Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 11 February 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Matter of the Day

Constable Philippa Reynolds

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Gregory Campbell has been given leave to make a statement on the death of police officer Philippa Reynolds in Londonderry, which fulfils the criteria set out in Standing Order 24. If other Members wish to be called, they should indicate that by rising in their places and continuing to do so. All Members who are called will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject.

I remind Members that, as the investigation is ongoing, they should be careful not to say anything that might impact on any cases that may come before the courts.

Mr Campbell: Like many people in Northern Ireland, I awoke on Saturday morning to the terrible news of the death of Constable Philippa Reynolds. None will have been more affected by that news than the family and close friends of that young woman. As you said, Deputy Speaker, I do not wish to allude in any way to the circumstances that are before the courts. I merely want to ensure that the entire community, as represented in the Northern Ireland Assembly, shares in the grief of the family and friends of that young woman.

As has been outlined in far better terms than I can, her commanding officer, Chief Superintendent Stephen Cargin, indicated the sense of loss the police family has felt and continues to feel. He said that she loved to do her job and that she was:

"serving the community to the best of her ability".

He also said that she was:

"enthusiastic, bubbly and had a beautiful personality."

Unfortunately, only two years into the job as a serving police officer, her life ended in the early hours of Saturday morning. Previous to that, she had been a teacher, and had exhibited all the characteristics that I just mentioned. As a society, we are, sadly, the losers, as a young woman has passed on as the result of this accident.

I think that today we need to stand united with the police family and with the wider community, which the police serve and have served over the past 40 years, and assure them of our thoughts and prayers at this very difficult time.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): As Mr Campbell said, the House will be well aware that, at around 3.40 am on Saturday, as a result of a road traffic collision, police Constable Philippa Reynolds was killed. She was a rear seat passenger in a police vehicle on duty in the Ebrington area of Derry city and was killed in a collision with a stolen vehicle. Two of her colleagues were injured, though, fortunately, not seriously. We send our sympathy to them today as well.

I know, as Mr Campbell has said, that all Members of the House — indeed, of this entire community — will be united in paying tribute to the work of Constable Reynolds and in expressing sympathy to her parents, Mervyn and Dorothy, her sisters, her family circle and all her PSNI colleagues. As you have said, since two men have been charged in connection with the incident, it would not be appropriate to say anything more on that. However, it is absolutely clear that Philippa Reynolds died doing the job that she was enthusiastic about and to which she was dedicated — working on behalf of everyone in this community.

Over the weekend, I spoke to the Chief Constable, the Deputy Chief Constable and other officers in Belfast and Strand Road. It was absolutely clear that this tragic death has affected the PSNI deeply. Yet, in the conversation that I had early on Saturday morning with an officer in Strand Road, it was clear that there was also the resilience and the determination to do the job in general and to ensure that those who perpetrated the act were caught. There is a resilience and a strong determination among officers in the PSNI to continue to do their duty and to make Northern Ireland safer for us all.

As has been said, Philippa passed out as a constable only in early 2011. She had barely two years' service, yet it was clear that she was already a dedicated officer and an extremely valued colleague. She qualified and worked as a teacher but gave up that profession to serve the community as a police officer, and she spent her entire career based in Strand Road. Although she was a dedicated police officer, let us remember that she was also rather more than that. She was a keen hockey player with the Owls club and was connected with the Girls' Brigade.

Mr Campbell referred to the quote on Saturday from the district commander, Chief Superintendent Stephen Cargin, but it bears repetition: she had just a "really bubbly personality". That has been echoed by others, including those who knew her well and, indeed, by the picture that her family released over the weekend. Many a girl with the heel of her shoe caught in a grating would have been sitting sobbing; she was just laughing, because that was the pleasant personality that she had.

On Saturday, the Secretary of State, Theresa Villiers, and the Minister for Justice and Equality, Alan Shatter, asked me to pass on their condolences, which I was able to do.

It is clear that her tragic death has affected not just her friends and colleagues but many throughout these islands, particularly in south Antrim. On behalf of my colleagues and the entire justice family, I assure her family that they are in our thoughts and prayers at this time.

Mr Clarke: I join my colleagues in expressing sympathy to Philippa's family and the wider family circle on her tragic death at the weekend. Although I did not know Philippa Reynolds personally, I appreciate that she was from south Antrim and, at the end of the day, she was a young lady cut down in the prime of her life while doing her chosen job. She was someone who had changed her career path from education and chosen the Police Service. Her loss is tragic to her family and, at this time, our thoughts and prayers should be with them.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. On behalf of Sinn Féin, I offer our sincere condolences to the family and many friends of Philippa Reynolds, the young PSNI constable who was tragically killed on Saturday morning. This tragic accident highlights the dangers that police officers operate under daily. However, as has been said, an investigation is under way and court proceedings have begun, so I will be careful not to comment further or impinge on that process.

On Saturday afternoon, the Mayor of Derry, Kevin Campbell, and some of his Sinn Féin councillor colleagues called at PSNI headquarters in Derry to express condolences to the PSNI and to Constable Reynolds's family and friends. He also wished her injured colleagues a swift and speedy recovery, as all in the House will support.

I never met Philippa Reynolds, but I was talking to Kevin yesterday, who told me that her death has had a profound effect at a local level on her PSNI colleagues, those who worked with her on a day and daily basis. They recognised and appreciated the genuine grief and sadness in Derry over her death in such circumstances.

As I hear and read accolades from her PSNI colleagues, her former teaching associates and her hockey teammates, it is clear that Philippa Reynolds was a remarkable young woman. The PSNI and we as a community have lost a bright young talent who would have made a distinctive contribution to our community.

I offer sincere condolences to her family. When young people die in such tragic circumstances, it has an effect beyond the family, but we can only imagine the tremendous impact, and our thoughts are with them today. Déanaim comhbhrón leis an teaghlach, agus go ndéana Dia trócaire ar a hanam uasal.

Mr Hussey: On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I express our sincere sympathy to Philippa's mother, father, sisters and boyfriend on this tragic loss. We also express our sympathies to the Police Service in general, and we also think of the two officers who were injured at the same time.

As you know, I had the honour to serve in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and I know of the camaraderie when officers are on duty. I know the fun that people can have in a job like policing. I know the characters whom they meet during their life as police officers. The friends whom you make while you are on patrol will be with you for the rest of your days.

I know what it is like to be in a police car that is hit by another car, because I was in a police car that was rammed on one occasion, and I am paying for it yet. For a young woman of 27 years of age to lose her life in such tragic circumstances is something that we cannot comprehend, but our thoughts and prayers must be with her family because they are the people who have had the biggest loss. Society has lost a police officer who by all accounts would have gone far in the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Our thoughts must be with the PSNI in Londonderry, because this will be with them for many days to come.

Mr Durkan: It is with great sadness that I rise to express the shock and sorrow of my city and this region at the death while on duty of a police officer in the early hours of Saturday. Our thoughts and prayers go out to the family, friends and colleagues of Philippa Reynolds at this very difficult time. Clearly, she was a young lady who was highly regarded, respected and loved by all who knew her and whose life was dedicated to public service. This incident highlights the risks and dangers faced by the police and, indeed, by all our emergency services on a daily and nightly basis, and why we must give them all the support they need to serve and protect our community.

Mr Craig: In the early hours of Saturday morning, the news was passed on to me, as it was to many others, about the death of Constable Philippa Reynolds. It came as a deep shock not only to her family but to the wider policing family. I spoke to a few officers after that, and there was a sense of deep loss about this young individual who had joined the force less than two years earlier. It is a very good testimony to Philippa that her fellow officers felt the loss so deeply and that in her two years in the service, she was so highly thought of by the force. Society as a whole is the big loser from the loss of Philippa Reynolds.

12.15 pm

She was an individual who took part in almost everything in her local community. Mention was made of her participation in hockey, the GB and other societies. She entered into everything that she did as an individual with all her heart, and the same was true of her commitment to the PSNI. It is a very sad loss indeed.

Although our hands are tied in speaking about how her loss has come about, it is deeply regrettable that such an event has occurred. It is not the first time that such an event has occurred, and, unfortunately, it will not be the last

I send my sympathy and that of our party, and, indeed, the prayers of my family and many others, to the Reynolds family at this time.

Mr McDevitt: I rise as a member of the Policing Board and chairman of its human rights and professional standards committee. It is very sad that we have to stand here to note, regret and condemn the violation of a police officer's most fundamental human right, which is the right to life.

I join with colleagues in expressing our heartfelt sympathies to her parents, her sisters, her boyfriend and her colleagues. She seemed to embody everything that you would want in a modern police officer in Northern Ireland — someone who was rooted in her community, who was dedicated to volunteering and volunteerism and who had life experience beyond policing, which she seemed very determined to bring to her job as a constable.

It is worth noting that the families of Garda Gary McLoughlin and Garda Robbie McCallion, who were killed in the north-west in similar circumstances in recent years, will know better than any family the pain, anguish and sense of not understanding that will be going through the Reynolds family today.

I look forward to the speedy progress of justice, and I stand in solidarity with the rest of the House in expressing our heartfelt sympathies, our best wishes and our love to her family and friends.

Mr Allister: I wish to associate myself with the tributes and condolences that have been expressed to the Reynolds family.

When someone dies in a road traffic accident, it always brings great shock and a great sense of tragedy, but when that person is someone as young and as vibrant as Philippa Reynolds, it is even more poignant. For many, when we think of her age and of our own children who are at or about the same age, the poignancy of it comes home to us.

I know that these are dark days for the Reynolds family and that there will be dark days ahead. However, I trust that the sense of community empathy will be some small comfort to them, as will the acknowledgement of the contribution that their daughter was making to society.

In mourning this loss, it would be remiss of the House if we did not also remember that another family is suffering bereavement at this time because of a road traffic accident. I refer to the loss just a few hours previously of the life of John Hillis in an accident that occurred between Tandragee and Poyntzpass. He was known to some of us in the House because of his previous service as a councillor in the community. I would like to join, as I am sure would others, in conveying condolences to the Hillis family and to his wife and son and daughters on his sad passing.

Philippa Reynolds was taking part in a routine patrol to keep the community safe. I want to finish by saying that we are also grateful to another police patrol at the weekend, which, through its alertness and quick action, ensured that we were not meeting here today to note a tragic outcome to the arson and terrorist attack on the home of William Frazer. We are grateful to the police for the swift action that they took.

Assembly Business

Committee Membership

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion on Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion, and, therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Sydney Anderson replace Mr Sammy Douglas as a member of the Committee for Social Development; and that Mr Sammy Douglas replace Mr Sydney Anderson as a member of the Committee for Employment and Learning and as a member of the Public Accounts Committee. —
[Mr Weir.]

Ministerial Statement

Apprenticeships and Youth Training

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement about my intention to undertake a major review of my Department's policy on apprenticeships and youth training. Such opportunities are important for our economy in matching skills to the needs of employers, and for our young people in providing opportunities and giving them a stake in society, while investing in their own skill levels.

I strongly endorse the concept of apprenticeships. They constitute a form of training that is warmly embraced by the business community. In essence, an apprentice is someone who is trained while being employed. I believe that, in our evolving economy, there are now new types of employment and levels of training for which the apprenticeship concept would be of value. At the same time, not every training opportunity or area of employment requires the rigour of a formal apprenticeship. So, in turn, we also have a duty to support and facilitate other forms of training for young people.

As our economy is going through a considerable transformation in both the types of goods and services that are produced or provided by business and the nature of employment and job opportunities, I have decided to launch a major review of apprenticeships and youth training. I want to ensure that they support the growth and rebalancing of the local economy and meet the specific needs of business for a highly skilled workforce. I also want to ensure that young people are provided with opportunities to develop the skills and experience required to be attractive to employers and to provide consistently high-quality training leading to qualifications that can support them throughout their working lives.

My aim is to build on and enhance existing strong provision, ensuring that Northern Ireland has a system of apprenticeship and youth training that is the gold standard — a system that makes our European partners look to us for good practice. Skills are the main driver of the transformation of the Northern Ireland economy. We have a clear requirement to increase skill levels across a broad front. My Department's skills strategy sets out what is required in attainment at levels 2, 3, 4 and above if Northern Ireland is to be internationally competitive by 2020. We also need a stronger focus on STEM skills, namely science, technology, engineering and mathematics.

The jobs of tomorrow will require higher-level skills across a wide range of occupations. We need to address skills shortages and skills mismatches wherever they occur. In turn, we must match skills to the specific needs of employers. Our excellent local universities already provide strong, clear pathways to higher-level skills. Northern Ireland has a strong footprint in higher education, including the highest participation rates in the UK. That is now supported by Northern Ireland's first higher education strategy, with a strong emphasis on the local economy and a significant increase in both undergraduate and postgraduate places.

We also have a strong and flexible further education sector, with six excellent colleges providing skills and qualifications at a range of levels. Indeed, alongside other skills providers, they support on-the-job training. However, we also need to ensure that we are offering plausible alternative non-academic pathways to address our skills requirements, including higher level qualifications — pathways that are just as rigorous and just as valid.

In conducting the review of apprenticeships and youth training, we will be investing in a full spectrum of interventions to support our skills agenda.

The concept of an apprentice is not a new one. It goes back to the Middle Ages, when young people sought to be an apprentice under a master. In return for their labour, they were provided with a job, instruction and lodgings. Apprenticeships have been fundamental to the industrial heritage of Northern Ireland and, in the 19th and 20th centuries, helped the region prosper and gain a worldwide reputation for quality and innovation in manufacturing, some of which we retain today. At that time, the apprenticeship route into a career was much sought after by young people and was highly valued by the businesses that employed them and by wider society. Some of the top leaders in industry, academia and the public sector today started their career as apprentices.

Much has changed in the nature of business and the nature of employment since the origins of apprenticeships. Today we are a predominantly service- and knowledge-based economy, with growth in business services such as ICT and finance, in tourism, in advanced engineering, and in food and drink manufacturing. I want the review to ensure that apprenticeship training is more closely matched to the economy's growth sectors and to the needs of businesses in those sectors.

We have only to look at the Titanic Quarter to see how dramatic the changes have been. Harland and Wolff, once the largest shipbuilder in the world, has transformed itself into a manufacturer for the renewable energy sector. The Titanic building welcomes tourists from all over the world to the very slipways where the White Star Line vessels were built. The Northern Ireland Science Park, which houses multiple start-up companies that are making commercial use of research and development work from the universities, sits beside the last remaining naval ship from the battle of Jutland. The multinational Citigroup employs over 1,200 people, who have undertaken jobs that were once located in New York or London, on what was once a brownfield industrial development site. In amongst those organisations is the new campus of Belfast Metropolitan College.

Into the 21st century, we have rightly retained the concept of young people taking up a job and accepting a wage in return for the opportunity to learn the skills from their employer, and, nowadays, from training experts in colleges or with other training providers, to become proficient in the job and to enter sustainable employment. Over the past decade, government and business have invested heavily in apprenticeships and other training for thousands of young people.

ApprenticeshipsNI is currently the main apprenticeship programme. It offers training across a wide range of occupational areas to employees. Those employees earn a wage while working with experienced staff to learn and develop their skills. An apprentice also receives off-the-job training to work towards achieving a competence-based qualification, a knowledge-based qualification and essential skills. Records show that 10,900 apprentices are in training. Our current programme applies only to levels 2 and 3.

Recently, on the back of the ICT action plan, which was published in June 2012, my Department worked with IT Assist, which is the provider of IT services to the Northern Ireland Civil Service, and local ICT employers to develop a public-private ICT apprenticeship pilot. That aims to address the skills shortages being experienced by the local ICT sector and encourages the sector to explore new recruitment models to employ individuals rather than rely on the traditional method of recruiting graduates from university.

The employer engagement plan, which I published last March, outlines a commitment to introduce higher-level apprenticeship pilots in the ICT and engineering sectors. Higher-level apprenticeships respond to employers' higher-level skill needs, support business growth, meet the career aspirations of individuals and enhance opportunities for social mobility. The Department has worked with a number of leading companies, training organisations and sector skills councils (SSCs) to put the pilots in place. The ICT pilot was launched in November 2012 at South West College. Discussions are continuing on the establishment of an engineering pilot, and it is hoped that agreement on the terms of the pilot will be reached in the very near future.

Although those measures are welcome additions to the apprenticeship offering, it is clear to me that apprenticeships have lost some of their earlier-held status, and there are several reasons for that. There is still a perception that they were only for manual jobs in the craft, construction and engineering sectors. Often, other pathways of education are held in greater esteem.

A false hierarchy has been created between academic education and vocational or technical training and education. That can lead to some rigidity in the pathways to progression.

12.30 pm

I want the review to examine how the apprenticeship pathway to a career can be seen as equal to, or even better than, the academic route and enjoy high levels of esteem, returning it to the prestige it once enjoyed, valued by employers, society and the apprentice. I want the review to explore whether and how young people can embark on an apprenticeship, but also progress into higher education should they wish to, not just on a full-time basis and not necessarily directly after work.

I want to see how an apprenticeship can be a stepping stone to higher-level skills, not just an end in itself. I want the review to take into account the successes of our education system, whereby more young people are leaving school with better qualifications, and recognise that the jobs of tomorrow will require higher levels of competence than in the past, as identified in the skills strategy. We currently have many apprentices at level 2, but I am convinced that businesses will increasingly require higher-level apprentices progressing to levels 4 and 5 — the equivalent of a foundation degree and a bachelor's degree — or even further.

Apprenticeships are not the only form of vocational training. We must consider traineeships that offer pathways to apprenticeships themselves, and, indeed, other routes that offer progression into education or employment. Not all our young people will be ready to take on an apprenticeship. Some will need a small amount of additional training to prepare for the challenges of future apprenticeships; others will require an extended package of training and work experience.

There are also young people who are much further removed from the labour market, and whose journey towards employment will be much longer. As for other training opportunities for young people, my Department already offers a de facto training guarantee, with a place for all unemployed 16- to 17-year-old school leavers. The guarantee is extended for young people with a disability or from an in-care background, up to the ages of 22 and 24 respectively.

Training for Success is designed to enable participants to progress to higher-level training, further education or employment by providing training to address personal and social development needs, develop occupational and employability skills, and, where necessary, essential skills training. There are three strands of Training for Success: skills for your life; skills for work; and programme-led apprenticeships.

The programme-led apprenticeships strand is an intervention measure introduced in September 2009. It aims to ensure that those who have been assessed as being capable of achieving an apprenticeship qualification at level 2, but who have not yet secured employment, are prepared for future progression to employment as an apprentice. Participants follow the same apprenticeship framework as those following the ApprenticeshipsNI provision, spending time in directed training and workbased learning placements with an industry-appropriate employer. Currently, around 2,300 young people are participating in strands one and two of Training for Success, and 5,100 young people are participating in programme-led apprenticeships.

I want to ensure that flexible and appropriate provision is available for all our young people, regardless of their starting point. The review of youth training will ensure that the new training offer for young people is sufficiently broad and flexible to enable them to progress to an apprenticeship or into employment. The review will explore how we can engage more with employers on the training curriculum and improve young people's employability skills through measures like work placements. I intend that the youth training review will consider the vocational pathways that are available to young people post-16, and how those link with further education provision in our colleges and higher education provision in our universities. It is important that we have in place a holistic approach to training that facilitates transitions between full-time education and training and continued learning within the workplace.

The review will consider the different factors pertaining to apprenticeships and post-school youth training. On apprenticeships, it will consider the role of the employer and training provider in shaping, supporting and managing apprenticeship programmes; the role of government in shaping and supporting apprenticeship programmes; contingency planning around how to make use of any tax incentives that may become available from the UK Government; which occupational areas would benefit from government-funded apprenticeships, and at what levels, in order to grow and rebalance the economy; whether the current range of subjects or frameworks is sufficient to meet the needs of employers and the economy; the framework for training, including the qualifications to ensure that they are recognised and valued by employers and apprentices; how apprenticeships can provide support for pathways, both academically and vocationally; the components of an apprenticeship programme, including its duration, employment, the contents of the training programme, an examination of appropriate requirements for numeracy, literacy and ICT, and the development of enterprise and employability skills; how to have parity of esteem between apprenticeships and other further and higher education pathways; the role that higher-level apprenticeships should play and how best to develop and facilitate them; how apprenticeships can be expanded into the professions; how SMEs can be encouraged to engage with apprenticeships; how apprenticeships can have a better gender balance and be attractive to all; how the system and processes can be simplified, where possible; and how best practice in other jurisdictions can be incorporated into the framework for apprenticeships in Northern Ireland.

With youth training, the review will consider how to best ensure that, in practice, every young person, post-16, has the opportunity to participate in a training programme; the essential components for one or more effective programmes, which provides a plausible non-academic pathway to prepare young people for progression to an apprenticeship or into sustainable employment; other elements of flexible content that may be required in addition to the core offer of employability and essential skills; how to improve young people's employability skills, including the importance of work experience and how it can be integrated into any offer; how to clarify the offer to enable young people to make the correct choices on entry routes and progression opportunities; the age range and duration of future programmes; how to engage employers in the content of the training programmes and the employers' support in providing work experience opportunities; and the delivery arrangements to enable a flexible and personalised offer appropriate to the young person's needs.

In carrying out the review, I want to ensure that it will complement and link with the Executive's key priorities, the Northern Ireland Executive's economic strategy and the Northern Ireland skills strategy and so help to rebalance and rebuild the economy over the short, medium and longer term. The terms of reference will be published on my Department's website today. The review will be conducted by the Department, and I intend to make it a personal priority over the coming months.

I want the whole review process to be inclusive and to engage with all the relevant stakeholders, be they employers, trade unions, training suppliers, further education colleges and, indeed, young people themselves. I want it to be a thorough review of our policies, but I do not want it to be an exhausting academic exercise. It needs to be evidence-based and pragmatic but also visionary and imaginative. We will also want to learn from the best experiences from the rest of the UK, the rest of Europe and beyond.

I plan to announce the membership of an expert advisory group that will provide advice to the review within the next few weeks. There will also shortly be a call for submissions. I will host a forum for all stakeholders to attend in late spring, at which we will present some of our early thinking and take their views to guide and shape our thinking. I will also keep members of this Assembly and the Committee for Employment and Learning advised of our progress through regular communications.

The review will conclude in the autumn of this year. It is likely that we would then proceed to formal public consultation on the provisional conclusions of the review. Once my officials and I have considered the responses, we will formalise new policy and programmes and seek to implement changes as soon as possible. My ambition is to have a system of apprenticeships and youth training that is regarded as a gold standard across Europe.

Mr B McCrea (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): I thank the Minister for his statement, and I appreciate the briefing that he gave me this morning. Without doubt, this is a timely intervention, and the Committee will welcome the fact that we will look at apprenticeships from a general point of view.

It is quite a substantive document from the Minister, and I will just make a few points. I realise that we are at the initial stages of this activity and, therefore, there is nothing specific to ask questions about. So, I will confine myself to raising a few points that the Minister may wish to expand on.

At the top of page 4, he says:

"it is clear to me that apprenticeships have lost some of their earlier status."

I would welcome the Minister clarifying how he might address that, particularly with reference to the German/ Swiss model.

The issue of programme-led apprenticeships is mentioned on page 5. Those were a useful intervention in September 2009, but there is now perhaps some conflict between those and industry-led apprenticeships. Finally, in ICT, we need to upskill to level 4 and level 5 and above.

In concluding, I draw to the Minister's attention a statement from the Confederation of British Industry (CBI) to the Committee to show some of the difficulties that he has. NIE had 4,000 applicants for 50 apprenticeships in two years. Of the 2,000 who applied, 300 did not bother to turn up. Of the 1,700 who sat basic skills tests in literacy, numeracy and mechanics, only 600 came through. Of the 600 who came through and did practical tests, only 200 made it through. Of the 200 who were interviewed, only 45 were taken on. Minister, this shows that the issue of apprenticeships cannot be taken in isolation. We need a total solution. I wish you well in your inquiry, and I am sure that the Committee will wish to participate.

Dr Farry: I thank the Chair of the Committee for his comments. First, I stress that this is a very substantive piece of work and something that I believe is of fundamental importance to the economy in Northern Ireland. This is very much the opening salvo, and it was appropriate to come to the Assembly and make the statement. I give an undertaking to come back to report on our interim conclusions in due course and, indeed, on the final conclusions when we reach those. Indeed, we look forward to an ongoing engagement with the Committee.

The Chair mentioned a number of points, and I will try to take each of those in turn. First of all, there is the issue of the status of apprenticeships. We have good programmes at present, and they are making a difference, but it is fair to say that we have a hierarchy in this society that values certain pathways over others. It is important that we recognise that we need to look at all of those pathways and ensure that we have the appropriate balance and treat all as being of equal worth. Obviously, people will have different ambitions and attributes and will lend themselves more readily to different pathways, but we have a duty to ensure that we have the full spectrum in place and, more importantly, that we are directly engaging with employers and ensuring that they are getting precisely what they need with the people coming through.

He mentioned the German and Swiss model, where they clearly do have that parity of esteem, if I can use that term, between the different pathways. We are very keen to learn what we can from that model and to see what lessons can be applied to Northern Ireland. I should caution, of course, that there are much wider cultural factors in a lot of the continental European societies that lend themselves to a different model on the economy. They have, for example, much stronger social partnership relations. Nevertheless, where we can draw lessons, we will endeavour to do so.

He mentioned programme-led apprenticeships. Those were introduced as a direct response to the recession and the difficulties that young people were having in finding opportunities. Again, I stress that we need employers to be partners in all of this, because employers need to create the apprenticeship opportunities in the first place, and government, in turn, will do what it can to support them in that regard. We will be looking at programme-led apprenticeships as part of this review.

He also mentioned the important ICT sector in Northern Ireland and the opportunities there for higher-level apprenticeships. I fully concur with the thrust of the remarks that he has been making. ICT is a growth industry in Northern Ireland and requires people coming through from a range of different pathways, whether that is university or whether it is through the apprenticeship route. Obviously, apprenticeships offer that on-the-job training, which may be suitable for some aspects of the ICT sector, particularly the more technical aspects.

We are developing a pilot for level 4 ICT, and that was launched in November last year at the South West College, but we need to press on and consider whether we can do even more in that regard, and also whether we can broaden out higher-level apprenticeships to other areas, both in the range of subjects and the levels. We should not just stop at level 4 but consider level 5 and potentially level 6.

12.45 pm

The Member made reference to the need for a holistic approach. Clearly, what we are doing with this review is looking at apprenticeships and youth training, but nothing in this society ever happens in isolation. Work on other avenues is under way. That could be through Department of Education around improving attainment levels in schools. There is also work on the entitlement framework, and on the prospect of having a 14-19 strategy in place.

We need to ensure that we are encouraging people coming through. I think that, in due course, careers has a role to play in advising young people about the different pathways in place.

Let me stress that I have spoken directly to NIE. I am fully aware of its particular issues, and we are happy to engage with it to see if there is anything we can do to improve the situation that it has experienced.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that, though the Chairperson of the Committee enjoys a level of extension to his questions, that does not pertain to other Members. I ask you to be concise in your questions, and I am sure that the Minister will be equally concise in his answers. I see that Mr Buchanan is smiling.

Mr Buchanan: I thank the Minister for his statement. As stated on page 1, the Minister's aims and aspirations are:

"to build upon and enhance existing strong provision, ensuring that Northern Ireland has a system of apprenticeship and youth training that is the 'gold standard'"

It was stated that other European countries should be able to look on and get some value from it, which would be valued by employers and will be a stepping stone to higher-level skills. What consideration has or will be given to the German model, which seems to have different pathways and, indeed, it has to be said, is leading the way, so far as youth employment is concerned?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions. With regard to aspirations, it is important that we are ambitious for this society. Clearly, in decades past, Northern Ireland was a world leader in the global economy. Through many of our products, we were the world leader. We need to seek to recapture that position but, in doing so, we need to recognise that the nature of the economy is changing, and that the areas in which Northern Ireland is strong today, and will be strong in the future, are evolving. It is important that our apprenticeship frameworks and youth training are flexible and meet the shifting demands of the economy and employers, including through higher-level skills.

The Member's remarks on the German economy reflect the comments that the Chair of the Committee made. We will look very closely at what is happening in Germany. The Member is right to say that there are very clear alternative pathways that have been established over many generations, particularly in the Germanic countries of Europe. We will not be able just to lift that and drop it into our society, given that we have a number of different local features that are not reflected elsewhere in Europe, but which we hold in common with the rest of these islands. However, there will be lessons that we can derive from that, including how we can better link in with industry, build up the esteem of an apprenticeship and communicate to young people that going into an apprenticeship is as worthy as going to college directly for a dedicated course or going to university. In turn, it is for the rest of society to recognise that people make choices that are all of value to the economy and, indeed, that people can rise to be

It is also important that we use mentors and good case studies of people who have risen to dizzy heights. For example, one that is very close to home is the example of Alastair Hamilton, the chief executive of Invest Northern Ireland, who started out as an apprentice and is now heading our economic development organisation. That just shows that there are different pathways and that people can be successful no matter which way they start off.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. Given that a large number of the engineering manufacturing sector's firms are located in the Tyrone and mid-Ulster area, will the Minister elaborate on the engineering pilot scheme that he referred to in his statement?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. On the general point about engineering skills, we are running an engineering skills working group, which is working closely with the business community to address some of the very particular skill needs that it identified. We hope to launch the engineering apprentice pilot at level 4 in the very near future, and we are in discussions with Semta, which is the sector skills council for that part of the economy. We hope to conclude that soon. We identified that in our employer engagement plan as an area that we want to expand into. Hopefully, that is only the tip of the iceberg for higher level apprenticeships for engineering and other subjects.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. Indeed, I raised the issue of apprenticeships with the Minister and his officials some months ago in reference to local employers in mid-Ulster finding young people with employability skills and the delivery of appropriate engineering apprenticeship schemes. The Minister announced a comprehensive policy review, including an expert advisory group and a forum for all stakeholders. Given that it will be the autumn at the earliest before a consultation is launched, when can we expect new policies on the ground that will benefit our young people?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. Hopefully, she has sparked some thoughts in our minds with the questions that she raised earlier. I want this to be a short, sharp, focused process. However, given the nature of how we develop policy in Northern Ireland, it is important that we take a little time to engage with all the relevant stakeholders to ensure that we get this right. The last thing that we should have is a situation where we are, essentially, writing policy in closed offices without that engagement.

We will be looking to announce the advisory group in the next few weeks and, thereafter, the stakeholder forum, which will be a much larger meeting where we can test out some of the emerging thinking. I will want to bring this phase of the review to a conclusion as quickly as possible. The target date is early autumn this year, which is only seven or eight months away. It is not a long process.

Depending on precisely what the review says, it is likely that we will need to go out to public consultation, given that we will be making recommendations on formal policy. However, at that stage, very clear recommendations will be in place, which we will market-test through that consultation. Once the consultation closes, we will, within a matter of weeks or a couple of months, reach the final conclusions. We will then need to look at precisely what point we are at in the cycle of apprenticeships to determine when we can commence implementation. Depending on the particular aspect, we may be able to implement some aspects straight away, others in September 2014 and others in September 2015.

Mr P Ramsey: I welcome the Minister's very substantive statement. I agree with the Chair: there is so much in it that we can only but welcome it. Does the Minister acknowledge the high levels of youth unemployment and the increasing number of young people who are NEET — over 40,000? Will he give a commitment to the House today that the engagement with young people that he refers to will be done in a meaningful way, that they will be part of the substantive discussions and that they will have a role, so that we will have a creative, purpose-built plan for Northern Ireland and not something that is taken off a shelf elsewhere?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Ramsey for his comments. The review is happening under devolution, and we wish to shape it to fit in with the needs of our local economy and our young people. I concur with him that we need to engage directly with young people so that we can find out what they require. Although we stress that, in part, this is about ensuring that we address the needs of the economy and employers, it is also about addressing the needs of young people and their aspirations for their own life and career.

The Member quite rightly identifies problems that we have with youth unemployment and NEETs. He will be aware of the youth employment scheme that we launched and the wider NEETs strategy, which are already beginning to have an effect in providing young people with greater opportunities.

It is important to recognise that at present we have, in effect, a youth guarantee in that Training for Success is open to any 16- and 17-year-olds who find themselves out of school with no job available, but it is not compulsory, and not every young person will be part of that. We also want to encourage young people to think about an apprenticeship, but a lot of them may not be in a position to begin to think about that. So we need to ensure that we have proper pathways in place that can link a young person leaving school with an apprenticeship in due course or provide them with training to obtain a job or to enter into full-time education again. A core aspect of what we are taking forward is not just about reviewing apprenticeships; it is about reviewing youth training and ensuring that we have a full spectrum of interventions.

Mr McCarthy: I welcome the Minister's statement, and I commend him and his staff for their dedication to duty despite the many pressures that the Department has to endure. On a couple of occasions, the Minister referred to gold standard aims for Northern Ireland. Will he tell us what emphasis he places on higher level apprenticeships in Northern Ireland?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question and for his nice remarks about the Department, surprisingly enough.

The issue of higher level apprenticeships is critical. We have a skills strategy, which clearly identifies that we need to move people up the skills ladder at levels 2 and 3, and particularly at level 4 and above. We know where we need to be if Northern Ireland is to be competitive internationally by 2020, and we know that proportionately more of the jobs to be created will require higher level skills. We need to ensure that we are progressing our young people to those levels of attainment, but, in doing so, it is important to stress that we are not talking about everyone having to go through a formal academic route and getting a foundation degree or a bachelor's degree, although young people may progress to those through apprenticeships.

The apprenticeship model and higher level apprenticeships are an alternative way to take young people who may have different backgrounds, skills and attributes and delivering them to higher level skills because employers often need higher level skills. It is important that we consider the range of levels at which we will make interventions and the subjects that will be available for higher level apprenticeships.

Mr Ross: Like others, I welcome anything that aligns training and learning closer with the needs of the economy, and work placements can help to do that. As we know, traditionally, it has been difficult for some people to find work placements. What incentives does the Minister envisage government offering businesses that, up to this point, have been unwilling to engage in apprenticeships?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. He makes a critical point. Apprenticeships will work only with the participation of employers. Government can provide a lot of support and can facilitate, but, ultimately, we need employers to create jobs and apprenticeships.

We have to acknowledge that the profile of the Northern Ireland economy is different from other parts of the UK and these islands. We have a much higher profile of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). Historically, they have been more reluctant to take on apprenticeships, which they have seen as some sort of risk. Given that this is happening under devolution, it now allows us to tailor our support to address the needs of SMEs more directly than a more general UK-wide approach would have achieved. In doing so, we need to see whether there is a means by which we can manage some of the risk.

Some models have been applied in other jurisdictions, and it may be that SMEs will not be asked directly to employ an apprentice but that a pooling arrangement will be created that will allow the risk to be managed on a collective basis. We will certainly have a look at that.

We are also mindful that there has been a lot of talk from a number of parties at UK national level about a tax incentive around training. Obviously, any tax incentive is not devolved to the Assembly but would apply on a UK-wide basis. In turn, we need to think through the nature of our policy response to that, and it is important to plan ahead.

So, in the event that the current or a future Government move ahead, we can in turn rapidly put in place additional types of policy to capture the available tax incentives.

1.00 pm

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire agus roimh an obair atá déanta aige go dtí seo ar ráta na ndaoine óga atá dífhostaithe anseo a ísliú.

I thank the Minister for his statement, which was lengthy and had an awful lot of good content. I also thank him for the work that he has done so far on youth unemployment. How does the Minister plan to ensure that the expert advisory group has sufficient representation from the likes of the community and voluntary sector, which does an awful lot of good work in providing apprenticeship opportunities for people from disadvantaged communities, particularly rural communities? I am keen to hear from the Minister about that.

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his comments, and I am more than happy to take his points in considering the advisory group's composition. Given that we are taking forward a Northern Ireland solution, we have to take the nature of the Northern Ireland economy into account.

I recognise that there is a rural dimension to this. We also have to take the profile of our economy into account. It is not just about SMEs versus larger businesses; it is also very heavily weighted to the public sector, and we have a smaller private sector than elsewhere. However, we also have a vibrant third sector in community and voluntary organisations, which have the potential to offer not just work placements but apprenticeships. We will seek to ensure that we take on board that feature of our economy, as well as the Member's suggestions.

Mr Newton: I also welcome the review. However, I am disappointed that the Minister described it as a short, sharp focus, because I do not believe that that is what is necessary. We need a fundamental review.

Like the Chairman of the Committee, I draw the Minister's attention to the programme-led apprenticeships. It is disappointing that, over three years, only 22% have achieved a level 2 qualification and have difficulty getting the necessary work experience. That indicates that employers are not buying into the programme-led apprenticeships. That stands in stark contrast to the employer-led focus of Apprenticeships Northern Ireland, where 80% to 90% of young people get full-time employment in their skilled area. How does the Minister envisage addressing the gap between the two types of apprenticeship programme?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Newton for his comments. Let me assure him that this is a fundamental review of apprenticeships and youth training. In essence, everything is on the table and open for discussion and reconsideration. However, I stress that we will not sit back and take years to do this. We have a fast-moving economy, and it is important that we seek to deliver within an ambitious timescale.

This will be a dedicated piece of work in my Department, and a number of civil servants have been earmarked to work almost exclusively on it over the coming months. I and my special adviser will also be deeply involved in this work over the coming months. So, it is something that we will be intensively involved with.

The Member shared some interesting statistics on the differences between ApprenticeshipsNI and programmeled apprenticeships. Those differences reflect the level of employer engagement. There are clearly issues around the programme-led apprenticeships that we need to consider seriously, including how that level of intervention can be better packaged and how we can better engage with employers. To an extent, those low figures reflect that there are people who will, potentially, not be progressing to employment. They also reflect in part the situation in our economy, where opportunities have been more limited.

Another piece of work that we need to look at, which will touch on this review but probably lies more broadly, is the forthcoming review of the careers strategy, which cuts across my Department and the Department of Education.

John O'Dowd and I are scheduled to launch that in 2014, but I am open to bringing it forward, if that can be agreed between the two Departments. I am conscious that, at present, there are many demands for employers to engage on work placements and work experience on a range of levels. We need to work out a means of better coordinating that and avoiding duplication in the system. That may be a key feature of the review when we get to it.

Mr Elliott: I note that the Minister mentioned the employer engagement plan in his statement. Will he outline how the Department is performing against the targets set out in the plan?

Dr Farry: The Member is right to highlight that as a key document. It is one of the key implementation documents arising out of the skills strategy. I am happy to share with him a full update on the strands within it. There are, if my memory serves me correctly, 20 different programmes, and I am confident that we are on schedule with the vast majority of those. We will seek to make sure that we deliver all of them by the conclusion of the first phase, later this year. I will come back to the House, probably in early autumn, to announce the second phase of the employer engagement plan, which is a strand of the skills strategy.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers. This is a wide-ranging report, and, given the presentations that we have had in Committee on the subject, it is timely. At the end of the process, will the Minister consider the possibility of a one-stop shop, with an information-sharing aspect and an enhanced website, which would allow people to tap directly into information?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr McCann for his comments. I agree with him that this is highly relevant to Northern Ireland at present for a range of reasons. I am certainly happy to take on board his suggestions about communication, information and a website and, beyond that, the use of social media etc for all this. We want to ensure that that is a key aspect of the review.

Mr Hilditch: I have been closely involved in apprenticeship schemes while wearing another hat and have shared the bitter disappointment experienced by many. Can the Minister assure us of the robustness and scope of the review, particularly on the role of the employer?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Hilditch for his question. I am certainly happy to give him that assurance. Employers are the critical linchpin in all this, and the discussions that we want to have with them will perhaps be the most critical. I think that it is fair to say that employers are eager for this type of review to occur. They know that what we have at present is good, but we know that we can do even better and need to evolve rapidly and reflect the changes in the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome today's statement and support the Minister's work to offer apprenticeships and job opportunities to our young people. How big a change is needed in relation to the esteem in which apprenticeships are held in our society, particularly in the education system?

Dr Farry: I thank my colleague for his question. That really reflects a theme that we have tried to get across today. It is important to present apprenticeships as a perfectly legitimate way of training and entering the workforce. They should be at least on a par with other pathways such as further and higher education. As we develop apprenticeships into higher-level skill areas, I think that parity of esteem will become even more obvious to people. Given that apprenticeships are much more linked to employers' job requirements, we can see a situation developing where they provide a more productive and successful route for young people to enter into sustainable and, indeed, highly-paid employment. That may, in turn, reinforce the message that we are trying to get out about parity of esteem. Careers advice can also play a role in that, as can addressing some of the cultural norms in our society, such as valuing, wrongly, one strand as more important than others.

Mr Allister: The challenge for the Minister is to turn his seven pages of aspiration into something that works and delivers. I am not suggesting that we can drop the German model into Northern Ireland, but it is hard to ignore the German experience — the most successful economy in Europe and youth unemployment of 8% — and then ask whether there is a correlation with the fact that 60% of their school leavers go into apprenticeships through their dual system and 30% are directed unashamedly down an academic route through their grammar schools. Does the Minister think that there is the maturity in the Executive to set aside the ideological blind spot about proper routes for those who are academically focused and proper routes through apprenticeships for those who are not?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Allister for his question and comments. Let me be clear: the German model is a very good one, and it is one that we wish to learn from. I am encouraged that a number of voices across the House are keen to take us in that direction. It is something that we have identified as being perhaps the key case study in the European context that we all want to look to. It is important that we set our ambitions to learn from and adapt to that as much as possible from that at this early stage. However, I caution the House that there are wider factors to do with our history and culture that may lead to us not being able to replicate all of that model as readily as some people may want. Let us go as far as we can.

Again, I stress that I want to see the development of alternative pathways in society. What we do with apprenticeships is not done in a bubble. Other things can be done elsewhere by way of public policy that may set things up better for people to take on apprenticeships in due course. Those discussions are taking place, and there are moves to address some of that in the education reform. Members will have their own views on exactly what direction we should go in and whether we should be more ambitious. However, I get a sense that others appreciate that this is something in which other interventions, right from early years, can make a difference by turning around different aspects of society.

Executive Committee Business

Suspension of Standing Orders

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 11 February 2013.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 11 February 2013.

Mr Deputy Speaker: There are Ayes from all sides of the House and no dissenting voices, so I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated. Today's sitting may go beyond 7.00 pm, if required.

Spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next two motions relate to the Supply resolutions. As usual, I propose to conduct a single debate on both motions. I shall call the Minister to move the first motion, and the debate on both motions will then begin. When all who wish to speak have done so, I shall put the Question on the first motion. The second motion will then be read into the record, and I will call the Minister to move it. The Question will then be put on the second motion

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to four hours and 30 minutes for the debate. The Minister will have up to 60 minutes to allocate at his discretion between proposing and making a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have 10 minutes. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

1.15 pm

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That this Assembly approves that a total sum not exceeding £15,459,758,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraving the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 and that total resources not exceeding £16,572,965,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(c) and 2(c) of table 1 in the volume of the Northern Ireland spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13 that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013.

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £7,136,563,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund on account for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £7,641,877,000 be authorised, on account, for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 4 and 6 of table 1 in the Vote on Account 2013-14 document that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

After the rather insipid cross-community support for the suspension of Standing Orders, I hope that this will be a fairly short debate. The level of interest did not seem to be huge.

Today's debate is an important step in the legislative process that controls our finance. The debate covers the final spending plans for 2012-13, which is the second year of the Executive's Budget for the period 2011-15. In the first Supply motion before the House today, I seek the Assembly's approval for the Executive's final spending plans for 2012-13 as detailed in the spring Supplementary Estimates (SSEs) that were laid before the House on 4 February. Through the second motion, I request interim resources and funding for the first few months of 2013-14 in the form of a Vote on Account. I request the levels of Supply set out in the motions under section 63 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which provides for the Minister of Finance and Personnel to make recommendations to the Assembly leading to cash appropriations from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund.

The amounts that I ask the House to vote in Supply for 2012-13 are significant: over £15 billion of cash, over £16 billion of resources and over £2 billion of accruing resources to spend and use by Departments and other public bodies in Northern Ireland. The first Supply motion sums up the spring Supplementary Estimates that are before us today for approval. I suspect that this reminder will be in vain, but I remind Members that the SSEs reflect all in-year changes made since the Main Estimates were approved by the Assembly last June. They reflect the departmental expenditure limit (DEL) changes agreed in the June, October and January monitoring rounds as well as the annually managed expenditure (AME) funding agreed by the Treasury since the approval of the 2012-13 Main Estimates last year. The debate today is about what we have spent, not, although I expect it anyway, a plea for what we should spend. I make that point before moving on. I can already see looks of scepticism around the House. People are tearing up speeches that they were going to make. If only.

Before I go into some of the detail of the spending plans for 2012-13, there are some important points I will make now. The SSE process that surrounds the resolution gives legal form to the financial decisions made by the Executive in the three monitoring rounds in this financial year. The Main Estimate process in June 2012 gave legal authority to the plans in place at that time. However, as we all know, things change. Unforeseen issues arise, delays occur and policy changes happen, and it has been necessary throughout the year to make changes to departmental budgets. It is a necessary thing. Indeed, it reflects good financial management that we are able to make budgetary adjustments to respond as the financial environment changes.

This necessary and important process means that the legislative authority that we put in place in June last year is somewhat out of date. We need to put in place new legislation in the form of a Budget Bill and SSE to reflect the 2012-13 financial year as we currently see it. Over the next few weeks, there will be a number of important stages relating to the Supply resolutions and the Budget Bill. Those are important pieces of legislation. It is equally important that Members appreciate that the legislative process that we begin today and will finalise over the next few weeks simply gives form to the 2012-13 Budget as amended by the Executive in the monitoring rounds this year. So, I once again make a clarion call for Members to use the debate to focus on the financial position for the current year. We have an opportunity to debate the changes that have happened and the allocations that have been made during this financial year, and, to facilitate that, I will outline some of those allocations in a moment.

As I have already said, I suspect that my call will fall on deaf ears and that there will be some in the Chamber who, as soon as they hear the word "Budget", will immediately think that the debate is a forum in which to plead for more money for this town or that town, this project or another project or to decry the lack of funding in future years for their area. I am sure that, once they start doing so, Mr Deputy Speaker, you will call them into line, the debate will be considerably shortened, and the suspension of Standing Orders that we moved earlier will not be necessary. People may get home in time for their tea, too. Although it is important that Members are given the opportunity to raise such issues, the resolutions before us today and the legislation that we will pass in the House relate primarily to this financial year, and I ask Members to bear that in mind.

I will now turn to 2012-13. This financial year has again been a difficult one for the local economy. However, there are indications — it is important to remind the House of this — that the economic climate is improving, even if somewhat slowly. The recently published Northern Ireland composite economic index shows a 0-7% quarterly improvement in the third quarter of 2012. A key driver of that performance was the local private sector, which recorded a 1% quarterly improvement, whereas activity in the public sector decreased marginally by 0-1% over the same quarter. The performance of the local public sector is not surprising given the tight public expenditure constraints imposed by the UK coalition Government.

Although the context is undoubtedly challenging, there have been great opportunities in 2012. One of the things that the Assembly must do, while not ignoring the difficult reality that we face at the minute, is to celebrate some of the landmarks and successes that we have had and the ways in which we have faced and overcome challenges in the past year. Our celebrations of the Titanic centenary were a resounding success. The Titanic visitor centre continues to attract hundreds of thousands of visitors and is a focal point for Titanic tourism. The Irish Open golf championship in July attracted many tourists from beyond our shores and was a great advert for the north coast. Recent news of increasing employment levels is to be welcomed, and Invest Northern Ireland continues to work with businesses here to realise maximum potential in our economy.

I also want to give Members some of the salient points in relation to the 2012-13 financial year. We began the year with an overcommitment. An additional £30 million current and £30 million capital had been allocated to Departments with the expectation that, during the year, through monitoring rounds, the Executive would be able to recoup this through reduced requirements. I can confirm that this approach not only allowed additional funding to be appropriately planned for but it has also been effectively managed through the three monitoring rounds. In addition to eliminating the planned overcommitment, the Executive were able to allocate further funding throughout the year to high priorities and emerging issues.

In current expenditure, Departments surrendered £66·7 million non-ring-fenced resource DEL for redistribution in the three monitoring rounds. This compares with the equivalent reduced requirements of £65·7 million, £54·9 million and £80·9 million for the preceding three years. Northern Ireland also received £33 million resource as a result of Barnett consequentials from Her Majesty's Treasury. Taking into account central funds and funding to manage the overcommitment and ring-fenced resources, the Executive were able to allocate some £112·9 million to emerging issues in 2012-13.

On the capital side, Departments gave back £51·4 million for redistribution during in-year monitoring, which compares with £48·2 million last year. Again taking into account the management of the overcommitment and additional allocations from Her Majesty's Treasury, the Executive were able to meet capital pressures of some £115·3 million in 2012-13.

It is worth reminding ourselves of how some of those allocations were used to address issues that were raised by Members on a number of occasions. In 2012-13, the Executive allocated some 30% of available current expenditure funding to the Department of Health, including £4 million as a response to the pseudomonas outbreak, proving that the Executive can respond swiftly to significant emerging issues. Once again, our road network received a significant boost, with an injection of £7.8 million resource and a further £5 million for street lighting improvements. DARD received £6.7 million for animal disease compensation. The Department for Employment and Learning received £13.8 million for employment initiatives, and the Minister for Employment and Learning has just talked to the Assembly about some of those. The Department of the Environment received £1.5 million for emergency financial assistance for those whose properties were affected by flooding, and the Department of Justice received £10 million for the Prison Service staff exit scheme.

On the capital side, the Executive allocated £5 million to the Department of Education to address minor capital works in schools and £1.3 million to carry out repairs on the Arvalee special school after the fire there. The Department of Health received £15.5 million for a range of projects, including funding to address infrastructure risks, the expansion of the car park at the Ulster Hospital and capital investment as a result of the pseudomonas recommendations. DRD received £40 million for structural improvements to our road network on top of the £7.8 million of resource that I mentioned. DRD received a further £12.5 million for the replacement of buses for our transport network, which, as I have said on previous occasions — he never comes in to hear the good news — would bring joy to the heart of the Green Party representative who sits in the corner.

Mr Hamilton: He is in the electric car.

Mr Wilson: Right. OK. DSD received £19·8 million for — [Interruption.] Mind you, an electric chair might be more suitable on occasions. [Laughter.] DSD received £19·8 million for co-ownership and other housing initiatives, including £11·8 million under the Get Britain Building loan and equity initiative, which, of course, helps first-time home buyers who want to get on to the property ladder. DSD also received £4 million for thermal improvements to Housing Executive homes, which has allowed those on a low income to save on fuel and electricity bills.

Those are some of the notable public expenditure allocations made in monitoring rounds, but, as I have said in the past, Members must not forget that, in addition, provision was made in the annually managed expenditure exercises and SSEs in 2012-13 for, among other things, £2·9 billion of non-contributory and income-related social security benefits to the most vulnerable. This funding goes some way to protect the most vulnerable and provides mainly for expenditure on disability benefits, income support, pension credit, jobseeker's allowance and housing benefits. Members will be aware that, under welfare reform, that will be part of our DEL funding from next year.

My officials, working with Department for Social Development (DSD) colleagues, are in ongoing contact with HM Treasury on the wider welfare reform position. The House will be aware that we have secured a number of important regional concessions, and discussions will continue over further weeks to ensure that welfare reform will be implemented as beneficially as possible for those affected.

1.30 pm

Before leaving the detail of the SSEs, I inform the House that some additional headroom has been built into the SSEs over and above the January monitoring position. This has been done for dental services and health and social care trust spend in the Health Department, and for the staff exit scheme for prison officers in the Department of Justice to ensure that we maximise our spend at year end. That is necessary to ensure that no resources are lost to Northern Ireland under the Budget exchange scheme. The Finance Committee is aware of this position and has endorsed the approach being taken. It is critically important to emphasise to the House that such headroom has been included on the condition that if — I emphasise "if" — the resources become available, they must be used only for the agreed purpose, effectively ring-fencing the areas that I outlined.

I am sure that Members will endorse the actions taken; actions that will ensure that we maximise the funding available to Northern Ireland and utilise that funding for areas that the Executive have endorsed by providing allocations in this financial year.

I turn now to the Vote on Account for the 2013-14 financial year. The second motion before the Assembly seeks approval for a cash and resource Vote on Account to ensure the continuation of services into the next financial year. The amount of cash and resources proposed are an advance by around 45% of the final 2012-13 provision. I emphasise that it has no direct correlation to the budget allocations for 2013-14. Many Members have expressed confusion over this advance, and with your indulgence, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will try to outline the necessity for this Vote on Account to help aid its transparency to Members.

The legislation in relation to the 2012-13 financial year gives legal authority for Departments to incur expenditure and to spend money up to a limit. Those limits are directly related to the budget of each Department and can be reconciled to the Budget. Indeed, this is done for each Department within the weighty tome — the Estimates document — that I see some Members have on their desk. This legislation is voted by this House twice every year, in June and again in February, to update the June legislation. However, the period between April and June every year is not, initially, covered by the detailed legislation, and legal cover is therefore required to allow Departments to incur expenditure. That is where the Vote on Account or the advance comes in. It is necessary to vote this now to enable services to continue into 2014, until the Main Estimates, which will reflect the detail of the 2013-14 financial plans, are prepared and presented to the Assembly for approval. I am not sure if that helps or hinders Members' understanding, but I will remain optimistic and assume the former.

In conclusion, I commend to Members the 2012-13 spring Supplementary Estimates, the 2013-14 Vote on Account and the Supply resolution as tabled. At the end of today's debate on the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account, I will endeavour to deal with any issues raised on them.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Committee for Finance and Personnel took evidence from DFP officials on the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account for 2013-14. These are routine, though, by necessity, complex matters. I take this opportunity to thank the departmental officials for their assistance to the Committee in that regard.

The Committee has approved accelerated passage for the Budget Bill, which will be introduced by the Minister later today. That decision was on the basis that there has been appropriate consultation with the Committee as provided for by Standing Order 42(2), and I have written to the Speaker to provide confirmation of that.

As has been pointed out, the SSEs reflect the changes that have been made to the opening Budget position as a result of the monitoring rounds in June, October and January. Additionally, the Department has explained to the Committee that some headroom has been built in to give the Executive ability to spend any last-minute underspends.

During the evidence session on 30 January, the Committee examined the reconciliation between the departmental expenditure limit figures in the Main Estimates, which were agreed last June, and the SSEs before us today. That was an informative exercise, during which the Committee received helpful clarification from officials on the in-year technical changes to the resource and capital allocations for 2012-13 for a number of Departments. In some instances, the figures involved were substantial. For instance, the Department for Employment and Learning received £189 million under resource. That includes additional funding from the Treasury for student loans, which is ring-fenced for that purpose.

The majority of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) £28.5 million resource figure is made up of a £19 million transfer under the invest-to-save initiative that relates to Transforming Your Care. A further £6·6 million transfer to the Department of Health from DSD for programmes under welfare reform and the Supporting People programme makes up the majority of the £28.5 million.

The Department of Justice figure of £71 million is made up of reserve claims for policing, such as hearing loss at £24 million, and also £24 million resource and some capital for additional security. There is also a legal aid reclassification of £10 million from resource to capital.

The Department for Regional Development's (DRD) technical capital reduction of £23 million reflects some additions for public realm works, for which it would get additional capital from DSD, as well as reflecting the £30 million reduction for the A5, which relates to the reinvestment and reform initiative.

The scale of those technical changes, combined with the cumulative changes resulting from the normal reallocations through monitoring rounds, will, in some cases, have resulted in significant differences between the opening and closing resource and capital allocations of Departments. In that regard, it will be important that all Statutory Committees have satisfied themselves as to the reasons for and timing of any significant levels of easements or returns of moneys during the in-year monitoring process, and that the necessary assurances have been received on any concerns raised with Departments in terms of minimising year-end underspend.

As regards its own expenditure, the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) had easements totalling £7·5 million in resource and £2·5 million in capital, which is significant in terms of DFP's relatively small budget. During oral evidence, the Committee queried why the Department's business plan classified the risk of not meeting the 1·5% underspend target as amber, and the Departmental officials assured members that, while it was difficult to predict with any certainty, indications at that point were that the Department was on target to meet its year-end underspend targets.

A sizeable proportion of the Department's in-year surrender of moneys related to Land and Property Services (LPS). The Committee has, on several occasions, raised concerns about the amounts of money being returned to the centre due to a reduction in the salaries budget. Members pressed officials and, indeed, the Minister about the effect that that will have on front line services. Robust assurances were received that LPS had used its budget as best as possible and that neither rate nor debt collection would be affected by that reduction.

While we should welcome the prudent and timely surrender of money by Departments during the monitoring process, it will be important that Committees and members continue to scrutinise that area closely. In that regard, I believe that DFP should be leading by example, and perhaps the Minister will wish to pick up on that point when closing today's debate.

As regards the headroom that I mentioned earlier, the Committee has previously considered the inclusion of headroom in the SSEs and understands that, while the Estimates need to be firm and realistic, that is a necessary measure in the event that significant sums of unanticipated reduced requirements may emerge in the final weeks of the financial year.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel was advised that headroom had been created for the Health Department and the Department of Justice. For the former, £15 million of headroom has been allocated for the health Estimates, £2 million of which was for dental services and £13 million for front line health and care services. The Department of Justice was permitted just over £21 million, allowing further resources to be allocated to the early retirement package for prison officers. The Departments in question will then have the Assembly's approval to spend up to that limit if, and only if, any additional funding is allocated to it. The departmental officials stressed that DFP's supply division will monitor the allocations to ensure that they are used only for the agreed purposes.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel has undertaken an active role in scrutinising the quarterly monitoring rounds throughout the 2012-13 financial year and has received timely briefings on the Department's position prior to each monitoring round.

I turn now to the motion relating to the Vote on Account for 2013-14. This is a practical measure that provides interim resources at approximately 45% of the 2012-13 provision. This enables Departments, as the Minister said, to ensure that public services continue during the early part of the financial year until the Main Estimates for 2013-14 and the associated Budget Bill are debated before the summer.

Speaking from a party perspective, I note that both motions refer to the Consolidated Fund. We need to debate how we can increase funding for Departments. The Committee for Finance and Personnel discussed that issue last week and looked at research that it had commissioned on Wales and Scotland in particular and how further powers and moneys are allocated to the Consolidated Fund. Those jurisdictions are having those debates, and we need to do that as well.

Wales, for example, has focused on the limitations of the Barnett formula and is looking at the devolution of setting income tax. Of course, Scotland has already achieved that to a great degree. We need to have that debate here because it will ultimately benefit local taxpayers and ratepayers. I hope that I have kept those comments within the remit of the motion.

On behalf of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, I support both motions.

Mr Storey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): There is no guarantee that I will stay within the remit of the motion. However, I have endeavoured to listen to the Minister of Finance and Personnel's caution and his explanation of the process, which is much appreciated.

The Committee for Education reviewed the monitoring round information and questioned the Department of Education on its spending throughout the financial year. The Committee endeavoured to track the changes in spending that have manifested themselves in the spring Supplementary Estimates. I have to say, however, that that is far from an easy task because it is always the case that Departments are good at ensuring that they give you plenty of information but not the specific answers that you are requesting. I will come back to that issue in a few moments.

The Estimates are difficult to navigate, and the format of the document sometimes makes it hard to identify the key changes in budgets and spending. That is why it is useful that the Minister set out some of the changes in some detail at the start of the debate. I will refer to them in a few moments

As other Members and Committee Chairs may say today, the scrutiny of budgets and spending is one of the most important elements of the work that is carried out in the House. To do that effectively, we must have a clear line of sight between policies, budgets and Estimates.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel has lobbied for change in the financial processes of government, and there is an understandable tension between departmental spending discretion and the provision of fuller transparency. Again, I will comment on that in a few moments.

1.45 pm

The Estimates for the Department of Education indicate that, in 2012-13, the resource requirement for education increased by some £65 million. Of that, £57 million was in the education and library boards and the voluntary grammar and grant maintained integrated sectors spent £15 million. Much of that extra expenditure was associated with the payment of voluntary severance packages to teachers, which had been agreed in the previous year.

I think that it is right to remind the House that, in a period of over 18 months, our education system has lost something like 1,500 members of staff. Members, that is the reason why we are all hearing the teaching fraternity express concerns in our schools and boards of governors and in the correspondence that comes to our constituency offices. However, that is as it is as regards the process that has been undertaken to date.

The increases can be contrasted with the substantial decrease of some £4 million in the funding for the Middletown Centre for Autism. We, as a Committee, have expressed concern about the policy objective, and the way in which that centre was operated in the past raises a concern about the £4 million reduction. The Department has advised that the decrease was reallocated within the education budget and was brought about by the absence of match funding from the Department of Education and Skills in the Republic of Ireland. The Education Committee will be keen to progress that matter in the next few days and to ask further questions of the Department of Education.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: I will give way; yes.

Mr A Maginness: This relates not so much to your latter point but to your former point about the loss of 1,500 teachers. Does the Member accept that this is a very short-sighted approach to education in so far as the loss of those teachers means greater pressure on school staff locally? That causes more stress and sickness and a stretching of resources in schools, and, ultimately, it diminishes the quality of education. Our teachers are very hard-pressed, and I say that with some knowledge.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for the intervention. I agree with the thrust of what he says. Teachers are the key drivers and the key element of the delivery of our education service, and I think that we need to be cognisant of that. The Department's rationale is to have larger schools. The Department's area plans, policy statements and comments are replete with references to larger schools. I think that, if you have larger schools, you will invariably have a smaller cohort of teaching staff, which creates its own difficulty. So, I think that that is an issue, and it is one about which the Education Committee has expressed concern in the past.

Returning to the issue that is before us in this debate, it is also appropriate that we record that, in the financial year, the Executive provided additional funds of some £6 million for minor works and to deal with the fire damage at Arvalee school. I think that we all welcome that that money was made available as a result of the process and changes in-year. The Committee visited Arvalee in October and was very pleased to learn of the extra allocation in support of the important provision for a special school in the area.

The Executive also provided very welcome additional in-year support for school maintenance of £6 million and promised a further £10 million next year. However, that is little in the overall backlog in our school estate, which is something in excess £260 million. So, there is a long way to go in addressing the maintenance issues in our schools.

As the House is aware, the spring Supplementary Estimates are, of course, also the basis of the Vote on Account for 2013-14. The Estimates reference the education and library boards, the Staff Commission, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) and the Youth Council for Northern Ireland. As Members are aware, the Education Bill, which is at Committee Stage, includes plans to dissolve those organisations and roll up most of their responsibilities in those of the new Education and Skills Authority (ESA).

That change represents a significant realignment in expenditure terms, and it is estimated that ESA will have a budget of well over £1.75 billion. Of course, a great deal of that money will be passed on to schools for salaries and other services. Nonetheless, concern has been expressed during the Committee Stage of the Bill at the creation of such a large arm's-length body as the one envisaged in ESA. If ever there was a time when we need clear understanding and scrutiny of the Budget process, it is when we have the creation of an organisation of the size and scale of ESA, as currently proposed.

The Committee has also sought access to the latest business case for ESA. However, that information has been relatively slow in coming from the Department. That information will inform us on the issues that I have raised. Members were told at Committee last week that much of the savings associated with ESA had already been made through the suppression of vacancies. It should also be remembered that, in 2006, the Department of Education brought into operation a vacancy control policy, which has never been amended. That is another reason why we are facing pressures in the system. Given the significant spending power proposed for ESA and the pressure on budgets generally, the Committee will be expecting more efficiencies from the new organisation, which, hopefully, will register in the Department's budget for 2014-15 and beyond.

There are a number of issues that I wanted to raise as a Member, including the issue of savings delivery plans.

The Executive and the Finance Minister have set out a plan, policy and procedure for Departments to align their budgets with the savings delivery plans, and it is incumbent on each Department to endeavour to fulfil that requirement. It is with grave disappointment and concern that I register that the one Department that has been failing on that issue is the Department of Education. The savings delivery plans and the way in which the budgets have been aligned are issues that will not be going away. The Committee and I, as a member of that Committee, will endeavour to ensure that the appropriate information is laid before the House.

Mr Cree: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the two Supply resolutions, which, as you have indicated, Mr Deputy Speaker, will be debated together. I also thank the Finance Minister for outlining some of the detail involved and the work that Departments have undoubtedly put into producing all these statistics. In particular, the spring Supplementary Estimates contain a lot of figures, and I am sure that it was no easy task to collate that information. However, that said, this time last year we were enthusiastically hoping that it would be the last year of having to deal with the current form of statistics.

The review of the financial process in Northern Ireland, which has been talked about for many years, would provide better read-across between published financial documents, enhanced transparency and improved Assembly scrutiny. The Committee for Finance and Personnel produced a report to improve the situation, which was welcomed by the Minister and approved by the House. Regrettably, that is still languishing in the Executive.

Budgets are spending plans for years and do not convey cash or resources to Departments, nor do they give authority to spend cash or use resources. That is done annually through the Estimates and the relevant Budget Bill. There are different figures in the Budget, the Estimates and the accounts. The Budget covers the wider public sector, including non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs), etc. Estimates and accounts relate to departmental levels. The Committee for Finance and Personnel took evidence from DFP officials on 30 January 2013. We would have liked more time and had not the opportunity to study the full Estimates, which were laid last week.

I now turn to the two motions before us. The Supply motion seeks the Assembly's approval of the Executive's final spending plans for 2012-13, as detailed in the SSEs that were laid before the Assembly on 4 February. The second motion requests interim resources and funding for the first few months of 2013-14, in the form of a Vote on Account. The spring Supplementary Estimates are mainly technical and tidy up the loose ends that have been dealt with in the various monitoring rounds.

I will now highlight a few concerns that I have with the monitoring rounds. The main difficulty is the amount of resources surrendered by Departments, particularly towards the year's end. That can be only as a result of bad budgeting in the beginning, failure to phase budgets properly or the handling of efficiency savings.

Let me give you some examples, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) had a decrease in net resource requirement of over £20 million and a decrease in net cash requirement of over £38 million. The Department of Education requested an additional £5 million in-year yet returned that the following quarter. What kind of strategic planning does that represent?

The Minister's own Department is carrying £1·227 million as a non-Budget item for the Special EU Programmes Body. I ask the Minister whether that is likely to be spent in-year or whether it is, indeed, outside the Budget exchange scheme. Provision of £30 million remains for the settlement of the equal pay claim. I know that there are current legal challenges, but can that sum be carried over into next year without penalty in the absence of some sort of settlement this financial year?

The January monitoring round provided reduced requirements of some £30 million resource expenditure and £12 million capital investment. That makes the Minister's job — to ensure that resources are used in the most advantageous and value-for-money manner — very difficult. Departments need to take more care in the planning and managing of their budget.

I turn now to the Vote on Account, which is needed to ensure that the flow of resources continues to Departments. The Minister has said that that is usually around 45% of the Budget. That is not an ideal situation, as we do not have the necessary detail to scrutinise it effectively. Let us hope that this is the last year in which that unsatisfactory procedure obtains and that, next year, we will have a clear, transparent and, dare I say, logical Budget exercise.

I will support both motions today.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá an-áthas orm páirt a ghlacadh sa díospóireacht seo. I am pleased to participate in the debate on the spring Supplementary Estimates, which, as has been stated already, reflect the changes that have occurred in departmental expenditure against the amounts originally set out in the approved Budget. The motion seeks the Assembly's approval of those changes, which reflect sums redistributed as a result of the in-year monitoring rounds. Once approved by the Assembly, the SSEs are given legislative authority by the Budget Bill.

Mr Cree mentioned the need for a review of the financial process to ensure a greater degree of transparency. The Vote on Account makes provision for a proportion of next year's proposed Budget — around 45% — to be allocated so that Departments do not run out of money.

There are a lot of figures in the Estimates, and it is difficult to drill down to the detail. Rather than oppose the motions, I think that a more constructive course of action might be to ask some questions about the figures. One aspect of the figures that I am interested in is the amount of money that comes in from capital asset realisation.

I have asked a number of questions about that and about the revenue-raising options that are open to the Executive, and I believe that there are three main areas: the regional rate, the RRI borrowing and capital receipts. The Budget for 2011-15 includes around £900 million of additional spend over the four-year period generated through those revenue-raising measures. That includes an additional spend of around £200 million from the regional rate increase, but there is also more than £440 million of capital receipts identified by Departments and an additional £100 million of capital receipts identified by the central asset management unit.

2.00 pm

Is the Minister in a position to outline where we are with those two aims? How much of the £440 million of capital receipts have we achieved to date, and how much of the £100 million of capital receipts identified by the central assets management unit? I have asked some Assembly questions on that.

At one stage, we were told that quite an amount was coming from DRD capital assets. I asked a question about that, and I think that the Minister referred at one stage to four revenue-generating assets that were sold by DRD. In response to my question, DRD said that it has, in fact, only sold one revenue-generating asset, which was a car park at Kent Street in Belfast. That sale realised £300,000, and the car park was actually sold to the Department for Social Development. One begins to wonder whether that is additional money coming into government or money that is in government and keeps moving around. Perhaps the Minister will explain and elucidate that area of the financial situation.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair)

I raised with the Minister during the January monitoring exercise in the House the issue of the £18 million that DETI had included in the Titanic signature project and which was refused by the EU. Is the Minister confident that that EU money is still available? Is he happy with the way in which DETI handled that whole debacle or is he inclined to investigate it? Will he send PEDU in to examine exactly what happened in that case?

Other revenue-raising options were apparently open to us. Belfast port was asked to contribute some £40 million. Has it contributed that £40 million? Will it contribute the £40 million? If not, why not? There was to be an £80 million contribution in respect of housing associations. I am reading that from a written answer that the Minister sent to me, and the words "there was to be" suggests to me that it did not actually happen. So, I have a question for the Minister specifically about the £80 million contribution from housing associations — have we received that, will we receive it or what exactly is the situation?

As well as that, there was to be a £12 million income from the new plastic bag levy. We are two years into the budgetary period and have not received anything from the new plastic bag levy. How much will we receive from that over the budget period? If these revenueraising options do not produce the money that they were originally intended to produce, what will the shortfall be? I remember that, at the beginning of the budgetary period, the possibility was for £1.5 billion to come from revenueraising options. The Minister then revised that to £786 million. That has now been increased to £900 million. That figure seems to fluctuate, and we need to know exactly what the situation is. If we are not to achieve the stated aim of raising £900 million over the four-year period, what will we achieve? If there is a shortfall, how will that impact on the numbers in the budget?

There are a number of other items that I would like to deal with, and time will probably not allow me to cover them all. I echo the point that Mr Storey made. My estimate is that the shortfall in the schools' maintenance budget is around £300 million, and that has been the case for quite a while. The Minister mentioned that some extra money will be forthcoming to the Department of Education to address some of those difficulties, but it seems to me that that is nothing more than a drop in the ocean of £300 million.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Bring your remarks to a close

Mr D Bradley: — efficiency savings? I see that the clock has beaten me to it, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for the time to contribute. Go raibh céad maith agat.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): First, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I wish you and Members a happy Chinese new year: Kung Hay Fat Choy.

I welcome the opportunity to outline the Environment Committee's views on this motion. DOE's budget is not large in comparison with those of some other Departments, but this does not make it any less important, and it actually means that even small reductions can have a major impact. The Committee gave its support to DOE's proposed budget at the start of the year and welcomed the general direction of expenditure and priorities. Members accepted that constraints and prioritisation were unavoidable due to the required cuts, and they recognised that the ongoing decline in receipts from planning application fees was adding to the pressures being faced by DOE.

Staffing difficulties in DOE's planning division continue to concern the Committee. When income from planning application fees drops, as it continues to do, the impact falls directly on staff. The uncertainty that that generates among planners is being exacerbated further by the as yet unknown impact of the proposals to devolve planning functions to local authorities. This makes it a very difficult time for those affected, and the Committee is mindful of that, but also aware that DOE needs to ensure that robust and effective planning functions continue.

The Committee, therefore, welcomed the introduction of a voluntary redundancy scheme for planners under the Executive's invest-to-save scheme. The Committee supported DOE's bid to secure funds for it, and I hope that the scheme is managed effectively to address current planning function needs, with an eye on future changes. The scheme must not be short-changed, even if other priorities come to the fore.

The Committee is also very supportive of DOE's scheme of emergency financial assistance to district councils. The one-off payment to households that suffered exceptional inconvenience proved a lifeline for many during the several flooding events last year. However, on learning that significant flooding events have occurred every year, except one, since 2007, the Committee stressed the urgent need to address the underlying causes of flooding, where it happens repeatedly and regularly, rather than continuing to treat each occasion as a one-off emergency. No doubt, the money is a godsend to those receiving it at the time, but handing out funding in that way, year after year, is not a smart or sustainable way to address the problem. Those in receipt of the money would much prefer that their homes did not flood at all. Small, piecemeal funding is a very short-sighted approach to a long-term problem.

The Committee is also concerned about the use of revenue raised by the single-use bag levy. The scheme will come into force in a couple of months' time, and we must ensure that it delivers for the environment by changing people's behaviour. If the introduction of the levy leads to less money for DOE, that will be a sign of its success. It must not mean that DOE's obligations to the environment, such as river basin management, can no longer be properly funded.

I must also mention the Committee's concerns about the ongoing need for proper enforcement, whether it is enforcing the proper management of waste; ensuring the implementation of measures introduced to improve the road safety of goods vehicles; checking that taxi drivers are properly licensed for the safety of their passengers; or even just ensuring that planning happens where and how it should. Legislation is only as good as the measures that are put in place and properly funded to enforce it, and DOE must have the necessary resources to make sure that this happens.

Less clear-cut to the Committee is what DOE is doing to finance the local government reform process. Through the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA), councils have made it very clear to the Committee that they feel that central government should carry some of the burden of the reorganisation. The Committee is aware that DOE has now made several bids in subsequent monitoring rounds to fund reform. All were unsuccessful. I am sure that everyone in the Committee is, like me, keen that the reform process progresses, but until we see the detail of the resources requested and why and when they are needed, it is difficult for the Committee to lend its support to these bids. The Committee wants clarification of the amount needed from central government and the rationale for the figures being suggested.

The Committee has been largely supportive of DOE's bids during the past year and, in considering the Vote on Account, stresses the importance of making sure that the necessary funds continue to be made available to the Department so that it can continue to deliver its programmes and conduct its functions effectively.

On behalf of the Environment Committee, I support the motion.

2.15 pm

Mr Girvan: I speak in favour of the Supply resolution for the 2012-13 Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account, and the DUP supports both.

I appreciate that we are making a spend of £15·45 billion for cash and around £16·572 billion for resource. I, too, think that we have an issue with regard to the financial process review and the implementation of that review, and Leslie Cree referred to that earlier. I appreciate that it takes an Executive decision to give us the transparency that we require when we look across the lines. That might not be available for next year, but let us hope that that is a work in progress and that we can get that transparency. When you look at the large block of spend of over £4 billion for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety with very little detail included, it is extremely difficult to read across and see where it goes. We have also had some difficulty in receiving information on spend from the Department of Education. We have heard about problems: the programme maintenance budget has not necessarily got the money that it requires for next time. We need to have more information on the accounts, rather than block headings that hide a multitude of other things. Too much has been given away to the Department to spend without it having to give a detailed breakdown of where that spend is going.

The Minister mentioned the exact mechanism that will allow us to make the spend. We approve the Budget, hopefully in June this year. I understand that there is a certain amount of overlap. The 45% equates to £7·136 billion cash and £7·64 billion resource. Information on the monitoring rounds has been coming through better than in previous years. Those Departments that identify shortfalls and release funds early allow the Minister to make adjustments and identify where that spend can be made.

Some people mentioned issues around Barnett. We welcomed an additional £30 million that we received from Barnett. Some people might be more encouraged by the fact that the Chair of the Committee mentioned other aspects, such as tax-raising powers. Some of us have severe reservations about going down that route in some areas, so I will reserve judgement on that matter.

There are areas where funds are being brought back to the centre through monitoring rounds and are not being allocated. Historically, I know that money has had to be given back to Treasury because some Departments did not volunteer it back early enough so that spend could be made. I am happy to say that that did not happen last year. I am hopeful that we will not have the same issue this year and that we can make the spend. A number of projects do not necessarily make the running. For example, there has been a delay on the A5 project and, as a consequence, that money has had to be reallocated during the year.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I also support both resolutions before us today. I thank the Minister for outlining the context and purpose of the resolutions and the importance of providing to Departments the certainty so that they can proceed to continue to roll out the Programme for Government commitments.

The Minister, in setting out the constraints and advising people against adventurism in respect of setting out their wish list, reflects that if we were to be perfectly honest, the discussion that we can have is very limited. Members have recognised that although the process that we have devised within the constraints on the budgeting process can always be improved, it effectively works. The monitoring round process allows the Departments to work in a sensible and mature way, and over the past number of mandates, you can see that improving. Reference was made to developing better financial forecasting and projections. To give credit where it is due, I think that that has also improved quite significantly.

There is a debate around the efficiency delivery programme about whether we are talking about cuts in front line services or genuine efficiencies. I know that there has been an attempt by the Minister, and I am certain that that has been replicated across the Departments, to ensure that we are getting more services, or the same services that we had, and that it is not a case of getting fewer services for less money. If people are delivering on efficiencies, we should proclaim that, but we have to recognise that the ability to address the issues in a strategic way would mean a budget process that reflects what that term means, as opposed to what an Administration might do with a fixed sum of money. I would like some assurance from the Minister today that he is taking some interest in the discussions that are ongoing in the Administrations in Scotland and Wales. They are beginning to explore the potential, and there is probably considerable benefit in the respective Finance Ministers exchanging notes and experience on that.

Having said all that, I think that the officials have satisfied the Committee's concerns. I am not speaking on behalf of the Committee but as a member of the Committee. They took on all our questions and responded, and, when necessary, they provided further information to the extent that I believe that, within the limits that I have mentioned - I am not going to stray beyond the boundaries of this discussion — our approach is correct. There have been one or two references to the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. Fair enough, if those wrinkles are there, they should be resolved. I hope that our Committee might be of some assistance if the particular difficulties can be explained to us. As the Minister has previously acknowledged, it was the Finance Committee that developed the discussion and a proposition which, in fairness, he responded to.

If we look at some of the key strategic reforms that we have undertaken, such as the RPA and the Education and Skills Authority (ESA), we know that they take too long. We have made those decisions, and if that can be translated into efficiency savings or investment to save, you would include everything from planning processes across the board. The recent controversy over John Lewis indicates that there is work to be done there as well, and perhaps at some stage somebody will start to analyse the opportunity cost to our economy here.

However, I think that there should be no difficulty in people supporting these propositions that allow the Departments to get on with their work. The Budget Bill will provide the necessary authority. People may think about the next Budget round and how we would approach it differently, with a more proactive approach to how we can control our finances and amend the type of spending policies that we develop. On that basis, I support both resolutions.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As Question Time begins at 2.30 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until that time. The debate will continue after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Mr Adrian McQuillan.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Questions 2 and 4 have been withdrawn and require written answers.

Public Appointments

1. Mr Elliott asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what action they intend to take to review the process of public appointments. (AQO 3343/11-15)

Mr P Robinson (The First Minister): The deputy First Minister and I have responsibility for public appointment policy and for making appointments to the boards of public bodies sponsored by our Department. Individual Ministers are responsible for making appointments to the public bodies sponsored by their respective Departments. An exception to this rule is the Police Ombudsman, whose appointment rests with the deputy First Minister and me but whose office is sponsored by the Department of Justice.

As part of our policy remit, the deputy First Minister and I appoint the independent Commissioner for Public Appointments, who has a statutory responsibility to publish a code of practice for public appointments and to audit departmental policies and practices to establish whether that code of practice is being observed. The commissioner publishes his findings in the form of audit reports. He has an important role to play in enhancing and sustaining public confidence in the appointments process by holding Ministers and their Departments to account.

Public appointments policy and the commissioner's code of practice are governed by the overarching principle of selection on merit. Ministerial public appointments are, therefore, made in accordance with relevant legislation, public appointments policy and, where applicable, the code of practice published by the independent Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Following the findings of the Fair Employment Tribunal in the case of Lennon v the Department for Regional Development and criticism from the commissioner that some departmental appointment processes had failed to fully comply with his code of practice, a cross-departmental working group of officials is looking at how compliance with the code can be improved and public confidence further enhanced.

Mr Elliott: I thank the First Minister for that background information. Have there been any detailed discussions with the Commissioner for Public Appointments about how that process may be taken forward to see whether Ministers abide by the code and principles that are already in place? Have the First Minister and deputy First Minister recommended any review of either the appointment process or, indeed, the appointment of those who are already in place?

Mr P Robinson: First of all, the deputy First Minister and I are absolutely determined that the process should fully take account of the recommendations and proposals that come from the independent commissioner. It was on foot of his recommendations that the cross-departmental working group was set up. We will look closely at the recommendations that come forward from that group and ensure that Ministers uphold them. This is a matter of public confidence. The public have to be satisfied that people are appointed to public bodies on the basis of expertise, experience and, indeed, the merit that their application holds. At the same time, there are some public bodies where there is a further requirement, which is that, as far as it is practicable, the board as a whole or the commissioners as a whole, whichever the case may be, are representative of the community.

Mr Dunne: I understand that two areas of inequality in appointments are in the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission. What can be done to address those imbalances?

Mr P Robinson: In those two cases, strangely enough, there is an unusual situation in that, although responsibility for pay and rations and, indeed, public policy on those matters rests with the devolved Administration, the appointment of the chief commissioner and commissioners falls to the Secretary of State in the Northern Ireland Office. The deputy First Minister and I recognise that anomaly, and I believe that we have both asked the Secretary of State to look at that issue and to pass the handling of those appointments to the devolved Administration. She could, of course, do that as part of the legislation that she intends to introduce this year.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. Given that many of the existing quangos were established in the period of direct rule, will the First Minister outline the number of such quangos, the number of appointees currently in post and any time frame for a fundamental review of all the quangos?

Mr P Robinson: Taking those in reverse, I can tell her that there is a review at present. We have an ad hoc group that is looking at whether we can reduce the number of quangos, whether some of the functions of those quangos can be taken into Departments or, indeed, whether some of the quangos, as she refers to them, can be merged. That work is ongoing, and it is something that we and each Minister will look at.

Most of the quangos will have representation that has changed over a period, so very few of them will have their original representation. I think that something like 300 or 350 positions in public appointments are changed each year. To be accurate, I believe that 1,634 public appointments are held, or at least there were in the last figures that I saw. That changes on a fairly regular basis, but I doubt very much whether there are any appointees from direct rule who have not been replaced. Of course, it is possible that appointees from direct rule have been reappointed by devolved Ministers.

Mr Eastwood: Can the First Minister give an update on the long overdue appointment process for the vacant llex board positions and the chief executive position?

Mr P Robinson: We went out to public advertising for those posts and received a number of applications. After officials had carried out the sifting process, it was the general view that there was not sufficient choice for the deputy First Minister and I to move forward. Therefore, we are going to advertise again, if we have not already. I hope that there will be public interest and that people will put their name forward for the important positions of chair and board members of llex. It is a work in progress.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 2 has been withdrawn.

Executive Ministers

3. Mr Allister asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they have considered asking Ministers in the Executive to reveal the truth about their involvement with the past. (AQO 3345/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: Our statutory role as co-chairs of the Executive Committee confers no authority on us to require the disclosure of such information from any Minister. However, we expect all Ministers to act in conformity with the ministerial code, the Pledge of Office and the seven principles of public life.

Mr Allister: The First Minister can do better than that, surely. Does he recognise that a major problem attached to dealing with the past is the prevalent belief that the IRA will never tell the truth about the past? Therefore, does he agree that it would be a significant confidence-building measure if the terrorists whom he sustains in government were to publicly tell the truth about their past, instead of, for example, the deputy First Minister trying to pretend to us all that he mysteriously left the IRA in the 1970s?

Mr P Robinson: Of course we want everybody, whether a Member of the Assembly or a Minister in the Executive, to tell the truth. If he feels the way that he does, I am left wondering why he put forward a preference for a voluntary coalition with Sinn Féin when he did, rather than going forward with a mandatory coalition, as we do. However, anybody who has information about people's involvement in the past should give it to the PSNI. We firmly believe that everyone should be equal under the law and equally subject to it, no matter what their role in society may be.

Mr Campbell: The First Minister is a Minister without a terrorist past, but can he confirm that, if and when he is in the capital of the Irish Republic at a formal event — promoting jobs in Northern Ireland, for example — and there is a toast to the president of that country, he would stay and toast the president, unlike what happened at a recent event in London when the deputy First Minister did not?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Remember, the supplementary question has to be about the question.

Mr P Robinson: There should be nothing in anyone's past that should put them in a position where they fail to respect, tolerate and understand the protocols that are involved. Certainly, when in the Irish Republic, I have to recognise and respect its head of state. Indeed, I went to the inauguration of the new head of state of the Irish Republic.

Mr McDevitt: Given that reconciliation is a devolved matter and that truth and reconciliation are two sides of the same coin, will the First Minister today join me in calling on the two Governments and all parties in the House to sit down soon to develop an ethical basis on which to deal with our past?

Mr P Robinson: We have had discussions about how we handle the past. There is a recognition that, if we had had to agree on the past or our goals for the future before we set up this Administration, it is unlikely that this Administration would have been set up. This Administration was set up very much because we want to have a peaceful future for the people of Northern Ireland with a stable political administration.

It is vital that we deal with issues of the past. We do that through the considerable funding that we give to victims' organisations, and we have done it by recommending that it would be appropriate for us to build into the new peace and conflict resolution centre at the Maze some storytelling facility so that victims, without the harassment of cross-examination by lawyers, can tell their story and indicate the hurt that it has caused them and the effect that it has had on their life. I am not sure — I have certainly not had any indication — that there is agreement around the Chamber, never mind outside — not even in the victims' sector — on any one way of dealing with the past. In the absence of that overall agreement, we have to get the highest possible level of agreement. That is one of the issues that is outstanding for the cohesion, sharing and integration (CSI) strategy. I hope that the parties will look at the level of agreement that it is possible for us to get now, no matter what their aspirations might be for future agreements.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for his answers so far and the manner in which he is approaching this very difficult issue. He described the impasse. Does he agree, especially given the upcoming 15th anniversary of the Good Friday Agreement, that we need to make sure that dealing with the past is done not only in a sensitive and inclusive manner —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: — but in a way that recognises that all suffering and grief has equal validity?

Mr P Robinson: One has only to talk to some of the victims' groups and some people who clearly are victims but have not associated themselves with any of the groups to see the impact that the very long period of the Troubles has had on their life and the lives of their families. It is up to us, as an Assembly and Executive, to do whatever we can to reduce, as far as is possible, the difficulties that they face in their daily life as a result. Nothing, of course, can replace loved ones or make up for the very considerable injuries that have been caused. We live in a very small and closed community. Over 3,000 people have been murdered and over 30,000 people have been maimed and mutilated. That indicates that victims are throughout our society and that very few people have not been in close contact with those who have been hurt, injured or killed. In that kind of society, we need not only to look after the victims but give them hope for the future. I hope that the Executive can do that by showing that there is a better way than violence and that having a shared future is the future for Northern Ireland.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 4 has been withdrawn.

Sexual Orientation Strategy

5. Mr Dickson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister when the sexual orientation strategy will be published. (AQO 3347/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will ask my colleague junior Minister Jonathan Bell to answer the question.

Mr Bell (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): We remain committed to publishing a sexual orientation strategy. Work is ongoing in the Department to publish a consultation document. The sexual orientation strategy will be published once the consultation process has been completed.

2.45 pm

Mr Dickson: You have to accept, junior Minister, that it is now six years since you published the original strategy and that, in fact, you or your predecessor promised the House that we would have the strategy delivered to the House by the end of December 2012. This is now February 2013.

Mr Bell: As I said, the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister remains committed to publishing a sexual orientation strategy. Junior Minister McCann and I, along with officials from the Department, continue to engage with many from the LGBT sector in regular meetings, and I will bring that consultation document and strategy to the House as soon as I can.

Mr Nesbitt: I remind the junior Minister of his words to the House on 17 September last:

"confirmation to have that draft ready and out for consultation by the end of 2012." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 77, p107, col 2].

Can he explain what has led to this slippage?

Mr Bell: We remain committed to publishing the strategy. The nature of the office is that we need to seek agreement. We continue to work with many people in the sector and continue, with our officials, to work through. We have to gain that agreement to bring the strategy to the House, and, when we can, we will do so.

Mr I McCrea: Can the junior Minister confirm that, following last week's vote in the House of Commons, there are no plans to change the definition of marriage in Northern Ireland?

Mr Bell: Yes, I can: there are no plans to legislate to change the definition of marriage in Northern Ireland. I have said in the House before that I believe that marriage is between a man and a woman. I say, equally, that I am against all forms of homophobia. I recognise the innate dignity and worth of every human being, whatever their sexual orientation, and I will continue to act and the office will continue to act against any form of homophobic bullying that exists in society. It is wrong and should not occur.

As far as your specific question is concerned, you will be aware that the House had a motion before it about marriage between people of the same sex. That motion was defeated by the Assembly on 1 October 2012. It is not an issue that is under active consideration, and we will not bring forward any proposals to redefine marriage in legislation.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Will the Minister comment on reports from the LGBT sector that his party — the DUP — has been dragging its feet in relation to the publication of a credible sexual orientation strategy for a number of years and is hostile to the sector's receiving equality of treatment?

Mr Bell: As I said, my party and I neither hate nor fear anybody of an L, G, B or T orientation. Therefore, by that definition, we cannot be homophobic, and we are not hostile to anybody.

Cohesion, Sharing and Integration Strategy

6. Ms Brown asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline the time frame for the publication of the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy. (AQO 3348/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: We remain committed to building a united and shared community by continuing to improve good relations across our society. Since devolution in 2007, we have significantly increased the funding available for good relations. This supports valuable work on the ground across hundreds of projects, building relationships and tackling sectarianism. Bringing forward a robust good relations strategy with a clear framework for action is a critical part of achieving our vision of a better future for everyone in supporting this work. We recognise the importance of translating the Executive's commitment into clear, meaningful action. Work on developing the strategy is at an advanced stage and will continue in the context of recent events, with a view to providing the most credible basis for the publication of CSI. The working group has concluded its current work, and the resultant draft document, along with a small number of key issues requiring further consideration, has been sent to us for discussion with party leaders.

Ms Brown: I thank the First Minister for his answer. What was his reaction when he heard the Alliance Party's proposal that he should establish an all-party working group to deal with these issues?

Mr P Robinson: That is tempting. I suppose that, if you want it in one word, it would be "incredulity". It is hard to fathom how the Alliance Party could walk away from and boycott an all-party group that was set up to deal with these matters and to get consensus among the political parties and, having done that, propose that we set up a group to try to reach consensus on these matters. It is an inconsistent position, and it is particularly inconsistent coming from a party that was set up on the basis of wanting to have consensus politics.

Any political party in the Chamber could walk away and come up with its version of what a cohesion, sharing and integration strategy might look like; it would be very easy for us to do that from our own positions. The real difficulty is in getting consensus across the community and all the political parties on how me might move forward. I am glad that some parties still want to carry out that work and have not walked away from the difficult task of reaching consensus.

Mr Lyttle: Is the First Minister willing to reflect on his party members' involvement in the distribution of thousands of leaflets that incorrectly referred to the Union flag being ripped down?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The question must relate to the original.

Mr Lyttle: I am coming to the point. What impact has that had on cohesion, sharing and integration in this society?

Mr P Robinson: There will be people right across Northern Ireland who will find it difficult to understand why the Alliance Party would put its hand to changing a settled status quo in Belfast City Council with the resultant difficulties we have all had to face. They then try to tell us that it is somehow a compromise to fly a flag on one building in the city council area for 18 days a year and not at all on two other buildings. How is that a compromise from all three buildings flying a flag 365 days a year?

I hope that the Member and his colleagues will reflect on the issue and perhaps recognise the damage they have caused by aligning themselves with Sinn Féin and the SDLP. The next time a vote of a similar character comes to any council, I trust that they will think of the consequences of their actions, rather than simply try to cosy up to Sinn Féin and the SDLP.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that all supplementary questions must relate to the original question, which was on the CSI strategy.

Mr Hussey: An important element of any CSI document should be the issues of parades and protests. Will the First Minister advise what work is being undertaken by his Department in advance of this year's marching season to ensure a safe and peaceful summer?

Mr P Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I have had a series of conversations on the subject with each other, other Ministers, the Secretary of State and the police. We have also talked to party leaders and have indicated that we want to bring them together. We had hoped to do that last week, but there was a difficulty with one party leader's schedule. It is our hope that we can look at the outstanding issues, which, I think, everybody now knows are flags, parades and the past.

Mr Dallat: Although many will wish to wash their hands of guilt for what has happened in the recent past, does the Minister agree with me that the events on the streets have sent a loud and clear message that a strategy for cohesion, sharing and integration is absolutely critical and the time for dilly-dallying is over?

Mr P Robinson: Yes, and I hope that we will get cooperation from the SDLP as we seek to bring it forward. It is essential that we have as wide a buy-in as possible from the political parties in the Chamber. When the leaders meet to deal with the issue, I hope that we will have a cooperative spirit from all the political parties there.

The strategy has an important role to play. However, I do not overstate the case, because there are literally hundreds, if not thousands, of projects on the ground where good relations work is ongoing. It is always easy for the press to pick up on where there is discontent or disorder, but it pays little attention to the thousands, indeed tens of thousands, of people who, every day, as part of their life, attempt to encourage good relations at every level of our society. So I trust that that was an indication from the SDLP that it will play a full part in getting an agreed cohesion, sharing and integration strategy.

Peace IV

7. Mr Hamilton asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on a possible Peace IV fund, following their recent visit to Brussels. (AQO 3349/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I travelled to Brussels as negotiations to conclude an agreement on the EU Budget for 2014-2020 entered a critical stage. We used the opportunity to raise issues important to Northern Ireland at the highest levels in the European Union. At the European Council on 7 and 8 February, European heads of state agreed the multiannual financial framework of approximately €900 billion. This Budget sets out headline funding for many areas of significant importance to our economy, such as the common agricultural policy; research and development funding; and structural funds, including the Peace programme.

One of the issues that required our presence in Brussels was to make a final push to ensure inclusion of financial provisions for a possible Peace IV fund. We raised the issue at a number of high-level meetings, including with the president of the Parliament and the president of the Council. Our request received a positive response and built on the considerable efforts already made on the issue. I am pleased, therefore, to be able to indicate that the current position is that provision has been included for €150 million for a Peace IV programme in the draft that is before the European Parliament, which must give its approval. It is a significant step forward, and we will continue to work with the European Parliament to secure a final agreement.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the First Minister for his positive news on a Peace IV programme. Was the important issue of Northern Ireland's regional aid status raised during his visit?

Mr P Robinson: Yes. During the visit, the deputy First Minister and I met not only the two presidents, as outlined in my original answer, but also three European commissioners. During all those meetings, we raised the issue of regional aid, which is very important from a Northern Ireland point of view. Regional aid provides us with the opportunity to take away some of the detriment caused by the differential in rates of corporation tax in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. If they take away our ability to apply regional aid to encourage investors to come into Northern Ireland, we would be at a distinct disadvantage. My understanding at the meetings that we held was that the commissioners were sympathetic to that point of view. Ultimately, of course, it will be for the final negotiations to determine whether we are entered as a footnote in the documentation that comes forward, which would allow us to have regional aid right across Northern

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the First Minister confirm whether both the Irish and the British Governments lobbied on our behalf for the new Peace funds, given David Cameron's opposition in the EU Budget discussions to increased spending?

Mr P Robinson: Several levels of negotiation take place. It is fair to say that the United Kingdom Government found themselves in a difficult position — one might say, "Hoist by their own petard" — in that they were asking for a reduction in the Budget and therefore found it difficult to ask for an increase by applying for Peace IV funds. The Irish Government consistently argued the case for a fourth tranche of Peace funding, but Her Majesty's Government made it fairly clear at each level that they would not resist any such proposal. Although the draft that was passed has provision for €150 million, the new protocols require the proposal to go to the European Parliament, and it will be for it to decide how that vote is to be taken. There has been some indication that the vote may even be taken by way of a secret vote. I would be less confident that it would be passed in those circumstances than if there were an open vote in the Parliament. Certainly, however, when we talked to the president, he was reasonably confident that, if it was agreed by the Commission, it would be passed at the next step — the Parliament — perhaps with some minor adjustments.

Social Development

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 9 has been withdrawn and requires a written answer.

Social Housing: Rent and Arrears

1. Mr Allister asked the Minister for Social Development what are the implications for rent levels and existing arrears when housing associations take over Housing Executive properties. (AQO 3358/11-15)

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):

This is the beginning of a process of discussion and deliberation on the reform of social housing, and it is too early to speculate on the implications. We have a situation in which £1 billion worth of urgent work needs to be done on Housing Executive properties, and we do not have that sort of money at the moment. I believe that, with a new system, we will have the flexibility and the resources to deliver good value housing of a high standard for the people of Northern Ireland.

Annual rent increases have been a feature of social housing over many years, and are necessary to maintain standards. It is expected that future rent levels will be better aligned to planned investment and funding requirements. There should be a closer convergence between Housing Executive and housing association rent levels over a period of time. However, I also want to ensure that tenants are protected from any excessive or unaffordable rent increases. That is why I am proposing that an independent social housing rent panel is established, which will agree annual rent levels based around a fiscal rental policy that will be subject to Assembly scrutiny.

I will work with my officials to define the policy and framework within which the new rent advisory panel will work to achieve that. This is the start of a process to reform social housing and develop a sustainable financial model. It is too early in the process to discuss details of existing arrears with the Housing Executive and potential transfer of arrears to a bespoke housing association.

Mr Allister: My constituents and, indeed, the Minister's constituents who are Housing Executive tenants know that rent levels under housing associations tend to be higher. Therefore, there is a natural fear, given the direction of travel that the Minister is indicating, that the direction of travel for their rent is going to be upwards. I do not think he has said anything today that will disabuse anyone of that view. Is the fact that there are large Housing Executive arrears going to impact? Indeed, what is the present scale of Housing Executive arrears, and what is going to happen to them?

Mr McCausland: If you compare many Housing Executive properties with housing association properties, you will see that many of the Housing Executive properties certainly in the case of my own constituency, and I assume it may be the case in the Member's constituency — are of an older type of housing. They are houses that go back to maybe the 1950s or 1960s, and which may well have a lower rent at the present time. However, when you compare those houses with the more modern houses built by the housing associations, look at the energy efficiency of the newer housing. Look at the savings in those houses around energy costs. It seems to me that, often, when you work it out — I have spoken to a number of constituents about this — you find that the amount that they would be spending on any additional rental costs would be more than compensated for by the reduction in the cost of heating the home.

I have been looking at some particular estates recently where the quality of the older housing is such because there has been so little done in maintenance, even in the houses that were built back in the 1950s and 1960s, particularly the 1950s and early 1960s, which were built post-war. They were built quickly to get housing built at a time of need, but they were built in a style and of a standard that is very poor and very energy inefficient. The people in those houses would benefit significantly from having a more modern house.

Bear in mind that the Rinmore estate in Londonderry was the first example of transfer to a housing association. Yes; in that case, tenants were subjected to increased rent, but they virtually got a brand new house, which is much easier to heat. They are therefore making significant savings on their fuel costs, which is practically offsetting the rent increase. That is the evidence from the first example that was brought forward.

The situation as regards transfer of stock to housing associations —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Time is up.

Mr McCausland: — is something that we still have to work through at the moment. We are starting a process.

Mr McQuillan: What are the current proposals for the Housing Executive's stock transfer programme?

Mr McCausland: The current programme of stock transfer started off with the Rinmore scheme in Londonderry. In conjunction with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, my officials are currently finalising a stock transfer programme that will see almost 2,500 Housing Executive properties transferring to the housing association movement. The programme will take place in a number of tranches, with the first tranche of 675 properties in 19 locations commencing in 2013-14. A second tranche of 922 properties in 19 locations and a third tranche of 798 properties in 22 locations will follow on from that.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I remind the Minister that there are houses in his constituency that were built in the 60s, 70s and 80s and are lying derelict, which people could move into.

The Minister is aware that there is no agreement at all as to what structures may replace the Housing Executive, and I am concerned about his position on rent alignment. Will he assure us that future rent increases will be dealt with within a public policy framework?

Mr McCausland: I have stated categorically that tenants should be protected from any excessive or unaffordable rent increases. That is the reason behind setting up an independent social housing rent panel, while the overall approach to rental policy would be subject to Assembly scrutiny.

Welfare Reform Bill: Underoccupancy

2. Mr Boylan asked the Minister for Social Development for his assessment of the underoccupancy proposals in the Welfare Reform Bill in relation to possible evictions. (AQO 3359/11-15)

Mr McCausland: In recognising that the underoccupation restriction, commonly known as the bedroom tax, is a serious issue for Northern Ireland, it must be remembered that the coalition Government at Westminster have brought forward these proposals and, in keeping with the principle of parity, we are largely compelled to do the same. However, in order to help those people who are affected through the transition, I intend to put in place housing services that will provide support and assistance to those who are impacted. I have tasked the Housing Executive and the housing association movement with bringing forward an action plan, which I expect to receive shortly, that will provide a range of support measures to mitigate and support those households that are affected.

My priority remains to do all that I can to prevent evictions and tenants being declared homeless. I have asked social landlords to ensure that, as far as possible, all options are explored to prevent social tenants from being evicted from their homes. In addition, further support for the various groups of people who may be affected, such as those with children who have grown up and moved on, may be available, for example, by way of discretionary housing payments.

The housing benefit reform changes have identified the potential for stock mismatch and the need for tenant mobility. That has been recognised, and it is proposed that, from 2013-14, a target for smaller units will be delivered through the social housing development programme. Social landlords are asked to consider whether there are opportunities to bring forward smaller-sized accommodation, through newbuild schemes or reconfiguration, which will increase their stock of smaller accommodation or one-bedroom units in those designated areas of particular need.

I should also point out that, at the start of the current year, when the social housing development programme was brought forward, I challenged the Housing Executive on that issue and on the fact that account had not been taken of welfare reform and the need for smaller properties.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr McCausland: That issue has been with us for a long time, but we are resolving it.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for his answer, but given the historical circumstances in the North and the lack of housing stock, when will the proposals be introduced? Does he seriously think that they can be implemented?

Mr McCausland: The Member speaks about the historical situation. Unfortunately, in the past, the social housing development programme did not take account of the situation, even though people knew for a while that changes were coming. Indeed, a better range of accommodation should have been provided in the social housing development programme over quite a number of years.

We are looking at measures that will be brought forward fairly soon. I believe that those measures will go a long way towards addressing the issue. However, it is a problem not of our making. This has been introduced by the Conservative-Lib Dem coalition Government so is effectively being foisted on us. We cannot shake our heads and hope that it will go away. We cannot just pretend that it will go away. It faces us and confronts us directly. We must look at what is possible, which is what I am trying to do at the moment.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a chuid freagraí. I listened very carefully to the Minister's suggestion about the need for smaller accommodation to ensure that people do not fall into the pitfalls associated with the worst excesses of welfare reform. Will he provide us with some detail of his discussions with the housing association movement? What stipulations is his Department imposing to ensure that that type of accommodation is provided in areas where the worst excesses of welfare reform will kick in?

Mr McCausland: I have said that action should have been taken on this over a number of years. It should not simply have been left until this stage when welfare reform is directly upon us. We have known for a while that it is coming, which is why, at the start of the financial year, I directly challenged the Housing Executive, which brings forward the social housing development programme. I pointed out that it was a failure and shortcoming on its part that it did not build into its social housing development programme appropriate accommodation in the light of welfare reform.

When I simply asked officials whether they had taken account of it and the answer was no, I was obviously very much concerned. Housing Executive officials should have taken account of that. I subsequently called in the housing associations and the Housing Executive and spoke to them about trying to beef up and strengthen the amount of work that is being done on newbuilds and also about making sure that special account is taken of the need for smaller units

The issue is very much on my mind, and I have been talking to the Housing Executive about it. The Housing Executive is in a better place than it was a number of months ago. We have a new chair, a new vice-chair and a good chief executive. We are in a much better place than we were previously.

Ms Brown: Will the Minister outline what measures are being considered to mitigate the impacts of underoccupancy legislation?

Mr McCausland: As I said, I am committed to tackling the bedroom tax through building more homes and providing help, advice and support to those seeking to downsize. A telephone contact centre and housing advice service will be put in place to raise tenant awareness and to contact the social tenants affected to help them to consider their housing options. We also look across the water to see what is being done in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Measures will include promoting and assisting tenant mobility; helping tenants to move to more appropriately sized housing; where possible, supporting tenants in paying their rent; examining options that can be put to tenants who need to move to a smaller home; facilitating home swaps; and advising on how to take in lodgers or joint tenants. Other initiatives under way include increasing the provision of additional one-bedroom stock. My Department has also asked all social landlords to review their rent arrears policies.

It needs to be emphasised again that this is being imposed directly by the coalition Government. It is being foisted on us, and, therefore, we have to do what we can. I believe that the measures that I am taking will help.

Mr Agnew: The Minister mentioned discretionary housing payments as a measure that could help to mitigate the effects of the bedroom tax. Will he outline the criteria for those and whether he has any plans to widen the criteria or increase the budget?

Mr McCausland: I am sure that the Member will be aware that I announced an increase in the budget. I see the Member nodding, so he is conscious of that. The amount has been trebled, so it is clear that we have made a substantial increase. If there is a need to do more, we will certainly look at that. At the moment, however, it seems that the amount that has been set aside in discretionary housing benefit is adequate. The trebling of the amount in recent years has gone a long way, and that will continue. There will be a higher level for a number of years.

The key word is "discretionary", and we will certainly keep a close watch on how it is implemented. It is being done to address particular real and genuine need, which is the right sort of approach.

3.15 pm

Belfast City Centre: Regeneration

3. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister for Social Development what proposals and time frame are in place to address dereliction in Belfast city centre and help regeneration. (AQO 3360/11-15)

Mr McCausland: My Department has a strong track record in the regeneration of Belfast city centre. During the past decade, the Department for Social Development (DSD) began the process of reversing 30 years of underinvestment with developments such as the £400 million of private sector investment at Victoria Square and the £28 million public investment in the renewal of 14 of the main shopping streets.

I have set my Department a challenging agenda for further significant regeneration measures over the coming years. Those will include the Royal Exchange scheme in the north-east quarter of Belfast city centre, which has the potential to bring 3,000 jobs and private investment of over £360 million to help to remove dereliction and bring Belfast to its proper place as a modern, competitive and attractive city. The Bank Square renewal scheme will commence on site by June this year, with an investment of £4·4 million by the Executive to deliver more high-quality public space.

I will shortly be announcing the commencement of a design commission for the third phase of the Belfast Streets Ahead public realm renewal programme, focusing on Royal Avenue and York Street and going out to the proposed new University of Ulster campus on York Street. Later this month, I will also announce proposals for bringing forward development sites in the north side of the city centre that aim to attract private investment to complement the investment that the University of Ulster is making.

Those are some of the main items of work that my Department will be bringing forward over the short to medium term, together with our ongoing focus on the promotion of the city centre and my commitment to tackling disadvantage and housing-led regeneration across Northern Ireland. I fully expect the support of the House when I make the case for resources at the next spending review.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Will he give an update on the redevelopment work in the Castle Street area?

Mr McCausland: I think that the Member is referring to the West Side master plan. The Bank Square regeneration project represents the first step towards the implementation of the regeneration plans for the west side/greater Castle Street area of the city centre. My Department will also be publishing a development brief for a site on Bank Street, which was highlighted as a key development opportunity in the West Side master plan, before 31 March. Further opportunities are dependent on securing private developers to invest in the renewal of that area and obtaining statutory planning approval for individual schemes that are outlined in the plan. My Department will carefully consider the timing of bringing the proposals in the master plan to the market, given the downturn in funding for the property development sector.

Mr Cree: The Minister referred to the York Street scheme. Has he had discussions about the delay in processing that major redevelopment with his colleague the Minister of the Environment?

Mr McCausland: Quite a number of representations have been made to the Minister of the Environment about the planning application for the University of Ulster campus. Given that it will be one of the major changes in the north side of the city centre, I noticed that Belfast City Council has appointed an all-party delegation to urge the case for the development going forward. It will transform that whole area.

I have not pressed the Minister directly on that point. However, I take the opportunity this afternoon to urge him to move forward on it, expedite it and get it completed. The university is keen to move ahead. If it is delayed much longer, it will lose an entire year of intake, and it would be disappointing if the whole scheme were put back, effectively by one year, because of a delay that possibly could well have been prevented.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. When does he envisage that the proposed Royal Exchange scheme will move forward?

Mr McCausland: I announced on 18 June 2012 that I intended to make a decision later this year on whether to move forward with a statutory development scheme for the north-east quarter of Belfast city centre, where the proposed Royal Exchange project is located. My Department has, therefore, commissioned an urban regeneration potential study for Belfast city centre to examine the close interplay between retail, leisure and commercial office investment in the continuing regeneration of Belfast.

The study will aim to establish the current and forecasted economic and social development across those sectors to guide appropriate public sector support for new development to maximise private and public investment in the city centre. That study will inform my decision on the promotion of a statutory development scheme for the north-east quarter.

Mr McDevitt: I thank the Minister for his generous acknowledgement of the contribution that his SDLP predecessor Ministers made to the development of Belfast and for his continued dedication and commitment to the development of the city centre. Does he agree with the Minister of the Environment's decision to protect Belfast city centre by preventing development outwith planning policy at the Sprucefield site?

Mr McCausland: I am glad that the Member highlighted what he perceives to be the strong commitment of previous Ministers to the regeneration of the city centre. I am sure, therefore, that the Minister of the Environment will, as I previously indicated, want to move as quickly as possible in taking forward the issue of the University of Ulster. It is important that that is taken forward as a matter of urgency.

As for the question he asked, that is a matter of planning policy and is outside the remit of my Department, as the Member well knows. As Minister for the lead Department on the regeneration of Northern Ireland's towns and cities, I would naturally like to see clear, unambiguous planning policy that is in line with the regional development strategy.

Welfare Reform: Free Advice

4. Mrs McKevitt asked the Minister for Social Development what action his Department is taking to increase access to free advice to deal with the proposed changes in the Welfare Reform Bill. (AQO 3361/11-15)

Mr McCausland: My Department already commits significant financial support for the provision of front line advice services in Northern Ireland. During the 2012-13 financial year, a total of £3·5 million was made available to fund front line advice provision — £1·6 million from my Department, and the rest from local councils. A further £3·5 million has been committed, from 1 October 2012 to 31 March 2015, to the Northern Ireland Advice Services Alliance Consortium, which is made up of Advice NI, Citizens Advice NI and the Law Centre NI, to provide regional support to the advice sector.

I am well aware of the potential impact that the proposed changes may have on claimants. My officials are currently engaging with the Northern Ireland Advice Services Alliance Consortium to agree how we can work together to best support claimants in dealing with the changes proposed in the Welfare Reform Bill. That engagement will continue throughout implementation.

Mrs McKevitt: Has the Minister considered including a clause in the Welfare Reform Bill to allow claimants access to independent advice?

Mr McCausland: At the moment, the Bill is in Committee, and work is ongoing. There are discussions around that, as the Member is, I am sure, aware, and I do not want to pre-empt what the outcome of those discussions will be. However, whether there are clauses here, there or somewhere else is not what matters. What matters most is making sure that we have the infrastructure on the ground to provide the services that people require.

I have clearly said that we have significantly contributed towards the sector, to the extent that I have already outlined. We are engaging with the sector and we will continue to do so. That is, by far, the best approach. As for the details of the Bill itself, that is a matter that will be taken up in the future, I am sure, on the Floor of the Assembly.

Mr Beggs: When constituents are unaware of their benefit entitlement, fuel poverty is particularly problematic. That is most likely to occur during a change in the benefit system. Does the Minister appreciate that investment in the advice sector will help to minimise the damage that could occur in extreme cases of fuel poverty, adversely affecting an individual's health and placing additional costs on our health system?

Mr McCausland: I am sure the Member is well aware that, since coming into the Department, I have placed a particular focus on that issue and highlighted the point that one of the major contributors to fuel poverty is level of income. Although there are some things we cannot do, one thing we can do to increase income is to increase benefit uptake.

There has been a very substantial increase in the level of benefit uptake in Northern Ireland in the past few years, particularly in the past year. We trebled the amount of benefit uptake because of new, effective and innovative ways of targeting those who are in the greatest need but perhaps have been not been claiming benefit. Therefore, it has been effective and continues to be effective. We can do even better, but we are doing much better than some years ago and will continue to improve the standard.

Licensing

5. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on the review of licensing laws. (AQO 3362/11-15)

Mr McCausland: A public consultation on proposed changes to the law regulating the sale and supply of alcohol in Northern Ireland ended on 12 November 2012. The consultation document contained a wide range of proposals, including further restrictions on mixed trading in supermarkets, where most alcohol is now sold. I have sought the views on greater flexibility for pubs, clubs and hotels. The consultation attracted wide interest in the community, with over 2,500 responses received. The vast majority were from members of the public, with 140 responses received from organisations, including drinks industry groups, retailers, health bodies, local alcohol advice services, councils, political parties, charities and faith groups.

I welcome the level of interest in my plans to make further changes to licensing legislation, and it is important that officials carefully consider the various views expressed. Given the large volume of responses received, drafting the report on the outcome of the consultation is taking longer than usual. I have asked for a draft report to be with me by the end of February, and it will be discussed with the Social Development Committee before deciding the way forward.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer. I declare an interest as a Member who infrequently frequents a licensed premises. Can the Minister further develop that answer and please provide us with information on whether he is opposed to further extending licensing hours or whether he is still in the process of considering it?

Mr McCausland: If the Member had listened carefully to what I said, he will know that I said that we are waiting on the outcome of the consultation. It would be totally improper to pre-empt the outcome of that consideration and say what we will do until we have given careful consideration to the consultation responses. It would be an act of gross discourtesy to the people who replied if I were to say, "You have written in, but it does not really matter as I have made up my mind already." We are looking very carefully at what they have said.

Mr I McCrea: Can the Minister outline what he is doing to tackle the issue of cheaper alcohol that is available in supermarkets?

Mr McCausland: There is strong evidence of the link between alcohol consumption and related harm, and the evidence is clear that affordability is one of the drivers of increased consumption. Therefore, the price at which supermarkets sell alcohol, which is sometimes cheaper than bottled water and soft drinks, is damaging to our communities. That is why Health Minister Poots and I are in the process of commissioning research to model the likely impact of minimum unit pricing in Northern Ireland. That will help inform our future discussions and decisions in that area and allow us to bring forward proposals that have a proportionate and positive impact on mental and physical health and well-being and the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland. Of course, similar consideration is being given to that matter elsewhere in the British Isles.

Mr Elliott: To get back to the issue of the ongoing review and consultation that the Minister talked about, has he looked at the experience of any other countries, particularly in the European Union, to see whether any good practice could be adopted in Northern Ireland?

Mr McCausland: I will not go into the details, because that would pre-empt the results of the consultation. However, yes, we have looked at practices elsewhere, and there is no point in going forward with that sort of work unless you look at good practice elsewhere to see what lessons can be learned, not just from the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland but other places.

Spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly approves that a total sum not exceeding £15,459,758,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 and that total resources not exceeding £16,572,965,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(c) and 2(c) of table 1 in the volume of the Northern Ireland spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13 that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £7,136,563,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund on account for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £7,641,877,000 be authorised, on account, for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 4 and 6 of table 1 in the Vote on Account 2013-14 document that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr McQuillan: I welcome the motions before the House today, as they are a necessary part of the financial process. I will be brief, because when you speak at this stage of the debate nearly everything that can be said has been said. I will take on board that the Minister said earlier that he is looking home for his tea tonight, so I will keep my remarks fairly brief.

3.30 pm

There is no doubt that we will continue to face challenges with the economy and that the economy is not as strong as we would like it to be. Nevertheless, we need to do the best job that we can with the resources available. There has also been good news in the past year. The Minister mentioned some of the tourism successes over the past year, and as a Member for East Londonderry, I was especially pleased to see Portrush host the Irish Open. I hope that this will bring a boost to the economy on the north coast.

The Minister raised a number of points in his opening speech that are to be welcomed. First, despite an overcommitment of £30 million at the start of the year, the Minister was able to reallocate almost £113 million of resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) and £115 million of capital spend through the monitoring rounds and an additional allocation from the Treasury, rather than giving this back to the Treasury. This money was used so that the Assembly was able to respond to various needs that arose, such as the challenges that we face in the health service.

Extra capital resource has been made available for schools, roads and Housing Executive homes, and this has to be welcomed. Despite what some Members think, I believe that this proves that the procedure of monitoring rounds works. In particular, I commend the Minister for the way in which he has reallocated the resources to those most in need, and I welcome the Executive's commitment to the health service.

I will take this opportunity to highlight the important work that has been done by the Executive, particularly by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in the run-up to the autumn statement. Exemption from the carbon floor price will help to save consumers and businesses from significant increases in their energy bills, as well as protecting jobs that would otherwise have been put under threat. These resolutions are necessary for the work of the Departments to continue, so it is essential that they are approved. It is necessary so that they can do their jobs and carry out their functions, which many people in Northern Ireland depend on. I support the motions.

Mr Wells: My speech is somewhere outside. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, thank you for calling me, albeit unexpectedly early. I know that the Minister is keen to get home for his tea, and I only have a couple of thoughts in my mind as to what I want to say.

First, as the Deputy Chair of the Health Committee, I want to speak briefly on the finances of the trusts. The trusts are to be congratulated for the way in which, under very challenging circumstances, they have come in largely on budget. Indeed, I understand that the total expenditure of the Department was £12 million under budget. That sounds like a lot of money, but that is, of course, in the context of a total budget of £4·65 billion.

Some of the trusts, particularly the Southern Trust, have performed extremely well in what has to be one of the most challenging years that they have ever faced. They have managed to overcome some of the difficulties. There has been a remarkable improvement in the number of A&E waits of over four hours and 12 hours, for instance, in the Belfast Trust. The issue has more or less been put to bed as far as the Southern Trust and the Western Trust are concerned, and we are still now left with the hard core issues of what to do with Antrim Area Hospital and the Ulster Hospital.

That having been said, it is quite clear that the health service in Northern Ireland is treating more people in more hospitals and more quickly than ever before at a time when demand for health service resources is increasing by between 6% and 7% and while income in real terms is increasing only by 1.9%. That is commendable.

The incoming year is going to be even more challenging. I have been speaking to some of the chief executives of the trusts, and some of them tell me that, although they were able to deliver in year 1 and year 2 of the current comprehensive spending review (CSR) period, year 3 is going to be desperately difficult. Therefore, we will be relying upon the Minister acting as the fairy godmother, as it were, and doling out some money in the monitoring rounds to ease the situation.

I want to raise one specific and particular issue. In the incoming financial year, we have a remarkable opportunity to deal with the awful condition known as meningitis B. As a result of a vaccination programme that has been rolled out by the Department in recent years, we have effectively eliminated meningitis A and meningitis C from Northern Ireland. That is tremendous news, because I speak as someone with definite and very certain personal experience of meningitis.

We in the south Down community had a dreadful situation 10 years ago when a young lad aged three in Rathfriland died very suddenly from meningitis. I will never forget standing at the door of the church for that funeral and seeing the eyes of the parents of that young fellow and thinking about what they had gone through. Within 24 hours, he had gone from being a totally fit, normal and healthy young boy to dying.

At that time, there was no vaccine for meningitis. Now, we have just heard it announced, in February, that a vaccine could well be available in June of this year, for the final strain of meningitis: meningitis B. If that is possible, the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation (JVCI) recommends its introduction in Northern Ireland. I think it is absolutely essential that we find the finance to vaccinate all children in Northern Ireland against that condition, because that holds out the hope that, from now on, any parent who sees his child developing flu-like symptoms will not be panicking and fearful of the awful condition of meningitis; it will be something more normal and less threatening.

This event has come about very suddenly, and, indeed, the Department was probably not even aware of the existence of that vaccine when it was preparing its financial forecasts for the incoming year. However, I hope and pray that we can find, either through the monitoring round or some additional resources, that we can vaccinate all children in Northern Ireland against that condition and that, in a few years' time, the various charities that have been established to campaign for and support the treatment of those who have had this condition will be able to wind up and close down, because the condition will have been removed from society.

The sad fact is that one in every 10 children who contract meningitis die from the condition, and many more are left horribly deformed. Therefore, it is very seldom that one comes across what we could call the golden bullet, the ultimate treatment for a very serious condition. However, it looks as though we are almost there — almost. Even though we are in a terribly difficult financial position, I hope that we can find the resources to deal with that.

There are many other issues that I could dwell upon. The capital budget of the health service is still under enormous stress. That having been said, despite very difficult and dark economic times, we have been able to introduce proposals for a new local hospital for Omagh, and the extension of the cancer unit at Altnagelvin is cast in stone, it is definitely going ahead and is very much welcomed by the communities of the north-west.

We all attended the pre-opening tour of the new South West Acute Hospital in Enniskillen, and it is the most wonderful provision. Indeed, when it was opened, it was the most modern hospital in Europe. I said at the time that it was very much a case of "'Star Trek' meets A&E". It really is futuristic in the extreme. So, we have that wonderful new facility for the people of Fermanagh and Tyrone, open, fully equipped, and performing operations and many other forms of care for the people of that community. Therefore, I suspect that the people of the Western Trust area cannot say at the moment that they are being badly treated, as far as financial provision for health is concerned.

However, many of our other hospitals have seen better days. My own local hospital, Daisy Hill, in Newry, is a typical 1960s structure and has all the defects of that type of building. In an ideal world — and I know it will not happen for many years — we would demolish Daisy Hill and build on a greenfield site at the edge of Newry, perhaps near the motorway, and provide a fit-for-purpose, modern facility for the people of the southern part of Northern Ireland. I realise that, at the moment, that is not an option, and I accept that. However, certainly in the long term and for many years to come, we have to consider what we are going to do with that hospital.

Craigavon Area Hospital has its problems, and some of the other hospitals are past their sell-by date. I welcome the extension to the Antrim Area Hospital, as it will ease some of the pressures that I referred to earlier, where we are having real problems with four-hour and 12-hour waits at that hospital.

All I can say is that the health service — the chief executives and their teams — have done exceptionally well, given the economic circumstances that we are in. I am confident that we have a good strong team which will continue that work, but there will be storm clouds ahead in the year to come, and we depend on the Minister, at monitoring-round stage, to dole out extra resources for this hard-pressed service.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I support both the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account. I am mindful of the expectations and ambitions of the Minister with regard to how the next 10 minutes may go, and I do not guarantee not to disappoint.

I will make a few comments in my capacity as Chairperson of the Committee of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), and, after that, I will give some personal views on the two motions.

In-year, the Committee was briefed by the Department on its monitoring round returns and proposals, and I am pleased to say that it was broadly satisfied with the Department's approach. Following the Department's qualification of its resource accounts for 2010-11, the Committee has kept a watching eye on the Department's financial processes. Indeed, the Committee has since received regular briefings on governance issues in the Department and heard about progress on measures that have been put in place to address issues. At briefings, the Committee was assured by the departmental accounting officer that appropriate action had been taken to remedy the concerns and that processes had been put in place to prevent those issues happening in the future.

The Committee has taken a particular interest in the Department's capital projects and understands the importance of maintaining momentum in the regeneration of these sites to attract investment and provide jobs for local areas. The Committee visited a number of the sites to look at the progress made and hear further about plans for this CSR period. In January this year, the Committee visited the Maze/Long Kesh site to see how work was progressing. During the visit, members were briefed by the chair of the corporation board on plans for the site. The Committee will keep a watching brief on progress at the Maze/Long Kesh site as the €20 million peace-building and conflict resolution centre is progressed and, indeed, as the Royal Ulster Agricultural Society moves to the site.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, if I may, I will make comments on behalf of my party. I begin by acknowledging that the Ulster Unionist Party and, I believe, the SDLP, did not lend support to the 2011-15 Budget at the time, but we do not intend to jeopardise the ability of Departments to draw down resources by opposing the process at this stage. I agree with my colleague Mr Cree and with Mr Girvan, who spoke previously about the need for further transparency, to which I add the desire for a better readacross between the Budget lines and the targets in the Programme for Government. That is, I concede, a very difficult trick to turn, but it is one that I am sure that the Minister would like to see addressed as we go forward.

I have just seen a response to a question for written answer about an Executive visit to China. I was wondering how many officials accompanied the Ministers, who were they, where they stayed, what class of travel was undertaken and, generally, what was the cost of the trip. I regret to say that the Department is unable — or feels unable — to answer any of those questions. So when it comes to general transparency and openness, we have some way to go as an institution.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Nesbitt: I will certainly give way.

Mr Wells: Does the honourable Member not agree that it is a bit churlish to condemn the Department for not revealing that information? China is the second largest market in the world, it is growing rapidly, we have to be there, and it is essential that we are there at the highest level. Therefore, how could anyone be critical of a mission to China when, undoubtedly, we will gain enormously through trade for Northern Ireland as a result?

Mr Nesbitt: I thank Mr Wells for his intervention. I was not being critical of the trip, Mr Wells. I was being critical of the Department's unwillingness to detail the costs, the numbers, the class of travel and the type of hotels stayed in. They were all legitimate questions for a Member to ask and are in no way to be taken as a criticism of the undertaking of the trip.

I have half a dozen issues to draw to the Minister's attention, and perhaps he will give some clarity on them. The first relates to the Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry. I believe that all Members were very pleased that the legislation was passed last year. We were also pleased by the level of co-operation between the Department and the Committee, which scrutinised and advised on aspects of the Bill.

We were particularly pleased that the scope was extended so that the start date is not 1945 but 1922. This may affect only a few victims, but, for them, it is everything to be included in the scope of the inquiry. However, we lack full clarity on the full costs of the inquiry. There are no Budget lines to cover the work that Sir Anthony Hart and his team will undertake, not just the establishment costs and running of the inquiry but what moneys may be deemed to be required to address the issue of redress. As the Minister will know, many victims will define redress as financial compensation, and I am interested to know what his thoughts are on that.

A final thought on the abuse Bill: we know that it is investigating institutional abuse rather than the broader issue of clerical abuse. Will the Minister set aside a budget at least to scope out whether a further inquiry can be undertaken to bring in those who were abused outwith institutions?

Secondly, Members will be aware that £12 million was set aside for the delivery of a childcare strategy over the four-year budgetary period. However, only a minimal amount has been allocated to date. I am reminded of criticism from the likes of Siobhan Fitzpatrick, the chief executive officer of Early Years, who believes that we are running somewhat behind in getting a strategy out to consultation and that it is not rocket science.

Thirdly, estimates state that, at present, the social investment fund has a net provision of zero and a new net provision of only £600,000. I wonder if the Minister will agree that that shows the failure of the fund to get off the ground. It was £80 million over four years, which became £80 million over three years, and, now, clearly, it is going to be £80 million over two years. Will the Minister comment on the fact that an equivalent sum to the money intended for the social investment fund for this year has been channelled into six rather hastily arranged signature projects?

The flag dispute has highlighted many underlying issues, not least education, dereliction and deprivation. All those issues could and should be addressed through the social investment fund

As I mentioned before, the Committee visited the Maze/ Long Kesh site. The development corporation has a new net provision of £2·723 million. I would welcome clarification on how that figure has been reached. My party remains opposed to the location of a peace centre at the Maze prison, especially as we are now aware that it will operate at a significant loss. During our briefing at the Maze site a few weeks ago, the Committee was told that even if the projected number of visitors is attained —

110,000 per annum — it will still require a subvention of £650,000 per annum over the first three years. Why should the taxpayer be asked to stump up £2 million over that period for that facility?

Support for government and other services is the single largest expenditure in the spring Supplementary Estimates (SSEs). There is a provision of over £14 million. I am sure that the Minister will agree that the detail is rather vague, and I request that he break it down much further. What does support for government entail, and what are the other services that equate to such a significant sum of money?

With regard to OFMDFM issues, the Minister will be aware that a change in gross provision for victims shows a reduction of £590,000, leaving a net provision of just £79,000. I recognise that that operates alongside the new Victims and Survivors Service, which has a provision of over £2·5 million. However, I would welcome further detail on what has led to that other category having such a small budget?

Finally, to move away from OFMDFM issues, the Minister brought up the Prison Service exit scheme. I wonder if he can inform us about the tax implications for those who opted to take part in the first tranche of that exit scheme. What specific consideration was given to those people, and what were the tax implications for those who were going to engage in the first tranche before the scheme was rolled out by the Department of Justice?

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Initially, I will speak as Chair of the Committee. A couple of issues came up in the Committee that the Minister may wish to address.

In this year's Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) budget, a total of £10 million has been ring-fenced in the expectation that the issue of the EU nitrates directive and disposal of chicken litter would have been addressed. Indeed, we are all more than consciously aware of the possibilities of infractions that could ensue from that. Most of that allocation was surrendered in the October monitoring round. As the issue is still outstanding, it is important that we hear what provision is being made in the 2013-14 Budget to address the very serious issue of chicken litter disposal. I see the Minister laughing. [Interruption.] But for a lot of farmers — and probably for a lot of chickens, too — it is a very important issue.

The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment had the great opportunity recently to secure a debate on the small business research initiative. There is the possibility of dealing with Departments to help us to bring forward good projects because there is a lot of development of technology at the moment.

So, I would be interested to hear the Minister's views in relation to the £10 million that was ring-fenced and how that may dovetail with the efforts of the small business research initiative, with DETI and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD), to make sure that this important issue is dealt with and that new technologies are brought to the fore to help to deal with it.

In the December monitoring round, DETI made a bid for £18·2 million resource funding in respect of the Titanic signature project. The Department informed the Committee that the bid was required to safeguard an equal amount of EU funding previously earmarked to be drawn down by the Titanic project. That bid was unsuccessful. Therefore, what are the implications for funding, particularly in light of a rather unusual departmental response to the Committee regarding the £18·2 million? It states:

"with the action undertaken by DETI, the write down will be offset by the £18.2m which will then be available for drawdown on other projects in future years meaning there is no shortfall or gap in funding under the EU Programme and no loss to the NI Block."

The response further states:

"There has been, and will not be, any additional cost or additional government funding to the Titanic project."

That all seems a bit unclear, so perhaps the Minister will clarify precisely where the £18·2 million, which seems to appear and then disappear, will come from, particularly given that the bid was unsuccessful. The Committee is aware that the requirement arose as a result of difference in legal opinion between the EU and the Department, which, apparently, has yet to be resolved. Is the Minister in a position to shed further light on the matter and whether that provision will be made in 2013-14?

Those are the views of the Committee. With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will speak in my own capacity as an MLA and chair of the all-party working group on construction. I pay tribute to the Minister for his co-operation with that all-party working group in delivering a number of proposals that are facilitating and helping the construction trade in very difficult times.

With regard to the green new deal, I know that there was an economic evaluation and appraisal carried out by the Department for Social Development (DSD), and it was ruled out. That economic appraisal was more or less throwing out the baby with the bath water; the good and the bad. If there were bad parts to it, good enough, but could the Minister, who is charged with the Budget, look at where we can spend to save? By that I mean that not only are we safeguarding the environment and helping to create jobs for the construction industry by retrofitting homes with insulation schemes and the like, but we are helping to tackle the worst excesses of fuel poverty. Those excesses mean that a lot of people, mainly older people, wind up in hospital at considerable cost to the health service while they are there and afterwards with community care projects and assistance in their homes.

Through proper investment in the economy, environment and home insulation, you can actually invest to make considerable savings in the health budget, aside from the economic, environmental and health benefits that would accrue to many members of the population. That is an issue that I would like the Minister, who has listened in the past, to look at. It has cropped up consistently at the all-party group on construction. I want to hear what the Minister has to say, particularly about how money that is properly invested can lead to savings and help to benefit the wider economy and society as a whole. On that point, I will conclude.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motions proposed by the Finance Minister today, and on behalf of the Alliance Party, I support them.

The debate presents us with an opportunity to examine how we use departmental finances to build a shared future, address inequality and foster sustainable economic growth across Northern Ireland. The Alliance Party believes that the best approach to rebalancing the Northern Ireland economy is through encouraging collaboration, whereby Departments work towards cross-cutting goals in a joined-up manner. We would, therefore, like to see much better co-operation between our Departments to make sure that we grow our economy effectively and maximise the efficiency and value of our public services.

On that note, the cross-cutting Executive investment in six signature projects, two of which involve the employment of graduate teachers without permanent employment contracts in one-to-one tutoring of our children, are a welcome development, as are the social enterprise hubs that have been created. There was some concern that they were created because the social investment fund was not on time. Notwithstanding the regret that that is the case, those are welcome projects to be taken forward in areas of key need.

Like the Finance Minister, we welcome the investment by the Health Department in the invest-to-save scheme. That is a positive development, although I would also have liked increased investment in mental health provision.

The financial aid released by the Department of the Environment to councils to deal with flooding and the £1,000 payments made available are welcome. In my constituency of East Belfast, I noticed just how damaging the impact of flooding can be and how vital those £1,000 payments are in helping people, especially the vulnerable, to get back on their feet. As was expressed today, residents would ideally like that investment to be used collectively for our infrastructure and systems to ensure that flooding is not as severe in the first place.

It would be interesting to hear from the Minister on the performance and efficiency delivery unit (PEDU) investigation into the early warning systems, how far we have moved on the flood line issue and whether there is a need for improved civil contingency planning to ensure that the resources we invest are used in an even better manner.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

The Health Department and the Department for Social Development investment in Supporting People is also particularly welcome. In my constituency of East Belfast, I have seen money from the Supporting People fund used to help to house vulnerable women in times of need, which is an extremely welcome service.

We have had investment from OFMDFM for the inquiry into historical institutional child abuse, which has been most welcome. Concerns remain, however, about the speed at which we are releasing funds for the vital childcare services needed across Northern Ireland, which are often cited as the single biggest barrier to economic activity for many families across Northern Ireland and, in particular, for women

I share the Chair of the OFMDFM Committee's concerns about the roll down of funding for the social investment fund. That £80 million was meant to be spread over four years, but it now appears that it will be squeezed into two years. As a result, there have been pressures on the social investment zone planning committees. They are being asked to roll that out in an extremely short time frame. I declare an interest as a member of the east Belfast steering group.

We must be willing to take measured risks with the investment of our finances in a way that maximises efficiency and output in the long term. Long-term investment in key growth sectors such as ICT, agrifood, the creative industries and financial services have been welcome and are crucial to the long-term rebalancing of our economy.

Long-term investment in tourism is welcome and vital for increasing visitor figures and spend in our cities. Building on the success of ni2012: Our Time Our Place, we must assure the world that Northern Ireland remains a safe and exciting place to visit.

Titanic Belfast in my constituency of East Belfast has been mentioned, and it is good to see visitor numbers for that centre reaching their targets and then some. Recently, we also had the East Belfast Arts Festival, which I would also like to see increased investment in going forward.

4.00 pm

Departments such as DCAL should have a focus on gaining the maximum return for our local economy. The Alliance Party's strong preference was for a shared stadium, but, as that could not be agreed, it is important that the proposed stadia upgrading and investment go ahead within timescale and budget to help to generate much-needed revenue and regeneration in sport and the construction industry, as the Chair of the Enterprise Committee said.

The Alliance Party also feels that the failure to use resources creatively for a green new deal has been a missed opportunity. It offered innovative means of creating sustainable economic growth, job creation and energy efficiency and tackling fuel poverty. The employment opportunities that it could have provided range from high-tech manufacturing jobs to maintenance jobs at wind power plants or in sustaining and growing employment in the agriculture sector through biomass production. Research indicated that the targeted investment and growth of the renewable sector could create up to 30,000 jobs and that the short-term retrofitting of housing stock through the implementation of cost-effective energyefficient measures would create and sustain jobs in the construction sector. We therefore urge that that be reconsidered and implemented at the earliest opportunity, if possible.

Building a shared society for everyone is the biggest social and economic challenge that faces Northern Ireland. It is simply not acceptable for it to be dismissed as an isolated issue. It is central to Northern Ireland's viability. The Alliance Party believes that we now have an even greater responsibility to tackle the cost of division, which, in the absence of any new Department of Finance or OFMDFM in-depth analysis, was last estimated to be around £1 billion every year. Indeed, the cost of policing the recent violence and unrest is estimated at around £15 million. That is an unjustifiable burden for our society and economy, and the inability of OFMDFM parties since 2005 to develop a new shared future strategy to settle community relations issues is an unacceptable failure of leadership. I welcome the fact that parties are talking the shared future talk, but a generation of young people and those disengaged from society require us to take action and to invest resources in creating a shared and integrated society and economy for the benefit of everyone in this community.

Under Alliance Ministers, the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Justice have introduced a shared future proofing policy appraisal system to promote sharing over duplicating budget allocations in their Departments. I call for that system to be brought into Departments as a way of making efficiency savings, avoiding duplication and promoting integration in Northern Ireland. The system could be used for future public spending in areas such as social housing, the provision of public services and facilities and many other areas. That good governance permitted the Alliance Minister for Employment to invest in vital employment opportunities for our young people that I welcome, such as the youth employment scheme and the work being done to advance the learner access and engagement programme, which accesses the hardest-to-reach learners in our community and gives them a pathway into further education. If Ministers from other parties support a shared future, it is time to see fundamental change in the way that we use our scarce finances. The social and economic future of this region depends on that.

Mr McDevitt: I will make a few remarks about the healthcare and social care situation and then a couple of more general remarks.

Without doubt, my party welcomes the much-needed £15.5 million that the Minister has been able to find for investment in health and social care on the capital side. As the Minister well knows, the pressures in health are many, and they are all very genuine. Members have made significant reference to the invest-to-save aspect of the current health budget requirements. Transforming Your Care is at the heart of that invest-to-save requirement. I trust that the Finance Minister will continue to cast a necessary cold and clinical eye on every aspect of Transforming Your Care. For it to work, it is important that investments that are made to save money down the line genuinely achieve those savings and are credible invest-to-save options. Many in the professional side of management, the clinical side, the representative organisations, the patient groups and a significant number of Members still have reservations about some aspects of Transforming Your Care being able to deliver the savings that are being suggested. I trust that the Minister and his Department's long-standing expertise in sifting out the potential from the areas that might not work will continue to be applied

Other aspects of health and social care policy will present us with real and deep financial challenges, not least the cost of social care, which is the topic of considerable debate across the water today. It would be a great pity, given that we have an integrated health and social care system here in Northern Ireland, if we ended up having to ask people at the very limit of their means to make contributions to the social care of elderly people in particular that were well beyond their ability to afford. Such a scenario would be a breach of the basic contract at the heart of the NHS, which is to provide health and social care free at the point of delivery. I trust that the Minister will continue to respect and uphold that principle. As we reflect on and begin to face up to the challenges of providing an increasingly ageing population with social care in their third age, we must not do so in a way that cripples working families and provides little more than a shifting of debt from one generation to another.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Does he agree that, in previous Assemblies, all parties unanimously agreed that, at some time in the future, free personal care would be available to all who need it in Northern Ireland? It would be something similar to what is provided in Scotland.

Mr McDevitt: Indeed. I think that Mr McCarthy's long and consistent campaign on the issue is something that many people in the House will acknowledge. It is a policy objective that I am happy to support. However, if we are to credibly put a policy objective like that on the agenda, the Finance Minister will have to secure a very significant amount of money to pay for it. I am happy to join Mr McCarthy in saying that it should be a shared objective of all of us to explore how we would secure such moneys. In doing so, however, the invest-to-save bits of Transforming Your Care will have to work very well.

Another aspect of care on the edges of the health service that is worth debating at this point is dental services. There is considerable pressure on dental services at the moment. It seems to be a pressure that is at odds with or in the opposite direction of travel to the spirit of Transforming Your Care. In other words, it seems to be about taking NHS services out of dentistry or reducing the amount of dentistry that can be done at public expense. That seems to be contrary to where we are going with Transforming Your Care, which is about trying to get as much healthcare as possible into primary care. That also raises the possibility of downstream costs. If you make less of an investment in good general dental services across your population base, some people's dental health will, inevitably, deteriorate, which will cost the health service more money downstream.

Finally. I want to talk about efficiencies and opportunities on an all-island basis. Those are significant in the health and social care sphere, be it through the commissioning of specialist surgical and specialist secondary care services; greater opportunity for co-operation in the border region or along the border necklace, so to speak, in the primary care sector; the integration of emergency services in the border region; or the specialist and strategic investments that can be made in our very good and very modern hospitals north of the border. I think about the success of the cancer centre in Belfast City Hospital and the opportunity for further cardiac services to be developed in Altnagelvin Hospital. Significant opportunities that need to be exploited have been created by the beautiful new acute hospital in Enniskillen. It is a fantastic building that is open for business, and I, for one, would like to see plenty of business coming through its doors. For it to really work, it will have to be able to sell its services south of the border and into the neighbouring counties of Sligo, Leitrim, Cavan, Monaghan and south Donegal. As the Minister anticipated, that is not exactly a matter for the Supplementary Estimates or the Vote on Account, but they are points worth making regarding the financial opportunities that are out there.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I am pleased to be able to speak in this debate. As Members will know, the Committee regularly scrutinises the Department of Justice's budget and receives detailed information on the monitoring rounds and savings delivery plans. When considering the budget plans and allocations, the Committee pays particular attention to the main spending areas and the pressures that are likely to impact on the savings plans and the delivery of front line services.

The main pressure faced by the Department of Justice this financial year is once again caused by legal aid expenditure. The information available indicates that this year's legal aid spend could be up to £107 million, compared with an available budget of £85 million. That leaves a shortfall of £22 million. The Department intends to fund that pressure from a range of easements identified in other spending areas and by switching £10 million capital DEL to resource DEL as part of the January monitoring round.

The cost of legal aid continues to far exceed the budget available for it, and it is clear that that is totally unacceptable. Despite the additional £39 million provided for legal aid and other court pressures as part of the devolution financial package, the funding required to cover the cost of legal aid now has to be found from other areas of the Department's budget. The Committee has supported changes to criminal legal aid fees, and that has resulted in reducing fees and costs in that area. However, there are a number of large, one-off, very high-cost case bills left in the system that will be paid this year, amounting to £10 million. Those have caused some of the pressure.

More worryingly, the other cause is a large increase in the number of complex, higher-cost, civil legal aid cases. In 2011-12, there were 32 cases, costing £2·6 million, compared with this year, when there are likely to be over 100 cases, at a cost of £8 million. For Members' benefit, the cost of civil legal aid has trebled over the past year. The Committee has asked for more detailed scrutiny of why that has come about. Criminal legal aid fees have reduced significantly, but there is now a spike in civil legal aid. We need to know why and whether there is a correlation between the reduction in the fees being paid in criminal legal aid and the pot of money for people to access now seeming to be in civil legal aid. We have asked for more detailed scrutiny of how that has come about.

When you operate a system in which there is little justification or rationale for the submission of fees, that leaves it open to exploitation, as criminal legal aid was exploited repeatedly by those in the legal profession. That is why I welcome and the Committee has called for changes to be made to civil legal aid. The Committee will look forward to scrutinising the reforms that the Minister intends to make in the area of legal aid expenditure. We will look at that in close detail and will be careful to ensure that access to justice is protected while value for money is achieved. It is imperative that the cost of legal aid is brought within budget as soon as possible, otherwise the impact on other spending areas in the Department of Justice will be unsustainable.

In relation to the overall Department of Justice budget, in-year savings of £27 million had been delivered by 30 September 2012, which represents 59% of the total in-year target of £46 million for this financial year. The Department is on course to achieve this year's target and the total Budget 2010 savings target of £114 million by March 2015. There are, however, indications that, in a number of areas, such as the Probation Board, the Office of the Police Ombudsman and the Police Rehabilitation and Retraining Trust, there has been an impact on front line services. The Department has provided some additional funding and intends to use the in-year monitoring rounds to assess pressures and, where possible and necessary, provide extra funding. The Committee will continue to scrutinise the impact of the planned savings on front line services during the 2013-14 financial year.

The Committee also welcomes the additional £10 million that was provided to the Department in the January monitoring round to fund the prison officers' exit scheme. That will enable more of the officers who have opted to leave the service to do so. In that area, it is important that Department and the Prison Service move more quickly. There are still hundreds of prison officers who have been put into category 3, which is the category that says their application to leave the service is still under consideration. For a lot of individuals, there is uncertainty around this, and people need to have that certainty so that they can plan for what they do when they are able to leave the service. Until we get to that point, that creates a problem in how the prison service is managed. It is an area the Committee will return to.

The Committee notes, however, that, as a result of this additional funding, the Department is committed to surrendering at least £10 million of capital funding in the 2014-15 financial year. We will wish to keep a close eye on the capital expenditure position. In particular, the Committee will no doubt wish to scrutinise progress with regard to the key capital project, the Desertcreat training college. The procurement phase is ongoing, and we will wish to monitor progress on a regular basis to scrutinise the time frame in which it will be delivered and whether it will be delivered within budget.

The police budget takes up almost 65% of the Department's budget, and £48 million of additional security funding from HM Treasury's reserves has been accessed this year as part of the spring Supplementary Estimates process. The mounting cost of policing recent unrest is of considerable concern, with the Chief Constable indicating that the cost so far has exceeded £15 million. Members will be aware that, given the current challenges and pressures, including the dissident terrorist threat and concerns over the long-term resilience of the force, a business case for increased resources to fund additional officers to meet operational requirements is being prepared. There is no capacity in the Department of Justice budget to fund additional police requirements, particularly on this scale, and we will wish the bid for additional resources from the Treasury to receive strong support from the Minister and the Executive. I support the Supply resolution for 2012-13.

Mr Allister: If I am being called, the Minister is obviously going to get his way with a short debate and we are not going to get anywhere close to 7.00 pm. It always concerns me a little when a Minister says, "There is nothing here. Let us move on". I sometimes wonder what the Minister may be trying to hide. Of course, in these 400 pages there may well be opportunities for exactly that.

I want to begin by exploring this question, and maybe the Minister, when he comes to answer, will shed some light on it. We pass through the financial year with a series of monitoring rounds. Indeed, it is but 10 days or two weeks since we had the announcement of the January monitoring round. We then come to this final Estimate, within which the Minister tells us that he has retained "headroom"; that is to say, more money that he is unlikely to need in the normal course of events and will have available for special projects or spending. I suppose that the first question I have is this: why is that money simply not allocated in the January monitoring round, which is so close in time to where we are at this point? What is the logic of retaining what is called headroom? How much is that headroom? The Minister told us that he had retained some headroom. I do not think that he told us how much it was. I would like to hear that. He indicated that it could go to such eventualities as dental services, some of the health trusts and the prison staff exit scheme. Yet, if I remember the figures approximately correctly, in the January monitoring round, the Minister had bid for, I think, some £30 million. I think that he got only £10 million. Yet, here we are, 10 or 14 days later, with the Minister telling us that, within the headroom, he has got more money for the prison staff exit scheme. I suppose that my question is: why do it that way? Why was that simply not allocated as part of the January monitoring? That is the sort of issue about which I would like to hear a little explanation.

On the matter of that headroom — I do not know how big it is — we have this stand-off or difficulty with the Titanic funding. Does the Minister anticipate utilising some of that? Or is there a logjam there because Sinn Féin is exercising a veto on that matter if the funding has to flow and be authorised through OFMDFM? Will he tell us whether that conundrum over the Titanic — I think that it is £18 million — is likely to be aided or affected at all by the headroom money, however much it may be?

On the general financial management issue, if I understand the figures correctly, they indicate to us, at page 7 of the Estimates, that, whereas the present net provision was £15.8 billion, the new net provision will be £16.5 billion. Now, that would seem to indicate an extra need or increase of somewhere between 4% and 5%. There may be two questions out of that. First, in the general national context, we have become so used to hearing of times of austerity and cuts, but where are the cuts that we have been threatened with — I am not inviting them — if we are able to manage matters so that there is, in fact, an uplift of something approaching 5% in the new net provision? Secondly, will all that money be spent, or will some of it not be drawn down? Is this an academic figure, or is it a practical, actual figure of the money that we are likely to spend? Perhaps the Minister will expound on that.

I turn to some figures that I always feel drawn to examine in these Estimates; I am afraid that old habits die hard. I have been looking again at the spend on the cross-border bodies. Not for the first time, I find that they generally need more, not less, and that the hand is always out for more money. Page 33 shows that the language body needs an extra injection of money. Something like a 15% increase is needed for Waterways Ireland's departmental overheads, and, on some other unspecified category, Waterways Ireland needs another £75,000. If we go to Tourism Ireland, on page 103, we find that it too needs more money, as does InterTradeIreland. InterTradeIreland then seems to be giving back £58,000. I do not understand that, but I suppose that InterTradeIreland may not have a lot to do sometimes, given that only 9% of exports from our manufacturing goes in that direction. I am just making the observation that, in the main, these bodies are costing us more than we anticipated this time last year and more than we set for them in the Budget.

The one that perhaps has not cost us much — there is very little surprise in this — is the Food Safety Promotion Board, which is generously surrendering £373,000. Considering that there is not a single job in Northern Ireland with the Food Safety Promotion Board — there is no one at all employed here — and one wonders what it is doing, that is something to be welcomed, but, overall, those bodies collectively are soaking up more this year than before. The one that I cannot find proper delineation of is the much-loved SEUPB. Strangely, it does not appear in the summary of DFP expenditure in the way that the other cross-border bodies appear in the summary for their Department. The only reference to the SEUPB is tucked away in non-Budget expenditure. Will the Minister tell us how the expenditure of SEUPB has been going, why it is not on the face of the figures and why it is that, yet again, in these times of apparent austerity, it seems that we are putting more money than ever before into North/South

I was not here for Mr Storey's contribution, but I think that he raised issues abut ESA. ESA, like SEUPB, although we know that it is costing money, does not appear anywhere in the Estimates that I can see. One would like some explanation of that.

I am always tempted to look at the expenditure of OFMDFM, and I note that it, as is its wont, seems to be lavishing money on projects that it had not budgeted for. I see that the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation now requires an increase of £2·7 million in its gross provision. Shrines are getting very dear, it seems. Then there is a figure that is suddenly included for strategic sites. Some £5·5 million, which was not required hitherto, is now required. What is the explanation for the spend on strategic sites? Why was that cost not anticipated, but now suddenly has to be met?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Allister: Is it the case that the donation of some sites to the Executive has turned out to be a very expensive luxury indeed because of the cost of their upkeep? Sadly —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: I have indeed run out of time.

Mr Wilson: I thank Members for their participation in the debate. I will make it clear at the start that I did not wish this debate to be cut short so that I could get home for my tea. Unfortunately, after all of this is over, I have other duties to perform, including a function tonight. I was simply concerned about the health and well-being of Members and hoped that they would be able to get home for their tea. [Laughter.] I note that some have already gone, including some who participated in the debate.

I thank Members for their contributions. By and large, they listened to the points that I made and they tried to keep their speeches as relevant as possible.

4.30 pm

I will turn now to the contributions that were made by Members in the debate. I will try to comment on some of them and get through them as quickly as possible.

The Chairman of the Committee for Finance and Personnel raised a number of issues, the first of which was the importance of Assembly Committee scrutiny. Indeed, a number of Members made the point about the scrutiny of the allocations that were made by Departments and their savings delivery plans. The point was made about the accounts and the importance of the ability to scrutinise them, which, of course, meant that the accounts had to be presented in as transparent a way as possible.

I agree with all that, but I direct this comment mostly to Sinn Féin Members, because a number of them made the point about the importance of transparency, the simplicity of the accounts and the way in which we dealt with them and the ability of Committees to be satisfied that Ministers were using their budgets in the most effective way possible.

Unfortunately, whether it is about the review of the financial processes or savings delivery plans, it has been difficult to get Sinn Féin's co-operation on those issues. On a number of occasions in this Assembly, I have aired my frustrations that we have not been able to get the review of financial processes through the Executive. I have met those who have had difficulty with it and I have explained it to them. I thought that I had agreement, but that has not happened.

I appreciate the point that Mr McLaughlin made in his speech. I will be more than happy if the Committee for Finance and Personnel can help to deal with that logjam. I do not really care who gets credit for breaking the logjam, but I want to see the review of financial processes, into which the Committee for Finance and Personnel had a very important input, come to fruition in the Assembly, because it will help the scrutiny of the Budget.

As a Sinn Féin Member and not as Chairman of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, Mr McKay also raised the issue of the Executive's need to find other ways to raise revenue. He suggested that we should be looking at the greater devolution of tax powers. Now, I have made it clear on many occasions that I am not a great supporter of increased devolution of tax powers unless there are specific reasons for that. I find it difficult to understand the argument that we wish to see the devolution of tax powers so that the Executive would have greater availability of additional revenue.

If we look back at all the times when we asked for the devolution of tax powers, whether in the form of air passenger duty or corporation tax, we see that it has been done in order not to raise more revenue but to reduce the amount of taxation that we undertake. I am quite happy with that because I believe in low taxation, but if the devolution of tax powers is to give this Assembly the greater ability to raise money, let us be honest with people. I note that the Chairman of the Committee said that it would benefit the local economy and local taxpayers. Well, the only way in which local taxpayers will benefit is to have the devolution of tax powers with the purpose of reducing taxation. That would not be a way of raising increased revenue.

Of course, the more tax powers that are devolved to Northern Ireland, the more that we have to take responsibility for those. I have not heard anyone who supports the proposition for a referendum on the future of Northern Ireland mention the deficit in the revenue raised here. The more that you devolve, the greater the gap will be. We have to accept our dependence on the Exchequer at Westminster.

Mr McKay raised the issue of DFP underspend. I accept that there has been an underspend in the past. We are making every effort to meet the target. However, DFP manages a whole range of expenditure on behalf of other Departments, not least the office estate. To a certain extent, we are in the hands of the decisions and cooperation of other Departments when it comes to meeting those targets and trying to keep expenditure in line.

Mr Storey raised the issue of the 1,500 staff reduction in the Department of Education over the last year and talked about the importance of the savings delivery plans. I want to make clear that the only Minister who is not co-operating is the Education Minister. He has written to me indicating that he does not have any intention of co-operating with the examination of savings delivery plans.

Let us just remind ourselves of the purpose of savings delivery plans. It is to make sure that, if savings are being made within a Department in line with the targets set in the Budget, those savings are not acquired and brought about by simply cutting front line services as the first port of call. There must be a real search for efficiencies in the Department to safeguard front line delivery of services. If savings delivery plans are not open to scrutiny and the information is not made available to the Assembly, we do not know whether Ministers are simply taking the easy route and cutting front line services rather than looking for real efficiencies within their Departments. I do not know —

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way; yes.

Mr D Bradley: The Northern Ireland Audit Office has produced a report on the Budget in the last Assembly term and the way in which efficiency savings were achieved. It pointed out that, in many cases, the so-called savings were, in fact, charges laid on to services and did not meet the criteria that define efficiency savings. Has the Minister acted on that report to ensure that there is no repetition of that practice in this term of the Assembly?

Mr Wilson: I cannot say how every Department has abided by that observation of the Public Accounts Committee. But that is why savings delivery plans should be available to Committees for their examination to see whether Ministers are delivering real savings. That is part of the Committees' job of scrutinising Departments. As I was going to say before the Member intervened, I do not know whether we could have avoided some of the 1,500 reduction in staff in the Department of Education through other efficiency savings, since there is not a transparency in the savings delivery plans of the Department.

Mr Cree raised the issue of the financial process. I think that I have dealt with that point. He also raised the issue of the amount of money surrendered in monitoring rounds. That is not always due to bad budgeting, and I do not think that I have ever made the point that it is. There are sometimes genuine reasons. The only plea that I make to Ministers is that, if you are going to identify that you are not going to spend money, do it as early as possible so that the money can be allocated.

He made the point about whether or not budgets were adequate. One of the reasons why we had the review of budgets and have moved some money about is because, given the pattern of reduced requirements during the monitoring rounds, the original budget allocations did not reflect the real needs of Departments in some cases. Therefore, changes for the final two years have been made.

Mr Bradley raised a number of issues. He talked about financial processes, which I have dealt with. He also talked about capital assets, a theme to which he has returned on many occasions, and whether we delivered on those in the past year. I will explain things to him again. During 2011-12, the planned capital receipts in the Budget amounted to £142 million. The total achieved was £171 million, so we exceeded the planned amounts by £29 million. In 2011-12, the asset management unit assisted Departments in delivering £2·8 million, which again exceeded the target of £2·5 million. So in 2011-12, we more than met the targets.

The target for this financial year is £22-5 million, and we will continue to work with the asset management unit and Departments to deliver that. We are slightly short of the target. We have identified £32 million, but some of that money will take time to deliver due to legalities etc, so we are slightly short of the target and are working to ensure that we meet it by the end of the year.

A number of Members referred to the Titanic bid, where the £18·2 million rests at present and whether that money is likely to be lost. I will explain it again to the Members who raised the issue. The Titanic signature project came in at cost. We did not overspend, and we were on time, but £18·2 million of the finance was to come from Europe. All the advice was taken on what we would have to comply with to draw down that money. We acted on the advice we were given, but at a late stage, Europe said that it did not accept that the way in which the procurement was undertaken was correct and that we were therefore not eligible for grant aid from Europe.

The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment could do one of two things. It could fight the decision, which would probably take until almost the end of this Budget period. It is fairly sure that it would win, but you cannot be absolutely sure in any of these cases. So rather than risk losing the £18 million, it was suggested — this was good proactive management of budgets — that money be taken from other government spending to pay for the Titanic signature project and have other Departments bid for the EU money. The Departments will have two years to spend that money, which makes good sense. The issue has not been resolved.

Mr Allister asked why it has not been resolved: it has not been resolved because there has been a dispute, which meant that it could not come to the Executive for approval. That is why it is built into the accounts of DETI, which, as the programme managing authority, will make the funds available, and they will be drawn down by other Northern Ireland projects. That is the sensible way forward. The drawdown of that £18·2 million of funding on other planned expenditure should mean that there is no impact on the Northern Ireland Budget. The money is simply being moved around: money comes from one Department to DETI, and the European expenditure goes to another Department. That is how the issue should be dealt with.

4.45 pm

Mr Bradley raised the issue of the Belfast port, and he asked what was happening with that money. I think that I indicated that there have been difficulties with it. That is one reason why I made it clear during the Budget process that we really should be doing those things robustly. It is unlikely that we will avail ourselves of that money in the next two years of the Budget. However, Belfast port has indicated that it could meet some of that by building some office accommodation, which would, of course, be ready-made office accommodation for DETI to put potential clients in. So, that would save money in the DETI budget, but it would not save the full £40 million, which is a pressure that will have to be dealt with.

He also raised the issue of the housing associations, which the SDLP claimed as one of its policies. Therefore, I find it rather strange that its Members do not quite understand the way that it works. It is not a case of us getting money from housing associations; it is simply a case of making less money available to housing associations through housing grants. Housing associations will then have to use their reserves or borrow to fill that gap. Therefore, we will get the same number of houses built but with less contribution from the Executive. That means that we would have the money to spend otherwise. So, we have not received any money from the housing associations, and if Mr Bradley had understood his own party's proposal on this, he would not have expected us to get any money from the housing associations in the first place.

Mr McLaughlin raised a number of issues about the monitoring rounds working. I cannot understand his party's resistance to the financial processes. If we went down the route that Sinn Féin wants us to, which would simply give us very broad lines of expenditure that meant that Ministers had the latitude to move money across without having to make reduced requirements, we would not have the ability to have money returned for monitoring rounds to deal with the kinds of issues that arise during the year. That is one reason why the whole financial process is important.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Thank you for addressing the point. I have sought to understand both the reason for the impasse and what could be done. I think that the balance is between protecting Ministers' sense of autonomy through control over their budgets and delivery of Programme for Government commitments and greater transparency and read-across in the Budget. What perplexes me is why it has not been possible to find a formulation that would resolve that issue, rather than to have a stand-off.

Mr Wilson: I appreciate the Member's view on that. His is the same as mine, in that I cannot understand why the stand-off has continued. What is proposed does not remove Ministers' ability to move money within their own budgets. There is still a de minimis level of £1 million where they can move money and still make proactive management decisions that enable them to move larger amounts of money, albeit with Executive approval. There are other ways in which Ministers can still have freedom to move money about. However, we have to have some lines of expenditure whereby once we vote money to Ministers, they keep the spending within what has been voted so that the Assembly at least knows what money is going to Departments for.

Mr Bradley and Mr McLaughlin raised the issue of departmental efficiencies. Those are monitored on a regular basis. To date, £445 million will be delivered in savings in 2012-13. That is £9 million more than the target set. Of course, that excludes the Department of Education, because it has refused to participate in the exercise. So, we really do not know what the level of savings is there.

Mr Bradley also raised the issue of schools maintenance. Again, that is an issue that the Education Minister has to deal with as a priority. I note that, during the year, the Education Minister was able to find £70 million to allocate from reallocations that he made in his own budget. He obviously did not put maintenance at a high priority in his spending. I would point out that we have made, and will make over the next two years, an additional £90 million available for education as a result of decisions that the Executive have made.

I turn to Mr McQuillan, who raised the issue of the carbon price floor and the exemption for generators in Northern Ireland, which is a significant concession from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury at Westminster. It will, first, save generation capacity in Northern Ireland and, more importantly, should keep electricity bills from going up by about 15% and make us less dependent. The problem was that if we did not have that exemption, we would have been almost totally dependent on generators in the Irish Republic for security of supply. That was a good out-turn.

Ms Lo, who is not in her place, raised the issue of local government funding. I am sorry that the Minister of the Environment has not kept his Committee informed about his bid. Apparently, he shared it with the Northern Ireland Local Government Association (NILGA) and the councils but chose not to share it with his Committee. Maybe the Committee ought to take that up with the Minister. We had a discussion at the Executive last week, and I am sure that the Minister will inform the Committee of the outcome of that in due course. I am sure that the Committee will push him for answers and information about that.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for giving way. I cannot let the point go. Last week, when you were on the Floor, you said quite adamantly that there would be no funding for local councils. As an existing member of Ards Borough Council, I am very concerned about what is happening. Are you telling us today that there is a glimmer of hope that councils will be recompensed for a situation that is not of their making?

Mr Wilson: I do not think that I was quite as adamant as the Member suggested. Given that the Executive can change their mind, and have been known to change their mind on a number of issues, I do not think that I could have been as categorical as the Member suggested. I said that I believed that there are two elements of the funding: the convergence element and the transition element. I said that we would have to find some funding for convergence. I am sure that this will eventually be made known to the Committee by the Minister, but, as a result of discussions in the Executive, funding will be made available even for some aspects of transition.

Let me be clear: that money will not magically appear, but will be the result of money not being spent on other services. Whether or not funding the review of public administration (RPA) is regarded as a priority as opposed to some of the other things that Members have mentioned today, such as health and education, is a question that had to be decided. However, some additional funding has been made available, and the detail will be made known in due course.

Mr Storey and a number of Members raised the issue of Arvalee Special School. We have allocated £1·3 million to that.

Mr Nesbitt raised the issue of the childcare strategy. The consultation on that will finish on 5 March. A total of £1·182 million has already been allocated to a number of projects. I see him smiling, and I am sure that, if he were to intervene, he would ask why it has taken so long. Things sometimes take longer to process through the arrangements that we have — his party put those in place under the Belfast Agreement — than we would like. Nevertheless, we have ring-fenced money for the strategy, and the outcome of the consultation will properly inform us as to how it can be best spent.

Mr Nesbitt: I very much appreciate the Minister giving way. Does he not feel that, if he did not like the arrangements of the Belfast Agreement, he should have changed them at St Andrews?

Mr Wilson: Let me be up front because I never hide behind this: some of the changes that were made at St Andrews to try to make sure that Ministers could not run rampant in their Departments are part of the reason why the process has slowed down. Of course the more checks and balances that you put into a system, the slower that that system will be. It is one of the things that we have to live with, and at least I am being up front with the Member in saying that the processes are slow. However, we have to expect that, if we want checks and balances, we will sometimes not get quick decisions made. It is frustrating, and it allows things to be held back at times, but that is one of the prices that you pay once you start putting in those checks and balances. It is not just in Northern Ireland that we find that. The American President is finding it with all the checks and balances in the American system. There is a price to be paid if you want to have those.

It is the same with the social investment fund. The area-planning process is now well advanced. Eight to 10 projects from the steering groups should be available by the end of January, and those will be submitted to the Department on 28 February. We will then start to see the projects delivered on the ground.

Mr Nesbitt also raised the issue of victims and survivors' services, and the change in money that he referred to should be welcomed by him. It is a movement from back-office, administrative funding to actual services for victims, and I hope that he will welcome that movement of funding.

He raised a very important issue about the future cost of the historical abuse inquiry and what has been budgeted for that. There is no presumption about the outcome of the inquiry and over whether its chairman will recommend that there be financial redress. If that becomes apparent, it is a pressure that we will have to deal with, and a bid will have to be made by OFMDFM. It is not presumed at present, because it is impossible to do so. We do not know the numbers, we do not know the outcome of the inquiry and we do not know what will be recommended by the chairman, so it is impossible to build anything into budgets for that.

I loved Mr McGlone's cheek. He started off by asking what we are going to do with chicken waste. He did not even smile as he raised the issue. There was no sense of irony at all. Perhaps he should have been asking not me that question but his party colleague, because there was a perfectly good solution for dealing with chicken waste, but the Minister from his party decided not to adopt that.

The Member quite rightly pointed out that it is creating a difficulty for the agriculture and food processing industries for the future, and, as a result, the money that DETI had available for dealing with chicken waste will not be able to be spent. The planning decision was made by the Minister from Mr McGlone's party. I just wish that he had lobbied the Environment Minister before that disastrous and short-sighted decision was made. I hope that we do not live to regret that decision for an industry that is growing by around 40% and is a big source of employment in Northern Ireland

He and a couple of other Members spoke about the warm homes scheme and the green new deal. In 2011-12, we spent £15 million on fitting houses and improving their heating standards under the warm homes scheme. That is similar to many of the things that people are asking for in the green new deal. It is not called the green new deal, yet it does a lot of the things that people are asking to be done in the green new deal. The scheme creates a lot of construction jobs. In 2012-13, we will have spent £15·9 million, and, on top of that, there is the boiler replacement scheme, which was part of the green new deal. In 2012-13, £4 million will have been spent on that.

Mr Givan raised the issue of legal aid pressures. The insatiable fiscal appetite of the legal profession in Northern Ireland never ceases to amaze me. The Chairperson is quite right to say that there is a funding pressure of £22 million, and, in the monitoring round, £10 million was made available for that. That pressure will have to be dealt with by the Department of Justice.

Mr Lyttle talked about the costs of division. I have to say that, had the Alliance Party thought about the causes of division, we might not have had the ugly eight weeks that we have had to go through since it made the decision that it did in Belfast City Council, with all the problems that that has caused Northern Ireland. Rather than lecture us about the costs of division, maybe he and his party should reflect on what they have done to cause unnecessary division in Northern Ireland by their support for Sinn Féin and the SDLP on the issue of the flying of the Union flag. He also raised the issue of flooding incidents. The PEDU response to the flooding incidents, which has been discussed, zoned in on what we can do for warnings, co-operation and resources in order to address that. That is ongoing work.

