beams and motes comes to mind, with regard to the behaviour, not only of the Member who asked that question, but of his party. If he considers the way in which his party and his associates have behaved over the course of recent weeks and months, he might have thought twice about asking such a question.

Third-World Link

4. Mr Dallat asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister what progress has been made towards establishing a linkage with a Third-World country; and to make a statement. (AQO 247/02)

The Deputy First Minister: No official or formal links have yet been established between the Executive and a developing country. However, we recognise that the people of Northern Ireland have a long and well-renowned tradition of supportive links with developing countries through the valuable work of Concern, Trocaire, Christian Aid and other charities. I had intended to visit Malawi in late August to see the excellent work being carried out by Concern and other relief organisations. However, due to my mother's terminal illness, I was unable to go.

In the Assembly we have already established an all-party group on international development. We need to consider how the work of that group and perhaps the activities of something such as the commonwealth local government good practice scheme, which is funded by the UK Government, can assist in developing stronger and more valuable links with developing countries, as recently reflected in the Member's comments during the Programme for Government debate.

Mr Dallat: I applaud the Minister's interest in Third-World issues. Is he aware that Coleraine Borough Council has recently established a linkage with the city council in Zomba in Malawi, the country that he referred to? Will he encourage other councils to consider similar procedures? Assuming that normality breaks out in the House, would he avail of an early opportunity to visit Malawi so that he can reinforce the Assembly's concern for the people of Africa and the Third World generally?

The Deputy First Minister: The links being developed between Coleraine Borough Council and Malawi through the twinning process are worthy of our fullest support. I would certainly encourage other councils to follow that sort of initiative. I am aware that in the past similar initiatives were undertaken by Derry City Council in relation to Kebele 37 in Addis Ababa. More recently, there have been some links between Derry and El Salvador. Sharing experience and expertise between local authorities and developing countries can lead to mutually beneficial relationships through which we can all learn. In circumstances where many of us like to tell each other that the eyes of the world are upon us — when the truth is the eyes of the world more generally roll up to heaven every time we seem to put ourselves into another crisis — it is right that that we take a wider view of the world and see our responsibilities and our role in that world context.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Is the Deputy First Minister content that his partner in Government has already got Third-World links with a terrorist guerrilla organisation in Colombia? Does he not believe that it sets a bad example to the Third World that we have gunmen established in our Government? During the last 72 hours, has the First Minister expressed to the Deputy First Minister a willingness to remove his Ministers, who prop up Sinn Féin in this Government?

The Deputy First Minister: The Member is referring to matters that are the subject of legal proceedings in Colombia. We must let those events take their course there.

In circumstances where there are all sorts of stories about all sorts of conversations and records of conversations being leaked and briefed, I will let the Member receive whatever leak he has or may get of any conversation that I have had with the First Minister through the DUP's normal course, rather than taking the opportunity to reveal those conversations here.

Mr McCartney: In view of the fact that we now have a Health Service that has the longest waiting lists in Europe, a sewerage infrastructure that forbids the development of property and a water system that is currently inviting fines from the EU, does the Deputy First Minister agree that we have much in common with Third-World countries and much to learn from their experiences?

The Deputy First Minister: We face significant challenges in relation to infrastructure and the public service estate. We have undertaken the reinvestment and reform initiative precisely because we face those significant challenges due to the backlog of underinvestment during direct rule. We treat those problems seriously.

As to likening those challenges to some of the challenges that the Third World faces, I would say — as I would in relation to any developing countries — that the best context in which they can face those challenges, and manage those public expenditure and public service issues, is by having truly democratic arrangements available and in operation.

Strategic Investment Body

6. Mr Molloy asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to give an update on the proposals for the creation of the strategic investment body. (AQO 230/02)

The Deputy First Minister: Following the announcement of the reinvestment and reform initiative in May, we established a project board, on which all the parties in the Executive are represented, to advise us on the way forward on the development of the strategic investment board. During the summer the project board considered the detailed arrangements for the strategic investment board and how it should function.

At the Executive's meeting on 23 July, it was agreed that work should begin immediately to prepare the necessary legislation to establish the strategic investment board. The Strategic Investment and Regeneration of Sites Bill was introduced on 30 September and will have its Second Stage tomorrow. We hope to complete the Bill's passage through the Assembly and for it to receive Royal Assent by March 2003. There is confidence for you.

In the coming weeks the project board will undertake more detailed work to define how the board will carry out its functions and to identify the types of skills and expertise required to enable the board to operate successfully. It will also address other key issues, such as corporate governance and accountability.

Mr Molloy: I thank the Minister for his confidence. I hope that we will get it all done by the end of the week. I hope that we will have that situation. Will the Minister explain the role of the investment body in the likely public-private partnership (PPP) or private finance initiative (PFI) contracts?

The Deputy First Minister: The board will be there at a broad level to serve the Executive's strategic investment approach and centralise the expertise needed to manage the increased levels of capital investment that we are hoping to achieve using the reinvestment and reform initiative. It is hoped that by so doing we will reduce the amount of money that ends up being spent on consultants in our capital undertakings from one contract and project to another.

In providing that advice to the Executive, and in assisting the various Departments in their undertakings, the strategic investment board will be helping to form and advise on Executive views in relation to the use of PPPs where they are deemed to be appropriate as one part of that overall strategic investment portfolio. They are only one part of that, and it is to be a part that adds to the net investment that we are able to achieve, beyond what would be available to us under conventional procurement.

Mr Poots: Given that we are having a review of public administration in an attempt to create a more efficient Government, why are the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister introducing a Bill that will create a strategic investment board at a cost of £3 million a year plus set-up costs, up to five development corporations costing between £750,000 and £900,000 a year, and a plethora of new civil servants to be added to the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister? Are they not satisfied with having more staff in their office than Bertie Ahern and Tony Blair have, and do they now also want to create an office with more staff than George Bush has?

The Deputy First Minister: The strategic investment board will be there to serve the investment programme of the Executive at large and to ensure that we will be able to improve and increase the capital expenditure that we are undertaking. We have to do that in dramatic ways.

Members will recall that they often criticise cases of underspend and delays involving capital projects. The idea of a strategic investment body is to cut through many of those problems by having expertise centralised and available in Government to support the work of the different Departments and the Executive, and also to reduce the undue reliance on outside consultants. Members often criticise the constant reliance of Departments on outside consultants and want us to do more in-house in a programmed way. That is exactly what the strategic investment body is about.

Consistency is a bit much to ask for, but Members may recall that some time ago all parties represented on the Committee for Finance and Personnel supported a report calling for a new central driver for capital expenditure. The type of case set out in the Committee for Finance and Personnel's very good report into public-private partnerships and private finance initiatives is exactly the one that we are answering with our proposals for this body.

Sure Start (Shankill Road)

7. Ms Lewsley asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to make a statement on the Deputy First Minister's visit to the Sure Start project, Shankill Road, Belfast. (AQO 261/02)

The First Minister: The Deputy First Minister visited the Shankill Sure Start project at the Alessie Centre on Belfast's Shankill Road on 17 September. That project operates from three early year family centres — the Alessie centre, the Hanna centre and the Martin centre, which are located in the greater Shankill area. Those centres provide high-quality settings for a range of activities covering play development, health and well-being, and parenting and education. The centres also host a range of drop-in facilities, parent and toddler groups, art and craft sections and one-to-one support services.

The Deputy First Minister was given a presentation on the work of the Shankill Sure Start project. He met with parents and users of the service and saw at first hand the impressive range of facilities, activities and services being delivered to children and families. Giving our children the best possible education, and encouraging people to learn and develop throughout their lives, has a fundamental place in the Programme for Government.

We recognise the longer-term benefits associated with early years education, and the Executive are providing additional support through the Sure Start programme, targeting children under four and their families in areas of need. Initiatives such as the Sure Start project on the Shankill Road help to promote a positive image of the area and demonstrate what can be achieved through communities and statutory agencies working together in partnership.

Ms Lewsley: Does the First Minister recognise the immense value of such visits, particularly to the staff and the children? Will he consider making a comparable visit to a disadvantaged community in a Nationalist area of Belfast?

The First Minister: I take both of the Member's points. It is one of the great pleasures for the Deputy First Minister and me, and, indeed, other Ministers, that we can go and visit people delivering services at the sharp end and see what is happening. It is good for us, it is good for them, and it is good for the service. It is one of the pleasures of this business and helps to compensate for other aspects that are not always such a pleasure.

In relation to the Member's specific proposal, there is a certain parallel that if the Deputy First Minister goes to the Shankill, people say that I should go somewhere else. I shall look at that proposal sympathetically.

Devolution and Financial Allocations to Health

8. Dr McDonnell asked the Office of the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to outline the effect of devolution on the overall allocation of financial resources to health. (AQO 274/02)

The Deputy First Minister: From the outset, the Executive and the Minister for Finance and Personnel have identified health as one of our main priorities and continue to treat it as such. Since devolution, the Executive have agreed substantial additional resources year-on-year for health and personal social services. During the period 2000-01 to 2003-04, the health budget will have increased by £1.1 billion to over £3 billion, representing growth approaching 60% over the period, and an average growth of 12.8% over that period.

The draft budget announced on 24 September offers £300 million more for health than would be provided through the simple application of the Barnett formula based on changes in English health expenditures. The draft Budget proposals further provide year-on-year increases of 4% and 7.7% in 2004-05 and 2005-06. Health funding for those two years will be further increased by allocations from Executive programme funds and the reinvestment and reform initiative.

Dr McDonnell: Has there has been any assessment of the impact of this money on the National Health Service?

Has it visibly reduced waiting lists? I separate waiting lists for a first appointment from bottlenecks for surgery. Have the bottlenecks or secondary waiting lists for surgery been cleared? If not, why not?

3.00 pm

The Deputy First Minister: The number of people awaiting treatment is a huge concern, and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has confirmed that there will be an expansion in hospital capacity over the next one to two years. The reinvestment and reform initiative has already financed additional capacity that will amount to 100 beds; it is intended to provide additional elective surgery and there are also plans to improve cardiac and cardiology surgery.

There must also be increased investment in community and intermediate care to help to avoid, where possible, hospital admission, to provide for earlier discharge, and to deal with the sort of bottlenecks to which the Member refers.

Mr Speaker: That brings to an end the time for questions to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: I do not normally take points of order during Question Time.

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: Mr Speaker, will you tell the House if the business for tomorrow has been changed? Will the Business Committee tell Members what it is going to do with the motion?

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member knows that I do not take points of order during questions to the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, but I have already indicated through the usual channels that I will take a question at the end of Question Time. I assume that Dr Paisley's question is one that may well be asked, but I will take it at the end of Question Time.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Public Transport

1. Mr Byrne asked the Minister for Regional Development what immediate proposals he has to increase the number of people using public transport. (AQO 263/02)

The Minister for Regional Development (Mr P Robinson): Mr Speaker, I commend the Business Committee for the decision that you will announce later.

Mr Speaker: Is the Minister indicating that the point of order might not actually be a question of acquiring information from the Speaker?

Mr P Robinson: You got your chance and you blew it, Mr Speaker. The consultation proposal, 'A New Start for Public Transport in Northern Ireland', which I issued on 17 September, would see the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its Translink bus and rail subsidiaries amalgamated into a new, dynamic, publicly owned operating company, Transport Northern Ireland. It would also establish an independent public transport regulatory body. Significantly, I am also proposing the progressive injection of private sector finance and expertise into the public transport market insofar as it makes sound commercial sense and is acceptable to the wider community. I am convinced that these proposals would lead to improved public transport provision.

