Ministerial Statement

Housing Executive: Maintenance Contracts

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):

With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement in relation to the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and the management of maintenance contracts.

It was just this time last year that I made a statement here in the Assembly in relation to the Housing Executive's management of response maintenance contracts. At that time, I advised of the long track record of concerns about the Housing Executive's contract management regime and how, on taking up my post, I had expressed my significant concerns about the issues surrounding its management of contracts. In fact, so great were my concerns that I asked for a forensic investigation to be carried out of a sample of Housing Executive response maintenance contracts to provide me with assurances on the contracts, the quality of services to tenants and the proper use of public funds.

The findings in the ASM report unfortunately proved that my concerns were exactly right. The findings and the evidence in the report clearly demonstrated to me that there were considerable issues and shortcomings in relation to the Housing Executive's management of response maintenance contracts. The report's key findings covered quality of workmanship; invoices submitted by contractors; completion of work on a timely basis; NIHE inspections; ability to recover overcharging; and duplicate schedule of rates codes.

Many examples in the report point to poor workmanship and poor contract management by the Housing Executive, which indicates clearly to me that tenants are not getting the services that are expected or being paid for by the taxpayer. The report covered six response maintenance contractors and followed on from the failings identified in Red Sky. The companies were Omega, PK Murphy, MDC, Carillion, Leeway Maintain and H&A Mechanical.

Again, at the time of my previous statement, I advised that the Northern Ireland Audit Office, following significant concerns raised by whistle-blowers, MLAs and the media, had also decided to examine the Housing Executive's management of response maintenance contracts in view of the seriousness of the problems identified in the management of specific contracts. That report supported the work that my Department had undertaken and pointed to the fact that the Housing Executive's own management systems were demonstrating the weakness of its management of those contracts. You will all be aware that that report was the subject of a hearing at the Public Accounts Committee on 5 September 2012. The Committee's report, which was damning, was published on 20 March 2013, and the memorandum of reply was laid in the Assembly on 24 May 2013.

Taking account of all the factors together at that time, I advised that I believed that the Housing Executive, as an organisation, had failed to demonstrate the required response to known shortfalls in contract management, either in a manner that recognised the importance and significance of these issues or which demonstrated an unequivocal determination to address these matters with the necessary pace and urgency that anyone would, rightly, expect. Therefore, in July last year, I took the unusual step of introducing special accountability measures to bring about improvements efficiently and effectively and to enhance significantly the current oversight arrangements between my Department and the Housing Executive. I also advised then that I had to assume that the types of problems evident in the management of response maintenance contracts could also be evident in the way in which the Housing Executive managed its other contracts, such as planned maintenance contracts. I can assure you now that it gives me no pleasure to advise that, once again, I was, in fact, correct in my assumptions. Indeed, what the new chairman of the Housing Executive has discovered in his first six months in regard to planned maintenance is of such a scale that the issues of response maintenance pale into insignificance by comparison.

You will be aware of the statement by the chairman of the Housing Executive this morning on the level of overpayments to planned maintenance contractors. In his statement, he said that, when he took up office in November 2012 and was briefed on the Housing Executive's management of maintenance contracts by me, he requested a comprehensive investigation by the chief executive into those matters. He also said that the board considered the findings at its May meeting. The findings are extremely disappointing, given the scrutiny that the organisation is already under for its management of response maintenance contracts, and I totally concur with this.

The figure is estimated to be some £18 million. Let me say that again in case you think that you have misheard: £18 million in overpayments to four contractors. I have been advised by the Housing Executive that the four contractors are PK Murphy, Bann, Mascott and Dixons. I am sure that you, like me, are astounded at that amount and wonder at the level of incompetence in the Housing Executive that led to that state of affairs. The scale of what has been uncovered has been a scandal. Let us not forget that this is taxpayers' money that could have been used to build around 200 much-needed social homes.

How did this happen? I can still recall the assurances that the former chairman, Brian Rowntree, gave me last year in relation to contract monitoring arrangements and the assurances he gave me that, during his tenure, significant progress had been achieved in dealing with the contract issues. Those emphatic assurances from Mr Rowntree — verbal and written — were useless; they were not worth the paper they were written on.

When I said last year that the Housing Executive as an organisation had failed to date to demonstrate the required response to known shortfalls in contract management, I also advised that I had major concerns about the culture in the organisation and the level of aspiration in the Housing Executive to deliver a quality service to tenants regardless of cost and contracts. For me, that is clearly still the position in that organisation.

How was this allowed to happen in the first place and then continue? Why has the appropriate action not been taken to identify the issues and weaknesses and to address them, to effect the change required? Are the problems evident in any further areas of contract management; for example, heating or grounds maintenance?

The recent PAC report on 20 March points to one reason when it recorded that the Committee was shocked at the attempts by the Housing Executive management to suppress internal audit reports. Indeed, the PAC even found evidence that the Housing Executive management exerted pressure to have audit opinions watered down. It referred to a culture of stifling any form of criticism and called it "institutional resistance": I have to agree with that phrase. The PAC advised that a key attribute of a mature and open organisation is that, where mistakes are made, they are recognised and improvements are made as a result. That did not happen in the Housing Executive.

So what am I going to do about it? As I said, I introduced my special measures last year, which include a monthly accountability meeting between my permanent secretary and the Housing Executive's chief executive where the position on these and other key issues is reported. The Housing Executive has advised in its regular reports that a number of special measures actions have been completed. My permanent secretary therefore has already instigated a further governance review by my Department's head of internal audit to assess the outcome of the implementation of the recommendations of the Housing Executive governance review in 2010, the special accountability measures and the ASM recommendations. It will also look at the lessons learned by the Housing Executive in respect of the management of response maintenance and the extent to which they have been applied to the management of planned maintenance contracts. A report is expected from the team later in the summer.

Terms of reference have also been developed for the work by DFP's performance and efficiency delivery unit (PEDU), which will support the internal audit team. The focus of PEDU's work will be on the contract management processes. I have recently sent the terms of reference for this work to Minister Wilson to agree. My officials have also been reviewing the oversight arrangements in place, including the update of the management statement and financial memorandum between my Department and the Housing Executive. My permanent secretary has also just written to the chairman to advise him of additional actions to be put in place by my officials.

More importantly in tackling these issues, I have appointed a new chairman, Donald Hoodless, who has taken on an incredibly difficult job but is determined to put in place clear governance and assurance systems and to tackle the issues and make the organisational changes that are required to bring this organisation into line and to ensure that appropriate services are delivered to tenants along with value for public money. That is what my priority has always been. Since his appointment, I have been meeting the new chairman monthly, along with the new vice-chair, to discuss key issues of concern. He has already demonstrated to me, both in words and actions, that he has the required leadership for the Housing Executive board that has been lacking in the past, and I am fully supportive of the actions he has taken to date.

I also have to factor in the implementation of the fundamental review of the Housing Executive — the social housing reform programme — which will result in a new social landlord body or bodies with a similar function to the housing associations. The outcome will be that such bodies will be subject to the same inspection regime as the existing housing associations. As part of its preparations for the review, the Housing Executive board has decided to begin the process of reorganising the Housing Executive into two key entities: the landlord function and the regional strategic function.

Concerns that my officials and I have about contract management arrangements in the Housing Executive are well documented and have been evidenced by a substantial enhancement of the accountability arrangements between the two bodies. In view of the continuing accountability issues, my permanent secretary and I consider that the time is ripe to rethink the whole process of obtaining assurance on contract management and other landlord functions. I therefore believe that it may now be appropriate to introduce an inspection regime to the landlord function of the Housing Executive, and I have instructed my officials to proceed with the necessary arrangements. There are two main advantages with such a proposal: namely that an inspection regime similar to that currently in existence for the housing associations will greatly improve the level of assurance that my accounting officer will receive on the landlord function and that the Housing Executive will have the benefit of experiencing and acclimatising to an inspection regime that it will be subject to post the review.

The position that the Housing Executive finds itself in now in relation to its management of contracts is totally indefensible and will not be tolerated any further. Change must happen and happen quickly and correctly. Whilst we need to look to the future, we must also identify the weaknesses and the mistakes of the past in order to learn, to change and to make sure we do not find the organisation in this position ever again. I do not underestimate the size of the task ahead, both in my Department's oversight of the Housing Executive and the work that is required from the board of the Housing Executive, but there will be no shortcuts to making sure that there are significant changes in the Housing Executive.

What has happened in the past must not happen in the future. As yet, it is not clear whether what has taken place in the past is a result of incredible incompetence or wilful corruption. Time will tell. I will support the chairman in the work ahead, but this is a major challenge to the board to show the required leadership, drive and determination to deal with these issues and begin to effect change now.

Mr Brady (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development):

Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. Anyone who hears those figures — £18 million of overpayments to four contractors — will be astounded. Frankly, it beggars belief. Without being prejudicial, this is either incompetence on a scale never seen before or something more serious with potential legal implications. As the Minister said, this is public money that could have been directed towards the building of social housing to address our long waiting lists rather than lining the pockets of others.

I am pleased to note that the Minister is taking further action to address governance issues, including those relating specifically to contract management. However, in the wider context of social housing reform, we must all maintain a cool head. I am sure that the Committee will wish to engage with the Department and the Housing Executive on the decision to begin the process of reorganisation of the Housing Executive into the landlord function and the regional strategic function. We should not conflate the future reform of the Housing Executive and the current problems with overpayments to contractors. Change in contract management —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Bring your remarks to a close. You need to come to a question.

Mr Brady: Change in relation to the reform of social housing must be given detailed consideration before decisions are taken. Therefore, I urge the Minister to consider that as we move forward together with social housing reform.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Did the Member have a question? Did I rush him past one? We were waiting for a question.

Mr Brady: No.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his quite shocking statement today. Minister, do you have confidence in the current senior management team in the Housing Executive?

Mr McCausland: When we look at the scale of what has been disclosed today and the fact that the situation prevailed over a number of years, it is clear that the senior management team has questions to answer. We need to remember that the senior management team is initially answerable directly to the chair and the board. I am sure that they will put those questions to the senior management team.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. It certainly made for shocking listening and reading. The Minister said:

"As yet, it is not clear whether what has taken place ... is a result of incredible incompetence or wilful corruption."

Does the Minister believe that, potentially, corruption is at play? If so, is he confident that he can identify it and eradicate it?

Mr McCausland: In a situation in which there were overpayments of £18 million, it is clear that there are only two possible options. They are the two options that I identified quite a long time ago in this very Chamber: either people were not doing their job properly in checking and managing — the management of contracts should be a priority in the Housing Executive — and work was being done incompetently or people were simply not bothering to do their job, or, on the other hand, there was something more sinister than that. Those are the only two options. There is an old saying that somebody is either a fool or a knave; either they do something because of stupidity and incompetence, or there is something untoward behind it. Time will tell; we just do not know at present. However, I assure the Member and the House that I am determined to get to the bottom of this. I very much sense the same desire on the part of those now in charge in the Housing Executive: the chair, the vice-chair and the board also want to get to the bottom of this. This situation should not be tolerated; it is totally unacceptable. That is why I used the word "scandal". It is a scandal.

Mr Swann: Does the Minister agree that the culture and structure of Egan contracts allowed these abuses and malpractices to happen? Is it time to completely remove Egan contracts from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive?

Mr McCausland: I thought that the Member would have been aware that we have moved forward with new contracts. However, I do not think that we can simply put it down to the contracts or whatever. There was clearly something of a culture endemic in the organisation. This was systemic in the Housing Executive. In due course, Members will come to their own conclusions, and, in due course, the evidence of the exact nature of what that was will appear. However, there was something very badly wrong in that organisation. I think that it was clearly wrong at a number of levels, because of the extent of it; it was not restricted to one small part of the organisation. We are talking about £18 million of overpayments, so it was very widespread. As I indicated, a number of contractors were involved in receiving overpayments. If there are only four contractors and £18 million, you are talking about very large amounts per contractor.

Mr Campbell: When a Minister comes to the Assembly and makes a statement of this magnitude, it obviously indicates that something is significantly and seriously wrong. The Minister alluded to heating or grounds maintenance: will he indicate whether serious investigations have taken place to see whether there are further causes for concern in those contracts?

Mr McCausland: Work is moving forward on other fronts. We started off with response maintenance and moved on to planned maintenance. Now, other areas need to be explored.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement to the House, although a lot of it does not make good reading. Part of my question is about what has been done to claw back the money that has been paid out.

There has been a serious problem, not only in the maintenance end of the Housing Executive. Minister, your predecessors and you, during the Red Sky scandal, said that there were serious problems. Will the Minister tell us why he did not act back then when he knew through Red Sky that there were serious problems to implement the sort of measures that he is now —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member knows that he has one question.

Mr McCausland: I did act, and I came in for criticism from some people because I acted.

At the time, I asked, "If there is an issue with a contractor and we are taking contracts away from that contractor and giving them to adjacent contractors" — as we did — "have we an assurance that those adjacent contractors are not in any way responsible for or guilty of the same sort of things that were happening with Red Sky?". That was the ASM report. As I said, that report revealed that there were problems not just with one company but with a range of companies. It investigated the adjacent companies to which the Red Sky contracts were then given. It was right that we looked at that to see what was going on and whether we were simply taking a contract from one company and giving it to another that was doing a similar thing. Why would you do that?

I remind the Member that, as I pointed out in the statement, at that point, I sought an assurance from the then chairman of the Housing Executive, Brian Rowntree, that the companies to which the contracts were awarded after they had gone from Red Sky had no questions over them. He gave me assurances verbally and in writing.

As I said, the assurances were not worth the paper that they were written on.

12.30 pm

Ms Brown: I thank the Minister for his statement. Does he support and, indeed, encourage the practice of whistle-blowing in his Department, particularly given the serious nature of his statement?

Mr McCausland: Yes. When people are aware of things that are being taken forward in an improper manner, or that there is impropriety in an organisation, it is right and proper to highlight them. That is a good thing, which I certainly stand over.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for his statement, which is alarming and many years overdue. Does the Minister agree that there is legacy of the paramilitary campaigns being used as a factor in determining excess pricing in contracts here? Does he further accept that it is dangerous to have a select tendering process —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members know that they have to restrict themselves to one question.

Mr Byrne: — that cuts out many contractors. Good professional firms believe that something untoward is happening —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister.

Mr McCausland: The issue about Housing Executive contracts is not new:

"Housing Executive Board Shaken By Contracts Report ... Report recommended that the system of contracts should be changed".

That was a headline in 'The Belfast Telegraph' on 2 May 1978. More than 30 years ago, there were issues about Housing Executive contracts; it is not new.

We have clearly identified that the scale and scope of this is £18 million. Bear in mind that that £18 million is not spread evenly. I understand that, in the case of one of the contractors, the highest amount overpaid was in the region of £8.9 million. That is the scale of it. Whatever arguments, analysis, scrutiny or views people may hold, the first thing is to get to grips with the scale of this. We will now take forward the work, and I have every confidence in the chairman and vice-chair of the Housing Executive. Their arrival has transformed the relationship with the Department to a position where there is openness and transparency. We will be able to move forward and to tackle these issues. However, there is certainly something badly wrong within the Housing Executive and in the whole management of maintenance contracts.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to ask one question only, in fairness to other Members who wish to ask a question.

Mr Copeland: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, for that timely reminder. Minister, I, too, thank you for bringing the statement to the House. It must have been quite difficult, given the scale of what is involved. For the purposes of the statement, what constitutes an overpayment?

Mr McCausland: I would have thought, with respect, that the word is fairly self-explanatory. An overpayment is a payment over and beyond the correct payment for a particular job. The nature of the contracts being what they are, there will be different forms of overpayment, which takes us into the fine detail of how all this arose. That is the sort of thing that will now have to be teased out by the Housing Executive and, indeed, by an independent review.

We are taking forward an independent review of this and it will be looked at in some detail. The ASM report, for example, looked into overpayments in regard to response maintenance. A look at the nature of the problems showed that it took various forms. It might have been somebody charging for something that they had not done; somebody tending to charge too much for something that they had done; or somebody charging for something that they said they had done but had not. Overpayments can arise in a range of ways.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for his statement. The overpayments that he mentioned are, quite frankly, on a startling scale. Will he confirm that the company that replaced Red Sky is one of the worst offenders, to the extent that it dwarfs any concerns involving Red Sky?

Mr McCausland: The Member will be aware, as indeed other Members will be aware, of the company from which the contracts were taken by the Housing Executive and given to after they were taken from Red Sky. Yes, that company is one of the companies that featured quite significantly in my statement this morning.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for his statement. I think that we are all shocked by the scale of this blatant disregard for public money. With regard to the overpayment of £18 million to the four contractors, will the Minister detail what steps have been taken to start the process of clawing the money back and whether he actually believes that we can get that money back?

Mr McCausland: I understand that the Housing Executive has commenced appropriate action, including legal action, to recover overpayments. That work is ongoing and will, I am sure, be ongoing for some time. It is a substantial amount of money that needs to be recovered.

Lord Morrow: I, too, thank the Minister for his statement today, which makes for horrific listening and reading. In relation to the timescale around all of this, a credibility gap has opened up here. It is important that the matter is brought to a close as swiftly as is possible but as accurately as is possible. Has the Minister any indication as to what timescale will be placed on this? Hopefully, it will not take another £18 million to ascertain what did go wrong.

Mr McCausland: It is a complex process legally to get to the bottom of these things and seek to have money recovered. I think that I would be unwise to put a timescale on it. What I will say is that I believe that there is a commitment by the chair of the Housing Executive to lead the work, as quickly as possible, on what needs to be done within the executive. There will also be an independent review to get to the bottom of the full detail. However, these are complex things.

Look at the ASM report. It was initiated soon after I came into the Department, and we are two years on. The processes here are slow; you have to check through so many documents, inspect pieces of work and so on. It is a slow process. However, I assure the Member that I do not want to see this running on beyond the time that is required. We need to get it done thoroughly, so that whatever can be recovered for the public purse is recovered.

Mr McCarthy: In view of the horrendous statement this morning, the Minister said in response to another Member that there have been problems with the contracts for running over 30 years. In God's name, somebody somewhere should have seen what was happening and not allowed it to reach the point where 18 million quid of public money has gone astray. Will the Minister tell us whether there is any possibility that somebody will be made accountable for this error and that criminal proceedings will be initiated so that at least some of the money will be recouped on behalf of the taxpayer?

Mr McCausland: The Member poses a question about the duration of impropriety. Certainly it is the case, as was indicated in that headline, that back in 1978 there were questions about Housing Executive contracts. They may have been different questions, but nevertheless questions were being asked even then. If this was the private sector, and somebody announced at the annual meeting of a company that £18 million had been overpaid, I think that heads would roll and people would be out the door very quickly. Things do not always happen in exactly the same way in the public sector and the private sector. However, we do need to get to the bottom of responsibility here. It is about not just what happened but how it happened. People have to take responsibility for their actions — or inactions, as the case may be.

Mr Newton: I, too, thank the Minister for his statement this morning, concerning as it is. Does he agree that those elected representatives who made representation on behalf of east Belfast company Red Sky, and who were pilloried in the press for doing so, have now been completely vindicated?

Mr McCausland: On the basis of the report, there is really no doubt that the issues with Housing Executive contracts were not unique to Red Sky. Indeed, it is clear that a significant number of contractors were engaged in the same or similar practices. At the time that the Red Sky contracts were terminated, it was argued by some people that Red Sky was singled out, and the motivation behind that decision was questioned. The Department received representations at the time from a number of political parties from east Belfast, as the Member will know, including the DUP, the Ulster Unionist Party and the Alliance Party. All of the parties in east Belfast spoke out at that time on the matter. The first point that I made — that the other contractors that were around were engaged in similar practices — has certainly been vindicated by the report.

Mr Beggs: If a householder was getting a workman to carry out a repair job, they would inspect the work, satisfy themselves that the work had been completed and then pay. Why can a multi-million pound organisation not follow those basic principles? Will the Minister indicate what level he feels that the failings have been at? Is it at the level of just the basic clerk, or is it at a much higher level in the organisation?

Mr McCausland: That is a question that would be good to put to those who were in charge of the Housing Executive during the lengthy period when that situation prevailed, including previous senior management in the organisation and previous chairs. There were other folk around when those things were happening who have questions to answer. Does it happen simply at a low level in the organisation or at a high level? I suspect, from what I have seen of it so far, that there was something in the culture of the organisation itself that meant that there was a very cavalier and casual approach to a lot of those things. When you are talking about £18 million you can certainly use words like “casual” and “cavalier” about the approach. There was not the proper management or the proper internal controls. The people at the top of the organisation — previous chief executives and so on — should have been on top of that sort of thing, but they clearly were not.

There is a lot of work still to be done to get to the bottom of it all, but it was important that, following the statement from the new chair of the Housing Executive, we brought it to the Floor of the Assembly this morning and gave Members an opportunity to comment, ask questions and seek clarification on it. There is certainly a lot of investigation still to be done.

Mr Allister: If there has been wrongful siphoning off of £18 million of public money, has the Minister called in the police? Can he answer Mr McCarthy's question about how long it has been accumulating? If it is endemic in the Housing Executive, why did the director of corporate services recently get a huge handout upon his redundancy?

Mr McCausland: First of all, the £18 million was over just a short few years; it is not going back over a lengthy period. Secondly, I do not intend to comment this morning on the role of any particular individual in the organisation. Certainly, as yet, the Housing Executive has not called in the police. The investigations are ongoing. [Interruption.] The Member may just care to listen.

The issue is now with the Housing Executive. It was brought to my attention in the past few days. The Housing Executive will look at it, as will the Department, and decisions on the right way forward and the recovery of moneys will be a top priority.

What will come from that in due course? Time will tell, but we need to find out first exactly how things were. I will want further briefings from the Housing Executive about the ways in which this particular immense sum of money arose. It goes back a number of years, well beyond the time when I went into the Department. As soon as I went into the Department, I started the process of investigations because I knew that things were wrong. I am determined that we will get to the bottom of it.

An independent review of the matter is being carried out to get to a further level of information but, as with previous examples of inappropriate behaviour in public sector organisations, there seems to be a general acceptance that you do the internal work first to gather evidence and then you look at whether criminal issues arise or whether the police should be brought in. A lot of information has still to be gone through in the Housing Executive.

Mr Agnew: I welcome the fact that this problem has been identified and that efforts are going to be made, where possible, to recoup some of the money. However, it seems to fit the Minister's agenda to paint the Housing Executive as bad and housing associations as good. If we look at the performance of housing associations and their response times in maintenance contracts, we see that the percentage of targets met is as low as 75%.

Given that the proposal is to, effectively, hand this issue over to housing associations, why are they not under equal scrutiny and why has their performance not been investigated to the same degree?

Mr McCausland: I welcome the Member's agreement that getting this information out as quickly as possible was the right thing to do. The fact that the information has gone out this morning in the way that it has done clearly vindicates the strong stand that I have taken with the Housing Executive over the past two years. We have been interventionist in a way that has not been the case previously. That is right and proper, and there are 18 million reasons why it was the right thing to do.

The Member talked about painting the Housing Executive as bad. You do not need to paint the Housing Executive as bad in this instance because it did that by itself. Housing associations are, obviously, much smaller organisations; they are scrutinised and are subject to a high level of oversight, I would contend. However, it is wrong to conclude that, as the Member seems to be doing, housing associations as we know them now in Northern Ireland will somehow or other take on the landlord role under some future restructuring. That has not ever been said to be the case.

We need to view housing in a holistic way. We need to look at social housing but also at the regulation of the private rented sector and of housing associations. All those elements need to be taken forward together. That is why we introduced a housing strategy last year so that we can have a more holistic approach to housing. All those elements have a role to play.

I want to emphasise the point that the Member made at the start. The content of this morning's statement vindicates everything that I have said and done regarding the Housing Executive's shortcomings over the past two years.

Executive Committee Business

Main Estimates 2013-14

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to four hours for the debate. The Minister will have up to 60 minutes to allocate, as he wishes, between proposing and making a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have 10 minutes. I remind Members that the vote on this motion requires cross-community support.

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £8,271,268,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £8,558,118,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1.3 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Estimates 2013-14 that was laid before the Assembly on 29 May 2013.

Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Since this is the first time I have been in the Assembly while you have been in the Chair, I congratulate you on your post. I hope that you will look kindly on me if, by some mistake, I overstep the mark.

The debate covers the Supply resolution before the House. The resolution seeks the Assembly's approval for the 2013-14 spending plans of Departments and other public bodies, as set out in the Main Estimates. The Main Estimates were laid in the Assembly on Wednesday 29 May 2013.

The resolution before the House relates to the supply of cash and resources for the remainder of the current year, 2013-14, as detailed in the Main Estimates. The Vote on Account, which was passed by the Assembly in March, provided initial allocations for 2013-14 to ensure the continuation of services until the Main Estimates could be presented to the Assembly for approval.

This resolution and the Budget Bill, which I will introduce later today, request the balance to complete the total 2013-14 cash and resource requirements of Departments and other public bodies. The balance to complete amounts to over £8 billion of cash and over £8.5 billion of resources. Those requirements have their origins in the third year of the Executive's Budget 2011-15, which was approved by the previous Assembly on 9 March 2011, as well as in the demand-led annually managed expenditure (AME).

On behalf of the Executive, I request and recommend the levels of supply set out in this resolution under section 63 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Accelerated passage is required for the legislation, and there is provision for this specific instance in the Assembly's Standing Orders. The Committee has agreed to grant accelerated passage, and I want to place on record my appreciation of the Committee's work in agreeing this important step in the process.

I expect that, during today's debate on this important resolution, we will hear many voices using the debate to raise important and relevant issues. I also suspect that there will be some who will, shall we say, provide tenuous links to the Supply resolution in order to raise their own pet issues that may not be so relevant. I can already see that there are a number of Members lining up to do just that. So, be warned, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Although I do not doubt their sincerity, I urge Members not to stray too far from the specifics of the Supply resolution before us. I make that plea on all these occasions, and it always falls on deaf ears, hence my reliance on you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, to keep the Members in line and not let them stray too far off the path.

Taking my own advice, I will move on to the subject of today's debate. The 2013-14 financial year, like previous years, will present significant challenges for the Assembly in the provision of public services. When the 2010 UK spending review outcome for 2013-14 was set, in real terms it provided resource departmental expenditure limits (DEL) that were 6.1% lower than the 2010-11 baseline and capital DEL that was over 40% less than the 2010-11 baseline. However, since then, two material changes have occurred. First, subsequent UK Budgets and autumn statements have increased our 2013-14 resource DEL by £145 million and our capital DEL by £151 million. Secondly, it must be remembered that a number of difficult decisions on curtailing public expenditure have already been taken in 2011-12 and 2012-13, meaning that we are more prepared for the level of public expenditure available and have laid the groundwork for some of the required savings.

Since the Assembly agreed the 2011-15 Budget in March 2011, a number of other external issues have changed the 2013-14 financial landscape. Probably the most important in determining the scale of the Northern Ireland block is the UK Government's change in spending emphasis in that they have switched the resourcing emphasis from current to capital spending. In light of these issues, the Executive undertook a review of the 2013-14 and 2014-15 years in November 2012. The outcome of that is reflected in the Estimates before the House today.

The changes that I outlined have been agreed by the Executive and are reflected in the Estimates before us, ensuring that the necessary resources are in place as early as possible to allow good planning and delivery of essential public services. It would be easy to stop there and focus solely on delivering public services. However, we, as an Assembly, must continue to support our economy and encourage our private sector as it continues to face financial difficulty. We must utilise the resources in this Bill in the most effective way possible to ensure that we can provide a sound footing for our businesses, our society and our people. Today's news about better prospects for the private sector is an indication that the emphasis that we have placed on it is beginning to bear fruit.

Those are some of the difficulties that we face in 2013-14, but we also have much opportunity. Invest Northern Ireland continues to encourage our fledgling businesses and to support our established ones. The number of job announcements over the past number of weeks is an indication of the success that has been achieved.

In tourism, this year again provides many opportunities for us to promote Northern Ireland as a major tourist venue. The World Police and Fire Games, which are being held here, will provide a platform to promote our tourist industry. The UK City of Culture celebrations continue in Londonderry. There will also be a further increase in cruise ship business in 2013, with 58 ships and 114,000 passengers due to visit Belfast; that will mark a growth of around 30% over two years.

For those among our ranks who have an interest in cycling — I notice that the Member for South Belfast is not in his place, but he is a keen cyclist — the start of the Giro d'Italia cycle race will begin here in 2014. I do not know whether the First Minister also intends to join that; he certainly has the kit if not the ability. That event will bring a significant amount of tourism. I can assure Members that I will not be participating. I prefer bikes that exercise the wrists rather than the leg muscles. Who could forget, also, that the eyes of the world will be on us next week when the G8 summit provides an opportunity to showcase our country?

I turn to our public expenditure environment. Over the coming months, there will be a number of critical public expenditure issues to be addressed with Treasury Ministers that will have a strategic impact on Northern Ireland. In a few weeks' time, the Chancellor will announce the outcome of the 2015-16 spending round, including the level of funding for Northern Ireland. In addition, there is the ongoing issue of implementing the UK Government's welfare reform agenda in Northern Ireland. Ministers continue to work through that very complex area. As I have mentioned in the House previously, we can expect HM Treasury to exert greater control and scrutiny on the drawdown of annually managed expenditure.

It is easy to interpret some of the constraints that we face as a reflection of an economy in difficulty.

However, I am certain that we face 2013-14 in a better position than we might have envisaged after the 2010 spending review. There are some tentative signs that the Northern Ireland economy is beginning to stabilise; for example, there was an increase in employee jobs during 2012, and the number of unemployment benefit claimants is unchanged from December last year. Our latest output figures are also encouraging, with growth across services, production and construction in the final quarter of 2012. The latest Bank of England forecasts paint a relatively optimistic and positive scenario for the UK economy as a whole, and, as I have outlined, our regional economy also appears to be returning to growth with the public services budget having some degree of certainty towards 2015-16. Despite those positive signs, there are clearly a number of challenges still facing the local economy, particularly on bank lending procedures, which the Assembly will continue to help address.

1.00 pm

It is now up to all of us to support our economy, equip our workforce and direct our public services to maximising the position that we find ourselves in, and I believe that the Estimates before you today will facilitate that process. Mr Deputy Speaker, I look forward to the debate on the expenditure plans in the Main Estimates and on related issues, and I look forward with some interest to see how you will deal with Members who stray from that path in their zeal to represent their constituents and pursue particular interests.

Mr Allister: What is he scared of?

Mr Wilson: I am not afraid at all, but I want to get home tonight. We have the sun, and we really do not want to miss out on that if we can avoid it. I certainly do not want to be here until midnight, and I am sure that Members do not want to be here until midnight either. I request the support of Members for the resolution to approve further Supply for the 2013-14 financial year to enable vital public services to continue beyond the current provision in the Vote on Account.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I exhort Members to follow the Minister's very good example.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I am sure that the Minister will be glad to hear that I will not raise any pet projects. However, he raised the issue of the Giro d'Italia, and that should be of benefit to north Antrim. If the Minister can do anything to lead those cyclists up into north Antrim, perhaps along a newly extended A26 to the Drones Road, all the better.

Senior DFP officials briefed the Committee on the Main Estimates for 2013-14 and the associated Budget (No. 2) Bill, which gives legislative approval to the Estimates and is to be introduced in the Assembly following this debate. Advanced copies of the Main Estimates and the Budget Bill were made available to Committee members prior to the briefing. DFP officials also provided a paper to the Committee that, amongst other things, reconciled the figures in the Main Estimates for 2013-14 with the original allocations for 2013-14, which were contained in the four-year Budget 2011-15 that was agreed by the Assembly before the end of the last mandate.

The Committee's scrutiny of the Main Estimates focused on establishing the background and the reasons for the changes in the allocations for each Department. The moneys involved were significant, including a total of almost £100 million in resource allocations and £313 million in capital allocations. There was a total of £57 million in resource reductions and £346 million in capital reductions, while there was £154 million in resource transfers and £6 million in capital transfers with Whitehall Departments. There was also a range of resource and capital technical adjustments.

In addition to explaining the make-up of those changes during oral evidence, DFP officials provided a detailed breakdown for each Department in writing to the Committee. While the scrutiny was, by necessity, detailed and painstaking — I do not intend to rehearse that today — perhaps it will help to inform today's debate if I highlight a few of the more significant changes affecting some Departments since the 2011-15 Budget.

The largest of the resource allocations applied to the Department for Employment and Learning and the Department of Education. The former received £58.3 million, which splits into £29 million for student fees and £29.3 million for training and employment initiatives under the economy and jobs initiative. For DE, the figure is £25 million, which includes an Executive allocation of £15 million and £10 million for schools estate maintenance as part of allocations under the economy and jobs initiative. On resource reductions, the DETI figure amounted to £13.8 million, mostly comprising an Executive reduction following their assessment of how Departments were performing in relation to their original budgets. DRD reductions amounted to £12.5 million, which was also comprised mainly of an Executive reduction.

The most notable of the amounts in capital allocations was £240.9 million for DRD, which included the reprofiling of £195 million in A5 capital and £44 million in capital acceleration. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety received £37.3 million from the reprofile of that A5 capital. DFP officials explained that the Health Department was awarded an additional amount for the Ulster, Omagh and Altnagelvin hospitals. On capital reductions, the most notable amount was £336 million for DRD, which included amounts relating to the removal of initial A5 and A8 moneys and an Executive reduction. During their oral evidence, DFP officials also explained that the £123 million transfer for DSD related to the movement of housing benefit and the social fund from annually managed expenditure to departmental expenditure limit budgets, which do not represent additional amounts.

Finally, on the changes since the 2011-15 Budget, it is also worth noting that there were a range of technical items, including a DSD figure of £16.7 million capital that relates to asset management unit receipts, and a transfer of resource from DARD to DFP in respect of shared services.

On behalf of the Finance Committee, I thank the departmental officials for taking us through the reconciliation of the Main Estimates before us with the original Budget for 2013-14. The Department has recognised that prior-year out-turn information is beneficial to the Committee in considering the overall financial performance of Departments. Accordingly, DFP provides the Committee with the monthly financial performance of each Department, including the forecast out-turn position at the end of each financial year. That data provides a useful tool for scrutiny, and so the Finance Committee shares this with the other Statutory Committees, which, in turn, can receive Department-specific briefings from the financial scrutiny unit in the Assembly Research and Information Service. This represents an important step forward in the transparency and scrutiny of public finances, and I encourage all Statutory Committees to set aside time to regularly monitor departmental performance in this regard going forward. I also ask that DFP endeavour to provide the forecast out-turn position for the year end to the Finance Committee slightly earlier than on this occasion, when the figures were received the day before it was due to consider the Main Estimates and the Budget (No. 2) Bill.

Following the DFP briefing on 29 May, the Finance Committee agreed to grant accelerated passage to the Budget (No. 2) Bill for 2013 on the basis that it is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the expenditure proposals in the Bill. I have advised the Speaker accordingly.

Finally, on improving the Budget and financial processes, the Committee wrote to the Department recently to seek an update on the review of the financial process. From the Department's response, I deduce that the long-standing bone of contention between the Department of Education and the Department of Finance and Personnel remains concerning the review recommendation that the spending areas in departmental expenditure plans be restructured. The conflicting views on that have been well aired in the Chamber, and I certainly do not wish to rake over the ashes of that one. However, given that the Committee and the wider Assembly were generally supportive of most of the review recommendations, I trust that that disagreement will not prevent at least some of the positive recommendations from being progressed in the meantime.

In that regard, the Finance Committee previously agreed that it would take forward the complementary and interrelated exercise of developing a memorandum of understanding (MOU) on the Budget process. I am pleased that officials from the Assembly and DFP are currently collaborating to develop a draft document for consideration by the Committee and, ultimately, by the Assembly and the Executive. We are agreed that the MOU should help to address some of the difficulties encountered in previous Budget processes by setting out the principles for guiding the relationship between, on the one hand, the Assembly and its Committees and, on the other, the Executive Ministers and their Departments. Those might include, for example, mutual recognition of the value of the respective roles of the Assembly and the Executive in the Budget process; the requirements for proper consultation with Committees; the need for proportionality in the demands of Assembly Committees on Departments; and the need to maintain constructive and effective working relationships. It could also set out how the guiding principles would be applied and how breaches of the agreement would be addressed. As envisaged by both the Finance Committee and the Department, that type of high-level agreement would be underpinned by new Assembly Standing Orders.

The Finance Committee has previously recognised that the successful implementation of the memorandum of understanding would help achieve some of the recommendations from the review of the financial process, particularly in streamlining the end stages of the Budget process, in which we are presently engaged. Moreover, by enabling stronger oversight of departmental budgets and expenditure by Assembly Statutory Committees, the MOU will help to ensure the Executive's strategic priorities are developed effectively and efficiently and will also —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr McKay: — allow problems to be identified early enough for corrective action to be taken. On behalf of the Finance Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Girvan: I support the Supply resolution motion before the House. I appreciate that we had our Vote on Account issue dealt with previously, which allowed us to go ahead with 45% of our spend and to move ahead with 55% still to spend in this current financial year.

I just want to set the scene for the process. I appreciate that the review of the financial process is ongoing and has been for some time. I, for one, feel that there has been an element of foot dragging in that matter. I appreciate that one Department in particular — the Department of Education — seems to have an area in which it just wants to keep everything under a single blanket heading: delivery. I have some concern about that.

I will take the guidance of the Minister, and I appreciate that we have to stick to the debate for today. We have shown real delivery to the benefit of the community and the business community at large in relation to the rate relief scheme that was piloted by the Assembly. We started with a rate ceiling of £5,000 in 2011-12 and increased that to £10,000 in 2012-13. In this year, 2013-14, we are now up to £15,000, which equates to roughly 50% of businesses that can take advantage of the 20% reduction. That is intended to encourage those businesses through a difficult and awkward time.

Other points that have been brought forward include the prompt payment scheme, which offers some direct help to those who struggle to get payments through — contractors and particularly subcontractors — albeit that some work needs to be done to ensure that the subcontractors get the benefit passed down to them correctly. Some subcontractors that are bought in at a very late stage and are not necessarily on the list could fall through the rails and not benefit.