5.00 pm

I move to Mr McDevitt's speech, which dealt with issues for the future: Transforming Your Care and the cost of adult social care. Both are big issues. Adult social care is one that we will have to deal with and which will cause great problems in the future, as the number of people over 65 increases. By 2025, there will be a 42% increase, and by the same date there will be an 83% increase in the number of people over 85. We talk about what we can do about nursing and residential care and the cost of that, and the Health Minister has a consultation out at the moment. We have to be aware that the cost of that will be enormous and, if we decide to make it a priority, there will be significant costs to other Departments in the form of reduced funding.

Mr McDevitt also raised the issue of Transforming Your Care and the costs of transformation. There is a cost associated with the planning, designing and implementing of those changes, and some £70 million has been allocated to that in the current budget. He raised the issue of dental services, and part of the headroom that has been factored into the remaining time of the Budget is to deal with dental services. If that money becomes available, it should be available to the Department. I emphasise the importance that is attached to that.

Mr McDevitt also raised the issue of cross-border savings. I must say something to the Member that I have said time and again: I have no difficulty with making better use of our resources, if they can be shared and we can buy in services from the Republic. Take the likes of Daisy Hill Hospital: the Health Minister has already said that, probably, its survival will depend on whether services can be purchased from it by the Republic. However, the record to date has not been good, because, for many of the services that are made available, the costs have not been recovered. We have done a paper on the savings and the costs of cross-border co-operation. The balance at the moment shows that we actually lose £11.2 million on cross-border co-operation as it exists at present. If we are going to have this, there must be a payment for the services, whether it is the sharing of school, university or hospital places or whatever, to make sure that we are not subsidising the Republic rather than making money out of the sharing of services across the border.

Mr McDevitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way, yes

Mr McDevitt: It seems to me that there must be a payment for services procured from anywhere else. If a Department is doing something for another Department around here, they raise a service level agreement and they sort it out in accounting terms. It seems to me only logical that that should apply in all aspects. I ask the Minister just to clarify the figure of £11·2 million: is that across all of government or does it just refer to health?

Mr Wilson: I can make the figures available to the Member. It refers to costs across all government Departments.

I come to the points that Mr Allister raised. First, he raised the issue of the increase from the present net provision to the new net provision, an increase from £15·8 billion to £16·5 billion. That is partly the result of a number of things: the Budget exchange scheme that allows us to carry money over; the Barnett consequentials; reserved claims; and changes in the annually managed expenditure, which, of course, is demand-led. Those things will have accounted for that

Mr Allister also asked about the headroom and why we did not allocate that money in the January monitoring round. The figures for the January monitoring round are probably three months ahead of the end of the financial year by the time we make the January monitoring allocation. There can be and there are likely to be underspends during that period. Under the Budget exchange scheme, we have a limited ability to carry money over. Historically, we can estimate the likely underspends that will arise between January and March and how we can avoid giving those back. We have made an estimate that the underspend could be somewhere around £37 million. That is judged on a historical basis. It is an estimate. It might be less than that, it might be more than that, and that is why I said, "If the money is available". We have ring-fenced it to those two things, because we know that the money can be spent by DOJ on the Prison Service redundancy scheme and by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety on the things that I mentioned, including dental services. The Treasury requires us to say where it will be spent if it becomes available. It is an underspend that will or could arise in the remaining couple of months of the financial year, and that is why it cannot be allocated in January.

Mr Allister also raised the issue of North/South bodies. It is important to note that all North/South bodies have to deliver a 3% year-on-year efficiency saving, and they have been delivering that. The apparent increases that the Member referred to are given by Her Majesty's Treasury to cover the bodies' reclassification as non-departmental public bodies. He will be aware of the issue, because he has raised it with me about some bodies here in Northern Ireland. Reclassification will require additional expenditure, but it does not represent an increase in real spend by the bodies.

I thank Members for their participation, and I hope that I have dealt with all the issues raised. I recommend the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account to the Assembly.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the vote on the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That this Assembly approves that a total sum not exceeding £15,459,758,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 and that total resources not exceeding £16,572,965,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2013 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(c) and 2(c) of table 1 in the volume of the Northern Ireland spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13 that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013.

Vote on Account 2013-14

Mr Deputy Speaker: The motion on the Vote on Account has already been debated. I remind Members that this vote also requires cross-community support.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £7,136,563,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund on account for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £7,641,877,000 be authorised, on account, for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 4 and 6 of table 1 in the Vote on Account 2013-14 document that was laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2013. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Budget Bill: First Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to introduce the Budget Bill (Northern Ireland) 2013 [NIA 18/11-15], which is a Bill to authorise the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of certain sums for the service of the years ending 31 March 2013 and 2014; to appropriate those sums for specified purposes; to authorise the Department of Finance and Personnel to borrow on the credit of the appropriated sums; to authorise the use for the public service of certain resources for the years ending 31 March 2013 and 2014; and to revise the limits on the use of certain accruing resources in the year ending 31 March 2013.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I inform Members that confirmation has been received from the Committee of Finance and Personnel, in accordance with Standing Order 42(2), that the Committee is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals contained in the Bill and that the Bill can, therefore, proceed under the accelerated passage procedure. The Second Stage of the Bill will be brought before the House tomorrow.

Business Improvement Districts Bill: Final Stage

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That the Business Improvement Districts Bill [NIA Bill 9/11-15] do now pass.

I want to put on record my thanks to the Chair and members of the Social Development Committee for their timely and effective scrutiny of the Bill. Given the continuing downturn in our economy, it is important for us as an Executive and as an Assembly to deliver whatever assistance we can, so I appreciate the efforts of the Committee, particularly during a time when it has a very full programme of scrutiny of other primary legislation.

I thank Members across all parties for their support for the Bill. We know from consultation exercises and discussions across a wide range of interests, including businesses and representative bodies, that there is a great deal of enthusiasm for business improvement districts. The primary purpose of the Bill is to allow for the establishment of statutory BIDs in Northern Ireland. This will bring us into line with the other United Kingdom jurisdictions and the Republic of Ireland, where such legislation is already in place.

As I indicated in previous debates, the Bill will be an important addition to the toolkit of measures available to help hard-pressed traders during the continuing difficult economic situation. This is not a one-size-fits-all approach. The BIDs legislation will simply provide a framework that will allow local traders to work closely with their local council to develop solutions to their unique situation, with the aim of attracting more shoppers and consumers into the BID area to explore what is on offer and spend money in local businesses. I, therefore, commend the BIDs Bill to the House.

Mr Brady (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for bringing the Final Stage of the BIDs Bill to the House. The Bill was referred to the Committee for Social Development, in accordance with Standing Order 33(1), on completion of its Second Stage on 17 September 2012.

The Committee received 16 written submissions and took oral evidence from the NI Retail Consortium, NILGA, the NI Independent Retail Trade Association and the University of Ulster. Of course, the Committee also heard from the Department on the provisions of, and rationale for, the Bill. The Minister tabled two amendments at Consideration Stage. The Committee welcomed the amendment to clause 6, which means that all nondomestic properties can be included within a proposed BID area, whether or not they have an exemption from paying rates. Therefore, the tenant or owner will have the entitlement to vote on the BIDs proposal. The Committee acknowledged that it will be up to the BID proposer to decide which properties to include in the final proposals for hallot

The amendment to clause 19 was tabled at the request of the Committee, following advice from the Examiner of Statutory Rules. The amended clause will include two additional clauses, which are now to be subject to draft affirmative resolution. I thank the Minister on behalf of the Committee for bringing forward those amendments.

5.15 pm

I will not rehearse what was said at the previous stages of the Bill. I will, however, speak briefly on the key aspect of the Bill and what it will mean for businesses here. In short, the Bill will provide a statutory basis for the development of business improvement districts. If a vote to establish a BID is successful, everyone who is captured in that BID area will be liable to pay the BID levy, which is used to fund additional services in the area.

From the evidence received from stakeholders, the Committee acknowledges the benefits that the Bill will bring to businesses here. It will bring them together to work collectively on a vision. It is hoped that a BID will increase footfall and promote towns and city centres. It will create a partnership between local businesses and local councils. Most importantly, it will help to generate income.

The Committee recognises that there will be challenges, and raised concerns. As was mentioned, during the Consideration Stage, the Committee raised questions about the compulsory levies on businesses, especially given the financial pressures that businesses are under. We also recognise that exemptions and lower levies can be included within a BID proposal; for example, for charity shops, although that is down to the BID proposers.

The Committee also questioned the value of making BIDs a mandatory arrangement and recognises that, where businesses currently pool resources to help to develop a common area or project on a voluntary basis, there is a potential for businesses that do not contribute also to benefit. The Committee also recognises that, although there are concerns about the mandatory nature of the BID, the decision to take the BID forward will be made on a democratic basis.

Looking ahead, the Committee would like the Minister to explore a fund similar to that in GB for business improvement districts to help town centres to access loans for their set-up costs. The Committee acknowledges that, although the Bill makes provision for local councils to make contributions to enable the projects identified in the BID to be carried out, it does not see why the Minister for Social Development, perhaps in conjunction with his colleague at the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, cannot establish a similar fund. The Committee looks forward to exploring that with his officials.

I thank the members of the Committee for their contributions to the debate in Committee and in the Assembly. I also thank the witnesses who provided written and oral submissions and the departmental officials who provided responses to members' queries. Finally, I thank the Committee staff, who facilitated the Committee Stage of the Bill. I commend the Bill to the House.

Ms P Bradley: I welcome that fact that we are now at the Final Stage of the Business Improvement Districts Bill, which, of course, could be of huge benefit to many small retailers. It is hoped that it will improve the commercial environment in our town centres, and I look forward to its roll-out in our local council areas.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for bringing the Final Stage of the BIDs Bill to the Assembly. Like the Deputy Chair, I thank all the staff.

We welcome the passage of this legislation, which has been universally welcomed across the business sector as something that will assist it at this difficult time. I have been convinced that reservations that I expressed at earlier stages of the Bill and in Committee can and will be addressed. However, I re-emphasise my belief that, if the benefit of this legislation is to be maximised, there must be government subvention and investment at the very least in its embryonic stages. That is an opinion shared by the Deputy Chair of the Committee, but we welcome the legislation.

Mr Lunn: I am standing in for Judith Cochrane, so I have very little to say about this except that we certainly welcome the Final Stage of the Bill. It is not something that I have been close to, but I had the opportunity some years ago when I was involved with the Lisburn historic quarter partnership to look at the possibility of a voluntary BIDs arrangement. I think it was around the time when the Blair Government were in the early stages of setting up what is

In less stressful economic times, it would certainly be a very good string to the bow of local communities that want to improve their district. There is no fault in it. It may be a bit of a hard sell just at the present time, but time will tell. Other Members mentioned council contributions and, perhaps, a contribution from the Department. To make it attractive, that is probably vital. Who wants to have a levy on the rates if there is not some other contribution as well? This is good legislation. I hope that it works, and we welcome it today.

Mr McCausland: I thank Members for their contributions to the debate. I assure them that, as we take this on, there will be full consultation on the regulations in due course.

A number of contributors pointed out that there should be some sort of arrangement to include start-up funding in support of a BID. I previously committed to examining support arrangements in other jurisdictions before making a decision on that. I am considering options at the moment for providing support to businesses and councils in setting up BIDs in Northern Ireland, and I will make an announcement on that in due course.

I am grateful to Members for their constructive input as the Bill has progressed and for the high level of consensus that it has enjoyed. The Bill is a framework that will provide further subordinate legislation to support BIDs and provide the detail. The Assembly will again have the opportunity to consider BIDs when the regulations have been drafted in due course.

I conclude by asking the Assembly to pass the BIDs Bill and allow it to move forward to gain Royal Assent.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Business Improvement Districts Bill [NIA Bill 9/11-15] do now pass.

Energy Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions in Part 1 of the Energy Bill, as introduced in the House of Commons on 29 November 2012, dealing with electricity market reform.

We are here today to consider the issue of extending primary legislative powers for electricity market reform (EMR) to Northern Ireland. These powers will help to ensure that, in the longer term, low-carbon generation can compete fairly on cost with fossil fuels without financial support and deliver the best deal for the consumer. Electricity market reform works with the market and encourages competition, minimising cost to consumers, to deliver the investment we need. I believe that these measures will ensure that Northern Ireland remains a leading destination for investment in low-carbon electricity, thereby boosting our economy by generating skills and expertise and creating jobs in the sector.

The consent of the Assembly has been sought for provisions relating to matters devolved to Northern Ireland. The provisions under consideration relate to the following: the introduction of a feed-in tariff, with contracts for difference for large-scale renewable electricity generation; the closure of the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) to new generation from 1 April 2017; the introduction of an emissions performance standard (EPS) for a new coal fuel-fired plant; and a new UK-wide institutional framework to administer the contracts for difference.

A key factor in the success of the NIRO to date is the fact that it was working within a UK-wide context. Therefore, the costs of administration and incentivising the NIRO are spread across all UK consumers, which offers the best value-for-money solution for Northern Ireland.

Contracts for difference will be available to Northern Ireland generators for projects commissioning from 2016, but, crucially, the costs will continue to be socialised across all UK consumers. Importantly, the Energy Bill retains my right to set a different strike price for Northern Ireland generators where there is clear evidence that that is required.

Although the NIRO closes to new generation from April 2017, projects already supported under the NIRO will continue to receive support.

The emissions performance standard provides a regulatory backstop on the amount of emissions that new coal-fired power stations are allowed to emit. Although this will apply across the UK, the Bill contains a provision giving me the power to suspend the EPS in Northern Ireland where there is a potential risk to security of supply.

The right institutional framework is crucial to ensuring that EMR drives investment in low-carbon generation and security of supply at an affordable cost to consumers. I am proposing that Northern Ireland is part of the UK-wide institutional framework that has a clear split of responsibilities between government, the devolved Administrations and the delivery body.

As Members can see, my Department has worked closely with the Department of Energy and Climate Change to ensure that Northern Ireland's position is recognised and respected. The powers are required now as a signal to investors as they make long-term investment decisions. The Executive are in agreement with that course of action. If this opportunity is missed, there will be a significant implication for the deployment of low-carbon generation in Northern Ireland. I am confident that by supporting electricity market reform, there will be positive opportunities for Northern Ireland to reduce its dependence on imported fossil fuels, to cut carbon emissions, to promote investment and to support job creation. Passing this legislative consent motion is an important step in the process.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith as an Bhille a thabhairt os ar gcomhair. My thanks to the Minister for bringing Part 1 of the Energy Bill before us today. The Committee has given considerable consideration to the policy proposals, which have resulted in this motion. At its meeting on 24 November 2011, the Committee considered a written briefing from the Department, which included developments with the coalition Government's White Paper on planning our electric future. The written briefing outlined the Department's position on the policy proposals now included in the LCM.

On 16 January 2012, the Minister wrote to inform the Committee that a study had been undertaken on behalf of the Department and the Utility Regulator's office to analyse the impact of EMR on incentivising renewable electricity in the North. The Committee received oral briefings from economist John Simpson on 9 February 2012 and the Utility Regulator on 12 March 2012 to assist in clarifying some of the technical details and on the impact of the possible future adoption of a FIT with CFD. As a result of the briefing from Mr Simpson, the Committee had a number of questions for the Utility Regulator and the Department. Responses to those questions have been provided to Members, along with the Committee's report.

On 15 May 2012, the Minister wrote to confirm to the Committee that, subject to an LCM, the Westminster Energy Bill would extend to Northern Ireland for the purposes listed in the legislative consent memorandum. The Minister informed the Committee that she would seek the establishment of a single administration system across the UK for the FIT CFD as only 10 to 15 contracts would be expected in Northern Ireland annually. Members subsequently received an oral briefing from the Department on electricity market reform at its meeting on 14 June 2012. At its meeting on 15 November 2012, the Committee received a further oral briefing from the Department as part of the pre-legislative scrutiny of its plans to introduce an Energy Bill to Northern Ireland to cover provisions for, among other things, the development of an energy efficiency obligation, a small-scale FIT CFD and a higher priority to be given to sustainability in the statutory duties of the Department and the Utility Regulator. Members noted that respondents to the consultation had agreed that a small-scale FIT would be an appropriate means of incentivising small-scale renewable installations.

The Committee carefully considered the proposals in the LCM and is of the view that this legislative consent motion, coupled with the forthcoming Northern Ireland Energy Bill, is the most appropriate means of extending to Northern Ireland the statutory framework and enabling powers for the electricity market reform programme to encourage low-carbon electricity generation for ensuring security of supply. The Committee, therefore, supports DETI in seeking the Assembly's endorsement of the legislative consent motion.

Mr Newton: By and large, I concur with the remarks of the Chair of the Committee and recognise the importance of this legislation to Northern Ireland. In fact, it is right to say that the Committee recognised that, in order to improve security of supply in the longer term, low-carbon generation needed to compete fairly on a cost basis and on a level playing field. I welcome the work that has been done by the Minister and her officials at Whitehall and the fact that the costs of contracts for different CFDs will be socialised across the UK, as the Minister pointed out, and as happens with the Northern Ireland renewables obligation. Indeed, an incentive mechanism that is funded only by Northern Ireland consumers would not have allowed us to reach by 2020 our targets that were established under the Programme for Government.

The Committee is aware of the work that has been undertaken by the Department of Energy and Climate Change in London, by the Utility Regulator, as the Chairman mentioned, and by the system operator to ensure that CFDs work for Northern Ireland generation. It is important that we maintain investor confidence in Northern Ireland while keeping the cost to the consumer as low as possible. I welcome the legislative consent motion.

5.30 pm

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I concur with the Member who spoke previously, who concurred with the Chair of the Committee. However, I will have to check Hansard to see what kind of adjective Mr McGlone used to describe John Simpson.

The legislative consent motion is, in the round, very welcome. It will greatly incentivise the generation of low-carbon electricity and is aimed at better enabling us to achieve the targets that are outlined in the strategic energy framework. It is also very welcome in the sense that concessions have been secured to ensure that electricity generators that are based in the North will not be negatively impacted in the single electricity market as a result of the proposals' outworkings. That was one of the concerns that many of us had in the early stages of the process, so I congratulate the Minister and all those who were involved in the negotiations behind the scenes to achieve that result. I also thank all those who advised the Committee throughout the process and kept us on what may have been the right track.

All of us well understand the need to move to a low-carbon future. Indeed, a motion that the Alliance Party tabled that sought the development of a long-term energy strategy for our future was discussed in November last year and received unanimous support. I am alarmed at the definition that the British Government use in the Bill to determine low-carbon electricity generation. According to the Bill, low-carbon electricity generation is electricity generation:

"which in the opinion of the Secretary of State will contribute to a reduction in emissions of greenhouse gases".

I have seen that type of wording before. It has been used as a cover for natural gas to generate heat or power and is then put forward as some form of low-carbon technology. Natural gas is not an alternative to fossil fuels. It is not a low-carbon energy source. It is a carbon-intensive fuel, and any efforts to promote it as anything else are utterly pointless. If the objective is to reduce carbon emissions, the solution is not to consume more gas. Compared with coal, gas produces fewer carbon emissions. However, it is still much greater than other forms of electricity. The only solution is to move away from fossil fuels and on to greater renewable forms of energy. That is why the Bill is needed. Presently, the cheapest forms of electricity generation are the most polluting and the main source of our climate change emissions. Without government interventions to ensure the facilitation of more renewables, we will end up with not just higher bills as a result of rising gas and oil prices but ever-rising carbon emissions.

A number of concerned individuals and groups in Britain have raised serious concerns about the implications of the Energy Bill, which was recently passed there. The need for an energy Bill that is tailored to meet our unique circumstances has been outlined. Thankfully, that Bill will follow from this legislative consent motion at a later stage. I welcome the Minister's announcement today that she has secured Executive support to bring forward that energy Bill.

Some renewables companies have said that they would prefer if the existing system of subsidies that supports domestic renewables were made available to large-scale installations such as wind farms. Concerns have also been raised about a potential fall in investment as the subsidy switch-over kicks in, which the Minister referred to. New renewables installations, such as offshore wind farms, will continue to qualify for the current system — the renewables obligation — by which renewables generators receive certificates that they will sell in addition to the power if they come on stream by 2017. Their subsidies under that scheme will continue until 2037. The first new contracts should be ready to come into force by 2017, so, in theory, there should be no gap. Under the reforms, however, generators must apply for contracts for difference before turbines are built. That can take several years in the case of large offshore wind farms, which means that developers must begin to apply under the new system soon, at the risk that they would have been better off under the current system. I would like to hear from the Minister what action has been taken to address those concerns and how we can expect them to be resolved in the coming period.

I know that I have focused much of my remarks on potential concerns about the Bill, but other Members and the Minister have outlined a clear rationale for the benefits of the proposal and the clear need for it. I am still content to support it.

Mrs Foster: I thank everybody who spoke and who supported the motion. I thank my Executive colleagues, the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Business Committee for allowing this matter to be considered in such a timely fashion and for allowing the motion to be debated today.

I want to answer a few points that Members made. Mr Newton referred to the socialisation of the incentive across the UK. That is a critical issue and one that we spent some time on in the Department. If we had been pushed back to an incentive that applied just to Northern Ireland consumers, it would have been very difficult to reach the level that we have been able to attain in this Bill. Therefore, I want to acknowledge the work of my officials with Department of Energy and Climate Change officials in securing that socialisation across the UK. I also want to acknowledge the fact that I have retained the rights in relation to the strike price. That was something that we negotiated as well.

To pick up on Mr Flanagan's point about the definition of "low-carbon generation", it is referred to as renewables, nuclear and gas in the Bill. Natural gas is needed to manage the intermittency of wind, particularly in Northern Ireland, where we do not have nuclear power stations. We need that fast-start gas plant for when the wind does not blow. I ask the Member to acknowledge that, and the fact that his party has supported the gas line to the west. I want to see that developed as quickly as possible, particularly for businesses along that line, including agrifood businesses, and, indeed, Quinn Glass in our constituency of County Fermanagh, which is very much looking forward to having access to natural gas to give it an edge against its competitors. We need to acknowledge that natural gas plays a fundamental role in the energy market in Northern Ireland, and we will discuss that in the context of the Energy Bill when it comes to the Floor of the House, which I hope will be soon.

I believe that EMR will help to attract private sector investment now and will therefore deliver growth and jobs for the economy. In addition, I believe that providing clarity now on support for low-carbon generation will help to contribute to meeting our target of 40% renewable electricity by 2020.

Secondary legislation will be forthcoming to allow the EMR provisions to come fully into force in Northern Ireland. However, the Assembly must support the need to give developers the confidence and assurance to continue to invest in our growing renewables industry and help protect the Northern Ireland consumer from rising energy prices. I commend the motion to the Assembly, and I thank Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions in Part 1 of the Energy Bill, as introduced in the House of Commons on 29 November 2012, dealing with electricity market reform.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 12 February 2013

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Molloy] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. In the week that the horse meat crisis has been raging and there has been great public unease and a great adverse impact on our prime agricultural industry, why has there not been a single statement to the House on that issue from any relevant Minister? What will be done to address that deficit?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As you know, the Executive decide which Ministers give statements to the House. It is not the Speaker's role to direct that.

Ministerial Statements

Door-2-Door Transport

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I wish to make a statement on my plans for the urban Door-2-Door scheme.

The urban Door-2-Door scheme is part of the Department's transport programme for people with disabilities. It was first introduced in 1990, and the Door-2-Door element of the programme, which initially operated only in Belfast, was extended across Northern Ireland in 2006 to towns and cities with a population of 10,000 or more, following an independent review of the programme. The aim of the service is to target social exclusion and to provide an urban-based transport service for elderly and disabled people who find it difficult to use mainstream public transport. In 2011-12, over 148,000 passenger trips were undertaken by members of our Door-2-Door service.

In 2006, the Department entered into a contract with Chambers Coach Hire Ltd to provide Door-2-Door transport services in 27 urban areas across Northern Ireland to elderly and disabled people who are members of the scheme. In 2008, the Department entered into further contracts with Disability Action and Bridge Accessible Transport for the delivery of Door-2-Door transport services in Belfast and Londonderry respectively. In late 2010, Chambers Coach Hire experienced financial difficulties that led to the creation of Moneymore Coaches (In Administration) Limited, which took over the contract previously operated by Chambers. This was effectively a single tender action by the Department.

The contracts with Moneymore Coaches (In Administration) and Disability Action were due to expire on 24 May 2011, and the Department, with the assistance of the Department of Finance and Personnel's Central Procurement Directorate, carried out a tender exercise to appoint new operators for the services in all areas except for Londonderry, where the contract was not due to expire until September 2011. Preferred bidders were identified through the procurement exercise, and that was communicated in April 2011. However, subsequent legal action resulted in a ruling on 28 February 2012 in favour of the plaintiff, requiring the Department to re-procure the service or withdraw it.

To ensure a continuity of service provision to members while consideration was given to last February's ruling, and to ensure a continuity of service while we reviewed our policy on the provision of Door-2-Door services, the Department has awarded three single tender action contract extensions: to Disability Action to provide services in Belfast; to Bridge Accessible Transport to provide services in Londonderry; and to Moneymore Coaches (In Administration) to provide the services in 27 towns across Northern Ireland. These extensions are due to expire on 31 March 2013.

Work has been completed on reviewing the policy for the Door-2-Door scheme, and a consultation exercise commenced on 22 October 2012. That ended on 14 January 2013, and responses are currently being analysed and assessed. The position on single tender actions means that we now need to address the procurement issue. In the light of the court decision, when we go to the market, it is important that we do so in a way that our specification is clear and concise. We are working closely with colleagues from Central Procurement Directorate and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment on developing procurement proposals.

It is clear that some time will be required beyond 31 March 2013 to agree these new ideas, test them and then go to the market with a realistic, value-for-money and workable specification. In the interim, only two options are available for the existing contract extensions: extend the single awards for a further period using the existing providers; or terminate the contracts for all areas until our considerations are complete and a new procurement is finalised.

'Procurement Guidance Note 02/10' gives details on the single tender award process and of the consequences of improper use of single tender awards. Although we are satisfied that the current awards meet this guidance, the single tender award for Moneymore Coaches (In Administration) Limited has effectively been in place since October 2010, that for Disability Action has been in place since May 2011 and that for Bridge Accessible Transport has been in place since September 2012. Since, as I said earlier, it is clear that some time will be required beyond 31 March 2013 to agree new ideas, test them and then go to the market with a realistic, value-for-money and workable specification, I do not believe it is appropriate to continue to extend the existing single tender awards.

Terminating the contracts for all areas until such times as our considerations are complete and a new procurement is finalised draws a line under the current scheme. It fits readily with the consultation exercise that ended on 14 January, meaning that we will be clearer on the membership criteria, given the changes to the benefit system that will see the introduction of the new personal independence payment. Termination will also allow us more time to update our database and to redesign and arrange printing of new application forms and supporting literature for members, given the possible changes to eligibility criteria and to the passporting benefits.

Given the advantages of this option, I have decided that my Department will end the existing contracts with Bridge Accessible Transport, Disability Action and Moneymore Coaches (In Administration) when the current extensions run out on 31 March 2013. My staff will advise the three organisations of my decision today.

It is obviously important that the up to 2,200 current regular users of the Door-2-Door service are not left without any service for a period. Therefore, although the current Door-2-Door service will end when the current extensions run out on 31 March 2013, I have decided that, to meet the needs of existing users, we will put in place an interim service managed by Disability Action from 1 April 2013. Transport services will be provided or organised by Disability Action and they are likely to draw upon some or all of the rural transport partnerships, other voluntary organisations and, if necessary, other service providers.

Rural community transport partnerships were established in rural areas to help meet the transport needs for members who live in rurally isolated areas and who, due to reduced mobility, cannot access mainstream public transport. The services are a combination of demandresponsive transport for individual members through the Dial-a-Lift scheme and the provision of group transport to organisations that are also members of the partnerships.

The partnerships provide services in some 98% of rural Northern Ireland across seven operational areas. Each partnership is an independent company with its own board of directors. They are charitable organisations and operate on a not-for-profit basis. The partnerships have stimulated the development of community transport provision and make a valuable contribution to public transport accessibility. In 2011-12, the partnerships carried out more than 684,000 passenger trips. I believe that many, if not all, of the partnerships are well placed to assist with the interim service where Disability Action believes that it is appropriate. Existing members of the Door-2-Door schemes may be able to become members of rural transport partnerships and receive services in that way if the partnerships consider that appropriate.

My officials are working with Disability Action and other stakeholders to ensure that the interim service will be fully operational before the Easter break, and scheme members will be kept fully informed of the changes being implemented. The first letter to scheme members is issuing today. It is important to clarify that scheme members will be fully informed of the changes and that the letters are issuing to scheme members, not Members of the House.

The principles of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations (TUPE) are also being applied to avoid creating unnecessary worry and stress for the existing hard-working staff delivering the Door-2-Door services. From today, steps will be taken to engage with employers and staff to effect transfers quickly and painlessly. In parallel, my officials have set up a project team to move forward the procurement of Door-2-Door services in the future. It is our intention to commence pilot operations later this year and to evaluate the effectiveness of those pilots after a year of operation. Thereafter, we plan to tender for the provision of services that will best meet the needs of our intended service users.

I will finish by making it clear there is absolutely no question of a reduction in budget for the services in the interim or going forward. I commend the statement to the House.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before we begin questions, I remind Members that questions are on the statement about the Door-2-Door service.

Mr Lynch (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I thank the Minister for his statement. I note that he emphasises that strong procurement procedures will be followed, particularly in light of the recently published audit report. Is the Minister content that clients of the service will not be inconvenienced by the interim arrangements, and will he indicate whether he will consider extending the service to include other socially excluded categories, such as young people and the unemployed?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development for his question and for his broad support for the measures that I have introduced today.

The bottom line, and it is very important, is that there is no reduction in the budget allocated to this. The resources are being maintained. I hope that, as a result of the changes that I am announcing today, the service can even be improved. I hope that, for those who avail themselves of this important service, there will be little or no disruption to their lives. They will still be able to make contact on the same telephone numbers to arrange available transport. Therefore, this service regulates the current situation, and I hope that, as we go into the future, we can look positively at how we can improve it further.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will the Minister detail why he has chosen Disability Action to deliver the service and not any of the other organisations or, indeed, the Community Transport Association?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. Of course, he, like most Members, will have a high regard for Disability Action as an organisation and for its capacity to provide a service. It is a voluntary and a community organisation that has been providing services for disabled people in Northern Ireland for a very long time, predating the Door-2-Door scheme. It is clear to me that its ethos of putting the needs of disabled people to the forefront of its business, and its experience in providing services and dealing with Departments, makes it the organisation best placed to seek co-operation from others. It understands disabled people's transport needs in particular and knows how to make the interim service work.

10.45 am

Before further procurement can be finalised, temporary arrangements with established voluntary and community organisations is the best option.

Mr Hussey: I, too, thank the Minister for his statement. I am pleased to hear him make it clear that there will be no cut whatsoever in the funding for that important service, which, I believe, currently costs in the region of £3 million.

He made a brief reference to telephone numbers. Will he explain how current users will receive telephone contact details for the interim service?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his support for today's announcement. It is important that there be as little disruption to the users as possible. With that in mind, arrangements have been put in place to ensure that the telephone numbers that customers currently use to contact their provider will not change, which will allow them to continue to avail of that important service.

That will give some comfort and minimise any disruption or inconvenience that may be felt. I am confident that Disability Action will be able to deal effectively with the transition. Understandably, there may be teething problems, but I hope that, with the same telephone numbers in place, the users, who are the important people in the process, will feel able to make the necessary arrangements for their transport.

Mr Dallat: I welcome the Minister's statement and the energy that he brings to his Department. In the penultimate paragraph, he mentions future pilot schemes. Does he agree that Door-2-Door Transport will become meaningful only when we have proper integrated transport systems, similar to those developed in Britain and the Republic of Ireland? Will he assure the House that before he finishes his term as Minister we will have a scheme up and running?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his always flattering approach.

Mr A Maginness: Fawning.

Mr Kennedy: Yes. I understand his point, which is important. He will know that we are putting a rural transport pilot scheme in place in Dungannon and Cookstown. The link to Door-2-Door is there, but it is not yet complete. We will continue to explore ways in which to bring forward schemes that best suit the needs of the entire community, rural and urban.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for his helpful statement. I particularly welcome the pilot projects that he intends to undertake. Will the pilot providers be able to participate in any future tendering process, given the Department of the Environment's (DOE) plans for driver licensing?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. The arrangements that I have announced today are for the interim while we prepare for the new scheme. The new scheme will have to be piloted and tested, and I hope that the operators will have an opportunity to tender.

I will have close discussions with DOE about licensing arrangements. The Member's point is well made, and we will make sure that we are aware of it as we go forward.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for his statement. Can the Minister reassure me that the Door-2-Door scheme in my own constituency of North Down will not suffer as a result of this change? Can he assure me that Disability Action will be able to take on the workload from Moneymore Coaches and Bridge Accessible Transport? Can he also enlighten the House on how the procurement process went so wrong that Moneymore Coaches was able to overturn the decision in court? What was the cost of that to the Department?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for what I think is his support of the measure that I am bringing forward. I was not quite clear about that.

Rather than dwelling on past experiences, I want to take forward the Door-2-Door service: a service whereby people avail themselves of transport facilities to help them in their daily lives. As the Member rightly said, the service is widely used in the north Down area. I am aware of his interest in the Door-2-Door scheme. We are, obviously, entering a period of transition from the old arrangements, ending the single tender actions and giving Disability Action the opportunity to provide this service.

I am confident that Disability Action will do a very good job. Its reputation goes before it. I would be concerned if any Member thought that Disability Action was somehow not capable of providing an efficient and effective service. Yes; there will be teething and transitional problems initially. However, Disability Action and my Department will seek to work through those problems as quickly as possible. We are attempting to ease those as much as possible. The fact that the same telephone numbers are to be used for people to avail themselves of the service is an important benefit.

I very much hope that the service will continue and go forward. It is absolutely crucial to underline the fact that we are still putting in the same resource. This is not a cut. It is not, as some people predicted, a case of trying to save money. It is about a more effective and efficient service as we go forward and begin to plan for the more permanent arrangements that need to be put in place.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister confirm to the House that the period from the termination of the contracts until the introduction of the full scheme will be as brief as possible to give advantage to the other members?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. It is important that the transition is as seamless as possible, and that is obviously my intention. The current arrangements, which run until the end of March, will continue to be delivered by the current operators. Thereafter, Disability Action, in conjunction with the other providers, will take on the service. I very much hope that it will be seamless and that people will not encounter any serious or significant difficulty in availing themselves of these very necessary services.

Mr G Robinson: I thank the Minister for his statement. Does the Minister foresee any service or job losses as a result of his announcement? Will he do everything that he can to maintain the current level of service in both areas?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. He raises the very important point of how staff involved in the current operation will fare. We very much want to protect them and encourage the protection of their terms and conditions. We envisage that the new provider, Disability Action, will need to avail itself of the services of drivers and associated staff. We will co-operate with staff fully to ensure that that happens as seamlessly and effortlessly as possible.

Mr McCallister: I welcome the Minister's statement. The Minister knows that I have a long-standing interest in this area. He referred to TUPE. Can he assure me that clients will see pretty much the same faces behind the wheel so that there is no change for them and no disruption in the way that the system operates for clients and drivers?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. Indeed, I pay tribute to him for his interest in this particular issue, on which he has made long-standing representations on a constituency basis and otherwise

It is my strong sense that the same drivers and the same people will be involved in providing these important services. I pay tribute to the drivers and to the staff who have provided the services over the years and will hopefully continue to do so. I very much expect that there will be little or no change in many of the personnel involved in this service

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Príomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Minister, I thank you for your statement. The Door-2-Door Transport service continued the practice of taking people to hospital appointments while, in my area and other areas like mine, rural transport was stopped from doing that. Will the new arrangement you have set up carry on the practice of taking people to hospital appointments? Will you look at reinstating that service in rural areas where you have withdrawn it?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. It is important to stress that the Door-2-Door Transport service was never envisaged as being purely a health service transport service. It is important that we realise that it provides a service to members of the community with particular access needs for a range of activities.

I am aware of the issue that he raises on a continual basis. Of course, as we move forward to prepare for the more permanent arrangements, I will look again at that. The initial rationale behind Door-2-Door Transport was not to provide simply a health service transport service. It is more than that, it needs to be more than that and it is important that it continues to be more than that.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he confirm that, under the new delivery of the scheme, there will be no difference in the cost to the service user? Furthermore, what account will the review that is being analysed in relation to the transport provision take of the interdepartmental working group that is looking at health and education transport provision? Is there any scope in that review for providing a much more effective and cost-efficient service?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question. Indeed, she makes a very good suggestion. Of course we are already aware of that interdepartmental review, which will, and should, feed into any pilot scheme that we come up with or any new proposal for the permanent arrangements that need to be put in place.

Certainly, as I have clearly indicated today, there is no reduction in the budget for the service. I want to stress and reiterate that. This has the potential to improve the service for the people who use it and perhaps to add to the numbers who use it. I hope that those are the positive outcomes of the announcement today.

Mr Storey: As someone who used public transport this morning to travel to the House, I would not be as commending as the Member for East Londonderry Mr Dallat about the Minister and his operations. The train was excellent, but the bus was atrocious, because I arrived here late.

However, moving on to his statement, is the Minister aware that, under the current regulations, organisations such as the rural community transport partnerships are unable to apply for contracts? That has inhibited them, as partnerships, from growing. Will he look at every possible means of expanding the rural community transport provision and providers to include organisations such as North Coast Community Transport, which provides an invaluable service to my constituency?

11.00 am

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. I am genuinely sorry for his transport difficulties this morning, although he is someone who I think missed the bus a long time ago. [Laughter.] He makes a good point, and, as we go forward, we will give consideration to how the overall service can best provide rural and urban transport.

Mr P Ramsey: Minister, I am chair of the all-party group on disability, and a number of your colleagues are on that group. You will be aware that this issue is regularly on the agenda. I strongly welcome the statement, particularly in the context of Disability Action taking on the additional work, which it has the capacity to do. Can the Minister assure the House and all those with disabilities across Northern Ireland that a consistent service will be available to all existing users?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member, and I pay tribute to his long-standing interest in the issue. In bringing forward the changes, we do so with the intention that the maximum level of service cannot only be maintained but improved. That is what we seek and what we are about. That is why there is no cut in the budget for this and why we believe it to be an important resource. I very much hope that Disability Action and the operators will have success in not only maintaining services but improving them.

Mr Allister: Is the Minister, in his statement, really announcing a soft landing to end a separate urban door-to-door scheme and bring about its fusion into the rural scheme? Is that really what he is saying? Given the role of Disability Action, has it been engaged on foot of a single tender action?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. I have a sense that the Member sees conspiracy in almost every statement, but perhaps that is being overly cynical.

The situation needed to be addressed because the time period for the single tender was to expire at the end of March. It was sensible to review the situation and see how it could work more effectively and efficiently. That is why we have come up with the proposal. Disability Action will now be the main contractor.

It is an interim solution, and it is my intention and that of the Department to use pilot schemes to bring forward a more permanent and equally a more effective and efficient scheme. This interim measure is because of the very real time pressure and deadlines of the end of March. Decisions had to be taken, and the decision that I outlined today is in the best interests of Door-2-Door Transport and community transport generally.

Education Maintenance Allowance

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to outline to the Assembly the Executive's decisions for the future of the means-tested education maintenance allowance (EMA).

The EMA scheme was jointly introduced in September 2004 by the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) and the Department of Education (DE). The main purpose of the scheme is to encourage young people from lower-income backgrounds to remain in post-compulsory education at school or college. EMA supports key Programme for Government priorities to close the gap in educational underachievement between those who are least and most disadvantaged and improve the participation of young people in education. At present, it consists of weekly payments of £30, £20 or £10 depending on household income and bonus payments totalling £300 per annum.

Findings from a recent joint review of EMA had highlighted that the scheme was not as effectively targeted as it could be. Over 60% of students who received EMA indicated that they would have remained in education even if they had not received it. On the other hand, the review identified cases where EMA had made a real difference for retention.

It is important to say that, from the outset, both I and the Minister of Education were committed to the retention of the EMA and were determined that young people from lower-income families would continue to be assisted to stay in education and training. Nevertheless, good governance meant that we had to address the issue concerning how effectively the current scheme was targeted.

At the Executive meeting on 5 July 2012, it was agreed that a public consultation and associated equality impact assessment on the future of the EMA scheme should be undertaken with a view to implementing any agreed changes from the academic year 2013-14. On 30 July 2012, the public consultation was launched, and it ran for 14 weeks until 2 November. It contained five options for the future structure of EMA that had been considered and costed in light of the need to better target the scheme and to find certain financial savings.

A number of key findings emerged from the review and consultation. The majority of respondents wanted EMA retained in some form and were in favour of a single payment of £30 a week. The current bonus awards of £300 per annum — agreed through the learning agreements that learners sign each year — are recognised by a substantial proportion of stakeholders as improving completion of coursework, timekeeping and behaviour, although these outcomes are not the primary objectives of the scheme. Although a substantial proportion of stakeholders supported the retention of the bonus payments, the majority of respondents agreed that the £300 annual bonus payments ought to be reduced.

A number of options included in the consultation document considered a household income threshold of £16,190 in line with the free school meals criteria. However, it was noted that this threshold was much lower than the current EMA threshold of £22,930 and the EMA thresholds in Scotland and Wales, and it was concluded that a threshold at this level would exclude too many disadvantaged families and young people from the scheme. A number of respondents to the consultation, including the National Union of Students-Union of Students in Ireland (NUS-USI), suggested the addition of a second household income threshold for families with more than one dependent child, in line with the Scottish and Welsh EMA schemes.

I can now advise the Assembly that, taking these various factors into account, the Executive have agreed that the scheme should be better targeted to more effectively support families most in need. To that end, they have determined that the £20 and £10 bands should be withdrawn and be replaced by a single band of £30 a week, payable to children from households with income of £20,500 or less with one dependent child, or £22,500 or less where there are two or more dependent children. The implementation of these changes will result in a 21% improvement of targeting, based on the numbers forecast to be eligible for the scheme in 2014-15, and a 10% improvement on current numbers.

The Executive also considered whether the bonus payments should continue to be payable under the scheme. They noted that around 60% of EMA coordinators in the learning centres saw considerable value in the bonuses. They believed that bonuses made a difference to behaviour, timekeeping and completion of coursework and that the removal of the bonuses could potentially have a negative impact on the motivation and performance of learners and could result in an impact on the participation of older learners and, in turn, on retention rates of the scheme.

The responses to the public consultation on the future of EMA demonstrated that there was support for the retention of bonus payments, with almost 70% of respondents stating that bonus payments of at least £100 per annum should be retained. The Education Minister, in particular, is also very keen to retain bonuses as part of the scheme, given the important contribution that bonuses have made in incentivising young people to attend school or college and complete the necessary coursework.

Consequently, the Executive have concluded that bonuses should be retained in the scheme, albeit in a modified form, to ensure successful delivery of the core objectives of the scheme and the wider Executive priorities for tackling disadvantage as articulated in the Programme for Government, including closing the gap in educational achievement and participation rates.

The Executive have, therefore, agreed to continue to include a bonus element in the scheme comprising a £200 annual bonus payable in two tranches. This represents a reduction of £100 in the current £300 annual bonus. I emphasise that no bonuses are payable in similar schemes in Great Britain, so, once again, the Executive have developed a solution to address the differing needs of the population here compared with elsewhere.

The new scheme, excluding bonus payments, will produce savings sufficient to meet the target set by the Executive. The bonus payments are largely being met by a transfer of resources from the Department of Education, with a smaller contribution from my Department. Although the budget and responsibility for the implementation of EMA rest with my Department, it is a cross-cutting issue with the Department of Education, and I am pleased to have reached a very satisfactory conclusion with the Education Minister. I am also grateful for the support of the Executive, and especially the assistance of the Finance Minister, in reaching this conclusion.

That decision now represents an appropriately targeted and financially sustainable way forward on education maintenance allowance, and I commend it to the House.

Mr B McCrea (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): I received a briefing from the Minister earlier this morning about this statement, and I conveyed to him then, as I convey to him now, that I am disappointed to have received the statement in this manner. The Committee can find no record that it received a summary of responses to the consultation, as is normal practice. I am quite sure that the Committee would have wanted to talk about this matter in some detail. It is certainly a matter of public interest, and I am, frankly, shocked that it should be brought to the Assembly as a fait accompli.

There are significant questions that we want to ask, which the format of this debate does not permit. However, I have a specific question. The Minister says:

"The implementation of these changes will result in a 21% improvement of targeting".

What does that mean exactly? Does it mean that 21% fewer people will receive EMA support, or how has he arrived at those figures?

When I look at the impact of the changes in the threshold, I find that this will affect hard-pressed families in Northern Ireland. I would like the Minister to tell us how many children and parents will be affected. What saving, because this appears to be a cost-saving exercise, does he seek to make from that?

I conclude by saying to the Minister that this is not the appropriate way to go about making major changes that have financial implications for the people of Northern Ireland. The Committee should have been properly consulted. Had it been, it would have consulted properly and engaged with the Department. I suspect that Committee members present will be extremely disappointed in the way that this has been handled.

Dr Farry: The Chair of the Committee has made a number of points, and I will try to respond to all of them. First, he spoke of procedures. This is an Executive decision that was taken last week at the Executive meeting and which we are reporting to the House today. As such, this is the first opportunity that we have had to report on the Executive's decision. It is appropriate that I come to the Assembly to make this announcement, and we are happy to be here and answer questions on the issue.

The issue is a joint one between my Department and the Department of Education, and we have to formulate a joint position for the two Departments taking the issue forward, in addition to formulating a common position for the Executive. A public consultation ran for 14 weeks in 2012. At no stage did the Committee express any view on that consultation or seek to give its views to the Department.

The Chair of the Committee is probably the last person in the Chamber who wishes to take direction from anyone, least of all those in his party. It is important to acknowledge that the Committee sets its own agenda and seeks information from the Department on issues.

11.15 am

From standing back and observing over the past 18 months, I have been amazed that some of the critically important issues on which the Department sought to engage the Committee have not been picked up by it. We have had to ask several times, although there have been other matters that the Committee has become involved with intensively. I respect its role, but it is for the Committee to set its agenda.

If the Committee wants to have a dialogue with us about setting a forward work programme, we are more than happy to do so. In that light, we are happy for officials to attend the Committee in the near future to give it a full briefing on the outworkings of the consultation and a summary of the responses received. However, I stress that that was a decision for the Executive to take, and we are reporting what was decided.

This is good news for students and young people in Northern Ireland, and we should not forget that. We are announcing a scheme for education maintenance allowance that is better than that in any other jurisdiction in the United Kingdom, and it is important that we bear that in mind. England has abolished EMA entirely and replaced it with a bursary scheme, with expenditure at a third of the previous level. Our scheme is similar to those in Scotland and Wales, but no bonus is available in those jurisdictions. We are continuing to invest in a bigger and better way than other jurisdictions.

We acknowledge that we needed to ensure that the scheme was better targeted. We have identified situations in which it has not made a difference to people's decisions to stay in education. That money could be better employed in supporting young people, as opposed to using it in ineffectively. We have now achieved better targeting of the scheme, with the money going to those who will benefit most from it.

With the additional contributions from the Department of Education, there is only a small reduction in the overall level of EMA expenditure in the Budget. However, those resources will be concentrated in fewer hands. Around a quarter of young people in Northern Ireland receive EMA, and in that quarter we will see a reduction of around 10% in the current figures. However, if we look ahead to the projection of recipients, there will be a reduction of around 21% in 2014-15. I again stress that this is an investment in young people, and it sits alongside all the other expenditure to support young people.

Mr Buchanan (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): I thank the Minister for bringing the statement to the House. However, I am disappointed that the Committee did not see the responses or anything else prior to it coming before the House, nor had it any opportunity to discuss it further. I listened to the Minister's criticisms, but I would have thought it good practice for the Committee to have seen the responses, as it will have a number of questions to ask when it sits again.

How many students stand to lose out because the £10 and the £20 band thresholds will be done away with?

Dr Farry: I thank the Deputy Chair for his comments. The Committee will receive a summary of the consultation responses in the very near future. We will ensure that that takes place so that the Executive's decision can be further scrutinised in Committee. However, I stress again that we are reporting an Executive decision to the Assembly.

We estimate that, for 2011-12, there were 22,367 recipients of the £30 band, 2,338 recipients of the £20 band and 1,759 recipients of the £10 band. In essence, we are removing around 4,000 from the current range of EMA recipients.

Given the current economic situation, there is obvious upward pressure on numbers receiving EMA. We project that, by 2014-15, about 26,000 people will be eligible to receive the £30 band.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Like other Members, I welcome the announcement, the agreement at Executive level and the certainty that that creates for students. I am also happy to see the Minister give some sort of acknowledgement that the five options that were put forward last July were unacceptable. That was the view of my party when we responded. However, I support the Chair's comments in respect of how this has been handled procedurally. That has been disappointing, and the fact that an urgent oral statement has been made raises questions. This is all based on a flawed review with a small percentage of respondents that was then presented as the view of the majority of the student population, which is not the case. Will the Minister outline the predicted reduction in the annual EMA budget as a result of this agreement? What efforts have been made by DEL to find those savings elsewhere in the Department? I would also like to know whether the Committee was ever made aware that NUS-USI put in an alternative proposal.

Dr Farry: In respect of the consultation being flawed, I remind Mr Flanagan that it was a joint consultation by my Department and the Department of Education. It was signed up to by two Ministers from two different political parties, and it was endorsed by the Executive. I do not think that the counterproposals from NUS-USI have been reported to the Committee because we have not yet received a summary of responses, but the Minister of Education and I have had meetings with NUS-USI and have engaged with it on its proposals. Equally, as an organisation, it has sought to engage with a wide range of MLAs. So, although that engagement may not have happened with the Committee, I would be surprised if individual Members were not aware of what NUS-USI was seeking to achieve.

In respect of the financing, there was a requirement from the Executive to find certain savings in relation to EMA. All the options in the original consultation paper were costed on that basis. We have ensured that the core of the new EMA scheme is within those parameters. When I say "the core scheme", that is minus the issue of the bonus, which is being funded by a transfer from the Department of Education to my Department's baseline that will be addressed in due course by the Finance Minister. My Department is also making a smaller contribution towards that. The EMA scheme is now financially sustainable. I want to give the message that any uncertainty around EMA is now over, and we will have something that we can stand over in the coming years.

Mrs Overend: From memory of my time on the Committee for Employment and Learning a number of months ago, I recall that the analysis of EMA failed to accurately portray the reasons why it failed certain students. How does the Minister propose to measure its success, going forward? Can the Minister provide the exact cost to the Department of Education and the Department for Employment and Learning and the difference in cost?

Dr Farry: We measure the success or otherwise of the scheme primarily in terms of the retention of young people in secondary education or further education. A second element is the level of achievement that those students attain due to the support that comes from EMA. There was some inefficiency in the scheme in that the majority of young people indicated that, while EMA was useful, it was not making a difference to their decision to stay in education. To an extent, that will still be with us under a revised scheme. We are not going to fully address that issue no matter how we reorientate the scheme.

The current scheme for EMA costs about £27 million per annum. The revised scheme, short of the issue of the bonus, addresses and identifies savings of about £5 million, which slightly more than meets the recurring pressure of about £4·6 million that the Executive have presented us with. The cost of the £200 bonuses will be £2·1 million in 2013-14 and a recurring cost of £4·1 million thereafter. The Department of Education is paying £1·85 million in 2013-14 and £3·6 million thereafter. My Department is paying £250,000 in 2013-14 and £500,000 recurring.

Mr P Ramsey: I, like other members of the Committee, particularly the Chair and Deputy Chair, want to express my genuine concern. This is the most important subject for families and young people across Northern Ireland. It is hugely disappointing that the Committee — a scrutiny Committee — did not have the opportunity to look at those consultations. The consultation in itself presented a bogus choice between one group and another, and that was part of our submission to the Department.

The Committee has been engaging with this subject matter since the commencement of the consultation. There are very few weeks when we are not talking around the edges of EMA, so I am surprised to hear from you even the criticism of the Committee. If you have something to say to the Committee, you should say it to the Committee and not in the House. I have to say that.

The format does not present us with an opportunity to engage effectively and properly in challenging this. For example, Minister, Include Youth continuously presented a very good case about vulnerable young people in terms of making a special case for them, as is done in Scotland, to bring them in through the EMA. What have you done in those circumstances?

Dr Farry: Mr Ramsey's comments confirm some of my ongoing frustrations with the situation. First of all, the Committee may well have had an interest in EMA but there has been nothing to stop it seeking information and updates from the Department at any stage. This has been a very live issue over the past six months and longer. We have not received correspondence or requests for information from the Committee on this issue, and we receive a lot of requests for information from the Committee on other matters on an ongoing basis.

Second of all, what we have produced is, actually, a good scheme for Northern Ireland and a better scheme than in other jurisdictions in the rest of the UK. Let us also remember that we are doing a lot of other things to invest in young people. Mr Ramsey referred to the campaign by Include Youth for a form of EMA for those who are on community and voluntary-type schemes supported by the European social fund that have been engaging with the issue of NEETs. There was a debate in the Assembly on that issue many months ago, calling on me to act in that matter. I am disappointed that I am being asked what I have done on that, having announced several months ago as part of the NEETs strategy that we have introduced a training allowance for young people who are on those schemes. So, the proposal from Include Youth has been addressed under a quicker timetable than Include Youth and other organisations asked of the Department. We have done what Mr Ramsey asked months ago, so I am at a loss as to why I have been asked today why I have not done it.

Mr P Ramsey: It is EMA I am talking about.

Mr McCarthy: I welcome the Minister's statement and his continuing efforts to make sure that young people get the opportunity to further advance themselves. I welcome the fact that a number of students were in the Public Gallery to hear what was being said. How does the new system compare with the proposals from the National Union of Students and the Union of Students in Ireland?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr McCarthy for his comments. I stress that we have had a positive engagement with the NUS-USI. The proposals that we have outlined from the Executive are greater in terms of investment than the consultation response from the NUS/USI proposed. So, we have actually gone further as an Executive than the students asked us to in what was, I have to say, the sensible and realistic response that came from NUS-USI. We have followed through on their proposal for the retention of the £30 allowance. We have taken on board their comments about a split differential threshold for low-income households with one child versus those with two or more children. We have listened to what they had to say about the bonus and gone further than what was proposed. That is why it is important we get the message out that we have continued to invest in young people.

Mr Ramsey made some comments from a sedentary position after I had sat down. He was talking about EMA. What we have announced for young people through the NEETs projects is EMA-equivalent. We may not be branding it as EMA, but it is precisely what was asked of us by the sector by way of a training allowance.

11.30 am

Mr Ross: I share the concern of other Committee members that the Committee was not kept in the loop on this, but I will perhaps buck the trend by being a little more positive about the content of the statement. I do not think that an EMA system in which 60% of recipients of the payment would stay in education anyhow can be considered a good use of public money. Therefore, I think reforms that target the most vulnerable to ensure that they get a payment to stay in education and save the public purse money are a positive development.

I want to point out something that the Minister said in his statement. He said there was a fear that the:

"removal of ... bonuses could potentially have a negative impact on the motivation and performance of learners".

Does the Minister agree that the motivation for young people to stay in education should be to gain a good qualification to secure a job and get on in life, not, primarily, because they get paid to do so?

Dr Farry: I agree with the comments from Mr Ross on the overall design of the scheme and the rationale for students. It is important to recognise that EMA has played a positive role in supporting students from low-income households and enabling them to have the freedom to attend school or college without the same degree of financial worry. It is important to stress, of course, that EMA is not part of the formal welfare system in this country; it is an entirely different type of initiative. That has been, to some extent, the outworkings of that. At the same time, we should seek to avoid a situation where people, particularly young people, do something only because there is a financial incentive for it, whether that is to engage, through the EMA, or go on work experience when they are unemployed. Finance may well be an important consideration, but it should not be the sole consideration. The more important consideration is that young people understand the importance of education, training and work experience in building their career. It is only through upskilling and experience that young people will be competitive in an increasingly difficult and challenging labour market. I think that most young people understand that and are responding positively to the initiatives that are being put forward by my Department and others.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I welcome the Minister's statement. I am sure that many students across the North do so too, as it brings some relief, especially considering the bonuses. This remains a vital resource for many of our young people who wish to remain in education, not the motivation for doing so in the first place. When you consider that we have been able to retain EMA and keep university fees frozen at the current level, there can be no doubt that we have the most affordable and supportive arrangements for students of anywhere else on these islands. I especially welcome the contribution from the Education Minister, John O'Dowd, on protecting the bonus payments and ultimately ensuring the success of the scheme for local students. Look at what the Tories wanted to do and have done in England and Wales: abolish the scheme entirely. In Scotland, they have not been able to retain the bonuses. So, today's statement is to be welcomed. How will the Minister monitor the outworkings of the changes to EMA so that they do not negatively impact on the core aim of the scheme?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Hazzard for his comments and the context that he has set. It is important to reflect on that for a moment. Overall, this Executive are investing and doing more for young people on a pro rata basis than any of their counterparts. Mr Hazzard referred to the freezing of tuition fees for local students at local universities. That has already made a clear difference to people choosing the option of higher education. We also have a strategy for widening participation in higher education to ensure that we have a proper, fair, balanced profile of students coming forward and encourage under-represented sections of the community in Northern Ireland to access higher education.

We then have the youth employment scheme, where we also invest more on a pro rata basis than our counterparts elsewhere. From a standing start, we have now created the new budget to invest in NEETs, and a range of programmes have been launched over the past number of months as part of a new NEETs strategy. That includes a training allowance for young people who were previously on the European social fund-supported schemes. What we are doing on EMA, which is a further investment in young people, sits very well within that context. Through this, the scheme will be better targeted, so that the young people most in need of EMA support will continue to receive it, and it is not being withdrawn at all. We are well ahead of our counterparts in that regard.

Mr Storey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): I thank the Minister for his statement to the House today. I think that members of the Education Committee will certainly view with great interest the scheme as proposed. There are many elements to it. It is interesting that almost 70% of respondents stated that they wanted bonuses retained and that that is actually what the Minister has done, which he informed the House of today. I think that most Members will welcome the fact that the revised scheme does not focus all entitlement for assistance solely on students entitled to free school meals, which is an issue that the Education Committee has looked at on a number of occasions.

Given the Minister's answer to the previous question about what is being done for young people and in light of this scheme and the focus to ensure that we target our resources appropriately, does the Minister now feel that it is time to revisit with the Education Minister an issue that the Education Minister decided to put in the bin, which is a 14-19 policy? That is a key component to assisting schemes such as EMA and others that he has outlined in the House today.

Dr Farry: Again, I thank Mr Storey for his comments. I think that what he is alluding to is that what we are doing on EMA is only one part of a much bigger picture in how we support young people. It is important that we coordinate what happens in further education and in our secondary education system.

Yesterday, we announced the apprenticeship and youth training review, which, with respect to my Department's functions, is a further investment in young people. I remain happy to engage with the Education Minister on these issues, be it the more tight, discrete entitlement framework or a much broader 14-19 strategy. It is important that form follows function and that we ensure that we take a holistic approach to the interests of young people; that they have access to the best courses, no matter where they are provided, and the best teaching and advice, no matter where that is provided; and that we incentivise them to stay on education and engage with it.

Mr Dallat: I welcome the Minister's statement and note that he is back in the comfort zone of the Executive.

The Minister will, of course, be aware that far too many people leave school without any basic qualifications and that many of them emigrate to other countries with no skills. Does he agree that it is critical that he engage with the widest possible political spectrum when discussing the future of such people, particularly those who have been failed by the secondary system and desperately need to stay on at school to acquire the skills that will give them the dignity of a career that they will not have with no skills at all

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Dallat for his comments. I am perfectly comfortable where I am.

First of all, it is important to recognise that the Executive have recognised the importance of upskilling across a very broad front. Certainly, within my responsibilities, we have a wide range of schemes and initiatives that seek to address those issues. I responded to Mr Storey by stressing the importance of collaboration and co-operation between my Department and the Department of Education on how we take those issues forward. Although it is not my direct responsibility to respond for the Department of Education, it is important to acknowledge that there are firm and quite challenging targets in the Programme for Government for attainment at GCSE, particularly in maths and English. It is important that we ensure that as many young people as possible are trained in the core competencies and that, in turn, we have a training system that picks up and gives fresh opportunities to young people who, unfortunately, leave school without those basic qualifications.

Mr Allister: The Minister likes to boast that he comes from a party that values, indeed exemplifies, consensus, yet, today, he has belligerently displayed a cat-and-mouse attitude with the Committee and dodged the Chairman's question, which was this: why was there no feedback to the Committee on the outcome of the consultation? He tells us today that he will provide it now, after the event, without the Committee asking him to provide it. If he can provide it so magnanimously after the event, why did he never think to provide it before the event?

Dr Farry: The tone introduced in response to my statement was not initiated by me, but, if people want to make comments and go off into procedural matters rather than focus on the substance, that is their choice, and I will respond to and address those comments. I believe that I was clear in stating the position earlier, but, for the benefit of Mr Allister, I will state it again. First, this was a matter that went before the Executive: the Executive reached a position last Thursday; and I am here to report today. I would have been here on Monday, but there were issues with the Student Loans Company and implementation that we had to address first. Secondly, this is a joint matter for my Department and the Department of Education, and it was a joint consultation by the two Departments. It is, therefore, a cross-cutting issue for the Executive and between the two Departments. I make a commitment that we will brief the Committee on the responses to the consultation as soon as we can. I am sure that Mr Storey, as Chair of the Education Committee, is equally looking forward to a similar briefing from his Minister on the issue.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the retention of the education maintenance allowance. I am well aware of the real difference that it makes to young people, students and families across Northern Ireland. Despite the political showmanship of Mr Allister, I welcome the fact that, at first glance, the new model appears to reflect quite a number of responses to the public consultation. How will the EMA link with other measures being taken to ensure that all our young people have an equal opportunity to achieve their educational potential? How will these changes be communicated to young people and families across Northern Ireland?

Dr Farry: I thank my colleague for his comments. That is another reason why it is important that we made the statement today. We have given an assurance to young people, particularly those from a low-income household, that they can have surety about the future of EMA. I appreciate that there was some concern in the wider community about the matter.

EMA is part of a much wider suite of policies that we have to support people in education. Again, I highlight what the Executive have done on tuition fees and our strategy on widening participation. All of that is about encouraging young people to stay in education, to progress in education and to consider a range of flexible pathways through which they can achieve higher skills. As we conclude the debate, it is worth stressing to the House that we need to invest in a major upskilling of the population in Northern Ireland. We know what we have to achieve by 2020 if we are to be internationally competitive, so we need to encourage more and more young people to invest in their skills and their future. Their future is our future.

Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister for Regional Development, Mr Danny Kennedy, to move the Consideration Stage of the Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development).]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: No amendments have been tabled to the Bill. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to group the three clauses for the Question on stand part, followed by the long title.

Clauses 1 to 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Budget Bill: Second Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Budget Bill [NIA 18/11-15] be agreed.

Accelerated passage of the Bill through the Assembly is necessary to ensure Royal Assent as early as possible in March. That provides legal authority for Departments and other public bodies to draw down and spend cash and use the resources in the Bill in 2012-13 to ensure the continuity of public services into 2013-14.

As the House is by now well aware, the preparation of the detailed Estimates and the related Budget Bill under consideration today is a difficult undertaking given the timetable involved. The Bill and the Estimates must reflect the latest financial monitoring position, which was announced to the Assembly on 22 January, and yet the Bill requires Royal Assent before the end of the financial year. It is no easy task to bring the Bill to the Assembly in that small window of opportunity. I am, therefore, grateful that the Committee for Finance and Personnel has confirmed, in line with Standing Order 42, that it is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals in the Bill and is content that the Bill proceed by accelerated passage. I welcome and appreciate the assistance of the Committee in that matter.

Given that today's debate is on the content of the Budget Bill, I shall now briefly outline the purpose of the legislation and draw attention to its main provisions. The debate follows the Bill's First Stage yesterday, which, in turn, followed the debate and approval of the Supply resolutions for the 2012-13 spring Supplementary Estimates and the 2013-14 Vote on Account. The purpose of the Bill is to give legislative effect to the 2012-13 spring Supplementary Estimates and the 2013-14 Vote on Account, which were laid before the Assembly on 4 February 2012. Copies of the Budget Bill and the explanatory and financial memorandum have been made available to Members today.

I do not intend to spend time merely repeating the detail that I gave Members yesterday. However, in accordance with the nature of the Second Stage debate envisaged under Standing Order 32 and for the benefit of Members, I will summarise briefly the Bill's main features. Its purpose is to authorise the issue of £15,459,758,000 from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund in 2012-13. That contains an additional £268,502,000 since the Main Estimates were presented last June. The cash is drawn down on a daily basis as needed from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund, which is managed by my Department on behalf of the Executive.

The Bill also authorises the use of resources totalling £16,572,965,000 by Departments and certain other bodies. That is some £697,463,000 more than was approved in the Main Estimates in June. Members will note that the amounts are detailed in part II of each departmental spring Supplementary Estimate for 2012-13.

In addition, the Bill revises, for 2012-13, the limit on the amount of accruing resources that may be directed by my Department to be used for the purposes in column 1 of schedule 2. That limit includes both operating and non-operating accruing resources — in other words, current and capital receipts — and amounts to £2,270,977,000.

Under section 8 of the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001, a direction on the actual use of the accruing resources will be provided by way of a DFP minute that will be laid before the Assembly in March, following Royal Assent to the Bill. Therefore, the Bill not only authorises the use of resources but authorises accruing resources, bringing the resources for use by Departments and other public bodies to almost £19 billion.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I would like to get through the statement, and then there will be opportunities.

The sums to be issued from the Consolidated Fund are to be appropriated by each Department or public body for services as listed in column 1 of schedule 1 to the Bill, while the resources, including accruing resources, are to be used for the purposes specified in column 1 of schedule 2 to the Bill. The amounts now requested for 2012-13 supersede the Vote on Account in the Budget Act (Northern Ireland) 2012, passed this time last year, and the Main Estimate provision in the Budget (No. 2) Act (Northern Ireland) 2012, passed by the Assembly in June 2012.

The Bill also authorises a Vote on Account for 2013-14 of cash of £7,136,563,000 and resources of £7,641,877,000 to allow the flow of cash and resources to continue to public services in the early months of 2013-14 until the Main Estimates and the related Budget Bill are approved in June this year. Again, the cash and resources are to be appropriated and used for the services and purposes set out in column 1 of schedules 3 and 4 respectively.

Finally, clause 5 authorises temporary borrowing by the Department of Finance and Personnel at a ceiling of £3,568,281,000 for 2013-14. That is approximately half of the sum authorised in clause 4(1) for issue out of the Consolidated Fund for 2013-14 and is a normal safeguard for any temporary deficiency arising in the fund. I must stress to the House that clause 5 does not provide for the issue of any additional cash out of the Consolidated Fund or convey any additional spending power, but it enables my Department to run an efficient cash management regime.

In conclusion, there is little more that I can usefully add on the detail of the Budget Bill, but I will be happy to deal with any points of principle or details that Members wish to raise. I will endeavour to answer questions relating to the wider financial environment, as I suspect that Members may not adhere too closely to the nuances of the Bill.

Mr D Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh míle maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Éirím an babhta seo mar Leas-Chathaoirleach an Choiste Airgeadais agus Pearsanra. I dtús báire, ba mhaith liom a rá go gcuireann an Coiste fáilte roimh an Bhille. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I rise as Deputy Chair of the Finance and Personnel Committee to speak on the Bill before us today.

Tugann an Bille atá os ár gcomhair údarás dlíthiúil le haghaidh caiteachais de réir mar atá leagtha amach i Meastacháin Bhreise an earraigh. As we have heard, the Bill provides statutory authority for expenditure, as set out in the spring Supplementary Estimates 2012-13.

Lena chois sin, clúdaíonn an Bille an Vóta ar Chuntas a thugann cead do Ranna Rialtais airgead agus áiseanna a chaitheamh go luath sa bhliain 2013-14 go dtí go dtéann na Príomh-Mheastacháin faoi vóta sa Tionól i mí Meithimh seo chugainn. The Bill also includes the Vote on Account, which allows Departments to incur expenditure and use resources in the early part of 2013-14 until the Main Estimates are voted on by the Assembly in June.

Standing Order 42(2) states that accelerated passage may be granted for a Budget Bill provided the Committee for Finance and Personnel is satisfied that it has been appropriately consulted on the public expenditure proposals in the Bill. On 30 January, departmental officials briefed the Committee and took questions on the Budget Bill, including questions on issues relating to a range of Departments. That evidence session represented the culmination of a process of scrutiny by the Committee of public expenditure issues throughout 2012-13, both for DFP as a Department and at a strategic and cross-departmental level. Following those evidence sessions, the Committee was content to grant accelerated passage to the Bill, and the Chairperson wrote to the Speaker to inform him of the Committee's decision.

During yesterday's debate on the SSEs, the Chair mentioned that DFP officials had explained to the Committee the technical changes that were made through in-year monitoring of resource and capital allocations. The Committee also received assurances that limited headroom had been built into the SSEs for the Department of Health and the Department of Justice. The Department of Health was allowed £15 million of headroom, £2 million of which was for dental services and £13 million for front line health and social care services. The Department of Justice was allowed just over £21 million for further resources to be allocated to the early retirement package for prison officers. Furthermore, officials informed the Committee that the SSE for DETI could be subject to change if the First Minister and the deputy First Minister approved spending for the Titanic signature project. The Committee welcomed the assurances from DFP officials that the headroom in both Departments will be monitored to ensure that allocations are used only for the agreed purposes and that any changes in DETI's SSEs will be updated accordingly.

The Committee welcomes the engagement with the Department on those issues during the quarterly monitoring rounds, and Committee members will continue to prioritise that aspect of their work. I also encourage the other Statutory Committees to continue to monitor closely the financial forecasting and expenditure of their respective Departments for the remainder of this year and during the next financial year to help ensure that underspend is minimised and Departments maximise the impact from available resources.

Idir an dá linn, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle, ar son an Choiste tacaím leis an Bhille. In the meantime, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, on behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

12.00 noon

Mr Weir: I will not be able to indulge in the linguistic rhetoric of the previous Member to speak. I will try to keep my remarks in one language and keep them focused.

As a more recent recruit to the Finance and Personnel Committee — [Interruption.] — or perhaps, as indicated, a returnee to the Finance and Personnel Committee, I am a recidivist who has ended up there after years of absence. If not the outgoing Finance Minister, the incoming one will appreciate the film reference to the much-maligned 'The Godfather: Part III', in which Michael Corleone said that every time he thinks that he has got out, they keep dragging him back in. I feel that I have a somewhat similar relationship with the Finance and Personnel Committee.

As a member of the Committee, I welcome the Budget that is before us. It is a Budget for stability, rather than what happened many years ago, when we had Budgets that ping-ponged about from year to year. This is part of a longterm plan. Indeed, the Budget's parameters were largely set even before the Assembly election. I do not doubt that we will hear many worthy calls in today's debate from Members in all parts of the House who would like to see more expenditure in various financial areas. There is no doubt that worthy statements will be made, and I believe that Departments need to be proactive in debating whether their priorities are right. However, we must all accept that we are operating under a level of financial constraint because of the block grant and some of the cutbacks made by the coalition Government. That limits what we would like to do. I am sure that the Finance Minister would like to spend a lot more money on a range of subjects, but he is prudent, obviously, in looking at how we can live within our means.

Despite that, we are still able to commit £1.3 billion in capital investment, which, in these hard-pressed times, is sustaining the construction industry in particular. Sometimes, the role played by government in achieving that is ignored, but it is very productive. As well as creating a sense of stability, the Budget retains its focus. At the start of this term, the Programme for Government reiterated the concentration on the economy as the number one priority, and I believe that this Budget helps the economy. It does so principally by ensuring that the burden on taxpayers and on businesses is kept to a minimum. The Budget reinforces a number of measures, particularly the effective freezing, in real terms, of the regional rate for domestic and non-domestic ratepayers. Since the Assembly was restored in 2007, we have ensured that the regional rate increase has been kept at zero or, at most, at the level of inflation. So, businesses and citizens throughout Northern Ireland should be able to look forward yet again to a rate rise that is no greater than inflation. I know of the prudent response of a lot of councils, and it is important, at this stage, that they do not take advantage of that by saying, "Well, because there is not a major rise coming from the Executive, we can simply bump up the rates at a local level". That would be highly irresponsible and would convey the wrong attitude to local traders. Fortunately, I am aware of councils that will keep increases at zero or at a very low level this year.

The Budget contains other measures, in particular rates relief for small businesses, which was pioneered by the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister has been able to extend that this year, so another 3,500 businesses will be able to take advantage of it. We have also seen the rates concession that allows empty premises to be rejuvenated for a business. Indeed, that has already helped to stimulate town centres. Again, that is a question of the Executive delivering for people in terms of the rate burden that is upon them. The funding of that has been mentioned, because it does not come at no cost at all. In many ways, the retail levy on large businesses is not punitive but actually tries to rebalance the rates process and create a more level playing field for both small businesses and the large retail units. Despite many of the dire predictions that were issued some time ago, it has not met with the complications that some people predicted.

While I am on the broader issue of rates, I will point out that it is noticeable that, in respect of domestic rates and, indeed, the overall financial burden on people in Northern Ireland, there is, on average, perhaps a difference of more than £500 from the domestic rates that would have been paid under direct rule. Some of those who are calling for a return to direct rule need to bear that in mind. It is about delivering for people on the ground.

I welcome the recent work that has been done on the RPA to find a package that provides proper funding. We need to realise — this feeds into the Budget — that there has been, both from some in the Chamber and some in the wider sector, a false argument about the balance between local government and central government in paying for that. What we should consistently strive to do and what the Budget strives to do is to get the best possible value for money and the biggest bang for our bucks. We should not look to spend any money unnecessarily.

As well as looking after the broader business sector and ensuring that there is the minimum burden on it, where we can do so, we should be creative in our economics and ensure that we have properly targeted changes for our budgetary position. Recently, the House welcomed the moves that were made on air passenger duty. That has been a focused reduction. It has not cost the Budget an enormous amount of money but could pay high dividends and, indeed, has been concentrated on where it will actually make a difference. Similarly, as the Executive strive on the issue of corporation tax, that could also, in the long run, be a game changer. It is obviously not before us today.

It is important that money is set aside to try to deal with the most vulnerable in our society and those who are at the edges of poverty. For example, in terms of making a real, long-term change on the ground and the impact of the social investment fund, which will actually try to lift areas out of poverty by way of a strategic, long-term plan, I am glad to see that there is a further commitment to that. I am glad to see that groups that, at times, get ignored through funding streams are catered for. So, for example, as regards dormant bank accounts, there is a particular concentration on children and young people and, particularly, on faith groups, which are sometimes restricted in what they can apply for. It is also the case that, as we move ahead with welfare reform — I appreciate that there are mixed views across the Chamber on welfare reform and that the extent to which we have flexibility is limited — there is a commitment by the Executive to try to ameliorate the worst aspects of welfare reform.

I conclude by referring to one particular area, which came up time and time again and found unanimity. One of the barriers to welfare reform and employability in Northern Ireland is the lack of comparable childcare provision and the lack of affordability. Consequently, while we await the wider announcement of a childcare strategy from OFMDFM fairly soon, I am glad to see the commitment to the childcare strategy in the Budget. At the moment, the money that is ring-fenced there is essentially to pump-prime activity by other Departments. Getting a childcare strategy right from a financial point of view can end up being a win-win for the Executive. It will meet the need to bring us into line with other parts of the United Kingdom, and it will free people up, increase their employability and help to lift them out of poverty.

When you scratch beneath the surface, there is much in the Budget Bill to commend it. I welcome Second Stage and look forward to supporting it later.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for his opening comments and the Deputy Chair, Dominic Bradley, for outlining the Committee's position, which he did scrupulously, accurately and fairly. My broad intention is not to repeat that but to examine a number of problems. As Peter Weir indicated, our strategic approach over a four-year Budget period allows for a developmental approach and enables a much more strategic perspective to emerge.

If we consider, for instance, that our number one priority for a number of these Budget periods has been to grow and rebalance the economy, there is the issue of missed targets. There is a pressing need — I am not approaching this on the basis that this is Sinn Féin doing what Sinn Féin would do — for the Assembly to look at whether the same inputs will continue to give us the same outputs. If we do not change the inputs, we need to examine what we have been doing and whether we have all the necessary tools.

Clearly, if we expect the public sector economy to lead to a general economic recovery, we will wait for a very long time. My view is that we should first acknowledge the general malaise in international economies. It was certainly not the public sector that caused those problems, and many of the issues in the private sector are beyond the reach of the Assembly. When it comes to the role of the banks in supporting local enterprise, we have to live with the reality that the accountability mechanism does not reside here. The officials and representatives of the major banks whom we met are acutely aware that they are not accountable to the Assembly. They have a public relations responsibility, which they meet, and they bring in their public relations experts to assist them in that task.

It can be frustrating and difficult to get the outcomes that give assurance and hope to existing businesses and to those who are anxious to develop their entrepreneurial skills and instincts and would look for support from the financial sector to identify that all the necessary leverages exist. It is time that the Assembly looked at that because, if we were to examine our Programme for Government targets over successive mandates, we would clearly see that this is an issue that we come up against time and time again. That results in our falling short of our expectations and does not justify the view that there is an international recession that we can do nothing about.

This is a time when we should be prepared, working with other Administrations, to look at the pros and cons. We should not be deflected from that course by people waving price tags in front of us. Missed or lost opportunities also come with price tags. As an Assembly, we can learn from other assemblies that are looking at taking on more powers. That will have implications for the block grant, and there are cost factors to be examined. However, as we have a track record of missing targets that we set for ourselves, it is incumbent on us to formulate a different approach.

I make an appeal to the Minister. This Budget represents what has been agreed by us, and I do not cavil about that at all; I support it. The Minister and his Department have steered the other Departments to a path that has ensured its faithful application. There may be variations in performance, but the strategy is the right one. Let us agree in advance and then let us devolve, evolve and make amendments through the various processes that we have developed and that I think will stand up to the test.

It is at the strategic level that we are being challenged. The time has come at least to begin to discuss that strategic level. Discussing ideas and thinking through processes does not cost any money. It is a question of developing new strategies and approaches if we can. Hopefully, that will find more traction in the Assembly, and, as people move forward, we will begin to examine how we can represent our existing private sector and its potential and, in particular, our young people. Can we develop synergies between, say, the policies of DETI and DEL to ensure that we meet the skills gaps in our workforce that are costing us jobs? I hear news announcements about jobs, clients who are being interviewed, trade missions abroad and whatever, and all of that is sound. However, I would like to see more analysis of why particular investments did not occur or were relocated — sometimes not all that far from here — to see what we might do to amend our approach and get a different outcome. That is my response to what I think is an otherwise sound approach. If we continue our progress in job creation with the same inputs, we will unfortunately continue to get the same outputs.

Mr Cree: I was struck by the Minister's opening comments. They bore a striking resemblance to my own, so I can only assume that he has got it right.

Yesterday, we approved the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account. The existing legislation that gave authority to spend cash and use resources is now out of date. The new Bill needs to be put in place before the end of the financial year. We have just heard Mr McLaughlin talking about the four-year Budget, and this will complete the second year of the Budget for 2011-15 . The Main Estimates for the third year will be voted on in June. That is important, because we are now looking at being three quarters of the way through the Budget. As the Member who spoke previously said, targets need to be achieved. There is little time left in the plan to get it right. Therefore, when we get the detail of the Estimates in June, it is important that we have the full figures on all aspects of the Budget and that they are delivered to Committees in time for them to scrutinise them effectively. That does not always happen.

I share the Minister's concern that Departments are returning high levels of reduced requirements and even bids that have been sought in-year. That is still a major problem that needs to be addressed. I repeat what I said yesterday: more care and good management are needed from Departments in handling their budgets, and that really has to start now.

Another serious development is the Audit Office report on Departments' claimed savings. The report is most scathing and casts major doubts on whether savings were achieved at all. Some two thirds of the cases that the Audit Office examined were not efficiency savings. How does the Minister propose to deal with that situation? Those savings were obviously a significant part of our Budget. Does this mean that the figures will have to be reworked? If those are not genuine efficiency savings, that will have an effect on the total Budget envelope.

I wish to share with the House that, in a reply to a recent question, the Minister of Finance advised me that the Education Minister had told him that the Department of Education would not participate in the savings delivery plan monitoring exercises. That is the same Education Minister who has been attempting to block the financial review process. Minister, can you do anything to move those issues forward, or do the Executive need to do something to achieve an adequate solution to that problem? We were assured at St Andrews that no Minister would be allowed to block any proceedings, yet here are two major issues that we have difficulties with.

Members will be aware of the difficulties caused by the refusal of the application for a European contribution to the Titanic project. Can the Minister assure the House that the same sum has been allocated to specific projects in the Budget, and can he identify those so that we can be assured that the cash resource will not be lost this year? My understanding is that the money can be used only for existing projects in the Budget if we are to save that £18·2 million.

We are told that the Department has built in enough headroom to safeguard against late underspending this year. At the last count, there was an overprovision of £26 million. Perhaps the Minister could update the House on the latest figure.

Later in the debate, my colleagues will highlight other concerns that the Ulster Unionist Party has about other departmental budgets. I make the point again that it is imperative that we are all aware of the issues in the Budget, the knock-on effects and their implications for the remainder of this year. We must be aware of how important that will be when we deal with the Estimates for the Budget for 2013-14 in June of this year.

Mr Dickson: I, too, support the Bill. I am glad to take part in this debate, following yesterday's discussions on the Supply resolution. I will concentrate on some issues concerning the Department for Regional Development, as I am a member of the relevant Committee, and how they relate to the way in which we approach the Budget generally.

The Department for Regional Development is the largest capital-based Department. The major cuts in capital expenditure in this Budget period present DRD with a significant challenge. The scale of that challenge is even more apparent when one considers the Department's remit for securing transport and water infrastructure and the significant investment that both those areas require. I appreciate that, to an extent, we are still recovering from some of the financial decisions taken under direct rule, but we still have not addressed the historical underinvestment as effectively as possible.

I would be one of the first to welcome additional funding for more sustainable forms of transport. Indeed, I was delighted that, through the extra investment announced in the January monitoring round, extra buses would be provided. However, when it comes to the general principles with which we approach our Budget, it seems that we do not take the need to invest in public transport sufficiently seriously. When, for example, the Committee for Regional Development scrutinised the draft Programme for Government, we were told that, from the Budget figures presented at that time, bus replacement funding was minimal. It was so minimal, in fact, that the funding allocation for the 2013-14 financial year would have paid for half a bus. Why do we make such small allocations to public transport when formulating the initial Budget, leaving the replacement of buses dependent on whether other Departments spend all the money allocated to them?

I understand that we are a car-dependent society. In fact, we are the second most car-dependent society in Europe. Therefore, we need to provide in the Budget for essential road schemes and maintenance. I also understand that the solution to those problems is not always to throw large sums of money at them, and that we need to use other methods at our disposal to change attitudes about the way in which we travel. For example, we need to encourage more active and sustainable travel to schools, which was the topic of a recent debate in the Chamber. It would be equally wrong to claim that there is no impact from the continuing imbalance in our transport budget. We are still missing the targets for investment in public transport set out in DRD policy documents. That should be a major cause of concern. Our approach to the Budget should be to practise what we preach and back up the agreed targets with appropriate action. Why, for example, do we state in policy documents that we should have a 65:35 balance between roads and public transport investment, yet continue to allocate less than 20% to the latter year after year? Perhaps we need to take the targets set out in policy documents more seriously when putting the Budget together.

We cannot continue to live in denial of the way in which we spend our money, and nowhere is that illustrated more clearly than in how we approach the question of Northern Ireland Water. The House has today voted the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill through to the next stage. When it passes, it will commit the Assembly, the Minister and the Budget to hundreds of millions of pounds of expenditure over the next three years, yet we still have not had a proper discussion about the future of Northern Ireland Water. It certainly was the elephant in the room during the Regional Development Committee's examination of the Bill, and, no doubt, other members of the Committee will share my frustration and discomfort at having to scrutinise such a Bill with absolutely no idea what the Minister is planning and how that will affect future Budgets. We need, at least, to start by having an honest, open and detailed debate on the future of water and how it is financed in Northern Ireland.

In the economic circumstances that we face, it is particularly important that all spending is extensively scrutinised and can be wholly justified. That is not happening with the funding of our water service and infrastructure. To be honest, we are poorly served by our current policy. We have to approach our finances with maturity. It is no good to keep telling the public that we can afford things that we cannot, and we definitely cannot afford to keep diverting hundreds of millions of pounds from other essential services because some do not want to make difficult decisions about the future governance and financing of our water system. I cannot honestly tell my constituents that, when Budgets go by year after year, the current water arrangements are in their best interests, not when £280 million a year or thereabouts is being taken out of hospital and school budgets to pay for it. We need to address the water issue urgently and to put systems in place that are fair and protect the most vulnerable and do not drain resources from the services on which they most depend. To summarise, when it comes to the Budget, issues need to be addressed, and you do not need to look much further than the DRD budget to identify some of those.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.27 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Regional Development

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that supplementary questions should not be read.

Roads: Review of Public Administration

1. Mr McMullan asked the Minister for Regional Development what discussions have taken place between his Department and the Department of the Environment regarding responsibility for some of the road network being handed over to the new councils under the review of public administration. (AQO 3373/11-15)

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): No discussions are taking place regarding responsibility for some of the road network being handed over to the new councils under the review of public administration (RPA).

In September 2009, Executive colleagues agreed a revised list of functions that were identified as being appropriate for transfer to local councils. These included pedestrian zone permits; permitting local events to be held on roads; alley gating; and off-street and on-street parking enforcement. In June 2010, the Executive agreed to reframe the timetable for the reform of local government, which would see the functions transfer by 2015. My Department remains committed to the review of public administration and continues to work closely with colleagues in the Department of the Environment to deliver the objective of the local government reform programme.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for his answer. Is he aware of any parcels of ground in adopted areas for which no one accepts responsibility?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. To be fair, it is not directly related to the review of public administration. I am aware, of course, that there are substantial portions of ground all over Northern Ireland where ownership is not established. For a Department such as the Department for Regional Development to assume or to take under its control the ownership of such portions of land would be expensive and would also bring liabilities that we would have to be very careful about managing.

Mr Hussey: Is the Minister still keen for off-street parking to be devolved to local councils? He referred to a thing called RPA, which I am not very keen to see happening at all. Are you keen for off-street parking to be devolved to local councils?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I am indeed very keen to see off-street parking. Local government, in whatever shape or form the councils are in, could perform a useful duty and service on behalf of local ratepayers to manage it. It would give councils the authority to decide on thorny issues such as charging, rates of charge and penalty charge notices. I am interested in that, and I will continue to have discussions not only with the Minister of the Environment but with local councils, if they are so minded to engage on that possible transfer.

Mr P Ramsey: In the Minister's initial response, he said that it had been decided that it was appropriate for powers to be devolved in certain areas such as residential parking, alley gating and, possibly, road safety initiatives through traffic calming. Is it not the case that local government can play a meaningful part, in that it is the right place for accountability and the right place to which to devolve those responsibilities, even much earlier than anticipated?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question, and he made a valid point. Issues such as pedestrian zone permits, local events held on roads — presumably aside from parades and other possibly contentious issues — alley gating, off-street and on-street parking could usefully be transferred to local government, where local knowledge would be best employed.

Park-and-ride Facilities: South Antrim

2. Mr Girvan asked the Minister for Regional Development, in light of his recent announcement on the park-and-ride facility at Ballyhenry/Sandyknowes roundabout, whether his Department has considered any further sites in the south Antrim area. (AQO 3374/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: My Department's park-and-ride programme board is in the process of finalising a strategic programme for the delivery of park-and-ride sites between 2013 and 2015. The draft programme includes proposals for two sites in the South Antrim constituency. One proposal is for the construction of a large park-and-ride site at Ballymartin Road, Templepatrick, and the other proposal is to extend the existing park-and-ride site at the Paradise Walk/Antrim Road roundabout.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister for his answer. What deliberations has the Department for Regional Development had with Invest NI about what I call "the green elephant", which is the Global Point site at Corr's Corner? Since it was purchased, some 130 acres have been lying with absolutely nothing on them for 22 years

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I am aware of the Corr's Corner site that he speaks of, and, obviously, some discussions need to be ongoing with other Departments about it. No conclusions have yet been reached, but we will continue to look at it as a potential site. Certainly, we are still in the early stages of its development.

Mr Kinahan: I apologise for giving the Minister a crick in his neck by asking him a question from directly behind him. How many additional park-and-ride spaces have been made available in the past two years? Will he look at other places in south Antrim in time to see whether there are other places where we can have park-and-ride facilities?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I trust him implicitly, even though he is behind me. I am sure that he is behind me all the way.

The good news for the Member and the House is that over 1,000 additional park-and-ride and park-and-share spaces have been provided in the past two years. That is an increase of over one quarter of the total number available. Of course, we continue to look at and to identify sites not only in south Antrim but elsewhere throughout Northern Ireland. We will continue to do so, because park-and-ride and park-and-share facilities have the potential to bring about a modal shift in how people travel, particularly by car. I think that the ability to park and ride and to park and share is increasingly seen as a huge benefit. So, we will continue to look at potential sites, including in the south Antrim area.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Now that we have him on the subject of park-and-ride facilities, is he aware of the efforts that have been made for the procurement of a park-and-ride site on the A6 at Dungiven?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question and for his dogged pursuance of the A6 issue, whether that is for a scheme to improve the road itself or to add park-and-ride facilities. Of course, for such a major scheme, we would seek to explore opportunities for park-and-ride or park-and-share facilities. I am not directly aware of the current situation on the identification of sites at the moment, but I undertake to write to the Member and update him.

Mr Eastwood: I welcome the Minister's commitment to park-and-ride schemes. Further to that, will his Department be supporting park-and-ride schemes in the city of Derry during the 2013 City of Culture celebrations?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I was pleased last week to open a new park-and-ride facility and park-and-share facility at Drumahoe, which serves the city of Londonderry and the wider area. The UK City of Culture year is an opportunity for people to avail of transport arrangements that will benefit Londonderry. In the longer term, I see huge benefits for it. I think that it is a good example of having provided such a facility and of increasing its capacity, and I look forward to continuing to do that.

The Member will also know that, where the UK City of Culture is concerned, I am very pleased to confirm that the rail link between Coleraine and Londonderry will open earlier than expected. I know that Members all through the House will receive that well, particularly those who have constituencies in the north-west. I take particular pride in the achievement of being the Minister who saved, if you like, the rail link between Coleraine and Londonderry and who, hopefully, enhanced the service between Belfast and Londonderry.

Road Signs

3. Mr Campbell asked the Minister for Regional Development how many incidents of defacing road signs have been reported in the last 12 months. (AQO 3375/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I can confirm there have been 244 reports of road signs being defaced in the past 12 months. The majority of damaged signs are identified by Roads Service officials as part of their routine inspections and are prioritised for replacement or repair as necessary. If sufficient evidence is available, Roads Service may seek prosecution of those responsible for carrying out those wanton acts of vandalism. I am sure that you will appreciate the many difficulties in proving a case in this regard, as the courts require substantial and clear evidence before an effective prosecution can be brought.

I am also sure that the Member shares my frustration that my Department has to devote valuable resources, both in expenditure and staff time, to deal with the issue when they could be used much more profitably on other activities, many of which are safety related, that would provide great benefit to the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Sandra Overend.

Mrs Overend: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Apologies; I call Gregory Campbell for a supplementary question.

Mr Campbell: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I thank the Minister for his reply regarding the 244 cases. Will he undertake to consider — where there have been repeated incidents of vandalism of whatever type, particularly on main routes where tourists or others are unused to the journey — the possibility of replacing the signs with signage located higher to make it more difficult for the offence to be repeated?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. We look, on an ongoing basis, at how best we can protect the existing signs and ensure that they become less easy to attack. However, some people make determined efforts to deface or vandalise signs, and that is very regrettable indeed. I know that that is a concern for many Members, and Londonderry signage seems to be a particular target in the northern and western divisions

Officials from the northern division advised me that there have been 34 incidents of road sign defacement over the past 12 months in that area. Although we do not keep detailed records of how signs are defaced, we estimate that that vandalism occurs approximately four to six times a year. So, there are serial offenders out there. I wish that they would stop it, and I wish that we could spend the money on other equally important, or more important, ways to improve road maintenance and generally within the Roads Service budget.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is the Minister aware of a proliferation of signs being defaced in the Dunloy, Rasharkin and Portglenone areas of County Antrim?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I am not aware of the specific detail. I am happy to learn of any representations that he wishes to make to me.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Will he detail how many incidents of flags flying on road signs or lamp posts have been reported to him and what action he is taking to remove them?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her question. I do not have the specific detail available at this point. However, I am happy to correspond with her. She will recognise that, as with the issue of the defacement of road signs, it is a delicate and, sometimes, difficult matter to police, but we endeavour to seek a way to resolve issues of particular contention.

A5 Road Project

4. Mr Boylan asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the A5 project. (AQO 3376/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: The Member will be aware that the A5 project is the subject of an ongoing legal challenge that began today and is processing as anticipated.

My Department continues to work closely with the Department of Finance and Personnel regarding future budgets for the A5 and any financial implications arising from the delayed start to the scheme. That co-operation has enabled some internal reprofiling of my Department's budget, which will facilitate the deferral of some of the A5 allocation to when it is required. In addition, at my prompting, the Finance Minister has secured flexibility from Her Majesty's Treasury to carry forward £50 million of reinvestment and reform initiative borrowing power into 2014-15. That additional flexibility is immensely helpful in managing the ongoing delay to the A5 project.

2.15 pm

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for his response. What recent discussions has he had with the Dublin Government about funding for the middle section of the A5?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. He will remember that the Irish Government had initially agreed to make a very substantial contribution that would have seen the entire project brought forward. That was not possible. They have now agreed to make two payments of £25 million in 2015 and 2016 respectively. Beyond that, they remain committed to the completion of the A5, but they are not yet in a position to make further funding commitments for the period post-2016 in advance of their consideration of the next capital review framework, which is anticipated for 2015.

DRD: Procurement

5. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the steps he has taken to ensure that public procurement within his Department encourages competition and is attractive to local businesses. (AQO 3377/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: Recent reviews of our tender processes have helped to remove barriers for smaller businesses wishing to compete for public sector opportunities.

Examples include reductions in the levels of experience and financial requirements needed and the use of more standardised tendering documentation. My officials have also streamlined and simplified procedures for tenders below the EU thresholds and reduced the paperwork associated with tendering for those contracts.

To increase the visibility of tendering opportunities, all contracts above £30,000 are advertised on the eSourcing Northern Ireland portal, with construction-related contracts also advertised on the Department's website. All those measures are supported by a programme of meet-the-buyer events, organised or attended by representatives from the respective centres of procurement expertise.

There is close liaison with local industry groups, such as the Construction Employers Federation and the Quarry Products Association, to help provide for a sustainable supply chain. It has been recognised that there can be difficulties for smaller businesses seeking to access large frameworks and term-type contracts. For that reason, in areas of work such as road maintenance and minor works, contracts have been split into numerous specific work categories. Limitations are imposed on the geographical coverage and the value of the contracts, which, in turn, permits small to medium enterprises to participate directly, thus providing increased competition.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for that fulsome answer. Does he accept that there is a perception among the small business community and small contractors that there is a cartel operating around public procurement and that it is counterproductive to developing and growing small business, particularly in the construction sector, which relates to the Department for Regional Development (DRD)?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. If that is his perception, I hope that it is not the reality of things. I understand the importance of small to medium enterprises getting the opportunity to tender for and attain work contracts from the Department for Regional Development, Roads Service, NI Water and all the agencies under my departmental control. I am keen to hear at first hand examples that he may have, and if he has such examples, we will investigate and interrogate those and satisfy ourselves that it is not the case that we are in any way discriminating against small businesses.

Mr Cree: On supporting local businesses, Minister, will you tell the House how your Department and its arm's-length bodies perform in respect of prompt payment of invoices?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary. He raises an important issue, particularly for those in business who are under pressure and so need and seek prompt payment for their work. That is an essential action to support local industry.

Following commitments that the public sector would speed up the payments process, I can confirm that my Department continues to perform exceptionally well against the 10-day and 30-day prompt payment targets. From September to November 2012, DRD released procurement and grant payments totalling £60 million, of which £58·2 million, 97%, was paid within 10 days. In the same period, 8,209 of 8,320 invoices, an impressive 99%, were paid within 30 days. Overall, therefore, the Department continues to perform above the Northern Ireland Civil Service average.

Public Transport

6. Mr Durkan asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the steps he has taken to encourage integrated public transport involving Translink, community transport groups, health and social care trusts and education and library boards. (AQO 3378/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: My Department is working with Translink, the Southern Education and Library Board, the rural community transport partnerships, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and representatives of the health trusts to identify opportunities for improvements to the integration and efficiency of publicly funded transport services. To assess the short-, medium- and long-term changes that are possible, it is proposed to undertake a pilot project in the Dungannon/Cookstown area. It is expected that, after a period of planning, the pilot project will begin later this year, followed by an evaluation, the duration of which has yet to be decided.

Local stakeholders will be involved at key points throughout the project. My Department is also providing funding through the rural transport fund for a pilot Translink bus service from Enniskillen to Altnagelvin Area Hospital. The rural community transport partnerships have been involved in the development of the pilot project.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does the Minister agree that there is an urgent requirement to develop more integrated transport to reduce costs and increase usage?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary, and I agree with his point. In these straitened times, it is important that we are able to do more, even with less in some circumstances. The Member will be aware of my announcement this morning on Door-2-Door Transport, which received a broad welcome in the House. We continue to look at these transport issues and will seek to make progress on them on the understanding that working with other Departments and agencies is surely in the short-, medium- and long-term interests of everybody.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister provide an update on the pilot scheme in mid-Ulster?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary. He will know that a range of agencies is involved in the Dungannon/Cookstown pilot scheme, including health, education and those related to my Department. We very much hope that rolling out that pilot scheme will assist us in developing Province-wide transport arrangements. I undertake to update the House and members of the Committee for Regional Development on progress.

Mr Storey: Translink receives something like a 30% subsidy from the Department of Education for transport costs. What discussions has he had with the Minister of Education about the performance and efficiency delivery unit report on transport and a more efficient way of ensuring a joined-up approach to its provision, particularly for schools in rural areas? There is a real issue there, and it will be an increasing issue if the Education Minister gets his way on the proposed closure of rural schools.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question, which was asked, I suppose, with his education hat on. It is timely.

I have not had direct discussions with the Education Minister. I do, however, believe that it is in everyone's interests that Departments and Ministers work collectively to address issues. We can do more together and achieve favourable outcomes, particularly in the current economic climate. I will seek to work with Executive colleagues on that.

Public Transport: Door-2-Door Services

Mr Molloy: Question 6. Sorry, question 7.

7. Mr Molloy asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline his plans to combine urban and rural door-to-door services to enable better integration of services and to improve efficiency. (AQO 3379/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I will answer question 7, if that is all right? I know that the Member is perhaps besotted with other issues, but anyway.

The Member will be aware of the statement that I made earlier to the House on the future of the Door-2-Door service. Work has been completed on reviewing the policy for the Door-2-Door scheme, and a consultation exercise commenced on 22 October 2012. The consultation ended on 14 January 2013, and responses are currently being analysed and assessed.

I do not think that it is appropriate to continue to extend the existing single tender awards for the provision of the service. I have therefore decided that my Department will end the existing contracts with the three current operators when the single tender actions run out on 31 March.

It is obviously very important that current regular users of the Door-2-Door service are not left without any service for a period. Therefore, although the current Door-2-Door service will end for now when the extensions run out on 31 March, I have decided that, to meet the needs of existing users, we will put in place an interim service, managed by Disability Action and with services provided by it, other voluntary organisations and, where applicable, other service providers, from 1 April. I stress that the interim service is not, and is not intended to be, the existing Door-2-Door service. My officials are working with Disability Action and other stakeholders to ensure that the interim service will be fully operational before the Easter break. Scheme members will be kept fully informed of the changes being implemented.

In parallel, my officials have set up a project team to move forward the procurement of Door-2-Door-type services in the future. It is our intention to commence pilot operations later this year and to evaluate their effectiveness after a year of operation. Thereafter, we intend to tender for service provision that will best meet the needs of our intended users.

Mr Molloy: I thank the Minister. I think that he missed his calling earlier.

Will he give us an indication that the current rural transport providers will be considered as part of the new project when it comes into being? Looking further ahead, will the Minister consider whether all the different services that we use should be under one transport management scheme, for schools, health and all the other different structures?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. His final suggestion has, of course, enormous consequences, and yet it is interesting and challenging enough that we should look at it and all other options. The interim arrangements that I announced today will give us an opportunity to look at the entire landscape. I very much hope that we can be innovative in our approach and can utilise and work collectively with the various agencies, Departments, groups and providers out there.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his answers. I listened very carefully to what he said. Given that he would be of a mind to encourage the integration of the different transport providers, will he consider setting up an independent transport authority, similar to what happens in the Republic, to maximise competition and give the public the best possible opportunities? [Interruption.]

Mr Kennedy: Thank you very much for that supplementary question. I think that mention of integration with the Republic has caused some concern on the Back Benches.

We are very much in the foothills. We are making interim arrangements for the Door-2-Door service, with a view to having a longer-term solution. I am not keen on the creation of additional bodies, which can sometimes be overly bureaucratic and perhaps not represent value for money.

I am prepared, at this stage, to concentrate on improving and maintaining the local services that are in place.

Agriculture and Rural Development

Mr Deputy Speaker: I advise Members that question 11 has been transferred to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. A written answer will be provided.

Farming: Income

1. Mr Kinahan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the recent publication of provisional figures showing that total income from farming between 2011 and 2012 fell by more than 50%. (AQO 3385/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The magnitude of the fall in farm income is of great concern to me. I have heard the figures described as horrendous, and I absolutely agree with that assessment. The figures confirm just how exceptionally difficult last year was for farmers. I have the utmost respect for how our farmers have faced the extreme challenges of the last wee while

During 2012, a number of factors converged to put real financial pressure on the industry. On top of poor weather conditions throughout much of the growing season, we had a substantial rise in feed costs and a weakening of the euro, which reduced single farm payment receipts and held back producer prices. Those were very painful events but, unfortunately, world cereal harvests, local weather conditions and exchange rate movements are all factors that fall completely outside our control. The industry had grown in the years preceding 2012, and I believe that the potential for growth still exists despite the major setback for the industry last year. I believe that we should continue our work not just to improve competitiveness but to build an industry that has the strength and resilience to withstand the types of setback recently witnessed.

The 2012 figures clearly demonstrate that we continue to need a strong, well-funded CAP that not only supports farmers but drives competitiveness, without drowning us in red tape. I am fighting for those outcomes in the ongoing CAP reform negotiations. I very much hope that this year will see a marked improvement in the fortunes of the industry and that we can once again turn our attention to the longer-term challenges and opportunities that lie ahead. I will play my part, and I look forward to working with the industry-led Agri-Food Strategy Board in building an industry that is robust, outward-looking, self-reliant and prosperous.

In respect of immediate action, I have announced my intention to bring forward the payment of the 2013 less-favoured area (LFA) scheme. We are making the payments some three weeks earlier than planned. That is a contribution of about £25 million a year to the economy. In addition, we have already begun —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mrs O'Neill: OK. We have also begun administrative checks. We will continue to get things speeded up as quickly as possible to ensure that we get support to farmers.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for her answer. I know that she cannot change the weather or the feed prices, and I welcome the change to the LFA scheme that she has just mentioned. We need to make sure that people are paid on time and quickly, given that that is one of the only ways for them to get money. What changes will the Minister make to her policies to assist the industry? The increase in world population has to be one of the ways of increasing what our farmers get from their land.

Mrs O'Neill: I assure the Member that I firmly believe that the change in world population is a plus for our local industry, because we have an opportunity to produce more food and to be a major player in supplying that market. There are opportunities.

Reform of the common agricultural policy will be very important in making sure that we target the supports that need to be in place for particular sectors in the entire agrifood industry. The work of the Agri-Food Strategy Board will also be key in tackling and identifying challenges and allowing us to shape the new programme and tailor supports to those who most need them. The growing world population is a plus for us, and we need to use that to our advantage. I certainly assure the Member that I will do all that I can, through short-, medium- and long-term plans, to support the industry.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answers so far.

Does the Minister accept that there is great anxiety and apprehension in the farming community at the moment?

Does she also accept that the new mapping system is proving to be a fiasco for many farmers? Some of them are trying to remedy the discrepancies in the maps, but they have been told that they cannot get an interview at their local office for about another three weeks.

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for his question. Again, I assure him that I will do all I can to support farmers. The mapping situation has been discussed many times in the House and, indeed, in Committee. It is important that the maps are got right. I totally accept that it is a two-way process. It is about the Department and the farmers working together. I am not aware of delays in getting an appointment to talk about a map or to explore the issue further at DARD Direct offices, but I am happy to take that on board and ensure that the proper staff are there to help farmers. Obviously, the benefit of having DARD Direct offices is that you can get someone quite easily and quite accessibly, so I am happy to take that on board.

Mr I McCrea: The Minister will no doubt be aware that there is a lack of confidence in the agriculture industry, with the horse meat issue —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not relevant to this question.

Mr I McCrea: I am coming to -

Mr Deputy Speaker: If you are not very quickly relevant in your supplementary, we will move on.

Mr I McCrea: Will the Minister accept that within that confidence is the confidence of young people to go into farming, as it is part of their family heritage? What will the Minister do to encourage that?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for his question. He is absolutely right: we need to instil confidence, and we need to have supports in place that attract young people to stay on the farm or come into farming. Again, under the common agricultural policy, there are targeted streams that we can have the flexibility to use. They will look at new entrants into farming and young farmers. So, I think there are avenues there that allow us to support young people. If we are going to have a sustainable farming sector in the future, we need young people to continue to become involved in the industry, and we will do all that we can. I will continue to work with the likes of the young farmers' organisations, which do great work with young farmers. I fund them to do some work, and I will continue to do that. I think that a combination of all of those efforts will attract young people into the farming industry.

Rural White Paper Action Plan

2. Mr Brady asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the rural White Paper action plan. (AQO 3386/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: In June 2012, I launched the rural White Paper action plan, following close consultation with my ministerial colleagues and a wide range of rural stakeholders. The action plan contains around 90 commitments from across all Departments, relating to a wide range of important rural issues: rural transport, rural broadband, healthcare, education in rural areas, rural tourism, support for rural businesses and measures to tackle poverty and social isolation.

I want to be clear that rural issues are not solely the responsibility of my Department. All Departments have a responsibility to deliver their policies and programmes effectively in rural areas and to honour their commitments detailed in the rural White Paper action plan. Each commitment or action is allocated to a lead Department to take forward, with most actions to be undertaken within a short — one to three years — medium — three to five — or long-term — five to 10 years — timeframe.

Two projects that are already making significant progress and helping rural communities throughout the North are the farm family health checks and maximising access in rural areas (MARA), which are being delivered in conjunction with the Department of Health via the Public Health Agency. The farm family health check programme aims to screen 1,800 rural dwellers at farmers' marts and community venues. To date, I am pleased to say that 38 health checks have taken place, all of which have been very well received. Some 920 rural dwellers have availed themselves of the service, and 40% of attendees have been advised to attend their GP on the basis of the results of the screenings.

The aim of the MARA project is to offer 12,000 rural households a visit from a trained enabler, and that is well under way. One hundred rural enablers have been recruited and trained, and approximately 1,000 initial home visits have been completed, with second visits, where necessary, under way. To date, we have had over 2,880 referrals on a variety of grants, benefits and services.

I have chaired a meeting of the interdepartmental committee on rural policy. That group consists of senior policy officials and is tasked with overseeing the implementation of the rural White Paper.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for her answer. How will she ensure that other Departments deliver on their commitments in the action plan?

Mrs O'Neill: I did not quite get to finish the answer, but that is the point that I was coming to.

I oversee the Department's oversee group, which will hold all Departments to account. This is Executive-led. Even though DARD takes responsibility, it is an Executive programme to make sure that we have all Departments taking cognisance of the needs of rural areas. Each action in the rural White Paper is allocated to a lead Department that has responsibility for implementing that action within the time frame specified. The Executive have agreed that all Departments will report to DARD regularly on progress in implementing their respective actions, and DARD will produce and submit an annual progress report to the Executive. I will make sure that that continues to be done. I reiterate the point that this is an Executive commitment. DARD is taking the lead, but it is important to show the wider rural community that this is the Executive caring about their interests and making sure that they are protected.

Mr Storey: Actions 49, 50 and 51 of the action plan that has been published by the Department have DE as the lead Department. Does the Agriculture Minister use the same definition of a rural school as her counterpart and colleague — that it is 105? If she does, given the vast number of rural schools in the primary sector that fall well below that, particularly in the west of the Province, does she agree that that figure will inevitably lead to the widespread closure of rural schools? In light of the action plan, what is she doing to protect rural schools?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said, although DARD is in the lead, it is Executive work. The Member, as Chair of the Education Committee, knows fine well that it is not simply a numbers game. All the other factors need to be taken into account, particularly the fact that a rural school is often the centre of a rural community. When the Education Minister set out the six criteria in the sustainable schools policy, he took into account all those other factors. I will ensure, in my role to support rural communities, that those arguments are always put forward. I am happy to do so, and I have done so in the past for schools in my constituency. The Education Minister has taken account of the wider factors. It should not simply be a numbers game, and that is well accepted.

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister indicate the scale of the redrafting of the document following the consultation process? Was she surprised by the critical response from many in the industry who had waited for the plan for many years but then felt badly let down by the totally unimaginative proposals?

Mrs O'Neill: It was important to get it right from the start, which is why it took such a long time to come to fruition. It is still fairly early days in its implementation; all the recommendations are still to be gone through. It was not an attempt simply to bundle up what is already being done by Departments. There was an attempt to get Departments to come on board with additional plans. The Member will be aware that an advisory stakeholder group was in place at the outset to make sure that it fed into a lot of the actions. There was a wide range of interest, and a wide range of groups came forward with ideas. This is an initial step in setting out the Executive's commitment to rural communities. We need to make sure that these are implemented in the short, medium and longer term. Although there may be some criticisms of the document, the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. As I said, it is still early days. We need to see the actions implemented. I assure the House that I will continue to play my role by making sure that other Departments are held to account for what they have promised to deliver.

Rural Economy: Research and Development

3. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the role of departmental funded research and development in assisting the rural economy. (AQO 3387/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: My Department's vision is of a thriving and sustainable rural economy, community and environment. I recognise the role of research and development in achieving that vision. I also recognise that a broad-ranging research programme is required if we are to succeed. The Department's evidence and innovation strategy sets out the overarching framework for research and development to underpin evidence-based policy and delivery. The outcome of research on the rural economy allows our policymaking to be based on sound scientific evidence and allows DARD to be an advocate in government for the needs of the wider rural community. We want to promote and provide guidance on the issues facing rural communities through rural proofing. I see our research and development programme as a fundamental tool to allow us to do that.

There are three funding strands in the evidence and innovation strategy: the DARD-directed research work programme at the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI), which has a total budget in excess of £8 million; the industry-led research through the research challenge fund, which this year will support local businesses to the value of £1 million and will enable research to a total value of £2 million to be conducted; and the Department's postgraduate research studentship scheme, which funds eight PhD students each year. In addition, we are committed to increasing the drawdown of European funding in the area of research and development. In the 2013 financial year, we will fund a Horizon 2020 facilitator post based at AFBI to ensure that we are best placed to capitalise fully on the significant EU budget in that area.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for her response, particularly the breakdown of the various themes of the fund. Will she ensure that there will be maximum drawdown from the fund, specifically to help the agrifood industry? Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs O'Neill: Absolutely. The Department participates in the Barroso task force, and I work closely with Executive colleagues to ensure that the agrifood and rural sectors fully capitalise on the available EU funding. To assist those sectors to take advantage of the Horizon 2020 funds, we will also place and fund a facilitator post based at AFBI. I hope to have someone in place by April. That postholder will work closely with the desk officers in Brussels, local research providers and industry to assist with setting up collaborative partnerships and to provide any help necessary to assist in the application process. I hope that that will lead to an increase in our drawdown. There is, obviously, an Executive commitment to draw down additional funds. This post will assist us to do that and make sure that we target it towards the agrifood sector.

2.45 pm

Mr Campbell: Will the Minister outline whether there will be any possibility of an expansion of research and development at the proposed new DARD headquarters at Ballykelly, given the prospects for employment in the catchment areas there, which include Ballymoney, Coleraine, Limavady and Londonderry?

Mrs O'Neill: I assure the Member that the headquarters relocation project is on target. I recognise the benefits that it has for employment in the construction industry and in the ongoing servicing of a new building in the area, and I know that it is something that the local people welcome.

As regards research and development, an additional post is not being considered at this stage. It is a great, expansive site that other Departments may look to in the future

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for her answer. I welcome the investment in research and development. I am sure that she will agree that it is critical that the projects are properly evaluated. Will she tell the House how, precisely, she intends to evaluate current and future projects?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said, a number of projects are ongoing; I outlined three in my initial answer. There will be independent evaluations of each of them. If he would like to receive them, I am happy to provide the Member with any evaluations and research that have been done to date. Each project will be evaluated to make sure that we get the most out of them that we can and to ensure that they represent value for money. I am happy to provide the Member in writing with the details that I have.

Flooding: South Belfast

4. Mr McGimpsey asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the findings of the Rivers Agency's investigations to identify the exact source of flooding in south Belfast in 2012. (AQO 3388/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: The storm on 27 June 2012 generated extreme rainfall in certain localised parts of greater Belfast, including south Belfast. It occurred after days of rainfall that had resulted in saturated ground and high river levels, and it caused flooding to more than 1,300 properties.

Rivers Agency staff have been liaising closely with their counterparts in Roads Service and NI Water to identify where infrastructure was overwhelmed by the intensity of the rainfall and to identify what practical measures can be taken to reduce the risks of recurrence.

I am very aware of the distress and hardship caused by flooding and the concerns that house owners have had about obtaining insurance. Rivers Agency can issue a letter of comfort to residents that they could use in negotiations with insurers. That letter would set out the measures that are being taken to reduce flood risk.

As recently as 31 January, I visited the Finaghy area to see at first hand what actions are being taken to reduce any further risk of flooding and to meet residents.

Mr McGimpsey: Will the Minister assure us that the immediate remedial action that is being taken will, in fact, protect residents in the parks off the Lisburn Road, such as Sicily, Priory, Marguerite and Greystown? Can she tell the House when those remedial works are due to be completed and give comfort to the residents, who have suffered repeated flooding?

Mrs O'Neill: There are a number of issues. The incident in June last year involved heavy rainfall, and the impact that it had on residents caused a particular problem for all agencies. Each area is being dealt with on a catchment basis. In some areas, Rivers Agency and NI Water might be involved, and in others, it might be Rivers Agency and DRD. So, a number of things are being taken forward.

I know that Rivers Agency has been dealing with undesignated culverts and that it has been looking to repair some of them. Some grilles have been replaced, particularly in the Orchardville area, and we hope that that will help to alleviate flooding. A lot of minor works around Stockmans Lane have been planned. There is an additional sandbag store at Finaghy Road North. So, a number of measures have been taken forward. No one can give anyone a 100% guarantee on flooding, but we can at least work towards mitigating all the factors that contribute to flooding, which is what we are committed to doing. Rivers Agency is also committed to working with all other partners, because it is key that, in this instance in particular, the whole system was overwhelmed due to the heavy rainfall. So, DRD, Rivers Agency, the council and NI Water all have a role to play.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for her answer. She will be aware that much of the flooding in the Finaghy area was caused by debris in a river at Ladybrook, which, in turn, overflowed — a bridge was choked, and the river overflowed and overwhelmed the area. Will the Minister tell us what remedial works for the short term — I know that she has mentioned some of them — and what capital works for the long term are in place to ensure that this does not happen again?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for his question. As I said, a number of pieces of work are ongoing, all on a catchment-by-catchment basis. As I said, in some areas the Rivers Agency might be working with DRD, while in others it might be working with the council. So, a number of pieces of work are being taken forward. It is important that that interagency response to the problems of flooding continues.

The system was overwhelmed in June last year, and, in the longer term, we need to take forward how the system copes. As I said, the Rivers Agency has taken its role forward in cleaning out culverts. It is also looking at the designation of culverts and has provided two new grilles, one of which is in Orchardville in south Belfast. As I said, I met residents and assured them that that would be done very quickly, and, if it is not done now, I would expect it to be done over the next week or so.

A number of works are ongoing. Other minor works are planned for the Stockmans Lane area, and some other culvert work is still to be done. As the Member will be aware, we are working closely with partners who are carrying out a major study on the future plans for the area.

Ms Lo: The Minister mentioned a number of short-term, reactive measures. Would she consider asking the Executive to look at long-term plans and see how we can upgrade the whole sewerage system in Belfast to cope with all the future changes that will be brought about by climate change?

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for the question. As I said, NI Water is carrying out a major study in the area, and I think that that will expose all the failings in the present system.

You are absolutely right: flood alleviation is not a short-term initiative. You can do certain things to mitigate the flooding, but we need a longer-term plan to properly tackle major flooding problems. I am happy to have discussions with the Executive when we have the outcome of the major study of the area, and, where the Rivers Agency has a role to play, I will make sure that we are forthright in coming forward and playing our role. However, in the absence of that major study, we do not yet have the detail to go to the Executive with a proposal.

Single Farm Payments

5. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the single farm payment process this year. (AQO 3389/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: At 4 February this year, 90% of single farm payment claims had been finalised. These figures include 910 inspection cases, and that is four times more than this stage last year. This leaves 10% of cases still to be paid. Of these, the inspection cases remaining to be processed represent about a quarter of the remaining claims. The remaining 7.5% of cases cannot be paid immediately for various other reasons.

We are working to clear the remaining inspection cases as quickly as possible and expect that the majority of cases will be finalised by the end of May. Again, this is significantly earlier than last year, but we will continue to invest to improve this further in future years.

Looking to 2013, I am pleased to report that just under 38,000 new farm maps have now issued. As I have explained before, farmers now have an important piece of information. It is a two-way process, and we need to work together to make sure that we get those farm maps right. The 2013 single application forms are based on the new farm maps, so it is crucial that the maps and the maximum eligible area are as accurate as possible. That will obviously avoid delays in farmers getting their payments later in the year. We aim to issue 2013 single application packs issued to farmers no later than 29 March. We also plan to issue revised maps to farmers who report mapping changes.

I know that many farmers rely on receiving their single farm payment as early as possible, and I want to be able to pay them as early as possible. I am pleased to note that an early assessment of the first year of using the control with remote sensing approach to undertake on-the-spot checks in 2012 indicates that it has the potential to speed up our single farm payment control processes and payments. I will explore how we can learn from our experiences in 2012 to extend the use of control with remote sensing in 2013 and in future years.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for a detailed response. Can any other help be given to farmers to help them with their 2013 claims?

Mrs O'Neill: As I explained earlier, all DARD Direct offices will be open during the single application period to provide general advice and support to farmers in making and receipting their application. Earlier, a Member raised concerns about delays around that and in getting appointments, and I am happy to take that further and explore it.

In general, farmers can go into in DARD Direct offices and make general enquiries about their maps, entitlements, handling inspection findings and measurement of ineligible areas. They can secure amendments to maps, which will also be accepted through that period at our local offices for farmers who need to make changes. So, although farmers will once again be able to access their maps online through map viewer, this year, an additional new feature means that not only can they view the maps but they will be able to measure ineligible features, which will support them in filling out their application form. However, I again stress that this is a two-way process: I encourage farmers, when they receive their map, to get in touch with the Department and make sure that together we get this right. That, in turn, will speed up future payments.

Mr Irwin: Given that they will soon receive their 2013 IACS forms, farmers are deeply concerned over the level of inaccuracies in their new maps. Yesterday, one farmer who contacted me had 30 fields missing from his farm maps and another had 35 fields missing. In light of the unacceptably high level of mapping errors, does the Minister agree that the delivery of the maps has been diabolical, and will she update the House on how errors that cause such concern have arisen in the delivery of the maps?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not agree with the "diabolical" statement, but I assure the Member that the first two batches of maps went out and were received very positively by farmers. Now that we have had the final batch of maps sent out, we have had some positive feedback but farmers have also contacted me with concerns around missing fields. I have that under investigation, but it initially looks like it is not the result of incorrect mapping but of a systems issue. So it is something that I hope can be resolved very quickly, and my Department is working on that. I do not agree with "diabolical", but I agree that getting the maps right is a two-way process. I take seriously my role in what DARD produces, and the farmers will take their role seriously in getting it right.

Mr Rogers: Following on from the previous Member's question about farm maps, I also have lots of problems in south Down with farmers coming to me with map problems. Minister, how can the aerial photograph accommodate the hollows and the hills that we have in our land in south Down? That seems to be a major problem. I have farmers whose entitlements are reduced every year but their farm has not changed.

Mrs O'Neill: That, again, comes back to the two-way process. Those maps will not capture everything. They are an improvement on what was previously issued, and we have been improving them year on year. When I talk about a two-way process, I am actually asking a farmer to take the map that they have, walk their land and identify what is not on the map, what needs to be on it and let us get it right once and for all. That is the important message that we need to get out. As I said, it definitely has to be a two-way process. DARD is not going to have 100% accurate maps, and we will get to that stage only if we work in partnership.

Mr McNarry: On that, will the Minister explain to this layman what to say, when confronted on the issue of maps by his local farmers, about how fields go missing? Will she also explain what advice I can give to farmers about how they retrieve those fields?

Mrs O'Neill: I am happy to provide the Member with the guidance that we issue to farmers, which shows you how to look for ineligible features. It is things such as that that make fields appear to be missing. It comes back to the same statement: if we work in partnership, we can get maps to a very high standard. However, I am happy to share with the Member the guidance that issued. It is in quite simple language and is easy to understand. It is important that the Member familiarises himself with it for when he deals with farmers. It would, I am sure, be helpful to you and to the farmer.

Rural Development Programme

6. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the current rural development programme. (AQO 3390/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: The rural development programme, with a budget of £500 million, aims to improve the economic, social and environmental conditions in rural areas throughout the North of Ireland. It brings together a wide range of support for the farming, forestry and primary processing sectors, rural enterprise, business development, diversification and rural tourism. Across farm, forestry and food businesses, improving competitiveness is encouraged through a number of measures and complementary schemes that provide support, facilitate restructuring, encourage development and foster innovation. For example, the Focus Farms programme has enabled approximately 13,000 farmers to learn, share experiences and solve common problems through discussion, farm walks and demonstrations. The Farm Family Options programme has encouraged 3,000 farm family members to increase their skills and awareness, with financial benchmarking support provided on almost 1,800 farming enterprises. To build on that, the farm modernisation programme provides capital support for the modernisation and improvement of production techniques on farm businesses.

Over 2,900 farmers have already benefited, with letters of support to a further 2,500 farmers currently being issued under tranche 3. It continues to have a very positive effect on farm businesses. In addition, beyond the farm gate, the agricultural and forestry processing and marketing grant scheme has provided some £18 million investment to 78 agrifood businesses.

3.00 pm

The programme also funds farmers who manage their land for positive environmental benefit. My Department manages and delivers measures that support new woodland creation and the sustainable management of existing woodland. Agrienvironment schemes are funded by an average of £25 million each year, and, in return, 12,100 farmers are undertaking positive environmental actions that enhance our countryside. In addition, the less-favoured area compensatory scheme, which is claimed annually by some 13,500 farm businesses, results in a further £25 million entering the rural economy.

The rural development programme is making a very positive contribution and raising the quality of life in rural areas. We have over 1,300 projects being supported with grant aid of £24·9 million, which has levered in match funding of £17·1 million.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mrs O'Neill: It is all very positive.

Budget Bill: Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Budget Bill [NIA 18/11-15] be agreed. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Buchanan: In contributing to the Budget debate, I do so primarily as Deputy Chairperson of the Employment and Learning Committee — a Committee that is probably on borrowed time, but is nonetheless doing important work in areas key to our economic future. We can be in no doubt that we continue to face a very tight and challenging financial and economic environment, with little real sign of national or international recovery. In such circumstances, it is the duty of each of us to explore how best we can manage the cuts and pressures, while still doing our best to deliver high-quality services.

Lord Bannside, the former leader of my party, used to say that money talks, but the only thing that it says is "goodbye". I know that we are all aware of that nowadays, but there are people in our community who feel it very acutely and struggle to put bread on the table. It is vital that we give priority to helping those who are most vulnerable and in greatest need.

Given that we are a devolved region of the UK that is dependent on the block grant, the Budget shows the excellent job that the Finance Minister has done in allocating resources across the Departments. He deserves praise for the constructive way in which he has redistributed and reallocated resources on the basis of the various monitoring rounds and Budget realignment, rather than the continual grumbling so often levelled against him around the Chamber. We can never have enough resources. We would always like more, but we must live in the real world.

The economy is, quite rightly, at the centre of the Programme for Government, and the Department for Employment and Learning plays a key role in that. I mentioned those who struggle to make ends meet. One of the major areas of concern, one of the major problems facing our society and, indeed, one of the most serious effects of the economic downturn is growing unemployment. The figures are far too high, especially among our young people. That simply has to be tackled, and tackled robustly.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Member for giving way. He will no doubt remember the statement made by the Minister for Employment and Learning this morning, in which he did his best to get all young people into training, apprenticeships, etc. Does the Member not agree that it would be a criminal offence to consider doing away with such an important Department at this time?

Mr Buchanan: That will be up for discussion when the time comes

The deployment of resources into schemes and initiatives aimed at the creation of jobs will not be a waste. If we get that right, it will be an investment that will lay the foundation of an economic recovery — a recovery that will stand a much greater chance of being robust and long-lasting. A key driver of a dynamic and substantive economic recovery is a properly educated and skilled local workforce. That is recognised by the Executive, and I especially welcome the jobs and economy initiative announced by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister in November 2012. As my colleague the First Minister said at the time, the initiative:

"will provide a significant boost to the economy in Northern Ireland and provide employment, particularly for our young people and those who have been out of work for long periods."

The Executive have set aside £80 million for the initiative over the next three financial years. It is reassuring that the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) will receive £1 million in 2012-13, £14 million in 2013-14 and £15 million in 2014-15 to fund a range of key schemes designed to tackle unemployment and create a workforce with the sorts of skills and education qualifications that employers are looking for today.

I do not intend to speak in detail about those schemes, but I support the Steps to Work programme. We will now be able to fund schemes in the programme that are targeted at those who are aged between 18 and 24 and those at the other end of the scale, aged 50 and over. People in those two categories find it hard to get steady employment.

First Start is targeted at those young people who have been out of work for at least 26 weeks and aims to provide them with a minimum of six months' employment in the private or public sector. That provides them with a good opportunity to add to their CV, thus helping increase their chances of getting more permanent work.

For those aged 50 and over who are out of work and find it almost impossible to get back into the workplace, the Step Ahead 50+ project will give 1,100 people in that age group a chance of temporary work in the community and voluntary sector. Again, that opportunity will hopefully enable people to get valuable experience to add to their CV

It has often been said that if we are to attract the right sort of direct investment and encourage local small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and entrepreneurs to take risks and grow their businesses, a key ingredient must surely be the availability of a well-educated and skilled workforce. That is where higher and further education plays a vital role.

Additional funding has also ensured increased enrolments for science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) courses and other directly relevant courses at our local universities. That is the sort of forward thinking that we need. I commend the Minister for Employment and Learning for pursuing the matter. Linked to that are the 150 additional fully funded PhD places in areas of economic relevance.

However, if we are to get the best value out of the extra funding at higher education level, we need to ensure that the right sorts of high-value-added jobs are available for students when they graduate or become PhDs. Therefore, I encourage the Minister for Employment and Learning and my colleague the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, Minister Foster, to work closely on that particular issue.

I turn now to a final DEL-related issue, which is that of apprenticeships. The Minister made a helpful statement in the House yesterday, in which he announced a major review of apprenticeships and youth training.

It is vital that the review leave no stone unturned. There are problems that need to be considered and addressed. Some would-be apprentices can lack incentive and motivation, and they can also lack appropriate education standards. However, there are many other young people who are keen to avail themselves of any opportunity to learn a trade or develop a skill. I am sure that we all know of young people who are totally frustrated and will eagerly grasp any work-related opportunity.

Yesterday, the Minister referred to a "gold standard". That is what we all aspire to, and we do not want to allow red tape to get in the way. Employers who would be prepared to take on apprentices ought not to be hampered by bureaucracy, regulation or, indeed, overzealous employment law.

I will move on to other issues outside the employment and learning sphere. First, I welcome the level of capital investment that has gone into the health service in the western area. I ask the Minister of Finance and Personnel to consider in future monitoring rounds putting money into bringing forward the second phase of the Omagh hospital. As we know, the Omagh hospital was to be a single development. It was then broken down into two different phases so that the first phase could be got under way. The second phase is to be the mental health facility. I ask the Minister to look at that. It is important that that phase is brought forward in tandem with the first phase of development that is already under way.

In education, it is important that the Lisanelly land in Omagh is developed for the education campus. Unfortunately, progress seems to be very slow at the minute. School builds in the western area, especially Omagh, are of a very poor standard and need to be upgraded. Think back to a few months ago when Arvalee School was burned, requiring a newbuild on the Lisanelly site. We need to get work on that education campus moved on a lot more quickly. I ask the Minister to keep that in mind if there is any spare money in his Department.

I welcome the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's (DETI) commitment of £28·6 million for the proposed gasworks in the west. That will be of extreme benefit to businesses there. I know of a number of businesses that are looking forward to tapping into that for their own benefit. I ask for that, too, to be kept on the radar.

I could go on and speak about many other issues in my constituency, but I will leave it at that. I welcome and support the Budget Bill that is before the House today.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the Budget Bill. I will, hopefully, make some constructive remarks that may well be taken on board

As each of us is all too aware, the economy in this part of Ireland is in free fall. Private enterprise is slowly melting away, and jobs are being lost at a phenomenal rate across each of our six counties. The figures that the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) released most recently estimate that 24,945 people emigrated from the North of Ireland between the middle of 2010 and the middle of 2011.

That equates to 1.4% of our total population emigrating in one year, or around 500 people leaving this state every week. Things have not got much better since those figures were calculated.

We cannot simply sit back and expect macroeconomic conditions to reverse themselves. We need to continue to take a proactive approach to address the crisis that we find ourselves in as a result of global economic factors. We need to invest the money that we are allocated in a strategic and thought-out manner to ensure that we not only achieve the challenging targets set out in the Programme for Government but so that we have a direct impact on the quality of life of all of our citizens.

It is clear that the Executive are doing their best to grow the private sector and rebalance our economy, despite the fiscal limitations facing them. Since the Assembly was first established, the primary objective has consistently been to grow the private sector and rebalance the economy. That target has not yet been achieved, and we really must ask ourselves why. What barriers are there to our achieving that objective?

In my view, there needs to be a debate around the fiscal levers that we have. To date, any attempts to start that debate have been countered with a reference to an overestimated deficit between what we contribute in taxes and what we receive to run our Administration. That price tag is always thrown out and the case for greater fiscal powers dismissed. However, little or no assessment has been made of the potential benefits. It costs nothing to have a rational debate on such a matter. We are prepared to engage in that debate. We are prepared to listen to the views of other parties and those in the community who are interested in this area. However, we would also like the debate to be sensible and approached with an open mind.

There is no doubt that our local economy has massive potential. However, that potential is being seriously hampered by the lack of an ability to control our own fiscal affairs. Decisions taken by a Government in Westminster have serious implications for us here. Not only are decisions taken that have serious implications for us, which we have no say in, but we have a complete lack of information on the levels of revenue and expenditure coming into and out of the North.

We need to see much more work done to promote greater economic planning across this island in a joined-up manner. We need to move to a position where we consider the economic realities of this island as a whole. For example, when public services are being mapped out, it needs to be done in a way that benefits citizens on both sides of the border, delivers the best possible public services for all of our people and provides maximum value for money.

3.15 pm

The border continues to act as a barrier to economic development which stifles the economic potential of all of Ireland, but particularly those along the border corridor. In my own county of Fermanagh, a number of proposals have been put forward to achieve these objectives in areas like health, education, local government and economic development. One of those proposals is a submission made by a group in north-west Fermanagh to work with Coláiste Cholmcille in Ballyshannon to deliver education to that part of the border corridor where a school is threatened with closure as a result of low enrolment numbers. Such proposals need only a fair hearing, but they also need the support of both Governments on this island to make them happen.

We are halfway through the current budgetary period. It is a good time to assess where we have come from, where we are now and where we are going. If we did that in a serious way, we would see that we have failed to achieve the principal objective that we set ourselves. So, we need to look at alternatives to growing the private sector and rebalancing the economy, and that needs to be done in a sustainable way. We need to assess new ways of maximising the potential of the whole of this island. We cannot simply continue on this path without reviewing our progress and analysing all the options that are open to us. The game-changer is further fiscal powers. We are happy to participate in a sensible debate in that area. Is anyone here opposed to such a discussion? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr D McIlveen: I support the Budget Bill. So far, the debate has been enlightening in many ways. It was particularly enlightening to find out for the first time that my Chief Whip is a fan of 'The Godfather', which concerns me slightly: never mind horse meat, I am starting to worry about horses' heads if my voting record does not improve greatly. In all seriousness, this has been very useful. At this time of the year, it is always good to take stock of what has been happening and what the plans are for the future.

The Deputy Chair of the Committee for Finance and Personnel summed up well where the Committee is with the Budget Bill. We are not unmindful of the fact that certain Departments are experiencing unforeseen challenges. Look at the Department of Health: obviously, Transforming Your Care is putting quite a financial burden on it and will continue to do so. Obviously, the events in the past six months from a Justice point of view have put pressure on the PSNI, and the retiring prison officers' scheme has also brought a financial burden. So, we are not unmindful of the fact that there are challenges out there. As Mr Flanagan indicated, the economy and how we rebalance the economy within Northern Ireland must continue to be the focus of any Budget that we have.

I also cannot miss the opportunity, as I did in the Committee, to have a go at the European bureaucrats who have brought this predicament upon us in relation to the Titanic signature project. Let us hope that that is an issue that can be ironed out in the coming days.

What a Budget like this highlights is that each Department has a unique responsibility for balancing their books and making sure that public money is being spent in the best possible way. I am sorry that Mr McCarthy has left us, because I struggle with the argument for clinging on to Departments just for the sake of it. Listening to certain representatives, particularly in the Alliance Party, you would think that if the Department for Employment and Learning was wound up every university, every apprenticeship scheme and every possible support mechanism out there for getting people into work would disappear with it.

Nothing could be further from the truth: all we are doing is looking at where the functions can be transferred to that takes away from a burdensome, over-bureaucratic, over-expensive and unnecessary Department. That is where this whole process is going. It is about efficiencies. If we and the private sector are sending out a message to the public that we all have to do things more efficiently, we cannot be hypocritical and say that we will not be more efficient in the way in which we do things. Those are the challenges, and the line that the Alliance Party has taken is very disappointing because it shows a complete detachment from the reality of what the public expect and want in that they want this place to run in a much more efficient way.

I also take a particular interest in Mr Flanagan's comments on greater fiscal responsibility. Of course I agree with that, and I still strongly advocate the devolution of corporation tax to the Assembly. However, with that power comes responsibility, and when we see Sinn Féin's approach in Belfast City Council over the proposed reduction in rates to help struggling businesses through this difficult time, perhaps the jury is still out on devolving that fiscal responsibility. That said, Departments cannot blame the Minister of Finance and Personnel for all their shortcomings and struggles, and there has to be a continued focus on how we make our Budget go that little bit further.

Reform of the public sector has to be one way to do that. Unfortunately, we now find ourselves in a position across the United Kingdom whereby the public sector is shrinking, and the financial rewards of being in the public sector are shrinking to the point at which trainees in some police forces in England get smaller salaries than trainees in a leading fast food restaurant. That is an example of the way in which the public sector is having to stretch its budgets further and further, which will, for the foreseeable future, continue to be the case. Northern Ireland will have to face up to that because while 23.5% of jobs in Scotland are in the public sector, here it is nearly 30%. That obviously has a knock-on effect at subcontractor level, which can then have a ripple effect. Our dependence on the public sector is excessive, so we have to continue to work with the private sector and try to incentivise it as much as possible to encourage further investment in business and create jobs.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: Yes, I will.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Thank you very much. I will be very brief. You referenced the size of the public sector vis-à-vis other regions. Does the Member not agree that the public sector here does, in fact, compare favourably, particularly in its efficiency, with other regions and that the issue that distinguishes us here is that the private sector is floundering and is too small?

Mr D McIlveen: I agree to an extent with what the Member said, but I am not sure that I agree with the way he said it. We have to accept that, if the public sector is to shrink, which is something that I am keen to explore, we have to make sure that it shrinks at the same rate as the private sector grows because the jobs that will have to be moved from one sector to another would have to be found elsewhere. Therefore, we have to continue along the road of incentivisation and decide how we encourage that direct investment in Northern Ireland.

We are not in a position economically in which any of us should give ourselves a pat on the back. That said, we have to accept the benefits that devolution has brought. Regular trade missions, for example, go out on behalf of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, the First Minister and deputy First Minister and the Minister of Finance and Personnel to encourage businesses to come and invest in Northern Ireland and to have their UK base here. We cannot ignore the fact that Belfast and Northern Ireland are considered the second most favourable location for foreign direct investment, being second only to the City of London. That is an incredible achievement in a relatively short period of time of devolution.

So, we have to accept that we are making progress, and, obviously, there are still huge economic challenges out there that we cannot ignore. However, I believe that this devolved Assembly's work has to be ongoing, it has to continue to face up to those challenges and it certainly has to continue to deliver. I pay tribute to Invest Northern Ireland under the leadership of Alastair Hamilton, as it now has a proven track record of encouraging businesses to invest in Northern Ireland. I think that it is right and proper that we do that.

Moving on to talk about the Department for Social Development's (DSD) budget, I will be parochial on this subject. I certainly appreciate the investment that has come to Ballymena through the Minister for Social Development for, first, social housing at St Patrick's Barracks. That was long needed and is very welcome. We are looking forward to seeing the Fold Housing Association under the support of the Department for Social Development get this project fully under way so that the housing shortage in the Ballymena area can be dealt with.

Secondly, we are also very encouraged by the £4 million investment that will go into the Ballymena area to try to regenerate the approaches into the town. That is very welcome, and we look forward to welcoming Minister McCausland after inviting him to come to Ballymena to launch that particular scheme. We left that with him. We told him that he was very welcome to come to Ballymena any time that he wants, as long as he makes the same announcement for more money to come into the town. It has been very much needed, and, hopefully, that money will be well spent on generating more business and getting more custom to come in from across the Province as we look to tidying up the town in that area.

I support the Bill in its entirety. The weight of expectation of how the money will be spent is probably on the Minister of Finance and Personnel's shoulders. However, my point is that it should not be solely on his shoulders — the mantle has been passed to each Department. You have your budget, so you need to go out and spend that money as effectively as possible. We welcome that 22 schools have received a collective spend of around £220 million. That was a very positive announcement, and we hope that similar announcements will come from the Department of Education. That is where the Committee is with that issue. I commend this Budget to the House.

Mrs Overend: As we heard, this stage of the budgetary process is important, as it gives legislative effect to the spring Supplementary Estimates and the Vote on Account, which the Assembly debated yesterday. Despite voting against the 2011-15 four-year Budget, my party is content to let this stage pass so that Departments' ability to draw down resources is not jeopardised.

As my party's spokesperson in this area, I will take this opportunity to look specifically at the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment's budget. The Minister will be aware that a significant proportion of the DETI budget is transferred to the economic development agency, Invest NI, for the purposes of growing our economy. That is one of the most essential tasks that any government-linked body carries out, and, allied with the organisation's significant spend, it is clearly important that it demonstrates strong performance in economic development.

To give some perspective on the vast figures that are involved, Invest NI's net provision in 2012-13 was just under £144 million. In short, we need more clarity so that we can reach a conclusion on the job that Invest NI is doing.

I would like to see clearly defined the numbers of jobs and the amounts of investment promised at the outset and those which actually materialised. Further to that, I would also like more certainty around the extent to which jobs created are counterbalanced by jobs lost, as well as more specific data on job quality. Only then will we have a true picture of the performance of that agency. It is once again disappointing that Invest NI has once again registered a substantial reduced requirement of over £20 million. We must look at the budget flexibility open to it in order to address that.

3.30 pm

Tourism, as a key driver of the economy, must also demonstrate a strong return on money invested by government. I would be the first to admit that much good work has taken place in this area, and I give credit where it is due. I think particularly of the successes: the new Titanic Belfast building, the Irish Open and the preparations for the UK City of Culture. However, when we consider that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB) received over £25 million, Tourism Ireland over £15 million and InterTradeIreland over £3 million — as well as £470,000 under the vague heading of "development of tourism" — it is clear that we should expect results.

The Minister will agree that some of the statistics did not bear out the successes for which we had initially hoped, and I think specifically of the disappointing drop in the numbers of visitors from Great Britain, which are down 15% on last year. That is despite the not-insignificant budgets provided to NITB and Tourism Ireland for the NI 2012 campaign. I hope that we can learn from some of the mistakes and have a successful World Police and Fire Games and UK City of Culture year, and the imminent publication of a long-overdue tourism action plan will, I hope, help in that regard. However, I would prefer it if the plan were fully costed.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that Northern Irelandspecific economic research is fundamentally important as we seek to implement policies to make best use of our economic potential, and that is the next area of the DETI budget that I wish to deal with.

The area of economic development policy and research was given just under £15 million in 2012-13, and I would welcome clarification on how that is broken down. The work of the economic advisory group is important in this regard, but I ask the Minister whether we are drawing on enough expertise that is independent of government. In making this point, I think specifically of the merger involving the Northern Ireland Research Centre and the loss of experience as a consequence.

On the specific point of childcare, I believe that the provision of affordable and effective childcare is an economic driver, and I welcome the fancy words used to recognise its importance. However, I must say that I am disappointed that there is yet another delay in launching a childcare strategy, and I seek assurances that the finance will be dedicated to addressing this real issue.

I conclude by reiterating what many in this House said today and yesterday: the budgetary process needs more clarity. It is disjointed and does not have the necessary transparency to provide proper scrutiny. I know that the Minister shares my frustrations, as he has said as much in the past, and it really is time that the review of the financial process was fully implemented.

Mrs McKevitt: I welcome the opportunity to discuss the Budget Bill. It is so important for all of us in this House to understand the impact that our budgetary decisions have on families, individuals, communities, organisations, charities, sports clubs, companies and farmers, etc, at a time when money is scarce. It is critical that the health and safety, education, housing need, job prospects and wellbeing of all our citizens are prioritised. However, there is also a duty on us to ensure that due proportionality gives a fair distribution of finances across all Departments, so that services can be delivered equally.

I am neither a financial guru nor an economist, but I have enough understanding to know that, behind every plus and minus sign on the Budget sheet, there is a story to be told. I have some real concerns about underspending in a number of Departments. Millions of pounds planned to be spent in this financial year will be returned for a variety of reasons, be it procurement procedures, poor planning or inefficiency within Departments. The bottom line is that a number of planned projects will not now happen.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Member for giving way. We talked yesterday about the number of underspends in different Departments. If you look at OFMDFM, you will see that no money has been spent to date through the strategic investment fund, there is no childcare action plan and many of the regeneration sites are still behind schedule. Does the Member agree that those underspends are not so much about financial good management in the Department but more about bad administration by government? More and more projects are not delivered because that money is being sent back to the centre.

Mrs McKevitt: I thank the Member for his intervention. I agree with him. With better planning in the future, those projects could be delivered.

I register my concern about the amount of money that is being spent by each Department on services provided by consultants, particularly when we hear about the refusal of European funds for projects such as the Peace Bridge and the Titanic Quarter.

As a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure, I welcome the overall £7 million increase to the Department. The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure (DCAL) has the smallest budget of all Departments — less than 1% of the overall Budget — yet it has such an important role to play in the provision of and access to our arts, culture, leisure and sports. I will continue to argue that that Department is worthy of a bigger share of our Budget. Imagine, Minister, if your home budget limited your leisure, sport, art and tourism spend to less than 1%. My colleague Dominic Bradley reckons that you could not afford to go to the cinema if that were the case.

On the brighter side, the additional money for the arts and Northern Ireland Screen are very welcome and will go some way to alleviate the difficulties in those areas. The small lift to the World Police and Fire Games is also welcome, but the news that Ravenhill is unavailable for the games is more than disappointing. This is the premier flagship project of 2013, and it is important that we get it right. That first impression will last.

With competitors and visitors already making travel arrangements for the games, it is critical that venues are tied down quickly. With Ravenhill and Casement Park ruled out for the opening ceremony, I am delighted that the organising committee is taking a serious look at the generous offer made by Newry and Mourne District Council to consider Pairc Esler in Newry. Hopefully, this preferred opening ceremony venue will be announced in a couple of weeks. I hope that the revenue from the games will come to fruition and enhance the investment made by the House.

Mr Gardiner: On 10 February, the Minister of Finance and Personnel said:

"Despite the reduction in the Public Expenditure available we are continuing to make the Health Service a key priority and providing a better Budget settlement than in either Scotland or Wales."

I welcome that, and I thank the Minister personally for the interest that he is taking in the health service in Northern Ireland.

Can he define exactly how the settlement here is better than that in Scotland and Wales, and why is England excluded from the list? Is it better funded than Northern Ireland, or is it on a pro rata basis? Is he comparing like with like? Is it possible to compare an area as small as Northern Ireland with a population of 1·8 million to an area the size of Scotland, which has a population of 5·2 million — nearly three times as large? Surely, there are economies of scale possible in a large area like Scotland that are, quite simply, impossible here in the small area of Northern Ireland. So, is it not bound to be the case that the health service budgetary settlement here, which might look better, has always got to be better pro rata if we are to offer the full range of health services in a small province where economics of scale are impossible compared to Scotland?

I say that because any Finance Minister is going to have to fund any Health Minister here better on a pro rata basis than some other areas simply because of the lack of economies of scale.

The Minister said:

"even in the most difficult financial situation, the Executive have agreed to afford a degree of protection to the health budget."

I welcome that. He went on to say:

"That is why we have ring-fenced and put in place full protection for the health element of the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) budget. Indeed, when factoring in the efficiency targets and service reductions that will apply in other UK regions, I would suggest that the Health Service in Northern Ireland has received the most beneficial settlement anywhere in the UK." [Official Report, Bound Volume 59, p180, col 2].

Will the Minister define exactly how far he has gone to meet the Health Minister's requirements for the health elements in his Budget? What level of efficiencies is he looking for from the Health Minister, and has he suggested where those efficiencies might be achieved? The Minister also said in his recent statement:

"As a result of our investment, many key projects will be able to proceed over the Budget period. They include the new police and Fire and Rescue Service training centre, the Altnagelvin Area Hospital radiotherapy centre, and the sports stadiums and water and sewerage network upgrades." [Official Report, Bound Volume 59, p181, col 1].

I note that only one of the infrastructure schemes that he mentioned is health related, and that is Altnagelvin Hospital's radiotherapy centre.

Will the Minister define how much each of the investments that he mentioned will cost? The Minister speaks of capital projects being taken forward over the next four years, with spending in that area being well above the long-term trend. How much is health getting as a percentage of the total infrastructure investment by the Executive? How does the cash investment in health compare with the cash being spent on sports stadiums, for example? I look forward to the Minister's response, and I hope that it is worthwhile.

Mr McCallister: We must be coming to the end of the Budget debate if I am being called to speak. Today's debate has raised some interesting points. I would like to build on some of the issues that colleagues brought up. Mr Cree and Mrs Overend said that we need to look again at how we reform the Budget process, keep movement going and bring more transparency. I know that it has been a long-standing hobby horse of Mr Cree, and I am sure that he will continue to raise it with the Minister here and at Committee.

Mrs Overend talked about other economic drivers. There has been disappointment in the tourism industry, and it is important to draw Members' attention to the fact that 2012 was to be Our Time Our Place. Despite a huge marketing plan, the numbers did not stack up. There was a very difficult period in December, but, even much earlier in the year, we just did not break through into some of those markets. There were some successes, and Mrs Overend mentioned the success of the Titanic project.

I would like to draw the Minister's attention to some of the issues that have come up. Will he comment on where we are on the equal pay claim and the £30 million increase? How will he resolve that, and what changes will it make to the Budget? He also outlines in the Bill the superannuation and other allowances that relate to expenditure on pensions, lump sums, tax and gratuities in the Civil Service pension scheme. That is shown in the Budget as a decrease of over £234 million in the net cash requirement. I understand that this has occurred mostly through the movement of working capital. I would appreciate a slightly more detailed explanation from the Minister on that specific issue.

There is an element of European funding coming into DFP, and the Budget shows that with reference to EU Peace programmes, EU community initiatives and the European regional development fund. Will the Minister outline how that sits alongside the Programme for Government commitments to increase the drawdown of European funds by 20% and whether his Department is maximising the European funding available to it? His colleague Mr McIlveen seemed to be laying the blame for the Titanic centre funding at the door of Europe. It is fair to say that the jury is probably still out on who is responsible.

Given the size of the education budget, we need to have more clarity in education. We constantly hear from colleagues who sit on the Committee for Education about the difficulties that they have in getting that clarity. I would be interested to know whether the Minister of Finance and Personnel thinks it acceptable that the Minister of Education has not shared his savings delivery plan like other Departments. Transparency is needed, and there is no good reason for the secrecy from that Department.

Will the Minister of Finance and Personnel assure the House that he will speak with the Minister of Education and deal with him at Executive level to see how we can bring more transparency to this? It is difficult and frustrating for a Committee to try to scrutinise and hold a Department to account when it is not given the relevant information.

I have a couple of concerns about the budgeting for the Education and Skills Authority (ESA). The use of consultants has cost some £870,000. If we break that figure down, we can look as some examples of spending: £45,000 on ESA delivery models and location options; £65,000 on an assignment to find an ESA programme manager; and over £12,000 to determine the terms and conditions of ESA directors. The question must be asked whether all of that is absolutely necessary.

We are led to believe that ESA is about driving efficiencies and saving money. However, in his response to an Assembly question from my colleague Danny Kinahan, the Minister said that he has not budgeted for the new organisation. Therefore, as things stand, we do not know whether it will save money. However, I offer this to the Finance Minister: if an organisation employs over 60,000 people, it is unlikely to be cheap. With an organisation of such sheer size and scale, is it not time, when the legislation is progressing through the House, that we started to look at budgets and at what the scale of such an organisation is likely to be?

Mr Flanagan spoke about cross-border co-operation. I do not think that anyone ever stood in the way of that which made sense, whether that be building a road or — I see that Minister Poots is in the Chamber — looking at how we deliver cardiac services for children. Everyone in the House has been proactive about that.

Even if we do not agree on the exact subvention from Westminster, we know that it is very large. We can debate whether it is £8 billion, £9 billion or £10 billion, but it is huge. Whether the Minister continues to campaign for and champion tax-varying powers, I imagine, knowing him and his party's philosophy, that tax-varying powers are unlikely to mean a reduction for anyone. They are likely to be taxraising powers.

Mr Hamilton: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Certainly.

Mr Hamilton: Thank you. Will the Member agree that, given the fiscal deficit that he mentioned, regardless of whether one disputes its size, taxes in Northern Ireland would by definition have to go up to meet at least the current standard of public services that people have come to expect?

Mr McCallister: I certainly agree with that. You cannot continue to argue that you want even higher levels of spending and expect that, if you devolve tax-varying powers, taxes are going to be reduced. Without being too unkind, there is a slight air of fantasy from the Member and Sinn Féin on that.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. He said that the deficit — or subvention, as he called it — is £8 billion or £9 billion or £10 billion, but we do not have a figure at all. We have an overestimated figure that nobody can stand over; a figure that is based on flawed estimates and that contains figures that, by the Treasury's own admission, are not overseen by either the Executive or the British Secretary of State. That figure tells us very little. It is not based on fact; it is based on estimates. We need to properly debate the fiscal arrangements that we have. The British Government need to give us accurate figures. Placing a price tag up front in the debate is not helpful. When talking about a potential deficit, we need to have proper figures.

I return to the Member's comments about taxation policy. Any taxation policy, if we did have greater fiscal powers here, would not simply be dictated by Sinn Féin. It would have to be done with the collective agreement of the Executive

Mr McCallister: I thank the Member for that intervention. Given the fact that he is not able to give even his estimate of the figure, does he at least accept that, however accurate the estimate is, it is a large figure? I gave the example, which he quoted, of £8 billion, £9 billion or £10 billion. Maybe the Minister can give his best guess when he is summing up the debate. However, the figure is substantial, and that is what we have to get across. I do not have an issue with it being a substantial figure. I think that, living in the United Kingdom, we have a collective duty to help worse-off regions in our nation. Northern Ireland happens to be a worse-off part of the UK, so it is right and proper that we get some help from our friends across the rest of the country.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Go ahead, Mitchel.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Always glad to help, John. Thank you very much for giving way. Do you agree that an argument over estimates is, by itself, very unlikely to give us a definitive answer? Our call, which we think most parties that want definitive answers would support, is to give us the information and let us make our own minds up.

Mr McCallister: I notice that Sinn Féin has not given us a definitive answer yet. Perhaps its Members should get the number crunchers behind the scenes in Sinn Féin to try to come up with a definitive answer. Does he accept that the figure is very large indeed, and that we are very fortunate to be part of the UK and have that subvention and support from the rest of the country?

Mr Rogers: I welcome the Second Stage of the Budget Bill, which presents an opportunity to offer my opinion on some aspects of the planned spending. I have listened to the Minister. Today is not about lambasting the Minister, and I promise him that the purpose of my comments is purely to reflect on whether we have got our priorities right and, perhaps, to influence how, in the future, we allocate scarce public resources.

As a former teacher, I note with satisfaction that the Youth Service is getting an additional £755,000 to promote the personal and social development of children and young people, and assist them in gaining the knowledge, skills and experience to reach their full potential as valued individuals. Through community relations measures for young people, that will encourage the development of mutual understanding and promote recognition of and respect for cultural diversity. I welcome that, and hope that the additional money will help in focusing on the need to generate genuine understanding of the need to respect difference and encourage diversity. Recent events on the streets of Northern Ireland remind us that much needs to be done to bring an end to the mistrust, lack of self-esteem and inability of many young people to engage positively with others from a different background.

The total Youth Service budget of over £37 million is money that I hope is used in the most effective way and shared fairly across the North, particularly in rural areas, where opportunities for engagement are limited. In rural areas, we do not have peace walls, but I remind Members that peace walls do not have to be made of concrete or corrugated metal. They can exist in the minds of people, and that is equally sad.

I would like to focus on a few issues in education and highlight the fact that sound financial planning for education and raising standards are inextricably linked. The original idea behind ESA was commendable: reduce bureaucracy and deliver more resource to the classroom. As a school leader back in those days, I was encouraged by that, but like many others today, I have severe reservations.

Really what I am saying is that it causes me great concern that the Department has not yet got an up-to-date business case, and ESA could be up and running in a few months. I do not think that that would be acceptable if I were looking for a business loan. Although you are not responsible, Minister, how will your Department address that issue? Because, in two months' time, we will be in the next financial year.

School maintenance and newbuilds: there are major issues with school maintenance, with a £200 million backlog, and there is a list of promised newbuilds still waiting to cut the first sod. What a boost that would be to our construction industry, if only it could be prioritised. That, in turn, would increase the spending power of the shopper and help us to reinvigorate our local economy.

In response to a question for written answer a few weeks ago, I was astounded to hear that over 270 primary schools have class sizes of 30 and that 17 schools have class sizes of 35. There are major issues here that need to be addressed if we are really serious about raising standards and giving our young teachers some worthwhile employment.

Our teachers do fantastic work, but meeting the needs of 30 or more children with diverse learning needs requires special attention. Many of our classrooms cannot even physically accommodate such classes. I was delighted to attend an event in Stranmillis last week with other colleagues from the Assembly and to meet many young people. We really need a scheme where our newly qualified teachers are guaranteed a year's employment to complete their early professional development.

I question the scheme by OFMDFM to employ 200 teachers to promote one-to-one support for literacy and numeracy schemes. That seems like a good idea, but is it a one-off or an integral part of some strategy to raise standards? Is it sound financial planning, or planning on the hoof?

As we move forward, sound financial planning will be integral to raising standards. Our school leaders are expected to have a school development plan that is closely linked to a three-year financial plan. If there is a change to common formula funding, that will affect a school's budget. How can school leaders plan ahead if we continue to have the seasonal adjustment that the education sector experiences? ESA could be that opportunity, but where is the up-to-date business case? I will move on.

I was surprised to learn that over £15 million has been cut from the Department for Regional Development's budget. That concerns me, as less money is being provided for high-quality water and sewerage services. I am aware that many small sewerage plants in rural areas need to be replaced or upgraded in order to comply with European legislation, and I worry that we may arrive at a situation where we incur infraction penalties.

Again, in the same Department, remaining with environmental issues, I note that there is no provision for future plans for the electrification of our rail network. Yes, I acknowledge that much work has been done in recent times — and I am particularly pleased that refurbishment work on the Belfast-Derry railway line is ahead of schedule. That is good news, but our rolling stock on the Belfast-Dublin railway line needs replenished.

In recent years, there has been considerable progress in reducing death on our roads. I am mindful of the young police constable who lost her life at the weekend, and other families who have lost loved ones in recent times. However, the overall reduction in death on the roads is major and welcome. The additional £6 million for the Department of the Environment, which I hope will be invested in infrastructure designed to reduce further death on our roads, is welcome.

It would be remiss of me not to mention the Audit Office. I welcome the good news that no change is proposed to its budget of over £8 million. I also welcome the Minister's undertaking to acknowledge the independence of the Audit Office in carrying out its statutory role and the fact that he considers the Audit Office's role to be well-defined by statute and not to require any further attention by his Department in providing clarity. I accept that, and I feel that I can now relax in the knowledge that the Audit Office will be free to carry out its vital work without any interference, other than from the Audit Committee, which has sole responsibility for agreeing its budget.

4.00 pm

I note the reduction in the budget of the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service and surmise that it is not related to the fact that substantial money was returned by that organisation in recent times. In recent weeks, I have had the privilege of attending the opening of a new fire station at Rathfriland. I know that many other fire stations around the North need similar facilities. I look forward to that.

Two months ago, the Assembly passed a motion on the Narrow Water bridge. After that debate, the Minister assured me that a decision would be made once his officials had scrutinised all the necessary documents. I know that they have been working closely with the other parties involved in the application. I say this to the Minister: south Down — in fact, Northern Ireland — cannot afford to lose a £20 million project for an Executive input of less than £2 million. Our construction and tourism industries need that action.

Mrs Dobson: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the DARD budget today. The DARD budget is the budget that, perhaps, has the greatest impact on our major economic industry: the agrifood industry. High above the Senate Chamber, there are three images depicting Northern Ireland's three greatest industries: shipbuilding; the textile industry; and agriculture. Of those three, agriculture is our sole remaining major local industry. It is, therefore, beholden on the House to ensure that our farmers and the wider industry receive every possible support. Just like all businesses operating to a budget, Departments are not and should not be immune to budgetary constraints on their activities. That is what makes the DARD budget so critical to the Northern Ireland economy as a whole.

Looking back at the past year, the focus of the DARD budget should have been to achieve the maximum economic return for this industry and for our economy as a whole. Last year was a tough year for farmers. I believe that everyone in the House can agree on that point. It was a year in which the farmers deserved greater support and assistance from the Department, the primary aim of which should be to support the future of the industry. However, the Agriculture Minister has said that she hopes that next year will be better for farmers. I am sure that the Finance Minister would agree that Ministers should strategically plan their budgets to deliver help, not hope. A Minister who was confident in their future planning and the direction of their Department in the past and into the future would never offer mere hope. That suggests misdirected priorities and wasted resources. Farmers, their families and all those employed directly and indirectly in the industry will not thank the Minister and her Department for the consequences of failing to plan strategically, something that is suggested by the significantly reduced net and cash requirements for the 2012-13 budget.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

More recently, the Agriculture Minister has told us that she is showing leadership, as she moved ahead of her Department in making the decision to relocate her headquarters to Ballykelly. During the past year, however, farmers have been calling on the Minister to step forward and take decisive action to deliver help on the issues that are important on each and every farm in Northern Ireland. I am sure that the Finance Minister, given his keen interest in agriculture, will share their concerns, as I list their issues: slurry spreading; fairer pricing; rising feed prices; rising rural crime; rising energy costs; and, of course, the potential long-term damage of the horse meat scandal. An issue that is critical to the future of the industry is the forging of strong links among all elements of the food production chain.

Within last year's budget, the Minister had a duty to address all those points in detail, but the performance has been poor, at best. For far too long, successive Ministers have failed in their responsibility and duty to work towards returning profitability and stability to the industry, an industry that, during that period and to this day, continues to offer reduced returns for harder work. Despite all the money and resources received, DARD has continually failed to come up with the goods. That cannot go on indefinitely with no end in sight.

One major area of concern is the continued failure of the Rivers Agency to stem the tide of flooding. Despite a significant increase in resources for the Rivers Agency and flood protection, DARD is still broadly failing to tackle flooding. Does the Finance Minister agree that, in 2012, it is wholly unacceptable for people living in Northern Ireland to continue to have their life disrupted and put on hold because of flooding? The Agriculture Minister has failed to get a grip on the issue despite increased resources. A fundamental review of the Rivers Agency and effective increased funding may well be required to help to plan for the future. Solutions are urgently needed, but DARD does not appear to be in a position to offer them. Minister, that must change.

Another area in which increased resources in the Budget appear to have offered little in the way of positive results is the significant increase of £4 million to the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI). The Minister continues to receive expensive research results or, in the case of the County Down biosecurity study, continues to wait for expensive research results. Yet, she fails to act on the advice received. The Minister must listen to the expert advice that she is paying dearly for from her budget. There are countless examples of where the breadth of knowledge of AFBI is continually ignored in favour of Department dogma. The increase in research funding is to be expected from a Department that likes to research an issue to death without taking any action whatsoever to resolve the problem. The too-long-debated issue of bovine TB is only one of many examples.

As we look in detail at the DARD budget and its future priorities, we must never forget the family budgets in farms across Northern Ireland. Provisional figures released by DARD show that the total income from farming in Northern Ireland is down by 52.2% in real terms, from £290 million in 2011 to £143 million in 2012. The situation is not helped by an Agriculture Department that, over the past year and looking to the future, shows a cavalier indifference to the plight of the farmer. That will have a devastating effect on farmers and their families all across Northern Ireland. Although the Agriculture Minister confirms her concern and disappointment, she must share responsibility for the drastic drop in farm incomes. Despite a relatively healthy budget allocation, the Minister's Department continues to take action that only heaps added pressure on an industry already at breaking point. Does the Finance Minister agree that support and action are urgently needed, not further prevarication, expensive research, misdirected priorities and silence? The Agriculture Minister must look outside the walls of her Department and visit farms, farmers and their families.

One area that continues to perform well across the Budget period is the healthy enrolment numbers at the CAFRE campuses, which are at an all-time high. That proves that more and more people want to learn about farming. They are studying to enter the industry, which is healthy and is to be warmly welcomed. It is, therefore, all the more important that DARD prioritise support for our farms to enable them to modernise, grow and provide the future for young farmers and their families. The investment in their future through CAFRE must not be in vain or there will be no industry left for them once they finish their education. DARD has a responsibility and duty to direct its efforts and resources to ensuring that we have an industry that is ready and available to young farmers to take up the reins when their time comes.

Sadly, news of falling farm income shows that successive Ministers and the Department have resolutely failed. My fear is that the news of falling incomes will not act as a magnet but will actively deflect people from choosing farming as a career in the first place. During the Budget period, DARD missed the opportunity to help an industry in which statistics now prove that incomes are falling. The Minister must review her priorities and look again at the real world of farming across Northern Ireland. Farmers wanted a change in direction from a Department that has a track record of continually feeding the bureaucratic machine. They are calling for help to sustain the future of their industry. For far too long their calls have gone unanswered.

I hope that the Finance Minister will commit to doing all in his power to ensure that DARD meets its basic requirements on the headquarters relocation. I would welcome your assurance, Minister, that you will ensure the continued pursuit of good budgetary planning as opposed to ideologically and politically driven decisions. I look forward to June's debate, in which we will all have the opportunity to scrutinise and debate the issues of the headquarters in detail. That debate will surely provide much animation in the House.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Budget today, and I urge the Finance Minister to closely monitor the Department of Agriculture, if we are to avoid future falls in farming incomes across Northern Ireland. We must never allow our one remaining major industry to go the same way as shipbuilding and the textile industry. The House owes that to Northern Ireland.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. At the outset, I take the opportunity to apologise to the Minister and to other Members who have taken part in the debate for not being here earlier. I was dealing with issues that have probably been in the media all day today. I just want to apologise genuinely to the Minister. Budgets are a big issue, and, if we are serious about getting things right, we need to ensure that money is spent properly and goes to Departments so that they can plan ahead and deal with relevant issues. I am aware that other Members have raised issues on the Budget, especially the budget allocated to health. So, I want to take the opportunity to address the House on some points as the Chair of that Committee, and I thank the Minister for giving us the opportunity to take part in the debate today.

I acknowledge that health and the Department of Health receive a substantial amount of money. It gets a substantial allocation in the Budget round, and I take it on board that the Health Department is entitled, through the monitoring rounds, to access additional money at that time. That is to be welcomed. We need to balance that — this is not about starting another debate — with the question of whether it is enough, given the issues that the health service faces. I know that there have been issues of efficiency and efficiency savings in all Departments, but that is especially the case with health and social services and the number of trusts etc. So, to streamline the money that is going into the health and social care budget, we need to ensure that the majority if not all of it is spent on front line services. We need to ensure that, by the time that that money goes through the system, each pound that is being allocated to front line services is not diluted.

Looking to 2013-14, the Committee is well aware that the Health Department is facing a difficult year. As other Members have said, there will be budget pressures. A number of weeks ago, we heard from officials on this matter, and we were able to probe some of the details and figures that they gave us. The Committee still has some questions, because we are still waiting for figures coming from the Department so that we can compare them with figures on other issues. So, it was a concern for the Committee, but we are doing our job as a Committee and are scrutinising and ensuring that the Health Department spends the money properly.

"Transforming Your Care" is the new buzzword, and we all hear it. It is the new buzzword, especially in the health sector, and we are told that it will radically change the way in which health services are approached and delivered over the next number of years. The vision of Transforming Your Care needs to be welcomed. I do not think that anybody could argue against that vision, but there are genuine concerns out there that some parts of Transforming Your Care can dilute services and allow for the privatisation of some services. We need to raise those issues. As I said, no one could argue against the vision of Transforming Your Care, and, if we get it right, it can work.