I also propose to issue shortly a consultation paper on extensions to the concessionary fare scheme. If the Assembly is prepared to allocate the resources to enable me to introduce such extensions, I am confident that they will increase public transport usage as well as benefiting less-well-off members of society.

As for capital investment, Translink has 23 new trains on order, has completed work on the Bangor line relay, and will commence work on the Belfast to Whitehead relay this year. Translink is also continuing to upgrade its ageing bus fleet. With the assistance of 50% grant aid from the Department for Regional Development, Translink is expected to spend £5.4 million this year and £11.4 million next year buying about 130 new low-floor buses.

These developments should make rail and bus travel more attractive.

Looking further ahead, the 10-year regional transportation strategy includes many measures to encourage greater use of public transport such as refurbishment of stations, improved passenger information systems, more park-and-ride facilities, more quality bus corridors, more town bus services and a rapid transit system for Belfast. However, the outcome for public transport will ultimately be determined in the budgetary process, and I trust that I can call for Mr Byrne's support in this regard.

Mr Byrne: Does the Minister agree that the number of journeys travelled on public transport declined last year by 2%, and that, therefore, a proactive approach must be taken by Northern Ireland Railways, Ulsterbus and Citybus to make public transport more attractive? Does he accept that the Department for Regional Development has a public responsibility to ensure the increasing use of public transport, including rural areas beyond the Belfast metropolitan area?

Mr P Robinson: In spite of the statistics showing significantly increased use of public transport by senior citizens as a result of the free fares scheme, unfortunately there has been a 2% downturn in the number of passenger journeys on public transport. That is a disturbing trend, and it encouraged me to introduce the consultation document 'A New Start for Public Transport in Northern Ireland'.

Evidence elsewhere in the world shows that where private sector finance and expertise has been introduced into public transport, it has reversed that decline. It has also shown that where public transport is the responsibility of the public sector, the figures decline. That is one factor that we can use to turn the figures around and ensure greater usage.

The Member will know, coming from west Tyrone and also from his background on the Committee for Regional Development, that unless we can raise the standards of the product that we offer to the public, we will not encourage more members of the public to use public transport — hence the injection of Assembly funds into railways and new buses. That kind of good service with regular, dependable, comfortable buses and trains is more likely to encourage people to use public transport than anything else.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr McClelland] in the Chair)

Pedestrian Crossings

2. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister for Regional Development what formula is used to assess the need for pedestrian crossings. (AQO 241/02)

Mr P Robinson: Roads Service receives many requests for the provision of controlled pedestrian crossings, whether pelican or zebra. Requests are assessed using a formula based on national guidelines to ensure a consistent and equitable approach. Consideration is given to sites if where P is the number of pedestrians crossing the road per hour, and V is the number of vehicles per hour.

$$P \times V^2 > 0.5 \times 10^8$$

The purpose of the formula is to assess the degree of conflict between pedestrians wishing to cross a road and the number of vehicles using it. The formula acts as an initial sift. If the threshold is exceeded, the site is considered in more detail, and other factors are taken into account when making the decision. Those factors include vehicle speed, road geometry, accident history and proximity to shops, schools, community centres, hospitals, and so on.

This is an important matter and, therefore, I have asked the Roads Service officials to review the formula and the other factors taken into account to ensure that pedestrian crossings are provided where they will be of most benefit. In undertaking the review, my officials will consult the Committee for Regional Development.

Mr McCarthy: I was going to take down the formula, but I got lost. I will get it in Hansard tomorrow.

The Minister will be aware of the demands from elderly people and parents of young children for crossings to ensure safe passage across busy main streets. In the circumstances, can the Minister promote a reduced formula, which would provide crossings and, thus, reduce the risk of injury or fatality?

Mr P Robinson: I have asked my officials to report to me after the review. The existing formula — complex though it is — can be tweaked to allow more crossings. It simply involves changing the factor 0.5 in the formula. Nonetheless, there are requirements if we are to be able to fund additional pedestrian crossings. That is another factor that depends on budgetary issues.

Mr McCarthy: What about saving a life?

Mr P Robinson: Sometimes it does not save lives. That depends on the circumstances in the area. The more pedestrian crossings there are, the less regard cars pay to them, and especially to zebra crossings. Many factors must be taken into account. I am happy to allow my officials to speak to the Member, if he wants to submit views to the review. The Department will consult with the Committee for Regional Development to hear its views on the formula and any changes to it.

Mr Shannon: Will the Minister confirm that he intends to change the criteria along the lines that he discussed with elected representatives and community groups at a meeting in Ards and bring them into line with the needs of the people of Northern Ireland? When does he envisage consultation starting and finishing, so that the communities of Ballywalter, Greyabbey, Kircubbin, Millisle, Ballygowan and Comber can benefit from it?

Mr P Robinson: The review is under way. I asked officials to carry it out, so, naturally, I assume that they have begun it. It would be unhelpful for me to make any assumptions about its outcome before I have heard what the Committee for Regional Development has to say or what the review establishes.

During the meeting in Ards, I was made aware of several factors, which can be just as important in judging the dangers as the numbers of pedestrians or vehicles. The Department wants to see if the formula can reflect more accurately the danger to people crossing a road, as opposed to the number of pedestrians or vehicles on it.

Mr Hussey: The Minister has answered my query in part. To take the issue of traffic calming beyond pedestrian crossings, I understand that he is looking objectively at the figures and formulae that seem to cause Mr McCarthy so much concern. I urge him to ensure that the review takes a more subjective approach to traffic-calming measures, because it can be difficult for rural communities to meet the indicative figures that the formulas require.

Mr P Robinson: Leaving aside pedestrian crossings, traffic-calming measures are determined by a scoring system, which is based on several factors. I am concerned about moving away from objective criteria. If a Minister determines his own subjective criteria, people will question his decisions, and he will have no defence unless he operates according to objective criteria. For that reason I would far prefer to use objective criteria that adequately respond to the dangers that exist in an area rather than subjectively decide, according to the mood of the moment, the most appropriate point to have pedestrian crossings or traffic-calming measures.

New Railway Station (Lisburn)

3. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister for Regional Development to give the proposed timescale for the construction of the new railway station at Lisburn.

(AQO 270/02)

Mr P Robinson: Translink has plans for a new bus station at Lisburn in its corporate plan for 2002-03 to 2004-05, and it has already commissioned an economic appraisal on its construction, which is due to be completed by the end of the year. If the option to construct a new bus station is accepted by the board of the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and by my Department, the next step will be to put the proposal out to tender. The project can commence when that process is completed, and it is hoped that work will begin before the end of this financial year.

3.15 pm

Ms Lewsley: Will there be adequate provision for disabled access to the new station? Currently, people in a wheelchair and parents with prams have to cross the lines to reach the other side of Lisburn's railway station.

Mr P Robinson: I am happy to confirm that, when I last spoke to Translink about disabled access, it made it very clear that it considered that a priority, not merely for stations which it is constructing but for rolling stock. When we have more details of the proposal, I shall be happy to sit down with the Member and the group with which she is associated to examine the proposal and see if she considers it as adequate as Translink no doubt would.

Mr Poots: Can the Minister confirm that there are problems with the site proposed by Translink and that meetings have taken place between it and the local council? Are we set on the site which Translink currently wants, or is there a possibility of identifying other sites which may be closer to the railway station and more conducive to traffic flows in Lisburn city centre?

Mr P Robinson: I am not aware of any problem with the site. I know that Lisburn City Council would prefer it to be somewhere else. However, the site identified by Translink is one to which it has legal access, and which is, therefore, its obvious choice. It is an operational matter that the council will no doubt wish to take up with Translink directly. However, a station in the middle of Lisburn can be a help to the city centre and should not be considered a nuisance by anyone.

Storm Drainage Impact Assessment

4. Mr K Robinson asked the Minister for Regional Development if he has taken steps with his Colleague, the Minister of the Environment, to have a storm drainage impact stage inserted into the planning process for new housing development. (AQO 268/02)

Mr P Robinson: The development planning process is a matter for the Department of the Environment. I am advised that, as part of that process, the Department of the Environment consults with the Rivers Agency of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development about potential sites for housing and other developments. The Rivers Agency assesses the potential for flooding in the area and whether preventative measures regarding improvements to infrastructure would be required if the site were zoned for development.

There is also consultation with the Water Service, the Roads Service and, where necessary, the Rivers Agency, on planning applications for specific housing developments to ensure that they have adequate facilities for the discharge of storm water and that it will not create or exacerbate flooding problems in the area. The Water Service advises the Planning Service on the availability of water and sewerage services and any difficulties envisaged relating to the capacity of the existing public sewerage infrastructure and the proposed timing of new or improved infrastructure to absorb new development.

I am also advised that some planning applications for housing developments require the submission of an environmental statement under the Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1999. Such environmental statements must take account of any significant environmental effects likely from the proposed development and include a description of the measures envisaged to prevent, reduce and, if possible, offset any significant adverse effect on the environment.

Those arrangements ensure that the potential impact of storm-water discharges arising from proposed housing or other developments is properly considered at the stage of the development plan or development control in the existing planning process.

Mr K Robinson: I thank the Minister for his very brief answer. What other significant steps does he plan to take to improve the storm-drainage requirements in the vicinity of new housing and commercial developments — and, indeed, those already in existence for at least the past 10 years — with specific reference to the prevention of flooding incidents such as those which have occurred or are likely to occur in parts of Newtownabbey and Carrickfergus?

Mr P Robinson: The instances to which the Member refers resulted from significantly higher rainfall than had been experienced for a considerable time. The Assembly will always have a judgement to make regarding the level at which storm drainage facilities should be available.

If the Assembly wants to raise standards, it will have to cough up and give the Department the funding with which to do that. However, the existing planning mechanism gives the Planning Service, the Water Service and the Rivers Agency sufficient ability to consider the storm drainage implications of any planning application. The planning process does not require a new stage. It already includes consideration of that element of planning.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister give details of his views on the provision of physical measures, such as mini-roundabouts, which are aimed at reducing the speed of visitors going into, and leaving, housing developments?

Mr P Robinson: I can confirm that the speed of traffic will have no impact on storm drainage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Attwood is not in his place, so I call Mr Sean Neeson.

Flood Damage Compensation

6. Mr Neeson asked the Minister for Regional Development, pursuant to AQO 40/02, why his Department has refused to compensate people in East Antrim whose properties were damaged by the severe floods in June 2002.

(AQO 254/02)

Mr P Robinson: Entitlement to compensation from the Department is not automatic. For a claim to be successful, it must be shown that the Department failed to carry out its statutory duty or was negligent in some other way. Every claim is, therefore, thoroughly investigated. If no evidence of negligence by the Department is found, the claim is turned down.

Following the serious flooding that occurred on the evening of Friday 21 June 2002, the Department received 346 claims for compensation. However, the Department's investigation revealed that the flooding was caused by the exceptional thunderstorms and heavy downpour that occurred that night. Those extreme weather conditions were localised. Flooding in the worst-affected areas — parts of Newtownabbey and Carrickfergus — was exacerbated by water that ran off higher ground. Therefore, in the absence of any other significant factors, the Department believes that it has a defence in law against the claims. In those circumstances, they must be turned down.