1.15 pm

We must also consider that we started from a very difficult position. We have a £4 billion cut over the Budget period from our block grant under the Barnett formula. We had a cut of £4 billion in what we will receive up to 2015. Therefore, we have been trying to manage that effectively. Some of that was being dealt with by the savings delivery plans that were put forward by Departments. Some Departments seem to have one view of what a savings delivery plan is and others seem to have a different idea. Therefore, there needs to be some clarity. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety decided to close some wards in a hospital and said that that was a savings delivery plan as opposed to a cut. In one person's view, it is a cut; in another person's view, it might well be a savings delivery plan. We need to get savings, but we must be sure that we are not cutting services. The Finance Committee has been looking into that matter, and it needs to be sure that that is what it is getting.

I appreciate that the October monitoring round is probably the most important, and it is vital that, when Departments identify that their spend may not be met, they release that money back so that it can be allocated as early in the process as possible. Let us be honest: when it comes in January, there is a very small window of opportunity to spend it.

We have major concerns about some of the arm's-length bodies. The Social Development Minister made an announcement to the House this morning about an £18 million overspend in his Department. That indicates that we are not necessarily getting true accountability with regard to the money that we hand out to arm's-length bodies to be managed through Departments. Assurances need to be given that the process of managing and governing arm's-length bodies will be looked into and that a proper spending plan will be put forward.

Two figures are mentioned in the motion: £8.2 billion of cash and £8.5 of resource. We need to be sure that we get value for money for all the spend. In all cases, we are making improvements, and it is vital that we see improvements. By no stretch is that down to the Minister of Finance and Personnel: I have to sing his praises, as you would expect. However, the war is not over, and we still have to fight to ensure that we get the help required for the other tool in the box — corporation tax. Devolved corporation tax powers are another tool that we can and should try to deliver to maximise what Northern Ireland can achieve both in the private sector and with regard to helping fund and deliver the public sector.

We have had many reports on how the Rate Collection Agency is performing. Rate collection is the only tax-gathering power that we have in Northern Ireland at present. It is vital that we get the return and that the money is lifted early and efficiently, and that is happening.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leat as an deis cainte ar an díospóireacht thábhachtach seo ar an Rún Soláthair agus ar na Príomh-Mheastacháin. Thank you very much, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to contribute to the debate.

The Member who spoke previously mentioned that the budgetary settlement under which we are working was one of the most difficult ever, with losses of £4 billion and a further £300 million through end-year flexibility. Even with that, last year, some Departments had extremely high figures of easements, amounting to around £150 million on the revenue side alone. The Minister was surprised by that, as were Assembly Members. On the back of that, the Minister introduced a review of departmental spending to try to ascertain whether there was a need for reallocations in the final years of the Budget, and I know that that work has been completed. It would be interesting to know whether the Minister is satisfied with the outcome of that review and whether he feels that further reallocations are necessary.

The Minister warned us at the beginning not to bring up pet subjects, but I am afraid that I will have to err on that issue and refer to one that I have referred to in several debates. Although it might be a pet subject, it is still relevant to this debate, so I would be eager to hear from the Minister where we are after two years and what his forecast is with regard to the remainder of the budgetary period for capital receipts. Is the Budget still on target for capital receipts, given that we are now into the third year? Where have the major new receipts or revenue streams over and above the usual sources, such as rates etc, come from?

I have a few other points that I would like to raise. The A5 slippage was mentioned and how some of that money has been reallocated. Are there still moneys from the A5 project that are open to departmental bids?

Moving on to the stadium project, I note that Crusaders Football Club has won the right to legally challenge the Government's allocation of £25 million to the redevelopment project at Windsor Park. The judge, Mr Treacy, ruled that Crusaders had established an arguable case and that there was a possibility that the redevelopment of Windsor Park amounted to unlawful state aid. He granted leave to seek a judicial review on that point and on the alleged lack of transparency around that. Whether or not Crusaders is successful in its action, is it the Minister's view that that action will lead to a delay in those projects, and, if so, what are the possible financial implications?

Earlier in the year, we had the case of the Titanic signature project, where the EU rejected an application for £18 million on the basis of the nature of the procurement exercise. I would like to raise that with the Minister and ask him whether he is satisfied that the single tender procurement with no element of price competition represents value for money. I think that he said in his statement that the £18 million could be allocated to other projects. It will be interesting to know what progress has been made on that reallocation and what projects have benefited.

Welfare reform looms large. I think that the latest prediction is that the Bill will come before the Assembly in the autumn term, so it is important for the House to know what provision has been made in the Budget Bill to mitigate some of the impact of welfare reform, particularly in relation to the bedroom tax, which has caused much anxiety in our community. If the Executive decide to go for a substantial mitigation of welfare reform, how will that be resourced and can it be done without top-slicing Departments?

In relation to the social investment fund — I think that it is now called "Delivering Social Change" — it is disappointing that, three years into the Budget, none of those funds has been dispersed. Will the Minister inform the House whether there is an expectation that that process will begin this year and whether there is adequate time in the remainder of the budgetary period for those funds to be utilised?

Likewise, with the childcare fund, I think that £12 million was allocated to the initiation of a childcare strategy. To date, only £300,000 of that has been released. What is the present situation and what will be the implications of further delay? Many community groups involved in providing childcare services are extremely disappointed at the slowness of the process. Indeed, many have had to let valued employees go because of the delay.

In relation to the united community announcement, the House will be interested to know the estimated cost of the recently announced shared school campuses — 10, in all — the urban villages project and the NEETs cross-community employment programmes. For example, what will the costs be in the current year, and where is that additional money to be found in the Budget Bill? How will the money be provided in future years, or is the whole project purely contingent on an economic package from London to provide more resources?

I am interested to know whether there is provision for potential EU infraction costs across all Departments. If so, what is the scale of that?

Sin a bhfuil le rá agamsa, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle anois, ach, ar ndóigh, beidh deis cainte eile ann amárach, agus beidh mé ag dúil le páirt a ghlacadh sa díospóireacht sin fosta. I look forward to continuing discussions tomorrow.

Mr Cree: We have reached that stage in the year again when we have to allow the Main Estimates and the associated legislation in the Budget Bill tomorrow to pass. Despite having voted against the four-year Budget in 2011 and having expressed serious concerns about aspects of that Budget, we have little option but to raise those concerns once again and move on. The Minister will be pleased to know that. This stems from the fact that we have a financial process — again, the Minister will recognise that he has heard from me on this before — that is not fit for purpose. I have said that many times in the House and in many Budget debates throughout the years. In the past, the Finance Committee did good work in an attempt to remedy that. It held an inquiry into the role of the Northern Ireland Assembly in scrutinising the Executive's Budget and expenditure, and it made recommendations, including the need for formal agreement on a regularised or structured Budget process. It was also felt that an early formal stage in the process was necessary to give the Assembly the opportunity to influence the Minister's thinking, if that is possible, and to enhance effective scrutiny.

1.30 pm

The Department of Finance and Personnel is taking forward a review of the financial process on behalf of the Executive. Its terms of reference state:

"the overall aim of the review is to examine and make recommendations on the options to create a single coherent financial framework that is effective, efficient and transparent and enhances scrutiny by and accountability to the Assembly, taking into account the needs of the Assembly."

Both the inquiry's recommendations and the stated intention of the review of financial process are laudable and would undoubtedly improve the situation, not least by making debates such as this and the one tomorrow more meaningful. This question, however, remains: what has happened to that vital work? The Committee for Finance and Personnel inquiry sits on a shelf somewhere, and the review of the financial process is being frustrated by the Sinn Féin Education Minister, who refuses to make his Department's expenditure transparent. That is unacceptable. There has been much talk recently about a rotation of the Finance Ministry by the DUP. I hope that one legacy of Sammy Wilson's time in office will not be that he could not carry through the vital reform of the Assembly's financial dealings.

In today's motion, the Minister seeks the Assembly's approval of the 2013-14 spending plans of Departments and other public bodies as set out in the Main Estimates. The combined sum is £8,271,268,000. That vast amount should be adequately scrutinised by the Assembly, but that is simply not the case at present. So that we do not complicate matters or jeopardise the drawdown of funding by Departments, but in the full knowledge of our previous opposition to the four-year Budget and the concerns that many colleagues will outline over the next two days, we will not obstruct the budgetary process at this stage.

In closing, I will mention a few areas in the Main Estimates on which I would welcome clarification from the Minister when he responds to the debate. First, the First Minister and deputy First Minister recently announced the strategy, Together: Building a United Community. However, I am aware from my membership of the OFMDFM Committee that it has not yet been factored into any budget. Assuming that some or all projects will be up and running in the incoming year and bearing it in mind that junior Minister Bell claimed that £0.5 billion would be allocated to it, some detail would be interesting, given the lack of consultation thus far with other parties.

Secondly, the Minister has been granted additional infrastructure funding of over £200 million by the Treasury through the Barnett consequentials. Will he outline the specific projects for which that money will be made available? It is important that it is seen to make a tangible difference rather than simply evaporating into the Minister's coffers with little or no transparency.

Lastly, the legal dispute over the European grant for the Titanic project was raised during previous budgetary stages and by Mr Bradley this afternoon. I would like to hear the Minister's explanation of the current position on the £18 million and the request from the Enterprise Minister. I know that, in the past, he told us that, for the money to be a net saving, it had to be for a project already included in the Budget, but perhaps he will clarify that.

Mrs Cochrane: I too welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion today. It is every Member's responsibility to interpret how the consequences not only of the Estimates but of the impending Budget Bill might serve to improve and develop our local economy and what impact that will have on our constituents.

I am glad that the Minister, in his opening remarks, highlighted our need to focus not only on our public sector spending but on the importance of supporting our private sector. As someone with a key interest and background in business, I look forward to chairing the first formal meeting of an all-party group on small and medium-sized enterprises tomorrow, at which we will hear directly from our small business sector on how we can further assist it to grow and prosper.

The challenging financial environment that we face must be handled maturely and innovatively as, although there has been some good news today, there will, undoubtedly, be further impact on the economy through, for instance, the Welfare Reform Bill, as it progresses. Mr Bradley has already outlined some concerns that we have around that.

In some aspects, the challenge can pass to Departments to manage their individual budget, but that would be rather short-sighted and would indicate a missed opportunity. Collaboration between Departments is imperative, and we must continue to focus on early intervention and prevention, as a shift in the balance of resources into programmes that seek to prevent problems from emerging or to intervene at an early stage can produce savings through avoiding the need to spend greater resources as problems fully develop.

More than ever, we must seek to tackle our duplicated services and the divided society that that perpetually reinforces. I am sure the Minister will not be surprised to hear me state in the House once again that the cost of division in Northern Ireland drains our economy of around £1 billion a year. I welcome the fact that other parties have finally come round to the Alliance Party's way of thinking. We have the First Minister and deputy First Minister's Building a United Community strategy, for instance.

Shared future sound bites are worth nothing unless serious action is taken at Assembly level. We need to create serious and achievable targets in order to progress a truly shared future for everyone. Those targets must have the required resource allocated to them through our Estimates and our budgeting process.

One of the most significant areas of duplication remains our education system, and the vast majority of our schools still serve only one part of the community. We have ended up with too much of the Department's money locked up in capital, so the pressure for cuts then falls on our teachers, pupils, transport and special needs etc. Expenditure per capita in Northern Ireland is significantly higher in education than in all other UK regions, but that resource is actually being eaten up through overadministration and overprovision of partially empty schools. Even in the immediate term, the potential for collaboration could start to realise up to £80 million a year of savings, but, unfortunately, the issue of integrated education has been slightly neglected in the Building a United Community strategy, even though integrated education is the issue that most people would identify as a means of overcoming division and making the resulting savings. The less ambitious forms of sharing are unlikely to deliver what is needed. Therefore, as we look ahead, we must consider if this is the most effective use of our resources. The Minister for Employment and Learning is, however, reviewing our fragmented teacher training sector. At present, that is the only potential move to develop integration as opposed to merely sharing.

In housing, we still have residential segregation, which creates significant cost pressures for private and social housing. The territorial display of flags and emblems, along with peace walls, creates major inefficiencies in our housing market. Perceptions of territoriality must be addressed, as it also has a negative impact on our business sector.

There is a strong financial and economical imperative to build a shared future so that our public spending is not wasted on maintaining division. The concept of separate but equal is unsustainable economically and morally. Policies that simply adapt to segregation result in inefficient resource allocations. Shared proofing of all policy and spending commitments, therefore, will assist in effective budgeting and spending in Northern Ireland. That is already the practice of the Alliance Ministers and, thankfully, has now been recognised in the 'Together: Building a United Community' document. I look forward to seeing the positive impact that that can have. I support the motion.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I am pleased to speak as Chairman of the Committee for Justice in support of the Supply resolution for the Northern Ireland Main Estimates for 2013-14, which will grant the Department of Justice over £715 million to enable it to fund its responsibilities and priorities. Of course, the Committee regularly scrutinises the Department of Justice budget and receives detailed information on monitoring rounds. The Committee pays particular attention to the savings delivery plans and the likely impact on the delivery of front line services.

On 30 May, the Committee for Justice received a detailed briefing from officials on the budgetary position, the pressures that are faced and the 2012-13 provisional outturn. The Committee noted that the Department's resource DEL underspend represents 0.65% of the budget, which is a good outcome in managing that budget. Over the coming months, the Committee intends to scrutinise closely the spend against budget by the Department of Justice and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies, and to assess that against the associated outputs.

I will highlight for Members some of the key budget challenges that face the Department of Justice in 2013-14. The main pressure that is faced by the Department continues to be the cost of legal aid. Already, the Legal Services Commission has forecast a pressure of £27 million. It is important to note that we no longer have access to Treasury funds in respect of meeting the continuing legal aid shortfall. That £27 million needs to be found from the Department of Justice's allocation. That money could be spent on police stations, prisons or on various community safety projects. Indeed, I will highlight an early intervention project in my local area. The Department of Justice needs to get more involved in such projects and team up with the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Department of Education to try to prevent young people from ever becoming engaged in activities that can lead them down a path that, inevitably, ends up with them going through the criminal justice system and the revolving door that that becomes. Money needs to be allocated at that early intervention stage. In my constituency, a project under the Resurgam Community Development Trust is taking forward that type of work. That is an example of where £27 million would be much better spent — not only in my constituency, but in every Member's constituency — than on easing the pressure faced by the Legal Services Commission. The Department intends to provide £15 million to ease that pressure at this stage. It is unsustainable for substantial additional funding to be provided year after year to meet that cost, given that a significant budget of £85 million is already allocated to fund legal aid.

Despite changes having been made to the fees that are paid for criminal legal aid, which have reduced spend in that area considerably, civil legal aid costs have trebled over the past 12 months. The main cause appears to be a large increase in the number of complex higher cost cases from 32 cases in 2011-12, costing £2.6 million, to over 100 cases last year, at an estimated cost of £8 million. Members may draw their own conclusions as to how criminal legal aid has reduced because of a fee change that was not applied to civil legal aid. A different cost system operates in civil legal aid. Now, 12 months later, the costs have trebled. Members can form their own views about how that came about. In this area, the Committee has repeatedly shown its support to the Minister, David Ford, for bringing in changes to legal aid structures. I trust that, when changes are brought forward — I believe that changes to how civil legal aid operates are needed — the Committee will not be found wanting. We will certainly challenge and scrutinise. Ultimately, however, the current system does not provide value for money for taxpayers, although it may provide value for money for others. We have requested further information on the reason for that increase. We will continue to scrutinise that information as it becomes available.

I turn to the G8 summit. During a briefing with officials on 30 May, the Committee pressed strongly for further information on where the money is coming from to fund the summit, the estimated contribution that would be required from the Department of Justice, and what guarantees the Executive have that the Northern Ireland Budget would not have to pick up the costs. Of particular concern is the likely policing bill. Officials were unable — maybe unwilling — to provide any concrete information at that briefing. I certainly think that, if the Finance Minister was able to shed some light on the anticipated costs of the G8 summit and comment on the Northern Ireland Executive's likely contribution to meet some of those costs, the House would appreciate that.

I certainly recognise the benefits of having the G8 in Northern Ireland, and I think that it is right that we recognise those benefits. However, it was the Prime Minister's decision. We would, therefore, argue that the significant liability for meeting the costs should rest with the Treasury. The Chief Constable has indicated that he has received a written assurance that the UK Treasury will pick up most of the costs relating to the policing of the G8, which is welcome news. However, we are aware that DFP has been leading on the discussions with Treasury. If there is any information pertaining to that, it would be appreciated.

The prison officers' voluntary exit scheme was launched on 8 November 2011. So far, 360 staff have been released, and the Executive have provided additional funding to enable a further 157 to be given the certainty that they will be allowed to leave under the scheme. That leaves 27 staff — seven governors and 20 senior officers — who are waiting for a guarantee that they will be allowed to leave the service. I welcome the indication that the Justice Department is in discussions with DFP to see whether further funding can be secured this year in order to provide those officers with confirmation that they will be allowed to go. It is important that the scheme is brought to a satisfactory conclusion as soon as possible to create certainty for all officers concerned. I trust that DFP and the Executive will be able to support DOJ's application, which will enable all the remaining staff to leave.

Speaking personally, I certainly welcome the fact that the Executive have recognised the invaluable contribution of the prison officers who availed themselves of the scheme. I declare an interest, because a family member is one of those who have left the service under this scheme. It is right that we give recognition to the prison officers who served during the darkest days of the Troubles in Northern Ireland, 29 of whom lost their lives.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I am not going to give way; I want to make a few more points.

Twenty-nine officers lost their lives during that conflict. The scheme recognises the particular circumstances faced by those officers. Of course, there is a monetary benefit for the Executive, and that point should not be lost. It is an invest-to-save scheme, so, ultimately, the costs of funding it will be recovered for the taxpayer. In that sense, it is a win-win: the contribution of staff is recognised, and the taxpayer will achieve a more cost-effective service in the long term.

Desertcreat is a key capital project for the Committee to scrutinise. The Committee is extremely concerned about the problems with the project. The project team briefed the Committee on the reasons for the additional £30 million cost to the scheme. We are aware of the efforts being made to reduce that additional cost, and we have sought assurances that this work will not impact adversely on the quality of the training facilities to be provided at the college. The Committee will keep a close eye on this. On 20 June, the project team will again come before the Committee to provide answers to the many questions as to how the project has been managed, why there has been such an overrun and whether there will be detrimental consequences for the core facilities at the college, and also any questions that may pertain to jeopardising the tendering process. Judicial reviews and other projects were mentioned earlier, and we are concerned that this could get stuck in judicial proceedings, unless things are carried out exactly to the letter of the law.

In the last few moments, I want to commend the Minister for bringing this to the House. I know that my colleague Mr Girvan from South Antrim indicated that you would expect us to say so, but I think that it is right that we recognise Ministers who do an effective job for all of us in the House. Minister Wilson has gone repeatedly to the Treasury and secured a number of key concessions — for example, air passenger duty — and represented the Executive in other areas. I think that it is right that we commend him not because we have to but because that commendation is worthy and justified. I support the motion.

Mr McQuillan: I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate today. This is once again an important motion, as Departments would not be fit to operate without its being passed by the Assembly. As the Minister said, we have more resource available to us than we previously thought we would, due to the UK Budget and Autumn Statement, but we understand that we continue to live in a period in which resources are not as plentiful as they once were. We have to live with the money and resources that are available to us, and I want to commend the Minister for the work that he has done despite the difficult circumstances that we find ourselves in.

I would like to make a few points; the first is in relation to the new councils. The first elections to those bodies are expected in May 2014. This will, of course, save us money in the long term, but a number of costs must be met beforehand. One of the most pressing concerns is about rates convergence. Many people have asked how the new councils will affect their rates. In my constituency, Coleraine and Limavady Borough Councils are merging with Moyle and Ballymoney councils to form the new Causeway Coast and Glens District Council. People want to know how their rates will be calculated and how the merging of these councils will affect the size of their rates bills. I welcome the fact that money has been made available to deal with this, and it would be useful if the Minister could outline what allocations have been made to deal with rates convergence in addition to any other costs of transition, such as councillor severance and the shadow councils.

On a separate issue, I would also like to mention the help that these resolutions will make to the level of domestic and business taxation. I welcome the fact that, despite the difficult times that we live in, the Executive have taken steps to ensure that families are helped with the cost of living. In particular, steps that the Executive have taken in relation to rates mean that the level of domestic taxation in Northern Ireland is among the lowest in the UK. The regional rate has been limited, not only to inflation but to the lowest indicator of inflation. This has provided real help and is to be welcomed. Perhaps the Minister could outline to the House the differences in domestic taxation levels among different parts of the UK. That will no doubt demonstrate how devolution and the decisions that this Executive have taken are working to the benefit of the people of Northern Ireland.

However, we all know that it is not only the householders that have been helped but businesses as well. Due to the measures that the Executive have taken, business taxation is among the lowest in the UK, and it is helping to make Northern Ireland one of the most competitive places in the UK to do business. We can see that this is paying dividends by the number of job announcements that we have witnessed recently. In addition to this, the small business rate relief scheme has helped many businesses in my own constituency of East Londonderry to the sum of almost £2.5 million. That scheme has been adopted by the Scottish Government, and it is good to see that the Executive are making decisions that other parts of the UK are keen to follow.

Obviously, these resolutions have wide-ranging implications, and it would be impossible to cover everything, but I welcome the fact that the Finance Minister is using the resources available to him to help householders, businesses and the growth of our economy. I support the motion.

Mr A Maginness: I welcome the debate, but I seek reassurance from the Minister in relation to the recovery of our local economy. The Minister said some rather encouraging words about the current economic situation, but I hope that he will expand on that and give us even more encouragement. It seems to me that, sadly, we are still in the doldrums, and we all must work very hard to try to develop our economy further. I hope that the Minister will put his best foot forward and give a more detailed analysis of the current situation.

There is no such thing as a free lunch, and the G8 springs to mind. I thought I was reassured by the Minister of Justice during Question Time some weeks ago, when he indicated that there would not be a cost to Northern Ireland for hosting the G8 summit in Enniskillen. I may have been mistaken, and if I was, I apologise to the Minister, but it comes to me, and to others I would think, as a bit of a surprise that we would be expected to pay for the summit. It seems that it is part of a UK arrangement. If that is the case, the central Government should, in fact, bear the burden of the G8. I know that they are carrying a considerable amount, but I am not so certain that Northern Ireland needs to pay the contribution that has been suggested. I am not sure whether that is 5% or 10%, but, nonetheless, it has been suggested that the cost will be in that region for Northern Ireland. I would like the Minister's view on that. He is a man given to great discretion on these matters, but he certainly expresses his mind from time to time. Perhaps he might want to do so about this issue.

Another issue that springs to mind is corporation tax. That has been put on the long finger. I know that the Minister has never expressed his commitment to that in enthusiastic terms, although there has been a commitment nonetheless. I wonder whether the fact that corporation tax has been put on the long finger impacts on his view of our economic future, how we develop our economy and how we work our way out of this recession. Perhaps a more practical and important pressing issue at the moment is that of regional aid. Is the Minister confident that he can persuade his counterparts in the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS) of the need for Northern Ireland to be treated differently and to maintain regional aid here? It seems that, if we are losing out on corporation tax, we have to have a firm commitment from the British Government on regional aid. That is a fair point. There were various arguments with the European Commission about that. I believe that the European Commission has been successfully persuaded to accept the position that Northern Ireland should be treated very sympathetically regarding regional aid. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that issue. It seems to be very important.

A further point relating to the Department of Justice is Desertcreat. I wonder whether the delay in Desertcreat will impact our Budget further down the line. It is a fairly substantial amount of capital expenditure. What is the impact of delay? It may well be a beneficial impact, but it could also have a malign impact by squeezing out other worthy projects in the near future. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that.

The Welfare Reform Bill will obviously have an impact on Northern Ireland. I hear worrying talk at Westminster about further cuts and, of course, controlling welfare expenditure. I wonder whether there is any way in which we, through a more imaginative use of our resources, can mitigate the impact of those welfare cuts in Northern Ireland. Those questions should be answered. The people out there who are worried stiff should be given some reassurance. I hope that the Minister will give that reassurance.

Finally, last week in the Assembly, the issue was raised of the workers employed in and seconded to the PSNI and the Department of Justice who have not benefited from the equal pay settlement. I ask the Minister to make some comment on that issue. If funding is available, although it may be difficult, perhaps it could be allocated so that workers who have been seriously disadvantaged — that is the view of the House — will receive some reassurance that their position will be altered to their advantage.

Mr Swann: I welcome the opportunity to outline the Employment and Learning Committee's view of the Budget Bill. The pressures on all Departments are well known to all in the House, so I will not rehearse the issues here. I am sure that the Minister will be glad to hear that. However, the Committee for Employment and Learning would argue that the work of the Department for Employment and Learning is central to directing Northern Ireland out of the current financial difficulties.

Through its inquiry into careers and hearing evidence from the Department and organisations such as the CBI, the Committee has learned that one of the main drivers for recovery is to ensure that Northern Ireland has the workforce, skills and training to enable it to compete for jobs in the global market. That said, the Committee welcomed the Executive's prioritisation of the issue in their economy and jobs initiative, announced in November 2012, and the £200 million attached to it, albeit that it was, for the most part, recycled money. The Committee welcomed the initiatives for more PhD students, more STEM places and funding programmes to provide assistance to the unemployed to re-enter the labour market.

On 14 November, the Minister came to the Committee to explain the new economic measures and to detail how the funding was made available. The Committee will continue to oversee the spending of these additional economic measures in 2013-14 and 2014-15 to ensure that the targets that have been set are met.

On 29 May, during its briefing on the June monitoring round, the Committee acknowledged that the difficult economic climate creates pressures on the DEL budget. The Committee was briefed on the budget transfers in and out of the Department, including the £5.8 million that is due from the Department of Health, which is its contribution towards the costs of medical, dental and social work student places, and a contribution of £1.85 million from the Department of Education towards the cost of retaining the £200 a year bonus in the education maintenance allowance scheme.

The Committee is also cognisant of the £3 million reclassification from resource to capital in further education. The Committee intends to keep the reclassification of the colleges to non-departmental public bodies under review this year.

Speaking as the Ulster Unionist Party's spokesman on employment and learning, I raise concerns. Looking at further education in colleges, we can see that some £172 million is being allocated over 2013-14, which is down from over £200 million in 2011-12. However, I welcome the increased budget that has been afforded to higher education year on year since 2011. It will receive nearly £200 million in the year that the Main Estimates refer to.

Mr Cree has raised concerns about the Together: Building a United Community strategy, which, in a number of places, outlined strategies that cross over into the territory of DEL. An example of that is the United Youth programme, which aims to create 10,000 one-year placements and 100 summer schools. For the purposes of the Main Estimates, I would be grateful if the Finance Minister could detail whether he knows how those policies will operate alongside current DEL policies and, most importantly, how they will be funded.

In her contribution, Mrs Cochrane referred to DEL's statements and progress on teacher-training colleges. The funding of Stranmillis University College remains a concern. Fears were alerted when the Minister for Employment and Learning announced in a statement to the House in November 2011:

"In the event that the Stranmillis/Queen's merger does not proceed, the outlook for Stranmillis University College is bleak ... I do not have any additional funding for Stranmillis." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 69, p77, cols 1-2].

However, in a statement to the House in May 2013, the Minister said:

"Stranmillis's longer term projections, based on its assumptions, indicate that it will maintain a positive income and expenditure reserve and cash balance, but, again, the trend towards a deficit position each year post-2021 will eventually deplete its reserves and cash balance. However, Stranmillis will remain vulnerable to any additional requirement for capital expenditure across the forecast period over and above its existing backlog maintenance requirements." — [Official Report, Vol 85, No 4, p3, col 1].

With that relative uncertainty in mind, I ask the Finance Minister to take the opportunity of the debate to commit himself to making a budget available to Stranmillis that will meet its needs for as long as necessary. He will agree with me that it is a first-class institution and deserves the Assembly's support.

Recently, the Open University's activities were transferred from England to Northern Ireland, making it our third devolved university. The Minister has received clarification that the funds transferred for the Open University will remain ring-fenced. However, from 2015-16, those funds will form part of the overall funds available for higher education in Northern Ireland, and he intends to fund the Open University's activities on the same basis as other universities in Northern Ireland. Considering the work that the Open University carries out in providing facilities to learn while you earn and enabling those in employment to increase their educational abilities, will the Minister state that he can and intends to ring-fence the funding allocated to the Open University, even for a further number of years, to enable it to strengthen its position as the third university in Northern Ireland?

My last concern relates to the June monitoring round that has been presented to the Committee, in which there is a bid for £5 million for the Steps to Work programme. Should that bid be unsuccessful, is the implication that Steps to Work will be under pressure in the current year?

Mr Frew (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I will focus on the budgetary and financial aspects of a few issues that are close to the Committee's heart. These topics have taken up substantial Committee time and are of considerable public interest.

I start with the recently published 'Going for Growth' report and its request for £400 million from central government. As all Members will be aware, agrifood and the development of a strategy for the agrifood industry is, for the first time, a key target in the Programme for Government. It is a target for which DARD and DETI share responsibility. I am Chair of the ARD Committee and sit on the ETI Committee, so this Programme for Government target is close to my heart.

The agrifood industry has great potential, but it also has great challenges. It currently employs 27,000 in food and drink processing and a further 47,000 in farming. The potential lies in its capacity for growth, and the 'Going for Growth' document indicates that there is a potential for another 15,000 jobs and a growth in sales of 60% to £7 billion. However, one of the main challenges is funding to kick-start this and the timescale for making that funding available. The Committee recently took evidence on 'Going for Growth' and was told:

"We are working on a timetable that suggests that those are 2020 targets, but, frankly, a lot of that can be front-ended and fast-tracked if we have the right approach and attitude to it. We are suggesting that that £400 million is a three-year commitment starting virtually immediately. We can do this over a longer period, but it would miss a lot of opportunities that are available to us today."

It is estimated that, were government to invest that £400 million, it could lever in investment of over £1.3 billion from industry.

In evidence to the ARD Committee, we heard further details of how the £400 million would be spent. We were told that £250 million would be specifically for farm business development. A single agrifood marketing organisation, consolidating all marketing and promotional activity and established by government, would cost around £15 million a year. Clearly, that kind of money and that level of commitment are central to the premise that we can use the agrifood industry to grow ourselves out of recession and provide good, solid, well-paid jobs for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Although he is right to talk about the agrifood industry and the farming community, does he agree that we must never forget or lose sight of the fishing industry, which is part of the ARD Committee's remit? It is practically on its knees and must also be catered for. I hope that the Finance Minister can help.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his contribution. He is absolutely right. I am aggrieved at the way that the ARD Minister has reacted to the pressures that the fishing industry is under at this time. I will touch on that later in my speech if I get time, Mr McCarthy.

Importantly, those agrifood jobs would be spread throughout Northern Ireland and would not necessarily be concentrated around Belfast or any other hub for that matter. Clearly, that is a decision for the Executive to take. On behalf of the ARD Committee, I would welcome any indication that the Minister can give us today on the Executive's response to the proposal for £400 million. What consideration is being given to the timescale for delivery of the funding, which is just as important? Will it be available over three years, 10 years or somewhere in between? Specifically, what indications do we have that the £250 million for farm business development will happen? That is vital.

Look at the farming industry at present and at all the pressures that it has been under. They cannot relate to 'Going for Growth'. They are so restricted, depressed and looking down at their feet, in most cases, that they cannot look for inspiration in this document, even though there is a lot in it. There has to be a bridge between the plans, timescales, innovation and aspirations in 'Going for Growth' and the farming industry, to give the industry some relief.

I turn now to the second financial topic that has been exercising the Committee and, indeed, many individual MLAs, particularly those from the rural constituencies: the crisis that the farming industry has been hit with over the past nine to 12 months. There has been what some would call a perfect storm of rising input prices for things such as fertiliser, feed and energy. On top of that, we have the situation where the price paid to the farmer did not cover his or her costs, let alone allow for a profit. The weather then kicked in to horrible effect with the severity of the snowstorm in March and the impact of the poor weather last summer. That affected fodder supply, even in this late spring of 2013. Difficulties with credit facilities and the squeeze by the banks have clearly not helped the situation. The Committee has explored all those aspects in some depth. We have spoken extensively to the farming industry, taken written and oral evidence from the supermarkets, made informal contact with the processors and had a very informative oral evidence session with the grain and feed merchants. Indeed, we will be taking evidence from all four main Northern Ireland banks on 27 June.

The impact of these factors on the farming industry has been immense. The combination of factors has pushed and could push more of what would otherwise be profitable farm businesses under. This crisis has been slow in rising, and farm businesses have slowly used up all their reserves of capital, capacity, money and fodder. Of course, there has been the very welcome emergency funding from the Executive for the hardship payment, worth some £3 million to those affected by the snowstorm in March, not least in my constituency of North Antrim, and the fodder scheme, worth £1 million. Although I do not wish to diminish the hardship felt by other sectors in our society, such as the construction industry and retail, farming is different, because there is a social aspect to it. Europe recognises that through the single farm payment and the common agricultural policy. Farming affects everyone, every household and every family, because it is what they eat, what is on their kitchen table or dining table on their plates, and it nourishes their children and family members. There is a social side to farming that none of us can choose to ignore.

The final issue I will raise is one not so much of finance but of a lack of resource planning. The Committee has been examining the DARD and Forest Service response to tree disease in Northern Ireland, particularly ash dieback. We have found that, although the response is good, there appears to be somewhat haphazard planning — or lack of planning — for resources, including finance, people and management systems. The initial and, indeed, essential response to the tree disease outbreak comes at the cost of other Forest Service activities. It cannot have any other reaction. However, the Committee cannot in all honesty say that additional resources are needed, because it has proven difficult to get definite resource information from the Department. What is clear is that some thought and effort needs to go into resource training. While all those resources are going into tackling that disease, it is taking people away from their daily and routine work. I believe that that will have an impact on the Department and the Forest Service in the coming months, maybe even years. I wish that DARD would concentrate on that. If it needs more resources, it should ask for them to get it through this.

Another issue that I want to address, speaking in a DUP capacity, is the construction industry. People will know that I am steeped in that industry, having spent 20 years as an electrician and 10 years as a foreman electrician. I have seen the devastation in that industry. We need something to kick-start and help that industry. We need as much capital spend on buildings as possible to inject potential and growth in the construction industry.

The other thing that I will mention — Mr McCarthy, rightly, brought it up — is the fishing industry. It seems that the Agriculture Minister has turned her face away from the fisheries industry. That is agrifood. There is food, as well as processing and transport. It is a major industry in Northern Ireland, and we must be in a position where we can offer support similar to the hardship fund for farming, because fisheries have also been hit hard by the weather and other issues such as the selective fishing gears. All of that has led to pressure on the fishing industry that it cannot afford. I ask the Executive to put pressure on the Agriculture Minister so that something is done —

Mr Frew: — to alleviate the pressures on that industry.

Mr Wells: I rise to raise a few issues as Deputy Chairperson of the Health Committee, and then I want to move on to the fishing industry in my capacity as MLA for South Down.

The budget for health under the CSR has been set at £4.65 billion, which equates to £2,583 for every man, woman and child in Northern Ireland, including just one extra, my grandson, who was born on Thursday and who will, hopefully, make very good use of his £2,583.

The Minister is to be congratulated because, when the CSR was being drawn up, he fought to ensure that there was a real terms growth of 1.9% in the health element of the DHSSPS budget. That was very welcome and showed a commitment by the Minister and the Executive to health, acknowledging just how important it is, not only in keeping us all fit, healthy and alive but also because there are 70,000 full-time equivalent jobs in the public element of the health service. There must be at least another 30,000 in the private sector in places like nursing homes and residential homes and among physiotherapists and opticians etc. When we see that, we realise that one in every 10 people in Northern Ireland who are employed work for the state in health, and another almost 50% of that number work in the private sector. It is a hugely important employer, and, as a result of the CSR agreement, much has been done to maintain that employment. Indeed, there have not been any compulsory redundancies at all in the health sector under the present dispensation. That is quite remarkable.

I well remember the former Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Mr McGimpsey, becoming the inevitable prophet of doom and predicting that there would be 4,000 redundancies in health as a result of the package that was agreed. That turned out to be absolute nonsense. I accept that there have been voluntary redundancies, early retirements and severance packages, but all of those have been entirely voluntary. No one has gone unless they wished to leave. Therefore, the health service — I accept that it is suffering huge stresses — is in a much better position than many predicted, given the economic downturn.

There are storm clouds on the horizon. No increase whatsoever was awarded in the social services element. We in Northern Ireland have an advantage in having a unified health, social services and public safety provision, but the one downside is that, in GB — England, Scotland and Wales — if there is a shortfall in social services provisions, that can be added to the rates that are charged by the relevant metropolitan county council or regional council. Therefore, when stresses show up, there is a way of raising extra money. Because social services in Northern Ireland are financed entirely by the Budget allocated by the Minister of Finance we do not have that option. Therefore, there are considerable stresses in the social services element.

Whilst we accept that there has been a 1.9% real terms growth in provision for the health element of the DHSSPS budget, it has to be admitted that growth in demand is increasing at least three times faster than that. That is one of the reasons why some of the A&E statistics that we see in Northern Ireland at the moment cause so much concern. For various reasons, demand is rising rapidly. Some of it is to do with lifestyle choices such as drug addiction, alcohol, cigarettes or obesity, some of it is due to an ageing population, and some of it is due to an increase in population as a result, in particular, of net immigration. Therefore, there are considerable stresses. When we add to that the fact that medical inflation is running even faster at a higher rate, we realise that things can be very difficult.

Health is unique in that, every now and then, a very important new procedure or treatment comes along that, if we did not introduce it, would place our citizens at a disadvantage compared with the rest of the United Kingdom. That is an uncertain quantity that has arrived on the scene and has not been budgeted for. Tomorrow morning, I will present a petition to the Assembly that has been signed by 22,000 people who are asking the Minister of Health to introduce the new vaccine for meningitis B into Northern Ireland. As I have only three minutes to speak tomorrow morning, I will take a couple of minutes now to emphasise the importance of that issue.

Every elected Member in this Chamber has come across meningitis B. It is a dreadful condition that can take the life of young people, in particular, in a very short time. We had an awful tragedy in Rathfriland in my constituency 10 years ago, when a three-year-old boy died of meningitis B. As long as I am a public representative, I will never forget the faces of the parents of that young boy. They thought he had flu but then had the awful realisation that it could be meningitis.