We talk about a collective, joined-up approach from Departments on some of the issues, but one of the issues that struck me was the Minister of Social Development's acceptance and admission, when answering a question a number of weeks ago in the House, that he is failing in his duty to build the amount of supported living accommodation that he committed to building under the Bamford recommendations. That is not the Health Department's issue; it is an issue for the Department for Social Development, but the Department of Health has to pick it up.

The Committee was told that the transitional funding for implementing Transforming Your Care had not yet been identified for 2013-14. So, we are talking about Transforming Your Care taking us forward over the next few years, yet the transitional funding to do that has not been identified. That is a concern.

Minister, there is also the matter of pay freezes. I know that this is probably on your radar and that you and others will probably have raised it. The pay freeze will be lifted, and we need to ensure that more money is found for salaries.

Day and daily, we hear about new drugs and vaccines becoming available, and the Department will want to look carefully at them and their affordability. Not a day goes by without somebody facing the issue of how, whatever illness they have, they can access the drugs. Money then becomes the issue. Credit where credit is due, in fairness, a number of months ago the Minister of Health was able to find money to allow people to access some of the drugs associated with cancers. The world changes, access to drugs changes, new vaccines come on the market, and then there is another battle. If we are serious about the health of our people, we need to ensure that they can access some of those drugs and vaccines on a daily basis. There are difficult decisions ahead for the Department on how it chooses to spend its budget in 2013-14.

From the conversations that we have had in Committee, I assume that the Department will put pressure on the health and social care trusts to spend a greater proportion of their budget on health promotion and disease prevention. The out-turn figures for 2011-12 were put before the Committee a few weeks ago, and we were disappointed to learn that the trust spend on health promotion had dropped from 1·6% in 2008-09 to 1·4% in 2011-12. That takes me back to my point about investing for health, Transforming Your Care, health promotion, early intervention and tackling health inequalities. The money being spent by trusts on health promotion will drop next year. We need to have a common-sense approach, rather than saying one thing in one document and something else in another.

Suicide is a curse on all our communities, and it knows no boundaries. Suicide affects every home and every constituency, and it saddens me to say that it is probably the biggest killer. The rates for those who succeed in taking their own life have increased 100% over the past 10 years. Something is wrong. I have talked about Transforming Your Care, health promotion and the trust spend going down. What surprises me is that, while the suicide rate is increasing, the spend on mental health services by trusts has fallen from 7.5% of their overall budget to 7% over the past four years. Currently, it is around £227 million a year. I cannot balance that. Suicide is one of the biggest killers and is increasing, yet the spend on mental health by trusts is falling. For the record, Bamford recommended that the budget for mental health be increased to £400 million, yet we spend £227 million on mental health issues. So we would like to see the 2013-14 spending plans move towards that goal.

More generally, the Committee hopes that the Department will be able to sort out its own finances for 2013-14 as soon as possible, so that we can look at that. We hope to see those plans early in the new financial year and, in fairness, I am hopeful that that will be the case. However, if we are serious about it, it needs to be recognised that tackling health inequalities is not just a health issue. If we are talking about getting in there with early intervention, we need to be serious about tackling areas of social need. We need to be serious about getting into areas of high health inequalities. We need to ensure that we have proper education, resources, access to services and investment because, at the end of the day, they will benefit health.

Who knows? It may be that, 10 years from now, we will not need the substantial budget that we have for health because we are getting in there to intervene at an early age. It is important that, in looking at the Budget, we do not go into our own silo and try to get money for this or that Department. I say on behalf of the Health Committee that, if we are serious about tackling the whole issue of health, including health inequalities, health promotion, early intervention and prevention, every Department needs to play its part.

Mr Wilson: I first thank the Members who remain in the Chamber. Quite clearly, after raising their points, many Members were dead keen to get a response to them maybe by remote control or something, I do not know — but they seem to have deserted the place. Maybe they will read Hansard tomorrow. Anyhow, I thank Members for their contributions today. Some were relevant, some not so relevant, and some were fairly predictable. People would like to see lots more money spent, but there were not too many ideas about where we would save that money. That, I suppose, is the nature of these debates. I thank all the Members who took part in the debate and the Committee for accepting that the Bill should go through by accelerated passage. Mr Bradley accepted on behalf of the Committee that it had had the opportunity to scrutinise the Bill. Of course, officials have always been and always will be helpful in pursuing issues that the Committee wishes to raise because of the shortened nature of our debate on the Bill as a result of the legislative timetable.

Members raised a number of issues, and I will try to cover as many of them as possible. First, a number talked about the importance of Budget planning. We are in the third year of a four-year Budget. It showed a degree of maturity by the Executive and Assembly that we agreed a four-year Budget. We outlined the hard choices and put those to the public. We did not try to hide behind an approach of saying, "Well, we will tell you what it is like this year, and, at the end of this year, you will find out what it will be like next year". Rather, we put those choices to the public. Furthermore, this place gets an awful lot of criticism from journalists who say that we do not do our job properly, we are not mature, we cannot deal with hard issues and we are afraid and walk away from difficult things. We put this four-year Budget to the public before an election, and we are now rolling it out. We are coming into the third year of it now. This will probably not be the kind of thing that resonates too much with critics of this place, but other Administrations across the United Kingdom did not do what we have done. They dodged the issue of what lay beyond the election by giving one-year Budgets and then telling people what the consequences would be after the election. We set our stall out, which was the right thing to do. It gives certainty to Departments and enables them to plan for the longer term. Of course, the danger always was that, if the situation changed, some of the Budget data and decisions might be out of date. Again, we dealt with that through in-year monitoring and, of course, the review of the Budget for the past two years, where we looked at what had happened for the first two years, saw where there had been consistent pressures on some budgets, consistent underspends in others and made the necessary adjustments. I know that some people did not like that.

Mr Rogers is not here, but he referred to the Audit Office, which did not like the outcome of that process. However, if it consistently underspends — especially as it is the office that talks about good budgetary practice, always points the finger when there is not good budgetary practice and always tries to nit-pick where it perceives that mistakes have been made — it really cannot complain when we apply to its budget the very principles that it would want applied to Departments. It was not an attack, as I said. I just wanted to get that off my chest at the start before I ran out of steam. It is worth noting that nobody should be exempt from good budgetary practice, the review of budgets and ensuring that public resources are well spent, whether the amounts are small or large. Members who referred to good planning raised some important points.

Mr Weir raised the issue of capital spend and mentioned that, despite the recession, in 2012-13, we spent £1.3 billion. Again, it is worth noting that, as a result of some of the work done by the Budget review group and members of various Committees — I know that Mr McLaughlin was a big proponent of this — we found additional resources. Even with a 40% cut in our capital budget, we have been able to retain spending at that kind of level. It is down from the £1.6 billion spent in the previous year, but it is a high level of spend. Let us remember what it means to the Northern Ireland economy. Some 54% of work in the construction industry — that is up from 32% — is now a result of money spent by the Assembly and Departments in Northern Ireland. The construction industry faces difficult times, but it would have faced even more difficult times had it not been for the capital resources that we put into projects across Northern Ireland. It is worth remembering the impact of decisions that we make here on the general

Of course, there has been some delay in spending on capital projects this year. Spending on the A5 has been delayed as a result of judicial reviews, and that probably accounts for a reduction of over £50 million. I do not want to get on my hobby horse — I have stacks of hobby horses to get through today anyhow —

Mr Hamilton: Do not talk about horses.

Mr Wilson: Talking about horses today may be a bit dangerous.

Judicial reviews and legal challenges by the very people who claim that they want the Executive to do something to stimulate the economy often lead to delays in expenditure when we need to get that expenditure into the economy. I raise this time and time again with many of the private sector bodies that come to see me. They talk about the impact that the Executive can have on stimulating the economy. Yet, very often, some of their members are the very people who, when unsuccessful in a tender, do their best to challenge that tender and delay the spend that we want to get out into the economy to ensure that more jobs are created and more people employed.

4.30 pm

Mr Weir also raised the issue of the dormant accounts scheme and asked for an update on it. I am disappointed that the scheme is not up and running. It would be an important addition to the money that is available for many organisations in the voluntary and social economy sectors.

We will expect to receive a 2.8% share of the money that is in the dormant accounts scheme. That will amount to £1.3 million currently and another £1.9 million this year. We have not been able to spend it, one of the reasons being that it still rests with the Executive. Sinn Féin may have some difficulties with the scheme, but I hope that those can be cleared up so that the money can be made available to the organisations that would benefit from it.

Mr McLaughlin mentioned the devolution of additional fiscal powers and the way in which that could help future Budgets. He raised the issue yesterday as well, and I know that it is a theme to which he and his party will keep coming back.

There is a political element here on both sides. Of course Sinn Féin wants greater independence from the rest of the United Kingdom, even ignoring the economic impact that that would have. As a unionist, I do not want to see that economic independence. Therefore, we need to find some common ground, and we have done that in the Assembly.

The issues should be judged not on unionist or nationalist ideological grounds but on whether there is a clear case for the devolution of additional powers. That case would have to include the impact that those powers would have on the ability of the Assembly and the Executive to do things, the costs that would be involved and the benefits that would stem from it. Only on that basis should we then make the judgement as to whether we seek the devolution of those powers.

We did it in the case of air passenger duty. There were good reasons for that, and, as Minister of Finance and Personnel, I supported it. We are seeking it for corporation tax, which will be a challenge, but, on balance, it seems that the arguments are that it would be a good thing for the economy.

On other occasions we have sought exemptions from some of the tax regimes that apply in the rest of the United Kingdom. I know that this will not please the Green Party too much, but the fact that we are now exempt from the carbon tax, provided that it is not seen to go against state rules, will please electricity consumers all over Northern Ireland. That was a good call by the Executive. The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and I lobbied hard for that, and it was accepted by Westminster. There are other green taxes, such as the aggregates levy, that are damaging to our economy. Unfortunately, because of an EU ruling, we have to fight for that exemption to be maintained in Northern Ireland.

Therefore, there are occasions when it is the right thing to do, but the idea that we should break free of the existing fiscal restraints for ideological reasons is not the right way forward.

Mr McLaughlin also said that we need to look at strategies to grow the private sector. There is ongoing work to be done over the next number of months and years, and I hope that the Committee for Finance and Personnel will play a role, along with other Committees that need to do so as well

As the situation changes and as the economic circumstances change, of course we have to look at our strategies. We have to ask whether they are working as well as they should and could be, and whether there are different things that we can do. First, no one has a monopoly on knowledge on this. Secondly, just because you have done something in the past does not mean that you should keep on doing it into the future. Thirdly, we have to look at the changing contexts and decide what can be done. I look forward to the work that can be done in the future on those cross-cutting strategies.

Mr Cree raised the issue of the Audit Office. I think that I have dealt with part of that.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Yes; I will.

Mr D Bradley: The Audit Office produced a report entitled 'Department of Finance and Personnel — Collaborative Procurement and Aggregated Demand' in which it stated that a potential £100 million saving for the Northern Ireland taxpayer is not being realised because government agencies are not collaborating in procurement and that, in fact, only around 4% of the potential is being realised. That is a reference to the way that things were done. The Minister has just said that the way that things were done in the past is not necessarily the way that they should be done in the future. Does he agree that, given that report and its proposals, we should change the way that things were done in the past and realise that potential £100 million of savings, which we could badly do with?

Mr Wilson: I am glad that the Member raised that point. It illustrates one of the cautions that we should have about auditors, accountants and the Audit Office, who sometimes sit behind the desk with the blinds drawn, ignoring the reality of the outside world.

The Member should think about what he has just said and some of the things that he has identified himself with in the past as a member of the Finance and Personnel Committee. I have a report from the Finance and Personnel Committee — and I am very sympathetic to many of the recommendations in it — that stated that we should be tailoring our purchasing to try to help Northern Ireland firms and ensure that small and medium-sized enterprises in Northern Ireland get the biggest possible share of public expenditure in Northern Ireland because that helps the local economy.

Collaborative tendering brings advantages in money saved. However, do not forget who will be the first to complain once we get into collaborative tendering, making tenders larger and putting out more complicated tenders. Representatives of industry in Northern Ireland sometimes come to me and say, "Why do you not break tenders up so that small firms can benefit from them? More small firms, which may not have the financial wherewithal to go for a large tender, could then bid for smaller tenders." I hope that the Member sees the tension there. In fact, as far as I can remember, he was actually a member of the Finance and Personnel Committee when the report on procurement came to the Assembly and was debated. He cannot ask, on one hand, whether I will abide by what the Audit Office states in its report on collaborative tendering — yes, there will be savings, although I do not know whether those will amount to £100 million — and, on the other hand, say, "By the way, we want procurement within the EU rules to be designed in such a way that benefits small firms in Northern Ireland."

I am glad that he raised that point, because I think that it shows the tension that there sometimes is between one section of government and this Assembly, and even the tension in what Assembly Members often ask for.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Yes; I am quite happy to give way.

Mr D Bradley: I have listened to what the Minister said. However, according to that report, the total potential savings were somewhere in the region of £140 million. I think that around £38 million of savings are now being realised. The extent of the total potential savings allows for the type of compromise that can be found between having larger contracts and ensuring that smaller firms in Northern Ireland benefit from procurement.

Mr Wilson: I do not know how you will get those savings. What the Audit Office is thinking about there is, for example, when we order desks to order them in one job lot. If a Department or part of a Department decides to order desks, you will maybe find that only three or four local suppliers will apply for it because it is a small order. If we put out an order for all of the desks required across the public service in Northern Ireland, you could be absolutely sure that, first of all, some of the small suppliers could not actually handle such a tender, but secondly that tenderers from right across Europe would be in on it. That is where the difficulty lies. If we want to make savings on procurement, that is dead on. However, on the other hand, do not then be coming to this Assembly and complaining that there is a small supplier in your constituency who used to be able to get into government as a big customer but is now locked out. I get that all the time. That is the tension that there is there. We have probably strayed a little, but I was misled — sorry, waylaid — by the Member. [Laughter.] The Member misled himself, but he waylaid me and I moved away from the central purpose of the debate.

Mr Cree also raised the issue of the Titanic project and the £18 million, as did a number of people. There is no danger, if we do as the ETI Minister has asked us, of losing the £18 million of European money that was going to be used as part of the payment for the Titanic signature project. We do not know, and we will only find out by testing it in court, but if the Titanic signature project was no longer eligible for the £18 million and we ran out of time in finding some other use for that £18 million, then, and only then, would we lose the money.

That is why I support the ETI Minister, who spotted the problem. She is convinced — and look at all of the advice that was given to DETI: it looks convincing — that the way in which the procurement was done falls within EU rules. However, why would we risk losing the £18 million by simply waiting until we have explored all of the investigations on that particular issue when the easy way out is to simply say, "That £18 million is available. It can be used by other Government Departments"? We simply take money from the Budget which would have been used by other Departments, use it for the Titanic signature project and let other Departments bid for the £18 million. All you have done there is move the money about, and you have not lost it. That will not cost us any more. The only time it will cost us money is if we run out of time to spend the money. Then that £18 million would go back to Europe.

Mr Cree: That money can be used for existing approved contracts in the Budget. That is why I wondered whether you could identify the projects. So, obviously, if the money is switched to those particular headings, it means that the £18 million would be used up and the £18 million that those projects were looking for would be free for other purposes. Is that right? Is there a time frame on that?

be spent within the next two years. So, the time frame is about finding the projects that are available that can spend the £18 million before 2015, and there are plenty of such projects, as the Member said. What we simply do is use European money to fund those projects and take £18 million from them and make it available to DETI.

He also asked about headroom. The total headroom that we have looked for is £36.6 million. We have to specify to Treasury where, if we underspent that money, it would go to. We have specified that £21.6 million would go to the Department of Justice (DOJ) and £15 million would go to Health. That assumes that there is going to be underspend identified between now and the end of the financial year. If no underspend is identified, the headroom will not be used. The budget will be closely monitored in the final stages of the financial year to ensure that, if that money is available, it is used for that purpose.

4.45 pm

Mr Dickson raised two basic issues: how we spend our money in DRD on roads versus public transport; and Northern Ireland Water. I was not quite sure whether he wants more money to be spent on public transport — of course, the result would be less money spent on roads — because he also acknowledged that we are a car-owning society and are very reliant on cars. Indeed, like me, he campaigned very hard for significant expenditure on roads in his constituency. I would love to be able to claim sole responsibility for the fact that nearly £300 million will be spent on roads in east Antrim. Unfortunately, I cannot claim that, even though some other Members have claimed that they had a big responsibility for it. He is not here at the moment. I was not quite clear whether he wants less money spent on roads.

There is still a roads infrastructure problem, and we have spent significant amounts of money on public transport, such as the allocation of £12.5 million for bus replacement. Indeed, there will be some benefit to our constituency in so far as some of the work on those vehicles will be carried out there. There is £1.9 million for improvements on the railway line, and, in east Antrim, we not only have new rolling stock, which has improved the service greatly, but significant investment in railway stations and in encouraging people to use the railways. He and I recently attended the St Brides Street car park in Carrickfergus, where the park-and-ride scheme has been extended to try to get people, even if they want to use their car to get from home to the town centre, to at least get onto the train to get into Belfast after that. We have also committed £4 million to concessionary fares to encourage elderly people. So, we have sought to get that balance, and I hope that he recognises that.

Mr Dickson also raised the issue of Northern Ireland Water, and I thought that he was very clever in doing that. I know what he is getting at, and I suspect that all Members in this Assembly know what he is getting at, but he never made any commitment to it. I will give some examples of the language that was used. He said that we have just had the Minister in with a Bill about Northern Ireland Water. The Member is, of course, very unhappy about that and would like it to be changed. However, the Minister was only in here for about two minutes because, as he made clear, there were no amendments to the Bill. I would have thought that, if the Member and his party were keen to see changes, they would table some amendments. He said that we have to approach the issue with maturity and that there are difficult decisions on governance and finance. It is all very good, but is the bottom line that the Alliance Party is saying, "The decision not to charge people for water is wrong, and we want to introduce water charges"? It is not about simply governance or maturity but about whether or not we get money, if not from government sources then from the public.

Mr Dickson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way because the Member will maybe tell me what he wants.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister. You are absolutely right: there was no amendment to the water Bill because it was unamendable. That was checked out, and you will read my comments on the Bill in the Committee report, where I laid down my views very clearly.

We are missing an opportunity, and if I did not say that the Assembly has to face up to the reality of charging for water for domestic customers in a fair, open and transparent way, I am quite happy to say so now.

Mr Wilson: I appreciate the Member's candour. It is a brave thing to say. He is right that we need to debate the issue. I suspect that not too many Members would have taken the stance that he has taken, which I know will not be popular with some people. Nevertheless, there are big issues coming down the road with infrastructure, including EU directives on how we deal with flooding and the fact that the Treasury is now saying that we have to make up our minds about whether NI Water will be a government body or an arm's-length body.

Mr Buchanan raised issues about the Department for Employment and Learning. He is quite right about the importance of money being made available for training. In selling Northern Ireland abroad, one of our main selling points is our people. We have to sell the skills and work ethic of our people and their ability to help employers who come here to operate a profitable business.

It is for that reason that, on top of the money that Department for Employment and Learning received in the Budget at the start of the period, two significant allocations were made to tackle unemployment during the period that we are discussing today. Those were given early in the year so that schemes could be put in place during 2012-13. There was £8 million for the Steps to Work programme and £5-8 million for the youth unemployment scheme, which again shows commitment. In addition, there was money for people who want to do PhDs, so it was also directed at the top end of the market.

Mr Buchanan also spoke about funding for various projects, including the Omagh hospital and the Lisanelly education campus. The Education Minister and the Health Minister will have to decide on those issues in future budget allocations.

The Member mentioned the gas infrastructure and welcomed the additional money that will now be made available to take the gas pipeline to the west. If we are going to deal with energy costs and fuel poverty, there has to be an expansion of the gas pipeline across Northern Ireland.

Public utilities and such single producers have to be regulated, and that topic might be worthy of a debate in the Assembly at some time. The role of the regulator has not been helpful in decisions about rolling out and getting investment in the infrastructure that is required across Northern Ireland. No matter whether we are talking about gas, electricity or water, I find it difficult to understand how the regulator can be so out of touch on some issues. The very fact that he referred Phoenix Natural Gas to the Competition Commission and got knocked back on so many things tells me that serious issues about the role of the regulator need to be discussed. I make that point because it does and will have a significant impact on our ability to attract investment.

Many Members talked about private investment, and if decisions are sometimes incomprehensible and certainly not explained by the regulator, which then impact on the ability of private utilities, albeit monopolies, to raise money and increase the infrastructure in Northern Ireland, we will all be the poorer for it. Some Members may want to take up the issue and debate it in the Assembly. I will give way to the Member. I thought that he was pointing at someone behind me.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for giving way. I was not going to start a panto show there, by calling out, "He's behind you."

I presume that the Minister refers to the recent dispute between the Utility Regulator and Phoenix Gas over its price determination. The Minister questions the decision that the regulator took, which was that it will negatively impact on future investment into the gas industry. However, the truth is that the gas industry here is very well, and very heavily, regulated. It is run so well that there is a guaranteed return for investors who want to come into the gas market. The gas market is not new here any more; it has been here since 1996, so it is fairly well established. If someone wants to come in and invest in it, they will get a substantial return.

On that one issue of the price determination between the Utility Regulator and Phoenix Gas, the decision by the Competition Commission is completely independent of any arm of government here. We have no authority over it at all. That decision actually returned a net saving of £19 million for consumers, compared with the proposal put forward by Phoenix Gas. So I think that we are very —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr Flanagan: I am just finishing —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am very mindful that the Minister told us yesterday to stick to the subject under discussion. I remind all Members to return to the subject of the Bill.

Mr Wilson: I was only responding to the points that were raised by some of the Members. All I can say in response to the Member is that the Competition Commission certainly found that the decision by the Utility Regulator was wrong on many counts and, indeed, that it was not in the public interest. The Member may talk about the returns on gas and the savings to consumers, but there are no savings to consumers who do not have access to gas. Many people in the west of the Province — people in his own constituency — will be very surprised to hear him say that he would prefer that they do not have access to gas and will have to rely on oil and other expensive forms of heating. The Member may want to reflect on the intervention that he has made, or maybe the case is that he does not really care whether his constituents have a choice of fuel in the west of the Province.

That really brings me on to some of the other stuff that Mr Flanagan talked about. If he has got it wrong on gas, I can tell you that he has got even more wrong when it comes to the fiscal position of Northern Ireland. I really do wonder who writes the kind of stuff that he came out with in the Assembly today. He referred to this "overestimated" deficit that we live with. Having said that it was overestimated, and even after he was challenged by the Member for South Down, he still could not tell us what the overestimation was, how it occurred or the extent of the problem that he had identified.

However, I have to say that he should perhaps talk to some of the Members of his own party. They have asked 60 questions about this issue in the Assembly. Mr Flanagan has asked one Assembly question on it. Despite all the answers that have been given, no one in Sinn Féin, as far as I am aware, has yet challenged the methodology as to how the fiscal deficit has been estimated. And it is an estimate. In all the answers that I have given on this issue, I have made it clear that it is an estimate. By very necessity, it has to be an estimate. However, the methodology which is used is accepted by the Office of National Statistics. You would imagine that if anyone wanted to challenge it, it would be the Scottish Executive, but they accept it. If they thought they were having the wool pulled over their eyes, they would not accept it. Do not forget that they are going to have a real referendum on independence, not the kind of pseudo-referendum that Sinn Féin is talking about. Sinn Féin crosses its fingers behind its back and hopes that the Secretary of State never agrees to it, because the 65% of the people in Northern Ireland who have declared themselves in favour of the Union would give Sinn Féin its answer.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Minister has just exhausted my patience. [Laughter.]

Mr Wilson: I am actually dealing with the fiscal deficit, which was raised. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: You could have fooled me, Minister.

5.00 pm

Mr Wilson: It is related. The Scottish Executive have not questioned the methodology of how the fiscal deficit has been worked out. If it is overestimated and if it is overestimated by a certain amount, let us know and let us hear what is wrong with the methodology. As a result of using wrong methodology, by how much is the estimate out? Is the deficit much smaller than has been shown? There will have to be an awful lot of mistakes made to eliminate a deficit of £10·5 billion, which was identified in 2010-11, the year for which it was finalised.

Of course, Mr Flanagan has a political point to make here. It is an inconvenient truth that we are dependent on the rest of the United Kingdom. He says that we have to break away from these decisions that are made at Westminster. Well, the decisions that are made at Westminster actually ensure that we are £10-5 billion better off than we would be if decisions were not made at Westminster. Maybe he should remember that. It has an impact. It has an impact on the amount of money that we have for health. Of course, Sinn Féin does not worry about whether we have a health service any longer. They are all rich enough now to pay for it. They go to private clinics, and not just clinics in the United Kingdom; they head off to private clinics in America

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, I insist that you stick to the Bill, and you are not to go back to Cuba again.

Mr Wilson: I point out, Mr Deputy Speaker, that it is all related to the fact that we get a subvention from Westminster, and that subvention helps to pay for services that, fortunately, some of the richer Members of Sinn Féin do not have to pay for any longer. Therefore, they do not give a stuff about the fiscal deficit because they can afford to pay it out of their own pocket.

Mr McCallister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Certainly, yes. I hope that it is a helpful intervention.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Minister. Does he agree that, even if we all went private and did not need to spend anything on health, we would still have a huge subvention from Westminster?

Mr Wilson: The Member is absolutely right. We spend over £4 billion on health. Even if we could pay for that out of our own pocket, we would still have a fiscal deficit, as the Member has pointed out — his maths are very good — of nearly £6 billion. That is the point.

The other thing that Mr Flanagan raised — again, it was related tangentially to the Budget — was that we needed to look at how we did our trade. I wrote it down:

"The border is a barrier to trade."

I do not know; he is certainly up the left on the fiscal deficit, but the border being a barrier to trade? Has he never heard of our membership of the EU, the single European market or the fact that we can trade all across Europe without barriers? There may be a geographical or a political barrier, but the single European market means that there can be trade between countries. We cannot put barriers up because of a border. If we are going to have a rational debate about the Budget, the way forward and the improvements in our economy, at least we should try to stick to the facts, for goodness' sake, before we go down the route that he has gone down.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: He wants to try to redeem himself on this. Mr Deputy Speaker, if I give way for an intervention here and he leads me down another path, I hope that you will give me an opportunity to answer. You will not? Then I will not let him in on an intervention.

I come to the points that Mrs Overend made about the performance of Invest Northern Ireland. She said that we needed more clarity on Invest Northern Ireland, asked why it had reduced requirements and said that it needed greater budget flexibility. Let us have some clarity on Invest Northern Ireland. In 2011-12, the money in the Invest Northern Ireland budget supported investment commitments of £450 million by local and foreign-owned businesses. Over 6,500 new jobs were promoted: 1,700 in locally owned companies, 1,100 in externally owned companies and a further 1,300 through locally focused new business starts. Over 2,000 local companies were supported in one way or another to expand, secure investments etc. Overall, those figures translated into real benefits for a large number of Invest NI clients and widened our business base.

Members want clarity about what was done with the money. Of course, some of it was returned. I am just a bit disturbed about the call that Mrs Overend and other Members made for DETI to have greater flexibility to use such underspends. There is an agreed procedure in the Assembly when a Department cannot spend money on the purpose for which the Assembly voted it. This is the important point: we as Assembly Members listen to what Ministers say, the Executive present their priorities and budgets are voted on that basis. Members ought to think more when they talk about budget flexibility. Do they really want a situation in which a Minister bids for money, does not spend it and then decides, without any reference to the Assembly, to spend it on something different? That is what budget flexibility of that nature means. There is a proper way of dealing with an underspend. If a Minister cannot spend money on the purpose for which it was voted, it comes back here as a reduced requirement. The reduced requirements are presented to the Assembly, and it is decided how the money will be spent. It may even go back to the same Department for a different purpose, but at least the Assembly is informed, which is important given the calls for transparency.

There is a worrying trend among Ministers — I have mentioned some of them in the Assembly in the past — who want to have autonomy over their budget. That really means that, once they have the money in their hand, they can thumb their nose at Members of the Assembly. That, to me, is not a way of ensuring budgetary transparency and accountability. I was glad that the Member raised the issue because it gave me an opportunity to make the point, which I believe is very important. It has implications for Members who are not Ministers but who want and should have a say in how budgets are used.

Mrs McKevitt raised issues about money that was sent back to the centre. She gave the impression that it was wasted, squandered or not used in a way that was effective. I remind her that there will be occasions when Ministers have to return money. That is the purpose of monitoring rounds. My gripe is when they leave it deliberately to the last minute. Sometimes, Ministers cannot afford to do otherwise because they do not know until the last minute that the money will not be used. If money is returned early, it can be put into schemes. If you look at what happened with the returned money this year, you will see that it was not squandered in any way. Some of it went into helping co-ownership, which aided the construction industry and allowed first-time buyers to get into the market. A lot of it went into health, which enabled waiting lists to be tackled and new drugs to be financed. I do not think that anyone would suggest that that was squandering the money in any way. Some of it went into road maintenance, and, since we all drive along roads and get complaints from constituents about potholes and so on, road maintenance is important. Some of it went into schools maintenance so that schools can have defects dealt with. This might be partly my responsibility because I talked about Ministers returning money and the difficulties that that causes. It causes difficulty only if it is unanticipated and left to the last minute. That is why we have to keep a number of projects on hold where money can go into them quickly. It is the kind of issue that the media sometimes love to pick up on: when money comes back, it is sometimes squandered just to get rid of it. It was not squandered. It was spent on good projects that we can all stand over.

Mr Gardiner raised a large number of questions about the health service and whether we were as generous to the health budget as we claimed. We protected the health budget at the start of this four-year period more than it was protected in any other part of the United Kingdom and more than any other budget in Northern Ireland was protected. It was one of the few budgets to have a real terms increase. Even in England, on top of the protection that the Government said that they were giving the health budget, they then had to find £20 billion worth of efficiency savings, which is causing the problems that we see in the headlines all the time.

We not only protected the health budget but gave the Minister flexibility to move money within it — the sort of flexibility that I said I would prefer Ministers not to have. The Health Minister had that flexibility because we realised that, given the pressures, he should have the ability to move any savings around during the four-year period. Last year, of course, we made additional in-year allocations to the health budget. This year alone, £33 million was given in resource DEL and £15 million in capital DEL. Over the four years, the resource DEL for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety will increase by  $8\cdot3\%$ , which is well above the rate of inflation and a real increase.

Mr Gardiner raised issues concerning the capital spend. I cannot give him a comparison, but he spoke about a number of projects. If I give him the figures, perhaps he can do the comparisons himself; I do not have all the figures to hand. He asked how the capital spend for the Department of Health compared with, for example, the capital spend proposed for stadia. The capital spend last year was £321·7 million. This year, it will be £223·5 million, and, in the final year, it will be £200·3 million. If the Member takes some of the projects that he listed, he can compare capital spend in health with some of the capital spend for other Departments.

The Member also asked what additional money was given for capital spend. In-year capital bids that were met this year include £4 million for the Belfast Trust site, which was on top of the available capital; £8 million for service infrastructure; and £4 million for other smaller capital projects, such as the car park extension at the Ulster Hospital. I hope that that answers some of the Member's questions.

Mr Rogers asked whether we had our priorities right, but I had some difficulty with the rest of his speech. Asking whether we have our priorities right was a legitimate question to ask, but getting your priorities right means that maybe you are not spending as much on one thing but too much on something else. That is what priorities are all about. After asking the question, we then got a catalogue about the money spent on the ESA, classrooms, the number of schools, school builds, the size of classes and the fact that we needed to ensure that all newly qualified teachers got at least a year's experience. Those might be the priorities of Mr Rogers — as a former teacher, I can understand why he would have them — but, if those are the priorities, what are the lesser priorities? I did not hear anything about that. If Members are going to raise those kinds of issues, that needs to be addressed.

5.15 pm

The Member also gueried the scheme announced by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, which is to be delivered by the Department of Education. Under that scheme, 200 newly qualified teachers would be employed to help youngsters who are struggling; for example, when a teacher makes an assessment that a pupil due to get D in their GCSEs could, with a wee bit of additional help, be pushed up to a C. That is a good scheme to address educational underachievement. It ticks one of the boxes that Mr Rogers raised, namely whether we can find jobs for newly qualified teachers and give them the opportunity to get a bit of experience. I do not think that he should write that scheme off. My one regret is that, having announced the scheme in October or November. the Department of Education still has not even advertised for those teachers. It is one thing for us to have great policies and schemes, but, if we are slow to introduce them, maybe we have to ask questions. Maybe that is an issue that people will raise with the Education Minister.

I have dealt with the issue of the Northern Ireland Office.

Mrs Dobson raised the issue of the DARD headquarters relocation. An announcement has, of course, been made about that. It is my view that the matter is cross-cutting and, therefore, requires Executive approval. For clarification, all we have at the minute is a specific site that has been referred to the Executive. To date, the only decision we have to make is to consider whether Ballykelly is a suitable site. A lot of work is still required on the relocation and the costs that would be incurred. That includes asset transfer, office estate impacts and potential staffing consequences. Those need to be fully identified for the Executive to make a final decision and consider funding, because considerable funding will be required. I understand that a business case is being worked on at the moment.

The Member raised other issues about the performance of the Agriculture Minister. I really do not want to get into a spat between two female Members of the Assembly, because I do not think I would win. I will stay out of the differences that she has with the Agriculture Minister. I am not usually circumspect, but I will be on this occasion. That is the wisest choice.

Mr Deputy Speaker, you will be pleased to hear that I will conclude the debate on the Budget Bill. We are now at the close of the Second Reading, including Budget provisions for the early months of 2013-14. I commend the work of the Assembly and the formation of the Bill. I ask the Assembly to support it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that this motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Second Stage of the Budget Bill [NIA 18/11-15] be agreed.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker.]

Adjournment

Care Homes: South Antrim

Mr Deputy Speaker: The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes. The Minister will have 10 minutes to respond. All other Members who wish to speak will have approximately seven minutes.

Mr Kinahan: I am pleased to be able to put forward this topic. I will certainly not take 15 minutes, probably more like 10. I thank the Minister and colleagues from South Antrim for being here.

I am pleased to raise the matter, as I am sure that it is not just pertinent to South Antrim. The issue in South Antrim has been raised with me three times in the past six months. I will not name the areas today, nor will I name the companies involved, as I do not think that that is necessary to make the points that I need to make. If necessary, I will speak to the Department or the Minister afterwards, if he wishes to know more pertinent information.

In South Antrim, as I said, there are three cases of long-established housing developments where typical families of all ages and in all forms and guises have thrived together and where one of the houses has now been bought or sold or is in the process of being bought or sold to become a care home. You might ask, "What is wrong with that?". Initially, nothing.

The Bamford proposals recommended that we should not keep people in institutions other than when we really have to. In South Antrim, we have a hospital that was, until recently, home to some 200 people with severe learning disabilities or similar conditions, and, in order to follow Bamford, we have seen nearly all being moved into new institutional homes. I congratulate all those involved in pursuing what has to be the right thing to do.

Many of us listened to much opposition from families who saw their loved ones being split up from their colleagues of many, many years and from the routines and habitual comforts of their institutionalised home. Moving them to new homes, to supported living in everyday residential areas where they can be part of everyday society and, where possible, go for walks in the park, go shopping, go to the cinema or go to church — doing what any of us can do — is the Bamford way forward. Time will tell if that is right, but it has to be worth trying.

When those ideas were put forward in the Chamber on previous occasions, I asked whether we had really thought them through. Our excellent health service and all those involved in looking after those with severe learning disabilities have certainly thought through how they look after their family. I think that it is nicer to call them "family". What we have not thought through is how this rehoming will work on the ground with everyone else. That is how it should fit. That is why I brought forward this debate today.

Before we reach the crux of the debate, I just want to remind you that each member of that family being rehomed is someone's brother, sister, mother or father. Each is a loving person who has dignity and the right to as comfortable a life as we can give them. Each has feelings and emotions and the right to joy and fun and to live their life to the full, as much as any of the rest of us. So, I ask everyone to keep that in mind as the debate goes on.

I have set the scene; now I want to move into two scenarios. First, we have a residential area, as I have said, of families — all with their own lives, problems and enjoyments. The partnership from the health service, working with the housing association, decides that that housing development is ideal. It is a good quality housing development. It is in a large cul-de-sac; it is where quiet family life exists; and there is no through traffic. Each house has a garden, front and back, a pavement, and probably fulfils most families' idyll.

The housing association wants to find exactly that. It wants to find a suitable house for sale of that idyllic type, preferably in an area where its family has close ties, close links to the community and a chance of building on that idyll with the community, which also looks at the same ideal, and which, in time, we might think and hope, will adopt that new family.

However, at the moment, consultation is not compulsory, and guidelines on how to communicate with the residents have not been perfected. In this scenario, a short, reasonably blunt letter is sent to some of the houses near to where the house chosen for purchase is — where they are planning to buy and to put the new family in place. In that letter, they state that they wish to purchase the house and to place in it two people with learning disabilities in supported living.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kinahan: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Clarke: Does the Member accept that the biggest problem is not necessarily the consultation and making people aware of the idea of supported living, but the fears, some unfounded, about that, which others raise? We have read that people believe that the individuals could be sex offenders. There are different suggestions. I think that that has caused more fear than the consultation process. In support of what the trust has done, it has made people aware and consulted them beforehand, but others are indicating what types of people could possibly live in these areas, and that causes more fear than the consultation process.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Member for his comments. I partially agree with them, but, if he lets me finish the speech, he will hear that I am moving into those sorts of points.

The consultation was the right way to proceed, and I congratulate them for doing it, but much more was needed to be said. Sadly, all the letters did was raise concerns, and we have just heard some typical concerns. Not everyone understands what learning disabilities are nor what supported housing means. When only a very few were notified, it meant that for some, not all, the rumour mill ran wild, and, of course, it became most active.

If you then looked at the housing association's website, you would see that it provides accommodation to support people with complex needs, which, of course, opens it up even more. If you carried on looking at the website, you would see that it talks about individual houses, bungalows and group settings. What does it mean by a group setting? Does that mean that many more are going to be moved in? If you read on, you will see that it states that it requires accommodation that can be specifically adapted. What sort of adaptations are we talking about? Is that going to change the whole house? Further on, the website states that it is possible that there will be a site office. Before we have really thought about it, a lot of things start happening, and people get more and more concerned.

It takes time to arrange these meetings. At the first meeting, we discovered that it was for people with severe learning disabilities and that there was going to be 24-hour care. Rather than placating the fears, it did the opposite. At that meeting, we also discovered that it was a 10-week consultation and that there were only six weeks left. Sadly, that meeting caused more concerns to be raised. At the second meeting, with further residents, we had an excellent and thorough briefing from the health trust and the association. It allowed many matters to be clarified, but, at the same time, the rumour mill kept going and more and more concerns came out and one fed off the other.

The question I am asking the Minister today is this: could we look at a proper PR campaign, local or national, that shows the benefits of Bamford, the excellence of the housing associations and their staff, and the need to give these families a chance of a family life, as far as is possible, with their new neighbours?

5.30 pm

I also ask the Minister to set up guidelines using known expertise on how to consult so that everyone in the area is involved over a much longer time before decisions are made. That will mean that residents do not feel that it is a done deal and that everyone understands the intentions and reasons for such a purchase. I ask for a longer and more careful consultation period and a good PR exercise.

In the second scenario, a house is bought or privately rented in a similar residential area to the first scenario, but there is no consultation. High green wire fences are put up at the front and back, secure, ugly doors and access facilities are installed, and two severely autistic people are moved in to be cared for and to become part of the family.

The neighbours, however, knew nothing until it had all happened. Cars were parked all over the place causing congestion, and bin lorries could not get in. The same sort of issues arose, and everyone in the area became concerned. Most MLAs in the constituency and the local MP became involved

Again, I ask for proper PR. I also ask for more consultation, because in that case there were no guidelines to state that there should be consultation. I hesitate to ask for more guidelines and rules because in many cases we have too many, but now that this has started to happen everywhere, we must think about putting guidelines in place. It is good to know that, apparently, only 31 of those 200 people need to be found homes and families. Not all those cases have resulted in problems similar to the ones that I am talking about today.

Purchasing a home is one of the most important investments in family life, and the sense of security that that brings should be sacrosanct. At one meeting, an estate agent said that he would definitely mark a house down in value if it were situated beside a care home. How sad it is that such a generalisation can be made. That makes my call for a PR campaign all the more important.

If there is consultation on guidelines, the Minister needs to have discussions with the Environment Minister and the Social Development Minister to link to planning guidelines and DSD funding. If this Adjournment debate is to achieve anything, it is that those two things happen, we have proper guidelines, and everyone can learn to live together properly.

Mr Girvan: I thank my colleague for securing the debate this evening. I want to explore why we have adopted the care in the community approach.

As the Bamford report states, this is the proper way in which to deal with people. They should not be kept in hospitals or institutions but should be integrated into a community, sometimes into the community that they came from. They are the vulnerable people, not the communities into which they are moving.

I attended one meeting. I think that people should be proud that their area was chosen as a safe environment for vulnerable people who feel that the community will be there to protect them. I understand that consultation takes place only when a housing association is involved in the purchase of a property. Housing associations get public money to purchase a property, so they must consult. Private landlords in other areas have offered their properties to a health trust, and it has located people in those properties without using the consultation process. Residents find out only after the event.

I appreciate that my colleague Mr Kinahan mentioned another facility and that fences were put up round it. I feel that this is the wrong approach. I believe that it does not allow independent living. This is not a residential home; it is their home, and it is going to be their home in the community, and I think that we need to focus on that. They will be part of the community, and they will play an active role in the community, visiting the shops, leisure centres and facilities. We need to say that that is part of it.

Unfortunately, when fences start to go up, the house ceases to be an ordinary residence in a development; it starts taking on a different stance from neighbouring houses. I appreciate that we have lived through a history in which some properties had large fences round them for security reasons. We happen to have one in Carnmoney in which an MP lived. He ended up with large fences round his house, and there were cameras. You would have thought that he lived in a barracks. I hope that those days are gone

From a security and health point of view, we have to realise that Muckamore Abbey — and I am happy to mention it — is being wound down and that only those for whom it is safe to go back into the community will be put into the community; others for whom it is not safe, will not. In light of that, this has taken a long time. It has been a desire for 20 years to bring people back to living in communities, and it is only in recent times that we have started to make inroads in that direction. A number of people in the abbey should not be there. They have the right to live in a community and be supported.

I appreciate that there is fear in communities about what is happening. A certain message went out in Ballyclare, and, unfortunately, it created a problem. Those who fuelled it did not do anything to make it any easier for us to progress the matter. There are areas in which I have heard people say that it is fantastic; they know that the property is well maintained, that the garden is probably in better order than their own — and they are living next door — and that they are good neighbours. If there were problems, those would be dealt with.

I really feel that this is something that we need to consider. It is about social inclusion, and the issue is about how the consultation is carried out. I believe, from the DSD's perspective and having to engage in that process, that sending out a general letter is not the way to do it. We knew that people with learning difficulties would be housed there, and that it was going to be their home. They would be tenants, just like anybody else who rents a property. The issue has to be dealt with properly, and the consultation needs to say exactly what this is: it is a home for those with learning difficulties or severe learning difficulties. That is the sector that we are dealing with.

Assurances were given to people that this is the only type of person who would be in that home. It would not be a case of rotation; it would be a steady group of people who would have the house as their home for the long term. People would not be moving in and out. I think that there was a fear in the community that there would be one group one week and another group the next. These people need to be supported in the community.

I appreciate that the Northern Trust is involved, which is key in this matter. It is vital that we bring it to these sorts of engagements. We need to ensure that the consultation says exactly what this is, so that there will not be any ambiguity or opportunity for the rumour mill to start and for the rumour to go out into the community about what this might be and cause fear.

I cannot say whether these facilities will or will not be detrimental to the value of adjacent properties, but my impression is that they should not, if they are managed correctly. It is all down to ensuring that the management of these facilities is correct.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Thank you very much, Deputy Speaker.

I have to say that I had some concerns about this being the subject of an Adjournment debate, because I do not suppose that we are going to be in the situation of discussing the wider policy issues on a constituency-by-constituency basis. I also have some concerns that there was certain heavy-handedness, even by some of the elected representatives, in dealing with the concerns. These are very sensitive matters.

I am a staunch supporter of the care in the community process, and I want to say that to the Minister. It is progressive, it is clinically sound and it has been proven to be so. I visited Muckamore Abbey within days of being elected to represent South Antrim, and I commend the progress that has been made. Mistakes were made, and I am conscious that they were perhaps made in an anxiety to respond to the pressure to get care in the community outcomes for some of the long-stay patients, who, quite clearly and with the necessary support and opportunities to be skilled, would get to the point where they could be full members of our community. They always had that potential, but that was not always encouraged or recognised.

My sense of it is that, at times, elected representatives have to hold their nerve. In any set of circumstances, there is always the potential for a rumour mill. It might be a careless remark or people who set out for entirely selfish not-in-my-back-yard motivations. There are all of those opinions, and I think that we have to take them into account. We cannot legislate those emotions at a local level out of existence. The housing authority and the trust should engage with the local community in an open fashion and give commitments that are seen to be delivered.

An example was cited about putting up fences. I think that a founding principle should be that whatever accommodation and location is chosen should look absolutely the same as any of the properties in the vicinity. There should be nothing whatsoever to mark it out as distinct or separate, because any differences will invite more negative or reactionary responses.

There is a facility for elected representatives. South Antrim leads the way in this, and at a cross-community, cross-party level, people are prepared to come together privately to deal with issues and try to identify solutions away from the headlines. We should continue that practice and commend it to other constituents. Rather than running to newspapers or holding public meetings, unless you are quite certain that people have all the information and that no more strident voices are going to run away with the issue, we will do justice to the individuals who need to be supported by us on this journey.

I strongly commend the Minister for the work and the progress that has been made in the delivery of commitments that were given several mandates ago. I urge him to keep up that good work, especially with the support of the MLAs in this constituency. It has been used as a pathfinder. Likewise, let us hope that the housing association involved and the trust meet their responsibilities. Let us attempt to ensure that we do not pander to the lowest common denominator on this issue, otherwise we will never solve this problem or do justice to long-stay patients.

Mr Ford: Although I want to speak as Mitchel McLaughlin just has about justice for a number of individuals in our community, I should emphasise that I am not speaking as the Minister of Justice, but as a constituency MLA. I should also probably declare an interest, although it is a bit out of date, as a former social worker. Indeed, at one stage, I failed to get a job with what was then the Northern Board doing rehabilitation work in Muckamore Abbey Hospital.

5.45 pm

There is a fundamental issue here. I regret missing the first few minutes of Mr Kinahan's speech, but I heard him speak about the rights of individuals, which is fundamentally what this issue is about. Antrim has been host for many years to a significant number of people who have moved out of long-stay hospital accommodation, whether that was in Holywell Hospital or Muckamore Abbey Hospital. That process has happened across the town, mostly in Housing Executive estates. We have now reached the position where, for a number of reasons, housing associations and the trust have looked into some private housing, particularly the benefits of a large bungalow, perhaps for people who are less mobile than would have to be the case for them to live in a three-bedroom Housing Executive semi with a staircase. The real question that arises is this: what are the rights of individuals to a normal family life in those circumstances?

I have had contact with immediate neighbours of people who were, I think, quoted in the first example. There is strong acceptance that Antrim has provided a hospitable home for many people moving out of long-stay care, and those neighbours wish to continue to provide that hospitable care and a good neighbourly atmosphere. We need to look at how these issues are handled to ensure that we do not hype up concerns and fears that do not exist. Sadly, in my time as an MLA, I have also assisted some of my former colleagues in looking at the issue of the location of a children's home, where certain people did not want such a home in their area. In my other capacity as Minister of Justice, I know the difficulty finding somewhere to serve as a hostel in which sex offenders and other offenders can be managed successfully in making the transition to the community. However, it is surely incumbent on all of us, as public representatives, to ensure that we do not add to fears. We must recognise, as Mr Kinahan highlighted, the rights of individuals, which means that people do not necessarily have a veto over what happens in their area. The notion that we somehow have to take a different attitude to private housing estates, rather than Housing Executive estates, seems contrary to saying that we provide the best and most appropriate facilities for those with particular needs.

If there is an issue with, for example, car parking, it should be addressed as such; it should not be addressed as an issue of concern for those who live in particular units. I am pleased that Antrim is a well-mixed and sharing town compared with many other large towns in Northern Ireland. I am proud to represent it as somewhere in which people with mental health problems and learning disabilities have been welcomed into the wider community. The important thing is that we continue to ensure that that remains the atmosphere for those with particular and different needs and that we continue to meet those needs.

Mr Clarke: It was interesting to listen to Mitchel McLaughlin's comments and find myself agreeing with most of what he said.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Examine your conscience.

Mr Girvan: Dangerous ground.

Mr Clarke: Obliterate that from Hansard. I would not want that to be publicly recorded. [Laughter.] All joking aside, his comments about people grabbing headlines and raising fears were well made. That has been the danger with this application from the outset. I probably come at this with a slightly different view on how the trust has identified residential areas — whether it is the trust or DSD that looks at houses in multiple occupation to suit housing demand. I believe that a good model and good example for the trust to look at in Antrim is located beside Enkalon, where a unit has been made to accommodate people with learning difficulties. Staffing economies can also be found there. We have what looks like a residential development, and more should be done to build on that example.

As has been said, we have hosted Holywell too long. I hasten to say that there are residents there who have wanted out for years. Danny organised a meeting for us with the trust a couple of weeks ago, at which it said that some of those people had been waiting to get out for almost 20 years. It is a travesty that people have been stuck in a location for 20 years longer than they should have just because they have learning difficulties. They went in there for short-term treatment, have had their treatment and should have been back out to socialise with the wider public. Unfortunately, that has not been the case. I commend the Minister and his Department for the work that has been done to address that. That said, I still think that more effort should go into determining locations. We do not want to change the character of areas, but people should not be socially excluded from communities. That is important. The point was made by an official from the trust that we could be looking at someone who has family or relatives in the general area and that we should try to house that person in an area with familiar surroundings. That point was well made.

On the other side of the coin, many of us who have been representatives of the area for a few years have been lobbied by families who want to keep their relatives parked there, which is a travesty. They have been dependent on the facility that their loved ones have been in for too long. It is unfortunate that some would prefer for them to stay there, as opposed to allowing them enjoy a normal life outside in the community, given that the medical profession believes that they can integrate.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Will the Member give way?

Mr Clarke: I will.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I thank him for mentioning that. What I discovered there was interesting, although I know that it does not cover every circumstance: when parents are ageing, they are thinking about what would happen if they were to die. They then argue the case for retaining the long-stay at Muckamore, as opposed to, for them, the risk of staying in the community. I found that to be a major factor for that particular parents' group.

Mr Clarke: I appreciate the point that you make. The parents are bound to be ageing, given the time that some of the people have been in the facility. However, given that it has been an unknown quantum for so long, it should give peace of mind to the parents of the people who have been stopped there for so long to hear that we are going to resettle them in the community, with the package and the support that they need so that, when the parents pass on, they will do so knowing that their loved ones will be in a better place than the environment in which they have been living.

Danny made an interesting point about the consultation. I suppose that we can say that consultation is for consultation's sake. When can you consult enough? It is interesting that the organisations that wish to purchase the homes for the purpose did consult. We could have private landlords deciding to buy up houses in residential areas and changing them to multiple occupancy, regardless of the need, with no consultation. We are in the fortunate position that the organisations that are making accommodation to settle those people in residential areas have consulted and made the communities aware of their action plans.

As I said in my intervention to Danny, the fear generated and the spin that some people have put on the plan to create the monster that people think is going to happen has been disastrous. I think of the correspondence that I have had. People have even put in writing to us what they believe will happen. The only reason that they got that idea is that somebody put it out there in the first instance. That has been disastrous for the people who need resettled. Bear in mind that, when the plan pans out, those people will be settled in our community, and they will have a stigma before they even arrive. That is unfortunate, given what we heard from the departmental officials last week or the week before. None of the people they are talking about resettling in the community has any of the background that has been suggested. It is unfortunate that we are stigmatising individuals before we can even get them settled in the community. They are ordinary people who have had difficulties and have stayed too long in an institution. We need to get them settled back into the community, where they belong, but the very fact that that stigma has been attached to them is a travesty.

Hopefully the Minister will take on board some of the points that have been raised today and not only focus on residential areas but look at a model where we can have units like Oriel, I think it is called, in Antrim, opposite where the army barracks was, where they have made more accommodation. In blocks of accommodation like that, you can use the staff much more widely, but, at the same time, it gives residents the impression that they are living in a residential area, close to the town and facilities and away from the institution.

Mr Ford: I thank the Member for giving way. I entirely take his point about Oriel Lodge, but part of the issue is that we should also ensure that those who move from Muckamore Abbey Hospital to the likes of Oriel Lodge are also able to move on to more normal housing when they are able to do so.

Mr Clarke: Yes. I would never take away from that. I am making the point now because, if there are some people who are deemed to be worse than others, a choice may have to be made between Oriel Lodge-type accommodation or residential accommodation. However, people going into residential accommodation should not need 24-hour care and support when they get to that stage. That is one of the concerns that have been reflected in correspondence that I have received from some individuals. They deem those people to be worse because they need 24-hour care, without knowing the background of the individuals concerned. I hope that the public get the message that they have nothing to fear from these individuals, who need out of the institution.

Ms Brown: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important issue, and I congratulate the Member on securing the debate. I speak as a Member for South Antrim, which is home to Muckamore Abbey Hospital, and as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

It is interesting and somewhat disturbing that, when this debate was first secured and meetings took place to discuss the issues that were to be raised, there was an alarming and worrying perception of what was meant by the proposal to rehome patients. Some of the concerns raised ranged from worries about the impact on property values to fears that convicted sex offenders would be moved into their neighbourhood, putting whole communities at risk. I mention that not to criticise those in the community — I understand their views — but to highlight the difficulties faced by all who have had to manage this transition and, in particular, the challenges faced by individual patients who are, perhaps, living through the most trying times of their already troubled life as they face major change. I would like to use the time allowed to me to speak on behalf of those vulnerable people, who need our support.

I would like to simply pose this question: what does it say about us, as a society, if vulnerable individuals are labelled and unintentionally victimised by others who, sadly, have little or no understanding of the true situation or the policies behind it? I am a great believer in community spirit, no more so than in recent weeks, when I praised the people of Antrim for coming together to promote suicide awareness. In that instance, I called for a joined-up approach, asking the Department to harness the goodwill and energy that exists and turn it into something that benefits the whole community. Sadly, in this instance, I believe that the challenge to the Department is to work harder to encourage goodwill and properly explain the policy in an attempt to alleviate the fears and misconceptions that exist. I know that officials have attended meetings and I welcome that, but more must be done.

We have heard much talk in recent days about a shared future for Northern Ireland, and that conversation has tended to focus on rights and identity. However, we also need a shared future for health and social issues. The individuals whom we are talking about today are real people with real families and real lives. In the past, they have been sent to institutions where, for whatever reason, they have become forgotten and regarded as out of sight and, literally, out of mind. The House has a responsibility to those who are now coming forward after years of societal neglect. They are part of our society and should be entitled to feel part of our community. As some of the most vulnerable people in our care, they deserve not just compassion but representation in the House and in the policies that we promote.

I support the further development of care in the community for those with special needs. For too many years, those with learning disabilities were locked away in institutions. That was primarily because we, as a society, took pity on them, believing that that was the best form of care that we could offer. That, however, is no longer the case. Today, there is no reason why those with learning disabilities should not be offered the opportunity to lead a normal life. They no longer need our pity; they need our support. It is surely right that individuals are permitted to lead an independent life through supported living, rather than being marginalised.

Unfortunately, the legacy of hospitalising those with special needs has been far too many people being treated as inpatients. On average, those in hospital have been there for around 20 years. That is a staggering statistic, and, despite a policy to see them returned to the community to pursue an independently led life, around 250 individuals remain in care. I fully accept that this is an incredibly difficult situation, with many challenges and conflicting pressures. Each individual has different needs, and there is no easy solution. Therefore, we must implement a system that primarily caters for the needs of those at the heart of this issue, namely the patients or clients themselves. Some people will need to be placed in shared accommodation, as we have heard already, with a carer presentm but that option might not be applicable in every case. Whatever the circumstance, it is important that the individuals themselves are able to determine which arrangement is best for them.

This society has undergone so much change in recent years. However, all too often, we still see evident the stigmas associated with mental health and learning difficulties, and that must change. We must target some of the resources available at educating and promoting awareness of these matters if we are to see real change in attitudes. I urge the Minister and his officials to look at that as a matter of priority.

6.00 pm

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I have a speech, but I do not intend to use it. I will just respond to the issues that have been raised.

First of all, I am disappointed that the debate has come before the House. It reflects a regressive and backward approach that I do not want to be associated with in any way, shape or form. A society is judged on how it treats its weakest and most vulnerable. A number of years ago, I had the opportunity to visit Romania. In that society, many youngsters with learning difficulties were institutionalised and abandoned. I visited some of those facilities, and I found an appalling situation. We associate that with the Ceausescu regime in Romania. In Northern Ireland, we have had long-stay institutions, and they are nothing like what was in Romania. However, I do not want our people, our community and our loved ones with learning disabilities to be put in long-stay institutions. I want them to be part of our community.

When I go into local shops and restaurants where learning disabled people are employed, I am more inclined to go back to those facilities, because I recognise that they recognise that those people are part of our community and need our support, and they are giving them jobs. I go up to the cinema and see a fellow who I am very friendly with cleaning there. He lives in his own accommodation, and he has a learning disability. You know what? That is really good. I do not want a society in which we put people away in institutions. I want a society where we value, care for, love and show affection to people who have a learning disability.

I hear the suggestion, "We do not want these people living in our area because they could be sex offenders". There are more people with a learning disability who have been the victim of sexual abuse than the other way around. I hear, "We do not want these mentally ill dangerous people". Again, people with a learning disability or, indeed, a disability of any kind are far more vulnerable and likely to be attacked than the other way around. Recently we had that case in Lisburn, where young Scott Vineer, an autistic lad, was beaten to a pulp and left for days. Thankfully, Scott continues to make progress, albeit slowly. He is headed in the right direction after that brutal attack by socalled normal people. I do not want to be associated with that. I do not want to be associated with people who say that this will have a negative impact on house prices and that surely cheaper housing could be obtained with public money. I want our learning disabled community to be a fully integrated part of our community, where people who have a learning disability can be cherished and we can share our space, facilities and community with them.

I accept that, in all of this, we have a job of work to properly inform communities when these things happen. We have a number of learning disabled facilities in Lisburn. We have some wider communities where there is greater support and larger numbers of groups together. We also have individual bungalows and residential care homes. There is a cocktail of facilities and a mixture available, and that should be the case right across Northern Ireland.

Let me say this: you cannot choose your neighbours. I suspect that, in these instances, people will find that the learning disabled community are good neighbours. There is a far greater potential for much more difficult neighbours who will hold noisy parties and have cars leaving late at night, taxis calling and all that goes with that than people will get with any learning disabled neighbours that they might have.

I thank all those who took part in the debate. What has been said has been largely constructive. I will take on board issues that were raised, particular the issue of ensuring that homes are the same as every other home and that stupidly large fences are not put up. I often see six-foot fences around people's homes. That does not seem to be unreasonable, where it is appropriate, but I do not see any need whatsoever for putting up ridiculous things because someone happens to be autistic. I want to see things done appropriately and properly.

I will fully conform with what Bamford has requested and recommended. He has brought expert views to the table. I will drive the Bamford review forward and ensure that people from the learning disabled community have the opportunity to fully integrate into society. I have passed Muckamore on the school bus when out on school trips and heard stupid comments being made by young people who did not know any better. It is regrettable that we have adults today making stupid comments when they should know better.

Monday 18 February 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Ministerial Statement

Beef Contamination

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I apologise for the delay in getting the statement into Members' pigeonholes this morning.

With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, I wish to make a statement to update Members on the discovery of equine DNA in beef products. First, I would like to take this opportunity to make it clear once again that this has nothing to do with the high-quality, fully traceable beef produced here in the North. My Department delivers meat hygiene official controls on behalf of the Food Standards Agency (FSA) in approved slaughterhouses and other establishments. Senior officials from the Department and the FSA maintain regular formal and informal contact to ensure consistent and effective delivery to the agreed standard, and the FSA performs regular checks and independent audits to ensure the quality of work delivered on its behalf. My departmental inspectors enforce regulations that provide customers with assurance about the origin of beef in abattoirs and approved cutting plants. We carry out extensive controls on the traceability of beef and beef products, mainly mince, both fresh and frozen, in abattoirs and approved cutting plants across the North. It is on that basis that I am confident of the high quality, safety and full traceability of beef that is born, raised and slaughtered here in the North, and I have openly and often stated that position since the beginning of this incident.

The FSA was made aware of the results of a Food Safety Authority of Ireland (FSAI) authenticity study of a range of meat products on 14 January 2013. This was a small survey conducted as part of the FSAI's routine monitoring programme of the labelling of foods and was specifically to check the type of animal species in meat products. The survey results showed that a number of beefburger products manufactured in Britain and the South contained horse and pig DNA. The FSA in the North informed my Department of the issue on the evening of 15 January 2013. The FSA launched an urgent investigation into the issues highlighted in the survey and initiated a four-point plan for the investigation. This is being implemented by the FSA in conjunction with the food industry and other Departments, including my Department and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) and includes the following: to continue the urgent review of the traceability of the food products identified in the FSAI's survey; to explore further, in conjunction with the FSAI, the methodology used for the survey to understand more clearly the factors that may have led to the low-level cases of cross-contamination; to consider, in conjunction with relevant local authorities and the FSAI, whether any legal action is appropriate following the investigation; and to work with DEFRA, the devolved rural affairs Departments and local authorities across Britain and in the North on a food authenticity survey on processed meat products.

All the FSA's intelligence is being fed into the European Commission through the rapid alert system for food and feed. As you will be aware, this has become a pan-European investigation. An intense investigation into the traceability is still under way, and the FSA is working closely with the respective authorities.

This is a very serious issue, and evidence points to either gross negligence or deliberate contamination of the food chain. For that reason, the FSA is working closely with police forces across Ireland and Europe. Indeed, a number of arrests have already been made in Britain.

The situation is developing at pace. The response between Departments in the North has been co-ordinated through the food and feed incident management group chaired by my Chief Veterinary Officer. To date, that group has met three times: on 17 January, 1 February and 8 February. More meetings are planned in the coming days. A number of retailers both in the South and here in the North have withdrawn potentially affected products from sale. The FSA has carried out a comprehensive risk assessment of the food safety risks associated with this incident, and its advice is that the risk to human health from burgers in which equine DNA was detected is likely to be very low if the products are cooked thoroughly and if general food hygiene practices are followed. On Sunday 10 February 2013, the FSA issued interim advice to public institutions, such as schools and hospitals, as well as to caterers and consumers purchasing from retailers, in the light of the developing nature of the incident. Food businesses have been tasked with conducting authenticity tests on all beef products for the presence of significant levels of horse meat. Of the just over 2,500 samples of processed beef products tested, 29 were found to contain horse meat. All those products had already been removed from supermarket shelves by the time of the announcement

Last week I met the FSA on several occasions to be updated on its investigations, and I met representatives of the Food Safety Authority of Ireland. On Wednesday, I met representatives of the main supermarkets here in the North. I emphasised to them the quality and traceability of beef from the North and encouraged them to source their products locally. On 14 February, eight cases of horse meat contaminated with bute were identified in an abattoir in Britain. Two of the carcasses were retained at the abattoir, and the others were sent to France. Three of those have been traced, and work is ongoing to identify the whereabouts of the others. Since 2011, 21 samples have been tested in the North for the presence of bute, and none of them has tested positive.

Mr Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to bring Members up to date, and I assure you that my officials are working tirelessly to protect the beef industry in the North. I intend to ensure that the FSA continues to require supermarkets to maintain their responsibility to provide their customers with assurance on the authenticity of their beef products by continuing to carry out surveillance for species. I will also want assurances that traceability of the raw materials continues from the fresh meat sector through to the processing sector. It is important that a system is put in place to ensure that horizon scanning for future potential problems is improved. I wish to investigate further the proposal from Safefood to have a neutral environment where information can be placed anonymously. I will ensure that Members are kept informed of progress by way of regular updates.

Mr Frew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): Many members of the public believe that the large supermarkets have got off lightly on this issue and that the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development has not done enough to highlight supermarkets' responsibility in this regard. In the Minister's conversations with the supermarkets, has she stressed to them the part that they have played in this debacle? Can she give us an assurance about the quality of food and the price in supermarkets? We all believe that supermarkets have played a part in pushing down prices and that that has led to some of these issues. Has she defended the County Down processing firm that has unfairly lost a contract with Asda, which some would say is unwarranted? The reputation of the food industry here must be protected. Can the Minister assure us that all cold stores in Northern Ireland have been checked for horse meat? Has any further horse meat been found?

Mrs O'Neill: The Chair of the Agriculture Committee will be aware that this is an ongoing investigation and that the findings of a number of tests are still to come. We had the results of the industry tests on Friday, but we also expect the results of further tests that environmental health officers are carrying out at the request of the Food Standards Agency. I am led to believe that those are due to be reported on by the first week in April. Until we have those results, it is hard to give the assurances that the Member talks about.

This is a massive consumer confidence issue. I put the case very strongly to representatives of independent supermarkets and the larger multi-retail companies. My very strong message to them was that they need to source locally and that this cannot have any impact on the farming community, because our local farmers are not involved in the investigation. Our local farmers are totally distinct from it, which involves processed food. There is a genuine fear in the farming community that, as a result of what is happening, future costs will be put on to it. I will stand strong with them to make sure that no costs are passed on to them, given that they are not involved in the situation.

There is an onus on processors and supermarkets. I have made that point very firmly over the past number of weeks, and I will continue to make it. Processors and supermarkets have a responsibility to consumers to make sure that they get what is on the packet and on the label, and they have a responsibility to assure the public that their products are safe. Farmers have to jump through hoops for farm quality assurance systems. They must ensure that they live up to all the required practices before they can put a logo on a product that they can stand over. Why should processors and supermarkets not have to do exactly the same?

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement and for all that she has said for the farming industry. She has stuck up for it robustly. However, the message must go out today that you support the call from the farming industry that no cost should come down the line to the farmer.

Mrs O'Neill: I assure the Member that I absolutely support that call from the farming industry. Our local produce is fully traceable, and it has integrity and safety. Given that they are not involved in the investigation, local farmers should not have to take on any costs that come as a result of further tests. Our farming industry needs to be treated separately in this instance. It already adheres to very high standards, and I fully support it.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for her statement, which, as she said, arrived very late with us. It is abundantly clear that a major exercise is required to restore consumer confidence. Will she commit to spearheading that exercise to ensure that the local industry, especially our farmers, is not irreparably damaged by the revelations, which now come almost daily?

Mrs O'Neill: I assure the Member that the reason that I have been so public on the issue, even though the Food Standards Agency is taking the lead in the investigation, is that I am concerned about the damage that the investigation is causing to the local farming community's reputation. That is why I have to be very vocal about it and why I have to keep repeating the message that our local produce is safe, is traceable and has integrity. I will continue to promote that message to protect the local farming industry. The confidence issue will be resolved only as a result of a thorough investigation. The Food Standards Agency has a role to play in the completion of the investigation in as speedy a manner as possible. The investigation needs to be robust. It is now a European issue, and there are ongoing investigations at different levels. Either we are dealing with criminality — we have seen some arrests, which I support — or there is gross negligence that needs to be exposed. Those are the only ways in which we will restore public confidence. I assure the Member that I will continue to carry out my role in promoting and supporting the local farming industry.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her statement. It is very important that the statement be made, because the longer that the saga goes on without an official statement in the House, the more the wider public is concerned.

When was the issue first raised? Is it the case that it first arose in a cold store in Newry back in September and that it took a long time before the FSAI formally raised the issue publicly? How secure or otherwise is full traceability from the farm gate to the finished product on the shelf?

Does the Minister accept that another system, developed by Dr Ken Baird, might be worth considering to achieve full traceability from the farm gate to the consumer?

Mrs O'Neill: I can confirm to the Member that the Food Standards Agency first alerted us to the fact that there was an incident in a local company on 1 February this year. We were first alerted to the original situation in the South by the FSAI on 15 January. We have been regularly involved with the FSA and engaging with it since that time. I am led to believe that there was an investigation by the FSA and that environmental health officers from the local council were involved. It is important to reiterate that none of that foodstuff entered the food chain, and it is important that we get that message out.

I have been very clear in saying that local traceability is second to none. That also needs to be applied in the processing sector. If there is already a way to do that, it should be exposed and that should be the lesson learned from this investigation. The major retailers and the processors have a duty of care to the consumer to make sure that they can stand over their products. Until such time as processed foods are also fully traceable, it will be very difficult to restore consumer confidence.

Mr McCarthy: I welcome the Minister's statement. Does she agree that the longer this goes on, the more difficult it is for confidence to be instilled in the whole industry? I welcome her defence of the Northern Irish agriculture industry. However, does she agree that there has been too much buck passing, which seems to continue every week? The sooner someone takes responsibility for what has happened, the sooner we will get back to doing what we do best in Northern Ireland, which is producing meat that people want to purchase. I say that not as a meat eater but as a vegetarian, but fully supportive of the Northern Irish agriculture industry.

Mrs O'Neill: I thank the Member for his question. From the very start, I have said clearly that the Food Standards Agency is taking the lead in the investigation. If you want to know where the buck stops, that is it. We have been very sure to challenge the FSA on its role in the investigation to make sure that it is robust. I am coming at this purely from the point of view that reputational damage is being caused to the local farming industry. That is why it is important that we continue, as an Assembly and as an Executive, to send out the message that we support local produce, that it is fully traceable, that it has integrity and that it is safe. The Food Standards Agency is the lead body. I have issues with the fact that the Food Standards Agency is not accountable to the Assembly, but that is an argument for another day. At this moment, we need to get to the crux of the investigation and have everything exposed. We can have the conversation about FSA accountability at another stage.

Mr Irwin: Does the Minister agree that it is important that it is made clearer where food comes from and that country-of-origin labelling should be a priority, given that the housewife needs to know exactly where her food comes from?

Mrs O'Neill: Absolutely. The provenance issue is at the core of this. Let us be very clear: this is a traceability issue. The fact is that there is no traceability in the processing sector, and we need to get to the bottom of that. Everybody has to play their role in giving consumer confidence to the households who purchase the products. We will continue to do that Mr Clarke: The Minister will be aware that the Agriculture Committee heard from officials from her Department and the FSA last week. They told us that there was never any suggestion — it was never on their radar — that horse meat was in abattoirs or was being used for food products. Can the Minister explain why, as she said in her statement, since 2011, 21 samples in Northern Ireland have been tested for the presence of bute? Given that it is used only in horses, why was there testing for it?

Mrs O'Neill: That is like saying that you should ignore a problem until it exists. You should always be prudent in looking for potential threats to the food chain. That is why the vets take very seriously their role in abattoirs in carrying out tests. If the Member is suggesting that you sit back and do not do anything until a problem arises, that is not a prudent way to do business.

Mr Beggs: The Minister has spoken about the responsibility of the supermarkets to maintain customer assurance on meat products. Does the Minister agree that, the shorter the supply chain, the greater the control and the smaller the risk? Does she agree that local butchers can play an important role in providing that assurance? Does she also agree that, if supermarkets choose to use a variety of suppliers, they risk their future business and that greater control and genuine knowledge of the source of meat are essential?

Mrs O'Neill: I fully agree with the Member that the whole food supply chain is a complicated process, and the more stages that are involved in that, the harder it is when it comes to investigations. I put the point very clearly to the major supermarkets and to the independent supermarkets that I encourage them to source their products locally. That shortens that supply chain, and that is far more beneficial to the public, so I encourage that to happen.

Lord Morrow: I wonder if the Minister will brief us on what discussions she has had with her counterpart in the South of Ireland. Will she also tell us to what extent Greencore is supplying here in Northern Ireland, bearing in mind that its chief executive is Mr Patrick Coveney, who is a brother of the Agriculture Minister in the South of Ireland? Is it not true that, in fact, ABP supplied food to Greencore, which, in turn, supplied our schools here? Will the Minister tell us if that practice is still going on, and what action does she intend taking to further investigate that situation?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not think that it is a time for political grandstanding, but I am happy to advise the Member of the discussions that I have had with Minister Coveney, Owen Paterson and the Scottish and Welsh Ministers. Those discussions have been ongoing, and we have had two teleconferences in the past week with Owen Paterson and the Scottish and Welsh Ministers. It is important that we continue to discuss the matter. The week prior to that, I had discussions with Simon Coveney, and I will continue to do so. This is a European issue. It is right across the board, and we will have to continue to talk. Investigations are going on at local level and at European level. I am going to Brussels next Monday, where there will be an agriculture commission meeting. There will be an opportunity for everybody who is involved to sit around and have a discussion on the lessons that have been learned, what else needs to be done in terms of consumer confidence and what else can be done to support the supply chain.

In respect of Greencore and who it is supplying, you should put that guestion to the Food Standards Agency. I am happy to pass on to the Member any details that I have in respect of — [Interruption.] The Food Standards Agency is in the lead in the investigation. You can choose to nod your head all you want, but that is the reality. They published a list last week of the companies that they have been supplying into, and, regardless of who is involved in any of the companies, if there is any criminality or fraud involved, that should be exposed, and it should be dealt with by the full rigour of the law. I have consistently made that point, and I will consistently continue to make that point, regardless of who is involved in any of these situations. This certainly is a European issue, and it needs European investigation. As I said, I stand over the fact that anybody who is involved in fraudulent activity needs to be brought before the courts.

The Minister of Education made an announcement last week around schools, and I encourage the Member to look at that.

Mr Storey: Following on from the Minister's comments in relation to the Education Minister, in that statement there was no reference to the supply chain in terms of contracts emanating outside Northern Ireland. What discussions has the Minister of Agriculture had with the Education Minister to ensure that there are no contracts that are currently supplying schools in Northern Ireland that emanate out of the Irish Republic or any other jurisdiction in which there has been a clearly identified problem? Can she, without trying to pass the buck or trying to pass the blame on to somebody else, give us a clear answer? Clearly, she did not answer Lord Morrow's question.

Mrs O'Neill: Let me be very clear: the Food Standards Agency is in the lead in this investigation. Throw your head up or choose to ignore it, but that is the reality. I encourage the Member, as Chair of the Education Committee, to have a conversation with the Education Minister.

Mr Storey: I have.

Mrs O'Neill: Well, you asked me the question. On Friday, I had a meeting with the Education Minister. He had a thorough discussion, which he found very useful, with the Food Standards Agency around all these issues. He has a job in respect of the education of children and school meals being provided. He asked a number of questions of the Food Standards Agency, and I know that he sought some assurances. I encourage you again to have that conversation with the Education Minister in your role as Chairperson of the Committee. He sought assurances from the Food Standards Agency because it is in the lead in this investigation.

Mr Allister: Now that, five weeks on, the Minister has belatedly come to the House on these issues and in the hope that she will get to grips with matters that threaten the stability of our vital agrifood sector, can I ask her what specific measures, not platitudes, she intends to take to ring-fence our blameless red meat producers from collateral damage? What steps will she take to deal with her porous horse passport system?

Mrs O'Neill: Maybe the Member has not been following developments. This is an evolving situation. I have consistently made the point that the local farming industry is not involved. I come at this situation from the point of view of wanting to protect the reputation of the food production system in the North of Ireland, which is fully traceable with high standards and total integrity. I will continue to make that point and encourage all Members to make that point.

The horse passport issue is a discussion for another day. It has been highlighted around horse welfare, and people have made public statements on horses in the last number of weeks. Anything that has come to the Department has been fully investigated. There is nothing in the evidence that has come forward to suggest anything untoward at this moment in time, but I am happy to fully investigate any horse welfare issues that come forward. The Member will be aware that the horse passport scheme is an EU scheme that was rolled out across Europe. It came in here in 2010. A review of the scheme in 2011 identified no major deficiencies. That said, I assured the Equine Council for the North of Ireland at a recent meeting that my officials will work with it to bring about any improvements that we can to the horse passport scheme in the North of Ireland, and I am committed to doing that.

Mr McNarry: I recognise that the Minister speaks for the farmers. Is she satisfied with the speed of reaction and subsequent co-operation on this matter by retailers with her and her Department? Can she assure the House that products currently for sale from retailers do not contain horse meat? Can she tell the House that retailers are standing over products on the shelves today and that they will cause no fear for the consumer? That is a different question from her ongoing investigations that she talked about today. This is about consumer confidence today in the shop. Will the Minister give the House an assurance that, when a person goes to the shop today, no matter where it is, to buy a product with beef in it, the consumer can be comfortable that that product has no horse meat in it?

Mrs O'Neill: I will give an assurance on the local produce because that is the assurance that I can give.

Mr McNarry: No, you have to do better than that.

Mrs O'Neill: That is —

Mr Speaker: Order. You must allow the Minister to answer.

Mrs O'Neill: I can give an assurance on local produce because that is what I am responsible for. That is the system that I am responsible for, and I will stand over it. Local produce is safe, traceable, transparent and is there for all to see. If there is a "Farm quality assured" stamp on it, it is safe and can be stood over. I cannot stand over processed food. I am not responsible for processed food. The food processing companies are responsible to DETI. The Food Standards Agency is taking the lead in this investigation and is answerable through the Health Department.

I will continue to separate out those roles because that is important. I will stand over what I can, which is local produce, and I will continue to do that. All we have to go on around processed food and horse meat in processed food is that the Chief Medical Officer in England said that it was safe to eat. That is the only advice that we can go on. She has made that call consistently. Apart from that, I could not give an assurance, but the Chief Medical Officer gave that assurance, and I can only trust that judgement given that she is an expert in her field.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement. Given that the free trade dynamics of the EU food supply chain played a significant role in the recent failure of confidence in the supply chain, what steps will the Minister take to engage with Brussels and our MEPs in the weeks ahead to put this issue to bed?

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Mrs O'Neill: As I said, this clearly is a European issue now, and it is important that we continue to engage with the MEPs. I am going to Brussels next Monday for the European agriculture commission, and I also intend to try to meet MEPs when we are there. The investigation is going on at local level but also at European level, where a full Europol investigation is under way. We need to be on top of all those things and continue to engage at local level but also at European level. I assure the Member that I am committed to doing that.

Executive Committee Business

Budget Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Sammy Wilson, to move the Consideration Stage of the Budget Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Deputy Speaker: No amendments have been tabled to the Bill. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to group the seven clauses of the Bill for the Question on stand part, followed by four schedules and the long title.

Clauses 1 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 to 4 agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Budget Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Policing and Community Safety Partnerships (Designated Organisations) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move

That the draft Policing and Community Safety Partnerships (Designated Organisations) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be approved.

I am seeking the Assembly's approval of the Policing and Community Safety Partnerships (Designated Organisations) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013. The order designates a number of organisations to sit on all policing and community safety partnerships (PCSPs) across Northern Ireland and on the four district policing and community safety partnerships (DPCSPs) in Belfast.

I propose the designation of the following organisations: the Police Service of Northern Ireland; the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; the Probation Board; the Youth Justice Agency; health and social care trusts, excepting the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service; education and library boards; and the Northern Ireland Fire and Rescue Service. I am pleased to be able to bring the order before the Assembly, since it marks an important milestone in the establishment and operation of policing and community safety partnerships.

When I made provision for the establishment of PCSPs in the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011, my aim was to make our community safer. The partnerships have brought together and built on the work of the previous district policing partnerships (DPPs) and community safety partnerships. Overseeing their work is a joint committee consisting of representatives from my Department and the Policing Board.

PCSPs are designed to play a key role in building confidence in the justice system and ensuring that members of the community are empowered to help develop solutions to tackle crime, the fear of crime and antisocial behaviour. They will be expected to contribute at a local level to the achievement of Northern Irelandwide targets set in the Programme for Government, as well as to deliver on the vision outlined in the community safety strategy and the objectives detailed in the policing plan. The partnerships are working to ensure a joined-up approach to policing and community safety issues, developing holistic solutions to issues identified by local people and making a real difference on the ground.

It is, of course, early days. However, I hope that PCSPs will be able to step up to the mark in difficult circumstances and give the leadership needed to address community safety issues in local communities, through identifying problems, developing solutions, taking action and judging and learning from the results. We have already seen some recent examples of PCSPs responding to the needs of local communities. One notable example is from Omagh. Following the tragic death of Jason McGovern, Omagh PCSP is taking forward a range of targeted initiatives to improve town centre safety, co-ordinating with a range of bodies to develop a holistic response to those local issues.

One of the new features of PCSPs that will enhance the effectiveness of such joint working is that of designation. That feature was designed to formally recognise the contribution that statutory and voluntary and community organisations can make to enhancing community safety. In practice, it means that those bodies will be fully immersed in the work of the partnerships, delivering with other partners to improve community safety. They will, as part of the PCSP, work to engage with the community to identify issues of local concern, develop plans and take action as needed. I believe it to be extremely positive that that responsibility will not simply lie with the police, as had tended to be the case previously in DPPs.

The Justice Act includes two types of designation. The first is local designation, where each PCSP can select bodies that might potentially assist them in meeting their local objectives. Those bodies can hold membership of the PCSP and contribute to the partnership's planning and delivery. The second type of designation came about as a result of a Justice Committee amendment during the passage of the Justice Bill. It enabled my Department to list, in an order, a number of organisations that would be obliged to provide representation on all PCSPs across Northern Ireland. In my view, this represented a strengthening of the original provision for local designation, and I was happy to support it.

I thank the Justice Committee for its careful consideration of designation issues and for its ongoing input as we develop the final designation order. It is with the Committee's support that I bring this order before the House today.

The bodies that Members see listed in the draft order represent the culmination of a wide-ranging consultation exercise undertaken by my Department, with support from the Policing Board. The Justice Act required consultation with all PCSPs prior to the development of the order, and the formal consultation on the seven bodies listed in the order closed in August of last year.

During the consultation process, it was clear that PCSPs recognised the importance of having representatives from a broad range of sectors working together to develop local solutions. The majority of respondents stated that the bodies listed were appropriate for designation because of their potential to play a key role in improving community safety across Northern Ireland. In my view, the order is crucial. It provides PCSPs with a level of consistency and ensures that the key players in the arena of community safety are involved across the board.

Prior to formal consultation with PCSPs, departmental and Policing Board representatives met representatives of a range of bodies identified through consultation as potential designated bodies. The seven bodies listed in the order were keen to get involved from the outset and recognised that the benefits of designation were mutual: they would help PCSPs to deliver on their strategic objectives; and the work of the PCSPs would link in to their own organisational objectives.

Many of the bodies have already become involved in the work of PCSPs on a voluntary basis. They are getting to grips with local issues and are ready for the responsibility that the order will place upon them. Indeed, they welcome the formalisation of their contribution in this way.

I want to emphasise the importance of ensuring that those who can make our communities safer, do so, and do so in partnership. We must bear in mind that strong partnership working is integral to delivering the improvements that we want to the quality of life in local communities in every part of Northern Ireland. The order is only one part of the picture, but it is an important one. It will allow PCSPs to deliver holistic solutions for local people. I urge the House to support the motion.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): The origin of this draft statutory rule, which the Minister of Justice brings to the Assembly for approval today, comes from the work of the first Justice Committee in the previous mandate, when it considered the establishment of the policing and community safety partnerships as part of the provisions contained in the 2010 Justice Bill. That Committee looked at the establishment of PCSPs in some detail and took oral evidence on those particular clauses from 21 organisations at a stakeholder event. I commend those who were on the Committee at that time. It was ably chaired by my colleague Lord Morrow, and it looked at this in some detail. I know that a number of its members subsequently moved on, but it carried out an important piece of work. I think that it is important that we put that, and our appreciation, on the record.

Part of the Committee's deliberations on the clauses related to the size and composition of PCSP membership. It was the Committee's clear view, strongly supported during the oral evidence event, that there was merit in designating a small number of named organisations, such as the Probation Board, to be represented on all PCSPs to ensure a consistent level of skills and expertise across the partnerships, rather than leaving it entirely to each PCSP to decide for itself which organisations should be represented on it.

The Committee's preferred approach to achieving this was to require the Department of Justice to produce a regulation listing the proposed designated organisations to be approved by the Assembly. It was the Committee's view that such a regulation would place the decision-making in the hands of the Assembly, and the Committee believed that to be the most appropriate place for it. Given that no agreement was reached between the Committee and the Minister on this during Committee Stage of the Justice Bill, the Committee tabled appropriate amendments at Consideration Stage, and these were supported by the Assembly. The regulation provided for by the Committee's amendments is before the House today.

The current Justice Committee was briefed by departmental officials on the proposal for the regulation in October of last year and considered the draft statutory rule in January 2013. The Committee has agreed that it is content that the designated organisations in the regulation, which, as the Minister outlined, include the PSNI, the Probation Board and the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, will bring a broad range of experience and expertise to the partnerships and will contribute to enhancing community safety on the ground.

The Committee looks forward to seeing the Department draw up guidance on developing the role of the designated bodies, and it has asked for clarification regarding the protocols that are in place between the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, which will be represented on the PCSPs, and the housing associations, which will not, on sharing information that is relevant to each partnership's work. The Committee also welcomes the Department's intention to make provision for organisations, such as the Public Prosecution Service and Roads Service, which are not in the list of designated organisations, to engage and contribute to the work of PCSPs as necessary on issues of local concern.

At its meeting on 31 January 2013, the Committee agreed to recommend that the draft statutory rule be approved. I will support the motion today. Echoing the Minister's comments, I believe that this is a welcome development. I think that PCSPs and the way in which they have been formulated have enhanced the role that they can play in our community. Certainly, concern was growing that, sitting in isolation, district policing partnerships and different community safety partnerships did not operate as effectively as they could. The joined-up approach now is the best way to try to deliver on issues that, ultimately, affect all our local communities. We trust that those organisations will be able to play an important role in that.

I will now speak in my capacity as an individual Member. We have a degree of concern. I know that, in the first year of operation, these statutory organisations will not have voting rights. Obviously, that could, ultimately, change. We will be keen to review how that relationship is established between the statutory bodies, people who are appointed as independent members and political representatives to ensure that they work properly together. We will await the outworkings of its first year of operation. We may then have a view about the appropriateness or otherwise of the voting rights being extended and added to those organisations. Certainly, I commend and support the motion.

Mr G Kelly: I am not on the Committee for Justice, but I am a member of the Policing Board and happen to be the chairperson of its community engagement committee. For that reason, I thought that it was appropriate to say a few words on the motion.

For all the reasons that the Minister and the Chair of the Committee covered, I welcome the statutory rule that is being brought forward. I think that it is crucial to having community engagement at the core of policing, and it is excellent that the designated bodies actually have a duty to attend. I agree with the comments of the Member who spoke previously on — well, I do not know whether we agree. However, the fact that the seven designated bodies agreed not to use their voting power during the first year in testing was a great move forward by all of them and reflects the ability to negotiate the matter with them.

There is a duty to attend. It is, if you like, an extension of a multi-agency approach that has been seen to work on the ground in a number of areas, including north Belfast. For that reason, I am delighted that we are at the point where agencies are coming forward and assisting in that in holding the police to account. As the Minister said, the police have said that, very often, they are the organisation that is held to account, but many other statutory bodies should be involved with community safety and other issues. I think that the partnership bodes well for the future. I support it.

Mr Ford: Mr Deputy Speaker, I am sure that you will be delighted to know that I do not intend to make a lengthy speech. I thank the Committee Chair for his positive comments. I confirm to him that guidance is being developed for the way in which the partnerships will operate and for the role of the designated organisations and that we will review voting rights at the end of the first year of operation. I welcome Gerry Kelly's contribution. As he said, he is the co-chair of the joint committee between the Department and the Policing Board. I echo his comments about the necessity for joined-up partnership working. I thank the House not only for its agreement this morning but for the lengthy and detailed work that has been done in the Policing Board and the Committee to get the order right. I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Welfare of Animals (Dog Breeding Establishments and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next item of business is a motion to approve a statutory rule.

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): I beg to move

That the draft Welfare of Animals (Dog Breeding Establishments and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be approved.

I seek to introduce the aforementioned statutory rule, which will, subject to the Assembly's approval, specify the standards for commercial dog-breeding establishments and introduce a new licensing system for such establishments. Before I go into the detail of the regulations, I will briefly explain to Members the background to them.

The current regulations covering dog-breeding establishments are the Dogs (Breeding Establishments and Guard Dog Kennels) Regulations 1983. The regulations were made under the Dogs Order 1983, which focuses on dog control as opposed to dog welfare. The 1983 regulations set out the information that must be supplied to a council for the registration of a dog-breeding establishment and specify the conditions under which such establishments must be constructed and operated. Although the 1983 regulations provide basic welfare standards for accommodation, they do not contain any specific welfare controls for bitches, dogs or pups.

Prior to the Welfare of Animals Bill being introduced in the Assembly in June 2010, there were calls from elected representatives and members of the public to bring forward new legislation to stop so-called puppy farming. In addition, during the Bill's passage through the Assembly, there were also calls from a number of MLAs to stop puppy farming and to specify in the Bill the welfare standards for dog-breeding establishments. However, the level of detail required to do that was considered excessive for primary legislation. My predecessor, Michelle Gildernew, therefore gave an assurance to the Assembly that one of the first pieces of subordinate legislation to be made under the new Welfare of Animals Act 2011 would concern dog-breeding establishments. Bringing the draft regulations before the House today honours that commitment.

The Welfare of Animals (Dog Breeding Establishments and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations 2013 will regulate the commercial breeding of dogs and provide commercial dog breeders with specified standards that are intended to maintain and, where necessary, improve the welfare of breeding dogs throughout their breeding life. The regulations will not apply to hobby breeders who breed the odd litter of pups to maintain good bloodlines in a show dog or a good working strain in, for example, a gun dog or a sheepdog.

The regulations will introduce a new definition for breeding establishments with an associated licence to operate such an establishment and a related licence fee; provide an exemption for licensed dog-breeding establishments from the existing requirement to have a block licence under the Dogs Order; make it a mandatory requirement to microchip all bitches, dogs and pups in the establishment; introduce conditions that must be complied with under the terms of the licence, including controls on the age and the number of litters that a bitch can breed, the minimum age at which a pup can be sold or transferred, and written socialisation and enrichment plans for pups and bitches in the establishment; and provide an exemption for registered hunt clubs, providing that they do not sell dogs or pups, and one for registered charities, providing that they do not breed dogs.

It is important for Members to know that, before the regulations were drafted, my officials visited a number of registered breeding establishments here and in England to help inform development of the policy. The establishments here range from small establishments with fewer than 10 breeding bitches to a large establishment with 400 to 500 breeding bitches. Standards in those establishments vary considerably, from what could be described as Rolls-Royce models to those barely meeting the minimum standards set in the 1983 regulations. The visits were very informative and helped improve my officials' understanding of the difficulties faced by breeders and the issues that needed to be addressed.

A 12-week public consultation was undertaken on the draft regulations, and it ended on 10 January last year. The consultation issued to over 2,000 stakeholders, including 242 registered breeders and 1,214 block licence holders. My Department received 610 responses, 90 of which were substantive responses and 520 of which were letters supporting the response from one group of breeders.

The consultation responses came from a diverse range of stakeholders, and a wide spectrum of opinion was expressed in the responses, with many conflicting views. Overall, however, the draft regulations were welcomed by the majority of the 90 stakeholders who submitted substantive responses, and there was significant support for the vast majority of the proposals.

However, the breeders' group that had 520 letters supporting its response expressed concern generally about the legislative proposals and about the draft guidance for council enforcement officers, which was also subject to consultation. It stated its opposition to the new regulations, preferring to the keep the current regulations made under the Dogs Order 1983, and to build on and reinforce them rather than introduce new legislation under the 2011 Act. It did not agree with the proposals to license a dog-breeding establishment or the introduction of a licence fee. It suggested that the current block licence, which is issued under the Dogs Order, be retained. It also expressed its opposition to many of the proposed conditions of a licence, such as whelping facilities; socialisation of pups; mating conditions; microchipping, particularly for pups going for export; first registration by the breeder of the pup on the microchip database; records to be kept by breeders; and the suspension of appeals procedures.

As I stated earlier, although the Dogs (Breeding Establishment and Guard Dog Kennels) Regulations under the Dogs Order were fit for purpose when made in 1983, they do not provide the welfare standards that we expect in the 21st century. Therefore, I do not consider it a viable option to keep the 1983 regulations under the Welfare of Animals Act.

I have considered all other points that were raised by stakeholders. Where practical, I have tried to address as many of their concerns as possible. However, in addressing stakeholder concerns, both from welfare organisations and dog breeders, I have had to ensure that the new regulations do not become watered down and meaningless, but clearly set out the welfare standards that commercial breeding establishments must adhere to.

As a result of the consultation responses and subsequent scrutiny by the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, I have made a number of significant changes to the draft regulations, including changes to the definition of "breeding establishment". In the consultation, one of the key elements in defining a commercial breeding establishment was a person who keeps three or more breeding bitches and breeds two or more litters of puppies in any 12-month period. Most stakeholders did not agree with the proposed definition, and were of the view that hobby breeders should be allowed to breed three litters each year before being required to be licensed as a commercial breeder.

To take account of the majority of stakeholders' comments and to ensure that very small breeders did not face new licensing costs, I have increased from two to three the number of litters that may be bred each year before a breeding establishment licence is required.

In the consultation, it was a proposed that a bitch could breed only one litter of pups in any 12-month period and could not be bred after she reached eight years of age. Although a wide range of stakeholders supported those conditions, valid comments were received from dog breeders that they were too restrictive and not financially viable. For example, greyhounds can be raced until they are five or six years of age, and, under the proposals, could therefore breed only two or three litters before they reach eight years of age. In a bid to take on board those comments while still protecting the welfare of the breeding bitch, I have amended the conditions to allow a bitch to give birth to three litters in three years as long as the bitch is not bred in any consecutive heat period. That takes account of bitches that come into heat less than every six months. In addition, a bitch can be bred after six years of age if, on each occasion, a veterinary surgeon certifies that the bitch is in good health to breed.

I have also removed the requirement to have an older bitch or dog spayed or neutered before rehoming. Although I would prefer that those older bitches and dogs are not bred again when they retire from the breeding establishment, it is, on balance, better that the dogs and bitches that are suitable for rehoming as family pets are rehomed as opposed to being put down because of the cost of neutering. I have reduced the mandatory record-keeping requirements that a breeding establishment must retain to the minimum required to allow an inspector to assess compliance with the regulations. I have retained the requirement for all pups to be microchipped before they leave the breeder. It is crucial that pups can be traced back to the breeder, irrespective of whether they go to a new owner in England or remain in the North. Microchipping will allow that to happen.

The draft regulations are fit for purpose. I am pleased to say that the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, as part of its scrutiny role, thoroughly examined them. It undertook its own stakeholder engagement and visited a number of breeding establishments. My officials have worked with the Committee to ensure that we now have workable regulations that will improve the standards in commercial breeding establishments across the North. I hope that my officials have assured the Committee that, although council officials have almost 30 years of experience in inspecting dog-breeding establishments, they will work with councils to ensure that their officers understand the requirements and licensing conditions under the new regulations. I endorse that commitment, and I have agreed that the powers in the new regulations will not commence until 1 April to allow time for that to happen.

At the Committee's meeting on 11 December, it indicated that it was content for the regulations to be brought before the Assembly. The Committee provided final clearance of the draft regulations on 5 February. I put on record my thanks to the Committee for its valuable input into all the regulations.

I highlight to Members that, as a result of the new licensing regime, councils will, for the first time, receive a fee that will cover the cost of processing the licence application, including the inspection visit. I assure Members that no unfunded burden will be placed on councils, and hence ratepayers, as result of the regulations.

I appreciate that regulation alone will not stop so-called puppy farming. That is going to take a concerted effort by members of the public, future dog owners, good breeders and enforcement agencies to work together to identify breeders, either licensed or unlicensed, who put financial gain before the welfare needs of their pups and their dogs.

However, these regulations clearly set out the welfare standards with which commercial breeders must comply. More importantly, they provide the powers to allow action to be taken where a breeder does not meet those standards. Council inspectors will also have clear standards for applying strong enforcement powers that will allow them to take action to prosecute anyone who is illegally breeding dogs. In addition, the new enforcement powers and tough penalties will act as a deterrent to those taking part in illegal dog-breeding activities, sending out a clear message that no such activities will be tolerated.

Following Assembly approval of the regulations, my officials will start publicising the existence of the new requirements for commercial breeders and highlighting to future dog owners the importance of buying pups only from reputable breeders and where they can see the conditions in which the pups are born and reared.

So, again, I am grateful to the members of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee for their support for the regulations, and I commend the motion to the House.

Mr Frew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I welcome the opportunity to speak to this motion, which seeks to affirm the Welfare of Animals (Dog Breeding Establishments and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013. The statutory rule is being laid under powers conferred by sections 12 and 55(3) of the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011.

As part of the Committee's scrutiny of proposed legislation, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development presented the outcome of the consultation to the Committee at its meeting on 3 July 2012. After that meeting, many of the key stakeholders expressed considerable concerns about the legislative proposals and the draft guidance for enforcement officers. As a result of those concerns, the Committee agreed to host a stakeholder event to help inform its understanding of the apparent apprehensions felt by a large number of individuals and organisations. This included a wide range and type of organisations, among them animal welfare groups, dog breeders, the local authorities that will enforce the legislation and local hunt clubs. That was an extremely useful exercise, and clarified in the minds of members exactly what the issues were.

The Committee followed up the stakeholder event with a visit to two very different dog-breeding establishments. I take this opportunity to thank both dog breeders who allowed us to visit their premises. That, again, was very useful because we could begin to see what the regulations would actually mean on the ground. The Committee also received oral and written evidence on this issue.

Over the next few months, we worked closely with Department of Agriculture and Rural Development officials to clarify and agree positions on a number of issues. That was useful for all concerned, and gradually compromise positions were discussed and agreed. My thanks go to the officials who worked closely with the Committee on this. For example, the Committee expressed reservations on the requirement to spay or neuter dogs at the end of their breeding life before rehoming. Members felt that this would lead to breeders choosing to end the dog's life rather than comply with the requirement, due to the costs involved. It is cheaper to put a dog down than to spay it. On this occasion, after detailed discussions between the Committee and officials, the Minister decided to remove the spaying requirement from the draft regulations.

Members also expressed their concerns regarding the requirement for mandatory record-keeping for each individual dog and their puppies. This was seen to be very bureaucratic and cumbersome by the stakeholders we consulted with. As a result, the Minister agreed to reduce the record-keeping, as she said, to a minimum that a breeding establishment must hold to allow an inspector to assess compliance with the regulations. The Committee sees that as a sensible move in ensuring that the bureaucracy associated with the regulations is not gold-plated but is still effective and proportionate.

A further concern was the proposed requirement to microchip all pups that go out of Northern Ireland to England. Some felt that that would label pups from here as coming from Northern Ireland puppy farms, an image that many breeders would not be happy with — indeed, were horrified by. There were also concerns that microchipping was not a legal requirement in England and might disadvantage locally bred pups. However, in the end, after considerable discussion, the Committee was content that the Minister retain that requirement in the regulations. The Committee is also somewhat reassured to have heard recently that England has since decided to make microchipping compulsory in April 2016. I am sure that that will level the playing field for our dog breeders.

1.00 pm

There are many other examples that I could use of the Committee working well with the departmental officials, but I believe that I have said enough. The statutory rule came before the Committee at SL1 stage on 11 December 2012, and the Committee had no further issues with the merits of the policy. The Committee further considered the statutory rule on 5 February 2013 and resolved that it be affirmed. I confirm that the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development is content that the statutory rule be affirmed by the Assembly. I thank the Minister and her officials, who listened closely to the concerns of the Committee and were prepared to take the time and effort to address those concerns.

Mrs Dobson: As Ulster Unionist Party agriculture spokesperson, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the regulations, which have now reached the Floor of the House.

If the vision in the new regulations to increase the welfare standards of dogs and decrease animal cruelty is to be fully realised, it is beholden on the Department to ensure that that vision is properly and efficiently delivered to the benefit of all and not at the expense of legitimate dog breeders and their businesses. Now that the proposals have reached their final stage, the Department, from today, has a duty to educate dog breeders and the wider public. It is vital that everyone knows their roles and responsibilities. There will be many dog breeders, both large and small, including families, who may be unsure how the new regulations will affect them. It is therefore vital that the Department continue to work closely with all stakeholders to increase awareness of the new regulations. I therefore request a clear commitment from the Minister to provide assistance and guidance to dog breeders to make sure that people do not unwittingly get caught on the wrong side of the regulations.

I commend all the stakeholder organisations that engaged fully with the Department and the Committee throughout the process. Through their engagement, they have ensured that the final regulations before the House today are far more realistic than the original unworkable proposals. The regulations allow breeders to focus more on their puppies and less on their paperwork. That is a result of effective lobbying by many groups, and I commend each and every one of them.

I know that, in Committee, members broadly welcomed many of the changes that the Department has made. The issues that dog breeders and their representatives have with the regulations have been discussed at length in Committee, at the Committee stakeholder event, which the Chair mentioned, and when the Chair, the Deputy Chair and I visited dog breeding establishments. The Minister and her officials will be aware that concerns remain among dog breeders regarding the licensing arrangements. I urge them to continue to work with stakeholders to help them and their members.

In passing the regulations, it must be ensured that they will not unwittingly lead to breeders choosing to go underground. I have said at many stages throughout the process that there is a fine line between introducing legislation that is designed to improve the welfare of animals but, through its exercise, leads to more and not fewer puppy farms operating across Northern Ireland. The Department has a moral obligation to ensure that that does not happen. I therefore urge the Minister to monitor the effectiveness of the regulations on an ongoing basis. We welcome the proposals before the House, and I would further welcome the Minister's assurances on the points that I have raised.

Mr Byrne: Like the Members who previously spoke, I welcome the publication of the Welfare of Animals (Dog Breeding Establishments and Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations. I thank the Minister for the work that has gone on over the last six months. I also thank the officials for the work that they did in facilitating the Committee.

The Committee held an inquiry and conducted stakeholder consultation meetings, as has been mentioned, including one main one in the Long Gallery. All the interest groups had their say and had an input. As was mentioned previously, the Committee attended two meetings at dog breeding establishments: one small establishment near Aughnacloy and a larger establishment in Fivemiletown. Those meetings were good for the Committee because we saw at first hand some of the issues and concerns that dog-loving people have had about puppy farms in the past.

Puppy farm breeding has been open to question for a number of years. The new regulations will bring some order and conformity to the situation. I am glad to say that the concerns of the smaller greyhound breeding establishments have been addressed by the Minister and the Department. It is important that the smaller greyhound breeders are not badly handicapped by the new regulations.

As the SDLP's agriculture spokesperson and Deputy Chair of the Committee, I fully commend the regulations and thank the Minister and her officials for all their work.

Mrs O'Neill: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the members of the Committee for all the work that they did in scrutinising the regulations. I assure them that we have time before the regulations come into effect on 1 April to make sure that we publicise the issue wholly and get all the information out to stakeholders and councils. That is a job of work for the period ahead.

I also assure the Member that I listened carefully to the concerns of the greyhound breeders, whom I met throughout the development of the regulations. I am glad that we are going to approve the regulations.

Question put and agreed to.

Planning Bill: Extension of Committee Stage

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I beg to move

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended to 7 June 2013 in relation to the Committee Stage of the Planning Bill (NIA Bill 17/11-15).

On Tuesday 22 January 2013, the Assembly referred the Planning Bill to the Committee for the Environment for scrutiny. The Bill will accelerate the introduction of a number of reforms to the planning system contained in the Planning Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 and will make legislative changes to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the planning system.

At its meeting on 24 January, the Committee for the Environment agreed to call for written submissions from interested organisations and individuals. In addition to signposting notices in the local press, stakeholders have been contacted directly, and a number have already indicated their intention to respond to the Committee's request. The Committee for the Environment firmly believes that it is essential that all stakeholders are given the opportunity to comment on the Bill, particularly as it includes two new elements that have not been consulted on by the Department. In effect, there is an expectation that the Committee will do the consultation on behalf of the Department. Therefore, we cannot afford to rush the Bill through without proper and full scrutiny. That will take time, so we have allowed until 15 March 2013 for responses.

The Committee anticipates a high volume of submissions. The Committee will invite all respondents to take part in a stakeholder event at which they will have the opportunity to air their views and question the Department and members of the Committee.

The Committee feels that it is essential that it is afforded the time to exercise its scrutiny powers to the full and asks that the House supports this motion to extend the Committee Stage of the Planning Bill to 7 June 2013.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

Health Inequalities: Report of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 15 minutes to propose and 15 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Ms S Ramsey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I beg to move

That this Assembly welcomes the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety's review of health inequalities; notes the recommendations relating to the restructuring of government Departments; and calls on the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to discuss the recommendations in the report with the ministerial group on public health and to action those that are within his remit.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am delighted to move the motion on behalf of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

I would like to begin by providing some background to the Committee's review of health inequalities. The Committee has been concerned about the issue for some time. We are aware that, although the general health of the population has been improving over recent years, the rate of improvement is not equal for everyone. Health outcomes are worst in the most deprived areas in overall terms. There continues to be a large gap across various measures of health, including life expectancy, drug- and alcohol-related deaths, suicide, teenage pregnancy, smoking during pregnancy and cancer-related deaths. The main cause of these health inequalities is poverty.

Back in June 2012, the Committee was aware that the Department was in the process of producing a new public health strategy to follow on from Investing for Health. Members will remember that, when 'Investing for Health' was published by the then Minister, Bairbre de Brún, it was seen as one of the most radical documents of its time. We, therefore, believed that a review of health inequalities would be useful work that could feed into the Department's development of the new strategy.

The Department's draft strategy 'Fit and Well: Changing Lives 2012-2022' was published in August for public consultation. That consultation ran until the end of October 2012, with the strategy expected to be published in spring 2013. Parallel to that process, the Committee carried out its review of health inequalities so that the results of that could feed into the final version of 'Fit and Well'. I want to take the opportunity not only to welcome the Minister to today's debate but to thank him for agreeing to wait until we had finished our report. It is important that the value of the Committee's work is seen by the Department and the Minister because we can add to the process.

The terms of reference of our review were to identify effective interventions to address health inequalities in other regions that could be applied here, with a particular focus on early years intervention. We invited a range of expert witnesses to give evidence to the Committee. We were keen to be outward-looking and see what we could learn from other places. We heard from people working on projects across Ireland — in Ballymun and the Midlands — from Scotland and the European office of the World Health Organization.

As a Committee, we also agreed to carry out a study visit as part of the review. That involved the Deputy Chair and me going to Cuba to attend an international conference on public health and see for ourselves various aspects of the Cuban healthcare system. The Cuban healthcare system spends $585 on each person a year, whereas we spend almost $4,000. Despite that huge variance, Cuba achieves health outcomes that compare with and, in some cases, exceed those produced by our system. Therefore, we thought that it was important to go to the conference and see at first hand whether there was anything that we could learn about Cuba's system and use here to tackle health inequalities.

One of the striking aspects of the Cuban approach is the focus on primary care. We got the chance to visit a GP surgery and a polyclinic. We learned that, in 1984, Cuba introduced the system of a family doctor and nurse service because they realised that they relied too much on hospital services. Cuba wanted to put a bigger emphasis on prevention and on treating people in the community first and foremost to prevent them needing hospital treatment, where possible. The family doctor lives in the community that they serve. So, at any point in time, they can provide an overview of all his or her patients' general health. As I mentioned in a previous debate, that is partly because they carry out annual health checks, which means that they can prevent ill health or, when needed, intervene early. The Committee fully accepts that some parts of the Cuban health system cannot be directly transferred on to ours. However, the focus on prevention, patient education and primary care all fit in with the vision that the Minister has set out in 'Fit and Well'.

We visited a polyclinic where various clinics and minor operations were carried out, and we learned that the one that we visited had an infant mortality rate of zero in the past 15 years and had had no maternal deaths in the same period. We also heard that a lot of emphasis is put on the care of pregnant women, who have 12 antenatal appointments. The breastfeeding rate is also very impressive, with 95% of women breastfeeding for up to six months. That means that children get the best possible start in life, because the system prioritises the needs of pregnant women and supports them in breastfeeding. Again, that ties in with the Fit and Well strategy, where the focus is on early intervention. My colleagues from the Committee will speak later about some of our recommendations on breastfeeding and parenting.

Another thing that struck us was that there is a strong focus in Cuba on empowering people to deal with their own condition rather than simply writing them a prescription or giving them a pill. We observed classes and spoke to the instructors. The classes were held in a hall that had been pretty damaged by the recent weather in Cuba. However, it was decided that the hall could still be used, and work was still going on. The classes were held in that public hall, which had basic facilities. Throughout the day, different classes were held for people with health problems such as diabetes, high blood pressure, arthritis and depression. Those people had been referred to the classes by their doctor. So, instead of automatically being given a prescription or a pill, they were referred to a class. All the classes were free of charge, and the instructor was employed by the state. There was no modern gym equipment, but there was a can-do attitude from both the instructor and the participants, who made best use of the buildings and facilities that were available to them.

We also talked to men and women who participated in daily grandparent circles, and we attended one such circle. The circles involve people aged from their 50s to their 80s meeting every morning in a public park to do a set of exercises together. We met a woman who was over 80 and still had her own teeth. She had lost only one tooth, which is impressive for somebody of that age. The members of the group were enthusiastic about the benefits of exercise. Importantly, however, they were also enthusiastic about the social aspect of such groups, which is often forgotten. Sometimes, we talk about our elderly being excluded and isolated, but I thought that the social aspect of that group was hugely important.

The group is peer-led, but an instructor visits twice a week to ensure that people do the correct exercises. A doctor also visits every couple of weeks to monitor blood pressure and so on. Again, they were using a public park. There were no special facilities, and it was free to everyone. If we are serious about tackling health inequalities, we need to make better use of our assets. We have so many leisure centres, parks, schools, school playing fields, halls, church halls and government buildings that could all be opened up a lot more widely so that people could take part in activities that would benefit their health. In fact, in Cuba, there was even a project for children with learning disabilities that was based in the local zoo. The staff were using the animals in the zoo and factoring them in to the weekly work programme for the children, which involved therapy and exercise. We need to think outside the box.

The report says that, if we are to get a handle on health inequalities, there must be a united front across all Departments. It is not an issue for the Department of Health alone; in fact, the Department cannot deal with the issue on its own. As part of the review, I wrote to all Departments on behalf of the Committee asking for details about the programmes that they currently run to tackle health inequalities through early years intervention. Unfortunately, a number of Departments simply stated that they had no such programmes. It is my impression that some Departments have not quite grasped the fact that we all have a role to play in improving the health of our people. It goes across the board: we need to look at education, housing, job creation, access to the arts and sport and so on. It is important that all Departments accept that they have their part to play.

The Minister is keen to secure cross-departmental buyin and action for the Fit and Well strategy. I assure the Minister today that the Committee is more than willing to be part of the push to tackle health inequalities. I urge members of other Committees to take the time to ask what their Department does to promote public health. If Departments are not doing anything, they need to do something. If Departments are doing stuff, can they do more?

I thank Committee members for the part that they played in the report and staff from the Committee and the Research and Information Service, who helped us to produce the report. I also thank the witnesses who gave the Committee the benefit of their knowledge of and information about the programmes that they run. I commend the report to the Assembly.

Ms Brown: I speak as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety to commend the report to the House.

On taking office in May 2011, the Minister of Health, Edwin Poots, placed health inequality at the heart of the agenda. It is not fair or equal that we have a society in which inequalities not only are evident but continue to widen. It is therefore imperative that the Assembly acts to reduce inequalities and strive to build a fairer society for all.

At the heart of health inequalities, we see more people and communities suffering from smoking- and heart-related diseases, suicide, teenage pregnancies, drug- and alcohol-related mortality and cancer mortality compared with other areas of Northern Ireland. People are not necessarily born with poor health; rather, it is often a condition of their environment, and that condition is poverty.

In my constituency of South Antrim, nearly 18% of the population have a long-term health problem that affects their ability to carry out day-to-day activities. Some 38% of the population hold either no qualification whatsoever or a low qualification. Members may ask why I raise the issue of health alongside that of low educational attainment. The answer is simple: as the report demonstrates, they are linked.

There is a need for a joined-up approach to tackle health inequality as well as poverty. The issue needs to be taken up by the Executive Committee as a whole, from the perspective of the economy, regional development, agriculture, rural development and education. Every Department has some role to play.

The Department of Health provides services for those who need them. The practice of modern medicine has come a long way in recent years, but it is poverty that remains at the heart of poor health. That poverty is partly caused by the absence of a nurturing environment to provide a decent education for our young people, which helps to secure employment in an ever more competitive work environment. A historical absence of decent housing also contributes as does the need for supportive and better rural life with access to schools, a library and an employment centre, access for infants to local, supportive preschool nurseries and access for parents to programmes such as Sure Start that provide an early intervention mechanism. There is obviously a role for parents and local communities, but many of those involved in such communities have been calling for much of this for some time amid cuts and closures. I urge all Departments to review those strategies, which are clearly not delivering, with a view to overhauling them to ensure that they deliver for all our communities.

The bones of the report focus on the need for a joined-up approach among Departments towards promoting better health and reducing health inequalities; namely, collaborating and prioritising funding and resources for projects in areas of social and economic disadvantage. One of the report's recommendations is that consideration should be given to creating a Department for children and young people to place greater focus on early years intervention, and I ask the Minister to comment on that recommendation and to update us on how that complements the work of the ministerial subgroup on children and young people. While there is much for the Minister of Health to consider in this report, there is much for others to digest to see what could lead to a better, healthier and more equal Northern Ireland.

Mr Beggs: I, too, am pleased to support the motion highlighting the Committee's review of health inequalities.

When we reviewed the Statistics and Research Agency's figures, it was clear that there were huge variations in life expectancy. The average female life expectancy in Northern Ireland is 80·5 years, but, in the 20% most deprived areas, it moves down to 77·9 years. For a male from one of the 20% most deprived areas, it is 71·5 years. Those are quite dramatic variations in life expectancy, and, with that, there is associated illness. A range of factors are thought to contribute to that, such as an increased risk of mortality because of drugs, alcohol and smoking and an increased risk of suicide. There is also the issue of respiratory mortality and cancer mortality.

The Committee received evidence from a range of experts, many of whom pointed towards the importance of early years programmes to help improve the health of the next generation and to reduce health inequalities. Mention was made of Professor James Heckman and Sir Harry Burns, who have both recognised the importance of early years investment in education and in health. I declare an interest as a member of Horizon Sure Start, which provides support to parents in Carrickfergus and Larne.

I will concentrate on recommendation 4 in the Committee's report, which states:

"The new public health strategy should recognize parenting as having a significant influence over long-term public health issues and should adopt a 'progressive universalism' approach to supporting parenting projects."

In the evidence from the Triple P Project, we were advised of how Kaiser Permanente, an American insurance company, had reviewed the effects of adverse childhood experiences. It highlighted that such adverse experiences result in a higher risk of developing obesity, ischaemic heart disease, depression and alcoholism. So, by improving parenting skills and reducing adverse experiences, the health of the next generation can be improved. Progressive universalism is about supporting everyone, with more support for those who need it most. The Triple P project from Longford and Westmeath highlighted that 30% of children with social and emotional behavioural problems had parents from lower socioeconomic groups. Of course, that means that 70% were from other groups, and there clearly needs to be support across the board for everyone. The group also highlighted the research by Steve Aos from the Washington State Institute for Public Policy, which, again, expressed a preference for the universal approach and indicated that, essentially, you get better results and better value from your investment by taking that approach. Some parents may require only limited support and guidance from literature, whereas others will benefit from extra parenting support such as classes and regular meetings with advisers and specialists.

Perhaps the most dramatic example of how a parent can affect the health of their child is demonstrated by the issue of mothers who smoke. According to the NHS website on smoking and the unborn baby, protecting your baby from tobacco smoke is one of the best things that you can do to give your child a healthy start in life. Every cigarette you smoke in pregnancy harms your unborn baby. It contributes to an increased risk of stillbirth, and newborn children are less likely to be able to cope with any complications that arise. Smokers' babies are more likely to be born early and to face the additional breathing, feeding and health problems that go with being premature. A child of someone who smokes is more likely to be underweight and less able to fight off infection.

There is also an increased risk of cot deaths. What is quite surprising is the variation in the numbers of mothers who still smoke in Northern Ireland. When I looked at the official figures, I discovered that, in the Old Warren ward, 55% of mothers still smoked in 2011. In the Greystone ward, 50% smoked, and 48% in the Ballee ward. In my constituency, 41% of mothers in the Clipperstown ward smoked, and 39% of mothers in Sunnylands and Blackcave still smoked.

1.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Beggs: Clearly, further early education support is needed to try to identify this problem and prevent children from suffering.

Mr McCarthy: I offer my support and that of the Alliance Party to the recommendations that are contained in this report. Inequalities in any aspect of modern life are wrong, unacceptable and should not happen, but, when it comes to inequalities in health provision, it is time that someone stood up and called a halt to what is going on. That is exactly what we in the Health Committee have done in this review, and I pay tribute to our Chairperson for putting this very important issue on the agenda and carrying out such a review of the issue. Hopefully, as a result of our investigation, we can, together, put forward those inequalities and what we see as a means to put an end to all health inequalities in Northern Ireland.

I also commend the Committee staff for their work, particularly in bringing to our sessions very important people from various backgrounds who gave us an insight into their experience and made suggestions on a way forward. I also welcome the presence today of the Health Minister, and I hope that, together, we can see an end to health inequalities for all in our society.

So far, colleagues from the Health Committee have spoken on a variety of issues, and I wish to deal with the contribution that was made by Dr Erio Ziglio, the European officer with the World Health Organization, and Joan Devlin from Belfast Healthy Cities. We were extremely grateful to have the input from such a very high-profile individual. He took time out to contribute to our review, along with our own Joan Devlin from Belfast Healthy Cities, who continues to do extremely valuable work in Belfast.

One of the key points that was made by Dr Ziglio was that a reduction in health inequalities could not be made by working solely within the health service. He argued that, for a public health strategy to be successful, it must provide added value to local and regional development. In his experience, countries with an overall development strategy will have more success, and that is exactly what we want to see as a result.

Dr Ziglio told us how Slovenia had major health inequalities and poor indicators on health and unemployment. However, over a 10-year period, Slovenia made significant improvements by identifying and bringing together three main sectors — health, agriculture and tourism — and produced a strategy that involved all three Departments of government. By working together collectively, there were benefits for each of the sectors, and Dr Ziglio made the point that this combined approach is better than each of the Departments working as silos and seeing each other's Departments as competitors for limited resources. We see some of that quite regularly in Northern Ireland. He also suggested that we in Northern Ireland should look more closely at how to maximise European structural funding opportunities. He believed that the trend has been for most of the funding in health to go to buildings, which might not necessarily be the best way forward. If health could join with other sectors, that would be a better way to access European funding.

With these wise words from this eminent World Health Organization doctor, our Committee has made its first recommendation, which states that the Health Department should actively work to form partnerships with other areas of government, such as the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI), which includes tourism, the Department for Regional Development (DRD) and, indeed, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD). The Health Department should form partnerships to access much-needed European structural funds.

As I said earlier, health inequalities are unacceptable, and it would be everyone's goal to see them eliminated as soon as possible. If our recommendations are acted upon, we could indeed see —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr McCarthy: — equity in all our health provisions. I hope that the Minister will act on those recommendations.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I also speak as a member of the Health Committee and in support of the motion. I, too, acknowledge the role of the Committee and its staff in undertaking such an important report.

Tackling health inequalities must be central to the delivery of health and social care provision and the Transforming Your Care proposals. Early intervention and prevention is central to that objective. We spend £4-6 billion per year on health and social care and employ 70,000 staff, but the reality is that health has not been shared equally across all the people in our society. The life expectancy of someone in a more affluent area is around 10 years greater than that of someone in a more deprived area. With respect to health inequalities, the top three constituencies are Belfast West, Belfast North and Foyle.

In that context, therefore, I want to focus on recommendation 9 of the Committee's report, which is:

"The Department should consider increasing the percentage of the overall health and social care budget spend on prevention to 6% within the next decade."

That issue was discussed at an evidence session with the World Health Organization, where it was indicated that most European countries' average spend on prevention is 3%, and that that should double within the next decade. The World Health Organization highlighted how there is still reluctance by some Governments to direct resources to prevention.

What, therefore, do we mean by prevention? The Social Care Institute for Excellence defines prevention as providing a range of services that promote independence, prevent or delay the deterioration of well-being resulting from ageing, illness or disability, and delay the need for more costly and intensive services.

The Economic and Social Research Institute of Ireland stated that, for every €1 invested, you get €7 in return. I stress that those figures are for the Twenty-six Counties only, and I urge the Minister to work with his counterparts in Dublin to provide all-Ireland figures that provide us with a clear economic case for early intervention and prevention.

The Institute of Public Health in Ireland referred to the need for preferential resourcing to disadvantaged communities. The World Health Organization described how the resources could be mobilised, through partnership with other sectors, or through utilising resources that come from the EU through structural or cohesion funds. Early intervention in Scotland resulted in savings of £5·4 million to the Scottish economy.

I want, therefore, to examine a number of key health areas that could be impacted on by prevention. In the Western Trust area, the largest inequality gaps are in alcohol-related mortality, 112%; self-harm admissions, 89%; teenage births, 76%; and smoking during pregnancy, 71%. The constituencies of Belfast West, Belfast North and Foyle have the highest standardised death rates of the main causes of death. The four constituencies of Belfast West, Belfast North, East Derry, and Foyle had over one third of all teenage births in 2010. One hundred and eighty seven alcohol-related deaths occurred in Foyle between 2001 and 2010. All those are stark inequalities that require additional focus and investment in prevention and early intervention

The principle of Transforming Your Care, in shifting resources from acute to community services, is laudable, but with that comes additional demand for resources. We have an ageing population and, although opting to be cared for at home is an understandable request, it requires additional support for families and carers. Prevention schemes for older people in England that are delivered through the WRVS organisation examined the social return on investment. The hospital-based aspect of the study showed a £1·9 million return on investment.

In conclusion, I highlight two important proposals in advancing early intervention and prevention. The first is the development of the social care campus model, which will allow for a combination of health and community care to be delivered as part of a hub. Secondly, I suggest to the Minister, in his absence, that the facilities exist in the north-west through the Project Kelvin database and its link to North America, the C-TRIC facility and the university, in terms of connected health. I ask the Minister to comment and update us on both those proposals.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion. It is a very important matter for everyone across Northern Ireland. Unfortunately, health inequalities continue to exist in today's society, and that remains the challenge that we all must continue to work to improve. I commend the Health Minister for all his work to date on leading on this and trying to improve the health and well-being of our population. I know that he will continue to make preventative care and health promotion a top priority in the Health Department.

The Health Committee has undertaken a lot of work on this subject, and its review of health inequalities has provided some valuable findings that will be useful to the Department as it plans for the future. Life expectancy, alcohol and drug-related deaths, levels of self-harm, teenage births, suicide rates, and respiratory and lung cancer rates were found to be among the most sizeable inequality gaps between deprived areas and the overall figure across the Province. Even in a constituency such as mine — North Down has one of the highest rates of life expectancy — real divisions exist and, therefore, health inequalities unfortunately exist between people who may live only one mile apart. Every constituency experiences significant health inequalities in its population.

As has been said, the Committee has taken evidence from Dr Erio Ziglio, from the World Health Organization. He spoke of how different Government departments in Slovenia, such as health, tourism and agriculture, work together to get positive outcomes for health inequalities. He also spoke about Scotland, where a thematic approach was taken to Departments to tackle inequalities. Some of the recommendations of that review are particularly realistic and constructive. Early intervention was importantly distinguished as one of the best ways to address health inequalities, and that also came through during the many evidence sessions we held with groups and organisations.

The role of parenting was established as one of the keys to improving heath inequalities. It is vital that the correct emphasis is put on supporting parents. Some of the evidence gathered from the Republic of Ireland highlighted the fact that a lack of support for parenting can often have negative effects on children as they grow up. Broken homes and marriage breakdown can also add to health inequalities, and I believe that we should do more to support marriage as a basis for stable homes and society.

Another recommendation is that we should identify and fully utilise the significant resources that we have already. There is a vital role for a cross section of statutory and voluntary agencies to work together and pool resources to help tackle health inequalities. Working together on the ground in our communities is important, as is working together at Executive level. I know that the Minister has been personally involved in several community outreach projects, including those in Kilcooley in Bangor in the North Down constituency, working alongside the South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust.

Departments must work together in a joined up way to tackle these important issues. Education and Health should be working hand in hand on many of the issues around early intervention. However, every Department has a role to play. The promotion of healthier living and well-being should also be continually prioritised by the Department. I know that much good work has already been done on that over the past number of years. Prevention is better than cure, and that must remain our top focus and priority as we plan for the future and ensure that we have a fit-for-purpose health service that will tackle the health inequalities that exist in Northern Ireland today.

1.45 pm

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, speak as a member of the Health Committee in support of the motion.

The Public Health Agency highlights the fact that poverty and economic inequality are bad for health, with poverty an important risk factor in illness and premature death. Poverty affects health directly and indirectly in many ways, including financial strain, poor housing, poor living environments, poor diet and limited access to employment and other resources, services and opportunities. Poor health can also cause poverty. It is well established that the poorest people live the shortest lives in the worst health. Unfortunately, we have persistent poverty here in the North. The figure stands at 21% before housing costs, which is more than double the 9% in Great Britain.

The research on health inequalities makes interesting reading. My constituency, for instance, ranks eighth for multiple deprivation. A number of other health inequality rankings indicate that my constituency of Newry and Armagh is not particularly well off.

I will concentrate on recommendation eight of the report, which is that the new public health strategy should prioritise funding for projects that involve collaboration between partner organisations to ensure a co-ordinated and more effective approach to particular issues.

Another recommendation is that the Department place the new public health strategy in the context of a wider governmental strategy for the development of the North as a region. The Department should work to form partnerships with other areas of government, including Departments not traditionally associated with health matters, such as the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, DRD and DARD. The Department should also look at other sectors where partnerships could be formed, leading to the accessing of European structural funds. It has been argued that a reduction in health inequalities cannot be achieved by working solely in the health sector. For a public health strategy to be successful, it must also provide added value to local and regional development.

Slovenia was mentioned by other Members. I also cite it as an example of where there were major problems and poor health and unemployment indicators. Over a 10-year period, Slovenia made significant improvements in reducing health inequalities and unemployment. It did so through partnership with three sectors. It identified these three sectors — health, agriculture and tourism — and produced a strategic plan involving them. The trend here has been for most health funding to go into buildings. If health can partner other sectors, there will be more of an opportunity to access funds.

The importance of collaboration between sectors, communities or organisations delivering services on the ground cannot be overemphasised. There will be a major role for voluntary organisations in the concept of Transforming Your Care, and a collaborative approach will continue to be very important. If it is accepted that a partnership approach is required for a project to be funded, that will avoid duplication and succeed in bringing together a wide range of skills and expertise, which can only enhance and promote any public health strategy. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr McDevitt: I, too, speak as a member of the Health Committee. I am very happy to support the motion and speak to the report.

Colleagues have covered several important areas where health inequality manifests itself. I want to focus on one area that I might not be expected to focus on. Nonetheless, I shall, and the issue is breastfeeding.

It is a simple reality that the breastfeeding rates in our region are unbelievably low. They do not stack up well in comparison with other parts of the world. Indeed, they stack up unfavourably compared with other parts of these islands. Yet the benefits of early breastfeeding and sustained breastfeeding during the first six months of a child's life are beyond doubt. Today, a very interesting news report points to the specific benefit of colostrum, which is the very early milk that a mother produces during the first day or two of a child's life, and how essential it is to building up the child's immune capacity and developing essential reflexes, such as the swallow reflex.

I am very happy to speak on this topic because I am the husband of a woman who took the positive decision to breastfeed her three children. One of the reasons why I was late for the debate is that those three children are now enjoying the benefits of the canteen downstairs. The sad reality is that our socio-economic background means that we are probably in the group of people that is able to make that choice. Mrs McKevitt is here beside me and has, I am afraid to say, been accused of being my wife on a couple of occasions — something that I know she deals with well. She told me that she took the positive decision to breastfeed her five children. Again, I suspect that she was able to make that decision because she was coming from a socio-economic grouping and educational basis that gave her the opportunity to make it.

The report highlights the inequality that exists between women who come from some of the most deprived wards and those who come from the least deprived. The inequality is, of course, that the more less well off you are the less likely you will be able to make a positive choice to breastfeed for your children.

To give you some statistics, it is worth noting that only 15% of children here are breastfed up to the age of six months. I think that the Committee Chair pointed out that, in Cuba, that figure is 95%. Mrs McKevitt, speaking privately during the debate, reflected to me that it is unlikely that a breast is best campaign was running in Cuba and that that is just the way it is. It is cultural and accepted. Women do not feel awkward or strange if they decide to breastfeed, and doing so is not seen as something that should cause the slightest embarrassment or as anything other than perfectly ordinary.

The Health Committee's report highlights that, in several jurisdictions, not least in Scotland, there is a debate on, and, indeed, a law on the statute book, protecting the right of women to breastfeed in public places. It seems sad that any jurisdiction should have to think about giving a woman the right to do what, frankly, in many ways seems like the most natural and obvious thing for her. However, if that is necessary, so be it. It is a shame and a sad indictment on a society. I wish that we would not have to think about going down that road. However, we may have to, because the sad reality is that we know of incidents of discrimination against women in Northern Ireland who sought to breastfeed outside the privacy of their homes.

The debate about breastfeeding is a debate about culture, tolerance, understanding and respect. It is a debate about women and about having the integrity, courage and maturity to understand —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McDevitt: Yes, of course.

Mr Wells: The Member is developing an interesting point, and I want to see it through to a conclusion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McDevitt: Thank you very much. I appreciate the opportunity to have an extra bit of time.

I think that it is important for us all to understand that some of the ways in which we objectify women and choose to present them in our society make it more difficult for debates such as this to happen. Some of the ways in which we have sought to marginalise breastfeeding and treat it as something that should be done in private rather than just as part of a child's early development have set us back a little.

I hope that this report is yet another opportunity to raise the issue. I look forward to the Minister's response. I hope — indeed, I trust — that he will have a progressive perspective on the issue. I, for one, would love to be able to give every single child in our little region the opportunity to benefit from the great start that my kids and Mrs McKevitt's kids had.

Mr Easton: Health inequalities are major factors in determining life outcomes for people in our society. Although the overall trend is improving health and better outcomes, there still exists a wide spectrum of health outcomes across various measurements. I believe that we must look to new and innovative ways to tackle those differences and to ensure that everyone has equal opportunities to increase the positive outcomes for their health.

Poverty is one of the major issues that affects a person's health. People often tell us — indeed, they tell me — that basics such as food are priced so that the food that is best for our health is often out of the price range of those who are on the lowest incomes. Recent events have shown the dangers of accessing cheap food. Again, one of the biggest groups affected will be those on a low income. That highlights why the first recommendation in the report is so vital.

Through cross-departmental working, we can address issues such as poverty and deprivation, which will then have a real and positive effect on people's health outcomes. For instance, the Department for Social Development's work on encouraging people to ensure that they are receiving their full welfare benefit entitlement means that people will have more money to spend on food. The warm homes scheme ensures that people's homes are effectively insulated. That benefits the environment and means that heating costs will come down, leaving more income that can be spent on good-quality food. It is important to seek out further ways in which partnerships with other Departments and outside agencies can be established to increase the positive health outcomes that we all want to see.

There is a plethora of evidence to show that, to achieve value for money, the best place in which to invest is early years. Prenatal care, breastfeeding and support for parents are themes that continually arose during the research for the report. Although no one is suggesting that we should write off programmes that aim to help our youth or adults make good choices, if we get early intervention correct, we will see better health outcomes. Breastfeeding, for example, provides protection not just for the baby but for the mother. It is considerably cheaper than formula feeding and has beneficial bonding qualities for the family. However, Northern Ireland has the poorest rate of breastfeeding beyond six months when compared with other countries. The World Health Organization recommends breastfeeding for at least the first year of a baby's life. We must therefore support mothers who wish to breastfeed by introducing legislation to support breastfeeding mothers.

A child who resides in a house in which there are addiction issues, violence or neglect is not going to reach its full potential in any aspect of life. The introduction in 2012 of the Safeguarding Board for Northern Ireland has provided scope to examine parenting choices and how they impact on children in the family. Children with behavioural problems come not just from the lower socio-economic group but from a wide range of families with a wide range of experiences. Universal access to programmes is therefore fundamental to help address the issues and health outcomes for that child and the family. A child with behavioural problems has a significant impact on the whole family. Therefore, the whole family must be treated as a unit, not just the child.

While promoting universal inclusion, we must ensure that resources home in on those groups that are traditionally hard to reach. We must increase funding to projects that involve collaboration between partner organisations. We must identify best practice models that exist and work to enhance their impact. The role of the third sector in that is vital. The success of, for example, Sure Start is evidence of good practice in partnership-working. The voluntary sector can often access hard-to-reach groups as well as be on the ground. It can tell us what is needed in a particular area and what will work in that area.

Prevention is better than cure, and it often comes at a much lower economic cost. In these economic times, it is all about value for money. Increasing the amount that we spend on prevention rather than cure will achieve better health outcomes for all communities. By educating our young people and families on good health choices, by collaborative working and by supporting families, we can make a difference to the health outcomes of the whole of Northern Ireland in years to come.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I welcome the Committee's report on health inequalities, particularly the focus on early years interventions. It signals a recognition that, although our health has been improving in general, the rate of improvement has not been the same for everyone. I have already agreed with the Health Committee to delay the publication of the strategic framework for public health until I have had time to consider the recommendations and to discuss them, as necessary, with colleagues.

When I made a statement to the Assembly in September on the publication for consultation of the draft framework,

I drew Members' attention to the fact that health outcomes are generally worst in the most deprived areas in Northern Ireland when compared with the region generally. A number of Members across the House identified that today. Those inequalities are, of course, not unique to Northern Ireland. However, we can learn from experience elsewhere

The new public health framework is intended to build on the work already undertaken under the 2002 Investing for Health strategy and set the direction for the next 10 years.

2.00 pm

I think that we would all agree that changes in population health are a long-term goal, which can take decades to achieve. A review of Investing for Health, which was carried out in 2010, acknowledged a considerable amount of evidence to support the rationale for tackling the societal influences that impact on health, such as education and literacy; employment and working conditions; housing; and income. Increased emphasis on the societal factors complement the more traditional focus on disease prevention and associated factors, such as diet, alcohol and tobacco use.

The review also drew attention to the evidence that investment in early childhood interventions can reduce the societal inequalities rooted in poverty, by providing young children from disadvantaged backgrounds with a more equitable start in life. Early interventions have the potential to reap long-term benefits, as they can influence health and other outcomes over the whole-of-life course.

The new framework, on which consultation was completed towards the end of last year, addresses many aspects highlighted in the Committee's recommendations and is generally in accord with its findings.

I turn, first, to the Committee's call for a new public health strategy to be placed in the context of wider government strategy and for a thematic approach across the public sector. Those are principles that underpin the new public health framework. The new framework will contribute towards the achievement of a number of objectives in the Programme for Government and the economic strategy. It will also seek to create synergy with other key government strategies, such as Delivering Social Change.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

I agree that strategic alliances need to be formed in tackling many of the public health issues that we face. You have heard me say before that I want every Minister to be a Minister for health. The public health framework is the result of working across all parts of government. It sets out a cross-cutting programme of action. The ministerial group on public health, which I chair, has led on and will continue to contribute to its development. I have also held bilateral meetings with ministerial colleagues on key public health issues, such as suicide prevention.

There are other initiatives to which I need to draw people's attention. We are working with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), for example. Those colleagues are doing significant work. Other Departments, which might not have been traditionally associated with health matters, such as the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Regional Development, are working with us as well. There are courses of work on public health happening within government, and that is something that I strongly welcome.

The draft public health strategic framework also recognised the potential for greater collaboration across government and proposed six priority areas for consideration. One illustration relates to the use of space and assets. Across the public sector, we have many physical assets that could be put to better use through cooperation. For example, local communities could benefit from school premises and facilities, such as playing fields, outside of hours. Many public spaces could be used more widely to promote physical activity, and we need to take creative approaches.

The process of establishing a thematic approach to Departments, as in Scotland, for example, where Cabinet Ministers have responsibility for broad areas, such as health, finance, employment and sustainable growth, is an interesting one. Although it is not within my sole gift, I would be happy to further consider options with ministerial colleagues for the benefit of population health.

In respect of the recommendation to create a Department for children and young people, I am fully supportive of coordinating responsibility for children's issues. However, my view is that the clear direction of travel should be towards fewer, not more, Departments. I am fully committed to ensuring that early years intervention remains a key focus for this Department, and I will continue to work with other Departments on that and on other areas of common interest.

To illustrate that, my Department is actively engaging with other Departments on a number of early intervention initiatives. For example, discussions are under way with Departments that have a key interest in children and young people about the establishment of an interdepartmental early intervention fund. We also received £5 million through OFMDFM's Delivering Social Change framework to deliver increased direct family support and support for parents' projects, both of which have strong early intervention elements.

My Department's regional family and parenting strategy, Families Matter, and the draft public health framework place emphasis on the importance of early intervention and parenting support. The public health framework proposes early years as one of the two strategic priorities in tackling inequalities. We chose early years because of the now overwhelming evidence internationally that people's life chances are most heavily influenced by their development in the first years of life. That was highlighted by several of those who gave evidence to the Committee.

I agree that if we are to break the cycle of disadvantage across generations, it is vital that our children are given the best possible start in life. That starts from antenatal care, and includes childhood development, support for good parenting and opportunities for learning. What happens to children in their earliest years is key to their outcomes in adult life, not in relation just to health, but to educational attainment and economic status.

A number of Members mentioned breastfeeding. The issue is not just the nutritious value of the mother's milk, but the nurturing and important bonding that takes place, which makes children into better adults who can relate more easily to others in how they deal with other people in later life.

The Committee also made recommendations on early years and the importance of parenting to reinforce that priority in our strategy. Another of the framework's proposed priority areas for collaboration across Departments is support for families and children:

"enhance support through incremental development of targeted and universal programmes."

Again, that is in line with the Committee's recommendations on early years and a progressive universalism approach to support for parenting.

I believe firmly that by adopting early intervention approaches to policy development and service delivery, we can deliver improved outcomes for children, young people and families. I also recognise that intervening early in the lives of children and families has the potential to deliver economic gains, as has been evidenced elsewhere, including in Scotland.

In addition, as sponsor Department for the Safeguarding Board for Northern Ireland (SBNI), I agree with the Committee's assessment that whilst the SBNI's main focus is to ensure the effectiveness of agencies involved in child protection, it does have wider powers to promote the safeguarding of children more generally.

I also commend the creation of supportive environments for breastfeeding, as is outlined in the report. It is one of those three proposed strategic outcomes. The introduction of legislation to support breastfeeding mothers is one of the proposed measures to achieve that outcome.

I have already referred to the aspiration in the public health framework for better collaborative working to make best use of all of the resources that we have. I welcome the Committee's recommendation on that.

One of our greatest assets is the people of Northern Ireland. We need to harness the commitment and energy of individuals and local communities in addressing the health issues that matter to them in ways that work for them. Health professionals need to be skilled up to support people to do things for themselves.

With regard to the new public health framework's prioritizing funding projects which involve collaboration between partner organisations, the framework will recognise that partnership working on a broad cross-sectoral basis continues to be vital if we are to make substantive progress in reducing inequalities. The framework should be used to help inform investment in programmes and interventions which are shown to be effective. In light of current financial constraints, it is essential that opportunities are taken to maximise existing resources and effect across all partner organisations.

The Public Health Agency will have a key role in working with others across government and other sectors to co-ordinate delivery and bring about more effective collaboration.

With regard to the recommendation to increase spend on public health, I remain committed to increasing the share of the health budget which is devoted to public health. I have already allocated additional funds to the Public Health Agency in 2012-13, which has enabled new investment in the provision of additional support services to help to address suicide and mental health issues; new initiatives to support vulnerable young children and their families; development of new programmes to help older people to continue to live independently; new breast screening services; and new initiatives to help to tackle obesity. Any commitment in that area, however, must be considered alongside the range of other priorities for the health budget, including meeting the needs of an ageing population and addressing the ever-increasing complexity of healthcare requirements.

I believe that there is much common good between my Department's strategic proposals for public health and the Committee's recommendations. The recommendations are also in keeping with the shift left agenda called for by Transforming Your Care.

Those are some initial comments on the report. I have undertaken to consider the recommendations more fully, together with the outcomes of our consultation, during the process of developing the final public health framework. I should add that we had a substantial number of responses to the consultation. We received over 140 responses, most of which are detailed and well argued, and deserve careful consideration.

The process will include two cross-sectoral workshops, to which representatives of the current ministerial group on public health have been invited, along with other key stakeholders. The first workshop took place a week ago, and the Committee's recommendations were shared with the group that day. A further workshop is planned for next month, and the aim is to finalise the framework this spring.

The process of finalising the public health framework will seek to identify further opportunities for cross—departmental working, which I will be happy to discuss with Executive colleagues as necessary. It is in the interests of all of us collectively as elected representatives to ensure that all people are enabled and supported in achieving their full health potential and well-being, which is the proposed view of the new public health framework.

Collaboration across government and at all levels of society will be vital if we are to change lives, particularly for our young people. Leadership from all Ministers will be of paramount importance. I welcome the Committee's support in this vital area of work. I am happy to work further with the Committee on the issue as we seek to achieve the common goals of improving the health of the Northern Ireland population and reducing health inequalities.

Mr Wells (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): In one sense, this is an unusual debate in that we know what the problem is and we know where we need to get to. Maybe the difficulty is in getting from A to B.

As Maeve McLaughlin quite rightly said, health outcomes in Northern Ireland are largely determined by where you were born. As she indicated, in constituencies such as Foyle, North Belfast and West Belfast, health outcomes, by every measurement, are poor in respect of length of life, health during that life and the health of our children. Unfortunately, it is often the case that where you were born determines how good or bad those outcomes will be.

All the indicators certainly suggest that health risks such as smoking, alcohol abuse, drugs, obesity and lack of breastfeeding are self-evidently a problem in the poorest parts of our society.

Mr Beggs brought to the table some very useful information on the issue.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Smoking in the home increases the risk of a child suffering from asthma. Is the Member aware that a combination of early years health education from Sure Start, home visits from health visitors and the provision of smoking cessation support from local pharmacists, etc, has significantly reduced smoking rates in certain areas such as the Antiville and Love Lane wards in my constituency, where it has gone down from 60% to 22% and 50% to 22% respectively within a two-year period? Is he aware that such dramatic changes can occur?

Mr Wells: I was not, but I certainly think that that is a very useful addition to the debate, showing the form of intervention that can provide a quick hit in helping to reduce health inequalities.

Mr Beggs also revealed some startling statistics from other parts of Northern Ireland. For instance, he said that, in Old Warren, which I believe is in the Minister's constituency, 55% of expectant mothers are smokers. It is extremely worrying that that is going on because of the inevitable outcomes for health inequalities. I am sure that, if you compared it with a similar sized population in somewhere like BT9 or Cherryvalley in Belfast, you would see a very different pattern of smoking. There is a very famous picture —

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for giving way. Interestingly enough, we did a course of work, through the Public Health Agency and Barnardo's, in a number of estates in the Lisburn area that have challenging problems, and that was obviously one of the things that was highlighted. However, it also highlighted a range of problems that then led to poor educational outcomes. Poor educational outcomes and poor health outcomes go hand in hand. Therefore, working together to ensure that we drive up both simultaneously is absolutely critical.

2.15 pm

Mr Wells: I agree entirely with the Minister. Indeed, in the most recent Chief Medical Officer's annual report, there was a very graphic indication: if you take a bus from the Markets area, which, I assume, is South Belfast, to the top of the Malone Road, your life expectancy, if you are male, increases by nine years. That is nothing to do with the fact that the air is fresher at the top of the Malone Road; it is all to do with poverty and the outcomes of having very little in the way of the world's resources.

The Committee was very fortunate to hear from expert witnesses with a wide range of experiences. The Ballymun project in Dublin, which I do not think has been mentioned yet, was very interesting. Ballymun is one of those huge 1960s or early 1970s estates that has enormous problems because of unemployment, disabilities and poverty. We heard about what was being done to tackle the health outcomes of the 20,000 people who live in that estate. The Longford/ Westmeath Triple P project was also fascinating because you had a mixture of urban and rural. Dr Ziglio gave us evidence from Slovenia. In addition, some of us had the benefit of attending a seminar on the situation in Glasgow.

All the evidence indicates what needs to be done. First, we need a greater emphasis on public health. The Public Health Agency has recently been established in Northern Ireland. We were very critical of Mr McGimpsey as Minister throughout his time, but one of the things that was positive during his time as Health Minister was the formation of the Public Health Agency. All the evidence indicates that we need to increase our expenditure on the public health element of health to 6% — it is a much higher level in Cuba — so we have to double our expenditure over the foreseeable future.

Secondly, we need collaboration among Departments. You cannot tackle this with the silo mentality that we and many other parts of the United Kingdom have. Of course, perhaps the most interesting and controversial recommendation of the report is that we should move towards the formation of a children and young people's Department. The Minister said in response that he disagreed with the creation of more Departments. The Committee envisages that replacing a current Department rather than bringing about a new one. Scotland does not have silos; it has Ministers based round themes such as older people and children and young people. That works, because a themed ministership brings together all the resources required to tackle a specific issue. You do not have to barter among 12 different Departments to bring elements to the table to create a mixture of policies to bring about better outcomes for young people; you would have a Department with the primary aim of delivering that I accept that, under the present structures that we have in Northern Ireland — the need to have everyone round the table in a five-party mandatory coalition — it is difficult to think outside the box and have themed Ministers. However, I would like to think that, as we become a more normal democratic society, we will start to think in that way. I cannot see, because of the very wide encompassing nature of public health in Northern Ireland, how we can deliver what we need, particularly for our young people, simply on the basis of the present structures. I accept that that is an argument for another day. It is certainly not one that the Minister, without waving a magic wand, could deliver in the morning. I hope that, as things move on, we will be able to move to that holy grail.

Mr Beggs mentioned the very interesting material that we received from Harry Burns, the Chief Medical Officer for Scotland, who recognised the importance of early years intervention. He focused on the recommendation that we should make this very much a public health issue. He expressed appreciation for the work of the Triple P project in the midlands of the Irish Republic. Dr Ziglio's name featured prominently in many contributions. Mr McCarthy mentioned his evidence from Slovenia, where, again, the suggestion is that, if Departments can get together and form a universal coherent policy, huge increases in health outcomes can be achieved in a very short time. So all the evidence seems to point in the same direction.

We do not normally associate North Down with health inequalities, but Gordon Dunne made a point about people who may live within a mile of each other. While one part of society enjoys extremely healthy outcomes, just down the road, there is another part of society in which problems evident in other parts of Northern Ireland persist. He also brought up the issue of parenting skills. There is absolutely no doubt that even in deprived areas, children reared by loving, devoted and committed parents do much better than those who have a less idyllic upbringing. We must do everything that we can to promote good parenting, so I think that his point was a very useful one that we need to emphasise.

Mickey Brady quoted the very worrying statistic that 21% of the people of Northern Ireland are living in poverty. There is no doubt that that statistic is important when it comes to inequalities in health outcomes. As he knows, that figure will probably become higher and higher under social welfare reform. Therefore, we need to put resources into this before more people have poor health outcomes. He, again, emphasised the need for partnership and suggested that DRD and DETI should be involved. Without doubt, practically every Department has a role in developing better health outcomes.

Maeve McLaughlin also quoted the 10-year discrepancy in life expectancy between people living in different parts of Northern Ireland. She suggested that resources should be pumped into obtaining stronger links and partnerships with other sectors. She cited the great inequalities in alcohol-related deaths in the Western Trust, and, again, the Foyle constituency is in the top three areas for that type of inequality. She suggested a composite approach to social care Conall McDevitt raised a crucial issue. I do not decry for one moment the fact that it was a male Member of the Assembly who raised the very important issue of breastfeeding.

One of the things that we learned from our visit to Cuba was that the vast majority of people there are significantly poorer than those in Foyle, North Belfast and West Belfast, but they live longer. It was interesting to see how the Cuban approach delivered an average life expectancy of almost 80 for males. That is extraordinary when you consider that just down the road, Haiti, with the same population and a similar geographical position, can achieve nothing like that.

One of the points that emerged during our visit to Cuba was the almost universal level of breastfeeding by young mothers, to the extent that it was practically unheard of for that not to happen without there being a very good medical reason. Before the Chair spoke to the conference, we hurriedly rang Northern Ireland to get the equivalent figure for here, only to find that it was shockingly low. In workingclass, vulnerable communities, it was absolutely dreadful. The figures quoted this morning indicate that there is no doubt that breastfeeding is crucial to the first year of a child's life. Yet we do very badly on that. Therefore, it was absolutely right of Conall McDevitt to raise the issue and make a cultural point, which was that we must make it extremely comfortable for mothers to breastfeed, when required. There must be no further stigma. I am a product of breastfeeding — I do not know whether that is good or bad. Certainly, my three children also are, and they are healthier and, I think, happier as a result.

Alex Easton was one of the few Members to raise the issue of the dangers of cheap junk food. Among the many things that I noticed in Cuba was the total absence of fast food. There are no large famous retail chains selling burgers, chicken or whatever. Fast food just does not exist. People do not eat fast food in Cuba, and that must also contribute. The reason for that is really nothing to do with health; it is just that many such companies are American owned and not allowed to operate in Cuba. However, I have no doubt that thousands of healthy young people in Cuba have benefited from the fact that they have no concept of a McDonalds "triple whopper burger" or whatever they are called. I do not eat them because I am a vegetarian, so it does not worry me, but you know what I mean one of these massive cholesterol cocktails on a plate. The Cubans just do not have them, which makes their society much healthier. Therefore, if we have vulnerable communities who live on fast and unhealthy food, the outcomes will inevitably be poor. He also raised the role of the safeguarding board in promoting parenting.

I have only a couple of minutes left. One thing slightly annoys me about these debates. We have had yet another debate on a subject that should really concern all 108 MLAs. However, what has happened? We have had the Health Committee talking to itself, and the Minister has been listening in, with his chief of staff beside him. [Laughter.] I cannot think of a title, but I am sure that it is something as important as that.

As an Assembly, we will really have to spend a bit more time becoming interested and involved in the debates and in other Committees' issues, because, frankly, there is not much to be achieved by the 11 members of the Health Committee debating this issue in the Committee and reaching total agreement — unusually, with Mr McCarthy there — and then coming to the Floor of the Assembly and reaching total agreement with little or no involvement from anyone else. We have had that again today, but at least we have the Minister here to respond. I think that this is becoming more and more of a burning issue.

Ms S Ramsey: I thank the Member for giving way. For Members' information, there are only nine recommendations in the report. It is not a big report, and it is on the Committee website, so people should take their time to read it. I think that you are absolutely right: health is everybody's business.

Mr Wells: There is a quick plug for the Committee's work. I will just finish with this point. It is totally wrong that we can have a society where someone is doomed to live nine years fewer simply by accident of birth. If he is born in the Shankill, the Short Strand or the Bogside, that person is more or less doomed to live nine years fewer than somebody he can see across the motorway and who is, perhaps, living on the Upper Malone Road, simply because of that accident. That cannot be tolerated any longer.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly welcomes the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety's review of health inequalities; notes the recommendations relating to the restructuring of government Departments; and calls on the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to discuss the recommendations in the report with the ministerial group on public health and to action those that are within his remit.

Mr Speaker: As Question Time will begin at 2.30 pm, I suggest that the House take its ease until that time.

2.30 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Mr Speaker: I remind Members not to be seen to be reading out their supplementary question. Members should refer only to their notes.

Budget: Prime Minister

1. Mr D Bradley asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what representations they intend to make to the Prime Minister prior to the forthcoming Budget. (AQO 3399/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister):

Representations concerning tax, fiscal and public expenditure issues are made on an ongoing basis. The Minister of Finance and Personnel's quadrilateral meetings, which are usually held at least twice a year, represent the formal process whereby we engage with Treasury Ministers on public expenditure and taxation issues. Separate bilateral meetings are also held on tax and fiscal issues.

Our representations have resulted in the abolition of air passenger duty (APD) on direct long-haul flights and reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing flexibility for the A5 road project. At our meeting with David Cameron during his visit in November 2012, we discussed the general implications of devolving corporation tax and agreed then that we would have a further meeting.

As Members will be aware, the final report of the findings of the joint ministerial working group was sent to David Cameron for consideration in November. The British Government must now decide whether corporation tax powers will be devolved to the Executive. David Cameron wrote to us last month to confirm that he will meet us again to hear our views on corporation tax in detail and that his office will work with ours to identify a suitable date. We continue to press for that meeting to take place as soon as possible. We hope that it will take place before the March 2013 Budget, but a decision is not directly linked to the Budget

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an LeasChéad Aire as an fhreagra a thug sé. I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. In the light of the £25 million that has been expended on policing the flag protests, would he support a bid by the PSNI to the Treasury security fund for the replacement of that money?

Mr M McGuinness: That is a matter for the Policing Board and the PSNI. The events of the past number of months have obviously been very difficult and a very serious challenge not only to the PSNI but to these institutions. I look forward to more peaceful times in future, and I am conscious that people are flagging up the real challenges that we all might face over the next seven or eight months. I hope that everyone will do all in their power to ensure that everything passes over peacefully. However, if the Policing Board, the PSNI and the Minister of Justice were to make a case to the First Minister and me that we should raise with the British Government directly the issue of replacing the money that has already been spent by the PSNI, I think we would be more than willing to do so.

Mr Dunne: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answers. Given the huge expenses that have been paid to the MPs from his party, will he confirm that he will now instruct them to take their seat and vote against the Budget cuts?

Mr M McGuinness: There is a very short answer to that question and a very long-winded answer: the short answer is no

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Does the deputy First Minister agree that the absence of complete and accurate figures for the North's revenues and the reliance on Estimates from the British Treasury pose a real problem for the Executive in developing a comprehensive economic strategy?

Mr M McGuinness: Yes, I agree. Current Estimates employed by the British Treasury are based on assumptions and tend to vary widely. The Executive are doing our best to help our people through the economic downturn and financial crisis, but we find that we are limited in what we can do. If we had access to accurate information, it would be of help. It is an issue not just for us but for Scotland and Wales. I believe that all the Administrations should have access to a proper statement of public accounts. We do not have that at present.

The House should be reminded again that the First Minister and I have, at every opportunity, spoken to the British Prime Minister, David Cameron, about the reneging on a financial commitment that was at the heart of establishing these institutions five years ago. In quite a number of meetings with other British Government Ministers, not least Theresa Villiers, the Secretary of State, we have reiterated the real difficulties that have been presented, particularly for our construction industry, by the resiling of the British Government from the financial commitment, which was described by both Gordon Brown and Tony Blair over five years ago as ring-fenced and guaranteed. It is also important to point out that that financial commitment was made in the course of very important negotiations at St Andrews, which all the parties in this House were at. Of course, the Irish Government were also present. I would like the Irish Government to remind the British Government of the financial commitment that was made at that time and to urge the British Government to fulfil the agreement that was made, which resulted in the establishment of these institutions, which, in my view, have proven to be very successful.

Goods, Facilities and Services Legislation

- 2. Mr Weir asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister when goods, facilities and services legislation will be brought forward. (AQO 3400/11-15)
- 9. Mr McElduff asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the legislation in regard to goods, facilities and services. (AQO 3407/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, I will take questions 2 and 9 together.

The Programme for Government commitment to extend age discrimination legislation to the provision of goods, facilities and services requires that legislation to be taken through the Assembly by 31 March 2015. Currently, anti-discrimination legislation in relation to age is limited to the fields of employment, vocational training and further and higher education. Prior to a new Bill being introduced to the Assembly, a considerable number of steps have to be undertaken to progress through the required legislative stages. We are currently considering the scope of the legislation to ensure that it achieves its intended outcome. We aim to have the legislation in place during the latter part of 2014-15, in line with the Programme for Government commitment.

Mr Weir: I will try not to break the eleventh commandment and not be seen to read out my supplementary question.

The bulk of countries have applied this on the basis of the qualifying age being 18. The exception is Australia, where it has been watered down somewhat. Can the deputy First Minister give an assurance that we will follow best international practice and set 18 as the qualifying age?

Mr M McGuinness: As the Member knows, we are giving active consideration to the scope of the legislation. Research has been commissioned into the discrimination in the provision of goods, facilities and services experienced by children and young people, people of working age and older people. Officials are scoping out all the issues likely to apply with each Department. Officials are working on a comparative analysis with other jurisdictions such as Australia, which the Member mentioned, to see how they have implemented similar legislation across the age sectors. All that will go towards ensuring that an informed decision is reached on the scope of the legislation.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis an LeasChéad Aire fosta as a fhreagra go dtí an pointe seo. Has the Equality Commission given the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister any indication regarding the scope and breadth of the legislation?

Mr M McGuinness: The Equality Commission is strongly opposed to the blanket exclusion of minors from statutory protection. It recommends that the legislation should be non-discriminatory and in line with the guiding principle of non-discrimination in article 2 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and the concluding observations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. In addition, when examining the scope of the legislation here, we need to be mindful of any potential breach of our section 75 duty that may make such legislation vulnerable to a legal challenge.

Mr Eastwood: Further to the other supplementary questions, can the deputy First Minister reassure the House that the legislation will not leave young people discriminated against and that that will be built into the legislation?

Mr M McGuinness: I am sure that nobody in the House wants to see any young person discriminated against. That is why I indicated in a previous answer that there was a scoping exercise taking place. Officials are very much involved in looking at a number of situations, particularly what is happening in Australia and Canada. As a result of all of that work, we will have to come to final decisions in the House so that we can ensure that the legislation meets the time frame laid out in our Programme for Government.

Mr McCarthy: Will the deputy First Minister give us any indication of the status of the single equality Bill for Northern Ireland?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member knows as well as anybody else that, as in all of these matters, there are differing views in the House on it. He will also be aware that, in order to ensure that we bring legislation forward to deal with that issue, we need an agreement in the Executive. Thus far, we have not been in a position where we can bring forward the legislation, but no doubt that will form part of ongoing discussions.

Disability Strategy

3. Ms Fearon asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the disability strategy. (AQO 3401/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: Cheann Comhairle, with your permission, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer the question.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): The United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities places an obligation on government to promote, protect and ensure full and equal enjoyment of all human rights by all persons with disabilities. The involvement of persons with disabilities and their representative organisations in all facets of public life is an important aspect of the convention. The Executive's formal response to our obligations under the UN convention and the findings of the 2009 promoting social inclusion report on disability will be delivered within the context of a new disability strategy.

Article 33 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities requires that people with disabilities and their representative organisations are not just consulted by this Administration as part of the development of government policy and strategy but are actively engaged. To fulfil our obligations, a specialist in disability was engaged and worked with our officials to develop a draft strategy, on which we consulted last year. The sectoral expert also advised us on arrangements for consultation, including the development of fully accessible documentation and consultation events. With that support, we completed a consultation exercise, and we have developed a comprehensive strategy, which has incorporated many of the views expressed during the consultation.

Arrangements are being finalised to launch and publicise the Executive's new disability strategy, and we are engaging with the disability and other sectors. In line with the view of stakeholders on the need for delivery, that will include early signature projects being taken forward within the Delivering Social Change framework.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I know that OFMDFM has an overarching role when it comes to disability issues, but will the Minister outline what specific areas the Department will bring forward in this?

Ms J McCann: The Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister takes the lead on disability awareness and advocacy and on monitoring, reporting and governance.

So OFMDFM will host a major inclusive conference to invite providers of all public services to gather with representatives of the disability sector and other sectors to consider how current arrangements meet the needs of people with disabilities on the basis of equality. In conjunction with people with disabilities, we will also develop a Delivering Social Change signature project to provide greater support and advocacy for people with disabilities and for their families and carers. There are a number of areas that we will look at when it comes to those signature projects. They will include action on disability awareness and advocacy; access, particularly to transport and digital inclusion; housing, employment and standard of living; tackling crime against people with disabilities; and participation in sports and leisure.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Minister for her responses. I chair the all-party group on disability, and one of the key worries and stresses for people with disabilities across Northern Ireland is the impending impact of the welfare reforms. Will the Minister outline whether those issues will be addressed and incorporated in any new disability strategy?

Ms J McCann: The Member raises a point that has been raised before on this issue. The Minister for Social Development brought proposals to the Executive for a Welfare Reform Bill to give effect locally to the proposed changes. Consultation respondents on the draft disability strategy expressed a range of views on welfare reform. It was clear that disabled people feel vulnerable about the potential changes that are about to happen, especially in relation to disability living allowance. For many, the potential of suffering a loss in what they see as their primary source of income means that much of the strategy would ring hollow if those changes were introduced. We must, therefore, consider the potential impact of welfare reform in the context of what we aim to achieve through the delivery of that strategy.

2.45 pm

Mrs Dobson: Have officials produced a report on the consultation on the disability strategy, and what is the timescale for the full publication of the strategy following Executive approval?

Ms J McCann: The purpose of 'A Strategy to Improve the Lives of Disabled People 2012-15' is to set out a high-level policy framework to give coherence and guidance to Departments' activities across general and disability-specific areas of policy. The actions that will follow the strategy will provide a framework, particularly for the implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, and take forward that work to improve the lives of children and adults with disabilities. The strategy is about the delivery mechanism that all Departments will buy into that will improve quality of life for people with disabilities.

St Lucia Site, Omagh

4. Mr Buchanan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to provide an update on the St Lucia site in Omagh. (AQO 3402/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: Under the Hillsborough agreement, the St Lucia site, apart from the historic barracks buildings, was gifted to the Executive to raise funds from the eventual disposal of the site, which contains houses, light industrial buildings and land. The OFMDFM-owned portion of the site shares an outer boundary with the Department of Education's Lisanelly site, while the historic barracks portion is still in the ownership of the Ministry of Defence (MoD). This part of the site was subject to leasehold covenants dating from the 19th century that limited the use of the site to military purposes and required its return to the original landowners — the Archdales — should it no longer be required by the MoD. As a consequence, the property at St Lucia, which was transferred to OFMDFM in April 2011, did not include this historic core.

The houses on the site have been assessed by the Department for Social Development as not suitable for conversion to social housing. The Housing Executive has reported that there is not unmet demand for social housing in the area. While the site's potential is being assessed, it is necessary to have realistic expectations of what is feasible in the short to medium term because of the current state of the land and property market locally and regionally. It is important to raise the maximum value from the site, and consideration needs to be given to market conditions. Officials are in discussions with Omagh District Council and the Department for Social Development's regional development office regarding future possibilities for the site.

Mr Buchanan: I thank the deputy First Minister for his response. Is he fully aware of the importance of the site to the future development of Omagh, given its strategic location? He touched on discussions with some of the stakeholders, such as Omagh District Council. Will he advise us on the possibility of the site being handed over, given over or gifted to the council or some other stakeholder for the future development of Omagh?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member knows that I am conscious of the strategic importance of the St Lucia and Lisanelly sites to the people of Omagh. We are all conscious of the prospect of an education campus on the Lisanelly site at some stage in the future. I said that the St Lucia site partly bordered the Lisanelly site, and the St Lucia site is full of complications by dint of historic agreements made many years ago. The development of the sites is critical, and I understand that there are ongoing discussions with Omagh District Council and the Department for Social Development about how we can take the issue forward.

In the event of there being an educational campus on the Lisanelly site, lands that are under our control at St Lucia could be made available to the education authorities for playing fields for the pupils who will inhabit that site. The issue of historic buildings is a wee bit more complicated, and I expect that the discussions between ourselves, the Department for Social Development and Omagh District Council will continue. It is important that we get a resolution of the situation with St Lucia, because we all understand that, strategically, the sites are of critical importance, not least because of their ability, if they were utilised, to free up other land and other buildings in the area that could be used for the benefit of the local community.

Mr Byrne: Does the Minister accept that, given the uncertainty that pertains to the sites, the sooner the Executive can come to some decisions, the better it will be for the people of Omagh?

Mr M McGuinness: The Department of Education has pushed forward decisively with what it wishes to do with the Lisanelly site. There will be further discussions between the Department and some of the local schools that are interested — and others that may be less interested — in locating to a campus that, I think, would provide a unique sharing arrangement in education. That opportunity should not be missed, and there is a responsibility on everybody in the Omagh area to recognise the reality that the proper development of the Lisanelly site into an education campus would represent a real beacon of how we need to go forward through sharing in education. St Lucia has important land that can be utilised for playing fields for the young people on the shared education campus, but, yes, it is important that we come to an agreement on the historic nature of the buildings, which are protected buildings, and their significance to the town of Omagh, the local council and the Department for Social Development.

Mr Hussey: I want to deal specifically with the walled barracks of St Lucia Barracks. I understand from the Ministry of Defence and the Secretary of State for Defence that negotiations are under way between the Ministry of Defence and the covenant holder to buy out that covenant, and it is the understanding of the Ministry of Defence that the entire walled barracks will be offered to OFMDFM. I ask the deputy First Minister to confirm that, if that is the case, it will come into the control of OFMDFM and will be offered perhaps to Omagh District Council. Those buildings are so significant, and we do not want to see them lost to a private developer.

Mr M McGuinness: I absolutely agree with the Member: the sites are of critical importance to the town of Omagh and are sites that Omagh District Council has a tremendous interest in. I know that there is a commonality of view between the political representatives in the House from the West Tyrone constituency on how the sites will be developed for the benefit of the local community. I certainly want them to be developed for the benefit of the local community and not for the benefit of developers.

Victims' Groups: Funding

5. Mrs Hale asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister when funding for victims groups will be confirmed. (AQO 3403/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: The responsibility for administering victims and survivors funding to groups transferred from the Community Relations Council to the Victims and Survivors Service on 12 November 2012. The Victims and Survivors Service opened the application process for the 2013-15 victims and survivors funding programme for groups on 26 November 2012, and the application process closed on 17 December 2012. The Victims and Survivors Service is in the final stages of completing the assessment of applications from groups for funding from the victim support programme for 2013-15. Once the necessary final pre-contract checks have been completed, the service anticipates that letters of offer will be issued to successful groups from March 2013.

Mrs Hale: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. Does he agree with me that it is vital that long-term funding continues to be in place for those who have been most wronged during the past decade?