As with all claims, the Department's decision can be challenged through the independent legal process. Claims like those, where the value is under £2,000, fall within the jurisdiction of the Small Claims Court. However, before any claimants consider that step, I believe that it would be helpful if I had the benefit of an independent opinion from senior counsel on the correctness or otherwise of the Department's position. I have, therefore, asked my officials to arrange that, and the independent opinion is expected soon. A copy of senior counsel's opinion will be lodged in the Assembly Library.

Mr Neeson: Many of my constituents received letters from the Department for Regional Development stating that the flooding was an act of God. However, many of the areas that were worst affected by the flooding in June 2002 have been affected regularly — places such as Chichester Square and the lower Woodburn Road. Taylors Avenue in Carrickfergus was flooded and devastated for the third time in a year. Flooding regularly occurs on the Shore Road at Whiteabbey. Many of the residents who are affected by that simply cannot afford house insurance. Many of them have great difficulty getting house insurance because of the regularity of the flooding. Is it not time that the Minister, his Department and the Rivers Agency accepted their responsibility towards my constituents in East Antrim?

Mr P Robinson: The rights of the Member's constituents are no different to those of other Members' constituents elsewhere in the Province. The same criteria must apply to all. If the Member is suggesting that the Department should fork out money irrespective of the circumstances or whether there was any negligence on its part, that would be absurd. The Assembly simply could not afford to do that. Therefore, negligence on the part of the Department must be clearly shown before any compensation is paid.

I am happy to consider circumstances where there is a case for negligence. However, I honestly believe that I will not have to consider such a case, because the Department's compensation agency attentively considers any details that suggest that the Department would be unable to sustain a refusal of a claim in court. We are, therefore, keen to ensure that a payment is made where there is a case. With so many cases involved, rather than simply follow the basis of the Department's initial consideration, I determined that I would have the case considered by independent senior counsel to examine the Department's legal position.

I have also asked the Department to instruct senior counsel to provide a clear guideline on the circumstances in which it is right and legally required for the Department to make compensation payments. I propose to put a copy of that guideline in the Assembly Library. It will be useful for Members to recognise circumstances that, according to the law as it stands, will give entitlement to compensation and those that are unlikely to. It does not remove anybody's right to take legal action, but it will give some indication of the circumstances in which a case is likely to be successful.

I can well understand, for I have seen it too many times in my own constituency, the anguish suffered as a result of flooding. However, every flood is not the result of negligence by the Department for Regional Development or the Water Service. We must recognise that if the Assembly were simply to pay every claimant who submitted an application, it would have a very considerable bill to pay, and money would have to be taken from other heads of expenditure.

Mr Beggs: Will the Minister acknowledge that, in refusing all compensation claims, his Department appears to be telling my constituents that it is not at fault and that its agencies never contribute to flooding? Could blocked drains and culverts have contributed to flooding? Will he acknowledge that, where the Roads Service has had to carry out remedial work to repair faulty culverts, that agency's blocked structures will have contributed to the flooding of some of my constituents' properties?

Mr P Robinson: If blocked drains are the result of negligence by the Department, the Member's constituents will have a valid claim. However, if, for instance, the Water Service staff clear blockage in a drain on a Thursday, it is blocked on a Friday and flooding occurs, nobody could say that the Department was negligent. Staff cannot stand for 24 hours of every day at every drain throughout the country. That would not be negligence in those circumstances. Therefore, it is necessary to show that the Department has been negligent in how it has dealt with drains and other matters of its responsibility.

Belfast to Bangor Road

7. Mrs E Bell asked the Minister for Regional Development to make a statement on the current situation regarding the Belfast to Bangor road (A2). (AQO 252/02)

Mr P Robinson: The A2 Belfast to Bangor road is one of the arterial routes into Belfast. It has a two-way traffic flow of almost 40,000 vehicles a day and is of high strategic importance. Safety along the route is of particular concern, and in recent years the Roads Service has implemented several measures directed at improving road safety.

This summer, the Roads Service carried out two important schemes specifically directed at improving the safety and structural condition of the road. One scheme involved resurfacing the section of the road between Whinney Hill and Ballygrainey Road and included a junction improvement at Whinney Hill, localised widening at Cultra Avenue and central hatching between Whinney Hill and Ballygrainey Road. The other scheme involved amendments to the layout and provision of traffic signals at the junction of the A2 Rathgael Road/Old Belfast Road, which has the worst history of accidents on the A2. In addition, work to replace a safety barrier at a tight bend near Seahill continues.

The benefits arising from those improvements are already apparent to all users of the road. I assure the Member that the Roads Service will continue to monitor the road with a view to introducing, where appropriate and practical, further measures to address any safety problems that can be remedied by engineering.

Mrs E Bell: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answer. I congratulate the Roads Service on the improvements to that busy road, especially at Rathgael and Seahill. However, I ask the Minister to ask his Department to take note of the dangers of entering and exiting side roads to the expanding residential development along that road.

3.30 pm

Mr P Robinson: We are happy to monitor that road regularly and to look at any increase in the number of cars using it, the velocity of traffic or any change in drivers' behaviour — those are among the Roads Service's normal duties. Often the first reaction of Members, other elected representatives and others to a road accident is to blame the road. I must put on record that staggering statistics are available that show that in all but 2% of road accidents the fault lies not with the road but with the driver.

Pumping Station (Holywood)

8. Mrs Carson asked the Minister for Regional Development in relation to correspondence received by his Department concerning a sewage pumping station in The Coaches, Croft Road, Holywood, to outline measures he has taken, and proposes to take, to address the issues raised. (AQO 245/02)

Mr P Robinson: The Water Service will adopt sewerage infrastructure constructed by private developers provided the infrastructure meets the specific requirements set out by Water Service under article 17 of the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1973. The sewage pumping station at The Coaches, Croft Road, Holywood was constructed by Hagan Homes, which developed The Coaches' housing site. The Water Service was advised that the pumping station has not been adopted due to legal difficulties that relate to the transfer of the land on which the pumping station is located. The Water Service has been in contact with Hagan Homes and its legal advisers on many occasions about the issue, but, regrettably, despite those approaches, it has not yet been possible to bring the matter to a conclusion.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question No 2, which stands in the name of Mr Mick Murphy, has been transferred to the Department for Regional Development and will receive a written answer.

Planning Service Enforcement Officers (Belfast)

1. Ms McWilliams asked the Minister of the Environment how many Planning Service enforcement officers he plans to employ for the Belfast area; and to make a statement. (AQO 238/02)

The Minister of the Environment (Mr Nesbitt): Three planning officers are devoted to enforcement duties in the Belfast divisional planning office. They comprise one higher professional and technology officer, and two professional and technology officers. Those officers have dedicated administrative support. In addition, a proportion of senior management time in the division is devoted to enforcement work. I have moved to strengthen the management of the development control and enforcement sections in the Belfast division and other divisions, and that should have a positive impact on the Belfast division's ability to deal with enforcement casework.

As the Member is aware, a Bill is before the Assembly to streamline and considerably strengthen my Department's enforcement powers. The aims of the Planning (Amendment) Bill are to make it simpler and easier for the Department's enforcement officers to take enforcement action against those who flout planning law, to make available to the Department tough new enforcement powers and to make stiffer penalties available to the courts. I plan to review enforcement staffing levels in Belfast and other planning offices after the Bill becomes law.

Ms McWilliams: I remind the Minister and the House that the answer that he has given to me is exactly the same as the one he gave to me on 30 April 2002, which was that three full-time enforcement officers were employed and that he would move to strengthen the management of the development control and enforcement sections in the Belfast division. That was his answer on the 30 April, and it is still his answer in the first week of October. I visited the office recently and know that there is only one enforcement officer, who is dealing with 777 cases. Two officers are on leave. What does the Minister mean when he says that he has "moved to strengthen the management."?

My constituents would be in despair to think that five months later the answer remains the same. There are not three officers in place — there is only one.

Mr Nesbitt: I empathise entirely with what the Member said about the lack of enforcement officers. There is a total of 21 officers throughout Northern Ireland — four of the divisional planning offices have three officers each, and three of the offices have three officers each. Many thousands of enforcement cases are brought each year; I am aware of the problem. However, there is a certain thing called money, which is needed so that we can have more enforcement officers in place. It is hoped that that money may come through in the Budget process.

One issue that must be addressed in the Budget process is the planning process itself. I hasten to add that a strengthened Planning (Amendment) Bill is in the offing, with new enforcement powers, increased fines and penalties for non-compliance. I hope that, collectively, those provisions will act as a deterrent to the lack of will to abide by the law. In that context, when the Bill is passed, the necessity for additional staff will be reviewed.

Mr Shannon: I welcome the Minister's response, at least in relation to the provision of new enforcement officers, if not the intention to deliver them. Will he confirm that, although there is a need for more officers in Belfast, the same need exists in other areas, for example in the Ards borough? Moreover, does he agree that, with the Department's reluctance to employ extra enforcement officers, many enforcement actions are on hold? Does he not feel that action should be taken to clear those up? Some of them have been on hold for 12 to 24 months.

Mr Nesbitt: I agree that there are other areas in Northern Ireland besides Belfast. I referred to all of the areas in Northern Ireland where officers were placed. There is no reluctance on the part of the Department of the Environment — and certainly not on my part — to ensure that the law is enforced. I repeat: I want to see planning decisions taken efficiently and effectively for those within the law, and I want those outside the law to be dealt with as efficiently and effectively.

Dr Birnie: Regarding planning enforcement in south Belfast, could the Minister inform the House as to the current position regarding the building of some apartments, together with a lift shaft, in the principal's house at Union Theological College, which break a historic skyline?

Mr Nesbitt: Union Theological College is a very important listed building. At the “Look up to Belfast” seminar last week, we saw that other places in the world try to maintain their listed buildings by utilising them, improving them internally and ensuring that they are in good stead for usage. That is what has happened to Union Theological College. It has been retained in ownership and continues to be used as it was previously used. I recognise that the skyline has been broken asymmetrically. However, the building fulfils what could be called “international standards” for its type in that nothing can be removed from what was put in place originally.

Section 19 of the Disability and Discrimination Act 1995 requires us to make buildings available to the disabled. Having said that, when I received the written question I examined the process by which this decision was reached by the Environment and Heritage Service very closely.

Development of Brownfield Sites

3. Ms Lewsley asked the Minister of the Environment what measures he is taking to encourage developers to use brownfield sites for new developments?

(AQO 271/02)

Mr Nesbitt: The regional development strategy sets an aspirational target of 60% of new urban housing growth in settlements of population of 5,000 or more, to be accommodated in existing urban limits as defined at the 2001 baseline year. That has been referred to as the brownfield target. The strategy also advocates that the potential for achieving the target is to be assessed through the development plan process using urban capacity studies. My Department is already carrying out urban capacity studies in association with the preparation of current plans. These will be published along with each draft plan to provide the public with the technical reason behind the choice of housing sites. My Department adopts a sequential approach in allocating lands for housing in the preparation of development plans.

Urban capacity studies form the important first stage by identifying potential sites within the urban limits. Allowance is then made for windfall sites — for example, sites in urban areas that become available over the course of the plan period due to unforeseen land use changes.