There is a possibility that, on 12 June — Wednesday — when it meets in London, the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation (JCVI) could recommend that the meningitis B vaccine should be introduced in Northern Ireland. I am glad that Mrs Boyle is here today because, tomorrow morning, Sean Devine and his family will be in this Building with that petition in memory of their daughter Terri, who died of meningitis B. They will also take the petition to 10 Downing Street to plead for the introduction of the men B vaccination. Of course, that has to be paid for, and the Department will have to find the resources quite quickly to introduce it. Do I believe that it is good value for money? Yes, I do. It would be wonderful, in five years' time, not to have to consider the potential of children dying of meningitis because we would have wiped the condition out. We could go a long way towards that on Wednesday, if we get the right decision, but still the money has to be found. That is the difficulty. I therefore plead with the Minister to continue to exercise generosity when it comes to the distribution of monitoring round money to the Health Department. That type of extra, unexpected cash can be very readily spent and can have a huge impact.

Up to now, the Department has kept within its budget. Indeed, I always use the analogy of Houdini in a glass tank with chains around his feet and hands, with three minutes to get out. Each year, that type of illustration applies to Health. It is possibly going to make it — is it going to make it? And then, on 31 March, we discover that, yet again, it has managed to get out of the tank, make all the budgets balance and come in on budget. That is getting more and more difficult every year, and I congratulate the staff who manage to achieve that in very difficult circumstances. They have done a fantastic job. We make it more and more difficult for them every year, and monitoring round money is a very effective way of releasing pressures that develop in the health service, perhaps more so than in any other Department. I urge the Minister to continue to exercise generosity in that particularly important aspect of funding.

As an obscure DUP Back-Bencher for South Down, I move on to the fishing industry. I agree entirely with Mr Frew. I have been approached by representatives of the fishing industry in recent months, and they do not resent the fact that the farming industry has had that much-needed £5 million of funding help because of bad weather. However, they make the point that, whilst the storms were raging on the land, they were also raging at sea. Their boats were tied up, and they were unable to go out and pursue their livelihood. The fishing industry has also had, to use Mr Frew's phrase, the "perfect storm" of very bad weather, incredibly high prices for fuel, increases in insurance and all the regulations that have to be adhered to. If they could achieve a small fraction of the subsidy that is, rightly, given to the farming community, that would go a long way to solving their difficulties. It is unfortunate that the Minister — she is not here today; I understand that she is not well — seems besotted by one sector and shows very little interest in the fishing community.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that the fishing industry has made a tremendous move in helping the Department with the selective fishing gear that it is trying to use? That has put pressure on the industry with regard to the fish it can catch and the income it can bring in.

Mr Wells: Absolutely. The industry would say that it has worked with two Agriculture Ministers from the same party and that it is finding life a bit more difficult under this Minister than the previous one. There seems to be no meeting the industry halfway to try to help it out in this very difficult time. It is an industry that has huge added benefits in processing, yet it seems that it is being ignored.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As Members will be aware, Question Time begins at 2.30 pm, so I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. This debate will continue immediately after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Anna Lo.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Economy: Fiscal Measures

1. Mr Brady asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, in light of the ongoing discussions with the British Government on the devolution of corporation tax powers and other economic proposals, to outline the Executive's priorities on fiscal levers which would stimulate economic growth. (AQO 4230/11-15)

Mr P Robinson (The First Minister): Pressing the Government for the devolution of corporation tax powers remains our key priority. We are examining the actions that can be taken forward now so that a devolved rate could be implemented as soon as possible after a positive decision by the UK Government in autumn 2014. While we are obviously disappointed that the Prime Minister does not intend to make a decision on the devolution of corporation tax powers until autumn 2014, the Executive remain committed to securing these powers to rebalance our economy, create jobs and increase prosperity. The coalition Government included exploring that idea in their Programme for Government. Similarly, we made it a key element of our policy. We, like the many hundreds of people who responded positively to the public consultation on this issue, believe that this measure, above all others, has the ability to deliver a step change in the performance of our economy. Devolution of this power would allow us to meet our shared objective of rebalancing our economy more quickly than would be the case if we are reliant on those policy levers that are currently available to us. The proposals being developed as part of the economic pact will also stimulate economic growth. It is intended that these measures will be put in place pending the decision on corporation tax powers.

We hope that an announcement can be made about the economic pact later this week. However, it is important to state that the measures being discussed as part of the economic pact are not sought as a replacement for corporation tax powers. The Executive will, therefore, continue to push for corporation tax powers to help provide the necessary stimulus to grow our economy going forward. We will consider the case for additional fiscal powers that may assist economic growth in Northern Ireland, though we are conscious of the implications for our block grant. The Finance Minister is pressing the Government to take action at a national level on issues such as fuel duty, short-haul air passenger duty and VAT for the hospitality and tourism sector and the construction sector.

Mr Brady: I thank the First Minister for his answer. It seems that the Tories have recognised the limitations of the system by which they finance devolved Administrations. How does the Minister propose we deal with local challenges under that system?

Mr P Robinson: The Executive, in their Programme for Government, highlighted that the central and key issue for them is the growth of our economy. There will always be limitations to what we can do, depending on the fiscal levers that are made available to us. We have recognised that if we share an island with a country that has a much lower level of corporation tax, that is an issue that has to be tackled. It disturbed me that some other parties in the House decided that we would not get corporation tax-setting powers and started an argument about the need for a plan B. The reality, of course, is that some of us stuck to our guns and kept our nerve on this issue. We continue to press the Prime Minister. The key element of this Friday, if that is the date that we can get the pact agreed with Her Majesty's Government, is not just the commitment that they will definitely take a decision in autumn 2014, but that, as important as that is to us, if it is a positive decision, it will be implemented during the term of this coalition Government.

Mr Nesbitt: In examining actions — [Interruption.] Perhaps that is HM Treasury ringing to answer the question for me. In examining actions, at any time did Her Majesty's Government try to make any kind of linkage or use leverage regarding corporation tax by bringing in other policies such as a single education system?

Mr P Robinson: The Prime Minister and the present and past Secretaries of State have always indicated that they are supportive of the issue of rebalancing our economy. All of them have indicated that they recognise that tax-setting powers for corporation tax is the single issue that has been most clearly identified. There has been no attempt on their part to indicate that we have to do something else before they will resolve that issue. The Government are as committed as the deputy First Minister and I are to pursuing a strategy on good relations, and they will encourage us to go down that line. They welcome what we have done and have been surprised, I think, that we have gone as far as we have as quickly as we have with the statement that we made and the strategy that we published. We get support from the Government on that, but they have never made it conditional to corporation tax powers.

Mr Girvan: What does the First Minister want to see in the economic pact? What hope does he have that the devolution of corporation tax will be achieved?

Mr P Robinson: There will, I hope, be a number of features to the pact that is being discussed with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. If our key focus has been on corporation tax, the big issue and the measure of success or failure will be whether there is a commitment to the implementation of the tax-setting powers during this term, if they are granted by the Government in the autumn of 2014. That was not the case when we last met the Prime Minister, and one reason for the suspension was to allow further consideration of that.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chéad-Aire as ucht a fhreagra, agus seo í mo cheist air. Has any progress been made on the allocation of enterprise zone status?

Mr P Robinson: I have some concerns about the issue of enterprise zone status. If the whole of Northern Ireland was being considered as an enterprise zone, I would be very much in favour of it. One difficulty that I have found with previous enterprise zone exercises is that they are often the cause of displacement. You are not really adding jobs to our economy. You can boost an individual area but very often at the expense of adjoining areas because companies move into the enterprise zone. We have considered the issue, and if, in the wider context, it was thought suitable for the whole of Northern Ireland, we would welcome that. However, I retain the concerns that we may not bring in new jobs but simply move the jobs from one area to another.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that their electronic equipment should not be interfering with the Chamber. If someone has their phone on, please turn it off.

China: OFMDFM Visit

2. Mr Ross asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the outcomes of their recent visit to China. (AQO 4231/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: Our recent mission to China was to further strengthen Government-to-Government relationships through a number of high-level meetings with Ministers in Beijing. We met Madam Liu Yandong, who visited Northern Ireland last year and has since been promoted to the position of vice-premier. Madam Liu has overall responsibility for science and technology, education, sports and culture, and sustainable development. We discussed the potential of opening a bureau representing the Northern Ireland Executive in Beijing, and we will explore that with Executive colleagues in the near future.

Through Madam Liu's invitation to visit China, we also held meetings with the Minister of Commerce and the Minister of Education. Those meetings were extremely useful and enabled us to progress a number of issues that we hope will result in expanding trade opportunities for local firms and Chinese Government investment in university and school partnerships. Our engagement with the influential Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs was an important step in opening key channels to increase foreign trade, economic co-operation and university links. Agreeing to that meeting was a strong signal of how seriously the Chinese Government are taking any potential partnership arrangements. We also met Education Minister Yuan Guiren and discussed our commitment to developing Northern Ireland's international links in the higher education sector. China is rightly considered a priority target country for Queen's University and the University of Ulster. We welcomed the opportunity to discuss existing and potential links with Minister Guiren and how we can develop our greatest asset, which is our people. Throughout the visit, we were supported by the Chinese People's Association for Friendship with Foreign Countries, and we believe that this relationship will now lead to further visits by Executive Ministers and organisations to negotiate on a range of tangible issues that will benefit local communities and Northern Ireland businesses.

Mr Ross: It is clear that, with a population of over one billion people, China is a part of the world that we want to develop our links with. The First Minister said they are considering opening a Northern Ireland bureau in Beijing. What is the likelihood of that happening, and what would the potential impact be on the Northern Ireland economy?

Mr P Robinson: We have a bureau in Washington and one in Brussels. Given the scale of the Chinese economy, there is trade potential for a small country such as Northern Ireland if it can get only a small part of the trillions that are spent by the Chinese people. That would have a massive impact. It is an important opportunity that should not be missed. We have an Invest Northern Ireland office in Shanghai, and we want to supplement the Northern Ireland presence in China. We believe, perhaps more than some other countries, that an awful lot of trade and business is dealt with directly through government sources, so it becomes more important to be in the governmental capital.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chéad-Aire as ucht a fhreagraí. What is the First Minister's assessment of the potential for local businesses through increased links with the Chinese market?

Mr P Robinson: As I said, the potential is massive, particularly in the agrifood sector. The deputy First Minister and I had discussions with Madam Liu in particular about the prospects, and she told us of the many million children who are born in China every year. There are advantages in powdered milk and milk products being exported to China, and the high standard of European food is recognised. Chinese people want quality food products, so there is great potential. No country in the world eats more pork than China, so there are great opportunities for Northern Ireland's agrifood industry.

Agrifood is not the only industry with potential. Wrightbus imports its buses to the Chinese market, and they can be seen on the streets of Hong Kong. Given that 1.3 billion people live in China, the transport industry also has potential.

Mr Swann: Given the positives from the visits to China, Brazil and India, has the First Minister any intention of amending the Programme for Government targets for export to emerging countries to ensure that they remain challenging and competitive?

Mr P Robinson: We are always happy to exceed our targets. When targets are met or look as though they are about to be met, we consider whether we should provide more challenging targets. If the target is on investment, we are always happy to see that Invest Northern Ireland has been successful in exceeding targets. With every Programme for Government, we have put higher benchmarks in place, and we will continue to do so. If we get close to meeting those targets, we will, of course, revise them upwards.

North West 200

3. Mr I McCrea asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment of the importance of the North West 200 and how it contributes to the economy. (AQO 4232/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: I do not believe that I am the best person to quantify the merits of the North West 200 objectively against the many other highlights that the Northern Ireland sporting calendar has to offer. However, having been to a number of races at the annual event in recent years as a guest of the Coleraine and District Motor Club and, before that, as an interested spectator, I assure the Member that the many thousands of road-racing enthusiasts who descend on the north coast each year consider the North West 200, along with the Isle of Man TT week of racing, to be the highlight of the sporting year. It is the largest annual sporting event on the island of Ireland and continues to attract competitors and spectators from around the world. The North West 200 clearly makes a significant contribution to business in the north coast area and that is why the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure have supported the event financially in recent years.

Of course, for all its organising ability, and even with the support of government, the one thing that the Coleraine and District Motor Club is unable to manage is our weather. As Members know, two of the past three years of the North West 200 have been significantly impacted by adverse weather conditions. As I said publicly, it is important that the organisers are given as much flexibility as possible to enable them to react to changing weather patterns. To that end, the Regional Development Minister advised the Executive last week that he will look urgently at amending legislation to increase the flexibility and ability to close roads at events such as the North West 200. That is an important step, and a necessary one if we are to preserve the status of the race meeting, for road racing enthusiasts and for the benefit of the local economy.

Mr I McCrea: I thank the First Minister for his response. He referred to the North West 200 as one of the largest sporting events in Northern Ireland. Not only is it a sporting event; it is a tourist event as well. Will the First Minister assure the House that this issue will continue to be on the Executive's agenda to ensure that the North West 200, which is an international event, receives the support that it requires?

Mr P Robinson: It is on the Executive's agenda. We have discussed it at two or three of the Executive's meetings. We have discussed the two elements: first, whether we can be more flexible as to when roads can be closed — and we are not talking about additional road closures, but the ability to vary the road closures depending on the weather — and, secondly, the contribution that the Executive make towards the funding. We have asked the appropriate Ministers — the Ministers of Culture, Arts and Leisure; Enterprise, Trade and Investment; and Regional Development — to discuss those issues and bring a report to us.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the First Minister outline what exactly has been agreed at Executive level with respect to flexibilities in road closures for any future North West 200?

Mr P Robinson: That is probably more appropriately a matter for the Minister for Regional Development, but I can indicate that he has informed Executive colleagues that it is possible to have a measure brought before the Assembly that would allow more flexibility as to on what hours, and on what days, the roads could be closed. That meets, as best the Executive can, the weather issues; though, I have to say that, even with that flexibility, a very long period of wet weather could still end up requiring the meetings to be terminated. However, it gives greater opportunity to the race organisers, and the Minister responsible for the Department for Regional Development has already given instructions to prepare legislation to that effect.

Mr Dallat: The First Minister said that he was not the best person to comment on this. However, I would have thought that, as he once owned a Vespa, he was ideally suited to comment on the North West 200. Does he agree that probably the time has come now to invest in new infrastructure that will always benefit the North West 200 and give it sustainability beyond the time when it is, perhaps, acceptable to have it on the roads?

Mr P Robinson: I must tell the Member that the history of the Vespa ended in a crash that resulted in the vehicle being in two parts, so perhaps I am not the best person to comment on this. I spoke, rather, of the ability to put the North West 200 in context with other major sporting events in Northern Ireland. That is clearly something that requires more objective reasoning than someone who has a particular interest can give. It is a massive boost for the whole economy of the north-west, and particularly the north coast, including Coleraine. It is an event we want to continue to support. I am one of those who have lobbied the Minister to get more funding for the area. If you look at events that bring in similar crowds, they get a more attractive funding stream than the North West 200, so I think that there is a strong case. That is why, during the course of the Executive meeting, the Ministers have been asked to look at that issue and report back to us.

Sexual Abuse Victims

4. Mr Copeland asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline their plans for providing support for the victims of sexual abuse who are not covered by the historical institutional abuse inquiry. (AQO 4233/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will ask junior Minister Jonathan Bell to answer that question.

Mr Bell (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Regardless of whether an individual is covered by the historical institutional abuse inquiry, there is a Lifeline service available 24 hours a day. Details of that service can be found on the website. Anyone who has suffered from sexual abuse, historical or otherwise, should report that to the PSNI. There are support mechanisms in place for those who do. In addition, considerable work has been undertaken in the development of the Northern Ireland regional sexual assault referral centre, or SARC as it is known, called the Rowan, which is a high-level outcome of the tackling sexual violence and abuse strategy. It is a partnership initiative between the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Police Service of Northern Ireland, and is hosted and managed by the Northern Health and Social Care Trust. The service went live on Tuesday 7 May 2013, commencing with Police Service referrals in the first instance to enable the new practices and protocols to be embedded. A full service, which will include self-referral and third-party referral, will be available from 2 September. A staged implementation plan would be normal practice for other SARCs established across GB. The Rowan delivers a 24/7 service 365 days a year to victims of sexual crime. A victim who is referred to, or who attends, the Rowan is offered a range of comprehensive services tailored to meet their identified needs.

Mr Copeland: I thank the junior Minister for a very fulsome answer. Is he aware of, and has he given any consideration to, the two briefing papers that were prepared by Amnesty International? One referred to clerical child abuse and the other covered the abuse in the Magdalene laundry-type institutions in Northern Ireland.

Mr Bell: Yes, I am aware of both, and junior Minister McCann and I are to have a meeting with Amnesty International in relation to those papers. In relation to abuse that has been perpetrated by the clergy and members of religious orders outside an institutional setting, that clerical abuse is no less important and no less emotive than institutional abuse. We are mindful of the equally destructive impact that that abuse has on individuals. As I said in the House before, following the inquiry into historical institutional abuse, it will be for the Executive to consider how to deal with the abuse that does not fall within the inquiry's terms of reference.

I know that there is a question later on about the Magdalene laundry, so I will touch on it briefly here. Anyone who was resident here in the Magdalene laundries or similar institutions as a child between 1922 and 1995 can go forward to the inquiry into historical institutional abuse to relate their experience. They will be able to talk in private to members of the inquiry's acknowledgement forum about their experiences. The contact details are available on the website. As I said before in the House, we have appointed a senior civil servant to draw up a scoping report on the Magdalene laundry-type institutions to see what further action should be taken. Junior Minister McCann and I have agreed to meet Patrick Corrigan of Amnesty International, and former residents of the Magdalene laundry-type institutions, to discuss the situation regarding those institutions that were here.

Mr Campbell: The junior Minister referred to the Lifeline service. Given the publicity that has attached itself to the inquiry from it was announced, has any evidence emerged of other types of institutional abuse through the Lifeline service or any other service?

Mr Bell: I know that several hundred people have contacted the inquiry. We have been very clear that it is an independent inquiry. It is being led by a former High Court judge, and it is for the inquiry to independently report back to us. Services are available for everyone who was affected by historical institutional abuse. A range of services is in place for those victims and survivors. Since October 2012, we have funded the WAVE Trauma Centre to provide a drop-in facility for victims and survivors in Londonderry. It welcomes all victims and survivors of historical institutional abuse, and it is available from 10.00 am to 12 noon every Friday. A qualified trauma counsellor is in place to support and help victims and survivors, as required. A similar meeting place was provided in Belfast city centre. It had not been used and was discontinued as of January 2013.

I want to make it clear that support is available for anyone who has suffered abuse. If that abuse is within the terms of reference of the inquiry, they can come forward and the procedures are in place. If it is outside those terms of reference, the Police Service and social services need to know about it not only to deal with what has occurred, but to protect other children who may fall victim to those who have been guilty of perpetrating child sexual abuse. The Lifeline service is available for everyone, and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has a comprehensive range of support in place for any victim, whether or not they fall within the historical institutional abuse inquiry terms of reference.

Ms McGahan: I have been told by some people who have been to the acknowledgement forum that there is a great need for a follow-up service by the staff there. They made the point that it can take a few days before the full effect of having relived their trauma kicks in, and, as such, it would be appropriate if a mechanism were put in place to provide ongoing contact over several days to ensure that they are all right. Will the Minister speak with the acknowledgement forum staff to ensure that that happens?

Mr Bell: I can certainly speak with the staff of the inquiry about any matter that we have responsibility for. Our hearts and support are with those people. Remember, we chose the remit of institutional abuse because those children did not have a mother, father, stepmother, stepfather or any other caregiver to go to at probably the most vulnerable time of their lives. We will seek to do anything that we can to support and help victims and survivors.

I know professionally that, when you unpack some of the abuse that individuals have suffered, it can lead to a wide range of conflicting emotions, and incidents coming to the surface that may have lain dormant for some time. We can talk with the Wave Trauma Centre and those who have the professional expertise to help victims and survivors to make them aware, as I am sure they are already, that Members of this House have been approached and told that feelings, emotions, vulnerabilities, hurt and pain that has lain dormant has surfaced, is recurring and that they need a support service to deal with that pain.

I salute the bravery, courage and integrity of victims and survivors who have come forward in very difficult circumstances. That takes a huge amount of courage, and everyone in the House sends their best wishes to those who are engaged in the inquiry. We will do everything that we can to ensure that their experience, traumatic and difficult as it is, can be made as comfortable as possible.

Finance and Personnel

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 5, 7, 10, 11 and 12 have been transferred.

Apartment Development Management Companies

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel, following the publication of the Northern Ireland Law Commission report 'Apartments' — NILC 17(2013) — what plans he has to introduce legislation to regulate apartment development management companies. (AQO 4245/11-15)

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): First of all, I acknowledge the work that the Member has done on this issue and his patience in that he withdrew his private Member's Bill to allow for a more comprehensive survey of what may be done in relation to this issue. That has taken far longer than I or he expected, so I appreciate his patience on this matter.

We now have the report, which has been presented by the Department of Justice. It contains a wide range of recommendations, some of which will require administrative action and some will require legislative action. The commission has recommended the regulation of managing agents rather than management companies and, in doing so, has favoured the Scottish model of regulation, which provides for complaints in respect of managing agents to be considered by a new body, the Homeowner Housing Panel. The Republic of Ireland has also established a new body — the Property Services Regulatory Authority — which oversees the licensing of a number of service providers, including managing agents, and promotes consumer awareness. The Republic has amended its law to provide for the establishment of owners' management companies, which are responsible for managing, maintaining and repairing the common areas in multi-unit developments.

We have to and will study the report to see which recommendations we want to go forward with, whether we want to amend some recommendations and, then, what legislation, if any, is required as a result of the decision we make on the recommendations.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for his response and his acknowledgement of the hard work that we did in 2010 for the private Member's Bill, only for the Law Commission to take over. Will the Minister acknowledge the concerns of apartment owners and dwellers that, until we have strong laws, unscrupulous people will or may continue to exploit the situation? Will he now give serious consideration to legislation to overcome those problems once and for all?

Mr Wilson: All of us who are constituency representatives will be well aware not of only the anxiety that this has caused many people but of the impact that it has had on their ability to sell properties that they have purchased in estates that were supposed to have common areas managed but that has not happened and there has not been proper management. In some cases, questions arise as to what happened to the funds that they put into the whole management arrangement.

I had hoped that we would have been in a position to make firmer proposals far sooner than this, but the Law Commission made a meal out of getting this report to us. We have it now, and we will look at the recommendations and seek a way forward as quickly as possible.

The one point that I would make to the Member — this has been difficult in the Republic and in Scotland — is the question of whether any law can deal retrospectively with problems that already exist or whether it is simply a law that will be devised to look at problems as they arise and maybe cover, through legislation, a problem related to that in the past.

Mr McKay: Does the Minister agree in principle that tenants and owners of apartments are entitled to equality of service with all other tenants and property owners? He has outlined that consideration will be given to the proposals. Can he give us an idea of the timescale for that?

Mr Wilson: I hope it will happen as quickly as possible. First of all, we have to look at the recommendations. We may have to query with the Law Commission why it made some of the recommendations and the thinking behind them and, after that, quickly start consultation on the steps forwards. I have no doubt that the Committee will have an important role to play, as will other interested Members.

Mr Craig: The Minister referred to Scotland. Will he outline what the Homeowner Housing Panel is and his view on whether something similar could be applied in Northern Ireland?

Mr Wilson: It is an independent decision-making body. It is separate from the Scottish Government and local authorities. It determines, first of all, applications from homeowners who consider that their property management agent has failed to carry out duties or to comply with the code of conduct. The panel will have independent members who are appointed by Scottish Ministers and specialise in housing and land management issues, as well as a legal representative and an industry representative. Administration for the panel is provided by Scottish Tribunals Service through support staff. The panel can deal with the issue of management companies and lays down the rules for such companies and makes sure that they are enforced.

DFF: Flags and Flagpoles

2. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel how much his Department has spent on flags and flagpoles in the last five years. (AQO 4246/11-15)

Mr Wilson: The Department has spent £7 on flags and flagpoles in the past five years, so you can see that we get good bargains on our flags in Northern Ireland.

Ms McCorley: Does the Minister recognise that erecting flagpoles in Belfast city centre has the potential to raise tensions unnecessarily? Further to that, was there consultation with the people who work in those buildings before the decision was taken? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Wilson: The question amazes me. The people who have objected to the steps that I have taken are responsible for the powers that I exercised. I am exercising my powers under the Flags Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2000. What was the origin of the regulations? The origin was the Belfast Agreement. Who negotiated the Belfast Agreement? It was Sinn Féin and the SDLP, who have been some of the most vociferous critics of this and who endorsed the agreement and encouraged people to vote for it. I could almost say, "Thank you" to the Member's party for encouraging people to give me the ability to erect flags on government buildings in Belfast city centre. I did not need to consult because, as I am reminded time and time again, the agreement was endorsed by the majority of people in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic.

Mr Campbell: Does the Finance Minister agree that it would sometimes be better for those who pose such questions and their parties to ask themselves what was the origin of the flag problem on 3 December 2012? Had they not taken that decision then, perhaps the Finance Minister would not have had to take his.

Mr Wilson: I am afraid that the Finance Minister would have taken his decision anyway. Perhaps it was only because the issue was raised that my attention was drawn to the law that enables me to fly the flag on public buildings. In my view, the best and most dignified way of expressing that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom is not to have flags on every post along the road, sometimes left to lie in tatters; it is to fly them officially on government buildings. The decision to have the dignified flying of the flag on government buildings to indicate that they are part of the government of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland was the right one. Regardless of whether the flag protests had ever happened or the issue had ever been raised, it was still the right decision, and I stand over it.

Mr Allister: I note the very modest expenditure involved. In light of that, can the Minister encourage his colleague the Culture Minister, who has had a budget of millions in respect of the UK city of what seems to be monoculture, to endorse the idea that it would be appropriate at some point during the UK City of Culture to allow the flying of the flag of the United Kingdom? She is on record, in an answer in the House, as saying that there will be no occasion when the UK flag will fly during the UK City of Culture. Likewise —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has placed his question.

Mr Allister: Likewise, she seems to want to get to the same position with the World Police and Fire Games.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has placed his question.

Mr Allister: Can the Minister encourage her, in all the squander that she undertakes, to spend some money in this direction?

Mr Wilson: I wish that it were in my power to direct her to do so. There is an anomaly: on one hand, the Minister and others wish to capitalise on the advantages that the UK City of Culture coming to Londonderry can have for the economy and profile of the city, while, at the same time, they do not wish to recognise the ultimate symbol of the UK, namely, the flag of the country.

Apartment Development Management Companies

3. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for his assessment of the position of the Northern Ireland Law Commission on the regulation of apartment development management companies. (AQO 4247/11-15)

Mr Wilson: The commission mooted the possibility of a new, simpler form of company for management companies, and it appears that the option was very attractive to consultees. However, ultimately, the commission concluded that a new form of company might not be an effective solution in the shorter term. It went on to suggest that administrative requirements for the management companies could be modified and adapted. However, it is not entirely clear what the commission has in mind in that regard. That is one of the reasons why I said in an earlier answer that I would like to explore some of the thinking behind the recommendations that it made. Given the specific legislation that was required in the Irish Republic to regulate the operations of the owners' management companies, it might not be possible to achieve as big an impact by simply changing things at administrative level, and legislation may well be required.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his answer. Given that there is a bit of a grey area on this aspect and that some may say that part of it is consumer law, can the Minister confirm that, if he feels that legislation should come forward, it should come forward through DFP?

Mr Wilson: There is a range of law involved here; there is company law, consumer law and property law. I do not mind which Department it comes through. I do not think that it is in the interests of those who are affected by this to have an interdepartmental squabble as to who should have ownership of the legislation. To me, a grave problem has been identified, and now we have to find the most effective and quickest way of dealing with that problem to make sure that management agents and/or companies are brought under some kind of control and that, where they feel aggrieved, people can use an appeal mechanism to have their grievance dealt with.

Mr Weir: What role does the national Property Services Regulatory Authority have to play in the issue?

Mr Wilson: The national Property Services Regulatory Authority has been set up in the Republic, and it does a number of things. This will be one of the things that we will want to look at. It provides for a comprehensive licensing system that covers all the property service providers. First, there will be a licence. Secondly, it will investigate and adjudicate on complaints that are made against those property service providers. It also has an audit and inspection function of the operation. It does not just sit back and wait for complaints; it will go in and investigate. There is a proactive element to it. It also sets down minimum qualification standards for anybody who wishes to set up such a company.

When Members raised this matter in the Assembly, I imagine that those are the kinds of issues that they wanted dealt with. The questions are these: can we deal with this in an administrative way, what legislation, if any, do we require and how quickly can we move towards that?

Business: Non-domestic Rates

4. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the response of the business community to the non-domestic rates evaluation. (AQO 4248/11-15)

Mr Wilson: I am glad that the Member has asked the question. It raises important points that I have been trying to get across to the business community over the past number of weeks.

The Department is undertaking the exercise in response to calls from the business community for a rates revaluation, despite the fact that the Westminster, Scottish and Welsh Governments have all decided to postpone theirs until 2017. That said, it is a difficult time to do it, but I believe that it is the right thing to do. It is difficult because the property market is in some turmoil, and it is difficult to establish long-term rents. Rents have gone down since the boom days. My fear is that everybody thinks that they will be a winner and that, because rents have come down, rates will also go down. I emphasise that we want to get the same amount of money from rates. What may happen is that, in relative terms, some people's rents will have gone down more than others', so they will benefit. Some people's rents will have gone down less than others, so they will have to pay more.

The rental market is difficult to read during this prolonged recession, which is why I encourage people to make responses. Forty-five thousand businesses have been canvassed. To date, around 7,000 businesses have responded. The more information that we have about the market, the more accurately we can undertake the revaluation exercise. If we do not have the information, we will have to make a best guess.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for his answer. What will happen if the business community provides insufficient evidence for the evaluation?

Mr Wilson: I do not want to contemplate that happening because it is in businesses' interests to respond so that we have the best information possible to establish net annual values (NAVs) across the Province and, therefore, what should happen to people's rates. I encourage businesses to go online and fill in their response so that we have the best information. If that does not work, we will have to base assessments on the evidence that is available, which will probably result in many assessments not being right the first time. It will mean additional work as people make appeals and cases against assessments. I would rather that we got it right the first time rather than put people through the operation of having to appeal the initial assessments because our information was incomplete.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht an mhéid a dúirt sé.

As the Minister said, many businesses have expectations that revaluation will lead to a lowering of rates. That has been evident in many radio broadcasts. What action does the Minister intend to take to manage those expectations?

Mr Wilson: The first action is to get the message across. Many business organisations have now got the message that we will not be looking to take any more or any less money in rates from businesses after the revaluation is finished. We will be looking to get the same pot of money. Do not forget that the Executive are committed to a 0% real increase in the amount of money that we take from businesses. However, some businesses will pay more because economic conditions have moved in their favour. Maybe the market has pushed consumers towards certain types of business or certain areas. Some businesses will pay less because their areas or locations have had a fall in customer numbers, footfall or economic activity, which will be reflected in the relative rents that they pay. So the same amount of money will be gathered, but it will simply be gathered in a different way. As a result of revaluation, there will be winners and losers.

The second thing is that, where there are big changes in the amount of money that businesses pay, there will be — we did this last time, and there is no reason why the Executive will not make the decision this time as well — an interim arrangement whereby the increases are introduced gradually. So, nobody should be hit with a massive increase in their rates bill, but they will know that, within two years, it will build up to a certain level.

Mr Swann: Looking to SMEs, which are the other side of our businesses, what is the current uptake for the rate relief scheme for empty shops, following its recent introduction?

Mr Wilson: To date, there have been, I think, well over 120 — I do not have the exact figure, but it is well over 120 — across all council areas. That has resulted in new businesses starting up and hundreds of jobs being created. Obviously, I would like to see more of that happening. A 50% reduction in rates in the first year, which, of course, is the most difficult year for a new business, is an important concession. The pleasing thing is that that innovation in Northern Ireland has now been copied by other Administrations across the United Kingdom.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 5 has been withdrawn and transferred to OFMDFM.

Government: Revenue

6. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the relationship between locally generated revenue and the British Consolidated Fund. (AQO 4250/11-15)

Mr Wilson: Broadly speaking, all tax generated locally is due to the UK Consolidated Fund. Some other receipts, most notably rates, which we just talked about, are a devolved responsibility and are lodged with the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. Some other receipts, such as minor items of revenue from fines, levies and penalties, also go into the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. However, most taxes raised in Northern Ireland go into the UK Consolidated Fund.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. Many people are not aware that the majority of revenue generated here enters the central pot in Britain. Can the Minister indicate the manner in which the current situation that he just described benefits our economy?

Mr Wilson: Most people should be aware that, although we put some in, we get twice as much out. It is actually of benefit that we do not have to rely solely on tax revenue generated here in Northern Ireland and that it is supplemented by the block grant and the addition to the block grant, which well exceeds the taxes raised in Northern Ireland. Our taxes are paid into the Consolidated Fund, and twice as much comes back out again. I think that that is a fairly good bargain. Of course, that is the bargain that we have because we are part of the United Kingdom. How much poorer would we be if the only money available to the Executive and the Assembly was that which was generated in Northern Ireland?

Mr Rogers: The contingency fund is part of the Consolidated Fund. What access do the Executive have to that fund?

Mr Wilson: The contingency fund is held centrally by government for exceptional circumstances. In some cases, it is anticipated that exceptional circumstances might occur around, for example, security etc, and we can draw down from the contingency fund for that. If a particular disaster or issue were to hit Northern Ireland or was UK-wide, an allocation would be made from the contingency fund. If the Government were to spend, say, £100 million, we would get our Barnett consequential from that. If the issue was particular to Northern Ireland, with exceptional circumstances leading to exceptional expenditure, it would, of course, be up to me and the Executive to negotiate with Treasury for drawdown from the contingency fund.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Question 7 has been withdrawn and transferred to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Economy: Fiscal Measures

8. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the priorities for the devolution of fiscal levers to stimulate economic growth. (AQO 4252/11-15)

Mr Wilson: Although we are very disappointed that the Prime Minister does not intend to make a decision on the devolution of corporation tax until after the Scottish independence referendum in autumn 2014, the Executive remain committed to securing those powers, and that remains our number one priority.

Officials are examining actions that could be taken forward now so that a devolved rate could be implemented as soon as possible after a positive decision by the Government. I would be reluctant to seek additional fiscal powers that require a block grant reduction while the possibility of securing corporation tax powers remains.

As I pointed out in an earlier answer to the Member's colleague, the more fiscal autonomy we have here in Northern Ireland, the greater the possibility that the Treasury may well say, with regard to the additional money that they put into the block grant, "If you wish to stand on your own two feet, we are happy for you to do that". We could finish up much poorer in Northern Ireland.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answers. It is good to see that he is using the conditional tense now. There is a question over the accuracy of the figures that he has quoted. Given that the Tory Government have stated clearly that there are limitations in how they finance the devolved Administrations, does the Minister agree that it is now time for a more strategic approach to fiscal powers here in the North?

Mr Wilson: Can I just nail this nonsense? The Member and his party have asked me I do not know how many questions about how much money is raised in Northern Ireland and how much money comes from the United Kingdom. One thing I will make clear to the Member is that, no matter how much he and his party try to wriggle, we are billions — not millions — of pounds better off as part of the United Kingdom. That might stick in his throat, and he might like that not to be the case, but it is. To talk about the figures being inaccurate as though, somehow or other, the billions of pounds of additional money that we get as a result of our membership of the United Kingdom would somehow disappear is the kind of fairy tale economics that Sinn Féin is so good at and that leaves them looking stupid on many occasions when they take part in economic debates.

I have already stated that I do not believe that there is a case for obtaining or seeking widespread additional fiscal powers for Northern Ireland. Where there is a good case to be made and there is a good economic rationale behind it, I will throw all my weight behind it. Look at the efforts that Arlene Foster and I put into securing the abolition of air passenger duty for long-haul flights: that is an indication that I will not shy away from seeking additional fiscal powers when they are beneficial, but only when they are beneficial and not for the political reasons that Sinn Féin would seek them, even though it might leave the people of Northern Ireland impoverished.

Mrs Overend: Further to what the Minister has said about the strength of being part of the United Kingdom, will he inform the House what consideration he has given to the outworkings of the Silk commission in Wales and the Scotland Act 2012?

Mr Wilson: Scotland and Wales, especially Scotland, are following their own agendas. The Scottish National Party Government wish to have greater fiscal autonomy and are pursuing that. Whether that is a wise course of action is a matter entirely for them and the people of Scotland. As I have said, I am not convinced that there are sound grounds for seeking the widespread devolution of fiscal powers for Northern Ireland, although where there is a case made for individual taxes to be devolved, after consideration of the costs and the benefits, if the benefits outweigh the costs, of course serious consideration ought to be given to it.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith. The Minister mentioned earlier that officials were currently looking at other options around corporation tax. Will he outline any further steps that the Executive are taking now that Prime Minister Cameron has kicked it down the line until after the results of the Scottish devolution referendum?

3.30 pm

Mr Wilson: Just to correct the Member: I said that officials were examining the actions that need to be taken so that, once a decision was made about the devolution of corporation tax, we had the mechanisms and regime that we needed in place so that there was not a further period of delay after the decision had been made. However, he raises an important issue: we should not simply mark time while we wait for that. There are a number of proposals that we have been suggesting in the economic pact that the First Minister and deputy First Minister have been speaking to the Prime Minister about. We regard those very much as interim arrangements that would help to deal with some of the economic difficulties that we have over the next number of months and years while we wait for a decision to be finally made by the Government on corporation tax.

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £8,271,268,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £8,558,118,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1.3 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Estimates 2013-14 that was laid before the Assembly on 29 May 2013. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I welcome the opportunity to outline the views of the Environment Committee on the Supply resolution for the Main Estimates for 2013-14.

In a recent briefing to the Committee, departmental officials highlighted the decrease in the Department's current expenditure budget by £3.2 million, which is a fall of 2.6% on its 2012-13 allocation and a fall of 6.9% on its baseline 2010-11 allocation. The Committee has also noted that, with no real resurgence in the construction industry, the Department's income from planning applications is unlikely to rise for the foreseeable Budget period. The Committee has previously welcomed the measures put in place to minimise the effect of that.