Mr M McGuinness: Yes, absolutely. A very clear indication of the commitment of the First Minister, me and the entire Executive to this is the reality that, in the four years between 2011 and 2015, we are spending, through the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund, the Community Relations Council and the Victims and Survivors Service, close to £50 million. We absolutely accept the importance of ensuring that people who have been victims of the conflict are supported. We are also very determined to ensure that the detailed work that the Victims and Survivors Service is involved in, dealing with the individual issues that affect victims, is carried out in a cohesive and professional manner and in a way that is bespoke to their particular difficulties.

Mr McDevitt: Does the deputy First Minister agree that what many victims desperately want and need is a process of true reconciliation and a truth process getting off the ground in our jurisdiction? What conversations are he and the First Minister having —

Mr Speaker: Order. The question is very specific. It is about funding to victims' groups. Let us not widen the question. I will ask the Member to continue, but let us try to get to a supplementary to the original question.

Mr McDevitt: Thank you for your guidance, Mr Speaker, as always. In that case, what conversations are the deputy First Minister and the First minister having with others about funding mechanisms that would support victims and support the wider objective that I addressed in my earlier question?

Mr M McGuinness: The First Minister and I are very conscious of the need to ensure that we support victims who have been affected by the conflict of the past. Built into the funding arrangements that deal with all the complex challenges that people face is a recognition that we have to deal with that aspect of the past. The Member is obviously tempted to ask what the resolution is to the bigger question of how we deal comprehensively with the past. There is no agreement on that. There appears not to be agreement between the British Government and the Irish Government, and there certainly is not agreement in the House. My party has put forward what, we believe, is the best way forward. I am not saying that that is the solution; others have their ideas and, no doubt, will put them forward. Many times, in the course of many interviews in recent years, I have said that one of the big failings of the agreements that have been made — the Good Friday Agreement, the St Andrews Agreement or even the Hillsborough agreement — was the failure to deal with the past. People can come at the past from their individual perspective.

We could also have a situation in which people choose to speak for victims as though they know exactly how each victim or family wants the past to be dealt with. If you go out and talk to victims' groups and to individual families affected by the past, you will find various views. So coming to an agreement that satisfies the vast majority will be very difficult, but we should not baulk at the challenge. There is a job of work to be done and discussions to be had. I hope that, at the end of those discussions, there will be agreement on how we move forward.

Mr Elliott: Will the deputy First Minister give us some outline of the locations throughout Northern Ireland where there are gaps in funding and service provision in the victims' sector? How does he plan to deal with the issues to do with where those gaps are and ensure that nobody loses out because of the location that they live in?

Mr M McGuinness: The Victims and Survivors Service needs to deal with that issue. We would be very disappointed if certain parts of the North felt that they were not being adequately serviced. If the Member wants to contact me about a specific demographic or a specific location that is of concern to him, we can have that discussion and see whether we can resolve whatever difficulty is in the mind of the people who have obviously lobbied the Member on the issue.

Employment and Learning

Further and Higher Education: People with Disabilities

1. Mr Copeland asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what action he is taking to increase further and higher educational opportunities for disabled people. (AQO 3414/11-15)

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): Last September, I was pleased to launch Access to Success, my Department's regional strategy to widen participation in higher education. The strategy has a strong focus on the creation of a more accessible higher education sector, where people who are most able but least likely to participate are given every encouragement and support to apply to, and benefit from, higher education. The strategy identifies those groups that are still under-represented in higher education (HE), including those with disabilities and learning disabilities, and that may require additional support to take full advantage of the educational opportunity.

My Department provides some £3 million through disabled student allowances to help students with the extra costs that they may incur when studying their higher education course. The allowances can help with the cost of specialist equipment, travel and other course-related materials. They also finance one-to-one personal support to disabled students who are on higher education courses at our colleges or universities. The support providers include note-takers, dyslexia coaches and sign language interpreters. The Department also provides premium funding of around a quarter of a million pounds per annum to the higher education institutions in recognition of the additional costs of recruiting and retaining students with learning difficulties and disabilities.

In the further education (FE) sector, my Department provides financial support of £3·5 million per annum to assist regional colleges to discharge their responsibility towards students with learning difficulties and disabilities. That includes £2 million per annum to help to meet the cost of providing tailored, discrete courses for students who are unable to undertake a mainstream course due to the nature or degree of their disability or learning difficulty. The colleges also provide an information and advocacy resource hub, which is accessed through the Colleges Northern Ireland website and the DisabledGo service, that provides potential and existing students with accessibility information about colleges and college campuses.

Mr Copeland: I thank the Minister for a very fulsome answer. Within what time frame is it anticipated that the sums of money that he referred to will be spent? Will that happen within the context of the Programme for Government or the current Budget allocation? Will he outline how he intends to track whether the money that has been allocated is sufficient to meet the needs of this deserving sector?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his interest in this subject, and I assure him that this remains a commitment for me, my Department and the Executive. The Executive have endorsed the widening participation strategy for higher education. The resources come from my Department's existing baselines. The figures that I quoted are spending figures in-year, and I expect that, at the very least, we will seek to maintain them into the future. We will certainly look to increase them where appropriate.

Again, universities are required to have access agreements with the Department that are signed, produced and reviewed every year. That is the means by which we hold the higher education providers to account for their delivery. As to the further education sector, we have ongoing discussions with the colleges, and there is a deep commitment from all the providers to ensure that they are accessible to all sections of the community. That is because, ultimately, we want to ensure that we are developing every talent in society to its maximum potential.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. Given that there is a strong post-19 lobby group looking for greater provision of services for those with learning disabilities, what engagement has the Minister had with Sperrinview Special School, Dungannon and with other such groups in that sector?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for that question. I cannot comment on the very specific engagement that she mentioned, but I am very conscious that post-19 provision is an issue that concerns a wide range of people. I know that there have been discussions in the Health Committee, the Education Committee and the Employment and Learning Committee on that.

We have a range of programmes that address the employability opportunities of young people who perhaps have some learning disabilities or wider disabilities. We are very happy to engage with them. Those types of policy are always under review so that we can make sure that we are getting it right, because I appreciate that it is an area where we need to ensure that we are fully engaging with the young people in question.

Mr P Ramsey: I give the Minister's statement to the House a warm welcome, particularly the £3·5 million to colleges for students with a learning or physical disability. I want to home in on the specific matter of those who are deaf or hard of hearing. What specific programmes or actions are being promoted on widening participation to include those groups?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Ramsey for his ongoing interest in the area. This applies to how we can use the resources available to provide very discreet, one-to-one interventions to assist people with a whole range of different barriers, including those with hearing difficulties. There are services in both the FE and higher education settings where, for example, assistance can be given for taking notes and engaging with lecturers. That one-to-one service is available, and it is hoped that it will address the particular needs of that category of people.

Steps 2 Success

- 2. Mr Byrne asked the Minister for Employment and Learning whether his Department has received any formal representations from companies which are seeking to compete for the Steps 2 Success programme contract. (AQO 3415/11-15)
- 13. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the Steps 2 Success programme. (AQO 3426/11-15)

Dr Farry: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will group questions 2 and 13. I also request an additional minute for the answer.

My Department is currently working on the development of the Steps 2 Success programme, which will replace Steps to Work in 2014. The Steps 2 Success public consultation exercise received over 80 responses from a range of organisations. Respondents raised a number of key issues around the proposed programme objectives, eligibility and content. There was also significant interest in proposals on the contract area and duration of the programme, supply chain management and funding.

The responses have been analysed, and the key design features of the new programme are being finalised. The new programme will demonstrate that the Department has listened to the feedback received from the consultation exercise and will blend some of the successful elements of Steps to Work with the best of what is being delivered elsewhere. The Department believes that that will bring forward a programme specifically designed for Northern Ireland that will serve all unemployed clients well.

As the Department has not yet finalised the design of Steps 2 Success, it is not able to receive formal representations from companies seeking to compete for Steps 2 Success contracts. Officials have met, at their request, a number of organisations that are actively considering whether they will bid to deliver Steps 2 Success, either as a lead contractor or as a subcontractor in the supply chain. Their purpose has been to update on progress made in developing the programme. No information has been given to organisations at those meetings that is not already in the public domain. Officials have also ensured that organisations delivering other departmental provision have been kept up to date about Steps 2 Success.

Steps to Work currently delivers a quality service that helps people in Northern Ireland move into work. Steps 2 Success is being developed to build on that service and to ensure that we continue to offer unemployed people a range of supports to help them find and keep a job. Details of the programme will be published shortly, and that will be followed by a two-stage procurement process under the guidance of the Central Procurement Directorate (CPD) in the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP). It is anticipated that that will be completed by November 2013, with the programme starting in 2014. Details of the procurement process will be formally publicised on the CPD website.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. Will he state when the tendering process is likely to happen? Will it be a single contract for all Northern Ireland or will there be regional variations to make sure that we have the right quality-assurance scheme? It is crucial that we have a qualitative training scheme for the unemployed.

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Byrne for his question. We are finalising the design of the programme, and we will be seeking to go out to procurement within the next couple of months. On the Member's specific question around contract areas, he will be aware that the original consultation highlighted the potential for Northern Ireland to be one contract area. However, members of the Committee will be aware that the current thinking is around the potential for three contract areas across Northern Ireland. The final decisions have not yet been taken, but it is more than likely that that will be the future design. We will come back to the House to confirm that as soon as we have taken those final decisions.

Mr Campbell: Will the Minister confirm that, when it is up and running, the principles behind Steps 2 Success will be adopted in many of the programmes that are currently in constituencies so that young people, particularly those who are not in education, employment or training (NEET), are made aware of the training that is available to try to get them into work?

Dr Farry: It is important to understand that Steps 2 Success will be our main return-to-work programme, and it will apply to all age groups. Beyond that, we have a number of specific interventions that address the needs of young people primarily, but Step Ahead 50+ is also there to address slightly older members of the workforce who have not had the opportunities for jobs recently.

The provisions that we have through the youth employment scheme and some of the NEETs projects will offer more intensive work for people who find themselves in those difficult situations than would be available through the more general mainstream provisions. Even with that, we are moving ahead with Steps 2 Success to try to achieve a more individually tailored approach that meets the needs of individual clients a lot better. More flexibility will be given to the contractors and subcontractors in that regard.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In answers to questions in the Committee, we were told that up to £5 million might be top-sliced from the £40 million being allocated to the Steps 2 Success programme just to cover administration by whichever three contractors are successful. What will the Minister do to ensure that the overwhelming majority of any funds allocated for the scheme will go directly into putting schemes in place and will not be there for administrators that come in, maybe from Britain, to administer the scheme, which they will simply top-slice off?

Dr Farry: I understand the concerns that the Member has raised. First, it is important to say that, at this stage, we cannot assume the nature of any successful, or otherwise, bidders for these contracts. I will assure him in this regard: I stress that the scheme is not designed as a cost-saving exercise. That is not in my mind, and it is not in the mind of the officials in the Department. This is about ensuring that we do the best that we can to design a work programme that will assist people who are unemployed, particularly those who are long-term unemployed, into work. The scheme will be judged on how successful we are in respect of those types of outcomes.

We are seeking to learn the best lessons of what happens in other jurisdictions in that regard and to avoid the bad lessons that are already apparent from those types of projects in other areas. Obviously, there will be some overhead costs involved for the companies that will be involved in all this, but, given that we are going out for procurement, there is a clear aim to achieve best value and to ensure that the system for delivering the services is as lean as we possibly can get it and that we are maximising the impact of our scarce resources on the front line

Mr Speaker: Caitríona Ruane is not in her place for question 3. Chris Lyttle is not in his place for question 4, and Patsy McGlone is not in his place for question 5.

Programme-led Apprenticeships

6. Mr Newton asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how he plans to address the lack of work placement opportunities available to people enrolled in the programme-led apprenticeship scheme. (AQO 3419/11-15)

Dr Farry: I congratulate Mr Newton on his diligence in being here. Programme-led apprenticeships were introduced in September 2009 as an intervention measure during the current economic downturn. The Department recognised that, in the current economic climate, it was unlikely that young people wishing to be apprentices would secure employment at the outset.

The programme aims to ensure that young people assessed as capable of achieving an apprenticeship qualification at level 2, but who have not yet secured employment, are prepared for future progression to employment as an apprentice. The benefit of the programme is that participants follow the same apprenticeship framework as those following the employer-led ApprenticeshipsNI provision so that they have developed good underpinning skills before they gain employment.

I am aware that some training providers are finding it difficult to source the requisite work placements for participants on the programme-led apprenticeship programme. My Department has urged the providers of training to continue their efforts in search of placements, but that is particularly difficult in the current economic climate. They are encouraged to contact public sector bodies operating in their locality, such as health and social services trusts and district councils, to explore further placement opportunities. In the current offering, I must stress that the ApprenticeshipsNI programme, which is employer led, must always be the preferred option. It requires the continued support of employers, and I encourage them to reconsider the value of apprenticeships and the benefits that they can bring to their businesses.

3.15 pm

On Monday 11 February, I made a statement to the Assembly outlining my intention to undertake a major review of policy on apprenticeships and youth training. The review will explore how we can engage more with employers on the training curriculum and improve young people's employability skills through measures such as work placements.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for his answer so far, but I did ask specifically what he would do to achieve placements. Will the Minister agree that this programmeled apprenticeship scheme was introduced as an interim measure, and that to continue with the same approach does a disservice to young people, employers and the overall economy?

Dr Farry: I fully understand the Member's comments, and I want just to address two or three aspects. First, we are working with the public sector to try to maximise the number of placements. Secondly, in my main answer I stressed that I regard this as being a temporary intervention that was made by my predecessor in the context of economic downturn and a lack of opportunities for employers. Our current policy is to regard the mainstream ApprenticeshipsNI programme, which deals directly with employers, as being the preferred route because it is much better for a young person to be learning on a job than learning purely in a college or training provider setting with, perhaps, the prospect of a placement.

I appreciate the Member's ongoing interest in the topic of apprenticeships, and he is fully aware that we launched a review last week. It is my intention that that review will be comprehensive and cover the future of programme-led apprenticeships. I want to ensure that we have a model that works best for young people, giving them the maximum opportunities, and also works for employers as well.

Mr B McCrea: Minister, will you tell us, though, exactly how successful or unsuccessful programme-led apprenticeships have actually been? I heard it reported that only 30% on such schemes actually get some employment. What steps are your Department taking to try to improve such schemes?

Dr Farry: I thank the Chair of the Committee for his question and his interest in this topic. Obviously, programme-led apprenticeships have been a challenge, and in my answer to Mr Newton I indicated that they were far from ideal in terms of the type of intervention that we are making.

Presently about 5,000 people are participating in programme-led apprenticeships, compared with about 11,000 in ApprenticeshipsNI. Almost half as many are in the programme-led apprenticeship scheme. I would prefer that that entire provision could be catered for in terms of the workplace. When someone is training as an apprentice through the mainstream scheme, they are an employee and have a job that they are currently undertaking. Only about 60% of those in programme-led apprenticeships have a placement; about 40% do not. That is clearly a matter of concern, and we need the support of employers to maximise that. In that regard, we are encouraging the public sector to consider what it can do to assist.

Mr Elliott: Following on from those questions about the programme-led apprenticeships scheme being an interim measure, what exploration has there been with the private sector to establish an industry-led scheme that would replace that scheme?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Elliott for his comments. He will appreciate that we are involved in an advertisement campaign around the ApprenticeshipsNI scheme. Although we are reviewing all our apprenticeship programmes, as of now we are seeking to maximise the uptake of the current offering.

Last year, the 'Belfast Telegraph' ran a successful campaign to highlight the benefit of apprenticeships in Northern Ireland. Ultimately, however, we can only work in the context of employers coming forward and offering opportunities, and young people being prepared to take them. So, it is important that we continue to encourage both those groups to come forward for something that is to their mutual benefit and the success of the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers. Has the Minister read the Hansard report of the presentation by NIE as part of a CBI delegation to the Committee for Employment and Learning a couple of weeks ago, when serious concerns were raised about the apprenticeships that it applied for?

Mr Speaker: I encourage the Member to come to a question.

Mr F McCann: That is the question. I am asking what can be done to ensure that that is dealt with.

Dr Farry: I am certainly very much aware of the discussions, and the presentation that was given by the CBI to the Committee. I make it a habit to study the Minutes of Evidence from the Committee. Beyond that, I have had direct discussions with NIE itself, which has recounted to me its experiences with this. Those discussions reinforced the need for us to encourage more and more young people to consider going down the apprenticeship route and the need to work to ensure that our young people at pre-apprenticeship level have the employability skills, essential skills and motivation to take on an apprenticeship. I commend the very positive leadership that NIE continues to present through its engagement in the training of young people.

Youth Unemployment

7. Ms Fearon asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the programmes currently in operation to assist people to get into education, employment or training. (AQO 3420/11-15)

Dr Farry: My Department provides a range of programmes to help unemployed young people get into education, employment and training. I will outline the main programmes in operation and the new initiatives specifically designed to reduce youth unemployment. Those are in addition to my Department's main Steps to Work programme, which is designed to improve people's employment prospects and help people into work.

The Training for Success programme offers a guarantee of a training place to all unemployed 16- to 17-year-olds to enable them to develop occupational, employability and essential skills. The youth employment scheme offers unemployed 18- to 24-year-olds work experience placements and the chance to develop job-specific skills. An employer subsidy of £5,000 is available in key growth sectors.

Under the Steps to Work programme, the first start initiative offers waged opportunities for 18- to 24-year-olds. In addition, my Department's disability employment service provides programmes to help young people with disabilities progress towards and move into employment; programmes such as Workable (NI), Access to Work, Work Connect and the job introduction scheme.

Building on those programmes, my Department has introduced a number of new initiatives under the Executive's Pathways to Success, the NEETs strategy, specifically for unemployed young people. Those new initiatives include the collaboration and innovation fund, which provides support to help disadvantaged 16- to 24-year-olds improve their employability through the acquisition of economically relevant skills; the community family support pilot programme, which helps the most disadvantaged families in targeted areas by supporting parents and helping all family members to re-engage with education, employment or training; and the community-based access programme, which will enable 16- to 18-year-olds to increase their essential skills qualifications and progress into further education or government-funded training.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that, due to the wide range of schemes available, it is a complicated area to get advice on? Would he consider setting up a onestop shop for advice to enable easier access for NEETs?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. I entirely understand the point that she is making. One key aspect in the NEETs strategy is the focus on the one-to-one mentoring of the young people in question. The Careers Service is very keen to take that forward. We fully appreciate that, to really make a difference to young people, particularly those who are facing real barriers, one-to-one interaction will be required; as, indeed, will signposting, which can be provided, to make sure that they are aware of and can access the most appropriate schemes available.

Mr Storey: Does the Minister not believe that the initiatives he listed in response to the original question are working in a policy vacuum, given the fact that the Education Minister has refused to ensure that there is a policy for 14- to 19-year-olds? Will he tell the House what interaction or joined-up approach there is between his Department and the Department of Education to ensure that there is an overall provision to the benefit of young people and not the benefit of silo Departments, as clearly seems to be the way of doing business at the moment?

Dr Farry: There is no policy vacuum. The overall NEETs strategy has been endorsed by the Executive and is an interdepartmental strategy. That includes the Department of Education. In particular, one of the things that we are keen to develop in partnership with that Department is a tracking system for young people throughout the system. At present, it tends to break off when transfers are being made between different stages.

I fully appreciate the importance of a 14-19 strategy and that we need clear funding of an entitlement framework as a subsection of that. I further appreciate that the Salisbury review has made a number of recommendations in that regard. I am also aware that the Member has a motion down for debate in the very near future. My officials and

I continue to engage with the Department of Education around those issues, and I know that the Minister of Education is keen to ensure that, collectively, we deliver the best for the young people of Northern Ireland.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. What mechanisms does the Minister have to assess the success of the wide variety of schemes that he has outlined here today, to show that they are working in getting young people into long-term employment?

Dr Farry: The Member is correct to say that we need to ensure that we are delivering in all of the schemes that we have out there. The main means by which we will do that is by having a clear understanding of the baselines that we start with and tracking the progress in that regard.

We want to see a decrease in the number of people who are falling into the NEET category and in the number who fall into youth unemployment. You will also be aware that the Executive have tasked my Department, alongside the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI), with producing a strategy on economic inactivity. Again, we will want to see changes happening with regard to the number of people who fall into those categories. Indeed, we will be bringing a paper to our various Committees and to the Floor of the Assembly in that regard in the very near future.

Engineering: Skills Shortages

8. Mr Durkan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what his Department is doing to ensure a joined-up approach to addressing skills shortages in the engineering sector. (AQO 3421/11-15)

Dr Farry: To address skills shortages in the engineering sector, I chair the advanced manufacturing and engineering services working group. That working group consists of employers from the sector and representatives from the further education colleges, universities, employer bodies and other Departments. It aims to agree a coordinated approach to the skills needs of the sector and to put in place relevant interventions in the three areas of skills provision, sector attractiveness, and co-ordination and communication.

To gain a better understanding of the skills demand in the sector, my Department has commissioned research to ascertain the likely skills shortages there will be over the next three years. The research will assess the skills profile of the sector, carry out a salary survey and highlight any skills imbalances that currently exist or are forecast to exist. It will include statistical modelling work, which will examine the demand for skills under a range of scenarios over the short, medium and longer term. That key piece of work is expected to be finalised in summer 2013 and will inform the further population of the action plan for agreement by the group.

In the meantime, a number of actions are already being taken forward. Work with employers and colleges is under way to explore the introduction of relevant short-term specialist engineering conversion courses and an aerospace academy. Discussions are also well advanced about the establishment of a higher level apprenticeship in engineering, and I expect that those will be concluded shortly. Recently, I made a statement to the Assembly outlining my intention to undertake a major review of apprenticeships and youth training. That review will conclude in autumn 2013. All of that work supports the wider aims of the Executive's science, technology, engineering and mathematics (STEM) strategy, which identifies actions to encourage more people to study those subjects, including engineering.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answer. Can the Minister give a little bit more detail on what discussions he has had with engineering companies over the past six months on how we can ensure a more joined-up approach going forward?

Dr Farry: Again, I thank the Member for his interest in this topic. The establishment of the working group was very much informed by concerns that were being brought to me directly by engineering companies and, indirectly, via a number of Members. The skills adviser for Northern Ireland, Bill McGinnis, did a scoping exercise in discussion with a number of companies from the sector. We also had a stakeholder forum event in the Stormont Hotel, last June, at which a number of issues were aired. Finally, a number of employers sit on the working group and are involved directly in the discussions that we have. We also have representative bodies from business, which reflect the views of their individual members.

3.30 pm

Mr Speaker: Order. That concludes Question Time. Before we move on to the next item of business, I want to point out that quite a number of Members were not in their places for Question Time. I know of no other elected institution where that would be tolerated. I expect Members who were not in their places this afternoon to, at their first opportunity, come to the House, give a reason and apologise to this House. I assure Members who, for whatever reason, feel that they cannot do so that I will deal with the matter properly and procedurally. It cannot go on that Members just do not turn up and do not give a reason. Certainly, if it continues, I will deal with it. From here on, I expect Members to come to the House, give a reason and apologise to this House. Let us move on.

Committee Business

Sustainable Energy

Mr Speaker: The next item of business is a motion from the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Thank you, Mr Speaker. I apologise that I was not in my place earlier. I had been in the Chamber, but I left to attend a social function with the intention of being back on time. Unfortunately, however, two other Members were not in their places during that time. My profuse apologies to you for that.

Mr Speaker: You were in the Chamber, out of the Chamber, and then I noticed you in the Public Gallery, so I know that it was not deliberate. I think that I need to say that. We will keep a watching brief on Members who do not come to the House to apologise or give a reason, and we will deal with them. The Member may continue.

Mr McGlone: I thank you for your understanding, Mr Speaker, and, obviously, your observation.

I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Executive to encourage and support further growth in the sustainable energy sector to help maximise government's contribution to creating sustainable, high-value jobs in the renewable energy sector, developing the green economy, enhancing security of supply and encouraging consumers to use renewable energy.

In February 2011, the previous Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment reported on its inquiry into the barriers to developing renewable energy. The Department has provided regular and timely updates to the current Committee on progress with the implementation of recommendations from that inquiry. Indeed, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) and other Departments are to be commended on their efforts to implement many of the recommendations for which they have lead responsibility, such as the inclusion of interim targets for renewable electricity and renewable heat in the strategic energy framework; representatives from business, academia and the renewable energy sector now being included on key subgroups for renewable heat, grid development and planning; DETI's working with the financial sector to educate and provide awareness of the long-term security of renewable energy incentivisation; the development and implementation of a renewable heat incentive; new building regulations being introduced by the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) to improve the thermal performance of buildings; efforts by the Utility Regulator to improve the transparency of costs for renewable energy grid connections; and steps by the Department of the Environment (DOE) to improve consistency in planning consents and increase permitted development rights for renewable energy installations in the domestic, business and agricultural sectors.

However, a number of the inquiry's recommendations that were either accepted or partially accepted have not yet been implemented. The disparate nature of energy vires may have contributed to that to some extent.

The fact that there are so many Departments with responsibility for energy matters was identified in the inquiry as a contributory factor to preventing the efficient and effective roll-out of renewable energy opportunities by the Executive. The Committee supported the call in the Barnett review of economic policy for the Executive to provide clear focus and leadership to the range of energy policy issues as a separate and distinct government priority. Although the Department informed the Committee over a year ago that the consolidation of energy functions should be revisited at some time in the future, the Committee still awaits the outcomes of a cost-benefit analysis that the sustainable energy interdepartmental working group (SEIDWG) considered in November.

At the core of any long-term strategy there must be a long-term vision. The inquiry recommended the development of a long-term vision for renewable energy to 2050 and beyond. The Department accepted that, and, as agreed with the Committee, the Department established a sustainable energy action plan, which the Executive approved in April last year. However, today, more than two years after the renewable energy inquiry report, that long-term vision has yet to be developed. Indeed, the Department only recently appointed external consultants to carry out a study with a view to establishing that long-term vision.

To inform the establishment of a vision, a series of stakeholder events will be held next week that will contribute to a report later in the spring. The Minister may be in a position now to provide more detail to the House on how and when a long-term vision for renewable energy will be established.

The need to make certain renewable technologies mandatory was an inquiry recommendation that DFP accepted. In June 2011, DFP informed the Committee that, from 2013 onwards, it was likely that some form of renewable energy would be necessary to meet the proposed building regulation requirements. However, having considered its latest update in November, it seems that DFP has done nothing beyond putting in place new building regulations to improve the thermal performance of buildings.

The Committee recommended that the Executive take forward the green new deal. However, in May 2012, DFP decided instead to opt for a boiler replacement scheme. Although such a scheme is to be welcomed, it will benefit consumers by having their boilers replaced by existing engineers using boilers that are manufactured outside Northern Ireland. If we are to grow our green economy, we need to provide further incentives for domestic energy-saving technologies and renewable technologies that provide opportunities to generate new jobs and new business opportunities in green manufacturing, construction, installation, servicing and maintenance.

Of course, the renewable heat incentive will contribute to that when phase two is launched later this year. However, that needs to be coupled with incentives for energy efficiency to ensure that we increase the use of renewable sources of energy in an environment where overall energy usage is falling because of efficiency measures. It is only in that way that renewable energy can really start to contribute significantly to security of supply.

The inquiry called on the Executive to bring forward a programme to develop the renewable energy potential of public buildings. The Committee was informed by DETI and the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) in June 2011 that regulations exist that put a duty on responsible authorities to take appropriate steps to ensure that a public building that was constructed after 31 December 2011 or that has undergone major renovation after that date fulfils an exemplary role in the context of the renewable energy directive. Although it is unclear what exactly that means, I am personally aware of a number of new or recently renovated public buildings where renewable energy technologies simply have not been availed of. That also came up recently at a meeting that I attended with key sectors in the industry. If the public sector is not encouraging the use of renewable energy, how can the Executive encourage others to do so? That is a key point.

Since the previous Committee's inquiry, the Department has done a lot of good work to implement many of the recommendations. I thank and commend the Minister for that. However, a number of the key recommendations that were accepted have not yet been implemented. It should be said, however, that DETI does not have lead responsibility for most of them. They can be summarised as follows: consolidating responsibility for energy vires; developing a long-term vision for renewable energy; making certain renewable technologies mandatory for new buildings; incentivising domestic renewable energy and energy efficiencies to create high-value jobs and business opportunities; and leading by example by ensuring that, for public buildings, every opportunity is taken to avail of renewable technologies.

Those are the very recommendations that can contribute most to creating sustainable, high-value jobs in the renewable sector, developing the green economy and encouraging consumers to use renewable energies with the environment at its core.

The Executive must lead by example. We have an excellent opportunity to exploit the many opportunities presented by the development of renewable energy technologies. The Committee wants to encourage continued growth in the sector. The Carbon Trust's estimates are very encouraging. It estimates that, by 2020, between 8,000 and 33,000 more jobs could be created from renewable energy. The future actions taken by the Executive will have a significant influence on whether the actual figure is closer to 8,000 or 33,000. The future of many of our people depends on that.

If the upper estimate for jobs is to be realised, the Executive must fully consider the Department for Employment and Learning's (DEL) report on skills requirements in the renewables sector. The report estimates that up to 5,880 more skilled people will be needed by 2015 to integrate renewable technologies and energy efficiency measures into existing buildings; for offshore wind and tidal installations; for bioenergy technologies; and for energy storage. That report was published in 2011. To what extent have the Executive taken on the report's findings? Has enough been done to date to ensure that the skills are in place as they are needed?

The last thing that we need is for businesses to consider locating elsewhere because we did not act to address a skills gap that has clearly been identified.

At its meeting last week, the Committee considered the statement from the Minister for Employment and Learning on his review of apprenticeships and youth training. The Minister highlighted the need to match skills to the needs of employers. The great potential for employment in the renewable energy and energy efficiency sectors will be realised only if we have in place the appropriate skills at the appropriate time, and matched to the needs of employers and potential employers in the renewable sector.

It is essential that there be a much more integrated approach in the Executive to renewable energy to create the right conditions in which to develop the renewable energy business and the employment opportunities that undoubtedly exist. There is also potential to develop our green economy —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has almost gone.

Mr McGlone: — through the opportunities that exist for supporting innovation, research and development, and the export of renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies for the benefit of the economy.

Mr Newton: I welcome the motion. When it was first drafted, the word "further" did not appear in the first line. That is a small but important point, because we need to recognise the work and growth that has been happening in the area. The inclusion of "further" was critical. I say that because we need to recognise that the Minister has already done some good work. I note that the Committee Chairman paid tribute to her for that. That work has taken place in a holistic way that has seen a range of renewable technology initiatives taking place. The strategic energy framework (SEF) has been put in place. Invest Northern Ireland identified wind, marine, bioenergy and resource efficiency as areas in which there could be major growth.

I will mention three specific areas: the first is the skills base that is necessary in the area, which the Chairman mentioned; the second is communications; and the third is the potential incentives, if I get that far.

In August 2011, the Department for Employment and Learning published a study that sought to determine the skills required to support the potential economic growth in the Northern Ireland sustainable sector. It should be noted that, despite the fact that the study concentrated on only a small number of sub-sectors, the report identified a number of major concerns. Those included a decline in the number of people pursuing high-level mechanical and electrical courses. That is an area on which the House has concentrated its energies before. There is a need for multidisciplinary, skilled workers to meet the crossover of disciplines at all levels. For example, there is a need for ICT and engineering skills crossover in the development of the smart grid. There is the possibility that current public sector funding constraints will make additional public intervention and funding courses difficult, hence the need for the Employment and Learning Minister to perhaps concentrate his energies on making bids, where he can, for additional money.

3.45 pm

An issue that gives me and I am sure many others cause for concern is that any large incoming company will likely have to source many of its initial requirements from outside Northern Ireland. That says that the skills base in this area is not here and, if we secure inward investment, those jobs are likely to go to people from outside Northern Ireland. The most promising route to address that appears to be to provide a healthy supply of labour market entrants with STEM subject qualifications in science, technology, engineering and maths. That is an important piece of work that must be done to underpin and take forward a renewables strategy. It cannot be down to only one Minister to deliver on this; it is a cross-sectoral issue, and is of particular importance for DEL.

Many organisations provide information, advice and support about renewable energy, and communication by government is obviously critical: communication between government and the public, between government and the business sector, and within government. We must have that cross-sectoral approach, which the Chairman spoke about. I know that the Minister will want to ensure that communications are effective and that that area will be addressed. However, communication is two-way. The public need to seek the information as much as government must provide it, and the business sector also has to communicate with government. If it is not a two-way thing, and there is a breakdown, we just are not going to get there.

It is imperative to communicate with and educate the public. An enhanced programme for how we do that must be considered. However it is achieved, there is a need to continue to communicate consistently and effectively —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Newton: — across all Departments and with the public and the business sector.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I speak as a member of the ETI Committee in support of the motion. We have to start from the premise that people at home and in businesses are struggling daily with the cost of energy. In 2008, electricity customers in the North of Ireland endured a 53% increase in the price of electricity. In a recent evidence session, the Consumer Council highlighted how home heating oil has increased in price by 63% over the past three years. Therefore, as has been accepted, the energy strategy must move away from its dependence on fossil fuels towards much more of our energy coming from renewable sources.

The strategic energy framework confirmed new renewable energy targets, which have been referred to, of achieving 40% renewable electricity and 10% renewable heat by 2020. Are we doing enough to meet those targets and to promote further growth? The low-carbon and environmental sectors saw a 2·8% increase in employment between 2009-2010 and 2010-11. The Carbon Trust estimates that renewable energy could create between 8,470 and 33,124 jobs by 2020. Those targets will, of course, depend on the aggressiveness of companies in exploiting the supply chain opportunities that are likely to emerge from the growth in renewables.

I join others in highlighting the skills required by that sector. The 2010 DEL report suggested that an additional 3,327 skilled persons would be required between 2011 and 2015; that the six regional colleges are considered a key element in meeting that vocational need; and that the main training need would be a reskilling away from traditional trades, for which some colleges have already developed a range of courses. But do all of our regional colleges have a clear vision and a strategy for the development of the renewable energy sector?

Energy storage — and, more specifically, the development of a smart grid — is seen as one area where graduate-level skills are needed. NIE points out that it finds it difficult to recruit power engineers and will face greater recruitment problems over the next few years due to an ageing workforce. The main response here, in my view, will come through a STEM initiative. Although much work has been done on renewable energy, it has been done in the absence of an overall vision for renewable energy. The main document outlining Government policy is the strategic energy framework. That extends to 2020, but does not contain interim targets or milestones, apart from for the level of electricity consumed to be from renewable sources by 2020.

Although there is a move — and I welcome it — from DETI to increase incentives for renewable energy, in some cases there is a sense from potential developers that those incentives may improve in the future. Therefore, some developers are not convinced that now is the time to invest. Opportunities were clearly missed to take advantage of funding for research and development under European framework programme 7.

There are major disparities North and South. The North, across that programme, drew down in the region of €30 million, and in the Twenty-six Counties the figure was just under €500 million. It is therefore vital that more is done to support the sector, under both the new Horizon 2020 framework and any other funding opportunities that are available. The Green New Deal Group estimated that additional investment for a green recovery package could be in the region of £900 million, and also pointed out the housing fund, which is designed to enable the energy retrofit of 500,000 homes over a 10-year period.

In conclusion, it remains the case that very few public buildings are using renewable sources and that 42% of our households are in fuel poverty. It is therefore vital that more is done to support a clear vision and an action plan to support further growth in the sustainable energy sector. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Overend: I rise to speak in favour of the motion. Supporting growth in the sustainable energy sector is important for a number of reasons already mentioned today, including jobs, the environment and security of supply. The motion refers to that. It is a motion that the Committee felt was relevant to bring for debate in the House, given the work undertaken over previous years in a number of areas.

I will begin by highlighting some of the recent good news stories in the renewable energy sector. I think specifically of the SeaGen tidal turbine installed in Strangford lough, which is a world leader in that field. As well as that, we have seen a £50 million investment by Belfast harbour to develop a new terminal for the assembly of offshore wind turbines, which will be utilised by DONG Energy for its future Irish Sea operations. Another example is the ongoing work off the north Antrim coast, where licences were granted in October last year for three renewable energy projects. Those are all positive examples of what can be achieved in Northern Ireland with the right focus and investment.

A renewable energy inquiry was taken forward in 2010 by the previous ETI Committee. A number of recommendations were brought forward at the conclusion of that inquiry and published on 27 January 2011. The recommendations covered a vast range of areas, including government vision, strategy and policy, communications, development of technology for renewable energy, support for business, grid infrastructure and connection, and planning and consents. The Committee has received regular updates on the implementation of those recommendations, most recently on 17 December 2012, when the Chair received a letter from the head of DETI's energy division.

We are now aware that, while work has been ongoing in relation to a number of the recommendations, such as the electricity market reform (EMR) seminar held in June 2012 and the decision to launch the boiler replacement scheme in December, there is still work to do. For example, analysis to evaluate the structure of small-scale feed-in tariff (FIT) levels and associated small-scale ROC branding levels for the period prior to the FIT being introduced is due to be completed by March. Perhaps the Minister could update the House on the progress of that work.

As well as that, the long-term vision for energy in Northern Ireland to 2050 is still being worked on. The Committee was informed that consultants are being used to aid this project. Again, I ask the Minister to clarify where that process is at and when we should expect to finalise the long-term vision that is so vital to this sector.

Given the high levels of unemployment in Northern Ireland, which have been consistently around 8% as well as being the UK average for some time, it is more important than ever that jobs are maximised in every sector of our economy. The green economy is no different in that respect.

A briefing provided by the Assembly's Research and Information Service has considered this issue in detail and has found that a number of gaps in provision exist in the green sector. According to this information, we need to look specifically at jobs in process, plant and machine operations as well as skilled trades occupations. I ask the Minister to outline how she is currently monitoring these clear gaps in provision.

Education needs to be considered as well. The Minister should also be looking at what training and qualifications are necessary to fill the evident gaps. A joined-up approach is clearly needed, and that is why the Ulster Unionist Party wanted to establish a Department of the economy as soon as possible in line with the recommendations of the independent review of economic policy to tie in the functions of DETI and DEL.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

The motion specifically mentions the security of supply of renewable energy. That leads on to considering the likelihood of meeting our renewable energy targets. The current target is to provide 40% of electricity demand from renewable sources by 2020, but we all know that that is very unlikely to happen.

The 2011-15 Programme for Government also includes encouraging the achievement of 20% of electricity from renewable sources and 4% of renewable heat by 2015. It is essential that we continue to strive to meet these targets as far as possible. I am sure that the Minister will update us on that today.

Mr Lunn: Not for the first time, I find myself speaking on a Committee motion even though I am not on the relevant Committee.

Mr A Maginness: You are very versatile.

Mr Lunn: Aye, I know. Be that as it may, the motion speaks for itself, and I have no doubt that it will have overwhelming support. I will speak briefly on the economic potential, after which I will put on record some Alliance Party proposals on the wider context.

The motion refers to government's contribution to creating sustainable jobs, but government should recognise the potential for others to create jobs. Governments do not create sustainable jobs but they can create the conditions for others to do so.

We have been moderately successful in this sector in Northern Ireland. There are over 30,000 jobs in the low carbon and environmental sector, which represents a marginally larger total proportionately than in the rest of the UK. That total is growing, despite the prevailing financial conditions. I appreciate that estimates are only that, but even at the lower end of the spectrum, it is possible to see that number doubling over the next decade.

I agree with much of the findings of what I believe was the previous Committee's inquiry into barriers to the development of renewable energy production when it comes to the current lack of targets, which Mrs Overend mentioned. I do not want to set everything up as a tick-box exercise, but we need some means of measuring success or otherwise as we go forward.

I am also amazed at the wide range of agencies that are involved. You have to wonder whether these could be brought together in some way, but whatever the outcome of all that, the key is to have targets for jobs; that is the number one priority. There is, of course, a wider context, particularly with regard to the benefit to consumers. I note that almost £7 million overall is now available each year for home insulation, which is a good start.

The Alliance Party has proposed a renewable energy support Bill. We would include in that the introduction of renewable heat incentives, provision for permitted development for domestic and non-domestic renewable installations and the creation of a framework for the installation of smart meters in every home for microgeneration, which, I understand, would cost roughly £30 million over five years with a potential return of more than that annually. We also support the introduction of a framework for the development of geothermal energy.

We would also like to look at a programme of low-interest loans to the agrifood industry to produce and market environmentally friendly food products. That seems popular at the present time.

4.00 pm

We should not underestimate our green image as a useful marketing tool when it comes to promoting Northern Ireland as a green economy hub. However, we have to back that up with a range of environmental initiatives, not just the direct work on renewable energy. We need to be more environmentally friendly in both our economic and health interests. Initiatives such as the rapid transit scheme, which looks as if it will finally go ahead, will be a welcome development. The creation of additional woodland would also be welcome, as we are sadly lacking in that. That would go along way towards assisting moves towards more renewable energy provision.

This is not a criticism of the Minister — in fact, Mr McGlone complimented her when proposing the motion — but this is the sixth time in three years that we have discussed something along these lines in the House. We have had debates on the warm homes scheme in January 2010, the strategic energy framework in November 2010, the green new deal in October 2010, the green economy in September 2012 and the energy strategy in November 2012. Perhaps, in her reply, the Minister could point to some positive outcomes from all those debates. Mr Wells made the same point in the health debate earlier; namely that we talk about and around these things, but it is sometimes hard. Everybody agrees, but there does not seem to be a positive way forward. I look forward to hearing from the Minister in due course.

Mr Moutray: I rise as a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment to speak in support of the Committee's motion. The motion, which I hope will gain widespread support across the House, considers several potential benefits that would flow from the further growth of the sustainable energy sector. Sustainable energy has been defined as energy that has minimal negative impacts on human health and healthy functioning of ecological systems and that can be supplied continuously to future generations. That is a technical definition, but it emphasises the importance of sustainable energy.

The public debate on energy has taken centre stage in recent years. Our dependence on oil and gas is simply not sustainable. We owe it to generations yet to come to make sure that we grasp the nettle, develop alternative energy resources and set clear strategies, objectives and targets. Therefore, today's debate is important as it encourages us to go the second mile.

The Committee's interest in these matters reflects the Executive's interest and approach. The Executive have the strategic aim of a more sustainable energy system in which energy is used as efficiently as possible, much more of our energy comes from renewable resources and energy efficiency is maximised. The Executive's strategic energy framework looks ahead to 2020 and includes the key goals of building competitive markets, ensuring security of supply, enhancing sustainability and developing our energy infrastructure.

In the limited time that I have, I want to address one of the key areas outlined in the motion: the creation of high-value jobs. As our traditional manufacturing base continues to decline and unemployment, especially among our young people, continues to blight our society, it is vital that we do all that we can to exploit all alternative means of job creation. To do that, we must focus on potential growth areas, of which the renewable energy sector is a prime example. Various investigations into the job creation potential of the sustainable energy industry have confirmed, with some variations depending on the criteria applied, that a significant number of people could find meaningful and secure employment in this field over the next decade. I think, for example, of the opportunities presented by developments in marine energy, including wave, tidal and offshore wind. If we are to avail ourselves of such opportunities, at least two things must happen: Northern Ireland companies must exploit the opportunities arising from growth in the sector in the United Kingdom and Europe, and we must ensure that we have a strong skills base. Indeed, those things are two sides of one coin. With our manufacturing heritage and mindset, we could and should lead the way.

It is important that DETI, which takes the lead on energy issues, continue to work as closely as possible with other Departments. I know that that is already happening through the sustainable energy interdepartmental working group, which is chaired by my colleague Arlene Foster. I pay tribute to the Minister, who has shown commendable vision and determination in the development of sustainable energy, to the extent that Northern Ireland is setting an example for others to follow. A key Department represented on the interdepartmental group is the Department for Employment and Learning.

The need for a joined-up approach between educational qualifications, skill development and job creation has been mentioned by others in recent debates in the House, and I want to re-emphasise the point. Relevant courses of study, such as STEM subjects, and academic research and development can all contribute towards a skill base that will supply the industry with suitable employees, who will be able to avail themselves of high-value, well-paid and secure work. We need also to ensure that our IT institutions provide us with those who have the required skills in project management and leadership. Success in those areas will, in turn, encourage further growth in the sustainable energy sector. That can only be good for business and for our communities.

Mr Frew: I support the motion. This is a very important motion to the Chamber, and it is on a subject that we have talked about on countless occasions, as has already been said. Nonetheless, it is a very important issue and one that we have to keep our focus on.

I have heard comments commending the Minister on the work that she has done in this regard. I echo those sentiments and congratulate her on that work. That work is evident when you look at the work being done in the tidal sector of renewable energy. It gives me great pleasure to see that even off the shores of my constituency, North Antrim, there are ventures being put in place for tidal renewable energy. I will meet Tidal Ventures on Friday 15 March to discuss that very issue and see how we can add to an already flourishing renewable energy market.

That brings me to my point: if one message gets out of the House tonight, it should be that we cannot do this on wind alone, and we cannot survive on renewables alone. If you ask businesses, they will tell you that security of supply and cheap energy are the most important things to them. I am not yet convinced that renewable energy on its own will bring any price dividend to our businesses and industry. There has to be a mix, and there have to be choices for our industry. That is the most important thing that should come out of the debate. Of course, we must progress renewable energy; of course, we must progress wind energy, where it is best placed; and, of course, we must progress tidal energy and offshore wind where we can. It is great that there will be offshore renewable wind farms that produce as much energy and electricity as some of our smaller generators. That is very important, and it is good that we will work on, support and enhance that industry. However, government cannot create these jobs; we can only set the standard and set the arena so that companies move into the space. So it is very good that we push on.

Alongside renewable energy — wind, tidal, anaerobic digestion and every other sort — we must sustain the choice for consumers and industry. That means supporting them when they choose the gas route or remain with oil. That is important to our businesses. The Minister is due to meet representatives from Michelin, which is in my constituency. Michelin is very reliant on cheaper energy prices. It is a global company that used to be top of the league of the most costly plants in the world. No company or plant would ever want to be top of that league. I am grateful that, in the past few years, it has been able to reduce its energy costs so that it is no longer top of that league. That gives confidence to its workforce and to North Antrim, and I commend the company for what it is doing. In the past month, it has installed two wind turbines to help it to reduce its energy costs. However, it still relies on oil and electricity.

We need to get smarter with our grid and make sure that it works, but we also need interconnection. It really annoys me that parties in the House — I mean Sinn Féin — do not support the North/South interconnector and the ways in which they want it to be installed. It is vital to the economy and business in Northern Ireland to help the security of supply and to keep prices down. Where the security of supply is concerned, I also worry about our ageing generators and our problems with the Moyle interconnector.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Frew: So, it is vital that we get North/South interconnection as quickly as possible to help our industry.

Mr A Maginness: I welcome the motion and the debate. There are recurrent themes in this motion and in the debates that have taken place in the House about the energy sector and renewable energy in particular. We have to give credit to the Minister for her work in the field. We also have to give credit to the ETI Committee. Even though it is under new Chairmanship, it is still the best Committee in the House. It works away for the common good and works to persuade the Executive to take on the challenge of developing the renewable energy sector.

I think that, although we should support the Minister's good work, there is still a lack of collective Executive commitment to the development of the sector. I agree with Mr Lunn that government cannot create jobs, but government can create the conditions in which jobs can be created and the economy stimulated. That is what we need to do. As legislators, we should put pressure on the Executive, because we know that the jobs potential in this area is significant. The Carbon Trust has spoken about between 8,000 and 33,000 jobs by 2020, which is a substantial addition to the number of jobs in Northern Ireland. The DEL report on skills refers to almost 6,000 jobs that will be required by 2015. We are not talking about unskilled jobs; those are skilled jobs that will have a high value, will pay people well and will create further job opportunities in the sector.

As I have said before, we are uniquely blessed here with wind, sea and grass. We can grow grass and vegetation and produce the means for renewable energy. We have the sea and the tremendous power of the marine. We also have the tremendous power of wind. As Mr Frew said, we should not be overly dependent on wind. Wind is only one source, and it has its deficiencies as well because it is not constant. Nonetheless, we should be developing as much as we can in that direction.

4.15 pm

As Mr Frew also said, to develop that aspect of renewable energy, we have to have the North/South interconnector. If we do not have it, you can forget about renewable energy in Northern Ireland, because we have to be able to transfer electricity from one part of this island to the other. If we do not have the interconnector, we cannot do that. We can argue as long as we like about the track of that interconnector and the route that it takes, but we have to have a solid commitment to that interconnector; otherwise, we will imperil the renewable energy sector in Northern Ireland. The regional colleges have an important role to play in developing skills and giving our young people opportunities. I appeal to government to get its act together —

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr McGlone: I am wearing another hat as the chair of the all-party working group on construction. Will the Member accept that the huge pool of skills that we have at the moment could, tomorrow morning, with additional investment through the likes of green new deal, be put to use immediately to help create jobs and protect our environment? As well as that, installation schemes could protect those who are vulnerable to cold-related illness and fuel poverty, many of whom are older people.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member very much, and I wish him well in his election campaign. [Laughter.] Mid Ulster is a suitable place for the green new deal, and I am sure that, from the Benches in Westminster, he will be even more resourceful and even more forceful in putting forward the green new deal. I wish him well, and I know that he will continue to advocate when he is elected on 8 March.—

Mr McGlone: On 7 March.

Mr A Maginness: On 7 March —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Can we get back to the motion, please?

Mr A Maginness: Right. I know that he will continue to advocate —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr A Maginness: — renewable energy.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion. At a time when unemployment rates continue to cause concern, it is imperative that the Executive capitalise on every opportunity to enhance job creation and develop further our economy.

Renewable energy is by far one of Northern Ireland's biggest economic opportunities. Recent figures from the Northern Ireland Renewable Industry Group (NIRIG) estimate that approximately £1 billion will need to be invested if DETI's 2020 renewable energy targets of generating 40% of energy from renewables are to be met. I am not aware of any other industry in Northern Ireland that can talk about that level of investment. However, if we are to secure major investment in a sustainable energy sector and the job creation and economic advantages that come from it, the Executive must address a number of issues. Given the initial financial outlay required for the majority of renewable energy projects, DETI must ensure that the incentives offered remain at a level that will continue to make renewable energy schemes financially viable and attractive for would-be investors. Long-term stability around policies and avoiding regular reviews of the level of incentives offered will strengthen investor confidence and encourage investments in the types of scheme required to reach the 2020 targets, such as small-scale single wind turbines

DETI can also play a role in encouraging high standards in our sustainable energy sector. The failed project at the Woodbrook eco-village in Lisburn, where the biomass heating was deemed not fit for purpose, shows that it is crucial that viable and effective systems are put in place. A gas installation had to be put in in that development to meet the project's heating requirements.

Planning outcomes for renewable energy applications must reflect the encouraging nature of the overarching policies of the DOE and have DETI's 2020 targets in mind. On that basis, the recognised benefits of renewable energy development must be given significant weight when decisions on such applications are made. It is important to note that planning decisions must not be influenced by the number of applications that are received because that is not a true reflection of the number of projects that are actually developed.

Even with long-term, stable policies, incentives from DETI and planning decisions that reflect the promotive policies of DOE, achieving growth in the sustainable energy sector raises other significant challenges. Perhaps the most significant of those challenges is the electricity infrastructure and its inability to harness the levels of generation needed to meet upcoming targets. To help to create sustainable, high-value jobs in the renewable energy sector, develop the green economy and enhance security of supply, it is vital that the Executive do all in their power to ensure that the proposed North/South electricity interconnector is progressed as soon as possible. The recently launched renewable heat incentive scheme is a welcome development for non-domestic properties, and I look forward to the extension of that to the domestic market in the near future.

Not only is a strong, indigenous and sustainable energy sector vital to the economy, job creation and security of supply, but it is in the best interests of the consumer. Supporting further growth in the sustainable energy sector will mean that Northern Ireland is much less reliant on the importation of fossil fuels, leaving us much less exposed to volatile international prices. That is good news for consumers, who, in many cases, are already crippled by rising energy prices. In my continuing support for the sustainable energy sector and the benefits that come from it, I support the motion.

Mr Agnew: I welcome the debate and the general support for renewable and sustainable energy that we have heard around the Chamber. In some cases, it has been hardwon, and, in some cases, it has been entirely surprising to hear the positive comments. That said, I welcome them.

I will not rehearse too many of the figures, but I will highlight a few. The Department for Business, Innovation and Skills estimates that, in Northern Ireland, just over 31,000 jobs exist in the low-carbon and environmental sector. If we break that down, we see that that probably equates to around 25,000 jobs in the sustainable energy sector itself. That sector has continued to grow despite the recession. It has bucked the trend and has continued to provide increased employment across Northern Ireland. Indeed, it has brought clean, green energy to this part of the world

There has been a significant number of new startup businesses, and there are a number of small and medium-sized enterprises in the sector. Renewable and sustainable energy is also helping to maintain some of our big, key players, and it is worth noting that 75% of Harland and Wolff's contracts are now in the offshore renewables base. The Carbon Trust estimates that up to a further 33,000 jobs can be created by 2020 if we meet our 40% renewable electricity target. The report that the Assembly Research and Information Service produced for the Committee has been mentioned in the debate. I am keen that we focus not only on meeting the 40% target but on maximising job creation for Northern Ireland. Of course I want to see renewable and sustainable energy in Northern Ireland, but I also want to see us maximise the job potential for our citizens instead of importing wind turbines and seeing huge foreign companies coming in. Although I welcome clean, green energy, I want to see the local economy benefiting as much as possible from a move towards sustainable energy.

Although I welcome the success that we have seen to date, I have some concerns. The renewable heat incentive in Northern Ireland is less generous than its equivalent in GB, and, indeed, having spoken to some of the players in Northern Ireland, I know that they see GB and, indeed, the Republic of Ireland, as more attractive markets for their businesses. That concerns me because, as I say, we want to retain those businesses and grow our economy, not lose them to other parts of these islands.

We put £25 million towards the renewable heat incentive, which I welcome, but it is worth noting that that money came from the Treasury specifically for a renewable heat incentive. DETI and the Minister have not chosen to top that up with further moneys, which is why we see the lower incentive rates. It has been said that we want more people to avail themselves of renewable energy to spread the money further and wider, but, if we topped that up, perhaps we could produce better incentives. Another factor that has been pointed out is that we are trying to incentivise people off oil, not gas, but the fact that GB is seeking to incentivise people off gas suggests that, in the long-term direction of travel, renewable energy and heat is where we want to go. That is why I ask why we are committing £32·5 million to the extension of the gas network to the west.

Even with the optimistic outlook that we are potentially connecting 30,000 homes, that is around £1,000 per home. I would ask whether that is the best use for public money, given that further down the line we may well be seeking to incentivise those people back off gas and onto renewables.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will.

Mr Frew: Does the Member agree that, for any rationale for extending a gas pipeline, it is not necessarily households that you should look at with regard to that equation? It is about businesses, and giving businesses the opportunity to choose their source of energy. That is the way that you will reduce bills for companies. It should not be about households. The equation should be about businesses and what businesses can connect to the gas pipeline.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Agnew: I accept the Member's point to an extent, but the question has to be whether it is a good use of public money. If, further down the line, businesses are going to be seeking to invest in renewable heat instead, it may not be a good choice for business either. In his contribution, the Member mentioned choice. He said that we should not have a single supply and we needed to have a mix and to have choice. I agree with him, and there is plenty of mix and choice in offshore wind, onshore wind, tidal, wave, biomass, air source heat pumps, ground source heat pumps, solar photovoltaic (PV) and solar thermal. There is plenty of diversity in the renewable sector, and that is where we need to head.

One final concern that I will mention, which has been referred to, is the failure of Departments to start shifting departmental buildings onto renewable heat. There have been some moves within DFP and DARD in particular, but, when I ask questions of other Departments, they say that they are not considering it, have not considered it and have not assessed it. When you look at DARD, you find that that Minister sees the potential, not just for departmental savings —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Agnew: — but indeed for the agriculture industry if we incentivise the use of biomass.

I welcome today's debate. We are right to congratulate ourselves where we do well, but I certainly think that we can do more. I hope that we will.

Mr B McCrea: Mr Maginness said that this was the best Committee in the Assembly. I have not had the benefit of hearing its deliberations, but there are a few questions that I would like some clarity on. Perhaps the Minister or the Chair will be able to deal with them.

The first thing is, when people call for somewhere between 7,000 and 33,000 jobs, I would like to know specifically what those jobs are in. We seem to have a range of issues: onshore wind, offshore wind, biomass, fracking, photovoltaic, the performance, the grid or whatever. Presumably, you do not need the same skills to do all of those. I would like someone to explain to me exactly what is our strategic energy policy. I heard Mr Dunne say that DETI's target was 40% of electricity by 2020. Is that electricity production or electricity consumption?

When people tell us that there are no alternatives, I wonder about the cost of putting in interconnectors that may link us to nuclear power in Cumbria or, for other issues, about how we look at the cost of investment. That is the real issue, and it was actually brought up by Mr Agnew: is this an appropriate use of public money?

Offshore wind farms are not being built. If you look at the Committee that I am on, you will see that a number of large construction firms that manufacture wind turbines are closing down in Denmark and elsewhere because the markets are not being fulfilled.

4.30 pm

When people talk about the cost-effectiveness of those interventions, I wonder which is more cost-effective. Is it offshore wind or is it gas-powered generators? What is more important to the consumer? Is it that the lights are always on, the price that we pay, or sustainability?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. Mr Frew also raised the point about whether renewable or sustainable energy will have a positive impact on price. It is worth noting that, although it is hard to predict how prices will go, we know that gas prices are rising and will continue to rise. The one thing that you get with renewable energy is sustainable prices, because, with regard to solar and wind, those fuel sources are free.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you. Some commentators believe that the United Kingdom's commitment to giving financial support to renewables on offshore wind will cost £160 billion over the lifetime that they are forecasting. You have to say to yourself that, if other countries do not do that and if they invest in nuclear or gas, which are cheaper, or other things, we are at a competitive advantage. All I am saying is that those things need to be looked at so that we can work out what skills we should be investing in.

People are talking about 7,000 jobs. There is a real need to invest in the grid. I am sure that the Minister will agree that we have had underinvestment in the grid and in our assets, and we now need more power transmission engineers. I also think that we need to look at the interconnectors. The question, of course, is this: who is going to pay for the interconnectors? Will it be the consumer or the heavy users — I find it a little bit strange that it is our heavy users who are paying disproportionately more of our electricity bill — or should it be the Government as some form of sovereign investment? Those issues need to be decided before you can decide what jobs you need to invest in.

Mr Agnew mentioned the significance of Harland and Wolff and about how much of its output was now in renewable energies. I had the opportunity to talk to Harland and Wolff, and it said that, unfortunately, because it was not part of the winning consortium — DONG Energy won the offshore bid — it is sitting with no work for its renewable section. It is actually going back to oil and gas in the North Sea. There is an issue about whether we are really creating jobs that we will get.

I also talked to AirGrid and the folks who are trying to manage the amount of wind that we bring into the whole of the Irish grid, and that includes Ireland and Northern Ireland, and they tell me that we are at 40% at the moment on peak, but that they would like to take it to 75%. That is a tremendous engineering feat, but it leads to certain problems about curtailment. What happens when the wind blows too strongly, and what happens when we cannot balance the load of energy that we make in the middle of the night when we do not have the demand? Those are strategic issues that I hope the Minister will be able to address.

I was also interested to learn that many of the offshore wind farms off the Dublin coast will not now be built, because the Irish Government says that they are already meeting their obligations with onshore wind farms — you will notice that the United Kingdom has just signed an agreement on that — and that it is simply too expensive to invest in offshore.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr B McCrea: All of those issues come forward. However, I would like to see some form of proper economic strategic framework for energy, and if we had that —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I am sorry; I am just finished. I do not have time. We need a proper framework to do that, and then you can decide on the jobs and skills that you want. We must

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr B McCrea: — put the cart before the horse.

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I value the interest shown by Members in the debate. It had been indicated that we have debated sustainable energy on quite a number of occasions, and what are the benefits of it? The benefits are that you get to spend the afternoon with me in the Chamber debating sustainable energy issues and talking about the real sustainable issues.

In the most recent debate that we had about this issue, someone raised the issue about what falls under sustainability in relation to energy. Indeed, the previous Member who spoke mentioned nuclear, gas and renewables. Those are the three elements that make up sustainable energy, and we need to remember that. I know that we have talked mostly about renewables. If Mr Agnew is wondering where I got that definition from, it is a Department of Energy and Climate Change (DECC) definition.

Mr Agnew: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Agnew: You mentioned that it was a DECC definition. The Department for Business, Innovation and Skills includes nuclear when it lists its renewable energy and low carbon sources, but it does not include gas.

Mrs Foster: We are talking about energy issues today, so I will take the Department of Energy and Climate Change's definition. Let us look at those issues. We have talked a lot about renewables today, and I think that it is right that we do that. We have an increasing amount of renewables in our energy mix, and I very much welcome that. It gives us the opportunity to insulate against future cost increases of wholesale oil and gas prices, but we also need to look to longer term benefits in relation to security of supply and economic growth.

Basil McCrea asked me about having a strategic vision in relation to energy. I know that he is not a member of the ETI Committee, but that is what the strategic energy framework (SEF) is. That is why we have it there. That sets the whole framework for energy policy up to 2020. I will talk about what will happen beyond that, because Mr McGlone raised the point about what we are doing up to 2050.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Minister for giving way. For clarity, do we remain committed to 40% of electricity being produced from renewable sources by 2020?

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. I will talk about that later, because Mrs Overend talked about the fact that we would not reach that by 2020. I am delighted to see the progress that has been achieved with our electricity generation. In fact, we have gone past our interim targets in relation to that.

The strategic energy framework is there to support the development of a range of renewable technologies, and Members rightly make the point that we do not create the jobs; we just set the context for those jobs. That is what we have been trying to do through our work on the strategic energy framework and through Invest Northern Ireland and the many interventions that are taking place at present.

The 40% renewable energy target by 2020 is the cornerstone of our strategy. It is there to help us to increase energy security and is a significant step towards decarbonisation of the power sector. Growth in the sustainable energy sector, fuelled by increasing use of renewables, brings many benefits. Renewables can be a key player in creating investment, exports and jobs, which Northern Ireland's economy needs. For example, Invest Northern Ireland has indicated that the low-carbon energy and environmental goods and services sector presently delivers £3·7 billion to the Northern Ireland economy, employing 31,000 people in 1,500 companies. The sector is a net exporter of goods and services and is anticipated to continue to grow at almost 5% each year for the next 10 years.

We have identified wind, marine, bioenergy and resource efficiency sectors as having the highest potential to deliver significant economic and employment benefits to Northern Ireland through the various supply chain opportunities, research and development and inward investment.

I am disappointed with Mr Agnew's point that it is only local that we want to see investing here. Some of the best investments that have been made here in the renewables sector have been from foreign direct investment, and I will continue to push that in the market because I believe that we can be a real hub for that sector internationally. That is what I want to see being achieved. So, I ask him to raise his aspirations in respect of renewable energy.

We need to facilitate the onshore renewable sector. The Department has developed an onshore renewable electricity action plan, the final version of which I hope will be with the Executive in the next few months. That aims to maximise the amount of renewable electricity generated from onshore renewable sources and is underpinned by the rationale that it is for the market to bring forward the most cost-effective mix of renewable technology.

In 2011, wind energy contributed £620 million to the local economy. It is expected to grow by 8% this year and to rise to 9% in 2014 and maintain that level of activity through to 2020.

The established bioenergy sector in Northern Ireland is a net exporter of goods and services, with growth and sales estimated to rise by 20% from 2011-12 levels to £240 million in 2014-15. Importantly for Northern Ireland, offshore wind licensed projects in the Irish Sea region are valued at £20 billion and, if realised, have the potential to provide one of the largest single business opportunities for this region in a generation.

Our offshore renewable energy strategic action plan was agreed by the Executive in March 2012 and provided the strategic framework within which the Crown Estate announced the results of the first Northern Ireland offshore leasing round in October. As the House is aware, development rights were awarded to First Flight Wind for offshore wind off the south Down coast. In the marine energy sector, tidal energy off the north Antrim coast went to a consortium with international and local connections, which has raised our profile internationally, and I very much welcome that.

The potential for business development in the renewable energy sector is great. Invest NI has developed a strong sector team and employed a dedicated business development director for renewables in Europe to maximise supply chain and foreign direct investment opportunities. Many successes have been delivered, including the South West College, B9 Energy and Fast Technologies working together to develop energy storage solutions to militate against curtailment on the electricity grid, which was mentioned on a number of occasions; Harland and Wolff's offshore developments in transformer substations; and the investment in the sector by Belfast Harbour for the provision of the DONG Energy offshore logistics terminal, which will deliver substantial benefits to the wider economy. In fact, Invest Northern Ireland is matching supply chain opportunities for over 60 work packages associated with the terminal and associated offshore contracts, which is very much to be welcomed.

I previously informed Members that I asked MATRIX to conduct a study of emerging market opportunities for Northern Ireland in the sustainable energy sector. That study, which was led by a team of business leaders and key academics from across the sector, is due for completion shortly. Once I have given the final report due consideration, I will work with the Executive, the economic subcommittee and other relevant stakeholders to take its recommendations forward as appropriate.

There is also much activity in research and development, as Ms McLaughlin mentioned. Support for a centre for advanced sustainable energy, based at Queen's University, is being developed by Northern Ireland's research institutions and businesses in the renewable energy sector. Several Northern Ireland companies continue to be involved in the development, manufacture, assembly or deployment of marine energy devices.

Implementing electricity market reform with the rest of the United Kingdom will be a positive opportunity for Northern Ireland to further reduce its dependence on imported fossil fuels, cut carbon emissions and give the renewables industry the confidence to invest in renewable electricity generation in Northern Ireland.

Having highlighted the benefits of renewables, I stress that the key thing that we need to do to prepare for the future is to ensure that we use as little energy as possible — energy efficiency. That is why I am introducing, in a new Energy Bill, a proposal for an energy efficiency obligation that could ensure a step change in energy efficiency in Northern Ireland. In addition, the Energy Bill proposals would increase the importance of sustainability in the hierarchy of duties and obligations for the Utility Regulator and the Department. Where appropriate, the deployment of renewable and energy efficient technologies are embraced within those activities.

I talked about the opportunities in the renewable energy sector, but we can also demonstrate that Northern Ireland continues to excel in another important sector of resource efficiency. It is important that Northern Ireland companies not only exploit opportunities in the sustainable energy sector but look at how they can utilise resource efficiency and on-site renewable generation to increase their competitive position.

We continue to deliver the sustainable productivity programme's full range of activities. These include an interest-free energy efficiency loan scheme, a capital grant scheme for water- and/or materials-saving projects, industrial symbiosis services, free audits to identify resource efficiency projects, free technical consultancy to help businesses to take resource efficiency projects forward and a range of other events and activities.

4.45 pm

I will look quickly at incentives. The House will be aware that the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) has been very successful in encouraging greater levels of renewable electricity generation. Companies such as Brett Martin, Balcas, and Ballyrashane Creamery have all installed renewable electricity generation technologies to offset their energy costs.

At a domestic level, we are starting to see increased interest by homeowners in the installation of solar photovoltaic panels. When the NIRO was introduced in 2005, renewables accounted for just 3% of total electricity generation. The average up to the end of December 2012 was just under 14%, which means that we have already exceeded our 2012 target of 12% by some margin. I think that it was Ms McLaughlin who said that we only have the one target of 40% by 2020 in the SEF. That is right, but in the Programme for Government we had a target of 12% by 2012. We have exceeded that, and are now at 14%. That is a sure sign that our renewable energy policy is on the right track. I very much welcome that.

I was rather amused when Mr Lunn said that the Alliance Party policy was to get a renewable heat incentive. Well, I can tell him today that that is granted, because, of course, we have a renewable heat incentive. We have been developing a more diverse, sustainable and secure heating market. That is one of the Department's priorities. Northern Ireland is overly dependent on home heating oil, which leaves consumers vulnerable to price fluctuations beyond our control and has a direct impact on the levels of fuel poverty. To —

Mr Byrne: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I will indeed.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for the effort that she has made in making sure that we have a better energy mix. How concerned is the Minister or the Department about protest meetings that are now taking place regarding wind farms? It is something that is beginning to become a concern in west Tyrone. I think that fears are being exaggerated, particularly in relation to health.

Mrs Foster: More than anybody else, I recognise the right of communities to come together and ask questions; that is absolutely the right thing to do. I would encourage those companies who want to put in installations, of whatever nature, to engage at the earliest opportunity with the community so that if there are questions to be asked about health or other issues, they are answered as quickly as possible. The worst way to do it is to ignore the local community and think that you can just talk to them at the end of the planning procedures; that is not the way to engage with communities. I have said that to many installers, whether of wind farms, anaerobic digesters or whatever. Early discussions are key.

For the Northern Ireland heat market to become secure and more competitive, it is vital that alternative fuel sources such as renewable heat technologies and natural gas be developed and encouraged. The strategic energy framework therefore includes a target for Northern Ireland to achieve 10% renewable heat by 2020. To reach that ambitious and stretching target, it is essential that we have support mechanisms in place.

Last November, I was pleased to launch the Northern Ireland renewable heat incentive (RHI). It is a groundbreaking scheme and will provide businesses, community groups, schools, churches and other organisations with ongoing financial support when switching to renewable heat.

In addition, the development of that sector will provide opportunities for local firms involved in the area. It is expected that the incentive could support the installation of over 20,000 technologies by 2020, as well as securing our target for renewable heat. The RHI is available for non-domestic customers in the first instance, with a view to extending it to the domestic market in due course. In the meantime, householders can avail themselves of grant support from my Department, via the renewable heat premium payment scheme, which I launched in 2012.

To go to Mr Agnew's point on why we did not top up the renewable heat incentives —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is almost up.

 $\boldsymbol{\mathsf{Mrs}}\;\boldsymbol{\mathsf{Foster}}\!: \mathsf{I}\;\mathsf{have}\;\mathsf{taken}\;\mathsf{a}\;\mathsf{few}\;\mathsf{interruptions}.$

The renewable heat incentives are not set because we have only £25 million; they are set because we looked at it from an economic perspective and we looked at the counterfactual, which, of course, is oil and not gas. It is quite wrong, Mr Deputy Speaker, for a Member to try to mislead the House by saying that we are setting it because we have only £25 million and are not looking at a way of topping it up.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mrs Foster: We are looking at it from an economic perspective. However, I know that that is something that is quite alien to Mr Agnew.

Mr Flanagan (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her response. I am quite glad to be able to go after the Minister. I do not mean "go after" the Minister — I mean that I am glad to speak following the Minister. That is because it means that I cannot be the recipient of some of the comments that the Minister makes sometimes. I thought that, until her final 10 seconds or so, she was going really well.

I welcome the opportunity to make a winding-up speech on this debate, and I thank the Committee for supporting the motion. I am thankful that energy is a devolved matter and that we are not reliant on DECC to provide policy definitions for us. The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment recognises that we are in a prime position to exploit the opportunities that renewable energy development presents across these islands and in the wider European context.

As many Members indicated, it is not the sole responsibility of one Department or one Minister to drive this forward. Many other Departments have various responsibilities regarding the effective roll-out of renewable energy and energy efficiency opportunities, both of which can contribute to the green economy. Many Members have taken the opportunity to commend the Minister. I also commend her for the efforts that she has made in trying to grow this one aspect of our economy as part of her role as the economy Minister and the energy Minister. However, it is clear that there is a great need for other Departments to put renewable energy high on their agenda, and, as the chair of the SEIDWG and as a member of the Executive, the Minister has a key role to play in making that happen.

From a personal point of view, I think that the failure to introduce a radical retrofitting scheme that is based on the proposals that the green new deal group put forward is, and has been, disappointing. Such a scheme would have brought multiple benefits through reduced energy costs, reduced carbon emissions, the tackling of fuel poverty and the creation of thousands of jobs in the construction sector.

The boiler replacement scheme, which was brought forward as an alternative, is a welcome scheme. However, I will return to this question: why could the boiler replacement scheme not have been implemented as part of a wider energy efficiency/retrofitting loan scheme? It could have been done as part of a loan scheme. Are we expected to believe that those who are in the greatest deprivation, which means those who are living with the worst aspects of fuel poverty, can afford to shell out £1,000 to get a new boiler installed, even though there are considerable long-term benefits to having a fully efficient boiler?

The fact that those in gas areas cannot avail themselves of any kind of a grant to switch to renewables reinforces the point that I have often made about the level of protection that is afforded to the gas industry here. We have had gas since 1996. It is a very well-established industry, and it is very attractive for potential investors. It is my view that that protection does not need to be there any more. As Paul Frew identified, we need to move to a situation where there is choice. However, that choice does not exist for those who are living in gas-enabled areas.

The launch of the renewable heat incentive is a very welcome move. However, Mr Agnew mentioned the facts that only £25 million was invested in it, that all that was provided directly by the British Government and that the scheme is, in fact, being administered by the British regulator. So, the £25 million that the Executive put forward came from the British Government, albeit with tweaked incentives, given the high proportion of our households that pay more for oil. However, the fact that that £25 million has been dwarfed by the £32.5 million incentivisation that the Executive have provided for the gas pipeline has raised some concerns, particularly among those who are employed in the green economy sector, about the Executive's seriousness about the renewable energy sector. I am glad to hear positive comments from the Minister towards that sector, and I am glad that initiatives to support that industry are still being taken forward.

I genuinely hope that the RHI scheme is a huge success and that, in the future, its budget can be further increased.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I take his point regarding gas. However, does the Member realise that Michelin, for example, did not remove itself from the top of a league table of the most costly plants because of the two turbines that it has installed at the back of its yard; it has removed itself from that position because it has connected to gas. That is the most important thing here. Businesses in the west deserve gas as much as businesses anywhere else. Sinn Féin should not be denying them, or trying to deny them, that choice.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am glad that he mentioned Michelin again. It is an issue that he raises all the time. A resource that also exists in north Antrim and is not being tapped into but is very accessible for both businesses and households is geothermal energy. It needs to be given serious consideration. It is not included as part of the renewable heat incentive. The potential of geothermal energy would be very attractive for many businesses in the Member's constituency. I encourage the Minister to think seriously about how it will be incentivised and what changes need to be made to allow that industry to grow here.

To return to the Member's comments about the gas network, I can say that most of the information provided to the Committee about it concerns domestic households: the impact that it would have on fuel poverty; the number of households that would benefit, which is potentially 40,000; and if 70% signed up, how much it would cost. Very few references were actually made to businesses. That is why, as Committee members, we talk about households.

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will in a wee minute. We have been told that it is there to benefit domestic customers. Obviously, there is a clear benefit for very intensive manufacturing businesses. There is no doubt about that. If that is why the gas network is being expanded, that is the reason on which it needs to be sold. It should not be sold on the potential savings for domestic customers, only for people to turn around and say that it is not about domestic customers.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for giving way. His party supports the gas network to the west, by the way, and it did so at the Executive. I am very pleased that it did so, because it recognised that the issue is not just about domestic customers but businesses. Yes, it is about domestic customers, but it also about businesses. He knows fine well that the load factor that is provided by people such as the Quinn Group in Derrylin has made that an economic decision for the Executive. I am very disappointed that a Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone does not recognise the economic benefit that that will bring to that company. It is quite unbelievable.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for her intervention. I do not need any more information on how much benefit it will have for businesses. That is clear: no one is questioning that. We are talking about domestic customers. Sinn Féin has supported the gas extension. However, there are questions about domestic customers. If it is being done for businesses, sell it for businesses.

Mr Flanagan: Do not come out and say that it is for domestic customers and then tell us not to bring up domestic customers.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Go ahead, Paul.

Mr Frew: If the Member admits that this is Sinn Féin policy, where does he stand?

Mr Flanagan: What I am articulating is the Sinn Féin policy. My party has supported the roll-out of the gas network because it makes sense for everybody. However, when you say "everybody", that has to include domestic customers and businesses. You cannot send papers to a Committee and say that it will benefit a certain number of domestic customers with very little reference to business and then stand up here and say that it is only about business and that we should not think about domestic customers. The debate is about the positive nature of the renewable energy sector. I want to get back to that.

I want to talk for a moment about the draft heating policy that has recently been produced by the Housing Executive, because, once again, it returns to the choices that Paul Frew brought up. Once again, people who live in a gasenabled area will not be afforded the choice to move from gas to renewables. If we are going to have that choice, the option has to work both ways.

Very few public buildings actually use renewable heat. This one, of course, continues to use gas. I would like to use this opportunity to encourage the Assembly Commission to assess the potential for renewable heat here. When I table questions to Ministers, I get responses from DFP that state things such as it is still trialling solar panels. In 2013, it is still trialling solar panels.

Recently, I visited the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise in Enniskillen, where there is a very effective biomass boiler. It is supplied with biomass by local farmers. That is having a good impact on the local economy. Last week, there was a good event there at which local companies were able to showcase the renewable products that they offer.

Mr Dunne raised the issue of district heating schemes and how one in his constituency was not very successful. The reason that it was not successful was not because the technology did not work; it was because the houses did not sell owing to the slump in the housing market. Economically, it was proven that it would have worked if all the houses had been sold. We need to go back and look at the potential for district heating schemes. An eco-village is proposed for Enniskillen. At the centre of that should be a biomass boiler.

I have 30 seconds left, and I am mandated by Sinn Féin to talk about the North/South interconnector at every opportunity. Other Members have raised that issue and how Sinn Féin has opposed it. It is very clear to realise —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

5.00 pm

Mr Flanagan: At the minute, there is no planning policy in the system in the South for a North/South interconnector. The recent expert report notes that it will be slightly more expensive to build it underground, but that does not take into account the additional costs of pylons and overhead power lines. It also does not look at land devaluation and environmental impact assessments.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls on the Executive to encourage and support further growth in the sustainable energy sector to help maximise government's contribution to creating sustainable, high-value jobs in the renewable energy sector, developing the green economy, enhancing security of supply and encouraging consumers to use renewable energy.

Mr Agnew: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to accuse a Member of trying to mislead the House?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will ensure that the Speaker and his office take a look at that transaction in Hansard and review whether any further action is required.

Adjourned at 5.01 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 19 February 2013

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Budget Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister of Justice to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Budget Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Speaker: No amendments have been tabled, so there is no opportunity to discuss the Budget Bill at this stage. The Bill's Further Consideration Stage is therefore concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Criminal Justice Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I advise Members that a petition of concern was tabled this morning to amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26. Today's proceedings on the Bill will therefore stop after the Question on amendment No 20. The Questions on the remainder of the Bill will be put at the next sitting of the House

I call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to move the Consideration Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I am sure that Members will be pleased that Sammy Wilson is not now on his feet. Before introducing the amendments for debate, I will say a few words about the progress of the Bill to date. I thank the Committee for its assistance in getting a relatively short but fairly complex Bill to Consideration Stage within the allotted time.

Mr Speaker: Minister, you just have to move the Bill at this stage.

Mr Ford: Mr Speaker, I beg to move amendment No 1.

Mr Speaker: Minister, you just have to move the Bill at this stage.

Moved. — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order of consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list.

There are three groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 13 and Nos 35 to 37, which deal with notification requirements for sex offenders and making human trafficking offences triable on indictment only. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 14 to 17 and Nos 38 to 41, which deal with the release on licence of children convicted of a serious offence; enabling the operation of registered intermediary schemes; and the abolition of the offence of scandalising the judiciary. The third debate will be on amendment Nos 18 to 34, which deal with the retention of DNA profiles, fingerprints and photographic material.

Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Mr Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 13 and Nos 35 to 37. The amendments deal with increasing sex offender notification requirements and ensuring that human trafficking offences are triable on indictment only.

Mr Ford: I beg to move amendment No 1: After clause 1 insert

"Notification requirements: absence from notified residence

1A.—(1) Part 2 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 is amended as follows.

(2) After section 85 insert-

"Notification requirements: absence from notified residence

- 85A.—(1) This section applies to a relevant offender at any time if the last home address notified by him under section 83(1),84(1) or 85(1) was an address in Northern Ireland such as is mentioned in section 83(7) (a) (sole or main residence).
- (2) If the relevant offender intends to be absent from that home address for a period of more than 3 days ("the relevant period"), the relevant offender must, not less than 12 hours before leaving that home address, notify to the police the information set out in subsection (3).
- (3) The information is—
- (a) the date on which the relevant offender will leave that home address:
- (b) such details as the relevant offender holds about—
- (i) his travel arrangements during the relevant period;
- (ii) his accommodation arrangements during that period;
- (iii) his date of return to that home address.
- (4) In this section—

"travel arrangements" include, in particular, details of the means of transport to be used and the dates of travel.

"accommodation arrangements" include, in particular, the address of any accommodation at which the relevant offender will spend the night during the relevant period and the nature of that accommodation.

- (5) Where-
- (a) a relevant offender has given a notification under subsection (2), and
- (b) at any time before that mentioned in that subsection, the information notified becomes inaccurate or incomplete, the relevant offender must give a further notification under subsection (2).

- (6) Where a relevant offender—
- (a) has notified a date of return to his home address, but
- (b) returns to his home address on a date other than that notified.

the relevant offender must notify the date of his actual return to the police within 3 days of his actual return.

- (7) Nothing in this section requires an offender to notify any information which falls to be notified in accordance with a requirement imposed by regulations under section 86.
- (8) In calculating the relevant period for the purposes of this section there is to be disregarded—
- (a) any period or periods which the relevant offender intends to spend at, or travelling directly to or from, an address of the kind mentioned in section 83(5)(g) notified to the police under section 83 or 85;
- (b) any period or periods which the relevant offender intends to spend at, or travelling directly to or from, any premises, if his stay at those premises would give rise to a requirement to notify the address of those premises under section 84(1)(c).
- (9) This section applies in relation to any relevant period which begins on or after the day after the coming into operation of section (Notification requirements: absence from notified residence) of the Criminal Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2013.".
- (3) In section 87(1) and (4) (method of notification) for "or 85(1)" substitute ", 85(1) or 85A(2) or (6)".
- (4) In section 91 (offences)—
- (a) in subsection (1)(a) after "85(1)" insert ", 85A(2) or (6)";
- (b) in subsection (1)(b) for "or 85(1)" substitute ", 85(1) or 85A(2) or (6)";
- (c) in subsection (3) for "or 85(1)" substitute ", 85(1) or 85A(2) or (6)"."

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: In clause 3, page 2, line 31, leave out "an EEA State other than" and insert "a country outside". — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 3: In clause 3, page 2, line 32, leave out "an EEA State other than" and insert "a country outside". — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

"Convictions, etc. in a country which is not a member of the Council of Europe

96AA.—(1) The further provisions referred to in section 96A(5)(b) are as follows.

- (2) Where P is charged with an offence under section 91(1)(a), it is a defence for P to prove that the relevant conviction, finding or caution falls within subsection (4).
- (3) P shall cease to be subject to the notification requirements of this Part by virtue of section 96A if the High Court, on an application made by P in accordance with rules of court, so orders; but the High Court shall not make such an order unless it is satisfied that the relevant conviction, finding or caution falls within subsection (4).
- (4) A conviction, finding or caution falls within this subsection if the relevant court is satisfied—
- (a) that any investigations or proceedings leading to it were conducted in a way which contravened any of the Convention rights which P would have had if those investigations or proceedings had taken place in the United Kingdom; and
- (b) that contravention was such that, in the opinion of the court, the conviction, finding or caution cannot safely be relied on for the purposes of meeting the condition in section 96A(2).
- (5) In this section-

"the relevant conviction, finding or caution" means the conviction, finding or caution by reason of which P is subject, by virtue of section 96A, to the notification requirements of this Part;

"the relevant court" means—

- (a) in a case to which subsection (2) applies, the court before which P is charged;
- (b) in a case to which subsection (3) applies, the High Court." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]
- No 10: In clause 3, page 4, line 26, leave out from beginning to "section 97" in line 29 and insert
- "(3) Omit sections 97 to 101 (notification orders).

Mr Ford: The new clause inserted by amendment No 1 will add to the range of information that a convicted sex offender is required to give to the police if they are subject to the notification framework set out in Part 2 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. That framework is designed to assist the police to protect the public and prevent crime. The new provision will require sex offenders to notify the police of travel plans within the UK.

We know that sex offenders travel to commit crimes, and, too often, we have seen horrific sexual murders take place in areas that were not the home of the offender. One example was Robert Black's conviction in 2011 for the murder of Jennifer Cardy. The current notification regime addresses that issue in two ways. First, it requires offenders to tell the police in advance if they plan to travel to destinations outside the UK. This aims to make it more difficult for sex offenders to offend abroad by travelling to other jurisdictions where exploitation of children for sexual abuse is all too prevalent. There are many examples of such cases. The law can also prevent an offender from travelling to any country or all countries outside the UK for the purposes of protecting children from serious sexual harm. Secondly, the law requires offenders to tell the police of any address or addresses in the UK where they have stayed for at least seven days within a 12-month period. Thus, police will know the likely or possible whereabouts of an individual if he is not at his main address. This is all useful information for the police to have to prevent crime and protect the public.

There is one loophole apparent in the provisions that this amendment seeks to address. The police brought this to our attention as the result of a particular case where an offender spent a large amount of time away from his home address but had not registered a second address. Although no offending behaviour was identified in that case, it became clear that those who, for example, travel with a touring caravan or stay at bed and breakfast accommodation for no longer than six nights at a time can be anywhere in the UK for any length of time without any requirement to tell the police. Since then, my officials have worked with the police and other key stakeholders to address the issue. The emerging proposals were shared with the Justice Committee, and members have been supportive. The resulting amendment before the House today aims to provide a method to plug the identified gap.

The provision will require an offender to notify the police in advance of their intention to travel away from their registered home address for more than three days. That will not be necessary if they are going to stay at another registered address or if they will be required to notify that address under existing law. In other words, if they are simply going to travel from place to place for short periods, they must at least tell police in advance of their plans. Such a requirement can never ensure that the police will know where an offender is all the time. That is an impossibility. Of course, the provision is only as good as the information that the offender can give at the time. However, it will at least allow the police to know that one of the notified offenders is travelling to another part of the UK and, where applicable, to inform the other police service of the likely presence of a known sex offender in that area. It may also allow the police to intervene if an offender plans to go somewhere where, the police believe, the offender may pose a specific risk, such as a theme park, perhaps.

I have consulted the Attorney about this provision. Although cautioning that the measure may draw close to a disproportionate interference, he considered that the proposed restriction on private life is likely to withstand a challenge on article 8 grounds on the basis of the legitimate aim of crime prevention. Our aim is to take effective but proportionate measures to ensure the safety of the public from harm, and I consider this measure to meet that aim

The second group of amendments — Nos 2 to 11 — are to the sex offender provisions and extend the provision in clause 3 to require offenders with convictions from all other countries, not just those within the European Economic Area (EEA), to notify the police if they are in Northern Ireland. The existing provision is limited to those with convictions from EEA countries. This was a result of concerns expressed to me by the Attorney General, who felt that a wider application would not be compatible with article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). However, the limited application of the provision did not find support from members of the Executive when I asked for approval to introduce the Bill. I therefore gave a commitment to work with the Attorney and with the Justice Committee during the passage of the Bill to bring forward an amendment to allow for a single, enhanced process for attaching notification. My Department worked with the Attorney's office and brought proposals to the Justice

Committee. The amendment provides that a sex offender with a conviction from any country outside the UK will be statutorily bound to tell the police of his presence in Northern Ireland rather than having a court order made, as at present. However, to address the Attorney's article 6 concerns, there will be safeguards for those from countries outwith the Council of Europe. They will be able to apply to the High Court for the removal of any notification requirements on the basis that the conviction from their state of origin was unsound due to human rights abuses. There is also a defence on identical grounds against any charge of failure to comply. The Justice Committee supported the amended proposals, which we consider to be a proportionate method to meet the aim of improving public protection.

I will turn to amendment Nos 12 and 13, which make human trafficking offences triable on indictment only. Amendment No 13 inserts a new clause that amends sections 57, 58 and 59 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 to remove the existing provision for summary convictions for human trafficking offences. At present, a trial may be directed to either the Magistrates' Court, where the maximum term of imprisonment is six months, or to the Crown Court, where the maximum term of imprisonment is generally 14 years. The proposed new clause will ensure that, from commencement, all future offences of human trafficking, whether for sexual or other forms of exploitation, are triable on indictment in the Crown Court and will attract a maximum sentence of 14 years' imprisonment. A further consequence of the amendment is that sentences for human trafficking offences will automatically be included in the scheduled offences referable to the Court of Appeal by the Director of Public Prosecutions on the grounds that he considers sentences unduly lenient. I am sure that Members will welcome that particular provision.

In the course of the consultation on the Bill, strong views were expressed that sentencing for human trafficking offences should be an effective deterrent to this heinous crime. Those views were echoed by the Justice Committee, which emphasised its desire to see the strongest possible legislation introduced in Northern Ireland on human trafficking. Recent judgements in Northern Ireland have also reinforced the seriousness of human trafficking. In one case, Judge Burgess noted:

"Any case involving the trafficking of other human beings is a serious case and will merit a sentence which is proportionate to the offending and is a genuine and real deterrent."

This, of course, is also in line with the spirit of the EU directive that highlights the gravity of the offence. I believe that the changes provided for in amendment Nos 12 and 13 reflect the seriousness of the offence and will act as an effective deterrent to traffickers. I therefore commend amendment Nos 1 to 13 and Nos 35 to 37 to the House.

10.45 am

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): Before addressing the first group of amendments, with your indulgence, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a few general remarks about the Bill in my capacity as Chairman of the Committee for Justice. Although the Committee for Justice has agreed the clauses in the Bill as drafted or as drafted with proposed departmental amendments, as I indicated at Second Stage, the reality is that the Bill is considered a necessity rather than one that is particularly welcome. It is fair to say that the only parts of the Bill that had the wholehearted support of the Committee were the provisions introducing new offences to tackle human trafficking and sex offender provisions that will improve public protection arrangements. The Bill has, however, provided an opportunity for the Committee to table an amendment to do away with the archaic offence of scandalising the court. I will say more about that during the debate on the second group of amendments.

Given the importance of the three policy areas covered by the Bill — changes to the law on sex offender notification requirements; the introduction of two new offences aimed at preventing and combating human trafficking and protecting its victims; and the establishment of a new legislative framework for the retention of fingerprints and DNA samples and profiles — the Committee extended the Committee Stage of the Bill by a number of weeks to enable detailed and careful scrutiny of the 10 clauses and the four schedules. The Committee also considered other proposed provisions on unrelated issues that the Department indicated it intended to bring forward at Consideration Stage.

The Committee sought a wide range of views as part of its deliberations on the Bill and requested evidence from interested organisations and individuals, as well as from the Department of Justice. Written responses were received from 27 individuals and organisations, and the Committee took oral evidence from eight organisations. The written and oral evidence raised a number of issues and concerns, particularly in relation to human trafficking and the proposed new fingerprint and DNA retention framework.

I thank the members of the Committee for their contributions to the discussion on and consideration of the Bill at Committee Stage. The detail in the Committee report demonstrates that we scrutinised and considered all aspects of the Bill in a full and thorough manner. I also thank the witnesses, who provided useful written and oral evidence, and the departmental officials, who provided clarification and additional information to the Committee throughout the process.

I turn to amendment No 1. During Committee Stage, the Department advised the Committee of its intention to table the amendment, which will make it necessary for a sex offender to notify the police if he plans to be away from his home address for more than three days without leaving the United Kingdom. That provided us with an opportunity to consider it. The PSNI had drawn the attention of the Department to a perceived loophole in the current legislation, meaning that a sex offender who travelled within the UK could use a series of addresses for up to six days at a time without notifying the police. During evidence to the Committee, the Police Service explained that the issue had come to light when there had been difficulty keeping track of an offender who had travelled around the UK but had not stayed at one address for long enough to have to notify the police under the current provisions. The Committee welcomes and fully supports the amendment, as it develops and strengthens the policy in relation to notification requirements and will provide greater public protection.

The Committee also welcomes the Department's intention to introduce secondary legislation that will require an offender to notify all travel outside of the UK and not just travel of three days or more, as is currently the case. The exception to that will be cross-border travel to the Republic of Ireland, which, for practical reasons, will remain unchanged at three days or longer.

While the Committee fully supports the amendment, the same cannot be said of clause 1 and schedule 1, which provide for a review mechanism to enable offenders who are subject to an indefinite period of notification to apply to have the requirements reviewed and discharged after a period of 15 years from the date of initial notification or, in the case of an offender under the age of 18, after eight years. Some members, including me, supported their inclusion in the Bill only on the basis that legislative change is required to ensure that Northern Ireland complies with the 2010 Supreme Court ruling in the case of R and Thompson v Secretary of State for the Home Department. As the Minister has already highlighted, a similar provision was opposed during the passage of the 2010 Justice Bill. Since then, a number of welcome changes have been made that are reflected in this Bill. They include an increase in the further review period from five years to eight years for offenders over the age of 18 and the inclusion in the list of criteria to be taken into account by the Chief Constable when considering an application of information relating to convictions for nonsexual offences, where behaviour since indicates a risk of sexual harm. Some of us also find reassurance in the fact that the review mechanism to be adopted in England and Wales now more closely mirrors the one in front of us today with regard to an application being made to a court for a further determination rather than by way of a judicial review, which was initially considered for that jurisdiction.

I move on to amendment Nos 2 to 11. At Second Stage, the Minister highlighted the fact that the Executive had made it clear that they could not support the introduction of the Bill unless he gave a commitment to table an amendment to clause 3 to allow for a single enhanced process for attaching notification to offenders with convictions from outside the United Kingdom, rather than just from another European Economic Area country, which is what the clause currently covers on the advice of the Attorney General, who was concerned that the Bill would not be compliant with ECHR obligations and would, therefore, be outside the competence of the Assembly if the statutory requirements were placed on offenders from all states outside the United Kingdom.

The Department provided the Committee with information on options to amend clause 3, together with the benefits and drawbacks of each approach. The amendments before us today represent an approach that addresses the concerns of the Executive and the Attorney General. It will place a statutory requirement on offenders with convictions from countries outside the United Kingdom to notify the police after being in residence in Northern Ireland for seven days but provide safeguards to enable offenders to seek to have the requirements discharged by the court if they believe that their conviction in the other country was obtained by abuse of convention rights or to deploy such a defence if charged with an offence of failing to comply with the notification requirements. The Committee is content that this twin approach addresses the issues that have been raised and supports the amendments.

I now turn to the amendments in this group that relate to the human trafficking provisions. Clauses 5 and 6, which cover human trafficking, attracted substantial responses from a number of organisations during Committee Stage. Although there was broad support for the two new human trafficking offences created by the clauses, other issues were raised in the evidence received by the Committee that are not covered in the Bill.

I will deal with one of the most important issues first, which is addressed by amendment Nos 12 and 13. At the outset, the Committee made it very clear to the Minister that it wanted to see the strongest possible legislation introduced in Northern Ireland in relation to human trafficking. The Committee expressed concerns to the Department about the possibility that, under the Bill as currently drafted, conviction of human trafficking offences would attract a sentence of less than six months or a fine. The Committee felt very strongly that this did not reflect the gravity of the offences. The Committee asked whether the Department had given any consideration to including a mandatory minimum custodial sentence in the legislation. In response, the Department advised that the Minister fully supported the Committee's strongly held view that Northern Ireland should be seen as a hostile place for traffickers and noted that sentencing was one of the tools for tackling this crime. However, the Minister felt that sentencing in an individual case should be a matter for an independent judiciary and highlighted the fact that mandatory minimum sentences allowed no room for discretion and made no allowance for the exceptional case.

The Department subsequently indicated that, in response to the Committee's concerns, the Minister was considering whether there was a case to make the human trafficking offences indictable only, which would mean that offences would be heard in the Crown Court, where the maximum term of imprisonment is 14 years. As a result, the Minister has tabled amendment Nos 12 and 13, which will make the human trafficking offences in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 and the new offences created by this Bill triable on indictment only. The Committee is of the view that this more adequately reflects the seriousness of the crime and, therefore, supports the amendments.

In the evidence received by the Committee it was clear that a number of voluntary organisations felt that there was an opportunity to put additional human trafficking measures into legislation by way of the Bill, particularly in relation to protection, assistance and support for victims, including children, training and the availability of proper investigative tools, which they felt the Department had missed. In fact, one of the main criticisms of this area of the Bill was that the Department had adopted a minimalist approach in implementing the EU directive on human trafficking. The Department refutes that claim, indicating that further legislative provision is not required to implement the EU directive, except in the area of support for victims, where consideration is being given to subordinate legislation. It outlined other work that is being taken forward in a wide range of areas. The Committee, however, recognises the merit in making further legislative provision in the additional areas mentioned. It has agreed that it will give further consideration to the matter in the context of Lord Morrow's private Member's Bill on human trafficking, once it is introduced in the Assembly. The Committee will also closely scrutinise the secondary legislation to be brought by the Department to strengthen support for victims of human trafficking.

Another issue that arose during the Committee's scrutiny of this area of the Bill was the complex, piecemeal approach to human trafficking legislation. In particular, there was concern that that approach to legislative reform could lead to a complex and potentially weak legal framework that would make it more difficult for law enforcement officials and legal practitioners to combat human trafficking and to protect and support victims. The Committee understands that the proposals in the Bill seek to copy England and Wales in the substance of the changes to be introduced but achieves that through a different means with the outcome that more trafficking offences will be applicable in Northern Ireland than in England and Wales. Concerned that that might cause confusion for victims and create difficulties for law enforcement officials, the Committee raised the matter with the Department. In response, the Department highlighted that the clauses in the Criminal Justice Bill, although drafted in a different style, cover the same range of criminal activities as in England and Wales and mirror the additional provisions introduced in Scotland in relation to the extraterritorial jurisdiction. The Department also indicated that none of the law enforcement agencies that work with the legislative framework had experienced difficulties. It did, however, indicate that it may consider an exercise of consolidation of human trafficking legislation when other pressing areas of work have been completed. That will need to be kept under review, with further thought given to it if there is evidence of confusion.

The last issue that I want to cover relates to the establishment of a national rapporteur for human trafficking. Although the interdepartmental ministerial group, together with the UK Human Trafficking Centre, fulfils the UK obligations in relation to a national rapporteur, some concerns have been raised that the process is not independent of government. The evidence received suggested that countries that have created an independent overseer have seen real success in the quality of information available on human trafficking and the profile of trafficking in their Parliaments. The Committee agreed to raise the issue of an independent national rapporteur with the Minister and may wish to return to that issue during consideration of Lord Morrow's private Member's Bill.

Given our desire to see the strongest possible human trafficking legislation introduced in Northern Ireland, the Committee supports the amendments tabled by the Minister in response to its concerns regarding the sentencing framework for these offences and looks forward to considering the proposals in Lord Morrow's private Member's Bill.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I want to speak specifically to the sex offenders aspect of the Bill. The Sexual Offences Act featured in the last Justice Bill. It was not voted through as a result of a petition of concern. We now agree on the amendments to the Bill and are now satisfied that the Bill is ECHR-compliant. That is the proper basis on which the Bill should go forward.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for bringing the Bill forward and progressing issues such as this within the Northern Ireland Assembly and our framework for making powers and legislation. We want to ensure that we, in Northern Ireland, are not seen to be soft on crime or criminals. I hope that the Bill will help us to achieve that. We must also ensure that we remain compliant with human rights legislation. However, it is important that all citizens and, indeed, visitors are given the maximum protection by law, irrespective of what that requires.

To stop human trafficking and sexual exploitation, we need legislation that will inhibit this scourge on our society. We must take every possible step to ensure that those involved in such criminal activity are stopped.

I am pleased that the amendments generally widen the powers of the authorities to deal with such cases. This is particularly relevant in the notification requirement when someone is absent, or will be absent, from a notified residence. Clearly, the amendments also deal with criminal activities outside the European Union. We discussed the National Crime Agency recently, and these are areas in which Northern Ireland would benefit from that agency. That is why I am so disappointed that Members on the opposite side of the House refused to support the proposal for the National Crime Agency to operate here. I cannot understand why they did that — maybe they will be prepared to tell us today — when we could have assistance on issues such as the ones addressed in the Bill —

11.00 am

Mr Speaker: I encourage the Member to stay within the Bill. We would certainly widen the debate if we went down the avenue that the Member has just gone down. Let us try, as far as possible, to deal with the Bill.

Mr Elliott: Thank you very much for that guidance, Mr Speaker. It is much appreciated.

The Bill will have very wide-ranging effects in Northern Ireland. I wonder whether the Minister is preparing to table any further amendments at Further Consideration Stage. We heard the Chair of the Committee talking about Lord Morrow's Bill and whether any other aspects could be incorporated into it. So I would be interested to hear from the Minister on that. The Ulster Unionist Party supports the Bill and the amendments in this group.

Mr A Maginness: It is important to note the work of the Committee, in conjunction with the Department and the Minister, on the Bill. There has been a very good rapport between the Committee and the Minister on the amendments, particularly those in group 1. That is a good example of working together and building consensus.

Clearly, there are concerns about sex offenders and their travels, both within this country and abroad. It is important that notification requirements are made stricter so that one can prevent offences being committed, particularly against children. All of us in the House are very concerned about the welfare of children. We in the SDLP welcome this aspect of the Bill. We believe that the improvements that have been made to the Bill, particularly those that emanated from the Committee, in association with outside groups who informed the Committee very well on the issues that arose, are a good example of working together.

I understand the concerns that people had about the Supreme Court decision in R and Thompson v Secretary of State, which dealt with the indefinite nature of sex offenders being on the sex offenders' register. I understand that people felt that, because of this case, there would be some relaxation in the notification requirements and in the maintenance of that register. However, the Bill has made reasonable and sensible changes: the periods are reasonable and sensible, and the proposed mechanism is a very sensible way of going forward. It provides the public with reassurance that we are not being light on sex offenders and that they will still have strenuous conditions to comply with. That is worthy of note, and we are doing useful business in translating the effects of R and Thompson into law in this jurisdiction.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

I believe the human trafficking provisions to be sensible, and Members should be confident that that is the right approach. I think that there is a general satisfaction among members of the public and the police with what is proposed, and we are fulfilling our mandate from the public by providing them with protection and by being compliant with human rights. We have taken on board what the Human Rights Commission said and what the Attorney General said about our international obligations, and we should be satisfied with the first group of amendments.

Lord Morrow: I am pleased to have the opportunity to contribute to the Consideration Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill.

My remarks will focus in particular on clauses 5 and 6 and the Minister's proposed amendments to them. Like many Members from all sides of the House, I am very much in favour of what is proposed under clauses 5 and 6. The two clauses will bring Northern Ireland into line with article 10 of the European directive on human trafficking and are undoubtedly a positive step forward in tackling that heinous crime in Northern Ireland

I further welcome the Minister's decision to introduce amendment No 13, and the decision to put into statute a requirement for all human trafficking offences to be triable only on indictment will ensure that appropriate penalties are handed down for those who are convicted of such offences. Members from all sides of the House will agree with the introduction of that amendment, and I thank the Minister for bringing it forward.

I also want to put on record my thanks to the Minister for his decision to introduce an annual human trafficking action plan, which will be reviewed annually. I would prefer to see such a plan placed on a statutory footing, but I believe that it is a positive step forward that will improve the response of the Executive and law enforcement agencies to human trafficking in the Province. In the light of the Minister's decision, I will review whether to include clause 13 of my draft Bill in the final Bill, which will be brought to the Assembly in the very near future.

However, in spite of those positive steps, I must put on record my great disappointment with the minimalist approach that the Minister has taken in the Bill to ensuring compliance with the European directive on human trafficking. It is patently obvious that he has largely decided to follow the coalition Government at Westminster on the implementing measures to ensure that Northern Ireland is compliant with the EU directive. The Bill fails to ensure compliance with the directive in numerous areas, and I will outline only a few today.

The Bill does not set out in statute a list of aggravating factors that courts need to take into account in sentencing those found guilty of human trafficking and does not ensure in statute that special measures will be provided to victims of human trafficking as of right, as is suggested by GRETA and the European directive. The Bill does not ensure, as article 9.1 recommends, that proceedings should be dependent on the reporting or accusation by the victim and that proceedings should be able to continue if a victim withdraws his or her statement.

Furthermore, the Bill does not seek to introduce a legal advocate for children under the age of 18, which is recommended by articles 14.2 and 16.3 of the European directive and by the Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA) report on this subject. Furthermore, the Bill does not seek to introduce an independent national rapporteur, as is set down by article 19 of the directive. The Minister continues to maintain that the interdepartmental ministerial group is sufficient for this task, but I do not see how it can be argued that Ministers who set policy in this area can be described in any way as independent.

I believe that we have been elected to this House to make real differences to the lives of the most vulnerable. It is apparent to Members from all sides of this House that victims of human trafficking and exploitation in this Province are some of the most vulnerable people on our shores. It is incumbent on us that we seek to ensure that the most effective measures are in place to protect them and support them. It is for this reason that I have put down my own human trafficking and exploitation Bill, which will be coming to the Assembly very shortly. I hope that the Assembly will back my Bill, which seeks to ensure that Northern Ireland is fully compliant with the EU directive on human trafficking.

I thank the Minister for introducing the measures that are outlined in clauses 5 and 6 of the Bill, for introducing amendment No 13 and for his decision to introduce an annual plan with regard to human trafficking. However, I strongly believe that further action is necessary, and I urge the Minister to consider further the measures that I have outlined in my Bill. I would be failing in my duties if I did not say that there are many gaps in this Bill, and, hopefully, my private Member's Bill will seek to close those gaps.

Mr Dickson: I am delighted to speak on the Bill's Consideration Stage, because it has been and is an important piece of work. As the Chair and others said, the Committee has worked very well in the scrutiny phase of the Bill, working with the Minister, the Department and, most importantly, the stakeholders who have an interest in the areas that we have been dealing with in this group of amendments. I thank the hard-working Committee staff for the work that they have done, and I thank all those who contributed to get the Bill to the point where we are today.

The Minister has gone through and explained the amendments that he has brought forward, but I will add the weight of my comments to a few of them. It is important to recognise that the provision for notification by sex offenders, which has been raised by every Member who has spoken thus far, will be unique to Northern Ireland, and it is encouraging that the Assembly is demonstrating its ability to provide legislation not only for people in this jurisdiction but to lead the way. It will be interesting to see whether other jurisdictions in the United Kingdom choose to take interest in what we are doing. It is encouraging that the police brought this to our attention and that the Department has acted on that information. It is encouraging that we are now sitting in this place legislating for that. As well as providing additional protection to the public and assistance to the police, it demonstrates the continued benefits of devolved policing and justice.

I also welcome the amendments to clause 3, which should offer the appropriate protection, while providing for people from states with poor human rights standards who may have been wrongly convicted. It provides a clear and real opportunity for those matters to be dealt with. The NSPCC in particular highlighted the importance of the provision requiring offenders to notify the police on entry to Northern Ireland, as the current arrangements placed unnecessary responsibility on the police to find those offenders and to get them to a register and apply a notification order. The Minister has very helpfully explained to the House that the existing provision is limited because of the concerns that were expressed by the Attorney General, but I thank the Minister and the Attorney General for working together and working out a resolution to this matter. They have worked out the difficulties and worked through this in the scrutiny process with us in the Committee.

I turn to amendment Nos 12 and 13 and welcome the proposals that all human trafficking offences will now be tried on indictment in the Crown Court. This sends out a very clear message that offenders can be sentenced for up to, generally, 14 years.

11.15 am

In recent years, the horrors of human trafficking have become more and more apparent, and society rightly calls, and has called for, a robust response. It is imperative that those crimes are treated seriously and that the sentences reflect the gravity of the offences. I welcome that those sentences will be included in the schedule of offences that can be referred to the Court of Appeal on the grounds that they may be considered unduly lenient. I think that that also sends out a very clear message when dealing with those matters.

It is vital that we make clear that we abhor at all times human trafficking and all that flows from it and that it will not be tolerated in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is sending out a very clear message today that we are closed to human traffickers. That is the objective and the core of amendment Nos 12 and 13.

I support the amendments, and I believe that they will strengthen the Bill. The Alliance Party will support this group of amendments.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tagairt a dhéanamh do na clásail a bhaineas le human trafficking.

I would like to refer to the clauses relating to human trafficking. Like others on the Committee, we share concerns about the rising incidence of human trafficking, and we wish to see what measures need to be taken to address it. Therefore, we welcome the recommended changes, and we would like to see the law strengthened in that regard.

Tacaímid leis na leasuithe. We support the amendments.

Mr D McIlveen: I support this part of the Bill.

I now chair the all-party group on human trafficking. The issues on the trading of human beings as objects has been well rehearsed in the Assembly, so I do not think that it is necessary to go down that road again. Obviously, I take heart in hearing from my colleague Lord Morrow, because I believe that some additional tightening-up is required for this whole issue and that Lord Morrow's Bill will seek to do that.

We have to acknowledge that considerable advances have been made. I support, in particular, the provision that states that:

"A person found guilty of an offence under this section is liable ... on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years."

We have a position at the minute whereby someone who has been trafficking human beings can go before a magistrate and effectively be viewed in the same way as someone who has committed a speeding offence. We should bear in mind that article 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights states very clearly that the trading of human beings and forced labour are grotesque crimes. I think that it is essential that higher penalties are imposed and that this place is made as hostile for human traffickers as we can possibly have it.

Moving forward, we also need to look at how this whole business is promoted. I obviously support the fact that we are looking at a private Member's Bill that will effectively make it illegal for someone to pay for sexual services. However, I think that, at a later stage, we will need to look at how we can deal with the advertising of sexual services. I am thinking particularly about the idea of escorts. I think that there is a traditional view of an escort, who used to be a rather lovely person for somebody to spend an evening with. Obviously, the 21st century definition of the word "escort" has changed somewhat. We now have the word "escort" used as a euphemism to try to legitimately put forward services that also cover human trafficking. So, I think that we will have to look at that issue to see how the advertising of sexual services and of people who could be victims of trafficking may be looked into in the future.

We need to keep our finger on the pulse of the issues that are before us. I believe that the Bill implements a number of recommendations that have already been put forward, particularly from the GRETA report. We need better central data collection for this issue. This is still a problem. We need to look at how quickly victims are repatriated, and those are all bigger issues specifically around human trafficking that need to be addressed. Unfortunately, the facts in Northern Ireland speak for themselves. We have seen only two convictions for human trafficking. More has to be done, given the problem that we have here.

I believe that we have certainly come far in the few years that this has been put at the top of the agenda with the all-party group and now the private Member's Bill. However, we have to continue to make sure that we are not a gateway to the UK. We have been identified as a weak link when it comes to transporting victims of trafficking from other parts of the European Union into this part of the United Kingdom, and then on to England, Scotland and Wales. We have to recognise the unfortunately unique position that we find ourselves in geographically with having another European Union country with a land border here in Northern Ireland.

I support the Bill and the amendments, and commend them to the House. However, I hope that we will continue to deal with the grotesque issue of human trafficking and that support will be given, as Lord Morrow has said, for his Bill, which, I believe, will further tighten up the law around that issue

Mr Allister: I generally welcome the Bill. In this group of amendments, I particularly welcome the moves being taken to deal more adequately with trafficking offences, the removal of those offences to the Crown Court, and the capacity to make those referable by the authorities in terms of the adequacy of sentences. Those are sensible, wise and necessary provisions.

In looking at the detail of amendment No 1, there are a couple of issues that I would like the Minister to address and to satisfy himself that the clause, as drafted, is exactly as intended and will not create unwarranted circumstances that could be avoidable. Amendment No 1, as I understand it, will, understandably, introduce the requirement for sex offenders to give notification of their travel and accommodation plans if they are travelling for more than three days. That will apply whether they are going to Suffolk, Portrush or anywhere in the United Kingdom. The requirement in amendment No 1, under what will be section 85A(2) of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, is that the relevant offender, not less than 12 hours before leaving his home address, must notify the police of the required information.

The circumstance that I want to address the Minister's mind to is this: what happens when someone is faced with an emergency requirement to travel? They are, in the terms of the legislation, a sex offender. I remind the House that the ambit of sex offender is huge under schedule 3 of the 2003 Act. It includes the person who has a conviction for unlawful carnal knowledge with a girl under the age of 17 at the time in Northern Ireland and who, himself, was over 20. That person attaches to himself the categorisation of sex offender. Some years may have passed, and they may be a much more settled individual. Yet if that person, in a family situation, has an emergency or is required, because of a family accident, to travel to Scotland or Fermanagh to be with someone who has been critically injured in an accident, they must go. However, they cannot go for 12 hours because they must let 12 hours pass before they can notify. Is that really what the Minister intends?

I understand perfectly that the recidivist sex offender must and should be sat upon very severely by the law in terms of their movements. That is essential, necessary and right. But when we draft laws, we draft them for the wide ambit of people to whom they apply. They also apply to individuals at the margins, both in time and quality, of the offending. I ask the Minister whether it is necessary on that detail to have that restriction, that time limitation of not less than 12 hours before they can leave their home address to deal with what could be a family emergency. That is something that the Minister should look at.

Remember, too, that the penalty in some sex offending that puts you on the register can be a caution. That can be a consequence that makes you into a sex offender. So I am not dissenting from the wisdom and necessity of requiring sex offenders to give notification. I am questioning whether, in every circumstance and every case, a blanket application such as here is doing justice to the circumstances. I invite the Minister to respond and consider that.

I invite him also to tell the House: what is the parallel provision with the person faced with the need to travel within Northern Ireland, to which this new sanction will apply, and the person desiring to travel to, say, Donegal? If someone wants to go to Portrush for three days, they must notify. If they want to go to Donegal for three days, is it the same provision? Must they equally notify? Perhaps the Minister will clarify that, because it is important that there is some parity of approach on these matters.

You may have people who, at relatively short notice, are offered three days' work somewhere. They go, they stay, they work. Are they subject to the same provisions whether that job is across the border or in Northern Ireland? Have we got that parity of provision?

I stress that I very much support the general thrust of the Bill, particularly the provisions on trafficking. Apart from those few remarks, I am very happy to support the direction of travel of the Bill.

Mr Ford: I thank those Members who took part in this section of the debate. I also thank those who took part in the work of the Committee, and my staff who engaged with the Committee. As has been acknowledged by a number of Members around the House, there has been very positive and useful engagement between the Department and the Committee, which has produced a set of largely agreed amendments.

On the specific issue of the first group of amendments relating to sex offenders, I believe that we are showing in the Bill that our primary aim is to continue to offer the best possible protection for all the community in Northern Ireland from the risk posed by sex offenders.

The notification requirements of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 are important to realising that aim. I wish to acknowledge that, in his contribution, the Committee Chair noted that some members were not entirely enthusiastic about that provision, but have accepted that it is balanced and necessary, given our obligations. As other Members highlighted, notably Alban Maginness and Stewart Dickson, it is a matter of the balance of our obligations.

11.30 am

Specifically, the new clause on travel within the UK, which has just been referred to by Mr Allister, allows us to add to the effectiveness of the information that has to be given to the police and represents a balanced response to the current gap in the overall provisions. My understanding, as I am sure some Members will be pleased to regard, is that travel to the Republic of Ireland, including short distances across the border into Donegal, is already covered by provisions in legislation relating to international travel. This is about ensuring that we maintain similar provisions within the United Kingdom. So, there is already provision if somebody is going to Dunfanaghy. The issue now is to ensure that we have suitable provisions should they go to Downpatrick.

It has been recognised that extending the process to offenders coming from all jurisdictions outside the UK is a positive step forward; one which required considerable work by the Attorney General and the Committee. I am grateful for what has been done to ensure that we strengthen our arrangements, make them more effective and enhance the ability to protect people from risk.

We have an obligation, this morning, to acknowledge the good work done by a number of agencies, led principally by the probation service and the police within the public protection arrangements; organisations that will use and enforce the legislation. The new proposal will underpin the work that they do to make the difference in keeping society safe.

It is fair to say that there was more discussion on the general issue of human trafficking than on the sex offender notifications. There are clearly issues that Members see as going beyond proposed amendment Nos 12 and 13. However, there does seem to be a general welcome for those amendments, in particular to ensure that we regard the offence of human trafficking sufficiently seriously that it is triable only on indictment in the Crown Courts. Mr Elliott asked whether I am planning further amendments in that respect. The answer is no, I am not. I believe that the provisions we already have in statute and the provisions we are introducing in the Bill as amended reflect the seriousness of human trafficking offences in terms of the consequences for victims and send out the strong message that this abhorrent crime will not be tolerated in Northern Ireland.

Lord Morrow asked a series of questions, and Paul Givan, as Committee Chair, started off with a reference to the national rapporteur. I will deal briefly with some of those points, although I suspect that it is an issue that is likely to come before the House again in different guises.

The specific point of the directive for a national rapporteur is that it is for a national rapporteur, not a regional rapporteur. We do not have the ability to establish a national rapporteur. As a member of the Home Office-led interdepartmental ministerial group on human trafficking, I argued at the first meeting I went to for a wider involvement of NGOs in that work; specifically, as a minimum, the NGOs that provide direct services to the victims of trafficking. It was an argument made by some other Ministers. It was an argument that did not win favour with the Home Office, which provides the lead for the UK as a whole. We may wish to see greater provisions around the national rapporteur, but that is a matter that lies in the gift of the Westminster Parliament and the Home Office. It is not something that we can deal with here.

However, I reject the suggestion that what the Department of Justice is doing is a minimalist approach to legislation, simply mirroring that of the Government of England and Wales, which is, in that context, what the Home Office largely is. I do not believe that that is the case. In many ways, the provisions that we have put in the Bill and those that are already in place in Northern Ireland go significantly beyond the provisions for England and Wales. For example, we have implemented some of the discretionary issues referred to in the EU directive, not merely the mandatory ones, so that we extend the law to habitual residents of Northern Ireland and to bodies incorporated under the law of any part of the United Kingdom. That is going beyond a minimalist approach. The maximum penalty for human trafficking offences in Northern Ireland being set at 14 years and the guarantee that all offences will go to the Crown Court exceeds the mandatory requirement under the EU directive. Ensuring that trials are only on indictment will guarantee and underpin that that is how we see things there.

I have also said that I am looking at the option of secondary legislation for putting assistance and support for victims during the recovery and reflection period on a statutory basis, and my officials are examining how that would work. The administrative arrangements for support for victims, again, go beyond the minimum 30-day requirement that exists under the directive. These measures, and anything we propose, have to add to the existing position and not simply replicate what exists in other places.

Similarly, Lord Morrow raised the issue of a legal advocate for children. That is perfectly reasonable, but it is a matter for the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and not for the Minister of Justice. I understand entirely the motivation, but I cannot interfere with another Department on that.

Mr McIlveen raised the issue of there having been only two convictions for human trafficking in Northern Ireland. That, of course, is an operational issue for the relevant bodies, but there have been two prosecutions and both resulted in conviction. Other cases are in the system, and a landmark judgement has made it clear how seriously the courts take the matter. Potential victims in Northern Ireland have been rescued from trafficking. Of course, we also wish there to be prosecutions, where prosecutions are possible. I believe, however, that we are already showing, for example, in general legislation, that aggravating factors are taken into account in all criminal cases and do not need to be specified for trafficking. Special measures are available for all vulnerable victims and do not need to be added purely for victims of trafficking.

The issue of whether proceedings can continue, depending on whether a statement is withdrawn by a witness, comes within the existing prosecutorial test administered by the PPS.

All of those are key points in which matters are being dealt with, and adequately so, at present. I certainly do not wish Northern Ireland to be seen, in any way, as a friendly place for traffickers, but I do not believe that that is the case. I believe that our legislation, underpinned by what we propose today, will ensure that that message is sent out. We will continue to keep operational matters under review, without necessarily needing to say that everything needs to be in statute. Indeed, I welcome Lord Morrow's acceptance that it is not necessarily beneficial for the annual plan to be in statute. What is important is that we have the annual plan and that we show that that is an important issue for all of us.

Finally, I return to the sex offender issue and the final point made by Jim Allister about emergency travel. It appears to me that Mr Allister quite reasonably points out that the provisions of the proposed new clause are reasonable, but that there may be certain circumstances, which, I suspect, even he will agree are fairly rare, in which somebody may, because of a family illness or bereavement, wish to travel in an emergency and not be able to give 12 hours' notice. If Mr Allister is prepared to accept that we should pass this new clause today, I will certainly undertake to look to use Further Consideration Stage in the way that it is intended to see whether it is possible to introduce a further subsection that would make it clear what needs to apply should emergency travel be needed for that kind of family emergency.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Certainly.

Mr Allister: Does the Minister accept that the matter could be rectified very straightforwardly by inserting a clause to the effect that there is a defence if there is reasonable excuse. If, for instance, without reasonable excuse, someone travels without giving the required notice, they have offended the law, but, if they can show reasonable excuse, they have not offended the law. I think that something along those lines would meet the situation.

Mr Ford: It is always good to have a lawyer behind me, as well as the lawyers who advise me elsewhere. We can discuss the precise details of that point. Mr Allister's suggestion may well be the best way of dealing with it, but I think that there is an acceptance around the House that what is proposed is appropriate but requires a little tweaking to deal with emergency situations. I am happy to give an undertaking that we will do that and return at Further Consideration Stage, if the House agrees the new clause today.

That, I believe, Mr Deputy Speaker, has summarised the key comments that were made in the debate. I am extremely grateful for the broad support from all sides of the House for this group of amendments.

Lord Morrow: Before the Minister sits down, will he give way? He mentioned the fact that I had welcomed —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Sorry, Lord Morrow. I believe that the Minister had already —

Lord Morrow: He had given way.

Mr Ford: Mr Deputy Speaker, if Lord Morrow wishes to intervene quickly, I am prepared to stand up again and continue with further thanks to Members.

Lord Morrow: I ask the Minister to give way. I suspect that he would. Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. Thanks, too, to the Minister. I just want to clarify a point. He is right as far as he goes. He said that I had welcomed the fact and had acknowledged the introduction of an annual human-trafficking action plan. However, the wee bit that he, conveniently, left out, which I did go on to say, was that I would like to have seen that put on a statutory basis. I ask the Minister to take cognisance of that.

Mr Ford: I thought that I had actually said that in my remarks. I certainly acknowledge that Lord Morrow believes that the annual plan should be statutory. My position is that if the Department is committed to publishing a plan annually in consultation with other elements of the justice system, it is not necessary to put it on a statutory basis. We are all agreed on the importance of a plan. We are all agreed on the importance of showing that the House and the justice system are united against those who would engage in the foul crime of trafficking. As for the precise method and whether the plan is statutory,

Lord Morrow and I will have to continue to debate those issues

"the relevant court" means—

- (a) in a case to which subsection (2) applies, the court before which P is charged;
- (b) in a case to which subsection (3) applies, the High Court." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

11.45 am

Mr Deputy Speaker: Amendment Nos 10 and 11 have already been debated and are consequential to a number of earlier amendments to clause 3. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly to group these amendments for the question.

Amendment No 10 made: In page 4, line 26, leave out from beginning to "section 97" in line 29 and insert

- "(3) Omit sections 97 to 101 (notification orders).
- (4) Subsection (3) (and the related repeals in Part 1 of Schedule 4) do not affect the validity or effect of any order made under section 97 or 100". [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Amendment No 11 made: In page 4, leave out line 33 and insert "for "98" substitute "96A(6)" ". — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 3, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Trafficking people for sexual exploitation)

Amendment No 12 made: In page 6, line 2, leave out paragraph (a). — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

Clause 5, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Mr Deputy Speaker: Amendment No 13 has already been debated and is consequential to amendment No 12.

Amendment No 13 made: After clause 6 insert

"Trafficking offences to be triable only on indictment

- 6A.—(1) In section 57(2) of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (trafficking into the UK for sexual exploitation) omit paragraph (a).
- (2) In section 58(2) of that Act (trafficking within the UK for sexual exploitation) omit paragraph (a).
- (3) In section 59(2) of that Act (trafficking out of the UK for sexual exploitation) omit paragraph (a).

- (4) In section 4(5) of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 (trafficking people for exploitation) omit paragraph (b).
- (5) This section does not apply in relation to an offence committed before this section comes into operation."
- [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 14, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 15 to 17 and Nos 38 to 41. Those amendments deal with the release on licence of children convicted of serious crime, the examination of a defendant through a registered intermediary and the abolition of the offence of scandalising the judiciary.

I call the Minister of Justice to move amendment No 14 and to address the other amendments in the group.

New Clause

Mr Ford: I beg to move amendment No 14: After clause 7 insert

"Release on licence of child convicted of serious offence

Release on licence of child convicted of serious offence

- 7A.—(1) In Article 45(2) of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 (child convicted of serious offence) for "notwithstanding any other provisions of this Order" substitute "subject to Articles 46 to 46B".
- (2) In Article 45 of that Order after paragraph (2) insert—
- "(2A) Where a court passes a sentence under paragraph (2), the court shall specify such part of the sentence as the court considers appropriate as the relevant part of the sentence for the purposes of Article 46 (release on licence).".
- (3) For Article 46 of that Order substitute—

"Release on licence

- 46.—(1) In this Article—
- (a) "P" means a person detained under Article 45(2);
- (b) "the Commissioners" means the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland;
- (c) "the Department" means the Department of Justice; and
- (d) references to the relevant part of P's sentence are references to the part of P's sentence specified as such under Article 45(2A).
- (2) As soon as-
- (a) P has served the relevant part of P's sentence, and
- (b) the Commissioners have directed P's release under this Article.
- the Department shall release P on licence.
- (3) The Commissioners shall not give a direction under paragraph (2) with respect to P unless—

- (a) the Department has referred P's case to the Commissioners: and
- (b) the Commissioners are satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm that P should be detained.
- (4) P may require the Department to refer P's case to the Commissioners at any time—
- (a) after P has served the relevant part of P's sentence; and
- (b) where there has been a previous reference of P's case to the Commissioners under paragraph (3) or Article 46B(4), after the end of the period of 12 months beginning with the disposal of that reference.
- (5) In determining for the purposes of this Article whether P has served the relevant part of P's sentence, no account shall be taken of any time during which P was unlawfully at large, unless the Department otherwise directs.
- (6) The Department may at any time release P on licence if it is satisfied that exceptional circumstances exist which justify P's release on compassionate grounds.
- (7) Before releasing P under paragraph (6), the Department shall consult the Commissioners, unless the circumstances are such as to render such consultation impracticable.
- (8) Nothing in this Article requires the Department to release a person in respect of a sentence under Article 45(2) at any time when that person is liable to be detained in respect of any other sentence.

Duration and conditions of licences under Article 46

- 46A.—(1) Where a person is released on licence under Article 46, the licence shall, unless previously revoked under Article 46B, remain in force until the expiry of the period for which the person was sentenced to be detained.
- (2) A person released on licence under Article 46 shall comply with such conditions as may for the time being be specified in the licence (which may include on release conditions as to supervision by a probation officer).
- (3) The Department of Justice shall not, except in accordance with recommendations of the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland—
- (a) include a condition in a licence on release,
- (b) subsequently insert a condition in a licence, or
- (c) vary or cancel any condition in a licence.

Recall of licensees

46B.—(1) In this Article—

"P" means a person who has been released on licence under Article 46;

- "the Commissioners" and "the Department" have the meanings given in Article 46(1).
- (2) The Department may revoke P's licence and recall P to detention—
- (a) if recommended to do so by the Commissioners, or

- (b) without such a recommendation, if it appears to the Department that it is expedient in the public interest to recall P before such a recommendation is practicable.
- (3) P--
- (a) shall, on P's return to detention, be informed of the reasons for the recall and of the right conferred by subparagraph (b); and
- (b) may make representations in writing to the Department with respect to the recall.
- (4) The Department shall refer P's case to the Commissioners.
- (5) Where on a reference under paragraph (4) the Commissioners direct P's immediate release on licence under Article 46, the Department shall give effect to the direction.
- (6) The Commissioners shall not give a direction under paragraph (5) unless they are satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm that P should be detained.
- (7) On the revocation of P's licence, P shall be liable to be detained in pursuance of P's sentence and, if at large, shall be treated as being unlawfully at large.".
- (4) In Article 46(3) of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 (functions of Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland) at the end add "or Articles 46 to 46B of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998."
- (5) Where-
- (a) on commencement a person is detained in pursuance of a sentence under Article 45(2) of the 1998 Order, and
- (b) the Department, after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and the trial judge if available, certifies its opinion that, if the amendments made by this section had been in operation at the time when that person was sentenced, the court by which that person was sentenced would have specified as the relevant part of the sentence such part as is specified in the certificate,

Article 46 of the 1998 Order (as substituted) shall apply as if the relevant part of that person's sentence for the purposes of that Article were the part specified in the certificate.

- (6) But subsection (5) does not apply (and subsection (7) applies instead) where that person is a person whose licence has been revoked under Article 46(2) of the 1998 Order.
- (7) Where this subsection applies, paragraphs (3) to (6) of Article 46B of the 1998 Order have effect as if that person had been recalled to prison under paragraph (2) of that Article on commencement.
- (8) Articles 46A and 46B of the 1998 Order apply to an existing licensee as they apply to a person who is released on licence under Article 46 of that Order (as substituted).
- (9) In this section—

"commencement" means the date on which this section comes into operation:

"existing licensee" means a person who, before commencement, has been discharged on licence under Article 46 of the 1998 Order and whose licence is in force on commencement:

"the 1998 Order" means the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998."

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 15: After clause 7 insert

"Examination of accused through intermediary

Examination of accused through intermediary

- 7B.—(1) In section 12(1) of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 (which at the passing of this Act is not in operation), the inserted Article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 is amended as follows.
- (2) At the beginning of paragraph (2) insert "Subject to paragraph (2A),".
- (3) After paragraph (2) insert—
- "(2A) A court may not give a direction under paragraph (3) unless—
- (a) the court has been notified by the Department of Justice that arrangements for implementing such a direction have been made in relation to that court; and
- (b) the notice has not been withdrawn.
- (2B) The withdrawal of a notice given to a court under paragraph (2A) does not affect the operation of any direction under paragraph (3) given by that court before the notice is withdrawn."." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 16: After clause 7 insert

"Abolition of scandalising the judiciary as form of contempt of court

- 7C.—(1) Scandalising the judiciary (also referred to as scandalising the court or scandalising judges) is abolished as a form of contempt of court under the common law.
- (2) That abolition does not prevent proceedings for contempt of court being brought against a person for conduct that immediately before that abolition would have constituted both scandalising the judiciary and some other form of contempt of court." [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]
- No 17: In clause 9, page 8, line 2, leave out subsections (1) and (2) and insert
- "(1) Except as provided by subsection (2), this Act comes into operation on the day after Royal Assent.
- (2) The following provisions of this Act come into operation on such day or days as the Department may by order appoint—
- (a) section 1 and Schedule 1;
- (b) section (Notification requirements: absence from notified address);
- (c) sections 3 and 4;
- (d) section 7 and Schedules 2 and 3:
- (e) Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule 4 and section 8 so far as relating thereto." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

No 38: In the long title, leave out "and to" and insert "; to".

— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

No 39: In the long title, at end insert

"; to provide for the release on licence of persons detained under Article 45(2) of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998". — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 40: In the long title, at end insert

"; and to amend Article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999".— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 41: In the long title, at end insert

"and to abolish the common law offence of scandalising the judiciary". — [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

Mr Ford: We all know that, every so often, children commit and are convicted of grave offences. In law, that is defined as an offence for which an adult could receive a custodial sentence of 14 years or more. Typically, it will involve a very serious sexual or physical assault. In those circumstances, the standard juvenile justice centre order, with its maximum duration of two years, is not always adequate.

Courts, therefore, have at their disposal determinate detention orders under article 45(2) of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998, which allows them to pass sentences that properly reflect the gravity of the crime. There have been only four or five such orders in the past 10 years, and none has been made since 2008.

Under existing provisions, it is entirely a matter for the Minister of Justice to determine when or if during the sentence a child should be released on licence, the conditions of that licence and matters of breach of licence and recall to custody. As currently framed, the Minister's power is completely unfettered.

Following a recent legal challenge, article 45(2) detention orders and associated article 46 licences have been declared non-compliant with articles 5 and 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights in that they make no provision for the required inclusion in the process of an independent judicial element to determine matters of release, licence conditions and recall to custody. The amendment remedies the matter by removing the Minister of Justice from the process, requiring the court to specify a point at which release on licence should be considered and introducing the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland as the appropriate independent judicial element for determining matters of release, licence conditions and recall to custody.

This not only makes the provisions ECHR compliant but brings them fully into line with all other similar custodial sentences that involve release on licence, such as the extended and indeterminate custodial orders used for public protection. We are, in effect, doing no more than replicating the arrangements that already exist for those other orders.

Amending the provisions in this way maintains an important sentencing option for the courts, meets our convention obligations, links the detention orders to established provisions for other similar orders and strengthens the processes for establishing risk and protecting the public. Crucially, it will also allow us to place the management of the small number of existing cases on a rational and compliant footing.

I now turn to amendment No 15, which inserts a new clause 7B, which involves a minor technical amendment to article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999. That order deals with the examination of an accused person through a registered intermediary. Intermediaries are communication specialists who assist victims, witnesses and defendants with significant communication deficits to communicate their answers more effectively during interview and when giving evidence at trial.

The registered intermediary scheme will be piloted at the Crown Court sitting in Belfast for certain types of offences following commencement of this provision. The new clause inserts a requirement that a statutory notice must be given to a court by the Department before that court may give a direction permitting the examination of an accused through an intermediary. It also provides that the notice can be withdrawn by the Department, and the power of the court to give an intermediary direction, therefore, ceases to exist. The amendment is technical in that it ensures that there is legislative consistency in this respect between the provisions dealing with the accused, and victims and witnesses.

The amendment standing in the name of the Committee Chair relates to the repeal of the common law offence of scandalising the court. I thank the Committee for the work that it has undertaken in bringing forward this amendment. The amendment to insert a new clause 7C equates to that which has been brought forward for England and Wales in the Crime and Courts Bill [HL].

As Members will know, I declined an offer to include Northern Ireland in that Bill because I believe that this is the appropriate place for legislation to be shaped for Northern Ireland — in this Assembly. Before bringing forward an amendment to repeal the offence, England and Wales had the benefit of a Law Commission consultation to gauge views. My preference would have allowed for an opportunity to consult similarly in Northern Ireland at an appropriate time, and to find out whether there were other changes that might be needed to protect the courts. The Committee, however, has chosen, as is its right, to bring forward this amendment, which it is able to do with less of a consultation process than the Department would have been obliged to carry out. I am entirely content that the House decide the issue today.

Finally in this group of amendments is the issue of amendment No 17, which amends the Bill's commencement arrangements. As was the case at introduction, the provision on sex offenders, except those relating to obsolete offences, and on DNA and fingerprints will be commenced by order at a date or dates to be determined. All the other provisions now in the Bill, however, will come into operation immediately after Royal Assent. Amendment Nos 38 to 41 similarly augment the long title to reflect the addition of the new provisions.

I recommend the amendments standing in my name to the House. I am certainly interested to hear the comments from around the House on the Committee Chair's amendment.

Mr Givan: First, I wish to speak on amendment No 16, which the Committee for Justice has brought to the Assembly and which seeks to abolish the offence of scandalising the judiciary as a form of contempt of court under common law, and amendment No 41, which is a consequential amendment that is needed to the long title as a result of our proposed amendment.

I am very pleased to bring amendment No 16 to the House today. The rationale for such an offence derived from the need to uphold public confidence in the administration of justice. However, the last recorded successful prosecutions in England and Wales were in the 1930s. The offence has recently been described as "virtually obsolete." The offence is archaic and should be consigned to the history books.

Members will be well aware that, in March 2012, the Attorney General for Northern Ireland brought a prosecution against Peter Hain MP for the common-law offence of scandalising the court for statements that he made in his book 'Outside In', in which he criticised a judge. The court was invited to make no order after Mr Hain clarified the intention behind his remarks. The prosecution attracted significant media and political interest at the time, with questions being raised about the right to freedom of expression and such criticism being regarded as political speech, and, therefore, under the European Convention on Human Rights, subject to the highest degree of protection, although absolute, and whether the offence was obsolete. Indeed, it was raised by the former Home Secretary, Mr David Blunkett, during Prime Minister's Questions, when he asked:

"Should not respect for the ... judiciary be balanced with the rights of individuals to fair comment on that judiciary?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"let me just say this: there are occasions, as we all know, when judges make critical remarks about politicians; and there are occasions when politicians make critical remarks about judges. To me, that is part of life in a modern democracy, and we ought to keep these things, as far as possible, out of the courtroom."

The prosecution prompted an amendment to be laid by Lord Pannick QC in the House of Lords in relation to the Crime and Courts Bill, proposing the repeal without replacement of the offence of scandalising the court for England, Wales and Northern Ireland. In bringing forward the amendment, Lord Pannick argued:

"There is simply no justification today for maintaining a criminal offence of being rude about the judiciary-scandalising the judges or, as the Scots call it, murmuring judges. We do not protect other public officials in this way. Judges, like all other public servants, must be open to criticism because, in this context as in others, freedom of expression helps to expose error and injustice. It promotes debate on issues of public importance. A criminal offence of scandalising the judiciary may inhibit others from speaking out on perceived judicial errors."

When referring to the case taken by the Attorney General for Northern Ireland against Peter Hain, Lord Pannick stated:

"This bizarre episode has damaged the reputation of the legal system in Northern Ireland". The amendment was withdrawn at Committee Stage to allow the Government time to consider the matter.

The Minister of Justice subsequently wrote to the Committee, informing it that the Minister of State, Lord McNally, had advised that, having considered and consulted on the issue, the Government were minded to support the amendment and wished to know whether Northern Ireland wanted to be included in it. The Minister indicated his preference for local legislation, and stated that he considered that it would be more appropriate for the matter to be looked at separately in a Northern Ireland context.

He, therefore, advised Lord McNally that Northern Ireland should not be included in the Crime and Courts Bill, and asked his officials to take forward work to seek views on this in Northern Ireland. When asked by the Committee for the timescale for completion of that work, the Minister indicated that, subject to any other competing priorities, he planned to take forward a consultation on the issue in the new year.

The Committee considered the matter, and was of the view that the Criminal Justice Bill could provide an appropriate vehicle in which to take forward the repeal of that offence now. The Committee, therefore, agreed that an amendment should be drafted on that basis, and sought advice on whether such an amendment would fall within the scope of the Bill. The Committee also agreed to seek the views of the Attorney General for Northern Ireland, given his interest in the matter, and noted the results of the consultation that was undertaken by the Law Commission in England and Wales, in which there was general support for abolition of the offence in those jurisdictions.

The Attorney General responded by outlining that the Criminal Justice Bill might provide an opportunity to recast scandalising contempt in statutory form rather than repealing the offence. The Committee, however, disagreed, and stated that it wished to see the offence of scandalising the court abolished in Northern Ireland and was content to take forward an appropriate amendment.

Subsequently, during the debate in the House of Lords on 10 December to ratify the amendment in the Crime and Courts Bill, Lord Carswell, a former Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, indicated his support for the amendment.

He stated:

"I have to say, and I hope that they will take this into account, that I cannot see any reason why judges in Northern Ireland should have any different protection from judges in England and Wales against scandalising. I think the same considerations apply, and having been a judge there for 20 years, I would certainly not wish to see any differentiation."

When he said "they", he was referring to the authorities in Northern Ireland.

Following confirmation that the amendment was admissible, the Committee finalised its wording, which is in front of Members today. On the basis that I have outlined, the right thing to do is to abolish the offence in Northern Ireland. The Committee seeks the support of the Assembly for amendment Nos 16 and 41.

12.00 noon

Before I proceed, I also want to speak about this in my capacity as an individual Member. I want to cover a number of areas for the benefit of Members.

First, I want to put on record my appreciation to Lord Justice Girvan and the Attorney General for taking the actions they did. As a result of their actions, this amendment is before us, and the House can ensure that public confidence is not damaged any further than it was by the action taken against Peter Hain. If Members have not reflected on the commentary on this issue in the House of Lords, where there has been considerable debate, there are a number of quotes that, I think, they would benefit from hearing. With Members' indulgence, I plan to go through some of them.

Obviously, Members are aware of Peter Hain's book. Lord Pannick quoted from it in the House of Lords, for Members' benefit, when he said:

"Mr Hain had described the judge and his conduct as 'high-handed and idiosyncratic' and he added that he thought the judge 'off his rocker'."

Lord Pannick went on to say:

"Whatever the merits or lack of — I take no position on this — in Mr Hain's critical comments, surely a former Secretary of State, or indeed any citizen, should be able to express his views about a judge without being threatened with a prison sentence."

I share that view. Lord Pannick also said:

"The irony is that public confidence in the judiciary is undermined far more by legal proceedings that suggest that the judiciary is a delicate flower that will wilt and die without protection from criticism than by a hostile book or newspaper comment that would otherwise have been ignored."

I share entirely the sentiments expressed by Lord Pannick.

This place has the duty — above the judiciary — to ensure that the public have confidence in and support for the functions exercised by the judiciary. That is why the amendment is before Members today. It is there so that we can undo the damage caused by the ridicule and embarrassment that resulted from the case that was taken against Peter Hain.

It is unfair for Members to lay the blame for this solely at the feet of the Attorney General. I disagree with his actions in taking that case, but he made it clear to the Justice Committee that he had received correspondence from Lord Justice Girvan on the issue. So, we had a judge corresponding with the Attorney General on the matter: that is inappropriate. It is not just the Attorney General who we are having to deal with through the amendment. We are also having to ensure that public confidence in our judiciary and the way it operates is not further damaged. Indeed, by passing the amendment today, we can restore public confidence in the way in which the judiciary operates.

The case was withdrawn, and it is important to acknowledge that the Attorney General did not, ultimately, proceed. However, it is important for Members to put the reason why the case did not proceed into context. It did not proceed because Peter Hain provided clarification that it was not his intention to undermine judicial independence in any way. That is why the case did not proceed. It was not necessarily because of the public furore that surrounded it, including the Prime Minister getting involved at Question Time; it was because Peter Hain clarified that that was not his intention, Interestingly, that was touched on in the House of Lords by Lord Bew:

"The Attorney-General made it clear that he would not have set aside the proceedings until the receipt of the letter from the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Mr Hain. In that letter, Mr Hain effectively argued that it had not been his intention in any way to challenge the independence and fairness of the judiciary in Northern Ireland. This is an important point, because I think it quite likely that the Attorney-General for Northern Ireland had in mind the dictum of Lord Russell of Killowen, perhaps the greatest of all the Northern Irish judges of the last century. In 1900, as Chief Justice of England, he offered a dictum in this sort of case that intention was crucial and that there had to be a calculated and clearly deliberate attempt to challenge the independence of the judiciary. By his letter, the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, Mr Hain, put himself on the right side of that dictum by saying that he had no intention in any way to challenge the independence of the judiciary in Northern Ireland.

What this reveals is that the Attorney-General and Sir Declan Morgan, the Lord Chief Justice, as far as I can understand from the remarks that he made at the time that this was a public matter, believe that there was in principle a case in law here, and a legal case that could be taken. That is why we have proposed this amendment. If there is any possibility that there could be such a case brought, which I think would widely be regarded as absurd, we must do what we can to eliminate that possibility."

That, in my view, puts into context why the case did not proceed. That is why I agree with Lord Bew that, if there is any prospect of this case being taken forward, on whatever grounds, it does not merit being treated as a criminal offence. Therefore, I trust that amendment No 16 will be supported by all Members.

It is also important for Members to note that Lord —

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member for giving way. I note that he emphasised that there should be no criminal proceedings in this or similar cases. I agree with the Member on that. However, does the Member not agree that, given the gravity of the allegations made against Lord Justice Girvan, some alternative civil proceedings could and should have been taken to protect his reputation and standing or, indeed, the reputation and standing of any other judicial figure in a similar situation? Mr Hain's written comments went beyond mere criticism and offence. They tended to verge on challenging the integrity of Lord Justice Girvan, for whom many in the legal profession have a great regard. I think that his standing among his peers is second to none.

Mr Givan: The Member's contribution is important, and I will come to that point. In no way should Members regard the amendment as an opportunity for open season on the judiciary. I agree with comments that elected representatives need to demonstrate self-restraint. There is a role for us to uphold the independence of the judiciary. However, there is a balance to all that.

The Member, quite rightly, pointed out that there may have been another vehicle for bringing a challenge, if somebody is offended by a statement made about them. I share that view. Lord Justice Sedley, for example, is the most recent judge to sue for libel. His case against 'The Daily Telegraph' was an example of a Lord Justice clearly feeling that criticism had gone beyond what was reasonable, and he was able to sue for libel. I disagree, however, with attaching a criminal offence to criticism of the judiciary. That is inappropriate. It is inappropriate for a taxpayerfunded Attorney General to be able to take cases of that nature against ordinary citizens, Members of the Assembly or, indeed, for that matter, the former Secretary of State, Peter Hain, with whom I have many disagreements about politics. I am not doing this because I have any particular liking for Peter Hain, but it is the principle that I wish to

It is important to note that, during the debate in the House of Lords, Lord Goldsmith also commented on the issue. He said:

"I was the Attorney-General for Northern Ireland for six years and I was never asked to, nor did I, consider that offence in Northern Ireland-or, indeed, in England and Wales, of which I was also Attorney-General. There does not seem to be any need for the offence and I never saw any need for it at the time."

It is useful to have those statements from a previous Attorney General and someone of such standing as Lord Goldsmith. Lord Carswell, whom I quoted earlier, is a former Chief Justice for Northern Ireland, so I think Members should take on board his comments on the issue. I will quote from Lord Carswell, because these eminent individuals are much more capable than I of articulating what I am trying to convey, and they carry much more weight than I do, certainly within the environs in which they operate in the legal system. Lord Carswell said:

"I did not consider for a moment instigating a prosecution or suggesting to the Attorney-General - who was not the noble and learned Lord, Lord Goldsmith, but a predecessor — that a prosecution should be bought. There were deeply scandalous assertions in a certain newspaper that I had come to the conclusions I had reached in criminal trials on the instructions of the Government, more or less, without saying it, as their cat's paw. I was deeply offended and I deeply resented it. I was scandalised, but not for one moment would I have considered asking the Attorney-General whether he would consider bringing contempt proceedings — or, rather, a scandalising prosecution ... it is not necessary in modern conditions: not necessary for a sophisticated society; and not necessary for judges who have to have the hardihood to put up with comments which sometimes may be unfair, badly based and just plain vulgar rudeness. However, that is part of what they have to do: they have to shrug their shoulders and get on with it. It is for that reason that, although I was very cross at the time about it, I certainly did not invoke the criminal law."

Lord Carswell's opinion of how the case to do with Peter Hain was handled by the Attorney General and the judiciary in Northern Ireland is pretty devastating. I will pick up on some other quotes. During the debate, Lord Pannick and a number of Members intimated their unease that Northern Ireland was not moving on the issue. Lord Pannick made the point that he was disappointed that Northern Ireland was not going to move on it — I think it was in the debate of 10 December — and he made the following commentary on that:

"It is ironic that the impetus for this amendment came from the Peter Hain case in Northern Ireland, and now the anachronistic law that led to that case is to be abolished in England and Wales but not in Northern Ireland."

He makes a valid point. How absurd would it be, given that the case emanated from Northern Ireland, if they abolished the offence in England and Wales but it is retained in Northern Ireland? That would be simply absurd, and it is therefore important that we move to deal with this amendment

Lord Lester of Herne Hill said:

"Even though the amendment springs from a problem that arose in Northern Ireland, I am doubtful as to whether the Northern Ireland Government will agree to bring their common law into line with what we are doing in England and Wales."

Maybe he was right in that respect — that the Executive had not been looking at the issue and the Minister had not brought it to the Executive's attention — but the Justice Committee of this place has decided to take action in respect of that. So, in response to Lord Pannick and Lord Lester of Herne Hill, I say that I appreciate their interest in the affairs of Northern Ireland and they can be assured that this Assembly has decided to ensure that Northern Ireland is not left in the dark ages when it comes to this offence.

It is important that Members recognise that the actions that resulted from this case have a chilling effect on the citizen's ability to pass comment on judicial decisions. I certainly recognise that. I know that many in this place are certainly no shrinking violets when it comes to expressing their opinions, and I would not for one moment think that Members of this place would shirk their responsibilities, where criticism is merited, to pass judgement on judicial decisions. Indeed, I have done so. I was critical of the sentence awarded to one of the killers of Constable Carroll, a sentence handed down by Lord Justice Girvan. That sentence has now been referred, and I trust that that matter will be dealt with, as the Director of Public Prosecutions now deals with that case.

Devolution of justice is new to Northern Ireland, and Members are seeking to tread carefully on this issue. We are seeking to build relationships. In that respect, I commend the Lord Chief Justice, Sir Declan Morgan, in all this. I have found him always to be amenable. He has offered to come to the Committee for Justice, which will be the first occasion on which a Lord Chief Justice has been prepared to engage with this place on judicial matters beyond his scope as chairman of the Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission. We will be able to engage with him on judicial matters, which is a very welcome development. I want to encourage Sir Declan Morgan to continue to bring the judiciary forward with him. It is important that that work continues.

The Lord Chief Justice, in a speech to the Law Society of Ireland in Dublin on 10 May 2012, commented on this issue. He gave a lecture on the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 and on how it has given the judiciary a greater role in the interchange with the legislatures. He said:

"The principal purpose of this lecture is to demonstrate that in my jurisdiction the incorporation of significant elements of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law has caused a change in the relationship between the judiciary, the executive and the legislature."

He went on to say:

"In carrying out the task of securing equilibrium we must all remember that our principal objective is to secure public confidence in the administration of justice."

He continued:

"It also means that an independent judiciary is entitled to expect its position to be respected and secured by Ministers and legislators, but must itself show proper respect for the role which others play in our justice system."

I support that comment. The independent judiciary has the right to require that legislators and the executive uphold the right to judicial independence. However, let me make it very clear: this place has primacy. We set the law, and we make the law. Judges make their decisions within the legal framework that we set as the elected representatives, as the people ask us to do. We will uphold the right of the judiciary to take those decisions within the legal framework that is established by this place, which has primacy in all this. It is important that we show respect in the way in which we conduct ourselves with the judiciary. I agree with that.

I will conclude this part of my speech on this group of amendments by bringing Members' attention once again to the Lord Chief Justice's speech. He said:

"The judiciary, as I often say, is independent, but it is not isolated. We participate and we listen willingly to the other voices in the conversation. For my part, I will do all that I can to ensure that the difficult issues we face as we establish our devolved justice institutions are determined in an atmosphere of mutual respect. At the end of the day, we are all working towards the same goal of ensuring our justice system has the full and deserved confidence of the public."

I agree with that quote from the Lord Chief Justice. Let me conclude on this point by quoting Lord Pannick as he concluded his speech in the debate in the House of Lords:

"As Justice Albie Sachs said on this subject in a judgment in the Constitutional Court of South Africa in 2001, respect for the courts will be all the stronger, 'to the degree that it is earned, rather than to the extent that it is commanded'."

I urge Members to support the Committee on the amendment. We tabled it to deal with this issue effectively and conclusively.

In my capacity as Chairman of the Committee, I turn to amendment Nos 14 and 15, both of which were brought to the Committee by the Department at Committee Stage. The Committee received information in relation to the new clause created by amendment No 14 only a few days before the Committee Stage was completed, which provided virtually no time for the Committee to consider the proposed clause properly. Noting that a legal challenge in an existing case has exposed that the current legislation concerning licence arrangements relating to the release of young offenders convicted of certain serious crimes is unlikely to be compliant with the European Convention on Human Rights, the Committee briefly considered the Department's proposed provision. Given that the principal test under the new arrangements will be the protection of the public, the Committee is content to support that amendment.

As the Minister has outlined, amendment No 15 is required to address an omission with regard to the planned registered intermediary scheme and the issuing and withdrawal of statutory notices in relation to the examination of vulnerable defendants through an intermediary. The Committee noted that the Department considers it unlikely that the power to suspend the scheme will need to be exercised but it is prudent to have the safeguard in place. The Committee is content to support the inclusion of the new clause through amendment No 15.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the amendments tabled by the Minister and those on scandalising the court tabled by the Committee Chair. I want to say a few words on scandalising the court. The Minister has said that he spurned the opportunity to allow Westminster to legislate on the matter. That is a very good principle and perhaps one that we will follow in future. The Chair said, in relation to the Assembly, that:

"We set the law, and we make the law."

It is interesting that, not so long ago, we were criticised for not supporting a legislative consent motion on the National Crime Agency (NCA). Perhaps if we all —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will give way, certainly.

Mr Ford: While the Member definitely makes a good political point, he needs to acknowledge that there is a difference between Westminster legislation that deals with UK-wide matters that impinge on Northern Ireland and an issue that lies solely with this House. The issue of scandalising the court is the latter, and that is why I was so determined that we would not consider Westminster legislating for us.

Mr McCartney: I will quote the Chair again:

"We set the law, and we make the law."

Let that be our guiding principle.

The Chair said that he did not often find himself agreeing with Peter Hain. I want to be very careful here. Peter Hain said that a judge was "off his rocker". At that, I will — what would they say in court, Alban? — rest my case. I do not want to make any further comment on that. The reason why we support the repeal of this legislation is that we believe that there is already sufficient legislative protection in place for anybody in public office who feels that their integrity or the role that they play in the judiciary or another public office is being attacked.

I followed the commentary on the issue, and it was interesting that a lot of people at Westminster, in particular, seemed to get very upset about this. However, they missed an aspect of it in some regards. The Attorney General addressed that at the Committee and in some of his public commentary. Peter Hain did not just say that a particular judge was off his rocker; he went on to say something else in his role as British Secretary of State. Indeed, the reason why he said that the judge was off his rocker is that he lost a case against him. It is some criterion if you are part of a process to appoint somebody to the higher levels of the judiciary and, having lost a case against them and said that they are off their rocker, you can then say, "I will not let you become a High Court judge". There might be many people working in the judicial process who are saying today, "I hope that Members of the Assembly are never put in a position where they can do that". That was the essence of the case, as well. That needed to be there, because Peter Hain should not have said that. He could have said the judge was off his rocker or stupid in the decision he made, but he should not have alluded to the fact that, if he had had his way, he would have prevented somebody going into public office simply because he lost a case against him. That is not a standard that we should allow to prevail.

The Chair spoke about this, and Albie Sachs is an exemplary person to set the standard. Whatever respect people have for the judicial process, it should be earned and not commanded. I agree with that. In Committee, we said, particularly when the Minister came around that time, that independence is one thing as a principle but it does not free any person, be it a judge or anybody else, from criticism of what they do. As I said in Committee, people have raised their voice against judicial decisions — they may not have described people who then became Lord Chief Justice in another jurisdiction as "off their rocker". but what they said was that they were wrong — and they were proved, eventually, to be right. When we had this discussion before, Tom Elliott, I think, accused us of not supporting the rule of law because we might question a judicial system or a police decision. As I pointed out to him then, the rule of law is not absolute either. It does not stand apart from the right of people to say that it is wrong. If you do not say that it is wrong, you end up with injustice being heaped upon injustice.

So, although we agree that this legislation is archaic and out of date, the Attorney General said clearly that Peter Hain corrected what he had said and, in essence, changed the sense of what he had said. He may still think that Lord Chief Justice Girvan is off his rocker — he may think all those things — but I think he accepted that, when you are in high office, you cannot hold against a judicial figure the fact that you lost a case and use it as an impediment to him or her progressing their career. That was the core of the message, and it was missed by all the great and the good in Westminster. Sometimes, having "Lord" or "Lord Chief Justice" in front of your name does not make you impeccable. There are many Lord Chief Justices who were in charge of tribunals and judges in charge of cases in England who became the Lord Chief Justice about whom many, many people said that they were rewarded by people like the British Prime Minister. So, the British Prime Minister may have got a laugh or two in Westminster when Mr Hain made his comments, but British Prime Ministers are not beyond reproach either.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.28 pm.

On resuming (Mr Speaker in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Mr Speaker: Yesterday, I raised the issue of Members not being in their place during Question Time, especially Members who have their name on the Order Paper for a question. One Member, Caitríona Ruane, has come through my door to apologise. Thus far, I have had nobody else. We know which Members were not in their place yesterday, and there is still time for Members either to come to this House and apologise or come through my office door and apologise. I will take confessions, wherever they may be.

Mr A Maginness: Especially during Lent.

Mr Speaker: Yes, during any time, whether in my office or here in the Chamber.

Let us move on to questions to the Education Minister. Question 4 has been withdrawn.

Education

Woodlands Language Unit

1. Mr Eastwood asked the Minister of Education to outline the rationale for the proposed relocation of Woodlands speech and language unit to three separate primary schools. (AQO 3427/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Article 7 of the Education Order 1996 provides that children with special educational needs will be educated in mainstream schools. That also applies to children who have statements of special educational needs, unless that is incompatible with a parent's wishes or with the provision of efficient education for other children.

All education and library boards and schools have a duty to comply with that legislation. The Western Education and Library Board has, therefore, developed a policy that requires such facilities to be located at mainstream schools. In line with its policy, the Western Education and Library Board had been in discussions with the board of governors of Belmont House Special School about the relocation and extension of the current provision.

The proposal is to relocate and increase the four speech and language classes to six units at three mainstream primary school locations in both the controlled and maintained sectors. Following consultation with parents and other directly affected parties, the board and the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools have now brought forward development proposals to support that intent. Copies of the proposal can be viewed on the Western Board's website. Those development proposals were published in the week beginning 21 January 2013 and are, therefore, in the statutory two-month period during which any interested party may make their views known to the Department.

I have accepted an invitation to visit the unit during the consultation period. Once the consultation has ended, I will take account of all the issues and then make a decision on the proposals based on what I believe is in the best educational interests of the children concerned.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for his answer. We have been told by parents and staff that this will be an extremely traumatic move for many pupils, many of whom have a high level of need. Can the Minister outline the perceived benefit for those kids if they are moved into three separate primary schools, given that so many relationships and so much experience has been built up in that one unit?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his supplementary. I am in a somewhat difficult position when answering questions on this matter at this time, because I am the adjudicator in the case. I am involved in a statutory process, and I have to adhere to all the legislation. I am involved in a consultation process and have not come to any conclusions on the matter.

I will visit the school in a number of weeks to talk to the parents, teachers and pupils directly and to listen to their experiences. When I have gathered all the other consultation responses, I will make an informed decision. I understand that the Member has the right to raise the matter during Question Time, but, as a Minister, I am in a somewhat difficult position in giving detailed answers to questions posed at this time.

Mr Storey: I appreciate what the Minister says about being able to answer specific questions on this case. Special needs provision that historically has been in the controlled sector is being divided up into other sectors, and that is setting a bad precedent. Will he give this House an assurance that, if we move towards any new structures under the Education and Skills Authority (ESA), the special needs provision that has been in the controlled sector will still be provided in the controlled sector?

Mr O'Dowd: Again, the Member invites me to respond to specifics on the issue, and I cannot do that. I will take into consideration all the matters pertinent to the case before I make a decision. Part of that decision-making process will be not only about whether the school should close but where the children will be dispersed to and what the mechanisms and management types of those schools will be should dispersion take place. I will take into account all of those matters.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I do not want the Minister to repeat himself, as he has gone some way to answer my supplementary. Given the significant concerns among the parents and, indeed, the pupils, will the Minister, when he has considered all of the concerns, come back and inform the House of the outcome?

Mr O'Dowd: I assure the Member that I will take into consideration the issues raised with me by all respondents to the consultation, particularly the parents and pupils affected. The usual process for an announcement on a development proposal is not to make a statement to the House but to make a written proclamation of what has been decided. First to receive that will be the school, parents and pupils, and it will then be made public.

Rural Primary Schools

2. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Education how small rural primary schools will be protected in light of the review of the common funding formula recommended by Sir Robert Salisbury. (AQO 3428/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Last summer, I appointed Sir Robert Salisbury to carry out a completely independent review of the common funding scheme. I received his report last month, and I am now considering its findings and recommendations in depth.

The review has raised concerns that small schools support is currently provided to all small schools, irrespective of circumstances or location. In the current financial year, £29 million was distributed via the small schools support factor in the current common funding formula. The small schools support factor allocates a tapered lump sum to all primary schools with fewer than 300 pupils and post-primary schools with fewer than 550 pupils.

The Salisbury report recommends the development of a small schools policy, whereby strategically necessary small schools, most likely to be small rural primary schools, would be funded outside the formula to ensure that they have sufficient funds to meet their needs. I will assess the impact of this recommendation, along with the others in the report, very carefully to inform my proposals for change, which I intend to submit later in the year. These will, of course, be subject to public consultation.

I reiterate that schools will not be closed simply because they fall below a threshold. Where it can be demonstrated that a small school is needed and can provide the appropriate quality of education, it should be retained and supported.

Mr G Robinson: Will the Minister tell us whether he still accepts the criterion set out by the Bain report that 105 is the appropriate number of pupils for a sustainable rural primary school?

Mr O'Dowd: I have always said that it is not a numbers game on either side of the argument, whether the numbers meet the sustainable schools criteria or fall below them. There are six factors to be taken into account when assessing whether a school is viable into the future, and all of those will be taken into account in making any decisions on small schools.

The Salisbury report calls on my Department to bring forward a policy on funding for small schools and the identification of small schools. The Member will note that the current funding formula does not match the sustainable schools funding formula. For instance, all primary schools with fewer than 300 pupils receive a small schools grant, and all post-primary schools with fewer than 550 pupils receive that grant. Those figures do not match those in the sustainable schools policy. However, I emphasise again that it is not a numbers game.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaimm buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. Will the Minister outline the ways in which the revised common funding formula will help to tackle educational disadvantage in all communities, whether rural or urban?

Mr O'Dowd: One of the main drivers behind my commissioning of the Salisbury review was to ensure that we are targeting social need, and that was stated in the review's terms of reference. All the evidence shows, as the Audit Office report showed again this morning, that educational underattainment exists largely in communities that suffer social deprivation. Therefore, I want to ensure that the Department directs its finances to the schools that service the communities that suffer most from socioeconomic deprivation.

The Salisbury report has made a number of recommendations on how we can do that. I am considering those along with all of the other recommendations because I want to ensure that my Department's budget is used to create a world-class education system and tackle educational underachievement. If we are to do that, we have to back up our policies with our finances.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Parents of primary-school children are very concerned, especially after the Bain report on school numbers and now the Salisbury report on funding. Has the Minister looked at what the timing will be when he comes back with his proposals on area planning so that we can stop frightening parents and produce something solid at the end?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept this terminology of frightened parents, etc. Of course, I am glad to say that parents take a keen interest in their children's education and in the schools estate. However, I am of the view that the majority of people realise that we have an unsustainable schools estate and that, if we are to use our limited resources properly, we should use them for sustainable schools that are properly planned and able to provide a modern education system for children. So, I do not accept some of the Member's terminology.

I hope to be in a position to make a statement to the Assembly next week on post-primary area plans. As a part of that statement, I will outline my way forward for primary-school area plans.

Education and Skills Authority

3. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Education to outline the projected annual budget of the proposed Education and Skills Authority. (AQO 3429/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: It is expected that the projected annual budget for the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) will largely be the sum of the budgets of the existing eight arm's-length bodies that will transfer to ESA. Those are: the five education and library boards; the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS); the staff commission; and the Youth Council. The budget in 2012-13 for those eight bodies was £1·476 billion resource and £58 million capital.

In addition, the Department currently carries out the role of funding authority for voluntary grammar and grant-maintained integrated schools. That function and some other operational duties that the Department carries out, such as capital funding for the voluntary maintained schools, will also transfer to ESA, along with any associated resources.

Work is ongoing to establish the level of funding for ESA, but, at this stage, a high-level estimate of the annual budget is somewhere in the region of £1·8 billion resource and £0·2 billion capital. That is based on the budget that is currently available for education in 2014-15.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that response. ESA is meant to be about saving money and being more efficient, but it will effectively become possibly the largest quango in Europe. Will the Minister detail exactly when he will bring the business case for ESA to the Department of Finance and Personnel so that the true scale of the cost will be known?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept the Member's description of ESA, and I note his party's stated opposition to it, although I am not absolutely clear what that opposition is based on. I suspect that it is more political than educational. If it is political, as I suspect, his party could be in danger of damaging our society's educational potential. I have yet to hear a rational argument why his party is opposed to ESA.

It will not be the largest quango in Europe or anywhere near that size. In fact, I question whether ESA meets the definition of a quango, considering that it is democratically accountable to my Department and the Executive.

On the question of when the business case will come forward, my Department is currently working on it and it will be presented in due course.

Mr Campbell: The Minister previously outlined a number of administrative savings that are ongoing and that have been ongoing in recent years. Does he envisage further savings if and when ESA is established?

Mr O'Dowd: Continued savings will be a matter for the ESA board and will also depend on what the education budget looks like at that time. However, it is expected that the establishment of ESA will initially save around £25 million a year on professional support for schools, as we will have an amalgamated service. The rationalisation of education administration under ESA will help to deliver £15 million of savings made a year from the administration and management costs of the Department of Education's arm's-length bodies.

The savings issue is vital, but the main driver behind ESA is to ensure that we have an educational body that will deliver a modern, fit-for-purpose education service for the communities that it serves. The education boards are outdated. That in no way undermines the good work that their officers and board members carried out, but our current management system is outdated. ESA's function is to modernise that and deliver an effective, efficient education service to the people it serves.

2.15 pm

Mr Dallat: I have listened very carefully to the Minister's replies so far. I am sure that he is aware that there was another publication from the Audit Office on literacy and numeracy today. Will the Minister assure the House that, once and for all, ESA will put an end to the affront of 9,000 children a year leaving school without the ability to read and write?

Mr O'Dowd: The report does not state that 9,000 children are leaving school without the ability to read and write. It states that there are 9,000 children whose numeracy and literacy skills are not what they should be.

Will the Member, as a member of the Public Accounts Committee, assure me that he will give the report a fair hearing? I note from reading the papers today that he has already made judgement on it without even a hearing at the Public Accounts Committee. As Minister, I expect that the Public Accounts Committee will give the Audit Office report a fair hearing. I welcome the Audit Office report; however, it does not tell us anything that we did not already know. No Member of the House should be surprised by the findings of the Audit Office report.

My party has been shouting from the hilltops for years about the fact that we do not have a world-class education system, while others were shouting back that we had, and telling us, "If it's not broke, don't fix it." We were saying that it desperately needs to be fixed. The Audit Office report highlights the fact that policies are in place that will fix it, but that will take time and further resources. However, I await the Public Accounts Committee's hearing in relation to the Audit Office report, and I will study the recommendations very carefully.

Mr Speaker: Question 4 has been withdrawn.

St Columbanus' College, Bangor

5. Dr McDonnell asked the Minister of Education for an update on the newbuild proposals for St Columbanus' College, Bangor, which were agreed by his Department in 2006. (AQO 3431/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: In my statement to the Assembly in the autumn of 2011 entitled 'Putting Pupils First: Shaping Our Future', I set out the challenges associated with the schools estate. One of the major challenges is the need to balance limited capital resources with the large-scale investment needed across the estate. Using the strategic work on area planning, I have moved to ensure that capital investment is targeted to ensure the delivery of modern, fit-for-purpose schools that will be sustainable in the future.