Lands are allocated on greenfield sites, including locations where extension to existing settlements may be necessary to meet the balance of housing growth as identified in the regional development strategy. Land is allocated for housing in the development plan in phases. The emphasis in the first phase is on the development of land in the existing urban limits, which will ensure that priority is given to brownfield sites in the allocation of land for urban housing growth.

Ms Lewsley: Other measures could be taken to encourage people to use brownfield sites. Does the Minister agree that the best incentive to encourage people to do that is to veto greenfield sites?

Mr Nesbitt: That is the fascinating dimension of planning: the tensions all around. Ms Lewsley would prefer developers to be encouraged to use brownfield sites only, whereas others want to use greenfield sites as well. Planning depends on striking a balance between conflicting and competing demands: urban and rural; and sustaining the environment while providing for economic growth. Many and varied tensions must be resolved, and, although I welcome Ms Lewsley’s suggestion that there may be other options, my solution to urban capacity studies, windfall land and greenfield sites focuses my mind on brownfield sites.

Rev Dr William McCrea: The Minister accepts that it is important to encourage developers to build on brownfield sites. Does he accept also that there are problems because many area plans are out of date? Does he, therefore, accept that it is urgent that up-to-date area plans be drafted so that brownfield and greenfield developments remain in proper proportion?

Mr Nesbitt: Although I do not wish to be disrespectful, my answer will be brief. Dr McCrea, the Chairperson of the Environment Committee, is correct. Many of the plans are out of date, so new plans need to be drafted quickly. If anyone objects to a plan, it goes to a public inquiry, and, as always in planning, many people object. However, I agree with Dr McCrea’s remarks.

Mr McClarty: Will the Minister tell the House what steps he is taking to ensure that town cramming — and I mean town cramming, not town planning — resulting from an overprovision of high-density developments or apartments, which are out of keeping with an area, is avoided?

Mr Nesbitt: General planning law provides various policy planning statements (PPS). For example, PPS 7, ‘Quality Residential Environments’, deals with the problem of town cramming — plans for new buildings must show their relationship with existing developments. Also, the Department for Regional Development is introducing PPS 12, which takes a holistic view of the need to provide a suitable environment, with green areas and space, for those who chose to live in urban areas. Therefore there are various means of ensuring that town cramming is avoided.

Waste Disposal and Recycling

4. Mrs E Bell asked the Minister of the Environment to make a statement on any meetings which have taken place with district council environmental departments regarding waste disposal and recycling. (AQO 267/02)

Mr Nesbitt: My Department has regularly met representatives of district councils, mainly through the strategic inter-group forum, which comprises representatives from the Department and the three waste management partnerships. The forum was established to assist with the implementation of the waste management strategy, which was published in March 2000. Recently, it has focused on finalising the partnership's waste management plans and funding.

Recycling is a significant element in the three final draft plans that were submitted to the Department at the end of June 2002. The allocations to councils under last year's waste management grant scheme were largely spent on the infrastructure needed to support those recycling targets. A similar pattern of expenditure is expected this year. Officials and I have met with individual councils and groups of councils about a range of waste management issues. Waste management is a standing item on the agenda of my quarterly meetings with the Northern Ireland Local Government Association. My Department and I value such close contact with councils, because it is vital to the successful implementation of the waste management strategy.

3.45 pm

Mrs E Bell: I was aware that some work was being done, but I was unaware of its extent, and I thank the Minister for that.

Does the Minister agree that educating the public is another essential part of the strategy in the development of waste disposal and recycling? Will he give me some idea about what is being discussed in his meetings on that subject?

Mr Nesbitt: I agree that it is important to educate the public, and I thank Mrs Bell for her complimentary comments about how far the process has moved. We are all part of the waste problem; therefore, we must all be part of the solution. We must be aware of the contribution that we can make. Resources have been spent on public awareness, and £1.5 million is available for that over three years. Surveys on our Wake up to Waste campaign showed that there was 30% more use of waste disposal and recycling units in certain district council areas, for example. Other statistics show that people are more aware of the need to deal with waste. Therefore we are confident, to a certain extent, of a heightened awareness of the problem of waste. It is now for this Administration, working with the three partnership councils that are legally responsible for waste disposal, to develop plans that will bring us to the point of reducing, reusing and recycling waste.

Mr M Murphy: Go raibh maith agat. Will the Minister detail what funding support packages are available for education and awareness?

Mr Nesbitt: I must have wax in my ears today, because that is the second time that I have had difficulty understanding Mr Murphy. Could he speak slightly louder?

Mr M Murphy: What funding support packages are available to district councils for education and awareness?

Mr Nesbitt: As I said, district councils contribute to that. The funding that is available is primarily for councils to begin implementing waste management plans — for example, we have a waste management grant scheme that goes to councils, for which £3.85 million is available this financial year. However, that is still awaiting the approval of the Department of Finance and Personnel. Public awareness is dealt with through schemes funded by the £1.5 million that I mentioned to Mrs Bell. A total of £7.4 million is available for various measures to ensure that there is education about waste management and various available methods of dealing with waste.

Mr Hussey: The Minister will be aware of district councils' growing problems with refrigerators and freezers — one is tempted to say that the figures make chilling reading. Will the Minister tell the House what steps his Department is taking to comply with the proposed EU Waste Electrical and Electronic Equipment Directive on the disposal and recycling of refrigerators and freezers?

Mr Deputy Speaker: If the Member were referring to washing machines, I would ask the Minister to come clean about it.

Mr Nesbitt: Do you want me to come clean about that, Mr Deputy Speaker? When the Member mentioned chilling, it reminded me of something that my daughter said to me the other day. I was getting a little animated, and she said "Take a chill pill, Dad"; in other words, she said that I should chill out. Perhaps that is also appropriate.

The disposal of fridges and freezers has been a problem. Grants totalling £250,000 have been made available to district councils for that, and we are awaiting the return of tenders for a contract to deal with that problem. We anticipate that we could be in a position to have the outstanding fridges dealt with by an all-island contract towards the end of the year.

Mr Gibson: I have listened with interest to the Minister's replies. Does the Minister not think that a regional approach to waste disposal and recycling would be much better than having three different councils involved in the programme?

Secondly, it is not possible to meet the EU Directive unless the disposal of recyclable items is honestly dealt with. Recycled glass and waste paper have always had an indifferent market. Has the Minister researched whether proper recycling markets can be established, on a wider basis than this region, which would make it possible to meet the requirements of the Directive?

Mr Nesbitt: I appreciate Mr Gibson's question, as he deals with the nub of the issue — the regional basis of waste disposal and recycling. He mentioned also the possibility of carrying out research in other regions. I have considered other areas and found that two traits arise throughout Europe and the rest of the world. The first is that it takes up to 10 years to get to the required standard, and the second important point is that there is a three-way split in waste disposal, the first two of which account for 30% each — recycling and landfill. The remainder is a gap that is filled, even in the most environmentally friendly countries, by what is called waste to energy; thermal; or that encapsulating word “incineration”. Dr McDonnell found his visit to an incineration plant in Copenhagen very informative.

There are problems to be solved, and we must bite the bullet. The volume of our waste is much too high and must be dealt with. Compared with an average of 30% of waste going into a hole in the ground in Europe, 95% of our waste follows that route. We have a long way to go, and we must be realistic about the matter.

On the issue of sustainable markets, £1.4 million out of that £7.4 million is allocated to providing such markets for recycled goods. I have considered the issue throughout Europe and further afield, to Japan, to find out how the most developed and environmentally friendly countries deal with waste. We have a long way to go to reach that standard.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Dalton is not in his place, so I call Mrs Carson.

Wind Farm Planning Application and the Tourist Board (Tappaghan Mountain)

6. Mrs Carson asked the Minister of the Environment, in relation to the proposed Tappaghan Mountain wind farm application, why the Northern Ireland Tourist Board was consulted, as it had not previously been consulted on wind farm planning applications.

(AQO 232/02)

Mr Nesbitt: While it is not always the practice to consult the Northern Ireland Tourist Board in relation to wind farms, the Department considered it necessary to do so in County Fermanagh because of the number of wind farm planning applications, the quality of the landscape and the need to protect natural tourism assets.

The proposed wind farm at Tappaghan Mountain is one of three current planning applications for wind farms in County Fermanagh. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board is being consulted about each of these proposals in order to obtain information required to arrive at a planning decision.

Mrs Carson: I am delighted that consultation is being carried out with the Tourist Board, as Fermanagh depends greatly on tourism. Does the Minister agree that consultation with the Tourist Board should continue in respect of the erection of all wind farms across the Province? Our renowned landscape will be spoiled. Will the Minister undertake to explore and, perhaps, seed-fund other forms of renewable energy, especially from farmyard waste?

Mr Nesbitt: That is another fascinating question about renewable energy. Northern Ireland is a region of the United Kingdom, which is the fourth richest economy in the world, and therefore much energy is needed. The question is how we provide the energy, whether it is renewable energy, or fossil fuel, which adds to carbon dioxide emissions. Those are fundamental questions that need to be asked. Mrs Carson mentioned consultation on wind farms. If a windmill is made of two or more turbines connected to a wind farm, or if a windmill has only one turbine, but is in excess of 15 metres high, an environmental statement must be made requiring consultation. Mrs Carson's question fundamentally concerned the forms of renewable energy. That is a fascinating question that is easy to ask, but difficult to answer.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. If there is to be a preponderance of wind farms in areas such as Fermanagh, principally because of the lack of areas of outstanding natural beauty (AONB) status, and because companies carry out very limited consultation with local people, the Minister will find that, although we are all for green energy, there will be difficulties in the coming years in locating green energy generators in the right places. Lack of AONB status could mean that the tourism value of places such as Fermanagh will be destroyed by the preponderance of wind farms.

Mr Nesbitt: I assure Mr McHugh that the tourism dimension is very important, although it is not within my remit. The tourist industry in Northern Ireland makes up a small proportion of the gross domestic product (GDP) compared with Scotland. If we could raise that to the same level as in Scotland, the industry would be much enhanced. This raises the matter of wind farms on the north coast. The wind turbines can be seen on the horizon on the Glens of Antrim as one travels up the M2 to the Antrim coast. With regard to sustainable development, a balance must be found between sustaining the economy and protecting the environment. The protection of the environment is an essential, axiomatic element of tourism.

Section 115 Limit

7. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of the Environment to detail the circumstances in which his Department will permit an increase in the section 115 limit imposed on district councils for expenditure on special purposes; and to make a statement. (AQO 239/02)

Mr Nesbitt: Section 115 of the Local Government Act (Northern Ireland) 1972 makes provision for district councils to incur expenditure for special purposes. The legislation imposes a limit on such expenditure in any one financial year, equivalent to half a penny in the pound on the rateable value of the district. The Department advises councils of this figure at the beginning of each financial year. I have no power to increase this statutory limit, but there is a case for reviewing the provision as the limit was fixed many years ago. I will address the matter when the appropriate legislative opportunity arises.

Mr McEliduff: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. Does the Minister accept that councils should be empowered to act to ensure well-being? Councils should have the maximum opportunity to decide how to invest ratepayers' money on priority local concerns, in the best interests of the community.

Mr Nesbitt: The Member used the words "maximum opportunity", but in the context of section 115, the advice is that councils should ascertain the extent of other statutory powers before making recourse to section 115. For example, the new Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill proposes enhanced financial powers with regard to economic development. That is a possible way to deal with the matter.