Revenue generated from the recent introduction of the carrier bags levy is also unlikely to compensate for the amount of £4 million removed from the budget, so the Committee has expressed its support for the bid submitted under the June monitoring round to cover the net deficit arising from that. Obviously, the Committee has concerns as to how the overall reduction in funding is likely to impact on the service delivery of the Department. The Committee feels very strongly that progress in achieving targets on river basin management plans has been severely hampered by inadequate funding.

The overall status of water bodies in Northern Ireland has not changed significantly since 2009, with only 29% currently at "good" status. The status of our largest inland water, Lough Neagh, is in the lowest possible category. That is particularly concerning to the Committee as it is the source of 40% of our tap water. The importance of meeting the requirements of the water framework directive has not been recognised in the Estimates. Extra resources are required, not only to address the environmental considerations of providing clean water but to avoid the payment of heavy EU infraction fines.

The Committee has also expressed reservations on the funding of local government reform. A wide range of costs has been identified, from expenditure associated with the possible relocation of headquarters and ICT changes to severance payments for councillors. The Committee believes that it is imperative that the process is adequately funded to ensure the success of the transition to the new councils. For that reason, the Committee was content to support the Department's bid in its June monitoring round submission for an additional £5.05 million to fund local government reform. I understand that that funding has already been agreed by the Executive.

I will now make some comments as the Alliance spokesperson for the environment. I believe that, for a Department with such a vast range of responsibilities, the budget for the Department of the Environment is inadequate, and does not reflect the need to protect and enhance our built and natural environment. The comparatively small spending allocation does not provide a positive message to the public from the Assembly that we care greatly about our environment. It also does not suggest that we care greatly about climate change, renewable energy or road safety, which are just some of the many issues the Department deals with that impact profoundly on our lives now and in the future.

Already struggling from an ever-diminishing financial allocation, the Department's position was made worse when £4 million was taken away from its budget, as that was expected to be recouped from the carrier bag levy. With some shops noting a 98% drop in the use of carrier bags, it now seems unlikely that anywhere near that amount of money will be raised, and I am concerned that projects that were earmarked for funding through that will lose out on much-needed investment if the departmental bid is not successful this time around. I believe that the principle of taking that money from the Department's budget was wrong in the first place. If we look at other examples, such as Wales, any money that was collected from the levy was additional to the Department's budget, and it was given to the voluntary sector for innovative and extra work to enhance the environment. I believe that that should have been the case in Northern Ireland.

As I have said before in the House, we are blessed with a rich and diverse natural and built environment, with clean air and water; beautiful countryside; lovely beaches, with or without the sunshine; and abundant wildlife, some of which is unique to Northern Ireland. Surely, it is our duty to effectively conserve and enhance our heritage for this and future generations to enjoy. Doing that will require adequate resources and a place higher up the Executive's priorities. A healthy environment will produce healthier people and a healthier economy.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will speak initially as the Chair of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

As the economy is the Executive's number one priority, the Committee has always believed that it is important that Invest NI be resourced to meet current commitments and to deliver on future opportunities that present themselves. During last week's meeting on the June monitoring round — unfortunately we did not get the papers well in advance, but, nevertheless, we did what we could with them — the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment considered bids from Invest NI for £5 million for the growth loan fund, £2.3 million for the Northern Ireland spin-out initiatives that support start-up and early-stage businesses and £1.7 million for the small business loan fund. The Department stated that it may be necessary to bid for a further £2 million to £4 million later in the year, depending on the performance of those funds. I have heard that those funds have been useful in stimulating some growth in business and, in particular, job creation support schemes.

The Committee also noted that Invest NI activity has increased over the past 12 months, with work in progress increasing by 105%. This has led to a resource bid of £4.5 million to cover expected pressures from an increased number of Skills Funding Agency (SFA) and R&D projects. Although it is heartening to see this increased level of activity in Invest NI, it is regrettable that Invest NI has to bid for funds. Invest NI is expecting to see an increase in this sort of activity, so it is essential that funds are made available now and in the future to meet demand. As the Finance Minister will know, the Committee has always supported the view that Invest NI should be provided with greater budget flexibility. The Department has informed the Committee that the tentative signs of recovery are increasing budget pressures in Invest NI. Although the Minister has provided assurances, Invest NI should be in a position to plan and move forward confidently, without having to regularly refer to the Finance Minister to make sure that appropriate financial support will be provided to secure private sector business investment and desperately needed jobs in the community.

When the Committee for Finance and Personnel was briefed on the Main Estimates in May, members were told that DETI was being allocated £4 million for something called studio capacity. The Committee would welcome more information on what that is and how, in fact, the money may be spent.

I will speak now as an MLA and as Chair of the all-party Assembly working group on construction. Some reference has been made to projects, and my colleague Alban Maginness referred to the provision of the policing and emergency services college at Desertcreat, which brings us back to this concept of spade-ready projects that many, particularly in the construction industry, hear of. The point must be made, and it is one that I am sure the Minister will readily hear, that the construction industry is crying out for those spade-ready projects, whether in roads or otherwise. The diversion, for want of a better phrase, of funding as a consequence of A5 project gives rise to the potential of other roads projects, the likes of newbuild schools and health estate projects. I would appreciate the Minister putting on record when those deliberations around reductions and adjustments in finances could ultimately lead to something happening on the site at Desertcreat, where not only the construction industry but services and the local economy in the Cookstown, Dungannon and south Derry areas are particularly looking ahead to that project. I attended a meeting with the Chamber of Commerce, and some members there are living in hope that the project will go ahead but others voiced some scepticism because they think that, in fact, it may not go ahead. I sought to reassure them as best I could, but, inevitably, the man with the money, Minister Wilson, is in a better position than I am to do that.

On the construction industry again, last time, unfortunately, £15 million was, for whatever reason, handed back from the social housing budget. Social housing is a great investment, not only in providing people with a roof over their head, although many coming through difficult circumstances as a result of the recession need such housing, but like the other spade-ready projects, it provides tangible employment in the community. Similarly, the retrofitting of homes in the public and private sectors — that green new deal package or, I emphasise, its best elements — leads to fuel savings and addresses issues of fuel poverty in people's homes. It also creates work and saves our environment.

A final thing on the green issue, and I know that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has taken an interest in this: will the Minister look at the potential that may arise from the new green investment bank for projects? With a bit of support and, in some cases, a little nudging from the respective Departments, we can see coming to the fore a variety of projects that could, as with the others that I mentioned, give a huge injection to the construction industry, help with employment and, through the green new deal and green investment bank, help our environment. If there are potentials, and if issues and opportunities arise around funding that may be available there, will the Minister shed some light on what his Department is doing to help realise those opportunities, particularly in the business sector?

That is my submission on behalf of the Committee and while wearing my other respective hats in and around the Assembly.

3.45 pm

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I will speak as Committee Chair to begin with.

The Committee was briefed by officials on the 2013-14 opening budget and June monitoring round at its meeting on 29 May this year; a meeting that should, of course, have allowed members time to consider the Department's position. Unfortunately, some papers were received just 30 minutes prior to the Committee's meeting. I note the criticism from the Chair of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment on a similar issue. Those 30 minutes left the Committee insufficient time to consider the proposals in any detail. As a one-off, perhaps that is something you could ignore, but it is a recurring theme, I believe, not just between the Department and the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister but between all our Executive Departments, or indeed most of them, and their respective Committees. Let me repeat what I have said in Committee: we are there to scrutinise, and that is not to be conflated with criticise. When you scrutinise, you may then turn around and support and praise the Department for its work. So, I do not understand why it is that we are getting late papers, particularly with regard to core financial information.

At the meeting, the Department advised that its opening resource budget was £73.9 million, a reduction of around £6 million compared with last year's figures. The Department highlighted that it was a particularly challenging allocation for this year due to additional pressures on the Department. However, at the same 29 May meeting, I think that it is fair to say that not one member of the Committee could claim with any confidence to fully understand the financial info as presented. So, there are two issues for the Minister to address: one being timeliness, the other being clarity.

One of the additional pressures I have just mentioned is in relation to the inquiry into historical institutional abuse. The Committee was advised, during the Committee Stage of the Bill, that costs were estimated at between £15 million and £19 million over the lifetime of the inquiry and that the necessary funds would be made available despite there being no baseline in the budget. I believe that the June monitoring round will see a bid put forward by the Department of some £3.8 million.

There is an issue with regard to the regeneration of former military sites, particularly Shackleton barracks, where there is no baseline for ongoing security and maintenance costs, which are significant for such a large site. The Committee was advised that it costs around £500,000 to £600,000 per annum for security, maintenance and pumping, as the site is below the waterline. Again, there is a capital bid in the June monitoring round for £1.3 million to cover the costs of those sites gifted by the Ministry of Defence in the Hillsborough agreement.

There will be significant expenditure in relation to the First Minister and deputy First Minister's recent statement on Together: Building a United Community. Junior Minister Bell mentioned on BBC television a figure of some £500 million over the next couple of years. Again, that is something that the Committee will take a view on in the coming months.

The Committee will continue to monitor the various Executive funds, such as the social investment fund and childcare fund, to ensure that spending is targeted and outcome-based.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I will speak now as a Member of the House rather than as the Chair of the Committee. I mentioned the bid in the June monitoring round for the historical institutional abuse inquiry. It is crucial that the inquiry is appropriately funded. There are concerns about the current support. During Question Time, junior Minister Bell talked about the two hours' counselling provided by WAVE. The Committee has had approaches from those who have already engaged in the inquiry. With your permission, I will read into the record a couple of quotes. The first is from somebody on behalf of a female who attended the inquiry. The witness said:

"She has not been well lately because of there being no support services or counselling in place after she came from the inquiry, just like many others before and after her. We will be fighting for support services for more than the two hours offered on a Friday morning and to have a clinical psychologist, somebody who genuinely understands and can help victims come through their pain."

Another witness was a man who attended the historical institutional abuse inquiry and was then trying to seek appropriate counselling. He wrote:

"I didn't want to do Tuesdays and I asked for Thursdays, but she did not want to lose money not seeing me on Tuesday, so it seemed that her money was more important than I was. She had the gall to say, 'Come up to the Ormeau Road to talk on Thursday.' The cheek of it. That is where I suffered so badly with nuns. I was shocked and sickened and felt so alone. Help is what I need."

I hope that the Minister will take those testimonies on board as the June monitoring round and further costs come to his door for the historical institutional abuse inquiry. As junior Minister Jonathan Bell said, people have suffered in non-institutional settings. I make the plea to the Minister to think of making funding available for a second process. Junior Minister Bell says that you can go to the PSNI or to social services, but why do we have an inquiry whereby, when you knock on the door and say that you were abused, the first thing that happens is that the person at the door shows you a list of venues and asks whether you were abused at one of those venues. If the answer is yes, they ask you to come in and say that they will help you, but if the answer is no because you were abused at a different venue, the door is metaphorically slammed in your face, and you are told to try the PSNI or social services. There is a basic inequality.

Will the Minister make clear at what point a military site such as Shackleton Barracks will cost us more to maintain than to sell? I understand that there was an attempt to value Shackleton Barracks, with a view to selling. Surely, at £500,000 to £600,000 a year, the time will come quite rapidly when it has cost the Executive more to hold on to the barracks, and it would have to say, "Thank you, but no thank you" to the MoD.

The social investment fund was originally £80 million over four years; it now appears to be £80 million over two years. I would welcome clarity from the Minister on the spending patterns. Will the full £80 million be spent within the time frame of the CSR, and will it be spent in an equitable manner? In lieu of the social investment fund last year, the six signature projects were announced. Will the Minister tell us how much has been spent and what the spending profile is for those over the next couple of years?

At least one Member mentioned the childcare strategy: £12 million effectively in the bank. Very little of that money has been spent, but up to 50% has been allocated before the production of a strategy. Of course, there is the big issue of what are the spending plans for Together: Building a United Community, and where will the money come from?

I have the OFMDFM resource budgets for CSR 10 by programme. This is something to read into the record. It was provided to the Committee by the departmental Assembly liaison officer, who said that it is the initial 2010 four-year budget and is attached at annex A. The Community Relations Council has a year-on-year budget of around £3.5 million. Will the Minister make clear the implications of that budget line with the introduction of the proposed equality and good relations committee? Will the budget for that new body impact on the £3.5 million for the Community Relations Council? The Attorney General gets an uplift of £250,000. Is there any particular reason why Mr Larkin needs more money? We also have the peace-building and conflict resolution centre. At a briefing, we heard that it will cost £650,000 per annum by subvention. The deputy First Minister told the House that it could generate a profit of £1 million.

Finally, in annex A of the resource budgets for this year and next year, but not the previous two years of the CSR, there is a budget line for a public assemblies, parades and protests body. That phrase came out of the Hillsborough agreement when the DUP and Sinn Féin attempted to sort out parading and said to leave it up to them and that they would come up with a new way of doing things. They were proposing a public assemblies, parades and protests body, for which they have budgeted £2.2 million for this year and £2.390 million for next year, which amounts to £4.5 million for a body that does not exist. Perhaps the Minister will explain that in his closing comments.

Ms S Ramsey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. It is probably the only time in the history of the Assembly that the Minister has had everyone saying nice things about him, not attacking him, but putting him in a good mood. Maybe the bit of sun at the weekend was the best thing that could have happened for you, Minister?

Mr Wilson: It would take more than that to put me in a good mood.

Ms S Ramsey: Having listened to some contributors to the debate, there are questions that officials from all Departments need to answer to their respective Committees. They also need to present paperwork to Committees earlier so that we can carry out our role of scrutinising what Departments are doing. We are not there for the sake of constantly battling with departmental officials. I say to them all the time that I do not want to fight with them every week. I want them to give me the relevant information. It is about having a partnership approach to ensure that we get the best outcomes for the people we represent.

The Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety met departmental officials on 29 May to explore some of the challenges facing the Department in its 2013-14 budget. The officials told the Committee that the Department is facing a funding shortfall this year and has, therefore, decided to submit significant bids in the June monitoring round. One of the main areas that needs extra funding is the transitional cost for implementing Transforming Your Care, or TYC as it is known. Some Members probably did not know what TYC was until a few weeks ago when we had the debacle around the residential care homes. There is a concern that this policy and vision is in place, whether or not it was voted on in this Assembly, and, every so often, the Department comes to us to say that it needs additional money to implement it.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Member for giving way. Does she agree that it was rather disappointing that, when the officials came to the Committee a couple of weeks ago to talk about the June monitoring round, they were not in a position to tell us exactly what the funding was for domiciliary care, on which so much of Transforming Your Care depends?

Ms S Ramsey: I am going to cover that point near the end of my remarks on behalf of the Committee. The Member is right; domiciliary care is an important part of Transforming Your Care. When we talk about bringing more services out of the acute/hospital sector and into the primary care/ community care sector, it is important to get that right, and domiciliary care is a key component of Transforming Your Care.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

The Department told us that it is estimated that £70 million is required to implement TYC between 2012 and 2015. Last year, the Department received £19 million through the invest-to-save scheme, and it is bidding for £28 million in June monitoring to cover the current financial year. As Chairperson of the Committee, I would be mad not to hope that the Department gets additional funding, and the Committee welcomes the bid for money to implement Transforming Your Care, but we were disappointed that officials could not provide us with the detail on what the money will be spent on. The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee covered that when he was talking about additional nursing staff.

We have been trying to probe further in order to find out whether that money will go towards creating new jobs so that Transforming Your Care is implemented. Will new jobs be created in health and social care? If so, in which professions, and in which locations will they be based? What new posts are required to support integrated care partnerships, which are a key theme of Transforming Your Care? How much money is going into domiciliary care? That is the question that Kieran McCarthy asked. These are all important questions to which the Committee needs answers so that we can carry out our role.

The Committee was also concerned that a bid has gone in for external consultants — not medical consultants — to be part of the management process for implementing TYC. Members will recall that the same issue came up a number of months ago when money was given to external consultants to develop population plans. One of the key questions asked by our Committee was this: why are we paying good money to consultants to tell us our population plans when the Health and Social Care Board and the trusts should have that information? If they are delivering services to a population, it seems silly that they do not know the size or the needs of that population.

The Department is very large and it employs some very clever people, some of whom have been there for a long time. The Department includes the board and the Business Services Organisation. Some of the people involved in those organisations are highly qualified and skilled. I do not understand why we need to pay good money for external consultants when we have that level of service and skills in the Department. The issue of where they link up depends on what the trusts and the board do on Transforming Your Care. The involvement of external consultants is a concern.

The Department is bidding for £26 million for elective care to bring down waiting times in a range of specialities, including orthopaedics, general surgery, gynaecology and cardiology. The Committee welcomes that. Every one of us in the Chamber will have dealt with constituents who have been told that they will have to wait months for a first appointment, a follow-up appointment or, indeed, surgery. Any strategy to tackle waiting times has to be welcomed. We want to see the Department getting a handle on this, but we have a genuine concern about using the private sector to tackle the backlog. It might tackle the backlog in the here and now, but will we be in the same position this time next year? Is using the private sector to tackle the backlog, especially in general surgery, orthopaedics, gynaecology and cardiology, a wise use of public money? The whole issue of waiting lists, and what can be done to better manage them, is a piece of work the Committee has agreed to look at in more detail in the autumn.

The Department also told the Committee that it is bidding for £1.2 million for the costs that will be incurred by the Ambulance Service, the Fire and Rescue Service and some of the health and social care trusts due to the G8 summit. Other Members mentioned that issue earlier. We have queried why all the costs associated with the G8 are not being picked up by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. As a Committee, we support wholeheartedly the Executive's approach to ensure that any costs incurred by our health and social care budget are paid back. The Health Department has been underfunded for many years, without having to cover the costs of a G8 summit. That is mad, so I support the Minister and his Executive colleagues in trying to get that money back. We are trying to get more detail about what the £1.2 million is for. I mean, £1.2 million for a four-, five- or six-day visit? Flippantly, I asked the other day whether we are going to put up a field hospital in the fields of Fermanagh. That £1.2 million is a lot of money to come from one Department. I am sure that some of the services in the community and voluntary sector would love £1.2 million to deal with issues over a three- or five-year period, never mind £1.2 million for five or six days.

Members will recall the ongoing debate about PEDU when there was an Ulster Unionist Health Minister. The DUP supported PEDU's involvement. As the Minister knows, we have asked the Department for a copy of the 2011 PEDU report so that we can see what recommendations it made for possible savings and efficiencies. Officials have advised us that they require the permission of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to release the report to the Committee. The Committee has agreed to write directly to OFMDFM so that we can get sight of the PEDU report. We feel that access to that report is critical to our understanding of the Department's approach to managing its budget. I hope that the Committee will receive that soon, but I appeal to the Minister on that issue today. The DUP was all over PEDU when Michael McGimpsey was the Minister.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Ms S Ramsey: Now that there is a DUP Minister, it does not seem that the officials are quite so willing to hand over PEDU reports. We wrote to OFMDFM about that, and I hope we get it soon.

Mr Kinahan (The Chairperson of the Audit Committee): This is what you have all been waiting for: a report from the Audit Committee.

On behalf of the Audit Committee, I wish to confirm that the provision for the Northern Ireland Audit Office in the Main Estimates corresponds with the amount agreed by the Audit Committee and laid before the Assembly earlier this year. The current financial climate remains challenging, as the reduction in money available for public expenditure in Northern Ireland continues. The Assembly wants the available public funds to be spent wisely. The Assembly must be able to hold to account the public bodies that have that task. The work of the Audit Office provides the Assembly with effective and truly independent audit assurance in relation to the use of public funds.

In December 2012, the Audit Committee approved the Audit Office's corporate plan for 2013-14 to 2015-16. The plan sets out how the Audit Office, as the Northern Ireland public sector auditor, will hold public bodies to account for the way they use public money. It shows how the Audit Office will undertake its core activities of financial and value-for-money audit. Each year, the Audit Office will conduct audits of over 200 public sector accounts. It will also undertake 11 value-for-money examinations annually. That work is of crucial importance to the Assembly and, in particular, to the Public Accounts Committee, which works closely with the Audit Office to determine whether public bodies have spent taxpayers' money economically, efficiently and effectively.

Of course, the Audit Office does not just have a role to play in ensuring that other public bodies use public funds appropriately. It has a duty to ensure that it, too, operates in accordance with best practice and provides the public with value for money. The Audit Committee, therefore, welcomes the acknowledgment in the plan that the Audit Office itself must maintain the highest standards of propriety and regularity and promote and secure value for money in its use of public funds, while producing quality, value-adding pieces of work.

The Audit Office has already secured significant efficiencies and cost reductions in recent years. It has done that without compromising either the quality or the scope of its work. Its plan anticipates a further decrease in cash terms in the net resource requirement during each of the first two years of the plan. That is followed by an increase in the third year of the plan. The Committee considered the proposed resource requirement in the draft plan and is satisfied that the reduced net resource requirement of 1% in 2013-14 and a further 0.9% in 2014-15, on top of the other efficiencies already made by the Audit Office since 2011-12, is consistent with the overall direction given by the previous Audit Committee in December 2010. That Committee agreed that it envisaged the Audit Office reducing its requirement by at least 10% in cash terms by 2014-15 from a 2010-11 baseline. In fact, the Audit Office's net resource requirement for 2013-14, as provided for in these Estimates, represents a cash terms reduction of 11.39% from the 2010-11 figure of £9.4 million.

The Committee sought assurance from the Comptroller and Auditor General that the proposed savings represented the maximum reduction that could be made by the Audit Office, while — and this is important — maintaining the quality and breadth of service to the Assembly. Having received that assurance, the Committee agreed the 2013-14 Estimate, which provides for a decrease in the net resource requirement of 1% in cash terms from the Estimate for 2012-13, meaning £8.327 million compared to £8.414 million.

The Audit Committee is committed to ensuring that the Audit Office has the resources necessary to ensure that the Assembly is provided with an effective and truly independent audit assurance in relation to public funds. However, it is also important that that should be done in as efficient a manner as possible. The Audit Committee will continue to consider the Audit Office's resource requirement annually. The Audit Committee endorses the provision in the Main Estimates for the Audit Office and looks forward to the continuing valuable support that the office provides to the Assembly.

I will now speak as a Member of the House, although my comments will relate very much to the audit role and will touch on efficiency savings. Many have discussed the failure to get clarity or timeliness in reports to various Committees, but I was shocked in the Education Committee when, in the presentation by the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the assistant auditor general said that all Departments do not really understand what efficiency savings are and how to achieve them. That is shocking. By efficiency savings, we mean managing how money is spent to save money and, most importantly, how it is effectively spent to create savings elsewhere.

As part of the Budget process, the Executive agreed that, from 2008 to 2011, Departments should work to deliver efficiency savings of 3% a year. What do we really mean by that? We mean savings that are not achieved by simply cutting funding of priority front line services. We are told that, especially in education, efficiencies that were claimed to be efficiencies were in fact one-off savings and that they may well lead to increases in costs per unit per output. That is extremely worrying. The report states that the present departmental reporting lacks sufficient detail, is not informative and lacks clarity. The Northern Ireland Audit Office argues that efficiencies can only be genuinely claimed when there is no reduction in the volume or quality of service delivery. We were told that, often, no information was provided on volume of outputs or quality of services and, therefore, that no informed interpretation was possible. We are governing Northern Ireland with no proper transparency or understanding of how to do so efficiently. Minister, I hope that you will look at and review what is happening to ensure that all Departments fully understand what is meant by efficiency savings and how to carry them out.

The Northern Ireland Audit Office also observed that there was no centralised challenge function in the context of efficiency delivery plans and the validity of efficiencies. What do we mean by no challenge function? That is all of us on the Committees. Do we all know what we are doing on the Committees to challenge each Department and its spending? I acknowledge that we have the Public Accounts Committee and that a briefing is going on at present on how to question effectively. But is that enough? I ask again: what will the Minister put in place to make sure that all Committees become excellent challenge systems? It is incredibly important, and we should all take on board that we must learn how we all have a role in making this Building work efficiently.

Mr Allister: Traditionally, in worthwhile Parliaments and Assemblies, Supply day resolutions tend to be good opportunities for opposition parties to explore and interrogate issues. So, I thought that, with last week's announcement of a new, vibrant opposition party, NI21, there would be nothing for me to do today. To my dismay, I discover that we now have to add the acronym AWOL to NI21, because here is an opportunity to explore, interrogate, challenge, expose and oppose all the things in the Estimates, and suddenly there is a deadly silence from that quarter. It is most disappointing, Mr Deputy Speaker, considering that I thought that I was going to have things much easier in the Assembly now, but there you are.

I will begin by questioning the veracity of this process. We all, very solemnly, come here and have trundled out to us in a resolution very daunting figures of eight and a quarter billion of cash or eight and a half billion of resources or whatever that will be supplied. It is all part of a very focused, orientated and worked-out budgetary process, and we are told that this is how we do it because we know what we are doing and how we are going to spend this money, what it is for, etc. We travel along with that ringing in our ears, and then something such as what happened a couple of weeks ago occurs. We have the First Minister and deputy First Minister — I welcome Mr McCrea to the debate. [Laughter.] He is a little underdressed today compared with his previous appearance. We have the First Minister and deputy First Minister suddenly announce all sorts of grandiose schemes that are not in any of these Estimates and are not in any budgetary document and which the House has never approved but which will come to fruition. No one is saying how they will be paid for. You have a bit of financial making on the hoof in a TV studio from a junior Minister who plucks out a figure of £500 million. However, at Question Time today, question 5 to the Department of Finance and Personnel was:

“to ask the Minister of Finance and Personnel to detail the financial implications of the Together: Building a United Community strategy”.

What happened? You did not get an answer, because the question was transferred to OFMDFM. Here we are, debating with all seriousness — or we are expected to — all these issues about how we will find and spend the money, and when a question such as that is asked, it is not for the Minister to answer it but for OFMDFM to answer it. So, where is whatever the figure is coming from? Where is it in these Estimates?

Take DEL, the Department on whose scrutiny Committee I sit. The Minister for Employment and Learning was never consulted about the very significant NEETs dimension of Building Together or whatever the latest fad for calling the project is. It is the Together: Building a United Community strategy, and it is used to be known as shared future. If you want to dust something down and reinvent and re-present it, you always have to change the name, so we had to change the name from shared future to the Together: Building a United Community strategy. Helping the 10,000 young people who, unhappily, are neither in education nor employment is an important part of that strategy, and, yet, the Minister for Employment and Learning, who is charge of that, was never consulted. He came to the Committee and did not know how it will impact on his Department, because he already has a NEETs programme. He did not know how it will be tweaked or changed or whether it is additional or supplementary to his programme or whether it is part of it or is intended to replace the existing NEETs programme. There were no answers to any of that.

Mr D Bradley: So what?

Mr Allister: “So what?” Indeed. I suppose that that about sums it up. “So what?” One just might expect that the Minister for Employment and Learning would have been consulted and asked about these things, that his view would have been taken and that what was proposed would have been something that would dovetail with and fit into that which is already on the boards. But, no, that is too much to expect, it seems.

One could go on about other aspects of that programme. Where is all of that in this infrastructure of budgetary process that we go through, including Supply resolutions and in-year monitoring and all of that when, suddenly, things like that can be whipped out of a hat with no funding spelt out whatsoever?

Then, of course, we have in these Estimates figures for, say, Roads Service. The Department for Regional Development is to get so many hundreds of millions of pounds. Then, the A5 programme hits the — falls apart, let us say, and the money is not required. One might have thought that that would be an opportunity to advance roads projects that are needed in other areas, such as the A26, which is one of the most dangerous roads, as is proven, sadly, time and time again, year in and year out. One would have thought that that was a programme that could, therefore, be accelerated and improvements made. However, it may well turn out that all that money will be siphoned off, maybe to pay for Building a United Community. The very day on which the First Minister, belatedly, came to the House to talk about Building a United Community, he dropped a hint that he was looking avariciously at the A5 money. I want to say this: if the House was previously persuaded that that block of money was for roads projects, it should be for roads projects — roads projects that are much-needed, such as the A26. It would be shameful if that money were siphoned off elsewhere, and yet that may well happen. Perhaps the Finance Minister will assure us today that none of that will happen and that other roads projects that are shovel-ready or can be made so will be the beneficiaries of that windfall of funding from the A5. One listens with interest to see if he can give us that assurance.

I will pick up on one or two other points. Huge amounts of money in these Estimates are allocated to the Maze project. Some £7.371 million is allocated to the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation, which will foist upon this community the Maze shrine. It is going to build the peace and reconciliation centre cheek by jowl with the hideous, ugly, toxic political building that is the hospital wing and all that goes with it. Not so long ago, when the proposition was that a stadium might be built there — that might seem, to some, a more innocuous proposition than a political peace centre — this Finance Minister, at that time in the House of Commons, had words of rebuke for it. It was, as he put it, the provision of a shrine to hunger strikers at the Maze. He sought assurance from Ministers at Westminster that direct rule decisions taken about that would now be capable of being reversed. Now, of course, what we find happening is that they are capable of reverse, but reversed with a project much less appealing than even a stadium, a peace and reconciliation centre that will be tainted by all of what the Minister previously talked about as existing at the Maze. If we need a peace and reconciliation centre, why put it on the single most toxic, divisive site you could find anywhere in Northern Ireland?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member will bring his remarks to a close, please.

Mr Allister: Why not give it a chance by putting it on a neutral site? Sadly, it is not going there; it is going to the Maze —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: — because, in this House, what Sinn Féin wants, Sinn Féin gets.

Mr McNarry: The Minister will agree with the understatement that money is tight and value for money is the order of the day for all distributors and users of our public purse. I expect him to know, because, as the Finance Minister, he knows all about those matters. He will also know that the Department for Regional Development is giving the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company a 10-year service agreement contract to provide transport in Northern Ireland. I am sure that he is concerned, as I am, that, despite knowing that, that Department's Minister is going forward today with figures that may not be value for money with that contract and the nebulous situation in which Translink does not have a contract but still avails itself of millions of pounds of public money. Therefore, I am not comfortable with you, Minister continually asking the House, as you have been doing — it is your job, which I respect — for money for regional development to be used further to subsidise the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its trading arm, Translink, particularly in view of the facts. Translink says that it has an £86 million pension scheme deficit liability; that it recently cleared a bank overdraft of £31 million; that it holds £10.5 million in cash and £13.5 million in short-term deposits; and that, on top of that, it has £50 million in other reserves, yet it will carry forward £38 million in trading losses. Minister, are you comfortable with that?

The Minister is the economist. I can read accounts and I can count, but blow me — it blows everybody with whom I sit on the Regional Development Committee — and blow us all if we can understand Translink's management and pursuit of public money when those facts are now in the public domain. I cannot understand how a company can have an overdraft of £31 million when it has £50 million in other reserves of which we know little and £10 million and £13 million in reserve. I ask the Minister whether it is in the public interest and whether he can assure the House that, as Finance Minister, he is content to submit to all requests from that company, as he knows it to be today, for significant and substantial finance, let alone the Assembly, whose duty it will be to decide whether there is a 10-year contract for that or any other company? I ask him on the basis that this is public money for our public service. With the facts that are to hand, I cannot as yet endorse that it is value for money. Can he stand in front of the House today and tell us that, in his opinion, this continuous drip of money for Translink, no matter what it is being used for, is value for money? Can we accept the facts and figures that his Department has obviously sifted through to bring forward any request that future money for Translink should be endorsed by the House?

Mr B McCrea: A number of Members have asked what the Estimates mean because they are not particularly transparent. In fact, Mr Allister was rather chiding of the remark about certain people not being here to participate in the debate. I regret that I have not matched the sartorial elegance that he was expecting on this occasion, though I note that he is looking rather dapper. I doubt that I will be able to match his eloquence in putting these things forward, but I will make a number of germane points, because he answered his own question in coming forward on this issue.

This is not a transparent process. Mr Allister started his discussion about the Department for Employment and Learning. For a time, I had the privilege of chairing the Committee, and we went to extensive lengths to understand the budgetary process. Even with all that effort, it was particularly difficult to do so because one had to deal not only with the baseline figures but with the results of in-year monitoring reviews, funds coming from Europe and, occasionally, unhyphenated money coming from Westminster as a part of Westminster projects. Where that money goes to is something of a mystery. In particular, when we were looking to deal with the issue of youth unemployment — the figure is quite significant and, in my opinion, is increasing — we were told that we were spending more per capita on youth unemployment in this region than is spent anywhere else, yet still the figures increase. I am not sure whether the money is being spent wisely. Part of it comes down to it being an issue for the Government to decide, collectively, how they will spend the money, but, looking at the figures in that one particular area, I am at something of a loss to understand whether we are being effective.

I will mention some other points. At this point, I will say that I do not profess to be an expert on the issue, but I hear anecdotal evidence that waiting lists in our hospitals, particularly in A&E, are growing very substantially. Apparently, demand for the services of our National Health Service is rising at a level of 6%, yet our resources are rising at only 1.5%. That is bound to lead to people being dissatisfied with a significant part of the service that we provide as a Government. So, I would be interested to hear whether the Minister thinks that this is a particularly serious issue. Has he been in negotiations with his colleagues about how they transfer funds from one end to another? What is our corporate plan for dealing with the matter?

I will move on to some other issues that are of particular concern to me. Again, the Minister may have more information on this. I realise that not all of this expenditure will be government expenditure, but the effect is serious and is of a strategic nature, and it is in respect of our energy policy. As I understand it, the issue is that by 2016 the energy supply that we will have will be very close to the maximum requirement to keep the lights on in Northern Ireland. We have to make serious decisions about making expenditure, whether it is on the Moyle interconnector. A sum of £40 million, I believe, has to be spent. The interconnector is, I think, a mutualised business now and is properly the responsibility, I suppose, of the long-term bond holders. This question must be asked: given the seriousness about keeping the electricity flowing in Northern Ireland, will the Government look to put a different form of management into that company? Will there be some issue that we might give money to bring the interconnector on line, given the seriousness of the threat to supply? Will the Minister consider giving money towards Ballylumford? As Members know, as things stand at the moment, Ballylumford will close down because it cannot meet the emissions standards required by the EU. It would take £30 million to £40 million to make it acceptable. Perhaps in the interests of the strategic need for electricity in Northern Ireland, the Minister will consider whether we should give money in that direction.

The final point on the electricity side of things is that the Government here have a commitment to produce 40% of the electricity generated by 2020 —

Mr Hamilton: Two thousand and sixteen.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you very much. They have a commitment to supply 40% of it from renewable resources. That will require significant resources to be spent on infrastructure. The regulator estimates that to be some £900 million, which is very sizeable. That may come from the electricity user or government subvention if the Executive feel that that is appropriate. Either way, it is a really significant intervention. We still have no clarity about the interconnector from Cavan to Northern Ireland. We have to do something about that if we are serious about keeping the lights on for our industry and domestic users. Perhaps the Minister will address the question of whether government expenditure will be used to alleviate the problem.

My final point is on the provision of broadband to rural areas. As I understand it, a significant sum was set aside for that in line with the UK broadband initiative. Other areas of the United Kingdom have progressed beyond consultation, and their process has been approved. Scotland, certainly the Highlands, is in the procurement phase. That will see significant spending on rural broadband infrastructure. Yet, I understand that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is not able to make progress because there was a flaw with its consultation process and it will have to be done again. Given that this issue is particularly important in many areas of Northern Ireland, what will the Minister do with the money that has not been spent to date, given that there is now a delay? Will that money be reallocated, or will we put in additional sums to make sure that we do not fall behind on a project that many in Northern Ireland are waiting for?

On the issue of how we go about our business — I have heard the Minister speak about this — if we are to have meaningful contributions and debate, we need to understand the figures. We need clarity in the information that is put forward. It takes significant resources to prepare those figures and make them available. It also takes significant work by Members to get to the bottom of the argument. It is incumbent on the Government to come forward collectively and say with one voice, “This is what we intend to do. This is where we will allocate the resources”. On that basis, where there is clarity of vision on the way forward, we will provide the necessary oversight and clarity of interrogation. Until then, I can only wait to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mr McCrea never fails to astound me. As he rose to his feet, he was tweeting a picture of himself engaging with students at a school in Antrim. Fair play to him for that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. We are debating the Budget.

Mr Flanagan: Somewhere in there, Mr Deputy Speaker, is a tenuous link to MLAs’ expenses and mobile phones.

I thank the Minister for tabling the motion. The crux of it, for anybody who is interested in this process — that may be very few, even if you include MLAs — is that people will be asking what those of us elected to this place are doing to respond to the growing and continuing need. What are we doing to deal with the growing and continuing economic crisis here, and what are the responses to that crisis? It is useful at a time like this for Ministers to spell out clearly what has been done. However, it is also useful to listen to Back-Bench MLAs and to consider alternative ways to deal with problems in whatever Department Members wish to raise queries about.

It is also important for us to reflect that, two years into the mandate and this Programme for Government, the number one priority of the Executive, which is rebalancing the economy, has yet to be achieved and is still a work in progress. It is still the number one priority for the Executive and MLAs, but it remains to be achieved. When you look at where we are now compared with two years ago, there has been considerable improvement, but, despite all the efforts made and good work done, the crisis continues. Many communities still face high levels of unemployment and emigration, particularly among young skilled people, which the Executive collectively and we as an Assembly need to continue to attempt to address.

It would be useful if the Minister could detail progress on tackling the number one priority of the mandate, which is growing the economy. We will hear talk about rebalancing the economy, and that will immediately turn to talk about devolving corporation tax powers, but so much more needs to be done to reduce overheads for businesses. I know that the Minister is doing a lot of good work there, particularly on rates, but one of the big costs for businesses, through energy, is actually taxation. That is not within his or the Enterprise Minister’s control, but it needs to be addressed.

There is an awful lot of frustration about further threatened cuts to welfare, government expenditure and investment in infrastructure. The Executive need to outline clearly what they are doing to tackle those three issues. It is good to hear that the First Minister and deputy First Minister continue to put pressure on Downing Street on all those issues.

It would also be useful if the Minister could provide the House with an update on the work of the Budget review group, which was mandated to identify £1.6 billion of new revenue streams. Can he outline the progress that has been made on that to date?