In June 2012, I set out my Department's capital investment plans to invest over £133 million in 18 newbuild projects. On 22 January, I made a further statement to the Assembly, indicating that I proposed to advance in planning 22 school building projects as part of a £220 million investment

I understand that St Columba's will be disappointed not to be included in my announcement. However, I must stress that this in no way implies that the newbuild proposal at the school will not be considered at a later stage. The reality is that the need for investment across the estate far exceeds the funds available to me through the remainder of this spending review period. I will continue to examine the case for capital investment, including the proposals for schools such as St Columba's, which will be considered alongside other priorities as part of any future capital announcement.

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that that school meets the criteria as an effective school and as an outstanding example of shared education in practice? Will he tell us what the governors of the school must do to ensure that St Columbanus is part of the next newbuild round?

Mr O'Dowd: I apologise: it is St Columbanus; I referred to St Columba's during my response.

The reports from the school are all very good. Many schools out there were not included in my capital builds announcement. That is in no way a reflection on the school, its management or the quality of education there. It is a reflection of the fact that we have a very limited capital budget to work with, and I have to have some form of criteria to match my need for builds against the budget.

I have published the criteria that I used on the Department's website. St Columbanus went through that criteria but it did not score as high as other schools. I intend to continue to work with my Executive colleagues to see whether we can secure capital funding. I am looking at my own budget to see whether further capital funding can be secured, and I want to be in a position to make further announcements in the future

The chapter is not closed in relation to St Columbanus, or many other schools out there. I assure the Member that I continue to examine all possible ways forward to secure future builds.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for his answers. I am still unclear, though, after his response to Mr McDonnell, whether he accepts that St Columbanus' requires a newbuild and, if it was not a case of limited finances, would he be in a position to say that that school requires a newbuild should finances become available?

Mr O'Dowd: I accept that St Columbanus requires a newbuild. I also realise that I do not have enough funds to rebuild all the schools that are out there. I require continued work on area planning in that constituency, however, and there has to be work carried out between that education and library board and the Belfast board on the number of pupils leaving Bangor and going back and forth to Belfast, etc. However, I accept here today that St Columbanus is on a lengthy list of other schools that require a newbuild. I also accept that we have to try to secure further funding to build them.

Education Bill: Voluntary Grammar Schools

6. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Education what meetings he has held in 2013 with representatives of the voluntary grammar schools concerning the Education Bill. (AQO 3432/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: I have not met representatives of any voluntary grammar school this year specifically concerning the Education Bill; nor were any requests received by my office to do so. The Education Bill is being considered by the Education Committee. I understand that voluntary grammar schools have made representations to the Committee and I await the Committee's report.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his answer. What steps could the Minister take to allay concerns about potential departmental interference in employment arrangements in that sector?

Mr O'Dowd: Departmental interference in employment arrangements in that sector? May I remind the Member that the Department, on behalf of the people, funds that sector to the tune of hundreds of millions of pounds. So, it is not interference; it is called public accountability with regard to employment and funding matters.

The voluntary principle is somewhat of a misnomer in the sense that if schools wanted to go voluntary and fund themselves, I would agree that the Department, the Assembly or anyone else should not interfere in their business. However, as long as any sector is funded from the public purse, in my opinion the Department has a duty to be involved in those schools, although not on a day-to-day basis, a weekly basis or even a monthly basis.

The ESA Bill as set out clause by clause is loyal to the heads of agreement, which allows voluntary grammar schools to continue to be voluntary grammar schools. It does not interfere with the voluntary principle in any way and allows those schools to continue unhindered as they were before.

In relation to employment matters, I think it is important that ESA becomes the single employer. I ask Members to cast their minds back to the dispute over classroom assistants at the start of the last mandate. All Members and parties quite rightly supported classroom assistants in achieving a pay rise. All were very vocal and supportive about that, and a settlement was eventually reached. A number of classroom assistants in voluntary grammar schools have still not received that award.

I use that as an example. However, if we had a single employing authority, that matter would not arise. Everyone would be entitled to the minimum standards of employment and wage control, and that is to the benefit of the employer. We should also be looking to the benefits for the employee in these matters, because every worker in the education sector should be treated the same.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I think I heard him say that it is desirable that ESA should be the ultimate employer for all staff. I know that I am jumping ahead to what is in question 8, but how does he reconcile that with 10(c) of the heads of agreement, which says the opposite?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not believe that there is a contradiction between 10(c) and ESA as the employing authority — 10(c) is there to offer reassurances to the voluntary sector in this matter. I believe that the Bill reflects the heads of agreement quite loyally. ESA is the employing authority. The day-to-day employment schemes of a school are the responsibility of the school. For the want of a better phrase, the hiring and firing of staff remains the responsibility of the school. That is in legislation.

The original question asked whether I could offer reassurances. The question is, do people want to be reassured or is their opposition really to ESA? I cannot reassure someone who does not want to be reassured.

Mr I McCrea: The Minister stated that he did not receive any request from or, indeed, met the voluntary grammar sector. Will he confirm whether he has or has not met with the Catholic maintained sector, either the governing body or trustees?

Mr O'Dowd: I can confirm it, because I have had a request to meet them, and I accepted that request. Does the Member want me to write to all the bodies and ask whether they want to meet me? That is not how it works. Representative bodies write to me. They ask the Minister for a meeting.

In my term as Minister, I have met representatives of the voluntary grammar sector on several occasions. I have spoken at conferences where there has been a large representation from the voluntary grammar sector. I have engaged in debate with the sector, and will continue to, around the matter. I have no problem meeting the voluntary grammar sector on this or any other subject. My response clearly states that I have not been asked for a meeting on this matter.

The Education Committee is dealing with the Bill. I am keeping abreast of developments in Committee. There have been several representations, as there should have been, from the voluntary grammar sector to the Education Committee. I await the Education Committee's report. If the voluntary sector wishes to meet me on the subject, my door is open.

Mr McGimpsey: Is the Minister prepared to accept amendments to the Bill to ensure fair representation for the voluntary grammar sector, the integrated sector and other sectors?

Mr O'Dowd: I find it amazing that, on the day on which the Audit Office report is published — a report that highlights in particular the need in working-class communities for equitable access to education — the only question that I am asked in the Chamber on the ESA Bill is on the needs of the voluntary grammar sector. Is any Member on the opposite Benches ever going to get around to asking this question: how does ESA meet the needs of the working-class Protestant communities? Will any Member on the opposite Benches ever get around to asking that question? I have been debating ESA in the Chamber for several years, even before I was Minister. I have yet to hear a Member from the opposite Benches ask this question: how does ESA meet the needs of Protestant working-class communities?

Mr Allister: Having avoided the question from Mr McGimpsey, will the Minister tell me why it is that the voluntary sector, which educates almost one third of children in the post-primary education field, is denied in his Bill representation in the composition of the board and funding for that sectoral representation and body? Why is that, if he has not got an innate bias towards the sector?

Mr O'Dowd: When the Member is standing at his next flag protest, whipping up the concerns of the Protestant working class, perhaps he can talk to them about educational underachievement. Perhaps he can talk to them about the Audit Office report. Perhaps he can tell them — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister must be heard.

Mr O'Dowd: Perhaps he can tell them how he is so concerned about the needs of the Protestant working-class community that he has joined the opposite Benches, in that he has not asked a single question about it in his two years in office.

Mr Allister: Answer the question.

Mr O'Dowd: I will answer the question — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Dowd: I will answer the question for the Member, because he has never put a question to me yet that I could not answer. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Dowd: The answer is quite simple. The Member is aware of the heads of agreement document from the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. I was tasked, as Minister of Education, to faithfully produce legislation that matched the heads of agreement. I have faithfully produced legislation that matches the heads of agreement.

Autism: Home Education

7. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of Education what opportunities exist for parents of autistic children who wish to implement specific home-based education. (AQO 3433/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Parents of children of compulsory school age, including parents of children with special educational needs such as autism, may choose to educate their child at home. The parent has a statutory duty to ensure that the education provided is suited to the child's age, ability, aptitude and any special educational needs that the child may have.

The education and library boards are required to ensure that children in their area are receiving efficient, full-time education that is appropriate to the child's age, ability, aptitude and any special educational needs. In discharging that duty, the boards ensure that special educational needs provision is matched to the individual needs of each child. That is the case whether it is provided in special schools, in special units attached to mainstream schools, in mainstream schools themselves, at hospital or through home education.

Support provided by the boards may include advice and guidance to the parent on suitable learning materials, training or examination options. The level of training and advisory support will relate to the age and developmental profile of the child or young person. The board will monitor the educational provision in place to ensure that it is effective and that the needs of the child continue to be met.

2.30 pm

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his answer. Can he indicate whether he is prepared to ensure that there is no variance from board to board in supporting homebased education?

Mr O'Dowd: That relates to the debate on the previous question. One of the reasons behind ESA was to bring in equality of provision across all areas of the North to ensure that there was not a postcode lottery, particularly with regard to special educational needs. The Member will be aware that we have gone through the SEN review. My Department is drawing up legislation regarding that matter to ensure that there is equality of provision with regard to special educational needs throughout the North.

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Mr Speaker: Question 5 has been withdrawn and transferred to DFP.

Trade Missions

1. Mr McDevitt asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline any planned trade missions involving her Department during 2013. (AQO 3442/11-15)

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Invest Northern Ireland's annual programme of trade exhibitions and missions offers opportunities for companies to visit markets of potential. The January 2013 to March 2014 programme includes over 85 exhibitions and missions to more than 35 countries or regions, including China, Europe, India, Kurdistan, the Middle East, New Zealand, North America, Russia, South Africa and South America

Mr McDevitt: Thank you, indeed, Mr Speaker. I join the Minister in acknowledging the very good work that Invest Northern Ireland does on behalf of our region. Of course, another component of international trade development is the development of our tourism market. Can the Minister confirm to the House that her Department supports the global greening initiative, which, this year, will see world landmarks including the pyramids in Egypt and the Christ the Redeemer statue in Rio de Janeiro turn green? Can she confirm that the First Minister and deputy First Minister will be able to support, in person, the Rio de Janeiro initiative, when they soon visit Brazil?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. Of course, the greening initiative is Tourism Ireland's initiative, and it has been going on for a considerable time. I think that it has got the leaning tower of Pisa and Sydney Opera House involved in the past, and I think they are looking for new and innovative ways of doing it. So, Tourism Ireland will continue to look to that. I am interested in how Tourism Ireland will give standout to Northern Ireland in respect of what it does across the world, particularly in relation to Belfast and the difficulties that have been ongoing. I am interested in how it will address those issues — [Interruption.] Sorry?

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister is speaking.

Mrs Foster: — particularly in the Great Britain market. I know that Members would like us all to go to Brazil to see the Christ the Redeemer statue, but I am looking at the Great Britain market to see how we can deal with those issues there. That is where my main focus is. Mr Speaker, I think Mr McDevitt would like another question.

Mr I McCrea: Will the Minister update the House on the Gulfood event that is planned? What does she hope to achieve out of it?

Mrs Foster: The Gulfood event takes place next week, and I am very much looking forward to being part of that trade mission and exhibition. We are taking companies out with us to underline the message about good food coming from Northern Ireland, not only for people in Northern Ireland — goodness knows, that message needs to be reinforced during these days — but in relation to exports across the world. It is an event that is held annually in Dubai, and it is billed as the world's biggest annual food and hospitality show. It covers food, beverages, ingredients, food service and hospitality. It has been running for over 25 years and attracts potential buyers across the Middle East, Africa and south Asia, so we very much look forward to that exhibition and hope that our companies get good feedback from that - if you will pardon the pun.

Mr Kinahan: Can the Minister clarify how successful she has been in getting Northern Ireland representation on to trade missions facilitated by UK Trade and Investment?

Mrs Foster: We are working more closely than ever with UK Trade and Investment, and we very much welcome the support that we now receive from our embassies across the world when we go out there. Now, they are more focused on how they can help businesses in the UK than on matters of diplomacy, as they were, primarily, in the past. We very much welcome that because they can help us with meeting people when we are out in the market and with giving us that little bit of extra knowledge, particularly in relation to culture and customs. So, we very much use the embassy network right across the world. Often, in that embassy network, UKTI sits side by side. We work closely with UKTI, and I would like to see more and more of our companies going on UKTI missions. Obviously, we have our own mission agenda, which I laid out in my substantive answer, but I very much want to encourage companies to be part of UKTI trade missions as well.

Economic Productivity

2. Mr Elliott asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline her Department's target in reducing the productivity gap with the rest of the United Kingdom. (AQO 3443/11-15)

Mrs Foster: My Department does not have any explicit target relating to reducing the productivity gap with the rest of the UK.

Mr Elliott: Obviously, the Minister will be aware that there was a target for the productivity gap in the PFG for 2008-2011. How will she monitor the ongoing productivity gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK in the current financial period?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. Of course, he is correct to say that we had a target in the previous Programme for Government. We moved away from that because the independent review of economic policy felt that we really needed to look at export-related growth and to prioritise exports as a key driver of economic growth at regional level.

We will monitor very closely, for our own purposes and, indeed, for those of the economic strategy, the productivity gap between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. The Member probably recalls that the target in the Programme for Government 2008-2011 was to halve the private sector productivity gap with the UK average, excluding the greater south-east, by 2015. Of course, we will continue to monitor that.

Mr G Robinson: Can the Minister give an update on recent investment success delivered by Invest Northern Ireland?

Mrs Foster: We were very pleased to see the announcement last week by Caterpillar of the 200 new jobs that it is creating at Springvale in west Belfast. We are very pleased indeed because that came as a result of interventions that we made after the devastating announcement in September last year of the loss of manufacturing jobs at FG Wilson, now Caterpillar. Sometimes, we have to say to companies, "You may have decided to move these jobs to another area, but is there something else that Northern Ireland can help you with?". We ask them what else we can help them to achieve from their company's point of view. In that respect, we have been able to bring those jobs to Northern Ireland and Belfast. They are shared services jobs. We are facilitating the Caterpillar group right across Europe, the Middle East and Africa. I understand that those jobs will service around 28,000 people in human resources, accountancy and all those issues. We should be proud that we have been able to bring those jobs here to Belfast.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Does the Minister agree that moves to increase productivity here could really be enhanced if we had access to complete and accurate public accounts and a stronger suite of economic indicators specific to this region?

Mrs Foster: That is why the independent review of economic policy asked us to get those indicators. The

Tuesday 19 February 2013 Oral Answers

Member will know — at least, I hope that he knows — that those indicators came out about two weeks ago. They will continue to inform us moving forward.

Mr Rogers: Does the Minister agree that the skills gap that employers find when hiring is a serious problem in dealing with low productivity and that a strategy between our schools, colleges and industry is essential if we are really to address that?

Mrs Foster: I suppose that the answer to that question really depends on the sector that the Member is talking about. There are some sectors where, I think, we are meeting employers' skills needs. However, in certain sectors where we have seen quite rapid growth over the past number of years — I am pleased to see that rapid growth — we need to do more on skills. Sometimes, when parents want their children and young people to move into professions such as law or accountancy or, indeed, to become a doctor, I ask them where the jobs will be for our young people. Certainly, in IT, a wide range of jobs is available to young people. Indeed, there seem to be a number of jobs in anything that has a science, technology, engineering and maths background.

I agree with the Member. I have been working closely with the Minister for Employment and Learning on skills, We have looked at skills in the area of renewable energy and heavy manufacturing, and we are looking at the IT sector. However, he is right to say that it goes back to the education sector as well. We need to start looking at younger people much earlier so that we can get the appropriate skills for the economy.

Tourism: Protests and Violence

3. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what changes are being made to the tourism strategy to deal with any impact on visitor numbers caused by the images of violence and protests in recent weeks that have been shown on news around the world. (AQO 3444/11-15)

Mrs Foster: On 23 January 2013, I announced that, following a meeting with representatives of traders, my Department, through the Northern Ireland Tourist Board (NITB), had agreed to provide financial support to help with the promotion of Belfast city centre. DETI, NITB, Belfast City Council and Belfast Visitor and Convention Bureau are working together on a recovery plan for Belfast. The broad elements of the package will include a contribution to the Backin' Belfast marketing campaign, an animation programme for Belfast and broader tourism messaging in the Republic of Ireland and Great Britain markets, which will include some co-operative marketing with carriers.

Mr Dallat: I welcome the Minister's answer. Does she agree that the damage done by the recent protests was not confined to Belfast and that action is necessary to counteract the awful damage done right across Northern Ireland and, indeed, beyond?

Mrs Foster: Last year was, of course, a tremendously successful one. The 2012 campaign worked on a number of levels by bringing Northern Ireland to prominence in people's minds for a number of reasons. We had some very successful campaigns, and I was pleased to see the civic pride that people took in Northern Ireland throughout last year. There is no doubt that damage was caused towards the end of last year, and we can all revisit why that was the case. I could stand here and talk about why Belfast City Council felt that it was necessary to proceed with that vote, I could talk about flag protests, but I want to concentrate on 2013 and how we can get back into the market and get that positive civic pride back in Northern Ireland

Although we have contributed money to Backin' Belfast, which, anecdotally, I understand is working and proving successful, we will, of course, continue to market the whole of Northern Ireland overseas. We are pushing ahead with travel, trade and consumer holiday shows. In our biggest market — GB — we had 40 days of news coverage about Northern Ireland, so we really need to get the message out that Northern Ireland has the lowest crime level in Europe, which I think we should be very proud of. We need to say to people that, if you come to Belfast or anywhere else in Northern Ireland, you will get a very warm welcome, good food and good hospitality. Those are the key messages to get out. So I make this appeal to Members right across the House: please look forward, and, when you talk to potential visitors, say right across the piece that we need them to come to Northern Ireland because it is a good place to work, study, visit and, indeed, do business in.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Minister talked about promoting the North. Maybe she should consider using "The Gathering" as a promotional tool for that.

When will the final figures for overseas visitors and tourist spend for 2012 be published?

Mrs Foster: I am still waiting for the Republic of Ireland figures. I am not clear in my mind when those will come out, but I think that it will be within the next two months. We will then have a clearer vision of what happened in 2012 all round.

Mr McQuillan: Does the Minister agree that, when we as public representatives make statements to the press, it is important that we do not say things that will further harm the tourist product and pump up tensions?

Mrs Foster: We can sometimes be drawn into situations in which we think that we are speaking only to our constituency and our people here in Northern Ireland. What really brought that home to me was when I spoke to one of our investors from the United States, who had a better knowledge of what was going on on the streets than I did. They pore over all the press cuttings and all the video footage on the internet. So, people need to realise that, when they say anything in here or outside, it will be reported across the world, which, of course, has an impact on Northern Ireland.

2.45 pm

Mr McCarthy: The Minister referred to activities last year. I refer to activities last weekend and the disgraceful scenes when an ordinary, simple football match had to be cancelled because of the activities of some clowns on the street. The Police and Fire Games are just around the corner. With those scenes from last weekend, which were not the fault of footballers or the IFA but other people, is there any — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Let the Member finish.

Tuesday 19 February 2013 Oral Answers

Mr McCarthy: — indication that the sportspeople who are due to come here will still come?

Mrs Foster: I made a plea that we watch our language, and then the Member gets up and calls some people "clowns". I do not think that it is helpful at all to refer to people as "clowns".

We had a very successful launch, which the CAL Minister and I attended along with the Mayor of Belfast. The figure for accommodation for the World Police and Fire Games has passed the £2 million mark, which I very much welcome. Some competitors from the previous games were over, and, frankly, they had a very good time across Northern Ireland. They visited Fermanagh, the Mountains of Mourne, the north coast, and, of course, they were in Belfast. They were singing the praises of this place as a destination. So, that is the sort of positive message that we want to send out. I hope to welcome, along with the rest of the Assembly, World Police and Fire Games members when they come here in August. I know that they will have a great time and a great games as well.

City of Culture 2013: Marketing Fund

4. Mr Eastwood asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the marketing fund being supplied to aid Derry/Londonderry UK City of Culture 2013. (AQO 3445/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The Northern Ireland Tourist Board and Tourism Ireland are liaising closely with Derry City Council and the Culture Company to develop aligned marketing and communications plans going forward. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board's spring marketing campaign promoting short breaks in the Northern Ireland and Republic of Ireland markets launched on Monday 28 January 2013, and the 30-second TV advert has a strong focus on Londonderry as the UK City of Culture 2013. A bespoke Londonderry 10-second edit has been airing from Monday 4 February 2013. Tourism Ireland is implementing a comprehensive programme of promotional activity to highlight Londonderry as the UK City of Culture 2013 in Great Britain and overseas.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for her answer and for all her Department's work to date in this regard. We fully support the Backin' Belfast campaign, but, given that Derry City Council has had a business case in for the past number of months looking for help and support with marketing for the City of Culture, will her Department engage fully with Derry City Council to try to ensure that we have the biggest available marketing budget for what is the biggest event in 2013?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. The Member will, of course, know that it is not just about my Department. We have been working very closely with the city council and the Culture Company on the marketing and communications plan. Under the new Executive advertising guidelines, I have to obtain permission for any marketing and communications campaigns in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland market. There is a proposal for a bespoke marketing campaign for the UK City of Culture, and OFMDFM is considering that, so I am hopeful that a decision will be taken in the very near future.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for that update. I am aware that a meeting is due to take place with her Department next week about the issue. Will she give us a timeline for the release of the £1·3 million that was bid for in the iON marketing plan? Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Foster: I hope to be in a position to have a decision on the money connected with my Department — I understand that it is £400,000 — by the end of this week.

Mr Campbell: The Minister may be aware of the series of meetings and discussions that have taken place with senior officials at the Culture Company and officials of the city council to ensure that there is a broad balance in the UK City of Culture events to which people of all communities and none can come. Does she support that drive and objective, and will she ensure, in so far as her Department's input can be ascertained, that that continues to be the case?

Mrs Foster: Certainly, that is my hope. Officials are fully aware of that. I have been saying right across the piece since we started to look at this tremendous initiative, which will bring much added value to the region — not just this year; it will leave a long-term legacy, not least because it is the first UK City of Culture — that it is an opportunity for the city to really provide a benchmark for everything that comes after it. Given that this is Northern Ireland, there needs to be buy-in from all sectors. I was pleased to be in Londonderry on Friday, and I met some of the residents of Nelson Drive estate. They are holding a celebration in July, and they had their launch on Saturday evening. I wish them well, and I hope that all the communities get involved in what will be a tremendous year for the city.

Mr Speaker: Question 5 has been withdrawn.

Food Prices

6. Mr Copeland asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what action she is taking to address rising food costs as outlined in a recent report by the Consumer Council. (AQO 3447/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Northern Ireland is part of a highly complex and integrated global food supply chain. We are not unique in that the food prices charged in our shops are influenced by a wide range of factors beyond our control. Food bills are increasing at a time when the spending ability of households in Northern Ireland is coming under increasing pressure. The 50% drop in farm incomes in the past year is a clear indication of the pressures being placed on household budgets. However, there are factors that we can seek to influence when it comes to food prices. The major retailers have an important role to play in that regard because they occupy a crucial position at the top of the food supply chain in Northern Ireland. I encourage them to engage proactively and positively about pricing with producers and processors.

Mr Copeland: I thank the Minister for her answer. She indicated that she is aware that the cost of grocery shopping is a major concern. She may also be aware of the Consumer Council's proposed recommendations on food prices, pricing policies and the balance of special offers. Will the Minister indicate any level of work that she feels she will be able to undertake to implement specific recommendations?

Mrs Foster: I know that the Member has read the Consumer Council's report on the rising cost of food, but perhaps it is not a good time to talk about the issue. One of the difficulties for many of our food producers in Northern Ireland is the fact that they have been heavily pressurised by retailers to produce cheaper food. The farmers are not getting the benefit of that; the people who get the benefit are the retailers. That is why I say very clearly that there is a need for us to engage — I intend to do that after things have settled and the current difficulties have passed — so that we can have a real conversation about the price of food. Many food processors feel that they are coming under increasing pressure to deliver cheap food, as a result of which we have had some difficulties in the immediate past.

I take the Member's point, particularly the fact that consumers have less money now than perhaps a number of years ago. However, Northern Ireland food is very good for you. It is traceable. We should encourage retailers to make sure that they stock good, traceable food so that we know its heritage and history. I take the point about the cost of food, but there is no such thing as cheap food.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for her reply. In some respects, she has answered the question that I was going to ask. Although the issue of rising food costs is very pertinent to many families, the issue of food contamination is causing grave concern. In light of the comments that she has made, will she assure the House that her Department and others that have responsibility for this issue will continue to ensure that we promote Northern Ireland home-grown produce, which is —

Mr Speaker: Will the Member finish?

Mr Storey: — safe to eat, and that she will support every effort to ensure that that continues to be the case?

Mrs Foster: I will support every effort to continue to make sure that that is the case. Actually, this morning, I spent some time with the Flavour of Tyrone Good Food Circle in Dungannon, where they were promoting good food. I have to say that some of the good food was a little too good at 10.00 am.

The horse meat contamination story has not been a good one. Large retailers have a crucial role to play in restoring consumer confidence. When consumers buy a meat product, they expect to get the meat product that was advertised. We need to engage in a meaningful way with the retailers and make sure that we get that message across.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answers so far. How will the Department work with the EU to bring forward its consumer agenda 2014-2020 to the North of Ireland?

Mrs Foster: I am sorry; I am not aware of that policy at all.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her previous answers. Has the Minister already met the Consumer Council in relation to its report on the cost of food? If she has not, has she any plans to do so in the immediate future?

Mrs Foster: No, I have not met the Consumer Council yet. Indeed, I am not sure whether there is a request in to meet me. If there is, it will be dealt with in the usual fashion. However, I have not had the opportunity to speak with the Consumer Council as yet.

Programme for Government: Renewable Energy

7. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what progress has been made in meeting the Programme for Government targets for renewable electricity and heat. (AQO 3448/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The 12% by 2012 target for electricity generation from renewable sources has been exceeded. At the end of January 2013, the rolling average for the financial year to date was actually 13·6%. The target for renewable heat is 4% by 2015, from a baseline of 1·7%. Good progress has been made towards encouraging renewable heat through the introduction of the Northern Ireland renewable heat incentive for non-domestic installations in November 2012 and the premium payment scheme for domestic installations in May 2012.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Is the Minister aware of Kirklees Council's warm zone scheme? The flip side of what she has talked about in terms of renewable energy, of course, is saving energy and heat. That council carried out a project over a three-year period that involved 165,000 homes, and it has been evaluated as an excellent project for saving electricity and heat. If she knows about that scheme, will she support it —

Mr Speaker: Time.

Mr G Kelly: — and, with other Ministers, bring it to the Executive?

Mrs Foster: I am sorry; I did not quite catch the name of the area.

Mr G Kelly: Kirklees Council.

Mrs Foster: Yes, I am aware of Kirklees. We had the debate yesterday about sustainable energy and, as well as renewable energy, one of the key elements of sustainability is energy efficiency. Therefore, I welcome any move to help with energy efficiency. Indeed, the Energy Bill that will come to the Floor of the House will introduce an energy efficiency obligation to deal with such matters. One of the key issues for us is to use energy in the most efficient manner.

Invest NI: Vacant Land

8. Mr Girvan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what action she is taking to utilise vacant land held by Invest NI in South Antrim. (AQO 3449/11-15)

Mrs Foster: In the South Antrim constituency, Invest Northern Ireland owns 394 acres of land. The majority of this land is occupied. However, 106 acres remain available at Global Point business park, Hightown industrial estate and Antrim technology park. Invest Northern Ireland land is held in support of economic development, and the agency is currently working with several businesses to develop interests in acquiring land in the area.

Invest Northern Ireland's property is proactively marketed to foreign and indigenous investors. The final decision on location rests solely with investors. It is important to be aware that Invest Northern Ireland operates in the area of property as a result of market failure. As a result, its primary remit is not to maximise occupancy, rental or profit. Instead, it employs a long-term strategy in respect of its property holdings.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister for her answer. In relation to the 106 acres at the Global Point site, I was wondering if there had been any communications between the Department for Regional Development and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment with reference to an extension or the inclusion of park-and-ride facilities at this location?

Mrs Foster: There are not 106 acres at Global Point. The 106 acres figure includes land at Hightown and Antrim. Only 91 acres are at Global Point.

3.00 pm

On the Member's point about DRD, I understand that there are discussions between Invest Northern Ireland and the Members for South Antrim, who are understandably keen to have Global Point dealt with. Indeed, I recall the MP for the area, Mr William McCrea, lobbying me on the matter some time ago. Therefore, it is something that Invest Northern Ireland has at the front of its mind in relation to its property portfolio. I am sure that its chief executive would welcome any meeting with Members for the constituency.

Mr Speaker: That concludes Question Time. I ask the House to take its ease as we return to the Criminal Justice Rill

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. During Question Time, the Education Minister asserted that, during his time as Minister, he has heard no representation from this side of the House about working-class Protestants. I put it clearly on the record that the Education Minister has heard about the controlled sector repeatedly from my party, and that is why the controlled sector body has been proposed.

Mr Speaker, will you also ensure that an inaccuracy about working-class boys not attending grammar schools — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. I have given the Member some leeway. He will know that, as Speaker, I do not get involved in how Ministers answer questions, but the Member now has his comments on the record.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Executive Committee Business

Criminal Justice Bill: Consideration Stage

Debate resumed on amendment Nos 14 to 17 and 38 to 41, which amendments were:

New Clause

No 14: After clause 7 insert

"Release on licence of child convicted of serious offence

Release on licence of child convicted of serious offence

7A.—(1) In Article 45(2) of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 (child convicted of serious offence) for "notwithstanding any other provisions of this Order" substitute "subject to Articles 46 to 46B".

- (2) In Article 45 of that Order after paragraph (2) insert—
- "(2A) Where a court passes a sentence under paragraph (2), the court shall specify such part of the sentence as the court considers appropriate as the relevant part of the sentence for the purposes of Article 46 (release on licence)."
- (3) For Article 46 of that Order substitute—

"Release on licence

46.—(1) In this Article—

- (a) "P" means a person detained under Article 45(2);
- (b) "the Commissioners" means the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland;
- (c) "the Department" means the Department of Justice; and
- (d) references to the relevant part of P's sentence are references to the part of P's sentence specified as such under Article 45(2A).
- (2) As soon as-
- (a) P has served the relevant part of P's sentence, and
- (b) the Commissioners have directed P's release under this Article.

the Department shall release P on licence.

- (3) The Commissioners shall not give a direction under paragraph (2) with respect to P unless—
- (a) the Department has referred P's case to the Commissioners; and
- (b) the Commissioners are satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm that P should be detained.
- (4) P may require the Department to refer P's case to the Commissioners at any time—
- (a) after P has served the relevant part of P's sentence; and
- (b) where there has been a previous reference of P's case to the Commissioners under paragraph (3) or Article

- 46B(4), after the end of the period of 12 months beginning with the disposal of that reference.
- (5) In determining for the purposes of this Article whether P has served the relevant part of P's sentence, no account shall be taken of any time during which P was unlawfully at large, unless the Department otherwise directs.
- (6) The Department may at any time release P on licence if it is satisfied that exceptional circumstances exist which justify P's release on compassionate grounds.
- (7) Before releasing P under paragraph (6), the Department shall consult the Commissioners, unless the circumstances are such as to render such consultation impracticable.
- (8) Nothing in this Article requires the Department to release a person in respect of a sentence under Article 45(2) at any time when that person is liable to be detained in respect of any other sentence.

Duration and conditions of licences under Article 46

- 46A.—(1) Where a person is released on licence under Article 46, the licence shall, unless previously revoked under Article 46B, remain in force until the expiry of the period for which the person was sentenced to be detained.
- (2) A person released on licence under Article 46 shall comply with such conditions as may for the time being be specified in the licence (which may include on release conditions as to supervision by a probation officer).
- (3) The Department of Justice shall not, except in accordance with recommendations of the Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland—
- (a) include a condition in a licence on release,
- (b) subsequently insert a condition in a licence, or
- (c) vary or cancel any condition in a licence.

Recall of licensees

46B.—(1) In this Article—

- "P" means a person who has been released on licence under Article 46;
- "the Commissioners" and "the Department" have the meanings given in Article 46(1).
- (2) The Department may revoke P's licence and recall P to detention—
- (a) if recommended to do so by the Commissioners, or
- (b) without such a recommendation, if it appears to the Department that it is expedient in the public interest to recall P before such a recommendation is practicable.
- (3) P—
- (a) shall, on P's return to detention, be informed of the reasons for the recall and of the right conferred by subparagraph (b); and
- (b) may make representations in writing to the Department with respect to the recall.
- (4) The Department shall refer P's case to the Commissioners.
- (5) Where on a reference under paragraph (4) the Commissioners direct P's immediate release on licence

- under Article 46, the Department shall give effect to the direction.
- (6) The Commissioners shall not give a direction under paragraph (5) unless they are satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm that P should be detained.
- (7) On the revocation of P's licence, P shall be liable to be detained in pursuance of P's sentence and, if at large, shall be treated as being unlawfully at large.".
- (4) In Article 46(3) of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 (functions of Parole Commissioners for Northern Ireland) at the end add "or Articles 46 to 46B of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998."
- (5) Where-
- (a) on commencement a person is detained in pursuance of a sentence under Article 45(2) of the 1998 Order, and
- (b) the Department, after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice and the trial judge if available, certifies its opinion that, if the amendments made by this section had been in operation at the time when that person was sentenced, the court by which that person was sentenced would have specified as the relevant part of the sentence such part as is specified in the certificate,

Article 46 of the 1998 Order (as substituted) shall apply as if the relevant part of that person's sentence for the purposes of that Article were the part specified in the certificate.

- (6) But subsection (5) does not apply (and subsection (7) applies instead) where that person is a person whose licence has been revoked under Article 46(2) of the 1998 Order.
- (7) Where this subsection applies, paragraphs (3) to (6) of Article 46B of the 1998 Order have effect as if that person had been recalled to prison under paragraph (2) of that Article on commencement.
- (8) Articles 46A and 46B of the 1998 Order apply to an existing licensee as they apply to a person who is released on licence under Article 46 of that Order (as substituted).
- (9) In this section—

"commencement" means the date on which this section comes into operation;

"existing licensee" means a person who, before commencement, has been discharged on licence under Article 46 of the 1998 Order and whose licence is in force on commencement:

"the 1998 Order" means the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998."

No 15: After clause 7 insert

"Examination of accused through intermediary

Examination of accused through intermediary

7B.—(1) In section 12(1) of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 (which at the passing of this Act is not in operation), the inserted Article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 is amended as follows.

- (2) At the beginning of paragraph (2) insert "Subject to paragraph (2A),".
- (3) After paragraph (2) insert—
- "(2A) A court may not give a direction under paragraph (3) unless—
- (a) the court has been notified by the Department of Justice that arrangements for implementing such a direction have been made in relation to that court: and
- (b) the notice has not been withdrawn.
- (2B) The withdrawal of a notice given to a court under paragraph (2A) does not affect the operation of any direction under paragraph (3) given by that court before the notice is withdrawn."." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 41: In the long title, at end insert

"and to abolish the common law offence of scandalising the judiciary". — [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice ).]

Mr Elliott: I will speak briefly to the second group of amendments. Amendment No 14 puts what I would call boundaries into place for the releasing on licence of a child convicted of a serious offence. I assume that the proposed new clause to some extent takes powers away from the Minister, powers that he appears quite willing to give up. I believe that it puts in place a better basis for that decision-making process, so I am content with the amendment.

Amendment No 15 concerns the "Examination of accused through intermediary". The detail is quite limited in the Bill, but we got a significant briefing in Committee, and we are again content to accept the amendment.

Amendment No 16 was tabled by the Committee in the name of its Chair. It is important that there be public confidence in the courts and the judicial system. There needs to be an opportunity for the judiciary to come under close scrutiny from everyone: members of the public; elected representatives; and other bodies. That scrutiny could often be a challenge to the courts, the judiciary in general or, in some cases, individual judges, in the same way in which a referee comes under scrutiny from spectators at a football match. That is right and proper, which is not to say that judges get every decision right or wrong.

I do not know how individual judges view the amendment to abolish the law of scandalising the court. However, I would be very surprised if they were opposed to its removal. I hope that judges would not want any personalised protection from comments that may be made about them above and beyond what other members of the public and those in public life are entitled to.

It is vital that judges and the judiciary have an independence that is required for their roles and responsibilities, without being totally protected by criminal legislation. I think that this is putting the judiciary and individual judges on a level footing with the rest of the community and those of us in public life. It allows people the opportunity to openly and freely have their say on what they think about judges and their decisions.

I listened to Mr McCartney, in his earlier contribution, referring to me and what I thought about what his party had said about some aspects. On occasions, I am sure that Mr McCartney and his party have said quite a lot about judges, the judiciary and the law that I would not agree with. Indeed, I am sure that, on occasion, some Sinn Féin members would not have been afraid to even go outside that law to say what they thought.

Mr A Maginness: The SDLP supports the second set of amendments. I will comment as briefly as I can on the matter raised by the Committee about the abolition of the offence of scandalising the court. The Committee has again shown itself to be exercising its functions and its power in an innovative way in the Assembly. I pay tribute to the Chair for leading the Committee in that regard on that particular provision. That is to the credit of the Committee, and it is perhaps to the deficit of the Executive at large for not grasping the issue themselves. We are performing a good service on this matter.

The remarks by Mr Hain in his book, which I happen to have here in the Chamber, and which I might refer to, gave rise to this issue. The remarks that he made were very unfortunate, and they were beyond simple criticism of a judge's judgement. We have to take that into consideration, but I think it was wrong to challenge Mr Hain in the manner in which it was proposed through that archaic legislation or law — I am not even quite sure whether it is actual legislation.

To use a criminal sanction was quite definitely wrong, but that does not mean to say that there was no merit in the reaction of the Attorney General, or, indeed, the reaction of the Lord Chief Justice. I will briefly refer to what the Lord Chief Justice said about Mr Hain and his remarks in his book. Sir Declan Morgan said that Mr Hain had made "unwarranted and wholly inappropriate remarks" about a decision made by a Belfast judge. Remember, Mr Hain's comments were not about the judge per se, but about his decision-making. It is very important to take that into consideration.

The fact that Lord Justice Girvan ruled against Mr Hain was very important. That point was raised by Mr McCartney earlier in this debate. Mr Hain seems to have overreacted to the way in which Lord Justice Girvan dealt with the case. He claimed that the decision had been "idiosyncratic" and "high-handed".

The Lord Chief Justice described the comments as having the potential to amount to:

"an assault on the wider independence of the judiciary".

He also said:

"There is a statutory obligation on those in ministerial office to uphold judicial independence."

He went on to conclude:

"In this instance however, it is difficult to regard the remarks as anything other than undermining and unhelpful to the administration of justice in Northern Ireland."

Those are pretty damning remarks by the Lord Chief Justice. Of course, it is a rare thing for the Lord Chief Justice to make public comment, but he did so on this occasion. That showed the extent to which he felt that the administration of justice had, in fact, been compromised.

Of course, Mr Hain was not in office when he wrote that particular book. Nonetheless, it reflected what he thought while he was in office, and to say that he was just making some criticisms of the judge was an underestimate of the damage that Mr Hain caused to the wider administration of justice.

It would be helpful to remind ourselves of what Mr Hain actually said. Remember, this was in the aftermath of an application to judicially review the Secretary of State for the appointment of a victims' commissioner. Mr Hain felt that this political decision should not have been brought before the court whatsoever. In his book, on page 333, Mr Hain said:

"The Appeal Court was similarly dismissive of his charges except on a procedural technicality. Having had run-ins with judges during my time as an antiapartheid protestor, I did wonder whether some history explained the eccentricity of the judge or even whether in common with other high earners he had been unhappy about my reforms of the property tax system which raised rates for larger houses."

That, I have to say, borders not just on contempt but on undermining the integrity of the judge in that situation.

Mr Hain goes on to say:

"It certainly was, when I was invited to confirm the promotion of the said Justice Girvan to become the Right Honourable Lord Girvan in Northern Ireland's Appeal Court."

He goes on, saying that there was a document that he had to sign:

"Pondering the document in my red box at Hillsborough on Christmas Eve, could I in all honesty agree to this when the Lord Justice's legal capabilities seemed so flawed? It was a momentary rather than a serious thought."

Then he goes on to say:

"I knew full well that that would provoke an even greater fuss, and just to be sure, called Charlie Falconer"

— who was then the Lord Chancellor and was actually on holiday in the Caribbean —

"I agree with you, not a wise thing to do, he said, amused. Nevertheless, promoting someone who was going out of his way legally to damage me seemed a novel obligation."

3.15 pm

That is a very serious statement. If it is not contempt, it certainly borders on contempt. It certainly impinges on the independence of the judiciary. He had it within his gift to promote this judge but decided that he perhaps should not. That is a very serious thing for Mr Hain to admit to. The fact that he did not do it is merciful. Nonetheless, he had it in his mind to do so. If he had not been able to contact Charlie Falconer, who was on holiday in the Caribbean, he might have stopped the promotion. That would have been extremely unfair. Here would have been a politician actively interfering in the appointment of a judge from one division to another, from the High Court to the Court of Appeal. So this is not a small thing. It is not just simply a matter of a level playing field, in my view. Judges have been —

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way. He makes quite an interesting point. However, I assume that a judge who has been treated unfairly in any appointment process has a due process that he can go through in the same way as anybody else who is not appointed or given a promotion, where applicable. I do not see what relevance that has to this amendment.

Mr A Maginness: It is relevant in so far as the amendment arises from a consideration of this situation. The amendment would not arise if this situation had not arisen in the aftermath of the judicial review, which failed to satisfy the Secretary of State at that time. That is the important thing.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Allister: Surely Mr Elliott is quite wrong. The appointment of someone from the High Court to the Court of Appeal is surely a prerogative appointment that would not be subject to the normal reviews and restraints of any other job and promotion therein. Is that not the case?

Mr A Maginness: I am grateful to my learned colleague for his intervention. I think that its true. It would not be subject to the same rigours as —

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way again. The point that I was trying to make is that having this point in law is not actually helping that case if a criminal charge of scandalising the court can be brought.

Mr A Maginness: I accept your point that this was the wrong way of doing it and that the Attorney General went down the wrong route. The opinion on that is almost unanimous, although I do not think that the Attorney General would agree.

Nonetheless, this matter was very serious. It was dismissed at Westminster by the House of Lords and House of Commons, and the Prime Minister's reaction was dismissive. That was quite wrong. If something similar had happened in England, there probably would have been a much greater reaction on the part of the Prime Minister in dealing with the situation. I do not think that he would have dealt with it in such a dismissive fashion. We were another jurisdiction, and I think that the Prime Minister was able to deal with the situation in such a dismissive fashion because of that. It did not immediately affect the judiciary in England or Wales, so there was an under-reaction in Britain.

I am not certain that everybody read Mr Hain's comments. If they had, I think that they would have been outraged by them. The Lord Chief Justice in this jurisdiction was outraged by them. I was, and I know that other people were, although they did not get the publicity or media coverage that those who criticised the Attorney General got.

Going back to Mr Allister's point, the remarks were not subject to some form of scrutiny. Therefore, what was the judge to do if something was not done by the Attorney General? I think that the only alternative that the learned judge had was to bring an action for libel. I am not so certain that a judge can freely take an action for libel. First of all, my understanding is that he needs the Lord Chief Justice's permission. Secondly, he opens himself up to all sorts of public scrutiny and so forth, which is inappropriate for a judge, because after the trial is over, he has to go on and carry out his public duty. So, it is a bit unfair to expect a judge to simply take the initiative with a libel action. Therefore, there may well be need for some other process to deal with a similar situation.

In conclusion, this was a serious situation. It has brought about the very reasonable amendment that the Committee tabled. I support that, as does my party, but it may well be that we need to look at some mechanism to deal with similar situations in the future. I am not sure how we would deal with it, but it was a serious situation that those at Westminster diminished. I think that we should take a very serious look at it.

Mr Dickson: In this group of amendments, we are looking at the issue of releasing of children who have been convicted of serious offences. Although every criminal offence is regrettable, we are very fortunate that the number of detention orders under article 45(2) of the Criminal Justice (Children) Order is very low. However, as the Minister explained, when the orders are issued, it is entirely a matter for him to determine whether a child is released on licence. It is quite clear that that does not comply with the ECHR, and the independent judicial element is essential. For that reason, we are happy to support the amendment.

I listened to the Chair of the Committee and to Mr Maginness in particular, who described the issue of scandalising the court and the particular case that was raised. First of all, I am pleased that the Minister is happy for the House to make a determination on the matter, as that allows me to support the Committee. In those circumstances, we are going to make the right decision on the matter.

Mr Givan: I thank the Member for giving way. Mr Dickson was enthusiastic at the Committee in his support for this. I trust that, in being given a free vote, he has been able to try to put some of that enthusiasm into the Minister so that the Minister can join with the House in abolishing the offence today.

Mr Dickson: I am sure that the Minister will join me in the Lobby should that be necessary.

Mr Maginness made some very important points, as did the Chair of the Committee, in describing the circumstances in which we find ourselves. Mr Maginness ended on a particularly important point, which, in layperson's terms, is that this should not send out the signal that it is open season on judges. That is probably the most important thing that needs to be said about this. While we may be removing particularly arcane legislation, we are, nevertheless, making it very clear that this House and Northern Ireland has high respect and regard for its judges.

Should our judges not be in a position to protect themselves from public comment that is unwarranted, unreasonable or breaches the law in any way, the matter can be referred back to this House, and we can consider the potential for legislation. While people might find comments offensive, as Mr Maginness has described, or quite funny, it is, nevertheless, inappropriate to take a poke at our judges in that way, and a very clear signal needs to go out from this House that we do not in any way condone that type of comment about the judiciary. Our judges in Northern Ireland have to take clear and proper independent decisions on very complex areas of the law and matters that are put in front of them. They must and do have the confidence of this House and the public in Northern Ireland.

Mr Poots: It is an interesting debate and interesting legislation, and I welcome and support the amendments.

Scandalising the court is an archaic law that most people did not realise existed until Peter Hain's book came out. Mr Maginness quoted from it quite liberally, but I think that Peter Hain deliberately set out to develop some sensational comments in his book to try to sell it. Using the terminology "off his rocker" to describe one of our most senior judges is wholly inappropriate, but, nonetheless, through his response, the noble lord fell hook, line and sinker for what Mr Hain wanted, which was to create publicity for his book to ensure that as many people as possible were aware of its existence. I have absolutely no doubt that he achieved that goal through that piece of sensationalism

The Lord Chief Justice initially responded to it, and many people thought that that was where it would rest, because the Lord Chief Justice was very clear in that response. However, the Attorney General was clearly prompted by Lord Chief Justice Girvan to take it somewhat further, and that caused huge controversy, not just here but at Westminster. That brought us to our knowledge of this law and has perhaps drawn to our attention that it is no longer necessary for Northern Ireland.

The Lord Chief Justice made it very clear that it is important that Ministers recognise the independence of judges, and I will come to that in a moment. However, it was somewhat bizarre this afternoon when Mr McCartney, a former hunger striker, placed a shield around Lord Chief Justice Girvan and offered him protection from the evil Peter Hain, who did not really want to appoint him as a judge but was left with no choice.

I can assure Mr McCartney that he does not actually need to offer any of the noble judges protection in this instance, because his party will have no role in appointing judges. Nor, indeed, will any other politician in Northern Ireland. The judges will be appointing the judges, and, as part of the devolution of justice, we as a party saw it as considerably the lesser of two evils: having judges appointing themselves, as opposed to the deputy First Minister having a role in their appointment .

3.30 pm

To that extent, judges in Northern Ireland have a greater degree of independence than in any other part of the UK, and that brings with it a huge, significant and grave responsibility, because the same checks and balances are not in place. Where judges are perceived not to have been paying as much attention to public policy and the legislature as they should, when promotions become available, politicians have absolutely no role in the judge being promoted.

Therefore, judges need to pay a considerable amount of attention and respect to the legislature, and Chief Justice Sir Declan Morgan has recognised that. In fact, in Dublin last year, he talked at length about the importance of equilibrium. He said:

"In carrying out the task of securing equilibrium, we must remember that our principal objective is to secure public confidence in the administration of justice. We are all committed to the rule of law ... It also means that the independent judiciary is entitled to expect its position to be respected and secured by Ministers and legislators but must itself show proper respect for the role which others play in our justice system."

We are playing a role in the justice system today in this House. We are legislating, and due respect should be given to the legislative body — which is this Assembly — by our noble judges in what they do.

It was somewhat striking that, at the weekend, it became apparent that legislation was going to have to be done for a second time at Westminster relating to the deportation of individuals — deportation of criminals — from the United Kingdom. Legislation was passed, and the intent of Parliament was clear, but some judges decided that certain elements of human rights law would actually supersede what was passed at Westminster, and therefore did not give the judgements that the legislature would have expected. In that instance, Parliament is going to have to go and legislate again. Clearly, the equilibrium balance has fallen the wrong way in that instance, because Parliament should not have to go a second time to legislate for something that was very clear was the wishes of the public the first time around.

Very often, we hear judges playing out the human rights arguments and making decisions based upon human rights. Very often, the decisions that are made to ensure the human rights of one party actually deny the human rights of another party. A very clear example is the recent European judgement where a couple who own a guest house —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member to talk on the amendments in this grouping. The discussion should be relevant to it.

Mr Poots: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will respect your indications. I am talking about the right to criticise judges and their decisions without actually scandalising them. It is not breaking the law. I will follow your guidance on this

In truth, the judiciary have far greater independence here than elsewhere, and, therefore, that needs to be respected. At the same time, as politicians, we need to show due respect for the judiciary, and we need to be receptive of their judgements and decisions. However, this legislature needs to have the opportunity to pass its legislation and not get to a point at which it is critical of court outcomes.

A huge number of decisions will be taken on social policy, for example. Northern Ireland passes legislation, and it is the Assembly that passes it. I sometimes hear people say, "The noble Lord has said this, and we should therefore follow that." This legislature makes those decisions. Judges do not make legislation. This House makes legislation, and I think that we have to have due respect for that.

Therefore, on scandalising the court, I want to make it absolutely clear that we have to get to the point at which there is the equilibrium that the Lord Chief Justice has identified. He referred to a conversation that needed to take place. That was back in May 2012. I am not aware of that conversation having taken place. It may have taken place, but I am not aware of the conversation that has taken place to identify where that equilibrium lies. It is absolutely critical that we have that balance, and that that respect is shown to the courts. We should not hold the courts in contempt, because that would be wrong. We should not scandalise them, because that would also be wrong. However, the courts should have the same degree of respect for the decisions made by this House, when those decisions are made in good faith and on behalf of the public.

It is absolutely essential that all of us recognise that, whether you are in the Royal Courts of Justice or, indeed, in this Assembly, subject to Her Majesty, we are all subject to the will of the people. We are here as servants of the people, and courts are servants of the people. The first element of any democracy is justice, and, therefore, the role that courts play is absolutely critical in that.

I want to see and ensure that, although we remove this provision today, we show our courts due courtesy. However, I also want to see that our courts show due respect for this House, and, indeed, for other Houses that pass legislation and that the will of the people is something that is granted and not superseded. When we come to these fine definitions, where one person's human rights are considerably different from those of another, judges need to give a wider view based on the wider view held by the public and ensure that they respect everyone's human rights, not just those of one individual.

Mr Allister: I want to focus on amendment No 16, which has arisen from quite a deep-seated controversy that broke last year over the action of the Attorney General. The Attorney General came in for a lot of criticism about his course of action. Just like a judge, he is not and should not be above criticism, but I think that he is as entitled as any of us to have that criticism be balanced and considered, rather than suffer knee-jerk and imbalanced criticism.

I will approach the matter in this way. If some right-wing extremist had said something extraordinarily offensive about a judge, attacked his personal, judicial and professional integrity, and the Attorney General had acted against that far-right — British National Party or whatever — individual, would the Prime Minister have risen at the Dispatch Box to condemn the Attorney General? Would politicians have been falling over themselves to condemn the Attorney General, or was it simply because it was the well-connected Peter Hain who was drawing the wrath of the Attorney General that we saw that reaction? That is a point worth pondering.

The Attorney General's position was this: he did not evolve the common law; he was put in that position by politicians, effectively, where he had to deal with the situation whereby the common law said that it was a contempt offence to scandalise a judge. Was he to ignore that, turn his back on it and pretend that it did not exist, or was he to address it? This House today will relieve him of that responsibility, because this House today will abrogate the provision in the common law whereby it is a contempt offence to scandalise a judge.

However, that was not the situation this time last year. That was not the situation when this book hit the book stands. The Attorney General was in a position where the law provided — not legislative law but common law and of equal strength in circumstances where there is no legislation — that it was a contempt offence to scandalise a judge. So, he had a judgement to make. He read, as, I suspect most in this House have or should have read, that Mr Peter Hain — it could only come from someone as supercilious and arrogant as Mr Hain — took great offence at being rebuked by the courts of this land and that he took it personally that what was a politically agreed appointment of an Interim Victims' Commissioner was questioned and challenged in the courts, for he — the mighty Mr Hain — is above all that. It is quite clear from the content and tenor of his book that he is not to be challenged. How dare anyone challenge the mighty Mr Hain, who was doing it all in the name of peace? He was serving that greatest of causes, and yet some jumped-up judge dared to take seriously a challenge to his actions and dared to question what the mighty Mr Hain had done. So, when Mr Hain came to write what he calls his memoirs, he had a score or two to settle. Yes, he had some other interesting things to tell us, because when you pick up this book, all sorts of interesting facts come out of it. He had interesting things to tell us about how he bought the DUP by flattery and by threatening to close the Assembly and stop their salaries. There are all sorts of interesting things, but I will not be sidetracked, because you would pull me up, Mr Deputy Speaker, I am sure.

He certainly had a score to settle with Lord Justice Girvan, and so he gets himself right down into the gutter. That is where he went: right down into the gutter. He said — he inferred — that what motivated Lord Justice Girvan was some personal issue with the fact that Hain had reformed property tax, and that people who lived in big houses did not like it. The shame is on Mr Hain for daring to think and express that.

3.45 pm

I have had run-ins with many judges in court. I know Lord Justice Girvan and there is no more independent-minded man sitting on the bench in Northern Ireland. I have had issues with him, disagreed with judgements and been on the wrong side of his wrath — all of that. However, I can recognise from it that there is no more independent-minded man on the bench than Lord Justice Girvan.

It was shameful and scurrilous to suggest that he may be motivated by something as base as the fact that a politician in the form of Mr Hain had interfered and pushed up his rates — a scandalous suggestion. Then to go on, as Mr Maginness drew to our attention today, to ponder, when it came to the justified promotion of the Lord Justice, that his legal capabilities seemed so flawed. Not satisfied with attacking his personal integrity by suggesting that he would be influenced by something such as a hike in his rates, he was now prepared to attack his professional capability and integrity.

I come back to my first point: if someone on the raving loony right — or left, where Mr Hain used to be — had said that of a judge, and the Attorney General had acted, would he have borne any criticism? I suspect not.

Mr Poots: I appreciate the Member's line of argument. However, if I was to describe the Member in some of the ways that Mr Hain chose to describe Lord Justice Girvan, the Member may choose to take a case against me for doing so. In that respect, why would we be in a position where we give judges greater protection than other members of the public or, indeed, Members of this House or Government Ministers? Should we put some special blanket of protection around retired Ministers or, indeed, current Ministers? Why should we have that scandalisation just for judges? I take it that the Member is arguing that we do not change this today. In that respect, why would Lord Justice Girvan not be in a similar position as myself or the Member to take someone to court if they slandered or libelled him?

Mr Allister: The Member raises a fair point, although he makes a wrong assumption about my position on this amendment. Just to crystallise that, I think that it is right that we make this amendment but wrong that we leave a vacuum having made the amendment.

Let me expound on that, if I may, and to do it in the context of how the Member raised the point: could not Lord Justice Girvan or any other judge so scandalised simply sue for libel? Yes and no is the answer. Yes, in theory; in practice, very difficult. Who hears his case? One of the other dozen judges who sit with him in the High Court? A judge is in a very delicate, difficult position where he cannot really defend himself in the manner that you, I or anyone else can defend themselves without impinging, I perceive, on the performance of his duties on the bench. A judge sues today for libel, and a colleague hears the case. You can already imagine —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Just let me finish the point.

You can imagine the innuendo that would arise. The judge succeeds in his case, and it is a nudge, nudge, wink, wink situation. Of course, he was always going to succeed. Was one of his colleagues not hearing the case? If the judge fails, where does he then stand as a judge coming into court to preside over the next libel trial? Whether the judge wins or loses, where does he stand as a judge coming into court to preside over the next libel trial? He stands in a very invidious position. That is why I think it too trite to say that he has the same rights as all the rest of us. He might in theory; in practice, it is a very different matter.

That is why I think that there is a bit of a gap, which now needs to be filled. If we are taking away the common law provision, we need to have some hedge of protection to avoid it being open season. Remember this: libel is a useful protection only if you have someone worth suing. If some vagabond worth nothing says something about you, there is no point in suing — no point whatsoever — so it is not just as easy as saying, "Let him sue." The House has to address whether any safety protection is required to stop it being open season through scurrilous remarks of the ilk of those made by Mr Hain.

Mr McCartney: Who would hear the case under current legislation? Would the same points not apply?

Mr Allister: Yes, and that is one of the problems of a small jurisdiction. In Northern Ireland, obviously, the judges and practitioners all know one another. That is one of the consequences of a small jurisdiction. In England and Wales, you could well have judges who have never met and know nothing about one other, and so you might have more obvious scope for the freedom of litigation without the inhibitions that I am talking about. If proceedings had been brought, they would have been, at least initially, determined here, and, quite potentially, could have gone ultimately to the Supreme Court, where at least there would be a degree of remoteness. However, there are certain constraints to a small jurisdiction, and the Member identifies one of them.

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Poots: I appreciate where the Member's comments are coming from. My understanding is that Lord Justice Sedley successfully took a case against 'The Daily Telegraph', so this is not something that has not happened before.

I caution that the import of the Member's remarks, if not the intent, is that a judge may be only a little impartial if one of his colleagues brought a case before him. I have no doubt that the judiciary would have acted with total impartiality had Lord Justice Girvan taken a case against Peter Hain and brought it before the courts.

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes, if I may deal with this intervention first.

I agree, and my expectation is that the judiciary would have acted impartially. However, that would not stop the proverbial man in the street, whatever way the case turned out, saying that it was a fix. That is ready-made territory for someone to say that.

Yes, a High Court judge in England did successfully sue for libel, but this comes back to the point that Mr McCartney made. That judge sued in a very much larger jurisdiction, where there was not the personal interface between the litigant and the decider, or someone key to the decision-making. So it is a problem and a difficulty. Although the House has been well persuaded that the common law should be abrogated, I think that the House is now leaving a gap. The House needs to think about that.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for giving way. Earlier, he said that you would not sue a vagabond, because he is a man of no substance. I want to hear him on this. I understood that the whole reason why you would sue is to restore your good name, not to get a bank of money. Although we are not talking about Judge Girvan here, I suspect that judges maybe have enough of that already. I would have thought that the real exercise is to restore their integrity and their good name, not to get a couple of hundred thousand pounds. Is that not right, Mr Allister?

Mr Allister: I am sure that restoring their integrity is the primary goal, but if you sue somebody who has no money, you might get a judgement against them, which you will never enforce, so you do not get any money. However, you are left with your legal bills, which are very substantial. So, in fact, you have to be prepared to say, "I am going to throw x tens of thousands of pounds at this to establish my good name." How many Members would readily do that? Some might; I do not know. It is the realities of that, which, I think, cause us to think that we should be looking at this in terms of, "Yes, we are going to pass amendment No 16". What then, however? Do we simply walk away and forget about it?

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I thank the Member for giving way. On that point, where would you make the differentiation between this jurisdiction and England and Wales, when they are not making any redefinition of it or any hedge around about it? We are following what the other jurisdiction is doing in England and Wales. Indeed, a former Lord Chief Justice, Lord Carswell, has made it clear that he would not want any difference to be made between how judges are treated here and how they are treated in England and Wales. So, how would we make that difference?

Mr Allister: It is a bit of role reversal, because I am usually the one who is more enthusiastic about following what England and Wales want, and the honourable Member is more of an enthusiast for proving the virility of devolution. I think that it is something that the House of Commons should also be addressing. I think that it has an added poignancy in Northern Ireland, because of the very small jurisdiction that we have, but I would like to see it addressed nationally by England and Wales as well. If they do not, I still think that it is something that the House needs to think about and apply some attention to.

Mr Deputy Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to give voice to those views. In those circumstances, and with those caveats, I am happy to support amendment No 16 today.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I shall perhaps not dwell on quite where the bulk of the most recent contributions have, but I want to look at the other three amendments in the group.

In my opening remarks, I explained that determinate detention orders under article 45(2), although not often used, provide an important and necessary custodial option for courts that are dealing with those children who commit the most serious offences. The revised provisions, as set out in clause 7A, which replicate the provisions for other similar orders, will ensure that the processes that are used to determine matters of release, licence requirements and recall will be subject to the required level of independent decision-making through the courts and the Parole Commissioners. Importantly, that will mean that the provisions will not only comply with our international treaty obligations but will bring the release, licensing and release processes that are associated with those detention orders fully into the mainstream arrangements for dealing with the management of serious offenders as they move from custody to the community. I believe that that in itself is a worthwhile step forward.

Although I am very grateful for the sort of hint that almost came from Tom Elliott, when he said that perhaps the Minister did not need to talk about this because he was so good, the reality is that, on human rights grounds, it is absolutely necessary that we deal with the current outstanding issue and that we move away from ministerial discretion in this specific area.

I do not know that anyone who contributed to the debate on this group of amendments spoke on proposed new clause 7B, which is a technical amendment on registered intermediary schemes. It is important that we ensure that we have legislative consistency between the provisions that deal with the accused and those that deal with victims and witnesses and ensure that that gives full compliance in order to ensure that there is a proper balance. I welcome the fact that I can assume that Members, by not referring to the issue, are content with the proposal before us. I am grateful for that level of support or, at least, the lack of dissent on the proposals that I have put forward.

4.00 pm

I want to speak briefly — significantly more briefly than others — on amendment No 16. It is clear that there is support in the House for the amendment, which removes the criminal issue of scandalising the court. It was also noticeable that many of the remarks that have been made around the Chamber focused on the difficulties that we are in and the potential need to look at certain other ways to deal with the potential problems that have been highlighted by the Hain case and other issues. On a personal note, when Mr Maginness quoted elements of the book, which got as far as the former Secretary of State consulting Lord Falconer on whether he should go ahead with making a judicial appointment, it highlighted two things: first, the importance of the fact that, as Mr Poots said, politicians in the Assembly are no longer responsible for appointing judges in Northern Ireland, which, I believe, is a good thing; and, secondly, it reminded me of the point last year when I was responsible for appointing a number of new QCs. That was a prerogative decision that lay with me. A number of the names on the list belonged to those who had fought the campaign against the cuts in criminal legal aid, which, as those who were Members of the previous Assembly will remember, were included in the first Justice Bill.

Mr McCartney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Give me a second. The irony struck me as I was faced with opening my rather cheaper black ministerial box — not an expensive red ministerial box — at home that night. I smiled to myself, and I then complied with my duty. I did not ring Lord Falconer. I did not ring John Larkin either. I will give way.

Mr McCartney: The Minister makes a very interesting point. Did he note that no one seemed to raise an eyebrow when a British Secretary of State, as he was then, phoned the Lord Chancellor to interfere in the judicial process as if it was commonplace?

Mr Ford: I certainly raised an eyebrow when I read the extracts from the book. Unlike Mr Maginness, I have not bothered to get it from the Library.

There are fundamental concerns, which highlight that there is an issue. Although we are content today to remove the criminal offence, there is an issue that needs to be addressed.

I must take slight issue with Mr Maginness. He praised the role of the Committee almost as enthusiastically as the Committee Chairperson. However, he said that the Executive at large were lacking in having failed to act on the issue. I have already been praised by the Deputy Chair of the Committee, so I thank him again and note that I made it clear that we did not want a legislative consent motion for Westminster on this issue and this was the right place to legislate. That was entirely the correct decision. It is also a simple fact that, if Departments legislate, a serious, lengthy consultation period is required. In the face of all of the other issues before the Department, I did not see it as a priority within the timescale in which the Committee was able to act. I did not think that it was legitimate to prioritise that against other issues that we are dealing with, which, frankly, are more likely to come back to us than the potential of scandalising the court arising again, perhaps in another 50 or 60 years. It is one of the quirks of our legislative process that, while Departments are obliged to go through that lengthy consultation process, Committees can act on a whim, as indeed can private Members. Whether we think that that is the right balance in the way things are done is an issue for another day.

I also noted that Mr Allister referred specifically to the fact that, in dealing with the Hain book, the Attorney General acted in line with his defined role in common law as it stands. We are seeking to remedy that by removing that common law position. Jim Allister and Alban Maginness have highlighted areas where there are issues that we will need to look at again and where we will need to have proper consultation to see whether alternative mechanisms are required in this jurisdiction. We cannot simply leave a vacuum, by removing the legal issue in a criminal prosecution but not deal with the potential that this problem may arise again in the future.

That said, I am content to go with amendment No 16 as proposed by the Committee, but I believe that the Committee and I will have further work to do on that in the future. I welcome the support which has been expressed for the amendments that I proposed.

Question, That amendment No 14 be made, put and agreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Amendment No 15 made: After clause 7 insert

"Examination of accused through intermediary

Examination of accused through intermediary

- 7B.—(1) In section 12(1) of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 (which at the passing of this Act is not in operation), the inserted Article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 is amended as follows.
- (2) At the beginning of paragraph (2) insert "Subject to paragraph (2A),".
- (3) After paragraph (2) insert—
- "(2A) A court may not give a direction under paragraph (3) unless—
- (a) the court has been notified by the Department of Justice that arrangements for implementing such a direction have been made in relation to that court; and
- (b) the notice has not been withdrawn.
- (2B) The withdrawal of a notice given to a court under paragraph (2A) does not affect the operation of any direction under paragraph (3) given by that court before the notice is withdrawn."." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Amendment No 16 made: After clause 7 insert

"Abolition of scandalising the judiciary as form of contempt of court

7C.—(1) Scandalising the judiciary (also referred to as scandalising the court or scandalising judges) is abolished as a form of contempt of court under the common law.

(2) That abolition does not prevent proceedings for contempt of court being brought against a person for conduct that immediately before that abolition would have constituted both scandalising the judiciary and some other form of contempt of court." — [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9 (Commencement and transitional, etc. provisions)

Amendment No 17 made: In page 8, line 2, leave out subsections (1) and (2) and insert

- "(1) Except as provided by subsection (2), this Act comes into operation on the day after Royal Assent.
- (2) The following provisions of this Act come into operation on such day or days as the Department may by order appoint—
- (a) section 1 and Schedule 1;
- (b) section (Notification requirements: absence from notified address):
- (c) sections 3 and 4;
- (d) section 7 and Schedules 2 and 3;
- (e) Parts 1 and 3 of Schedule 4 and section 8 so far as relating thereto." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Clause 9, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Schedule 2 (Articles 63B to 63O of the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland ) Order 1989, as inserted)

Mr Deputy Speaker: Turning to the third group of amendments, I remind Members that a petition of concern was tabled this morning to amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26 to the Criminal Justice Bill. Today's proceedings on the Bill will, therefore, stop at the Question on amendment No 20, and the Questions on the remainder of the Bill will be put on the next sitting day.

With amendment No 18, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 19 to 34.

Mr A Maginness: Mr Deputy Speaker, are you indicating that there will be no vote whatsoever today? It is just that I am uncertain as to —

Mr Deputy Speaker: For clarity, we will deal with the legislation in front of us until the first amendment that has been actioned by a petition of concern, so we will stop after amendment No 20.

As I said, with amendment No 18, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 19 to 34. The amendments deal with the rules for the retention of DNA, fingerprints and photographic material. Members should note that amendment No 21 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 22 and that amendment No 24 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 25.

Mr McCartney: I beg to move amendment No 18: In page 14, line 26, at end insert

"(c) a photograph taken as mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) (i) or (ii)".

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 19: In page 14, line 27, after "Fingerprints" insert ", photographs". — [Mr McCartney.]

No 20: In page 15, line 14, leave out from "the conclusion" to end of line 17 and insert

"the Chief Constable determines that the material is of no evidential value in relation to—

- (a) the investigation of the offence; or
- (b) proceedings against any person for the offence." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

No 21: In page 15, line 41, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 16 and insert

(c) the Northern Ireland Commissioner for the Retention of Biometric Material has consented under Article 63DA to the retention of the material." — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 22: In page 16, line 1, leave out paragraph (d) and insert

"(d) the District Judge (Magistrates' Court) has made an order under paragraph (13) for the retention of the material."— [Mr McCartney.]

No 23: In page 16, line 26, leave out paragraphs (11) and (12). — [Mr McCartney.]

No 24: In page 16, line 37, leave out paragraph (13). — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

No 25: In page 16, line 37, leave out "Commissioner" and insert "District Judge (Magistrates' Court)". — [Mr McCartney.]

No 26: In page 17, leave out lines 12 and 13 and insert

"Retention of Article 63B material by virtue of Article 63D(5): consent of Commissioner

- 63DA.—(1) The Chief Constable may apply under paragraph (2) or (3) to the Commissioner appointed under Article 63D(11) for consent to the retention of Article 63B material which falls within Article 63D(5)(a) and (b).
- (2) The Chief Constable may make an application under this paragraph if the Chief Constable considers that the material was taken (or, in the case of a DNA profile, derived from a sample taken) in connection with the investigation of an offence where any alleged victim of the offence was, at the time of the offence—
- (a) under the age of 18,
- (b) a vulnerable adult, or
- (c) associated with the person to whom the material relates
- (3) The Chief Constable may make an application under this paragraph if the Chief Constable considers that—
- (a) the material is not material to which paragraph (2) relates, but

- (b) the retention of the material is necessary in the interests of public protection.
- (4) The Department of Justice may by order amend paragraph (2) or (3).
- (5) The Commissioner may, on an application under this Article, consent to the retention of material to which the application relates if the Commissioner considers that it is appropriate to retain the material.
- (6) But where notice is given under paragraph (7) in relation to the application, the Commissioner must, before deciding whether or not to give consent, consider any representations by the person to whom the material relates which are made within the period of 28 days beginning with the day on which the notice is given.
- (7) The Chief Constable must give to the person to whom the material relates notice of—
- (a) an application under this Article, and
- (b) the right to make representations.
- (8) Without prejudice to section 24 of the Interpretation Act (Northern Ireland) 1954 (service of documents), a notice under paragraph (7) may, in particular, be given to a person by sending it to the person by email or other electronic means.
- (9) The requirement in paragraph (7) does not apply if the whereabouts of the person to whom the material relates is not known and cannot, after reasonable inquiry, be ascertained by the Chief Constable.
- (10) An application or notice under this Article must be in writing.
- (11) In this Article—

"victim" includes intended victim,

"vulnerable adult" means a person aged 18 or over whose ability to protect himself or herself from violence, abuse or neglect is significantly impaired through physical or mental disability or illness, through old age or otherwise, and the reference in paragraph (2)(c) to a person being associated with another person is to be read in accordance with Article 3(3) to (6) of the Family Homes and Domestic Violence (Northern Ireland) Order 1998."

- [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

No 27: In page 19, line 14, at end insert

"Retention of Article 63B material: persons completing diversionary youth conference

63HB.—(1) This Article applies to Article 63B material which—

- (a) relates to a person who has completed the diversionary youth conference process with respect to a recordable offence; and
- (b) was taken (or, in the case of a DNA profile, derived from a sample taken) in connection with the investigation of the offence.
- (2) The material may be retained until-
- (a) in the case of fingerprints, the end of the period of 5 years beginning with the date on which the fingerprints were taken, and

- (b) in the case of a DNA profile, the end of the period of 5 years beginning with—
- (i) the date on which the DNA sample from which the profile was derived was taken, or
- (ii) if the profile was derived from more than one DNA sample, the date on which the first of those samples was taken.
- (3) For the purposes of this Article, a person completes the diversionary youth conference process with respect to an offence if (and only if)—
- (a) a diversionary youth conference under Part 3A of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 has been completed with respect to that person and that offence, and
- (b) the Director of Public Prosecutions, having considered the report of the youth conference co-ordinator, has determined not to institute proceedings against the person in respect of the offence or, as the case may be, not to continue proceedings already instituted against the person in respect of the offence." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 28: In page 19, line 14, at end insert

"Retention of Article 63B material: persons given a penalty notice

63HC.—(1) This Article applies to Article 63B material which—

- (a) relates to a person who is given a penalty notice under section 60 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 and in respect of whom no proceedings are brought for the offence to which the notice relates, and
- (b) was taken (or, in the case of a DNA profile, derived from a sample taken) from the person in connection with the investigation of the offence to which the notice relates.
- (2) The material may be retained—
- (a) in the case of fingerprints, for a period of 2 years beginning with the date on which the fingerprints were taken.
- (b) in the case of a DNA profile, for a period of 2 years beginning with—
- (i) the date on which the DNA sample from which the profile was derived was taken, or
- (ii) if the profile was derived from more than one DNA sample, the date on which the first of those samples was taken."—[Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

  - [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

Mr McCartney: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker, for your clarity. As I understand it, there will be a number of votes until amendment No 20.

I will speak to the amendments tabled in my name and in the names of Seán Lynch and Rosie McCorley. For the record, they are amendment Nos 18, 19, 22, 23, 25, and 31. I will not move amendment No 30. We will oppose some of the amendments tabled by the Minister. Those are amendment Nos 20, 21, 24 and 26.

Mr Ford: I can assure the Member that, in the context of the petition of concern, I do not intend to move amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26.

I am grateful to the Member for giving way. If he will allow me to, I have something further to say. Mr Deputy Speaker, I understand the ruling that you have made that business will be suspended after the vote on amendment No 20. There seems to be something lacking in Standing Orders if, when the amendments subject to a petition of concern are not to be moved, we cannot proceed. I ask you to refer that issue to the Speaker or possibly the Committee on Procedures.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I assure the Minister that the Speaker has looked at this issue carefully, and he came to the judgement that he has passed on to me as Deputy Speaker. The Minister raises an interesting and valid point on procedure. Consideration has been given to the issue. For clarity on today's order of business, proceedings will stop after the Question on amendment No 20 has been put. However, the debate on this group of amendments will happen now, so the debate is about all the amendments standing on the Marshalled List in the third group, but voting will stop after amendment No 20. The Business Committee has agreed that the Consideration Stage of the Bill will be scheduled again for Monday 25 February, when the remaining Questions will be put.

Mr McCartney: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. In the first instance, I thank the Minister for not moving amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26. We look forward to a discussion with him and his officials on the appointment of a biometric commissioner. I know that the subject was discussed at today's Business Committee, and I concur with the Minister's well-made point about whether all amendments, apart from the three that were subject to a petition of concern, could have been voted on. I am sure that the Speaker will address that.

We will also support the amendments tabled in the name of Alban Maginness, which are amendment Nos 29 and 33. We will support the Minister's amendment Nos 27, 28, 32 and 34.

I will now provide a broad outline of the approach that we took on the formulation of the amendments and our opposition to some of the Minister's amendments. These points were made at every opportunity throughout Committee Stage during deliberations on the Bill. I acknowledge the role of the Committee staff, the departmental officials and those who provided evidence, because they helped us — they certainly helped me — deal with complex legislation.

It is worth recalling and putting in context the backdrop to and the need for, reason for and purpose of the provisions that are now in the Bill and why it had to be framed in a particular way. I refer to the Marper case, which was taken to the European Court of Human Rights. The court unanimously struck down the legislation that provided for the retention of fingerprints and DNA samples. The Assembly is now tasked with providing a legal remedy that should, in our opinion — we have made this known throughout — be human rights-compliant. Indeed, we want to extend the supervision of it to include the retention of photographs.

4.15 pm

We were guided and the Assembly should be guided by the principle of presumption of innocence. We cannot afford to legislate in a way that ignores the presumption of innocence, because, in many ways, you would create a defect immediately. Many people say that, if it is not human rights-compliant, it is nearly like soliciting another person having to take the matter to the European Court of Human Rights. We do not want to come back to revisit this in the future. I will major on the presumption of innocence because there is a provision in the Bill for the indefinite retention of DNA and fingerprints in cases in which a person is not charged as a result of an arrest, in which a person is not even subject to a prosecution, and, indeed, where no conviction comes about. That totally and absolutely undermines the principle of innocence. If a person is not convicted or even charged — if there is no prosecution — or if the person is released unconditionally, there is provision in the Bill for the retention of their DNA, fingerprints and photograph. That is not the task of the Assembly. The Assembly should always come down on the side of the presumption of innocence. Our approach and amendments protect that. We had a bit of a discussion earlier about the role of Assembly. It is to frame law, set law and protect citizens.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: Yes.

Mr Wells: The role of the Assembly is not only to do that but to protect our citizens against criminals who, in many cases, are torturing their local community. The Member has to face the fact that there are many examples, with the technology that we now have, of people who have committed the most vile crimes being detected, convicted and imprisoned entirely on the basis of DNA profiling. He will, no doubt, try to avoid saying that the PSNI made it very clear to the Committee that the retention of that material was absolutely essential in pursuing those criminals.

The Member knows — I said this in Committee — that my DNA was taken after a minor traffic accident in 2001. I could have gone, if I had wanted to, to the police and asked them to destroy it, but I did not. The reason is simple: I have absolutely nothing to fear. If I keep my nose clean and do not get myself involved in any crime, I have absolutely nothing to worry about in the retention of that material. Will he deny the PSNI the right to have access to the most modern technology to detect criminals, or will he force it to destroy material that, he knows, in the future could well solve a horrible crime? The worst examples in GB have been of serial rapists who have terrorised women in their community and, on some occasions, murdered those women and have been caught as a direct result of the retention of their DNA. Will he deny the Police Service of Northern Ireland the opportunity to capture those individuals by demanding the destruction of that material?

Mr McCartney: There are a number of things. You should not presume that every person who is arrested is a criminal. That is the type of principle that we are trying to protect. When the PSNI was in, I noted that it made that observation. However, when it was asked about statistics and the number of cases that were solved because of that retention, it was not very forthcoming with the answers. There does not seem to be a direct correlation. As part of the deliberations, we also heard that the database controlled by the British Home Office is 50 times bigger than the database in France. Yet, we were not told that the detection rate for any crime committed in Britain —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will indeed.

Mr Ford: Will the Member take it from me that the figures I have show that the database in England and Wales is something like six times the size of the one in France and that the proposals we are looking at would mean that our database would be somewhat smaller than the one in England and Wales? When I get to my speech, I will be able to give exact figures.

Mr McCartney: I appreciate that, but the figure I gave was presented to the Committee as coming from a piece of research. We were also told that the British database is five times greater than the European average and 10 times greater than the United States average. The point that I am making relates to what the PSNI and others who presented to the Committee said. Many of us in the Committee feel that we were in the car when you had that accident, because we have heard about it so many times. When you made the same observation to the human rights commissioner, he rightly made the point — you were there when he said it — that people's DNA is their personal property. Many of us would expect that, in certain circumstances, our house would be raided. He said that that does not mean that there is an open door so that the PSNI or any investigative authority can enter your house whenever they want. It does not mean that they can just say that they are there to prevent crime and ask why they cannot enter at any time if you have nothing to hide in your house. That is the point that was made. This is all about balance. If you have it at the core that a person is presumed innocent until proven guilty, how do you protect

There was a recent case — we can all quote cases to put one argument against the other — in which the person won libel damages because he should never have been arrested in the first place. Under this Bill, that person's DNA would be retained. So, you can prove that you should not have been arrested and that you were libelled by people who suggested that you were a criminal and that, in the broad sweep of things, we should be protected against criminals, yet the legislation says that you have no right to say that your DNA should not be retained.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: Yes, I will.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. Does the Member not agree that it is a flawed position that the retention of DNA equates to guilt? That is what the Member is articulating. He is saying that if you retain someone's DNA it means they are guilty. That is not what the Bill or the amendments are about. It is about finding the balance between the European Court's judgements and making sure that the public are protected. Is he not in that flawed position of equating the retention of DNA to guilt?

Mr McCartney: Many of those who presented to the Committee said that, in essence, that is what it was.

As regards some of the material that we received, the Home Office consultation document had this strapline:

"Keeping the Right People on the DNA Database."

That was nearly saying that there is a category of person who is found guilty, but there is another category who we nearly profile as criminals, and, therefore, we want their —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: Yes, I will indeed.

Mr Wells: Frankly, I do not care whether we have six times or 10 times the level of retention of France. As the Member for Lagan Valley has made clear, the retention does not lead to a conviction. The point made by several witnesses to the Committee was that very seldom is a conviction made on the basis of DNA alone. DNA evidence may help in the arrest of an individual, but it often requires other corroborative evidence to achieve a conviction. I keep asking the same question: if 10 times as many people in this part of the United Kingdom have their DNA retained as in France and that data is used correctly, what is there to fear?

I will give the Member another example. I carry a passport. It is a British passport, as I am sure you would expect. In order to get that passport, I have to have a photograph taken, and that is retained by the Border Agency. Why is that done? To ensure that, as I travel around the world, I can be identified if I am up to anything wrong. I do not object to that. No doubt he carries an Irish passport, but he does not object to his photograph being retained. There are 600,000 or 700,000 people in Northern Ireland who have one type of passport or another. So why is it wrong for the PSNI to retain photographs, DNA, fingerprints etc? Why is it wrong for the PSNI to retain that but all right for the Border Agency or the Irish passport authority to retain similar material?

Mr McCartney: The latter part of your point makes mine for me: the information is already there. There is photographic identification and documentation to show who we are and where we are, but what is framed here denies a person who is not proven guilty of any offence the right not to be held on a database. In essence, that says that you are part criminal, and we need to retain your DNA because it is part of what they would call a criminal investigation. Therefore, I do not think that you are comparing like with like.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will indeed.

Mr Givan: Does the Member not accept that some people may be happy to have their DNA retained because it would eliminate them from the investigative process and thus prove them innocent?

Mr McCartney: There may be and have been instances of voluntary processes, in which people are asked to volunteer their DNA. People come in, and conditions are set for the retention of DNA for an investigation, much in the same way as there is a provision in the Bill, which we support, for DNA found on a victim of assault or a sexual offence to be retained until the investigation is concluded. So this is not a case of saying that there should not be DNA retention or that investigators should not be given the scope and power to do what they need to do to make an investigation successful. We are saying that there has to be a point at which a citizen is protected and can say, "I do not want my DNA to be retained. I have been arrested improperly and incorrectly, and there is no evidence against me, nor is any prosecution presented". Even should people go to court and be found not guilty, holding on to their DNA supports the view that they are nearly not guilty. People have to be protected against that type of perception. That is what legislation is about. That is the counter to Jim Wells's position that there should be an amendment to create a compulsory process of collecting DNA and fingerprints and you should have no rights about your house because, let us face it, if you have nothing to hide there, why should the PSNI not knock at your door whenever it feels like it and come in to look round? Even Jim Wells would object to that. I do not think that we can do that.

This afternoon, I have heard people being described as having right-wing views, and that is what taking that approach is about. You must keep it in mind that this went to the European Court of Human Rights and was struck down, so the people we task with protecting us through legislation ruled against it. The Minister can respond to this. There is a suspicion, feeling, sense or even a concern that this, as presented, does not comply with that ruling. In essence, we are saying that we think that we have made a mistake that we are now correcting to a degree, but, in the long term, if someone takes a case, we will find ourselves back here. We have the opportunity to do the right thing, and, by doing the right thing, the presumption of innocence should be at the core.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): If Members will bear with me, I want to run through the Committee's position on all the amendments in the group, albeit that we will not vote on most of them until Monday. I will make some general comments about the clauses and schedules that bring in a new framework for the retention of fingerprints and DNA profiles, before turning to the specific amendments tabled for consideration today.

From the first time that the Department produced policy proposals for a new framework to govern the retention and destruction of fingerprints, DNA samples and profiles, it has been clear that there was unlikely to be a meeting of minds among all Committee members. The Committee agreed to support clause 7 and schedules 2 and 3, which insert PACE NI, the new framework governing the retention and destruction of fingerprints and DNA samples. However, there was a clear divergence of views on this. Some Committee members acknowledged the requirement for changes, given the 2008 judgement of the ECHR in the case of S and Marper v the United Kingdom that the indefinite retention of DNA and fingerprints from unconvicted individuals violated article 8 — the right to privacy — and expressed the view that the proposals in the Bill were proportionate and would continue to assist in the detection and prevention of crime, which is in the interest of public protection, although at least one member indicated a preference to retain the existing framework.

Other members, however, expressed strong reservations about whether the proposals for the retention of material are proportionate and necessary, particularly for those who have been arrested or charged but not convicted of a qualifying offence in relation to the policy of indefinite retention in a substantial category of offences and in relation to children and young people.

4.30 pm

They were also concerned with the inclusion of cautions, penalty notices and diversionary youth conferences in the retention framework. Those members indicated that they had serious concerns about whether the framework as proposed is compatible with human rights standards, and they were therefore not content with clause 7 and schedules 2 and 3. They indicated their intention to table a number of amendments relating to that part of the Bill at Consideration Stage, and the members from Sinn Féin and the SDLP have obviously done that.

A particular issue that the Committee discussed at length relates to the retention of material for persons convicted of a recordable offence. Article 63F provides for the retention of material indefinitely from all adults convicted or cautioned for any recordable offence and all young persons convicted or cautioned for more than one recordable offence. Given the very wide range of offences covered by the use of recordable offences, questions were raised about whether that approach is necessary and proportionate.

Some Committee members were content with the retention proposals, noting that a recent High Court judgement found that the policy of indefinite retention of data of convicted offenders in a substantial category of offences is not disproportionate, is lawful and is, indeed, rational. Other Committee members, however, expressed concerns about whether the approach is proportionate and necessary and whether it complies with the ECHR ruling in the S and Marper case. They indicated that they would not support that aspect of the retention framework.

I will endeavour to provide some further insight into the Committee's deliberations on the issues as they relate to amendment Nos 18, 19 and 31, which Mr McCartney tabled. The introduction of a legislative framework for the retention of photographs by the PSNI was raised in the evidence that was submitted to the Committee on that part of the Bill. The Department had previously highlighted that the ECHR judgement that has brought about the need to change the retention framework imposes no obligation in the retention of photographs. The Department was, however, of the view that it was likely that, if the current practice of indefinitely retaining photographs of persons taken on arrest were to remain unchanged, the police would face legal challenge at some point.

During the Committee Stage, the Department indicated that, following a case against the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, the Association of Chief Police Officers has set up a working group, on which the PSNI is represented, to bring the management of police information guidelines into compliance with the ECHR. The retention of photographs falls under those guidelines, and the PSNI will implement agreed best practice. The Department stated that it was satisfied with that approach and therefore did not intend to bring photographs within the retention framework. The Committee noted the position on the photographs. My party will certainly support that position and will therefore oppose the Sinn Féin amendment.

Amendment No 20 will amend article 63C, which enables article 63B material that is taken from a person in connection with the investigation of an offence to be retained until the conclusion of the investigation by the police, or, where legal proceedings are instituted against a person, until the conclusion of those proceedings. The Committee sought clarification on the point at which the conclusion of an investigation is deemed to have occurred, and it raised concerns that that article did not adequately reflect the intention of the provision.

The Department confirmed that the policy intention of the provision was that the material should not be retained once it had been established that it is of no evidential value to the investigation. However, the Attorney General had asked that the original drafting be revised to permit the retention of material if it were likely to be probative against, for example, a co-defendant, rather than solely against the individual from whom it was taken. With that qualification, the Department agreed to consider further the wording of the provision.

The subsequent amendment, which is being considered today, aims to clarify the provision by linking retention to the perceived utility of the material, rather than to the conclusion of the investigation. The Committee is content to support the amendment, given that it addresses the concerns that were raised.

Amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26 relate to the prescribed circumstances. A number of organisations raised concerns with the Committee that the prescribed circumstances referred to in article 63D are not set out in the Bill but would be left to subordinate legislation. The prescribed circumstances relate to the range of circumstances in which the threshold for the retention of material from unconvicted persons may be set aside.

The Examiner of Statutory Rules also drew the Committee's attention to this provision. It was his view that, given that it is a substantive amendment of primary legislation, the prescribed circumstances that relate to the application for the biometric commissioner's consent to retain fingerprints and DNA profiles should be set out in the Bill, with power to amend by way of subordinate legislation, subject to affirmative resolution if necessary, rather than leaving it to subordinate legislation, subject to negative resolution, as is currently proposed.

In order to address the concerns that were raised, the Department agreed to set out those prescribed circumstances in the Bill, hence the amendments tabled by the Minister today, albeit that they are not going to be moved. The prescribed circumstances reflect those in the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012, with the exception of the second part of the provision. As the provision is aimed at protecting some of the most vulnerable in society, the Department considered that a formulation that focused closely on the protection of the public rather than the broader prevention and detection of crime is appropriate and would relate exclusively to circumstances in which an individual has been arrested in connection with a serious, violent or sexual offence but where there is insufficient evidence to bring charges.

The Committee agreed to support the amendments, with some members indicating that, in their view, this is an appropriate approach that does not reflect on the innocence or otherwise of the individual and will assist in the detection and prevention of crime, and, therefore, is in the interest of public protection. Other members indicated that they would not support the amendment, given that it related to the retention of material from those arrested or charged but not convicted. In their view, that undermines the presumption of innocence and due process, and they have serious concerns about whether the framework, as proposed, particularly in relation to people not convicted, is compatible with human rights.

Again, on this particular issue, my party supported the amendments tabled by the Minister. Obviously, they are now subject to a petition of concern. Indeed, many of the organisations that came before the Committee, such as the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders (NIACRO) and others, made the point very strongly that all these things should be set out in the Bill rather than being subject to the negative resolution procedure. In my view, the amendments strengthen the position of the House to be able to take decisions on the matter. Obviously, other Members have a fundamental disagreement with the principle itself, as opposed to whatever mechanism is used to bring it into effect. However, we were content with the amendments that were tabled Amendment Nos 22, 23 and 25 relate to article 63D, the retention of article 63B material and persons arrested for or charged with a qualifying offence with regard to the role of the biometric commissioner. Indeed, the need for one was discussed by the Committee during its consideration of the evidence that was received on this part of the Bill. The Department confirmed that, where the police are of the view that the prescribed circumstances apply, the Bill allows them to seek the approval of a biometric commissioner to retain the material. The commissioner will be a public authority within the definition of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 and will be obliged to observe the ECHR.

During the Bill's Committee Stage, the Department explored, with the police and the courts, the possibility of the proposed role of the biometric commissioner being undertaken by the courts. Having considered the matter further, the Department advised the Committee that, without experience of operating the new framework, the police had been unable to estimate the likely volume of cases once it is up and running, but anticipated that numbers could be considerable at start-up as they process the historical abuse inquiries, along with other cases. Without a clear idea of the likely volume and the associated resource implications, the courts were understandably reluctant to take the business on.

The Department also indicated that, if the courts were to accept the task, although reporting restrictions could be imposed, hearings would be public with a requirement on an applicant to make representation in court. The risk that public opinion would reach a view on their innocence might be seen to undermine the willingness of some to make such representations. The Department said that it would remain the case that, were the commissioner to find against an applicant, they would be entitled to seek judicial review of any such decision.

The Department indicated that it intended to proceed with the biometric commissioner, but gave an undertaking to keep the matter under review. The Committee indicated that it was content with that approach, although some members highlighted issues with it. From my party's perspective, we were content with the proposals that it would be for the biometric commissioner to deal with this, for those reasons that I have outlined previously.

Amendment No 27 to schedule 2 relates to retention of article 63B material in respect of persons completing diversionary youth conferences. In the course of our deliberations on the Bill, the Department advised the Committee that it intended to bring forward an amendment to bring completion of a diversionary youth conference within the framework on the same basis as a caution. The Department indicated that both those disposals require acceptance of guilt on the part of the offender and so are treated as convictions for the purposes of the retention framework.

While the Committee supported the proposed amendment, some members expressed the same concerns regarding the inclusion of completion of a diversionary youth conference within the framework as they had with the inclusion of cautions. Since the Committee agreed to support the amendment to bring the completion of diversionary youth conferences within the framework on the same basis as a caution, the Minister has written to advise members that he is minded to accept the amendment tabled by Mr Maginness to amend the treatment of cautions awarded to juveniles, which I will come to shortly. The Minister has indicated that his intention to accept this amendment has implications for the treatment of diversionary youth conferences within the framework. He has, therefore, brought a revised amendment along the lines of that proposed by Mr Maginness for cautions. The Committee noted the intention of the Minister with regard to this amendment at its meeting last Thursday.

My party will oppose Mr Maginness's amendment. Given that the Minister's amendment was to keep in line with what Mr Maginness proposed in respect of how cautions are treated, we will vote against what the Minister has proposed in respect of this issue. I will elaborate a little bit more on that when I get to Alban Maginess's amendment.

Amendment No 28 relates to retention of article 63B material in respect of persons given a penalty notice. This was another new provision that the Department advised the Committee that it intended to bring forward at Consideration Stage to permit limited retention for two years in cases where a penalty notice has been issued under section 60 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011.

When questioned by the Committee, the departmental officials clarified that, generally, penalty notices would be issued without an arrest but that, in those cases in which a person was arrested for a recordable offence, his or her fingerprints and DNA would be taken and, in the event of a penalty notice being the disposal used, the two-year retention provision would apply.

Again, this is an area in which the Committee agreed to support the inclusion of the amendment, as drafted, in the Bill. Some Committee members indicated that they were content to allow limited retention in relation to penalty notices. Others, however, indicated that they had concerns regarding retention in relation to cases where a penalty notice has been issued on the same basis as cautions, and said that they would not support the proposed amendment.

Amendment Nos 29 and 33 relate to retention of article 63B material in respect of persons under 18 given a caution, and have been tabled by Mr Maginness. In the written and oral evidence received during the Bill's Committee Stage, organisations raised concerns that a caution was included within the definition of an offence for which a person is convicted. The organisations pointed out that cautions do not have the same status as convictions under other aspects of the criminal law. In their opinion, there was some disconnect between the Bill and what happens under other aspects of the law. Those organisations felt that considering cautions in this way is a disproportionate course of action and runs contrary to the purpose of a caution, which is to divert young people away from the criminal justice system.

In response to questioning from the Committee, the Department confirmed that a caution is treated as equivalent to a conviction for the purposes of the retention of DNA profiles and fingerprints because it involves acceptance of guilt. It is the Department's position that there is no logical basis for treating it otherwise for the purposes of the DNA and fingerprint databases.

A number of Committee members expressed concerns about the inclusion of a caution in the definition of an offence. Although noting that when a person is cautioned and accepts a caution, an acceptance of guilt is involved, they viewed the treatment of cautions as a conviction in the retention framework as inappropriate and something that in some way affects the purpose of a caution. They had particular concerns about children and young people, where the use of cautions is aimed at directing them away from reoffending, and indicated that they would not support the inclusion of cautions in the retention framework.

4.45 pm

Other Committee members were content with the inclusion of retention for a caution, on the basis that it would assist crime prevention and detection and that retention of DNA is not the same as a criminal record, in that it will not be disclosed.

The amendments tabled by Mr Maginness would change the treatment of juvenile cautions for the purpose of DNA retention. As I said earlier, the Minister advised the Committee last week that he was minded to accept the amendments, and the Committee noted that position.

Our party will be opposing the amendment that Mr Maginness has tabled. He tabled it in good faith, and I do not doubt for one minute the good intent behind it. However, what had originally been proposed by the Minister struck the compromise in respect of one caution: a second caution or conviction would lead to indefinite retention. Obviously, therefore, our party is not in a position to support the proposals that Mr Maginness will articulate shortly.

Finally, the Committee agreed to support amendment No 34, which corrects a drafting error in schedule 3, and, at its meeting last Thursday, noted the Minister's intention to table amendment No 32 to amend the definition of "DNA sample" in schedule 3 on the recommendation of Forensic Science Northern Ireland.

The DUP will be opposing all the amendments that have been tabled by Sinn Féin and the amendment tabled by Mr Maginness. As a consequence, we will be opposing the Minister's amendment, which deals with diversionary youth conferences.

Mr Elliott: These schedules to the Bill and this group of amendments are generally about the retention of DNA and fingerprints. Other parties have indicated that they want photographs to be retained as well. What I want, what the Ulster Unionist Party wants and, I think, what the vast majority of the public want is to ensure that we are not soft on crime and are not soft on criminals.

I am concerned that some on the opposing Benches want to give criminals every possible opportunity to evade the law. That is the reasoning behind some of the amendments. I listened to Mr McCartney say that DNA is your personal property. Of course it is, but if it can be used for the benefit of the law and the benefit of the public, it should be. If it can be used to stop crime and to convict people of crime, it should be used, just as your other personal property, such as your computers or your clothes, can be used. If samples need to be taken, they need to be taken. As a legislative authority, we need to ensure that we give every possible help and assistance to the law authorities so that they can carry out their tasks, prevent crime and ensure that they bring criminals to justice.

I understand that we are, of course, subject to the ECHR, but we must provide every assistance possible to the law enforcement authorities and not use legislation to inhibit those authorities. The Ulster Unionist Party will not support any weakening of the law. Sinn Féin and the SDLP have submitted a petition of concern regarding the commissioner for the retention of biometric material, which is basically an appeal mechanism in the legislation. I have not heard any reasoning yet, although perhaps I will before the debate is over, as to why there is such opposition to that. I am quite happy to listen to that debate.

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am quite happy to give way.

Mr McCartney: The Minister did not move his amendment. That is why we did not provide a rationale for our position, because we will be coming back to it. Our basic position is that it should be a matter for the courts.

Mr Elliott: I understand that, but I still have not heard the reasoning, and I have not heard an argument about why we should not have a commissioner and why it should go through the courts.

Mr A Maginness: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. The SDLP is supportive of the Sinn Féin amendments on this matter because we believe that the courts are best suited and placed to deal with any issues that arise. A biometrics commissioner is well and good, but the courts have the experience and the authority, and I and my party believe that they should be the adjudicator, if necessary. It is a matter of choice, but we believe that due process is important and should be upheld.

Mr Elliott: I thank Mr Maginness; he will have the opportunity to explain more. I am pleased that he has tried to explain Sinn Féin's position, because it has not explained it itself. I am quite happy that —

Mr McCartney: I told you why.

Mr Elliott: Sorry? I am quite happy for Mr Maginness to put forward Sinn Féin's position for it; that is well and good for him. This has been debated at Committee, and we have had the opportunities to have those discussions, but neither Mr Maginness, Mr McCartney nor anybody else from those parties brought forward any of those issues for a much fuller and wider debate at Committee.

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to give way.

Mr McCartney: We raised it at the Committee on a number of occasions. Your attendance at the Committee is maybe suspect; you may not have been there on those particular days.

Mr Elliott: I take exception to that, because I am sure that my attendance is every bit as good, or near enough, as that of Mr McCartney and some of his colleagues. He raised at Committee his party's concern about what is proposed, not why it wants something different and the reasoning for that, and that is why I believe that we have not had a reasonable opportunity to do that. It is the same with quite a number of the amendments: we have not had the opportunity to discuss them more fully at Committee. It would have been helpful to have that chance, and it may have helped us to understand much better, but we are quite happy to do it here and now and bring it back if necessary.

The Ulster Unionist Party will not support any weakening of the law, where reasonably possible, but we are quite happy to listen to the debate.

Mr A Maginness: I agree with Mr Elliott that it is important to support the law, and we, as a party, are anxious to support the law, but the law is not simply a matter of procedure but includes concerns about citizens' rights. Those concerns are enshrined in law through the Human Rights Act and through the European Convention on Human Rights.

It is quite clear, given the judgement in the Marper case, that we, in this jurisdiction, have an issue with the retention of DNA and fingerprints. Therefore, it is important for us to get our law right and to make it consistent with the judgement of the court. Therefore, we, as a party, along with other colleagues, are attempting to get the best legislation possible, and we believe that we should recognise the human rights issues.

Therefore, we are concerned that there should not be an overzealous approach to the retention of DNA. Yes, we accept in principle that DNA should be retained for a period of time when people commit offences. However, there are a number of other permutations. One relates to young people, and another relates to people who were arrested or charged where those charges were not completed by their going to court or by there being no conviction. Is it right and proper — that is the proposition that one has to put to the Assembly — that the DNA should be retained of people who were charged and not convicted and that their fingerprints be retained? That is the question.

In certain circumstances, it is not unreasonable for there to be limitations on that. In those particular circumstances, I suggest that there be no retention. When people commit offences and break the law, there has to be retention. That is right and proper, and the European Court and our own courts recognise that and see no problem with that, but, in a situation where you have indefinite retention —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, certainly.

Mr Wells: The scenario is more likely to be where a young juvenile commits a crime, a PSNI officer is perfectly aware that a crime has been committed and the situation is disposed of by means of a caution. All the evidence indicates that, if you take and retain the DNA, that individual is as likely to spiral down into a life of crime. However, if you have retained the DNA, you will often have some way of proving that the person has done the next crime that he or she commits. If you destroy the DNA, you will probably have no evidence to confirm that that person committed that crime.

I am surprised at the Member because he is a learned barrister of considerable experience. Implicit in what he is saying is that something will happen to that retained material by the authorities. He is saying that it will be abused or used wrongly or used to convict someone who is innocent. There is not a shred of evidence that that has happened.

I cannot tie down from any of those who are opposing this what is the real fear about what could happen to the material beyond the fact that it has been stored. I do not subscribe to this nonsense that it is a gross infringement of someone's privacy, that it brands them or that they spend the rest of their life with this burden that, because their DNA has been retained, they feel a criminal. It is absolute nonsense.

The young lads who are torturing my community in south Down could not care less whether their DNA has been retained from that aspect. Where they are scared is that they know that, if they commit another crime and their DNA is retained, they have a very good chance of being caught. So, he needs to explain why he, as a moderate, constitutional nationalist, is throwing his hat in the ring with Sinn Féin on this issue.

Mr A Maginness: It is not a matter of throwing one's hat in the ring with Sinn Féin, the DUP or anyone else. It is a matter of taking this issue on its merits, examining it and coming to a conclusion based on the law and on human rights. The Member will say that it does not matter to the individual. However, where a person's DNA and fingerprints are taken and they have not committed a crime, there is an implication that they are guilty of some offence.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?
Mr A Maginness: I will give way, yes.

Mr Wells: The amendment extends even further than that to photographs. Mr McCartney could not answer the question, but Mr McCartney, of course, comes from a different background to the SDLP. I will deal with that later. He could not answer why it is wrong for the police to retain photographs when the passport agencies in both jurisdictions will retain routinely passport photographs for many, many years. What is the difference? I do not feel that it is a gross infringement of my civil liberties if that happens.

Mr A Maginness: I suppose the difference is that, with the passport agency, you are not involving the courts or any imputation of misbehaviour or offending or anything of that nature. It is, essentially, a voluntary action on your part to give your photograph to the passport service.

5.00 pm

It is to your benefit, in so far as the agency has a record of your photograph so, if you get ill or there is a problem abroad, you can be assisted. Indeed, your photograph can be used for simple recognition so that you have no problem going through customs or passport control. So there is a material distinction, I believe, between the two situations. DNA, fingerprints and photographs are all the same type of material, so it is logical that photographs should be included with DNA and fingerprints.

Mr Wells raised a point about cautions. My amendment relating to young people deals with that. I think it important that I outline to the Assembly my position on that. It is amendment No 29.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, of course.

Mr Allister: Just before the Member moves off the original point, in trying to follow through his logic about retention, I want to understand how far it takes him. Does he hold that the authorities should not be able to retain a record of the name of a person arrested?

Mr A Maginness: No, I do not believe that you could reasonably object to that.

Mr Allister: On that premise, if it is not reasonable to object to the retention of the identity of a person, how is it reasonable to object to the means of identifying a person?

Mr A Maginness: The point of distinction is that the name is simply a record. I do not believe that you are talking about a material substance, such as DNA, fingerprints and photographs. I believe that there is a distinction to be made between those three things and a person's name. It is quite clear that there is a distinction between them.

Let me go on with my point on cautions, particularly of young people, and I refer to amendment No 29. I have to say that there was a lot of lobbying on this aspect of the Bill by witnesses before the Committee. Quite a number of organisations put forward submissions or gave evidence. One was the Children's Law Centre, and others included the Commissioner for Children and Young People, Opportunity Youth, the NIACRO and GeneWatch UK.

All of them reflected similar concerns. The Children's Law Centre, for example, said that cautions do not have the same status as convictions. It said that having retention where a caution was given would be a disproportionate course of action because it runs contrary to the purported purpose of a caution.

I ask colleagues to consider a situation in which a caution is given to a young person. The reason why a caution is given is to try to avoid circumstances in which that young person will become re-involved in the criminal justice system. If an additional aspect to that caution is that the person's DNA or fingerprints are retained, it diminishes the caution and makes it appear as though you were guilty of a crime in the ordinary sense that you committed an offence. I understand the Department 's argument, which was that, whenever you accept a caution, you are also accepting that you are guilty to some extent. That is a basic proposition that I do not seek to undermine. Nonetheless, if we are trying to move young people — minors — away from the criminal justice system, I believe that this undermines the value of a caution.

A number of those organisations that I referred to repeated that argument. However, it is interesting to note that the Public Prosecution Service's (PPS) code for prosecutors states that cautions are not regarded as convictions. So, on the one hand, we have a caution that could merit retention, while on the other hand, we have the PPS code for prosecutors saying that a caution is not a conviction.

The Children's Commissioner said that it was inappropriate and disproportionate to have retention.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Does the Member seriously and genuinely believe that all that he has talked about so far on these clauses since he got to his feet will help the police on the ground to make our streets safer?

Mr A Maginness: That is a proposition that I am sure the Member holds very sincerely. However, the point that I will make to the Member is that, if we materially diminish cautions in some way, I think that we will do a disservice to an alternative way of dealing with young people who offend or who are likely to offend. That is a disservice. Although you say that it will help the police and all the rest, in the wider scheme of things it might help to undermine what the police do, and it might help to undermine the whole business of good policing in the community.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Humphrey: Where is the evidence for the assertion that he just made?

Mr A Maginness: I am putting forward a proposition that the various respected organisations that I referred to reflected. Those included the Children's Commissioner, who has a public duty to look after the interests of young people and children in particular; Opportunity Youth, which is, again, a respected organisation; and NIACRO, which is highly respected and which said that it was inconsistent with the spirit of the Youth Justice Review. The Youth Justice Review spoke of wiping out young people's records when they reached the age of 18 so that there would be a clean slate and they could move on. That is because they wanted to try to decriminalise young people who offended, maybe when they were younger but, because of maturity and so forth, were moving forward.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Wells: This is going too far. There is no evidence for anything that he is saying. Before DNA was ever discovered, young people were cautioned and, sadly, the vast majority of them went on to commit much more serious offences for the rest of their lives. Then DNA comes along, they are cautioned, the DNA test is taken and at least the police can catch them when they start to inflict pain on their community.

The Member is trying to mimic what some of the witnesses said: because the DNA of a young person who has, for the sake of argument, been smashing a pensioner's window, is retained, he then carries the scars and mental anguish of that for the rest of his life and that drives him to a life of crime because he feels that he has been branded a criminal. Absolute nonsense. The evidence indicates that the vast majority of them do not even remember that their DNA was retained in the first place, that it just happens as part of the process, and they move on.

What it does mean, however, is that life for the police is made easier if they can carry out tests to apprehend that criminal at a later stage. No one has indicated any evidence to support what was said by those three groups that came before the Committee. They are liberal in their views and are certainly not out to help the PSNI. My support lies with the policewoman or policeman out on the streets, trying desperately hard to rid our community of individuals who are torturing it. That is where my sympathies lie; not with some mythical, non-existent evidence that people carry the burden of their DNA being kept in some locker in a police station.

Mr A Maginness: Those organisations are not anti-police. They are not opposed to law and order or good policing. In fact, they are for good policing and law and order. They want to bring about a situation in which young people who are offending cease to offend or to stop people offending in the first instance. Their bona fides, I believe, are well established in the community.

Government recognises those bodies. The Children's Commissioner is an official public post. NIACRO is a very respected organisation that does tremendous work in the community. If some of the policies and measures that those organisations talked about were put in place and into practice, we would probably have much less offending. That is their opinion. I accept the point that you are making and have made a number of times, namely this: where is the evidence?

Mr Wells: Non-existent.

Mr A Maginness: Where is the evidence in relation to the proposition that you make? It is an opinion —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: In one moment. It is an opinion that those organisations are expressing, but one that is considered, reasonable and has the interests of the wider community at heart. I do not think that it is just some nonsense that people have cooked up to satisfy their own sense of ego.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that privacy is a very subjective matter? In this House, we all forgo and concede a significant amount of privacy.

To give an example of where somebody may be very protective of their privacy, there are people on Facebook on whose profiles, if you search for their name, you will find only their name and no pictures or personal information because that is what they choose. Being on Facebook and being viewed on Facebook is in no way an implication of criminality but they still feel that, to protect their privacy, they want to retain that information and to release it only to those whom they choose. That is how they wish to maintain their privacy, and that privacy is protected under human rights law. It is not for us to decide what someone should or should not include under privacy. That is for them to decide. What the human rights laws protect is people's privacy, and that is what we are talking about.

5.15 pm

Mr A Maginness: I am grateful to the Member for his comments. I agree with him entirely. But I suppose, in a sense, I am now about to contradict myself. The two amendments that I put forward are a compromise. The compromise is to accept that retention lasts for a period of up to five years. The point I am making is that that is a compromise. I accept that it would be very difficult for the Department to concede the full argument that there should be no retention whatsoever.

The desirable and ideal situation is that there be no retention at all in relation to cautions. However, we live in the real world, and the Department errs on the side of caution, if I may put it that way. Therefore, it will have no truck with that particular argument. So, I am not being purist at all. I am putting forward a proposition that is reasoned and reasonable and restricts retention to a five-year period. That is a reasonable position to adopt. I ask the DUP, in particular, and the Ulster Unionists to revisit this. It would be a pity to divide the House on the issue. You will have another week to think about it. Think long and hard, and come to the right decision, which is to support my amendments. I think that we could make progress on that.

I will conclude there, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. There are no other issues that I need to enlarge upon at this point.

Mr Dickson: Mr Wells and I are probably going to have to agree again in this Chamber. I will give him my liberal view, and that is that DNA should be retained.

Mr McCartney takes the view that permitting the retention of material from unconvicted persons does not go far enough in addressing the Marper judgment. I think that that is where he is coming from on that. I always think that it is perhaps important that people get a full understanding of what a particular judgement is saying, what it is about, how it fits and what it is trying to do.

Mr McCartney appears to wish to interpret the Marper judgment as saying that no material should be retained from anyone not convicted. Quite clearly that is not what the decision is about at all. The decision says that it is permissible to retain material from those persons who have not been convicted. Therefore, it is perfectly reasonable to have an appropriate framework that holds an appropriate database to allow the police and the judicial system to go about their job of protecting the public. That is very clear. The retention of a person's private data cannot be equated in any way with the voicing of suspicions against that individual.

The amendments brought forward in respect of the retention and destruction of photographs were also briefly raised during the Committee's deliberations. It was argued that the photographs do not represent the same intrusion into a person's privacy, because they are not searchable, for example, in the same way as DNA and fingerprints —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: I will.

Mr McCartney: I have no desire to put the Member in a position. However, let me read the evidence given to the Committee by a departmental official in response to a question from Basil McCrea. He asked:

"What if the case has been before the courts and the individual is found to be innocent?"

The response was:

"It is a question of balancing the protection of the public in that there was, at some point prior to acquittal, for example, sufficient suspicion of an individual."

Therefore, the Department is actually saying that it is being retained on the basis that there is sufficient suspicion. Where is the presumption of innocence?

Mr Dickson: I am not sure that you can have a direct read-across to a presumption of innocence. This is about retaining information that allows the police and other parts of the judicial system to go about their duties and to safeguard those individuals, by allowing the appropriate authorities to eliminate them from a specific case or, within the framework, from proceedings at some future stage.

I will press on with photographs. The Justice Committee was told that the Association of Chief Police Officers had set up an appropriate working group. It is working with the PSNI to bring about management information guidelines, which will make the retention of photographs compliant with the European Convention on Human Rights. That is valuable and welcome. We accept that that is important work and that it is under way. It should be allowed to continue unhindered until brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Therefore, we are not prepared to support amendment Nos 18, 19 and 31.

Reference has also been made to amendments relating to the role of a proposed biometric commissioner.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: Yes.

Mr Agnew: I would like clarification on the issue of photos. I am in the position of listening to the debate before I make up my mind, which I know is rare in politics. What is the Member's differentiation? He mentioned searchability, but my understanding is that there is technology that allows you to search a photo database. The point has been made about why we should distinguish between a name and a photo. Why should we distinguish between a photo and a fingerprint?

Mr Dickson: Without going into too many details, I think that some Members and, sometimes to the benefit of the police, too many people seem to think that what they see on 'CSI' works in reality. As I understand it, the reality is that photo databases are not searchable and do not work in that way. We are a very long way off having to mistrust the retention of photographs.

I will move on. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission stated that it had no difficulty with the appointment of a biometric commissioner, as it could make for a more efficient operation of the state. It made the point that it cannot go into every courtroom every time that there is a dispute of this nature. However, it also wanted guarantees that the commissioner would conduct his or her duties in compliance with human rights obligations. Of course, those obligations would fall to it, as a public authority, and it would be required to observe the ECHR. That should allay any reservations about non-compliance.

The Committee was told that the Department explored, with the police and the courts, the prospect of the latter taking on responsibility for the proposed role of a biometric commissioner, but they were reluctant to do so, as the police could not estimate the number of cases on start-up. The number is likely to be considerable, especially as historical abuse cases are being processed along with other cases, as the Chair of the Committee pointed out.

If the courts were to accept the task, it should be borne in mind that reporting restrictions could be imposed on them. Court hearings are public hearings, and there may be people who wish to challenge the biometric retention of information about them, but they would not want that to form part of public proceedings. Therefore, it is fair to suggest that the commissioner would be a more appropriate route for looking at and challenging the retention of biometric information.

We believe that a commissioner taking on that role, subject to the ECHR, would be better for the provision of faster, fairer justice but that it should be kept under review. It is more appropriate for a commissioner than it is for the courts, which would allow for the retention of that information in a public forum, rather than through the private route of a commissioner's office, but subject to ECHR scrutiny. Therefore, we cannot support amendment Nos 22, 23 and 25.

I will now turn to juvenile cautions and amendment Nos 29 and 33. The Children's Law Centre pointed out to the Committee its concerns about under-18s who receive two cautions for minor recordable offences having their DNA and fingerprints retained indefinitely. A number of other respondents also expressed concerns about the status of cautions with regard to under-18s.

Having considered those matters, the Alliance Party is prepared to support the amendments that have been tabled by Mr Maginness that remove indefinite retention and introduce retention for five years. Indeed, that seems to be a proportionate response. It is just a pity that he cannot extend that response in a proportionate way to other retentions. It strikes an appropriate balance between protecting the public and ensuring that under-18s who have accepted their guilt do not have their DNA and fingerprints retained for the rest of their life.

Finally, amendment No 30 relates to the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996. It is my understanding that the Act provides for the safeguarding of material so that it can be used in certain appeals, thus working to prevent miscarriages of justice. Removing the exemption would mean that such material would be destroyed to the detriment of fairness and accuracy in the justice system. It seems wrong that we would destroy material that could be used to overturn a conviction at some stage in the future. For that reason, my party will not support the amendment. We will oppose the Sinn Féin amendments and support the SDLP amendments and the Bill as it stands.

Mr Wells: In his absence, I pay tribute to our Chairperson, Paul Givan, who has guided us through this very difficult legislation, and, of course, our very loyal and helpful staff. I must say that I think that we all agree that Paul has shown himself to be a rising star in the Assembly.

Mr Hamilton: He will be damned now.

Mr Wells: Yes; I suppose that is the kiss of death to his political career, I should say. Not to be facetious —

Mr A Maginness: What about the Deputy Chair?

Mr Wells: No, no; Mr Givan is a rising star. Mr McCartney falls into my age group of political has-beens.

Certainly, in my opinion, Mr Givan has been extremely effective in his chairmanship of the Committee and has worked well with our experienced staff to guide us through what is a very difficult issue. Again, it is confirmation of the need to have the Assembly that, rather than having direct rule Ministers simply laying it down as Holy Writ, we can, in a democratic society, debate, analyse and take evidence on those very important issues.

It also has to be emphasised that, with regard to the vast majority of the Bill, there was unanimity in the Committee. There was no falling out, but there was an issue that divided the Committee right down the middle week after week. I think that the dichotomy is between those who support the police and want to do absolutely everything that they can to help the PSNI in its extremely difficult task of trying to keep people safe from criminals, and those who, for very obvious reasons, support the police outwardly, but still resent some of what they did in the past, and will do only the basic minimum to help them in their task.

Let us be honest: the elephant in the room is that we all know why Sinn Féin would not want the retention of DNA, fingerprints and photographs. The reality is that, had those techniques been available effectively in the 1970s and 1980s, an awful lot of its erstwhile friends would have been locked up long ago for their terrorist crimes. Therefore, Sinn Féin, by its very DNA and nature, will always oppose anything that facilitates the police in nabbing the criminal. That is its history. We expect that from Sinn Féin.

Mr McCartney can use all the lines and propaganda that he has been given by Connolly House, but we know his background. We know where he has come from. We know where many of the other Members on those Benches have come from. They have come from a terrorist background. Hopefully, that is in the past, but that is where they have come from. They will resist anything that facilitates the work of the PSNI. They may sit on the Policing Board and the district policing partnerships or the CSPs, as they are now called. They may sit on the Justice Committee, but theirs is a very lukewarm and tacit support for the PSNI and the work that it does.

5.30 pm

The surprising aspect of this is not Sinn Féin — I expect it from them. The real surprise is the SDLP. The SDLP has not only opposed these techniques being used effectively by the police but, even worse, signed the petition of concern. It knows full well the implications of signing that petition of concern. Those of us who have tried to work with the SDLP at a local level have seen a greening of that party in recent weeks. We have seen it in the Gerry McGeough issue and the McCreesh park issue in Newry, where Mr Bradley's friends in Newry and Mourne District Council meekly put their hands up to support the naming of a play park after an IRA terrorist.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the Member to come back to the Bill. We are straying slightly beyond it at this point. I ask the Member to come back to the Bill to debate the issue.

Mr Wells: I was actually allowed to stray further than I expected. [Laughter.] I am very pleased that I got as far as I did. We have seen that greening, and it has now been shown.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Certainly.

Mr Agnew: I ask the Member please to use a term other than "greening", because he and I could both be accused of being green but maybe not in this regard.

Mr Wells: I use "green" not in the sense of sound environmental policy but in terms of republicanism.

They have become more republican. They have meekly — no doubt instructed by their friends in Sinn Féin — walked into the Speaker's Office and signed the petition of concern. They know the implications. They had the option this afternoon — it is rapidly becoming this evening — of fighting the valiant fight by putting down a marker, expressing their concerns and voting accordingly or of putting their name to a petition of concern knowing that they will effectively block everything.

We are now in a bit of a mess, because of the petition of concern and the fact that the Minister will now not move some of the amendments, which means that we will have to come back and start all over again. They still have time to recant, confess their sins, come to the Speaker's Office with those others who are looking repentance as well, change their minds and adopt a much more moderate approach. That could be done without any loss of face or principle. They still have that opportunity. However, if they — so-called constitutional moderate nationalists, with a very small "c" and a very small "m" at times — persist in what they are doing, the legislation will inevitably be considerably weaker, and criminals will get off as a result.

Mr McCartney, again using his text supplied by Connolly House, and, to a lesser extent, Mr Maginness — probably original thought in his case — have said that there is no evidence that the retention of DNA photographs and fingerprints will lead to a greater level of convictions. I do not care, because if the retention of DNA means that one rapist in Northern Ireland is caught and stopped from terrorising the women of this Province, as has happened in England and Scotland on many occasions, it is all worthwhile.

With modern technology, a minute sample of DNA can give evidence to help in a conviction. I say "help in a conviction", because all the evidence indicates that DNA is additional to other evidence, but sometimes it is crucial. Evidence beyond DNA is still required to prove a case beyond reasonable doubt. There is very little indication that anyone on the mainland has been convicted entirely as a result of DNA evidence, but it has been used as corroborating evidence. This will make life more difficult.

I am not interested in the viewpoint of liberal organisations such as the Children's Commissioner or Include Youth; I am interested in the people at the coalface of catching and prosecuting criminals in Northern Ireland. The evidence from the police, when they came before us, could not have been clearer. They made it absolutely clear that they wanted the option to retain that material as it would help them greatly in their very difficult task of protecting our community.

What was evident from what was said by Mr McCartney, Mr Maginness and, of course, Mr Agnew, who is the arch-liberal, so we expect it from him — sound on the environment but heretical on everything else — is that there is not a shred of evidence to indicate that the retention of DNA and, of course, now photographs, which has come into the mix as well because Sinn Féin wants even photographs to be destroyed, causes any psychological trauma to the individuals concerned, many of whom simply forget about the fact that it has been taken or perhaps do not even know what was taken.

So there is no evidence. They cannot bring before me scores of young individuals who say that their lives have been traumatised and they have been carrying this burden of guilt on their shoulders —

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I will make a couple of points. First, I hope that his commitment to evidence is as strong when it comes to proposals for stricter penalties, longer sentences and, indeed, from some his colleagues, the death penalty — I do not know whether he shares that view — despite evidence that such things are counterproductive.

Secondly, I heard the exchange between Mr Wells and Mr McCartney. The debate has become a black-and-white, polemical one: we should retain DNA completely in every case all the time; or we should never retain DNA in any case if someone is not convicted. The Bill highlights different cases. In some cases in which people are deemed innocent, DNA is destroyed. In other cases, distinctions are made; the Member mentioned rape, which is the perfect example of there being good, sound reasons for retaining DNA. It is not my job to bring the debate back to the Bill, but can we recognise the fact that we do differentiate? If Mr Wells's view is correct that there is never any reason to destroy DNA, why is he supporting a Bill that states that we should?

Mr Wells: The reason why we are in this predicament is because of the so-called European Court of Human Rights, which does not mean the European Community. People fail to remember that membership of the European Court of Human Rights stretches from the Atlantic Ocean to the Caspian Sea and includes representatives from judiciaries of countries whose human rights records fall well below anything that would be acceptable in western Europe.

In a test case, those individuals have ruled that, as a society, we have to restrict the opportunities to retain DNA, fingerprints and photographs. We are bound by that, and I am not happy that we are bound by it. I am not even happy that we are part of the European Union. I voted no 30 or 40 years ago, and I would still vote no today. Involvement in the internal affairs of our society has gone way beyond a European common market and is now becoming a European federal system. However, we are stuck, we are in it, we have signed up to that convention, and they have ruled in a test case that we have to take action. Within that judgement, we should go as far as possible to retain what we can, which is what we are trying to do as a party.

I congratulate Mr Elliott on his speech and appreciate what he said. He is absolutely right. Unfortunately, I also have to congratulate Mr Dickson. It grieves me to do that because the last time I did so, he put out what I had done to several thousand Twitter followers, so I was branded. No sooner had I said it and checked my Twitter messages than there he was saying it, and the whole world knew about it. He will do the same today.

We are trying to push the boat out as far as we can within the terms of a judgement that we do not accept in the first place. However, we are stuck with it. That judgement certainly does not force the Northern Ireland Executive and the Minister of Justice to destroy photographs. So the Sinn Féin amendment is totally unacceptable, and we will vote against it.

What are we going to do? Sadly, the vast majority of young individuals who are cautioned are guilty in the sense that the police apprehend them for a crime to which they admit, and there is absolutely no doubt. A police officer is not making that decision. On the basis of the person being guilty, a police officer is deciding on the best way to deal with the situation. Do we give him a caution?

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Certainly.

Mr Agnew: I come back to the issue of evidence. Young people, as they mature, make mistakes, and bringing them into the juvenile justice system very often makes them more likely to reoffend. Given the Member's commitment to evidence, does he agree that the logical follow-on is that we should not caution young people at all?

Mr Wells: I am not a complete Luddite so I can understand how a police officer, faced with a certain set of circumstances, decides that the best way to deal with that case is through a caution. However, several years down the line, it will be found that the vast majority of hardened criminals started in their teens. If, under caution, you can take DNA, fingerprints and photographic evidence, you will have the evidence to catch those people if, sadly, they become hardened criminals.

Implicit in what Mr McCartney is saying, and with which the nodding donkeys of the SDLP agree, is that, somehow, that evidence will be abused. What I am waiting for, from the combined brains of the opposition, is one piece of evidence or indication of any case in the United Kingdom in which DNA evidence has been tampered with, manipulated or used to convict someone who is entirely innocent. That is implicit in what they are saying about the retention of that material.

The overwhelming evidence, particularly in sexual crime, where DNA is frequently used in evidence, is that many dangerous, evil men who are behind bars would not be there had there not been DNA evidence. Without going into the mechanics of it, a DNA trace is often left after some horrible rape or sexual assault.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Yes.

Mr Agnew: I come back again to the distinction made in the Bill. I asked Mr McCartney to give way just as he sat down, so I did not find out whether he supports the distinction, but I certainly do. For certain listed crimes, such as rape, DNA will be retained for the reasons that the Member outlined. It is important to make those distinctions. It is not all or nothing; distinctions can legitimately be made.

Mr Wells: The Member for North Down has to realise that it is absolutely inconceivable that a serious sexual crime would be disposed of by means of a caution. You are not going to catch the criminal at the stage of their being cautioned, when it is more likely that he or she has smashed a pensioner's window, caused damage to some vulnerable person's car, or something like that. That is where the caution is likely to be exercised; certainly not in the case of a serious sexual assault. The problem is that, if that individual goes on to commit a really serious crime, you tie police officers' hands behind their backs if you do not allow them access to the latest technology.

DNA has the potential to revolutionise how we detect crime in Northern Ireland. The Committee went to Carrickfergus and saw some of the evidence. The level of evidence that can now be achieved from the tiniest fragment of DNA is extraordinary. You see how the scientists can enhance DNA —

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. There are considerable levels of so-called antisocial behaviour — low-level criminality — in some constituencies. Mr Maginness will be well aware that there are many pockets of it in North Belfast. People in the lower Falls are being terrorised in their homes because of so-called joyriding and car theft, which, I understand, occurred at 10.00 am at the weekend. What would those people think about what their representatives advocate today, following on from their refusal to support the National Crime Agency (NCA) a few weeks ago, refusing to give all the teeth that are needed — [Interruption.] The Members may laugh, but the people living in those areas, who contact my constituency office as well as yours, are fed up with how they are being treated and with their views being ignored by their so-called representatives.

Mr Wells: Had I been allowed to wander further down the road before the Deputy Speaker caught me, I would have mentioned the NCA issue.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member to come back to the Bill. [Laughter.] This time, he should not go further on down the road.

Mr Wells: I did not do that because I knew that I would have been stopped immediately in my tracks.

There has been a change in attitudes to policing in my constituency. I went to a meeting with the police in a strongly nationalist estate in Downpatrick. The meeting was packed, and people were screaming at the police. What was interesting is that they were screaming that they wanted more officers on the beat, more patrols and a higher police presence in the area because they were being tortured by young hoodlums and vandals who were often from their community.

That was a bit of a paradox but also a very encouraging development. People were not screaming to claim police bias or to complain that the Catholic community was being downtrodden. That was not the case; they just wanted a bigger police presence. I am absolutely certain that, as the honourable Member for North Belfast said, those individuals would react very badly if their public representatives failed to allow the police to have the weapons that they need to carry out their difficult task.

5.45 pm

It is very frustrating that, sometimes, when you meet the police, they tell you that they often know the identity of the person who has carried out a crime but that they unfortunately do not have the evidence to convict. The whole community, including the dogs on the street, as they say, know who carried out the crime. Therefore, why would we deny them the resource that has been developed at great expense throughout the world to enable them to detect those individuals? That is the issue.

Finally, and I will finish with this, people who get their DNA taken, receive a caution and do not reoffend have absolutely nothing to worry about. Would someone please tell me how, if that evidence were retained indefinitely, it could be abused? If you never came to the PSNI's attention again, why would they need to go back to their labs, bring out that material and use it?

Mr McCartney mentioned my experience. I have nothing to worry about. They can keep my DNA until the cows come home, because I hopefully will never commit a crime where they are going to need it. If I do something that requires them to bring that material out and test it again, I will deserve exactly what I get, because I will have committed a crime. However, I have nothing to fear, and the vast majority of ordinary, decent citizens who have had DNA profiles retained have nothing to fear.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Certainly.

Mr D Bradley: The Member made a very strong speech on law and order. I would be more convinced by his speech had his party condemned the illegal protests that took place, many of which ended up with —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr D Bradley: — people petrol bombing police.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member should take his seat. We are dealing with a Bill, not protests or any other issue. I ask the Member to retake his seat and the other Member to finish.

Mr D Bradley: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. You allowed Mr Wells a fair degree of latitude on these issues.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: First, I did not allow any latitude. Secondly, I would advise you not to challenge the Chair.

Mr Wells: I think that the Principal Deputy Speaker may react so badly to that challenge that he may resign from this Assembly in the next few weeks, such will be his hurt about what you said to him. You will be responsible for that.

The Committee has argued this point ad nauseam. If truth be known, we got absolutely nowhere in reaching an agreement. I have to accept that. We are going to argue it ad nauseam again here this evening, and, unfortunately, we are not going to reach an agreement. You will never shift Sinn Féin on this. I accept that. For very obvious historical reasons it fears DNA

I suggest that the SDLP and the Green Party rethink where they are going. The one thing that I am determined that we should not do is to put ourselves —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way on that point?

Mr Wells: Yes.

Mr A Maginness: The SDLP amendment is all about cautions, and the SDLP has shifted ground on cautions. We have said yes to five years' retention, while the previous situation would probably have meant indefinite retention. I think that the parties on the opposite Benches should reconsider their position so that they can have a more nuanced or balanced position and take into consideration the very reasonable points that Mr Agnew, the SDLP and, dare I say it, Sinn Féin made on the whole position on cautions and people who have been charged and not convicted.

Mr Wells: As far as our group changing its view on this particular issue, pigs might fly.

I suggest to the Member that the removal of the petition of concern would help matters enormously. I think that that is the problem. I have no difficulty with him opposing what we are suggesting, but I think that it is a problem to use a petition of concern while knowing the seriousness of the consequences for the legislation. Maybe his party will wish to reflect on that between now and next Monday. I think that is a very dangerous precedent to set. However —

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Certainly.

Mr Poots: This party has been criticised before for using petitions of concern. The SDLP is making this a sectarian issue, and that reflects very poorly on it, in that we have a nationalist block opposing this. The SDLP and the Green Party have demonstrated that they are soft on crime and soft on the causes of crime. Sinn Féin always courted the criminals

Mr Wells: That is a clear and succinct encapsulation of the situation that we are in. It disappoints but does not surprise me, given the trend that we have seen of the SDLP drifting further and further into the Sinn Féin camp. The Principal Deputy Speaker will no doubt stop me at any second, so I will drift away from that.

We have an opportunity to rethink, because we are coming back to this on Monday. I hope that wiser counsel will prevail and that we can reach a sensible conclusion on this — one that does not pander to those who, frankly, fear any technology that is available and any new techniques to prevent the criminal. Many of them were up to their neck in criminality for many years.

Mr Ford: I am tempted after that last exchange between Mr Maginness and Mr Wells to say that, instead of each of them suggesting that the other should be reasonable and agree with them, they should both suggest that everybody agree with the Minister. However, I have no expectation of that happening.

One point has been floating around the Chamber for some considerable time, and it started with Mr McCartney's opening remarks. I have absolutely no reason to believe that the proposals I am putting forward in the Bill and in the amendments that I have tabled are, in any way, not compliant with the Assembly's obligations under human rights legislation. Mr McCartney asked me that question, and I give him that straight answer.

The first issue raised by most Members who spoke was that of photographs. Amendment Nos 18, 19 and 31 were tabled by Mr McCartney and his colleagues, who want photographs to be brought within the retention framework and made subject to the same destruction rules as DNA and fingerprints.

The photographing of suspects and the use, disclosure and retention of such photographs is provided for in section 64A of PACE and is applied in the same way as under the equivalent provisions in England and Wales. That statutory provision is supplemented by guidance on the management of police information provided by the National Policing Improvement Agency on behalf of the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO). That sets out the processes that support the principles set out in the management of police information (MoPI) code of practice.

That came to the attention of the courts in England and Wales last June in the case of R (RMC and FJ) v the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. The case in question, which has been referred to already, involved the retention by the Metropolitan Police of the photographs of two individuals. On that occasion, the court was not satisfied that the existing policy struck a fair balance between the competing public and private interests or met the requirements of proportionality.

Lord Justice Richards, in the High Court of England and Wales, declared the policy as set out in the code of practice and guidelines unlawful, but allowed a reasonable further period within which to revise that policy. He stopped short of directing the destruction of the photographs without allowing the possibility of reassessment under a revised policy. I stress that that judgement was not, in any way, a reflection on PACE.

Following the judgement, ACPO set up a working group, on which the PSNI is represented, to bring the MoPI guidelines and the retention and use of photographs under them into compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights. That work is under way, and the PSNI will implement the outcome. I intend to let the police see that through to its conclusion and do not intend to bring photographs within the retention framework at this time.

Let me repeat some of the key points on that: the human rights and professional standards committee of the Policing Board is following the issue and has undertaken to keep it under review; the issue of photographs is being addressed by a police working party; and the court did not prescribe a legislative solution but directed the police to revise the policy, which is work in hand. Very specifically, given that we discussed legislative consent motions earlier, a decision of the English High Court is not binding on Northern Ireland courts, although it is generally regarded as persuasive.

I am satisfied that an administrative solution can be a satisfactory way of dealing with the issue. I intend to let that work take its course. I remind the House that photographs are not included in the retention framework in Scotland, which is regarded as the exemplar of good practice in these islands, nor in England and Wales, so I do not believe that it is necessary to bring photographs into the retention framework in Northern Ireland at this time. I therefore oppose amendment Nos 18, 19 and 31.

I turn now to some of the amendments that I am bringing forward, starting with Amendment No 20. Article 63C currently provides that fingerprints and a DNA profile may be retained until the conclusion of an investigation or any related proceedings. However, it was pointed out during the Committee Stage that an individual might be excluded from an investigation relatively quickly, but the investigation itself could remain open, potentially for several years. The policy intention in relation to that article was that the material could be retained until it had been established that it was of no evidential value to the investigation, in relation to either the person from whom it was taken or any other person.

Amendment No 20 to article 63C will tie retention to the perceived utility of the material, rather than the conclusion of the investigation, and will require it to be disposed of once it is clear that retention no longer serves any useful purpose. That seems to me to be an entirely proportionate approach. While I am talking about that, earlier in the debate I undertook to give the statistics on the number of people likely to be included in the database. In round figures, in Northern Ireland the database currently holds something like 5% of the population. Under the new framework, that will be reduced to 4%. Under the new arrangements in Scotland it is 6%, and in England and Wales it will be 8%. In the USA it is 3.5%, and in France it is 1.4%.

There is no doubt that, while the databases in the UK generally are something like three times the European average, they have proven to be 20 times more efficient in terms of dealing with it. For example, we have seen in recent years that the database in Northern Ireland — of course, it is not the database that convicts people; it is police investigation and a full evidence base that convicts people — has provided 700 investigative leads to the PSNI in recent years which they would not otherwise have. If we are serious about fighting crime, that is an entirely reasonable and proportionate position to take.

I have already indicated that I will not be moving amendment Nos 21, 24 and 26 at this stage, although the Chair has already detailed the issues as to why I believe that they would be an appropriate and proportionate way forward.

The first part of amendment No 34 makes the changes required to article 89 of PACE, making any order to revise the circumstances subject to the affirmative procedure in this place and not simply the negative resolution procedure. As previously indicated, the prescribed circumstances will focus on cases where the alleged victim of the offence was, at the time of the offence, a juvenile, a vulnerable adult or associated with the person to whom the biometric material relates. When cases do not engage those criteria, the Chief Constable will also be able to apply to retain material where he is satisfied that the grounds exist to do so in the interests of the protection of the public.

At an earlier stage I undertook to explore the merits of making applications for retention of material in the prescribed circumstances subject to the approval of the courts, rather than the commissioner. Amendment Nos 22, 23 and 25 from Mr McCartney and his colleagues are aimed at achieving that result. Following discussions between my officials and representatives of the Police Service and the Courts and Tribunals Service, it is apparent that, without experience of operating the new framework, there is little clarity around the likely volume of cases and the consequent resource implications of that. However, there is a general sense that it is likely to be significant when the new framework is first implemented and historical abuse inquiries are processed, along with other cases, but the workload may tail off over time. I therefore propose to proceed with the appointment of a commissioner for the moment, but will keep the matter under review.

A number of points have been made around the application to the courts rather than a commissioner. One of the key issues, which has already been highlighted by Stewart Dickson, is that, if the courts were to accept the task, although reporting restrictions could be imposed, hearings would be in public and there would be a requirement for an applicant to make representations in court in public, with — as was said very tellingly — the risk of public opinion reaching a different view on innocence than that which would be in the formal determination. That could well undermine the willingness of some people to make such representations — people who were justified in doing it.

It is extremely noteworthy that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission had no problem with the appointment of a biometric commissioner, as it could make for more efficient operation of the state, given that we cannot go to the courtroom every single time. That is a view that has been expressed by some of the responsible NGOs dealing with the issue.

The commissioner, of course, would be a public authority within the definition in section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998, which makes it unlawful to act in a way that is incompatible with convention rights. That would mean that any applicant dissatisfied with the hearing by the commissioner would have the opportunity to seek a judicial review.

On that basis, I believe that it is appropriate to continue with a biometric commissioner rather than leave all the issues to the courts. It would be in the better interests of justice to do so, and I am therefore opposed to amendment Nos 22, 23 and 25.

6.00 pm

A general issue around these points has been raised on the presumption of innocence. Some of the suggestions that have been made have gone beyond the actual realities of the European Court judgements. I certainly do not believe that we should presume that every person who has been arrested is a criminal, and the Bill does not do so. It provides for the retention of materials in certain specified and limited circumstances. In particular, those who are arrested for a serious offence and are charged but not convicted will only have material retained for three years with the potential for a further two years on application to the court. Only in cases of conviction for a recordable offences will material be retained indefinitely, as is currently the position and has been held to be out of line with ECHR requirements in the context of judgements relating to England and Wales and Northern Ireland.

I believe that the Marper judgement has shown that we can deal with that adequately by following broadly the Scottish pattern. The Marper judgement was concerned solely with indefinite retention from those who were not convicted. It was specifically in that regard that paragraph 109 of the Marper judgement stated:

"the Scottish Parliament voted to allow retention of the DNA of unconvicted persons only in the case of ... violent or sexual offences and even then, for three years only, with the possibility of an extension to keep the DNA sample and data for a further two years with the consent of a sheriff."

Paragraph 110 continues:

"This position is notably consistent with Committee of Ministers' Recommendation R(92)1, which stresses the need for an approach which discriminates between different kinds of cases and for the application of strictly defined storage periods for data, even in more serious cases".

Clearly, therefore, the court did envisage retention from unconvicted persons in certain circumstances. That is what we are applying in the legislation.

There is no doubt that, as the research suggests, those who have been arrested but not convicted have a significantly higher risk of being convicted of a future offence than otherwise similar individuals who have not previously been arrested. That risk does not diminish to the same level as in the general population until a period of between three and five years.

Mr Wells: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way to the Member.

Mr Wells: Does the Minister accept that that totally demolishes the argument being made by the SDLP and Sinn Féin representatives? We rest our case.

Mr Ford: Although Mr Wells is absolutely correct on that, the fact that it refers to those who have been arrested but not convicted having a significantly higher risk does not necessarily tie in with the remarks that he made earlier in the debate when, I believe, he said that the vast majority of young offenders go on to offend further. That is equally lacking in evidence. I am grateful for his support for my position, but I am afraid that I cannot support the remarks that he made earlier.

The position is clear: if conviction is not the outcome, it is only in cases involving serious offences that material will be retained and only for a limited period. Retention in cases involving an arrest but no charge will require that independent consent. That is proportionate.

One of the cases that has been quoted — it is a case that has been made by the police — concerns issues where allegations of rape have been made by different women against one individual. It may be something that happens late on a Friday or Saturday night, when the individuals are unable to give particularly good evidence on the basis of their state of intoxication and where it may well be the case that the alleged perpetrator alleges that the sex was consensual. In those circumstances, where similar allegations are being made, retaining a DNA sample and a fingerprint sample in the absence of charges seems to me to be potentially a most appropriate and proportionate way to deal with the potential of future offending. It would not apply in every case in which an allegation is made but in serious cases in which there is strong evidence. It is not about deprivation of liberty or having a criminal record but a limited retention of DNA and fingerprints for three years and possibly an additional two years on application to the court. I believe that that is justified and proportionate.

I will now turn to the area of juvenile cautions and, in particular, amendment Nos 29 and 33, which were tabled by Mr Maginness. As introduced, new article 53B of PACE, inserted by paragraph 3 of schedule 3 to the Bill, treats cautions as convictions for the purposes of the retention of DNA profiles and fingerprints, which would allow material to be retained indefinitely. That is because, for a caution to be awarded, the individual concerned must admit to the offence in question. There is mitigation for juveniles built into that. As with a conviction, if it is a first minor offence, the material may not be held indefinitely but for a period of between five and 10 years only, depending on the length of the sentence. However, on conviction or caution for a second offence, material from juveniles may be held indefinitely.

Concerns have been raised with me and my officials and in evidence to the Committee for Justice around the proportionality of allowing indefinite retention in the case of a juvenile who is given two cautions. Mr Maginness has tabled amendment Nos 29 and 33, which would decouple juvenile cautions from the indefinite retention provision and, instead, create a free-standing provision that any caution awarded to a juvenile would attract retention for a maximum of five years in each case. Cautions awarded to those aged 18 years or over would be unaffected. In his remarks, Mr Maginness outlined the different ways in which cautions are treated across different aspects of the justice system, which creates an inconsistency whichever way we deal with it.

Mr Maginness also talked, although not in reference to his formal amendment, about the issue of a clean slate at 18 and the youth justice review. There is a danger that, if we simply talk about a clean slate at 18, it could mean that a 17-year-old might have a clean slate after only a few weeks whereas, in the same circumstances, a 13-year-old would have the record retained for five years. That would be an anomaly, and I hope that he will not proceed with an amendment in that context.

In the context of the framework as a whole, I believe that amendment Nos 29 — the new article 63HA — and 33, tabled by Mr Maginness, will be appropriate and proportional. I will support them.

I turn again to some of my amendments around diversionary youth conferencing and penalty notices. I intend to bring those two further proposals into the framework. Diversionary youth conferences, like cautions, may be employed only in circumstances where an individual admits to the commission of an offence. I propose, therefore, to treat those in the same way as is now proposed for juvenile cautions, allowing retention for a maximum of five years in each case. Amendment No 27 incorporates those provisions as new article 63HB.

Secondly, the provisions in the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 introducing penalty notices were brought into force on 6 June last year. Such notices should now be brought within the retention framework where the individual concerned has been arrested in connection with a recordable offence. Amendment No 28 will, therefore, add new article 63HC permitting retention in such cases for a period of two years only. That is consistent with the position in Scotland, England and Wales.

I do not intend to speak to amendment No 30, since Mr McCartney has indicated that he will not move it.

I turn then to amendment No 32. The Committee Chair has acknowledged that this relates to a technical issue raised by Forensic Science Northern Ireland about the definition of a DNA sample. It is appropriate that we have that definition, in line with its advice, to ensure that the statement is simply that a sample is a sample taken for the purpose of deriving a profile. That is technical language, but it is the appropriate way of handling the issue.

Finally, the second part of amendment No 34 — I referred to the first part earlier — corrects a drafting error in paragraph 6 of schedule 3 to the Bill. That error escaped the legislative draftsman until now, and I do not think that any comment has been made on it.

I trust that is a satisfactory summary of the differing views. I believe that the proposals as they stand in my name, both the existing Bill and my amendments, and those put forward by Mr Maginness are an appropriate, proportional and rational way of moving forward. I thank the Members who contributed to the debate from different directions. I also repeat my thanks to my staff and the Committee for the work that they have done so far.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank everyone who has spoken in the debate. I want to briefly restate a number of issues and address a couple of points that have been made. Nothing that I have heard today has shaken our belief that this has to be based on the principle of presumption of innocence. That is a principle on which we test all that we do and —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: Yes, sure.

Mr Agnew: I made this point when I was addressing Mr Wells. He raised the issue of rape, and, as the Minister pointed out, there is a compelling reason for treating that as a different case. I am interested to hear the Member's view on that in relation to the presumption of innocence.

Mr McCartney: I covered that earlier this afternoon, although perhaps you were not here. I said that there are situations in which DNA found on someone after a serious sexual offence or serious assault should be retained. We have said that, despite what is said sometimes from the other side. I will not make too many comments about that.

I have said on a number of occasions — I have tested it throughout the Committee Stage — that we have a concern based on some of the things that some officials have said to us that this will not be fully compliant with the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights and that we will find ourselves back before the court. I heard the Minister stating unequivocally that it is wholly compliant and that there are no concerns in his Department or among any of his officials that it is not fully compliant and will not be seen in that light in the future. That is on the record, and we may want to come back to that.

The reason that we tabled the amendment about the presumption of innocence was the answer from officials on a number of occasions at Committee Stage. Those answers were prompted by questions from Basil McCrea, who at that time was, I assume, representing Ulster Unionist Party policy. He was told by an official that one of the reasons why DNA can be retained, should be retained and will be retained is when there is sufficient suspicion of an individual.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: Yes.

Mr Wells: I knew that the ghost of Basil McCrea would haunt us at some stage in the debate. I assure you that the authentic voice of the Ulster Unionist Party on the issue was articulated by Mr Elliott. It certainly was not articulated by Mr McCrea, who, once again, went on one of his solo runs.

Mr McCartney: It is interesting that you are often accused of going on a solo run when you say something worthwhile. I understand why you are trying to put that to the side and say that, because Basil McCrea is no longer a member of the Ulster Unionist Party, what he asked at the Committee is not relevant, but I do not see it like that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to return to the Bill.

Mr McCartney: This is about the Bill, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.

You may want to set aside what Mr McCrea asked in Committee, but the official referred — these are his words — to "sufficient suspicion of an individual". Therefore, those tasked with framing the Bill and taking it forward say that they want to be able to retain DNA if they have sufficient suspicion of an individual. That may be despite the investigator not taking the case to the prosecution service or the prosecution service taking the case and saying, "No case to answer". Alternatively, you may go to court and be found not guilty. That will still not be good enough. Officials want another category for those who, it says, are sufficiently suspicious. That is why we are very firm on the presumption of innocence.

Along with other members, I raised in Committee the issue of the size and extent of the database on 28 June 2012. This is the first rebuttal that we have had. Perhaps the Minister will provide us with the statistics that he has used today and state their source, as it will be interesting to see the source. He said that the PSNI had informed him that there were 700 investigative leads from DNA. We have not been told, even though it would have illuminated the debate — perhaps we can return to it — the number of cases in which the DNA used was in the data bank legitimately through other aspects of the judicial process. Another question that was not answered was this: how many of those leads led to prosecutions? Answers to those questions would help us to illuminate the debate and come to conclusions. However, we have been left hanging as if to say, "There you are: 700 leads". Somehow, that is seen as promoting your argument. Sometimes, what you do not say takes away from the argument that you are trying to promote.

6.15 pm

The issue of photographs did not come out of the blue. Mr Wells said that it was discussed in Committee, and so it was. It came from the Department, not from Sinn Féin. An official accepted that there is the potential for a legal challenge when it comes to photographs. Another departmental official said:

"It is for the police to get their own house in order on the issue of photographs. They recognise that ... there is the potential for a legal challenge when it comes to photographs."

The police accept that they are open to a challenge and they have to get their house in order. We are here to put a legislative framework in place that allows other people to put their house in order. That is why photographs are included in the Bill. It is not because we thought it up but because the Department nearly instructed us that it was perhaps a good thing to do.

Tom Elliott felt that I did not address the issue of the biometric commissioner. I will explain it to him, although I do not want to make this any longer than necessary. When the Minister indicated that he was removing the amendments, we felt that it was perhaps not appropriate to give the reasons why we thought that it was inappropriate. The Minister said that he is open to suggestions, and perhaps the Committee will return to that. However, our reason is very simple: we believe that that is what the courts are for. If somebody wants to test legislation, we should use the courts rather than set up another commissioner. We have surveillance commissioners and all sorts of commissioners, and a lot of people say that they usurp the authority of the courts.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member's giving way. I thought that, in my outline of the way that the commission would operate and be subject to the potential for judicial review, I made it clear that it would in no way take away the rights of the courts to determine an issue but would take away a large volume of work and would, hopefully, not require anything like the same input of resources. That would allow matters to be considered in private rather than in the public gaze with its potential implications for applicants.

Mr McCartney: I understand your logic. The point is well made, but there is an assumption that there will be a large volume. Therefore, when you try — perhaps we all do it — to make the case, you make out that the problem will be bigger than it perhaps will be. However, I argue on the principle that the courts are there to provide for such challenges and we should use them.

Steven Agnew raised a point. He is away, but we covered that in the main commentary.

Jim Wells is Jim Wells, as the saying goes. He had a contention about something that was not said. I have often heard that people have been convicted for what they say; I have never heard of convictions, even in the Diplock courts, for something that you did not say, but that is another day's work. He has the idea that we are somehow suggesting that the DNA can be tampered with and that might lead to false prosecutions and so on. We never said that once. The only person who said it today was you, so maybe your own mind needs disentangled on the ability of people to do that in a mischievous way. I said and we continue to say that our opposition is based on two planks: that it undermines the principle of presumption of innocence and that we do not feel that it will be fully compliant with the ECHR.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will give way.

Mr Wells: I am glad that the Member has made that point. What can possibly go wrong if the DNA is stored in a secure unit somewhere in Northern Ireland and is only ever brought out when there is an indication that that person has been involved in criminal activity? What is his issue? He is not even alleging that the police would tamper with it, abuse it or use it to falsely convict someone. He is underlining my point that the ordinary Joe Citizen who does not cause a crime or do anything wrong has absolutely nothing to fear.

Mr McCartney: There is always a case where people do not listen to what you are saying. You are creating a category that says that a person is sufficiently suspicious. If a person has been arrested and released, that, in our opinion, is the way that it should be in every aspect of life. There should be no special category of "We think that you are sufficiently suspicious".

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will give way.

Mr Wells: There is a direct parallel to this, which his party has signed up to. Access Northern Ireland can provide several levels of intelligence to various organisations when they apply for information. It can provide the hard intelligence, which is convictions. It can provide the medium level of detail, which is prosecutions that did not lead to conviction. It can provide the soft intelligence, which is that allegations have been made about an individual that may make him or her an unsuitable person to look after children. The Member does not resent that, and that is done to protect children from adults who may be inappropriate. So how can he argue that it is inappropriate in this case?

Mr McCartney: There are two things to be said about that. First, we have opposed the use of soft intelligence, and, indeed, we have supported many people who have taken cases about the use of soft intelligence, secret evidence and evidence that cannot be contested in court and won. Our position is very clear: if it is so open, why can it not be tested? We do not agree with the employment circumstances of the past in which people were denied employment perhaps because their father's father's father was once interned without trial. At the time, that was "acceptable". We say that it is not, and we will ensure that there are safeguards to protect people in that circumstance in the future.

I see that Mr Humphrey is also absent. In a number of interventions, he asked how the people of the Falls Road would view our position. He said that they would not view it very kindly, and the basis of his contention was that he got a couple of phone calls from people on the Falls Road. To me, the best test of all of this is, as Gregory Campbell said last week, the people. Let the people decide. I will use Gregory Campbell as my reference for Mr Humphrey. I will not rely on a couple of phone calls from anywhere to tell me that what I am doing is right, wrong or indifferent. We will let the people decide.

Mr Poots gave us a bit of a lecture on the use of the petition of concern. In many ways, he made a good point about whether it is being used in circumstances for which it was perhaps not designed. That is a fair point, and perhaps we as an Assembly could revisit how the petition of concern should be used in the future. I suppose that I would say this, but, in this instance, I believe that it is a correct use because the issue is in and around equality. In the previous mandate, the sexual offender notification clauses of the previous Justice Bill were taken through Committee Stage right up to Further Consideration Stage. They were supported and voted through by everyone, and, at the last minute, a couple of weeks before the election, the DUP put down a petition of concern. We are back now with the same legislation. Throughout Committee Stage, the departmental officials and the four DUP representatives accepted that the Bill had not changed in any real sense since the previous mandate. Therefore, if this were being tested by a jury — a rare thing in these parts sometimes — it might come to the conclusion that it was a bit of an abuse of the petition of concern procedure.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: I will, surely.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the comment that the Member makes. In that sense, he is right. The petition of concern is used in the House in a manner not envisaged when those who signed up to the Belfast Agreement decided to put it in. If Members, particularly those from the nationalist community, who often lecture this side of the House on abusing the petition of concern procedure want to convince us that we should use it more appropriately, surely you need to start practising what you preach rather than putting down a petition of concern. Why is the retention of the DNA of people who may be suspected of crime of particular nationalist concern? Why is that relevant only to the nationalist community and not to the broader community?

Mr McCartney: That is a point well made, and perhaps we can have that discussion. On the sexual offender clauses, that was not a concern to the DUP in this mandate but it was in the previous one. I am trying to point out that there is no point in saying to Members that they are abusing the petition of concern as if you are sitting in some sort of whited sepulchre. I do not think that there are too many whited sepulchres in this place.

I will just finish on this point. Stewart Dickson referred to amendment No 30. We took that off. I did not move it, because the departmental officials pointed out an unintended consequence of our amendment. That shows that, when people come with a reasoned argument, we are prepared to change our mind.

Mr Ford: Sometimes.

Mr McCartney: The Minister is speaking from a sedentary position. We are prepared to listen to reason, but there are principles on which we base our arguments and contentions. Jim Wells can get up and wax lyrical and try to throw what he perceives to be insults, but, I have to say and I have said it before —

Mr Wells: They were insults.

Mr McCartney: They may have been, but I just wanted to point that out to you. I heard you talking about the environment and congratulating Steven Agnew, but, as you know, hot air only rises, and most of what you said today rose to nowhere.

Question put, That amendment No 18 be made.

The Assembly divided:

Ayes 37; Noes 50.

Tellers for the Noes: Mr Lunn and Mr G Robinson

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I will not call amendment No 19 because it is consequential to amendment No 18, which has not been made. Amendment No 20 has already been debated.

Amendment No 20 made: In page 15, line 14, leave out from "the conclusion" to end of line 17 and insert

"the Chief Constable determines that the material is of no evidential value in relation to—

- (a) the investigation of the offence; or
- (b) proceedings against any person for the offence." [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice ).]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Bill for today. The Business Committee has agreed that the remainder of this stage of the Bill will be scheduled for next Monday, 25 February.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.]

Adjournment

Lisanelly Shared Education Campus, Omagh

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Members to resume their seat or leave the Chamber quietly.

The proposer of the Adjournment topic will have 15 minutes. The Minister will have 10 minutes to respond, and all other Members who wish to speak will have approximately six minutes.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I take the opportunity to speak on the proposal to develop a shared education campus at the vacated British Army site at Lisanelly in Omagh, County Tyrone. Members present will know that the campus is a top priority for Omagh and, indeed, for west Tyrone, owing to the multiple benefits that the project can provide for the children and future generations.

Lisanelly is an unprecedented opportunity to transform a 140-acre site, which has been derelict and vacated for the past number of years, into a new source of hope and achievement for the future. To date, a mountain of work has been undertaken to get the project to where it is today. Indeed, there is widespread support from all sections of the community for the development of the shared campus, which could contain schools from a wide range of sectors. They would work together, while retaining their distinct ethos and identity.

The campus has the potential to provide modern post-primary education provision and will include first-class educational facilities for up to 3,000 or more pupils in a more co-ordinated and effective way than is now possible. It will also enable local schools to embrace the curriculum changes and meet the targets of the entitlement framework.

School projects can be developed and delivered together with facilities, planned in a way that allows the schools to collaborate and work together. By collaborating, the schools can avail themselves of state-of-the-art facilities that would not be possible if they stood alone.

An excellent example of that was highlighted during the launch of the master plan in 2010. The example provided, which related to the schools of activity, stated that there was the potential to provide 3G covered pitches, with stadium-style spectator facilities. That is one example that was given of what can happen when schools pull together. The collaborative nature of the project will ensure value for money, while providing first-class facilities for the young people of Omagh. The model represents a template for shared education that can potentially be implemented in many other areas.

The project board has engaged extensively with schools, young people, parents, educationalists, business leaders and the wider community, and the consultations have indicated that there is widespread, significant support for the campus, particularly among our young people. In fact, I am told that, during one of the recent consultation workshops that were held as part of local democracy week, young people expressed a great deal of impatience that the project was not moving faster than it was. The brochure from the launch of the master plan provides a snapshot of some of the comments that were made. I will just read some of them. One refers to it as:

"an amazing chance that should not be missed".

Another says that it:

"could be a model for schools across the globe".

Another strongly supports it, but says that:

"individual identities must remain".

Another comment states that:

"shared facilities would mean that each school could have better access to much better facilities that each on their own could afford and sustain".

Another comment stated that:

"This is an exciting project and a fascinating opportunity for the young people of Omagh".

Another comment that I will share with you said:

"Keep the momentum going to make it happen as soon as possible."

6.45 pm

That is a snapshot of some of the opinions that were gathered, particularly from younger people, during one of the most recent consultations. Those are certainly the views that have prevailed right up until the present day.

In getting to the point that we are at now with the project, the transfer of the site into the ownership of the Department of Education was a major step forward in edging the project closer to reality. I am very familiar with that particular piece of work because, during that time, I worked as a personal assistant to my party's MP Pat Doherty, who played a central role in that particular campaign, which preceded my time as a MLA. I know of the hundreds of hours that Pat clocked up at countless meetings with Secretaries of State, Defence Secretaries, Ministers, MPs, TDs and MLAs from all backgrounds to keep the concept alive at a time when the site was in danger of slipping out of public control. I therefore want to pay tribute to Pat, who worked vigorously for many years to ensure that the site would come into public ownership.

I also want to pay tribute to Caitríona Ruane, who, in her capacity as Education Minister, enthusiastically embraced the concept of the shared campus at Lisanelly and played a central and hands-on role in advancing the project. I am glad to note that the current Minister, Mr O'Dowd, has continued the project with the same commitment and energy. His swift intervention in the case of Arvalee Special School during its hour of need in 2012, when the building was burned to the ground, is clear evidence of his commitment to the educational needs and well-being of young people in our district.

It is also important to note the excellent work of Omagh District Council; the Strategic Investment Board (SIB); the Western Education and Library Board (WELB); the Lisanelly schools working group, which was chaired by local church leaders; and Omagh business leaders, who have always been supportive of the project.

Although the main focus is, quite rightly, on the educational benefits, there are, indeed, wider benefits as well. For example, the campus will not only support and encourage excellent educational provision, but will provide an opportunity to promote regional balance and regeneration, which, of course, is in line with the Programme for Government commitments.

Lisanelly super output area is the single most deprived area in the entire Omagh district. It is located in the top 14% of the most deprived super output areas in the North. The construction of that huge development has the potential to create hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs in an industry that is under severe pressure. There is also the possibility of developing the vacated schools that are located in and around the town centre, which creates a very exciting possibility to make the town centre a more vibrant hub of economic activity. Of course, the concept of working and sharing together, which underpins Lisanelly, is something that is essential as we all strive towards a shared future together.

In conclusion, a Chathaoirligh, the construction of the campus will provide long-term social and pedagogic benefits for the children of Omagh. I believe that it could also usher in major positive economic and regeneration benefits for the entire community. It is an investment in the future. I congratulate the Minister for prioritising the project, coming here this evening and taking a hands-on role in helping to edge it forward. Lisanelly can offer a real vision for the future of how education can be delivered. All our children and young people deserve the best opportunities in the best surroundings.

Mr Buchanan: First of all, I thank the Minister for being in his place to listen to the debate, which is of the utmost importance to the future direction of education in Omagh.

When the Lisanelly site first became available for development, there was much interest in what type of development would be of most benefit to Omagh into the future. The concept of the education campus generated much debate and was welcomed by many in the education sector and others with an interest in the future education of our children in Omagh and, indeed, in the wider west of the Province.

Omagh District Council, along with the business community, the SIB, the working group, the Western Education and Library Board and others, has to date done a lot of work in promoting and seeking to get the development of the campus site under way. However, progress has been extremely slow, to the extent where confidence in the community is beginning to dwindle, with questions being asked about the Department's commitment and about whether this will ever come to fruition or whether it is simply pie in the sky. That is the feeling among some people in Omagh, and that is why I believe that this debate is so important.

We have schools in Omagh that are in dire need of a newbuild. The structure of those schools is abysmal, and, as a result, they are finding it more and more difficult to attract students. Take, for example, Omagh High School: its students recently excelled to great heights in educational attainment, but the building has far outlasted its lifespan and urgently requires a newbuild. The Sacred Heart College is in the same position as far as a newbuild is concerned. We remember the destruction of Arvalee school following a fire at its premises before Christmas, which saw the pupils scattered over two or three different sites. Thankfully, it will soon be operating out of temporary accommodation back on its own site. Although that arrangement is all very well for the short term, a newbuild is a must in the longer term.

In light of all that, I must ask the Minister this evening what he and his Department are doing to speed the development of the campus site. What is holding up progress? Has the maintained sector handcuffed the Minister, not permitting him to make the necessary progress?

There also appears to be a problem with the area plan in the Western Education and Library Board, which is hindering progress on the detailed design of schools on the site. Until there is clarity on that issue, it is my understanding that the design work will remain on the shelf.

Phase 1 of the works, which entails the demolition of existing buildings and the modification of the site, is expected to take two years, but it has not even commenced. Perhaps the Minister can explain the reason for that delay. Construction of Arvalee school is a must, as I said. In conversation with those involved in the campus site development, I have been informed that phase 1 can commence and run in tandem with the completion of the area plan and design works as well as the development of Arvalee school, the business plan for which is currently with the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP).

Therefore, I seek clarity from the Minister this evening on his commitment. It is all very well to say, "The Department is committed to this", but what is the level of that commitment? Is there something else that the Minister or the Department can, at some stage later down the line, turn to and say, "We would have delivered this, but x, y and z hindered us, and we were not able to deliver it"? What we need the Minister to do this evening is spell out for us what that commitment is. What does he mean when he says that he is committed to the campus site in Omagh? When can we expect to see phase 1 commence on site? When can we expect to see the area plan completed in order to allow the design works to continue? When can we expect to see the foundations laid on the site for Arvalee school?

That is one of the things that will give people confidence and let them see that the Department really is committed to this site. That is what we need to know this evening. There must be no ambiguity; rather, there needs to be clarity on this issue. It is no good if this goes on and on, and then, at some stage in the future, we are told, "We are sorry; although we were committed to it, something else held us back". Let us know now exactly what the situation is so that if it is not to develop and move forward, we can look to other areas for those schools that are in dire straits and which really need new builds in Omagh.

These things will clearly demonstrate a firm commitment from the Minister and the Department on the development of the site. I trust that when the Minister responds, he will clear up any ambiguity and give us clarity and timelines so we will know exactly what the situation is and when the site will be developed.

Mr Hussey: I also welcome the fact that the Minister is here. I congratulate Mr McAleer on securing the debate.

I begin by declaring an interest as a member of the board of governors of Omagh High School.

When Lisanelly was an army barracks, it made a large economic input to Omagh because there were so many soldiers and jobs. The loss of the barracks has had major economic consequences for Omagh, which cannot be forgotten.

The link between Lisanelly and St Lucia barracks cannot be overlooked. We have had a debate on St Lucia, and Mr Buchanan asked the deputy First Minister a question about St Lucia yesterday. I asked a supplementary question. However, in response to Mr Buchanan, Mr McGuinness said:

"The development of the sites is critical".

I would have said "are" critical; he said "is" critical. It is still critical for Omagh. He continued:

"In the event of there being an educational campus on the Lisanelly site, lands that are under our control at St Lucia could be made available to the education authorities". — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p119, col 2].

Given that that is the deputy First Minister's answer, is he implying that there will not be an educational campus on the Lisanelly site? He also said:

"The Department of Education has pushed forward decisively with what it wishes to do with the Lisanelly site. There will be further discussions between the Department and some of the local schools that are interested — and others that may be less interested — in locating to a campus that, I think, would provide a unique sharing arrangement in education." — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p120, col 1].

Mr McElduff and I were part of a political group that visited Drumragh Integrated College recently, which was, in its own right, a fascinating afternoon. There is no doubt that the young people of Omagh buy into the concept of an educational village.

Reference has been made to a local democracy event, which clearly shows that. I was a member of Omagh District Council from 2005; Mr McAleer and Mr McElduff were also members of the council, and, of course, Councillor Buchanan is still a member. Mr Byrne was a councillor in previous years. From 2005, members of the council, regardless of our political affiliation, joined together to push forward an educational campus at Lisanelly. That was Omagh District Council's vision. It is not a Sinn Féin, DUP, UUP or SDLP vision; it is an Omagh vision. This is what Omagh wants and expects.

Omagh High School has been sitting on the same site for over 50 years. I do not know whether the Minister has ever visited that school; as a board member and a politician, I obviously have visited. The school is falling down around people, yet it achieves some of the highest available scores because of the commitment of the staff. It is an excellent school, but the facilities are rubbish. Sacred Heart College brought together two schools several years ago, and it works very well. Again, the site is not perfect. Arvalee School and Resource Centre had the misfortune of having a terrible fire on its site, and pupils are now in temporary accommodation.

Three schools have agreed to move onto the Lisanelly campus, and three schools are undecided. I recently asked the Minister about the chairman of Omagh Academy's board of governors, who made it clear that that school no longer wants to be part of the project. Omagh Academy, Loreto Grammar School and the Christian Brothers Grammar School do not seem to want to play this game.

My advice is to leave them where they are. The three schools that need to move — Omagh High School, Sacred Heart College and Arvalee — need to be facilitated. We need an assurance today that they will be facilitated. We need work on the site.

Mr Buchanan and Mr McAleer referred to the fact that confidence was dwindling. That is because we see a site, but that is all we see. When I was vice-chairman of the council, I was here with other councillors to help to promote the shared educational campus idea. For you, Minister, the shared educational campus theory can be put into practice. The shared educational campus will work because the schools can keep their own identity but, where necessary, share. We all want that concept to work, and Omagh could be the perfect example for the future. However, by doing nothing and allowing the delays to go on and on, confidence goes out the window.

I want an educational village in Omagh that is the example for every other town in Northern Ireland. Omagh has had its share of troubles and sorrows. We are in the west, but we cannot be forgotten. I ask you, Minister, to assure us that there will be movement on Lisanelly. Perhaps, before the end of this Assembly term —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Hussey: — we will see some movement.