Mrs Courtney: I welcome the Minister's statement. Derry City Council has discussed the matter quite a bit because of concerns for people who were away from home, and whom we could not visit. I welcome the fact that the Minister will review this aspect of local government, and I look forward to seeing that happen in the next Assembly.

Mr Nesbitt: Again, I thank Mrs Courtney for her comment, rather than her question.

Environment and Heritage Service

8. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of the Environment what measures he proposes to reduce the time taken by the Environment and Heritage Service in providing responses regarding planning applications.

(AQO 234/02)

4.00 pm

(Madam Deputy Speaker [Ms Morrice] in the Chair)

Mr Nesbitt: Together with the Planning Service, my Department's Environment and Heritage Service has reviewed the effectiveness of the arrangements for consulting on planning applications. The review identified weaknesses in the consultation process, most of which were attributable to resource pressures in the Environment and Heritage Service. It also identified some areas where improvements could be made quickly.

To address the pressure, a bid for additional resources was made in the spending review 2002. The proposed allocations to my Department in the draft Budget do not suggest that it will be possible to meet the resource pressures. However, I will not be able to come to a definitive conclusion until the Budget is finalised later in the year.

The Environment and Heritage Service and the Planning Service are introducing early improvements that are not dependent on new resources being obtained.

Mr Hilditch: Will the Minister specifically examine the number of planning applications in the Carrickfergus town centre area, where the Environment and Heritage Service has engaged consultants to work on its behalf? When the developers get the problems identified by consultants out of the way and they are about to progress, they suddenly find a new set of problems. That has resulted in some applications being in the system since around 1999.

Mr Nesbitt: First, I have one general point. There are approximately 3,400 applications a year. Some of those involve the built heritage and some involve the natural heritage, so there are in total 5,236 consultations. There are not many staff to deal with those, the same problem that applied to a previous question.

I am conscious of 4 Governors Place in Carrickfergus. That is a rather complex planning application because it involves demolition, retention of listed buildings and some apartments. The Environment and Heritage Service consulted a second time on that. I understand that the planners will meet the architect to see if we can reach a best outcome. That meeting is forthcoming. However, I stress that there are always tensions in planning that must be resolved.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am afraid our time is up. Mr Sean Neeson was to come next, and I assume that the Minister will respond with a written answer.

Mr Nesbitt: That is my regret.

FUR FARMING (PROHIBITION) BILL

Consideration Stage

Madam Deputy Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshallled List of amendments and will note that there is only one amendment for debate. That will be debated when we reached clause 5. The questions on whether clauses of a Bill stand part will be taken at appropriate points in the debate. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

No amendments have been tabled to clauses 1 to 4. Therefore, I propose by leave of the Assembly to group those clauses for the question on whether they stand part.

Clauses 1 to 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Compensation for existing businesses)

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development (Ms Rodgers): Before I move the amendment, I want to say that it is very regrettable that the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development Committee has absented himself from the House and is not here to respond to my amendment. I am moving the amendment in response to the Committee's views, which I have taken seriously.

Mr Berry: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Rodgers: It is regrettable that the Chairperson is putting his own party political stunts ahead of his duties to the Committee, the Assembly and to —

Mr Berry: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to make a comment against the Chairperson when she is not fully aware of the circumstances of his absence?

The Chairperson of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee is meeting the Security Minister on important matters, including that of the Claudy bomb allegations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you, Mr Berry, for giving us details of the whereabouts of the Committee Chairperson. Minister, please continue.

Ms Rodgers: I beg to move the following amendment: In page 3, line 35, at end insert —

“(4) The scheme shall provide that payments shall not be made under the scheme in respect of a business which was first carried on after a date specified in the scheme”.

The amendment relates to clause 5, which deals with compensation for existing businesses. Clause 5, subsection (3), provides that the Department may make a scheme to provide for compensation for those affected by the ban on fur farming and sets out what such a scheme shall include. In its scrutiny of the Bill, the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development thought that it would be desirable if the Bill were to make express provision so that a compensation scheme would specify a deadline after which no payments would be made. I have accepted the Committee's view on that and propose that the Bill be amended by the provision of a new subsection (4) to clause 5.

The amendment does not affect the substance of the Bill. It is a clarification of the terms to be included in any scheme that the Department may make.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, Mr Savage.

The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development (Mr Savage): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr Berry: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Given the reason why the Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development was unable to attend, will the Minister withdraw her remarks?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Member gave the reasons why the Chairperson was not available in the Chamber. The point of order you raise is not a point of order. There is no Standing Order referring to that. I call Mr Savage.

Mr Morrow: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Did the Minister not refer to the Chairperson carrying out stunts, and she knows perfectly well that that is not the case? Would she now have the good grace to withdraw the scurrilous remarks she made?

Ms Rodgers: In my view the reason is academic; as Chairperson of the Committee, he should be here to respond to the amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I move to — [Interruption].

Mr Morrow: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Minister said that the Chairperson was carrying out “stunts”. She can twist and turn all she wants, but we are simply asking her to withdraw those remarks. He is not participating in stunts; he is at another meeting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. It refers to remarks that were made. We will look at Hansard and come to a conclusion on that.

Mr Savage: I thank the Minister and her Department for tabling the amendment. It is what Committee members wanted.

Mr McHugh: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the amendment. Every member of the Committee agreed that it was necessary for animal welfare, and to ensure that no one could start a business anywhere in the North to get compensation after the Bill was enacted.

Amendment agreed to.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Long title agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

COMPANY DIRECTORS DISQUALIFICATION BILL

Further Consideration Stage

Madam Deputy Speaker: No amendments to the Bill have been tabled. The Further Consideration Stage of the Company Directors Disqualification Bill is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

CHILDREN (LEAVING CARE) BILL

Final Stage

The Minister of Health, Public Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Molaim go ritear an Bille Páistí (ag Fágáil Cúraim) anois. I beg to move

That the Children (Leaving Care) Bill (NIA 5/01) do now pass.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Children (Leaving Care) Bill (NIA 5/01) do now pass.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN AND VULNERABLE ADULTS BILL

Committee Stage (Period Extension)

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Protection of Children and Vulnerable Adults Bill (NIA 22/01).

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety is examining the Protection of Children and Vulnerable Adults Bill. It is a significant piece of legislation and runs to over 50 clauses. The Committee warmly welcomes the Bill, which contains important provisions to enhance the protection of children and vulnerable adults. The Bill breaks new ground, and it is important that the Committee be able to devote sufficient time to scrutiny of its provisions, and to discussion of the impact it will have on organisations working with children.

Related issues include whistle-blowing and the making of disqualification orders for persons deemed to be a risk to children. In order to be satisfied that the Bill can fully deliver on its intent and provide safeguards for vulnerable young adults, the Committee asks that the Committee Stage of the Bill be extended to Friday 22 November 2002.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 31(5), the period referred to in Standing Order 31(3) be extended to 22 November 2002, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Protection of Children and Vulnerable Adults Bill (NIA 22/01).

AGRICULTURE (AMENDMENT) BILL

First Stage

Mr Armstrong: I beg leave to lay before the Assembly a Bill (NIA 10/02) to include horses within the definition of agricultural animals; and for connected purposes.

4.15 pm

Mr J Kelly: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Does that include donkeys or just horses?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order: that is information, which you had the opportunity, I assume, of seeking from the Member.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Bill will be put on the list of pending business until a date for its Second Stage has been determined.

FIRE SERVICES (APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTION) (AMENDMENT) REGULATIONS (NORTHERN IRELAND) 2002

Prayer of Annulment

Mr Berry: I beg to move

That the Fire Services (Appointments and Promotion) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 (SR 283/2002) be annulled.

Members of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety had differing views on the motion: some were for and against it; some were for and against the Regulations. My Colleague, Iris Robinson, Committee members from the Ulster Unionist Party and I have made our concerns clear. The Fire Services (Appointments and Promotion) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2002 were brought before the Committee in July, just before recess, and several members raised concerns at its motive, particularly at this time.

Concerns were raised about the equivalent experience and qualifications required, article 39 of the European Community Treaty, and the need to maintain the morale of firefighters. Concerns were raised by the Fire Brigades Union about the poor consultation on the Regulations put before the Committee. Some Committee members, including myself, asked if this was a political move by the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

The Regulations provide for equivalent “experience” and “qualifications”. Members are aware of the many tragic incidents that have taken place in Northern Ireland over the past 30 years and more. One thing that has held Northern Ireland together is the experience and dedication of our firefighters across the board — regardless of religion. We had, and still have, conscientious, eager and professional firefighters.

There are questions about the definition of equivalent “experience” and “qualifications”: there is no clear definition in the Regulations. The legal teams of the world will tell us that it is not important to include a clear definition. However, the Fire Brigades Union, my Colleagues and I believe that this is important.

The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety is throwing the responsibility for determining equivalent experience and qualifications to the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland selection panel. The Fire Authority has expressed several concerns about that — and I am sure, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you will have noticed those in the press recently. The responsibility should not be left to the Fire Authority: there should be a clear definition of the equivalent experience and qualifications required in the Regulations.

Members may ask what the equivalent experience and qualifications are. We were told that Her Majesty's Inspectorate would be able to provide guidance, but that will not be the case. Her Majesty's Inspectorate will not be able to provide guidance to the panel as stated by the Department in its letter to the members of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The Fire Authority for Northern Ireland has been advised of this, and I would like that clarified today.

No other profession in the country would permit outside entry at its highest level. It is like asking a road engineer to become head of brain surgery at the Royal Victoria Hospital: it is complete nonsense. Northern Ireland must have someone who is able for the job. In Northern Ireland there are men and women from each side of the community who would be capable of doing the job.

Article 39 of the European Community Treaty brings in the issue of the Good Friday Agreement. The post of Chief Fire Officer was previously designated as a public service post, so why is that not the case now? It is a public service post in other brigades in the United Kingdom, including London. Departmental officials told the Committee that the situation in Northern Ireland had changed since the Good Friday Agreement, and that therefore this exception was no longer justified. That is a joke, because we have seen how the Belfast Agreement has delivered anarchy, not just over the past couple of days in the Building but throughout the community. Article 39 must remain for security reasons.

Over the six years since the signing of the agreement, the level of violence has increased dramatically. There are more bomb attacks than ever, blast bombs have been fired at firefighters, there are daily attacks on firefighters, there is regular terrorist targeting and training, there was the incident in Colombia with FARC, and there are many other issues.

The Chief Fire Officer must remain in close contact with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding in talks on many sensitive security matters. It is a delicate post. It is a crime to throw away the article and open the gate to anyone outside the UK. A person from Northern Ireland would be best for the post, given the security problems and the trouble on the streets.

It is ironic that the Regulation has not been introduced anywhere else in the UK. Departmental officials told the Committee that other Departments in the UK are examining this, but that is all they are doing. This is a political move by the Sinn Féin/IRA Minister.

Firefighters' morale is low as a result of attacks on them across the country. Career development and progression is greatly promoted in the Fire Service in Northern Ireland. Many male and female firefighters have worked through the ranks to senior positions, hoping that some day they will gain further promotion, but, if the Regulation is enacted, it will send out a message from the Department that no firefighters in Northern Ireland are capable of doing the job.

People have said that it does not stop anyone in Northern Ireland from applying for the position, but the fact that the Minister is trying to move the Regulation to open up the position of Chief Fire Officer to anyone outside the UK is a clear political sign. It is also a sign that she thinks no one in Northern Ireland is capable of filling the position.