Sinn Féin wants to see a progressive and effective response to this crisis. It has to be both progressive and effective. Once again, it needs to be stated that our number one priority is to grow and rebalance the economy, and there needs to be a specific emphasis on job creation in there. On the fiscal powers and levers that the Assembly has, the Minister is, as we all know because he has stated it on many occasions, reluctant to pursue further fiscal devolution. So he deserves credit, even with that sentiment clearly expressed by him that he has done it where it is the will of the Executive, and with considerable success. The Minister needs to move beyond his point of opposition as a unionist and do what is best for the economy. Simply throwing out figures that this is how much this deficit is, without an actual figure, will not wash with people. He has a position of opposition just because he is a unionist Minister rather than wearing the other hat that he claims to wear as an economist. That hat seems to be set aside most of the time.

Our lack of fiscal powers here means that all we are talking about is moving money around at the discretion of the British Treasury and how much it, without any input from us, decides to give us. Primarily for that reason, many outside the House find the budgetary process very technical, very boring and very detached from their everyday life, whereas, if you look at Parliaments in other jurisdictions, you see that the process has a much bigger impact on citizens' daily lives, and they have a much bigger input into the way the Budget is carried out.

I look forward to the debate continuing tomorrow. I genuinely do not know what points Mr McCrea will have left to cover, but I am sure that he will get something in.

4.45 pm

Mr Wilson: I thank all the Members who attended and took part in the debate. Some obviously gave it their full attention, some gave it partial attention and some gave it no attention. Mr Flanagan seems to have spent some of his time listening to or looking at — whatever it is that you do — Mr McCrea's tweets on the Twitter machine. [Laughter.] It is nice to see that the new party for Northern Ireland is on a lead, and that at the end of that lead is Jim Allister, who upbraided him and, all of a sudden, Mr McCrea appears in the Chamber. I thought it was NI21 last Thursday, P45 on Monday, but it appears that he was dragged, screaming, into the Chamber anyway. I am not going to pay too much attention to what he said during his contribution, although I notice that, despite the fact that he was outside twitting, getting photographs taken and everything else, he was able to tell the Assembly what a number of Members had asked. I do not know how he finds that out or whether he has some kind of crystal ball, but he certainly did not find it sitting here doing his job as the opposition — the new, qualified opposition for Northern Ireland. Anyway, leave that aside —

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Wilson: I knew that would provoke him, Mr Deputy Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr B McCrea: The Member must check, Mr Deputy Speaker, that the television system that goes through this Building, conveying all the debates, is still working, because Mr Wilson seems to be unaware of it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the leader of the new party that that is not a point of order. I also encourage the Minister to, perhaps, stick to the debate.

Mr Wilson: It is not much of a recommendation, mind you. He spends all day twitting and watching the TV. [Laughter.] I do not know, but it is not the image that I would like to have, anyway.

Let me turn to the points that various Members have made. First, I will turn to the Chairman of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. What he pointed out actually fits in with some of the other issues that Members have raised throughout the debate as to where the money is coming from for this or that issue, and, of course, the united community initiative that the First Minister and deputy First Minister announced was one of the main targets for that kind of question. At the start of the Budget process, over two years ago, I said that although we were establishing a four-year Budget, as circumstances changed, as additional resources became available, or if we found that certain things that we planned to do could not be done, the shape of the Budget would, of course, change. That is the correct approach to have, because, of course, new challenges will arise, and we have to find ways of resourcing those new challenges and, perhaps, providing for additional priorities. The Chairman of the Committee very helpfully pointed out that, as a result of some of the changes in the review of the allocations that were made and the fact that some Departments were continually making returns in the monitoring rounds, we changed some emphasis towards DEL to deal with youth unemployment and the challenges that were arising as a result of the recession. Additional money was also made available to the Department of Education. This year, £15 million will go directly to schools' budgets, because schools were finding themselves under pressure and looking at how they were going to provide for the services in the classroom, etc.

The Chairman of the Committee for Finance and Personnel also welcomed the memorandum of association on the Budget process between the Assembly and the Executive. I agree that it is important to set out the respective roles and responsibilities of Departments and Committees. Indeed, a number of other Members raised that issue: how do we get better scrutiny? I think Mr Nesbitt raised the same issue, as did Mr Allister and a number of other Members. I have to say that I think legitimate complaints have been made. In the past, I have criticised Ministers and Departments for not doing this, but there are legitimate complaints. If we are to carry out our scrutiny role and Committees are to carry out their scrutiny role, information, of course, has to be made available to Committees to allow them to do that. As Sue Ramsey said, it does not always have to be seen as confrontational. It is not that you withhold information so that the Committee cannot have a row with you. Eventually, the information will be there, anyway. If it comes late, the Committee can always have another go at it at some other time, and sometimes it only causes aggravation. I have no difficulty with proper scrutiny of budgets. That is what my Department does. That is what Committees ought to be doing. In that way, how public money is being spent should be, and could be, properly scrutinised. It is an important role that we need to carry out and for which we need to facilitate Members.

Mr McKay also raised the review of financial processes, as did a number of other Members, including Paul Girvan and Mr Cree. I have made it clear that I have no difficulty with what the Committee asked for on that. In fact, it is my Department's view that we want to have a more transparent and streamlined means of presenting Budget statements and information to allow for greater scrutiny. I hope that the Chairman of the Committee will try to persuade his party colleague, with whom I have spent hours trying to sort that out. One problem is that we do not want to have so many budget lines, so you concede on that. Then, we do not want to have scrutiny of whether something is a reduced requirement. If a Department bids for money, and does not spend that money, which was voted to it, I would think that the whole Assembly would want to ensure that it was returned so that consideration could be given to how it should be spent. Otherwise, Ministers could get into the position where they simply put in bids for things that are dead popular and, afterwards, spend the money on things that are unpopular. That is no way to allocate budgets. That is the crunch point with the Minister of Education at present. I welcome any help that can be given in dealing with it.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. He will be aware that, this afternoon, we had a statement from his colleague the Minister for Social Development. It contained the horrendous fact that £18 million had been wasted, squandered — call it what you will. He is talking about scrutiny. Where was the scrutiny when that £18 million of public money was blown? Can the Minister explain where he stands and how he sees that horrendous state of affairs?

Mr Wilson: We have got to ensure that that scrutiny also extends to arm's-length bodies such as the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. Sometimes, the worst practices occur in arm's-length bodies. Some of the worst scandals have, of course, arisen in such bodies. So, it is important that that scrutiny should extend to them. Of course, where there have been issues, they should be addressed quickly.

Mr Girvan raised the issue of corporation tax. As I have made clear time and time again, we are continuing to pursue that with the Government at Westminster. In the meantime, through the economic pact, we are looking at proposals that may help the economy in the interim until a final decision on that is made, but work is ongoing. He also raised the issue of savings delivery plans. Again, I agree with him and the Chairman of the Committee. I think that Mr Cree also raised the issue. Those savings delivery plans should be presented to Committees and be open to scrutiny.

Mr Bradley raised a number of issues. First was the A5. Indeed, Mr Allister raised the issue of the A5 money as well. That money was allocated by the Executive; it was a priority. Now, it cannot be spent as a result of insufficient information being supplied with the planning application and the judgement of the court that the whole project had to be stopped. When the Executive have looked at all the bids for that money, we will decide how it will be spent. Mr Allister put forward an attractive but, I must say, fairly superficial argument on that particular issue, and I remind Members that that £113 million has to be spent this year. We do not have the ability to carry it forward, and that does limit the number of projects that can qualify for that money. My understanding is that the A26 is not at the advanced stage where the money, or part of it, could be spent in this particular year. Then, of course, there is the money for next year as well. So, projects will be judged against the priorities and how quickly the money can be spent to avoid any underspend, which, of course, would be lost to the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Bradley also raised, as he always does, this next issue. Despite the fact that I always give him a good answer, he never believes me; he really does doubt my responses. The position on capital receipts is good news for the Executive. In the Budget for 2011-12, we set out to raise £141.9 million, and we exceeded that target by £30 million. For 2012-13, we set a target of £127.3 million, and it looks like we will exceed that target by £40 million. When it comes to revenue raising, we anticipated that we would raise £372 million in additional revenue over the first two years of the Budget, and we have exceeded that target by £50 million. So, I hope that Mr Bradley is comforted by the fact that we have —

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will. Again, I suspect that he will cast doubt on the figures that I have given, which, of course, are there for scrutiny.

Mr D Bradley: I thank the Minister for giving way. My mind goes back to the draft Budget announcement in, I think, December 2010. At that stage, a figure of £1.6 billion in revenue-raising measures was talked about. In fact, I am surprised that Mr Flanagan asked you a question about that, because Caitriona Ruane claimed that Sinn Féin had raised that £1.6 billion. Anyway, that was reduced to £826 million, so maybe the Minister can tell us what remains of the £826 million in revenue-raising measures still to be acquired.

Mr Wilson: I cannot answer for Caitriona Ruane. I can be trusted, and I will leave Members of the Assembly to draw their own conclusions about some of the promises made by other Members in the House. I have given the House the figures for what we intended to raise over the past two years and the figures for what we actually raised. I am happy that we exceeded the targets and that we will continue to do so.

Mr Bradley also raised the issue of the £18 million that DETI spent on the Titanic signature project. That project came in on time and on budget, and it has been a massive boost for the tourist industry in Northern Ireland, despite the predictions of the Audit Office — Mr Kinahan places a great deal of support in it and is very confident about its predictions — that we would not even meet the target of a quarter of a million visitors; there have been 890,000 visitors through the Titanic signature project. So, the building was good value for money, and the project was good value for the economy and the tourist industry in Northern Ireland. We are still looking for projects that could absorb that £18 million so that we can switch our own capital spend to that part of the budget for DETI and use EU money for other projects. I hope that we will be able to report to the Assembly on that fairly soon.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I want to try to get through a number of points; I have answered that question time and time again anyway.

A number of Members raised the issue of building a united community, the responsibility for which, of course, rests with OFMDFM. All that I will say is that the First Minister and deputy First Minister have made a high-level decision on that and have reported to the Executive. The detailed work has still to be done, and the exact figures for what can be spent this year and in subsequent years have not yet been provided.

That is not unusual with any policy. I continually hear it at Westminster. When a Minister announces a policy, the question is "How much will it cost?". The answer is always "We are working through the detail of the issue". I do not think that anybody can say anything about the objectives, which are to promote shared education and to deal with that hard core of youth unemployment. Even during the boom times, we were not able to get those people into employment, which contributed greatly to the high levels of economic inactivity in Northern Ireland.

5.00 pm

Mr Bradley referred to the regional soccer stadium. I cannot comment on the detail of that because I do not know how long the judicial review will take or what its outcome will be, but DCAL will robustly challenge the case that has been put forward by Crusaders and is working to ensure that the money is spent on time.

Mr Bradley also mentioned the social investment fund and asked why it was taking so long to spend the money. A number of Members raised that issue. When the fund was introduced, we were told that the money would be thrown out the door to paramilitaries. It has taken a long time to put in place the nine regional groups to decide on local projects, to have that returned and for the final sift to be done. I know that from my own area, where projects are dealing with people who have learning difficulties, tourist-type facilities, home insulation and fuel poverty. These are all good projects, and it has been worth the wait to put in place proper scrutiny and proper sifting procedures so that the money is well spent and benefits communities. We should welcome the fact that we have gone through that process.

Mr Cree spoke about additional capital from Her Majesty's Treasury. I got the impression that he thought that I was hiding this money somewhere in my back pocket or in a hole in the ground and would produce it at a later stage. I have been quite clear and have given the figures to the Assembly on occasions on our additional capital for this year and our additional capital for next year. Some of it cannot be spent directly by Departments; it has to be given in the form of third-party loans. It is called "financial transactions money", and we have to work our way through that to find projects, one of which I will mention in a moment or two that, I think, will benefit the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Givan referred to the voluntary retirement scheme for the Northern Ireland Prison Service. We have given additional resources to it in the February monitoring round, and, where a case can be made by the Justice Minister, we will look at it because it is an invest-to-save initiative. He also spoke about legal aid pressures. I could not agree more, although I noticed that the lawyers in the Chamber got rather uncomfortable when he raised the issue. Additional money had to be given in the February monitoring round — I think that it was £16 million — to help with the legal aid pressures that had been generated. We do not want that to continue.

There has been some slippage with the Desertcreat project. I had a meeting last week with Danny Alexander, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, and I raised the issue with him, as I thought that it was best to do so at an early stage. I said that we might have some slippage with the Desertcreat project and sought early permission from the Treasury to carry money forward. The big danger with any slippage on the Desertcreat project is that, if we do not spend the money, we will lose it totally. Mr Maginness and Mr Givan raised that issue, and I trust that we will get a positive response from the Treasury. However, it looks as though we will not spend the money in the period that we had anticipated because of the delays in re-examining the budget for the college.

Mr McQuillan raised the issue of local government reform funding. In February, the Executive agreed a package of £47.8 million for local government reform. Of that, £13.8 million is for the transition elements such as the shadow councils, capacity building and so on; £4 million is to help with the capital costs of the ICT that has to be purchased so that the new councils can work together; and £30 million is for the convergence costs where there are big differences in rates. A number of other Members raised that issue as well.

Mr McQuillan also raised the issue of the level of rates here in Northern Ireland. I am proud of the record that my party has on rates in Northern Ireland. In the first Assembly, when the SDLP was in charge of the portfolio that I hold, rates went up by 10% in one year. In the last year of direct rule, they went up by 18%. Under the DUP, which, of course, is the ratepayer's friend, they have gone up by 0% in real terms. As a result, people in Northern Ireland pay considerably less for their rates.

The average domestic rate in Northern Ireland is £816. The next closest to that is Scotland, with £985, followed by Wales, with £1,036, and England, with £1,201. Of course, on top of that, people in other parts of the United Kingdom face water charges, which people here do not have. Sometimes, I hear people complain and ask, "What do you lot up there do? Do you not realise the kind of pressures we are under in everyday life?". The Assembly and Executive have responded to the kinds of pressures that people face. That is even in times of economic stringency. Do not forget that, when the SDLP was in charge and put up rates by 10%, the Government in Westminster gave, on average, 6% to 8% additional money to Northern Ireland. We have done that against a background of a 6.8% real reduction in the Budget. We have to bear that in mind.

Mr Maginness raised a number of issues, one of which was welfare reform. He talked about a local imaginative settlement. I am not quite sure what he meant by that, and I do not know whether he was either, to be quite truthful. The truth of the matter is that I do not care how imaginative it is: there will still be a cost to the resource budget of the Executive. The kind of changes that Minister McCausland intends to make are well known in the Assembly. All of them will represent costs to the Executive. For example, for the next two years, we will continue the current level of rates support. That cost the Executive £13 million this year. Next year, I think — do not hold me to this — it goes up to nearly £30 million. One very sensible suggested change to the Welfare Reform Bill is the additional charge for people who underoccupy houses. That is a bad policy that is likely to cost the Executive money in capital build and cause a lot of disruption to people's lives. If we decide not to go down that route, there will be quite a substantial cost to the Budget. There is no imaginative solution that magically reduces the impact of welfare reform without a cost to our Budget.

Mr Maginness also raised the PSNI equal pay issue. He seemed to indicate that it was a problem of resource. It was never a problem of resource. When we negotiated the settlement for the devolution of policing, there was a figure built into that for any equal pay claim that would have arisen as a result of the AAs and AOs who worked for the Police Service getting an equal pay settlement. It has become a question of whether there is a legal case for an equal pay settlement. When we negotiated the Civil Service agreement, the trade unions negotiated purely for members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service. Their tribunal case included only members of the Northern Ireland Civil Service; it did not include PSNI staff. The PSNI has not come up with a business case for an equal pay claim. Had it done that, the money was there in the Treasury for that payment. We now have a court ruling that there was no equal pay case that could be latched onto the Northern Ireland Civil Service case. Although the money is being held in reserve by Treasury, it is not going to pay out for a settlement that a court has ruled there is no case for, for staff that the trade unions did not take a tribunal case for and when the trade unions did not include those staff in their original settlement for the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way, because I know that it is an important issue for many Members. The answer to the Member's question is that, until the police and the Department of Justice determine that there is an equal pay issue and present a business case, there can be no payment. I am sure that he appreciates that.

Mr A Maginness: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I do not think that the Minister was at the debate last week, but I am sure that he is aware of the issues that were raised. Is the Minister saying that the decision by Judge Babington is a bar to a settlement for those outstanding equal pay claims or that the failure on the part of the PSNI to put forward a business case is the real obstacle?

Mr Wilson: First, the legal decision was on whether the PSNI staff could latch onto the Northern Ireland Civil Service equal pay claim, and it is clear that the decision was "No, they could not". If a separate equal pay case is made by the PSNI or the Department of Justice, there would be nothing to stop that. That is a perfectly legal claim, and, whether or not we have the resources for it, we would have to pay out. Do not forget that we did not have the resources for the Civil Service claim and had to dip into budgets for the £114 million or whatever it was that it cost us. If a legal case can be established, the earlier judgement does not rule out a separate case being made by the police. It does rule out attaching any equal pay claim to the Northern Ireland Civil Service claim. That is the issue.

Mr Maginness also asked me for some positive news about the economy. I am always happy to give positive news about the economy, and I always seek to be honest about it. Even some of the economists from the banks — I am not going to name them; we all know the merchants of gloom who regularly write in the columns of our newspapers — were on the front page of one of the papers today saying that they detect an upturn, the services sector has shown growth for the first time and the construction sector is showing greater stability and is not shedding labour for the first time.

Our own evaluation of the output of the economy, the Northern Ireland economic index — there should be a "c" in there somewhere, but I cannot remember what it is — has shown that we had 0.4% growth over the past year. That is not quite the same as GDP figures, but it is very close to it. We have also had the job announcements that Arlene Foster has made. Exports are up by 12%, and we are exporting to areas where there is growth: Brazil, India and places like that. There are signs of growth. However, let us be realistic about it: there are still big challenges for us. We plunged to the very depths of recession, and it will take a long time to recover. When it comes, growth will be slow. Even the UK economy is predicted to grow by only around 1% or 1.5%. Clawing back to the heights where we were before will take considerable time. Nevertheless, we see changes on the horizon.

5.15 pm

Mr Swann raised issues about the Open University for Northern Ireland and Stranmillis College that really have to be dealt with by the Employment and Learning Minister. I am sure that he will keep pressing the Minister on those issues.

Mr Frew raised the issue of hardship for farmers and the potential in the agrifood industry, and he is quite right. Along with the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister, I have had meetings with the agrifood industry. There is huge potential for Northern Ireland because of the horse meat scare and the fact that many of the supermarkets are saying that they want to source their meat and poultry from within the United Kingdom. That probably gives our suppliers the opportunity to increase their sales quite dramatically. On the basis of figures that I have been given, investment has the potential — it really is a small window of opportunity, because, of course, once suppliers have been established the opportunity has gone — to create about 2,500 jobs over the next two years. Arlene Foster and I have met the agrifood industry. We have also had meetings with the banks about this specific issue, and I must say that the banks responded with what the Executive can do to take some of the risk out of the lending that banks make to farmers. I am hopeful that, within weeks, we will be able to put together a scheme using some of the financial transactions money that is available to the Executive and the agreements that the participating banks will come to to ensure that capital is available to, for example, build chicken houses and pig houses, which are part of the essential supply chain for the agrifood firms that will then, hopefully, be able to take up opportunities with the big supermarkets. The one thing that they have said to me is "Look, this is a fantastic opportunity. For the first time, we can actually pick our customers, such is the demand. But we have got to capitalise on that". So, we will continue to deal with that.

Mr Frew also raised the issue of capital spend. As a result, first, of the additional money that we have raised — Mr Bradley referred to capital receipts — and the additional capital money from Westminster, our capital spend is up 27%. This is a significant figure: 55% of activity in the construction industry is now generated by funding made available by the Executive. The support being given to the construction industry is not always appreciated. I know that it is in very poor shape, but it would be in far worse shape had it not been for decisions made by the Assembly and the Executive.

Mr Wells raised the issue of health funding. Of course, the health budget was protected in the 2011 Budget, since when additional money has been made available in monitoring rounds. The health service must help itself by looking at ways in which it can deliver on savings, because there are different ways of doing things. I know that Members and, sometimes, the public will resist that kind of change, but, if we are to meet rising demand, we cannot keep on doing things as we have in the past.

Anna Lo raised the issue of the water framework directive. It is for the Environment Minister to decide what his Department's priorities will be. He is free to bid for additional money for the water framework directive through in-year monitoring, and the Executive will consider any of those bids. She also raised the issue of the carrier bag levy and the fact that some of the environmental projects that it was to have been spent on could not be carried out this year because it had not raised as much money as anticipated. Again, it is up to the Environment Minister to decide whether he wants to finance those projects. If he does, it will come from another budget; if not, he waits until the revenue comes through. The one good thing is that we have succeeded in ensuring that the money collected is returned to the Northern Ireland economy, for which I must again pay tribute to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. So, although it goes to the UK Consolidated Fund, it comes back to us, which is important.

Mr McGlone raised the issues of DETI June monitoring bids and Invest NI EYF. I really cannot comment on June monitoring bids. There will be a statement to the House on June monitoring at the end of June. Bids are coming in at present, and we are sifting through them. We will make decisions about them, and they will be announced to the Assembly using the proper procedure. I do not think that Members would wish me to anticipate what decisions might be made or, indeed, how much money we are likely to have for that.

On the issue of end-year flexibility for Invest NI, most Members now know how end-year flexibility works. We cannot carry over money or say that individual sections of Departments can carry over money if they do not spend it. It is all added together. The Treasury allows us to carry some money over. We negotiated the Budget exchange mechanism with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury when there was no carry-over facility, but I have never known an occasion when Invest NI, when it urgently needed money for projects, has been refused. Indeed, I can think of one occasion when money was required for the now very successful carbon fibre technology at Bombardier. Departments were top-sliced to make sure that we could meet our commitment on that because the job potential was so great.

The Member also raised the issue of a green investment bank. We are working closely with SIB to bring forward proposals that will utilise some of the financial transactions capital funding for that. We will consider the business case for any issues that come forward.

Mr Nesbitt raised a number of OFMDFM issues. Really, as Chair of the Committee, he should raise those issues in detail with the First and deputy First Ministers.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way. The one point I will agree with him on — he will not be surprised at this — is that the large increase in the budget for the Attorney General is a cause for concern. I hope that the Committee will encourage OFMDFM to look at that again.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for giving way. My point is that I agree with him: they are issues for OFMDFM, but, when information is supplied to the Committee Clerk only 20 minutes before Committee, you cannot rigorously make those points.

Mr Wilson: I accept what the Member is saying. That has happened to me on a number of occasions as well. Supplying the information shortly before the Committee starts is a practice which, I am sure, most Ministers would not actively promote, but sometimes there are good reasons why information cannot be supplied in a timely way. Ideally, I suppose, members should have the papers days before the Committee meets, so that they can read the stuff and then ask intelligent questions. However, a Committee can easily get around that. If the information arrives late, members can simply wait until the next time the officials are before the Committee and ask the questions when they have had proper time to consider it. However, ideally it should be done up front.

Sue Ramsey raised the issue of the PEDU report. I did not quite understand the point she was making that somehow or other we are waiting for OFMDFM to release it.

Although those reports are done by PEDU, which is part of my Department, PEDU has to be invited by the Minister to come into a Department. Once a report is made, it goes to the Minister, and the Minister then decides what he will do with the report, what recommendations he will accept or reject and who he or she shares it with. I understand that a number of the issues in the PEDU report actually informed the Transforming Your Care proposal.

Mr Kinahan raised the issue that I expected him to. He always raises it. He always invites me to bash the Audit Office. I think that he is some kind of masochist on this one. I will make the same point to him as I have made before. He talks about the budget for the Audit Office, and of course the Audit Office carries out an important function.

No one is going to deny that, but, like any other part of the structure that uses public funds, it must use those funds effectively. The organisation failed to spend over 6% of its 2012-13 opening budget and, in the past five years, has failed to spend, on average, 10% of its budget. It is very hard to make a case to argue that a body is under-resourced or needs more resources when, on average, it spends less than it has as an opening budget. Therefore, I do not think that the work of the Audit Office has been impaired in any way.

Mr McNarry raised the issue of the 10-year contract for Translink. He is quite right: we should not enter into a 10-year contract with what is, in effect, a monopoly, without proper assurances. Before the 10-year contract is signed, comfort has to be given to PEDU that there are proper procedures in place so that there is validation of the financial practices and control within the organisation. That will provide the information for the validation of the licence, which is required by the EU anyway, to be carried out. So, before any final agreement is reached, that work has to be done.

I have dealt with some of the issues that Mr Allister raised. He also raised the issue of the Maze, and it has been a popular issue for him, but the emphasis on the peace and reconciliation centre, as if that was the only thing that was going to happen at the Maze, really does not do him credit. He is more knowledgeable about those issues than he chooses to reveal. He knows full well that the Maze site, which is one of the biggest development sites — bigger than the Titanic Quarter — is a massive opportunity for the Northern Ireland economy. Indeed, the tens of thousands of people who visited the Maze site for the agricultural show saw the vast potential that there is for that site when it is fully developed. There is a lot of emphasis on the agriculture industry, research, marketing and all the other proposals for the site, as well as the other manufacturing and development proposals. At the end of the day, there are nearly 2,000 jobs to be created on that site. That is what we ought to be emphasising. There is a structure in place.

Mr Allister raised the issue of my view of the site under direct rule, which I am quite happy to address. Given the record of Northern Ireland Office Ministers, I was concerned that they would cave in to the kind of demands that there were at that stage that could have made the site into a shrine. We now have governmental arrangements in place that can ensure that that cannot happen.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way in a moment or two.

When we are looking at the Maze site and the vast potential in it, we should be seeking ways of ensuring that its potential is maximised. This is a good news story for Northern Ireland because of the potential that there is for creating jobs at that location. Although, unfortunately, it does not stop the kind of stories that we have at the moment, I know that, in 10 years' time, people are going to look back and ask what all the fuss was about. I can remember the same fuss about the devolution of policing and justice powers. That was going to be a disaster for policing. We were going to have terrorists in charge of policing. Looking back now, people ask what the fuss was about. We discuss policing in the Assembly, the structures around policing are still accountable and we do not have terrorists dictating what the police do. Operational independence is still there. I guarantee that, in the future, we will look back at this and see the exact same. I will give way.

Mr Allister: The Minister will not find any comment by me that is critical of the overall development of the Maze. He will find comments criticising the tarnishing of the overall potential by insisting on putting on the site the one thing that will undermine the overall development, namely, the peace and reconciliation centre because of its affiliation with the hideous IRA citadel buildings, which are the H-blocks.

I ask the question again; why tarnish the site by putting the reconciliation centre on the most divisive site that there is in Northern Ireland? If we need it, why not put it on a neutral site and save the wider good aspects of the Maze project from being tarnished and undermined? Why is it not going on a neutral site if we need it?

If he read today's 'News Letter', he would know that it is not just me who has concerns. The RUC George Cross association and many others are concerned, like he once was and like his deputy leader once was when he said that no matter how you dress it up and spin it, it will be a shrine if you put it there.

Mr Wilson: I listened to the Member talking about whether the Maze is a neutral site. I went to the Balmoral show and met people from all arts and parts and of all religions and backgrounds. They recognised me and came up to me to talk about the site, and no one seemed to be in any way curtailed in attending the Balmoral show because they thought that the site was not neutral. In fact, they enjoyed the day there and felt that there was great benefit in it. Indeed, as we are talking about neutrality, I would remind the Member that there is an RAF and Second World War museum there, and those could be regarded as military issues. We have to get away from the kind of language that the Member is using.

I see that my time is up, Mr Deputy Speaker, and that you are going to ask me to draw my remarks to a close. I thank all the Members who participated in the debate —

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will probably not get an intervention in. I thank all the Members who participated in the debate. I am sure that we will get a re-run tomorrow, so if there is anything that I have not covered, Members can raise those issues with me during the Budget debate.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the vote on this motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That this Assembly approves that a sum not exceeding £8,271,268,000 be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 and that resources not exceeding £8,558,118,000 be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1.3 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Estimates 2013-14 that was laid before the Assembly on 29 May 2013.

Mr Deputy Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House, I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated.

Budget (No. 2) Bill: First Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

I beg to introduce the Budget (No. 2) Bill, which is a Bill to authorise the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of certain sums for the service of the year ending 31 March 2014; to appropriate those sums for specified purposes; to authorise the Department of Finance and Personnel to borrow on the credit of the appropriated sums; to authorise the use for the public service of certain resources, including accruing resources, for the year ending 31 March 2014; and to repeal certain spent provisions.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I can inform Members that confirmation has been received from the Committee for Finance and Personnel, in accordance with Standing Order 42(2), that the Committee is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals contained in the Bill, and that the Bill can therefore proceed under the accelerated passage procedure. The Second Stage of the Bill will be brought before the House tomorrow.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Single Farm Payments: Farm Inspections

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes in which to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. One amendment has been selected and published on the Marshalled List. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes in which to propose and five minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes. I remind Members that junior Minister McCann will respond to the motion on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development.

Mr Frew: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the concerns within the farming community regarding the issuing of inaccurate land parcel identification system maps; notes that many were still awaiting their altered maps days before the deadline of 15 May 2013 for their single farm payment application; understands the difficulties and pressures that this will cause to the applicants and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline how her Department will support farmers and speed up the overall farm inspection process in order that more applicants receive their 2013 single farm payment in good time.

The motion is of the utmost importance to the DUP and to the farming and agrifood industries in our Province. A few months ago, the Minister warned everyone that the onus was very much on farmers to check their maps and make sure that they were correct. She said:

"Accurate information is essential to speed up the payment process."

On 18 December 2012, the Minister also stated:

"We have been working very hard to update the maps on the basis of the latest available aerial photography, but only farmers themselves are fully up-to-date with the conditions on the ground. It is vital that you provide us with any corrections which may need to be made as this will help to prevent delays with the processing of your 2013 Single Farm Payment applications."

It was remiss of me not to mention the fact that the Minister is not available today as she is unwell. I wish her a speedy recovery. It is regrettable that she cannot make the debate.

When the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development discussed the issue on 14 January, we were concerned about the process that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) had put in place to satisfy the needs of Europe to get the money drawn down for the single farm payment (SAF). At that time, we did not want to fall back into the disastrous process and late payments of 2011-12, so it was important that we kept the pressure on to make sure that the Department did not fall into that ground again.

Here we have a system being implemented with land parcel identification system (LPIS) maps, whereby the onus has been put on farmers to check their maps. When they check their maps and find errors, which can happen because it is a complicated system, they seek help from DARD. Months ago, farmers were telling the DUP that they were finding it hard to get any answers from DARD to get the processes fixed and reach a speedy conclusion so that they could use their maps and this information to apply for their single farm payment. Our big worry is that this will delay the single farm payment yet again, and we will go back to the horrors of 2011. When you talk to members of the farming community, it is very clear that they are dismayed with the processes and attitude of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development.

I will give the case study of a farmer, not from my constituency but from west of the Bann. Farmers were forced to join queues to sit with DARD officers to make all the necessary corrections to their farm maps. Sometimes corrections had been made even the year before, yet DARD reverted to old data. The farmer that I mentioned had a two-month wait before corrected maps were issued, and that seemed to happen only after a phone call to the local DARD Direct office. The farmer was both amazed and horrified to find that there was still a field missing from his map. After a succession of frantic phone calls to DARD, he was finally told that there had been a glitch that caused this problem with a number of maps. Can you imagine a farmer going to DARD and saying, "There has been a glitch with my information"? When he pressed the issue further, he was informed that the maps would not be corrected until the following week. The DARD officials could not tell him when they envisaged posting out the new amended maps. Indeed, they went even further, suggesting that he was to blame for the missing field. When he pushed for more detail, they could not tell him what had happened for this fault to arise.

This farmer, and many like him, has described the process as shambolic. Many farmers have been forced to attempt to complete the forms with inaccurate and incomplete information. At the very least, they have had to leave it to the very last moment to fill in their forms. Some are still waiting 11 weeks after they sat in a DARD office to make the corrections in the first place. That is totally and utterly unacceptable. Some farmers have expressed to me their continued disgust at how the whole process has been mishandled. It has led to major concerns and a lack of confidence in this year's application process and the Department that is charged with implementing it. That is only one case study, but there are hundreds and hundreds of farmers in the same position.

You have to put into context the importance of the single farm payment not only to the agriculture or agrifood industry but to Northern Ireland's economy in general. Some 38,000 farm businesses in Northern Ireland receive a single farm payment. It is worth around £300 million to our local economy. Let me tell you that that money does not stay in a bank account. It goes into all sorts of avenues and businesses all over the country. It is the farming community that spreads and distributes that. It is very clear that DARD has once again failed the farming community. In the outworkings of the process, DARD will tell the farming community that the responsibility lies with them and that they will have to be inspected, which could lead to delays to their receipt of the single farm payment. It is vital that our farming industry receives the single farm payment as quickly as possible. We should be in a position to urge the Department to implement advance payments.

There has never been crisis upon crisis in the farming community to the extent that we have had this year. Look at the crises that we have had: feed and fuel costs have spiralled out of control, with the grain men basically bankrolling the industry; there have been unfair and low prices for produce, meaning that most of our farmers are producing at a loss; there have been the horse meat scandals; and there was the wet weather of last summer and the snow crisis this year. All that has led to farmers having little capacity or capital to get themselves out of the problem. Farmers are also faced with bovine TB and all sorts of other diseases that penalise them.

We need a Department that will support, help and promote our industry, not hammer it at every opportunity. I know that there is a fear of European auditors. I know that, as a regulation body and payment agency, those auditors have to work within the rule of law. However, they are doing a shameful job of getting help and assistance to farmers at this time.

It is a disappointment that the Minister is not here because she tells us on every occasion that she can that she looks towards Dublin and the Republic of Ireland. I wish that she would look down south and see how our competitors in our neighbouring state are wiping the floor with her Department. Everything that they do is in support of their farming industry and to increase exports. They do not hinder, hassle and harass the farming community in the way that we do. I wish that the Department and the Minister would look towards Dublin to see best practice and to do something to start helping our industry and to push it to make sure that we can compete with our neighbouring states and countries in the EU.

In the time that I have left, I will address the amendment. The DUP supports the amendment because it adds to the detail of our proposal and outlines some measures that the Minister could put in place, such as advance payments. However, I regret that the Department is nowhere near ready even to seek permission from Europe for advance payments because it is in such bad shape. That is regrettable.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Frew: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mrs Dobson: I beg to move the following amendment:

Leave out all after first "applicants" and insert

"; further notes that Northern Ireland still remains exposed to disallowance if the rules of the scheme are broken; and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to tackle the problem of delayed payments by seeking permission from the European Commission to make advance payments, including proportionally smaller advance payments for farms selected for inspection."

I welcome the opportunity to move the Ulster Unionist amendment. At the outset, I declare an interest as my husband receives a single farm payment. It is abundantly clear to anyone linked to the farming industry that the Department has made a complete shambles of its mapping system. On 5 March, when I spoke in the House on the issue of mapping errors, the Minister described my line of questioning as scaremongering. It is not scaremongering to raise the legitimate concerns of constituents and farm businesses that are struggling because of the Department's incompetence. On that occasion and in a subsequent question for written answer, I asked whether any of her officials were ultimately going to be held accountable. The answer was a resounding no. There was no discipline whatsoever from a Department that so often takes a zero-tolerance approach to farmers when it comes to minor errors and discrepancies. We are told that a technical fault caused the errors in 3,560, or 9%, of all farm maps. Once printed, those maps went through a so-called manual quality-checking process. That process resolutely failed, and I am glad, as the Minister informed me recently, that additional steps have been added to it. It almost seems as if no checking took place at all, and that the final batch progressed straight from the printer to the post. Perhaps the Minister could clarify that.

Year on year, mapping failures have cost the Executive millions in what should be an embarrassing episode confined to the history books. That is all the more worrying when you consider the disallowance payments that the Assembly has been hit with in recent years. The issue began with the Minister's predecessor and has been carried forward, unresolved, into the current Minister's period of office. It is entirely unacceptable for the Minister to continue to preside over a system that remains in chaos and is leading to hardship for many farmers. Although it should be recognised that progress has been made, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development and her officials must accept that she has a very long road to travel before the system will operate as it should. It should operate in the best interests of farmers across Northern Ireland, not to the detriment and potential ruin of their businesses. It is, therefore, in the interests of doing what is right for Northern Ireland that the Ulster Unionist Party has tabled the amendment.

Advance payments would be of huge benefit to every farmer in Northern Ireland, especially those chosen for inspection.

The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development is famously quoted as wanting to take a team Ireland approach. However, when it comes to an issue such as farm mapping, where advanced payments have been available to farmers in the Republic of Ireland since 2007, she is content to operate at a snail's pace. Rather than directing her officials to make real and beneficial modernising change, she is content with "The old ways are best", when they clearly cannot continue. It is totally unacceptable that cash flow is withheld from farmers for up to nine months over a query that could be over as little as £30 or £40.

The old ways leave our farmers at a competitive disadvantage when compared with their rivals in what are increasingly ruthless global markets. The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development needs to explain why she does not believe that advance payments are good enough for Northern Ireland farmers, especially when we have both remote sensing and LPIS in place. Perhaps her reason for holding back is that she fears that the Republic will be faced with future disallowances. Her clarification on these points would greatly advance the issue.

Through my constituency office, I can give countless examples of farm businesses that are clinging on by their fingernails because their single farm payment has been withheld from them. This lack of information, uncertainty and stress caused by this restriction of cash flow cannot accurately be measured. As we know, cash flow is key to future business planning for all farmers. Without that lifeline, growth will simply not happen, and, whilst I acknowledge that it is only a problem for a minority of farmers, for that minority, it is a complete nightmare.

The real problem lies with the farmers selected for inspection. Some farmers have told me that they feel totally victimised by the Department when it comes to farm inspections. I know that farmers are selected at random and that some are targeted. I can understand why this is the case, but farmers would prefer more honesty from the Department. What exactly constitutes at-risk farms? In an area where there may have been an application with errors, minor though they may be, why should farmers in the whole area be forced to go through endless delays? The people who would really be helped by upfront payments will be those who are chosen for inspection. For them, the long silent period between being informed about an inspection, an inspection taking place and then the seemingly endless wait to receive payment can be an incredibly stressful period. Again I ask, "How can any business be expected to operate under these circumstances?"

I fully appreciate that people may query why farmers should get any money before having an inspection, but there must be an element of trust involved, the trust that is afforded to the farmers who do not get inspected. I do not envisage that advance payments should be made at the same rate as for those not selected, but any payment would, nevertheless, be more desirable than the current situation. The Department holds data on all farm inspections that includes the numbers, the reasons why they are inspected, the findings and any subsequent penalty that was imposed. I am sure that, from this data, an appropriate upfront payment percentage could be established.