Mr Byrne: Like the other Members who have spoken, I thank Mr McAleer for securing a debate on this topic. It is timely and important that we have the debate at this juncture.

The proposed Lisanelly educational campus in Omagh is a model of schooling that could provide a significant new educational experience based on a unique example of building different schools on one campus rather than on individual sites. The proponents of the shared educational model believe it to be a good model for shared education into the future. Shared education would be achieved on a large integrated site or educational campus in which a range of schools could be sited beside one another.

The three grammar schools in Omagh — Loreto Grammar, Christian Brothers Grammar and Omagh Academy — and the other two secondary schools — Omagh High and Sacred Heart College — have all developed a strong educational history and legacy. Many former pupils and staff are proud of their school identity. Drumragh Integrated College, which recently got a new school, would also like to be on the new campus. Arvalee Special School could also be accommodated on the site, which would be desirable.

As Mr Hussey said, the three grammar schools are more self-conscious and, indeed, precious about their school history, educational legacy and reputation. They have been looking for a lot of reassurance about the independence of school character, governance structures and educational autonomy in a shared campus. Thus far, their boards of governors and trustees have been somewhat hesitant and, indeed, reluctant about committing to the project. Mr Hussey referred to the chairman of the board of governors of the academy. He spoke to me about his anxiety should the academy commit to the site and the other two grammar schools not do so.

Thus far, the advocates of the project and the project team have primarily advanced the shared campus as a building construction project with unique physical characteristics. There is still not an educational argument that is robust and convincing to all concerned, particularly for some school governors and trustees. I am convinced, as are others, but we have to get the trustees and governors of these other schools on board.

The plan proposes to build six secondary schools on a 140-acre site that could accommodate approximately 3,700 pupils. Each school would share sports facilities and some other services, but each would retain its identity, as was referred to. The cost of the project would be £100 million-plus, which would be a tremendous economic boost for Omagh and a tremendous educational project and development.

The shared campus approach could be a good model of area-based educational planning for Northern Ireland in the future. However, that is assuming that all schools plan to use the facility and agree to it collectively. A number of schools have been hesitant to move from their existing sites. What negotiations have been conducted with those schools? I asked the Minister recently what formal and informal discussions or consultations have been ongoing. It is important that the interests of pupils and parents, along with the views of governors and trustees, are fully explored and taken on board.

The pooling of subjects at AS and A level could be a positive development that would allow schools to meet the requirements of the common curriculum within the educational framework. I know that some schools already share some subjects, but that could be made easier for pupils if the schools were closer to each other. It is not fair to have, for example, four pupils from the Christian Brothers' school who are studying the minority subjects having to go a distance in the wet and rain to the convent or the academy. It makes much more sense to have those pupils on a single campus site.

A number of areas still need clarification. The questions that arise include asking which facilities, such as canteens, administrative functions or other services, will be shared. There is also the question of the Dean Maguirc College in Carrickmore. I think that there is still a very strong desire to retain a secondary school in the Carrickmore area. I know that there has been some discussion in the past about that school also becoming part of the campus site, but I think that there is still a very strong local feeling that the school in Carrickmore should exist on its own. As Mr Hussey said, that school, like Omagh High School and the Sacred Heart College, badly needs a new building. The Omagh High School and Sacred Heart College buildings are falling down.

My request is to the Minister this evening. There is a need for an educational project team — a core group of people and civil servants — to advance this case, to get on with the work and to end some of the uncertainty. I think that it is fair to say that the Reverend Herron and Monsignor

Donnelly have played a very strong role in trying to advance this project. They have co-ordinated a group of people in the Omagh area along with officials from the Western Education and Library Board, the former chief executive of that board and others. They have done a lot of good work, but, as Mr Buchanan said, the time has now come for some forward movement and some action.

I am convinced that a group of —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Bring your remarks to a close

Mr Byrne: — core civil servants should be put together to carry out the necessary consultations. Let us get on with the project.

Mr Storey: I want to make a contribution to this debate in support of my colleague Tom Buchanan. If possible, and as other Members alluded to, I also want to try to bring some clarity to the course of direction not only of the project in Omagh but of what may be the Department's possible trajectory, as it may want to roll this type of idea out in other places.

I am also glad that the Minister has joined us this evening. I hope that he has cooled down a little from Question Time. I do not know what tablets he was on or what the case was, but he certainly got rather excited. We will try not to annoy him too much this evening so that he can go home nice and calm.

The Education Committee visited the Lisanelly project, and we very much appreciated the hospitality, kindness and the warmth of the welcome that we received. I believe that it gave the Committee members who went an overview and a first-hand insight into the potential and possibility that could exist in the Lisanelly project. I want to place that on record.

When the Member introduced the debate tonight, I wondered whether he was going to give either a detailed analysis of where we were going or a eulogy to previous Education Ministers and the current Minister. Given all that he said that they have done, perhaps he was preparing them for the new year's honours list.

Despite all that, as we sit or stand in the Chamber tonight, we have a project that has not progressed in the way that was intended. We can skirt around that, hide it or try to dress it up, but Members know that that is not how I do business. My colleague Tom Buchanan referred to the questions that must be asked. Is the Minister handcuffed? Is he being curtailed?

Nobody has mentioned it, but let us remember that there was a court case. There was a school that said, "We ain't shifting", and it took the Department to court. We then had the appeal and the regrettable situation of the appeal judgement giving 50% of the argument to one side, and the same to the other. However, the question that needs answered is whether a section of the Catholic maintained sector is going to be allowed to delay educational provision in Omagh.

When I look at the Western Education and Library Board's area plan — the Minister placed great emphasis on ensuring that area plans were produced — what do I find? I find that:

"The Diocesan Programme Board has made the following overall recommendations for future post-primary education in the Derry Diocese."

Are we working on the basis of a parish, a diocese or on the basis of making educational provision for the young people of Omagh? Who comes first?

I recently visited schools in the controlled sector in Omagh. There are concerns, fears, worries and apprehensions, but they know that possibly the only way that new capital provision will be made in the Omagh area is via the Lisanelly project. Why should they be allowed to sit in accommodation that is less than acceptable because others cannot make up their mind or have other issues — whether it is who owns the property, who makes the decision, whether it will be transfer based, and all of those things? While all of that goes on, we have a site that remains stagnant and is not being developed in the way that we would like.

The fact that Arvalee Special School will be rebuilt is to be welcomed. I too thank the Minister for taking on board that issue in the way that he has. We can all be thankful that that has happened. However, I conclude with this, and Members have referred to it this evening: let us have certainty and clarity. Let the Minister bring us up to date tonight on what he has been told and what discussions he has had with the maintained sector's diocesan board. Is it now committed to delivering a project with the potential to deliver on our and the Executive's objectives of creating shared education provision? With bated breath, we wait to hear about that from the Minister this evening.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Ar dtús, ba mhaith liom comhghairdeas a ghabháil le Déaglán Mac Giolla Uidhir as an ábhar seo a phlé os comhair an Tionóil inniu. I thank my constituency and party colleague Declan McAleer for securing the debate, which gives West Tyrone MLAs and the Chair of the Education Committee an opportunity to raise pertinent questions.

As other Members detailed, the Omagh shared educational campus has certainly caught the imagination. It is an iconic project and I, too, praise the leadership of the Rev Robert Herron, Monsignor Joseph Donnelly, the Western Education and Library Board, Omagh District Council and Pat Doherty MP, who were strongly supported by the Department of Education and strongly led, too, by the Strategic Investment Board and, not least, by programme director, Hazel Jones. Successive Ministers have also demonstrated their enthusiasm and support for a vision of integrating and sharing education, while protecting the individual ethos of the schools in question. It is about the efficient and effective use of public resources. It would effectively tick every box if one was to map out an ideal future for post-primary educational provision in an area.

7.15 pm

I am aware that the Education Committee, as has been said here, visited the site. I am aware, too, that the Good Friday Agreement Implementation Committee of the Oireachtas has visited the site, and it has been discussed in the British-Irish Parliamentary Assembly as well, where Michael Mates seconded my proposal to the then British Secretary of State, Shaun Woodward, that it needed to be transferred to the Executive. We were described in the Sunday 'Observer' as:

"the odd couple of Anglo-Irish politics".

Michael Mates pointed out that he was a British military officer who operated from the Lisanelly camp in the 1960s, so I cannot imagine that me, Ross Hussey or Michael Mates will agree on the past, but I think we will agree on the future.

This is about young people. It is about investing in the future of Omagh's children and young people, and there is excitement out there at that prospect. I believe that, even in the schools that are currently uncertain about their intentions and have not committed, the young people of those schools, and many of the teachers, are looking forward in great number to that vision becoming a reality. It will be a site where academic and vocational exist side by side, and there will be increasing respect for the vocational in that environment. That is a good thing.

I thank the Minister, John O'Dowd, for the recent visit, which I was part of. Essentially, it was an event at Omagh College. I am sure that he has been since, but my last direct engagement with the Minister on this matter was at that event.

Other Members have asked the relevant questions — when and who. When is it going to progress to the next stage? What is the next stage? Who has signed up? What discussions are taking place to further persuade them of the value of signing up?

My vision for education in that part of west Tyrone is one where the schools will share the site and where there are viable rural schools and post-primary schools, a la Dean Maguirc in Carrickmore and St John's College in Dromore. The Omagh district has a large youth population, and can accommodate all of that. We are specifically talking about the Lisanelly education campus today.

That project, together with the A5; the enhanced local hospital in Omagh; the educational campus itself; hopefully those newbuilds in Dean Maguirc and St Colmcille's Primary School; and health centres in that area — these projects will provide a much-needed shot in the arm for the construction industry. It is an area where hundreds and thousands of young people are emigrating at this time. There are 160 young people in Australia at this time from the Dromore and Trillick community alone. Dromore is a large village or small town and Trillick is a village. They are five miles apart, and between Dromore and Trillick, 160 young people are in Perth, Brisbane and Sydney at this time.

In conclusion, I ask the Minister to provide clarity and certainty as far as he can in relation to next steps, who has signed up and all of that. I thank the Minister for being in attendance, as well as the Chair of the Education Committee, who hails from a different constituency, but his interest is very welcome.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an deis seo díospóireacht ar champas an oideachais roinnte ag Lios an Eallaigh agus an tairbhe do phobal na hÓmaí agus don cheantar máguaird. I welcome this opportunity for a debate on the Lisanelly shared education campus and the benefits that it will deliver to the community in Omagh and the surrounding area.

The Lisanelly shared education campus provides the town of Omagh and neighbouring areas with a unique opportunity to develop a model for shared education — a model that can and will act as a flagship project for the area and as a beacon showing the way forward for other educational communities. It is truly about putting the pupils first and securing a shared educational, social and environmental future for our young people.

The Lisanelly campus project will deliver a joined-up, shared future for the children of the Omagh area. The proposal that is currently under development, which is for a series of shared education centres and core schools that are designed to the latest standards, will ensure that pupils' needs are fully met and that they are educated in a collaborative manner, integrating with other young people from all sections of the community while respecting the individual ethos and values of differing sectors and education models.

The Chair of the Education Committee suggested that my temper was not in the best form this afternoon. I am in good form this evening, and after reading out that vision for Omagh, why would you not be in good form? Why would you not support that? It is about education for all the young people of Omagh, treating them on an equal basis in an integrated way on the one site.

It is time to put the young people of Omagh first, ahead of the needs and wishes of individual educational institutions. Mr Byrne touched on that subject and said that a number of boards of governors and perhaps trustees or individuals had concerns about the Lisanelly site and the way forward. They may well have concerns, but I have never seen a more democratic process than that around Lisanelly.

There has been consultation with everyone, and everyone's views have been asked for. There has been discussion after discussion. Omagh District Council is in favour of the project, and there is cross-party support for it. Why should we allow a number of individuals or individual schools to stand in the way of that vision? I am of the view that we should not.

To answer the Chair of the Education Committee and Mr Buchanan, I am not handcuffed to anyone. I do not do handcuffs, and I am definitely not handcuffed to anyone on this matter. My loyalty lies with the Lisanelly campus. No other sector, individual school or body that is opposed to Lisanelly has my support in any shape or form.

It is time to move forward with the project, because it is the right thing to do. Mr McElduff mentioned the construction and economic benefits. It is estimated that every £1 of capital investment by the Government results in a wider benefit of £2·84 to the economy. For every £1 million that is invested, 28 jobs are created. A project the size of the Lisanelly campus has the potential to generate over £300 million in the local economy and to bring more than 3,000 jobs in construction and associated fields to the Omagh area. That, I am sure, will ensure that many of those young people who might have had to travel to Australia will not have to go there, because they will benefit from investment such as this.

Where do we go next? Let us see where we are. It may be useful to remind ourselves of the timescale for the project, because I can understand local frustrations that these matters are taking longer than was perhaps envisaged. It was first proposed in 2006-07 that Lisanelly was a viable project. The site did not move into Department of Education ownership until April 2011, which is just under two years ago. Since then, we have been proactively moving forward with the consultation process, and we now have an outline business case with the Department.

The outline business case shows that building the schools on the Lisanelly site is economically the best way in which to move forward. Arvalee Special School is moving onto the site, and we have submitted outline planning permission for the site as well.

What is holding up Lisanelly? There are a number of factors, of which the first is money. A quite significant investment of somewhere between £120 million and £150 million is required to fulfil the project. I am looking at a variety of funding options. We are being imaginative in how we fund it. I believe that a number of organisations and bodies from beyond these shores are willing to play a constructive part in funding the project, and we are engaging with them. Secondly, as I mentioned previously, a number of individuals or individual schools have expressed "concerns" on the matter.

Another concern, which had been a factor in delays, was the area-planning process. A number of Members mentioned that and asked what is happening with it. I intend to make a statement on area planning to the House next Tuesday. In a previous statement to the House about capital constructions and future school builds, I said that Lisanelly was, and remains, the core project for Omagh. Ahead of the statement on area planning, I will confirm again that there is only one show in town in Omagh — the Lisanelly site. Until I complete the Lisanelly site and until I ensure that those schools that wish to move onto the Lisanelly site are completed, I do not envisage moving forward with any other capital project in Omagh.

Mr Storey: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for the clarity that he is trying to give us this evening. However, there is something that I have not been able to get confirmed fully. In the area plan for the Western Education and Library Board, reference is made to a position paper that is going to be produced by the Catholic sector. Is he aware of that position paper? Has it been produced? What influence will it have on the statement on area planning that he intends to make to the House next week?

Mr O'Dowd: It will have no influence in that sense. I know where I am going with Lisanelly. I understand that the Catholic sector is engaging with the trustees and boards of governors of a number of schools on the basis of whether or not those schools are signing up for Lisanelly. That is a decision that those individual schools will have to make. I think that there is a wider responsibility on those boards of governors in this matter.

No one school can think of its individual needs in respect of this project. This is much bigger than any individual school in Omagh. This is about the future well-being of this generation and future generations in the Omagh area. It has been debated democratically. The democratic institutions responsible — the council, the elected representatives and the Assembly — are behind it. It is a Programme for Government target. I will not allow an individual, or individuals, to hold up this project.

From Tuesday of next week, I will be making announcements on area planning. I am in a position to say that the Lisanelly project will be confirmed as part of area planning. Capital investment in Omagh will be on the Lisanelly site for those schools that choose to go onto it. After we have completed that, those schools that do not wish to go onto the Lisanelly site will be considered for future funding, if funding is available at that time. However, I will not, as Mr Byrne suggested, set up a body of civil servants to discuss the matter further. The matter has been discussed enough.

Mr Hussey: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes.

Mr Hussey: I thank you for what you said so far. I am on the board of governors of Omagh High School. We were told some years ago that the Lisanelly campus was the only show in town. In my remarks, I asked whether you would go ahead without the input of Omagh Academy, Loreto and the Christian Brothers. Those schools that have committed to the project are entitled to see their newbuilds as soon as possible, particularly Omagh High School and Sacred Heart College. Are you now saying that you will go ahead with those schools because they have bought in?

Mr O'Dowd: I am saying that, but let us not rule out any school at this stage. What is the best future for the controlled sector in Omagh? Is it simply to build the high school for 700 pupils, or is it to look at proposals — as recently happened in Strabane — for a bilateral school where there is access through academic selection and non-academic selection on the one site? Is that the way forward for it? I ask the controlled sector to have a serious think about the best options for the controlled sector in Omagh.

I firmly believe that any school that moves onto the Lisanelly site will have world-class facilities that will be attractive to pupils and parents. I would be highly surprised if any parent chose not to go onto the Lisanelly site after seeing the facilities that are planned for that site. Let the controlled sector have further discussions about the actual shape of the schools in the controlled sector. I do not want to rule any school in or out at this stage.

However, what I am saying is this: the only capital development that will take place in Omagh over the next number of years will be on the Lisanelly site. I am not looking at building any individual schools in Omagh ahead of Lisanelly. I cannot be any clearer than that. That is crystal clear. I urge any school that has not yet signed up to Lisanelly to seriously consider its position both as members of the Omagh community — schools are part of the community and have a duty not only to their pupils but to the surrounding communities — and as citizens. They should realise that what is happening in Omagh is a key development, not only for Omagh but for across the North. That sends out a major signal that we can make change, that we can share within education and that there are possibilities here for other towns and cities across the North.

Members, I can understand some of the frustrations, and I appreciate Mr McAleer bringing the debate forward. However, I hope I have made it crystal clear, and I know this has been said before, that the only show in town for Omagh is Lisanelly.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 25 February 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Matter of the Day

Cycling: Martyn Irvine

Mr Speaker: Conall McDevitt has been given leave to make a statement on Martyn Irvine becoming a world champion track cyclist that fulfils the criteria set out in Standing Order 24. If other Members wish to be called, they should continually rise in their place. All Members called will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject.

Mr McDevitt: Those who believe that success in track cycling is just a matter of throwing money at a rider and some fancy aerodynamic kit should look no further than Newtownards rider Martyn Irvine's gold and silver medals at last week's world championship cycling event in Minsk. Steven Beacom captured it brilliantly in the 'Belfast Telegraph' when he wrote:

"Not bad for a bloke who told me ... last year that he was a couch potato when he was a kid and did all he could to get out of PE at Movilla High School in Newtownards. Martyn didn't take up cycling until he was 18 ... Winning a silver in the Individual Pursuit event at the World Track Championships in Minsk ... was a magnificent effort. We'd have settled for that ... Joyously though there was more to come. Much more. Less than an hour after taking silver, Martyn followed it up by claiming gold in the Scratch race. Remarkable. Put this down as one of the finest sporting feats ever accomplished by an Ulsterman. And it was the staggering way he did it that made his victory even more heroic. Despite being almost out on his feet after his earlier exertions, with 10 out of the 60 laps to go in the Scratch event, he broke from the bunch and basically just went for it sprinting away with every last drop of energy he had. No guts, no glory ... Martyn Irvine - Champion of the world!"

Those are Mr Beacom's words, not mine. It was an extraordinary achievement: the equivalent in athletics would be a medal in the 400 metres at the Olympic Games followed an hour later by gold in the 3,000 metres. He has done it all on a shoestring. It is what they call paniagua in cycling — bread and water. It means two things: you ride clean, but you ride with very little resource. The budget for track cycling in Ireland is well under €100,000, which is just under £90,000. Compare that with the £8 million a year available to the GB team in this Olympic cycle. It goes mainly to fund Martyn and Caroline Ryan, who won bronze last year in a points race, and they spend much of their time training in Majorca, pooling their track time so that they get the necessary hours in. I want us to do more than just honour him today. I want us to invest in him and to make him as proud of us as we are, undoubtedly, proud of him

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for tabling this Matter of the Day regarding a Newtownards man and, indeed, one of my constituents, Martyn Irvine. Over the past few years, the interest in competitive cycling has increased massively, thanks in no small part to some now almost iconic British cyclists, such as Sir Chris Hoy, Sir Bradley Wiggins, Victoria Pendleton and our own Wendy Houvenaghel, who tasted world championship success in the team pursuit in the 2008, 2009 and 2011 track world championships. It is fantastic that another local emulated that success by winning gold in the scratch discipline at last week's world championships in Minsk. Amazingly, as Mr McDevitt said, he won his gold medal in a 15 km race only an hour after winning in a 4 km race in the individual pursuit. This achievement is made all the more remarkable, considering the meagre resources that are available to him. Even Martyn himself commented:

"You couldn't live on what I'm living on".

All of Newtownards, Strangford and, indeed, Northern Ireland should be extremely proud of what Martyn has done through his hard work, his discipline and his endeavour.

Coincidentally, Martyn's success came on the day that it was announced that the Giro d'Italia is coming to Northern Ireland in May 2014, thanks to the work of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Tourist Board in securing this. It is an event that draws a television audience of 800 million and is broadcast live to 165 countries. I hope that what the likes of Wendy Houvenaghel and Martyn Irvine have achieved can inspire a generation and that, with major events such as the Giro d'Italia being held here, Northern Ireland can be more than just the capital of golf. In conclusion, I wish Martyn well in his future races and, in particular, when he represents Northern Ireland in next year's Commonwealth Games in Glasgow.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Déanaim comhghairdeas fosta le Martyn ar an ócáid stairiúil seo. I congratulate Martyn Irvine on the occasion of winning silver and, indeed, the world championship for Ireland

As other Members have said, it was a very historic day in Minsk for Irish cycling, and this comes on the back of a remarkable number of months for Martyn, including, of course, his participation in the 2012 Olympics and his success in the Track World Cup in November and now this spectacular double win. It is a fairy-tale story of a boy who went from being a mechanic to a cyclist and has now become a world champion. We give our heartiest congratulations to Martyn. I also take this opportunity to pass our congratulations to Kelly Gallagher for winning the bronze medal in the women's downhill and silver in the Super-G. They have both done us proud, as, indeed, has the Ireland women's rugby team in winning the Triple Crown. At this moment in time, the less said about the men's team the better. I cannot let it go without congratulating Derry on a great start to the National Hurling League at Celtic Park yesterday.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the previous Member who spoke for saving me the bother of having to read the sports pages to find out what happened over the weekend. Like Miss McIlveen, I take a particular pride in the achievement of Martyn Irvine, because he comes from the Strangford constituency and its main town of Newtownards. The Member for South Belfast gave us some context for the scale of the achievement, which is hard to overstate. The last time a man from these shores won a world track event, distances were measured in miles, not in metres. The year was 1896. Members will know that as a famous year, not least for the shortest war in recorded history — the Anglo-Zanzibar war — which, as we all remember, started at 9.00 am and finished 45 minutes later. That was one minute less than it took GB and Northern Ireland to win a hat-trick of golds at last summer's London Olympics. However, that golden 46 minutes was the work of three athletes: Rutherford, Farah and Ennis. Martyn Irvine took less than an hour to win two individual medals: silver in the individual pursuit; and gold in that 15-kilometre scratch. He was only bettered once by the reigning champion in the individual pursuit.

The whole of Newtownards will come together to celebrate that achievement, as will the whole of Strangford, remembering that this is not exceptional for the area. Sycerika McMahon recently won silver at the Euro swimming championships.

I congratulate Martyn Irvine. There will be pride at Movilla High School, his old school, in Newtownards, in Strangford and across Northern Ireland and pride across the whole of Ireland because he won wearing an Irish vest. I look forward to seeing Martyn in Northern Ireland colours next year at the Commonwealth Games in Glasgow.

Mr McCarthy: It gives me great pleasure to join my colleagues in congratulating Martyn Irvine from Newtownards on his fantastic achievement. He won the gold and silver medals at the world cycling championship last week. We are absolutely thrilled and delighted. I had the pleasure a couple of years ago, as chairman of Ards Borough Council sports development committee, of awarding Martyn the title of "Sportsperson of the Year". At that time, we in the committee obviously saw the talents that Martyn had and his determination and potential, and his performance last week proved us right in our confidence in that talent and ability.

Martyn certainly proved his excellence on the world stage last week. He brought great credit not only to himself but to his family, his home town of Newtownards, Northern Ireland and, indeed, the whole island. We wholeheartedly congratulate Martyn on his wonderful achievement and performance, and we wish him well for the future.

While I am on my feet, I also congratulate the Irish ladies' rugby team on bringing the Triple Crown home to Ireland. We are a nation of sportspeople, and we can bring the gold home to Ireland and Northern Ireland.

Mr McNarry: My Strangford constituency, which has an exceedingly fine reputation for sports activities, including cycling, greeted the success of Newtownards man Martyn Irvine with a wide-ranging rendition of plaudits, which has been added to here. My own would be "Fantastically brilliant", "World champion indeed" and "Well done, Martyn".

Assembly Business

Extension of Sitting

Mr Speaker: I advise the House that I have been given notice by the members of the Business Committee of a motion to extend today's sitting past 7.00 pm under Standing Order 10(3A). The Question on the motion will be put without debate.

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 10(3A), the sitting on Monday 25 February 2013 be extended to no later than 8.00pm. — [Mrs Overend.]

Committee Membership: Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion on Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion. Therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Robin Swann replace Mr John McCallister on the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. — [Mrs Overend.]

Mr Speaker: Amendment No 40 is consequential to amendment No 15.

Amendment No 40 made: At end insert

"; and to amend Article 21BA of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999". — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Speaker: Amendment No 41 is consequential to amendment No 16.

Amendment No 41 made: At end insert

"and to abolish the common law offence of scandalising the judiciary". — [Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice ).]

Long title, as amended, agreed to.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister for Regional Development to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development).]

Mr Speaker: No amendments have been selected, so there is no opportunity to discuss the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) Bill today. Its Further Consideration Stage is therefore concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Budget Bill: Final Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Budget Bill [NIA 18/11-15] do now pass.

Today's Final Stage of the Budget Bill draws to a close the legislative process for the current financial year. The House has debated the Budget Bill and the Supply resolutions over the past few weeks, and I am sure that Members will be happy to hear that I do not intend to repeat everything that has been said. With the exception of one or two Members' contributions, the debate has by and large revolved around the financial issues relating to 2012-13 and has been useful. One or two, however, may have strayed from the path, and I suppose that that is to be expected. In fact, I may even have strayed along with them or been encouraged to stray along with them on occasions, and indulgence has been given to me to do that. I was particularly entertained by Members who began their speech by giving advance notice that they did not even intend to stay on the topic. It is always nice to know that Members recognise that they are not on the topic but will talk about whatever they have in their notes anyhow. Lest I be accused of the same thing, I will turn to today's business.

Mr Elliott: Never.

Mr Wilson: I am glad that the Member recognises that I tend not to do that.

The Budget Bill covers the 2012-13 financial year and provides legal authority to spend in the first few months of 2013-14. In the management of public expenditure, we began the year 2012-13 with an overcommitment that we sought to manage through the in-year monitoring process. Throughout the three monitoring rounds, we were able successfully to manage down that overcommitment, as well as reallocate surplus funding to key areas such as employment and health. However, it would be a mistake to say that we are now finished with budgets for 2012-13. There is still a lot to be done in the remaining weeks. Ministers and Committees must make every effort to ensure that departmental budgets are carefully managed, thereby ensuring that we minimise underspend and the risk of having to return funding to the Treasury.

Ministers and Committees should also now turn their attention to 2013-14. We should be in the latter stages of planning for the next financial year, the first few months of which are covered by this Budget legislation. We must seek to ensure that public expenditure is fully utilised by Departments so that we maximise the budgets available. It is also critical that we seek to identify and redistribute additional funding as early as possible in the new financial year. The Vote on Account legislation in the Bill is crucial to that good start to 2013-14.

1.30 pm

I will spend a moment or two reflecting on 2012-13. This year was an important one for our tourism industry. Northern Ireland hosted the Irish Open, which brought much-needed tourism to the north coast and beyond. We also commemorated the centenary year of the Titanic, which also brought in much-needed tourism. In 2012-13, the Executive allocated some 30% of available current expenditure funding to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, again recognising that the health of our citizens underpins our society.

The Executive were able to provide £4 million as a response to the pseudomonas outbreak, £1·3 million to carry out repairs to Arvalee special school after the fire there and £1·5 million for emergency financial assistance for people whose properties were affected by flooding, proving again that the Executive have the power to respond swiftly to significant emerging issues. We were also able to allocate £19·9 million to the Department for Social Development (DSD) for co-ownership and housing initiatives to help to get people on the property ladder and £4 million for thermal improvements to Housing Executive homes, helping people on low incomes to save in energy costs.

I could go on, Mr Speaker, but I hope that these things give a flavour of the different ways in which the Assembly has delivered for our citizens, not to mention the delivery of ongoing routine public services on a day-to-day basis.

I move on to 2013-14. The Assembly will oversee many opportunities and challenges for our citizens. It is up to us to ensure that public services continue to be delivered, which is what this Vote on Account legislation intends to facilitate. Additionally, we must ensure that those public services are delivered in such a way as to maximise their use for the citizens of Northern Ireland. I now look forward to hearing from Members on this important legislation.

Mr D Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Éirím le labhairt anseo inniu ar son an Choiste. I speak on behalf of the Committee.

As Members will be aware, the Budget Bill provides the statutory authority for expenditure in 2012-13 as specified in the spring Supplementary Estimates, which encompasses what happened during the year's monitoring rounds. The Bill also includes the Vote on Account, which allows public expenditure to continue in the early part of the next financial year, until the Main Estimates for 2013-14 are voted on by the Assembly in early June.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel took evidence on the Budget Bill from Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) officials on 30 January. This evidence session marked the final stage of a process of scrutiny by the Committee of the 2012-13 in-year monitoring rounds. In addition to briefings on the Department's own position before and following the outcome of each monitoring round, the Committee also received briefings on the strategic and cross-departmental issues relating to public expenditure.

Under Standing Order 42(2), the Committee must determine that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the Budget Bill before recommending that it is content to grant accelerated passage. In this regard, the Committee welcomes the engagement with the Department during the quarterly monitoring rounds and on the Estimates and the Bill. It was particularly helpful for members to receive clarification on the details of the inyear technical changes to resource and capital allocations of Departments, some of which were quite significant. Clarification was also received on the limited headroom built into the spring Supplementary Estimates for the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS) and the Department of Justice, and members welcomed the assurance from DFP that the headroom in both Departments will be monitored to ensure that allocations are used only for the agreed purposes. Given that scrutiny process and the assurances received, the Committee was, therefore, content to grant accelerated passage to the Bill.

As to the residual issues to be addressed in the weeks ahead, the Committee reiterates the importance of Departments minimising year-end underspend to ensure that the Executive keep within the limits of the Budget exchange scheme agreed with the Treasury. In his statement to the Assembly on 22 January 2013, the Minister advised that:

"The Executive are carrying forward a considerable overcommitment on the resource DEL side. That should ensure that our block-level underspend at the provisional out-turn stage will not exceed the Budget exchange scheme limit" — [Official Report, Bound Volume 81, p57, col 1].

Given the financial and economic challenges facing the Executive, it is vital that the moneys are not lost to Northern Ireland and returned to the Treasury through year-end underspend exceeding the limits of 0·6% of resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) and 1·5% of capital DEL — figures which exclude the Department of Justice, which has separate end-of-year flexibility arrangements.

In his statement on 22 January, the Minister advised that the actual amounts of those percentage limits:

"will be finalised and agreed with ... Treasury in the coming weeks, but they are likely to be around £50 million of resource DEL and £14 million of capital DEL."

— [Official Report, Bound Volume 81, p54, col 2].

Perhaps the Minister will provide an update on the precise figures later in this debate.

Also on that issue, I reiterate the recommendation that all the statutory Committees closely monitor the forecasting and expenditure of their respective Departments during the remainder of this financial year — and, indeed, over the next financial year — in order to ensure that underspend is minimised and that Departments maximise the impact from available resources. Full and timely engagement by Departments with their respective Committees is crucial in ensuring that all statutory Committees can fulfil their important advisory and scrutiny functions in that area.

A further residual issue that the Finance Committee continues to examine is the question of the £18 million of European Union funding relating to the Titanic signature project. That was discussed by the Committee during its evidence session with DFP officials on the January monitoring round. More recently, during the Second Stage debate on the Bill, on Tuesday 12 February, the Minister assured the House that:

"The only time frame is that Europe requires that the money be spent within the next two years. So, the time frame is about finding the projects that are available that can spend the £18 million before 2015, and there are plenty of such projects".

He went on to explain that:

"What we simply do is use European money to fund those projects and take £18 million from them and make it available to DETI." — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p84, col 2].

The Committee has received some initial clarification from DFP on the role played and advice provided by the Central Procurement Directorate in the procurement process for the project. The correspondence from the Department also indicated that DFP is working with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) and the Department for Regional Development (DRD) on a range of potential projects which may be suitable to attract the £18 million in EU funding. Following consideration of that correspondence at their meeting last week, members agreed to request a private briefing from the applicable departmental officials to examine the issues, including the options for ensuring that Northern Ireland does not lose the £18 million in EU funding.

During the oral evidence from DFP officials on the Bill, the Committee also queried the impact of the Titanic signature project issue on the DETI spring Supplementary Estimates. On that technical point, the departmental officials informed the Committee that the spring Supplementary Estimates for DETI could be subject to change if the First Minister and deputy First Minister approve spending for the Titanic signature project. Any resultant increase in the DETI departmental expenditure limit on its reconciliation page will be updated accordingly as an addendum.

However, it was also explained that, if the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) endorses the allocation of £18 million to DETI, it will not appear in the DETI Estimate, but it will instead score in the Tourist Board accounts as a non-departmental public body. That is because, under current arrangements, Estimates reflect only the cash grant paid by sponsoring Departments to their non-departmental public bodies and not the full resource consumption. On that point, DFP officials explained that the review of the financial process aims to resolve the issue of aligning budgets, Estimates and accounts and thereby increase transparency.

During the evidence session on 30 January, DFP officials indicated that work was ongoing to progress the review, including discussions with counterparts in other Departments to find some way in which ministerial autonomy could be protected, so that Ministers have discretion to move resources around as they want to, but, at the same time, the Assembly is provided with an insight into where the resources are going. Perhaps the Minister can also update the House on that issue later in today's debate.

The two residual issues that I highlighted will, no doubt, be the subject of further consideration at a later date. For today, on behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister and congratulate him for bringing this forward today. I do not want to redden his face, but he does a wonderful job. Self-praise is no recommendation, but I am giving it to him anyway.

Agreeing the Budget Bill today will allow us to agree this year's 2012-13 spend and the spend for the first part of 2013-14 until we approve everything in June, hopefully.

In the monitoring rounds, Departments brought forward a commitment with regard to redeeming funds at as early a stage as possible so that they are not lost. Up to now for this year, things are working better. Historically, moneys have had to go back to Westminster because they were not spent. However, that is not the case. I know that the media like to jump all over the block grant that we receive and the moneys that we spend and do not spend. Parameters have been set down about how much we can or cannot carry forward, and it is good budgeting to ensure that that happens.

The Minister talked about ensuring that all work is carried out between now and the end of this financial year. Some Departments will definitely have difficulty in reaching some of those targets, but let us hope and pray that they do.

There was a problem with regard to Departments' interpretation of efficiency plans. Some arm's-length bodies and some Departments have different impressions of efficiencies, and work needs to be done to ensure that everyone is singing from the same hymn sheet. Departments' forecasts and expenditure was an area that we focused on greatly. The Committee wants to ensure that those forecasts are realistic and can be met through the expenditure over the next year and are not crystalball gazing. We have had to deal with some Departments having an overcommitment on their resource. So I appreciate that.

We support the motion. I was happy that the Committee agreed to accelerated passage and that we did not have the same debacle as last year, which created some difficulty, but we got there eventually. It had the potential for Departments to spend without that spending being formally agreed through the House. I support Final Stage and look forward to ensuring that, come June, we take the same approach to the Final Stage of the Budget Bill for 2013-14.

1.45 pm

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The discussions that we had in the earlier consideration of the Bill covered all the bases. The systems that we have developed are working quite effectively and are being worked effectively. We had an early focus on more accurate, more rigorous financial projection and set performance targets against that. I think that that has had the desired effect and that we manage the overall Budget in a much more satisfactory way. There will always be exceptions and circumstances that cannot be anticipated, but the flexibility of monitoring rounds allows us to adjust.

I echo Paul's comments about efficiency savings. Some Departments have genuinely found efficiencies, but it has been a patchy performance. The same focus that we previously put on financial projections and performance needs to be addressed to this issue because that will be an ongoing requirement as pressure on the block grant continues. On that basis, and just to join in, I commend the Minister on the motion and on the work done so far.

Mr Cree: It is nice to be able to support the Final Stage of the Budget Bill here this afternoon. As you know, the Bill provides a statutory authority for expenditure in 2012-13. I was talking to Mr Girvan in the Lobby, and I am just wondering whether he was reading my speech or has a very good memory, but he seemed to cover the same points, as, indeed, did Mitchel. It is probably a good thing that everyone in the Committee is singing from the same hymn sheet, and I have to say that it is an unusual occurrence.

Two weeks ago, we approved the spring Supplementary Estimates. They cover the monitoring rounds and the Vote on Account, which permits public expenditure in the early part of the next financial year. The Main Estimates for 2013-14 will be considered and decided by the Assembly in June. We will then enter year 3 of the four-year mandate, and, as I have said before, it is crucial that the Executive ensure that all Departments engage fully with their respective Committees by providing adequate information in time for scrutiny. The review of the financial process was intended to provide clarity in order to make such engagement meaningful. Does the Minister expect the Executive to agree and implement the improvements in time for the Main Estimates later in the year?

The current system is ineffective and does not show transparency or direct read-across. Moreover, Ministers must make every effort to ensure that departmental budgets are adhered to and underspend kept to an absolute minimum. We have to avoid the risk of having to return any unspent funding to the Treasury. The Minister said last year that such an occurrence would be extremely difficult to explain to taxpayers as we work through one of the tightest Budgets in recent years. It remains so. Increasing overcommitment to protect inadequate spending is just not good enough, and I support the Minister in his stand to improve accountability.

Last year, we were advised that some 1,400 new starts in the social housing sector had been provided. It would be good to know the situation today. Taxpayers need to know the actual results being achieved and what progress is being made over and above the provision of routine public services.

Another concern that I have is that Departments may well have failed to make the efficiency savings that they announced. I noticed that the Deputy Chairman referred to that. The Minister is well aware of the Audit Office report, and I would appreciate any comments that he is able to make on the situation and on how it will have a direct effect on the Budget figures.

We need to up our game and illustrate delivery during the remaining two years. The Estimates in June will be a critical time in defining the success or otherwise of this Government. We will be judged on that.

Mrs Cochrane: I welcome the opportunity to speak in the Bill's Final Stage debate. Although it has been said that the Budget was not all that we would have hoped for, economic reality necessitates that we do all that we can to maximise public expenditure, prevent underspend and strive to rebalance and restructure the local economy.

Most of the other Committee members covered all the technicalities of the Budget process, so I will not repeat those and will keep my comments brief. However, I know that the Minister would feel short-changed if I did not mention that the ongoing costs of managing a divided society are unsustainable.

In his opening remarks, the Minister highlighted some of the successes in tourism etc. Maybe I need to take the opportunity as well to tell him at this stage how wonderful he is. In the face of good news stories, however, the recent unrest has shown that, when we scratch the surface, the divisions are still very evident. There is no doubt that such divisions will continue to hurt us economically and financially by deterring tourism and investment, as well as by limiting our ability to attract and maintain top talent.

So, although I offer my support to the Bill, the question still stands: how much longer can the Assembly afford to continue spending money on managing division rather than finding sustainable solutions to remove it?

Mr McNarry: Thank you, Mr Speaker. Not wishing to be a party pooper, I want to go on record to say that I actually like Sammy Wilson quite well. However, I will speak in opposition to the Budget Bill. It is my intention to present my case and to be afforded, as I would expect, a fair and uninterrupted hearing. That is an entitlement that, I know, you allow each Member to legitimately claim in the House.

The Minister called for Members to adhere closely to the nuances of the Bill, and he presented to us the accelerated passage of the Bill to ensure the continuity of public services into 2013-14. Although the Finance Minister did a good job of presenting the Budget, the Budget that he had to deliver was a complacent Budget that was agreed by a complacent Executive and presented to a complacent Assembly.

In no short measure, however, I exonerate the Minister, who is, after all, someone who has to present the Budget, which the Executive agreed behind closed doors. He has carried out his duty professionally. I considered tabling amendments, but what is the point? This Budget is, and was, a done deal before the Minister presented it to the House. In fact, the House must share my thoughts, because no party tabled any amendments.

The purpose of the Bill is to authorise the use by Departments and certain other bodies of resources totalling over £16 billion. Current and capital receipts of over £2 billion contribute to an overall operating total of just under £19 billion. The Finance Minister, in his usual style of combining a jolly approach on the one hand with schoolteacher scolding on the other, has been the only Minister to present during the Budget debate. His job was to act as the delegated Minister who was tasked with the job of presenting the Budget carve-up that was agreed at the Executive table.

It seems that no other Minister felt it necessary, or was present, to defend their departmental spend, despite the universal criticism of all Departments by their respective Committees. The House alone and not a Committee is tasked with endorsing this Budget Bill, and not one Department that was mentioned escaped criticism, yet only one Minister — quite properly, the Finance Minister — appeared in the Assembly to first, listen and then to explain the Budget on behalf of absentee Ministers. I am not so sure that, to date, he has defended the Ministers' case for them, in which case I suggest that on future Budget occasions all Ministers should be present to defend their Department's policies and make their own compelling arguments for funding. Their separate cases have clearly convinced the Finance Minister yet again, but how revealing it would be for the House to have heard the merits of the arguments that persuaded Mr Wilson to present the Budget Bill for them.

Let me take them in order: the Department of Justice; the Health Department; the Department of Education; the Department for Regional Development; the Department for Social Development; the Agriculture Department; the Department of the Environment; the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment; the Department for Employment and Learning; and the Culture Department. All those Departments have high-spending Ministers. Each of those Departments is taking the Assembly on a route map of policies determined by individual party political agendas.

Take the education budget. Is the House agreed to the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) empire being funded? In the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD), is this Budget a rush towards blank-cheque handouts to Translink? Even though a serious Committee inquiry is taking place, are we content to fund Translink performances? Are we agreeing to a major road spend in the west, still mired in court cases? That spend is locked into this Budget.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

In health, is the House making itself complicit in playing the almighty distributor of priorities in that, the most sensitive of all complex Departments, where funding has simply become a lottery? In environment, are we funding a budget for a wind farm policy, a retail development policy and a Belfast versus the rest policy, and agreeing to the Budget funding an over-expensive super-council structure? When we look at the Budget presented, we see that you are all agreeing to those policies. You are giving powers of attorney to Ministers to fund their own political agendas. Of course, that has to be one of the joys of operating a mandatory coalition.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr McNarry: Just a minute.

The Assembly, caught in a mood of complacency, is allowing a party political carve-up at the Executive table, where the shopping list of largely party political fiefdoms is divvied up. We have cantonised government here. We have a Government of self-interested, party political shopping lists, rather than a Government of true coalition, presenting ideas and even solutions. That is, I contend, no way to run Northern Ireland during the greatest economic crisis in 80 years.

Look at the budgetary requirements borne out of party political projects and not out of addressing the needs of our economy and our people. You would almost think that austerity had not arrived in Northern Ireland. You could even be forgiven for thinking that austerity is over, when, in fact, no proper balancing of the books has even started. You would think that vulnerable people do not exist in Northern Ireland. However, the truth is that they do exist and are being ignored by a complacent and disconnected Executive preoccupied with their own party political interests and judged by the public, so far, to be smug with it.

How difficult can it be to spend a block grant? However, our Departments routinely return unspent money. That implies that the Departments do not know how to manage money; that they are full of wish lists and pie-in-the-sky projects. When push came to shove, they ran for cover by reneging on their fantasy bids. Tell me this: where do those projects come from? Who dreams them up? Who is conjuring up those spending follies? Are civil servants driving Ministers into a silo mentality of budgetary idealism and over-optimism?

2.00 pm

Having watched Departments return loads of unspent money, I suppose I can now concede that Sammy Wilson was right in saying that contingencies have proved to be unnecessary in our system. So much money is returned unspent that he has the surpluses to tinker, enabling him to readjust the financial allocation between Departments as the year progresses. So, with that departmental mentality, why would Mr Wilson need a contingency to fall back on? The terrible truth is that there is not joined-up government; there is no plan to get us out of the economic crisis; there is no driving energy or vision for government. The whole operation oozes with complacency and a lack of drive and imagination.

Why, when we make a decision to reduce the number of Departments, is the Department for Employment and Learning still there? Seemingly, it is being budgeted for and, seemingly, it has been politically bought and paid for. How many more squalid, self-interested, back-door compromises have to be made before we get a properly accountable system of government that can be properly measured against performance? The compromise that this Budget represents is characterised only by inaction and complacency. It is a situation that led one Committee Chairman to tell senior departmental officials to their face that their performance in front of the Committee was pathetic. Indeed.

However, in the Second Stage debate, one Member, who usually has something sensible to say on budgets, referred to the missed opportunities of this Budget. He said that it was at the strategic level that we are being challenged and that the time had come to at least begin to discuss that strategic level. He is right.

Take the Department of Education. Are we continuing to back ESA? Even though that body has yet to be fully established, we have thrown money, like confetti, at its building-block creation. It seems that it is primed to become an education empire, ready to receive more funding than the House intends. Certainly gone is the argument that ESA would be a self-sustaining body that would be financed on the basis of it being a slim, more efficient authority, and, thus, we were told, one that would, effectively, deliver savings. Savings through expenditure reductions are, it seems, no longer mentioned in the debate.

Are we budgeting for an ESA monster with a voracious appetite for eating up money? Does that budgeting also allow for the appalling policy decision to ignore, keep out or even permit associate representation on the ESA board for the voluntary grammar schools? In fact, are we supporting a budget to finance ESA, which, in effect, will do all it can to outlaw grammar schools?

A budget should be founded on integrity and not on expediency. These so-called agreed measures for implementation that are reflected in the Budget represent to me one hell of a compromise and a vacuum where principle should have stood. That compromise needs some explaining, because the Budget is the outworking of all the backstairs deals and all the agreed measures of this five-party mandatory coalition. This Budget will set in stone the priorities of that mandatory coalition, and, by supporting them, we are passing on those squalid deals on the nod.

Compiling the mandatory coalition Budget has not relieved the complexities brought to the table in distributing the spending figure that was put into our circle of administration. That is why the Budget enshrines missed opportunities and is oozing complacency in its carve-up.

Previously, the Finance Minister and I have often clashed. Well, perhaps, we have not clashed. Let me say that we have exchanged a difference of views over the meaning of the term "contingency". When I wanted to emphasise the need for contingencies, he politely declined by saying that, under his watch, contingencies were unnecessary. What do we do, however, when cavalier attitudes prevail in Departments and are, then, calculated into their budgets? At least, could we not expect to see Ministers being disciplined in a preventative way in future, in order to prevent both them and us looking foolish and incompetent? Is that, in itself, not a contingency worth implementing?

Expectations of the Budget exist out there. There is pressure for solutions and some panacea for the economic crisis that we are in. Nevertheless, this Budget and, I suspect, Budgets that are yet to come can never fully meet all that is expected of them. This Budget, however, fails to bring relief to those who are most in need. That is required to be addressed. Unfortunately, this Budget is not designed to do so. It needs to be reconstructed. New urgencies are developing rapidly. We have a duty to consider what scope, if any, exists to meet those new situations. We must exchange our present rigidity for flexibility.

In essence, what scope has this Budget to deal with certain particular problems that are not going away and are likely to be with us for some years ahead? I have to say that there is a persistent reluctance and unwillingness to reshape how we manage public spending to better meet the demands and needs of the economy and society. These budgetary measures are unacceptably remote from today's people, today's needs. We need a Budget that can help to offset the real pain and suffering that impacts directly on people. They will see very little in this Budget for them. There is scant recognition of their everyday requirement to adequately fuel growth, jobs and productivity. We must give people dignity along with a deserved quality of life.

Sixty thousand adults are out of work for a year or more. One-hundred thousand children are caught up in poverty. Thousands are rendered inactive and unable to find employment due to poor qualifications and limited skills. Increased numbers of children are leaving primary schools with severe literacy and numeracy deficiencies. More family homes than ever are being repossessed. Those are the real issues about which no one should feel complacent. I challenge any Minister in any Department to show the public how their use of their budget will impact directly on making life better for any person who is out of work; in poverty; lacking in skills and qualifications; unable to spell, read, write or count; or is caught in negative equity but is unable to keep up their mortgage payments.

That is not to mention the growing number of people who are fully engaged in work but are, nevertheless, struggling to raise a family or enjoy plans for their retirement. During these Budget Bill Stages, I have listened to some Members — and I have heard it today — open their speeches with a rant, interspersed with a whinge, and close them with a Budget validation and a whimper of, "I do" or, "I will support the Budget." That is not good enough.

A recent comment by Lynda Wilson, on behalf of Barnardo's, caught my attention. She said that people are asking for politicians to wrap policies around investment. We should pay attention to that.

I am mindful that the Minister will have the last word in this debate. I am sure that it will be very enjoyable. He may be tired or buoyant or in a combative mood, but he specifically requested that Members adhere closely to the nuances of the Bill. It is those shades of meaning and open interpretation that I have sought to address. I caution against ignoring what is being said. I respectfully suggest that my opinion is shared by many in the House and, more importantly, many outside. There is a growing consensus that there are underlying problems in this setup. It is not expressed openly in this debate because the Whips have done their job and organised the cheerleading. Nevertheless, there is a growing consensus that there are underlying problems in this political set-up.

The Bill should be part of rectifying the recurrent failure to address complacent departmental management. It should, but it is not. Today, I am not interested in a battle of wits and a one-day-wonder debate, or a Budget Bill that is a one-trick pony. The problem of complacency has been identified, so what can be done? I sense that the House would be agreeable to and interested in a debate that concentrates on really delivering for public expectations and meeting public need, perhaps by using a weighted score on departmental performances.

Earlier, I referred to a Member's view that it was at the strategic level that we were being challenged. That Member went on to ask whether we can develop synergies, find more traction, develop new strategies and see more analysis of why investments did not occur or why they were relocated. He concluded with what I consider to be a wry comment: if we are to continue with the same inputs, we will, unfortunately, continue to get the same outputs. His well-made point helps me to rest my case for an opposing view on the Budget.

Mr Wilson: I thank Members who took part in this short Final Stage of the Budget debate. I emphasise that it is the Final Stage. Maybe the Member who spoke previously should have borne in mind that there have been many opportunities to speak in the House over the past couple of weeks for those who take the view that, somehow or other, there are fundamental flaws in this Budget. The Member believes that that view is shared by many in the House. I am sure that, had he made a cogent case, and, much more importantly, put down some amendments, that untapped source of discontent may have been able to find some expression. I will deal with Mr McNarry's speech later, but, at the very outset, I want to say that a process has been gone through.

The framework for a four-year Budget was laid down in the debates. They took place in the Assembly, and everyone had an opportunity to take part in them. Members also took part in Committees. Ministers had the chance to make their bids. They made those at the Executive; some of them made them publicly in the Assembly. Some made them to their Committees or got their Committees to lobby, and there were substantial lobby groups across Northern Ireland. That set the basis for the four-year Budget, which we are now going through year by year. Of course, there have been changes to it, and that is why we are having this debate. People could not spend money on some of the things they had intended to spend it on; therefore, the money was reallocated. Of course, we also reviewed the Budget, looking at the trends in in-year reduced requirements and whether that meant that budgets should be reviewed in some way.

2.15 pm

Let me quickly go through some of the points that were made in the debate. The Deputy Chairman of the Committee accepted that there had been consultation, and I appreciate the work that the Committee did with my officials and the fact that, having done that work, it was happy for the Budget Bill to go through by accelerated passage. Of course, that did not mean that there were not opportunities for people to express views on the Bill in the House. Indeed, they did so in quite a long Budget debate earlier this month.

I think that the Deputy Chair made a very important point about the flexibilities that already exist for Ministers. He talked about the technical changes that were undertaken by Ministers after Committee scrutiny. One of the things that bemuses me a little is that there was opposition to the financial process arrangements, which would have introduced some changes. Some Ministers objected on the basis that they did not give them enough flexibility. The Deputy Chairman of the Committee got it right: there needs to be flexibility. Indeed, there is substantial flexibility, whether in the de minimis changes that Ministers can make or the retrospectively ratified larger changes that they can make through proactive management and moving money around. In-year bids also give flexibility.

At the same time — this is the other side, and I thought that the Deputy Chairman explained the balance really well — we must make sure that money is spent on the purposes for which it was voted. Therefore, you cannot and should not give carte blanche to Ministers so that, once they get a pot of money, they can simply say, "Let us do whatever we want with it". It is about making sure that you do not tie people's hands and say that every penny must be spent in the way that it was voted — things change, as Mr Bradley pointed out — while, on the other hand, ensuring that the views of the Assembly are not overridden by Ministers who simply say that they have carte blanche and can do whatever they want.

Mr Bradley also raised the issue of the overcommitment, and I can confirm to him that his figures are correct.

Obviously, the final figure depends on whatever allocations are made during the year because it is a percentage of our total Budget, but the figures that he gave are, by and large, the correct ones.

Mr Girvan has gone, but I thank him for the fulsome praise that he gave me. It is just a pity that the First Minister was not around to hear it. Anyway, that does not matter. Mr Girvan, Mr McLaughlin and Mr Cree talked about the importance of efficiency plans that Departments had to see through — it was a central theme. I would just make one point on that. Efficiency plans are important, and we set the efficiency levels that Departments have to achieve every year, but it is not for me or my Department to micromanage Departments and tell them that efficiencies have to be achieved by their doing this, this and this. That is up to individual Ministers.

It is then up to Committees to scrutinise that the efficiencies delivered were not at the expense of front line services or, at least, that front line services have not had their provision cut without efficiencies first being delivered in those parts of the Department that do not affect or impact on the public. That is why the monitoring of efficiency plans by Committees is important. It is a pity, and I have made this point time and again, that the Education Minister is the only Minister who is not prepared to engage in that exchange with Committees.

Judith Cochrane raised the issue of tourism and the impact on it of the current flags dispute, which her party unfortunately generated.

Mr McCarthy: No way.

Mr Wilson: Well -

Mr McCarthy: No way, Sammy. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Wilson: — there is no point in the Member saying, from a sedentary position, "No way; do not blame us.". As far as I and the public are aware, and the record shows it, the vote and the decision on the removal of the flag of our country from Belfast City Hall depended on the votes that the Alliance Party gave in support of Sinn Féin and the SDLP. Of course, that kicked off a whole raft of disorder across Northern Ireland.

Let me make quite clear something that I have said time and time again so am quite happy to repeat: I do not support what has happened as a result of it. I cannot understand why people who value their British heritage and the country in which they live would want to destroy it in that way. Equally, however, I think that those who sparked the reaction cannot run away from the responsibility that they bear for this and then condemn the impact that it is likely to have on our economy.

I really do not know where to start with Mr McNarry's contribution, other than to say that, if he really felt as genuinely and as hard as he said that he does about this Budget, he might have wanted to say all that at a stage when he could do something about it. I suspect that he raised all his objections at this stage because he knew that he could do so secure in the knowledge that nothing could be required of him, other than to engage in a bit of rhetoric. That is basically what it was.

I noticed that he asked what we should then do. I thought, right; I am going to get some really good ideas that I can take to the Executive, and when we review under monitoring rounds the amount of money, or when we start to work on the next Budget, Mr McNarry will have supplied me with great ammunition to take to my Executive colleagues. So, what did we get? He said that we need synergies, traction and strategies — I do not know what all that means. He talked about the unemployed, the poor, the disadvantaged, the need to stimulate the economy and to change direction. Since he mentioned specific problems, I thought that we might have got some specific actions to match them rather than simply a lot of management jargon about synergies, tractions, strategies and Lord knows what else.

However, let us just look at some of the stuff that he said. I am actually glad that somebody said something or at least made some comments about this Budget that I could get my teeth into. He talked about the complacency in the Assembly. We "ooze" complacency. That means all of us — all the parties. Some party Members had been whipped like curs into submission, and others simply could not be bothered anyway. That is except for McNarry, who happened to miss making any contribution in the main Budget debate and who forgot to table any amendments during Consideration Stage or Further Consideration Stage but got himself out of his complacency and rose from his place for the Final Stage debate on the Budget, even though he could not do anything about it by then. Nevertheless, the whole Assembly is, apparently, "oozing" complacency. I would have thought that, had he wanted to be proactive, he would have brought some things through.

Secondly, he asked why all the Ministers were not present to give their case. I cannot understand that. Does he not know how we go about doing Budgets? There is not a country in the world where all the Ministers come and make their case when a final Budget is being presented. It is a bit late at that stage. You can imagine, in that case, George Osborne standing up in a couple of weeks' time in the House of Commons with the Budget for next year and Ministers coming in and saying, "By the way, I want this for DEFRA" and "I want this for BIS.". What way would that be to conduct a Budget debate? We use a very reasonable mechanism, where all the bids from different Departments are weighed up and balanced, and then decisions are made about the pot of resources that we have and the way in which that money should be allocated. Then, of course, once we have decided on those allocations, the Assembly will have the final say on the Budget. Ministers are not present not because they are hiding but simply because it would not be a sensible way of dealing with the construction of a Budget.

He then talked about unspent money and fantasy bids. He asked where those projects come from. Again, he knows enough about monitoring rounds. Let us look at some of the moneys that were returned. The Department of Education returned some money because it took money for schools that had saved money and that may have wanted to use it during the year. Those schools decided that they did not want to use the money and therefore gave it back. I could perhaps criticise the Minister and ask why he did not find that out sooner from the schools, but the truth of the matter is that if the schools decided not to spend their own money, you cannot force them to do so. If they have put that into savings from previous years' budgets and decided that it will be better used next year because next year they are going to paint the school, redo the computer suite, or whatever, that is up to those schools to decide. I could go through lots of other things. Those are not fantasy bids that were picked out of mid-air and never followed through on.

He then asked what we do and said that we tinkered with the surpluses. When Stephen Farry makes bids, and we put £13 million into training young people who have no skills or people who we know already have skills but need retraining, that is not tinkering with the Budget. Indeed, using the Member's own criteria, that is good use of the Budget. When I give money to Nelson McCausland for people to get their foot on the first rung of the property ladder, through co-ownership or whatever, that is not tinkering. That is addressing a real problem that we have. That is what the Budget Bill contains. It reflects the changes that we have made.

If you look at the way in which we have allocated money in the Budget, you will see the priority given to growing the economy. He talks about the 60,000 people who are unemployed, and, yes, there are more people unemployed in Northern Ireland than we want to see. However, our average unemployment rate is now the same as the average unemployment rate for the United Kingdom as a whole. It is well below what it is in the Irish Republic, in most other European countries and in six other regions of the United Kingdom. Even though we are on the periphery of the United Kingdom and tend to suffer greater economic disadvantage, through some of the policies that we have used, we have kept unemployment lower than it would normally be at this stage of the cycle in a recession.

We have also addressed the issue of people living in poverty. Whether through the rates changes that we have made or through some of the things that we are doing through the social investment fund, the social protection fund, etc, we have addressed those particular issues. Of course, we have had to do it from within a Budget that is available to us from the United Kingdom Government. Therefore, I reject the superficial criticisms made at this late stage by Mr McNarry, and I commend the Bill to the Assembly, because I do not want to speak again after Question Time on this particular issue. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that, as this is the Budget Bill, cross-community support is required.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Budget Bill [NIA 18/11-15] do now pass.

Oral Answers to Questions

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Creative Industries Innovation Fund

1. Mr P Ramsey asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how many projects have been supported through the creative industries innovation fund. (AQO 3456/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): I thank the Member for his question. With his indulgence, I want to begin by congratulating Seamus McGarvey, the Armagh cinematographer who was nominated again for an Oscar — unfortunately, he did not get it — for the film 'Anna Karenina'.

The creative industries innovation fund (CIF) originally ran between 2008 and 2011 and supported 156 projects. The fund was relaunched in July 2011 and has a Programme for Government target of supporting 200 projects by 2015. At this midway point, 98 projects have been supported so far. The most recent call for projects closed earlier this month, and the applications that were received are now being assessed.

The fund stimulates the development of commercially viable products and services that are capable of competing in global markets and makes an important contribution to growing our creative industries. I am confident that the Programme for Government target will be achieved.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Minister for her response. I welcome the great detail that the Minister has outlined. Will she assure us that the Programme for Government targets that she referred to will be met across the board, that there will be no regional disparity and that all areas will have the opportunity to excel in what we know is an excellent industry — the creative industries?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. The two main areas that have benefited most from the fund have been Belfast and Derry. As a representative of Derry, the Member will know that it is good that the fund and the potential around it will certainly target areas that have experienced high multiple deprivation. However, there are regional disparities, and, again, that is down to local government coming forward with options to have creative industries innovation funding in their area. I am sure that others will ask at another date. I am keen for officials, wherever possible, to encourage local government representatives to make sure that their area has the same opportunities as many others.

Miss M McIlveen: Obviously, I welcome the CIF funding and the good work that it is producing. Does the Minister have any plans to expand the scope of the fund?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do have plans. Were more funds to be made available, I would certainly expand the funding. I am waiting, in particular, for the Committee's report on the creative industries. I anticipate that there will be good, positive suggestions in that report that may not be included in the current complexion of the fund, but I would certainly like to adopt them into the framework.

It is better to have a joined-up approach. There is no point in the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure having an approach and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment having an approach and then the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure making good recommendations that neither of those Departments takes account of. I look forward to that report. If there is a need to bid for additional moneys on that basis, I will certainly do so.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for her answers, and, of course, I welcome any funding. Does she realise, however, that it is the creative industries that will be the future of our design and the creation of architects and others that will bring jobs? I wonder what other priorities have gone ahead of those, because this is the very source of jobs in the future.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have not put any priorities ahead of the creative industries fund in terms of what the funding was intended for. This is a good news story: not only has the fund met its targets midway through, but it looks as if it will probably exceed its 2015 Programme for Government target.

The Member is right: it represents something like 4·1% of the workforce, and well over 30,000 people work in creative industries. The school curricula and those of further and higher education encourage more diversity in the creative industries. You only have to look at, for example, the 'Game of Thrones' set, where people who were involved in traditional employment such as carpentry and electrical engineering are now involved in set design. There is certainly a lot of potential there, and that is something that I am very mindful of.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I should have advised Members that questions 3 and 11 have been withdrawn. As Mickey Brady is not in his place to ask question 2, I call Joe Byrne.

World Police and Fire Games: Opening Ceremony

- 4. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when she will announce the venue for the opening ceremony of the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 3459/11-15)
- 5. Ms Brown asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on possible venues for the opening and closing ceremonies of the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 3460/11-15)
- 13. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the venue for the opening ceremony of the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 3468/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will take questions 4, 5 and 13 together.

Fifteen venues were scored against a comprehensive set of criteria to identify the most suitable venue to host the opening ceremony. This process identified a preferred option and contingency options for consideration by the World Police and Fire Games board. The board considered the options at its meeting on 20 February. The venue selected for the opening ceremony is the King's Hall in Belfast. It is an excellent venue that has extensive experience of hosting major events. It will be a great site for the opening showcase of the games. The closing ceremony venue is planned to be the Titanic Slipways. Both the venue sites have been agreed with the World Police and Fire Games Federation.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answer. It is good that the venue has now been settled. Have all the venues that will stage games during the World Police and Fire Games been sorted out?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Yes, all the venues have been settled. There are 41 sports and 57 venues. Not all of those are in Belfast; something like 15 are outside. Everything that was in place remains. The hiccup was with the opening ceremony, but everything else is sorted out.

Ms Brown: I also welcome the selection of the King's Hall complex especially given its historical significance in Belfast. How will the venue be modified to accommodate the opening ceremony? What is the anticipated capacity?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. The federation visited several times between April and July. On its last visit, it was stated that the capacity would be 21,000-plus. The King's Hall can reach that number and more and can even retract to receive smaller numbers if appropriate, although that is not envisaged at this stage. The figures anticipated last week are still expected to come here from 1 to 10 August. The King's Hall is more than able to cope with the opening ceremony.

Mr Humphrey: You said that there were 41 sports and 57 venues. What are the anticipated numbers of athletes and people coming to watch the World Police and Fire Games in Belfast?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have no figures for how many spectators there will be. There are 10,000 athletes, and it is expected that 15,000 people will accompany them. So, that is up to 25,000. There will be a big local interest, particularly in some of the events. The World Police and Fire Games company is looking at ticketing regimes to make sure that members of the public, particularly schools, have every opportunity to attend the events. Some schools here will be paired with countries that are visiting and competing. I have no figure — not even an indication — for the demand yet, but I expect to have that closer to the time.

Mr McCarthy: Does the Minister agree that this will be an excellent opportunity to showcase Northern Ireland at its best? There will be so many people coming from all parts of the world. It will be an opportunity to let people see that we have a shared heritage and are promoting a shared and better future for everyone in Northern Ireland.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I agree with the Member. It is not just that. Some of the World Police and Fire Games delegates from five different countries, who were here four or five weeks ago, visited some of our historic sites, tourist attractions and communities. They were nothing but impressed with what we have to offer. That was just a glimpse of what is to come from the start of August.

Tourism: County Londonderry

6. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, following the recent commemoration of the 400th anniversary of The Honourable The Irish

Society at the Guildhall, London, what plans she has to promote cultural tourism throughout County Londonderry. (AQO 3461/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure plays a central role in cultural tourism in the North through investment in cultural infrastructure such as museums, theatres, sports venues and the City of Culture. In July, a major classical music production will be hosted in Derry to mark the 400th anniversary of the building of the city's walls. The production is a collaboration between the Culture Company and The Honourable The Irish Society. It will be performed simultaneously in the London Guildhall and Derry's Guildhall by the London Symphony Orchestra and Camerata Ireland.

My Department's arm's-length bodies also contribute to promoting cultural tourism through the provision of facilities, ongoing support for cultural services and building partnerships and funding projects to attract visitors, such as the genealogy events and exhibitions that are planned.

Mr Campbell: The Minister outlined a number of events. She will, I am sure, be aware of the success of the event mentioned in the original question at the Guildhall in London last month. Does she agree that the key now is to ensure that all the events that she mentioned and others throughout the city and county of Londonderry need to be effectively marketed to ensure that they are a success?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I totally agree. It is rare for me to totally agree with Gregory Campbell, but I do. They need to be effectively marketed, and they need to be promoted in the community to ensure that everybody has an opportunity to avail themselves of what will be an outstanding opportunity.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answers. Will she outline some of the other celebrations that will take place as part of Derry's year of culture? Will she also give us some indication of whether there should be an effective marketing plan and finance from the Tourist Board?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The programme has well over 140 events. In relation to celebrating the building of Derry's walls, there are a few other events around history that we could consider alongside new and existing events that are shaped around the story of the walls. The city will play host to a number of events, such as Graffiti Jam, formerly the Walled City Carnival. The Maiden City Festival takes place in and around the walls as part of the build-up to the Apprentice Boys of Derry Association event. The Verbal Arts Centre will deliver classical musical events about the commissioning of the walls. It is incumbent upon everyone, particularly those with responsibility for promoting tourism, to promote the events in Derry to best effect. Whatever happens in the city of Derry and around the north-west needs to be impacted on by everybody.

Mr Eastwood: In Derry, we have proved that culture can be a good economic driver through cultural tourism. Is much work being done between her Department and DETI to ensure that that good work is capitalised on across the North?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I assure the Member that there is and will continue to be good work. I will make sure that what happens in Derry, particularly this year but also with the legacy, benefits the city. As I have said before and will say time and time again, it is a city that has not seen the investment that it was entitled to for decades. Investment in the City of Culture project by the Executive of over £30 million is a commitment to making sure that the project is very successful not just in 2013 but in the years after that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Michael McGimpsey is not in his place to ask question 7.

World Police and Fire Games

8. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the number of competitors who have registered for the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 3463/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: As of 21 February, 2,454 competitors had registered for the games. I continue to closely monitor progress on registrations and anticipate the company achieving the target of 10,000 competitors for the games.

Mr Hilditch: I welcome that information. I am not sure how the Minister views that information. Will the cap of 7,500, as anticipated by the Department, be required?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Sorry, I did not pick up the last part of the question.

Mr Hilditch: I was asking about the cap of 7,500 that was put in place.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Everything is in place as it should be. I was concerned some weeks ago that the figure seemed a bit low, but there is constant reassurance from the federation that the figures reflect a typical pattern of behaviour and that, closer to the games, there will be a surge of registrations. The figure includes team registrations, which makes it a bit deceiving. Captains are putting in a registration for their whole team. I want to get that broken down further and have a more accurate figure as the weeks roll on. However, certainly, I am happy at this stage that things are as they should be.

2.45 pm

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Will the Minister tell us what the current situation is with pop-up accommodation?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Pop-up accommodation is still being closely monitored and scrutinised in the event that it is needed by the World Police and Fire Games company. As I have seen, the company is working very closely with the Belfast Visitor and Convention Bureau and the Tourist Board to look at alternative forms of accommodation. As the Member is aware, under the Tourism Order 1992, tourist accommodation must be certified by the Tourist Board, and DETI has provided advice to the Tourist Board on how alternative accommodation, such as popup accommodation, will be facilitated under that order. Certainly, it will have all the facilities that anybody would expect in any other hotel or B&B facility.

Mr Gardiner: Can the Minister give us a guarantee that there will be sufficient accommodation for all competitors and that no one will be turned away because there is nowhere for them to stay?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I can guarantee that a robust exercise is taking place, looking not just within Belfast and not just at hotel accommodation. As my answer to the previous question suggested, the exercise is looking at pop-up or alternative accommodation. We are also looking at B&Bs and guest houses. Some weeks ago, I met some providers and potential providers. I am content that everything that should be done is being done. That is not just for Belfast and the central area but for outlying areas that are no more than half an hour's journey away. Certainly, there will be benefits for surrounding areas such as Lisburn from the World Police and Fire Games. At this stage, I am happy enough that everything will be done to achieve the target.

Arts: Lottery Funding

Mr McCarthy: Ceist uimhir a naoi, Mr Deputy Speaker. Question 9

9. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for her assessment of the use of lottery money in supplementing her budget for the arts. (AQO 3464/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Maith thú, a Kieran. I thank the Member for his question.

The Arts Council supports a number of programmes through lottery funding. These programmes include the small grants programme, the intercultural arts programme, the arts and older people programme, capital funding, support for the individual artist programme and specific arts project funding, as well as the annual funding programme. I am very pleased with this additional money from the lottery and how it is utilised because these programmes support groups and individuals in accessing and participating in the arts across the North. As the Minister, I place great importance on this work, as it is of particular importance to those who face barriers in accessing and participating in the arts — for example, older people and minority ethnic communities, as well as marginalised and deprived communities.

Mr McCarthy: Go raibh maith agat, Minister. Does the Minister agree that lottery funding should not be used specifically for her Department but should be used only for additional items and not included in departmental calculations?

Ms Ní Chuilín: It is not. I give the Member that assurance. It is additional money. Lottery money cannot be used to bridge gaps or holes in departmental funding. That is not its purpose. If the Member has any evidence that that is happening, I would be really keen to see it. Lottery money, like European money, needs to be additional and should not be "instead of". Any additional funding, be it from the lotteries, small trusts or elsewhere, that helps people to access the arts has to be welcomed, as I am sure that the Member agrees.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. What impact did the reduction in lottery funding as a result of the 2012 London Olympics have on the arts across the North?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. The Arts Council has estimated that there was a loss of £4·2 million as a result of the diversion of funds to the London Olympics, and, naturally, it feels that that reduced the overall funding available to lottery-assisted programmes. Specific details on the impact of that reduction are not available despite numerous requests. My Department has no evidence to suggest that there has been a significant detrimental impact on the access to and availability of funding for the arts here.

Mr Elliott: Given that, as I understand it, the Olympic organising committee handed money back to the National Lottery, has the Minister or her Department made any attempt to see whether any of that money is available to her Department?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not aware of whether that is the case. I will certainly try to find out. That is the first that I have heard that. Since we saw the figure that was available as a result of the London Olympic and Paralympic Games and heard the lobbying and requests from groups here and further afield about the potential impact of the events in London on the arts, we have constantly raised that matter and will continue to raise it. If there is new or additional evidence that money was handed back to the lottery but has not come back into the communities, I will be keen to hear about that and will certainly be happy to raise the issue.

East Belfast Arts Festival

10. Mr Newton asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline any representations that her Department has received regarding the East Belfast Arts Festival. (AQO 3465/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: In 2012, applications for funding for the East Belfast Arts Festival were made to the Arts Council and to Belfast City Council. The application to Belfast City Council was for funding under the community festivals fund, which is match-funded by my Department. Both applications were unsuccessful. Officials from the Arts Council subsequently met the festival organisers to fully explain the reasons for that decision. They also explained the application process to the organisers to assist them with future applications. The Arts Council provided £5,000 for the 2012 East Belfast Arts Festival in the form of sponsorship. To date, my Department has received no representations in relation to an East Belfast Arts Festival for 2013. I have asked my officials to arrange a meeting with you to discuss any assistance that can be made available to the organisers for the festival.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for her answer, and I am pleased that she recognises that the east Belfast festival, delivered as it was on a shoestring budget, was a great success. There is an indication from those who organised it that they need a development fund to help to make the festival an even greater success this year than it was last year.

Ms Ní Chuilín: As I said in my main answer, I am happy for my officials to meet you, as we have done previously. Given the size of east Belfast and, indeed, the festival's reputation, it merits a visit from officials to see what way we can take it forward, if at all.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her replies so far. I may have missed this, and, if I have, I apologise to the Minister. Did the Department give any direct support to the festival? If not, could the Minister explain why, please?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary. As I said in the main answer, it is about the Department providing money through the Arts Council and Belfast

City Council through the community festivals fund. Where there are specific requests — maybe the Member for East Belfast is hinting at this — for assistance and support for an overall development plan, which is probably about regeneration, part of which includes arts, we will be happy to look at that and try to support it, where possible. The money for festival programmes is allocated to the Arts Council and to Belfast City Council or local government.

Mr Nesbitt: The Minister said that, as yet, there had been no application for 2013. Would she welcome such an application, and would that be based on her assessment of the success of 2012?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member was present when I gave my answer to Robin Newton, who has raised the needs of east Belfast with me continually. I welcome the fact that, as I have heard anecdotally, 2012 and previous years were a success. I am sure that 2013 will be a success as well. If I hear the Member correctly — I do — I have to say that the shoestring budget was a hindrance and, if further funds or support were made available, the festival could be even more successful.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 11 has been withdrawn.

World Police and Fire Games: West Tyrone

12. Mr Buchanan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether West Tyrone will benefit from the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 3467/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The games will bring approximately 25,000 visitors to the North, and it is vital that we use the opportunity to promote and to sell us as a tourist destination. Although there are no games venues in the West Tyrone constituency, Cookstown in Mid Ulster will be the venue for the half-marathon road race. The company has engaged and will continue to engage with all local councils, including those in West Tyrone, to identify opportunities for them to organise or host events related to the games. Those engagements have highlighted opportunities for volunteering, accommodation and local businesses. In addition, a number of informal days have been held for accommodation providers, including local briefings that were held in Omagh and Enniskillen to which persons from County Tyrone were invited.

Mr Buchanan: I thank the Minister for her response. Can she give us some more detail on what work has been done with the local council in Omagh, the business community and hoteliers, guest house owners and so forth, so that the effects of the games in Belfast will have a more extended effect — far beyond Belfast — as is only right and proper?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The World Police and Fire Games company and, indeed, my officials have met many representatives from local government. Omagh District Council, for example, did not feel that there was an opportunity for it to bid to host events. Cookstown District Council, for example, put in a bid for the half-marathon road race, and the Member may be aware that 15 of the events and activities that are part of the World Police and Fire Games are being held outside Belfast. Along with Minister Foster, I have met the hoteliers and businesses recently about accommodation. Indeed, we previously met businesses to discuss the potential for the World Police and Fire Games and the City of Culture to increase support for, in particular, local and small businesses. That work will not stop. If there is anything in particular that the Member wishes to bring to my attention about Omagh or West Tyrone, I am happy to hear it.

Mr McDevitt: I declare an interest as someone who has applied to be a volunteer at the games. Can the Minister tell me whether the rumour is true that I will have an awful lot of competition in securing my opportunity to give up some of my time for free?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am afraid that you are, Conall, and I do not think that we are done yet. There was a request for around 3,500 people to give up their time to volunteer. We now have over 6,000 applicants, and that is good. One of the reasons that we extended the deadline for people to volunteer was to attract people from neighbourhood renewal areas, where, on occasions, there have been difficulties, particularly with some of the services. They have applied, and that is from where the bulk has come. It is good news. I hope that the Member is successful in his application, and I look forward to seeing him taking part in some way.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that the question is about the benefits for West Tyrone.

Mrs Overend: It has just occurred to me that there are benefits to other constituents, not just from accommodation. Has that occurred to the Minister? Can she outline some of the benefits to some of our small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in West Tyrone and Mid Ulster, maybe in catering and other such things?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am sure that small businesses and SMEs will compete for contracts, and those contracts have been outlined in detail to most of the SMEs. Strong social clauses will be included, so there will be an element of legacy well after the World Police and Fire Games finish. As the Member will know, the games will be hosted in Belfast. Belfast City Council bid for the games and won. We are trying to ensure that the benefits from the games go beyond Belfast and help tourism, SMEs, accommodation, catering, entertainment in local pubs and clubs and even the creative industries. We are looking to see what opportunities there are and what we can develop for August. Everything that can be done is being done.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 13 has already been answered.

Libraries

14. Mr McNarry asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline her vision for the future development of the library service as a community resource across Northern Ireland. (AQO 3469/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: My Department's vision for the public library service is set out in the 'Delivering Tomorrow's Libraries' policy document, which requires:

"A flexible and responsive library service which provides a dynamic focal point in the community and assists people to fulfil their potential."

That means a library service that reaches out, forms partnerships and finds new ways of becoming relevant to the communities. When libraries do that, they place themselves at the heart of communities. I am sure that the Member will agree that that is the best place for our libraries to be.

Local Government Reform: Finance

1. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister of the Environment whether he submitted a bid for £39·5 million to the Department of Finance and Personnel to help finance the reform of local government. (AQO 3471/11-15)

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): I thank the Member for his question. I can confirm that I made an argument to the Executive over a number of monitoring rounds in the past year, that it should move away from its previous position: that the Executive should not contribute to the cost of local government reorganisation. Although my three former arguments did not prevail, I am pleased to say that the Executive signed off on a proposal to fund local government reorganisation — not as much as I would have liked, but nonetheless substantially, and I want to acknowledge that contribution.

Yes, the original bid of a contribution to up-front costs was in and around £40 million.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for the frankness of his answer. Will he give us an update on any financial assessment that he may have commissioned with regard to the cost of rates convergence within the proposed reorganisation?

Mr Attwood: I am pleased to say that, following a series of robust negotiations, the funding package that was agreed by the Executive included a contribution of up to £30 million for the issue of rates convergence to which the Member refers. That modelling is being taken forward by the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP), working with the Department of the Environment (DOE), and we anticipate that that is the scale of moneys that might be required on the far side of 2015, in order to ensure that there is not a burden placed upon the ratepayers, both domestic and business, for rates convergence issues that will arise post 2015. Based upon the figures to date, a sum of up to £30 million will certainly help significantly to manage the issue of rates convergence following local government reorganisation.

Ms Lo: Obviously, it is welcome news that there will be central government funding given to RPA. However, we heard all that in the media last week, and I understand that all councillors received a letter giving them information about this agreement that the Minister had reached with the Executive. Is it not very remiss of the Minister not to have come to the House or the Committee to give us details about that agreement? We all heard about it in press articles.

Mr Attwood: I must say that there was a lot of speculation about what was or was not agreed at the Executive meeting over two weeks ago. I understand that, on the Floor of this Chamber, one Minister referred to the agreement, in advance of urgent procedure being deployed by the First Minister and deputy First Minister in order to sign off on the funding package that was agreed in principle at the Executive over two weeks ago. Consequently, I think it was my responsibility as a Minister to let the people on the front line know, the councillors of Northern Ireland who were hearing from others — not from me — about the scale of the funding package. Consequently, it was my obligation as a Minister and my responsibility as a public servant to let councillors know the truth of the matter, whatever the speculation.

Mr Weir: I, too, express some disappointment that we did not hear about it formally in this House. Although there has been welcome progress on the financial package for RPA, in the light of that, can he confirm whether there has been any slippage in the RPA timetable, or are we on track?

Mr Attwood: As I have indicated, time after time, to the House, the Committee, the Executive and the council clusters, and at every conference that I have spoken at — and there have been many — in my view, the point of no return in respect of local government reorganisation passed a long time ago.

Although I have reservations about elements of local government reform, I have no reservations about the principle. From DOE's point of view, there has been no uncertainty or doubt in respect of doing this, doing it on time and doing it properly. Those are the three standards against which I will be judged. Even though my officials were in contact with council clusters over recent times to ask them to confirm their progress against 11 key performance indicators, two of the councils have yet to reply. It would be quite surprising for the Member to hear which two those are.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister give us a sense of the amount of work required for the transition planning, what capacity is required and how that is being progressed?

Mr Attwood: First, in some degree, I have a little residual sympathy with the councils that, heretofore, have seen local government reform not being progressed. Consequently, they may have thought, heretofore, that there might be some uncertainty about whether it would happen in this mandate.

Secondly, I have sympathy for the councils with regard to the scale of what is being undertaken. In my view, the work involved in merging the councils into 11 with regard to the transfer of functions and councils becoming the planning authority on the far side of RPA is not fully appreciated generally. We have indicated 56 performance indicators to the councils in order to ensure that, whatever hesitancy may or may not reside in one or two councils - a lot of councils applied themselves diligently to the work over the past 18 months — those performance indicators will drive their performance and ensure that they get this done on time and get it done right. It is a very complex undertaking, as it involves hundreds of councillors, thousands of staff and 26 councils. However, now that there is greater certainty around funding and there will be more and more certainly in the near future around other matters, I hope that the councils, together with the DOE, will continue to apply themselves diligently to the task.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 3 and 12 have been withdrawn.

University of Ulster: York Street Campus

2. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of the Environment when the Planning Service will make its decision on the University of Ulster new campus at York Street, Belfast. (AQO 3472/11-15)

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his question. It is anticipated that a recommendation on the major York Street University of Ulster proposals will go to Belfast City Council in time for its town planning meeting on 7 March. I have always supported, in principle, the university's proposal to relocate at York Street. When I was a member of the Committee for Employment and Learning a number of years ago, I was one of the MLAs who said that, in principle, it was a wise course of action to locate a university in a city and for it to be part of the regeneration and reconfiguration of the north side of the city of Belfast. It is not an easy planning application to manage, bearing in mind its scale, its massing, traffic and parking, and heritage, nor is it easy to create a scheme that is sympathetic to and reflects the needs of local people, in particular the residents of Carrick Hill.

Mr Humphrey: I declare an interest as a member of Belfast City Council, although I am not a member of the planning committee. Does the Minister agree that this broad development at York Street from the University of Ulster is hugely important to the north-west part of the city and a huge key development in the broad development of that part of the city and, therefore, there should be no undue delay on any planning announcement?

Mr Attwood: If you look at significant planning applications over the past 18 months, although there has, historically, been undue delay, there is no longer, by and large, undue delay. Look at the decision taken last week in respect of Windsor Park, a planning application that was turned round in 11 weeks, and so on and so forth with regard to other applications being fulfilled within the timelines required, such as Narrow Water bridge, Ravenhill, and so on. Therefore, there is no issue about undue delay in the direction of travel of the planning system.

However, the design of the proposal is of such scale that it will mass significantly on York Street. It will go up very high, and it will have an impact on heritage, parking, traffic, and so on. Therefore, the nature, character and scale of the proposal are very challenging. I hope that nobody in this House or elsewhere thinks that that is an easy call. It is a big call because it is a big proposal, which will have a big impact on that part of the city. If it is done right, it can be part of the overall development in the north side of the city, with the Royal Exchange, north side, the underpass at the Westlink and the Harbour Commissioners proposal at City Quays all gathering around the Cathedral Quarter. We have an unprecedented opportunity to shape that part of the city. That opportunity only comes once in a century.

Mr G Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I welcome the Minister's answers so far. I agree that this is a huge project, which is generally very welcome in north Belfast and wider Belfast. Is the Minister satisfied that the consultation has been comprehensive when we are talking about the impact that the proposal will have on local areas, such as Carrick Hill, as he pointed out, but also New Lodge, Tigers Bay and other areas around there?

Mr Attwood: The Member may be aware that, later this week, I will be meeting Community Places, together with residents of the local areas that he referred to, in order to bring forward their issues and concerns about the development. During the summer and autumn of last year, the community, especially the Carrick Hill community, demonstrated a great sense of dignity and resilience, and I think that they deserve particular respect around issues in that area, including in respect of this planning application.

I have had very frank conversations with the senior management of the University of Ulster about how they should manage the application and the character of the application. I think that we are moving forward, and I would like to see a recommendation going to the city council in respect of the main scheme in advance of the town planning meeting on 7 March. That said, I have major concerns, which the university knows about and Mr Kelly might be hinting at, in respect of a car parking proposal for Frederick Street. In the fullness of time, that part of the application may have to be separated from the main application in order to go forward.

Mr A Maginness: I think that this will be a great opportunity for north Belfast, and I agree with the Minister. Will he take into consideration and not prejudice the development of some element of social housing, which is needed in that area and which the local people are supportive of?

Mr Attwood: The issue of housing in that area needs careful management. We do not want to see a situation arise where we will have a Holylands II in the north side area between the 'Belfast Telegraph' building and Carrick Hill. There is the potential for that to happen. That is why I welcome the city council's Buchanan report, which, working with the various colleges in Belfast, can map out how the student housing issue might be dealt with over the next number of decades. At the same time, we have to recognise that there will be a demand for social housing in that area. Areas have previously been designated for housing, such as land at Frederick Street, and, in my view, that needs to be respected going forward. I do not think that development of all the available land for the university is the way forward. I believe that there needs to be balanced development, and that will include potential student housing and, most definitely, social housing.

Review of Public Administration

4. Mr Newton asked the Minister of the Environment for his assessment of the work currently under way in each of the council areas with regard to the review of public administration. (AQO 3474/11-15)

Mr Attwood: This issue was touched on in the first answer. Over the past 18 months, work has been taken forward by the various council clusters. As I indicated, we asked them to reply to a matrix of performance indicators. I think that I said there were 56 tasks, but there are 54 tasks in total. We asked for information in respect of 11 key tasks. According to the information provided by the councils that replied, 64% of what was required had been achieved and was on track, which means that, as we stand today, one third of the tasks that we consider to be crucial have not yet been achieved or are on track. Now that the financial situation has been confirmed, that should be a catalyst for councils to apply themselves to ensuring that all the key performance tasks are on track and will be done in time for the reorganisation in 2015.

3.15 pm

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for his answer. I refer you to your answer to a previous supplementary, when you indicated that at least two councils had not replied to you at all on the key indicators. Does the Minister agree that all councils need to move together and that, if even one or two are dragging their heels, we will not achieve what we are trying to achieve through this review of public administration?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his supplementary. Although two councils have not yet replied to the questions that I raised, nine have replied, and that is the declaration of intent that I want to hear. Although there may be some doubt about some elements of the reform programme that councils are taking forward in the clusters, many are taking forward that work. The transition committee of Belfast City Council, for example, a council that Mr Newton will be very familiar with, meets twice a month, and its work programme is on the council website. Newtownabbey and Antrim councils are developing work on local development plans, a function that will pass to councils in 2015.

Although one council cluster on the north coast has not replied, I have met each and all of the transition committees. Although there may be concerns about local government reform, and whatever the difficulties may be — I do not discount them — I get a sense from across council clusters that they know that the 2015 date is for real.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Given what the Minister has said, does he now believe that we will meet the timeline for the introduction of shadow councils in 2014, and does he still believe that there is a need for them?

Mr Attwood: I believe in the principle of reform and that public policy, public organisations and the people of the North of Ireland have benefited from reform, however hesitantly some have come to it over the past 30 or 40 years. I believe that there is a need for a further phase of reform in Northern Ireland, of which this is just one example.

There are 750 days until the new councils go live, so the countdown is on. On local government legislation and boundaries and how we will fund this, I believe there is an adequate but not excessive amount of time in which to get this done and done right. I continue to honour that commitment. There was a bit of a hint from the Member of some doubt on his part. I trust that all Members and parties in the Chamber remain committed to that date and outcome.

Mr Elliott: Will the Minister accept that there are significant tensions among some of the councils that it is proposed to merge? Maybe those tensions are one reason why not all councils replied, and maybe they exist among even those that did reply.

Mr Attwood: Change is a challenge, and I would be surprised if there were no tensions. It is only in the tension, I think, that you are able, at a cluster level, to work through the issues and work through them right. If everything was sweetness and light, this would have happened a long time ago, and we would not be having this conversation. The fact that there are tensions is not unhealthy, although some councils that it was speculated would have tensions are among those that replied and are getting on with the job of reorganisation.

Hydraulic Fracturing

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin asked the Minister of the Environment what consideration he has given to claims by the Canadian doctor, Dr Eilish Cleary, regarding the health risks associated with hydraulic fracturing. (AQO 3475/11-15)

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his question. I am aware of the evidence of Dr Eilish Cleary from Canada. Indeed, I think that there is wider evidence from Canada that can help to inform the debate on fracking and whether it should or should not happen. I have read some of Dr Cleary's views, and it seems to me that they are a checklist from the Canadian point of view not just on public health but on the range of concerns and considerations that might be associated with the proposal for fracking. Let me reassure the House and the people of Fermanagh and elsewhere that a health assessment would be integral to any environmental impact assessment, which would be required in the event that a planning application or applications were received for hydraulic fracturing in any part of Northern Ireland.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for his answer, particularly given that he anticipated what my supplementary question would deal with. The Minister talked about a health impact assessment. Has he considered publishing draft guidelines that would inform the debate?

Mr Attwood: There are a number of answers to that. An interdepartmental working group exists, and I have asked that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety be represented on it. Although I sometimes stretch the competence of this office, I would not dare stretch it to comment decisively on issues of health. The point is that involving the Health Department in the ongoing interdepartmental work on the proposal is to recognise that there are health issues, which are multiple. I met the Environmental Protection Agency in America. Although many people talk about what happens under the ground with fracking and its impact on water quality, there is very much an issue about what happens to air quality above the ground, which is clearly a matter of health. As I said before, there will be no headlong rush to fracking. All environmental, planning and, indeed, health requirements will have to be satisfied by any proposal that is brought forward. We will examine all the research that is beginning to emerge around the proposal. That includes research that my Department is part funding and that is being taken forward by the Environmental Protection Agency in Dublin. My Department is represented on the steering group for that work. It is only when we have all the research and interrogated all the science that a decision can be made whether fracking, in principle, is or is not feasible.

Mr Campbell: The question asks for the Minister's assessment of one particular individual from Canada. Will he assure people across Northern Ireland that he will have an open mind to any benefits that might be derived as a result of fracking, in addition to any possible, however minuscule, health concerns?

Mr Attwood: She may be one individual, but she is the Chief Medical Officer of Health in New Brunswick in Canada. Therefore, she clearly speaks with a level of authority. To be fair about what she said at the seminar in Enniskillen recently, she gave advice from the Canadian perspective across a wide range of issues on hydraulic fracturing, not just health. People need to be careful. The information that she gave touched upon multiple issues that are relevant to the matter.

I will answer Mr Campbell's question more directly. Although I, as a member of my own party, have a view on the proposal of fracking, as a Minister, I have to step back. That is why I have laid down a number of principles: there should be no headlong rush to fracking, and the science, for and against, in Ireland, Britain, Europe, America and elsewhere, should be interrogated exhaustively. On the far side of the interrogation of the science, if a planning application is brought forward, which may be deemed to be article 31 significant because of its impact and may be subject to a public inquiry as a consequence, only at the end of all those processes might a conclusion be drawn on the matter.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I have listened carefully to what he has said, and he will agree that the negative publicity given to fracking scares the living daylights out of people. To clear the air, can the Minister give us an assurance that until there is absolute scientific proof that fracking is not dangerous, no planning approval will be given?

Mr Attwood: The reassurance that I will certainly give to the Member, the House and the citizens of Northern Ireland is that it is only after exhaustive interrogation of the science that any sensible Minister, Government or Assembly, wherever it might be, should make a judgement. It would be an aspiration to have absolute scientific assurance, but the nature of science is that it is not absolute. Very often, science can lead to conclusions one way or the other. My view is simply this: whatever about the view that I hold as a member of my party, if the science does not lead to the conclusion that this can be done safely, the wise counsel, I think, is that people have to reflect on whether it should be done at all.

Planning Policy Statement 18

6. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of the Environment whether he has any plans to review PPS 18 and supplementary guidelines. (AQO 3476/11-15)

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member. At present, no, I do not have plans to review planning policy statement 18 (PPS 18) and the supplementary guidelines. In my time in this job, I think that I have demonstrated that I do not shirk looking again at planning policy statements or guidelines. I could give you a family of examples of where I have looked at planning policy statements, be they on natural heritage, tourism, enabling development or retail. Although I am very aware of issues that increasingly are being identified around the operation of PPS 18 and the impact of wind farms, wind turbines and other renewable plant, I have not been convinced, at this stage, that there are compelling reasons to review PPS 18.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is the Minister aware that 48% of all wind turbine applications are in the constituency of West Tyrone and that areas, such as the hills above Drumquin, have reached saturation point? Will he consider any plans to introduce thresholds on an area-by-area basis?

Mr Attwood: It is already the case that the principle of cumulative impact is in place at a strategic planning level, when it comes to the assessment of wind farms, and at a local divisional level, when it comes to the assessment of wind turbines. Therefore, cumulative impact on various locations in a divisional planning area office is a threshold that is in place and will apply when it comes to making decisions on farms or individual turbines. In that regard, given that the principle of cumulative impact is already accepted, it is, in effect, a level of threshold when it comes to those decisions.

Mrs Overend: Does the Minister feel that there is any conflict between his Department and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) regarding the way forward on renewable energy?

Mr Attwood: I am not quite sure what the question may be hinting at. In any case, I can answer only from my point of view, which is that renewable energy is Ireland's biggest economic opportunity. The quality of our wind, wave and tide is the best in the world, and the aspiration to be self-sufficient in electricity and to become an exporter of electricity is conceivable and not beyond our capability. When it comes to the jobs around renewables, be they in manufacturing, research and development, construction or ongoing maintenance for renewable plant, it seems to me to be the way to go. We have an obligation to ensure that 40% of our electricity comes from renewable sources by 2020, and, according to the current trend, we are going to fulfil that obligation. That is my view. If that is DETI's view, there is no conflict between us.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions to the Minister of the Environment.

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The House is well aware of Mr Speaker's concern, and, I presume, that of the wider House, about the non-appearance at Question Time of Members who tabled questions.

Given that it happened again today, perhaps you could inform Mr Speaker. As well as people not being in their place, it would appear — I received an email indicating the questions that were withdrawn, as, I am sure, did all other Members. Question 11 to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure was not on that list. Perhaps Mr Speaker could investigate that.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: I thank the Member for putting that on the record. There was an administrative issue. Certainly, what he has said has been put on the record today. If necessary, the Speaker can take up the issue.

Lord Morrow: Further to that point of order, would you like to remind the House of what the procedure is when questions are being withdrawn? As my colleague Mr Campbell has already stated, it was clear at the outset that question 3 to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure had been withdrawn and that questions 5, 13 and 4 had been grouped. There was no mention of question 11. Did I miss it? I suspect that I did. However, do tell us.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I invite the Member to have further discussions with the Speaker's Office. I understand that there was an administrative issue in that regard. We will move on.

Executive Committee Business

Antarctic Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr Deputy Speaker: This is a rather unusual topic.

Mr Bell (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension of the Antarctic Bill to Northern Ireland including the provision making the regulation of activities in Antarctica an excepted matter.

I am delighted to address the House on this hot topic. It is important that in our society now, this House is not a cold house for anyone.

The Assembly will be aware that the First Minister and deputy First Minister have laid a legislative consent memorandum in which they seek support for a legislative consent motion in respect of the Westminster Antarctic Bill to Northern Ireland. The Bill includes a provision that the regulation of activities in Antarctica should be made an excepted matter with regard to our devolution settlement.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

It might be useful to Members if I briefly outline the background to the issue. The UK Antarctic Act 1994 implemented the protocol on environmental protection to the international Antarctic treaty. That established a regulatory and permitting regime for all British expeditions and nationals who travel to Antarctica. It applies UK-wide. The primary aim of the current Bill is to implement in domestic law a new annex to that protocol to the Antarctic treaty that relates to the prevention of and response to any environmental emergencies in the Antarctic. Part 1 of the Bill does that by requiring all of those who intend to undertake activities in Antarctica to take preventative measures to minimise the risk and the potential impact of environmental emergencies and to develop contingency plans for responding to any such emergency situation. In addition, Part 2 of the Bill includes proposals to enhance environmental protection in Antarctica, particularly for marine plants and invertebrates.

The key issue, however, is the reclassification of Antarctic matters as excepted in terms of the Northern Ireland devolution settlement. To date, all legislation on the regulation of activities in Antarctica has been made on a UK-wide basis. Any relevant functions have been carried out by the UK Government. However, during the drafting of the Antarctic Bill, it was identified that the Antarctic and the subject matter of the Antarctic Act 1994 had inadvertently been devolved to legislators in both Scotland and Northern Ireland. In our case, the matter of regulation of activities in the Antarctic was omitted from schedule 2 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998. I add that, although the matter is technically devolved here, no relevant functions were transferred with it, so no Department here has any legislative powers in relation to the Antarctic. An Assembly Bill would be required to confer such powers if they were considered necessary, although the purposes for which those would be sought are not immediately clear.

The UK Government wish to rectify the situation on the basis of the need for a single coherent regulatory approach to its international obligations under the Antarctic Treaty. Subsequently, with the consent of the Scottish Parliament, they made it a reserved matter as far as Scotland is concerned through the Scotland Act 2012.

Having considered the UK Government's request, the First Minister and deputy First Minister believe that there is no compelling reason to argue for the continued devolution of Antarctic matters. Having obtained the agreement of the Executive to do so, they wish to seek the agreement of the Assembly, by means of the legislative consent motion before us today, that the matter of the regulation of activities in Antarctica should be made an excepted one in schedule 2 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: I will give way in a second. You can ask whatever questions you want, and I will respond to them, if that is the appropriate protocol.

Although I appreciate that the Assembly would normally, and rightly, be reluctant to concede any diminution in its legislative competence in any area, I hope that Members will agree that it is sensible to do so in the circumstances of this very special case. Therefore, I commend the motion to the House.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Clearly, there is a great deal of interest in the motion: we have one Member who wishes to speak.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I thank the Minister for that very fulsome and clear explanation. The Committee was briefed by officials on 6 February 2013. Officials explained the need for this legislative consent motion. Following the briefing, the Committee agreed that it was content to support the legislative consent motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: We have a late entry: Mr Jim Allister.

Mr Allister: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was trying to intervene, but I am quite happy to do it this way. I support the legislative consent motion. I was going to ask the junior Minister whether he thought that Antarctica might not be as cold a house for unionists as Belfast City Hall. Antarctica, of course, being one of —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Member will resume his seat. I get the impression that the Member wants to veer off the subject. I ask him to return to Antarctica

Mr Allister: As I understand it, British Antarctica is one of 14 British overseas territories. As such, it proudly flies the Union flag. There is no restriction on the number of days on which it flies the Union flag. I was just wondering whether it would be a warmer house for unionists than Belfast City Hall. Happily, part of British Antarctica has been named Queen Elizabeth Land in honour of the jubilee. Will the Minister tell us whether the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), in all its parts, embraces and supports that?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I think that the junior Minister is now in a position to respond to the rather interesting and diverse debate.

Mr Bell: I thank the two Members who contributed to this interesting debate, particularly the Chair of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister for conveying the Committee's support for the motion.

I also thank the Committee for considering the matter within a very tight timescale and producing its report so expeditiously, given that it had no previous background on the subject matter prior to the laying of the legislative consent memorandum.

I am trying not to smile.

Although I appreciate that some might find it strange — [Interruption.] I am getting it from both angles now. Although I appreciate that some might find it strange that the Assembly is taking time to discuss the matter of Antarctica and may feel that the motion is of little consequence to the matters that the House normally involves itself in, nevertheless, a key constitutional point is at stake; namely, that the legislative competence of the Assembly should neither be restricted nor expanded without its agreement. That has been the basis of our discussions with the UK Government on this issue. At all times, we emphasised the need to ensure that the Assembly was given its proper place by bringing this legislative consent motion before it today.

I have thanked the contributors to the debate, including the Chair of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. Mr Allister asked about the flying of flags. The Finance Minister said that there are no Alliance Party penguins in Antarctica, which caused a bit of a laugh. My position is that I support the respectful and dignified flying of the Union flag, and I have said that at other times in the House. I said earlier —

Mr Weir: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Bell: Yes.

Mr Weir: Does the Minister agree that this is obviously an issue of particular interest to many unionists? Indeed, there has been a long unionist connection with Antarctica, as one of the most famous Antarctic explorers, Sir Ernest Shackleton, stood as a unionist candidate in the past. Not, I have to say, in Antarctica. Although I am sure that Members are well experienced of long driveways when they are canvassing, I think that that might be particularly lengthy.

Not only does the Union flag fly there but there is the added advantage that, during one of the seasons in Antarctica, the daylight effectively lasts the entire day. Therefore, the Union flag can be seen for long periods of time.

Mr Bell: From my own position, the longer it flies the better — from dawn to dusk. The Honourable Member has made his point.

As a loyal subject of Her Majesty the Queen, I am also delighted that a part of the Antarctic has been named in her honour.

I said earlier that we have had an interesting debate on Antarctica today, even if it is not a matter that we would have expected to have some responsibility for. I hope that all Members agree that it is a responsibility that can be surrendered without any adverse practical effect on our competence to legislate in the future. I also hope that all Members will agree that that will result in a clarification of responsibilities for the regulation of activities in such an important area of the world and, as my colleague pointed out, that some of my distinguished unionist forebears were key to exploring.

I again ask for the support of the House in passing the motion.

Mr Deputy Speaker: After that rather interesting and diverse debate, I think that we have arrived at the crucial moment when we will surrender Antarctica.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension of the Antarctic Bill to Northern Ireland including the provision making the regulation of activities in Antarctica an excepted matter.

Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next three items of business are motions from the Minister of Finance and Personnel relating to statutory rules. There will be separate debates on each. Only the motion on the Rates (Regional Rates) Order requires cross-community support.

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed

I can assure the House that none of these regulations apply to Antarctica or to any other parts other than Northern Ireland. They are, nevertheless, important issues, because they have a grave impact on services and people across Northern Ireland. The first one that I want to bring to the Assembly is the Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013.

3.45 pm

This scheme was initially introduced in 2007 for a three-year period, with the objective of encouraging and sustaining the provision of ATMs in rural areas. I believe that this policy objective remains a worthy aim in today's economic climate. The initial scheme was due to finish in March 2010. However, in November 2009, my Department undertook an evaluation of the merits of its operation. A range of research and analysis was undertaken along with consultation with key stakeholders, including the Rural Community Network, the Consumer Council and banking representatives. The view of the Finance and Personnel Committee was also sought at that time.

As a result of that evaluation, it was decided to extend the scheme for three years, a decision that ensured the scheme's existence until 31 March this year. Given the continued provision of ATMs in rural areas and a further increase in their numbers since the scheme was retained in 2010, I propose that it would be prudent to extend the exemption for a further three-year period. The legislation before the Assembly, therefore, continues the scheme until the end of the Budget period in March 2015.

I will turn briefly to what the scheme does. The exemption is provided for stand-alone ATMs that are individually valued on the valuation list, for example, those located outside petrol stations or on high streets. It does not apply to those located in banks or building societies, which tend to be valued as part of that property. As of November 2011, 55 ATMs were eligible for exemption, an increase from the 37 that were eligible when the scheme was introduced in 2007. I recognise that the increase is relatively small, but I believe that it is important to those who benefit from it.

The current cost of the scheme is around £113,000 of revenue that we forgo. I consider that to be an affordable sum, given the benefits that it can bring. There is a risk that the removal of this measure now could jeopardise the viability of machines that are currently exempt, thus having a detrimental economic impact on the communities that they serve. ATMs play a vital role in the sustainability of rural economies. Evidence shows that money withdrawn locally tends to be spent locally. Of every £10 withdrawn from a cash machine, almost two thirds is spent locally. On that basis, I consider that the current exemption for ATMs in rural areas should be extended for a further three years.

My Executive colleagues and members of the Finance and Personnel Committee have already been advised of the detail of the statutory rule. The Committee indicated that it was content for individual, separately valued ATMs in designated rural areas to continue to be exempt from rates, particularly given the modest cost of the scheme. Article 1 of the order sets out the citation, commencement and interpretation provisions. Article 2 provides for the extension of the relevant date, before which the scheme must end, to 1 April 2015.

In conclusion, I look forward to Members' comments and commend the Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 to the House

Mr D Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an méid a dúirt sé. I thank the Minister for his opening remarks.

Ag a chruinniú ar 7 Samhain 2012, d'amharc an Coiste ar chomhfhreagras ón Aire maidir le meaisíní uathoibríocha airgid saorsheasta i siopaí agus i staisiúin artola a bheas saor ó rátaí i mbardaí áirithe faoin tuath. The Committee, at its meeting on 7 November 2012, considered correspondence from the Minister on the rates exemption for stand-alone ATMs in designated rural wards.

The Committee noted that the measure, which provides full rates exemption for eligible ATMs, was introduced in 2007 as part of a package of rate relief measures that were aimed at rural areas. Initially, the scheme was to last for three years, ending on 31 March 2010, but, following an evaluation by the Department, and with the Committee's support, the decision was taken to extend the scheme for a further three years until 31 March this year. At that time, the Committee noted that banks had advised that rates exemption did not affect the decision on the provision of new ATMs but may be a consideration when deciding whether to retain existing ATMs.

The Committee noted from the Minister's correspondence in November that stakeholders that were consulted at the time of the original evaluation, including banks, rural community representatives and the Consumer Council, were all extremely supportive of retaining the exemption. The location of the ATMs receiving the exemption also showed that the most isolated rural communities were benefiting most from it.

The Committee agreed with the Minister's proposal to retain the scheme until the end of the Budget period, but it sought clarification on the number of ATMs that had been installed as a result of the scheme. As the Minister said here today, and as his correspondence confirmed, there were 37 rural ATMs at the time that the policy was introduced in 2007, and, by September 2012, there were 55. That is a growth of 18 ATMs over the period that the scheme had been in operation. The Minister was also of the view that the relief may be influencing the retention of ATMs in rural areas.

At its meeting of 28 November the Committee considered the proposal to make the order, and it had no objection to the policy proposals at that time. The formal statutory rule that is before the Assembly today was considered at the Committee's meeting on 13 February 2013, together with the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules. The Examiner raised no issues by way of technical scrutiny. The Committee agreed to recommend that the Assembly affirm the Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013. I therefore, on behalf of the Committee, support the motion. Go raibh míle maith agat. Thank you very much.

Mr Wilson: I do not think that there is a great deal for me to say, other than to thank the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for his remarks and to thank the Committee for the work that it did on the matter and for the way in which it confirmed that it believes that this is a policy worth continuing. I emphasise that 200 wards in rural areas are covered by the policy across Northern Ireland and that they tend to be the most deprived wards.

All the evidence is that, although this measure may cause only a marginal increase in the number of new ATMs coming into those areas, there have been increases, as the Deputy Chairperson pointed out. It probably is an important measure. The relief amounts to about £2,000 a machine, and it is probably a measure that ensures that those machines stay in rural areas. Of course, with the closure of a lot of bank branches, having access to cash is important. Having access to that cash locally, where people then tend to spend it in shops locally, is also important to the sustainability of the rural community. For all those reasons, I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Rates (Exemption for Automatic Telling Machines in Rural Areas) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Rates (Regional Rates) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Rates (Regional Rates) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

As Members will be aware, the Rates (Regional Rates) Order is brought forward annually and stems from the Executive's agreed Budget, which was originally brought to the Assembly back in March 2011. That Budget covers the four-year period from 2011-15. Members will also be aware that the regional rate supplements Northern Ireland's share of relevant public expenditure.

The regional rate provides additional revenue over and above the Barnett settlement, helping to fund departmental expenditure on hospitals, roads, schools and other essential public services, and investment.

To underline the significance of the rating system, over £1 billion is now collected in rates, regional and district, domestic and non-domestic. Taken together, the domestic and commercial regional rate will raise £627 million in the next rating year.

I will describe the breakdown of rate bills. The regional rate represents just over half of the typical bill, with the other half being made up of district rates, which are set independently by local councils. When the four-year Budget was agreed, the Executive pledged that the regional rate would be frozen in real terms until 2014-15 to provide certainty and stability for businesses and households to plan and manage their finances.

A real-terms freeze is adjusted for the effect of inflation. We are using the Treasury gross domestic product (GDP) deflator as an inflationary measure. That is the lowest measure of inflation that there is. In comparison with other inflation indices, it could be argued that there is a real-terms decrease in rates over the period.

The legislation that is before the House for approval today is the simple outworking of an important Budget decision that we have already made. It will fix two regional rates in the pound for 2013-14: one for households; and one for business ratepayers. The new rates in the pound represent a small increase of 2.7% in the regional rate for the 2013-14 rating year for households and businesses.

The Executive are committed to ensuring that household and commercial budgets are protected, given the continuing economic difficulties that are being faced across the board. Contrast that with the average rise of over 10% in the regional rate across the last four years of direct rule. The order therefore represents the best that we can do to balance the interests of ratepayers and the demands of public expenditure.

Some may argue that the regional rate should be reduced to alleviate the pressures of the continued economic downturn, which is affecting the domestic and non-domestic sectors. The economic pressures of the past five years have been unprecedented, but I firmly believe that the Executive have taken a sensible and measured approach. Any cut in the regional rate would mean a reduction in resources for other areas.

The regional rate increases were agreed at the start of the Budget period in line with the Executive's projected expenditure. Holding the regional rate constant in real terms also complements the commercial rating measures introduced since April 2012.

One of the measures included at that time was a levy on large retail premises, which was designed to rebalance the burden of rates on the business sector. This year's order also serves to fix the additional regional rate in the pound that is to be levied on large retail premises, which is otherwise known as the large retail levy. The large retail levy is set at an additional 15%, on average, to the large retail premises rates liability. The levy also increases in accordance with the non-domestic and domestic regional rate increases.

That levy has gone some way to funding the expansion of the small business rate relief scheme, which now assists around 24,000 small businesses in Northern Ireland. In addition, manufacturing rates continue to be held at 30%, helping around 4,500 manufacturing businesses. That is an economic support measure that is unique to Northern Ireland

Over half Northern Ireland business ratepayers now receive some form of rate relief.

4.00 pm

The Executive have gone to considerable lengths to provide that level of support, continuing to put the interests of business first by looking at ways to help firms through the downturn. In the domestic sector, decisions taken by the Executive and Assembly on domestic rates and the funding of water have ensured that the average household in Northern Ireland continues to pay the lowest charges in the United Kingdom, and by some distance. Of course, that benefits business too, because it means that households have more disposable income and, therefore, more money to spend in local businesses.

My approach, and that of my Executive colleagues, continues to be that we will not dip into the pockets of households and local businesses any more than is necessary until we have made all the savings that there are to be made in delivering efficient and effective regional government and public services.

That is enough context. These are all matters that were carefully considered and agreed when we set the Budget. Allow me to move on to the more technical matters that are covered in the draft order.

The order's main purpose is to give effect to the decisions made during the Budget process by specifying the regional rate poundages for 2013-14. Article 1 sets out the title of the order and gives the operational date as the day after it is affirmed by the Assembly. Article 2 provides that the order will apply in the 2013-14 rating year through to 31 March 2014. Article 3 specifies 33·02 pence in the pound as the commercial regional poundage and 0·3882 pence in the pound as the domestic regional rate poundage. Article 4 specifies 8·7 pence in the pound as the additional regional rate in respect of large retail hereditaments.

I look forward to hearing Members' comments, and I commend the order to the Assembly.

Mr D Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas fosta leis an Aire as an méid a dúirt sé ina chuid cainte i dtosach báire. I thank the Minister for his opening remarks.

The 2011-15 Budget, which was agreed by the previous Assembly on 7 March 2011, proposed that both domestic and non-domestic regional rate increases should be uplifted only in line with inflation. The purpose of today's rule is to set the rate of uplift for 2013-14. It also provides for the continuation of the levy on large retailers, which was introduced in April 2012 as a measure towards rebalancing the rating system by funding an extension of the small business rate relief scheme.

The policy proposals contained in the statutory rule were considered by the Committee on 28 November 2012. The Committee had no issues to raise in respect of these policy proposals at that time. The Committee formally considered the statutory rule that is before the Assembly today at its meeting on 13 February 2013, together with the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules, which had no points to raise by way of technical scrutiny of the rule.

D'aontaigh an coiste an rún seo a mholadh don tionól. The Committee agreed to recommend that the Rates (Regional Rates) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed by the Assembly. I, therefore, support the motion on behalf of the Committee.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Deputy Chairman for his contribution. I also thank him for always giving me warning of when I should start looking for my notes for closing the debate. He goes into this flourish of Irish which I do not understand a word of, but I know that it is a signal of, "You will be on your feet in about 30 seconds, so find your notes so that you can conclude the debate."

The fact that there has been very little contribution is probably an indication of one of two things. Either Members are fed up listening to me and just want to get me to sit down quickly, or Members are reasonably content that the decisions on rates that we have made in the Budget are, as I have said, a measured and balanced approach to the whole issue of rates. We have to raise money for the public services that people in Northern Ireland rightly demand. On the other hand, we should not be taxing people to a level that impacts on their living standards, especially when we are in the middle of an economic recession.

The Assembly and the Executive have got the balance right. We have to maintain the additional money that rates give us for all of the vital things that we deliver, and, at the same time, we should not go down the draconian route that we had under direct rule, when people were getting hit with 10% increases every year. Of course, that was during better economic times, when you could have argued that the Assembly had more money because more money was coming from the Exchequer at Westminster.

We have had to design our expenditure policies to facilitate the kind of restraint that we have shown on rates. That has benefited households and businesses. Sometimes, the Assembly is not given credit for the decisions that we make in this area. Other authorities across the United Kingdom, when it comes to the difficult decisions that have to be made on expenditure, immediately turn to ratepayers and think that they will bail them out and make money available to them. We have not done that, and that should be recognised as one of the very significant contributions that we have made to household budgets at this time of recession. For that reason, I have pleasure in recommending this order to the Assembly for its affirmation.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Rates (Regional Rates) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed

Rates (Temporary Rebate) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Wilson: I beg to move

That the Rates (Temporary Rebate) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Before dealing with the statutory rule, I will set out some background to the measure. The purpose of the legislation is to extend the empty shops rates concession, which I implemented in April last year. That concession was introduced as an amendment to the Rates (Amendment) Bill (Northern Ireland) 2012, which was scrutinised by Members during debates in February last year. At that time, I was introducing a package of measures aimed at rebalancing the rating system, assisting ailing businesses and improving the appearance of our towns and city centres.

The empty shops rates concession provides a one-year concession, which effectively allows 50% empty-property relief to continue for one year when a qualifying property, which has been empty for at least one year, becomes occupied again. The current legislative provision under article 31D of the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, as inserted by the Rates (Amendment) Act (Northern Ireland) 2012, permits applications for that concession until 31 March 2013.

The window for applications closes soon, and, following some early analysis of the success of the scheme, I have made the decision to extend the application period for another two years, taking us to the end of the Budget period.

To date, over 90 businesses have been successful in their applications for the scheme. There have been over 150 applications, most of which have been dealt with by Land and Property Services (LPS). Members often criticise LPS for its slowness in assessing some of these things, but given the amount of work that is required to do these assessments, I think that it is commendable that it has done nearly 150 assessments. Some 93 businesses, I think, have now benefited as a result. Of course, that means more employment and more footfall in town centres.

Unfortunately, there remains a need to provide whatever assistance we can to counteract the many shop closures and the effect that that has on the vitality of our towns and cities. I have seen the effects of the prolonged period of downturn in my constituency and in other towns and cities that I visit as part of my ministerial role. The extension of this concession will allow LPS to continue to receive applications for the scheme until the end of March 2015.

I have to say that the scheme has been a good one so far and has led to 92 businesses opening and getting up and running across Northern Ireland. I have visited a range of businesses that have benefited from the scheme, including a fish market in Enniskillen, a children's shop in Larne, a gift shop in Londonderry, a retro scooter shop in Carrickfergus and a restaurant in Belfast. Tomorrow — maybe it is Thursday — I am going to a shop on the Donegall Road that has opened as a result of the scheme. Of course, all of that creates new jobs for local people.

It may not be a big-bang policy in terms of its impact, but as is the case with many of the policies that the Assembly introduces, it is one more small piece in helping to revitalise our economy. That is important. Sometimes, people look for schemes that suddenly hit the headlines and bring about thousands of jobs. It is very often the little initiatives that Ministers, the Executive and officials come up with that lead to improvements. I think that this is one of those policies. It will help to add to the revitalisation of town centres and arterial routes.

It is also a sensible measure in terms of cost. The Executive would not have been getting any more money in from these units through rates if they had continued to be empty anyway. So, this is effectively a cost-neutral policy. Indeed, looking longer term, these businesses will end up paying full rates after the difficult first year of trading is over, so it may prove to earn us money in the long run.

It is a unique "made in Northern Ireland" policy, and I promised the Assembly that I would review it in-year. My Department has undertaken that work. My officials have found no instances of it being misused. In other words, there is no evidence of displacement, and I think that it is entirely sensible to continue with it in order to help to reduce the number of empty shops on our high streets.

Such has been the success of our scheme that Scotland has already announced that it is replicating our policy from April of next year. As Members may be aware, shortly after I announced the policy last year, it featured in the final recommendations of the Mary Portas report on high streets. The Welsh are now considering following suit. So, we have led the way, and it has been one of those innovative policies that, happily, is being copied elsewhere.

I turn now to the statutory rule itself. My Executive colleagues and members of the Finance and Personnel Committee have been advised on its detail. The Committee indicated that it was content for the empty shops rates concession to continue until 31 March 2015. Article 1 of the order sets out the citation and commencement. Article 2 provides for the amendment of Article 31D of the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, substituting the new end date of 31 March 2015. In conclusion, I look forward to Members' comments, and I commend the Rates (Temporary Rebate) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 to the House.

4.15 pm

Mr D Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an méid a dúirt sé ina chuid cainte i dtosach báire. I thank the Minister for his opening remarks.

Cuireadh an Coiste Airgeadais agus Pearsanra ar an eolas faoin mholadh le caoga faoin gcéad d'ísliú rátaí a chur ar fáil do dhaoine atá ag glacadh seilbhe ar shiopaí folmha nuair a thug an tAire eolas dóibh ar 11 Eanáir 2012. The Minister has more than 70 seconds to go.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel was first advised of the proposal to provide 50% relief for one year to the new occupier of an empty shop during a ministerial briefing on 11 January 2012. This was an amendment to the Rates (Amendment) Bill, the other provisions of which the Committee had already considered in some detail and reported on to the Assembly. Members heard that, to qualify, a shop needed to be empty for at least a year and that new businesses would not be limited to the retail sector. It was proposed that the measure, intended to bring empty shops back into use and rejuvenate town centres, would last only for the 2012-13 rating year.

In response to members' questions, the Minister advised that the scheme was not funded but that some revenue would be forgone in the first year of occupancy. In the longer term, it could of course be beneficial because of the rates that would be collected from a more established business. The draft amendment was subsequently considered by the Committee at its meeting on 18 January 2012, and the Chairperson confirmed the Committee's support for the measure in his speech to the Assembly on 24 January 2012.

On 24 October 2012, the Committee received a briefing from a senior Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) official on a range of rating issues, which included the empty shops rates concession. Members heard that, at that point, 32 businesses had made successful applications to the relief, although subsequent correspondence confirmed that the number had risen to 42 by the end of October. It was estimated that the rates forgone totalled £80,000. However, DFP did not think that the businesses would have set up without the rates concession

During the evidence session, the Committee also heard that the Scottish Government had announced a similar scheme for 2013, and the Welsh Assembly Government were considering the introduction of a similar scheme. The DFP official advised that the Minister was considering extending the scheme for the remainder of this Budget period and explained the steps being taken to promote and raise awareness of it.

Following the evidence session, the Committee agreed to support the extension of the empty properties rates concession. The Committee subsequently considered the proposal for the rule before us today at its meeting on 28 November 2012 and agreed that it had no objection to the policy proposals. The rule was formally considered at the Committee's meeting on 13 February 2013, and it was noted that the Examiner of Statutory Rules had no issues to raise by way of technical scrutiny.

D'aontaigh an Coiste an rún seo a mholadh don Tionól. The Committee agreed to recommend that the Rates (Temporary Rebate) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed by the Assembly, so, on behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for the verbal wink or nod that he was ready for me to wind on the debate. I thank him for the comments that he made on behalf of the Committee and, once again, for the Committee's work on the issue.

I do not want to add a great deal to what I said in my opening speech. The Deputy Chairman referred to the number of businesses that have benefited and the approximate cost. He said that, by October, 42 businesses had applied and been successful. Between October and now, that figure has gone up by 50, so we now have 92. I think that shows that, as the scheme becomes better known, more people are applying for it. Of course, assessments have to be done.

Although he talked about revenue forgone, I like to think that we will not lose any money from this. If the property remains empty, we get 50% of the rates anyway, and we get only 50%. If we allow the property to be occupied for a year, still at 50%, we are getting only what we would have got anyhow had the property remained empty. Had full rates been applied to the 92 properties that have been forgone, revenue would have been £225,000. However, as I said, had the shop remained empty, we would not have been getting that revenue anyhow. If the shops remain occupied for a further year, we will have recouped all that money, because we get the 100% rates in the second year, and anything after the second year is additional revenue.

So, I see this as a way of pump-priming the local economy, getting businesses in and eventually, of course, having them pay their full contribution in rates. There would also be all the other attendant benefits, such as additional employment, additional activity, the improvement of town centres and arterial routes as a result of that business activity and, of course, the benefit that there will be to local people having another new business open in their areas. So, there are many benefits to this, and I do not think that we should look at this as a policy through which the Executive are handing out money. This is simply a policy where, for one year, we accept that we will get only 50% of the rates, which is all that we would have got anyway had the business not opened. After that, there is a net benefit to the public purse as a result of the rates that come in.

As I said and as the Deputy Chairman alluded to, this is a policy where we in Northern Ireland led the way. It is having benefits right across, and there is not a constituency that is represented here where the benefit has not been felt. I know that the Deputy Chairperson's constituency includes more than just Newry and Mourne, but 10 businesses in that area have benefited from this. As I said, all constituencies seem to have benefited, some to a greater extent than others. I commend the order to the Assembly, and I trust that it will receive Assembly assent today.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Rates (Temporary Rebate) (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Committee Business

Sport: Grass-root and Elite Sports Facilities

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Miss M McIlveen (The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure): I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the target in the Sport Matters strategy to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities by 2014 that will support player and athlete development in Olympic and Paralympic sports; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to consider prioritising funding towards grassroot sports and elite facilities from within her existing budget, to ensure that our sportspeople competing in future Olympic and Commonwealth Games are not disadvantaged as a result of lack of investment.

I will begin by providing some context and background to the reasons behind the Committee tabling the motion. Mr Deputy Speaker, as you will be aware, the Committee and, indeed, the Assembly are on record as recognising the dedication, commitment and success of all our sportspeople following their superb achievements at the London 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games. However, the Committee felt that, although it is important to acknowledge those achievements, it is more important to ensure that there is a genuine lasting legacy for all our sportspeople following the games.

To that end, the Committee agreed in September 2012 to conduct a focused review to explore the issues and challenges facing our sportspeople to get a better understanding of what they need to build on their successes at international competitions and to increase participation in their respective sports. That is why the Committee then wrote to the governing bodies of competitive sports to get their assessment of the legacy of the 2012 games, the challenges facing their sport and measures that could be taken to address them, and the relationship between grass-roots and elite sports.

As a part of the review, the Committee also invited the governing bodies to attend a stakeholder event on 22 September last year, at which those issues were discussed in much greater depth. Some 22 sports governing bodies were represented at that event. Sports that participated in the review included athletics, badminton, tennis, swimming, martial arts, motorsport, cycling, and waterand equestrian-based sports. The review did not include the so-called big-three sports — football, GAA and rugby — which have seen, and will see, significant capital investment in this comprehensive spending review (CSR) period. The Committee wanted to focus its attention on the needs of other sports to see how they might capitalise on the successes and maximise the benefits of the London games ahead of the Rio Olympics in 2016 and, more immediately, the Glasgow Commonwealth Games in 2014.

The Committee is aware of the Minister's commitment to sport, as outlined in her Sport Matters strategy. Indeed, there are no less than 25 targets in the strategy, aspiring to create a culture of lifelong enjoyment and success in sport.

At its inception in 2009, the strategy noted that, in the provision of sporting facilities, Northern Ireland is underprovided for compared with other regions in the United Kingdom and Europe. Therefore, it is good to note that in the recently published 'Sport Matters Implementation Group Progress Report' for October 2011 to September 2012 — indeed, it was published only in the past two weeks — the target to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities that will support Northern Ireland player and athlete development in Olympic and Paralympic sports by 2014 is reported as having been achieved.

Despite that, many governing bodies reported common challenges during the Committee's review that suggest that the issues facing sport organisations may have a negative impact on the development of our players and athletes and on the future growth and success of their sport. It is perhaps not surprising that one of the main challenges that many of the sports faced was that they had limited or no access to funding. The impacts of that varied across the different sports. Many of the governing bodies reported that current sport facilities were inadequate and did not provide a proper environment for competitive training. Some reported the need for an elite training facility or centre of excellence so that high-end performers can train and practise in first-class conditions. Other sports found their players having to travel outside Northern Ireland to train for international competitions. Furthermore, with little or no funding available for participation in international competitions, some sports have to make a choice about attending events or selecting a team based on players' ability to afford travel costs as opposed to their ability to compete. The Committee was concerned about the impact that that practice would have on those sports in the longer term.

Another consequence of the lack of adequate facilities is that some sports are unable to attract events to Northern Ireland. Given the anticipated benefits to Northern Ireland of Belfast hosting the World Police and Fire Games in August — not least the arrival of 25,000 visitors — I am sure that Members agree that we should take every opportunity to attract sporting events and that the condition of our current facilities should not be an obstacle to achieving that.

The Committee is mindful of the pressures on the Minister's budget and acknowledges the difficult job that she has in balancing investment with tangible benefits. However, the Committee calls on her to ensure that the smaller sports are not overlooked for investment. Although their spectator and participation numbers may be lower than those of the big-three sports, without any investment those other sports will never have the opportunity to grow and develop.

The Committee heard that, for some sports, an investment of around £10,000 would make an enormous difference to participation across the board. Other sports, however, were in need of a much larger capital investment. We heard, for example, that athletics, cycling and tennis all need an indoor sports facility. Other sports, such as hockey, highlighted the need for a specific type of surface for their pitches.

4.30 pm

As Members will be aware, one of my constituents, Martyn Irvine, won silver and gold medals at the world track cycling championships in Minsk last week, and that was raised in the Assembly this morning. In the past few days, the spotlight has been put on the amount of funding that has been invested in cycling in Northern Ireland and the need for an indoor facility. Martyn Irvine and Wendy Houvenaghel have had tremendous success without that local investment, but what more could be achieved with it?

The Committee recognises that local councils also have a role to play in the provision of those facilities. However, that, in itself, comes with some unique challenges, given the financial constraints that many councils face. The Committee heard that surfaces were not maintained to the standard required, and swimming reported that there was limited access to the facilities and that that often clashed with public opening times.

Another challenge facing sports was the relationship with funding for grass-root and elite sports. Many report that, where funding was available, it was directed at high-performance and elite sportspeople. However, there were concerns that more investment was needed at grass-roots level to ensure a long-term legacy from the 2012 Olympic Games. There was recognition that elite performers rise from grass-roots level and, therefore, it was essential to invest at that level to ensure that elite sportspeople emerge.

Governing bodies also recognise the commitment and dedication of their volunteers. However, many found that, to properly grow, full-time development officers were needed. The Committee also heard that improvements are needed to our coaching and mentoring systems to enable sports to develop top-quality coaches capable of getting the best performance from our sportspeople.

Lack of visibility of smaller sports was also identified as a challenge. That was attributed to the absence of those sports in the school curriculum, lack of competitions held here and low profile in the media. Lack of visibility also had an impact on sports failing to attract private sponsors, therefore creating a reliance on public funding.

Over the past year, the Minister has demonstrated her commitment to sport through an additional investment of £1·5 million each to the IFA, the GAA and the IRFU over the next three years to tackle poverty and social exclusion in those sports. The Minister has also made available £3·27 million for boxing. However, the Committee calls on the Minister to assess how her Department can assist other sports to address the challenges that they face. Given the current economic climate, the Committee appreciates that there is not a bottomless pot of money. However, if those sports do not receive additional investment, any legacy from the Olympic and Paralympic Games will not be realised, as our grass-roots players will not develop and our elite sportspeople will not compete on an even keel against their competitors.

The Committee urges the Minister to talk with those sports to gain a fuller understanding of their needs and to identify areas for investment. Today's economic climate means that we all need to think outside the box. Therefore, that investment may come in the form of a shared sports facility or access to schools, colleges and university facilities. Therefore, the Committee also urges the Minister to talk with her ministerial colleagues in the Department of Education, the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to secure access. For those sports where a one-size-fitsall approach will not fit, the Committee urges the Minister to provide investment, particularly at times when she finds herself in a position to reallocate funds from within her existing budget. It is only through investment to improve facilities that we will deliver high-performance players and athletes and make our mark on the world's sports stage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Miss M McIlveen: In conclusion, Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank all those Members who will contribute to today's debate and encourage them to support the motion. I commend the motion to the House.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún seo inniu. There is no doubt that the success of some of our local athletes at the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics has given a boost to local sport. Níl dabht ar bith ann gur tugadh spreagadh do spórt áitiúil mar gheall ar rath ár lúthchleasaithe áitiúla i gcluichí Oilimpeacha agus Parailimpeacha, 2012. Success begets success, and that is surely one of the reasons why we have such an upsurge in interest in sports such as boxing, to name but one, but I am sure that it is the same for other sports that have produced champions.

Those achievements will have inspired many former sporting fans to get back into a sport from which they may have lapsed or to become involved in a new sport or even just to reconnect with some physical activity. The fact is that the recent successes have been good for us locally, as they have encouraged and inspired us. Over the past few days, we have seen even more success for Irish athletes as they continue to take more titles and medals at all levels. Martyn Irvine, Katie Taylor and the women's rugby team spring to mind immediately.

As a result of this new focus on local sport, many more of us are looking to see how we can participate and what facilities are available to allow us to do that. De thoradh an fhócais nua seo ar spórt áitiúil tá níos mó againn ag iarraidh a fháil amach cad é mar is féidir linn páirt a ghlacadh i spórt agus cad iad na háiseanna atá ar fáil leis sin a dhéanamh. On the back of the 2012 success, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure undertook a survey to establish the conditions for local sports to find out what issues they were facing. A stakeholder event was held in November 2012, and although there were specific issues for individual sports, there were common themes affecting them all, such as the need to further develop and grow their sport at grass-roots and elite sports levels. So, clearly, there is a need to provide support to all sports. Although it is the high-profile sports, such as Gaelic games, soccer and rugby that we hear of most often, we cannot forget or neglect the others.

The health and well-being benefits of participating in sport and physical activity are so well documented as to be an absolute no-brainer by now. Physical activity improves our life chances, increases our enjoyment of life, makes us look and feel better in mind and body and generally makes it more likely that we will make positive choices in other aspects of our lives. So, how many of us are actually becoming more active? Mar sin de, cá mhéad againn atá ag éirí níos gníomhaí? Evidence from recent surveys shows that while there are still groups in society that participate less than average, overall, there has been a rise in sport participation. However, there is still the gender differentiation, whereby 34% of males record 2.5 active hours weekly, which is almost double that of females. Team sport has declined, although there has been an increase in individual physical activity.

As the motion that we are addressing today states, one of the targets in the Sport Matters strategy is to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities by 2014 that will support player and athlete development in Olympic and Paralympic sports. The most recent progress report coming from the Sport Matters implementation group tells us that that target has been achieved, which is great news. I have also heard that a new programme will be launched over the next year, which will seek to build on those achievements, as there is still more to be done. It is good to hear that.

We also welcome the fact that, over the next few years, we will have three top-class sporting stadia in Belfast to cater for the needs of the three main sports. Those facilities will also serve other needs and will not just be limited to sport. Cuirimid fáilte roimh an scéala go mbeidh trí staidiamaí den scoth againn sna cúpla bliain atá amach romhainn a bheas ar fáil do na trí spórt mhóra. We also need to be aware that, despite that, there is still a shortfall overall in the provision of sporting facilities. Over one third of the population here live more than 20 miles from a recognised high-quality facility, so there is still more to be done. Tá níos mó le déanamh go fóill.

Therefore, although we celebrate the three big sports, we need to encourage participation in all sports. People should be free to choose whichever sport they wish to take part in, and, as far as possible, we should seek to provide the facilities to do that.

We call on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to continue the great work that she has been doing in supporting our local sports and athletes. We wish to see continuous support and encouragement from other Departments and local councils in investing in facilities for sport, to allow us to look ahead to future competitions to ensure that Irish athletes are able to compete on a level playing pitch with others throughout the world. Tacaím leis an rún. I support the motion.

Mr Kinahan: I am extremely pleased to speak on this motion, although I am not a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure. It may not look like it, but I was, and am, a very keen sportsman, although I challenge anyone to be a better armchair sportsman than me now, as that is all that I am left with. As is usual with these debates, the main points have been covered, therefore, I will go into slightly different matters, which, I think, relate. The motion calls on the Minister to consider:

"prioritising funding towards grass-root sports and elite facilities from within her existing budget".

In line with the motion, we must do so in a way that our sports people are not disadvantaged in the future.

Sport Matters: the Northern Ireland strategy for sport and physical recreation, 2009-19, sets out the investment and increased investment in sport. However, the strategy also states that it is to be:

"in areas such as education, health, the economy and the development of communities". That is the area I want to explore. I am sure the Minister will clarify in her answers to others on how successful the spend so far has been. I fully support that angle of the motion but I want to concentrate on that old chestnut of joined-up government. We all call for it but very rarely do we see anything happening. Yet here we have a Department with a small budget, which makes joined-up government even more important. Money is probably wasted by duplication of resources or inefficiencies — not so much in this Department but in other Departments.

If, for example, you look at education and think of the schools, sports fields, the PE and everything that goes on with the health of our children, a lot of money is being spent there that could, maybe, be spent in just a slightly different way to help us in what we are talking about. We also want to see those facilities opened up to all out of hours. The Department for Employment and Learning has the same issue with universities, colleges and skills and training facilities. We need to see those opened up to everybody else.

There is the Department of Health and its policies, and we have already heard about the push for walking and exercise. There is also the Northern Ireland physical activity strategy. The Department for Social Development is spending money on parks, playparks and community groups. Again, I am sure there is a certain amount of overlap there.

It amused me when I was thinking of other Departments and their spends. Of course, our Minister at the Department for Regional Development is encouraging everyone to undertake active travel and bicycle, walk or even run to work. It may take me a while from Templepatrick. However, if we think of Martyn Irvine, maybe we should all be racing here on our bicycles. It is really a matter of using every facility that is here in front of us.

We know that the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister has £118 million, which has yet to be spent. There is a lot of money in all Departments and maybe we could be making better use of that. I ask the Minister to push for a spearheading from her Department or one that works from OFMDFM.

One matter that always seems to be let out is not so much about getting fit but is absolutely key to incentivising people to do better, and it is the need to have our own sports museum so that we can look at the great successes of people such as Mary Peters or, more recently, Martyn Irvine. A sports museum would lift everybody and mark how successful we have been in the Olympics and many other events.

If we look at the Belfast Agreement, we will see the need for consensus. I would hope that we can see all Departments working together to use that consensus to make sure that we do find a way forward so that we are not duplicating the money that we are spending.

I also want to touch on all the rules, whether security or health and safety rules, or insurance. All those matters stop people from being able to take part in sports or make the most of the facilities around them. I ask the Minister certainly to look into the issue of insurance. Once, when trying to get permission to borrow a little bit of land in Parkgate to put up one set of football posts, we were stymied by the insurance.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is coming to a close.

Mr Kinahan: That is the absolute basics to it all. So, I very much support the motion and I hope that we achieve what it intends.

Mrs McKevitt: I support the motion, which calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to prioritise funding and ensure that the Sport Matters strategy target to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities available by 2014 is achieved. That target, better known as the PL23, is just one of 26 targets set out in the strategy for sport and physical recreation, 2009-19. However, it is a key target, because without facilities little else can be achieved.

4.45 pm

The themed strategy, which focuses on participation, performance and places, is a detailed document that not only focuses on the cost of providing facilities but gives an oversight to the benefits of getting involved in sport and physical activity. The consultation for the strategy had a huge response from the sports organisations and welfare and medical groups, all of which articulated the health benefits and savings to running our Health Department.

In today's world, people are less active than in the past, and spend more time watching television or playing on computers. Our society appears to discourage active lifestyles, such as walking to school or the shops, and a decreasing amount of children's time in school is spent being active. When you do not have the facilities, particularly in rural areas, it is very hard. Therefore, I was pleased to learn today that my local area is to benefit from a new facility in Ballyholland, with an investment of more than £800,000 by the Southern Organisation for Action in Rural areas (SOAR), Newry and Mourne District Council and the community. Investments like that open up doors and dreams for everyone.

Sport adds to a wide range of social, economic and cultural needs. It improves our health and well-being and gives us opportunities in a fast moving world to come together, celebrate and enjoy shared experiences. I should say that, since the new year, I have taken to the treadmill myself. Although, as you might observe, I am not completely match fit yet, I do feel a tremendous benefit. The experience has shown me that physical activity is good for everyone, but, more importantly, should be available for everyone.

As I argued in the spring Supplementary Estimates debate, and will continue to argue, the Department is worthy of a bigger share of our overall Budget. We must work with what we have got at the moment; hence the need for the Minister to prioritise funding towards grass-roots sports and elite facilities. We have seen great achievements from our elite athletes, at the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games, on golf courses around the world, on sports fields, on ice and on the sea. The World Police and Fire Games will give us another opportunity to showcase our ability to stage major sporting events. However, our legacy must be built on those successes and support athletes' development in Olympic and Paralympic sports. The £81 million capital funding shortfall identified by Sport NI must be addressed. The momentum built from recent successes should not be lost.

Ms Lo: I support the motion, but would like to express my disappointment at the Alliance Party amendment not having been selected. I recall the debate, in November last year, on the legacy of the Olympic and Paralympic Games. It was said then, and I say again now, that we must ensure that there is a genuine lasting legacy from the 2012 Olympics and that the opportunities for all people in sport and physical recreation become more widely available. I had hoped to see the motion further extended to include an emphasis on shared facilities. The Sport Matters strategy has a target of creating or upgrading 10 facilities by 2014, as the Committee Chair mentioned earlier. I ask the Minister to ensure that any new facilities are delivered on a shared basis. Our draft amendment called on the Minister to conduct an audit of sports facilities to identify ways of increasing sharing across the whole community. I urge the Minister to consider doing that. We need to know what facilities in what areas are being underused and how best to share facilities for everyone. I wholeheartedly agree that our sportspeople should not be disadvantaged by lack of investment, but nor should lack of access be an obstacle. We often talk about a shared future. Unfortunately, those discussions are frequently academic and lack a degree of practicality. We know that physical exercise has health benefits. Like the Member who has just spoken, I have taken up physical exercise; I took up swimming, recently. It has benefited me greatly and has helped my recurring neck problem. Sport also has the power to break down barriers in society and to bring people together. It is a practical tool for fostering good community relations, and that must never be underestimated.

After the sporting successes last summer, when our athletes brought us enormous pride, many commented that participation in sport would increase. I was interested, but not surprised, to read the Scottish study that said that that effect would be achieved only if there was a high level of community engagement in legacy planning.

Given the wider health and social benefits of physical exercise, particularly with regard to obesity-related illnesses, I am interested to know how much discussion the Minister has had with the Health Minister on joint investment for grass-roots sport. Of course, the responsibility does not lie only with DCAL and DHSSPS; district councils are also significant investors, as previously mentioned.

The Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure's inquiry into participation in sport highlighted the role that local councils have in developing grass-roots sports, particularly with regard to facilities. Given the unmet demand in sports halls across council areas, upgrading venues, so that a variety of sports teams can utilise them, is not only economically sound, but has the added benefit of ensuring that they are available to more people.

Before I close, I add a note of thanks to those who have worked so hard to build community relations through sport. Two weeks ago, the Crusaders/Cliftonville match was postponed amidst an unnotified protest. That disruption was unacceptable. I am aware that measures had been taken to make the sporting event a safe, inclusive and successful football match, and plans included a cross-community walk to the football ground. Sadly, given the events that followed, that work was overshadowed. We should all do better to find ways of expressing our gratitude and support —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring her remarks to a close?

Ms Lo: — to those who endeavour to use sport as a means of bridging divides. I take this opportunity to thank them.

Mr Hilditch: I rise in support of this afternoon's motion. Given my background in sport and some of the work that I have undertaken, I believe that the motion is well balanced in that it allows for the upgrade and refurbishment of existing facilities, together with the desire to provide much sought after new complexes. I acknowledge the Minister's dilemma, with one of the smallest departmental budgets set against the target, and the sizeable task ahead.

The debating of the motion today is timely, because, as anyone who follows the sports media will have seen, a large number of sports awards ceremonies have taken place across the Province within the past month. In recent days, I have noted some in Fermanagh, right through to my constituency of East Antrim. I mention that to, again, pay tribute to the many people who have contributed to sport and keeping clubs going through some of the toughest times in our country. Sometimes, they do it with the poorest of facilities and, sometimes, with nothing.

Our elite sportsmen and sportswomen deservedly take the limelight, but, down the pyramid to grass-roots level, there are not only the athletes, but the administrators, coaches and volunteers who give of their time freely and, in some cases, provide finance to ensure that their sport or club survives. Those people play a massive role in bringing people together through sport. Generation after generation, they did so when others were intent on driving communities apart. What better reward for those unsung heroes than, perhaps, to see the beginnings of a proper investment strategy that is aimed at developing facilities. Of course, I am aware that some sections of certain sports have benefited from previous opportunities on funding, but, as I have alluded to in the House before, we are in danger of creating the haves and the have-nots of sport. That is why a way forward must be balanced and reach as many people as possible in our communities.

An example of the position that some clubs and sports groups find themselves in was evidenced to me on Saturday past, when I was at one of our designated stadiums. It was a bitterly cold winter's afternoon, but the hot water system collapsed for the umpteenth time. It involved the boiler, pumps, valves, showers and radiators.

That club, which has just laid a new pitch at its own expense to improve its facilities, must try to find additional cash to replace a water system that has been repaired many times before: a sticking-plaster job. Does it do another sticking-plaster job on top of one that has been done before, or does it invest in a new system in a building that will, probably, become uninhabitable or even condemned shortly? That closure would affect the entire community because the club is heavily involved in work to tackle social deprivation in the area. That is why there must be a robust assessment of need as part of the strategy.

Finally, I commend the research documents that were compiled for the debate. It is especially interesting to look at examples of work in other places. In particular, I would like to draw the Minister's attention to the Scottish model. I ask her to consider that model, which created a series of community sports hubs as the country moves towards hosting the Commonwealth Games in 2014. I believe that that flexible model would be best suited to a small country like ours. It would be very much community based, with shared facilities, and would reach out to elite and grass-roots sports alike. That model would lend itself particularly well to partnership working as well as bringing perhaps two, three or four sports together in one facility. It would open up better use of facilities that are owned or managed largely by clubs themselves, schools or local councils and provide up-to-date, high-standard changing accommodation, training areas, club rooms, etc. Integrated and programme-led facilities would bring much buy-in from every sector.

I support the motion and look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Beidh mé breá sásta labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin. I am very pleased to speak in favour of the motion.

Like others, I have a long association with sports clubs, particularly in an administrative rather than active role of late. First and foremost, I pay tribute to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, who, with the smallest departmental budget, has shown absolute and unfaltering support and assistance to all sports and their development. That has been evident and recognised in the debate

When the draft motion came to the Committee, there was, I think, reference to "elite sports" and "minority sports". I am not keen on either of those two terms because I do not think they are fair. The terminology should perhaps be "mainstream sports" and "grass-roots sports" or, indeed, "other sports". As we know, mainstream sports account for some 93% of all spectator sports in this area. They are often referred to as the "big three". However, the reality on the ground is that the big three are made up of many clubs that, day and daily, struggle to survive after they have paid all of their outgoings.

Back in November, there was a discussion about the legacy of the Olympic Games. It is certainly welcome that the new 50-metre pool is to open in Bangor next month. I understand that the Committee will visit it just a few days before it opens. I very much look forward to that visit. The pool is part of the physical infrastructure and legacy of the games. More importantly, perhaps, is the Minister's recent announcement of boxing funding of £3·2 million. Again, I congratulate her for coming forward with that. I know that it has made a great difference to a number of small boxing clubs. I speak from experience. One of my local boxing clubs has been able to produce some of the best and greatest champions that this part of world has produced, including Eamonn O'Kane, who captained the Commonwealth team in Delhi in 2010.

The Minister has also been very much to the fore in recognising some of the minor sports, such as kick-boxing. That, too, is to be welcomed. Our consultation in November certainly threw up some interesting statistics in respect of the problems that clubs might have, such as funding and the provision of development officers, training facilities and equipment. I think of a local archery club near me. To kit yourself out with a bow and all the rest of it costs somewhere in the region of £2,000, a not inconsiderable sum in the current climate.

5.00 pm

Travel and insurance are also major costs for a lot of smaller clubs. There are issues of regulation and legislation. As the Chair said, there is a lack of visibility and sponsorship. Ms Lo said — and this may be critical to any new delivery of sport facilities — that all sport facilities should now be multi-sports facilities. That should be taken into account at design stage. That has been done very much in the development of the new Casement, Windsor and Ravenhill stadia. There must be total buy-in at local government level to provide that. There has not been in the past. We should certainly encourage it, and I hope that the Minister will do so.

The Sport Matters strategy 2009-2019 contains very interesting statistics on the various statuses of the targets: six have already been achieved, 16 are on track for achievement, and four are on track with some delay. None is at risk. I welcome that very much.

I call on the Minister to continue her sterling work to date. Tacaím leis an rún.

Mr Humphrey: I support the motion. Those of us who have an interest in sport will realise and accept that sport has united the people of Northern Ireland during the worst of the Troubles. Other Members have made mention of the 22 sports representatives who came to the stakeholder event in November. During that event, I spoke to a number of people from minority sports who had mixed views on whether the legacy from the Olympics and Paralympics last year in London would have a benefit for their sport in Northern Ireland. The sports that were represented at the games felt that there would be a positive. However, for sport in general, the Olympics and Paralympics — those great events that lifted this nation — will be of significant benefit to all sport, not just the sports that took part in

One example is when England successfully won the Ashes a number of years ago and took them from Australia before retaining them. Andrew Flintoff England cricket shirts outsold David Beckham's England shirts in sports shops across the United Kingdom. That was an example of a minority sport eclipsing a majority sport, and probably the nation's national sport. The people who were here from the minority sports felt that a lack of finance, funding and investment was a serious issue. One of them commented to me that small and moderate amounts of money can actually make a difference to sports. One example is a sport in which I have an involvement: cricket.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member and I share a common issue in relation to cricket clubs, particularly with the Member's club of Woodvale Cricket Club. In my constituency, North Down Cricket Club has a particular issue with fencing around its facility. The Minister has been made aware of that. A very small amount of money could make a huge difference for the sustainability of both those clubs, which reside in residential areas. Like the Member, I hope for a positive response from the Minister on those issues.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Humphrey: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I agree entirely. I declare an interest as a member of Woodvale Cricket Club. An investment to provide nets, which would prevent the ball visiting gardens and back windows of houses close by, would be of great advantage.

Another example of a minority sport that would benefit from some investment from regional government and local councils is, of course, boxing. I have met representatives from Albert Foundry, Cairn Lodge and Midland boxing clubs in my constituency. I know that Belfast City Council — I declare an interest as a member of Belfast City Council — will have a boxing strategy. I know that the Minister has a boxing strategy. It is absolutely important, if not vital, that those strategies coalesce to ensure that there is no wastage and maximise the benefit to those sports.

We must be fair, though, to government, in terms of both direct rule Ministers and regional Administrations at Stormont. Very clearly, for a long time in this country, money had to be put into providing security and defending our streets from anarchy. Money could not go into sport facilities. We need to bear that in mind. Many sporting bodies really want to see a joined-up approach, and I think that the Assembly needs to work closely with them on that. I believe that, by working with schools, universities, education and library boards, councils and private clubs, we can deliver that joined-up approach.

I want to use the example of Windsor Park, the national stadium for the Northern Ireland football team. Investment there means that there will be a new stadium and a home for the Irish Football Association (IFA), Linfield Football Club and the IFA's museum. If there was to be a joining up and meshing of Belfast City Council's facilities in the area there would be a new leisure centre, swimming pool, 3G pitches and, of course, that would also bring in Boucher Road Playing Fields. Apart from those facilities it would also open a type of Wembley Way — or Windsor Way — on Boucher Road. There would also be a centre of excellence for football with shared costs for the council and government.

Budgetary constraints in the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure (DCAL), a small Department with a relatively modest budget, mean that a joined-up approach to our provision of sports facilities is vital. The national Government, local councils, education and library boards, universities, private clubs and funders like the National Lottery all need to work together. If we are to maximise facilities, increase participation and recognition for sports, and improve the health of our young people and the wider community, it is absolutely essential that we produce elite athletes as well as well-meaning participants in activities. A collaborative approach, and only a collaborative approach, will enable us to get to the point where we can deliver Realistically, we will only have the 10 proposed elite facilities we are looking for across the sports in Northern Ireland if we have a joined-up approach, with local councils working with national and regional government. If there is to be a governmental shake-up, DCAL may no longer exist. It cannot be expected to provide the funding for this. We have to be realistic with our approach to the provision of sporting facilities as we move forward.

For too long, the facilities for our spectators, even of the big three that people talk about, have not been as good as they should be.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member will bring his remarks to a close.

Mr Humphrey: We are now approaching those three sports having world-class facilities. I look forward to a newly enhanced Windsor Park for the green and white army.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Éirím le tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún. Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. I support the motion.

The motion refers to grass-roots and elite sports facilities, but it is important to remember that such facilities are part of a continuum and that they should feed into each other. The athletes who end up using elite facilities begin their careers at a grass-roots level, and the better the facilities at that level, the better the chance we have of producing athletes at an elite level. Likewise, the success of our elite athletes encourages more people to participate at a grass-roots level and encourages our young athletes to reach for the sky. Elite facilities are essential for our sportspeople who compete at the higher levels.

We have heard today about the benefits of sport, and they are well known. Interest and participation in sport are good for physical and mental health and general wellbeing. The community aspect of sport also supports social cohesion and focuses people of all ages in a community on something that is of common interest across the age groups. Increasing participation in sports involves investment on the capital and revenue sides.

At a grass-roots level, strengthening club structures is an important aspect of increasing participation. Good club organisation and structures lead to improved funding, higher levels of volunteerism, better coaching and modern facilities. All these together attract more members. Professional backup from a governing body in the form of full-time officers supports the development of the club. Sport NI's Clubmark and the GAA's Club Maith give direction, support and backup.

Volunteer coaches have a very important role to play at club level at all age groups, from the youngest upwards. I thank all those who volunteer in sport as coaches, administrators and in other roles. The Active Communities programme, which funds some 120 coaches on the ground based on the 11-council model, is a five-year programme that is funded by the National Lottery. Schemes such as Active Communities are good for grass-roots sport. They get to the athletes on the ground and help and support their participation, training and skill development.

Earlier, the Chair spoke about the stakeholder event in the Long Gallery. She outlined the issues that came out of that, and I will not dwell on those. However, as other Members have said, DCAL does not have the resources to achieve everything that we want to through sport, including the facilities. We have some evidence of joined-up government around sport. We obviously have contributions from the lead Department — the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure — from the Department for Social Development (DSD) and the Health Department. The Department of Education contributes a large amount, and I want to refer to its huge sporting estate. Mr McNarry attempted to deal with that issue through his private Member's Community Use of Schools Bill. Unfortunately, the Bill did not advance beyond its Second Stage, but the Department gave an undertaking that this issue would be dealt with. That does not seem to have been the case, to this point anyway.

There are good examples of local government and the Department of Education co-operating, as in the facilities at St Colman's College in Newry and St Patrick's High School in Keady, to name but a couple. The facilities there are used by pupils during the day and they are open to the community in the evening. That type of joined-up co-operation is, I think, part of the way forward. Sport is a universal language across nations. I believe that it should be a universal language across —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr D Bradley: — all Departments here. I would like to see a dialogue opening up where greater funding is made available to the —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr D Bradley: — Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to provide the type of facilities that we need and are outlined in the motion.

Mr Allister: In part, this motion looks forward to future Olympics. Of course, we do that from the perspective of a very successful 2012 Olympics in and for the United Kingdom, for which I hope that we are all grateful.

Looking forward to future Olympics brings to mind, though, an issue that the House addressed over three months ago, on 12 November. That was the difficulty that many athletes and citizens of Northern Ireland find in respect of their inability to compete on behalf of the nation to which they belong and wish to belong; namely, the United Kingdom.

On the specific issue of the sport of boxing, the House passed a resolution calling for a Northern Ireland federation of boxing to be formed to open up the pathway to participation in our own national team — that of the United Kingdom — in future Olympics, so that boxers from Northern Ireland could have that option. Has the Minister taken any steps to advance that cause? Indeed, has the Committee taken any steps to advance that cause? Or is it something that it is hoped will simply be forgotten? Perhaps we could hear something on that.

We had, of course, the funding situation for boxing. However, the discriminatory distribution thereof by the Minister, who, although she was all over the place with her answers, seemed, for obvious reasons, to insist that it came down to this: if you were not an affiliate of the all-Ireland Irish Amateur Boxing Association, you were excluded from funding. That was a deliberate and calculated —

5.15 pm

Mr McMullan: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Are we wandering off the motion here when we use words like "discriminatory", which was in that last statement by the Member for North Antrim? Is he way off the wall altogether, and will he stay on the motion?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member may not be way off the wall, but he is certainly getting there, and I encourage him to return to the motion.

Mr Allister: I am sure, Mr Deputy Speaker, that you are very grateful to the Member for East Antrim for wanting to help you to do your job, but I am sure that you are more than capable of doing the job yourself.

The point is very relevant when one is talking about "funding towards grass-root sports". Boxing is a grass-root sport. The motion addresses "funding towards grass-root sports", so it is wholly pertinent to ask where the funding is going and why. Of course, in the context of the suggestion that there has been discrimination in the distribution of that funding by the imposition of a knowingly politically sensitive hurdle for boxing clubs —

Mr McMullan: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. This is getting ridiculous. The Member is using this debate as a political platform to push his agenda on boxing. He had his opportunity to discuss that here in a previous debate. He is still using the words "discrimination" and "knowingly". That has nothing whatsoever to do with the motion before us.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I caution the Member that he is coming dangerously close to questioning the Chair. I believe that I am quite capable of doing the job. Again, I encourage Members to stay to the motion. The motion is about funding.

Mr Allister: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, but if we did want to talk about discrimination in sport, which would be germane to the motion, we could of course point out that, since the Minister came to office, she has appointed to Sport NI 10 individuals from a Catholic background and four from a Protestant background. We could point out that, although she has had 71 applications from those from a Catholic background and 70 applications from those from a Protestant background for ministerial appointments —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr Allister: If you are Catholic, you have twice the chance —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr Allister: — of being appointed under this Minister.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Member will resume his seat. The Member is now totally out of order. I ask the Member, in the last few seconds available to him, to conclude and speak to the motion.

Mr Allister: I trust that, in sport, we will see the Minister leave her bigotry and her inclinations in that regard to one side —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is now up.

Mr Allister: — and deal with sport as it ought to be dealt with.

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Choiste as an seans an rún seo a phlé. I thank the members of the Committee for tabling the motion. I believe that everyone who has spoken — bar the Member who spoke last — has done so in the spirit of the motion and made very relevant points.

From the outset, as we are on the subject of athletes from here competing in major international tournaments, I would like to take this opportunity again to congratulate Marty Irvine, who won gold and silver medals last week at the World Track Championships in Belarus.

I will also take the opportunity to recognise the Alpine skiers Ryan Hill, Rosalind Connolly and Lucy Best, who between them won one gold, two silver and two bronze medals at the Special Olympics World Winter Games in South Korea, and whom I had the pleasure of meeting last week at an event organised by Special Olympics Ireland. I also congratulate Kelly Gallagher, a partially sighted athlete, on winning bronze and silver medals at the IPC Alpine Skiing World Championships in Spain on 20 and 21 February. As David Hilditch pointed out, it seems that, on most days, we are hearing about sport in a positive way through celebrations but, certainly, through people's achievements.

I listened very carefully to today's debate and noted all of the Members' comments and some of their arguments. The Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure's motion relates directly to one of the targets under the places pillar of my strategy for sport and physical recreation, PL 23. As Karen McKevitt pointed out, that seeks to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities by 2014 that will support players and athletes in the development of Olympic and Paralympic sports.

At the start of the debate, the Chairperson of the Committee talked about the genuine and lasting legacy of the London 2012 Olympics and Paralympics. Several Members mentioned a stakeholder event that took place in September 2012. That event looked in particular at a focused review of the Sports Matters strategy, as well as at gaps in funding and elite sports, and at training funding for sports.

Sometimes it comes down to having to make choices between competing or travelling. It also sometimes comes down to not being able, for example, to attract events because of the condition of some of our facilities. I know that other Members, not just those who sit on the Committee, such as Danny Kinahan, also mentioned that.

I think that, for us, boxing is a contradiction. It has some of the worst sports facilities, yet it produces more medals across the board. However, that does not mean to say that the situation is good enough. It is far from good enough, and we need to look at some of the smaller sports' capital and revenue needs, because, as mentioned, a small investment can go a long way.

There was a hint at looking at having a velodrome after Marty Irvine's success. I will raise that with my counterpart Michael Ring when I meet him soon. We may need to look at a multiple sports facility that athletes across the island can use. The idea of having a velodrome in County Down or elsewhere was tested previously, but the business case did not stand up. Perhaps we can do something that will mean that athletes will have to travel by car or bus for only a couple of hours rather than having to get on a plane, which, again, is an added expense.

We do need to look at high-performance facilities, particularly for elite athletes. We also need to look at coaching and mentoring, and at the lack of visibility. We need to look at the visibility and recognition of volunteers, coaches and administrators, which many Members mentioned.

Rosie McCorley said that success begets success. That is very clear. However, it is not just about what we see in the Olympics on television. Indeed, this afternoon, our first item of business was about Marty. It is about greater participation and encouraging physical activity, as well as yielding success in sport. It is about making sure that we make the best use of our facilities.

I am not too far from you, Danny. If I am not watching sport by invitation, I watch a lot of it on television or listen to it on the radio. I understand and appreciate the power of sport for health and the economy, as well as from the point of view of education, safety and health and well-being across the board. There are many overlaps, but I am pleased to say that, in my short time in the Department, I have seen that some of the gaps between Departments have been plugged.

I believe that sport and health and physical activity are Executive priorities. Different Departments are doing their bit towards trying to achieve better health and well-being. That can only be good. I can see that the sports monitoring group (SMG), which looks after the strategy, has produced better cohesion and collaboration across the board. It looks at local government, Departments, sporting bodies and sporting fora. However, I can also see that happening among my Executive colleagues. For example, there is more joined-up working between my Department and DSD than there was previously, and there is better joined-up work with the Health Department and the Department of Education, which is all to the good.

Karen McKevitt pointed to the positive impact that there has been on getting facilities in her constituency. I appreciate that, despite political differences, other Members have recognised that, although DCAL has the smallest budget, it has looked at investment in diverse ways. We have to be smarter about that investment.

To every Member who raised the point, I give a commitment to do that.

As I said, I made additional money available for the bigthree sports to look at nutrition, kids who are excluded and kids who have never been involved in any sport. As Dominic pointed out, we have to invest somewhere in the journey from grass roots to elite. We are not looking at the big-three sports in respect of just the sports that they are involved in. Kids may be athletic or involved in archery or other sports. We hope that the good offices of the IFA, rugby and the GAA will have the sense, skills and expertise to forward kids who are not involved in their sports somewhere else. That is a condition of the funding, and I am happy for that to happen.

I did not see the amendment that you referred to, Anna. I do not mean this in a bad way, but I think that there is a bit of naivety there. There are many more shared facilities than the Member gives the sports credit for. I know that you did not mean that begrudgingly, but there are. One of the best examples was when Linfield invited the Antrim camogs to use Windsor Park because they did not have enough facilities. That was not a cosmetic exercise. The relationship continued well beyond that.

There have been some mighty rows from mighty mouths in this place, such as what we heard from the previous Member to speak. They would like to make politics out of this. However, these things are happening in a very genuine way, and that will continue.

There is additional money for those sports and other sports. Unfortunately, the Department of Justice did not continue to fund midnight soccer, which was being funded from assets recovery. However, DCAL does fund that, because there are kids who, for all sorts of reasons, do not get an opportunity to be physically active until the evening, particularly those in socially deprived areas that are vulnerable to crime and poor mental health. I appreciate the sentiments, but a lot is being done. Many Members said that there is not enough visibility for some of the good work that goes on behind the scenes.

David Hilditch pointed out that there are huge challenges even with the development of stadia and grounds. Fixing or replacing that boiler could mean the cancellation of some coaching programmes or trips away. I understand that. It is not a good position to be in, but I understand it. I also understand his nervousness about creating an environment in which there is a gap between those who have and those who have not. That is not what any of us is about. I do not think that any of us is about elite anything.

Cathal Ó hOisín made the point that I have just made about the three big sports. He also pointed out the power of talking to people and, in particular, the stakeholder event that happened in September 2012. William Humphrey talked about his own constituency and took an intervention on cricket from the Committee Chair. It is true that a small investment goes a long way. In that case, it sounds as though good fences will make good neighbours. Such investment means having a relationship with the people who live around you, so it is important to have a look at that.

I met boxers from Cairn Lodge and other clubs on Friday night in Dublin. Despite the ongoing accusations, the boxing fraternity enjoys a lot of support. That is why it got the money that it did. The conditions for some clubs were atrocious. I refute the allegation of discrimination that the Member for North Antrim has made against me on an ongoing basis. I am not challenging the Chair — I just want that read into the record. I think that it is really unfair. I take my section 75 duty very seriously. I implement all my resources in accordance with section 75.

As regards the accusation that the Member keeps repeating, as I have said to him before, he needs to put up or shut up. He is not doing a good service to the boxing family. Sandy Row boxing club, like any other club, can apply for funding as long as it is affiliated. That has not changed since I last spoke. Despite the Member's protests, I have still not received a request from him to try to get this sorted out. I assume that he is just being a complete diva and using this opportunity to raise an issue that, in reality, he has done nothing about.

I welcome —

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will not. I have heard enough from you.

I welcome the motion. The Committee has done a lot to support grass-roots and elite facilities. I welcome the debate. I will take on board what Members have said and the suggestions to look at the research paper and the Scottish model. During the debate, Members have voiced support for all volunteers, coaches, administrators, governing bodies, and athletes and their families. It has also, yet again, raised the whole area of sport in a very positive way. I support the motion.

5.30 pm

Mr Irwin (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure): I thank all Members who have spoken in the debate. The motion is about an important issue, and I am glad that Members have involved themselves. As the Committee Chairperson highlighted so clearly at the start of the debate, the Committee is keen that the achievements of London 2012 — the Olympic and Paralympic Games — provide a lasting legacy for all our sportspeople. The Committee has looked at that issue since the end of the games and has involved a range of sports in its discussions on how to cement that legacy.

We are all delighted that sportspeople from Northern Ireland did so well in both the Olympic and Paralympic Games. It is also worth noting that our successes were not in the sports that receive the lion's share of the funding here, namely football, GAA and rugby. They were in other sports, such as rowing and boxing. In my own constituency, a young man called Ryan Hill recently competed in the Special Olympics Winter Games in South Korea and returned to Northern Ireland with two silver medals. That is on top of five other medals that he has received in recent times

As Members have heard, the Committee has worked closely with sports other than the big three to see how they can benefit from the legacy of the games and what they may need to do to ensure that participants might one day find themselves competing in the Olympics or Paralympics. The Committee Chair outlined that the Minister has put in place additional funding for football, GAA and rugby. However, the Committee's motion is designed to focus the minds of the Minister and Members on what we need to do for other sports. Those sports might not appear on our TVs so often, and they may not attract the numbers of supporters that the big three enjoy. However, given a little bit of investment, it is likely that they could significantly raise their profile and make a tremendous contribution to our community and to the lives of participants.

The Chairperson referred to the Sport Matters strategy and its targets. The Committee learned in the past couple of weeks that the targets for the upgrading of venues have been achieved, but we are aware that, in some cases, plans have been approved but not actioned. Members will be aware of countless sporting clubs in their constituencies that suffer from poor or inadequate equipment and facilities. In many cases, those clubs would see real benefits from an investment of even a few thousand pounds.

With today's motion, the Committee wants to encourage the Minister to spread the funding a bit more across a greater number of sports. We are not saying that she should not continue to support the big three. However, they have access to commercial funding that smaller grassroots sports do not. Talented participants in other sports may not be able to fulfil their potential without the proper environment and competitive training. It is important that we assess their needs and that the Minister is creative with the funding that is available. As the Chairperson has said, the Committee encourages the Minister to make additional bids for funding in monitoring rounds.

The Committee Chairperson mentioned the World Police and Fire Games, which take place this August and are being hosted in Belfast. Those games represent a significant profile boost for Northern Ireland. The Committee is keen that we make sure that we are well placed to bid for other games. That will not happen unless we can show that we have the appropriate facilities. The beauty of the World Police and Fire Games is that many of the events do not require elaborate venues or stadia, but that is generally not the case for other events.

As the Chairperson has stressed, the Committee is extremely mindful of the pressures on the Minister's budget. However, we call for smaller sports not to be overlooked when the Minister is considering her investment plans. The Chairperson highlighted that a number of sports have indicated the need for indoor facilities, and the Committee believes that, in some cases, there is an opportunity for facilities to be shared, maximising their utilisation and the benefits they bring. The Minister is more than aware of the benefits that sports bring when it comes to social inclusion and health, and better sports facilities in our communities will encourage more people to participate, with the added benefit of new talent being discovered.