Mr Paisley Jnr: Does the Member appreciate that it is important to employ someone who is capable of interacting directly with the Chief Constable in this role? The Member has already identified that, but the Minister does not interact with the Chief Constable except for guldering at his officers on the steps of Stormont. It would be useful to have someone who could interact appropriately with the Chief Fire Officer, especially in the event of a strike. Vehicles have been set aside for the police to do the job if that happens. It is, therefore, essential to have the right people interacting with the police at the right time.

Mr Berry: I wholeheartedly agree. The way the Minister shouted at members of the Police Service of Northern Ireland on Friday was a disgrace. The Health Minister's attitude was despicable, and she showed her true colours in the way she acted against the forces of the law.

I agree wholeheartedly that the Chief Fire Officer of Northern Ireland must be able to deal directly with the Chief Constable. It is clear that the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety does not take the opportunity to do that. Given the current possibility of a strike, we need someone who can interact closely with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding. Therefore, I fully understand Mr Paisley Jnr's remarks.

Concern was raised by the Fire Brigades Union. When the issue came to the Committee's attention, I spoke to representatives of the union, and I was astonished to learn that they knew nothing about the Regulation. Members might ask why the union needed to know about the Regulation. The bottom line is that the Fire Brigades Union, which represents 95% of all firefighters in Northern Ireland, has the right to know about any changes. The decent thing to do would be to let them know that the senior post of Chief Fire Officer was open for appointment.

When the Regulation and the Department's two amendments appeared, I asked the officials whether the Fire Brigades Union had been consulted; it had not. It was consulted after the Regulation was drafted in the middle of July. However, its representatives first found out about the Regulation when I approached them. I find it grossly insulting that the Minister and her Department did not consult the union sooner rather than later.

We must ask whether the Regulation is a political move. I have no doubt that the smokescreen of the Minister, her Department and others will be to say that they have received legal advice, and that retaining the existing qualifications required for Chief Fire Officer could have legal implications. The Committee received weak legal advice. The advice, which was consistent with that given to the Department, was that “the retention of the existing qualification requirements for the Chief fire officer probably cannot be justified, particularly in light of a relaxation of nationality requirements for public service posts”.

This does not make it clear that retaining the existing qualifications would be illegal. The word “probably” cannot be justified. As far as I am concerned, the legal argument is flawed; it is a smokescreen raised by the Department and the Minister. The Minister’s ultimate goal is political. This is a political move against the UK Fire Service, but she is going through the back door. Other members of the Committee and I do not buy it.

The Department keeps telling us that it is examining it, and that other Departments are examining it. Nowhere else in the United Kingdom has this taken place; only in Northern Ireland. We must zoom in to see the real problem, which is that we have a Sinn Féin/IRA Minister in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety who is prepared to promote such issues for purely political reasons. She is prepared to forget about the morale of the firefighters and everything else in order to push this Regulation through for political reasons.

There are people in Northern Ireland and in the Northern Ireland Fire Service who are capable of filling that senior position, no matter what religion they are. We have had people capable of this position in the past, and if it were opened up again, we would have capable candidates today.

I am concerned that disciplinary action was taken against the two acting Chief Fire Officers.

Is it a move to discredit the two gentlemen already in post? I should like the Department to clarify that today, for it stinks right through the whole system. There could be political moves on the part of the Minister to push this through.

4.30 pm

I trust that the whole House will back us, and our motion, today. I also hope that it has listened clearly to the Fire Brigades Union, which represents 95% of firefighters in Northern Ireland. If we say that we are ignoring their views and do not agree with them, their morale will be very much affected.

Many men and women have enjoyed career development and progression through the Northern Ireland Fire Service. Are they to be told that they might not have the opportunity because the Minister intends to open the floodgates and let anyone across the world apply for the position? In the Northern Ireland Fire Service we have men and women capable of taking on that position.

Today the Department must throw away the Regulations and forget about the flaws and the legalities of the whole thing; that is a smokescreen. The Minister and her Department must look to the Northern Ireland Fire Service for the position of Chief Fire Officer. We have the men and women who are capable of it.

The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Dr Hendron): Like Mr Berry, I have nothing but the most profound respect for all the firefighters in Northern Ireland. Having been on the front line in West Belfast all down the years, I have seen their courage and their actions.

I should like to take this opportunity to explain the Committee’s support for this Statutory Rule. As Mr Berry explained, the Committee’s decision was not unanimous; it was carried by a majority of six to two. Nonetheless, I am confident that the decision was well-informed, balanced and took full account of the issues raised.

The Committee’s duty was to scrutinise the Statutory Rule and establish whether it was sound regarding its intent. The Committee has delegated responsibility for its technical scrutiny to the Examiner of Statutory Rules, whose report I shall return to later. The aim of this Statutory Rule is to widen the pool of qualified potential applicants for the post of Chief Fire Officer for Northern Ireland beyond the United Kingdom in order to attract the strongest possible field of candidates. That is based — in my view, quite rightly — on the promotion of equality and is consistent with the freedom of movement of workers across the European Community. As the substantive post of Chief Fire Officer has been vacant for some time, it is important that this legislation be progressed as soon as possible.

In the light of concerns raised by the Fire Brigades Union, the Health Committee spent a considerable time considering the proposed legislation. It took evidence from departmental officials and representatives from the Fire Brigades Union. The union representatives voiced concern that the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland had not consulted it on the proposal.

Although the Department says that consultation took place, it appears that that was only when the proposal for the Statutory Rule had reached an advanced stage. That is regrettable and is not consistent with open and transparent government. I trust that lessons will be learnt. Had the Fire Brigades Union been consulted from the outset, the Department might have had more success in convincing its leadership of the merits of the proposed change and allayed fears about any possible dilution of qualification standards in respect of the post of Chief Fire Officer.

Turning to the Statutory Rule, I wish to deal first with the legal implications of retaining the existing qualification requirements for Chief Fire Officer. The Health Committee sought the advice of the Assembly's legal services regarding the Regulation's aims. The advice, which was consistent with that given to the Department, was that "the retention of the existing qualification requirements for Chief Fire Officer probably cannot be justified, particularly in light of a relaxation of nationality requirements for public service posts."

The current Regulations could be seen as discriminating against those who are not UK nationals by unnecessarily reserving posts to that group.

The Treaty on European Union 1997 provides for the free movement of workers without discrimination on the grounds of nationality. While Governments may classify certain public services as exempt from the freedom of movement legislation due to their "state sensitive" nature, I understand that the Department does not consider such an exclusion to be justified with respect to the post of Chief Fire Officer. That took account of the fact that few of the equivalent posts in Great Britain have such an exemption. It also took account of the situation in Northern Ireland following the Good Friday Agreement. I am not aware of any counter legal arguments having been made in support of the existing arrangements. The Minister may wish to confirm that I have interpreted the Department's views correctly on both of those matters.

In its evidence to the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the Fire Brigades Union underlined the importance of ensuring that the Chief Fire Officer has the ability and necessary training to do the job properly and effectively. Clearly, the Chief Fire Officer must command the respect of the entire fire-fighting force if there is not to be a serious loss of morale among members. To that end, I want to address the concerns raised by the Fire Brigades Union with regard to the proposed legislative changes.

The union voiced concern that the proposals would, in effect, introduce a two-tier system and undermine the existing arrangements whereby senior officers aspiring to the highest positions of command must have completed the highly respected brigade command course. As a consequence of those concerns, the Committee wrote to the Department to seek clarification on what was meant by extending eligibility for the post to potential candidates who "possess equivalent qualifications" to a person who had completed the brigade command course. The Department took account of the concerns raised, and it amended the draft Statutory Rule to include the requirement for non-UK nationals to have "experience" and "qualifications" that are equivalent to those that are already in place in the Northern Ireland Fire Service. The Department has advised that judgements on the equivalence of qualifications and experience would rest with the Fire Authority on the advice of Her Majesty's Inspector of Fire Services.

Committee members had concerns that the word "equivalent", for the purposes of experience and qualifications, was not defined. I understand that the Department's legal services have confirmed that it would not be advisable to prescribe in law the equivalence of qualifications and experience in respect of the requirements for the post, as that would result in the need for future sporadic amendments to the legislation. The Committee has no reason to doubt the integrity of the Fire Authority, relying on the professionalism and expertise of Her Majesty's Inspector of Fire Services, to rigorously apply the new arrangements fairly. I believe that that will ensure that there is no dilution of the high standards that are currently required for the post of Chief Fire Officer.

I disagree with the argument made by some that the proposed legislation is, in some way, a slight on the capabilities of local senior fire officers. The high calibre of Northern Ireland's fire officers is beyond dispute. Their selfless bravery and professionalism, which I referred to earlier, particularly in protecting lives and property during the 30 years of the troubles, is unquestionable. While the legislation serves to widen the pool of potential quality candidates, it does not in any way preclude any candidates from Northern Ireland or Great Britain from applying for, or being successful in, the competition. Of course, any unsuccessful candidate would have the facility to appeal to the Equality Commission if they felt that they had been unfairly treated. I am confident of the ability of local senior officers to demonstrate their qualification for the job in any such competition.

In his technical scrutiny of the Regulations, the Examiner of Statutory Rules made three comments. First, there was a breach of the 21-day rule, and the Department was remiss in not following established practice in laying Regulations. Secondly, it would have been more logical to insert regulation 4(1)(a) after regulation 4(2), and, thirdly, it would have been better to have expressly stated in the Regulations that it was for the Fire Authority to decide what experience and qualifications were equivalent to those set out in regulation 4(1)(a).

The Committee will consider the Examiner of Statutory Rules' report at its next meeting. However, the examiner has confirmed that his comments are relatively minor points that do not invalidate the Regulations. He has brought his comments to the Department's attention and has suggested that it may wish to bring forward an amendment in due course to tidy up the Regulations. The Committee will make its views known to the Minister on how this Statutory Rule has been handled. Although there are lessons to be learned for the future, they do not invalidate the rationale of the Regulations.

On behalf of the Health, Social Services and Public Safety Committee, I urge Members to support this progressive piece of legislation. It is consistent with the principle of freedom of movement for workers within the European Community and aims to ensure that the Northern Ireland Fire Service has the best possible pool of potential quality applicants for the post of Chief Fire Officer.

Mr J Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In proposing the motion, Assembly Member Berry talked about politicisation and mentioned the Minister and Sinn Féin/IRA, yet the entire thrust of his address was to politicise the Fire Service in this part of Ireland. The motion is not about the competence of the Fire Service. As other Members have said, no one has in any way attempted to criticise, diminish or belittle the Fire Service; neither is the amendment an attempt to prevent internal promotions within the North of Ireland Fire Service.

The amendment does not propose that no one from within the North of Ireland Fire Service can become Chief Fire Officer. It is about equality of opportunity. As Joe Hendron said, it is about casting the net wider so that those from America, Germany, France, Italy or the other part of Ireland can apply for that job. All the amendment does is extend that notion of equality. It does not in any way disbar, disallow or prevent promotion from within the North of Ireland Fire Service.

Earlier today we were discussing leaked information, yet Mr Berry has been leaking information from the Health Service to the Fire Brigade unbeknownst to any member of the Health Committee. Consistently — [Interruption].