The Ulster Unionist Party is clear in our support for any necessary steps to benefit our local farming industry. It is all the more important that, when neighbouring countries are taking steps, those with whom the power lies in Northern Ireland are equally quick to move to support our farmers. For six years, advance payments have operated in the Republic of Ireland. In those same six years, farmers in Northern Ireland have continued to suffer at the hands of a system that presumes the guilt of our farmers and takes months to establish their innocence. This has to stop. If the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development remains unwilling to introduce upfront payments, will she at least have the courtesy to put in place a deadline for the conclusion of the inspection process? Whilst farmers may grumble about being inspected, their biggest criticism is the time it takes for the process to conclude. I firmly believe that a clear target date needs to be set for the inspection process.

Again, I thank those who proposed the motion and commend the Ulster Unionist amendment.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The single farm payment, paid to farmers each year, is vital to the existence of many of our farming businesses. Many farmers rely on the single farm payment being made as early as possible each year. At the end of May 2013, almost 98% of the 37,500 claims submitted to the 2012 single farm payment process were completed and 98.5% of the 2012 budget had been paid out.

Each year, approximately €300 million of single farm payment is paid out to 38,000 people, benefiting some 25,000 farms and involving some 750,000 fields. That payment can be made in sterling or in euros. A decision has to be reached before 15 May, and the exchange rate is set on 1 October through the European Central Bank on that day. In the past, the EU Commission's auditors have expressed concerns regarding mapping, the consistency of inspections and the interpretation of rules. Therefore, the Department, farmers and the farming community, over this past few years, have been working together to address the EU's concerns. The outcome of all that work will be a greatly improved process. Once the process settles in, it will enable payments to be made more quickly. 2013 will be the first year in which the new mapping system will be used. The new maps will review all the fields to establish a maximum eligible area (MEA) for each field. That calculation is based on aerial photography, some of which was done a few years ago, and that is why farmers are asked to check their maps. Another feature of aerial photography is that it is not always able to clearly and correctly identify all the features in a field, such as heather, bog, lane ways and even scrub. All it takes is a phone call to the local DARD office to get that cleared up.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way. One Fermanagh farmer told me that a piece of ground from Rathlin Island had been mapped onto his farm in Fermanagh. Even though he went back into the local Department of Agriculture office on three occasions to have it changed, it came back on each of those occasions with the same piece of land mapped in. Does the Member think that that is unusual?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Member for his question. No. Mr Frew, on the Benches opposite, brought the same thing up. The problem here could be the local offices. I have been contacted about quite a few problems, and I am sure that other Members have found the same. I met the officials in those offices and was able to have my problems sorted out on that day. I do not say that there is no problem, but the problem may lie in the local offices in Fermanagh or Rathlin.

Mr Elliott: Will the Member give way?

Mr McMullan: I have already given way.

Another feature of aerial photography is that it is not always able to clearly and correctly identify all the features in a field. I have said that already. That why it is so important that farmers and the Department work closely together and make sure that all the changes are recorded as soon as the maps arrive.

The new maps were first issued from December 2012, and, by mid-February, farmers had received their maps, prior to the 15 May deadline for the SFP applications. The maps were issued in three batches, but, unfortunately, in the third batch, posted out on 3 and 4 May, there was a technical fault, whereby fields were missing from the maps. It affected only 9% of maps. All the farmers affected were given an extra two weeks to update their maps. If necessary, it could be done at the local DARD office, and quite a lot of farmers did that.

Where a new map could not be produced in time — Members did not mention this — following a farmer having made a change, it is recorded in the system, and the farmer is given a form recording the field area change. That provides the farmer with the relevant details of the field or fields. That allows the farmer to manually add that information to his 2013 application form for single farm payment. The field will then be automatically pre-printed on the farmer's 2014 SAF form and on any future maps.

About half of our inspections this year will probably be traditional field inspections. So, the use of control with remote sensing has the potential to improve inspection timescales. In 2013, the number of inspections increased from 248 to 1,000. That will take the pressure off field staff working on field checks.

The use of LPIS maps will have the potential to speed up the process because there will be less work associated with map checking and fewer map updates will be needed. All of that depends on the farmer taking the advice given. In other words, if changes are not reported, inspections will be delayed, and that means delays in payments. The system is huge. Not only do we have a new system, but the present system must be maintained, including the payment system, etc. We have to try to speed up the payments but, at the same time, ensure that all our control processes are strong enough to stand up to EU scrutiny. This is a new system, and we must give it time to bed in. If I remember correctly back to last year, people were complaining —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr McMullan: — that not enough was being done. We have done this, and we should give it time to bed in. In the next couple of years, we should have system that will speed up payments to all.

Mr Byrne: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion, and I thank the Members for bringing it to the Assembly. I also welcome the amendment. The SDLP will support the amended motion.

I welcome the opening statements made by Mr Frew and Mrs Dobson. I was worried that, for the past year, I was the only person who was becoming a bit of a Rottweiler with DARD. The reality is that DARD is not delivering in the interests of the farmers, and that has been the experience of many farmers. We are all beginning to hear it, and we are hearing it so often that we have to come back to this debate. As we all know, it has been difficult for the farming community over the past number of years with bad weather, increased costs in fuel and feedstuffs, low farm gate prices etc. Hopefully, some of that will be relieved as the result of the better weather that we have had over the past 10 days, and, hopefully, we will get more of that good weather in the coming months. It was a respite that all farmers were waiting and hoping for.

That does not compensate the farmer who is working hard and is still waiting for last year's single farm payment from DARD. If any Member here was waiting for over a year for the pay that they were entitled to, they would be very annoyed and frustrated at how they were being treated.

Farmers are the same, and they need the money. It is not our money; it is money provided by Europe. Therefore, they are very frustrated to be told that, even though their inspection has been OK, there will be a delay of six months to a year before their payment is processed. When my office rings DARD on behalf of farmers, it is told that DARD is dealing with October's inspections now and that farm inspections that were due in November will not be looked at for another number of months. We have a situation where farmers have been inspected last October and have still not been paid. When we asked about the inspections that took place in November, we were told that they can be looked at only after October's inspection reports are finished. Even when everything has been finalised, it will take 10 to 15 working days for the payments to be processed. There is no interest due on the late payment for the smaller farmers, and they feel particularly aggrieved.

Many farms are inspected repeatedly every year, even though farms are supposed to be inspected at random. If farmers are applying for different schemes, that may result in multiple inspections in one year. The inspections are demanding and stressful and often happen without warning. Like any busy workplace, that puts the farmer under pressure. When any experienced DARD official inspects a farm, its compliance should be obvious and it should not come down to a box-ticking exercise only. No farmer should be subjected to repeat inspections unless serious questions have been asked about the standards on that farm. As much as any Member in the House, I want standards, but there must be some way to make staged payments to those farmers, rather than them having to wait for all their money to be agreed. I have, for a long time, asked DARD to make upfront advanced single farm payments of 80% after initial verification to help ease the cash flow problems that many of those farmers have experienced. Mrs Dobson and others mentioned the cash flow problems that many farmers are experiencing. If the Republic and other member states can do it, it begs this question: why can we not do it? Common sense must play some part in trying to have a sensible approach to the inspections.

Many farmers had reconciled their maps in 2010-12 after protracted discussions and visits to DARD offices, but the new LPIS maps will change that again. Unfortunately, more than 3,500 farmers have experienced errors in maps that were sent out to them when they were applying for their 2013 subsidy, in that many fields have been omitted. We have heard stories here today about that. This issue with mapping will cause even greater annoyance and frustration with farmers. The system has cost £23 million. Nobody has taken responsibility yet for what went wrong.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Byrne: Suffice it to say that DARD and its culture of management are not meeting the needs of farmers. I would expect that the Minister and some senior people, including the permanent secretary, must start to address some of these problems.

Ms Lo: I support the motion on behalf of my Alliance colleague Kieran McCarthy, who has had to leave the Assembly on business.

I understand that the payment came into being on 1 January 2005, and it is the main subsidy scheme for farmers in the EU. As such, Members will realise how important — indeed, it is vital — it is for the survival of the farmer and the landowner and how important it is for the applicant to receive the single farm payment at or on the expected date, which is usually around Christmas every year.

As has already been said, to qualify for the SFP, there is a range of criteria to be met, the main one being the exact hectareage to be presented on the appropriate DARD form. As we are all aware, some time ago, Brussels was not happy with the quality of forms being presented, thus the disallowance incurred by the Department. Further investigations revealed that applications were made and money was paid out on areas of land that did not qualify for payment. As a result of that, the Department undertook a complete examination of every field in Northern Ireland, and it is those maps that are now causing problems regarding accuracy.

This very serious problem has been raised at the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee regularly, and officials and the Minister are very well aware of it. In the pack from the Research and Information Service, which we are indebted to library staff for, you can see that many Members have also raised questions on the issue. As I understand it, the Department has spent quite a lot of money on the land parcel identification system. Now, it appears that many anomalies exist when using that system, and with those anomalies comes delay. It is imperative that we overcome those problems at the earliest opportunity.

In recent times, the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee has heard presentations from DARD officials and various farming interest groups, all spelling out the problems as they see it. I am sure that the Minister and her officials are aware of the problems and will take whatever action is necessary to see, once and for all, the smooth running and completion of this vital component of the farming industry. We support the motion and the amendment.

Mr Irwin: As in previous debates on agricultural issues, I declare an interest as a dairy farmer and someone who receives a single farm payment. As a farmer, I have an acute awareness of the issues facing our industry in current times, and it is from a position of awareness that I will make my comments.

Being a farmer and a member of the DARD Committee, I get calls from farmers across the Province. I value the views of those working at the very heart and first rung of the ladder of the agrifood industry. Those views are important and should be listened to at the highest levels of the Assembly. Any action that can be taken by the Minister and her Department must be taken to lessen the burden on farmers.

For many farmers, the single farm payment has become a lifeline for the farm business and for the industry, especially over the past few years. That is because of the immense pressures that have been brought to bear on the industry by energy costs, the weather and the immeasurable difficulties presented to farmers over the past 12 months, including rocketing input costs such as feed and the inequity of the supply chain in fairly compensating farmers. All those issues combined have left farmers having to wait for a single farm payment for over six months — longer in many cases — leaving a farm business in a difficult position as the banks breathe down the necks of our farmers, waiting for the cash. I spoke to many farmers in that position, and the stress and strain for the farming family involved is huge.

The roll-out of the new LPIS maps has been far from straightforward. I have stated in the press and in the Chamber that farmers have borne the brunt of the Department's mishandling of the issue. I continue to hold the view that it is acutely unfair for farmers to be held responsible for the inaccuracy of the maps. The Department cannot use farmers as scapegoats when it is the Minister and her Department that have caused the confusion and concern for farmers in the first instance.

A farmer told me that a recent farm inspection by DARD officials threw up an error that resulted in a £7 deduction from his single farm payment. Even though the error was small, the inspection process and administering the corrections took an age to sort out. The obvious question is whether the chasing of that £7, compared with the thousands of pounds it cost in administrative fees, is worthwhile. The farmer in that instance rightly shook his head in bewilderment. Certainly there should be an investigation when there is an obvious error involving a significant portion of land, but we must ask whether such minor errors deserve such a costly response from the Department in time and money. I have spoken to those in the Department and form fillers outside the Department who are fearful that, come December, there will be an avalanche of minor errors to investigate. We could, for instance, be talking errors of a few square metres, yet the time and money required to investigate those errors will cause significant hardship for farmers.

Many farmers I have spoken to went through their maps in fine detail, yet many had reservations about the process. Taking a swathe of opinion on board, it is fair to say that there are genuine fears that payments will be significantly delayed because of minor errors unless the Minister and her Department take a different approach to investigating errors. I understand that the EU demands rigorous auditing of the single farm payment. However, there must be an element of realism in the system.

On the back of the recent winter weather and the hardships that continue to hamper our industry, we need the next round of payments to be processed in double-quick time. The pressures that have been exerted on the industry in recent times mean that farmers are fully reliant on their payments to ease those pressures. Any delay will be extremely costly for the industry in the short and longer term. Many farmers are experiencing real financial trouble following such a wet and cold start to the year. Grass yields are proving to be light, which means that pressure could again mount next winter in feed supplies and additional costs. Farmers need to be assisted by the Minister and her Department, not hindered.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Irwin: Advance payments certainly would help. When there are inspections and errors, advance payments would cut the long wait for many farmers. I plead with the Minister —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Irwin: — to find a resolution to that or, come December, there will be big issues for the industry.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. There can be no underestimating the importance of the single farm payment to our farming communities, particularly given the hardships experienced over the past 18 months. There was unforeseen weather, rising costs and falling prices, not to mention the additional costs incurred during the recent fodder shortage.

Many farmers rely on receiving their payment as early as possible to keep their farm sustainable, so I can appreciate the frustration and anxiety that any delay in the process can cause. That point has been well made by Members today.

The introduction of the new mapping system has been a massive and complicated piece of work, but as the single farm payment is worth almost €300 million a year to the rural economy, it is crucial that all necessary steps are taken to get it right in order to militate against disallowance fines being imposed by the European Commission. The maps had to be brought up to the required standard, which required DARD and farmers to work closely together to ensure that they were accurate, not just now but as part of an ongoing process when land usage and boundary changes occur.

When fully implemented, the new system will, hopefully, result in a simplified process and speedier payments, which is, ultimately, what everyone wants. Like many new systems, it has not been without problems, but we need to put the scale of the difficulties into context. We are talking about the remapping of 750,000 fields for about 38,000 farm businesses. Farmers began to receive new maps at the turn of the year, which allowed time for checks and any necessary changes to be made ahead of the single farm payment application deadline. It was unfortunate that the technical error that led to 9% of maps being issued with incorrect information happened during the final batch to be sent out and, therefore, closer to the deadline. I am pleased to note that the error was discovered quickly and that the Minister moved swiftly to minimise its impact on individual farmers by extending the opening hours of DARD Direct offices where necessary and delaying the single farm payment application packs of those affected for two weeks. I am aware that a small number of farmers have outstanding issues to be resolved. As I said earlier, I fully understand the difficulties that any potential delay in receiving the single farm payment can cause for farmers and their families, so I have no problem or difficulty supporting the motion.

Mr Rogers: I support the motion and the amendment. Farmers expect to receive their single farm payment in December, and this expectation is central to their financial planning. When a farm inspection is initiated, it can mean a delay of up to six months and severe financial consequences for the business. The delays cause problems servicing bank loans and making payments to feed, fertiliser and fuel companies. One farmer told me that his heart was in his mouth when he received notice of an inspection, not so much because of the inspection but because of the subsequent delay in receiving his single farm payment.

Repeated random inspections add great pain to an already difficult situation. It appears that if you make a genuine mistake one year, you could be penalised for a number of years. I know farmers who have had random inspections in each of the past three years. I certainly believe that there is a need for an inspection process, but it needs to be used appropriately. DARD needs to start inspections earlier to utilise the longer days.

DARD continually plays down the problem of inaccurate maps. A Member opposite talked about a minor glitch that affected over 3,500 farm businesses — 3,500 is not a minor glitch. A computer acronym that comes to mind is GIGO — garbage in, garbage out — which simply means that a computer does not make a mistake; it requires human interference. In a recent question to the Minister, I asked how the mapping system accounted for hills and hollows in the terrain. The answer was that farmers need to check that for themselves. That failure in communication also means that farmers generally have to accept the maps that DARD produces as correct. However, if inspected, there may be differences between what a farmer and DARD consider to be eligible or ineligible land. That may lead to severe penalties that, in some cases, wipe out the single farm payment.

Although a pilot on remote sensing has been carried out, this method of inspection requires more serious consideration. Many EU member states use the technology as part of the inspection process, and there is anecdotal evidence to suggest that it is much cheaper. The cost associated with DARD officers travelling hundreds of miles, criss-crossing the North, is phenomenal and needs to be reviewed.

Other problems arise in the process after an inspection has been carried out if penalties are applied. The system for penalty calculations is very complicated and, in fact, cannot be followed by Northern Ireland Agricultural Consultants Association (NIACA) members. They find it very difficult to reconcile the inspector's report with the level of financial penalties imposed. DARD provides examples on how the calculation is prepared, but, according to NIACA, they were found to be incorrect.

Penalties can be retrospective, and I will mention one or two examples of cases. A farmer was penalised because he sent his MC1a form along with his fallen animal, instead of sending it to his divisional veterinary office (DVO), as he had done in the past. He was told by the enforcement branch that he should have informed the DVO, but the farmer was unaware of that because, the previous time he had a fatality, he followed the same procedure. However, the rules had changed. He was told by enforcement that he should have known that the rules had changed. Another farmer was penalised because he had put down the wrong date of birth for five calves. He was told that if he reported to his local DVO, there would be no penalty. He did that, but DARD decided that he had committed a cross-compliance breach, because he had had a breach a couple of years previously. He was fined again.

I want to mention briefly the countryside management scheme. It is choked up with bureaucracy as well. A farmer was penalised because he built a double-skin stone ditch instead of a single-skin one. There needs to be a common sense approach to inspections and a greater tolerance of genuine mistakes. In my view, there is a need for a "yellow card" system — a warning that the farmer needs to get an issue sorted out within an agreed period.

Farmers are not criminals, but they are very angry about how they are being treated. As one farmer said to me, "If a farmer had been responsible for the horse meat scandal, he would be in jail."

There is no point in blaming Europe for the bureaucracy. Simon Coveney assures me that Europe sets the guidelines, but it is the Governments that interpret them. Minister, what discussions are taking place with DEFRA? What is the Department doing to tackle the slow tail of inspection payments and to shape the type of advice that farmers are given so that eligibility issues are dealt with more effectively?

It is very important that the single farm payment is drawn down as quickly and as efficiently as possible. The economic impact of delayed payment affects everyone, from farmer to housewife. A more efficient inspection process is central, but the bureaucratic wheels of DARD need to get in gear fast —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Would the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Rogers: — if the potential of our agrifood industry is to be realised. Without farmers, there will be no agrifood industry.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Although I appreciate the value and importance of the single farm payment for the rural economy, particularly in light of the atrocious weather that farmers recently experienced and the economic pressures that have come to bear on them, I think it is important to state that the mapping process was carried out on a huge scale, as has been well documented this evening. It was a huge operation, as has been said. It is a matter of regret that there was an issue with some of the maps. In fact, it went OK for 91% of applicants, but there was an issue with 9%, who, I believe, were in the final batch. It is only fair to point out that, when that was discovered, the Minister and the Department took action to address it. As was said earlier, that included longer opening of the DARD Direct offices and the redirecting of some staff to those offices to get the issue addressed. Furthermore, the SAF packs were issued two weeks later for those affected.

For what it is worth, our party supports the proposal for advance payments. That has been worked towards in the form of the new LPIS system and trying to get as many farmers as possible online. There has also been quite a bit of progress made in remote sensing.

The Minister acted in the face of some of these issues. The motion makes reference to support for farmers. It is important to say that the Minister and her Department have taken steps to support farmers. For example, during the year, she suspended modulation on the single farm payments. That will see an additional €20 million in the pockets of farmers this year. She also argued the case for the continuation of the single farm payment/less-favoured area compensatory allowance (LFACA) dual claims, in light of the conacre system that is prevalent in this part of the country.

Indeed, on the topic of LFACA, payments came out earlier this year and were worth in the region of £25 million. The Minister has asked her Department to look favourably at any applications for force majeure in respect of farmers who lost livestock in the recent snow, because that may have affected their density and, in turn, their LFACA payments. Of course, she introduced the hardship scheme and the fodder transport scheme for those who were worst affected.

In support for farmers, I know that people are entitled to be critical of the Minister and the Department, but it is important to counterbalance that. Some points were, quite rightly, raised today about the mapping system, delayed payments, and one thing and another. However, there are some good points, which I have just referred to.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Yes, he is right to point out all those short-term support measures that the Minister has put in place over the past year. Of course, we are very grateful for that assistance and help. However, would it not be of better benefit and more assistance to the farming community if she were able to transform the Department, which is, at present, a plundering giant, into one that is much more agile and speedy in assisting and helping the industry when it hits crisis after crisis after crisis? Would the farming community not thank her more if she were able to do that?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McAleer: I thank the Member for his intervention. In fairness, there is recent evidence to suggest that the Minister and the Department can move quickly and decisively to address issues as they arise. We saw that during the recent snowfall in March, when the Minister went to the Executive and got the hardship package delivered. We have also seen it with regard to the fodder transport scheme. A lot of progress has been made to get LFACA payments out earlier this year. I believe that there are as many as 1,000 farms in the pilot scheme for remote sensing. Hopefully, that will speed up inspections and payments and open up the potential of advance payments in line with rest of the country, which people referred to earlier.

To get back to my point, I want to try to counterbalance things a wee bit. Yes, there are issues. However, we are moving in the right direction. I want to mention some points. For example, the recent injection of £5 million into rural broadband was very important for rural areas. There has been investment in the rural borewells scheme, and £13 million investment in rural childcare. Money has been invested in rural businesses, farm diversification and, indeed, rural community organisations. Of course, the Minister has been over there arguing the case for a package that is tailored for this region as part of the CAP reform negotiations.

In conclusion, therefore, I support the motion and thank the Members who brought it to the House. We support it. The mapping error certainly was an issue; it affected 9% of applicants and it probably could not have come at a worse time.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close.

Mr McAleer: Thankfully, we are moving in the right direction. We support the motion.

Mr Allister: Various words, such as "shambolic", "appalling", "pathetic", and many more besides, have been used to describe the situation that has resulted from the mapping crisis. In truth, few of them are adequate. This is a failure of a colossal nature. It is a failure by government. You would think, to listen to some people in this House, that we did not have a system of government in which there is supposed to be a Minister who takes responsibility. One would think that it was always enough to say, oh, technical difficulties, or someone else's fault. When do we ever, in this House, get to the point when a Minister will stand up and say, "My Department has failed, and failed lamentably: I take responsibility for it and will act accordingly."? It seems that we never get to that point in this House. I suspect that we will not get to it today as the person who is replying to the debate is a Member who knows nothing about farming and is someone who represents West Belfast. I suspect that the chances of this debate reaping anything of value are nil, but there are points that need to be made.

The situation is aggravated when the Minister's apologists tell us, "Oh, all it takes is a phone call to get it sorted out", as Mr McMullan did, or, "Do not worry so much about it. Did we not put wonderful money into childcare?", as Mr McAleer did. Sorry; we are talking about issues that touch on the survival and, sometimes, the sanity of farmers, who are so pressurised and so at their wits' end that this is not to be trivialised and swept aside by saying, "Oh, it is terrible that it has happened, but it is only 9%". There is a responsibility on government that goes, or should go, something like this: if you implement a scheme and a system, you have a duty of care to those affected by it. Where is the duty of care demonstrated by the Department towards the farmers who have been detrimentally affected by this scheme and by the maps that are utterly useless and riven with errors?

We who are in touch with the farming community could regale the House with many episodes and incidents of farmers affected by this matter. Let me deal with one: a farmer who farms marginal lands in the foothills. Some of the land is classified as low and raised bog, and it has been accepted into the countryside management scheme because it meets the fundamental criteria of that scheme for such land: it is available to provide forage, has access for grazing and has a history of grazing. All that is set out in, I think, OT3 of the guidance. It is accepted into the countryside management scheme, but then the maps come along, and the land is coloured purple, meaning that all of it is disallowed. An inspector photographs cattle grazing the land, but it is still disallowed. The restriction on grazing to three months of the year is because of the countryside management scheme obligations, and yet the Department seeks to maintain that that farmer is not entitled to include that land. When he complains, the answer is, "Oh, you can appeal it". Yes, he can appeal it, but when? By that stage, he is liable to be bankrupt. His single farm payments for 2012 and 2013 have been denied, but he is simply told, "Oh, you can appeal it". What use is that? Where is the sense —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Allister: — of responsibility for a Minister who recognises that this is a shambles of her making? It is time that she faced up to that. It is clear that she is not bearing any pain —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: — but there are many who are. It is pain that she should feel but sadly does not.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development welcomes this debate on the single farm payment and the implications of the new land parcel identification system maps for the 2013 single farm payment process.

As Minister O'Neill has previously advised the Assembly, the single farm payment is vital to farmers. At about €275 million, it is practically equivalent to the profits made in the sector and represents cash income on which farmers depend. It is claimed annually by over 38,000 farmers, on the basis of the 750,000 fields that they farm. Each field must have its boundaries correctly stated, and the eligible area in the field must be correctly calculated. Only one farmer can claim single farm payment for each field.

DARD and the farming community continue to work hard to achieve the highest standards of administration of single farm payments. Over the past five years, they have worked together to address European Commission concerns about the interpretation of rules; consistency and rigor of inspections; and, most significantly, land parcel identification system maps. Once it beds in, the outcome of this work will be a vastly improved administrative process, and we believe our controls should meet European standards and enable more accurate payments to be made in a more timely way. However, 2013 is the year when the new mapping control is being used for the first time, and it will be 2014 and 2015 before the full benefits are realised.

This year, the Department had three objectives for improvements to farm maps. First, to review all fields to establish a maximum eligible area for each one. Secondly, to issue new maps to farmers, and, thirdly, to get farmers to fine-tune the information on the maps to state the eligible area on which they would base their claim. These three objectives have been achieved. The Department has calculated the maximum eligible area for each field, a new map has been issued to each farmer, and the Department is very pleased with the response that it has had from farmers to fine-tune the information.

The calculation of maximum eligible area was based on aerial photography. Some of the photography dated from a few years ago, so a significant proportion of the updates that farmers and agents made related to things that had changed on the ground in the meantime. It is simply not true to suggest that all the changes were necessary because of departmental error. Of course, it is not always possible to correctly identify all the features in a field from an aerial photograph; for example, overhanging trees can obscure detail on the ground. In regard to some vegetation, such as heather or bracken, it is difficult always to determine whether it is eligible from a photograph. That is why it is important that staff work closely with farmers to keep the mapping information accurate and that farmers tell the Department about the changes needed.

The maps were issued to all farmers between December and February so that changes could be made, where necessary, ahead of the single farm payment application forms being issued and the application deadline. Although the overall objectives have been achieved, there have been some process issues. Members will understand that this has been a complex task, and not everything has run as smoothly as the Minister hoped. The remapping of all the fields has had to take place alongside the continued running of a live system to accept applications, accept farmer changes and inspection findings, and make payments. The Department had to make sure that existing controls, systems and, ultimately, payments were not jeopardised.

There were two significant problems. First, it is regrettable that, for about 9% of maps, a technical problem occurred that meant that these maps were produced and issued with a significant number of fields missing. This should not have happened, but it was quickly fixed. Although these fields did not appear on the affected maps, they remained at all times in the Department's database, and farmers could update them, if necessary, in DARD Direct offices. The maps were reproduced in just over two weeks and affected farmers were given an additional two weeks to examine and update their map if an update was required. In the circumstances, I believe that this was a strong and appropriate response on DARD's part. Secondly, it was difficult to get all the information provided by farmers and their agents on to revised maps and send revised maps to farmers in every case. Until the middle of April, farmers who had told us about changes were given a replacement map, and the last of those arrived with farmers by 5 May. Maps were also available online and through DARD Direct offices. However, those farmers who raised changes later were provided, if they visited DARD offices from the middle of April onwards, with the information they needed to complete their application in a format other than a revised map.

Where does this leave us now? Today, 10 June, is the final day for receiving 2013 single farm payment applications. Up to and including 6 June, 37,706 applications had been received. It is good to see that this number is only slightly down when compared to the figure of 37,890 application forms that were received in 2012, particularly against the backdrop of numbers falling year on year for many years.

Twenty per cent of applications were received online. The Minister would like to see that number increasing. Applications online are subject to built-in rules and prompts that will help to avoid many obvious errors, making it easier for the farmer to comply. Also, paper applications have to be scanned onto the system and checked, which is inefficient and expensive and delays the start of the inspection process. More online claims mean faster payments in the long run.

What happens next? There are two further processes: verification and inspection. Over the coming months, we will be verifying the information declared by farmers on their claim forms to confirm eligibility. Significant resources are required each year to investigate and reconcile incorrect claims and to resolve queries on claims. That slows down the validation process and delays payments. Although we hope that most claims will be accurate and can be paid quickly, we are obliged to assess eligibility in accordance with EU rules and can only make payments when eligibility has been fully established. If farmers have not followed the advice and have ended up claiming more than the maximum eligible area we told them about for any of their fields, that will have to be investigated.

Farmers still have time to correct their applications if they need to. I encourage them to do so. If farmers find that they have mistakenly claimed a field for the single farm payment or LFACA because someone else is claiming that field for the same scheme or if they think that they have unintentionally claimed more than the maximum eligible area, they still have time to tell us about that and remove it from their claim. They need to do that now, before the administrative and on-the-spot checks start. That will avoid delays later trying to sort it out and could avoid penalties being applied. Also, if the Department contacts farmers with a query on their claim, they need to respond quickly so that they can sort it out and finalise their claim as early as possible.

The Minister recognises that some particular difficulties were experienced this year by some farmers because of mapping information. Assuming that the farmer has abided by the scheme's rules, the Department will consider a number of situations in which overdeclaration penalties would not be appropriate in individual cases where the farmer has claimed more than the maximum eligible area on their map.

As far as on-the-spot checks are concerned, DARD is required to check at least 5% of SFP cases to confirm the eligibility of the fields claimed. There was very significant progress in 2012 to update our systems and processes associated with the EU requirement to carry out the checks. One important outcome of the improvements was that DARD was able to start paying the 2012 inspection cases earlier. By the end of the year, it had paid five times more inspection cases compared with 2011. By the end of May 2013, during a period of significant difficulty for the industry, almost all the inspected farm businesses had received their 2012 single farm payments. Through all those enhancements, it was necessary to ensure that the quality and accuracy of inspections was maintained. That commitment to quality has been confirmed through recent independent audit checking of the inspections, which has shown that the quality of inspection controls was high.

One of the new and unquantified challenges this year will be the impact of the new LPIS maps being used during inspections. Once again, the Minister commends farmers for their commitment to updating the maps that were issued earlier this year. Where a farmer has updated their map and claimed carefully, making any further deductions from their maximum eligible area, that will speed up the completion of their farm inspection. It follows that, where changes have not been reported, it is likely to delay the inspection process. About half our inspections this year will be carried out using traditional field inspections. The Minister has decided to significantly increase inspections using satellite imagery this year to approximately 1,000, which will help to relieve the pressure on field staff to maintain the timely completion of field checks.

The Minister is satisfied that the Department's inspection controls are fit for purpose. She hopes to consolidate the progress that has been made in speeding up inspections and the processing of results. She will keep these processes under review to ensure that that remains the case.

Looking towards the end of the year, it is too early yet to be definitive about targets for 2013 single farm payments. As in previous years, the Department will work to complete as many 2013 single farm payments as possible at the earliest practical date.

I now want to cover some of the concerns that were raised by Members. A number of Members raised the issue of advance payments. While DARD will not be in a position to make early payments this year, the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development is committed to seeing this facility introduced as early as possible and improvements made to the maps. The bedding in of control with remote sensory techniques should allow us to complete our processes earlier and put us in a much better position as far as early payments are concerned.

Issues were also raised about the mapping problems and who would be held to account for those. I think that it was Mrs Dobson and Mr Byrne who raised those issues. The work that has been done to date has been complex and challenging. It is accepted that not everything has gone as well as had been hoped, but it is clear that any issues that have arisen have been dealt with as quickly as possible.

I now turn to Mr Rogers's point about what DARD is doing to interact with DEFRA and Europe to improve arrangements for farmers. DARD is actively involved in seeking to improve the arrangements for delivering single farm payments, not just in the context of the CAP reform negotiations but through its involvement in paying agency conferences and learning networks, which explore ways to make the delivery of those schemes simpler and faster.

I will now make some concluding remarks. I want to take the opportunity to thank the industry again for the positive way in which most farmers have responded to the challenges we face this year. Getting this right is vital as part of the effort to tackle the concerns raised in the past by the European Commission, but it also gives us a more stable platform for the future as we move towards CAP reform, with all its uncertainties. While we have clearly taken a big step in strengthening our controls through the LPIS mapping project, it is important to recognise that we constantly have to balance the impact of improvements against the need to make as many payments as early as possible. We also have to ensure that all our control processes are robust enough to stand up to audit scrutiny.

The Minister is committed to providing a compliant, accurate and timely delivery of payments, as required by the EU. The Department has made progress during previous years in working through the challenges presented by the audit criticism and the need to embrace new technology. We continue to face those challenges in 2013, and I know that the Minister is encouraged by the progress and commitment shown by our mapping, inspectorate and payment teams in meeting the challenges of 2012 and enabling the delivery of much quicker payments. Through the increased use of new technology and the continuing improvement in the accuracy of LPIS maps and farmers' claims, I am confident that we can maintain this position and lay a solid foundation for timely payments in the future. I support the motion.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for her response. Earlier, Jim Allister summoned Basil McCrea by saying that he was not here, but I noticed that Jim criticised the Minister for not knowing what she was going to talk about and then left before she had the chance to say it. I think that he will maybe be watching the debate on TV or will get a chance to read it.

One of the things that I would point out is that our amendment, which I take it has been accepted by all parties in the House, further notes:

“Northern Ireland still remains exposed to disallowance if the rules of the scheme are broken”.

We have to remember how much money has been lost to the Northern Ireland economy through the disallowances that have been applied. Those disallowances have mostly been due to mapping errors and inaccuracies. The issue has been raised many times in the House since I came into it, and we have always been led to believe that the Department is almost blameless in any of these errors; that it is always the farmer who is to blame when we get bills from Europe for £72 million, £84 million or whatever it is. I heard the Minister's response about satellites, drones and how remote imaging is going to satisfy all those concerns, but I am concerned that, if we do not get it right, we are going to be liable to far more errors. So we have to be sure that the steps that we take will be for the benefit of farmers and the industry in general in Northern Ireland. Aerial photography is mentioned continually, and a number of the Minister's party colleagues raised the prospect of it. The problem is that aerial photography does not take into consideration the gradient of a steep sloping hill in providing the overall area of the maps, which I know that the Minister has said that the Department has sorted out. It has not. People have been and are coming into my office to point out that the areas of their fields are still not correct because of the sloping nature of those fields.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: I have limited time. You have 10 minutes at the end, Trevor; work away.

I am glad that the Ulster Unionist amendment has been accepted. The main motion refers to speeding up the overall inspection process. We tabled the amendment because we are concerned that a speeding up of the inspection process would not help farmers' cash flow. We have heard evidence here of case studies. I think that Mr Rogers said that people who submitted forms in October are still waiting. Speeding up solely the inspection process would not have quickened up the paperwork or the final payment to farmers. I know that Members here talk about 9% and 5%, but those are mostly small farmers who are under critical pressure at this time, particularly with cash flow. Cash flow in agriculture and in farming has dropped. In 2007, it was £237.3 million. It dropped last year to £158.6 million, a fall of 25% over that period. In 2012, bank borrowing on agricultural loans was £821 million, which is five times more than cash flow. That does not take into consideration the money that is left for feed, fertiliser or fuel distributors. Speeding up the inspection process was not going to solve that at all.

Mr Rogers also mentioned the Northern Ireland Agricultural Consultants Association. We had correspondence from it stating:

“During previous years, farmers have filled in many correction forms, spent time in DARD offices, had inspections carried out by DARD inspectors, all making alterations to comply with the ever-changing rules. All this has been ignored. All and any previous alterations have been trashed as a result of these changes being ignored once again by DARD. DARD are blaming the customers — to use their term for farmers. There seems to be a serious communication issue between LPIS and DARD. They sent out maps, which were wrong. Land was even missing from businesses, and DARD walk away and then try to blame the farmer.”

Mrs Overend: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: Go ahead.

Mrs Overend: On that remark about correspondence being inaccurate, I wrote to the Minister regarding this issue on behalf of my constituents. I received a response only last Friday, telling me to urge my constituents to get their papers in for 31 May. How ridiculous was it to urge me to do that when the deadline was past?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Swann: Thank you.

Had the Minister the chance to come back, she would probably describe that as a glitch. It seems common parlance for the Department to describe anything technical or computer-driven as a glitch or to say that somebody else, somewhere, is to blame.

We tabled our amendment specifically because of the nature of the pressure that we are putting on our farmers. We want to bring forward even part payment to try to get cash flowing and money back into farmers' pockets. I think that it was in the Ulster Unionist-led debate that we talked about the 52% drop in farming profitability in the past year, and we asked the Minister to commit to the £400 million that has been promised to the Agri-Food Strategy Board. I have a question for the junior Minister in her own role rather than that of responding for the Department of Agriculture. I will even give way for her to answer. Is there a willingness in the Executive to find that £400 million to support our agri-industry as widely as possible? Does the Minister want to respond? That is fine. I will ask in other ways. I have submitted questions for written answer on this, and I look forward to receiving a commitment —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Swann: — from the Executive.

In conclusion, Mr Byrne and Mr Rogers used the phrase that the Department needs a “common-sense” approach. From what we have seen, the thing that is lacking most in the Department at the minute —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Swann: — is common sense.

Mr Clarke: Like my colleagues, I am pleased to accept the amendment proposed in the name of the Ulster Unionist Party. Although it is calling for advance payments, I suggest that the Minister should expect that we will be looking for possibly between 70% and 80% of an advanced payment, if we want to be more specific in relation to that.

It is disappointing that we are having a debate on the most major industry that we have left in Northern Ireland and that the Minister is not here. I appreciate that she is unwell today, but I suspect that it would perhaps have been better to put the debate back in order to have a relevant discussion and debate with the Minister, as opposed to a pre-written statement from her or her officials — much like the contribution from her colleagues in Sinn Féin, who were basically only paying lip service here today. I emphasise that it was not until the third Member from Sinn Féin spoke that they even suggested that they would support the motion or the motion as amended. The tone was disappointing. Indeed, the first Member from Sinn Féin to speak spent the full five minutes speaking about how wonderful agriculture was, and did not actually emphasise the difficulties and problems faced by the farming community. The very purpose of the debate was to talk about the problems with the single farm payment, and, particularly, the mapping.