As the Chairperson said, we must expect councils to play their full part. However, there is no reason why the Minister cannot work with councils to bring forward plans to upgrade and enhance the sports facilities that we have. That would be an excellent example of the kind of joined-up government that we are always being asked to undertake.

I would like to take this opportunity to reflect on some of the points made by Members who spoke today. Ms McCorley commended our Olympic and Paralympic competitors on their successes, which she believes will inspire ordinary people to participate in future. She also referred to sport's health and well-being elements. Mr Kinahan focused on the benefits of sports for communities and health and well-being, and he called for joined-up government to make funding go further.

Mrs McKevitt highlighted the necessity of having good facilities. Again, she reflected on the health and well-being aspect of sports. Anna Lo called for shared facilities and commented that sport can break down barriers and bring people together. David Hilditch acknowledged the small DCAL budget and the difficulties that that had caused. He praised the volunteers at grass-roots level.

Mr Bradley reiterated the importance of sport for health and well-being and spoke about how it brings people together. Mr Ó hOisín commented on the Minister's work on sport and talked about issues around terminology. He welcomed the 50-metre pool at Bangor. William Humphrey spoke about the lack of investment being an issue and said that small amounts of money can make a big difference.

Jim Allister highlighted the achievements of the London Olympics. He also highlighted the issue of sports participants not being able to compete for the UK and questioned what the Committee had done in relation to that. The Committee has met the boxing federation, the Minister and the Irish Amateur Boxing Association on the issue

I thank all those who made such useful contributions to the debate and encourage them to support the motion. I support the motion and commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the target in the Sport Matters strategy to have a minimum of 10 new or upgraded facilities by 2014 that will support player and athlete development in Olympic and Paralympic sports; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to consider prioritising funding towards grass-root sports and elite facilities from within her existing budget, to ensure that our sportspeople competing in future Olympic and Commonwealth Games are not disadvantaged as a result of lack of investment.

Agrifood: Graduate Programmes

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Buchanan: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the importance of the agrifood sector to the Northern Ireland economy; believes that this sector has the potential for significant growth in the future; recognises the need for graduates in this area and calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to promote graduate programmes in this sector, particularly within our two universities.

I am glad to see that the Minister is here to listen to this very important debate. This issue cuts across the remit of several Departments and agencies, but our primary focus today is on the role of the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) — I am the Deputy Chairperson of that Committee — and that of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) — I am also a member of that Committee.

On 18 February, we had an important debate in the House on sustainable energy. In his speech, my colleague Mr Stephen Moutray emphasised the importance of creating high-value-added jobs in that sector. His line of argument was that we need to have people who are suitably educated and skilled so that the expanding sustainable energy sector can be a growth area for business.

The same logic underpins the motion before us this evening. Agriculture is one of the oldest industries and is still one of our main industries. Northern Ireland is more economically dependent on agriculture than any other region of the UK. Like all other businesses, the agriculture industry has had its good times and its bad times, and, like all other businesses, it has to adapt to changing circumstances or it will fall into sharp decline.

Food and drink is Ulster's largest industry and employs almost 30% of our total manufacturing workforce. Figures released last December show that it is worth almost £4 billion to our economy. Taken together, the agriculture and the food and drink industries account for a very significant share of our GDP and are, therefore, key economic drivers.

The agrifood sector is of great importance to the UK economy and even more so to the Northern Ireland economy. It is the largest contributor to sales, external sales and employment in our manufacturing sector. It is recognised in our economic strategy as one of our priority sectors, and, in that strategy, there is a commitment to develop the industry.

Let us note as well that our small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), which are often family-run businesses, have been the very backbone of our economy over the years and account for a large percentage of the agrifood sector. The sector, from the farm to the manufacturing plant to the retailer, has tremendous potential. It provides our agriculture industry, our wider manufacturing industries and our local retail sector with wonderful opportunities to develop and expand, and the agrifood industry is one of the keys to our economic recovery.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

The current crisis and scandal in the meat industry, which has sent shock waves across the nation and beyond, is already having a major impact on the food industry. This is a pivotal moment in the history of food manufacturing and processing. The drama is still unfolding, and who knows where it will end. They always say that it is an ill wind that blows no good, for the crisis can, in a way, work to the advantage of our local agrifood industry. That has been illustrated in recent weeks by the increase in customer footfall in local butchers' shops. We have a high-quality product and excellent traceability and tracking systems in place, and we now have an opportunity to market our local product with renewed confidence and determination, not only in Northern Ireland, the United Kingdom and Europe but in markets right across the world and in countries such as China, Brazil, Russia and India.

However, if we are to succeed in the weeks, months and years to come, we must address the broader needs of the agrifood industry in a strategic and forward-looking manner. We need to be ahead of the game in research and development, innovation, and driving and targeting our export strategy. We must be able to adapt to changing customer habits, global demographics and health trends, and, bearing in mind that we still import a large percentage of our food, a fact that has been highlighted by the horse meat scandal, we need to remember that there is scope for us to produce more for the home market. We can act decisively to enhance the profitability of our local food chain.

There are several things that we can do to encourage our agrifood industry to achieve those key goals. The motion recognises not only the importance of the industry but the importance of ensuring its medium- to long-term viability and competitiveness. It identifies a central need and a pool of suitable graduates who will set standards and lead the industry forward at the various levels that I referred to earlier. Much has already been done and is being done to ensure the development of the sector in that way, and we warmly welcome that.

The Agri-Food Strategy Board has a major role to play, and it is pleasing to note that the food and drink manufacturing and processing future skills action group has reached agreement with the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE) and the universities to put specific courses in place over the next three years to fill gaps in the sector. The action group's three-year plan is designed to improve the management and leadership skills of employees in the food and drink sector and includes efforts at increasing awareness of careers in the area by informing schools, teachers and pupils about the range of job opportunities.

5.45 pm

The Minister for Employment and Learning recently announced an increase in the number of students enrolling at our local universities, but let us ensure that, when they emerge as graduates, they do so with the knowledge base and skills to enable them to compete for high value-added jobs in the marketplace, including the agrifood sector. Invest NI and others must also do everything possible to ensure that these are secure, well-paid and rewarding jobs in that sector. I know that courses in STEM subjects and related subjects such as food quality, safety and nutrition are oversubscribed at our universities and at CAFRE. In a way, this is a good problem to have, and every effort must be made by the universities and the college to develop their curricula in this area to focus on the provision of the right courses and, very importantly, to liaise closely with the industry to ensure that its requirements are met.

Earlier, I mentioned the good work of the skills action group. I also urge the Minister for Employment and Learning to work closely with the universities on all these issues, and I urge the Agriculture Minister to work closely with CAFRE. The Northern Ireland Food and Drink Association stated that there are important skills gaps to be tackled. Areas where there are such gaps include marketing and senior management skills and the need for greater knowledge and understanding of animal nutrition. I have no doubt that other Members will draw attention to other gaps and other areas where there are weaknesses.

The debate has come at the right time. The agrifood industry faces many challenges, but it also faces many opportunities. Let us be sure to meet the challenge and to grasp the opportunities. One way to do that is to ensure a good supply of graduates who will lead the way. I urge the Minister for Employment and Learning and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to work closely on these issues. Let us not be found wanting when it comes to these matters but let us ensure that all that can be done is being done to provide graduate programmes in the sector, particularly in our two universities, so that we have the graduates who are needed and that we have the qualifications that will bridge the gap and which will fill the demand in the sectors. We will still be at the cutting edge and leading for Northern Ireland. I urge the House to give its full support to the motion.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the motion. As was outlined by the previous Member who spoke, the local agrifood industry has demonstrated in recent years that it remains one of the more resilient sectors in our local economy. Indeed, it is recording growth at a time when many other sectors are experiencing great difficulty. Without doubt, one of the great drivers of growth and vitality in any sector is increased innovation and skills, and this has been the case with our local agrifood sector. However, we must not grow idle in the shade of recent success in this regard. As outlined by many commentators, including the industry itself, we need to constantly invest in the skills base in the

With this in mind, the recent announcement by the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development of a food innovation centre at Loughry is to be greatly welcomed as a huge step in the right direction. In light of the central role of the agrifood sector to our local economy, I doubt whether £1-8 million of government money has been better spent in the lifetime of this Assembly. Hopefully to be finished in the next two years, the food innovation centre will come as a major addition to the existing facilities at Loughry, bringing with it significant advancements in product development, package design and quality control laboratories. Not only will it provide much-needed jobs during the construction phase but it will meet the growing employment demands of the agrifood sector for decades to come by providing established and start-up companies with the technical staff needed to grow their business. In tandem with CAFRE's existing reputation for excellence, the new food innovation centre will, no doubt, act as a hub for future innovation and will help to facilitate new technologies and the successful exploitation of emerging market opportunities.

In welcoming the innovation centre at Loughry, it is perhaps salient to acknowledge the role of CAFRE in general in sustaining the recent growth in our agrifood sector. With campuses at Loughry, Greenmount and Enniskillen, CAFRE continues to grow and has, in fact, risen by some 20% in the past number of years, with more than 1,600 students enrolled in courses currently. Central to DARD's development of skills in the agrifood sector, CAFRE has a business-development focus, with its education and training targeted to those who seek to work in the local industry. A huge attribute of the existing arrangements is the provision of industry-led training, with alterations to course content made only following consultation with the advisory group and industry stakeholders, delivering a wide variety of programmes in agriculture, horticulture, food, equine, and rural enterprise. All CAFRE courses are externally accredited, and graduates are, no doubt, held in high esteem. In fact, last year's figures show that 91% of CAFRE students surveyed six months after they graduated were in employment or continuing their education in postgraduate research. Those are quite remarkable statistics. Furthermore, when you consider that the local figure for youth unemployment is nearly 19%, it is fitting that the House acknowledges the sterling work that CAFRE and DARD are doing, not only in sustaining our local agrifood industry but in driving it forward to capitalise on market opportunities.

In addition to the soaring success of CAFRE, the recent investment in improved innovation and research in the agrifood sector is vital in equipping our local industry with the skills needed to respond successfully to market demand. With tens of millions of pounds spent in recent years through DARD's evidence and innovation strategy, our improved research facilities and expertise now give us an opportunity to access new European research funding that was not possible in years gone by.

To enable local industry to access those funds within the EU's Horizon 2020 programme, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, Michelle O'Neill, recently announced that she would fund a local EU research funding facilitator to support local businesses and researchers in the area of food science. Bearing in mind that DARD's annual spend on agrifood research is close to £10 million, I believe that the new EU-focused post will add greatly to DARD's strategy of upskilling local businesses and will, no doubt, contribute greatly to the development of innovation in the local industry. It is important to bear in mind that skills gaps can have serious, detrimental implications for localised economic growth. So, unless there is a continued determination from all Ministers and Departments concerned to match the positive steps already taken by the Agriculture Minister to address shortages in innovation and science-specific skills, the health of our agrifood industry could be vulnerable in the long term.

Finally, a point worth mentioning is the tangible need for Departments to create and support a regulatory environment that nurtures increased growth in our agrifood industry. One of the main obstacles to creating and expanding businesses in rural communities is planning difficulties, as well as other deficits in infrastructure and services. In my South Down constituency, local industry has been crying out for years for infrastructural improvements, such as the Ballynahinch bypass, not to mention the complete failure of politicians and agencies alike to address gridlock in our county town of Downpatrick.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Hazzard: Such gridlock has come to characterise the ongoing failure to address the lack of investment in the area. Indeed, the 3,500 public sector workers who commute to Belfast daily account for the most commuter miles a year of any district outside the greater Belfast area.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has gone.

Mr Hazzard: If our local agrifood industry is to continue to expand, and —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Hazzard: — I have no doubt that it will, we must ensure that we facilitate and nurture an environment —

Mr Speaker: The Members time has gone.

Mr Hazzard: Thank you.

Mrs Dobson: As the Ulster Unionist Party's agriculture spokesperson, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion. An issue that I believe will unite all sides of the House is the fact that enrolment at the CAFRE colleges is at an all-time high. That is proof, if we needed it, that more and more people want to learn about farming and take up a career in our agrifood industry. They want to enter an industry that has a massive potential for growth and a bright future. I believe that this is healthy and to be warmly welcomed — unlike some of the food served in the college canteens, of course.

DARD, therefore, has a duty to direct its efforts and resources to that future, a future in which our young farmers take up the reins when their time comes. Entrusting farmers with the right tools to do that will provide a future for our young farmers and their families for generations to come. Once their studies are complete, young farmers and those progressing to further, higher and graduate study, need to have the confidence that there will be a job there for them. Sadly, the recent news of falling farm incomes will not act as a magnet but will, I fear, deflect people from choosing farming as a career in the first place. This is bad news for an industry with massive potential for growth. Departments have a duty to put their collective shoulders to the wheel for the sake of the future success of the Northern Ireland economy. The green shoots of recovery are emerging from the agrifood industry. For the recovery to be sustained and for growth to continue, we need to upskill our workforce to meet the future challenges of the industry. Time and time again, Northern Ireland has been internationally recognised as having an extremely dynamic and adaptable workforce. That workforce has risen to meet the challenges of the past, and I firmly believe that, with the right support from the Executive, it can and will be ready for the challenges of the future.

One area where clear change is needed is the relationship between the recently merged six further and higher education colleges and the CAFRE colleges. The now stronger and resource-rich further education colleges are in a unique position to provide help and support to those who are taking courses in the agrifood industry, not least in literacy and numeracy, which are areas that we have continually debated in the House. There must be massive potential to sweep away duplication of effort at all levels between further education colleges and the CAFRE colleges to lower costs while raising standards and to increase the geographical availability of agrifoodrelated courses so that they can be offered to a wider audience across Northern Ireland. That will ultimately lead to the delivery of improvements in academic attainment and in the learning experience for all our students. I would welcome the Minister for Employment and Learning's thoughts on the matter and his ideas on how greater working relationships can be fostered between further education colleges and the CAFRE colleges.

In making those comments, however, I am aware that, in reply to a question for written answer from my colleague Sandra Overend, the Minister recognised that skills gaps exist in the agrifood industry. Those include the shortage of food technologists and the need to raise leadership and management skills in the agrifood industry. Although we recognise the establishment of the skills action plan for food and drink manufacturing and processing, it does not go far enough to foster the level of co-operation that is necessary to raise standards.

There is also the need to provide fit-for-purpose careers advice and guidance to students who are attending the CAFRE colleges. Guidance will provide clear and seamless progression routes through to graduate courses at the universities. It is clear that the arrangements, albeit that they have been in place since the Agriculture Act (Northern Ireland) 1949, which gave DARD the central authority to provide education and training for the agriculture sector, are no longer fit for purpose. The continuation of the split responsibility, which is clearly demonstrated in the motion, provides the underlying reason why the education of those who will form the future of our agrifood industry from the farm to the boardroom is being held back.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mrs Dobson: It is, therefore, the responsibility of Departments to pool their resources, put their shoulders to the wheel and deliver for pupils who are studying agriculture at all levels. They are, after all, the future of the industry. We support the motion.

Mr Byrne: As agriculture spokesperson for the SDLP, I congratulate those who tabled the motion, and I support its sentiments and context.

The agrifood sector is a very significant and important part of the Northern Ireland economy, as it sustains over 92,000 people in employment. Over 19,000 of those are linked to food and drink processors, over 30,000 are in primary farm production, and those areas combined generate a further 43,000 jobs indirectly. That represents one quarter of all the manufacturing jobs in Northern Ireland and approximately 20% of the total private sector employment in Northern Ireland.

Despite the recession in other areas, the agrifood sector has grown and continues to show more growth. The world's population is growing by 1·5 million a week. Therefore, there is a market for more agricultural produce and food products from here. Between 1991 and 2011, the number of people who were employed on farms dropped by 13,000. However, that reflects that there are a smaller number of larger farmers. It is important that this agricultural produce has value added to sustain the industry and grow further. We now have a £4 billion industry and the potential to grow further.

Currently, we need to export 80% of our agricultural produce. That means that there is an opportunity that means that, with the right skills and graduates, more of our exports could result in higher-value-added products with more ongoing research and development.

The European Union 2020 R&D money is very important in that regard, and Mr Hazzard made reference to that.

6.00 pm

Queen's University has confirmed that, for the 2011-12 academic year, there were 474 applications for undergraduate degree courses offered by the university's Institute of Agri-Food and Land Use, with 85 students admitted on the course. For 2011-12 postgraduate entry, 49 applications were received for areas of research carried out by the institute, with six students enrolled, which, given the importance of the industry, is a relatively small number.

CAFRE has said that the employment rates for its students are high. Some 94% of Greenmount students were in employment within six months of completing their course. I think that is one of the few industries in which there is great growth potential for jobs.

In research carried out for a policy brief titled 'Innovation and Skills: Implications for the Agri-food Sector' by AFBI's agricultural and food economics branch, it was found:

"companies indicated that the constant factors driving their managers, supervisors, and specialist/technical/ professional staff to acquire new skills were: (1) the need to introduce new technologies and equipment, and (2) the need to develop new products and services."

That all requires highly skilled and qualified employees.

Many companies also stressed the continued requirement for substantial funding assistance from government to support the improvement of training provision and skills levels across the sector, with a particular emphasis on specific scientific and technical training aimed to encourage process and product innovation. Mr Tony O'Neill, who is the chairman of the Agri-food Strategy Board, also stated that more government funding needs to be put into the training of people with expertise and research capabilities in the agrifood sector.

Companies say that, with increased competition from abroad, we need to ensure that we have well-qualified staff so that they can compete when it comes to skills and technology. Posts for production engineers and skilled and semi-skilled workers are hard to fill. Specific specialist and technical expertise were also identified as a key area of skills deficiency. It is clear that there is a greater need for highly qualified graduates and food technologists. There are jobs for them, but we do not have enough trained people at this stage.

Parity has helped CAFRE and DARD to attract graduates. Around 70% of those who complete their LEADER+ programme stay in the food and drink sector. The Minister for Employment and Learning, Dr Farry, has said that it is for the universities to decide how many places will be available and what courses they will provide, but the universities should be given more funding to develop those areas when there is potential for jobs and growth.

For a long time, one big deficiency in Northern Ireland has been that we do not have a veterinary science course in any university in Northern Ireland.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Byrne: That is a major deficiency when it comes to the further development of the red meat industry, and I hope that some serious research will be put into trying to get a veterinary science course in Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyttle: I support the motion on behalf of the Alliance Party. One of the key pledges in our Assembly manifesto was to encourage an increase in the number of individuals holding STEM-related qualifications to help ensure that our workforce is capable of contributing to key growth areas in our economy. The agrifood sector is very much one of those key areas, and the food and drink sector and the agriculture industry are playing a crucial role in rebalancing and growing the Northern Ireland economy.

DARD estimates that the food and drink sector was worth nearly £4 billion to the region in 2012, and the value of gross output from the agriculture industry was put at £1·7 billion, so the importance of the agrifood sector cannot be overstated. As the motion states, the sector has the:

"potential for significant growth in the future".

To achieve that potential, we must provide the sector with the necessary skills for high-quality education and training. Our manifesto also committed to increasing the uptake in STEM-related subjects across all levels, from entry level to apprenticeship, technician, degree and higher degree. It is our view that growing areas such as the agrifood sector will be supported through that drive to improve STEM. Understanding and competency in STEM subjects are required to increase levels of research and development in Northern Ireland and to provide businesses with the skills to introduce innovation in their working practices.

Therefore, I welcome the additional 1,200 places for STEM-related programmes that the Minister for Employment and Learning pledged his Department will implement by 2015. I hope that extra places for courses associated with the agrifood sector will follow. The challenge is to ensure that those programmes provide future graduates with the relevant skills to forge successful careers in that area.

That will undoubtedly require collaboration between the Agriculture Department and the Department for Employment and Learning, alongside educational institutions that deliver the programmes and stakeholders in the agrifood sector, to ensure that we can produce an excellent knowledge and skill base in those areas. One platform for achieving that will, I hope, be DEL's future skills action group for food and drink manufacturing and processing — a group set up in conjunction with the Agriculture Department and Invest NI that includes stakeholders from the industry, employers and further and higher education institutions. The group seems to be a useful vehicle for developing what we can offer in this area.

In addition to those educational programmes, our universities can play further roles in assisting the sector through delivering assistance with product development, providing rural and agricultural policy development or advice, and undertaking applied research connected to the field. Our universities have an excellent reputation for world-leading research. I hope that they will develop their partnerships with the agrifood sector.

I reaffirm the Alliance Party's commitment to supporting our agrifood sector and increasing the education and training associated with the industry to further acknowledge that this is a developing and vital part of our economy. I call for a joined-up approach between the bodies and organisations involved to ensure that we provide degree programmes for future graduates that help them to create world-class careers and results in agrifood in Northern Ireland.

Mr Irwin: If the current horse meat scandal has proved one thing, it is the absolute importance of our local agrifood industry. Food is something that everyone needs and no one can do without. In recent weeks, the revelations about how food is processed, what is added and how it can be traced, tested and verified, have made consumers sit up and take a greater interest in what they are eating.

Consumers can, of course, rest very assured when they eat our own locally produced food that they are eating the very highest-quality produce, which is subject to the most stringent traceability and testing in Europe. Although we farmers moan and groan about paperwork and red tape — there is, of course, far too much of it — for once, perhaps, that has set us apart in a positive fashion from some of our EU neighbours. Our agrifood sector continues to farm well in a climate of economic pressure. That is, in no small part, due to the efforts of our innovative agrifood industry and the endless efforts of those who seek to add value to our locally produced food.

Innovation is a key driver for growth in the agrifood sector. That has been clearly identified by the Assembly, and the UK Government on a wider scale, as a core focus for economic improvement. The need to strengthen the private sector to help rebalance the public sector is recognised. Encouraging growth in agrifood must be an absolute focus for the Executive, given the opportunities that the sector presents.

There are many success stories of local firms having invested significantly in adding value to local produce. In doing so, they have created very appetising products that are sold worldwide. Investing time, money and effort in creating products, finding new markets, and selling our creativity and image internationally as the home of great taste is an undertaking of immense proportions. However, that is being done successfully, and we need to build on that work.

There is no doubt that the input of our graduates is key to the longer-term growth of the sector. I welcome the announcement of the DEL Minister last year that there will be a campaign to make teachers and young people more aware of the career opportunities in the sector. I am interested to hear from Dr Farry about his progress on that important initiative.

I studied a number of reports compiled by agencies relevant to our food industry, and it was clear that more work is required to help maximise the opportunities that will be presented over the next 10 years in supplying domestic and global demand for food. I know that the food industry and agriculture industry are very competitive marketplaces. In the light of that reality, we are punching above our weight locally in terms of innovation and the marketing of our produce further afield.

The domestic and global marketplace is growing steadily. With climate issues in a number of countries affecting the production of food, Northern Ireland and, indeed, the UK will have even greater opportunities to meet the demand, but only if the correct support is in place. I acknowledge that a number of programmes are in place, such as DARD's postgraduate research awards and the skills action plan. We can take pride in the excellent standards that are achieved at our agriculture and food technology institutions. However, if we are to truly realise the sector's potential, we must do more to effectively equip our graduates to enter the workplace and advance the industry, and ensure that we grasp the opportunities that are out there. I support the motion.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the work that has been done to date by the Employment and Learning Minister and the Agriculture Minister.

As has already been said, the agrifood industry is one of the most important employers and one of the more resilient sectors of our local economy. It is a billion-pound industry. At present, more than 60% of the food and drink produced and processed in the North is destined for export. The agrifood sector supports one out of every five jobs in the private sector and employs 92,000 people. Food and drinks processors buy 90% of the local agricultural produce. The multiplier impacts of growth in the sector are considerable. We need to strive for the North to become strategically important as one of the key food-producing regions.

It has been stated that the agrifood sector is, of all the industries in the North, best placed to support rural employment and sustainability. The Agri-Food Strategy Board has been set up to look at how it can further improve turnover and create more jobs. That will be an important report when published.

There is potential for significant growth in the near future. There are export success stories from the North of Ireland's agrifood companies. In my constituency, Fivemiletown Creamery had a major contract win in Asia last year. The Programme for Government highlights an export-led economy as key to achieving sustainable economic growth. Success stories, such as that in Fivemiletown, point to the agrifood sector having a key role in achieving sustainable economic growth. Other success stories include Mash Direct and the Fermanagh-based Kettyle Irish Foods. However, the industry needs to be prepared. It is important to maintain and build upon all of that.

A policy brief prepared by the agriculture and food economics branch of AFBI highlighted the fact that companies expressed a greater need for engagement and synergy between further education colleges, universities and the industry in relation to the content, design and delivery of education programmes. Levels of skills are important in developing an innovation-led economy. According to 'The Economist' in 2012, it is suggested that:

"economies cannot sustain a model in which innovation is driven by a small number of trained elite and supported by a large body of ... low-skilled production workers."

Growing the North's economy is a key priority, with education and skills at the core of the policy agenda for supporting innovation.

A key weakness in the food and drinks industry is that it has more people of working age with no qualifications. I welcome the fact that the Minister for Employment and Learning has identified the food and drinks manufacturing and processing subsector as a priority for employment and skills provision. There is a skills gap, and it has been identified by employers: a shortage of food technologists and engineers, and management and leadership skills in the industry. That needs to be tackled, given the high rates of unemployment in the North. It is important that we maximise support for the sector.

I also welcome the proposal announced recently for the new food innovation centre at Loughry. Regarding the report yet to be published by the Agri-Food Strategy Board, it is pre-eminent that the skills and capacity of the workforce will form a major strand of its work and, hopefully, go some way towards addressing the skills shortage in the sector. More needs to be done to analyse and engage with the labour market.

Finally, innovation comes with education. When the skills are there, it will help the industry to further grow and blossom. We need to be thinking progressively, as the agrifood sector is key to keeping the economy running. Education must reflect what the economy needs. I support the motion.

Mrs Overend: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion that has been brought forward by the DUP. I am pleased that the motion calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to act together. That highlights the cross-departmental working that is required if we are to succeed in making the best of our economic potential within the agrifood industry. You could easily add the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) to the mix, as it is so important to match the necessary skills with the relevant industry, but, perhaps, the DUP did not want to overly burden its Minister today.

I want to focus largely on the first part of the motion, which states the importance of the agrifood sector to the Northern Ireland economy, as well as the belief that the sector has the potential to achieve significant growth in the future. The importance of the agriculture industry in its totality cannot be understated, as it makes a significant contribution to the Northern Ireland economy. It has an annual output of £1·5 billion and, when taken together with the production and processing industries, it is one of Northern Ireland's largest employers.

The agrifood sector sustains a vast amount of Northern Ireland's private sector workforce. It has also been one of the strongest performers of all sectors in our local economy in recent years. In that respect, it has played a huge role in supporting and sustaining the economy throughout the gloom of a double-dip recession.

The share of total gross value added (GVA) in the agriculture sector in Northern Ireland at 1.6% illustrates that dependence, when compared with 0.7% in Scotland and 0.5% in Wales. If we look at the DARD key statistics from June 2012, we can see the hard employment figures. To give just one example, we can see that there are 25,000 people directly employed in agriculture, forestry and fishing, and 27,000 in food and drink and processing. That equates to around 6.5% of the total workforce. A report published by the Northern Ireland Food and Drink Association (NIFDA) shows that every job created in food and drink processing equates to 1.91 jobs in the regional economy. That is a great return.

We are all aware of the tremendous role that the agrifood sector plays in Northern Ireland, but it still has the potential for significant growth. First, we must continue to encourage people to buy local. In light of the recent horse meat scandal, I take this opportunity to put on record the fact that I have complete trust and confidence in our local quality assured beef. Naturally, having grown up on a dairy farm, I have always been a keen advocate for our local dairy products and local beef, but there is also scope to grow some of the lesser known subsectors under the umbrella of agrifood.

Currently, almost half of the gross turnover is provided in two areas: milk and milk-based products; and beef and sheep meat. We can work to grow our poultry meat sector, which, admittedly, will not be helped by the recent Rose Energy decision, and maximise income from such areas as fruit, vegetables and fish. I cannot forgo the opportunity to promote pork in the House, although I may need to express an interest, considering that my husband might benefit from it.

Opening up foreign markets for exports is also key, and I have said before in the House that we need a more ambitious export strategy. We should be encouraging those in the agrifood sector to explore the options and opportunities available to them further afield. Knowledge and contacts are, of course, vital in that.

There is also the issue of skills, which the motion specifically deals with. The sector cannot grow without the necessary skills base, and our two universities are vital to that. I note that the future skills action plan for food and drink manufacturing and processing was tasked with advising, designing, developing and testing new interventions to meet existing and future skills needs within the sector. To be fair, that plan makes mention of schools, colleges and universities.

I had the pleasure of visiting and touring the food technology campus at Loughry. I found it most interesting to hear that those who have gone into that profession often find that they have a long and committed career in that field.

However, there is a specific need to increase graduate programmes. That needs to be rectified. Statistically, there are lower levels of graduates in the agrifood sector compared with other sectors. That trend must be reversed.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mrs Overend: We must work to achieve a situation whereby more graduates choose to go into that sector and demand and supply is such that employers actually demand graduate-entry employees.

Mr Rogers: As a Member for South Down, I extend my sympathies to the Grant family on the tragic loss of their little son Daniel at the weekend. I am sure that the thoughts and prayers of the House are with them at this tragic time.

I thank the Members opposite for tabling the motion. The agrifood industry has changed over the decades as farming, fishing, food production and marketing has become a highly scientific operation. With a severe reduction in profit margins and increasing worldwide competition, it is essential that Northern Ireland is at the cutting edge of research and development. I cannot help but remember Mrs Dobson's comment about farmers having the reins. Farming has moved on a long way since farmers had reins and the little grey Ferguson. Today's farmers are highly skilled businessmen, engineers, accountants and scientists. In a similar way, our fishermen had to develop their skills set in order to survive.

Other Members talked about the impact that it has on the Northern Ireland economy. It has also made a major contribution to what happens here. In 2010, the Northern Ireland Food and Drink Association published a report entitled, 'Value of Food and Drink Industry to Northern Ireland'. The report highlighted the significant contribution that the agrifood sector makes, employing directly up to 50,000 people and generating over £800 million in value-added to the economy. Almost as many jobs again are created in the upstream supply chain and ancillary industries, helping to sustain the rural community.

A recent survey was conducted around 234 school leavers and graduates in the sector. In that survey, employers were asked how well prepared they were for the world of work. Over 40% felt that they were poorly prepared. Employers also indicated that a proportion of employees need to improve their essential skills in numeracy, literacy and ICT. I acknowledge the Minister's presence here today. However, as Mrs Overend said earlier, a cross-sectoral approach is needed from the Department of Education with regard to developing numeracy, literacy and STEM subjects; the Minister for Enterprise, Trade and Investment; DARD; and, of course, the Minister for Employment and Learning himself.

From an innovation perspective, combining education and training with practical knowledge, generated by experience in the production process, is an important driver for incremental innovation. In addition to the specialised and technical competences that are required for some jobs in the sector, the possession of more generic skills, such as problem-solving, analytical skills, creativity, team work and communication skills are considered important. Those skills shortages were identified most commonly in the position of managers, supervisors, specialists, professionals and technical employees.

A combination of innovative products, processes and practices is, clearly, the driving force behind the need for new skills in the sector. Deeper analysis of the study shows that employers suggest that they did not recruit from schools or university because recruits would be unlikely to have enough relevant work experience. What is the solution? Companies expressed a need for engagement and greater linkage between the further education colleges, CAFRE, universities and industry on the content, design and delivery of educational programmes, so that teaching and training adequately meets the needs of the sector. Integration of work experience in the course curriculum was a priority alongside the need for more business-related teaching to be included in relevant courses.

Government and industry need to work together to develop the skills base in the industry. Important skills gaps need to be tackled, such as marketing and senior management skills, and on-farm, animal nutrition and generic traits, if the industry to increase its competitiveness. It also needs to raise the level of investment in research and development at every step of the supply chain.

With regard to the impact in rural areas, a successful and growing food and drinks industry will generate more employment and income for the rural economy, from where it sources and where many businesses are located. The industry is probably the single most important source of sustaining the rural population.

We can learn from other jurisdictions, such as the Scottish Executive and the Irish Government. We do not have to reinvent the wheel. Let us learn from our neighbours. We are not merely talking about growth; we are talking about smart growth. A Member mentioned Mash Direct, so I have to plug Rooney Fish in Kilkeel.

The impact of the agrifood sector on the Northern Ireland economy must not be underestimated. With over a quarter of Northern Ireland's manufacturing jobs and a contribution to the economy of over £500 million, the opportunities afforded to graduates —

 $\label{eq:mr_speaker} \textbf{Mr Speaker} : \textbf{The Member's time has almost gone}.$

Mr Rogers: — in the sector must not be overlooked. There is potential to provide stability to the economy, create thousands of new jobs and increase the impact of our rural areas. However, this can be achieved only by improving productivity and enhancing the skills —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has gone.

Mr Rogers: — of our workforce. I support the motion.

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion on behalf of my colleagues and me. I thank the proposer of the motion for raising this important issue and all Members who contributed to the debate.

The agrifood industry is vital to our economy. It is one of the key sectors identified by the Executive in the Programme for Government and the economic strategy, and it was recognised by my Department as being in the priority skills sectors that contribute to rebuilding and rebalancing the local economy. The latest available information shows that gross turnover from the food and drink processing industry is around £3·7 billion. That figure has been growing over recent years. Taken together, the farming and processing industries contribute well over £900 million per annum to the economy in Northern Ireland and represent around 4% of the total gross value added. In 2011, the industries employed approximately 52,000 people, which represents about 6·5% of overall employment and about 10% of private sector employment. Therefore, the importance of the agrifood sector to the local economy in value added and jobs sustained is not in dispute.

Consequently, the Executive, my Department and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development have targeted the sector for growth. In support of that, in May 2012, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment set up the Agri-Food Strategy Board, which is tasked with developing a strategic plan for the agrifood sector. The work of the board reaches across the subsectors of the supply chain. It has identified a number of themes, including skills and capability. Although provisional figures provided by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development show that the total income from farming decreased substantially in 2012, the food and drink processing sector has remained resilient, with turnover continuing to grow and the number of employees increasing.

Notwithstanding the setback for agriculture, my ministerial colleague the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, Michelle O'Neill, believes that, as the world population grows, we have many reasons to be positive. I agree with Minister O'Neill that there are opportunities ahead. We must position our Departments and the sector to take full advantage. My Department will work with DARD to improve the competitive nature of the local economy and build an industry that has the strength and resilience to withstand the types of setback recently witnessed by the local agriculture sector. That is why I have identified the food and drink manufacturing and processing industry as a key sector for my Department to focus its employment and skills provision on.

Although the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development has overall policy responsibility for the development of the agrifood sector in Northern Ireland, my Department is committed to ensuring that the sector is provided with the appropriately skilled individuals whom it needs to flourish. My Department interacts with the industry in various ways. In higher education, it funds research and education related to the food industry. The further education sector delivers apprenticeship training and specific in-company training. The Department funds and performance manages the sector skills councils relating to the food industry. The Department also funds a wide range of apprenticeship training and employability initiatives. In 2009-2010, DEL contributed over £2 million to the food sector in that regard.

6.30 pm

Employers in the sector have identified a number of skills issues. As a result, my Department has established a future skills action group for food and drink manufacturing and processing. That group has been set up in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and Invest Northern Ireland, and it includes representatives from the industry, employers, and further and higher education. The group's aim is to bring stakeholders together to identify the skills issues that are facing the industry and to look at ways of addressing them. Those issues include difficulties recruiting sufficient numbers of graduates, a lack of food technologists and engineers, and the need to increase management and leadership skills. A number of Members identified those issues during the debate.

I launched the resultant skills action plan in June 2012, and work is ongoing to take forward interventions to encourage employers to avail themselves of existing training; to develop a programme of engagement with undergraduates to educate them about careers in the sector; to increase the science content in degree programmes to ensure that the qualifications meet the needs of industry —

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for giving way. There is a gap in Northern Ireland in that we do not have a veterinary science degree course. Does the Minister recognise that there may be an opportunity to have a combined effort between CAFRE, which has agricultural lands and research facilities for agriculture, and Queen's University, which has built up some expertise in science over the years?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Byrne for raising that point. Minister O'Neill and I are keeping that under close observation and review. At present, a considerable number of trained vets are available, so there is no immediate shortage. However, there may be shortages in particular subsectors of veterinary medicine, as, of course, veterinary practitioners cover a wide range of different activities. We are certainly willing to have discussions and to consider alternative models by which we can address some of those different skills shortages. We are also keen to ensure that there is close co-operation between all the providers, whether they are in higher education or the further education sector.

I can certainly give the commitment that we will continue to explore the issue. However, in doing so, I would give a certain word of caution that, at best, mixed signals are coming across about the actual level of demand and how the existing provision of qualified people fits in with that.

One of the other themes of the future skills action plan is the need to develop an engineering apprenticeship that will meet the requirements of the food and drink processing sector.

A number of elements in the plan are now well progressed. For example, representatives from the sector attractiveness programme Tasty Careers have booked visits with 50 post-primary schools to educate young people and teachers about the wide range of quality careers that are available throughout the industry. Discussions are also under way to develop a similar programme for universities so that they can target appropriate undergraduates who may never have considered working in the food and drink processing industry.

I think that it is important that we stress that a huge range of different activities are involved in the food and drink manufacturing sector. Indeed, although certain aspects may have an image problem that may inhibit people from considering that sector for a career, it is important that people are aware of the breadth of activities they can become involved in. It is also important that people are aware of the wider message, which a number of Members sought to get across, that the industry is growing and has a significant gross valued added. As such, people can have a stable carer and one that provides a considerable degree of success and reward.

Through the higher education strategy, Graduating to Success, I have stressed my commitment to ensure that Northern Ireland's higher education institutions support the local economy, and I have reaffirmed my Department's commitment to help those institutions to become more responsive to industry's skills needs. Graduating to Success also highlights the need to enhance graduates' employability prospects. That will be taken forward through the implementation plan.

To provide the agrifood sector with appropriately skilled graduates, Queen's University and the University of Ulster offer a broad range of undergraduate and postgraduate courses in the areas of food science and the wider agrifood sector. The Department of Agriculture's College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise also provides higher education courses, validated by Queen's University and the University of Ulster, in a range of subjects that includes agriculture, food and horticulture. Demand for those courses is increasing. For example, I am advised by the Department of Agriculture that 743 students were enrolled on its full-time and part-time higher education courses in the current academic year. Total enrolments have increased by 25% over the past five years, with full-time enrolments up by almost 50% in the same period.

When new courses are being developed, representatives from the industry and sector skills councils are closely consulted on course content, structure and pathways within qualifications to ensure that graduates are equipped to meet current industry requirements. In addition, the Department of Agriculture is investing significantly in the provision of new facilities to support the continued delivery of higher education programmes at the college. A new dairy unit is about to be commissioned at the Greenmount campus and a new food innovation centre is bring planned for the Loughry campus. Those facilities are also used for technology projects that underpin technology transfer to industry. My previous announcement to fund an additional 1,200 places for STEM-related programmes will have implications for the sector, and it further underlines my commitment. It is worth stressing that we regard agriculture- and agrifood-related skills as fitting under STEM and that universities have the flexibility to increase provision in those areas. The universities are mindful of their role in supporting the economy, particularly locally, by ensuring that there is a pool of graduates skilled in relevant areas. Therefore, the universities should provide and resource courses in response to changes in demand for graduates.

In addition to the agrifood undergraduate provision in the universities and the agricultural colleges, the universities undertake research. Such research capability is vital for economic growth, competitiveness and the well-being of the community. As the major suppliers of research in Northern Ireland, the universities have a vital role to play. Our universities are recognised nationally and internationally for world-class research and development. They performed extremely well in the most recent research assessment exercise, in 2008. That is a UK-wide exercise to assess research quality. The research showed that half the assessed research in Northern Ireland is rated either internationally excellent or world-leading, and more than 98% of Northern Irish researchers are working in disciplines in which world-leading research is taking place. My Department has responsibility for funding higher education research and will allocate almost £50 million in recurrent funding in the present academic year.

This year, the Department introduced a new funding model that supports internationally excellent and world-leading research, as well as targeting a proportion of research funding at STEM areas and those of wider economic relevance. Agrifood has been identified as a target market for growth in Northern Ireland. The model aspires to achieve the dual aims of pursuing international excellence in R&D while ensuring that the current and future needs of the local economy are met. In collaborating with local businesses, the Connected programme has enabled the universities and further education colleges to provide a highly effective one-stop shop for businesses wishing to access the expertise and knowledge in the local research base. Through the current programme, Connected 2, the higher and further education sectors have proactively developed additional strategic links with the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute and CAFRE. It is anticipated that those additional linkages will enable Connected to better meet the knowledge transfer needs of the agrifood and biotechnology industry.

I welcome the healthy demand for those agrifood courses and research studentships, and recognise the important role that our universities and colleges play in supplying the sector with appropriately skilled individuals. Both Queen's University and the University of Ulster remain committed to deepening their contribution to the economic, social and cultural development of this region and its global standing. The universities play a significant role in supporting the growing agrifood sector, contributing to agricultural and rural policy developments and advice, undertaking applied research and assisting product development. Both universities are keen to work in partnership with my Department's future skills action group and to enhance engagements with the agrifood sector to develop provision and to promote agrifood careers.

Mr Frew: I commend the motion to the House, as my colleagues have already spoken on it. I welcome the consensus throughout the Chamber from all parties supporting the motion. We recognise the importance of the agrifood sector to the economy and the wealth that it brings to this country. It should be supported by all in the Chamber because it is very important to the fabric not only of our economy but of society as a whole. The agrifood sector is not just about farming. I think that we all realise that, but it is important to state it. It is a science. It is manufacturing. It is engineering. It is accounting. It is everything nowadays, because even if you are on the farm, you need all those skills, and much more.

Of course, it is not just about the farm; it is about the process the whole way through. It is important that, while we grow and we support growth, we must support educated growth, because that way we will be able to get much more out of our industry and much more wealth into our nation. Farming has never let us down in the past, so why should it let us down now? Why should we, as a government, let it down? There is absolutely no reason why. That is why we need to support it and ensure that what we are doing now is right for that growth, right for the agrifood sector and right for the farming industry, and that we are supporting it as best we can, because there are threats to it.

There are threats to the very industry that we always talk about as rising, as growing and as being the future. Not least of those threats is the weather, which I do not think any Minister in the House can do anything about. There is also CAP reform. It has not been mentioned here once — we have been very positive — but CAP reform is a big threat. It could hurt the giants in our agrifood industry: beef and sheep meat; milk and milk products; and the poultry meat — all the giants that play such an important part in our agrifood sector. It could hurt those subsectors terribly, so we have to be very mindful that we support the industry, recognise the threats and understand the needs of the industry.

Farming and the agrifood sector have an important social element; it is not just about commercial interests or capitalism. That is why we have the CAP and single farm payments — to input to the industry and to help with food production and food security, which is a major issue throughout Europe. Europe is always mindful of the issue of food. Food can affect everything, from inflation to interest rates; it can affect the stability of a nation state, even in Europe. It is very important that we recognise that and help it to grow, because it will bring wealth to our nation and our people.

Another threat is, undoubtedly, the horse meat scandal and everything that that brings, including the uncertainty at the present time. I will reassure you again, because I have been echoing it through our airwaves and our TV screens for weeks: I have 100% assurance of the quality of meat that we produce in Northern Ireland, which is 100% traceable and which comes from the farm. It comes from the gate to the plate. There is absolutely no issue with that.

6.45 pm

As has been mentioned, there is always a silver lining to every dark cloud. You have only to go to a butcher's shop these days to see the queues that are forming outside. Those people know about assurance and they trust the local industry and what it produces.

This is not only an opportunity for us to help our local butchers, but to export even further and tell the world that what we produce is good, lean, green meat. That signal should go out to the world; it is something that the Executive should be encouraged to do, and we will do it today.

Sandra Overend spoke about joined-up government and about all the Ministers working together. She mentioned the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and said that we did not want to burden her. We are looking forward to the aftermath of the next election, when we will have all three Departments to do the work. We need to join up government better and we need to have focus.

The agrifood strategy board, which the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment introduced along with DARD, is due to publish a report very soon. We look forward to that because it is about the stakeholders, who are the key drivers in the industry, being given the chance to inform government about the way forward. It is very important that we never lose sight of that and that we ask the experts what support they need and how we go about growing. It is important that we always keep an eye on the stakeholders and the experts in the industry.

There are still problems with Europe. The laying hens directive put a massive burden on our industry, as did the pigs directive. Yet, member states all over Europe do not enforce those rules while we do. That leaves our industry in a very difficult position, because it has done a lot of good but is penalised and left at a disadvantage when it comes to exporting its produce. That should not be allowed to happen.

There is a need to educate people in our sector, but there is also a very important indirect influence, which comes from scientists and experts who deal with and identify new threats and who help to eradicate diseases. Those people are very important and the industry cannot do without them.

I now turn to some other comments that were made by Members. Tom Buchanan talked about the importance of the agrifood sector, as we all did. He also mentioned the horse meat scandal, as we all have. We also talked about importing meat. Why are we still importing so much meat into this country when we export so much? We should look to exploit that at this time.

Chris Hazzard talked about the new innovation centre and highlighted the agriculture campuses, going into detail on the work at CAFRE and its work at Loughry and Enniskillen. He talked about the dangers of skills gaps, which is very important. We cannot leave anyone behind.

Jo-Anne Dobson talked about the popularity of farming and the agrifood sector at this time. She mentioned falling farm incomes, which is another threat to the industry. Farming succession is another serious threat. Graduates are coming out of universities and colleges but it takes them too long — nearly a lifetime — to take over the family business. We need to look at that, and I know that the Ulster Farmers' Union and others are looking at the issue of farming succession.

Joe Byrne welcomed the fact that the DUP brought the motion to the House. We appreciate his kind words. He talked about the work of the agriculture colleges and about adding value to sustain the sector. He also mentioned government financial input, which is very important. It is important that the Minister not only supports the colleges and the universities with funding for places, but with money for research and innovation.

Sandra Overend mentioned her desperate desire to help the pig industry. I understand that, because Sandra knows that industry all too well. It needs support, along with our other major giants.

One of the major giants, which no one ever seems to mention, is the bakeries. Bakeries are up there when it comes to employment in the agrifood sector. We always seem to forget that. We talk about the production of food and meat, but we forget about the bakeries and how much employment they bring, which is very important.

I take what the Minister said about the commitment to funding, research places and a future skills action plan.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Frew: We welcome his words about the STEM subjects and the importance of STEM to this sector.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the importance of the agrifood sector to the Northern Ireland economy; believes that this sector has the potential for significant growth in the future; recognises the need for graduates in this area and calls on the Minister for Employment and Learning and the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to promote graduate programmes in this sector, particularly within our two universities.

Adjourned at 6.50 pm.

Ministerial Statements

Social Housing

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):

With your permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement on my proposals for social housing following the fundamental review of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE). Further to my written statement to the Assembly on 9 January, I want to take this opportunity to address Assembly colleagues and provide more information on the proposed new structures.

The change in structures is required to ensure that we can continue to deliver well-maintained housing stock, improve the focus on strategy and ensure value for money for taxpayers in the future. That restructuring should not be approached with anxiety. Rather, it is an opportunity for us to become more efficient and innovative in delivering and maintaining social housing to taxpayers and tenants alike.

Over the past few years, there have been a number of reports that recommended that it was time to review the structures to ensure future service delivery. In particular, the Savills stock condition survey report on the NIHE housing stock, which was published in May 2009, identified that over £5 billion of investment would be required over the next 30 years to maintain the current NIHE stock, which Northern Ireland obviously cannot afford. It is important that we look at innovative and sustainable ways of providing social housing, in particular how best we can use the capital value of the housing stock and the rental income to secure borrowing to meet the future need.

I want to stress from the outset that I view this as the start of a process of discussion and deliberation during which my Department will engage and consult widely with key stakeholders to develop the detail behind these high-level proposals and to ensure that there is consensus and agreement. I am committed to working closely with the Social Development Committee and other stakeholders throughout this process.

The Housing Executive has a long track record over the past 40 years of improving social housing stock. My proposals for the reform of social housing are about acknowledging the past achievements in social housing provision whilst clearly focusing on future sustainability and delivery for the benefit of tenants and the taxpayer. The fundamental review of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive by PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) in 2011 found that the current model and structures no longer allowed optimal delivery of either strategic housing or landlord services. The consensus from a series of meetings with stakeholders concluded that the "do nothing" option was not a realistic solution.

Over the past few weeks since I made the written statement, there has been a lot of unhelpful and perhaps uninformed speculation about my proposals. In light of that and before I outline the proposals, let me say something about what they are not. They are not fully agreed detailed proposals. They are a high-level vision and strategic direction of travel that brings to a new stage much of the discussion and debate that there has been about reform of social housing over the past number of years. It removes the uncertainty about what we are trying to achieve and allows open debate, discussion and consultation on how we can achieve that vision to ensure that we have consensus and agreement. They are not about abolishing the Housing Executive. They are about improving the structures for the delivery of those functions. They do not herald large-scale job losses, and, as I have made clear, the staff in the Housing Executive currently delivering landlord and non-landlord functions will still have to deliver those functions but in different, more focused and financially sustainable structures.

By the end of March 2015, I aim to have in place a sustainable housing system that delivers regional social housing needs through new landlord structures and housing associations and is strategically directed, governed and regulated. There are several proposals that I wish to be explored and developed. First, the Department will continue to have responsibility for overall housing strategy, policy, legislation and funding. Such a model recognises the key role of the Minister, the Executive and the Assembly in establishing and scrutinising the overall housing strategy and priorities for Northern Ireland. My publication of the draft housing strategy for Northern Ireland, 'Facing the Future', on 15 October clearly shows the lead role that is expected of and should be delivered by the Minister and the Department responsible for housing.

Secondly, I want to ensure robust regulation and inspection of the housing sector. That is an essential element of any new structures. The Department operates a robust regulation and inspection regime that provides assurance to the Minister and accounting officer on the quality of services provided by and governance of the housing sector. I want the landlord function of the Housing Executive to clearly operate in that regime, be subject to inspection and be required to register with the Department, as do all other social housing providers. I propose to expand on the existing powers of regulation to include additional powers of intervention and direction where shortcomings are found. That will be within a robust regulatory framework that provides assurances to me, as Minister, and to the Committee that social housing providers that receive public funds are operating appropriately.

In the context of a rent-setting regime, I propose that an independent social housing rent panel is established to agree annual rent levels within the parameters of a fiscal rental policy based on affordability set by me, as Minister, and subject to the scrutiny of the Assembly. This is a critical issue, and it is important to stress that rent policy will be set by the Minister.

I intend that the current Housing Executive non-landlord functions will fall under the remit of a Northern Ireland regional housing body. A number of key housing operations and services currently undertaken by the Housing Executive will need to be delivered at a regional level. This will be a body of housing professionals and experts providing and delivering key operational strategies and services — in effect, the non-landlord functions including but not limited to administration of the common selection scheme; assessment of need; the social housing development programme; warm homes; and Supporting People. I am clear that these key functions will remain with the regional housing body. Currently, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is classified as a public corporation. The development of these proposals will require legislative change and include consideration of the most appropriate vehicle for such a body — for example, a non-departmental public body or an agency. In either case, there will be a need to review the governance and board structures to take account of the legislative changes and the new roles and responsibilities.

I support the case for separating the landlord function to both allow appropriate focus on this area of service provision to tenants and to ensure that the landlord function can access private funding to allow suitable investment. The case for the separation of the new landlord function and the positioning of it within the housing association movement is dependent on agreement on the financial considerations, notably the reclassification of the new body being outwith the public sector. Key to this and central to the consideration of the right structures this is why I referred to the housing association movement - is that we need structures that will be acceptable to and therefore funded by the financial institutions. They will need to have the confidence of the financial institutions. The design process will consider how this can be achieved, looking at the current housing association model and the potential for bespoke bodies to take this forward. Another consideration is how to effectively engage tenants in this process to ensure a focus on tenant services and social housing delivery and improvement. I have no preconceptions of how many landlords there will be, as this will be subject to further analysis, including financial consideration, economic appraisals and engagement with key stakeholders.

To establish effective local government liaison, I propose to review the role of the Housing Council. The Housing Council was established in 1971 and is an advisory and consultative body that considers any matter affecting housing referred to it by the Department or the Housing Executive. The Housing Council is made up of one nominee from each of the current 26 councils. In considering the proposed new housing structures, I was mindful of the need to look at the role of the Housing Council, both in this context and taking account of the role of the Assembly and Assembly scrutiny, and the local government reform proposals and the future functions of councils. The Housing Council in its present format and structure is not the best model for the new system. I propose to consult on the best means to achieve local council engagement in relation to housing matters.

My departmental officials have commenced the programme of work to explore and develop these proposals, the first steps of which have only begun since the written statement was made. On the day that the statement was made, my officials held discussions with the chief executive and the Housing Executive director of personnel and management services to address primary staff concerns and to work jointly to allay staff anxieties. My officials and I have met other stakeholders in the few short weeks since the written statement was issued — the NIHE board, NIPSA, the Social Development Committee, the Housing Council and the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations — to further dialogue that began under the review of the NIHE and to begin the process of collaborative working on taking the proposals forward and addressing concerns. In particular, the Social Development Committee has a key part to play in providing scrutiny of the design of the new structures.

10.45 am

My Department is developing a programme of work to fully explore and design my proposals. A programme board has been established that includes the chief executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, to provide oversight of the delivery of this reform. The board's first meeting was held on 28 January.

I am committed to working collaboratively on this process, and I am keen to explore all options for the delivery of sustainable social housing both for tenants and taxpayers. I am committed to ensuring that the implications for staff arising from future structural changes are carefully managed. A detailed programme of projects will be established to deliver reform changes, and human resource issues will be a key aspect of that. Processes for communication and engagement with staff and their representatives will be an important part of the overall work programme.

I want to make one matter very clear. Much has been achieved in housing over the past 40 years. However, changes need to occur if we want to ensure that social housing in Northern Ireland can be a success for the next 40 years. The PwC report concluded and stakeholders agreed:

"'do nothing' is not an option."

Now is the time for change.

The strategic direction, as set out in my proposed plans, is not without its challenges. However, it sets out a compelling and sustainable future vision for new structures to support the future development and delivery of housing in Northern Ireland. It is my belief that this is what we need to do to support the most vulnerable in our society, and my Executive colleagues have supported the exploration of the proposals. I trust that colleagues across the Chamber will also endorse this approach.

Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. With your indulgence, I will make a few remarks on behalf of the Social Development Committee. I thank the Minister for his statement to the Assembly.

I have had the opportunity to discuss some of these matters at length with the Minister prior to this. The Committee has taken a keen interest in the need to take housing issues forward in this mandate. Although welfare reform has rightly dominated the Committee's programme of work until now, the Committee has argued the need for an overarching housing strategy. The future provision of social housing is, of course, a key element of that.

The Committee has acknowledged the Minister's assurance that this announcement heralds almost a blank canvas that will provide the opportunity for all stakeholders, including tenants, to have a real say in shaping social housing going into the future. The Committee also welcomes the Minister's confirmation that there are no predetermined outcomes for the precise model for the delivery of the landlord function.

The Committee is keen to work with the Minister and his Department in the time ahead, and it is committed to doing so not only so that it can scrutinise the Department's work in this very important area of social policy but so that it can help the Minister and his Department to shape the proposals. As the Minister said, the aim is to make sure that this is a positive development — I believe that it can and will be — so that we will end this mandate setting housing structures and can go into the next mandate and the next 20 or 30 years on a very positive and solid foundation. That means that we can ensure that the people we collectively represent who are in need of a home will get that home and a roof over their head.

Ms P Bradley: I also thank the Minister for his statement. One of the issues that will be in the mind of many Housing Executive tenants will be the sort of benefits that can come from this reform package. Will the Minister give some details of any stock transfers that have already taken place and say how the issue of improvements and rents can be dealt with?

Mr McCausland: I will address the transfer of stock to housing associations. The first to take place was the Rinmore scheme in Londonderry. That was a good example. There were a total of 55 houses in Rinmore, an area in Creggan in Londonderry. That scheme transferred from the Housing Executive to Apex. Of the 55 properties, 14 have had improvements completed, with the rent charge increasing accordingly. Four are currently undergoing improvements, and the rent charge has not changed at this stage. Improvements to the remaining 37 properties have not yet commenced, and, again, the rent charge has not changed.

There are good examples of work that will be carried forward: multi-element improvements to kitchens, rewiring bathrooms and improving installation and energy efficiency. There are two critical factors in the transfer. First, tenants have been able to benefit from properties that have been significantly improved through the housing association being able to lever in private finance to fund the work, which is something that simply would not have been achieved from the public purse alone. Secondly, throughout the process, tenants were made fully aware of the implications of the transfer for them, not only in improving their home but in other matters.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his long statement. It is disappointing that he said little apart from wishing to "explore" and "develop" proposals for which there is already scant detail. Given that, in July 2012, the Minister accused the Housing Executive of having failed its tenants, I am sure that neither he nor his party, for a series of other reasons, will be sad to see it go. Will he tell us about the future for undeveloped land owned by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive?

Mr McCausland: The Member refers to comments that I made about failures and shortcomings in the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I am sure that the concerns that I expressed at that time were shared by Members from all parties across the Chamber, because there were serious matters to do with the quality of delivery for tenants and serious questions about the value for money of some of the management and maintenance contracts.

I have had real concerns about the operation of the Housing Executive since coming into the Department. Therefore, I believe that we are going in the right direction of travel. We are in a better place than we were. We have a new chairman and vice-chairman who have brought great expertise and experience to the Housing Executive, and that has been transformative. We also have a new chief executive. A lot of good work is going on, and there is a good relationship there moving forward.

The Member asked questions about the structure and so on. All those things will be teased out over the next while. The land currently in the ownership of the Housing Executive is a valuable asset. There is work to be done on all these things. We want to ensure that a full business case is worked out for every aspect of the process and every opportunity and every possible line of travel is explored. I do not want to start closing down anything at this stage. We need to start exploring ways in which to get the best outcome and best value for tenants and taxpayers.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his statement and welcome the proper manner in which it was brought to the House. The Minister's aim to have a new system and new structures in place by the end of this mandate is ambitious. On the landlord function, his statement indicates the potential for bespoke bodies to be looked at. At this early stage, can the Minister give any details of how those bespoke bodies might look or operate?

Mr McCausland: There are two points there. First, we should be ambitious, and the people of Northern Ireland deserve that we be ambitious, so that we get the best possible outcome as soon as possible. That is for the benefit of tenants and the taxpayer. Secondly, it would be presumptuous of and inappropriate for me to spell out at this stage what the bespoke structures might be. That is the work that the programme oversight body now needs to take forward. Every opportunity will be afforded for input. If the Member has particular views and ideas, those will certainly be welcomed. We will take views from the Social Development Committee and other stakeholders as we move forward.

I say in passing — I made this comment earlier — that it is important that we make sure that, whatever form it takes, the landlord function has the confidence of the financial institutions so that we get the benefit of drawing in private sector money.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his statement. I must say that it is somewhat concerning and startling that a statement of this significance on the most fundamental reform of housing in years has failed to make any reference to the deeply segregated nature of housing in Northern Ireland. I ask the Minister what support and challenges he will give to the new structures to ensure that they meet the Belfast Agreement requirement to encourage and facilitate shared and mixed housing in Northern Ireland.

Mr McCausland: That point has been made on a number of occasions by Members of the Alliance Party. I will simply say that we are dealing here with the social housing sector. Segregation is also a factor in the private sector. Many areas where everyone is a homeowner are as deeply segregated as any other, so it is not unique to the social housing sector. Moving forward, we also need to bear it in mind that social housing segregation can often also be related to other forms of segregation. The Member will be aware that we have segregated education and we have sporting organisations that are effectively segregated. All these things are interrelated because they are all part of society, and they impact on each other and on where people want and decide to live.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Minister for his comprehensive statement. One of the issues that will have to be dealt with will be the significant stock transfer from the Housing Executive. Can the Minister give an indication of his assessment of the capability of the housing association sector to deal with that possible transfer?

Mr McCausland: At the moment, the housing association sector in Northern Ireland has 34,000 houses. We have 29 associations. There are mergers going on. Six associations are currently suspended from developing, and 23 are free to develop. So, it is a mixed story. There are encouraging aspects, and there are some that are not so encouraging and require a lot of support. That having been said, even the largest association has 4,600 properties, so you are dealing with associations with fewer than 5,000 houses. We are dealing here with 90,000 stock. There is a huge disparity there. That is why, at an earlier stage, I spoke about bespoke housing associations.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh mile maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. It certainly puts more flesh on the bones of the future of housing and where the strategic direction will be over the next 30 years. However, is it not the Minister's intention to break the landlord function into three separate bodies that would see a north-western housing association, a Belfast housing association and a south-eastern housing association, each containing 30,000 houses? If that is the case, would it not be detrimental to dealing with social need and high housing demand?

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Mr McCausland: On the question of whether you would break it up into three separate associations or whatever, all these things are still to be explored. There is some evidence from initial conversations with the financial institutions that they would prefer and be more favourable towards a number of housing associations or bodies rather than a single one, but all that is open to discussion over the next while. Nothing is predetermined. If that is a view that the Member wishes to put forward, I will be happy to consider it.

Mr Anderson: I also thank the Minister for his detailed statement. In relation to good housing standards, will the restructuring of housing lead to a better standard of housing for the many tenants of the Housing Executive who live in homes without cavity walls and, therefore, have no wall insulation, which results in them facing real fuel poverty due to huge heating costs that they can ill afford?

11.00 am

Mr McCausland: The Member touches on an important point, which is that we have to face up to the backlog of work in maintaining the quality of stock. The £5 billion of investment that I said would be required over the next 30 years is a significant figure. In the short term, about £1 billion worth of work is required, and that money is simply not there at the moment.

The Member highlighted the issue of the quality of housing. There are about 9,000 social housing stock properties in Northern Ireland that date to just after the Second World War. In fact, many were built in the 1950s, without wall cavities and, therefore, have no cavity wall insulation. In the past, the issue may not have been as immediate but it certainly is now when fuel prices are rising and people are much affected by fuel poverty.

As a result of having no cavity wall insulation, those houses are very hard to heat. There can also be issues of dampness and other problems that flow from that. There needs to be major investment if we are to deal with that sort of work. I am concerned not only that we move forward with our housing development programme but that we ensure that tenants in older properties are enabled to live in a property that is fit for the present century and easy to heat. At the moment, 9,000 properties do not meet those standards, so there is a huge amount of work to be done. That was identified as a piece of work to be explored as to the best way forward.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for his statement, which dispelled a little of the mist but not a lot. At the risk of sounding cynical, is the Housing Executive, having failed to keep its properties properly maintained over the years, now divesting itself of them at virtually no cost to the housing associations? How many landlords will then be there to pick up the pieces? Has any financial work or an economic appraisal been done on the whole exercise vis-à-vis switching particular estates to housing associations, presumably at a knock-down price? How can we ensure out of all of that, Minister, that new building will be going ahead on top of the maintenance that we are hoping will be done by those associations that will gain the houses?

Mr McCausland: I would encourage the Member to read the PwC report, which did quite a lot of work on exploring the best way forward. He asked whether calculations were done. Of course they were done. That was part of the PwC report. Now, as we move forward to the next stage of the process, everything will be assessed as to the financial viability, the best outcome and what produces the best result. This is all about producing a better outcome for the people of Northern Ireland, for the tenants and the taxpayers.

It is clear that many tenants — and the figure of 9,000 tenants was mentioned — are still living in post-war properties that do not have cavity wall insulation. That is simply unacceptable in this day and age. When you look at an issue such as that, the shambles over some of the maintenance contracts that we had with the Housing Executive, and the difficulties with contractors, it is clear that we need to change the situation. Doing nothing is not an option but everything will be properly assessed as we move forward.

I am not clear as to the reasons for the Member's doubts about the need for this. I think that it is absolutely essential.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. The statement referred to the strategic arm of housing; the non-landlord functions; administration of the common selection scheme; assessment of need; the social housing development programme; warm homes; and supporting people. Where does the administration of housing benefit fit in with those proposals? Will it be taken on by another Department or will it be administered by the private sector?

Mr McCausland: The issue of housing benefit is now subsumed into universal credit, so that process is being worked through the Assembly, albeit somewhat slowly.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aíre. On the ninety-odd thousand houses presently in the management of the Housing Executive, would their future not be better placed under the management of a single landlord?

Mr McCausland: Some people have suggested three; some have suggested one; I have heard people suggest five. All sorts of numbers are floating about. That is a piece of work that is still to be carried out. In due course, when we have had a full exploration and full consultation with stakeholders, the Social Development Committee and everyone with a potential input, we will come to a conclusion. It would be totally wrong, and I am sure Members would not expect me to do so, to prejudge the outcome of a consultation and deliberation that is only just starting.

Mr Allister: In the early part of his statement, the Minister reminded us that the stock condition survey, back in 2009, showed that, over the next 30 years, there would need to be investment of £5 billion — money that we could not afford. The Minister's magic bullet seems to be to get in private money. How does he then square the circle of interesting the private sector to that extent while, at the same time, maintaining rents at an affordable level? Is that not really the challenge that the Minister faces? How does he intend to meet the financial deficit while keeping the rents at an affordable level?

Mr McCausland: That is a question that the Member has asked previously. It is clear that £5 billion worth of work is to be done over a period of time. That would be funded through borrowing from financial institutions. That is now the practice elsewhere in the United Kingdom. Go to Glasgow or other parts of Scotland, England and Wales, and you will see that that is now the way in which housing is structured. So, we are getting in line with others who have already moved down this road. Financial institutions do have an interest in this. They are prepared to invest, if we have the right structure.

As to the level of rents, I will be setting the framework and policy within which the new social housing rent panel will operate. That will be subject to Assembly scrutiny. The panel will be an advisory body that will set annual rent levels within the overall policy framework based around the fundamental principles of affordability and sustainability. The social housing reform programme will develop the details of how the panel will be established and the parameters in which it will operate.

The Member is, I presume, also referring to the fact that, in general, housing association rents are a bit higher than Housing Executive rents. However, look, for example, at the cost to those 9,000 people living in houses with no cavity walls and no cavity wall insulation. Look at the amount of money they are spending on fuel to produce heat that is going out through the walls. Set that against any modest rent increase, and you will see that they would probably be in a better financial position than they are at the moment. Good housing that is structurally energy efficient and cuts costs is bound to be for the good of tenants. That is the direction in which we need to move.

Ms Brown: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he detail for the House the current subvention from the Northern Ireland block grant to the Housing Executive?

Mr McCausland: In subvention to the Housing Executive, in 2012-13, the total funding provided from the Northern Ireland block grant is £307 million. Excluding the funding that relates to the programmes administered on behalf of DSD, the SHDP, grants, etc, the net subvention to the Housing Executive is around £75 million this year. Rental income this year is around £270 million, and, with annual increases of retail price index (RPI) plus 1%, which is the norm, rents collectable increases by about £10 million each year. That is the current level of subvention to the Housing Executive.

Schools: Area Planning

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Le do chead, a Cheann Comhairle, ba mhaith liom ráiteas a dhéanamh ar an obair phleanáil ceantair atá déanta go data agus soiléiriú a dhéanamh ar an bhealach a ba mhian liom an próiseas a chur chun cinn le linn an trasdula i dtreo ÚSO. With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the area planning work that has been undertaken to date and set out how I intend to move the process forward during the transition towards the Education and Skills Authority (ESA).

In the delivery of public services, it is essential to plan for the future to ensure that provision is appropriate to best meet the needs of the population. We have a legacy of some 1,100 schools that were established along sectoral lines, without sufficient efforts to strategically plan the pattern of provision. In future, we need a planned network of educationally and financially sustainable schools that are capable of delivering the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework.

In September 2011, I commissioned the education and library boards, working with the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) and the other sectors, to develop area plans based on meeting the future educational needs of our young people. That process was grounded in the Department's sustainable schools policy. Seo an chéad uair ar tugadh faoi phleanáil straitéiseach le haghaidh soláthar oideachais ar an scála seo. This is the first time that strategic planning for education provision has been undertaken on that scale. It was the first time that sectors had been asked to plan together. I wanted the planning authorities to set aside individual, sectoral or institutions' needs and focus on how, as a society, we could best provide for the needs of all children and young people in an area.

The sustainable schools policy sets out the minimum number of pupils needed for schools to be deemed sustainable. Too many have focused on that minimum rather than on assessing the practicalities involved in delivering the entitlement framework as part of an education system that is fit for the 21st century. However, I have always made it clear, and I reiterate it now: area planning is not about budget cuts or school closures simply to save money. It is about strong, vibrant schools using the limited resources that we have, efficiently and effectively, to secure better outcomes for all children and young people. It is not about what is best for an institution; it is about what is best for pupils.

I turn now to the viability audit. To ensure there was a common understanding of the challenges facing education here, I believed that we needed to provide comprehensive information on each and every school. So, information on the quality of provision, enrolment levels and financial capability was drawn together for each school. They were known as the viability audits, which were published by the boards in March 2012.

For the first time, parents and the wider public had access to information about the level of pressure some schools were facing and would continue to face into the future. I think I can safely say that they sparked an important and, sometimes, heated debate. The audits were maligned in some quarters and misquoted or misused in others, but they helped us all to understand the extent of the problems facing our education system and allowed informed debate and discussions, which would not have happened previously, to occur.

Going forward, I want to ensure that schools, parents and stakeholders continue to have that information available. I want to see the ongoing mature debate that is needed to deliver practical area solutions. Therefore, today, I am reporting that my Department will build on the viability audits. My officials will identify relevant, up-to-date information at school and area level on such issues as finance, enrolment and performance, and I will require the boards, and, subsequently, ESA, to publish that information annually, commencing in April of this year. That information will be designed to give the public a clear picture of the shape of education provision in their area.

I turn now to post-primary plans. I took receipt of the post-primary plans at the end of December 2012. That followed a public consultation exercise with almost 50,000 responses. That level of response is to be welcomed. There were individual responses from parents, pupils, school governors and staff, education sectoral bodies, elected representatives and the wider public. Some responses were petitions about saving individual schools that were perceived to be under threat, while others took a more strategic view about the vision for the future of our education system.

The consultation responses recognised the underlying issues and the need for change. However, I recognise that change is never easy. Overall, there was a desire for greater clarity on the proposals, more opportunity for engagement and greater consistency across the plans. There was a call for more innovative ideas and a willingness to explore more cross-sectoral solutions.

11.15 am

A LeasCheann Comhairle, in moving forward with area planning, we will endeavour to take those underlying themes on board. I take this opportunity to thank those who are responsible for the development of the plans. They sought to respond to the challenges that were laid down. My Department has assessed the draft area plans against the terms of reference and guidance. Although the plans do not totally meet the terms of reference that I set out, they do, in some areas, contain sound proposals. I regard them as the foundation on which to move forward.

Some areas of the plans are well developed. For example, there are firm proposals in Lurgan for amalgamations in the Catholic maintained sector. I know that many people have done a lot of soul-searching, and I am pleased to say that, by assessing the issues realistically, a very practical solution has been arrived at that is in the best interest of young people.

In Enniskillen, the Western Education and Library Board (WELB) articulated a clear plan for the controlled and voluntary grammar sector. I have announced that that will now be advanced in planning. Again, with regard to the Western Board area, I confirm today that I am moving ahead with the Programme for Government (PFG) commitment to develop the Lisanelly site as a shared education campus and the area-planning solution for Omagh. I will inform the relevant schools' managing authorities that future investment in the Omagh area will be prioritised towards schools being built on the Lisanelly site.

Not surprisingly, there are many areas where there are a number of interrelated complexities to address. They will require a good deal more work to bring about an agreed solution

An area-planning solution for west Belfast remains elusive. I find that unacceptable, particularly in the light of the most recent report into child poverty, which highlighted west Belfast as having the highest levels of child poverty. A proven way out of poverty is quality education. CCMS and the Commission for Catholic Education need to bring forward definitive plans that provide equality of access to quality education for all the children of west Belfast without further delay.

Also In Belfast, we are faced with a particular situation with the number of young people who currently travel into the city. Over 12,000 pupils travel into Belfast from other areas every day, and almost 10,000 of them come from the South Eastern Education and Library Board (SEELB) area. We need to ask ourselves whether that is what we want for the future. Is it sustainable economically, educationally and environmentally? I will commission a specific piece of work to look at that issue. I want all sectors to be involved. I want dialogue with schools and communities that will result in practical long-term solutions. The pattern of provision in the corridor between the South Eastern Board and the Belfast Board areas is an area on which I believe that more focused and detailed work is required. I will also ask the relevant boards to give that immediate attention.

With regard to the next steps, I have written today to the chairpersons of the boards and CCMS outlining the Department's views on each of the area plans and setting out how I plan to move forward. I have also directed that the plans that were submitted to me in December 2012 should be made available to the public on the boards' websites

I have highlighted specifically a number of areas where I wish to see action. They include, for all boards, further development of a single approach to area planning and the presentation and content of the area plans; introduction of an appropriate mechanism to facilitate active engagement between all sectors to ensure that each has the opportunity to influence the proposals; and development of an action plan to deal with the specific priority areas and to address gaps in the area plans.

Planning to plan is not enough. We need to build on the achievements to date and to maintain the momentum on area planning. The time for endless discussion is over. It is now time for decisions.

As we move towards ESA, my Department will provide clarity and leadership on area planning. In the coming weeks, my officials will work closely with each board and CCMS on the details of their area plans and on where further work is needed.

To co-ordinate and oversee the continuing development of area plans, I will establish an area-planning steering group to be chaired by the deputy permanent secretary. The group's work programme will be aimed at filling the gaps in the current draft plans, embedding a single approach to area planning and identifying priority areas for action in the short to medium term. Membership of the group will include the controlled, maintained, integrated and Irishmedium sectors.

The primary area plans that I commissioned were received in my Department at the end of January 2013. I have directed that they be released for consultation on 19 March, with an extended consultation period open until the end of June. That will allow for wide-ranging discussion. My intention is that dialogue at local level, taking on board the lessons learned in the post-primary process, will result in more practical and sustainable solutions, including the potential, where appropriate, for increased sharing of accommodation and resources. I am also conscious that my response to the recently published independent review of the common funding scheme is likely to impact on primary school planning in the medium to long term. However, I am clear that we cannot delay. We must press ahead with planning in the primary sector.

We must ensure that our primary education sector can continue to demonstrate its ability to perform at the highest international level, as illustrated by the recent progress in international reading literacy study (PIRLS) and trends in international mathematics and science study (TIMSS) report. That means that we need to ensure that our schools are focused on quality of teaching and learning, not struggling to survive.

Change of this scale needs to be managed, and we will continue to take account of the constraints on recurrent and capital budgets that we are facing in the coming years. School budgets need to be used to maximise the impact for the benefit of children and young people.

I have made clear that the new school building programme needs to support strong, vibrant schools that are capable of delivering high-quality education long into the future. My recent announcements on the school building programme have been grounded in the principles of area planning and the work done to date. Investment will continue to be targeted at proposals where there is clarity and agreement on the shape of area provision. I will say to managing authorities, schools and their communities that it is now time to look to the future. Protracted debate and avoidance of decision-making will mean delayed or no investment.

Area plans for special schools were submitted to my Department in February 2012. Some of the plans included special units alongside the consideration of dedicated special school facilities. That made it difficult to determine an overall regional picture of the highly specialised facilities needed to support our most vulnerable children. The plans also predated the finalisation of the special educational needs review. I have decided that we need a co-ordinated regional assessment of future need for dedicated special schools. Therefore, I am commissioning the development of a regional plan for those schools, which will aim to be completed within six months of the commencement date.

A Cheann Comhairle, mar fhocal scoir, creidim go bhfuil réadú atá ag méadú go bhfuil athrú ag tástail agus ag tarlú. There is a growing realisation that change is needed and is happening. Area planning is the key to securing the changes needed to make our education system capable of competing with and, hopefully, exceeding the achievements of the best in the world. To make that happen, we need to be progressive and forward-thinking. Most of all, we need to show leadership. That means leadership at every level. We need to set aside any form of self-interest and put the interests of all our children and young people at the centre of the process. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Craig: I listened with interest to the Minister's statement. He referred several times to the viability audit that took place. Has he absolutely confirmed in his mind that the information in that audit is 100% accurate? There is some anecdotal information that suggests that false targets were set for some schools, which put them into stress in the audit when, in reality, only around 25 post-primary schools are in stress. Does the Minister concede that there may be issues around the accuracy of the audit?

Mr O'Dowd: I cannot comment on the accuracy of the audits because they have not been published. They will be published in April. However, I assure the Member that a robust process will be put in place to check the authenticity of the information in the documents. The viability audit that was published previously was proof-checked with the schools involved. I understand that all the documents were passed by the schools and managing authorities before they were published. I am aware of one or two cases in which schools questioned documents following their publication. Doubts were cast about some of the information. However, that was only in one or two cases that were brought to my attention.

I assure the Member that we will liaise with the Education Committee on the information that will be published in the documents. I am not fixated on the title "viability audits", as that may thrown up the wrong assumptions about what the document is about. We will choose an appropriate title and check with the Education Committee what information it believes should be contained in it and how that information should be validated, etc. We will move forward from there.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I welcome the Minister's statement to the House. I especially welcome his commitment to examine the ongoing practice of bussing more than 10,000 pupils from the south-eastern region in and out of Belfast each day. For seven years, I was one of those pupils, and I know only too well how long a school day can be when you are required to travel on four or five buses a day just to get to and from school. Moreover, given that many of our inner-city communities suffer from educational underachievement, that practice of feeding the proliferation of selective schools in Belfast is definitely not benefiting the communities they are there to serve. Will the Minister give a commitment to look at that when he moves forward with the focused work on this issue?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his question. When we look at the information about inner-city Belfast and at where some of the selective schools are placed, it is clear that they are not benefiting the local communities around them.

As you put it, 10,000 pupils from the South Eastern Education and Library Board area and 12,000 pupils in total are bussed into Belfast every day to attend school. Now, it is a major city and you would expect a certain amount of flow into it. However, questions have been asked about whether some of the selective schools are in the right place in the greater Belfast area, or whether they should go to where the main draw of their catchment is. I am not answering those questions. They have been posed to me, and we need to put in a mechanism that will bring us to the answers and how we move forward in the future.

Clearly, in education provision in inner Belfast, I have posed the question about west Belfast, but that question could also be asked of north Belfast. What is being done to ensure that those who live in inner-city Belfast or in socially deprived areas are gaining access high-quality schools? The area plans do not answer those questions, but I believe that the answers are easily accessible.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for a very welcome statement. There is much in it that we have been calling for, but I particularly welcome the, as he put it, "more opportunity for engagement". Despite the consultation process getting lots of answers, there is a still a mass of parents and teachers who do not know what is going on. When we get to the steering group, which I welcome, how will he make sure that it actually listens to principals and teachers, those who are not on it and, particularly, the voluntary grammars as well?

Mr O'Dowd: The role of the steering group is to examine the plans as they are currently formatted and to see how we can close the gaps in those plans. If there are dramatic changes to the plans as a result of those further discussions, and in circumstances where firmer proposals come out, there will be a need for consultation. However, in even the exercise of getting the plans in to shape, there will be a need for further discussion with local communities, schools and community leaders in those areas — whether that be informal or formal discussions around these matters. The key point that we have to get to is the decision-making. I emphasise again that future investment will be made in areas where decisions are made. Protracted conversations and the avoidance of decision-making is not the way forward for this matter.

There are lessons to be learned from the post-primary area planning process and from how the boards conducted the consultation process. I want this to be more hands on, and I want communities, school leaders and community and political leaders to be involved. That will not necessarily be a simple paper exercise; it has to be face to face as often as possible. I also want people to involve themselves not in the needs of individual schools, but in what it says on the tin. This is about area plans; let us discuss the educational needs of areas, rather than bogging ourselves down with the needs of individual schools.

11.30 am

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note his concern about "finance, enrolment and performance" and that he does not want children travelling around the country. I also note that he met the UN representative on the rights of the child recently. Will he reassure me that rural children, families and communities will have the same access to education services that is enjoyed by their urban counterparts as area planning progresses?

Mr O'Dowd: I assure the Member of that, and he will note that my sustainable schools policy was rural-proofed. Any future policies or decisions that flow will also be rural-proofed.

I am glad that he mentioned my meeting with the Chairperson of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child. The meeting with that gentleman, who has since given a speech to representatives of the community in Belfast, was very informative. There is a responsibility on us all to ensure that the commitments of the UN rights of the child are delivered, and I ask all parties to examine their own positions and policies to ensure that they are in line with the recommendations of the UN Rights of the Child Committee

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his statement, towards the start of which is the interesting line that he wants:

"the planning authorities to set aside individual sectoral or institution needs".

Yet, from this process so far, it is hard to draw any conclusion other than it will be an exercise in area planning within existing sectors. Is the Minister prepared to give a commitment that, in the right circumstances, the Department will honour its obligation to encourage and facilitate the integrated sector and will actively consider that model, if it is the best option, taking into account parental preference and all other considerations?

Mr O'Dowd: I will defend robustly anywhere that my Department has stood up to its responsibilities to facilitate and promote the integrated education sector. However, as the Member said, it is a sector: can he guarantee me that, when the integrated sector goes into a room as a member of the steering group that I will set up, it will discuss education in its totality rather than the needs of the integrated sector? Will the Irish-medium sector go in and simply discuss its needs? Will the boards or indeed the CCMS go in with the same approach?

In my view, they are responsible enough to go into that steering group and discuss education needs in their totality and present their points of view on education. However, when it comes down to the planning and decision-making, I believe that all the sectors that will be represented around that table are more than capable of looking at the picture holistically, of ensuring that we come forward with plans that meet the needs of our education system in its totality and of placing a greater emphasis on sharing within education.

One of the reasons that I have established the steering group is that I am not satisfied that enough account was taken of all sectors' needs during the previous process. The Irish-medium sector and the integrated sector had lobbied me heavily to be on the previous body. I did not agree with them at that stage; but when I reflect on the current area plans, I believe that there is a need for them to be on the next steering group. They will be represented there, but as educationalists to bring forward area plans and not just to speak about the needs of their individual sectors.

Lord Morrow: The Minister talks in his statement about three actions points, the second of which is to craft an inclusive consultation process. He goes on to tell us that this inclusive process:

"will include the controlled, maintained, integrated and Irish-medium sectors".

Where does the voluntary grammar sector sit in this inclusive process?

Mr O'Dowd: I have not ruled out the inclusion of the voluntary grammar sector. The question that I have not answered —

Lord Morrow: You did not rule it in.

Mr O'Dowd: You have the answer as well as the question? You are brilliant. You have the answer as well as the question. Had I known that — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr O'Dowd: — If I had known that, I could have done without making the statement — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister will resume his seat. I have to tell both of you to make your remarks through the Chair, please.

Mr O'Dowd: I was just saying, Mr Deputy Speaker, that if I had known that, I could have stayed at home and he could have made the statement, asked the questions and answered them

I have not included the voluntary grammar sector because of the question of who represents it in planning at an areabased level.

Mr Allister: The Governing Bodies Association (GBA).

Mr O'Dowd: Does it? The Member is hinting to me that it is the GBA. If the voluntary grammar sector comes back to me and confirms that the GBA can act as its representative body in discussions on the totality of education, I will certainly take that into consideration. However, I want to be assured that those bodies that will sit around the table are there to represent the sector that they say they will represent and will enter those discussions based on the needs of education in its totality. So, let us have that discussion. I have no difficulty with having that discussion or that confirmation. I have not ruled them out. You are right that they are not on the list, but I have not ruled them out

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. Does he agree with me on what can be achieved by area planning? We only have to look at the unique achievements in the Strabane schools estate, with the amalgamation of the town's two post-primary schools and the ongoing amalgamation of some of the primary schools. That is one of the best examples of area planning being tried, tested and proven to work for the educational provision of our young people in Strabane. It is a good model for going forward. Does the Minister agree with that?

Mr O'Dowd: I think Strabane is a very good example of how area planning can and should work. It has not been an easy journey for either the controlled sector or the maintained sector in Strabane in reaching the decisions that they have made, but they have reached those decisions. They have made firm decisions on the way forward. The maintained sector has moved forward with the newbuild facility at Holy Cross College, and it is moving forward from strength to strength. The controlled sector is now moving forward as well. I have confirmed that its schools will move forward with area planning. A new school will be built, which will service the needs of the entire community in the Strabane area.

That is proof, is proof were needed, that area planning can work, and area planning will be backed up by the Minister and the Department with future investment. There are other examples, such as in Lurgan, where schools are coming together. Again, there were difficult and emotional discussions, but people have made the right decisions about the future of education in the area, and it can be done. I say to other areas that, when they are in doubt, they should look around for other examples of where it is working. Strabane is a fine example of where it is working.

Mr I McCrea: The Minister has made his statement, and I certainly heard a lot of words, but, unfortunately, not a lot of substance. Nonetheless, will the Minister detail a timeline of the next steps that he referred to in the statement? He said that we need to set aside any form of self-interest. Does that include the Minister?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, it does include the Minister. I am open and frank with the House. If I had the legislative ability — I assume that you are referring to academic selection — I would bring a proposal to the House to have the phased removal of academic selection, similar to that proposed by the previous Minister, Caitríona Ruane, over a three-year period. I would bring that forward. I am not going to get agreement on that at this stage, but that does not stop me working away to persuade people to move away from academic selection.

Area planning, however, is not simply about academic selection, although academic selection does have an impact on it. We have talked about the 12,000 people travelling into Belfast, the needs of the controlled sector and the needs of the maintained sector, and stuck in the middle of that is a group of voluntary grammar schools, which need to be facilitated. I will find out how we can facilitate them, but they also need to play their part in area planning and engage with the educational partners around them. Everyone has to have a bit of give and take in relation to how we move forward with area planning. My position not being achieved does not stop area planning moving forward. Others' positions not being achieved will not stop area planning moving forward.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for his statement. Given that area plans for special schools were submitted a year ago, why has it taken so long for the announcement of a regional assessment? Are children in special schools being left behind?

Mr O'Dowd: No, I do not believe that they are being left behind. We are quite lucky that our special schools estate is delivering a very good service to our young people. I introduced special needs area planning because I wanted to find out about the initial landscape of it. I used that initial plan to make a number of decisions about capital builds in relation to area planning around special needs facilities. I made a decision on a special needs school in Ballymena and one in west Belfast, the St Gerard's Educational Resource Centre, etc. So, the information has been used, but further work needs to be done as regards our special needs schools. We need to look at it on a regional basis.

The previous document that looked at special needs schools looked at units at schools, etc. I want a more focused piece of work around our special needs schools, because there is a wide travel distance for our young people travelling to some of the special needs schools.

I want to use this opportunity to wish all the young people who were, thankfully, not seriously injured in the crash this morning near Downpatrick, all the best. I understand from the latest reports that the majority of the young people are OK. The driver is shook up but, thankfully, no one was seriously injured in that accident. I wish them all the best.

No one has been left behind in area planning. I have made investments, and I want to ensure that the next piece of work that we do is more focused and more strategic.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his update, and I welcome the fact that there has been a large number of respondents to the consultation. It is clear that those voices need to be heard.

In his statement, the Minister said:

"There was a call for more innovative ideas and a willingness to explore more cross-sectoral solutions."

He also said:

"My Department has assessed the draft area plans against the terms of reference and guidance. Although the plans do not totally meet the terms of reference that I set out, in some areas, they contain sound proposals. I regard them as the foundation on which to move forward."

Does the Minister agree that the reference to looking at cross-border solutions has not been adhered to and that much more work needs to be done by the managing authorities to assess the opportunities that lie in our education sector there? Will he outline to the House how those opportunities can be delivered, particularly in places with particular needs such as rural County Fermanagh?

Mr O'Dowd: I agree with the Member. I do not believe that the cross-border element of the terms of reference has been fully achieved. There remains potential for cross-border planning of our schools estate to benefit people on both sides of the border. I want the steering group to look at that as a specific piece of work. We continue to have discussions at the North/South Ministerial Council with Minister Ruairí Quinn on those matters to see how we can move that process forward.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his statement. As he is very much aware, there is a strong lobby for new schools in the Holywood area. I see that there are proposals for further discussions on the corridor between the South Eastern Education and Library Board and the Belfast Education and Library Board areas. Will the Holywood newbuilds be included in those discussions?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes; in general, I see the Holywood newbuilds being part of those discussions. I will meet you and a delegation from Holywood in a number of weeks' time to further discuss those matters.

As I said previously to you and to representatives of the schools, we need a firm decision in that area, so that I, as Minister, can make a proposal on the way forward. I need decisions in the local area and a confirmed area plan for the area, which has to take into account the flow into Belfast and vice versa. There is a bit more work to be done in that regard, but I look forward to the discussions with you and representatives from the area, which will assist us in moving forward towards an agreed pathway for the Holywood area.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for his statement, in which he referred to the post-primary sector in Fermanagh. Where does the responsibility for the proposals lie and who will make the final decisions on their progress? Does it lie with the Department, the Western Education and Library Board or the schools' boards of governors?

Mr O'Dowd: That depends on the sector. If you are referring to the controlled sector, I can say that the decisions will rest with the relevant education and library board. Decisions for the maintained sector will rest with the maintained sector. Those bodies will have to be included in the discussions on the way forward for the area planning process. That will be the deciding factor in signing off on area plans.

I made an announcement about the controlled sector in Fermanagh. I made that decision on the basis of proposals that were brought forward by the Western Education and Library Board. I agreed that those proposals were the best way forward for the controlled sector in the Fermanagh area, and they are progressing through planning.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the announcement of a new school build at Glenwood Primary School in my constituency.

The Minister mentioned west Belfast in his statement but the problems that he acknowledged apply equally in north Belfast. There are major socio-economic problems right across the constituency. Will he take urban constituencies such as North Belfast into consideration and will his steering group, when it reports to him, consider working with groups such as Integrated Services for Children and Young People in the greater Shankill area to get a viable solution to the problems that face many young people across the constituency?

Mr O'Dowd: You are right. I emphasised west Belfast in my statement as an example of where decisions need to be made. Those decisions can be brought together more easily in urban areas than in rural communities, where there are longer travelling distances etc. However, we have instances in west Belfast — I will come to north Belfast in a second — of schools looking at each other across the roads and of schools on the one site divided by a fence. To me, not much area planning is required to bring a resolution to that issue.

11.45 am

I agree with the Member about North Belfast. I have received representations from representatives of North Belfast and the Shankill area about how we should move forward on the educational attainment of the young people in that area. That will take community involvement and the involvement of the education board and the Department. I am happy to play my part in all that as well. I am more than happy for the voices of the representative bodies in that area, which the Member referred to, to be heard as part of an area-planning process. Indeed, they need to be heard as part of that process.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. In the statement, he made reference to a number of plans in particular board areas. However, he did not mention the North Eastern Education and Library Board, which is a board that has progressed with more specific proposals than others. I imagine that the Minister has received a huge response to the proposals for schools in the Magherafelt area. Will he give us an insight into his thoughts on the way forward in the Magherafelt area? Does he recognise that there has been a lack of engagement that is resulting in increased anxiety in schools?

Mr O'Dowd: The danger of using examples in a speech is that you may leave others out. My speech was between 15 and 20 minutes long, and I thought that it was long enough. If I left board areas out, it does not mean that they do not have good examples. I recognise the work on area planning that the North Eastern Education and Library Board has conducted. Indeed, some of the capital announcements that I made previously were as a result of the work that the North Eastern Education and Library Board conducted.

I am not going to give my views on the Magherafelt area, because continuing work is required on that. However, I will encourage the Member, as an elected representative of the area, to ensure that the decision process moves forward and that she uses her influence. Decisions need to be made in the Magherafelt area, particularly on the controlled sector and what provision will look like in the future. It is an area that the steering group will have to look at. As I said, it is one of those areas in which I want decisions to be made. There is still work to be done there, but it does not need to be protracted or long ended. People need to make decisions; that is the key to success. It is not up to me to tell that local area from afar what the solution is. It needs to come together, make the decision and present the rationale for that decision to me, as Minister.

Mr Allister: The Minister is on record saying that, although area planning itself does not have a stated purpose of ending academic selection, it will contribute to changing the educational landscape in such a way as to make academic selection more irrelevant. Will the Minister, therefore, tell the House frankly how important a tool area planning is to him in liquidating academic selection? Is that his real driver in area planning? Will he be frank and candid with the House about that?

Mr O'Dowd: I thought that I was frank and candid with Mr McCrea when he asked me a similar question. I am on record saying that, if I believed that legislation for a phased removal of academic selection, which my predecessor, Caitríona Ruane, promoted, would pass through the Assembly, I would bring it to the Assembly. However, I know that we will not achieve consensus on that.

Is area planning the key to removing academic selection? No, it is not. However, I believe that the more that people discuss education and the more that educational partners in the one area come together, the more irrelevant academic selection becomes. You can then provide excellent education across a range of schools, or in one school, without the need for selecting and rejecting children at 11 years of age. I do not distance myself at all from the remarks that you attributed to me. I assure the Member that area planning is not some sort of clandestine method for me to remove academic selection. However, I believe that its outcomes, the discussions with educationalists and the realisation that you do not need academic selection for educational excellence will come to reality.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before calling the next Member, I will say that there is too much noise coming from the Benches. Please take private conversations outside. I call Mr Mervyn Storey.

Mr Storey: In his statement, the Minister refers to sectors, as other Members have done this morning. Will the Minister tell the House when CCMS will be brought into the tent or told to stay outside it? Quite clearly, the controlled sector has had enough.

Today, the Minister announced that, in March, he will progress with the area plans for primary schools. In the past 10 years, 50 controlled primary schools have closed, of which 19 were maintained schools. Ten controlled secondary schools have closed, of which three were maintained schools. No voluntary grammars have closed.

I say to the Minister and the House today that the purge on the controlled sector must come to an end. As the DUP spokesperson, I make it clear that that will have to be the case.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member please ask a question?

Mr Storey: Will the Minister give the House a clear indication and an assurance that CCMS's cavalier attitude to area planning will come to an end?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not recognise the claim that CCMS has a cavalier attitude to area planning. It is in the tent. If you want to ensure that your facilities and estate are upgraded or replaced, you have to be involved in area planning. If you are not there, I am not building. It is as simple as that.

To talk about the number of school closures is to have the wrong debate. If the Member can point me to any schools that I have closed in my tenure that I should have kept open, that is the debate that we should be having. If a school can no longer provide the education necessary to facilitate the curriculum and the achievement of first-class, world-class education systems, I am of the view that it should be closed. That is the harsh reality. For a public representative to say that a facility should be closed may be a difficult concept to grasp, but if it is the wrong facility in the wrong place, it should be closed. I do not buy into the numbers game that there have been 50 closures here and none there.

One of the methods used for primary schools and, indeed, post-primary schools by the maintained sector has been to amalgamate schools. The Department does not necessarily register the amalgamation of primary schools and of post-primary schools as a closure, although it is, in effect, the closure of one of the schools when they amalgamate on one site.

I will not play the numbers game that says that if I have to close a controlled school, I will look for a maintained school and an integrated school to close. I may be tempted to look for a voluntary grammar school, but that is a different story.

The Member makes a serious point: the voluntary grammar sector will have to include itself. I refer to Mr Morrow's comment, and we will see how we facilitate it in the discussions. Whether it be the non-selective sector in the maintained sector or the controlled sector, it should not be taking all the hits. It is everybody's responsibility to ensure that we have a sustainable schools estate.

Miss M McIlveen: On reading the statement, I was curious about the piece of work that the Minister is commissioning on the number of pupils travelling from the South Eastern Board area to Belfast and, in particular, how that may limit the parental choice of my constituents. Having listened to his response to Mr Hazzard, I am speechless, and that does not happen very often. The Minister is suggesting that well-established schools in Belfast may be in the wrong location. Is the Minister telling the House that he is planning to move those schools and, if so, at what cost?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not know why the Member is speechless, considering that the population flows out of Belfast, and so on. Over the years, it has been decided that wellestablished hospitals in Belfast were in the wrong place. The fact that a school has existed in point A for a number of years does not mean that it has to continue to exist on that spot. That is particularly the case if it is drawing pupils from a geographical area beyond Belfast. Why are we congesting our roads by driving pupils to school and why are we spending hundreds of thousands — perhaps millions — of pounds bussing children to schools in Belfast when those schools could be built at another location that is more accessible to the draw of pupils?

However, I have no answer to any of those questions. I said in my statement that I am commissioning work that will have to include the schools that already exist in Belfast — the well-established schools that the Member refers to. Their views will have to be taken on the matter. I cannot tell the voluntary grammar schools where to place themselves. I cannot tell them where to be rebuilt. However, we can have a conversation with them about where the best place is for them to exist in the future.

Some of the schools have already asked themselves this question: where do we see ourselves geographically 10, 15 and 20 years done the line, serving education? They are already asking themselves that question. This piece of work will be valuable, not only to the Department but to those schools as well.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a ráitis. Tuigim go bhfuil an plean ceantair do dheisceart Ard Mhacha socraithe cheana féin. D'ardaigh mé cheana féin leis an Aire an gá atá le hinfheistíocht a dhéanamh i scoil Naomh Iosaf i gCrois Mhic Lionnáin.

I thank the Minister for his statement. I understand that the area plan for south Armagh is well settled, and I have already raised with the Minister the need for investment in St Joseph's High School in Crossmaglen.

There is little reference in the Minister's statement to progress being made in many areas of the region, outside of two or three. Four years after the 'Together Towards Entitlement' report was published, is he confident that the steering group that he will establish will move the process on at any greater rate? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr O'Dowd: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chomhalta as a cheist. I announced that I would be bringing forward the area planning process in September 2011. The group first got together in February 2012, so the work has been going on for about a year in real terms. At times, progress has been slower than I would have wished it to be and it has been frustrating. However, there has been progress.

This is not the best way to plan going into the future: we are dealing with five education and library boards, CCMS, the Irish-medium sector, the integrated sector and the voluntary sector. I hope that I have not left anybody out of that list. So, we have to get all of those people to work together and, for the first time in their collective histories, agree an area plan. Underneath that, you have 1,100 schools, all of which have an opinion about themselves — and rightly so — and believe that they should be the core school in their area and be maintained at all costs. So, you have to deal with all that and try to develop a plan.

So, we have made progress. I mentioned to one of the other Members that I have listed, as an example, areas of progress in some of the board areas. There are other areas that I can list as examples, but the overall picture has been that more work needs to be done on area planning.

Will the steering group move that forward? Yes, it will. The steering group will move it forward until the establishment of ESA, and then ESA will take responsibility for area planning. Area planning is going to be a continuous process of moving towards a sustainable schools estate.

On the issue of different versions of the plans and moving forward, there may be a couple of years' more work in this. However, at each stage, you will be able to examine the plans and make definitive statements about certain areas. I have done that: if you look at my capital builds announcement, I used area planning as the tool for deciding where new capital builds would be. As area plans move forward again, and when there is more money available for capital investment, we will look at them to see where capital investment should be. In terms of the school enhancement programme, which I recently announced, area planning will be the tool used to decide where that money should be spent as well.

So, it is an ongoing piece of work. As with many things in this society, things do not always move as quickly as they could.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for his statement. In reference to the educational campus in Omagh, can the Minister state whether the area-planning template matches the terms of reference of the Department? Can he assure us that all of the schools are positively engaged? What is the timescale for the consummation and development of the project?

Mr O'Dowd: I confirmed this morning that the area planning solution for Omagh is Lisanelly, and that my future investments in the Omagh area will be in the Lisanelly site. As I mentioned to you during the Adjournment debate a number of nights ago, there has been a very democratic system. There has been local consultation, the council in the area has debated this and supports the Lisanelly project, the local representatives in the area support it, the Assembly supports it and it is a Programme for Government target that I intend to achieve. So, it is one of those areas where there has been enough discussion: it is now time to move forward. As I said to you in the debate the other night, I am looking at a variety of ways to fund that project, and a number of international partners may be willing to provide some funding towards it.

All those aspects are going forward. I confirmed this morning that the decision on area planning for Omagh has been made: Lisanelly is the only show in town.

Companies (Public Sector Audit) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the draft Companies (Public Sector Audit) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be approved.

I will briefly set out the background to the draft order. The proposed legislation is necessary to update the list of not-for-profit public bodies that are subject to audit by the Comptroller and Auditor General (C&AG). Since 2008, when the original legislation was made, a number of new not-for-profit companies have been created, and some companies that were previously listed have been dissolved or transferred out of public sector ownership. Hence, there is a need to revise the list of bodies to take account of those changes.

The new legislation will permit the Comptroller and Auditor General to report on as well as certify the accounts of the relevant bodies, providing scope for him to comment more widely on matters pertaining to the bodies in question. That ties into the general legislative framework for other audits and provides for stronger accountability. I commend the order to the House.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As the Minister set out, this is a straightforward piece of legislation. The purpose of the order is to amend the list of not-for-profit public companies to be subject to annual audit by the C&AG from that set out in the Companies (Public Sector Audit) Order 2008. The proposal noted that the opportunity is also being taken to enable the C&AG to report on as well as certify the accounts of the bodies to be subject to that legislation. It stated that that is in line with the general legislative framework for other audits and will provide greater capacity for the C&AG to issue a report without necessarily qualifying or modifying his or her audit opinion.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

The Committee agreed at its meeting that it had no objection to the policy proposals. The formal statutory rule before the Assembly was considered by the Committee together with the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules, and the Examiner raised no issues by way of technical scrutiny. The Committee, therefore, agreed to recommend that the draft order be approved by the Assembly.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat. I support the proposal.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman for keeping their remarks as brief as mine. It means that we can move on quickly from this business.

I thank the Committee for its work on the legislation. As I said to the House, the order is necessary because the list of bodies to be audited has changed over time. Some have been added, and some have been taken off. It gives additional powers. Someone asked me whether this means that the Northern Ireland Audit Office will get additional resources. The answer is "No. It will not get additional resources". However, I understand that the Audit Office is content that the additional work can be done within the existing generous budget that we already make available to that body. I commend the order to the Assembly and trust that it will have Members' support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Companies (Public Sector Audit) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be approved.

Ad Hoc Committee: Parliament Buildings

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes. As a valid petition of concern was presented on Monday 25 February in relation to the motion, the vote will be on a cross-community basis.

Ms Ruane: I beg to move

That this Assembly approves the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee to deal with issues surrounding flags, emblems, symbols and language at Parliament Buildings and to report to the Assembly.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I want to read a few quotes from the Good Friday Agreement:

"We, the participants in the multi-party negotiations, believe that the agreement we have negotiated offers a truly historic opportunity for a new beginning."

"Táimid tiomanta don chomhpháirtíocht, don chomhionannas agus don chomhurraim mar bhonn leis na caidrimh laistigh de Thuaisceart Éireann, idir an Tuaisceart agus an Deisceart, agus idir na hoileáin seo".

"We are committed to partnership, equality and mutual respect as the basis of relationships within [the North of Ireland], between North and South, and between these islands ... We acknowledge the substantial differences between our continuing, and equally legitimate, political aspirations ... affirm that whatever choice is freely exercised by a majority of the people of [the North], the power of the sovereign government with jurisdiction there shall be exercised with rigorous impartiality on behalf of all the people in the diversity of their identities and traditions and shall be founded on the principles of full respect for, and equality of, civil, political, social and cultural rights, of freedom from discrimination for all citizens, and of parity of esteem and of just and equal treatment for the identity, ethos, and aspirations of both communities ... recognise the birthright of all the people of [the North] to identify themselves and be accepted as Irish or British, or both, as they may so choose, and accordingly confirm that their right to hold both British and Irish citizenship is accepted by both Governments and would not be affected by any future change in the status of [the North] ... All participants recognise the importance of respect, understanding and tolerance in relation to linguistic diversity, including in [the North], the Irish language, Ulster-Scots and the languages of the various ethnic communities, all of which are part of the cultural wealth of the island of Ireland ... All participants acknowledge the sensitivity of the use of symbols and emblems for public purposes, and the need in particular in creating the new institutions to ensure that such symbols and emblems are used in a manner which promotes mutual respect rather than division."

Tagann na hailt seo ó Chomhaontú Aoine an Chéasta, agus tá roinnt mhaith eile cosúil leo. Ritheann an teanga chéana tríd: urraim, cearta, caoinfhulaingt, comhionannas, éagsúlacht, Éireannach, Briotanach. An bhfuil an réaltacht ag cur leis na focail? These are some of the quotes from the Good Friday Agreement. The language running through it is "respect", "rights", "tolerance", "equality", "diversity", "Irish" and "British". Does the reality match the words?

We have watched the hysterical reaction to the democratic decision of Belfast City Council, a compromise position in relation to the flag that does not afford equality to nationalists and republicans. Indeed, it is a mirror image of what happens in other councils, for which Members of the House voted in their capacity as councillors. We have listened to the weak excuses as the PSNI has failed to police illegal parades and illegal roadblocks and the intimidation of elected representatives. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: We have watched as a significant number of Members joined those illegal roadblocks. Thankfully, because of public pressure from beleaguered businesses and civic society, they have come off that — not before time. We have witnessed the failure of leadership from many on the Benches opposite over the past few months. One example of that failure of leadership was the motion put forward by the DUP to the Assembly Commission. It is a Commission that claims that it operates on consensus, it has a unionist majority, and, on June 2, 2002:

"The Commission agreed that the flags issue is a political issue best handled by the Assembly."

Putting forward this motion is a political stunt by the DUP. The DUP, before Christmas, was calling for a forum to discuss the issue of flags and identity. Today, it has tabled a petition of concern to block the establishment of such a forum. It seems to me that both unionist parties are letting themselves be led by illegal, antidemocratic protesters like Bryson and Frazer, instead of trying to come at the issue in a sensible, mature way. This is 2013, not 1913.

Is é an cur chuige daonlathach plé agus vóta a dhéanamh sa Tionól, ach feictear go bhfuil eagla ar an DUP agus ar an UUP — agus níl a lán den UUP anseo — roimh dhíospóireacht sa Tionól.

The democratic approach would be for the discussion and vote to take place in the Assembly, but the DUP and UUP are afraid, it would appear, to have the debate in the Assembly. Who is afraid of democracy? Why would anyone be afraid of the establishment of an ad hoc group to deal with issues surrounding flags, emblems, symbols and language at Parliament Buildings and to report to the Assembly? As Assembly Members, we have a duty of care —

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for giving way. She goes on at great length to elaborate on the cowardice of the DUP and the Ulster Unionists on the issue. Would she like to tell the House why her party and her colleagues in the SDLP have consistently boycotted the Commission meetings? Would you like to elaborate on that?

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his comment. First, I say to him that his party should have no fear of democracy and equality. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: The place for discussion of flags, symbols and emblems is the Chamber, not the Assembly Commission. The UUP knows that, and where are its members today? Where are they in defence of their wonderful democratic position? Where are they? I see a lone presence in the Chamber. The least they could do is to come out and defend their undemocratic position in relation to this. Even at this stage, I call on the parties opposite to support the setting up of an Ad Hoc Committee, to look at the principles that I read out from this agreement. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: They are basic, fundamental principles. Who is afraid of democracy? Why should anyone be afraid of the establishment of an ad hoc group?

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: I will, yes.

Mr Storey: The Member asks, "Who is afraid of democracy?". If the party opposite is so keen on democracy, will she tell this House why it absents itself from the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster? It takes salaries, money and all the benefits, but it does not go to the most democratic forum in the United Kingdom.

Ms Ruane: That is a typical deflection tactic from Mr

Storey. [Interruption.]
Mr Storey: Answer.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I will not deign to give an answer to that deflection. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard.

Ms Ruane: Let us talk about the issues here, in this part of Ireland. Let us talk about the agreement. Let us talk about the agreements that we have reached as political parties. Let us talk —

 $\mathbf{Mr}$   $\mathbf{Storey} :$  We did not sign up to that —

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: See this nonsense that "We have not signed up to the Good Friday Agreement"? It is another pretence to their electorate. You signed up to power sharing, North/South, the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us not have a debate across the Chamber.

Ms Ruane: So, let us not pretend that you do not support these institutions. The difficulty is that you want to cherrypick what you do in these institutions.

I say to the Members opposite that, as Assembly Members, we have a duty of care to employees in this Building and, to date, the Assembly Commission has failed in that duty. Some of the staff in this Building have come to me saying that they feel that their traditions and identity have not been respected and they do not work in a neutral environment — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: — and they feel discriminated against.

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Will you allow a situation where a Member refers to members of staff in this House? I ask the Speaker to rule on this issue. I ask the Member to withdraw the remark, which is scurrilous. It is a very dangerous position for any Member to place members of staff in.

Mr Speaker: On the point of order, there is a mechanism outside the Chamber if staff have a problem with the Building. I advise Members to be careful and caution them against drawing staff into a political situation. I warn all Members of the House to be very careful in what they say. Allow the Member to continue.

Ms Ruane: I think it is very important that, in our duty of care, we ensure that all members of staff work in a neutral environment or an equal environment. The current environment is not neutral, and it is not equal. Their views need to be listened to and acted on. It is very important that all traditions are respected in the House and in the Building. Do I and the people who voted for me feel that our identity is cherished, that we have parity of esteem and that our ethos and identity are respected?

12.15 pm

Mr Storey: National insurance number?

Ms Ruane: Even as I ask the question, I am being interrupted rudely. We come up Prince of Wales Avenue; we come past Carson's statue; we come in under Britannia's lions — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: Poppies are sold at every entrance during November, yet our national flag is not flown and our Irish language is not given the place that it deserves. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: Our symbols, such as the Easter lily, are not given parity of esteem.

Mr Storey: War symbols.

Ms Ruane: You see, there is more rudeness from across the Chamber. There is more rudeness, because they do not want to listen to the message.

Mr Clarke: I do not want to listen to you.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: Well, there you go. I will ask the Speaker to rule on that. It is my right to speak here, and if you do not want to listen to me —

Mr Speaker: Order. Members need to be mindful of their language in the Chamber. It is a democratic institution. I should not have to remind Members where they are. Allow the Member to continue.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I respect the right of people in the unionist community to have their heroes, symbols and emblems, but I expect that respect to be reciprocated.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Ms Ruane: The days of forcing one flag on everyone are well and truly over. When are they going to stop ignoring people's views? I urge all parties to vote for this proposal. Who is afraid of democracy? Sinn Féin is not. Bring it on.

Mr Campbell: The issue of establishing or not establishing an Ad Hoc Committee to deal with the issues that the Member mentioned needs to be looked at in the context of where we are. The Sinn Féin Member for South Down said that these issues should be dealt with in the Chamber, yet the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee would not mean that they are dealt with in the Chamber; they would be dealt with in the way in which other issues are dealt with in Ad Hoc Committees — outside the Chamber. However, let us come to the central core of —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr Campbell: Yes, I will.

Ms Ruane: Actually, it would be dealt with in the Chamber. In the first instance, it would be dealt with by all parties sitting round a table in an Ad Hoc Committee, and a full report would then be brought to the Chamber.

Mr Speaker: The Member has a minute added on to his time.

Mr Campbell: Getting an extra minute is at least some good from the intervention, Mr Speaker.

So, as she has just confirmed, the Ad Hoc Committee would meet outside the Chamber, which negates what she said. That is almost pedantry. Let us get down to the core of the issue. It is really not conducive to good debate for the Member or anyone else to wave redundant documents from 15 years ago. That really is not conducive to where we are now and to the progress that we need to make for the future. We need to establish —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: Yes, everybody is looking to get in.

Mr Lyttle: I ask the Member sincerely to reflect on the comment about the Good Friday Agreement being redundant, given the huge democratic support that was given to that agreement across the whole island of Ireland.

Mr Campbell: The Member should have listened to what I was going to say. If we are talking about the underlying principles of integrity and respect and about some of the other issues that cover a range of documents, there is not an issue. The issue is the way in which that document was implemented over our heads and how it brought into a democratic forum those who advocated violence. That is the point that I was making. That issue is redundant, dealt with and, hopefully, will never come back again.

Mr Eastwood: Will the Member give way.

Mr Campbell: Yes, I will.

Mr Eastwood: The Member talks again about a redundant document. DUP Members have shouted from their seats about the fact that the DUP did not support the Good Friday Agreement. Will the Member not accept here and now that the people of Ireland — North and South — voted overwhelmingly for the Good Friday Agreement?

Mr Campbell: I am glad that the Member put it like that. The people of the Irish Republic, in that country, voted overwhelmingly in favour of the Belfast Agreement. Undoubtedly, that is the case. The position in Northern Ireland was completely different. Yes, there was a majority — 15 years ago. I do not know why people are obsessed with what happened 15 years ago. We are more interested in what happens today, tomorrow, next week, next month and next year. The position is that —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: No, I am running out of time to give way. It is not like me to be generous, but I have been very generous. I am not going to be any more.

The factual position in law is that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom. I know that the Member for South Down does not like that and does not want that, but she has to accept that. That is the reality. It does not matter how many Ad Hoc Committees she wants established or how many votes she wants, because that is the reality. It is not going to change next week, next month, next year or any time in the future.

A reflection of that reality is that the flag of the United Kingdom flies in the Parliament of the United Kingdom in London. Some people referred to what happens in the Irish Parliament, and many Members talked about a document from 15 years ago. The flag of that country flies on that Parliament in Dublin regularly throughout the year, so, if the honourable Member for South Down wants parity of esteem for flags, I await the introduction in that Parliament with her colleagues of the dual flags of the union flag and the tricolour flying on Dáil Éireann. I have not heard anybody say that that would be a contribution towards Britishness and Irishness and the recognition of both identities. Nobody says that. Why? Because the process that the Member for South Down and some of her colleagues seem to be engaged in is a one-way process. In Northern Ireland, they want recognition of dual identities, but, in the Republic, it is a solo identity. I do not know why I am regarded as being hard line when I say that. That is the factual position, and the honourable Member cannot seem to accept it.

The Member for South Down referred to rights and responsibilities and to issues that flow from the integrity of these institutions. For once, in one small part of what she said, I agree with her. We also need to establish that, when it comes to the rights and responsibilities —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Campbell: — of others in the context of what we do here, everybody has to accept that a petition of concern has been tabled.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is gone.

Mr Campbell: We have stated where we stand, and we move on beyond this redundant piece of legislation.

Mr Cree: It is certainly heating up. It looks as though it will be a very interesting afternoon.

Flags, emblems, symbols and language are always emotive and sensitive issues in Northern Ireland. That is particularly the case in the current, often volatile situation that we have seen on the streets over the past number of months. We have seen the difficulty that the decision at Belfast City Council has caused, and I ask that the Assembly do not make the same mistake. The necessary consensus in all the issues must be sought and agreed before changes are made. This debate should be carried out with that in mind, and we in this House should set an example.

The Assembly Commission currently has clear responsibilities under section 40 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. That includes providing the Assembly with the property, staff and services required for the Assembly's purposes. During my time on the Commission, that role has included looking at issues such as flags, emblems, symbols and language in the context of our work in promoting equality of opportunity and the desirability of good relations.

I will just correct the proposer of the motion. The Commission comprises five members, and no one in the House would contend that the Alliance Party is a unionist party. The Commission is the proper place for this subject to be discussed. For that reason, I and my party are opposed to the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee. Why do we need a new way of dealing with these areas when we already have an appropriate mechanism? One must assume that the underlying reason for this motion is the ongoing flags issue. Certainly, the discussion so far supports that.

The Commission has attempted to meet on a number of occasions recently to progress this matter, with the SDLP, Sinn Féin and the Alliance Party, on two occasions, boycotting the meetings. If those parties are not prepared to discuss the issues within the context of Commission meetings, why should we expect any progress on an Ad Hoc Committee?

The situation with the flying of the Union flag at Stormont is straightforward: we do not have a designated day list that is consistent. For example, it appears that Belfast City Hall goes with the designated day list published by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport in London, which offers 18 designated days for Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: Yes.

Mr Lyttle: Is the Member stating clearly today, therefore, that the Ulster Unionist Party is holding to its long-standing position of supporting designated days at Parliament Buildings at Stormont?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Cree: Thank you for that. You will have to wait for the answer.

Parliament Buildings at Stormont is governed by the list in the Flags Regulations (Northern Ireland) Order 2000. That has 17 days, but, with the death of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother and the Princess Margaret, we are now down to 15 days. It is the wish of my party, through the Commission, to look at how that anomaly can be rectified, because it is entirely inappropriate that the number of days is left to dwindle, as is happening.

Mr Eastwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: No.

A suggestion may be that the list used at Parliament Buildings is tied to the list used by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, or we can look at a Northern Ireland-specific approach. There is no reason why the Commission cannot deal with this. Indeed, a consultation is being drawn up along those lines.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: No.

I reiterate that my party is seeking to effect change that is fair through reaching a consensus. That is why it is so disappointing that others are not willing to participate through the usual forum. We are not seeking to push through a decision using a majority, as happened on Belfast City Council. We are also not seeking to go on a solo run, as David Ford attempted to do in the Justice Department with the stripping of the emblems of the Northern Ireland Prison Service. We are simply looking to consult on the best and fairest way forward.

As I said, my party is not willing to agree to the setting up of an Ad Hoc Committee of this nature. It is time-consuming and inappropriate, and the mechanism is already in place for discussion and debate. It is disappointing that, while the economy is still struggling and unemployment remains high, we are devoting so much time to flags and emblems.

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: No. Important and emotive as flags and emblems are, I think that the majority of people in Northern Ireland would rather that we found solutions to job creation, educational underachievement and housing issues.

Mr P Ramsey: I support the motion. For many weeks now, protests have been held across Northern Ireland about the flying of the Union flag at Belfast City Hall. The depth of feeling across the community about the issue shows that we have still not dealt sufficiently with the flags, symbols and emblems of the respective identities of so many people in Northern Ireland. To that end, as the SDLP member of the Assembly Commission, I welcome the motion to the House, which is the appropriate place to discuss the motion.

We are all here to lead, and this is what leading does, through the setting up of this ad hoc group — not just looking singly at flags but looking at emblems, symbols and a language strategy. A mature discussion by all should take place in the Chamber. That is how we demonstrate to those in the community and the outside world that the Assembly does not shy away from the difficult decisions and that we are capable of maintaining political recognition of the sensitive issues around flags, emblems and symbols.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Member for giving way. Clearly, the Member is talking about consensus, and I am sure we will move on to that. We have heard much about consensus in the Chamber. Very clearly, on Belfast City Council — I declare an interest as a member of Belfast City Council — there was no consensus on the flag. However, a majority of people in that chamber decided to drive through the policy. Your party clearly supports that majority in City Hall, but there is a consensus in the electorate to send a unionist majority here. You simply will not recognise the majority that resides here. I say to the Member, with the greatest respect, that in the City Hall vote your party voted in committee to remove the flag entirely, then shifted its position, led by Sinn Féin, to have designated days.

12.30 pm

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Member for the intervention. The original motion that was tabled to the Assembly Commission is clearly watered down now. The predetermined outcome that was originally in the motion has been taken out. I maintain the case that it was the DUP, the Ulster Unionists and the Alliance Party that, on the original Assembly Commission, decided on the designated days. Go back to 2001. It was those same parties that, in 2001, decided on the setting up of an ad hoc group to look at flags, symbols and emblems. There is no difference between then and now. That is the best place to bring forward ideas and thoughts, and, reflecting on what Leslie Cree said, to bring about consensus. There was never going to be consensus on the original motion that was tabled by the DUP and the Ulster Unionists, because it was seen as trick and stunt politics. Those trick and stunt politics failed.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. I appreciate that the Member was not here 10 years or so ago, but he should be aware that the setting up of an Ad Hoc Committee was in a period when this was, essentially, a Secretary of State matter. Indeed, where it was a reserved or excepted matter, the format was that an Ad Hoc Committee would be set up, as was done for a number of other issues, such as criminal damage compensation. That is why an Ad Hoc Committee was established at that point to look at the issue of flags, not within Parliament Buildings but across all of Northern Ireland.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Member for the intervention. It was also the case that the DUP accepted the Northern Ireland order from the then Secretary of State on the designated days. That is what it accepted at the Assembly Commission. Then, when the tensions on the street were very high, the DUP tried to pull a stunt over the other parties in the House. That was not going to happen. The SDLP was certainly not going to be part of that.

Getting back to the motion, Mr Speaker, I stress that the proposal is not a threat to any party in the Assembly. It is an opportunity to positively and constructively address issues around emblems, flags and symbols and should be seen as such. Let me make it clear that there is no appetite in the SDLP for any point scoring on the issue. There is no appetite for that. However, we all have a job to do on behalf of the public. If passed, the motion would give us a chance to speak candidly in Committee — a much calmer environment — about our views on these matters. That is not what is happening with some Members, who really are stretching it to the limits.

I remind Members that the Commission carried out an internal good relations audit in line with its section 75 responsibilities in conjunction with Holywell Consultancy. Holywell Consultancy examined various documents, including the Assembly's corporate plan, the engagement strategy, the good relations action plan, the secretariat staff survey, the dignity at work policy and the Assembly equality scheme. I want to highlight some of the areas where we have fundamentally not been able to achieve consensus, but we are prepared, as reasonable politicians and in representing our parties on the Assembly Commission, to get to a consensus. The difference here is that two parties were trying to force through a situation. It is not and never has been the practice or policy of the Assembly Commission for any party or joint party motion to be tabled. That is what our concern was. The parties need to reflect on what they did prior to Christmas. It was done to the fiddle of those outside who were calling the tune.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr P Ramsey: I appeal to Members. I know that there is a petition of concern to guillotine the motion. However, this is an important subject, and the only way we can deal with it is through an ad hoc group.

Mrs Cochrane: I support the motion. I want to first address why the motion is before us. As was already mentioned, back in December, the unionist parties used a mechanism to bring a motion to the Assembly Commission. At that time, I made it clear that I was not prepared to discuss the matter during constant violence and intimidation. There are those who have said that by doing so I was boycotting the Commission meeting. However, I believe it was a principled stand that gave those proposing the motion the time to reflect on their role as Commission members, allowed some of the heat to go out of the situation and prevented us from making a knee-jerk reaction.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Cochrane: No, I am not going to give way at the minute.

In the background, however, I met other Commission members to see if we could get consensus on the manner in which flags could be discussed in a formally constituted Commission meeting. I reminded my fellow Commission members that our role is to serve the Assembly and not individual parties and that, when making decisions, we should have due regard for equality. I also reminded them that, in June 2000, the Commission had agreed that the flag issue was a political matter best handled by the Assembly and that the Commission would operate to the existing regulations and take its direction from the Assembly.

There is an option for Members to bring a motion forward, and, although I do not agree with the DUP and UUP's motivation for doing that, they brought it forward, and they were operating in line with Commission procedures. Also, as the Commission's remit includes responsibility for good relations in this Building, regardless of whether some feel that flags and emblems are a matter best dealt with by the Assembly, the reality is that the corporate body has a role to play in this. I feel strongly that the matter will not be resolved satisfactorily without due regard for equality. Therefore, I was not willing to support the original motion. However, I showed leadership by trying to bring forward a revised motion that could be acceptable to all. Let us be clear: by agreeing to the new motion, the DUP and UUP have moved substantially from their original position in four ways. First, we are now asking for a report, not a consultation; secondly, there is no longer a predetermined outcome; thirdly, an equality impact assessment is now included: and, fourthly, the assumption that the Commission is the only place for the final decision to be taken has been removed. That is what consensus politics is about. The Speaker also sought to have all Commission members present in order to formally agree how wide-ranging such a report might be. Unfortunately, however, some members still felt unable to participate in the discussion.

Here we are today with a motion to establish an Ad Hoc Committee to deal with issues surrounding flags, emblems, symbols and language at Parliament Buildings and to report to the Assembly. Parliament Buildings hosts a large number of events and visitors each year and has a significant opportunity to play a leading role in the encouragement of dialogue, shared learning and mutual respect for different faiths and cultural backgrounds. The Stormont building and its history represent challenges that require careful presentation, and I believe that those challenges can be met through attention to detail and sensitive negotiation. The Good Friday Agreement was endorsed by the majority of people, and, regardless of whether some think it is redundant, the fact remains that those who signed up to the agreement and those who have taken office in the new institutions have a duty to ensure that such issues are dealt with sensitively and with an outcome that is balanced for everyone.

The existence of an Ad Hoc Committee and the work proposed for the Commission are not mutually exclusive. One might even inform the other. Therefore, I am content to support the motion. There is a need for mature debate.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Cochrane: No, I will not give way, thank you. There is a need for mature debate around these contentious issues — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member should not persist.

Mrs Cochrane: We need to balance the role of the Commission, members of which are to act with integrity, including political impartiality, with the party political views of Members, which could be expressed via the Ad Hoc Committee. We should see the motion not as a threat but as an opportunity to look at issues that will allow the Northern Ireland Assembly to be reflected as an Assembly for everyone. We have an opportunity to show leadership in addressing difficult and challenging good relations issues, and we should take it today.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.38 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Finance and Personnel

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 1 has been withdrawn and requires a written answer. Question 6 has been transferred to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) for written answer. Mr Roy Beggs is not in his place to ask question 2.

Net Fiscal Balance Report

- 3. Mr McKay asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the purpose of the net fiscal balance report by his Department and how it is used. (AQO 3487/11-15)
- 5. Mr Mitchel McLaughlin asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the purpose of the estimate on VAT produced by his officials for publication in the net fiscal balance report. (AQO 3489/11-15)

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I would like to take questions 3 and 5 together.

The purpose of the latest net fiscal balance report is to provide a broad overview of public sector finances in Northern Ireland for the financial years 2006-07 to 2010-11. As Members will be aware, the report provides an estimate of our overall net fiscal balance position, or fiscal deficit, which is, essentially, the difference between government expenditure and revenue raised locally. In that regard, the VAT estimate is merely one element. I remind Members again that, as the report indicates, it is not intended to provide an accurate estimate of individual revenue items such as VAT, which has been estimated in the absence of actual regional data.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister will know that income tax, VAT and corporation tax make up an estimated half of the North's revenue. That is based on two surveys. There are question marks over where the headquarters of particular companies here are based, which affects the figures for corporation tax. Those figures have, potentially, been underestimated. Does he agree that the estimates are insufficient for the Executive and that there is a need for him and the Executive to put pressure on the Treasury to release more accurate figures, which, of course, it has?

Mr Wilson: We do not, in all cases, have the exact figures for revenue that is collected here in Northern Ireland. That is not only true for Northern Ireland, but for other devolved Administrations. One thing that I would say, however, is that the methods that are used are accepted under the codes for collecting official statistics and are recognised by the Office for National Statistics. Secondly, of course, the Scottish Government have accepted that the methods that are used for Scotland, which we mimic here in Northern Ireland, are acceptable ways of calculating estimates.

Let us bear in mind that, in gathering many official figures, initially, estimates have to be made. Take, for example, the balance of payments figures for the United Kingdom, which tend to be estimates. Indeed, sometimes revisions are made as a result of more information becoming available later on.

The Member mentioned corporation tax. He mentioned one of the things that was not initially included. One of the reasons why we extended discussions with the Treasury was exactly to drill down and to try to get information on those figures. I am happy that, where there is dispute, there is a mechanism in place for dealing with that and for getting more accurate figures in the longer run.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Mitchel McLaughlin is not in his place to ask a supplementary question.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for explaining the net fiscal balance. Does the Minister have a strategy for reducing the fiscal deficit? What would be in that strategy?

Mr Wilson: We do not want to be reliant on subsidies from central Government because, of course, when fiscal decisions are made at that level, it leaves the Northern Ireland economy a victim to changes. What is the Executive's policy on that? What do we seek to do? The reason why we have given primacy to growing the economy, especially the private sector, is to reduce our dependence on the transfer of funds from Westminster or parts of the United Kingdom to Northern Ireland. I point out to the Member that we are not in a unique position. Indeed, of all the regions of the United Kingdom, probably only two are in surplus; the others are in deficit. That is very often because of where most economic activity is generated. The more that we can generate and grow our economy here, the less dependent we will be on public sector spending, especially for benefits, etc, and the more revenue we will generate, whether through income tax or national insurance. Will we ever not have a deficit? I doubt it very much. I think that nine other regions of the United Kingdom are also in deficit because of their geographical position and because it is difficult to attract investment and generate economic activity. That is the benefit, of course, of being in the Union: we are part of a bigger constitutional unit in which the weaker areas can be helped by the stronger ones.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I suppose that many people listening to the questions and answers here today will be surprised to learn that we do not have accurate figures on revenue collected. Can the Minister suggest any steps that could be taken to ensure that, in future, we have more accurate figures?

Mr Wilson: First, I want to dispel the idea, which seems to be behind all the questions, that, somehow or other, the figures are simply made up. They are not. The methodology for collecting the figures has been accepted by those who are responsible for compiling official statistics in the United Kingdom. They abide by the code that is laid down for compiling statistics. These are not wild guesstimates; they are estimates based on criteria and methodologies accepted by those who are responsible for compiling statistics.

As far as greater accuracy is concerned, the more that one drills down into the figures, the more that one tries to ally the figures to a measure that closely reflects them. I will give the Member an example, which is how we estimate

VAT. We look at the household survey to see what people in Northern Ireland spend their money on, and we take the VAT attributable to those kinds of goods and multiply it by the number of families, which gives us the estimate. To me, that is a fairly robust way of estimating the amount of VAT gathered in Northern Ireland: what are people's spending methods, what is the rate of VAT levied on those goods and how many families are there? Of course, given that the list of things that people spend their money on —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's two minutes are up.

Mr Wilson: — is generalised, that figure is, to some degree, bound to be an estimate.

Special Advisers

4. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the appeals mechanism in the code of conduct for special advisers. (AQO 3488/11-15)

Mr Wilson: I interpret the question to mean what appeals mechanism is set out in the arrangements introduced in September 2011 for appointing special advisers.

My Department applies the vetting/character checking process to prospective special advisers, as it does to all other civil servants. Under those arrangements, I undertook to review the appointment process. My Department makes a recommendation to the appointing Minister about a test of character. For special advisers only, an independent appeals process has been built into the decision-making process. If a Minister or a prospective candidate for a special adviser post disagrees with the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) recommendation, an appeal can be made. That will be to an external body that will not have any contact with DFP, the Civil Service or Ministers. The panel will be totally independent, and it will take a number of factors into consideration when hearing a person's appeal.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his detailed reply. From the tenor of the reply, I assume that this appeals mechanism has not yet been used. In the event of it being used, who would choose the independent members of the panel, how big would the panel be, and where would those members come from?

Mr Wilson: It has not been used to date. All special advisers have gone through the vetting process, but it has not been necessary to use the panel as yet.

The panel would be made up of outside individuals. They would be chosen by the Department, and, I imagine, would probably be individuals such as trade union officials, people who have been involved in adjudicating on labour relations issues or other such independent people. They will be totally independent of the Department, the Civil Service and any of the parties — there would be no political involvement in any of that. We would envisage an appeal panel of uneven numbers, probably three.

Mr Ross: How far apart are the arrangements that the Minister has put in place and those in the private Member's Bill that has been brought to the House by Mr Allister? Does he still believe that that private Member's Bill is necessary?

Mr Wilson: The view that I took —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I warn Members that this is Question Time to the Minister of Finance and Personnel and not on a future private Member's Bill.

Mr Wilson: I think that the question that was being asked was what was my view vis-à-vis the arrangements that I have in place and the arrangements that Mr Allister has brought to the House.

It was always my view that something that is agreed among the parties would be much better, rather than having to go down a route of a vote being taken in the Assembly on the issue. Whether it had a statutory basis or simply had the basis of guidance that I had issued, the important thing to me was that it had the agreement of all the parties. Sadly, at the time of the Bill's introduction and its Second Stage, that agreement was not in place. Therefore, I took the view at that stage — I still hold it — that, given the concerns, it was necessary to have something in place that we could apply to all special advisers

The concern I had at that stage with Mr Allister's Bill was the fact that there was no appeals mechanism, and as I said in answer to Mr Maginness's question, I believe that an appeals mechanism is important. Basically, Mr Allister's arrangements were much more absolutist than mine, and I always believed that they could be improved by including an appeals mechanism. That would allow us to have those arrangements on a statutory footing, and they would apply to everyone who was appointed as a special adviser.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to take another couple of supplementary questions, but that is on the basis that they are about the question and not the Bill.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as uchta a fhreagra. Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank you, and I thank the Minister for his responses. Given that the CBI and the trade unions supported the guidelines produced by OFMDFM, will the Minister call for those to be implemented? That will ensure that employers have the flexibility to select the right person for the job.

Mr Wilson: Whether we use the guidelines that I introduced or put the issue on a statutory footing, a number of important things should be considered. First. the arrangements should apply to all special advisers. Secondly, they should assure people that they can stand the test of time and cannot easily be changed in the future. Thirdly, they should give everyone a fair opportunity, even if they have involved themselves in something in the past that people would have regarded as wrong and tarnished their public image. They should be given the chance to show that they had changed, etc. Those were the important things to me. That was what was on offer; it was not accepted, and the Assembly will decide at some time in the future what is the best way of doing that. I am saying only what all the ingredients are. There should be a mechanism for vetting people who are appointed to such posts. If they disagree with that vetting, there should be a mechanism for them to have their say. There should then be an independent assessment of the case that they have made to decide whether they are suitable for the job.

2.15 pm

Mr Allister: Does the Minister agree that one of the fallouts from the Mary McArdle appointment was a realisation that procedures that had no regard for the thoughts or interests of victims were lacking in a material consideration? Therefore, as well as looking at pertinent matters such as contrition, any review mechanism should, if it can, devise a means whereby the views of those most directly affected, namely, the victims of the individual, can be taken on board.

Mr Wilson: My view was that any mechanism of appeal, review or whatever it happens to be should be transparent and clear enough to ensure that people appointed to these positions had the confidence of the general public. If they had been engaged in something in their past, they would be able to show, because of changes in their attitude, lifestyle and the fact that they had shown remorse for their deeds, that they could gain that confidence. If one of the ways of building that confidence is to feed in the kind of information that the Member suggested, of course the Assembly needs to look at doing that in any appeal mechanism

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 5 has been answered. Question 6 has been withdrawn and transferred.

Procurement: NIAO Report

7. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for his assessment of the Northern Ireland Audit Office report 'Department of Finance and Personnel — Collaborative Procurement and Aggregated Demand'. (AQO 3491/11-15)

Mr Wilson: I welcome the Audit Office report into collaborative procurement and aggregated demand. It has raised a number of important issues. The recommendations are being considered by the procurement board. The report will be the subject of a Public Accounts Committee (PAC) hearing on 29 May, and while the matters are under consideration by the PAC, I do not want to comment a great deal on the particular issues. However, there are general points, of course, in the report that I am quite happy to answer questions on today.

Mr Rogers: How does the Minister propose to manage the risks of our small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) being detrimentally affected by increased aggregation of demand and collaboration?

Mr Wilson: The report highlights the fact that there could be a conflict between having collaborative procurement — where we bundle all the public sector contracts into one big contract to gain economies of scale and reduce the cost — and maintaining our current record of ensuring that SMEs get a fair share of public sector contracts in Northern Ireland. It is a conflict; the report recognises that, and so must Members. If we want to make savings in large-scale contracts, we must recognise that that may well preclude firms. Just this week, I have dealt with letters and with queries from Ministers who have asked me questions about maintenance contracts that have been bundled together. Therefore, the bigger the contract, the more that you ask people for working capital guarantees and turnover guarantees because of the size of the contract. Once you do that, you exclude a lot of small firms. That is something that the Audit Office and the Assembly have to be aware of. There is that conflict. One of the things that you can do, of course, is get a lot of small companies to tender collaboratively or, where there is a big contract, get some of it split up so that small subcontractors can come in.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Is a collaborative approach taken to energy contracts?

Mr Wilson: As far as energy contracts are concerned, DFP's property division, which has responsibility for the Northern Ireland Government estate, has collaborative contracts for fuel and for electricity. However, that does not include all public sector bodies. For example, Translink is not included, and neither is Northern Ireland Water.

Collaborative contracts work better when you are dealing with large-scale firms. There is no danger of excluding smaller firms from purchasing electricity, because only a couple of companies here in Northern Ireland generate and sell it. There are collaborative contracts that mean that you do not have the problem that Mr Rogers highlighted in his question. Of course, we ought to look more intensively at those.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. In light of the failure to deliver on the projected savings throughout the collaborative procurement, would the Minister agree that a centralised procurement group, perhaps based in his Department, could help to achieve maximum savings?

Mr Wilson: Various centres of procurement expertise (COPEs) in a number of Departments are responsible for procurement in those Departments. There are sometimes very good reasons for that, because expertise is particular to one Department or whatever. Although I would like to expand my empire, I am not so sure that centralising all procurement under one body would always be the best solution. Secondly, and as I said, where there is that kind of joint approach, there is a danger that some of the smaller firms would lose out.

In the procurement board, we will be looking at where different COPEs can perhaps come together to hear about the kind of things that we are going to purchase this year and whether some of those things can be banded together. Even if COPEs insist on having their own contracts, another way of doing it may be to at least standardise the kind of things that we purchase. For example, if you are purchasing desks, do you need 10 varieties? Can you not have one variety so that, even though each individual COPE is purchasing, you know that there is one standard kind of desk and that you can, therefore, get the cost down?

North/South Co-operation: Expenditure

8. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what is the annual net expenditure to the Executive from North/South co-operation. (AQO 3492/11-15)

Mr Wilson: The Executive incur expenditure through their contribution to the running of the North/South bodies that were established under the Good Friday Agreement. In 2011-12 that amounted to a total expenditure of £38·9 million. In addition, Northern Ireland Departments engage in practical co-operation with the Republic of Ireland on the delivery of public services. As I said in another debate in the House, that includes healthcare and education, etc. The net cost of that practical co-operation is £11·2 million. That is mainly a result of more students using schools in Northern Ireland, whether those are primary schools or further education colleges, than we have people going across the border to be taught in the Republic.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he advise us whether the North/South bodies are subject to delivering savings during the Budget period?

Mr Wilson: They are required to deliver savings. The savings of 3% a year that they are required to deliver are the same as those that Northern Ireland Departments are required to deliver. That is up until 2013. The savings beyond 2013 have not been established yet, but, for the past two years, they have been required to make savings of 3%, and they have met those targets. There will be a requirement of 3% this year, and, of course, it is then up to Ministers from Northern Ireland and the Republic to look at what savings are made beyond that.

I can assure the Member that, in all the conversations that I have had with them, Ministers from the Republic are as keen as I am to see savings made in the cross-border bodies.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Is he willing to acknowledge the reality that co-operation between Departments on a single-island basis, rather than incurring unnecessary or unreasonable expenditure, contributes to financial savings, not least in health?

Mr Wilson: The logic of that is for the Republic to stop being so stand-offish and join the United Kingdom, and we would then have the benefits of the whole of the United Kingdom in which to share those services. However, that is probably as much of a fairy tale as Sinn Féin's hope of getting a united Ireland by 2016. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Minister, you are well off the mark. [Laughter.]

Mr Wilson: I was referring to the question.

Let me address the issue. I have had meetings with Ministers from the Republic, and I have no difficulty with sharing facilities across the border if that helps to reduce costs for us and them. Only a fool would say that we should not do that. My one concern is where we provide services but do not get payment for them, which means that they are being provided at a net cost to taxpayers in Northern Ireland.

However, there are many good examples. The Health Minister, who is sitting beside me, has, for example, made it quite clear that one of the ways in which to keep local provision at Daisy Hill Hospital in Newry is for greater use of it to be made by people from across the border. We have a cancer unit at Altnagelvin Hospital that came about only because part of the capital cost and the ongoing revenue cost is shared by the Republic, whereby people from Donegal can come across to Londonderry. We have gained from that. We could not have had a stand-alone facility at Altnagelvin Hospital were it to rely on Northern Ireland custom alone. By having input from the Republic and hammering down that it would make a contribution, the people of the north-west have the benefit of a cancer unit at Altnagelvin.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for that. Are he and his Department consulted by other Departments on any new proposed initiatives on cross-border co-operation?

Mr Wilson: If such initiatives are purely within the remit of individual Ministers and do not require, for example, additional capital for which bids are required to be made, individual Departments are very often left to engage in those arrangements. However, in many such instances — I have spoken with the Finance Minister in the Republic on a number of occasions about this — the initial impetus will come from the two Finance Ministers, who will ask whether co-operation is possible between Departments, after which individual Ministers and Departments will get on with the job.

Executive: Savings Delivery Plans

9. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what advice his Department gives to other Departments regarding savings delivery plans. (AQO 3493/11-15)

Mr Wilson: Responsibility for the development of departmental savings delivery plans rests with individual Ministers. However, at the outset of the process, and to assist them in developing their plans, DFP issued guidance to Departments outlining the key issues that they needed to consider. A key element of that guidance was to highlight to Departments that, in the first instance, savings should be made from reductions in administration and improvements in efficiency. Where that cannot be achieved, Departments should seek to identify savings measures that minimise the impact on front line public services.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for his answer. Has he set any parameters for the cuts in administration costs — say, 10% — that he hopes to get? What co-operation is he getting from all Departments? Are any in default of co-operation?

Mr Wilson: The Departments are required to make savings of 3% a year. In all years of the Budget so far, all Departments have met that requirement, and some have exceeded if

One or two Departments have fallen short by maybe 1% or 2% in a particular year and picked it up in the next year. However, by and large, all Departments have met or exceeded the targets. The complaint has been that the savings that have been made by cutting front line services are not regarded as real efficiency savings. That is one of the comments that was made in the Northern Ireland Audit Office report.

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 2 and 12 have been withdrawn and require written answers. As Mr John McCallister is not in his place, I call Mr Chris Hazzard.

Public Health: Beef Products

3. Mr Hazzard asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether there is any public health risk involved in eating beef products that have been contaminated with horse meat. (AQO 3502/11-15)

Mr Poots: On the basis of evidence, there is no food safety risk to consumers from implicated meat products. However, this is an unacceptable situation. People have a right to expect that the food that they are eating is correctly described. It is the responsibility of food businesses to ensure that the food that they sell contains what it says on the label. The Food Standards Agency (FSA) is following all lines of inquiry in this investigation and working with all the relevant authorities, including other government Departments, district councils, police forces and authorities in other European countries. Swift action has been taken where there is evidence of fraudulent activity.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Can the Minister outline who funds the FSA here and who it is accountable to?

Mr Poots: The Food Standards Agency is funded directly by us, but it is not responsible to the Assembly as such. It is a body that is outside the Assembly. That arrangement was set up because of the issues that surrounded the BSE problems and the lack of faith in politicians at that point in time

I note that the Member's party has suggested that the Food Standards Agency should maybe come under political authority. That is the same party that called for an independent environment protection agency just a few years ago. It appears that that party has done somersaults on this issue.

Ms Brown: Will the Minister clarify the position on the slaughter of horses in Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: It is legal to slaughter horses and to sell horse meat in the United Kingdom provided that it comes from an approved abattoir and carries an official stamp declaring that it is fit for human consumption.

Until a relatively short time ago, horses were killed in Northern Ireland at a rate of around 40 every fortnight. Those horses were exported, and that trade was legal, legitimate and carried out properly. The company has since discontinued that course of work because it was interfering with other aspects of its business. However, there was no indication whatsoever or evidence of any kind that that particular horse meat was ending up in the food market in Northern Ireland or the United Kingdom.

Mr McClarty: Given the unexpected nature of the horse meat scandal, is the Minister confident in the assurances that he has been given and those that he, in turn, has given himself?

Mr Poots: Confidence should lie in why this meat would not be fit for human consumption. It would not be fit for human consumption if contained bute, which is a drug that is given to horses. Of the tests carried out on horse carcasses by 30 January, 100% indicated that bute was not present in any of those carcasses. A huge amount of testing has been carried out. We are satisfied that this is not a danger to the public from a food safety perspective.

This is a labelling issue. It is an issue of fraudulent behaviour. I trust that people will be in court and charged in due course. Some of those involved are very big companies. Let us be honest: they need to be gone after and pursued rigorously. However, this is not a food safety issue. That has been our line throughout, because it is accurate.

Accident and Emergency Departments: Waiting Times

- 4. Mr Lynch asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline how many breaches of the 12-hour waiting time have occurred in accident and emergency departments since November 2012. (AQO 3503/11-15)
- 15. Mr Beggs asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what action is being taken to reduce accident and emergency waiting times at Antrim Area Hospital. (AQO 3514/11-15)

Mr Poots: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 4 and 15 together, as they relate to emergency department performance.

From 1 November 2012 to 31 January 2013, 1,656 patients waited longer than 12 hours for admission or discharge to emergency departments. That represents an average of 1% of all attendances across the health and social care trusts. In Antrim Area Hospital, 632 patients or 3.7% of patients waited longer than 12 hours during that period. While those figures are an improvement on the same period in 2011-12, it is unacceptable to me that anyone has to wait that length of time. I continue to look to the Health and Social Care Board and trusts to ensure that action is taken to further improve waiting times and the patient experience in our emergency departments.

While there has been some improvement in the A&E waiting times at Antrim Area Hospital, that improvement has not, in my view, been sufficient. It is for that reason, and in recognition of the challenges that the trust is facing, that I took the decision, in December, to appoint a small turnaround and support team to complete a strategic overview in order to establish what changes and support might be required to accelerate progress. The turnaround and support team is working alongside the support already being provided by the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and the Public Health Agency through the emergency department improvement action group. I expect these initiatives to impact positively on waiting times at Antrim Area Hospital's emergency department.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answer. Considering the fact that A&Es are backed up due to other issues in hospitals, what changes have been made to ensure that other consultants work in the evenings? How many hospitals carry out discharges in the evenings?

Mr Poots: We are operating on the basis of an improved performance across the system. For example, we have had no reported 12-hour breaches for the Royal Victoria Hospital. However, I do not find it acceptable that there are six-, seven- or eight-hour breaches; those are not acceptable waiting times either. Certainly, my drive for the services within our emergency departments is that we take all the waiting times down to less than four hours, although the target is not yet set at that.

We are seeing a different kind of performance from our hospitals. We are looking at a whole-hospital system. The HSCB and the improvement action group continue to work with trusts to improve processes to provide greater flexibility in our hospitals, including pharmacy, and to ensure that we get swifter discharges and better admission rates, including direct admissions from GPs. In all that, there are great opportunities for continued improvement. I welcome the improvement that has happened thus far, but it does not go far enough.

Mr Beggs: In the Minister's initial answer, he referred to the considerable 12-hour breaches in our A&E units. Can he advise us about why there are significant failures to hit the four-hour waiting time targets at our hospitals when most hospitals in the rest of the United Kingdom meet the National Health Service standards?

Mr Poots: Yes; between November 2012 and January 2013, 76·5% of patients received emergency care or were discharged within the four-hour period. I do not accept that as being good enough. We need to ensure that we make further improvements on that, and we need to move up to those targets. I do not see any reason why we cannot reach where everyone else is in the UK. I will continue to keep that pressure on the trusts. We are not at a situation that is acceptable to the public; therefore, we need to expect better performance and improvement.

I think that I have made that very clear, particularly in the Northern Trust area. Performance was falling well short of the mark there, and that is why we have the turnaround team. It is also one of the reasons why the chairman is not there anymore. We did not have an acceptance that such improvement could be made, and I do not accept that improvement cannot be made. I will continue to pressurise, to harass and to cajole until we get the figures up where they should be. Certainly, it is not acceptable to me otherwise, and I do not think that it is acceptable to the

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I call Sue Ramsey, I remind Members that I would not normally allow her to ask a supplementary since she will be asking a question immediately after this, but I am treating this as an exceptional case.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I appreciate that. Minister, you are aware of the stuff in the media about the Ulster Hospital. Will you outline why patients were there with the ambulance crews for four hours? Will you outline whether there was a divert to the Ulster Hospital, and, in turn, did the Ambulance Service divert away from the Ulster Hospital?

Mr Poots: There are diverts, on an ongoing basis, from the Ulster Hospital to the Royal, and I will deal with that a little more in a moment. Yesterday, there were 66 ambulances at the Ulster Hospital, and last Monday there were 68. Normally, the figure is somewhere in the 50s. When you have the ambulances pulling up, you normally get 60% of the people in those ambulances admitted to the hospital. The increase in ambulances meant that there were an additional six admissions.

The situation has proved very tight when it comes to the number of admissions that are taking place in the South Eastern Trust area. There have been more medical admissions, and there is quite an elderly population in that area. Consequently, the hospital is under greater pressure. The Royal does take diverts from the Ulster Hospital. We need to give some consideration to that because although the Ulster is the main hospital in the Trust area, which also contains Downe and Lagan Valley, it does not have the capacity that the Belfast Trust has in terms of acute beds.

We would do well to give some consideration to the number of beds that are likely to become available in the Ulster Hospital on a particular day. If it is recognised that there are pressures, the diverts should be put in place earlier to ensure that the pressures are absorbed in a better way. We do not want to see people waiting in ambulances outside a hospital. That is not the type of care that this Assembly wants. We are talking to the trusts and the HSCB about that. Hugh McCaughey has spent some time with us today to talk about those issues.

Mr I McCrea: Like the Minister, I was totally appalled to hear the figures for Antrim Area Hospital, with 632 patients having to wait over 12 hours. Does the Minister believe that the turnaround team that he has in place in the Northern Trust area, whilst it may have the desire to make changes, has the wherewithal to tackle that issue? If it does not, what steps can the Minister take?

Mr Poots: The turnaround team has dealt with other areas and seen significant improvement as a consequence. We need the Northern Trust's co-operation and willingness to work with the turnaround team. Thus far, that has been the case. We also need an ability to take difficult decisions, because we cannot go through life making easy decisions all of the time. Sometimes, you have to make those hard decisions. If people are not up to that and do not want to make those hard decisions, there is not a place for them. I do not have any evidence that that is the case, but we will continue to work with the Northern Trust on the issue.

Let me be absolutely clear: the service that the public are receiving from emergency departments, particularly at Antrim hospital, is not acceptable. I do not want that to continue. We are making an investment in the capital infrastructure there, but we need to support it through personnel, and we have been doing that.

We need to get very clear evidence on how this can be moved forward, and then we need to move it forward. The very clear position of myself, the Department and the HSCB is that we can turn this around, and we will endeayour to do so over the next number of months.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his answers. The Minister has put great emphasis on the turnaround team finding a solution to the problems, particularly at Antrim hospital. Is that team independent of the trust and the Department, or is it in some way connected to the trust? In what way is it actually working?

2.45 pm

Mr Poots: It is wholly independent of the trust and the Department. The turnaround team from Cumbria is doing the work at no cost to us. I greatly appreciate the work and support that the team is giving us, and they are people who have expertise in turning difficult situations around. It will work only if we get co-operation. People in the trust may want to carry on doing the same thing that they have always done and getting the same results — I am sorry, but that will not be good enough. If people are obstructive, they will need to look at themselves because they do not fulfil the role that we require in the health service. We need a health service that can respond to difficulties and respond very swiftly and effectively to the needs of the public. I expect that the turnaround team will receive full co-operation to achieve that.

Protect Life Strategy

5. Ms S Ramsey asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his assessment of the Protect Life strategy in light of the 100% increase in suicide over the last 10 years. (AQO 3504/11-15)

Mr Poots: The Northern Ireland suicide rate doubled before the Protect Life strategy was published in late 2006. However, the rate has remained high, with an average of 277 recorded deaths each year since 2007. The Northern Ireland Audit Office has acknowledged that the relative impact of the Protect Life strategy on suicide is difficult to estimate because suicide is primarily a societal issue and is, therefore, influenced by a very wide range of interacting factors. International evidence indicates that efforts to reduce national suicide trends need to be sustained and long-term.

There is no such thing as a quick fix to this highly complex problem. Undoubtedly, lives have been saved through Protect Life services, but it is not possible to estimate how many. Independent evaluation has identified a number of positive outcomes as a result of Protect Life, including strong community engagement in prevention, a reduction in stigma and raised awareness. Areas highlighted for improvement include better prioritisation of actions and enhanced cross-departmental working to address the underlying wider issues that contribute to increased risk.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response. It is an issue that the rate has increased 100% over the past 10 years. Despite all of what you have just said, Minister, and despite the work that is done daily, you told us last week or the week before that the ministerial subgroup had met recently but was not due to meet again until August. I appeal to you to recognise that that time frame is too long. Do you believe that suicide is a priority in your Department and in the Executive? I am concerned that we seem to take a run at suicide and suicide issues and it then falls away again. If the ministerial subgroup does not meet until August, that does not send a clear message.

Mr Poots: The only Ministers who turned up to the last meeting were Minister Ford and me. Ministers need to take suicide seriously, because it is a very serious issue. That said, there is a series of actions to be carried out from the meetings, one of which is to promote positive mental health through sport, working with the Minister for Culture, Arts and Leisure and, to reach rural communities, working with the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development.

So cross-departmental work is flowing from those meetings, and it is more important to develop actions in those meetings that are then followed up and carried through. It is very clearly our intention to carry those actions through to make that difference because there is no single answer to this. However, if we keep taking incremental steps and have a series of people doing a series of different things, that will help to get the message out that suicide is not the best but the worst option and that people should think over and over again and seek help if they have suicidal thoughts.

Mr Weir: What changes are being made as a result of refreshing the Protect Life strategy?

Mr Poots: The strategy, which was published in June last year, contained a number of new actions, including involving sporting organisations in delivering positive mental health and well-being messages; identifying specific arts interventions; and providing community-based health checks in rural areas.

The Public Health Agency is taking forward a number of additional enhanced services, including self-harm and family support services; self-harm training in support of National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidelines for the management of self-harm; additional and enhanced services for vulnerable and marginalised groups; and the development of a new public information campaign. As well as that, we are doing more work with sporting organisations and direct work with rural communities, so a considerable amount of work is flowing from that programme.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for the meetings that he has held with groups in my constituency of East Belfast on suicide, and I give credit where credit is due for his attention to the matter in my constituency. In what way will he, his Department or the Public Health Agency be responding to the very specific increase in death by suicide in East Belfast? In particular, what is his assessment of how the "card before you leave" scheme, sudden death reporting and community response systems are working?

Mr Poots: East Belfast has come to light recently because of the high number of suicides in that constituency. That has not been a recent trend but has been ongoing for some time. It is an area where we need to ensure that people have the opportunities to deal with their problems.

Not everyone who has suicide ideation has presented with mental health issues, so there is a course of work that can be done on the mental health side to have people admitted to psychiatric units more quickly when GPs recommend it, to have them discharged more quickly and to have GPs take on more of the work after discharge. If people have to wait for eight weeks from being referred by a GP before they are admitted to a psychiatric unit, a huge amount of damage is done, and they then have to spend considerably longer in a unit. We will get a much quicker turnaround of people through the units and deal with them more effectively in that way.

The majority of people who take their own life have not previously presented with mental health issues, so it is very important to get messages out through sporting clubs and various organisations where you can speak to people, relate to them and get the message to them that there is hope and opportunity and a chance for a better life and for them to think again if they have suicide ideation.

Mr Gardiner: The increase in suicide rates is of great concern. Does the Minister accept that the legacy of decades of violence has contributed to the traumatisation of communities and individuals and has left a legacy of unaddressed mental health needs?

Mr Poots: I have absolutely no doubt that the legacy of violence is a contributory factor. We still have groups that are organised in our communities. There is still a level of fear in many communities. People who have committed crimes in the past have difficulty living with those crimes. Others have been victims of violence and have found it difficult to cope. I have absolutely no doubt that the legacy of the Troubles is still presenting itself in the form of suicide, and the Member has put his finger on that issue.

Cancer Care

6. Mr Storey asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline the extent of collaboration taking place in cancer care. (AQO 3505/11-15)

Mr Poots: In recent years, we have seen the principle of collaboration and co-operation mainstreamed into cancer care. At a local level, multidisciplinary teams (MDTs) collaborate to deliver the best care pathway for individual patients. MDTs are groups of health professionals including nurses, doctors, physiotherapists and occupational therapists who work together to discuss a patient's treatment and care.

At the regional level, patients have benefited from the reconfiguration of cancer services on a hub-and-spoke model, with the Belfast cancer centre working collaboratively with the cancer units at Altnagelvin, Antrim, Craigavon and the Ulster Hospital. We are also working collaboratively at a national and international level, most notably in the development of radiotherapy services at Altnagelvin, which will treat patients from Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Northern Ireland also contributes to national and international programmes that provide us with valuable benchmarking information to ensure that real progress is being made in cancer services.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for his answer, and I place on record the appreciation of many people in Northern Ireland who have benefited greatly as a result of the care that has been provided for them when they go through what can only be described as a very traumatic time. Will the Minister elaborate on the benefits to Northern Ireland of working with countries such as the United States of America on cancer?

Mr Poots: The funding agencies in Ireland and Northern Ireland have worked with the Department for Employment and Learning and Invest NI and have developed common documentation and working procedures to deal with funding proposals involving health research from both jurisdictions and the US. That is being implemented and was launched in August 2012. That allows for two health projects funded through the partnership, and will support the salaries of 15 clinical and academic researchers who are delivering outcomes in line with the aims of the partnership, spanning healthcare advancements and economic development. A recent highlight was the publication of major findings and identification of genes that may cause some patients with diabetes to develop serious kidney disease, while other diabetic patients do not.

We are working very hard through the National Cancer Institute Cancer Consortium. The five work stream areas that have been identified for that are capital building for clinical research; public health and well-being; prevention and health promotion, to include population health research; nursing, palliative and end-of-life care; and survivorship. All of that is helping Northern Ireland become more skilled and more advanced and to deliver better results when it comes to treating people with cancer.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra, agus seo í mo cheist féin ar an ábhar áirithe seo. Has the Minister any plans to develop cross-border links with the Beacon Hospital in Dublin, which has recently installed pioneering new stereotactic body radiation therapy (SBRT) equipment called CyberKnife, which has been shown to have extremely positive outcomes on some cancers?

Mr Poots: We have just recently installed a new facility in the Belfast City Hospital that allows us to carry out that stereotactic work, and we are training staff to enable them to take that further. So, very good work is going on in Belfast City Hospital's cancer unit to enable people who are currently travelling outside of Northern Ireland to receive that care.

We want to maximise the amount of care that we can carry out here in Northern Ireland. However, when there are people who have conditions that need treated by further expertise, we are happy to work with others, whether in GB or in the Republic of Ireland, to ensure they receive appropriate care.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his information around collaboration on cancer. Will he confirm the timeline of 2015 or 2016 for the work on the north-west cancer unit?

Mr Poots: The north-west cancer unit should be finished by 2015, with commissioning to take place to have it operational by 2016. That work continues to progress and there is no indication that there is any delay on it.

Ulster Hospital: Operations

7. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety how many operations have been postponed in the Ulster Hospital over the last 12 months. (AQO 3506/11-15)

Mr Poots: During the period January to December 2012, there were 305 patients on the waiting list for an operation who had the notified date for their operation deferred.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for his answer. Given the issues raised by the Chair of the Committee, will the Minister tell us whether further operations have had to be cancelled because of those events?

Mr Poots: Almost on a daily basis, obviously, a procedure is cancelled, but that is for very good reasons. If someone is waiting for an orthopaedic procedure, but there has been a major traumatic car crash the previous night, obviously the surgeons are called away to carry out that work. If someone is waiting for a heart operation but someone else has had a heart attack the previous night, very often the surgeons are called in to carry out the operations on the cardiac table.

So it is just a fact of life that many times operations that are elective have to be cancelled because of emergency procedures. That is one of the reasons why we have gone down a route with Belfast City Hospital of making it, almost exclusively, an elective centre so that operations are not cancelled, and that mix between emergency and elective does not happen.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. Members will take their ease while we change the top Table.

3.00 pm

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Assembly Business

Mr Beggs: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I apologise to you and to the Assembly for not being in my place during questions to the Finance Minister. I will endeavour to be in my place — [Interruption.] — in the future and not to be caught out by others who withdraw questions.

Mr Speaker: Order. I thank the Member for coming to the House and apologising for not being in his place during Question Time. Other Members were not in their place, and I hope that they will follow the Member's example in coming to the House and apologising.

Two weeks ago or more, some Members were not in their place and have still to apologise or give a reason why they were not in their place. We are keeping a watching brief on the issue, and we will deal with those Members who feel that they should not come to the House and apologise or give a reason. However, I thank the Member for coming to the House and apologising to the whole House.

Private Members' Business

Ad Hoc Committee: Parliament Buildings

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly approves the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee to deal with issues surrounding flags, emblems, symbols and language at Parliament Buildings and to report to the Assembly. — [Ms Ruane.]

Mr Poots: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to speak on the issue, although I am not sure why it has been brought to the House. Reinventing the wheel is not normally recognised as good practice, particularly if things are working well. We have an Assembly Commission, which I do not think that there have been any complaints about in the past. It appears to me to be working well. It has a good history, and, going right back to 1998, it has dealt with very sensitive issues over the lifetime of the Assembly. So, the proposal —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr Poots: Yes, I will.

Ms Ruane: I absolutely agree that, in the past, the Assembly Commission worked on consensus. The problem here is that your party brought a proposal to the Assembly Commission that went against what your party and, indeed, other parties agreed in 2002. That was that the place for flags and discussion around flags is in the Chamber and not in the Assembly Commission. So, the reason why it worked well was because you did not bring the issue to the Assembly Commission. However, you have now reneged on that, and that is what is causing the difficulty.

Mr Speaker: The Member has a minute added on to his time

Mr Poots: That was an interesting speech from the Member, and I will deal with those issues as I go through what I have to say.

The Assembly Commission has an exemplary history, and we commend it for the work that it has done. However, I see today's motion as somewhat of a vote of no confidence in the Assembly Commission by the Member and thus in her membership of the Commission. The fact that Sinn Féin does not bother to turn up for Assembly Commission meetings does not ring very well with democracy and does not demonstrate that it has a real commitment to the democratic institution that is here and in the Assembly Commission. Of course, I think that Ms Ruane deems democracy to be whatever Sinn Féin says that it happens to be at a particular time. So, in some instances, you have to have a weighted majority, and in others, you have to have a majority of both communities. However, Sinn Féin is quite happy for Belfast City Council to have a majority vote, although, if a similar vote were to take place in the Assembly, it would have to be by consensus. Belfast City Council does not have to recognise consensus for Sinn Féin, but this House does. Where is the difference? There is no difference, but there is in Ms Ruane's world. She needs to explain to the House why she demands consensus here but accepts majority rule just a few miles down the road.

I know that Ms Ruane has some difficulty accepting realities. The reality that we have here is that this is an Administration that has powers devolved to it from Westminster. As far as I know, she does not live in the United Kingdom, but she is employed in the United Kingdom. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Poots: She takes British sterling, and, obviously, with the powers devolved from Westminster, as a former Minister in the Assembly, she brought forward legislation that had to be signed off by Her Majesty the Queen.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Poots: As a Minister in this House, Ms Ruane was quite happy to bring forward legislation that had to receive Royal Assent before one single shred of it could be enacted. She needs to accept the reality that this is part of the United Kingdom, whether she likes it or not. It is internationally recognised, and there are tripartite agreements recognising that. That will change only when the people of Northern Ireland consent to doing something different, and local indications recently suggest that that consent is not forthcoming. In fact, it is very much the opposite.

We have a system that works very well in the House, and I think that we should stick to a system that works well in the House. We should not be cajoled into doing something different because Sinn Féin likes consensus in one place but majority rule in another, and it does not know whether it is coming or going when it comes to democratic issues, but there is no particular surprise there. I am wholly opposed to the motion and commend the Assembly Commission on the work that it has been doing.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I suppose that it is to be welcomed that we are here today discussing how we deal with flags, emblems, symbols and language at Parliament Buildings. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo inniu. We need to address the issues in an open and transparent way if we are to be faithful to the sentiments of the Assembly Commission action plan.

The Good Friday Agreement tells us that we are committed to partnership, equality and mutual respect. De réir Chomhaontú Aoine an Chéasta, táimid tiomanta do chomhpháirtíocht, chomhionannas, agus do mheas ar a chéile. If equality is about everyone being treated the same, with all our traditions and cultures being respected, this Building, which houses the power-sharing Assembly, does little to address that. There is no evidence of equality here. Níl aon fhianaise go bhfuil comhionannas anseo. We have heard already about flags and emblems, but I would like to put a particular focus on the issue of the Irish language. Ba mhaith liom díriú ar leith ar an Ghaeilge. The Assembly Commission literature states:

"Parliament Buildings hosts a large number of events and visitors each year and has a significant opportunity to play a leading role in the encouragement of dialogue, shared learning and mutual respect for different faiths and cultural backgrounds."

Despite those positive words, there is merely a nod and a wink to them when it comes to respect for the culture of Irish speakers here.

A welcome sheet showing a plan of the Building is available at reception. It points out different parts of the Building, and it is available in a variety of languages. If you look carefully through the sheets, you will eventually come upon one in Irish. If you ask in advance, you can come up here and take the Parliament Buildings tour in Irish, but only if you give notice. Caithfidh tú iarratas a chur isteach roimh ré más maith leat an turas ar Fhoirgnimh na Parlaiminte a dhéanamh as Gaeilge. Those are minimal gestures only, and they are not enough. We need to have an environment in which all — staff, Members and visitors — feel that their culture is treated with respect.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Ms McCorley: No, I will not. [Interruption.] That means that we should see bilingual signage around this entire Building.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms McCorley: Ciallaíonn sin gur chóir dúinn comharthaí dhá-theangacha a fheiceáil san Fhoirgneamh iomlán sin. Where we have a sign in English, it should also include Irish and Ulster Scots, if that is what people want. In the Chamber — [Interruption.]

Ms Ruane: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Is it appropriate that people are speaking while our colleague is trying to speak?

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor. Members should not shout across the Floor. Order. Allow the Member to continue.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat. In the Chamber, we should have a simultaneous translation system for all Members requiring it. Sometimes in this Assembly there are questions raised and negative comments made about the Irish language, but the fact is that there is a vibrant Irish language community out there that wishes to live life through the medium of Irish. They are entitled to services in this society and to have those delivered through the language of their choice.

The Irish-language community increases daily. Tá pobal na Gaeilge ag fás go laethúil. Well over 3,000 schoolchildren are currently being educated through the medium of Irish in over 80 schools throughout the North of Ireland. Why would anyone in the Assembly wish to make those children feel excluded or disrespected when they, like children from many other schools, pay a visit here? Why would anyone deny them their cultural respect? What does that say about this Assembly?

Mr Clarke: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I thought that the motion was about an Ad Hoc Committee on flags and emblems, and not a history lesson on Irish. Maybe we could get back to the motion.

Mr McCartney: On a further point of order.

Mr Speaker: Order. Let me finish with this point of order. A number of Members have gone well outside the motion. [Interruption.] Order. Yes, of course, if Members, whatever they are saying, can link it to the motion — but most who have spoken have gone well outside the motion.

Mr McCartney: Further to that point of order, they say that ignorance is bliss. If you read the motion, it says, "flags, emblems, symbols and language". So, read the motion before you make a point of order. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Allow the Member to continue.