Mr Berry: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It is cheap that the Member is talking about leaked documents, given what happened on Friday. Let him provide the evidence. He made an allegation, and I want him to withdraw it.

Mr J Kelly: The Member said it in his speech. Apart from anything else — [Interruption].

Mr Berry: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I said that I had raised this issue with the Fire Brigades Union in July — not in September or October, but in July. It was legitimate of me to raise the issue. It was during consultation. As a Health Committee member, I asked members of the Fire Brigades Union whether they were aware of the Regulations, which they were not. Where is the crime in that? Does the Member not want the Fire Brigades Union to be consulted?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you for that clarification. I assume that the matter has been clarified for Mr Kelly.

Mr J Kelly: Clarification will wait for another day. We can only go on what we hear and what we are told.

We have spoken to firemen about what they are about. We have explained to the Fire Brigades Union the content, impact and import of the amendment. The entire objective of the motion seems to be to prohibit and confine; to create a closed shop in the North of Ireland Fire Service where no one outside the North of Ireland Fire Service ought to be promoted to Chief Fire Officer. That cannot be right — there is no openness, transparency or accountability in any sense of the word.

4.45 pm

In opposing the motion, the Department is clear in its use of words. The amendment allows a person to apply if he or she “has acquired experience and qualification equivalent” to the original requirements. That fits in with what the Fire Service has said. There may be merit in ensuring that the Regulations to ensure such equivalence are comprehensive and robust. However, there is nothing in the wording of the amendment that could be objected to by anyone concerned with equality of opportunity and ensuring that the best person for the job gets the job, irrespective of where he comes from. I oppose the motion.

Mrs E Bell: I support Mr Berry’s prayer of annulment. I agree with him, even if only in this matter. Can Members listen to what I have to say before they comment? We have recently spoken in the House about attacks on firemen and women by mindless thugs on our streets. Most of us have supported the firefighters’ battle to achieve a new wage structure to replace the existing 25-year-old one. The firefighters regard the proposed appointment and promotion Regulations as yet another attack on them. Those Regulations are not being considered for the other 57 of the 58 fire brigades in the United Kingdom. The existing Regulations are currently protected by the Treaty of Rome. However, it is argued that they must be altered here to achieve equality in accordance with the so-called needs of Northern Ireland. Such a change is not necessary at this stage and would also be extremely dangerous because it would open up senior positions to people in the European community who might not necessarily have the practical experience and who may have some communication shortcomings. In the heat of an emergency, a split-second delay could prove fatal. I hope that people understand my practical concerns.

In one area of the Republic, under Regulations similar to those proposed, a chief fire officer who had absolutely no background in or experience of actual firefighting was recently appointed. Add possible communication problems to that and there could be trouble.

Mr J Kelly: Does the Member agree that the appointment of a chief fire officer in the other part of Ireland was conducted in conformity with the Regulations that apply there and that the Regulations that apply here would prohibit someone who did not have the equivalent qualification — in other words, the training that is required in the Fire Brigade in Britain or elsewhere?

Mrs E Bell: I am not exactly sure what the Member means. I am sure that the person who was recruited in the South was recruited under the South’s Regulations. This is a matter of United Kingdom Regulations and the Northern Ireland Fire Brigade, which is still part of the United Kingdom, whether we like it or not. Firefighters in Northern Ireland regard the proposal as an insult because they think they are being treated differently from other firefighters in the UK. They fear that it would de-professionalise their service and open it up to non-experienced personnel, thus placing them at even greater risk than they already are.

As I said, I am making practical comments at this stage. No one in this Chamber can be in any doubt that I and my party have always supported the equality legislation.

A Member: Selectively.

Mrs E Bell: Our support is not selective. We support equality legislation. However, because something is, in general, desirable and right, it does not mean that every application of it has been desirable or right. We have complained about the process of the equality legislation — there have been many delays. All of a sudden, however, this idea turns up. It should be considered, but only on a UK-wide basis. At this stage no change should be made that would be to the detriment of any firefighter.

Mr J Kelly: What changes should be made?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mrs E Bell: The proposed change is not for good, practical reasons. Such changes should only be made when the equality legislation for the whole of the UK is examined. That should be the case until Northern Ireland is put into the South. I support the motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Given the number of Members who wish to speak in the debate and the time that we have made available, I ask the remaining Members to limit their contributions to five minutes.

Mrs I Robinson: I support the prayer of annulment motion brought by my Colleague on the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Mr Berry. The position of Chief Fire Officer in Northern Ireland is a crucial post and, as some Members intimated earlier, the person in post must interact with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding.

Morale among our firefighters is very low, following their high-profile campaign for better pay and a greater recognition of their role in society. Meanwhile, frequent mindless attacks on them continue across the Province. Firefighters take their lead from their superiors, so it is important that those who represent them, the face of firefighters, have their utmost respect and support. As the Fire Brigades Union representatives informed the Committee, firefighters may live or die on vital command and control decisions taken by senior officers.

I oppose discrimination, wherever it is found and from whatever source it emanates. The person most suitable — the best-trained, the most qualified and the one most likely to do the job best — should always get the job.

That is why I so deplore the discrimination that exists in policing. Young men and women can fail to become police officers, even though they know that they were better candidates than others who were chosen. That often means rejection from a career that the unsuccessful applicant has always had an ambition to pursue, perhaps even following in the footsteps of other family members.

I do not want to see discrimination in the Fire Service. I want the Chief Fire Officer to be the best person for the job. For that to be the case, he or she will require an intimate knowledge of Northern Ireland. As a result of our tragic history, heading an organisation such as the Northern Ireland Fire Brigade requires a familiarity with the Province's geography and the cultural issues whose significance remains throughout our society. It is not as if we have a limited pool of potential candidates from whom to choose. Under current legislation, our Chief Fire Officer could be appointed from officers throughout the 59 UK fire brigades who have completed the brigade command course at Fire Service college. Does it not seem peculiar that the Sinn Féin Minister now wishes to change the legislation to allow for applications from outside the United Kingdom? It has been claimed that to maintain the current legislation would be unlawful. However, other legal advice rubbishes that supposition.

Why are the other 58 fire brigades in Great Britain not seeking amendments to their legislation? Is it any wonder that firefighters' leaders fear that it is not about ability or equality of opportunity, but purely a political decision by a Minister pursuing an all-Ireland agenda.

The Fire Brigades Union also fears that political factors were behind the recent controversies surrounding the Fire Authority. Is it just coincidence that the only two Northern Ireland Fire Brigade officers who are in a position to apply for the Chief Fire Officer post have recently been made subject to disciplinary investigations?

In the Irish Republic, a two-tier entry system means that senior officers can possess little experience in command and control issues for large-scale incidents such as bomb scenes. For example, the chief fire officer in Wexford graduated in civil engineering in 1998 and worked as a building control officer for a consultancy firm until she was appointed assistant chief fire officer for Mayo.

Firefighters in Northern Ireland support the integrated personal development system promoted in the UK Fire Service, and, especially now, when pay and conditions are under discussion, it would be ridiculous for firefighters to do anything that might weaken their links with colleagues in Great Britain. As such, the appointment of a chief officer from outside the UK would run counter to the integrated personal development system. Firefighters wish to pursue that pathway of career progression and development, not to introduce a two-tier system. I support the motion.

Mr Dallat: I am quite sure that the prayer of annulment was not inspired in heaven; it is more likely that it was enunciated in less hallowed places, among people who have a vested interest in ensuring the retention of restrictive work practices. Why else would anyone want to limit the potential pool of applicants for the post of Chief Fire Officer? I cannot think of another reason.

I am sure that Mr Berry will reassure the House that his intervention has not been influenced by anyone in the Northern Ireland Fire Brigade who may be a potential applicant to the vacant post. I raise that issue, not as an allegation of impropriety, but to enable Mr Berry to go on the record with a crystal clear assurance that he has had no contact with anyone who may benefit from the annulment of the Regulations, which enable — [Interruption].

Mr Berry: I thank the Member for giving way. I can say honestly in the House that no one, including the acting Chief Fire Officers, has consulted me about the issue. I have had discussions about the positions with the Fire Brigades Union but, I stress, never with an acting Chief Fire Officer.

Mr Dallat: I raised the issue to give Mr Berry the opportunity to go on record and state that he has not been influenced in any way and because I know that, in the past, he has tabled leading questions relating to the Fire Service, which I felt at the time were inspired by personal contact. However, I have no proof.

There are serious issues relating to the future development and reform of the Fire Service, and, although there has been a tendency to put all the blame on the beleaguered Fire Authority, there are real concerns about the ability of some people in the Fire Brigade's management team. I say that because many of the recommendations made by the Public Accounts Committee have not been implemented and, in some cases, have been obstructed.

In such circumstances, I suggest that a new broom is needed to clean out everything that is wrong in the Fire Service. However, in saying that, I do not take away from the sterling work of firefighters in the past 30 years. I do not want anyone to confuse the two issues.

To reimpose restrictive practices would not be in the interest of genuine reform, but would be construed as either politically motivated to prevent applications from the Republic or a clumsy attempt to enhance the prospects of existing personnel. Of course, such practice is contrary to the ethos of the EU, of which we are a member.

5.00 pm

I shall conclude, because I know that you are anxious, Madam Deputy Speaker, that speeches be short. Do we potentially tell a firefighter or a fire chief who served in New York on 11 September and who wanted to apply for a job in the North that they are unqualified? I should think not. Mr Berry, in his single transferable speech, told the House that his little prayer was not inspired by the angels but by other factors. However, those factors have nothing to do with improving the Fire Service and more to do with retaining the closed shop.

Mr Shannon: I support the motion that my Colleague Mr Berry moved and that was ably spoken to by another Colleague, Mrs Robinson.

I must put on record my concern about the Minister's decision to consider this matter. In common with many others, I have no doubt that that decision is purely politically motivated. Members have said that they wish to ensure that there is equal opportunity of employment. That is true; however, if we follow the procedures and changes that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has proposed, that equality will not follow. For example, an officer in the Irish Army who transfers into the Irish Fire Service, and who may be insufficiently qualified to hold that position, can then apply for a position in the Northern Ireland Fire Brigade. That is wrong; in order to obtain a post in Northern Ireland people here must be qualified, have abilities, have passed exams and have done all that is necessary. For someone down there to get in through the back door is unfair and must be opposed.

The issue has been discussed in many councils, and my own, Ards Borough Council, has put on record its opposition to the proposed changes. Many other councils have done likewise, and, as a result, the momentum against the proposals has grown across the Province.

The Minister's proposals discriminate directly against those in Northern Ireland who wish to become Chief Fire Officer. As long as that continues, she and her Department stand condemned over fair play and fair employment. It is only fair that the same rules apply to everyone who must go through our selection procedure.

The changes also attack the firefighters' morale. My Colleagues have mentioned that attack on their morale. It is clear that many firefighters feel let down and undermined and that the proposed change in legislation tramples on their motivation and role.

If this were happening in any other sphere of employment, cries about fair play, fair employment and discrimination would be heard from unions and elected representatives. Yet that is what we face in this instance. It is ridiculous that the Minister will be allowed to make changes and manipulate employment guidelines to suit a political agenda. Let us look at the issue and give the job to the best candidate. Let us ensure that everyone has the same opportunity to apply for that job, and let us not allow the Minister and her Department to ride roughshod over the feelings of Members, those in the Fire Brigades Union and all those who wish to apply for the job but who are unable to do so.