I found it interesting listening to Mr Byrne describing himself as a Rottweiler. I would never say that about Mr Byrne, but there is someone who came much later than that who one perhaps could describe as a Rottweiler, but he has now left the Chamber. His contribution was worthwhile. He spoke about the Minister and her Department not delivering for farmers. I think that that has come out in the tone of the whole debate from all sections of the House, except, obviously, the Members from the Minister's party, who were here to put her on a pedestal today.

My colleague talked about the lack of confidence, and I think that has been the tone of the debate. Indeed, the proposer of the amendment spoke about confidence as well and the problems that the farming community faces on a regular basis. I do not think there is one of our offices that is not contacted annually about payments and problems relating to them.

It is interesting, when you look at the whole debate, to consider how much money has been paid for this mapping system. This is not new; it is actually the second time we have had a go at it. Then we tell farmers that it is their responsibility to check their maps and, if there is something wrong with the maps, to fix them and inform us. We have had this problem in the past, and all of the errors associated. We have a new system. Before the system was up and running we had inherited problems with that, and we are still saying to the farmers, "Here is your map, but go and check it. This is the best we can do, but, if there are any problems, it is your fault". Where else would accept that? I suggest that the Department would be much better taking the money it has spent on the system, give it to the farmers and tell them to employ professionals to carry out their own mapping exercise. First, the Department probably would have saved money, and, secondly, it would have felt reasonable to blame the farmer, or the agent acting on the farmer's behalf, for making mistakes in relation to the mapping.

Mr Byrne: I thank Mr Clarke for giving way. I think it is well-recognised that Ordnance Survey of Northern Ireland is the expert on mapping. I fail to understand why DARD did not employ it, rather than that private company with an electronic system that has plainly failed.

Mr Clarke: You could say that. We could say how good a job Ordnance Survey does in relation to all of the mapping that it does for Northern Ireland. You could also criticise the Department for previously taking the maps to India and getting the Indian people to do our mapping in the past. Look at the problems we had there. That is why I am making the point that I think it would be much better if the money spent in relation to that was actually given to farmers themselves to employ individuals to do the map, if the Department is expecting farmers to be responsible for what they are submitting.

We also heard today about issues raised with the maps and the contact that was made with the Department. The one that strikes me most was the example that Tom Elliott gave today — we have heard a few different examples — of someone who got a map, identified a mistake, took it to the local office and it came back wrong again. They went back to the local office again, and it was wrong again. That happened three times. What does that say about how the Department is treating the individuals in terms of the process and the concerns that they have? What if that farmer, or any other farmer in the same circumstances, had taken the map and assumed that the Department was doing the job correctly, had corrected the error, and continued on? Fortunately, in that case, it was obvious that the farmer whom Tom Elliott mentioned had the good sense to check his map the second and third time, rather than putting it in and being penalised at a later date.

Surely there is something fundamentally wrong with our system when we are told that the Minister is giving farmers two weeks to check their maps but, when they do that, they find that the Department is still getting it wrong. The Minister needs to do more in the way that she goes about her business to hold people to account, rather than penalising farmers continually.

There are three arabesques in the ceiling of the Senate chamber that represent shipbuilding, farming and the linen industry. Two of those industries are gone, and the only one that we have left is farming — and look at the shambles that the Department is making of it. Look at the shambles that we have seen, year after year. Jim Allister gave us a few words from the dictionary that you could use for the situation, but it is a shambles, and the sooner the Minister and her Department face up to their responsibility, the better.

The other interesting thing that came up — Members have had differing views on it — was the idea of zero tolerance, which Jo-Anne Dobson mentioned. She is right; there is zero tolerance from the Department. We have heard mention many times of gold-plating. Sinn Féin likes to idolise its all-island strategy, but our nearest neighbours are the ones who continue to talk about advance payments. Sinn Féin will not follow their example. Why is that?

Mr McMullan: Will the Member give way for clarity?

Mr Clarke: No. I will not give way to you; you would not give way to me earlier.

The Minister harps on about an all-island policy, but our nearest neighbour is doing something to support the farming community. Why is the Minister not doing that?

Mr McMullan: If you would let me tell you —

Mr Clarke: The Member continually wants to intervene but he had five minutes and all that he did was praise the Minister, read out a résumé of how wonderful she is and tell us what a wonderful job she is doing. If you go out and speak to most of the community today about how she is performing for the rural community, I would say that the answer is definitely not wonderful.

Perhaps, when she comes back to the House, the Minister will tell us what she is going to do to right the wrongs that have been happening in the mapping process. We have been told today that she is considering it and that she is going to do something about it, but just not now. The industry cannot wait; it is crying out for advance payments now.

We have heard about all the measures that the Minister has taken to deal with the crisis that we have faced over the past number of months. The Minister should be congratulated for those actions, but the farming community has been facing a crisis that began late last year and will continue into the early part of next year, given the most recent fodder prices. There will be a shortage of fodder, and the worst problem for the farming community later this year and early next year will be that they will not receive the money that they need to continue what they have been doing for so many years. They have faced severe pressures in the early part of this year.

Members who are involved in the farming community know that the current crop has been delayed for four weeks and that there is not going to be enough grass for next year. The farmers need to be in a financial position to continue their businesses into the future. One of the ways in which that can happen, given the problems and errors that have occurred in the past, is to make 70% to 80% of the advance payments to the farmers now, with no more excuses from the Minister. I support the motion and the amendment.

Question, That the amendment be made, put and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly recognises the concerns within the farming community regarding the issuing of inaccurate land parcel identification system maps; notes that many were still awaiting their altered maps days before the deadline of 15 May 2013 for their single farm payment application; understands the difficulties and pressures that this will cause to the applicants; further notes that Northern Ireland still remains exposed to disallowance if the rules of the scheme are broken; and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to tackle the problem of delayed payments by seeking permission from the European Commission to make advance payments, including proportionally smaller advance payments for farms selected for inspection.

Adjourned at 7.04 pm.

Speaker's Business

Public Petition: Meningitis B Vaccine

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Jim Wells has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes in which to speak on the subject.

Mr Wells: The Devine family from Strabane is here today and has presented me with its Time for Terri petition, which calls on the United Kingdom Government to introduce the new meningitis B vaccine. It is supported by representatives of the charity, Meningitis Research Foundation.

On 21 December 2008, Marie and Sean Devine tragically lost their daughter Terri at the tender age of 16 to the ruthless disease meningitis B. That was just days before Christmas and three days after Terri first complained of flu-like symptoms.

The Meningitis Research Foundation team in Belfast supported the family during that terrible time. Family members threw themselves into raising money for the charity, generating £60,000. The family also heard, through a Facebook page based in Cumbria, that names were being gathered for a petition to encourage the Government to introduce a vaccine for meningitis B, which is the condition that Terri had, and that the vaccine was waiting for a licence. The family has worked hard to gather signatures and is determined to put as much pressure as possible on decision-makers to have the vaccine introduced as part of the routine vaccination programme.

The family cannot bring Terri back but can help to save the lives of other children. The family have achieved an amazing level of support: 22,100 people have signed the Time for Terri petition, which calls for the introduction of the meningitis B vaccine as soon as possible to prevent more deaths and prevent children suffering serious after effects.

The Devine family know better than anyone how vitally important it is that our children are protected against all types of meningitis and septicaemia. Terri's sister Karen, her cousin Sarah-Jane Sweeney and Diane McConnell from the Meningitis Research Foundation travelled to 10 Downing Street last Thursday, accompanied by MPs Michelle Gildernew and Pat Doherty. They delivered a petition to the Prime Minister.

Meningitis and septicaemia affect around 3,600 people in the UK and Ireland annually. Meningitis B is responsible for the majority of cases of this disease in the British Isles.

The disease can strike anyone, at any time, at any age, killing one in 10 and leaving a quarter of survivors with life-altering effects, such as deafness, brain damage and loss of limbs. There is a newly licensed meningitis B vaccine. The Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation (JCVI) is expected to make its recommendation on that tomorrow. The Meningitis Research Foundation was among the specialist organisations submitting data for consideration by the UK Government's JCVI, including the reported estimated lifetime cost for someone seriously disabled by meningitis B, which has been estimated to be as much as £3 million per patient.

At last there is an opportunity to dramatically reduce the devastating impact of meningitis B. The Devine family supports the Meningitis Research Foundation, and is urging the Government to introduce the new meningitis B vaccine as soon as possible. Any delay will mean unnecessary deaths and children growing up with disabilities and needlessly limited opportunities to reach their full potential.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I now present the petition to you on behalf of the Devine family, hoping, as we all do, that we will be able to eradicate this terrible disease from our society.

Mr Wells moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I will forward the petition to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I will also send a copy to the Chairperson of the Health Committee.

Ministerial Statements

Putting Pupils First: Reforming the Common Funding Scheme

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Le do chead, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle, ba mhian liom ráiteas a dhéanamh ar an 'Athbhreithniú Neamhspleách ar an Scéim Chomónta Maoinithe' a foilsíodh ag deireadh mhí Eanáir agus breac-chuntas a thabhairt ar conas atá sé beartaithe agam rudaí a thabhairt chun tosaigh.

With your permission, I wish to make a statement on 'An Independent Review of the Common Funding Scheme', which was published at the end of January, and to outline how I intend to move forward.

Members will recall that I was not satisfied that the common funding scheme, which determines how funds are allocated to schools, was fit for purpose. I did not believe that the scheme adequately supported my key policy objectives, in particular raising standards, targeting social need and building a network of strong and sustainable schools.

Tá, agus beidh, m'fhócas ar thús áite a thabhairt do dhaltai i gcónaí. Cuireann seo taca faoi gach polasaí atá á chur i bhfeidhm agam agus gach cinneadh a dhéanaim mar Aire Oideachais.

My focus will always be on putting pupils first. That underpins every policy I am implementing and every decision I undertake as Education Minister. I therefore commissioned an independent panel, led by Sir Bob Salisbury, to examine this area and report back to me. I wish to thank Sir Bob, Evan Bates and Eemer Eivers for all their work on this review. I know that they engaged in extensive consultation and meetings as part of the exercise. Their report was published and placed on my Department's website at the end of January. Members will have had time to examine the report and the 29 wide-ranging recommendations it contains.

I specifically sought the Education Committee's views on the report and the recommendations contained within it. I want to thank the Committee for its detailed consideration of the report, the consultation with stakeholders that it undertook to inform its response and the response it provided to me. I encouraged consideration of the report by the strategic forum established by my Department. The forum facilitates engagement between education trade unions, senior staff in my Department and the education and library boards, and other arm's-length bodies that we sponsor. These views have helped to shape and inform my thinking on the way forward.

I have already outlined to the Assembly in earlier statements how I intend to drive up standards and to move forward on embedding area-based planning. This report on our common funding scheme and my response to it are about continuing and reinforcing that direction of travel. I want to make it clear that commissioning this review was not about saving money. It was about making better use of the funding that we have and using it to promote strong, vibrant schools that put pupils and their needs and aspirations first.

Following this statement, my Department will publish a revised common funding scheme for consultation in the next couple of weeks. The changes that it will contain will reflect the recommendations in the review report and my response to those. While today's statement provides an opportunity for me to set out my position on the key recommendations, I am also publishing in more detail a formal response to each of the 29 recommendations that the independent review panel made in its report.

The independent review panel made a number of recommendations relating to how we allocate, monitor and account for funding. Those include recommendations to restrict the number of funded initiatives for schools, to review earmarked funding, and to ensure that, where earmarked or short-term funding is necessary, there is a clear exit strategy. I accept the recommendations in respect of limiting earmarked funds and maximising the amount of moneys that go directly to schools via the aggregated schools budget. That is what schools told the review panel they wanted. I will review the earmarked funds that currently go to schools and establish whether those could be added to the aggregated schools budget and delegated directly to schools. It will not be possible, or indeed appropriate, to remove every earmarked budget. However, I will ensure that those are all reviewed to test whether they need to remain.

In that context, it is important that I make clear my view that money delegated to schools should be spent on improving the outcomes for the children and young people at those schools. My Department already has in place limits for surpluses and deficits. Those recognise that schools need flexibility and provide for schools to accumulate modest deficits or surpluses of up to 5% of their total budget or £75,000, whichever is less. However, too many schools are outside those limits. Last year, 86 primary schools held surpluses in excess of £100,000; seven of those had surpluses in excess of £250,000. The review has recommended that there should be stronger financial challenge and intervention procedures for schools with excessive surpluses and deficits, similar to those that are in place for school improvement.

It cannot be good practice that some schools are sitting on what can only be described as large surpluses when the Assembly voted for that funding to be spent on educating the pupils who they have enrolled. It is even less tenable for schools in which educational outcomes are low to hoard surpluses that could be spent on improving those outcomes. Equally, schools are no different from any other publicly funded bodies in that they must live within the resources allocated to them and not run up deficits. When that happens, the money needed to cover those deficits has to be found from other parts of the education service; that, too, is not tenable.

The best education systems internationally combine a high level of autonomy for schools with a high level of accountability for schools. I am committed to allowing schools the flexibility and freedom to make decisions on how best to meet the educational needs of their pupils within their budgets. I am equally committed to ensuring that there is robust accountability for the outcomes that they achieve. In that context, the review also recommends that my Department should explore the practical implications of allowing any school to adopt the systems of financial management operated for voluntary grammar schools and grant-maintained integrated schools. Some schools have made it clear to me that they would welcome the freedom that they perceive comes with having their own bank accounts. Others have made equally clear their view that that would be a burden that they do not wish to carry. I will accept the recommendation to explore that further. I intend to explore it once we have progressed the Education Bill and the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) has been established.

The independent review makes several recommendations that are designed to ensure that arrangements for funding schools support more effectively my Department's sustainable schools policy and the work on area planning. That has perhaps been the most challenging aspect of reforming our common funding scheme. The review panel's view is that the current means of funding small schools does not acknowledge the need to improve how we plan our schools estate on an area basis. The panel recommended that I remove all small schools factors from the current funding. However, it has to be recognised that strategically important small schools would, in that scenario, have to be supported by funding outside the new formula to deliver effective education for the pupils.

I know that much concern has been expressed about that recommendation. Although I accept the recommendation in principle, I am not, however, implementing it at this time. Small schools should be reassured that those factors will not be removed from the common funding formula overnight. However, I do want to signal that, although small schools factors in the current formula will be retained for the 2014-15 financial year, schools and managing authorities should not rely on the continuation of the funding allocated via those factors in the longer term. As I have stated previously, all six sustainable schools criteria have to be taken into account when deciding the future of a school, and a budget inflated through the small schools factors is not the single deciding factor for sustainability. I reserve the capacity to make further adjustments to the funding formula, including the small schools factors, in future years to reflect and respond to progress on area planning.

The area-planning work that is under way aims to have the right schools of the right type and the right size in the right place. Those area plans may determine that there is a need for a small school, and I assure the Assembly that, when that is the case, small schools that have been identified as strategically important will receive the resources that they need to provide the best possible education for the children whom they serve. The difference from the current position is that those small schools will be planned and approved. They will not be there just because they have always been there but because they represent the best solution for young people in that area.

The panel also recommended the development of a small schools policy that identifies and safeguards strategically important small schools. I have no difficulty with the thinking behind that recommendation, but I do not believe that another policy is necessary. We already have a sustainable schools policy that sets out the criteria and quality indicators to help managing authorities to assess schools' sustainability. We already have an extensive area-based planning process under way, designed to ensure that schools are planned strategically to deliver sustainable, high-quality education. Within that existing policy, I will provide further clarification on the circumstances as to when a small school will need to be retained and how it will be supported. My focus in moving forward that element of the reform will be to concentrate on implementing the policies that we have and ensuring that funding arrangements support those policies. I do not intend to introduce another policy that I do not believe is needed. What is needed are decisions.

Funding for our young people with special educational needs (SEN) is also covered by the report. The review, therefore, considers the pros and cons of funding our special schools via the funding formula. It also includes specific recommendations relating to funding to support pupils with special educational needs and funding for special schools.

There are challenges associated with adopting a formulaic approach to allocating funding for SEN support when that support is designed to reflect the individual needs of a pupil with special educational needs and will, therefore, vary from pupil to pupil. Quite sensibly, the independent review concluded that such funding does not, at this time, lend itself to allocation via a formula. I agree with that conclusion. However, I am conscious that leaders in our special schools want greater autonomy, greater delegation and greater flexibility to take decisions. From speaking to them, I know that they also accept the need for greater accountability.

I am, therefore, accepting the recommendation that consistent financial management information should be recorded for special schools to inform decisions and to plan spending. That is sensible practice and should already be happening. If it is not happening, I will expect the necessary steps to be put in place. The recommendation also calls for a specific review of special schools funding once the practice of setting down and reviewing consistent financial information has bedded in. I want to explore further with governors and school leaders in special schools what more might be done to ensure that the route by which they receive their funding does not impede their ability to make decisions that are best made at the school level.

A key focus of the independent panel's review was to examine how a revised funding formula would better support my determination to address educational underachievement and help to break the link between social disadvantage and low educational outcomes. Despite continued yearly improvement, the system still leads to disadvantaged pupils being only half as likely to achieve five GCSEs or equivalent at grades A* to C, including in English and maths, as their more affluent counterparts, and that presents an educational, economic and political challenge that we, as legislators, cannot ignore and cannot allow to continue. I am pleased, therefore, that the review panel addressed that significant dimension of its remit with rigour. It recognised that pupils from socially deprived backgrounds have greater obstacles to overcome and that schools need to do more to assist them in breaking that linkage. It makes very clear, through the evidence-based recommendations, that more funding should be targeted at pupils from socially disadvantaged backgrounds.

The review also recognised that the issues that schools face in overcoming barriers created by social deprivation are significantly increased with increasing numbers of children from less affluent backgrounds. The panel, therefore, recommended that funding for socio-economic deprivation should be weighted towards schools with significant concentrations of disadvantage to reflect the negative effects of such concentrations.

It will be no surprise to Members, therefore, to note that I accept and fully endorse these recommendations. Indeed, I intend to inject a further £10 million into school budgets next year, with that funding being allocated to help schools with the greatest concentrations of disadvantage to address underachievement among their disadvantaged pupils. Although this will be good news for many schools, I make it clear, however, that the extra money will need to be accounted for. To draw down that additional funding, schools will need to set out how they plan to use it to help pupils from disadvantaged backgrounds to achieve their full potential. They will have flexibility in identifying actions, but they will be held to account for the outcomes that they deliver.

I expect these interventions to link teaching and learning with the work that those schools undertake as extended schools and to involve outreach to parents and communities as well as direct support for the young people themselves. ESA will have a critical role to play in scrutinising schools' plans and in supporting schools in identifying suitable interventions to meet pupils' needs. The inspectorate will also ensure that, through the inspection process, there is an appropriate focus on the outcomes achieved for pupils with this funding.

Before I leave social deprivation funding, I ask Members to note that the review panel also made reference to the methodology that my Department uses to allocate this funding. I am pleased that the review recognised free school meals entitlement as the best available indicator of social disadvantage, but I am also content to accept the recommendation that this is something that should be kept under review. If a better measure emerges, it is only right that we should consider it.

The review also recommended that I consider adjusting the eligibility criteria for free school meals. It is important that I signal the complexity that proposed welfare reform introduces in that area. The proposed introduction of universal credit will, if agreed, require us to change the eligibility criteria for free school meals and, indeed, for assistance with the costs of school uniforms. I will shortly have to reach decisions on the trigger points for eligibility, and I will announce more detail on that at the appropriate time.

For now, I confirm that, whether eligibility is determined under the current or any new arrangements, it is my intention to apply the same eligibility criteria for free school meals both for primary and post-primary pupils from September 2014. That means that post-primary pupils from our lowest-income families will be supported with access to free school meals in the same way as our primary pupils. It also ensures that the post-primary schools that they attend will be supported in a similar way.

Balance of funding between primary schools and post-primary schools has also been an area of interest to the review, and there has been considerable interest in that issue. The review has recommended that that should be kept under review. I accept entirely the importance of early intervention, and I know that nursery and primary schools have long campaigned for more funding, making the point that they could deliver so much more with additional funding. Primary schools have equally made it clear to me that additional funding for them should not be at the expense of post-primary schools.

All the evidence shows that our post-primary schools are facing real challenges at present. We know that they are seeing the impact of earlier demographic decline, which has stabilised at primary level, and that they are much more likely to be facing challenges in living within budget than their primary counterparts. We also know that, although our primary schools are outperforming those in most other countries, the same cannot be said about some of our post-primary schools.

When resources permit, I will consider the scope to increase primary school funding. I will not do that at the expense of post-primary schools. However, what I want to do in preparation for that time is to ensure that future Education Ministers have the levers that they need to target funding to primary schools. One of the drawbacks of our current formula is that its complexity inhibits our ability to do that. Therefore, I will be consulting with schools on a model that will see us operating two separate formulae: one for primary and nursery schools and one for post-primary schools.

Members and, of course, schools will want to know how all of that will affect the make-up of the common funding formula and funding for individual schools. The review panel set out very clearly the key principles that should underpin a new common funding scheme, and I have accepted those principles. The panel also urged me to consider implementation of a new funding formula made up of a range of elements with a clear focus on funding to reflect pupil rather than institutional needs and to provide support for young people — those from a disadvantaged background or who face other barriers — with the clear purpose of ensuring that schools are funded equitably, transparently and to reflect the needs of the pupils that they serve.

Work is well advanced on a new funding formula informed by the recommendations in the review report, and I intend to launch a consultation on it in the coming weeks.

The independent review of the common funding scheme provides us with a sound basis for making change that will improve how schools are funded and ensure that funding more closely supports my core policy priorities. Although I have not accepted every single recommendation, I have accepted the vast majority. My officials are currently finalising a model that reflects the position that I have outlined today. I remain determined that the changes will be made from next April. I therefore plan to issue details of the proposals in the next couple of weeks so that schools will have time to consider them. Although schools are not closed for the duration of the summer holidays, teachers and governors, like the rest of us, need a summer break, and I plan to extend the consultation period into October to give schools ample time to digest the proposals and provide views. I will, of course, want to hear views from other stakeholders also.

My officials will be happy to brief the Education Committee in more detail in the coming weeks, and I will arrange to place a copy of the consultation documentation in the Assembly Library for Members' consideration as soon as it is ready. Reform of how we fund our schools is needed if they are to be able to deliver the outcomes for our young people that we need them to deliver.

I want to set out how I think improvements can be made. More importantly, I want to test those ideas with schools and others to explore whether there are better solutions than the ones that we will come up with.

There may be solutions that can more effectively respond to my determination to put pupils first. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr Storey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): The Education Committee has given the matter considerable time and consideration. The figures are significant, as the overall resource budget spent by schools or allocated by the Department is over £1 billion a year.

The formula under which funding is allocated, according to Sir Bob, is confusing and inconsistent. Therefore, the Education Committee recognises that simplification of the common funding formula is much needed. However, the Committee also recognises that it is difficult to assess the effect of any significant changes to the common funding formula scheme without sight of the full outworking of the Minister's proposals, and what we have today in the House is an appended statement and information detailing the Department's further work on each of the recommendations that Sir Bob made. The Education Committee therefore welcomes the Minister's assurance that it will be kept informed on the matters.

I think that the Committee will welcome elements of what the Minister said today, including the extension of the free school meals eligibility criteria to post-primary schools. That having been said, the Committee has concerns about a single measure of deprivation, which might not identify hard-to-reach groups and does not fit the usual definition of "deprivation".

The Committee will be surprised that the Department has rejected out of hand recommendation 22, which would inform the development of alternative measures of deprivation. Maybe the Minister could elaborate on why he has dismissed that recommendation completely. We also welcome the Minister's intention to ensure that a bigger share of the budget goes to schools.

In conclusion, will the Minister clarify to the House today his definition of a strategically important small school and how that will be determined in light of his announcement today? Although reference was made to surpluses in some primary schools, I trust that this is not an attempt to rob the rich to pay the poor and is not a situation where, rather than social engineering to advance education, we have financial engineering, which will have a detrimental impact on schools across Northern Ireland, particularly in those areas where there is good financial management and good outcomes. Maybe the Minister could give some comfort to those schools that have good sound financial management that today's statement is not an attack on them but is about trying to put in place a system that is fair — fair on the basis of educational need and not on any other criteria.

Mr O'Dowd: Thank you for your questions. I will try to cover them as best I can.

I accept the point that the Chair of the Committee made that the Committee cannot respond in full to the draft common funding scheme until it has seen the document, and that it will respond during the consultation. That is a fair point. I assure the Member that we are at the final stages of drafting that, and we will publish it as soon as possible to get feedback from the Committee.

The review recognised that free school meals entitlement was a good and sturdy measure. Other reviews have also recognised it as a competent way to measure the individual needs of a child. No one has come up with an alternative to date. If an alternative is brought forward, as the review team recommended, then I am more than happy to bring it forward.

Recommendation 22 states that:

"Data should be gathered on maternal education for inclusion in pupil databases, and its efficacy modelled as a measure of additional educational need."

That is not necessarily to do with social deprivation: it is an acknowledgement that the mother's education has a strong bearing on the child's outcomes. Although we accept that that research is accurate, gathering that information and research would place a greater burden on schools than the benefit it would have for education. We are saying that it is more important for us to tackle social deprivation and to fund schools to tackle social deprivation.

With regard to whether we are going to rob the rich to pay for the poor; if that has to be done, then we will do it. All the evidence points us to the fact that young people who come from socially deprived backgrounds face greater challenges in education than those who come from more affluent backgrounds. If the evidence points us in that direction, then we have to deal with it.

What I have done and the way in which I am setting out the common funding formula ensures that all schools are treated fairly and equally. Those schools that have greater needs are funded to provide for the young people under their care. The Member often refers to social engineering. Social engineering already exists in our education system, and it is called academic selection. It ensures that the vast majority of children from socially deprived backgrounds go to one school and those from less socially deprived backgrounds go to another. If the Member is opposed to social engineering, I am on the same page as him. Let us resolve that issue.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Chris Hazzard. Sorry, just before that, and bearing in mind yesterday's experience, there is quite an interest in the topic, and I want to be fair to all Members. Members should be aware that it is questions on the statement and that it is one question only per Member.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. It is a clear signal that the Minister is prepared and is engaging in rebalancing the distribution of resources in our education system in the interests of the aspirations and needs of our pupils and not the interests of the institutions that they might attend. In that light, the panel made it very clear that we should be increasing funding for pupils from socially deprived areas. The Minister signalled today —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I need a question.

Mr Hazzard: — an investment of £10 million into the school budgets next year. Will he outline whether he will be investing further in targeting social need (TSN) in the year ahead?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his question. I estimate that it will cost approximately £30 million over the next two financial years to meet the additional funding in the formula for targeting social need and to allow pupils attending post-primary schools to be eligible for free school meals and free school uniforms. I think that is money well spent.

The Member and the House will be aware that, earlier this year, I restructured my budget. In particular, I targeted a significant pot of money that had been set aside for redundancies. I set £20 million of that pot aside to deal with the outworkings of the common funding formula, and I am going to use that pot and other slippage moneys in my Department to fund some of those programmes. That £30 million is an investment in the future of the young people concerned and, therefore, an investment in our society.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the news that he is going to maximise the amount of funding that comes through the aggregated schools budget. In respect of earmarked funding, will the Minister clarify the premium for shared education?

Mr O'Dowd: I am studying the recommendations in the shared education report to see whether there is any crossover between it and the common funding formula review. We fund schools to carry out a range of activities, including shared education, through the common funding formula. Schools are funded for those sorts of activities outside their regular responsibilities: extracurricular activities, if you want to put it that way. Funding is available to schools to carry out work within various models, but we are talking to other funding bodies to see how we can ensure that the recommendations in the shared education report are funded as well.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome much in the statement, especially the fact that he is going to keep the Committee briefed and that he is proposing no change at the moment in funding for small schools. In addressing recommendation 3, he indicates that he is going to look at the financial management in voluntary schools. Why is he continually attacking voluntary schools when he is using an extremely good example of how well they work? Why does he not look at adopting the other things that voluntary schools do extremely well? That would speed things along.

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept that I am continually attacking voluntary schools. I attack the social engineering that takes place in some of our voluntary schools in respect of how they allow pupils access. One of the findings of the common funding formula review under Sir Bob Salisbury is that, when you have a significant number of pupils from a socially deprived background in a large concentration in one school, it is a disadvantage to those schools. We are now having to address that by using public funds to counteract the effects of academic selection in our system. That is something that you need to consider. There is a better way of doing this. A social mix of pupils across our schools is more internationally recognised as the best way of dealing with the effects of social deprivation. We are having to address the imbalance here with funding.

I want to explore the voluntary principle further. Voluntary schools hold the principle very dear, and it is one of the issues that they are raising in relation to the ESA report. A number of non-voluntary schools have made it clear that they would like to adopt the voluntary principle. I am willing to explore that with them further, and if we can come to an agreement on the way forward, I will be happy to introduce it for other schools, but there are pros and cons. It places a significant administrative burden on a school, and services provided centrally by the boards or by ESA will have to be adopted by the school. That will take finance away from educating young people because the schools will have to fund their financial management themselves. However, I am happy to explore the issue further and allow schools to make the final decision on whether or not they want to become voluntary.

Mr Lunn: I also welcome the Minister's statement. My question follows on from Mr Kinahan's. The Minister's comments about the possibility of allowing other schools to adopt the financial management model currently used by voluntary grammar schools seems to come with the caveat that it is conditional on the Education Bill and ESA being established. That is not the only reference in the statement to that condition. How vital does the Minister regard it that the ESA Bill is progressed with all speed, and will it be possible to make those changes if the ESA Bill does not go ahead, as some of us fear?

Mr O'Dowd: I am of the mind at the moment that it is not a case of if ESA will happen but when ESA will happen. We had protracted discussions on the ESA Bill for many years when I was on the Education Committee with the Member. I would have liked to see it progress much quicker than it has, but I am not concerned that ESA will not happen. It is a case of when ESA will happen.

ESA is very important because it will ensure that we have an effective, efficient and modern management structure that can deal with many of the issues facing education. The recommendations in Sir Bob Salisbury's report will move forward. I am of the view that they will move forward with ESA, so I am not overly concerned or in the frame of mind that ESA is not happening; it is when ESA happens. If there is a significant delay, we will continue to move those recommendations forward anyway.

Miss M McIlveen: The Minister states that he is going to reserve the capacity to make further adjustments to the funding formula, including the small schools factor. Will he consult at a later date on those adjustments, or will he be consulting on the reservation that he is proposing within the scheme to publish shortly? He went on to say that he will give an assurance to the Assembly around small schools, but I am not sure that the Assembly can take comfort from a verbal statement at this stage.

Mr O'Dowd: Well, all I can give you is a verbal statement at this stage. Of course I will consult if there are to be further changes to small schools funding. I am legally obliged to do so. Any changes to the common funding formula have to be consulted on, so if we move towards a stage where it is believed that there have to be changes to small schools funding then, yes, there will be further consultation.

Ms Boyle: I thank the Minister for his statement. It is a good news story for many schools. Schools will now have to do a particular piece of work in relation to accountability and how they use that extra funding. I particularly welcome the news on free school meals eligibility. As a member of the Education Committee who contributed to some of the views in the recommendations, I am delighted that the Department has greatly looked at and accepted recommendation 11. However, can the Minister be more specific on when his Department will review transport policy, and is that likely to happen in 2013?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for her question. The Member has raised transport issues with me on several occasions, specifically in and around Strabane and the rural hinterlands of Strabane. Yes, I want to see the review take place in 2013. I am trying to identify appropriate individuals to carry out that review. It is a specialised piece of work. With my departmental officials, I am trying to identify the appropriate candidates to move that forward.

Mr Craig: I read with interest in your statement, Minister, that you will ensure that schools are planned strategically and are sustainable. You also said that you will have further clarification on how a small school will be retained. With regard to both those statements, will the Minister please give the House an assurance that strategic planning will be done on a cross-education board basis, as I have witnessed in border areas of boards the strategic aspect of the planning fall apart? More importantly, when will he give us that clarification?

Mr O'Dowd: Cross-border planning — cross-board planning — was raised recently by your colleague Mr Spratt during a debate on schools in south and east Belfast, and the crossover between the Belfast Education and Library Board and the South Eastern Education and Library Board. I am of the view that it is much improved. Indeed, we have brought the boards and other planning authorities together to continue area planning and to ensure greater co-ordination and co-operation, so I am satisfied that that is much improved. Of course, I will continue to monitor the situation to ensure that it continues to improve.

In relation to clarification around when a small school is required, the sustainable schools policy sets out the criteria; it sets out travel distances, etc, in relation to small schools. I will provide further clarification to the Committee, with regard to my statement, on the strategic importance of small schools as we move forward, but it will be based on the current sustainable schools policy.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I congratulate the Minister on his statement this morning; it is a very exciting statement. Minister, leaders in our special schools are looking to have greater autonomy. What can we put in place for those leaders in special schools so that they will accept greater accountability, which will allow them to achieve that greater autonomy?

Mr O'Dowd: The report sets out the need for greater clarity on how the funding in special educational needs schools is delegated, etc. I think we need to go through those measures first, and, in parallel with that, I will have discussions with the leaders in our special schools.

Indeed, I recently met a delegation of leaders from our special schools. We covered a wide range of areas in our discussions, including financial autonomy for those schools. They are keen to take on more responsibility, and I believe that they have the skills base to do so. However, let us cover the first measures of the report about detailing exactly what funding goes into special schools and how it is used and, then, move forward as to how we fund those schools in the future and how that finance is governed, particularly by boards of governors, principals and leaders.

Mr Byrne: Will the Minister state whether a rural school's criterion, as well as TSN, will be included in the common funding formula? Does the Minister recognise that the criterion for 105 pupils is already killing the potential viability of many small rural schools?

Mr O'Dowd: The small schools formula, which covers many of our rural schools, will remain as part of the common funding formula, and it is a significant contribution. Tens of millions of pounds of additional funding are going into the common funding formula to cover small schools, including small schools in urban areas. It is worth noting that the definition of "rural" in the sustainable schools policy is everything outside Derry City Council area and Belfast City Council area, so we cover a very significant geographical area. I do not accept that the criterion of 105 pupils is killing off our rural schools. There are many, many rural schools with 105 or more, and many have fewer than 105. None of them will be judged simply on that number. The only person I am aware of who is fixated with that number is your good self.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note the Department's response to recommendation 11, which relates to transport policy, is that the Minister will advance a review of its provision and eligibility. I very much welcome that; indeed, two years ago, the Ulster Unionist Party passed a motion calling on him to do that. Will he give a commitment that that review of home-to-school transport will be primarily driven to make it fairer and to allow it to adopt a more common-sense approach, rather than solely to deliver savings?

Mr O'Dowd: The transport budget in our Department is currently around £70 million. A significant proportion of our budget goes towards transport. During the previous Administration, the then Education Minister, Caitríona Ruane, and the Finance Minister, Mr Sammy Wilson, agreed that the performance and efficiency delivery unit (PEDU) should review transport across the boards. PEDU has since brought forward a report covering how transport could be provided more efficiently across the five education boards. We are agreeing an action plan as to how we implement those recommendations. So, I can stand and say that we should not approach it simply on the basis of saving money. If there is money to be saved and used more effectively in transport or in other parts of the Department of Education, I think it is only right and proper that we should do that.

You mentioned a fairer and more common-sense approach. Yes, of course, I want to see a fairer and more equal distribution of resources across our society, and I want to ensure that our transport system is delivering a service that we can stand over. The review will cover all those aspects in relation to how transport is provided currently and how more effectively, more efficiently and more equitably it should be provided in the future.

Mr Spratt: In relation to recommendation 11, does the Minister propose to limit the availability of bus passes to children and, as a result, force them to go to their nearest school?

Mr O'Dowd: The terms of reference of the transport review have not yet been completed. I will ask the review to make a holistic examination of the transport policy and how we effectively and efficiently use more than £70 million of public money. How can the Member argue against that? If a pupil can travel to a good school nearby, why would we transport them 30 or 40 miles to another good school? Let us provide good services to our communities close to hand, rather than having to transport people 30 or 40 miles to other good schools.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his statement. I note from it that he tells us that, in future, small schools will be planned and approved. Of course, many of our existing small schools were not planned or approved in that sense. Is this the death knell for those schools? Is it the end of the pretence that the Minister is committed to the retention of small schools that have served their communities diligently for many years?

Mr O'Dowd: I have to say that the SDLP is not involved in an education debate on small schools; it is involved in a political campaign on small schools. The SDLP has yet to point out to me where the sustainable schools policy is wrong or how it would improve that policy. It has come out with various statements on how it would keep every school open and how it believes that all rural schools, regardless of their educational provision and outcomes, should be kept open. If it is seriously interested in sustaining viable rural communities, it needs to start by providing excellent rural education to the young people who live in those communities. Surely, it should insist that rural communities have access to good education in the same way as we would expect an urban setting to have good access to education. If the SDLP has an alternative policy, I am still waiting to see it.

Mr Allister: I declare an interest as the chairman of the board of governors of a primary school. Why does the Minister wish to discriminate further in funding against schools that, through no fault of their own, have fewer pupils who get free school meals, yet have the same overheads and needs as other schools? The Minister wants to provide them with less funding than neighbouring schools. Why does he want to discriminate against those schools?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept the term "discriminate". I know that the Member is an expert on the subject, but I do not accept that term.

Schools will continue to be funded to meet their needs. We are saying — international evidence points to this — that children from a socially deprived background face greater barriers to education. Therefore, their educational outcomes are lesser. I am sure that the Member would agree that if we can tackle the issues that face socially deprived young people at a very early age, society benefits in the long run because those young people go on to be valuable members of society and have more chance of getting employment and contributing to society and less chance of ending up in the justice system and costing society further in the future. Let us put the investment in at the start to ensure that those young people have a good start in life and move on from there.

I do not accept that schools will not be funded in the future. Of course, since coming into post, I have constantly argued that the education budget, in its universal capacity, is severely underfunded. Let us use the funds that we have to best of our ability. If more funding becomes available, I will distribute it across all our schools.

Mrs D Kelly: I note that, in the report, the Minister — or, at least, the authors — acknowledge the fact that the mother is still the children's best teacher. My question follows on from free school meals as an indicator. I think that it is recommendation 20 that states that there will be further examination of other factors that might well be taken into account. I am sure that the Minister will be aware that many people who find themselves described as the working poor have an income that is maybe 1p above the level for eligibility. How will this be taken forward, and when might he reach a conclusion on the analysis?