Ms Ruane: On a further point of order. At one point, I counted six men across the way speaking while my colleague was trying to make points. Then we had the comment on language. I would just ask the Speaker to make a ruling on the fact that she has been interrupted on every single occasion — by men, I have to say. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us show some courtesy, order and respect in the House. Order. Allow the Member to continue.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. And, yes, this is about language, so tá mise ag díriú ar an Ghaeilge.

I believe it would be a refreshing and positive signal to be coming from this Assembly at the start of Seachtain na Gaeilge if we could proclaim that we welcome cultural richness, celebrate diversity and respect all languages. Más féidir linn a rá os ard go gcuirimid fáilte roimh shaibhreas cultúrtha, éagsúlacht agus teanga.

We do not expect everyone to sign up to Líofa if they do not wish to do that. What we do expect is that we put an end to the barriers and begrudgery towards the Irish language that we have seen here so often. Let us see the establishment of the Ad Hoc Committee to discuss all these issues in a rational and respectful way. Tacaím leis an rún. I support the motion.

Mr McCausland: The proposal for an Ad Hoc Committee on these various issues is utterly unnecessary and completely unwarranted. There are some in the House who have a misunderstanding about the nature and constitutional position of Northern Ireland.

I listened on the television earlier to a contribution from the leader of the SDLP, Alasdair McDonnell, and, I think, another gentlemen called McDevitt, who probably sees himself as the leader-in-waiting. However, the two of them were making a contribution in regard to the nature of Northern Ireland, and they seemed to have this confusion that it was somehow like a hybrid state and not quite British; what was it? There was clearly a lack of understanding on their part.

The reality and the fact is that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom. Her Majesty The Queen is the sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Other people may have long-term aspirations and hopes — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard.

Mr McCausland: They may have long-term aspirations and hopes, but the difference is that the constitutional position of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom is not some vague aspiration or some long-term hope or strategy. It is a current, present, constitutional reality.

The United Kingdom's flag is the Union flag. It is, therefore, the only flag that should have a proper place in this Building. So, questions around flags are unnecessary because the fact of the matter is that it is the flag of the United Kingdom and whether it be here at the Northern Ireland Assembly at Stormont or, indeed, at the City Hall, which is the main civic building in the capital city of this part of the United Kingdom, the flying of the Union flag is the right thing because it is simply a reflection and representation of the constitutional reality of this part of the United Kingdom. It is not an aspiration. It is not about identity and culture, and so on. It is a reality.

3.15 pm

The second thing that was talked about was language. It is true that minority languages are part of the cultural heritage and cultural wealth of every country. The problem in regard to the Irish language is that, back in the early 1980s, at the time of the hunger strikes and soon after, when Sinn Féin started really stepping up its cultural war, we had a Sinn Féin publication that stated clearly that every word spoken in Irish was another bullet in the freedom struggle. That was talking about cultural war. It was not speaking about cultural wealth. I have never once heard any member of Sinn Féin stand up and say that what was put forward in that publication, which was the result of a seminar organised by cultural workers in Sinn Féin, was wrong. Sinn Féin has never disowned it, said that it got it wrong or apologised for it. Therefore, I can only assume that Sinn Féin still stands by the view that every word spoken in Irish is another bullet in the freedom struggle.

Sometimes people say that political traditions are not represented here and that we need to deal with symbols and emblems. They say that there is no reflection of Irish republicanism in this Building.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: Yes, I will.

Mr Humphrey: I am pleased to hear what the Member is saying. I wanted him to give way so that he could get an extra minute.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Member for that help.

Two quick points. First, there is representation in this Building of Irish republicanism. Outside this room there is, inscribed on a wall, a commemoration to Edgar Graham, a member of the Ulster Unionist Party who was murdered by the Provisional IRA. If you go elsewhere in the Building, you will find that there is representation in a similar manner. We have to be quite frank about that today. If one is talking here about an inclusive society, a shared society and a forward-moving society, the people on the Benches opposite must indeed turn their back on the sort of thinking that led to the death of Edgar Graham and to people saying that Irish being spoken was another bullet in the freedom struggle.

The final thing I will say is this: when people talk about consensus, I find it really does cause me great concern. The people who are talking about consensus are the people who named a children's playground in the Newry and Mourne council area after an IRA terrorist. If that is seen as consensus, if that is seen as forward thinking, if that is seen as a shared future, it is indeed a very strange view, and one that the SDLP in particular, which backed the naming of —

Mr Speaker: Time is gone.

Mr McCausland: That is a very strange view of a shared future that it would put forward in our society, and certainly one that I could not subscribe to or understand.

Mr Speaker: I say to the whole House that I will not allow Members to abuse interventions to allow another Member an extra minute. Interventions should make a contribution to the debate and should be genuine interventions. I warn the whole House. I hope that I do not have to warn the Member again. Let us move on.

Ms Ruane: I was going to make a point of order on exactly the point of Mr Humphrey's abuse of —

Mr Speaker: Order. I have dealt with that.

Mr Elliott: Clearly the difficulties in the debate highlight the difficulties that there are here in Northern Ireland and, indeed, in this Assembly Chamber. They highlight the lengths and extent to which Sinn Féin will go to cause division and problems within the Chamber and within Northern Ireland. I think that we have to be honest and clear: Sinn Féin does not want to be part of the United Kingdom, as is its express right. However, there is no reason why Sinn Féin should try to implement that view on everybody else against the will of the majority of the people of Northern Ireland. It is absolute and sheer hypocrisy for Sinn Féin to come to this Chamber and tell us that they are true democrats. Earlier in the debate, I heard Ms Ruane say that she was a democrat and ask whether we were afraid of the debate. She said, "Bring it on." Why, then, for almost 40 years, did they murder the citizens of this Province? Is that democracy? I do not believe that it is. Does she believe that it is her right to impose the will of their people on the other people of Northern Ireland? No;

I listened to her talk about democracy. If she is so keen on democracy, why do Sinn Féin MPs not take up their seats in the house of democracy at Westminster and argue their case in the way everybody else does? No; they are afraid of it. I see Mr McCartney making his views known — not orally, but with signals and signs. That is the petty and low terminology and attempts that they are bringing to this debate and the Chamber. That is regrettable.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. Earlier, the proposer talked about us in the unionist community being able to celebrate our heroes. The heroes that republicans have are the likes of Hogan and Martin, who they commemorated in Dunloy, in my constituency, at the weekend. They were responsible for the murder of a British soldier. That is the type of heroes that the party opposite wants to emulate and put on a pedestal.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Elliott: I cannot disagree with the Member's sentiments. I do not know why we need an Ad Hoc Committee for this issue. We have a method and mechanism in the Assembly for dealing with it. Some Members from the parties opposite, and, indeed, the Alliance Party, have boycotted that process. That is some democracy. If they want to deal with the situation, let them deal with it through the proper mechanisms and processes that are already available in the Assembly. I recall —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: OK, if it is quick.

Mr Lyttle: Would you care to correct your last statement, given that the Alliance Party attended the most recent Commission meeting? You are continuing to peddle inaccuracies, as has been the case on this issue for about the past two months.

Mr Elliott: Have they attended all the meetings of the Commission that were to deal with this? My understanding is that they have not. If Mr Lyttle wants to correct that, let him tell me.

I witnessed the work of an ad hoc committee that Sinn Féin set up in Fermanagh council many years ago to deal with emblems and artefacts in the council's chamber and buildings. They said that they wanted a neutral working environment. They got all those artefacts and emblems removed, but what have they done now? They have introduced Irish on the headed paper and the vehicles. Is that a neutral working environment for many unionists who do not want it? No; it is absolutely not, and it is despised by them. They have turned it from being —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I have heard enough.

They have turned it from being what they said was not a neutral working environment for them, to a non-neutral working environment for unionists.

Quite often, I listen to them tell us about how great the Republic of Ireland is. The Republic of Ireland has its national flag, the Irish tricolour. When I am in the Republic of Ireland, I have no problem with it being flown there, because that is its national flag. If you look at the regulations there, you see that it is normal practice to fly the national flag on all military posts and from a number of important state buildings every day. So what is the difficulty with flying the Union flag, which is our national flag, in Northern Ireland? There should not be any problem. I accept the Irish tricolour in the Republic of Ireland. Why is the Union flag not acceptable in Northern Ireland?

Mr Gardiner: I thank the Member for giving way. The Health Committee visited the Irish Republic, and we saw its Parliament. There is a tricolour flying from not only the building, but there is one inside the Chamber at the right-hand side of the Speaker. We should be looking to see where ours is, when it comes to our Speaker. There are also three tricolours in the Upper House. We have nothing here to display the fact that we are British.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for that. There is a challenge for you, Mr Speaker. I look forward to the next time we are having a debate in the Chamber — we will have a Union flag in each corner.

I do not know why this motion was brought forward in the first place, and I do not support it. There are mechanisms for dealing with it. Let us get on and deal with it.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Beidh mé ag caint ar son an mholta seo. I will speak in favour of the motion, which deals very clearly with a specific issue. Obviously, some Members have not even bothered to read it, given some of their interventions today. The motion deals with flags, emblems, symbols and language. It does not proscribe any language, symbol, emblem or flag. It just wants a discussion of all that. I am left wondering why anyone would fear that type of discussion. Maybe Members, in their contributions, will try to explain.

Tom Elliott has a peculiar definition of democracy when it suits him and in a particular sense. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: The core of democracy is to let the people decide. So when Sinn Féin stands for election, it is written in very large letters that we do not take our seats in Westminster. We deliver on that, and we adhere to it. Just remember that. That is the definition of democracy.

One reason why we think that an Ad Hoc Committee is the best way to deal with this comes from the Commission on 2 June 2000:

"The Commission agreed that the flags issue is a political matter best handled by the Assembly."

So, in many ways, we are fulfilling the Commission's wishes. I will spare the blushes of those from the unionist parties who were on the Commission at that time. None of them said that flags should be dealt with by the Commission, only by the Commission and that that was what it was for. So what has changed in the meantime? We have got no explanation here today.

We have had a petition of concern on whether there should be open debate. Mr Poots was here, having taken time out of his very busy schedule as Health Minister to come to the debate, which is amazing in itself, although I notice that he is now absent. This time last week, Edwin Poots said that the petition of concern was abused. This week, we have the DUP, quite shamefacedly, using a petition of concern because it suits its very narrow grounds. [Interruption.] I pointed out last week — Mr McCrea is speaking from a sedentary position.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: Last week, I pointed out that we would be prepared to have an open discussion about the use of the petition of concern. It was used last week because there was an equality issue. This week, it is not being used for an equality issue. It is being used to run away from a decision, already taken by the Commission, that the matter should be dealt with as a political issue by the Assembly and, by extension, an Ad Hoc Committee.

When Mr Poots was speaking, there were great cheers from his colleagues. Indeed, the Chair of the Committee for Education, who is now absent, said that Caitríona Ruane brought legislation through the Assembly. She has not brought one piece of legislation through the Assembly as far as I am aware. Getting up and, if you like, flagwaving — dare I use that expression during this debate — to get a cheap cheer from the crowd does not serve the debate very well.

Again, it was great to see Nelson McCausland, a Minister who has a very heavy schedule and runs a very important Department, having time out to come to the debate. Many will ask whether all Executive Ministers have time to make contributions when there are 38 other Members in their parties, or are the big flag-wavers being brought out this afternoon? It was obvious from the Minister's contribution, and I have absolutely no doubt, that he was asked at the last minute — over lunchtime, perhaps — to drop in. Apart from his contribution being a series of incoherent points, the Minister was even prepared to use the death of an individual to score a very cheap and base point. He did not care who he used to do that. When we hear speeches about concern for victims and the tragedy of the past 40 years, it rings hollow when Members come to the Chamber and use anything and any opportunity to score a very base political point. I say directly to that Minister: shame on you for doing that.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: Yes. I will give way.

3.30 pm

Mr McCausland: Somehow, it is all right for Ministers from Sinn Féin to turn up at Irish republican commemorations and eulogise and glorify Irish republican killers, but it is wrong for anyone else to refer to the victims of the people whom they eulogise.

Mr Speaker: The Member has a minute added to his time.

Mr McCartney: I thought that you were going to say — it would have been an interesting point — that maybe they had time to do that rather than fulfil their ministries. I note that you made no defence. You should be in your office; you should be running your Department — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Allow the Member to finish.

Mr McCartney: You should be running your Department and dealing with the issues that affect people's lives every day instead of running in here with a big flag and waving it at people — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard.

Mr McCartney: I want to return to the topic of the debate: the need for an Ad Hoc Committee.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has almost gone.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: I will make a final point. Perhaps I will get another cheer from the other side, which I hope that Hansard will record. No one should fear discussion.

Mr Weir: I cannot let go the remarks of the Member who spoke previously. Obviously, shame on a Minister for appearing in the Assembly in this debate rather than at a terrorist commemoration. Shame on that Minister for appearing in this Assembly debate. That is the level of hypocrisy from the other side.

I will deal with a few points that have been raised and explain why this is an unnecessary motion. As, I think, Tom Elliott pointed out, there a mechanism to deal with this: it is called the Assembly Commission. That is why a motion was legitimately tabled, dealt with and passed. Indeed, we managed to reach a situation in which —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way briefly.

Mr McCartney: Previously, the Commission agreed:

"that the flags issue is a political matter best handled by the Assembly."

Talk to your member on the Commission from that time and tell them that they were wrong.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an added minute.

Mr Weir: The Member opposite can quote from 11 years ago. However, some of the Members opposite have a very short memory. The motion also deals with an Ad Hoc Committee for emblems and language policy. I am sure that this is no secret that I am revealing: this Thursday, when the Assembly Commission meeting takes place, there is an item on the agenda to deal with a draft language policy. Are we told that that is not a legitimate level of discussion for the Assembly Commission? Perhaps that should simply be put to an Ad Hoc Committee, as suggested. I wonder whether the Member opposite, as she has done on three previous occasions, will adopt some sort of hokey-cokey approach.

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: No. Quite frankly, I have heard enough from the honourable Member for South Down today.

Ms Ruane: You are afraid to debate.

Mr Weir: The Member says that we are afraid to debate. However, on the past three occasions when these very issues could have been debated in the Assembly Commission, she has been missing. The old line of running away seems to be particularly applicable today to the Member.

Flags, emblems and language are all matters that are being dealt with and have been dealt with by the Commission. In the past 12 months, we have been looking at the issue of emblems. As was indicated, we have had a number of sessions on language policy, and, indeed, we will look at that again this Thursday. As was indicated, provision has been made, and when there is genuine demand, that has been met.

I am grateful to one of the Members opposite who highlighted that, when a group makes a request to have a tour in Irish, that will be catered for. However, that is on the basis of demand. It is not on the basis of unnecessary expense for a political purpose. The great tidal wave of greater interest in the Irish language does not appear to be borne out by issues that were raised in the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure this week.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I am surprised to hear some of the Members across the way eulogising community support for the Irish language.

Last week, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure was advised that a state-funded newspaper, 25% of which was funded by our Government and 75% by the Government of the Irish Republic, needed figures of 6,000 copies to be sold to break even. The peak that it reached was 1,500 copies. Frankly, €1·6 million for a publication that never left the dock is something that should be investigated by the House and by the Oireachtas in Dublin.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for that information. The reality is that the provision of services should be on the basis of need and not on the basis of political vanity projects that some of the Members opposite want to put in place.

At the heart of this, supposedly, is the establishment of an Ad Hoc Committee. I have no problem with dealing with what needs to be dealt with in Parliament Buildings through the Assembly Commission. I think that there is a wider argument for work to be done by the party leaders to try to improve community relations. However, does anybody in this House genuinely believe that, if a six-, eight- or 10-week Ad Hoc Committee deals with this issue through 11 Back-Bench Members, it will not generate more heat than light? We are going to be left with a situation, which, if anything, simply entrenches positions. That is one of my criticisms of an Ad Hoc Committee. I do not see any particular value coming from an Ad Hoc Committee; it would simply waste people's time and generate a greater degree of anger.

One of the other false assumptions that seems to lie at the heart of this is that Northern Ireland is some sort of condominium that is somewhere between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. Indeed, one Member who is present said to me not that long ago that I may think that I am British, but that she knows that she is in Ireland. The reality — there has got to be a bit of a reality check among some of the Members opposite — is that the consent principle means that you are part of the United Kingdom. That needs to be reflected in the Chamber as much as anything else.

In conclusion, genuine debate can be had in the Assembly Commission about what the Building looks like and how we accommodate people in relation to that. We can never go down the line — I will certainly never permit it — of turning this from a Building that seems to be open to everyone and that draws groups from all sections of the community into something that is a cold house for many people in this community.

I first got involved in politics in the students' union at Queen's University. It was marked out by an aggressive Irish-language policy, and, for many years, it sent out a strong signal that the students' union and Queen's in general was not somewhere that was welcoming to the unionist community. That created a chill factor and a factor that said that one community need not attend. The reality is that there are some in the Chamber who would be happy for that to be replicated across Stormont. We have a Building that is welcoming to everyone. I believe that an Ad Hoc Committee is unnecessary.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Weir: Instead of running away from the Commission, I urge Members to attend it and to debate the issues where they should be debated. I urge Members to reject the motion.

Mr G Robinson: At the commencement of my contribution, let me make it clear that I am proud citizen of the United Kingdom. As such, I firmly believe that our nation's flag — the Union flag — should fly on all public buildings in Northern Ireland, including this Building. However, recent events have shown the world that some parties have demonised the Union flag while promoting the flying of a foreign flag. That is called hypocrisy.

I am saddened that our country's flag does not have its rightful permanent place flying over this Building. Yes — 365 days of the year. I also include in that British emblems and symbols that are housed in this Building.

In this Building, Ministers, regardless of what party they come from, carry out British parliamentary-style procedures and decide on local changes to British laws. That proposed legislation requires Royal Assent to become law, yet we cannot fly the national flag over the Assembly Building on a permanent basis. It saddens me that, although British rule and law is administered in this Building, the national flag is flown only on designated days to pander to the needs of some parties who want to achieve nothing else but the removal of a legitimate emblem of the United Kingdom.

As a unionist, I am not blind to the fact that this motion is a cynical attempt to hide the moves in Belfast City Hall and some other council-owned buildings throughout Northern Ireland. In my council in Limavady, the Union flag and other symbols, even a mug belonging to Princess Diana, were removed by the republican/nationalist bloc a few years ago, and that has caused great resentment in the unionist community ever since. Members should also remember the indefensible violent response that their actions in December provoked in the wider unionist community.

In my experience, people of all religious and political beliefs do not have a major problem with the flying of the Union flag, but they are perturbed that it has become a political football for the enemies of Ulster. I believe that it is a great sadness that a Committee such as the motion proposes is even mentioned, and I am sure that Members will understand why I cannot and will not support the motion. The Assembly Commission is the place where this topic needs to be debated.

Mr Lyttle: I certainly had hoped that the debate would be constructive, but I have to say that some of the disrespect that has been shown by DUP Members has been quite startling to many who contributed.

I sat as Chair of the — Would you let me speak? Please? [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard. Continue.

Mr Lyttle: Thank you Mr Speaker.

I sat as Chair of the Assembly Business Trust last night with young directors from all across Northern Ireland, and one common, recurring question was why the economy is not top of our agenda and why we have not managed to deal with these types of issues and settle them. I think that it is clear by some Members' attitudes why it has been so difficult

I will try to keep my comments as balanced and factual as possible, as I am acutely aware that the majority of people in Northern Ireland want to see leadership and solutions on these issues. The lack of leadership around flags and emblems has had brutal human and economic consequences for people and businesses across Northern Ireland in recent months. Unfortunately, this is a symptom of a wider issue of an incomplete peace process and a lack of delivery from the First Minister and deputy First Minister on an Executive regional shared future strategy for Northern Ireland, which they have now had over five years in office to deliver.

I believe firmly that having designated days is a balanced, mutually respectful and sustainable way to display the flag that represents the current constitutional status of this region. It not only reflects the constitutional status but respects that it does not represent the only national identity in Northern Ireland. This has been a longstanding position of the Alliance Party, which has been completely independent of other parties' positions. When required to show courage in standing for this shared future policy, we have done so to the point of death threat and intimidation at our homes and workplaces.

It is perhaps important and useful to note that a recent poll found that 44% of people surveyed across Northern Ireland believed that designated days is the best policy for the respectful display of flags in our community.

We need mature and responsible leadership on these issues. As hard to believe as it may be, parties in this House have previously shown leadership on the issue. In response to the Flags (Northern Ireland) Order 2000, which governed the display of the Union flag on government buildings, the Ulster Unionist Party said that by accepting the:

"legitimate expression of British identity through the flying of the flag on the 17 [flag-flying] days ... the SDLP and Sinn Féin will be honoring their obligation in the Belfast Agreement to show 'sensitivity' and 'promote mutual respect' rather than division."

So, I am happy to give way and allow the Ulster Unionist Party Members to explain their dramatic U-turn that they made in their contributions earlier today on this clear policy. They may wish to do that and/or to clarify what seemed to be their advocating of flying the flag at Parliament Buildings on designated days.

That —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyttle: Certainly.

Mrs D Kelly: Would it surprise the Member to learn that many members of the Ulster Unionist Party in councils across the North of Ireland have supported flag-flying on designated days in local authority buildings?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for her contribution, and, indeed, I am trying to make the point that parties have shown leadership in putting forward balanced and respectful policies on these sensitive issues. I gave the Ulster Unionist Party an opportunity to clarify what its currently mixed policy position is on the issue. Its Members have not taken that opportunity. That, however, is perhaps no great surprise.

Unfortunately, for some reason, parties have U-turned on their positions, so instead we have had systematic campaigns of misrepresentation and intimidation that seem to continue to this day. I believe that this is a morally bankrupt politics of fear. I believe that the Northern Ireland public want to see positive politics that inspires and reassures people that they have a place in Northern Ireland.

I am willing to engage with anyone's legitimate concerns, and I will robustly test the motivation of other parties, but we must send out a clear message that there is nothing to fear from compromising and forming Ad Hoc Committees that allow us to look at these issues in a political manner. Given that the role of the Assembly Commission is to be impartial and not to act on behalf of political parties, the fact is that inequalities and fears over identity will never be addressed in the absence of engagement and the delivery of a shared future.

I believe that a balanced and positive expression of identity should be the aim of the Assembly and of Northern Ireland.

Peace is the only way that we will lift communities out of disadvantage and into regeneration and economic growth, and to have designated days is a flags policy that is in line with the Belfast Agreement, and one that will give us the platform to move on the delivery of those economic issues.

3.45 pm

It is not neutrality. It is not joint authority, which I cannot imagine Sinn Féin or the SDLP wanting to see in a new united Ireland, for example. It is a balanced and respectful reflection of the constitutional status of Northern Ireland.

We have gone further than just resting on those issues. We have published a shared future strategy and put forward the constructive suggestion of a shared future reference group, which would have elected representatives working with civic society. The First Minister and the deputy First Minister seem to have declined that constructive suggestion. Two years after the initial draft of the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Lyttle: — it is clear that the Assembly needs to do much more to deal with the issues and to allow us to build the shared and better future that we want for Northern Ireland

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I did not intend to speak to the motion, but I have been following the debate while being involved in other business about the Building.

We are discussing a proposal to establish an Ad Hoc Committee — a proposal that, amazingly, attracted a petition of concern. We are talking about an Ad Hoc Committee here. It is that reaction — in my view, with respect, an overreaction — that we should really focus on.

I listened to the contributions, and some Members appear to have difficulty addressing the role and purpose of the Ad Hoc Committee or, indeed, the reasons that the proposition emerged. It was proposed not least to resolve a flags protocol but also to avoid contaminating or polluting the role of the Commission, which is meant to be a neutral body that oversees the —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Yes, OK.

Mr Allister: Is not the real reason that the motion was proposed because if the matter stays within the Assembly Commission, its decisions are unchallengeable by a petition of concern? Sinn Féin fears democracy in the Assembly Commission, so it wants to put the matter into an Ad Hoc Committee, the decisions of which, if it loses in that debate, can be blocked by a petition of concern. Is that not the real truth of what Sinn Féin is at?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an added minute.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Thank you very much. I suppose that inadvertently, because I am not sure that he was intending to support my argument, Mr Allister has actually proved my argument. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: By taking the matter into the Commission, with its inbuilt majority and its different means of arriving at decisions, in fact what we see is an attempt to impose a unionist proposal on the entire Assembly. I want to go back to the origins of this — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I think that many of the Members who spoke completely overlooked this particular important point. There was sufficient notice for people to have thought their way into the proposition when it was initially brought to the attention of Belfast City Council, over a year ago now. As it went through the various mechanisms, people had plenty of time to consider their options.

The option that was eventually selected was not Sinn Féin's preference but a compromise position. I wonder why unionists, who, all along, had accepted the designated-days formula for here, did not give a credible explanation of why they needed a 365-days policy or why they did not move before the Alliance Party moved to the idea —

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. So that he is left in absolutely no doubt, the leader of the Sinn Féin group in the City Hall made it very clear — it was streamed, so anyone can watch it — that Sinn Féin's voting to place the flag on the pole on designated days was a tactical move. It was nothing to do with any policy or principle: it was a tactical move. Let us have consistency in the message. Let us have no spin when you are misleading the House.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I reject any allegation that I am misleading the House. I am speaking to the record, and I pose the question that you also avoided: why did it not occur to unionists that there was an available compromise? We could have avoided all the division, all the schisms, all the disturbances and all the disruption that we have had since.

Is there no flexibility, no imagination, no creativity?

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: OK, Trevor.

Mr Clarke: How can the Member suggest a compromise from 365 days down to 18, given that the majority of Northern Ireland — 56% of the population — is from the unionist persuasion? How is that a compromise?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I harbour the hope and the expectation that unionists, whatever the position — and I will accept, for the sake of the proposition, 54%. What responsibility are they going to show for the 46% of people who have a different perspective? That is what this comes down to; that is the nub of it. Three hundred and sixty five days of flying the Union flag did not acknowledge that there was any other diversity, any other opinion or any other allegiances in our society. That was a proposal and a policy that should, and must, be challenged wherever it appears.

Even at this late hour — and I know that there is a petition of concern in relation to this — the idea of taking this into the Commission, with its inbuilt unionist majority, is simply digging the hole deeper. The hole is deep enough as it is. There was an available compromise, which you ignored.

Mr Eastwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go ahead, Colum.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member is a former member of Derry City Council, and one of his former colleagues is Mr Gregory Campbell. No flag flies on that council building. Does the Member think for one second that Mr Campbell feels any less British every time he walks through the halls of the Guildhall?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I suppose that it would be something to look forward to if we had an acknowledgement from Mr Campbell, but we will not get that today either, I expect.

I want to finish on this point, because I am running out of time. It is important that we recognise that there is more than one tradition and more than one aspiration in this community, and we represent them all. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: In introducing the debate, Ms Ruane read excerpts from the Good Friday Agreement. She and a number of other contributors acknowledged the requirements to promote equality, parity of esteem and good relations, and recognised the diversity that makes up the modern Northern Ireland. I, too, wish to refer to a previous document, which is the definition, if you like, or the mission statement by the First Minister and the deputy First Minister for Northern Ireland:

"Our vision for Northern Ireland is of a peaceful society in which everyone can freely and fully participate, achieve their full potential, and live free from poverty. We want a fair and effective system of government, underpinned by rights that are guaranteed for all, and responsibilities that all must share. We wish to support dialogue, and to foster mutual understanding and respect for diversity."

I have to say that the debate, and the contributions of many Members this afternoon, does not fulfil those aspirations. As a mother of four — my youngest daughter is 19 and my eldest 28 — I, like many other parents across the North, despair at today's debate in light of the continuing job losses in this region.

In his contribution, Mr Lyttle told us the how the young directors asked last night why the economy is not at the heart of debate today. It is because of a number of reasons. At the beginning of this Assembly term, the First Minister said that the Assembly and the Executive would be judged on delivery over the next four years. Almost two years into this term, what has been delivered? Again, we are debating flags and emblems, and the methodology of dealing with it in an Ad Hoc Committee was precisely because, as Mr Lyttle and others pointed out —

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: Not yet. The failure of many — of OFMDFM — in actually producing a cohesion, sharing and integration strategy. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: Many Members have rightly highlighted that the work of the Committee is not about the politics of flags and emblems. It is the work of all of us, but most especially those in leadership positions around the Executive table.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I will not give way just yet, but I will do so during the course of the debate.

We need to take a step or two back. Why are we having this debate today at this time, when the recession is still biting and when job losses are continuing to increase? We are having this debate because Peter Robinson never got over losing the East Belfast seat to Naomi Long. Mr Speaker, 40,000 leaflets were issued across Belfast — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order

Mrs D Kelly: — because of Peter Robinson's failure to win that seat. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: That brought protestors and violence onto the streets of the North, and 152 police officers were injured. Did Peter Robinson show a lead by standing by Martin McGuinness's side to condemn that violence? [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: No, he did not. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

 $\mbox{\bf Mrs}\ \mbox{\bf D}\ \mbox{\bf Kelly}\mbox{:}$  The boys in the playground opposite have yet to tell —

Mr Anderson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Speaker: Order. Members should not persist. It is quite obvious that the Member does not want to give way at this minute in time. [Interruption.] Order. Allow the Member to continue.

Mrs D Kelly: The boys across the way are going to have to listen for once in their lives. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: Mr Speaker, many Members have referred to the Good Friday Agreement. I was filled with dismay to hear Gregory Campbell say that it is a redundant document. Shame on him. He is deluding himself and the people whom he represents, because the DUP's very presence in this Chamber acknowledges the institutions that were set up under the Good Friday Agreement. This place would not be in existence were it not for the DUP's tacit engagement with and participation in the institutions.

The Good Friday Agreement was amended by the DUP, in cahoots with the British and Irish Governments and, to some extent, Sinn Féin, to get the St Andrews Agreement. So, de facto, through the very presence and reality of the St Andrews Agreement, the DUP has accepted the Good Friday Agreement. It is about time that Peter Robinson and those in the leadership positions of the DUP told their Back-Benchers what that means. It means parity of esteem. It means equality. It means —

Mr Speaker: Order. I said earlier in the debate that it is important that Members, in whatever they say, link their words to the original motion. I am listening to the Member as she sums up. It is important that we try to come back to the motion as far as possible.

Mrs D Kelly: The reason why I referred specifically to the Good Friday Agreement is the failure and contributions of many Members opposite. They are deluding themselves and the communities that they represent. The Good Friday Agreement exists and is here to stay, so get over it. Get over it. [Interruption.]

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: No, I will not give way just yet. There is plenty of time for that. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Members should not persist.

Mrs D Kelly: A number of contributors talked about the position of the Assembly Commission. We, as an Assembly, ought to protect the Commission's position and authority and its roles and responsibilities. We should not put an issue as toxic as flags and emblems into that forum. There are other forums already in existence to deal with that agenda item. There is the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy and the First Minister and deputy First Minister's sitting with their colleagues around the

As other Members have pointed out, it is very disheartening that, when Ministers have spoken as ordinary Assembly Members —

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I want to make this point.

I defend Ministers' right to do so. Nonetheless, they are working the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement in their ministerial positions. That is what they are doing. They are Ministers under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement.

I will give way.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Member for giving way eventually.

You referred to parity of esteem. Will you refer to parity of esteem in respect of your colleague sitting behind you, who carried the coffin of a paramilitary ex-terrorist, terrorist or whatever you wish to call him; the naming of a park after a terrorist — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Clarke: — and the continual campaign in respect of —

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member must be heard.

Mr Clarke: — the freeing of Marian Price and Gerry McGeough?

4.00 pm

Mrs D Kelly: The Member opposite did not use the example of John Hume, who said that you cannot eat a flag. As he well knows, that is a reality for many people today, with child poverty increasing in this area — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: Child poverty in this region is among the highest. Mr Speaker, are my constituency offices a place apart from the constituency offices of Members opposite? We have people coming in because there is not enough social housing available to them; people are losing their jobs and their benefits are being removed. I hear shouting from the background. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: One of the points that I wish to make is that part of the issue around this is that there has been a failure to deal not only with building a shared future, but with the past. The SDLP has always called for that and said that we must deal with the past on an ethical and moral basis. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs D Kelly: We are not afraid of that. We are up for that challenge, and I hope that other parties will stand with us.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I have finished, Mr Speaker.

Mr Speaker: I remind Members that the vote will be on a cross-community basis.

Education: Entitlement Framework Funding and Strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is the motion on the — order, Members — entitlement framework funding and strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds. The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. I ask Members to leave the Chamber quietly. I ask the Clerk to read the motion. [Interruption.]

4.15 pm

Mr Gardiner: On a point of order, Mr Speaker, please ask the Clerk to read the motion again. There was so much noise, and it did not deliver down here. It was not his fault but that of Members making such an uproar going out. If he could read it again, I would very much appreciate it.

Mr Speaker: The wording is on the Order Paper. I apologise to the Member and to other Members who are not hearing the proceedings. There may be an issue around that, which we will look at. I appreciate what the Member is saying.

Miss M McIlveen: I beg to move

That this Assembly, in light of recommendation 9 of the review of the common funding scheme and the concerns being expressed by schools and further education colleges, calls on the Minister of Education to extend the funding earmarked for the entitlement framework to the 2013-14 and 2014-15 financial years; and further calls on the Minister of Education to work with the Minister for Employment and Learning to bring forward, as a matter of urgency, a common funding approach for all pupils and students within a coherent strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds.

In moving the motion, I acknowledge the announcement that the Minister of Education made last week on the provision of an additional £9.9 million to assist schools in the fulfilment of their obligations under the entitlement framework. The Minister will have to excuse my suspicion that this announcement may have some connection with this debate. It will not have escaped the Assembly's attention that, when a motion on education is tabled by the DUP, a ministerial statement or an announcement on the matter is issued shortly before the debate. No doubt, he will deny it, and if it had happened once, I would not have thought any more of it. However, when these coincidences keep occurring, such as with debates tabled on GCSEs and school leadership, it becomes increasingly hard to ignore. To misquote Oscar Wilde: to issue one statement may be regarded as misfortune, to issue two looks like carelessness, but to issue three looks like implementing DUP policy. In fact, I am tempted to table a motion on academic selection to see whether the Minister will be spurred into action.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Despite the Minister's announcement, there is still plenty to debate. The key objective of the entitlement framework is to improve equality of access for all young people, regardless of where they live or the sector in which they are educated to a broadly balanced and more economically relevant curriculum with clear progression pathways. This motion was tabled after it became clear from the Minister's savings delivery plan that, in 2013-14, only £5.2 million would be available to schools to meet the requirements under the entitlement framework and that, in 2014-15, that would reduce to nothing. To put this into context: schools were provided with £11.3 million in 2011-12. This has the potential to cause massive problems for schools and eat into their already stretched delegated schools budgets. Even following the Minister's announcement, schools are to receive £8.2 million in 2013-14 and £6.9 million the following year, which may be difficult to manage. This money is required to ensure that schools comply with their obligations under the entitlement framework, which means that a school must offer a minimum number of subjects at Key Stage 4 and post-16. It was recognised in the Salisbury report, which was published last month, that schools were struggling financially to meet those obligations, and as a result of this, recommendation 9 of his report suggested:

"To allow schools to fulfil the requirements of the Entitlement Framework in the short to medium term, the Department of Education should consider extending earmarked entitlement framework funding at its current level for the 2013/14 and 2014/15 financial years."

Unfortunately, despite an announcement that sounds so pleased with itself, the amounts on offer still fall very short of what was recommended by the Salisbury report and, I must presume, of what is required for schools to meet their statutory requirements. It is unfortunate that the announcement was not made earlier, as many schools may have already finished their curriculum for next year, to allow young people and their parents to make informed choices about their future.

The situation throws up a number of questions that I would like the Minister to answer. What has persuaded the Minister that the amount that he has announced is sufficient to cover the needs that are identified in the Salisbury report, which recommended maintaining funding at its current level rather than reducing it?

What will happen to schools that are unable to meet their statutory obligations due to decreased funding? If the schools have been unable to complete the transaction up to this point, can they be expected to do so within the next two years? Does the Minister have a contingency plan? A further question that I would like the Minister to address is: can we be satisfied that the entitlement framework is a suitable model for schools?

I will move on to the thorny issue of a coherent strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds. I can only call it "thorny", because there seems to have been a U-turn away from the policy of the previous Sinn Féin Minister of Education on this matter. A 2009 letter from Caitríona Ruane advised us that a working group on qualifications at 14-19 had been established in September 2008, with a commitment to work closely with the Department for Employment and Learning to further develop a 14-19 strategy. The Department's website says:

"The Department of Education ... and the Department for Employment and Learning ... are working conjointly to bring forward a co-ordinated programme of provision for 14-19 year olds."

However, when is a strategy not a strategy? When it is a "co-ordinated programme of provision", because in January this year the current Minister wrote to the Education Committee stating:

"I would like to clarify that the Department has no plans to publish a 14-19 Education Strategy."

So, in the context of the entitlement framework, it would make enormous sense to publish such a strategy. It would provide the structure to allow a joined-up approach to ensure that pupils' individual needs are met. The current funding structure does not allow a sufficient crossover. Although the independent panel behind the Salisbury report would prefer to see a school estate that could offer the breadth of courses that are specified in the entitlement framework, there is an admission that this cannot be an immediate reality and that such a change to the school estate could take some considerable time.

The reality is, therefore, that further education colleges, which fall under the Minister for Employment and Learning's remit, with their state-of-the-art facilities and specialist lecturers, are best placed to offer many of those courses. It appears inconceivable in the light of that reality that a strategy is no longer contemplated. Such a strategy could provide a means of giving protection to rural schools in the light of the reduction in funding, and it is those schools, which this Assembly has recognised on numerous occasions as important to rural communities, that potentially struggle most under the entitlement framework where transport costs, pupil numbers and the cost of provision of subjects are concerned.

The strategy could also look at small sixth forms. It is recognised by the independent panel, and generally accepted, that there are too many small sixth forms. However, will it be possible to operate large sixth forms without the excessive use of transport in rural areas? Given the reduction in funding, can those sixth forms continue, and what impact will that have on those rural communities? Conjoined thinking and a clear strategy could help not only in addressing the problems but in dealing with the fears of schools and pupils.

The disparity in costs of the provision of subjects between schools and further education colleges could also be addressed. The panel also noted that issue. The panel recommends that the Department of Education considers, with the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL), the potential for joint funding arrangements for all 16- to 19-year-olds. I feel that this does not go far enough, and such arrangements should be considered for all 14- to 19-year-olds as part of a 14-19 strategy.

Sadly, the panel chose not to allocate additional funding for the provision of applied or vocational courses for fear that it may encourage further duplication of provision and, in particular, encourage schools to replicate the specialist provision of further education colleges. However, a strategy may well address some of those issues.

Such a strategy could also address issues on special educational needs (SEN) provision. The SEN framework, operated by the Department of Education (DE), makes schools and the education and library boards responsible for identifying, assessing and making provision for pupils with special educational needs up to the age of 16. That is the situation unless that pupil has a statement of SEN, in which case the statement can then be maintained until the end of the academic year when the young person reaches 19 years of age. A smooth transition is required when that young person leaves the school system and becomes the responsibility of DEL from age 16 onwards, and a coherent strategy could deal with that. Furthermore, the needs that should be addressed while such young people are availing themselves of services at further education colleges as a result of the entitlement framework could also form part of that combined strategy.

Will the Minister once again clarify whether there will be a strategy arising out of the co-ordinated programme provision between DE and DEL? Will he advise what happened between the 2009 letter of his predecessor and his letter of January 2013 that resulted in the decision not to progress with the conjoined strategy? Will he provide more detail on the working group referred to by his predecessor and advise when the group ceased meeting and what happened to its recommendation?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Miss M McIlveen: At present, there is no clear direction of GCSE and GCE, and we have talked before about clear pathways. We need to be aware of the requirements of the workforce, the economy and universities, and whether we are meeting those requirements. That should form part of the basis of a coherent strategy, and currently we are seeing little evidence —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Miss M McIlveen: — of joined-up thinking between DE and DEL to deliver real outcomes.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Miss M McIlveen: That situation needs to change.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Members opposite for bringing the motion to the House.

I commend the Education Minister for announcing a further  $\mathfrak{L}9\cdot 9$  million to extend the entitlement framework support funding in 2014-15. As the Member opposite said, it will help ensure that schools deliver a wide range of courses applicable to each student's ability and needs going into Key Stage 4 and post-16. Regardless of what school or background they come from, pupils will have the same access to the opportunities presented by an increased number of courses.

Young people need to be equipped with the relevant knowledge that will help them with the skills that they need to compete for apprenticeships and other jobs. They need to be provided with the same support to give them the confidence, skills and experience to compete in the labour market

The 18 new courses at Key Stage 4 for 2013-14, moving towards 24 courses in 2015-16, and the 21 courses for post-16 for 2013-14, moving towards 27 courses in 2015-16, will help maximise and improve educational attainment, which is vital to helping build a world-class skills base here. Skills have the potential to transform lives by transforming life chances and driving social mobility. However, I believe that schools need to have robust, well-informed careers information and guidance, as that is critical to successful progression pathways.

I have spoken with many young people in my constituency who say that they made the wrong choices in the courses that they took owing to the lack of good advice and information on the subject and where it would lead them and on whether the courses were required for entry to certain other courses and colleges. Schools' careers advisers and external advisers should work in partnership with one another, pupils, parents and those with parental responsibility.

I am aware that a number of partnership agreements are in place with careers teams and schools. However, how is that working and how is it being benchmarked? How do we know that it is working to the advantage of the pupils? It is widely researched that good careers advice will help reduce drop-out levels in further and higher education courses and training.

Our economy demands a flexible and skilled workforce fit for the 21st century. I urge both Ministers and their respective Departments — DE and DEL — to re-evaluate the guidance given to Key Stage 4 and post-16 pupils to ensure that the courses are matched to the needs of the labour market and, in particular, within sectors of growth for the economy so that pupils can make informed choices to suit their ability and needs, know that the courses that they undertake are the right ones for them and be aware of what is available to them.

Area learning communities assist schools in reducing their costs, and they share expertise. I believe that that is good practice. I, along with other members of the Education Committee, had the privilege of attending one such area learning community in Limavady, where schools from different sectors come together to share classes and courses. Not only are the children getting the opportunity to work in partnership, but they are also working educationally across the religious divide.

4.30 pm

The Department does not allocate specific funding for area learning communities but to the schools within them under the local management of the schools. I would like to hear from the Minister how many schools in the North are actively participating in area learning communities. I believe that schools working collectively offer more choice to young people and open up wider opportunities for them going into employment.

That highlights the need for closer co-operation and collaboration between both Ministers in the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Education in order to explore a common approach for all pupils aged 14 to 19, as further education has a key role to play in opening up access to higher-level skills to individuals from backgrounds with historically lower rates of participation. I support the motion.

Mr Kinahan: I, too, welcome the motion. I especially welcome the call to extend the funding earmarked for the entitlement framework and the call to formulate a common funding approach for all pupils and students within a coherent 14-19 strategy. Those are two very good points, but it is sad that today's debate has been undermined by the announcement last week. Yet, I welcome the £3 million and £6·5 million that are being offered to help out with the payment of making the entitlement framework work. It is extremely welcome, but it makes me wonder whether the two parties are working well together and playing off on each other, or is it just good politics? I would like to think that it is the latter.

On the one hand, it is good news, but it is too late for many schools that have already planned their cuts. My colleague Jo-Anne Dobson will go into that a bit more in a few minutes. We welcome the entitlement framework and the breadth of its subjects, but we struggle to understand how it fits in with all the other changes that are being put into education.

To be able to afford the entitlement framework, we need large schools, which, at the moment, we do not have that many of, and we probably will not have in the future. Depending on what happens in this thing, we may not have the scale of those schools in the future. So, we do need funding; not just short term for the next two or three years, but a dynamic system of putting funding in place well into the future.

On the other hand, it could mean that we need to cause schools to share skills better, and to share facilities. That, of course, is welcome, especially in line with the Ulster Unionist policy of trying to achieve a single, shared education system into the future.

We recently saw in an answer to a question from me that the area learning communities cost some £10·7 million a year, with just over £1 million being spent in Newry and Mourne and just £90,000 being spent in south-west Belfast. That is not to say that one is better than the other, but it shows how diverse the use of funding is in pushing the area learning communities towards helping each other. We like the idea, and we like the broad curricula, but we do not want to see it being used for the comprehensivisation of our schools or taking away from achieving shared education.

With so much change ongoing, we need more dynamic funding. As I have said, we know that Sinn Féin wants the comprehensivisation of all schools. That means large schools and a broad entitlement framework, but we must take care that we are not sleepwalking into something that most of us do not want.

The second part of the motion calls for a common funding approach and a coherent strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds. I ask the Minister whether he has put someone in charge of pulling together all those points. Some extremely good points were made by the proposer. We need a coherent strategy, and we long to see Northern Ireland not just as the powerhouse of the UK or Europe, but actually producing people for the whole world. It does need someone to pull it all together.

This entitlement framework is one area where we are drifting like a rudderless ship in a sea of far too many changes, especially where there is a lack of an agreed cross-party way forward. So, once again, I call on the Minister to work with other parties to produce that long-term way forward. The spirit of the Belfast Agreement was consensus and not this deal-or-no-deal sort of system that we have.

The House and all of us pulling together can do much better, so I welcome the motion. Many of the symptoms within it, though, concern me. I may be wrong, but let us see our whole education system being pulled together. I support the motion.

Mr Rogers: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion but am disappointed that the SDLP amendment, which put a stronger emphasis on the necessity for a 14 to 19 education strategy, was not accepted, although I accept that the idea of "a coherent strategy" is mentioned in the motion

I welcome the extra funding to ensure the delivery of the entitlement framework, albeit that it is insufficient to meet the Salisbury requirements. However, where is the strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds' education? That is essential if we are to meet the needs of our young people and our economy, by offering them, wherever they go to school, a wide and better-balanced range of courses that are relevant to their needs, aptitudes, interests and their job prospects. Every pupil is different and choices should reflect each young person's interests and aspirations.

Many young people — and, indeed, parents — underestimate the importance of choice at the end of Key Stage 3, a choice that may significantly impact on their careers. What do you say to a person in their late teens who has insufficient science or foreign language experience to pursue a particular course of study?

High-quality careers education, information and guidance are essential during Key Stage 3 and right through their time at school so that they can make an informed choice, leading to the most appropriate route for them. It is about schools, as well as young people and their parents, having high aspirations and then achieving them.

The entitlement framework gives young people the opportunity at the age of 14 and 16 to pursue different pathways, in their own or other schools or in further education colleges. Many students choose the traditional route with the same school from the age of 11 to 16 or 11 to 18, but I have seen the real benefits of the flexibility that entitlement framework funding creates in my constituency in the Downpatrick and Newry and Mourne learning partnerships.

When a young person is engaged in their own learning and can see the relevance of what they are doing in school and college and what the progression pathways can lead to for their future, they are more likely to achieve and focus in the short- and long term, and more likely to progress into higher education, training or employment.

I was particularly impressed on a recent visit to the South Eastern Regional College, Downpatrick, when I observed three groups who took an alternative route post-16: a pet care course that young people were using as preparation for pursuing a course in veterinary nursing or equine studies; an ICT course that at the end of two years provided them with the necessary skills and qualifications to enter the world of work or third-level study; or a hair and beauty course that gave them the skills to set up their own business or enter the hotel leisure industry. Those young people knew why they were doing their respective courses and had their plans well mapped out. It is important to mention that further education (FE) colleges feel left out of the area-based planning process.

The entitlement framework and associated funding has many other benefits, including opportunities for shared education and helping the transition from school to third-level study. Having to go to another school or college helps to build independent living skills that are essential at third level.

It is important that parents are encouraged to aspire to a better education and future for their children. Parental involvement and encouragement, no matter how small, can have a direct and long-term effect on a child's educational achievement. It must be made clear to parents that, no matter what your background, your child can achieve educationally and improve life. That real parental engagement is needed through the strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds.

Young people with special educational needs need to have the same opportunities within the 14 to 19 curriculum, whether they decide to stay on at school or attend a further education college. I was assured by the Minister this morning that rurality will be an important factor as we plan. A Member said earlier that this entitlement framework and the curriculum strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds is an important aspect to maintaining rural schools.

In conclusion, I support the motion. It is about quality and coherence of provision through a 14-19 education strategy that meets the needs of all our young people and properly prepares them for a life of work in the 21st century.

Mr Lunn: I support the motion. Before I continue, I must say that I was utterly enchanted by Michelle McIlveen's introduction to the debate. I am sure that Oscar Wilde is up there somewhere having a quiet smile. He probably would have used the same words himself.

Michelle referred to the coincidence of the Minister preempting the debate by announcing a funding increase in advance of it. It must be the first time a Minister has dealt with half of a motion without getting to his feet. If a motion comes forward from the Alliance Party looking for a 200% increase in funding for integrated schools, it will be pure

Because the Minister has so adequately dealt with the first half of the motion, I will speak on the second point on common funding and the needs of 14- to 19-year-olds. Obviously, I support that part of the motion. There is a recognised and significant problem here. Too often, as we all know, 16- to 19-year-olds in particular are perceived to fall between the cracks and out of the system. Although that is beginning to change, there is still a lot of work to do.

The motion refers to a "coherent strategy"; I would perhaps use the word "flexible" but we can use both. We need a flexible strategy that provides real choice and flexibility of movement, post 16, between schools and further education colleges. Such a strategy could usefully tie in with existing education strategies, such as area planning, and Mr Rogers mentioned the desire and the need for FE colleges to be involved in that process. Parents and young people should be well placed to make that choice and to benefit from that flexibility after GCSEs.

Another issue, which we have talked about before and is particularly applicable here, is our current unwillingness to reflect on the vocational value of courses, primarily those offered by FE colleges. The whole system, from transfer test onwards, assumes that a specifically academic route is good and that a vocational — what we used to call technical — route is something else; I will not use the word "bad", but it is seen as somehow inferior.

Such a value judgement is wrong and flawed, and it is every bit as wrong and flawed at 16 as it would be at 11. In fact, there is an excellent case for the argument that more people in Northern Ireland should choose the college route at 16. Colleges are generally much better at incorporating professional input — for example, from industry — into their courses, making those courses more directly applicable to the workplace.

Although the interface between colleges and the workplace is generally sound, we need to improve the interface between schools and FE colleges. Colleges should not be seen as backstop options or a last-chance saloon, but as the preferred option for those looking at careers in industry and the like.

I wonder whether the proposers of the motion are equally content with all the recommendations in the common funding scheme — the Salisbury document. I think we all accept that concerns are being expressed by schools and FE colleges. On the same basis, I suppose that some schools would take issue with what I am saying about colleges being better linked to the real world of the modern workplace.

It strikes me that there is an issue for teachers as well. Again, I would like some consideration to be given to that by the proposers of the motion and the Minister. Within a coherent strategy and common funding approach for students there would, presumably, be a need for a common funding approach for teachers.

That raises additional issues. It seems to me that, for various reasons, the school teaching profession and the college tutoring profession are regarded as entirely distinct from each other. There is a case for a bit more parity of esteem, which we hear a lot about in this House, in that area.

Finally, I wish to introduce into the debate the tracking aspect of the not in employment, education or training (NEET) strategy. I said at the outset that too many people in their late teens fall through the cracks. For many, it can be a particularly vulnerable age. It is essential that we know who and where they are, and that they know what options they have.

In the previous debate, we heard a lot about the need to discuss real issues like education, the economy, the health service — you name it. That was referred to over and over again. I will not count, but there were 94 MLAs here for that vote, and there are about 16 here now for this important issue. I will leave that thought with you.

4.45 pm

Mrs Hale: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on my party's motion, which is very timely, given the Minister's statement earlier today.

I welcome the news that the Education Minister is to allocate £9·9 million to help schools and colleges to deliver the entitlement framework, but it comes as no surprise that the announcement comes on the back of pressure by the DUP.

Although the additional funding is welcome, it is fair to say that it is only a drop in the ocean. Many schools and colleges still express concerns that, if the common funding scheme is not extended to the longer term, many pupils and, indeed, small local communities, will suffer. Many principals of small rural schools, who do an excellent job, may conclude that the Salisbury report 's recommendations to change the common funding scheme will lead to the removal of pupils from their schools to larger schools, in which similar or better educational outcomes cannot be guaranteed.

I have genuine worries that the current review could mean the eradication of small rural schools in favour of large schools in more urban areas. Although there is an acceptance that the funding should be spent where there is need and that certain pupils may need additional resources, I strongly believe that changes to the common funding scheme must be based on an economic case that can show that there will be better educational outcomes for all pupils. That is why the funding for 2013-14 and 2014-15 has to be extended, allowing for a proper debate based on actual models rather than hypothetical outcomes.

My party colleague Mr Mervyn Storey raised a valuable point in the Education Committee. He highlighted the fact that there was no empirical data to prove that larger schools with bigger budgets can provide better educational outcomes for pupils, but that is where the Minister hopes to save large amounts of money.

Another area of contention is the use of free school meals as an indicator in the common funding scheme and, consequently, the delivery of the entitlement framework. I am aware that the uptake of free school meals in a number of post-primary schools in my constituency, which serve some deprived areas, can be as low as 10%. It does not equate to the reality of what is happening. It is also the case that many rural families who may be classed as living in affluent areas feel that the take-up of free school meals would cause isolation and stigmatisation in their community. It is evident that little thought has been given to considering other criteria, such as education maintenance allowance (EMA) uptake, social deprivation, rural poverty statistics, Department for Social Development (DSD) funding and community need. The list goes on.

Today's debate shows that the Minister needs to rethink certain aspects of the common funding scheme, a point that the DUP raised at Committee and in the House. He must commit to working in an open and transparent manner regarding his Department's savings delivery plans and ensure that his discussions with the Minister for Employment and Learning lead to a viable and, indeed, workable 14- to 19-year-old framework that will prepare all our young people for a fluid and unpredictable labour market.

I support the motion.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Like everybody else, I welcome the motion and congratulate the Minister on his decision in recent weeks to invest an additional £10 million to help local schools to fulfil their requirements under the entitlement framework.

In recent years, successive Sinn Féin Education Ministers have initiated a broad range of reforms, with an emphasis on ensuring that all our young people leave school with the skills and training required to meet the employment demands of a rapidly changing world. For too long, education provision was planned in an unco-ordinated and bottom-up way, through which the market demands of individual institutions triumphed over the educational needs of the child. Thankfully, however, we now see the building blocks of a system that delivers quality learning while guaranteeing an equitable and more relevant curriculum choice.

Central to this evolution in education provision have been the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework, which, in tandem, have developed key skills, increased access and choice for all pupils and empowered our young people to make informed decisions about their future.

Through the entitlement framework, young people have access to a far wider range of subjects and are now able to choose a mix that best suits their personal needs, not the perceived needs of the institution. Now, academic courses can be integrated with challenging professional and technical courses. That provides a much better base for many future third-level entrants, and, increasingly, the courses are focused on the requirements of a globalised economy.

Moreover, the entitlement framework ensures the capacity to deliver high-quality professional and technical pathways, again accessed by choice and available through modern organisational flexibility. Above all, it ensures that all our young people enjoy parity of esteem. For the first time, all, not just some, children will be helped to realise their full potential. Academic excellence can still be cherished in our system while ensuring that different pathways are kept open for all children at every possible point.

A LeasCheann Comhairle, at a time when educational discourse is saturated with the issue of underachievement and, more specifically, the ongoing underachievement of those who are from socially disadvantaged backgrounds, the importance of the entitlement framework cannot be overstated. With a focus on every young person achieving his or her full potential, from every sector and every background, the entitlement framework will ensure that all pupils will stay engaged in their own learning process. As a result, they will see the relevance of their educational journey, thus increasing their appetite to achieve long-term progression into higher education, training or employment.

If we bear in mind the need to tackle educational underachievement while making the best use of available resources, the Minister's decision to commission a review of the common funding formula was necessary, and the recommendations may help to drive sustainable educational excellence for many years to come. The proposed new formula is not only fair but more accessible and transparent. It comprises seven core principles, and the emphasis will finally be on pupil entitlement with additional premiums that reflect pupil needs. Ultimately, the new formula lays down the foundations for changes that will benefit all young people.

As the Audit Office report illustrated last week, educational underachievement exists largely in communities that suffer social disadvantage. Therefore, it is imperative that resources are directed to the schools that service the communities that suffer most from such deprivation. In light of that, I welcome recommendation 18, which calls for increased funding for socio-economic deprivation to be weighted towards schools with such significant concentrations of disadvantage.

As I outlined at the outset, the decision to extend the entitlement framework funds, as recommended by Bob Salisbury's report, is a welcome step. There is no doubt that it will go some way to ease the budget pressures faced by local schools. I also welcome the fact that the Minister of Education is committed to working closely with his colleague Minister Farry to ensure that the needs of all our young people are equitably met in the years ahead.

The entitlement framework and, indeed, the common funding review are examples of how we can raise standards and target social need. I welcome the fact that the House supports those two initiatives. I look forward to working with all sides of the House to ensure that we continue to tackle educational underachievement as we build a truly world-class education system.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the proposers for bringing the motion to the House, although I note with interest that, as my colleagues and others outlined, issues have moved ahead in that regard since the motion was tabled initially. Schools are broadly supportive of the overall aims of the entitlement framework, but they are continually hampered in its delivery because of budget cuts and the resulting difficult decisions that need to be made. We have discussed the issue on a number of occasions in the Committee for Education, including the impact on schools of the planned phasing out of funding.

Budget cuts and redundancies that have been carried out in schools to ensure balanced budgets have worked contrary to the delivery of the entitlement framework. It is one thing to look at the balance sheets and financial numbers and entirely another to think of the effect that those decisions can have on children in the classroom. I am aware that, when schools experience financial difficulties, balancing budgets takes precedence over delivery of the framework. Principals have taken and, indeed, been forced into making those difficult decisions. Staff have been made redundant, a move which, in some schools, has led to fewer subjects being delivered. Again, that is contrary to the spirit of the framework. Those decisions have impacted directly on the educational experience of all their pupils.

A special school in my constituency has fostered a fantastic relationship with the local campus of the FE college. Through the area learning community, it has been able to engage in excellent best practice collaboration, something that Northern Ireland's participation in the progress in international reading literacy study shows is rare, as only over one fifth of teachers say that they are collaborative with their colleagues.

Those relationships that have been built up between schools have been put in jeopardy because of the planned phasing out of funding. As we are in the final quarter of the academic year, and if collaboration is to be encouraged, not just in the short term but in the long term, it must be recognised that that announcement, welcome though it is, comes far too late for many.

Decisions have been taken, best practice has been put in jeopardy, and the educational experience of pupils has been damaged as a result of planning to cope with the phasing out of the entitlement framework funding. I have said in the House previously that a behind-the-sofa approach to funding the education of our children is a far cry from a strategic approach. Inevitably, costs will be associated if principals wish to reverse decisions that were taken prior to last Thursday's announcement of additional funding.

Mr Buchanan: I support the motion. I commend the Chair of the Education Committee and my party colleagues on it for tabling the motion and having it scheduled for debate today.

The importance of funding the entitlement framework for a further two years, as recommended in the independent review of the common funding scheme, should not be underestimated, given the immense benefit that it provides for those in the 14- to 19-year-old bracket. As has been mentioned, since the indication of the tabling of the motion, the Minister gave an indication at the weekend of his intention to extend the funding for the 2013-14 and 2014-15 financial years. That action taken by the Minister certainly shows the effectiveness of the Committee Chair and DUP members in their scrutiny role of his actions and on influencing his decision-making.

However, the Minister must go that step further and work more closely with the Minister for Employment and Learning to bring forward a long-term coherent strategy for our 14- to 19-year-old pupils. As Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning, I know that the Department for Employment and Learning is committed to developing a highly skilled, flexible and innovative workforce that will contribute to social inclusion and economic success. The crucial elements in achieving such a workforce is a coherent strategy that will deliver effective education and training for the 14- to 19-year-old age group by giving them their opportunity to engage in learning and enabling them to participate in and progress to further and higher education or achieve skilled employment.

Of course, there is a growing concern across all our colleges that the post-primary sector is withdrawing from existing partnerships, despite recognition of the exceptional quality and importance of the vocational programmes that are offered by the further education sector, on the grounds that college collaboration is no longer affordable due to the lack of clarity of future long-term funding or a strategy of the entitlement framework. Indeed, Colleges Northern Ireland has expressed its concern about that matter.

For the future benefit of our 14- to 19-year-olds, it is essential that the excellent partnerships that have been developed with schools and colleges in recent years continue. Given the substantial investment that colleges have made in staff and facilities during the period of collaboration, maintaining progress in that area, although a priority for the Minister for Employment and Learning and DEL, should equally be a priority for the Education Minister and his Department.

Although the entitlement framework as originally envisaged by DEL and DE was to contribute to the wider work of improving educational outcomes for all students and addressing the learning barriers that have seen far too many of our young people not achieving their full potential, DEL's concern is that the current trend of delivery will not deliver those potential benefits, with the result that our young people will continue to lose out and leave school with little or no qualifications, with the most vulnerable falling into the NEET category. That is why it is so important for the Education Minister to work closely with the Minister for Employment and Learning to bring forward a coherent strategy that will not only meet the need but deliver for that sector of society.

Under the strategic direction that was set for the future education sector by DEL, the aim of colleges in Northern Ireland is to be at the heart of lifelong learning; to strengthen economic and workforce development; to enhance social cohesion; and to advance individuals' skills and learning. Indeed, our colleges are now seen as a key agent for strengthening economic development. They have a crucial role to play in supporting business and innovation.

Key factors in the provision of education and training for our young people are to help them to identify their future aspirations; to agree programmes of learning that will meet their needs and are relevant to the workplace; to improve individual skills in literacy, numeracy and ICT; to improve employability skills; and to enable progression to higher levels of study.

Although DEL has been endeavouring to bridge the gap through its essential skills qualifications, which, over the past 10 years, have delivered excellent results, there is a need to deliver the essential skills —

5.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Buchanan: — courses to our year 11 pupils. However, the present arrangements in the Department do not allow for that, which I believe is a missed opportunity. Therefore, I say to the Minister —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Buchanan: — that he should acknowledge that there is a problem, accept that there is an opportunity that can be addressed —

 $\mbox{\bf Mr}\mbox{\bf Deputy}\mbox{\bf Speaker}\mbox{:}$  The Member's time is up.

Mr Buchanan: — act accordingly, do not bury your head in the sand —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Buchanan: — but endeavour to work closely with the Minister for Employment and Learning to bring forward a strategy —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Buchanan: — that will deliver for the 14 to 19 age group. Sorry, Deputy Speaker.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I assure the Member who spoke previously that I am not burying my head in the sand on any of these issues.

Can we just put into context why I made my announcement when I did? There are no suspicious minds involved in this statement or even in the previous three. Over the last period, the DUP has quite rightly tabled motions that were relevant at the time of tabling. I am working on them, you are working on them and other Members are working on them, and it should not come as a surprise that our work comes to fruition at the same time.

Last year, the Executive made an intervention by making a significant amount of money available to education. That was distributed through the aggregated schools budget. Following that, schools quite rightly lobbied me for entitlement framework moneys. They said that, although they welcomed the funding that came from the Executive, there was still a hole in the budget for the entitlement framework. At that stage, I promised them that I would examine the situation further to see what I could do.

A number of events happened after that. At the Executive meeting that followed what were around 500 job losses at FG Wilson in the autumn of last year, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister called all the Ministers together and set us the task of reviewing our budgets to see how we could create and sustain employment. Ever since, I have been reviewing my budget, and I have paid particular attention to two areas: current expenditure and how it was being spent; and how we could sustain employment through my budget.

We had set significant proportions of funds aside for redundancies in specific areas, and Members will be aware that, over the past two years, around 1,200 teaching posts and a significant number of non-teaching posts have been made redundant. Thankfully, the Executive's intervention has doubtless saved hundreds of jobs, and the money that I set aside for redundancies was not needed in full.

So, what were the issues in front of me? Clearly, one was the entitlement framework. I received a letter through official processes about four weeks ago that set out the entitlement framework funding for schools for the next two years. I told officials not to post that letter but to hold on to it until we had completed our work in reviewing the budget. Bob Salisbury's report was published, and one of its recommendations was that the entitlement framework should clearly continue to be funded.

Is the entitlement framework funded sufficiently? No, it is not. Our entire school budget is not funded efficiently, despite the Executive's valiant work to secure more money for education. I have never stood in the Chamber and said that the Department of Education is funded adequately; we have limited resources, and we have to use them as best we can. So, I endeavoured to keep the £3 million this year to bring the entitlement framework moneys up to £9-odd million

Looking to next year, I decided that the best that we could do was to make £6·4 million available and to taper off the entitlement framework intervention after that, as was planned originally. I simply do not know what will happen beyond that or whether we will be able to afford to continue to fund the entitlement framework separately. We will have to look at area planning, how the entitlement framework is being rolled out and at the co-operation between schools etc to decide whether entitlement framework funding can be made or will be available beyond that date.

I assure Members that I am not following DUP policy. I think that the DUP might be edging into my policy areas. However, I am sure that all Members will agree that it is doubtful whether schools care whose policy it is as long as they get their money. That is the important thing: the money has been delivered to them. I accept that the money was late in the day and that some schools may have already planned their curriculum offer, but circumstances beyond our control led us to where we are. However, the money has now been issued.

In proposing the motion, Miss McIlveen asked a significant number of questions. I will cover some of them now and the rest as I move on. You asked whether the entitlement framework funding is enough: it is not. I accept that. I have endeavoured to make available what we have. I welcome the fact that Members now acknowledge that, contrary to rumours elsewhere, I have a savings delivery plan, and it is accessible and viewable. I will say of that plan that I am reviewing my budget in the context of the FG Wilson meeting.

We have been tasked with examining our budgets and how we create and sustain employment. I will make an announcement to the Assembly in the coming weeks — next week if I can — outlining what changes I have been able to make to sustain and create employment in the Department of Education and to enable us to play our part in building the economy through interventions, which will see roles for construction, and so forth. I will ensure that Members are informed of that in full and, in tandem with that, that the Education Committee is fully briefed on any changes to the savings delivery plan that roll out from that work

Is the DEL and DE working group still meeting? Miss McIlveen referred to my predecessor's commitment to that working group. It is still meeting. Its members have not reached agreement on a strategy, but that does not mean that we are in disagreement. A lot of work has progressed since the letter that you referenced, the date of which you said was, if I am correct, 2009. A lot of work has progressed since 2009. The area learning communities are delivering a strategy at a local level that is based on the Department of Education's policies, and they are working in conjunction with their local higher education providers.

A lot of good work is going on locally, although I remind Members that the sustainable schools policy states that 80% of the entitlement framework should be delivered in the parent school. That is for sustainability reasons and to ease pressure on pupils, in order to ensure that they have a school base. However, great co-operation is going on between schools and DEL at that level through further and higher education groups.

I regularly meet the Minister for Employment and Learning to discuss the way forward in achieving better co-operation between the Department of Education and DEL. Those meetings are also bearing fruit. Indeed, the recent announcement around the EMA rolled out, in part. from our engagements around what is required for our young people's future educational well-being. Therefore, if Members require a written document stating what DE and DEL do together and how we are providing for 14- to 19-year-olds, yes, that can be provided. However, will extra resources come of that? At this moment, no. Extra resources will not come of that, because I do not think that either DEL or DE is in the position to put in extra resources. I see the entitlement framework funding that we have announced as being part of the strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds. I see our work around the EMA as part of it, and we have funded that largely from our own budgets and from savings from the EMA, and so on.

Work towards greater co-operation on a strategy for 14-to 19-year-olds is ongoing, but the outworkings of the strategy and of what is happening is largely, certainly in the Department of Education, the entitlement framework. Members have asked whether we need such a broad range of subjects and for schools to be under pressure to deliver those subjects. The answer to that is yes.

We need our students to be equipped — academically, vocationally and otherwise — with a broad range of skills so that they become better rounded, more tolerant and valued individuals, with more self-belief and able to be more valuable to society. They must be able to react to changes in the economy and workforce and become more independent and resourceful learners. The entitlement framework is equipping all our young people to do that, and it assists the development strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds.

I will cover a few other comments from Members. Mr Kinahan mentioned the cost of area learning communities. I now have a copy of the answer that he received, and, yes, one reading of it would have the cost as being £10·5 million, as the Member stated. However, the costings that he has in front of him are for the courses that are delivered in those individual schools. The actual cost per school of area learning communities is £3,000. When you take into account the additional funding for special educational needs schools, and so forth, the cost of area learning communities is around £600,000 per annum.

I think the area learning communities are very beneficial to our society. We hear much about sharing in education, and there has been a great deal of sharing, of both resources and knowledge, through the area learning communities. They have been a great benefit to our education system. I may have mentioned this to Members before: I visited Scotland late last year. The area learning communities there consist of preschools, primary schools and post-primary schools, all working together and sharing knowledge and lessons together. I would like to see us head in that direction and ensure that all of our schools work together and understand each other's roles in the education system.

As regards other Members' comments, give me one moment to consult my notes. Michaela asked how many schools are involved in area learning communities. All post-primary schools should be involved in area learning communities. Some area learning communities operate better than others. There are fine examples out there of area learning communities that are delivering great work. Some area learning communities are not as proactive as I would like to see them, and some individual members of area learning communities are not as proactive as I would like to see them.

Last year I announced that there was funding for area learning communities, because their funding was also coming to an end. I set aside  $\pm 0.5$  million per annum for area learning communities to bid to for courses that were relevant to the curriculum in terms of numeracy and literacy, etc. So there is funding available for them, and I encourage schools to play an active role in them.

Mrs Hale and Mr Hazzard both referred to the broader outcomes of the common funding formula review, the concerns of some about the common funding formula review and the advantages that Mr Hazzard sees in the common funding formula review. The Department has not come to a final conclusion on the common funding review. Any conclusion that we come to will have to go out to public consultation and views will need to be heard from members of the public, and, indeed, the schools.

There were concerns raised in that context by Miss McIlveen in relation to how the outworkings of the common funding formula and the entitlement framework will affect rural schools. Rural schools are currently operating the entitlement framework. The common funding formula has specific comments about small schools, etc, but it also states that, if we were to take action in relation to small schools funding, we should bring forward a small schools policy.

That small schools policy, by its very nature, would have to be rural proofed. It would also have to be proofed — I am not sure how we can do this — so as to protect small rural or isolated communities. There are communities out there that are small in number compared to the other communities surrounding them, but they have a stakehold in the community, and rightly so, and their school is part of that stakehold, so we would have to proof it in that way as well. I am not sure how we would do that, but we certainly have to be imaginative and inventive in any small schools policy.

I think I have covered the broad range of issues raised by Members during the debate. As I said, I doubt if schools really care why the funding was brought forward as long as it was brought forward and is put in place. I acknowledge the fact that there is not enough funding in education. There is not enough funding in the entitlement framework either, and I endeavour to work with my Executive colleagues to see if we can secure further funding for education. I will report to Members and to the Education Committee the proposed changes I am going to bring forward in the savings delivery plan as a result of our task to see how we can create and secure employment by using our budgets in a different or more imaginative way. I will report that matter back to Members. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Storey: I thank all those Members who have taken part in the debate, and my colleague Michelle, who proposed the motion. As always, she gives the detail and leaves me to gather up all of the bits and pieces that come as a result of what is said. I do not think that we should dismiss the fact that this is an important day in the House in regard to education, not solely because we are debating this issue, which is very important, but because it is also the day that the Minister has welcomed to Northern Ireland the representatives of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) to look at our education system.

We should remind ourselves that that organisation's title is the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

5.15 pm

Clearly, it is an organisation that places an emphasis on having coherent, economic, educational co-operation across our education system. I would like the Minister to confirm whether the Committee for Education, as the Committee with the statutory responsibility and as a key player in our education system, will have the opportunity to meet the members of that organisation. I am sure that they want clarity and answers from the Minister, as do we in this House, and an end to the mixed messages, because that is all that we have been getting since 2009.

Let us rehearse where those mixed messages come from. My colleague mentioned a letter from the former Minister Caitríona Ruane to me in 2009, which read:

"I wish to assure you of my commitment to work closely with Sir Reg to further develop a 14-19 strategy in the best interests of our young people."

Then we come to Sir Reg himself. It was interesting that Mr Kinahan mentioned larger schools. I would caution Members about larger schools; we need to be very careful about that issue. What did Sir Reg say in 2009, when he was the Minister for Employment and Learning? I am not sure whether he was still the leader of his party or who the leader was at that stage. I am still not sure who the leader of that party is at the moment. He said:

"Building on the good progress made to date, a joint 14-19 strategy will be available shortly for consideration."

Where is the strategy? Where is the policy? It is not about just getting a piece of paper. It is about getting a policy because, in the absence of a policy that is clearly set down, a vacuum is created and everyone continues to do what they have always done. If you continue to do what you have always done, you will continue to get what you have always got. That is why, again and again, we go around the issues of underachievement and of not giving our young people the best possible opportunities.

Then, of course, there is the Department's website, which I visit every day religiously to see what it is up to and to keep an eye on what it is saying. It says that it has a 14-19 policy, that it is continuing to work with DEL and that it is:

"working conjointly to bring forward a co-ordinated programme of provision for 14-19 year olds."

There is still nothing of substance. It is unfortunate that I am speaking after the Minister, but I hope that he will respond to the point that I want to make. Whatever happened to the document entitled 'Together Towards Entitlement'? That document reviewed the entitlement framework, looked at everything, told us that there were fewer than 10 pupils in some classes and told us the challenges and the issues. Recommendation 1 of that document states:

"DE, in collaboration with DEL, should give priority to promoting a wider understanding of the rationale for and implications of the Entitlement Framework and its place within the overall 14-19 DE and DEL policy context to ensure high quality outcomes for this age group."

Mr O'Dowd: If the Member so wishes, I am happy to respond to that point.

Mr Storey: Yes.

Mr O'Dowd: 'Together Towards Entitlement' has happened. We are in the entitlement framework era. The Member will recall that, in September 2011, I announced that the entitlement framework would become a legislative requirement from September 2013 onwards in a phased introduction. I have reminded the Member that the working group continues to meet. DE and DEL are engaged in proactive work. The 14-19 strategy is being delivered to the area learning communities on the ground, where it should be.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for that clarification. The Committee for Education will be interested to get an update from the working group to see exactly the ongoing work that it has done.

Let me come to the current Minister for Employment and Learning, Mr Farry. In the House a couple of weeks ago, referring to this motion, he said:

"I am also aware that the Member has a motion down for debate in the very near future. My officials and I continue to engage with the Department of Education around those issues, and I know that the Minister of Education is keen to ensure that, collectively, we deliver the best for the young people of Northern Ireland." — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p124, col 2].

There is a clear admission that we need to do something. However, as the Minister mentioned, we then come to look at how it is put into practice. Today, members of the OECD arrived at the Building. We also had an Invest NI presentation upstairs on the whole issue of what is available to companies by way of loans and financial help. In that presentation, the chief executive of Invest Northern Ireland stated very clearly that there is good working collaboration between DEL and DETI. I appreciate my colleague the Deputy Chair of the Committee for Employment and Learning staying for this debate and being with us to give us support. The sad reality is that it seemed as though DE was missing.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

The issue is having a clear, coherent policy that runs through our system to give our young people the best possible opportunities. Why do I say that? As the Minister mentioned, let us see how it works out in practice. The third related link in the chain of what happened in the House today is the Minister's statement on area planning and the future of area planning. What is happening with area planning? We have the Minister's policy and the entitlement framework. We have area learning communities. We have schools accessing the services of further and higher education colleges. We have the absence of a 14-19 policy, albeit with the Minister agreeing that he may give us a paper on that in the future.

I challenge the Minister or any Member of the House to read any one of the area plans that were put in the public domain today and find reference to further and higher education colleges. It is nearly impossible. It does not exist. We have all this talk and rhetoric about practical working on the ground with post-primary schools and further and higher education colleges. However, when it comes to the future planning of our estate, DEL disappears. I think it should disappear. I think DE should disappear, too. We should have one Department for children and young people that looks at all these issues in a far more coherent way.

What is happening? DEL officials stay inside their legislative rights and say, "Let us not cross the line." DE officials stay inside their legislative rights and say, "Let us not cross the line." The two Ministers talk and have all sorts of discussions and conversations. However, does it work practically on the ground? That is where we have a problem.

Let me come to another issue. Where did the 24 and 27 courses come from? The Minister has not clarified that for us. His Department changed the rules a few months ago.

He told schools that, because of issues, it is 18 and 24, rather than 24 and 27. It was a movable feast a few months ago. Who told us that the magic numbers were 24 and 27? That is the problem that I have with the straitjackets that the Departments want to put schools into. Is it not better to allow a school, which knows its pupils best, to determine what is best for those pupils and ensure that they have the adequate provision?

The cynic in me will always say that part of the entitlement framework rationale was to try to turn some of our academic schools into vocational schools and to dilute what goes on in our grammar schools. As a result, we now have not only mixed messages but a mixed economy. We have post-primary schools giving courses that they never provided previously. We have further and higher education colleges providing courses that they never provided previously —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost gone.

Mr Storey: We have other post-primary schools looking at provision that they never had.

The final point that I want to make is around the savings delivery plan. We will wait with interest to see what —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is gone.

Mr Storey: — the Minister's savings delivery plan has in it. I am not convinced that he has come up to the mark on it. Money has gone somewhere. I want to know exactly where it has gone, and I assure you that we will continue —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has gone. Order.

Mr Storey: — to look until we find it.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly, in light of recommendation 9 of the review of the common funding scheme and the concerns being expressed by schools and further education colleges, calls on the Minister of Education to extend the funding earmarked for the entitlement framework to the 2013-14 and 2014-15 financial years; and further calls on the Minister of Education to work with the Minister for Employment and Learning to bring forward, as a matter of urgency, a common funding approach for all pupils and students within a coherent strategy for 14- to 19-year-olds.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Speaker.]

Adjournment

John Lewis Retail Development, Sprucefield

Mr Speaker: The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes. The Minister will have 10 minutes to respond, and all other Members who wish to speak will have approximately five minutes.

Mr Givan: I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss the development opportunities at Sprucefield and, in particular, the Westfield planning application that included the John Lewis store as the key, anchor tenant. That opportunity has been well documented and would have brought £150 million of investment to Northern Ireland. It would have created around 600 jobs in the construction phase and up to 1,500 retail jobs in Northern Ireland at a time when they are desperately needed. Furthermore, it is important for Members to note that John Lewis would have been opening a distribution centre in Northern Ireland had the application been put through. So it is not just about the retail opportunity; the distribution centre and the jobs and investment that come with it would have been part of the development located in Northern Ireland.

Members will be familiar with the long history of John Lewis's engagement with Northern Ireland, which stretches back almost nine years. Let me go through, for the record, how it all started. In June 2004, plans were announced for the first John Lewis store in Northern Ireland to be built at Sprucefield, Lisburn. In November 2004, Belfast Chamber of Trade and Commerce lodged a formal objection to the planning application. In June 2005, direct rule Minister, Lord Rooker, gave the green light for the John Lewis store and 29 outlets in conjunction with it. In May 2006, Belfast High Court upheld a legal challenge from traders from Belfast and Lisburn, which effectively quashed the planning permission. In March 2007, the Government gave the go-ahead once again. In August 2008, the developer submitted new plans, reducing the number of retail outlets from 29 to 19, and vowed that, as Sprucefield was the only option, ultimately, the development would end up south of the border if the plan was refused. In February 2009, the Environment Minister, Sammy Wilson, announced a public inquiry into the application. In November 2009, Sprucefield Centre Limited applied to the Department of the Environment (DOE) for planning permission for retail, restaurant and associated infrastructural development, and the Department designated it as a major planning application — an article 31 planning application — and requested that the commission hold a public inquiry. In June 2010, the public inquiry was adjourned on its first day because of a new legal challenge by rival traders, who alleged that the DOE failed to advertise the scheme properly. In 2012, a mid-inquiry meeting was held by the Planning Appeals Commission (PAC) to ensure no further delays in the decision.

That is where the process has got to since 2004. It is laughable that we are talking about something that started in 2004. Throughout the process, there has been frustration. There has been legal challenge from Belfast Chamber of Trade and Commerce and commercial enterprises. I do not blame commercial interests for wanting to challenge this legally. They have the right to do so. I do not object to that, but I object to the courts facilitating a clear conflict of interest — a clear commercial interest — over a planning application. In other places, there is provision for that to be ruled out, and that should be established in Northern Ireland so that the courts do not have to constantly frustrate planning applications because people who have a clear vested commercial interest are trying to block them. Indeed, some of the same organisations then push the boundaries to get planning permission for themselves, but it is all right for them — once they get planning permission, they will do all that they can to stop anybody else getting it.

Then, of course, in January this year, the Minister announced a new area plan, limiting development at Sprucefield to bulky goods only. The nail in the coffin was administered, and John Lewis announced that it was withdrawing its application, but awaits the Executive's consideration of the attempted change in planning policy by Alex Attwood.

I think that it has been helpful for Members to get clear in their mind the very long process that John Lewis and those behind the Sprucefield development have been trying to follow.

We then had an attempt to change planning policy through the Belfast metropolitan area plan (BMAP). It is interesting that the Minister is attempting to go against an independent Planning Appeals Commission. He is interfering with the work of that body, which, for proper reasons, was set up as an independent organisation, but this Minister has decided that he can overrule the independent Planning Appeals Commission.

The Planning Appeals Commission looked extensively at what was recommended for bulky goods provision. We can go through a number of areas in which, in dealing with issues of concern, the PAC recommended that the bulky goods restriction should not be imposed. There are a number of key quotes from the Planning Appeals Commission's report. Paragraph 6.4.8, in reference to the commission's report on the original extension to Marks and Spencer, states:

"The appointed Commissioner in his report expressed the view that the provision of more retail warehouses at Sprucefield would not assist in achieving a regional trade draw."

It continues:

"It is difficult to see how more of this type of retailing will enhance Sprucefield as a regional centre."

Paragraph 6.4.6 states:

"The bulky goods restriction relates to a fundamental characteristic of the centre to which there is no reference in either PPS5 or draft PPS5. Such a restriction on the type of retailing to be permitted in one of the three RSCs is clearly a regional matter and should have been made explicit in regional policy (i.e. draft PPS5). In the absence of any such reference in regional policy, the restrictions now proposed through BMAP would have the effect of fundamentally changing the nature of the designation and are not appropriate for introduction through the development plan process."

That is the recommendation of the independent Planning Appeals Commission, yet this Minister believes that he can supersede all that, go against those independent members and try to retain the bulky goods restriction.

The PAC report states:

"The bulky goods restriction relates to a fundamental characteristic of the centre to which there is no reference in either PPS5 or draft PPS 5. Such a restriction on the type of retailing to be permitted in one of the three RSCs".

Belfast, Londonderry and Sprucefield are the three regionally significant retail centres that have been designated. The Minister is seeking by stealth to take away Sprucefield's regional designation. It is important that we point out that fewer restrictions rather than more are required. The PAC has said that that is required for Sprucefield to achieve what it wants.

Hopefully, the Minister can explain his position to the House today. I trust that the Executive will now be able to deal with the issue, but when the controversy around the statement of intention kicked off, the Minister said:

"I am not attempting to prejudice the outcome of the Public Inquiry".

That is a laudable platitude from the Minister that he does not want to prejudice the outcome of the public inquiry. He then goes on to say:

"I am strongly committed to putting Belfast first in these difficult times."

So he does not want to prejudice the public inquiry into the application from John Lewis for a development at Sprucefield/Lisburn, yet in the same breath he says that he is:

"strongly committed to putting Belfast first in these difficult times."

If that is not a prejudicial statement, I do not know what is. The Minister has blatantly shown the bias in his position by saying that he wants Belfast to be protected first and foremost. We need to bear in mind that that has implications not just for John Lewis. You can forget about development at Sprucefield; even if John Lewis is not able to come to Sprucefield, there will not be any form of development there. The notion that an IKEA-type retailer is coming to Sprucefield is a nonsense. The retail world and how it operates is changing, and government need to change along with that. Change is being driven by consumers, and we need to harness those changes and not try to restrict the way in which things are developing.

In trying to make those restrictions, it is important that we recognise that the retail world has developed through the internet and that we will not protect Belfast by stifling development across Northern Ireland. We can take away Sprucefield as the one issue, because Members may get fixated on it, but, across Northern Ireland, the Minister is saying, "I am putting Belfast first". It is about online shopping, click and connect, what is referred to as omnishopping, shopping through your laptop, iPad and through texting and about the development of Facebook and Twitter. All those new technological advances are shaping the way that the retail world operates, and if traders anywhere, including in Belfast, do not adapt to all that, they will be in terminal decline. Belfast, as is the case in other town centres, may have been suffering the emptying of some of its units, but not because of John Lewis, which it is not even here. Other factors have been part of all that, and we, as a government, now need to deal with this in the Executive.

Quite rightly, this is of regional significance. The Minister, through BMAP, is trying to circumvent what the regional development strategy (RDS) has stipulated, which is that Sprucefield is a regionally significant centre. He is going against the independent Planning Appeals Commission's idea of how Sprucefield needs to develop by trying to impose that restriction even though it believes, and rightly so, that it should be lifted. He wants to put Belfast first purely from a prejudicial basis. We have heard of political gerrymandering of boundaries; this is the retail gerrymandering of boundaries. Putting Belfast first is gerrymandering the retail boundaries of Northern Ireland and trying to do it through a circuitous route; namely, through the area plan, even though the PAC has said that that is wholly inappropriate. It is regionally significant, and, therefore, it requires the Executive to take the decision. I trust that the Minister will yield to the Executive on this and allow them to take the proper decision. That is where the decision should have been taken rather than through the Minister's approach whereby he has sought to bypass the normal procedures in taking his prejudicial Belfast-first policy forward.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Paul for securing the debate. It is a vital issue given that we are talking about a massive investment of £150 million. People are talking about, whatever is eventually realised, the potential for 1,500 jobs at a time when the private sector in particular is struggling.

I will talk briefly about the longevity of the issue. I acknowledge that the Minister has at least addressed the issue and come up with a decision, but I wonder what kind of message goes out about this economy when an application can be bobbing about for some 11 years in the system awaiting final decisions. Those decisions should be informed by a much more thoughtful, comprehensive, strategic balance between town centre development and its particular and peculiar needs against out-of-town development, which can bring with it the strength of major companies and a greater range of options for the shopper. I do not argue on behalf of Sinn Féin that there is a clear or simple answer. There is a balance to be found, and, whilst I commend the Minister for addressing the application, he has, in a sense, simply underlined the need to bring forward that agreed policy.

Parties should not squabble over this issue but, in fact, they do, and that is the unfortunate image that is projected by a failure to have an agreed way forward. There will always be local interest, and I would say that there are tensions within parties. People, at a local level, will argue, naturally enough, for the interest of their constituencies because they are responsible to their constituencies. However, clear and coherent statements of policy with the appropriate regulation and guidance means that people have an explanation when they go back into their constituency with, perhaps, a negative outcome on an issue that they had agreed to support.

However, if we are just bouncing about willy-nilly, or if we are looking simply for the weight of numbers as opposed to the weight of argument, I think that we will not make the correct decision and we will not get it right. Quite often, we will get it spectacularly wrong. I believe that the lobbies that exist all have something legitimate and of interest to say to the Assembly. We have to try to find the balance between what are, clearly, at times, mutually exclusive arguments and trying to decide what is best for the economy. I think that we have not always got that right.

So, I support the Minister, and I encourage him to proceed to develop that type of discussion. As the Minister, he has the power to do that, and I certainly would not support any moves to limit his ministerial powers on the matter. I hope that he will expedite the production of the type of discussion document that will lead to agreed and coherent positions that Members, regardless of whether they get everything that they want, can get behind and support, irrespective of any personal or localised interest. That is because I do not think that that approach will lead us anywhere except into further disputes as we move on.

Mrs Overend: I am pleased to be able to speak on what is an important issue for the Northern Ireland economy. The fact is that the proposal for this retail development would be of huge benefit not only locally to the Sprucefield site and to the Lisburn area but to the whole of our regional economy. The substantial benefits of the department store were outlined recently in a statement by Sprucefield Centre Ltd and John Lewis on 1 February 2013 that said:

"The Sprucefield Centre Limited, together with John Lewis, was committed to invest over £150 million into Northern Ireland and create over 1,500 retail jobs."

As the Member for Lagan Valley said, it would have created 600 jobs in construction. Additionally, John Lewis would have opened a distribution facility in Northern Ireland, resulting in further investment and jobs. That is not an investment that we can afford to lose, and those are jobs that we cannot afford to do without. I think that most Members will agree that our economy is in desperate need of a boost, with unemployment remaining stubbornly high at 7.8%, youth unemployment continuing to rise and a claimant count that is the second highest in the UK. We have potentially passed up on a great opportunity to make a positive contribution to addressing some of those figures and reversing the current trend, which sees us move further away from the rest of the UK in making an economic recovery.

We must ask how this decision was reached. The DUP Member outlined the detail of the process since 2004, and I need not repeat that. The recent decision by John Lewis to withdraw its planning application was taken because of the Environment Minister's position on introducing a new area plan, which will limit further development at Sprucefield to bulky goods such as furniture. I understand that that decision was reached as part of a policy to put "Belfast first" during these "difficult times". I also understand that the Environment Minister has stated that:

"This is consistent with the revised Regional Development Strategy 2035 which aims to strengthen Belfast as the ... economic driver and the primary retail location in Northern Ireland."

Although I may understand the reasons that he has given, I cannot agree with him because of the points that I made.

I understand that an analysis of potential sales for John Lewis, depending on its location, has been undertaken, and the results show that it would expect around 30% less if it were to base itself at a city centre location.

I believe that we need clarity on the process that is involved. As I outlined, Mr Attwood made his decision clear. However, we subsequently had the First Minister claiming that this is a matter for the Executive and not for the Environment Minister. We have been told many times that the changes made at St Andrews prevent Ministers from going on solo runs. How does this impact on the John Lewis decision, and who will make any future decisions on this issue? The consequences of these circumstances have, therefore, also led to a lack of clarity and, most likely, a lowering of public confidence in how the Assembly operates and in the Executive's decision-making processes.

One glimmer of hope is that the Sprucefield Centre Ltd and John Lewis said that they will review their position once the Executive have considered the Belfast metropolitan area plan policy and there is clarity on the role of Sprucefield as a regional shopping centre in Northern Ireland. Therefore, John Lewis has continued interest in opening a new department store at Sprucefield, and I urge the Executive and the Environment Minister to act as soon as possible to ensure that that investment is not lost.

5.45 pm

Mr Dallat: I thank Paul for the opportunity to take part in this debate, and I am sure he wonders what on earth someone from East Derry is doing sticking his nose into Sprucefield. However, the subject has been in my heart for many years. Indeed, one of the first debates in which I took part in the Assembly was on this very subject, probably 12 years ago.

I am interested in this because it is Lisburn today, yet it could be Limavady tomorrow and Coleraine the next day. Others will deal with the specifics, the details and all of that, but I will just do the passionate stuff. I am not sure whether Paul visits our neighbouring island, England, very often. If he does, does he ever get off the M6 or M1 and travel through those lovely towns and see the shape that they are in? There is not a shop left. There is no butcher, no baker, no post office. They are all gone, and where are they? They are in the out-of-town shopping centres. That is where they are, and that is the only evidence that I need. They have been replaced by charity shops, hairdressers, — you name it. In Ireland, we perhaps attach a great deal of importance to the heart of our communities — our towns and villages. We have every right to stand up for them.

Let us look at it this way: if the Minister were to please the people over in Lisburn now, the same would happen in other parts next week or next month. And what would we get? We would get these sprawling, unplanned developments. You build this thing out at Sprucefield, and naturally you will get housing around it. That housing will have no amenities, no bus services, no leisure centres, no anything.

If you do not believe me about England, let us take a wee short trip across the sea to America. A few years ago, I was in Ohio for the St Patrick's Day celebrations. I had a few hours to spare, and I asked to be taken to the nearest town. I was taken to a place called Ashtabula, and I will never forget it. There was not a shop left in it. There was one pub with a few men in it, who wore green hats and were celebrating St Patrick's Day. That was it. Where were the wives? They were away to the shopping mall, but they were going to be away all day, because it was at least 50 miles away.

Anyway, let us get back to Sprucefield. The fear is for Belfast. For years, I watched Belfast be bombed and systematically destroyed. In the past decade or more, I have watched it emerge out of the rubble again, which is fantastic. It is becoming an international place for tourists, and why? It is because it is a good place to come to. However, it is hard work keeping the city centre lively and vibrant, and there is evidence that a lot of that needs to be done. Are we going to do today what the bombers failed to do in the past? Will we do the same to Belfast as has happened to medium-sized and reasonably large towns in England? I do not think so. We could be forgiven for making these mistakes if people had not made them before, but, Paul, they have made them before, and we should not repeat them.

Planning is about creating some kind of balance that allows communities the best opportunity to survive, whether it be Dungannon or Derry, Armagh or Antrim, Lisburn or, indeed, Letterkenny, because towns across the border are affected by these things as well. I understand that officials from both jurisdictions meet to try to keep ahead.

A couple of weeks ago, I was in Glasgow as a member of the Regional Development Committee. I went for a wee potter around the city centre, and what did I find? John Lewis, in the middle of Glasgow, next to the theatre, close to the railway station, next door to the bus station, making a solid contribution to Glasgow, the vibrant city that it is. Now, someone please tell me why John Lewis would want things different in Northern Ireland, because I understand that it is its business policy to locate its stores in town centres. Nobody can tell me that. Maybe before the evening is out, somebody will tell us why we want to destroy Belfast in preference to —

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dallat: The time is up.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has gone.

Mr Lunn: I am glad that Paul Givan has brought the matter to the House. I listened with great interest to Mr Dallat. You could not fail to have sympathy for town centres in their present plight, but there are other considerations apart from the very slow growth of out-of-town centres. Town centres are going to have to change and, perhaps, become more residential, more niche retail and more leisure orientated, and that is just a fact. It is the only way that they are going to survive. Frankly, I am not sure that turning down the biggest name in British retailing is a price worth paying. It is a superb company that, in terms of profit and operation, makes more money out of 28 stores than House of Fraser makes out of over 100. It treats its employees as though they were directors.

John Lewis and Westfield know what they want and, in this particular location, they do not want a city-centre location. They are not going to go to the Royal Exchange, no matter what pressure the Minister puts on them. It is just not going to happen. They have worked out their sums. Mrs Overend mentioned the figure of 20% to 30% less footfall, less trade and less profit for them in that particular location. It is even worse due to the fact of where the Royal Exchange is.

Mr McDevitt: I thank the Member for giving way. Mr Lunn is the second Member to quote this 20% to 30% figure. It is a very interesting piece of work. I presume that there is some documentary evidence of that, and maybe he would be so kind as to place it in the Assembly Library.

Mr Lunn: I do not have documentary evidence, but I am advised that it is in the planning paraphernalia of the past nine years. That is an estimate that John Lewis has made itself

Can we really afford to lose an investment like this — and job creation like this? The Minister has every right to be concerned about town centres, but I do not believe that he has chosen the best way of addressing that decline, especially in the current economic circumstances. What message will John Lewis and Westfield take to their investment friends across the world after nine years of obstruction and argument, when they are actually doing us the favour of bringing £150 million of investment into Northern Ireland, a place where they do not need to be? They can go elsewhere on the island, or they can just not come to Northern Ireland or Ireland at all. I believe that their total investment in the UK represents about 2% or 3% of their total global portfolio. It is not that big a deal for them

There is a history to this. Mr Givan has given us the chronology of the past nine very sad years, but, even prior to that, Westfield tried to invest £200 million or thereabouts in Belfast for 10 years, and it was defeated by policy in Belfast as well, being told that Victoria Square could go first — and look what that did to Donegall Place — and then the Royal Exchange and, maybe in 10 years, Castle Court. It made a business decision to walk away, but it has come back. It would like to look at Sprucefield and, frankly, I think that it has been treated abysmally by our planning system and by the organisations that have been ranged against it by the Planning Service and the Department.

Not to be too hard on the Minister and, indeed, one of his predecessors who happens to be here, I would like to acknowledge that they have both tried to streamline the planning process, particularly Minister Poots in his time. I will give Mr Attwood credit for trying to deal more quickly with some of the big applications. Even though it is the wrong decision, I doubt whether this one would have been made so quickly under another Minister. You have made that a priority, and I give you credit for it.

I go back to the fact that this is the biggest name in British retailing. It is not going to come back to us. This bulky goods restriction is, frankly, a bit of a red herring. We all know that that restriction is now out of date. It predates internet shopping.

Mr Givan told us, and everybody knows, that the Planning Appeals Commission rejected that as a reason. How can you have a regional shopping centre so designated 10 or 12 years ago, which will only be able to sell bulky goods? If that is the case, how come Next, Boots, Toys R

Us and Argos — to say nothing of Sainsbury's — have all managed to set up shop in Sprucefield in the meantime, and they are not necessarily selling bulky goods. What is going on?

If the policy should have been bulky goods only, how come it has taken nine years to tell Westfield and John Lewis that? How many millions of pounds have been spent in the course of the planning application only for them to be told something that, apparently, has been policy since 2004? What is the point of designating Sprucefield, with all its advantages in respect of road connections, its closeness to large population centres and a regional shopping centre, if major retailers cannot set up shop there? Mr Givan is absolutely right. It will be the end of any meaningful investment at Sprucefield unless this decision is changed. I appeal to the Minister to rethink this one. I do not think that it is too late, but we will hear what you have to say.

Mr Craig: I agree that it is good that this subject has been brought to the House. Like many others around the Chamber, I am disgusted, outraged and sickened by the length of time that this application process has taken, and, as yet, it is not complete. As we learned earlier, this has all been going on since 2004. What I find remarkable in all of this is that we are talking about not only one of the best known names in the retail business in the whole of the United Kingdom, that is, John Lewis, but one of the few national chains in the United Kingdom that buys into the whole social principle with regard to its workforce. That is why I find it remarkable that the SDLP, of all parties, has attacked it.

The company is wholly owned by those who work in it. I think that is something that the Minister needs to go away and have a good, long, hard think about. It is not one of those capitalist companies that drains the resources out of the system and passes them on to billionaires who we all rarely get to see or know about. It is a company that shares its profit among its workforce and is wholly owned by its workforce. I thought that that party over there would have been wholly behind that and would have totally supported it coming in to Northern Ireland and, for that matter, Ireland as a whole. Others have already asked what the issue was. Why could it not go to Belfast or, for that matter, to the centre of Lisburn? All those questions were asked at the time.

In 2006 and 2007, I and some of my colleagues, such as the Minister of Health, were privileged to have sat in negotiations with John Lewis, which were carried out with the local authority at the time. As mayor at that time, I took part in those negotiations, and what I found fascinating about the company was not only its social principles and how well it looked after its workforce but the whole concept of what it was bringing, not specifically to Sprucefield or Lisburn but to Northern Ireland as a whole. At that time, it was said that it would bring 1,200 jobs. Some 800 of those jobs were to be directly associated with the shop, and 400 were to be part of an all-Ireland distribution network. If those 400 jobs do not come to Sprucefield, they will certainly go somewhere else. We can be absolutely certain of that.

6.00 pm

The other thing that I found extremely alarming when the Minister made his statement was that the company, which has a social conscience, had clearly agreed that a quarter of its workforce at Sprucefield would be targeted for areas of high unemployment. In fact, part of the agreement was that it would target unemployment in areas such as West Belfast, which the Minister allegedly represents. I say "allegedly" because 25% of that workforce would have been 300 jobs, targeted for areas like West Belfast. I would not pat myself on the back if I were the Minister, allegedly representing West Belfast and taking 300 jobs away from my own area. I would hang my head in shame, quite frankly.

What was the impact on all of us going to be? A major shopping chain coming not just to Sprucefield but to Northern Ireland plc, bringing with it not only the prestige that it wanted but an all-Ireland draw. That is why it could not go in the middle of Belfast. The company clearly works out its plans so that there is a minimum population of 2,500,000 to draw from.

Mr Speaker: I ask the Member to draw his remarks to a close

Mr Craig: That cannot be done in Belfast, but we will all be the losers as a result of this, including West Belfast, which the Minister allegedly represents.

Mr Poots: As you go through life, you very often find that the desirable can be unobtainable and the obtainable is sometimes undesirable. The desirable for Minister Attwood is that John Lewis would come to Northern Ireland and locate in Belfast city centre. For me, the desirable is that John Lewis would locate in Lisburn city centre. John Lewis did its own estimates of what it could achieve in sales at the Sprucefield site. It could achieve 60% of those sales in Lisburn city centre, and 80% in Belfast city centre. Therefore, the desirable, from the Minister's point of view, and, indeed, from my point of view, is unobtainable.

The question is whether the obtainable is desirable, namely John Lewis coming to Northern Ireland and settling at Sprucefield. The contention of the Minister should be — it certainly is the opinion of the majority of MLAs — that it is desirable for a number of reasons, without going into great depth on areas already covered by Members. A considerable number of jobs come with the store, and that will almost inevitably lead to some dislocation because every time a new spend enters the market, someone else loses out. However, many people travel outside Northern Ireland to get to certain stores — previously IKEA but still the likes of John Lewis, Harvey Nichols and Brown Thomas. People will travel outside Northern Ireland to go to such stores. We now have IKEA, which took another facility out of the market that encouraged people to travel outside Northern Ireland and take their money to mostly mainland Britain, but elsewhere. That element certainly ticks the box of being desirable.

The project would also encourage considerably more cross-border trade and bring fresh money into Northern Ireland's pockets, employing people in Northern Ireland. That element is also desirable. In terms of job creation and jobs dislocation, I think there would be a strong evidence base that the scheme would end up delivering considerably more jobs than would be dislocated.

The other element of its desirability, which was touched upon, is the ethical business that John Lewis is. The employees are the shareholders and benefit every year over and above their salary by about £3,000. That is as a result of their shareholding in the company that is John Lewis. I am not really very socialist but that is a socialist model that works, and the SDLP is decrying it. So I would like the SDLP to buy into that model because it is one that works very well. Not only would we create jobs, we would be better valuing people in what is generally a lower-paid sector. So in seeking to bring John Lewis to Northern Ireland, I am really more of a socialist than the SDLP Minister. People in the sector would receive well-paid jobs and enjoy the work that goes with that.

It was pointed out, rightly, that the development would bring a jobs benefit well beyond Lagan Valley. I know that John Lewis was particularly targeting west Belfast as one area in which it recognised that many unemployed people could be trained up directly to work on the shop floor.

I know that the Minister is not wholly opposed to out-oftown facilities because he has passed applications for a number of such facilities, including some in Londonderry. Certainly, in very strong SDLP constituencies, he does not seem to have such a great problem with this type of proposal. Nonetheless, I hope that there is nothing political about this.

The evidence is there: we can have John Lewis in Northern Ireland or we can have John Lewis in Dublin. What would do the most damage to Belfast: a store in north Dublin attracting thousands of people each week down there, or a store 10 miles from Belfast attracting thousands from the South to Northern Ireland?

Mr Speaker: The Member's time has gone.

Mr Poots: I am backing Belfast by supporting bringing John Lewis to a location 10 miles from Belfast, as opposed to Dublin.

Mrs D Kelly: I, too, welcome the debate, if only to put the record straight on a number of issues. I thought that it was an interesting ploy of Mr Givan's to detail the chronological history of this application as if somehow to wash the hands of his Ministers. I note with interest that Mr Givan failed to put on record that he was a special adviser to the Environment Minister for some of that period, as well as being a Lisburn City councillor.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I am happy to give way on that.

Mr Givan: Believe me that, if, in that role, I had had the opportunity to bring to bear any influence, I would have sought to do so. I did not have that opportunity. As I pointed out, Minister Wilson referred the application to the Planning Appeals Commission in 2009. That is the only decision that a DUP Minister has ever had to make about John Lewis.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker.

Minister Wilson has questions to answer about his continued failure to agree the sale of a small piece of land at Rushmere, which would, coincidentally, bring almost 1,000 jobs in retail and construction. The DUP has, yet again, given mixed messages. However, it is a day and a time of mixed messages from political unionism.

Members want to talk out of both sides of their mouth on some issues because they are local councillors. I note with interest that all those who have spoken thus far have been councillors, and members of councils that backed the Northern Ireland Independent Retail Trade Association (NIIRTA) town retail planning recommendations, which included saving our town centres and the economic regeneration of our town centres. Perhaps the Minister, in his reply to the debate, will detail for me, if not for some other Members, the impact on my constituency if the application by John Lewis had been given the go-ahead.

May I remind Members that John Lewis, plus the 19 other stores, withdrew the application? That was not the Minister's decision, and it is important to recognise that. There has been a failure by previous Environment Ministers to publish a number of planning policy statements that would have clarified matters much sooner.

Mr Givan pointed out the use of the legal system and judicial reviews. I am sure that he, in his capacity as Chairman of the Justice Committee, might want to question the legal system on that.

In Lurgan, for example, there are seven brownfield sites within the development zone of the town centre. Why are those not being developed? Why are growth and development in those areas not an issue for other parties?

The Minister is on record as saying that the footfall in Craigavon, for example, would be reduced by some 35% if the development at Sprucefield were to go ahead. I am interested to learn how that figure was reached.

How was that assessment made? Where did those figures come from? It is important to put that on record.

Mr Poots said that he was backing Belfast, so it might be useful for the Minister to give us his assessment of the current viability of Belfast city centre. I say that because we all know what is happening on our streets, and we know about the additional amount of revenue, as a consequence of the flag protests, that Belfast City Council and the Executive have had to put towards Belfast at this very difficult time.

It is important to realise other matters. Sites are available not only in Lurgan and Belfast but elsewhere. If John Lewis is so keen and has done such a study of the feasibility of being in Northern Ireland, why were other sites not considered? We all know about mid-Ulster and places such as Portadown, which is referred to as the hub of the North. Why were they not considered to be —

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I will give way in a second. Why were they not considered to be alternative and suitable locations?

Mr Lunn: Westfield and John Lewis chose Sprucefield for geographical reasons and for its closeness to population centres. It is far and away, and obviously, the best site in Northern Ireland. I do not decry Lurgan for one minute, but it is not in the same class.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the people of Lurgan, especially those who vote for the Alliance Party, would be very interested to learn of your judgement of the town of Lurgan. On that point, and in relation to Lisburn, one wonders why there was such opposition to proposals for the development of the Maze/Long Kesh site. It was only about three years ago that there was a preferred bidder for that site, and there was a failure of agreement around the Executive table. Then, of course, there was the economic collapse, and the bidder disappeared into the ether. If people really are champions of their constituencies, one wonders why they did not ask greater questions of their Executive colleagues when they failed to reach agreement around the development of the Maze/Long Kesh site.

I have every confidence in the Minister being able to defend his decisions on this issue. As a party, we champion workers' rights; the party came from the Labour and trade union movements. That is not an unimportant point to remember, particularly in the year of the centenary of the great lockouts in Belfast and Dublin. The SDLP will continue to support workers, but it is amazing to see the number of champions around the Assembly for one developer.

Mr B McCrea: Lots of things have been said, but not yet by everyone, so I will add a contribution. I am struck by the fact that the time I most recently met Mrs Kelly outside this environment was at Sprucefield. I was looking for some lights. There is something about trying to provide a shopping environment that people want to go to.

These days, economic development seems to be about building clusters — retail outlets, science premises or companies. It is efficient to put everything together. That is one reason why I am surprised that we have not been able to build on what seems to me to be an excellent site in and around Sprucefield, which has a good infrastructure and a number of existing significant retail outlets. It seems to satisfy the demands not only of the local population but of the wider population who shop there.

The challenge to the Minister is this: how do we undertake proper regional planning? It cannot be that we merely start off with a greenfield site from scratch. There are existing assets, be they infrastructure or businesses, all of which should be taken into account.

An investment such as that proposed by John Lewis would bring other benefits. Surely, when we are in a recession — and we are, undoubtedly, in one — what Government should do is try to find every way that they can to encourage investment. Otherwise, they are left to pick up the tab either for social security payments or public works and suchlike.

I am interested in the Minister's approach to that and a can-do attitude that, where there is potential for investment, asks what we can do to make it more attractive and make it happen sooner rather than later, because there is a knock-on effect to employment, both during construction and thereafter. That is the real issue. Nobody denies that we need to have some form of strategic oversight in planning for Northern Ireland. However, it seems to me that we are not entirely convinced about what it is. Maybe the Minister will deal with that.

An issue that also needs to be addressed is the very first one that I think I dealt with when I came into politics. It was that long ago. It was the John Lewis site. I remember getting a photograph. Mr Speaker, you would be surprised to see that I looked a lot younger and slimmer when that photograph was taken seven or eight years ago, when we were saying that we would be welcoming John Lewis. [Interruption.] I hear some unkind people saying that the photograph might be in black and white. It shows that we have taken quite an extraordinary amount of time to reach a decision on that.

I have to say, for what it is worth, that the straw poll would indicate to me that just about every woman in the country comes up and asks, "Where is John Lewis?" Mrs Kelly may not be in that group. However, quite a considerable number of people say that they simply do not understand why something that people want cannot be delivered. Why has it taken so long?

Of course, we know that there were issues in the past. We have had the timeline put out, judicial reviews and other issues, but I have to say that people expect better from our Administration. They want to see the matter resolved. They want to see John Lewis in place. The site in Sprucefield is ideal for it. It seems to suit its business model. It seems to be a good employer. It seems to tick all the boxes. I would like the Minister to tell us, if it is possible, what he will do to encourage investment in and around the centres of excellence, commerce and logistics that we have, because we should surely build on our existing assets.

Mr Attwood: I thank everybody for their contributions. I will deal first of all with the point that has just been made by Mr McCrea and was touched upon earlier by Mr McLaughlin, which is that, contrary to what people might think, I am convinced about what is needed with regard to retail policy. When it comes to shaping future retail policy, we need to shape it differently from the past. To go back to Mr McLaughlin's point: that is why we have recently appointed consultants. To do what? We have appointed them to draft a new planning policy statement 5 (PPS 5), which will acknowledge all the issues that have been raised here with regard to the retail picture and narrative in Northern Ireland and shape the policy that is right for the future. What is the policy that is right for the future? It is to embed deeper in the planning system support for town and city centre retail. When it comes to making decisions that are consistent with the law, current policy, practice and the regional development strategy, I have tried to be very faithful and consistent with all those requirements to show that town centres and city centres need to be protected.

A lot of decisions have been made. Members of the House will be aware that, before Christmas, I said no, no and no to three retail applications for Derry and said yes to only one in order to demonstrate that, consistent with policy, practice and good law, that is the way in which we should go in the future.

Mr McCrea wishes to see how we demonstrate that the planning system and DOE are fit for purpose and are opening the doors for sustainable development — there is a difference. I will not be a Minister who, at all costs, places and times, will approve development. I will not. As legislators, we should not indulge that sort of practice, but sustainable development. How have we done that? We have done that by turning around article 31 applications — two thirds of those that I inherited have now been addressed. We have done that through turning around renewable applications, especially for individual wind turbines. Why? To sustain the farming industry. We have done that by meeting or being close to meeting timelines in respect of all planning applications. Corners have been turned, but reform needs to be deepened and the planning system needs to get itself even fitter for purpose. However, let nobody pretend that the past 18 months do not demonstrate that the planning system is fitter for purpose than it was and that there is more work to be done in that regard.

Mr Poots said —

Mr Givan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will take points in a second.

Mr Poots said that the evidence base will show that considerably more jobs will arise from the Sprucefield development than will be lost elsewhere. He referred to what he called "dislocation". That is not the case. I agree on the great merits and ethics of John Lewis. I hope that the consequence of that is that other parties, when it comes to health service expenditure and welfare expenditure, will show the same commitment to ethics so that people in need are put first and profit is put behind the door, where it should be —

Mr Givan: You did not.

Mr Attwood: I will come to that point.

The evidence base flatly contradicts Mr Poots's contention that there will be considerably more jobs from the John Lewis development.

Remember: the issue with Sprucefield is not John Lewis per se; it is the other 19 stores and seven restaurants, the scale of which is greater than the John Lewis proposal. I regret that we are not going to a planning inquiry. The evidence that I rely on is the evidence of survey, the regional development strategy 2035 and the existing planning policy statement 5. If that is wrong or if I have drawn the wrong conclusions, why did those who support Sprucefield not interrogate my evidence, their evidence and the evidence of the third parties that were involved in the Planning Appeals Commission hearing? Why did they not test that evidence in front of the independent body, which would have given advice to government about the right outcome? That is for them to answer. However, I would like to have the answer, because my evidence led to the compelling conclusion that the advice that I had to give to the public inquiry was that we should protect our city and town centres and that the greater Belfast city and town centres need to be protected, particularly Belfast. What is the evidence -

Mr Givan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will. What is the evidence in that regard?

Whatever the Planning Appeals Commission might have said to the Department about its retail recommendations in 2009, we live in 2013. What is the evidence? You may giggle, Mr Givan, but the evidence comes home to your constituency. It comes home to all the constituencies that are within 60 minutes' driving distance of Sprucefield. What is the evidence? Unlike Britain, which has 11% vacancy of business units, we have 20%. It is 23% in Belfast. Tell the businesses, retailers and workers in Belfast, Lisburn, Craigavon, Newry, Banbridge and Newtownards the full consequences of the Sprucefield proposal —

Mr Givan: Of your decision; of Belfast —

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us not have debate across the Chamber.

Mr Attwood: What is the evidence on the Sprucefield proposal? It would have a 22.9% impact on footfall being diverted from Lisburn to Sprucefield. It would be over 12% from Belfast and 35% in the constituency of Mrs Kelly in Craigavon —  $\,$

Mr Givan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way in a moment.

Mr Poots argued — this is where I will give way — that the jobs from the Sprucefield proposal would be greater than the loss or dislocation of jobs from other centres. There are up to 100,000 retail jobs in Northern Ireland. Of those jobs, up to 50,000 are in the greater Belfast area. The evidence that I wanted to be interrogated and tested before an independent inquiry at the PAC tells me that the impact would have been over 10% on Belfast, over 20% on Lisburn and over 30% on Craigavon. Given that, can you explain to me how you work out the maths that say that the gain of 1,500 jobs at Sprucefield would not have meant a loss of many, many more jobs in Lisburn, Belfast, Newtownards and the greater Belfast area?

Mr Poots: I thank the Minister for giving way. It is a fairly simple explanation. If people are travelling out of Northern Ireland to spend money and there is the potential to bring people into Northern Ireland to spend money in the retail sector, that would equate to a greater spend in Northern Ireland and would create greater employment. I suspect that Belfast has lost far more as a result of the clothes shops on Boucher Road than it would have lost from John Lewis being at Sprucefield.

Mr Attwood: I trust that that evidence will be lodged in the Assembly Library, as I will lodge my evidence on the retail impact that is proven by surveys, the assessment of turnover and interviews in 22 locations. Those figures direct me to draw the conclusion that I have.

Why did I draw that conclusion? The RDS 2035 states that there should be a "precautionary approach" to out-of-town retail. It also states that Belfast is a "regional economic driver" and that Sprucefield is a regional shopping centre. There is a difference. The Executive endorsed the RDS 2035 in March 2012. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: Secondly, PPS 5, which is the only live retail policy — I wish that that were different — confirms that there should be a precautionary approach. The retail figures on the losses of shops and their closure also confirm that there should be a precautionary approach. In my view, any other approach would have been hostile to the interests of Belfast, Lisburn, greater Belfast and the North.

This was a moment to draw a line in the sand by giving advice to a planning inquiry about what we thought was the best retail policy. It was not the moment to serve the interests of any one or other retailer but to serve the interests of retail over the next 20, 30 and 40 years.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 4 March 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to today's business, I have two announcements to make. The Speaker has been notified by the nominating officer of the Ulster Unionist Party, Mr Mike Nesbitt, that Mr Robin Swann has been nominated as Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning. The Speaker is satisfied that this correspondence meets the requirements of Standing Orders, and he has asked me to advise the House that Mr Robin Swann has been confirmed as Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning with effect from 27 February 2013.

In addition, I wish to inform Members that the Minister of Justice wrote to the Speaker on Thursday 28 February to advise that he would not be in a position to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill tomorrow. The stage will be rescheduled by the Business Committee. Let us move on.

Matter of the Day

Security: Mortar Bomb Find in Londonderry

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr Gregory Campbell has been given leave to make a statement on the mortar bombs found in Londonderry that fulfils the criteria set out in Standing Order 24. All other Members who wish to be called should indicate that by rising in their place and continuing to do so. Each Member will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject. I also remind Members that, as an investigation is ongoing, they should be careful about what they say so that nothing might impact on any case that may come before the courts.

Mr Campbell: Last evening, on the Foyle Road in Londonderry, police intercepted a vehicle and, as the local police commander indicated this morning on various news media, in that vehicle were four mortars, live and ready for operation. We live in the context of dissident republicans having made a number of attempts on the lives of innocent people. Thankfully, only a small number of those attempts — too many — have been successful. Many have been prevented by good police work and community support, and it appears to be the case that last night was a similar event. Last night, however, we were within five or 10 minutes of a major outrage. How major it could have been can be established by recalling that, in 1985, there was a similar mortar bomb attack on Newry police station, and the end result was that nine innocent officers were murdered. Police stations in the Londonderry area — any of the three or four that I can immediately think of — are all in built-up areas. The police have indicated, as we all know, that these mortars are notoriously unreliable, so not only innocent police officers but innocent civilians were being targeted.

We need to send out a message that the Assembly in its totality utterly condemns the actions of those responsible last night, commends and thanks the Police Service and the officers responsible for apprehending the device and calls on the community, on whose information, we hope, last night occurred, to keep giving more information such as this and for the police to keep taking the action that they are taking to prevent the wholesale slaughter that could have occurred last night and, thankfully, by the grace of God, did not.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. On behalf of Sinn Féin, I join with the comments on the Floor and echo the frustration and anger that was felt by the residents of the Brandywell and Foyle Road areas last night. The vast majority of people in our city woke up this morning thankful that this incident, through whatever intelligence sources, had been stopped. People who are intent on damaging our city and our people need today to step up to the plate, come to the microphones and explain to the people of our city how those actions will advance any city, any people or any cause or build any city of equals or any Ireland of equals.

I was on the ground last night until late this morning. There was palpable anger and frustration from the residents. That was in stark contrast to the view of the vast majority of people and the mood in the city over the course of the events at the weekend in Ebrington Square. It was clearly viewed as an attack on our city and our people. The human cost of moving some of our most elderly and vulnerable residents from their homes in the late hours of this morning was stark. It is, it needs to be said, in stark contrast to the unity of purpose that does exist, continues to exist today and will continue to exist across all sectors of our city. Those who are intent on taking that away or somehow damaging the spirit or the unity across our city need today to answer to the people of the city what those actions were going to achieve in advancing any people or any community.

Mr Durkan: I join other Members in their calls. Ms McLaughlin spoke of the upheaval for residents. I know that my party colleague Pat Ramsey shares those frustrations. He was on the ground with her last night.

There is huge relief in the city of Derry today that those instruments of death and destruction were intercepted last night. Full credit and praise must go to the police for their brave and ultimately heroic actions. We shudder to think what might have happened otherwise, but I have little doubt that we would have woken up today to news and scenes of carnage. I speak for Derry today when I condemn those who would visit that on our society and when I re-emphasise our determination to drive Derry and Northern Ireland forward and not to allow others to drag it back.

Mr Elliott: I start by thanking the PSNI and the security services for their apprehension of the mortars, which has hopefully stopped the devastation that they had the potential to create in the city of Londonderry. The Ulster Unionist Party recognises and indeed can empathise with the people of the city of Londonderry who were disturbed and suffered as a result of the actions of last night.

I do not know whether these mortars came from the same stock, but, last week, the security services indicated that a mortar found in Belfast had come from old Provisional IRA stock. I challenge people from the Provisional IRA, some of whom may now be in Sinn Féin, to bring forward the information that is required to help the security services to stop such actions as happened last night. They must ensure that they give every bit of information possible. Let us be clear: some of those people know exactly where these munitions and explosives are. They should come forward and say. That is the outworking of the so-called decommissioning process. Where are all the weapons that were decommissioned? I thought that they were all out of circulation, but, obviously, they are not. Shame on those who are carrying out these acts now, and shame on those who carried them out in the past.

Mr Ford: I join the Members who have already spoken in condemning those who would carry out such a deed and in praising the police officers who dealt so resolutely with the threat and the army technical officers who assisted them.

I got a briefing soon after the incident occurred yesterday evening. It was absolutely clear that it was a major threat to life, as has been said, not just to the lives of the police officers for whom it was almost certainly intended but to the lives of civilians in heavily populated areas of Derry city. It is absolutely clear how utterly reckless those who would carry out such deeds are. There is no question of any justification. There is no question of their having any support. It is time that they listened to voices of the people from in and around the Brandywell area whom we heard across the media this morning condemning so eloquently what went on. They made it absolutely clear that those who would carry out such deeds do not speak for them.

Since I became Minister, I have had the chance to visit the city on a number of occasions for positive activities in Ebrington aligned to the City of Culture and other aspects, to speak to police officers at Strand Road or to see some of the other good work, led by the city council, being done on community safety issues. Clearly, there is a positive mood in Derry this year, shown in the way that the people of the city have responded to those who would carry out this kind of threat.

It used to be said that there was, in a sense, a division between those who talked about Londonderry and those who talked about Derry. It seems to me that that is not the case these days. The division is between a tiny minority seeking to drag this society back and the overwhelming majority of people who want us to move forward, recognising all the political difficulties that we have in this place but determined to turn our back on this kind of violence. The positive connections between the Police Service and the citizens on both sides of the river are a key way of demonstrating that. We saw that just a couple of weeks ago when Philippa Reynolds tragically died in a car accident. There was enormous support from right across the city for her PSNI colleagues and what they did. I have no doubt that that enormous support continues.

It is a tragedy that a small number of young people got sucked into behaviour against police officers last night, but it is clear where the city as a whole stands. I trust that the Assembly will be seen to stand resolute and united, as we have done, in support of the peace process and those who uphold that peace.

Mr Eastwood: I echo the words and sentiments of the Members who have spoken already. We are very lucky that we are not talking today about something even more serious.I want to put on record our praise for the PSNI and an Garda Síochána for the efforts that they put in to ensuring that another potential attack on our city and our people was foiled. I offer sympathy to the residents of the Brandywell area who were put out of their homes again last night. The people who purport to carry out these activities on behalf of the Irish people need to hear very clearly that the people of Derry and of Ireland as a whole reject them and view them as enemies of our peace process and our political future. We will not be held back. Positive stories are coming out of our city, and we will not allow those who live in fantasy land to drag us back to the past. Derry is on an upward curve, and we will not be deterred from that. This will be a very good year for our city, no matter what these people try to do. I know that I speak on behalf of all the people of the city when I say that.

Mr I McCrea: As a member of the Northern Ireland Policing Board, I condemn those who set out with the sole intention of murdering police officers and other people who live in the area. I commend the police officers who, in their normal day-to-day work and line of duty, were able to catch people who were intent on murder. I say, "Well done" to those officers and "Keep up the good work".

This is a better day than it could have been. My colleague Gregory Campbell referred to the lives that could have been lost. That cannot and should not be lost on the community, especially those who subscribe to and support dissident republican activity. It is important that we, as a community, stand together, condemn those responsible and ensure that the courts and the justice system deal with the people who have been arrested. We leave that in their hands. Again, I commend the police officers, and I hope that more work is done and more information brought to the police to ensure that further arrests are made and further attempts on police lives are stopped.

Mr Allister: I trust that we all welcome the fact that this murderous attempt was thwarted and that we will all show our appreciation and thanks to the intelligence services, which contributed to that thwarting. Sadly, some in the House wish to thwart the work of the intelligence services and to see the efforts to have the National Crime Agency operating in this Province thwarted. Last night was a reminder of why we need such facilities.

Vile, hideous and murderous as last night's attempt was, it was no more vile, hideous or murderous than the Provo attack on Newry police station, which some in the House still will not condemn. Of course, such acts are still happening, because the Provo template is seen to have worked for those who operated it. The current bombers look into this House, with its special provisions that guarantee a place for terrorists in government, and draw hope and succour from the belief that the terrorism that worked for the Provos can also work for them. That is why the attacks continue, and, so long as the House closes its eves to that reality and continues to sustain a system that rewarded terrorism, no one should be surprised that, sadly but inevitably, we have more terrorism from those who ape what the Provos did and who follow through to the letter the Provo template on all this. This was wrong. It was wrong in the 1970s. It was wrong in the 1980s. It was wrong in the 1990s. It has been wrong in this century. Those who justify what happened in the past continue to feed the mantra that generates today's terrorism. If they want to be taken seriously today, they need forthrightly to condemn and repudiate that which they did in the past, setting the example to today's terrorists. That, sadly, is the reality.

Mr McNarry: Ten minutes from murder is a daunting prospect and another warning that our society remains under constant threat from evil people who clearly do not fit into and have no desire to fit into today's society, which we in this House have helped to create. That is their decision, but, as Gregory Campbell said, there is an onus of responsibility on the House to stand together today in total rejection of this near-miss action, and so we must. It must not just be a token call from the House but be driven home by all Members from every constituency in Northern Ireland. Last night was a timely reminder to all towns and villages throughout Northern Ireland that they must remain vigilant and alert, because their safety is not guaranteed. It can and will be guaranteed only by the tremendous work carried out by the PSNI and others last night in rescuing a situation that was 10 minutes from sheer hell.

Assembly Business

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Having today had a matter of the day and a question for urgent oral answer rejected on the subject of the perversity of the operation of bail arrangements in the Province, I want to ask why the House is running away from facing up to the consequences of the actions of the courts last Friday, when William Frazer, a man without a record, was refused bail —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Allister: - while Sean Hughes -

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Allister: — a notorious IRA man, walked free on bail.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Allister: Why is the House running away from debating that matter?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member should take his seat. As all Members are aware, it is the Speaker who determines questions for urgent oral answer and matters of the day. If any Member wishes to have an item of business discussed in the Assembly, that should be taken to the Business Committee, which determines what items come forth. This is clearly not a point of order.

Committee Membership

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next item in the Order Paper is a motion on Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion. Therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Basil McCrea replace Mr Robin Swann as a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure; and that Mr Sean Rogers replace Mr John McCallister as a member of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee. — [Mrs McKevitt.]

Public Bodies (The Office of Fair Trading Transfer of Consumer Advice Scheme Function and Modification of Enforcement Functions) Order 2013: Assembly Consent Motion

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to move

That this Assembly consents to the Public Bodies (The Office of Fair Trading Transfer of Consumer Advice Scheme Function and Modification of Enforcement Functions) Order 2013 in the form of the draft laid before the UK Parliament on 12 December 2012.

It might be helpful for Members if I give some background to the tabling of the motion and how the order affects Northern Ireland. In 2011, the UK Government launched a consultation under the title "Empowering and Protecting Consumers", in which they proposed a number of reforms to the current institutional arrangements to ensure that consumer advice, representation and enforcement were delivered effectively and efficiently. This order will implement some of the changes proposed in that consultation. The order is being made under section 5 of the Public Bodies Act 2011, which enables UK Ministers by order to modify the functions of a specified public body and to make consequential and supplementary changes. The primary purpose of the order is to make changes to the Office of Fair Trading's consumer advice function. Currently, the Office of Fair Trading has a power, under section 8 of the Enterprise Act 2002, to operate a consumer advice scheme for the whole of the United Kingdom. The changes that the order will introduce in relation to Great Britain are to transfer this function to Citizens Advice and to Citizens Advice Scotland. In relation to Northern Ireland, the OFT consumer advice function other than for postal services will be abolished. The order will also make minor modifications to a number of enforcement functions of the OFT.

As the power to provide consumer advice is a transferred matter, the consent of the Assembly is required for the order by virtue of section 9(3) of the Public Bodies Act 2011. Although the OFT has had the power to provide for a general consumer advice scheme in Northern Ireland, it has never operated such a scheme here. This is because my Department already had a consumer advice service in operation before the launch of the scheme provided for by the OFT. The service operated by my Department operates under the name of Consumerline and gives advice to consumers on the circumstance of their specific complaint. Consequently, the changes being brought in by this order will have no significant impact for Northern Ireland consumers. As I have already indicated, under the order, the OFT will retain the function for providing for consumer advice in relation to postal services for Northern Ireland. This is because postal services are not a devolved matter. Although the OFT retains the function of providing for the advice scheme for postal services in relation to Northern Ireland, the advice service will actually be delivered by the Citizens Advice service.

The order also makes some minor changes to the enforcement of consumer law. The OFT is designated as an enforcer in a range of consumer legislation in force across the UK. In some cases, it shares a duty to enforce with other enforcers. The policy intention is that, in the future, local trading standards authorities, including the Trading Standards Service of my Department in Northern Ireland, will take the lead in enforcing consumer protection legislation. This necessitates a change to the legislation specified in the order so that the OFT will no longer have a duty to enforce but, rather, a power. The order also makes an amendment to section 213 of the Enterprise Act 2002 to provide that the enforcers, including my Department, will no longer need to consult the OFT when applying for an enforcement order. Instead, enforcers will simply be required to notify the OFT.

The amendments to be made by the order will ensure that Northern Ireland will continue to benefit from a UK consumer advice scheme for the users of postal services, and they will enable the Trading Standards Service of my Department to take the lead in enforcing a range of consumer protection legislation. At the same time, the OFT expertise in this area will continue to be available in Northern Ireland and in common with the rest of the United Kingdom. I commend the motion to the Assembly.

Mr Flanagan (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for tabling this Assembly consent motion. I will not keep you too long. The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment considered the Assembly consent motion at its meeting on 24 January and was content with the proposals.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment for considering the matter in the manner in which it did and for allowing the motion to come to the Floor of the House today. Again, I commend the motion to the Assembly.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly consents to the Public Bodies (The Office of Fair Trading Transfer of Consumer Advice Scheme Function and Modification of Enforcement Functions) Order 2013 in the form of the draft laid before the UK Parliament on 12 December 2012.

Benefits: Advice and Awareness

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes. [Interruption.] Order. [Interruption.] Clear the Public Gallery.

Mr Durkan: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the challenges facing the advice sector and the need for individuals to have access to advice and assistance in relation to their welfare rights; and calls on the Minister for Social Development to devise an advice services strategy, to develop an awareness campaign for individuals and to provide adequate funding for independent advice providers.

I do not think that any Member of the Assembly would not recognise the hugely important role played by the advice sector in society today. Front line advice workers deal on a daily basis with individuals and families, often in distress, always in need of help and guidance. We are talking about older people, younger people and people with disabilities. They need help with a wide range of issues: employment rights; benefit advice; housing-related enquiries; immigration help; increasingly, sadly, emigration help; fuel poverty; health issues; and many, many more. Without accessible front line advice services, many people would not get the support that they need and end up drowning in a sea of debt, poverty and despair. We should not underestimate the lifeline that is provided by advice services, nor can we take it for granted.

I am sure I am not the only Member who has had to contact regional advice providers, such as the Citizens Advice or Advice NI, for help dealing with particularly complex enquiries from constituents. Nor am I alone, I am sure, in working closely with local community-based advice providers and resource centres on a regular basis on individual cases. Those services are important to us as public representatives and are vital to the public that we represent.

Although access to statutory advice services and departmental direct lines is effective in resolving many individual concerns, there is no doubt that the invaluable services provided by the independent advice sector complement statutory services and increase accessibility. The sector is being forced to deal with an unprecedented demand for help. It is being forced to do so within serious budgetary constraints, putting massive pressure on those men and women who work round the clock, often in difficult conditions, with stressed-out clients.

Unemployment is rife and businesses are struggling, as we show few signs of recovery from recession. For every big firm or multinational that has to close, like FG Wilson and HMV, there are dozens and dozens of small businesses giving up the ghost in towns and cities across the North. Currently, around 53% of people over the age of 16 here are claiming benefits. That is a huge proportion. The redundancies to which I have just referred will lead many newcomers to what is the minefield of the benefits system, after having being employed for years. Those people in particular would be lost without the assistance of welfare rights workers.

The workload for advice groups has been compounded by the huge number of appeals against decisions deriving from the flawed Atos work capability assessment. With the failings of Atos, we have seen an unprecedented number of overturns on appeal. In many cases, if not most, those people, often vulnerable, have decisions overturned in their favour thanks to guidance and representation from advice workers to ensure that they receive their entitlement

It would be impossible to touch on every aspect of support that is provided by the advice sector, but we cannot ignore the changes that the Department for Social Development (DSD) has made, and is seeking to make, to the welfare system, or how those changes will impact upon individuals and the sector. We have seen the new employment support system implemented and changes to the local housing allowance. Although those changes came with advice provided by the Department, it must be acknowledged that new applications and criteria brought forward by those actions proved complicated and confusing for individuals.

Without the support of the independent advice sector, many existing and new claimants would have ended up lost to the system or witnessing a delay in their payments. The SDLP believes that we must work towards reducing the strain facing the sector, preferably through reducing the number of those who require help but immediately through resourcing the sector adequately to deal with the pressures that it is under. It is our contention that the economic context — budgetary cuts across the board and the pending welfare reform changes — will only add to the pressure. It is vital that we support the advice sector now and through the pending period of transition to ensure that individuals, particularly those who are vulnerable, are able to access free and independent advice to safeguard them against destitution.

We recognise and appreciate the work that DSD has done to date, and continues to do, to assist individuals with their welfare rights. Annually, DSD provides some £4·5 million for a range of advice provision, including regional advice support — there have been some issues there — front line advice support, housing advice and advice supporting benefit uptake. The Department has had success with its benefit uptake programme, as I am sure that the Minister will remind us, and a recent DSD consultation aims to build on that success to target vulnerable groups more successfully.

However, despite that commitment from the Department, there is much more to be done. Our concerns centre on the current demand facing the sector and the inevitability that that demand will grow with the proposed changes to the welfare system. We cannot ignore those changes, and it is unfair to expect claimants and potential claimants to wait in limbo, relying on news reports and Chinese whispers to inform them of the implications of reform. Advice services receive queries daily about the coming reforms, and as yet there are no concrete answers for them to give. Centres need to be resourced to deal with an increased volume of calls and to offer support and guidance to individuals throughout this period of change.

Although I welcome DSD's work, it is important to make the point that the Department itself has acknowledged that, for many, the barrier to benefits is a mistrust of statutory bodies. With the constant media focus on the Tory cuts agenda, individuals are now, more than ever, anxious in that regard. They would much rather get help from a poacher than be struck off by the gamekeeper. It is also worth noting that the new systems are expected to rely more heavily on IT applications and a new IT processing system. DSD must engage with community-based advice providers as well as regional organisations to instruct and assist them through theoretical and functional changes. I fear that an increased role for online benefit applications may present a further barrier to benefit uptake here.

In England, the Cabinet Office, along with the Big Lottery Fund, has created a £65 million advice service transition fund to assist the advice sector to provide support to individuals through these welfare changes. Alongside that fund, the Government have published a review of the not-for-profit social welfare advice sector in England. That demonstrates that not only do the Government have a role to play in supporting the sector but that advice providers will need to show initiative and change the way in which they work. They must increase levels of collaboration to build sustainability and effectiveness.

None of that £65 million fund has been allocated to Northern Ireland, and I want to know where the parity is in that. Scotland has also injected new money — in the region of £6 million — to advice agencies to assist with welfare changes. I appeal to the Minister for Social Development to do likewise, particularly as it has already been accepted that the impact of these changes will be even worse here than in other regions on these islands. The Minister needs to identify adequate financial support, and that support must be available to him to strengthen our advice services. The Minister must also show leadership and encourage the advice sector to form a more effective working relationship with the Department to ensure that the best front line services are available to individuals in need of help.

Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First, I want to place on record that the Committee has not formally considered the motion, but I will seek to accurately relay the thoughts of the Committee and the way in which it has dealt with these issues.

The Committee recently concluded its consideration of the Welfare Reform Bill, and one key element of that was people's right to access independent advice. The Committee received presentations on putting such independent advice on a statutory basis, but stopped short of supporting the formal proposition to seek to amend the Bill in that way. I speak for every member of the Committee, all of whom were consistent in the view that people need to have proper access to independent advice on their entitlement to benefit, and so on.

The Committee is unanimous in wanting to ensure that the Department gives adequate resources to the independent advice sector. The Committee members were unanimous in recognising that, on every occasion when awareness campaigns were organised or launched, there was a take-up of benefit entitlement that people had not properly availed themselves of until that point. Therefore, the Committee agreed unanimously on all the key aspects of today's motion. That will be very welcome to all those who rely on benefits because it is important that they get their entitlements.

The precise methodology of how the Minister, the Department and the advice sector work together to make sure that we maximise the rights of claimants to be able to get their entitlements is a matter for discussion. Clearly, as the proposer of the motion pointed out, the Department already deploys considerable resources to the advice sector, and we need to ensure that those are deployed wisely. People will, undoubtedly, face increased challenges as a result of the welfare reform agenda. It may, therefore, be logical for the Department to put aside increased resources for the independent advice sector. The Committee unanimously endorsed all the concepts of the motion, and that is a very good and welcome development.

To date, the Committee has looked at a range of issues, had a range of engagements and, for example, embraced the work on fuel poverty. Stakeholders highlighted the need to ensure people's ongoing awareness of their entitlements. Many people, including some senior citizens, do not always know their entitlements. People in the childcare sector pointed out that resources are available to many parents who are, as yet, unaware of them. When the Department and the Social Security Agency embarked on awareness campaigns of benefit entitlement, there was not a single occasion when people were not able to draw down extra entitlements as a result.

So it is fair to say that, although the Committee for Social Development has not considered the motion formally, the record will show that members across all its parties will endorse it unanimously.

12.45 pm

Ms P Bradley: I also rise to speak as a member of the Social Development Committee. I welcome the tabling of the motion today. As a caring society, we in Northern Ireland must ensure that those who require access to advice services can do so in a timely manner.

Day and daily, constituents come into my office expressing a high level of fear and trepidation about the incoming welfare reforms. There is also misunderstanding and misinterpretation about the forthcoming legislation and about the impact that it will have on people who currently receive welfare and on people in work who worry about what will happen should they ever need to access the system. I believe that good-quality advice is vital in counteracting that misinformation and possible scaremongering in our communities.

We have seen success in the past year of campaigns that were aimed at raising people's awareness of the importance of ensuring that they receive all the financial help that they are entitled to. That has been especially true in the case of people who are aged over 60. Since 2011, we have seen significant numbers of people taking advantage of the various ways of conducting a benefit check on their household to ensure that they are not missing out.

The question of who is best placed to deliver that advice also needs careful consideration. I worked for Citizens Advice for a number of years, so I believe that, as they are embedded in our communities, the independent providers are a good way of delivering that advice.

The role of statutory agencies also needs to be considered and explored so that the good work that has been happening can be built on. For instance, the role of statutory agencies, such as Land and Property Services (LPS), could directly target people who may not be availing themselves of their full entitlement. People who are identified will receive a personal letter from the Minister encouraging them to make the call. That shows how the statutory agencies working together can have a positive impact. I believe that the statutory and voluntary agencies need to work hand in hand to ensure that we are reaching everyone who needs to be reached in that respect.

Welfare reform is not about punishing the poor or creating division between deserving and undeserving; rather, it is about ensuring that we make better use of our resources to target those who need help the most. It is about making work pay and ending our over-reliance on our benefit system by those who are capable of work.

Advice before the implementation reform and after its introduction is vital to ensure that we achieve our aims. The majority will not scrutinise the reforms as we have done in the Chamber and in Committee. Therefore, we need to ensure that the information that is in the public domain is correct, easy to understand and relevant to each individual circumstance, and that people are aware where they can get that advice.

The Department has already begun that work through media campaigns and work in the voluntary and community sector. Statutory agencies have also played a role, and I believe that they will be vital in reaching the hardest groups in our society to give help and support. I support the motion.

Mr Copeland: I thank Mr Durkan for bringing forward this important issue. The role of the advice sector is discussed occasionally in this Chamber, and it appears that the same issues, such as a lack of resources or even uncertainty about meeting statutory obligations that need to be met, are raised time after time.

In his concluding remarks, the Minister will hopefully be able to clarify his vision for the future of the sector, particularly given the possible turbulent nature of the next few years.

Looking at Advice NI's annual statistics for 2012, it is easy to see why organisations such as that provide such a crucial role. It dealt with just over a quarter of a million enquiries last year. Add to that the endless streams of people who go to other organisations or those who should, but do not, seek support, and, very shortly, a picture emerges through the mist.

The forthcoming Welfare Reform Bill will only put further strain on that already busy sector. It is a piece of legislation that we were told was so important and so urgent when it was eventually introduced in the Assembly in October that we could not afford to delay, even for a number of weeks, without facing huge financial penalties. Yet, it continues to linger, casting a huge cloud of uncertainty. The Minister has stated that decisions have needed to be taken by so many dates now that, unfortunately, no one really has an idea of where exactly we lie with the timetable. That impacts greatly on those involved in making the preparations for the advice sector.

With the Department having seemingly failed to explain to the wider public what may be coming down the line, that has left the wider sector in the inevitable position of having to prepare for what will be a sudden and substantial upsurge in enquiries. There is no denying that the Department, with the support of the wider advice sector, has begun to work on issues such as benefit uptake. However, it is falling far short of the mark on other issues, such as our continuing and unacceptably high levels of fuel poverty.

On top of the existing challenges, Minister McCausland is presiding over the progress of the Welfare Reform Bill, which includes clauses that his own party colleagues said last week in Westminster, I believe, will hurt those living in poverty and those with disabilities. Although the Minister will no doubt refer with some clarity to the millions of pounds — £3·5 million according to me — that were made available to fund front line advice, less than half of that came from his Department, with the balance being met by councils. He may well then, with equal fervour, state that money is being made available until March 2015 for the Northern Ireland Advice Services Alliance.

All of that is very welcome and noble, but we have all heard it so many times before. However, when one looks back just a few months and sees the levels to which key areas such as the social development housing programme underspent the money that his Department provides for advice provision, that could be viewed as less than significant.

I would like the Minister to detail, even roughly, how the level of money that his Department has spent on public messages warning of the potential introduction of the Welfare Reform Bill, as well as increasing the support available for the advice sector, compares with other departmental campaigns, such as the hugely worthwhile road safety campaign of the Department of the Environment (DOE) or even some public campaigns run by the health service.

Despite a propaganda campaign that the Department apparently tried to start last week, we can not for one moment forget that the Bill will make an already hard life more difficult for potentially tens of thousands of families. Any and all forms of support but especially the provision of quick advice and assistance will be crucial if the Department is to ensure that those families find some way of coping.

It is not an ideal situation. The Department could be accused of underperforming in some aspects, but I am glad that there is at least someone in the independent advice sector —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Copeland: — that is ready to step in and is more than capable of doing so. I support the motion.

Mrs Cochrane: I, too, welcome the motion and thank the Members for securing the debate. Welfare reform, on top of the ongoing recession and cuts to public services, means that enormous pressure will be placed on our already strained advice sector services in Northern Ireland.

I know from those coming into my constituency office that people have an increasing number of questions about the changes to the welfare system. Information on the changes has been drip-fed, so it is difficult for the public to understand what those will mean for them in real terms. People are worried about the changes and afraid of the unknown. Therefore, an awareness campaign to update individuals on what is happening, and when, is vital to allay fears and provide clarification on some untrue rumours out there.

I have also seen increased demand in my office for representation at appeal hearings and tribunals. Given the high number of cases overturned on appeal, we need to ensure that the correct decisions are being made at the outset so as not to waste resources on appeals. With our office cost expenditure being continually reduced over the next number of years, we will inevitably rely further on local advice organisations such as Citizens Advice and the East Belfast Independent Advice Centre in my constituency. Without them, I can only begin to imagine what our caseload would increase to.

As other Members said, and as we heard in the Committee for Social Development, Advice NI has sent some of its advisers to applied suicide intervention skills training. Unfortunately, that is a harsh reality and enables members of staff to be able to recognise those at risk of suicide. I wrote to the Minister, a few weeks ago, to suggest that he look into commissioning additional advice workers, perhaps on a constituency basis. Those advice workers could work across each MLA's constituency office on a rota basis, over the five-year implementation, to provide impartial advice to constituents. Although it would not solve the problem entirely, it could go some way towards alleviating pressure on the advice sector.

In short, it is clear that finances need to be made available in order to provide mass training for those working in the advice sector, so that they will be equipped to deal with the substantial changes under universal credit. It is concerning that there appears to have been a lack of communication between the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) and the advice sector in relation to the huge pressure that the Bill will place on them over the next five to 10 years. Importantly, the advice sector needs not only adequate funding but to know that the funding is long term, so that it is allowed to plan and review the service that it is delivering, without having to worry constantly about where its next money is going to come from.

In closing, Mr Deputy Speaker, I join Members in supporting the motion and in calling for action on an advice services strategy in order to show the sector that we are serious in our support for the vital work that it does — work that often goes unrecognised.

Ms Brown: I rise as a member of the Social Development Committee to speak on the motion. I congratulate the Members in securing the debate, which I am happy to support. At this point, I declare an interest as a member of the management board of the citizens advice bureau in

There is no doubt that we are in the midst of times of change for many people within the benefit system. It is, therefore, critical that we, as elected Members, ensure that all our constituents who are affected by the change are given every assistance possible to help manage that change. Central to supporting the uptake of unclaimed benefits is the provision of advice and information. The Department has a role to play in providing to current or potential claimants information on entitlement, and it provides £4·5 million a year to support voluntary service advice. A further £1·9 million is made available by local councils. I believe that the Department has worked very hard to provide information in that area. I have seen plenty of advertising and information being made available. It is a very positive initiative, which appears to be delivering as intended.

Advice and support is of particular importance at this time, as changes to the welfare system have caused anxiety among vulnerable groups. I know that from my experience in my constituency office, as people worry about their future entitlement and future possible hardships.

In Northern Ireland, we benefit from a wide range of voluntary organisations, which communicate and work with the vulnerable groups that are in receipt of benefits or with those who are seeking assistance from the welfare system. Citizens Advice provides information and guidance on a range of issues, not just benefit uptake. It is in receipt of funding support from government to support the tremendous work that it does in easing people's anxieties and worries amid an economic downturn.

There are, of course, further examples, such as Age NI, which, I know, has been encouraging benefit uptake among the elderly, and I am sure that there are organisations in each of our communities that are doing very similar, worthwhile work. Very recently, I have been working with Employers for Childcare, which has been providing benefit checks and childcare vouchers to my constituents in South Antrim. That work is ongoing.

I am keen to see that those at the centre of change to the welfare system are supported by the Department in a proactive fashion. I know that those currently in receipt of disability living allowance are receiving communication in relation to the introduction of the personal independent payment and that those who were previously on incapacity benefit have received communication in relation to the introduction of employment and support allowance. The Department is, therefore, supporting those directly affected, and the advice sector, in conjunction with the Department's Opening Doors strategy, is onside in supporting those in need of help. I am, therefore, generally supportive of the motion. I thank the Members for tabling it, as it highlights the need to support many thousands of people through a very difficult time of change. I support the motion.

1.00 pm

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, rise to support the motion. As someone who worked as an advice worker in a welfare rights centre for 27 years before I came to the Assembly, I am acutely aware of the necessity for and importance of the advice sector.

The complexity of the current benefit system has meant that more and more people have required advice and assistance to deal with their benefits. Advice workers also have an advocacy role. As MLAs with constituency clinics, we all realise the increase, in particular, in the number of people who have been turned down because of the shambles — I say "shambles" advisedly — of the work capability assessment and what ensued from it and the absolute need for advice and advocacy to be given to the most vulnerable people in our society, who are suffering as a result.

A lot of the time and energy of advice workers and people who work in advice centres is spent seeking funding when it could be much better employed in actually dealing with the purpose for which they are there, which is to give people advice and assistance. Now we have welfare reform coming down the road. Paula Bradley said in her speech that it is not an attack on the poor. Of course it is an attack on the poor. As recently as the weekend, the British Defence Secretary, when looking for more funding for defence, suggested that the welfare budget — no other budget — should be cut, as if there had not been enough cuts. It is said that welfare reform does not target the poor, but those who are most in need. It does target those who are most in need, but it does so by cutting their benefits and ensuring that there will be more poverty and destitution as time goes on.

As regards universal credit, for instance, we have been told that there are a couple of reasons for it. Its underlying principle is that it is better to be in work than on benefits. Nobody argues with that. We have also been told that the reason that welfare reform is being introduced is to simplify the benefit system. Well, I have sat for the past year, approximately, listening to officials trying — I say "trying" — to explain universal credit. If that is not complex, I wish someone would tell me what is. All it does is reinforce, more and more, the need for advice and advocacy services.

The point was made by, I think, both Paula and Pam that advice centres are very rooted in communities, but a lot of them are also cross-community centres and do tremendous cross-community work. In many cases, there is no barrier to people going to different advice centres to get much-needed advice and assistance. The Minister has talked about a strategy for increasing advice and, indeed, benefit take-up. For instance, underclaimed pension credit currently runs at approximately £1.9 million. That needs to be addressed. Over the years, various schemes have been tried through Advice NI and CAB. To a large extent, they have been successful, but they need to be more successful. They need to target more people and ensure that those who are most in need of benefits get them. Historically, people here have a fear of officialdom and the statutory organisations. Again, the point was made that people are much more likely to go to independent advice centres, where they feel that they get a hearing that is beneficial to them.

We have heard much talk about the online take-up of benefits. We have been told by officials that 75% of people here in the North have access to broadband. As one Committee member suggested, the survey was, presumably, done online. Therefore, it actually targeted the 75% of people who have broadband. Many rural areas do not have access to broadband.

The Department is closing three community offices. One is in Crossmaglen, another is in Shantallow in Derry, and the name of the other one escapes me at the moment. Those offices service rural hinterlands and large urban populations, particularly in Derry. There is much need for them. With the closure of those offices, more and more advice and assistance will be needed by more and more people.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Brady: Although I support the motion, I think that the Minister needs to come forward today and give us a sustainable strategy for advice and tell us what advice centres can expect in the future as their workload continues to increase.

Mr Eastwood: Obviously, I support the motion. It is meant not to be political or party political but helpful. I am glad that we have support from around the House. The motion is set in the context of the fact that over 120,000 children in Northern Ireland live in poverty, as the Joseph Rowntree Foundation found last year. Many of them live in very severe poverty, and there is no sense of that figure getting any better. We also have the oncoming onslaught of welfare reform, which has been mentioned. Anybody who works in the community knows the difficulties that that will create and that it is being driven by Tory ideology to try to attack the poor to prop up everything else. We should not ignore that fact when we are dealing with this issue.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member agree that there is something obscene about the Government's proposals to cap benefits but not the bonuses for the bankers who created the financial crisis that we are now in?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Member for her intervention. It is clear, when you look at the policies being implemented by the Tory-Lib Dem Government, that they have no regard for and no real understanding of what the people whom we are talking about today are going through. Their friends are the bankers and the people on huge bonuses. They do not really know anybody who is on the breadline and have never dealt with anybody who is going to an appeal and needs support. They have also never dealt with anybody who has had the benefits to which they were entitled taken away because of Atos. There is a real lack of understanding, and that is the context in which we find ourselves.

We ask, therefore, that as much support as possible be given to mitigate the real dangers of welfare reform and the effect of the all the other economic disadvantages that people face. Everybody in the Chamber knows about the good work being done by organisations on the ground. My office is getting busier and busier as people understand the implications that welfare reform will have for them. People do not really know and have not grasped how difficult this will be. The people on the front line are those from Citizens Advice, Advice NI and the resource centre in Derry and all who work tirelessly to assist those in greatest need. I hope that we do everything that we can to support them.

My colleague Mark Durkan touched on the issue of benefit uptake, and some good work has been done. However, Employers for Childcare recently told the OFMDFM Committee that around 232,000 families were not even aware that they were entitled to childcare benefits. People on the ground need to be aware of that, and we need to support those who are trying to make people aware of it. I want to —

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that it is hard to understand why OFMDFM — the Department responsible for childcare — has not enacted an awareness-raising campaign throughout the community about the benefit advice and assistance that is available to parents to assist with childcare costs?

Mr Eastwood: It was shocking to hear that over 230,000 families had not been aware of or had not taken up their entitlements under the childcare provisions in the benefit system. I hope that OFMDFM will now increase awareness and help organisations such as Employers for Childcare to make people aware of the benefits to which they are entitled. We have called for that previously. I support the Member on that point.

I want to mention the Shantallow community benefit office, which Mr Brady referred to. Over time, the people in that benefits office have developed human knowledge and human expertise that is not in any way replaceable by a computer or a telephone conversation. We need to do all we can to support existing work, including the work that is going on in the Department. I know that it is probably too late, but, at this very late stage, I implore the Minister to revisit that decision to try to ensure that the people whom I represent have as much opportunity as possible to avail themselves of support and advice. With that, I commend the motion to the House.

Mr Anderson: I speak as a recently reappointed member of the Committee for Social Development. I am on a steep learning curve with all the welfare reform that is taking place. The field of welfare benefits is vast, complex and rapidly changing. As MLAs with busy constituency advice centres, Members will be all too well aware that the welfare and benefits system is of great relevance to an increasing number of people. A significant percentage of my work as a public representative is taken up with advising and helping people with a range of entitlements.

We are now seeing the fallout from the reform of incapacity benefit, which more than 80,000 people in Northern Ireland claim. As a result of the recent changes, about 50% of them have had their case reviewed. Of these, some 12,500 have been told that they will lose their benefit as they are considered fit for work, and about 8,000 are appealing that decision. Many of those people are and will be coming to our constituency offices to seek help. That is just one example. We will obviously see more examples with the ongoing major welfare reform across the UK.

I broadly support the motion. It draws attention to the importance of ensuring that the public have access to relevant information about benefits and entitlements. We should all support that. The motion also asks for adequate funding. I am in favour of that, too, and a lot is already being done in that regard. People need to know about entitlements. As changes in the system continue to work their way through, there will be further pressures on all agencies and groups that offer advice. There are various ways in which we can provide information. We live in an age of instant communication. For most of us, it would be hard to imagine life without the internet, but, in the area of benefit entitlement and uptake, we deal with some of the most vulnerable, so we must make sure that advice is well targeted. Not everyone is online. Some people cannot afford to be. Others who live in isolated rural areas have poor internet provision or maybe do not have it at all. That is a separate issue that needs to be addressed. Also, not everyone has easy access to transport to visit Citizens Advice centres and other such places. We must advertise widely in the media, in newspapers and on television and radio. Programmes such as 'On Your Behalf' on Radio Ulster are an excellent way of getting information across. In fact, a recent edition of that programme dealt with welfare reform.

The Minister has already shown and continues to show a high level of commitment to making sure that help is targeted and that people are aware of all that they are entitled to. I will highlight a few recent and ongoing initiatives. One of the Minister's first actions on his appointment in 2011 was to allocate extra funding to the Social Security Agency's benefit take-up programme. That has helped a lot of people to obtain help and support, largely in the age group of 60 and over. In these days of limited financial resources, it goes without saying that there is a clear need — more than ever before — for joined-up thinking and a joined-up approach between the various voluntary and community groups and the statutory agencies. There is a need for maximum efficiency. I know that the Opening Doors strategy aims to achieve all of that.

The Minister recently stated in the House that a further £3·5 million would be committed from 1 October 2012 to 31 March 2015 to the Northern Ireland Advice Services Alliance Consortium, which is made up of Advice NI, Citizens Advice NI and the Law Centre NI to provide regional support to the advice sector. The Minister's discussion paper 'Maximising Incomes and Outcomes' is also aimed at improving the uptake of benefits. I look forward to the Minister outlining a final plan on that in due course.

The Minister also allocates funding to councils through the community support programme. My council — Craigavon Borough Council — has received £326,000 from that programme. Of that, £58,169 is ring-fenced for advice service provision. The council has also allocated £104,266 of its funds, which means that Craigavon citizens advice bureau and LIAISE, an independent advice organisation, receive total funding of £163,435. Perhaps there is an increased role for local councils to play in that area, especially in light of the impending review of public administration.

Much is being done, and limited resources are being carefully targeted, but, as is always the case, we need to keep focused and ensure that the public are fully informed and get their financial entitlements. I support the motion.

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):

I listened with interest to all the Members who spoke in the debate, and I thank all those who contributed for their input. I wish to respond to all the issues that were raised during the debate. However, if there are issues that I cannot cover in the detail requested, I will write to the Members concerned as soon as possible following the conclusion of the sitting.

I warmly welcome the debate and wish to respond positively to the motion. As Minister for Social Development, I have responsibility for urban regeneration and community development, in addition to housing, social security benefits, pensions and child maintenance. My Department is, therefore, to the fore in tackling issues of disadvantage, and, through everything that it does, it is directly involved in helping people and communities to improve their lives. I am fully committed to tackling disadvantage and to building strong and vibrant communities across Northern Ireland. In that context, I give a high priority to building capacity and to looking at measures that will mitigate the negative impacts of poverty on individuals and their families, households and communities.

Like all of you, I am acutely aware of the significant and complex changes that we are embarking on as a result of the reform of our welfare system, the consequences of which are likely to impact on most parts of our society. Let us ensure that we protect the most vulnerable, and let us work as a collective to mitigate the worst aspects of the planned changes and to deliver the best possible outcome for the people of Northern Ireland.

Our advice sector plays a vital role in supporting people through the changes that will arise from the welfare reforms. I fully recognise the challenges that this period of substantial change will bring for the advice sector in Northern Ireland. Those challenges are faced by government and the advice sector, and there is an onus on both to maximise the impact of scarce resources to ensure that individuals can readily access good advice services. I want to work — indeed, continue to work — with the advice sector organisations and to harness their excellent resource and expertise as we go forward.

My Department has devised and introduced a strategy for advice services in Northern Ireland. I note that the need for a strategy was mentioned. That strategy, known as Opening Doors, is geared to helping to support an integrated, quality advice service across Northern Ireland. The strategy is already there, and it provides a framework to ensure that advice services are planned and delivered in a way that matches resources to need, focusing particularly on meeting the needs of the most disadvantaged. The key objectives of Opening Doors include maximising access to basic advice; resourcing the future of the advice sector; providing high-quality advice; and using existing resources effectively. I encourage all Members to get a copy of the strategy or to download it and study it carefully.

A key part of the advice strategy is the need for government to work in partnership with advice sector organisations to ensure the provision of good, easy-to-access services. My Department is already leading this work. As a first step, we asked the main advice-providing organisations in Northern Ireland to work together in partnership and as a consortium and to become a strategic partner with the Department in addressing issues on advice provision. This consortium is known as the Northern Ireland Advice Services Alliance Consortium, and its members are Citizens Advice, Advice NI and the Law Centre. The focus of our relationship with this advice consortium is to provide and target support for the provision of advice services to meet identified need.

Going forward, the advice consortium has a key role to play in building and supporting the capacity and capability of front line advice providers; securing joined-up and targeted service delivery; exploring alternative funding streams; and maximising the impact of the substantial resources that we have invested in advice. The advice consortium will also monitor advice activity on the ground and will let the Department know about emerging trends and issues. That will be supported by reliable information and statistics. That work is crucial if we are to target scarce resources to help claimants to deal with the impacts of welfare reform. Identifying and targeting the need for advice services in that way will allow government to respond in circumstances where specific robust evidence of changing demand has been identified. In other words, we want to make sure that those who need help get help.

Our work with the advice consortium and local councils means that we will be able to act appropriately when we begin to receive robust, reliable information detailing changes in demand for services. We will support advice providers so that they, in turn, can provide important support to our communities. My Department's commitment to providing access to advice services has seen us make a substantial financial commitment, in the region of £4·5 million each year, for advice provision: general advice; benefit advice; housing advice; and advice to help people claim any benefits that they are entitled to.

Local councils also work with officials in my Department and provide an additional £1·9 million each year for front line advice services. Collectively, therefore, that brings a total investment of approximately £6·4 million each year, with that funding geared to ensuring that everyone in Northern Ireland has access to free, independent advice and that those providing the advice are trained to a high standard and are supported to enable them to carry out their role. That funding represents a substantial investment in advice services, and that should not be underestimated. For that reason, we do and will continue to monitor how the investment is spent to ensure that services are indeed reaching those in most need. That quite rightly takes the form of robust monitoring and review arrangements, and I make no apology for that. It is the right thing to do.

Beyond my own Department, many other Departments also provide funding for advice services, in keeping with their own departmental priorities. By way of example, DETI provides funding for specific debt advice, and the Department of Health provides funding to support a range of health advice services. Much of that work is complementary to the work of my Department and will help support claimants through the welfare reforms. I warmly welcome that.

As we move forward with the welfare reforms, I fully recognise the need to promote awareness and to keep individuals informed of changes. Once again, my Department is already leading the work, and plans are already at an advanced stage to ensure that appropriate arrangements for advice services are in place and that claimants are fully aware of the changes. We must use all channels open to us and consider different ways to reach communities. There is a need for the advice sector to consider the best way in which to provide good advice and easy access to it; for example, with greater use of information technology to support communication and service delivery.

In parallel with that partnership work with the advice sector, there is significant work being done in my Department to make sure that our claimants are fully aware of the changes ahead. I know of the anxiety and confusion that many in our society feel because there is uncertainty around welfare reform. I am committed to keeping individuals informed. We have a dedicated team already in place in the Social Security Agency to engage with all stakeholders but particularly claimants and their representative groups.

In early spring, I will launch an awareness campaign on welfare reform that will include the distribution of an information leaflet to all households in Northern Ireland. It will provide important information on the current arrangements, the changes arising from welfare reform, who is likely to be affected and when the changes will happen. Together with the advice consortium, officials are also working with local councils to ensure that they are aware of changes and to give assurance to front line advice providers that monitoring processes are in place to ensure that they have the necessary support to deal with welfare reform queries when they begin to impact. The advice consortium, in collaboration with the Social Security Agency, will also provide training for front line advice providers on the changes resulting from welfare reform. Also, as part of the ongoing consultation on criteria for universal credit flexible payments and the introduction of discretionary support for Northern Ireland, my officials have undertaken a comprehensive programme of engagement with the voluntary and community sector and the general public.

My Department is committed to promoting benefit uptake, and in the past year alone our benefit uptake campaign has encouraged 4,000 mainly older people to claim additional support of £13·1 million through an awareness campaign and partnership working with the voluntary and community sector. We will also continue to provide advice and information through our Social Security Agency network. We provide advice and support to claimants through services available at their nearest jobs and benefits office and through the enhanced telephone service provided under Customer First. The agency provides accurate, timely and consistent information to claimants

I know that there are concerns around welfare reform and housing. I have major concerns around the issues a reduction in housing benefit will cause, in particular the impacts of the underoccupation restriction for the social sector. I recognise that the coalition Government have brought forward these proposals and, in keeping with the principle of parity, we are compelled to do the same. I am keen to ensure that appropriate housing services are put in place, which is why I recently tasked the Housing Executive and housing association movement to bring forward an action plan that will provide a range of support measures to mitigate the welfare reform changes and support the households affected by them. I recently brought those plans to the Executive subcommittee on welfare reform and asked Ministers to comment on their content.

I consider that early awareness of the extent of the changes to benefits will help households to prepare for reforms, anticipate their situation and smooth the demand for advice and support. The Housing Executive, as the body responsible for administering housing benefit, intends to write over the next few months and inform all affected households about the financial implications of the entitlement changes. That will include tenants living in housing association accommodation. My officials have worked closely with Housing Executive colleagues in order for them to be able to prepare specific leaflets for publication on the nature of the reforms. The intention is to use other supporting tools to communicate the changes, some of which are already up and running. They will include new website pages, an information video and an online calculator.

Mr Brady: Will the Minister give way?

Mr McCausland: Yes, very quickly.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for giving way. Will he advise householders how to downsize to properties that are simply not there?

Mr McCausland: I have identified already that the issue of underoccupation causes us all concern. It is not actually what is before us today, but I acknowledge the Member's point.

A telephone contact service and housing advice service will be put in place to raise tenant awareness and to contact social tenants affected to help them consider their housing options. That will include — this perhaps goes some way towards addressing the previous point promoting and assisting tenant mobility by helping them move to more appropriately sized housing; where possible, supporting tenants to pay their rent; examining options that can be put to tenants who need to move to a smaller home, consider downsizing etc; facilitating home swaps, promoting the mutual exchange scheme or advising on other initiatives; and putting in place plans and procedures for dealing with tenants who fall into arrears as a result of the reforms. In addition, further support for the various groups of people who may be impacted may be available by way of discretionary housing payments. The Housing Executive is looking at the current rules and procedures for such payments and intends to consult on future arrangements for their payment.

There are, indeed, challenging times ahead of us all: for our communities, for government and for advice providers. In my remaining minute and a half, I will pick up on a couple of points from the debate, including something that Mark Durkan said. It is important that our engagement with the consortium is detailed, consistent and ongoing. Beyond the quarterly detailed meetings, meetings are held monthly and, indeed, weekly with people from the sector. I took the opportunity on Friday to visit a citizens advice bureau in my constituency to hear from staff about their experience. So, work is ongoing there. The benefit uptake programme is a success. The Member spoke about Chinese whispers. Therefore, it is important that we provide as much information as possible, so that problems do not arise from rumours, unfounded reports or whatever.

Michael Copeland said that I was presiding over the progress of the Welfare Reform Bill. He then seemed to seek to detach or distance himself from welfare reform. I find that rather strange. I see that Michael Copeland has left us. It rather lacks credibility because I am sure that, as a good and loyal party member, at the last election he would have been out there campaigning on the doors and on the streets, day by day for the Ulster Conservatives and Unionists – New Force (UCUNF) candidate in his constituency. I have no doubt that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is almost up.

Mr McCausland: —as a good candidate, he would have done that. I am sure that he would have. As a good, loyal member, he would not have done anything else; you could not expect it. Of course, he would always remember from those days that David Cameron and, if he had got somebody elected —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr McCausland: — he would have managed to find himself toeing the Tory line and implementing the Tory cuts.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

1.30 pm

Mrs McKevitt: I am pleased to speak on the motion, and I pay a special thank you to all who contributed. Encouraging benefit uptake is of the utmost importance, especially as we are in the process of what has been described as the biggest shake up of the welfare system. "Confusing", "complicated" and "complex" — those are the words that constituents of South Down use to describe the welfare system.

For every benefit application, a form needs to be completed, and, for our elderly in particular, that can be a daunting task. Many decide not to bother applying and take the attitude that they will probably not be any better off at the end. That attitude, in many instances, is wrong. It is up to us to ensure that individuals have access to independent advice and assistance on welfare so that people can receive all the benefits that they are entitled to. To make that possible, it is imperative that independent advice providers receive adequate funding.

I pay tribute to all independent advice providers. Citizens Advice and Advice NI are two such charities that come to mind. Both are real lifelines to many, and, since changes in the welfare system began, both have found themselves overwhelmingly inundated with calls from individuals seeking advice. The need for welfare assistance in my constituency is so great that my office now holds a welfare clinic on a Friday to give constituents an opportunity to speak to a professional welfare adviser who can assist and guide them through the maze of the benefit system.