I support my Colleague's motion, and I ask Members to support him. We cannot allow manipulation to occur for political motivations in the Chamber. It is political engineering, which is unacceptable and cannot be supported.

The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (Ms de Brún): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis an Uasal Berry as an rún seo a thabhairt os comhair an Tionóil. Tá sé tábhachtach go dtabharfaí faoi na ceisteanna a ardaíonn an rún seo agus go dtuigeann Comhaltaí an fáth ar leagadh síos an Rialachán leasaithe agus na himpleachtaí a ghabhann leis ó thaobh comhionannais agus dlí de.

I dtús báire, bhí an leasú seo riachtanach lena chinntiú go mbeidh gach ceapachán feasta cothrom agus cóir faoi reachtaíocht an Aontais Eorpaigh. Cinnteoidh an leasú fosta go mbeimid in ann na hiarratasóirí is fearr a fháil do phost an Phríomhoifigh Dóiteáin tríd an phost a oscailt don réimse is leithne iarratasóirí san Eoraip agus níos faide ó bhaile. Tríd sin a dhéanamh, cinntíonn an leasú fosta go gcoimeádfar an t-ardchaighdeán taithí agus cáilíochtaí atá riachtanach don phost.

D'fhéach an dréachtleasú a chuir mé faoi chomhairliúchán i mí Iúil leis sin a bhaint amach trí éileamh ar iarratasóirí cáilíochtaí a bheith acu atá inchurtha leo sin atá riachtanach don phost faoi láthair. Mar fhreagra ar na hábhair inní a léirigh Ceardchumann na mBriogáidí Dóiteáin, áfach, éilíonn an leasú go mbeadh taithí fosta ag iarratasóirí ar dhóiteáin a smachtú sular féidir glacadh leo i gcomhair agallaimh.

I thank Mr Berry for bringing the motion to the Assembly. It is important that the issues raised be addressed and that Members understand why the amending Regulations were laid, along with its implications for equality and legality. Regardless of the fact that I hold a different opinion, it is important to have the opportunity to debate the matter.

First, the Regulations is necessary to ensure that any appointment made is fair and equitable under EU legislation. The Regulations will also ensure that we can attract the best possible candidates for the position of Chief Fire Officer by opening up the post to a wide range of applicants in Europe and further afield. The Regulations will also ensure that the high standard of experience and qualifications required for the post are maintained. The draft Regulations, which I circulated for consultation in July, sought to achieve that by calling for candidates to have qualifications equivalent to those currently required.

In response to concerns expressed by the Fire Brigades Union, however, the Regulations now before the Assembly also requires candidates to have equivalent firefighting experience before they can be accepted for interview. Therefore the Regulations include a new clause that allows candidates from anywhere in the world, with equivalent qualifications and experience, to apply.

It is important to note the nature of equivalence. The word "equivalent" means equal in value; having the same meaning or result; tantamount to or corresponding. Any applicant who does not have the necessary experience and qualifications will not be called to interview. Critics of the clause continue to claim that it will, somehow, dilute the stringent standards that exist. How can that be the case, if candidates are expected to have the same qualifications and fire service experience? To suggest that an engineer or a building inspector without these qualifications and senior level firefighting experience could be appointed as a result of the legislation is simply nonsense. They would not even be interviewed.

The example of the appointment of a female Chief Fire Officer in Wexford is quoted again and again and was mentioned in the House today. It is used so often to argue against the Regulations that it must call into question the critics' other arguments against the Regulations. Is it concern over standards that motivates them, or is it fear that a woman could apply, and be accepted for, such a post?

It is important for Members to understand that the Regulations does not affect, in any way, applications from serving members in brigades in GB or here, provided they have the appropriate qualifications and experience. All it does is extend the field to other suitable candidates in exactly the same way as the field is extended for all the other important jobs Members may see advertised in newspapers.

Apart from the sensible and practical reasons for endorsing the Regulations, there are also compelling reasons to do with equality. Under European legislation, Governments are required to facilitate the free movement of workers in the European Union. That means that the existing legislation discriminates against qualified candidates from the rest of Europe and elsewhere. Such indirect discrimination leaves the appointment process open to legal challenge. I have been advised that any such challenges would be successful. It has been mistakenly reported that the post of Chief Fire Officer is automatically exempted from the requirement to be open to other EU citizens. This is not the case. Such an exemption cannot be justified here. It is worth noting that it does not apply to the post of Chief Constable of the PSNI. The Chief Fire Officer's post, under article 39(4) of the EEC Treaty, was previously designated as a public service post, which meant that non-UK nationals were prevented from applying for it. On the basis of legal advice, the Department no longer considers that the post justifies a public service exemption.

Few fire brigades in GB attract this exemption, and the situation here, following the Good Friday Agreement, does not justify the exemption. Unless it was held that there were good reasons for not allowing European nationals from outside GB and here to apply for public posts, this public service exemption, which blocks such nationals from applying, could be judged by the courts to amount to discrimination.

In answer to Paul Berry's argument that the person holding this post will need to interact with the Chief Constable of the PSNI, I must point out that the exemption does not apply to the Chief Constable.

The views of members of the Fire Brigades Union were sought and received during consultation, and the original proposed Regulations were amended to specify that equivalent qualifications and experience would be required, consistent with some of the concerns that they raised. During the consultation, the Committee found out about certain matters before the Fire Brigades Union, because it consistently sought and received early sight of departmental proposals.

With regard to the proposed Regulations, the Department wrote to the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety on 1 July. That was followed by formal consultation on 5 July, with a range of organisations including the Fire Brigades Union, the Retained Firefighters Union, the Fire Authority and district councils. The Fire Brigades Union responded to the consultation letter of 5 July on 20 August. Following receipt of the response, the proposals were amended in line with some of the concerns that it expressed.

Questions have been raised about the morale of firefighters here, and the suggestion has been made that that could be affected by the proposed Regulations. It is a nonsense to suggest that someone from elsewhere, without relevant firefighting experience, would be eligible for the post. To suggest that the Regulations allows amateurs to apply is, by definition, an insult to existing firefighters. Equivalent qualifications and experience are required. Morale could be damaged to a far greater extent by the suggestion that people here would be able to compete only if no one else were allowed onto the field.

The Regulations in no way reflect on the suitability of potential candidates for this post — here or elsewhere. There have been made because of practical, legal and equality issues. Under these Regulations, qualified officers in the Fire Brigade remain eligible to apply, as can suitably qualified officers from fire brigades in Great Britain.

We decided not to wait until such changes had been made elsewhere, because we all recognise the importance of this post being filled substantively, as a matter of urgency. The post is about to be advertised, and therefore we cannot wait for changes to be made elsewhere before we act. Were we to do so, our legal advice is that we would be open to legal challenge.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Will the Minister draw her remarks to a close?

Ms de Brún: There are a couple of technical issues that Dr Hendron raised with regard to the Regulations.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Those must be dealt with speedily as you have only a few seconds.

Ms de Brún: Given that I have run out of time, I will write to Dr Hendron about those matters.

5.15 pm

Mr Berry: I have listened with intent to several Members who spoke during the debate. I listened to the Chairperson of the Health Committee, Joe Hendron, who said that it is important that we widen the pool. As far as I am concerned, our pool is wide enough at present. We have capable men and women in Northern Ireland. Dr Hendron's Colleague John Dallat can shake his head at me, but I believe that we have the men and women in Northern Ireland who are able to carry out the position of Chief Fire Officer, even if Dr Hendron disagrees.

I agree wholeheartedly with the Chairperson of the Health Committee that the post must be filled. I call on the Department to get its finger out, get rid of these Regulations and appoint a Chief Fire Officer to Northern Ireland, given the circumstances that we have.

Mr J Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Berry: I do not give way to Members of Sinn Féin/IRA. [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Berry: The Democratic Unionist Party is fit enough to deal with those people.

We have heard much about the legal implications. Let us consider the wording. The legal advisers returned to the Department and said that the word "probably" cannot be justified. If that is the legal advice, that person should get the sack. That is not clear guidance for us as a Committee.

We have also heard people say that this annulment will discriminate against people across the world, in places such as Germany. Anyone who says that we are going to discriminate is a hypocrite. These Regulations are discriminating against the Northern Ireland firefighters who have gone through the ranks — people who have developed their career and progressed through the Fire Service for 30 years. If the Regulations were to go ahead, those people would be clearly discriminated against. The Minister's attempt to have those enacted is once again a political move.

We then had the words of John Kelly — what a courageous man. He said that he would question the motives behind the motion. He said that the motion's object was political. Who is political today? The Minister of Health and Mr red-faced John Kelly. He went on to talk about leaked documents. Sinn Féin/IRA's spokespersons are the last people who should be talking about leaked documents in the Assembly today, given the circumstances of Friday past.

We move on to the issue of equivalency, qualifications and the firefighters' morale. That is being basically laughed off. Forget about the morale of the firefighters, even though the Fire Brigades Union has consulted with us all and made it known that it is against these Regulations because they basically say to the men and women of the Northern Ireland Fire Service, no matter what their religion, that there is no one capable within its ranks.

I thank Eileen Bell and Iris Robinson. Iris Robinson said that the Chief Fire Officer must be aware of the geography and culture of Northern Ireland. We are aware that the Minister of Health will not be in close consultation with the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding (GOC) for her own political reasons. Over the past 30 years, we have been aware of Sinn Féin/IRA's view of the police. It has been in close contact with the police, because it has pointed the gun at them and has murdered many police officers across the streets of Northern Ireland. It is clear that it is not going to consult closely with them.

But we need a Chief Fire Officer who is prepared, capable and aware of the geography of Northern Ireland. While the Minister will not consult with the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland, especially after all her screaming in the corridors of this Building on Friday, we need a man or woman capable of taking on this position.

Mr Hussey: I am sure that Mr Berry would agree with me that those people from all over the world who are interested in serving the community of Northern Ireland are welcome to come along and join the Northern Ireland Fire Service and work their way up to a position where they can apply for the post.

Mr Berry: I agree wholeheartedly with my Colleague Mr Hussey.

The only part of the Minister's comments worth listening to was her disgraceful comment that we are trying to discriminate against women. While the Minister for Health, who is a woman, has done a bad job in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, that does not mean that any other woman who applies to be the Chief Fire Officer would fail. It is clear that the Minister of Health has failed in her Department, and I trust that she will also fail today. I trust that the annulment will be accepted.

The consultation in relation to this has been disgraceful, as shown by the concerns of the Fire Brigades Union. It will affect the morale of the Northern Ireland firefighters. This is a clear political move by the Minister, Sinn Féin/IRA and her Colleagues to get this through. [Interruption].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

POINT OF ORDER – PERSONAL STATEMENT

Rev Dr Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In a previous debate a savage attack was launched on me and on what I was doing when the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development was speaking. I make no apology in the House to anybody when I am representing those who have been bereaved, shot and maimed by the IRA. I was with the Minister of State with responsibility for security, on her invitation; she brought the meeting forward so that I might make an issue of those who have suffered so tragically in recent days in the constituency that I represent. To be told that that is a stunt is an insult to the memory of the people who have suffered.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am aware that the Member was interested in making a personal statement, but I advise him that he must seek permission from the Speaker to do so. That personal statement may or may not be made following the Speaker's decision tomorrow morning.