Mr O'Dowd: Your original comment about the mother being a very important element in a child's education is clearly true. Mothers play a very important role in children's development, and we would never attempt to take that away from them.

In relation to free school meals entitlement, my predecessor Caitríona Ruane expanded eligibility for free school meals and, I have to say, met some resistance to that. We have further expanded that. As a result of my announcement today, something in the region of 15,000 more pupils in post-primary schools will be entitled to free school meals than would have been the case had I remained with the status quo.

As regards how we catch more people within the free school meals entitlement, welfare reform or the attempts to introduce it have stymied a lot of development in a number of programmes that I want to do in the Department of Education. I want to look at the entry criteria for nursery school places, in terms of benefits and income brackets and free school meals, but let us wait to see what happens with welfare reform. If welfare reform is introduced, I will have to introduce a new policy on the eligibility criteria for free school meals. My starting point for that will be to ensure that anyone currently eligible for free school meals remains eligible, and I will look to see whether we can expand that.

Mr D McIlveen: Minister, notwithstanding the fact that the duration of the consultation falls between July and August, when, I think, most people in the teaching profession will take a much-earned rest, the entire duration of this consultation is comparable to the length of the consultation on the High Hedges Act. Does the Minister see the high hedges of Northern Ireland as being on an equal footing with the future of education?

Mr O'Dowd: I think that there is a statutory limit to consultations. The limit is eight weeks, and the maximum is 12 weeks; it is somewhere in and around those figures. Government cannot shut down for two months every summer, much as I, and perhaps people here, would like it to. I cannot stop the Department of Education for two months every summer and await the schools returning. We have to continue policy development and implementation. The consultation is going out over the summer months, but it does not end until October. That gives ample time for any school or individual who wishes to respond to do so. There is no comparison with high hedges, low hedges or any other sort of hedge.

Northern Health and Social Care Trust: Turnaround and Support Team Report

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement to the Assembly on the report of the turnaround and support team on the Northern Health and Social Care Trust.

As Members will recall, I made a written statement to the House on 10 December 2012 on the appointment of a small turnaround and support team to the Northern Health and Social Care Trust to complete a strategic overview to establish what changes and support might be required to accelerate progress at the trust. The team was asked to provide an assessment of the changes required to improve performance and to support the management of the trust in the delivery of services.

As I highlighted in my statement in December, the trust has faced challenges since its establishment in April 2007. Despite the support measures that were put in place previously to assist the trust, there were no signs of sufficient improvement in waiting times in the trust's emergency departments. It was in light of those concerns and following a request from the chief executive of the Northern Trust for further support to address those issues that the decision was taken to appoint the turnaround and support team. Under its terms of reference, the team was asked to take forward the work in two phases, with phase 1 focusing on the analysis of the challenges facing the trust and its ability to deliver on services commissioned and phase 2 focusing on turnaround and support in light of the findings of phase 1.

I have now received the report from the turnaround team detailing the findings of phase 1 of the review. The report addresses the terms of reference comprehensively, and I am very grateful to Sue Page and her team for the significant work in taking this forward. I will make the report publicly available on the Department's website today.

In line with the terms of reference for phase 1, the review included an analysis and assessment of the challenges faced by the trust and its ability to deliver on the services commissioned, taking account of previous reviews and their implementation and drawing on information about similar providers elsewhere. Given the need to reduce waiting times for unscheduled care, the review examined performance, including the quality and safety of services and outcomes and patient experience at the trust's emergency departments, and identified specific areas and aspects of the trust's work and its relationships with other providers of health and social care where improvement is required. The report provides the team's assessment of leadership capacity at the trust and the changes necessary to improve performance.

The report makes five distinct recommendations. Those are to enhance leadership capacity at the trust and empower clinicians to lead change; to ensure support to deliver an improvement plan in three phases; to gain assurances that governance and quality systems are robust; to gain assurance that mortality data is robust; and to put in place a performance framework that will ensure delivery of the improvement plan and contains clear consequences for non-delivery alongside incentives for delivery.

The review has taken a hands-on approach, with practical engagement between the turnaround team and Northern Trust staff at individual and group level with front line staff and managers. It also involves visits to other healthcare providers to observe alternative ways of working. Throughout the review, the team not only focused on issues that were impediments to improving performance but considered the existing capacity for improvement and opportunities to develop new capacity for improvement in the trust.

The overall analysis, however, has identified that the Northern Health and Social Care Trust is in a poor position and requires intensive support to improve. It is reassuring to note that the team concluded that the trust can be turned around. That is essential to improve patient care and experience at the trust. However, support needs to be provided to enable it to do so.

Members will be aware that I announced the appointment of two senior directors to the Northern Trust on 2 May. The appointments were made, in light of the emerging findings of the turnaround team at that time, to lead on the next stages of the turnaround process to improve critical areas of service delivery. Mary Hinds and Paul Cummings joined the trust on temporary secondment from the Public Health Agency (PHA) and the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) respectively on 13 May. As senior director of turnaround, Mary Hinds will lead the improvement programme in the Antrim and Causeway hospitals and the related community services. In his role as senior director of corporate management, Paul Cummings will oversee the remaining service directorates and the corporate management functions. A new acting medical director is now in place, and two middle management staff have also been seconded to the trust from the Health and Social Care Board and the Public Health Agency. These appointments are the first steps in the change as part of the intensive support programme that will be provided to the trust to ensure that the necessary turnaround is achieved. The overriding objective is that the interests of and outcomes for patient care are at the centre of trust activity.

Specifically, the report recommends a three-phased improvement plan. Phase 1 has three separate components covering the operational delivery of services at Antrim Area Hospital; operational delivery of services at the Causeway Hospital; and maximising primary and community care and older people's services. Phase 2 will involve developing clinical networks and integrating clinical teams with devolved accountability. The outcome for phase 2 should be that clinical services become fully integrated and aligned to populations, with an accountability framework in place to manage resources and agree priorities for service review. Phase 3 will involve a systematic programme of service reviews to implement Transforming Your Care (TYC). The outcome for phase 3 should be the systematic delivery of the changes needed in line with the strategic objectives of TYC.

Initially, the key element of the work will be the delivery of phase 1 of the improvement plan. It is anticipated that this phase will be completed within six months. The Department will put in place governance arrangements to monitor progress against the plan. In that regard, it will work closely with the HSCB. It is important that the arrangements are effective but do not introduce an overly bureaucratic system that would impede progress.

The report signals the need to remove any sense of uncertainty about the Causeway Hospital's future management arrangements. I am very keen to remove that uncertainty. I told the House on 19 March that the TYC consultation had indicated significant support for the action set out in the 'Vision to Action' document. I confirmed that I was asking officials to begin work to take forward an options appraisal that would consider future management arrangements for the Causeway Hospital, such as whether it should remain in the Northern Trust or transfer in the near future to the Western Trust. Preparatory work on the options appraisal has begun.

I believe that the implementation of the turnaround team's recommendations will provide a solid basis to deliver the much-needed improvement at the Northern Trust. The learning will be shared across Northern Ireland. I do not underestimate the scale of the task involved. Members, trust staff and the public will want to consider carefully the team's report, which has been released today. The overriding consideration is the need to put the quality of patient care at the top of our priorities for Health and Social Care. I am determined, therefore, that improvements will be made at the trust. That is in the interests not just of patients but of the staff who work there. I recognise that turnaround will not happen overnight, although there are already some signs of improvement at the Antrim and Causeway hospitals. That is to be welcomed.

I stated previously my appreciation for the professionalism and continuing dedication of the doctors, nurses and other front line staff at the trust who want to provide safe, high-quality services to their patients and clients. Clinicians must be at the centre of the improvement process. I also recognise the commitment and determination shown by the previous and new management teams, and I want the Department, HSCB and PHA to work with the leadership in the trust to ensure that the actions that are now taken are fully effective in securing change. I am encouraged that the trust will follow a path that is clinically led and managerially supported. It is essential that the processes now under way are successful in delivering the much-needed improvements for the local community.

I commend the statement to the House.

Ms S Ramsey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement and his officials for the briefing that the Deputy Chair and I received earlier.

Minister, you say in the report that clinicians have been disengaged, and you talked about empowering the clinicians to lead change. Does that mean that, up to this point, clinicians have been disengaged? If so, what do you mean by that? Moreover, what do you mean by empowering clinicians? I want to try to get some more detail on that.

Mortality data came up in the recommendations. Are you indicating that there have been doubts about how those data were collated? If so, what impact did that have? What does it mean for the future? The review team focused on impediments to improving performance. Can you give us more detail of what that actually means? Are we now over those impediments so that we can deliver the best possible care for patients?

Finally, senior staff have been seconded from the Public Health Agency and the board, including Mary Hinds and Paul Cummings. Can you give us an indication of how long they will be seconded to deliver and take forward this work in the Northern Trust?

Mr Poots: I will seek to answer all four questions. Where disengagement and empowerment are concerned, I think that communication is essential in any task. People can be absolutely brilliant at a range of activities in their particular job, but, if the communication skills are not good, that is not helpful to others. So, it is important that good communication exists throughout if we are to ensure that people are engaged. The left hand needs to know what the right hand is doing. All that will create the situation in which empowerment can happen, where there are greater levels of communication and closer working co-operation. I think that we can achieve more in that area.

There are multiple ways of calculating mortality, and the method that the Northern Trust uses does not give us any particular concern. However, to be absolutely certain, the report suggests running another methodology, such as that used by the Dr Foster organisation, to provide maximum assurance. We are not saying that there is any risk there, but we do want to double up to ensure that we have that assurance.

On the impediments that might have been in our way, I think that leadership is critically important. Leaders have to be very proactive. They have to be on the ground talking and listening to key people, delivering the services in conjunction with those people and identifying what the needs are. There are great opportunities to ensure that we make the improvements that we want to see.

On the secondments, how long is a piece of string? It is important that we get this thing to work. It may take up to a year or somewhat longer, but, at the moment, we are perhaps looking at the secondments lasting up to a year. It could be less than that. We will see how we get on over the next couple of months and how things are improving before we move to make permanent appointments.

Mr Wells: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he let the Assembly know whether any other changes are anticipated among the senior management team in Antrim Area Hospital?

Mr Poots: The medical director's position will be advertised and filled. That is a very important position. We need strong leadership in that area to ensure that clinicians have the confidence that management is listening and so that management can ensure that clinicians respond to their needs.

One of the issues identified in the Northern Trust area was that, very often, senior consultants were allowed to take holidays at the same time, and things like that. That created problems unnecessarily. There are areas that we perhaps need to change, address and carry out improvements in. So, the medical director's post is one of the key positions that will be filled over the next number of months.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the Minister's statement. I particularly acknowledge his comments on behalf of the hundreds of staff who provide an excellent service in the Northern Trust. It is important to put that on record.

Will the Minister tell us what monitoring and evaluation techniques will be used to ensure the delivery of the report's recommendations? What is the time frame for achieving the same?

Mr Poots: I want the time frame for the delivery of some of the recommendations to be almost immediate. I want to see improvement at a very early point, and we are looking at that. In the longer term, we are looking for the phase 1 improvements to be completed within six months. To reiterate what "phase 1" means, it covers the operational delivery of services at Antrim Area Hospital and the Causeway Hospital, as well as maximising primary and community care and older people's services. That is a big task to have completed within six months.

On the governance arrangements, an improvement oversight group will be established and will be chaired by the Department. Initially, that group will meet monthly and, depending on progress, may move to meeting less frequently.

We need to ensure that we have appropriate monitoring without being overly bureaucratic and constantly bearing down on the people who have the task of carrying out the job. There will always be a degree of flexibility in all these issues, but it is very important that we keep our eye on the ball to ensure that the trust improves. For quite a number of years, the same problems have come up time and again in the same trust. We really need to get on top of those problems and move forward.

Mr Gardiner: I certainly welcome the Minister's statement and I encourage moving as quickly as possible. I wish him every success in looking after affairs in this. I do not think that I was really down for being called at this stage, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I think that it was more my colleague here, who is the spokesperson for our party on that score, but well done, Minister.

Mr McCarthy: I offer my best wishes to the Minister in the task that he has set out before us this morning. I think that it is the last-chance saloon for the Northern Trust, but I wish the Minister, Mary, Paul and everyone else every success in their endeavours. I refer the Minister to his reference in the statement to the trust's:

"ability to deliver on the services commissioned taking account of previous reviews, and ... information about similar providers elsewhere."

The Minister will be aware that the Northern Trust has not signed its service and budget agreement with the board for the last four years. Those agreements detail the work that is required by the board —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We need a question. The Member knows that one —

Mr McCarthy: Yes. Will the Minister tell the Assembly why the Northern Trust has not signed these important contracts for four years? How can the board monitor the services commissioned if the contract has not been signed? Could this horrendous neglect by all concerned —
[Interruption.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: OK, gents —

Mr McCarthy: — have contributed to the disaster that is the Northern Trust?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member is abusing the rights of other Members to ask questions.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for his question. Given that the new financial director and acting chief executive in the service is a former financial director in the board, I trust that those issues will be overcome as a result of that appointment.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he elaborate on why the Department is only now taking action to address emergency department waiting times in the Northern Trust?

Mr Poots: A series of actions has been taken to assist in the Northern Trust, and that work is ongoing. The problem was that we did not see the improvement in performance that we should have. We have had previous reports that I do not believe were fully implemented. Consequently, we have not benefited from the work that was carried out. We have a team in place now that is already making a difference in the Northern Trust. The turnaround team has done a good piece of work. It has worked closely with the Department and with people on the ground to identify the issues and problems that existed there.

My view, unlike that of the former chairman of the trust who said that we could not do better, is that the public have to get better; they deserve better, we have to do better and we will do better. That is why we are continuing to make differences here and to challenge and change. We will get there with the Northern Trust, albeit that the situation has been difficult for many years. Even before this trust was formed, the organisations that came together had their problems, and a lot of those problems came with those organisations. The Northern Trust has always had a difficult time. We need to get to the point where the Northern Trust is not being talked about for the wrong reasons but for the many good things that are already happening in it and can be enhanced further. I commend all those staff who are doing excellent work in the facility.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an ráiteas sin. I thank the Minister for his statement, in which he refers to the sense of uncertainty that exists about the Causeway Hospital. That uncertainty continues. I accept that preparatory work on an options appraisal has begun, but when will it be completed? What is its time frame and when will decisions be made?

Mr Poots: I fully accept that, while discussion continues, it will create uncertainty, so the sooner we can reach a conclusion, the better. However, we have to operate within legal parameters, so an options appraisal will be produced, hopefully in the not-too-distant future, which will go to public consultation. We will not go into it with preconceived notions because, at this point, I am not fully convinced that there should be a shift in the Causeway Hospital from the Northern Trust to the Western Trust. I see that there are strong and compelling reasons why that could happen, but there are also very strong reasons why it should remain in the Northern Trust.

We need to identify all the issues, consult the public and the clinical nursing staff, etc, within the Causeway

Hospital, identify whether social services are to go with it or are to stay with the Northern Trust, and identify whether it is more suitable for the Causeway Hospital to stay with the Northern Trust. All of that needs to be tested very thoroughly, bearing in mind that we also need to remove uncertainty. We will proceed with that work in due course, but as quickly as possible.

Ms Brown: I welcome the positive statement from the Minister and the continued efforts to improve matters in the Northern Trust. This is obviously a great cause of concern for all of us, not least my constituents in South Antrim. Will the Minister reiterate the main conclusions in the turnaround team's report?

Mr Poots: The main conclusions were really the five recommendations that I mentioned, the first of which was that we need to enhance the leadership capacity at the trust and empower clinicians to lead change. I believe that that is already happening. We need to ensure support to deliver an improvement plan in three phases, and that work is under way. We need to gain assurance that governance and quality systems are robust, and that is also happening as we speak. We need to gain assurance that the mortality data is robust, and we are looking at a different means of collecting that data that will, all being well, confirm that that data is robust. Finally, we need to put in place a performance framework that will ensure delivery of the improvement plan and contain clear consequences for non-delivery, alongside incentives for delivery. The overall monitoring team is in place, so things are moving quite quickly. I think that it is appropriate that we do move quickly to ensure that the team's recommendations are enacted.

Ms P Bradley: I also welcome the Minister's statement. As someone who worked for the Northern Trust, it is very bad to hear such negativity in this Chamber, especially the remarks about a last-chance saloon. I know that the staff at every level are working very hard on a daily basis, and they need our support and help. Will the Minister provide an update on the improvement action group for emergency departments?

Mr Poots: We are already seeing improvement in the emergency departments. However, it is early days and we do not want to introduce anything that appears to be at all complacent. For example, in April, there were 466 breaches in the 12-hour waiting times —

Mr McCarthy: Shame.

Mr Poots: I agree with the Member that that is a shame, and that is why we are acting. In May, that was reduced to 82. In June, there have been six breaches to date. That is still six breaches too many, but one can see the direction of travel and that improvements have been made quickly.

We held a workshop with trust staff and GPs, and have had a series of discussions with front line staff, who agreed a detailed action plan to address the fix phase of the turnaround team report. That is being developed. We have commenced discussions at the speciality level to identify and remove barriers to improving performance and to match medical staff capacity with patient demand, thus improving patient flows. We have commenced a capacity exercise that will better inform discussions with commissioners about future resource allocation. We have commenced a review of all systems associated with quality and safety, including a further analysis of key clinical indicators. We have developed a direct link from community to support inreach and the management of frail elderly people and to simplify and standardise access to community services.

We have also established a joint partnership forum to bring our local GPs and trust clinical and professional leaders together. The first meeting has already been held, and regular meetings will follow. The aim is to strengthen the clinical voice in the design and delivery of services to create that environment where clinical staff lead services, supported by responsive management. It also aims to strengthen the day-to-day management of processes, including the development of daily performance metrics, which the senior team use to support daily management. That has already helped in terms of patient flows.

The improvement action group, which was established by the Health and Social Care Board, working with the Public Health Agency, in April 2012, will address excessive waiting times across the region with the aim of securing a step-change improvement in 12-hour and four-hour performance and in the patient experience. It was originally set up for a three-month period but the board extended its existence so that it could help emergency care services through the winter, when unscheduled care came under the greatest pressure.

Following the secondment of key members of the emergency department (ED) action group to the Northern Trust, the board is moving to a new phase of work to address ED performance which will focus on the completion of regional demand and the capacity work by the end of July, fortnightly performance meetings with trusts and a renewed focus on the key actions to improve the unscheduled care patient pathway.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he outline what signs of improvement he can identify already — he has mentioned some of them — in the Northern Trust? In particular, can he comment on whether the Northern Trust has made any progress on the issue of the employment of consultants, particularly at the Causeway Hospital?

Mr Poots: The teams and the work processes have been established. This is not purely about the emergency department at Antrim Area Hospital; it is about the Northern Trust. It is critically important to ensure that this is not just about a single issue; there must be comprehensive and wholesale improvement across the trust.

The Member has raised an issue about the consultant base at the Causeway Hospital. The course of work that has been identified will look at matching medical capacity to patient demand. We are looking at how we can do the other capacity exercise so that we can better inform our discussions with commissioners. That will enable us to have the appropriate support for the Causeway Hospital and its consultants, and to have the appropriate number of consultants at that facility over a range of services.

It is incredibly important — just to put it on record again — that the Causeway Hospital has a very strong future. It is absolutely necessary in order to provide quality services to the public in that area. We will give due attention to ensuring that we can continue to provide quality services in that part of Northern Ireland.

Mr Lunn: I want to follow on from Mr McCarthy's question. The Minister's answer appeared to be that the financial director of the Northern Trust had been moved on, so that was the problem solved. However, the Belfast Trust, for instance, has not signed its service and budget agreement for the past four years either. The South Eastern Trust has not done so for the past two years and the Southern and Western trusts did not sign theirs in 2011. So, how important are these agreements? There seems to be a slightly cavalier attitude to them, yet we are talking about sums, in the Belfast Trust, for example, of upwards of £900 million each year.

Mr Poots: The commissioners also have a significant role in all this. They commission services and the trusts deliver them. In all that, it is for the commissioners to identify the services that are required and for the trusts to provide those services. Medicine is a movable feast, and the best-laid plans do not always happen.

There is much that is unpredictable, so you need a degree of flexibility.

I expect service agreements to be signed, but more important is what happens on the ground and that, where possible, delivery should be close to people, while allowing that flexibility for the unexpected, which very often happens.

12.00 noon

Mr I McCrea: I thank the Minister for his statement to the House today. He will be well aware of how critical I have been of the Northern Trust, certainly in respect of waiting times at Antrim A&E. The Minister also knows that GPs will play an important role in tackling many of these issues. Will he, therefore, advise the House how important it is that there is better collaboration between GPs and the trust?

Mr Poots: It is critical, which is why we have established the partnership forum between GPs and the trusts' clinical professional leaders. The more that professionals engage with one another, identifying the issues for GPs and hospital services and how best they can be addressed, the greater the potential for positive outcomes. So I will encourage, support and, on some occasions, drive more collaboration between GPs and hospital clinicians so that we can identify and deliver the best outcomes for people.

Dr Brian Hunter was the chair of the Northern Trust's LCG and is now the GP medical director in the area, so he will assist us in ensuring that the GP voice is heard loud and clear in the Northern Trust area.

Mr G Robinson: I commend the Minister for his statement and ask him to tell us the responsibilities of the two senior directors. I also commend all staff in hospitals throughout Northern Ireland. They do sterling, life-saving work, and all should be commended for the excellent job that they do.

Mr Poots: The two senior directors who have been appointed have different roles to play. Paul Cummings is from a financial background, and his role will be overseeing corporate management and its functions and the service directorates. Mary Hinds will lead the improvement programme in the Antrim and Causeway hospitals and the related community services. In essence, Mary Hinds will largely be doing the front-line stuff. She will work with clinicians and other staff, engage with them, identify the issues and work to ensure that we have that improvement. Paul Cummings will deal with the financial and business side. Appointments, recruitment and so forth will fall to his side of the house. That will allow Mary Hinds to focus almost exclusively on ensuring that service improvement happens.

Mr Allister: The Minister's statement refers to "clear consequences for non-delivery", which undoubtedly would be good, but how does that fit with the relocation on the same salary of the failed chief executive of the Northern Trust to a job specially created for him in the Health and Social Care Board, for which no one else was eligible or allowed to apply? Does that not sound more like a fix than a consequence of non-delivery?

Mr Poots: I make no apology for fixing things, particularly if they are broken. The truth is that I am not interested in going out to get people; I am interested in resolving problems. I identified that the problems in the Northern Trust pre-existed its creation. There were problems previously in the United, Causeway and Homefirst trusts before their amalgamation into the Northern Trust. It was a very difficult challenge. Now is not the appropriate time to be going out to damn people or to get people. Now is the time to focus on ensuring that we deliver the required quality of service for the people in North Antrim, South Antrim, East Antrim, North Belfast, Mid Ulster and East Londonderry who use the facilities provided by the Northern Trust. My concentration and focus is and will be on delivering the quality of services that people might expect.

Mr Beggs: I, too, welcome the Minister's statement. During March and April, the main accident and emergency units in Northern Ireland saw the lowest proportion of patients treated within four hours ever recorded. The figures show that one third of patients at Antrim Area Hospital are not seen within four hours and that, at the Causeway Hospital, it is about 30% of patients. How can the Minister be confident that we are seeing something more significant than the normal seasonal adjustment as we approach the summer months? How can he be sure that we are seeing significant improvement and changes and are starting to reach the 95% target that exists everywhere in the United Kingdom?

Mr Poots: We certainly did not see a normal seasonal period this year. For whatever reason, all the trusts were reporting a significant increase in the number of people attending hospital. There was a figure quoted to me of around 13%. It will always test and strain a facility when you get a higher number of more complex cases and many more admissions to hospitals. Our hospitals were under an awful lot of pressure, not so much in the early part of the winter but as we went into February, March and April. We have not quite come to an understanding of what has caused this or what the real problem has been, but we are very clear that there has been a significant increase in the number of people who have had to be admitted and the number of people who have been attending.

Hospitals have seen an increase in demand in April 2013 compared with the same period last year, with some 59,259 new and unplanned emergency department attendances in April, which is an increase of 2,796 on the previous year. Attendances in the Northern Trust increased slightly between March and April from 10,602 to 10,829. The Northern Trust indicated that it has seen an increase in sustained pressure on the emergency departments in its hospitals in the past number of weeks. That has been exacerbated by outbreaks of vomiting and diarrhoea in seven local nursing homes, which has meant that the number of frail older people presenting at hospitals has increased. The trust's ability to discharge people back to those nursing homes has been affected by that.

This is all complex stuff; it is not easy. I challenge Members, when they talk about the trusts and the work that goes on in the facilities, to recognise that the people working in the trusts do not have an easy task. They need our support, sometimes, more than they need our criticism.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for the statement. Integrated care partnerships have the potential to enable earlier intervention and prevent more people from entering hospitals. When will they receive significant funds? That was not mentioned in the statement. Was there a reason for that?

Mr Poots: No, there is no reason for it; there will be a dozen of them up and running this month. I thank the Minister of Finance and Personnel, who has just come in, for giving additional funds to ensure that Transforming Your Care can move forward and that integrated care partnerships can be established. We have put funding into the integrated care partnerships. I do not have the figure in front of me, but something tells me that it is around £3 million. That is a course of work that we are engaging in. We will ensure that those ICPs are up and running throughout Northern Ireland within the next nine months, but we expect to have a dozen of them operating this month.

Executive Committee Business

Budget (No. 2) Bill: Second Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill [NIA 21/11-15] be agreed.

This debate follows the approval of the Supply resolution yesterday by the Assembly for the expenditure plans of Departments and other public bodies, as detailed in the 2013-14 Main Estimates. As Members will be fully aware, accelerated passage for the Bill is necessary to ensure the receipt of Royal Assent prior to the end of July. If the Bill did not proceed by accelerated passage and receive Assembly approval before the summer recess, Departments and other public bodies might have legal difficulty accessing cash and public services and would, therefore, be significantly affected prior to our return to the Chamber in September. I am glad to note that the Bill can be given accelerated passage because the Committee for Finance and Personnel has confirmed that, in line with Standing Order 42, it is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals contained in the Bill. I thank the Committee for its agreement to the accelerated passage of the Bill.

I know that I did this yesterday during the Supply resolution debate, but I want to take a moment to make a call for agreement on the review of the financial process. It is a process that the Committee has long sought and that would reduce the number of times that we go over the same thing in the Assembly. It would also enable greater scrutiny of the Budget, which is really what we are about, and greater transparency. The review is an opportunity for the Executive and the Assembly to deliver a positive reform of direct rule-inherited publications and financial processes. I consider it an opportunity that we should not miss. I hope that that will be conveyed to the appropriate party and we can then free up the logjam that we have been experiencing for about a year and a half.

The Assembly's Standing Order 32 directs that the Second Stage debate should be confined to the general principles of the Bill. I shall endeavour to keep in that direction and encourage others to continue in that vein, as, I am sure, you will too, Mr Deputy Speaker.

The main purpose of the Bill is to make further provision of cash and resources for use on services, in addition to the Vote on Account provided in the Budget Act in March, up to the requirements of Departments and other public bodies set out in the Main Estimates for 2013-14. Copies of the Budget Bill and the explanatory and financial memorandum have been made available to Members today. The 2013-14 Main Estimates were laid in the Assembly on 29 May.

The Bill will authorise the issue of a further £8,271,268,000 from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund and the further use of resources totalling £8,558,118,000 by the Departments and certain other bodies listed in schedules 1 and 2. The cash and resources are to be spent and used on the services that are listed in column 1 of each schedule. Of course, these amounts are in addition to the Vote on Account passed by the Assembly in March, bringing the total amount of cash provided for 2013-14 to over £15 billion. In addition, the Bill sets, for the current financial year, a limit for each Department on the use of accruing resources. Accruing resources are current and capital receipts totalling £2,263,652,000. Therefore, the resources authorised in the Vote on Account in March and the resources and accruing resources now provided in this Bill bring the total resources for use by Departments in 2013-14 to over £18 billion. These amounts of resources include not only the departmental expenditure limits (DEL) on which our Budget process mainly focuses but the departmental demand-led annually managed expenditure (AME).

Clause 2 provides for the temporary borrowing by my Department of £4,135,634,000, which is approximately half the sum authorised by clause 1(1) for issue out of the Consolidated Fund. I must stress to the House that clause 2 does not provide for the issue of any additional cash out of the Consolidated Fund or convey any additional spending power, but it enables the Department to run an effective and efficient cash management regime and ensures minimum drawdown of the Northern Ireland block grant on a daily basis. That is important when contemplating the daily borrowing by our Departments.

Finally, clause 5 removes from the statute book three Budget Acts from 2010 that are no longer operative.

The Budget Bill is, admittedly, technical, and, on the surface, it can be hard to translate the figures into real-world public services. However, it is important to emphasise that every doctor and teacher, every road improvement, every hospital and every public service provided for under the authority of the Assembly is affected by the Bill and requires this legislation to operate legally in this financial year. Although it may appear dry and unimportant, and perhaps the figures seem a bit surreal, it is, in effect, crucial legislation for our public services. On that note, I will conclude, and I will be happy to deal with any points of principle or detail on the Budget Bill that Members raise during the debate.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. As was outlined, the Bill makes provision for the balance of cash and resources required to reflect departmental spending plans in the 2013-14 Main Estimates. Those are based on year 3 of the former Executive's Budget 2011-15, which was approved in the Assembly's previous mandate.

As on previous occasions, the Department of Finance and Personnel has highlighted the potential consequences for departmental spending should the Bill not progress through the Assembly before the summer recess. Budget Bills sometimes include provision to regularise excess cash and resources incurred by Departments, as was the case around this time last year, and I am pleased to note that, for this period, such a mechanism is not required, since no excesses have been reported.

The Committee took evidence from departmental officials, and, on behalf of the Committee, I acknowledge the work of the officials and thank them for their prompt responses to the queries posed by us. The evidence from the Department has provided explanations for a series of allocations, reductions, technical adjustments and transfers that have been made since the budget allocations were initially set out in Budget 2011-15. As I said during yesterday's Supply resolution debate, the Committee has agreed to grant accelerated passage to the Budget Bill under Standing Order 42(2) on the basis of having been consulted appropriately on the Bill's expenditure provisions.

During yesterday's debate, I also highlighted the importance of scrutiny by all Statutory Committees of departmental financial forecasting and out-turn data. Detailed and regular monitoring of the financial performance of Departments will enable Committees to identify issues in real time and to obtain assurances that the necessary corrective or preventative action will be taken. If the figures for the prior year forecast out-turn are made available to the Finance Committee in good time for its consideration of the Main Estimates, it will, in turn, be in a position to share those figures with other Statutory Committees, which could further inform the Supply resolution debate.

As I also mentioned yesterday, the Committee is taking forward work in collaboration with the Department to develop a memorandum of understanding on the Budget process that, in conjunction with other measures, should help to improve the Budget and financial processes and related parliamentary scrutiny and accountability. Such measures will ensure that the Assembly and its Committees can add real value to the Budget process and ensure that they are afforded the time and information to enable them to undertake constructive scrutiny and exercise influence at the most appropriate stages in the process.

At a strategic level, more effective Assembly input to and scrutiny of the Executive's Budget and expenditure will help to further demonstrate that devolution is making a difference in delivering accountable, responsive and efficient governance in the North. This will represent positive steps forward, but, where the immediate business before us is concerned, on behalf of the Finance and Personnel Committee, I support the Bill's general principles.

I will make a few comments from a party perspective, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. We need to ensure that we put a focus on the economy, and this Budget and this Programme for Government have certainly done that. Last week, I attended a CBI event with the Finance Minister in waiting, and it was good to hear the positive messages coming from that economic report.

Of course, part of the allocation in the OFMDFM budget is £5.5 million for community relations. We need to make the link between community relations and the hard issues that face us and the economy. That is a challenge for us. How do we deal with the hard issues of flags, parades and the past? Those are all having an immediate impact on communities' quality of life and prosperity. The danger is that, once again, these issues will go off the radar come September and October and will be forgotten until next year. So, given that, I welcome the setting up of the all-party group. There is an onus on it and whoever is appointed as its Chair to come up with something that is universally challenging.

I read an article by the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party in the 'Belfast Telegraph' last week. I did not agree with a lot of what he said, but he indicated that he was up for difficult conversations. He was right to make that point. We will find no solutions to these issues without difficult conversations, and that goes for Sinn Féin as much as for the DUP and the Ulster Unionist Party. The economy and the issues of culture, identity and the past are very much intertwined whether we like it or not, and we need to figure out how to take a collective and a mature approach to ensure that those issues, which dog us on occasions in the House, do not have a detrimental effect on people's quality of life, on communities and, ultimately, on the economy. We need to realise that and act on those, because they are having a big impact on the economy.

Sue Ramsey, the Chair of the Health Committee, referred yesterday to Transforming Your Care and the costs of implementing it. She referred to it having been allocated £70 million for 2011-15. It is important that we have the right money in health to implement the right policies. At a UNISON meeting that was organised in Ballycastle last week, there was much discussion about the closure of Rathmoyle residential care home, which is still causing huge distress and anxiety for those connected to it. At this stage, they do not buy in to the idea that everything will be rosy in the garden post Transforming Your Care. According to the trust, the closure of Rathmoyle will proceed, whereas the Department gave the impression that the process was suspended for all the residential care homes. Ballycastle has not got a stay of execution, and the mixed messages from the Department and the Northern Trust need to stop, because they are having a great impact on the people who live in those homes and on their families. Clearly, the Department wants to make budget savings by nudging older people into the private sector, but "At what cost?", I wonder.

The Fire Service comes under the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and has a resource allocation of £335 million. Quite shortly, the House will be looking at proposals to save money on public service pensions. The retirement age of firefighters will be one issue that will come up. That will be subject to some debate here, as it was across the water. That debate has focused on the fitness requirements of firefighters and on the lack of back-office roles in the service where older staff may go, given their own fitness performance as they approach the end of their career. That is something that we need to look closely at, and we need to try to make savings in all areas. However, sometimes the financial cost is not worth the effect that it will have on the service. It is critical that we look at that issue in detail and that the service level of firefighters be upheld.

Just over £7 million is allocated to the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation, which will be working with a development opportunity of international significance. Of course, there have been many naysayers about that project, one of whom is not with us at the moment. However, the site has the potential to create 5,000 jobs, ensuring that we get £300 million worth of investment. It is 347 acres of potential development, and there is the opportunity to create 2,000 jobs in the construction sector alone. I do not believe in looking a gift horse in the mouth. We need to get a move on with the project. It has huge potential to impact on our employment figures and to improve things in the construction sector. We need to look at it through an economic prism, as opposed to a narrow political one.

The A26 is a key route through north Antrim, and the upgrade of the Glarryford to Drones Road section of the route is of huge importance in reducing travel times and improving road safety, especially for those who commute from Ballymoney and Ballycastle. There is still some work to be done on that, as the Finance Minister indicated yesterday. I am keen to see that work processed and allocated as soon as possible. Of course, if you look at it from a wider perspective, the Glarryford to Coleraine part of the route is the only part of the road from Coleraine to Cork that is not dualled. Dualling it will certainly cut down travel time for commuters and for the great hurling fraternity that we have in north Antrim, heading down country every week from Cú Chulainn's, Shamrocks, Carey, Armoy and McQuillan's, who will greatly benefit. Of course, the main issue has to be the huge loss of life that we have seen on the Frosses Road section of the A26 over many years. We do not want to see that happen again. The sooner that project is brought to the fore and processed, the sooner it will be beneficial.

We need to see funding for fire stations, particularly in rural areas. I have just been passed a note from the good Member from East Antrim about the need for a fire station in Cushendall. That has been campaigned for for many years. Perhaps it is an indication that some people take the view that, because it is in the Department of Health, the Fire Service sometimes gets forgotten about, and that has a big impact in acutely rural areas such as Cushendall, Ballycastle and the north coast. Those areas are quite cut off from the Fire Service and mobile phone coverage. We need to go that extra mile sometimes for those rural areas to ensure that they get the same quality of service as anywhere else.

I conclude on that note, and I urge Members to support the Bill as introduced.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension, so I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first business when we return will be Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.29 pm.

Oral Answers to Questions

Justice

Mr Deputy Speaker: I must tell Members that questions 2 and 12 have been withdrawn.

Youth Justice

1. Mr Craig asked the Minister of Justice, in relation to the youth justice system, how many young people have received warnings or prosecutions in the last three years. (AQO 4259/11-15)

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): In the past three years, 8,759 young people have been brought before the youth court in relation to criminal offences. In the same period, the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) has directed diversionary disposals in respect of 7,732 young people and the PSNI has dealt with 7,690 young people by way of a discretionary disposal. There has been a downward trend in both PPS diversion and court prosecution across the three-year period. That may be attributable to the greater use of police discretionary disposals, which were introduced in May 2010. Overall, the number of young people coming into contact with the justice system has reduced.

Mr Craig: I thank the Minister for those figures. They clearly indicate that discretion is becoming the norm when it comes to dealing with the youth. I do not know whether the Minister has the figures with him, but will he indicate whether that is being successful in the longer term in diverting youths away from a permanent criminal record and, unfortunately, taking up a lot of time in the criminal justice system?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Craig for his supplementary question. On the basis that the scheme has been in operation for only three years so far, I do not think that it is possible to forecast the long-term engagement. There is no doubt that academic research and evidence from elsewhere suggests that by diverting young people from formal engagement with the justice system, if they get involved at a relatively minor level, it is likely to be very positive in ensuring that they remain out of the crime scene in the future. However, we will need to wait a few years to get hard evidence on the scheme.

Mr P Ramsey: I will follow on from the Member for Lagan Valley. Will the Minister outline to the House any indications or measurable outcomes of the existing schemes on diversionary actions across Northern Ireland?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Ramsey for his question, but I am afraid I am going to have to say no. It is difficult to give measurable outcomes at this early stage. We know that, when discretionary disposals are engaged in elsewhere, they have a habit of ensuring that young people do not get engaged in serious criminal activity. That is in line with some of the other good work that we have seen, for example, on reducing antisocial behaviour over the same three-year period.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. How many young people have been the subject of a fixed penalty notice, and what is the Minister's assessment of the scheme?

Mr Ford: I do not think that I have specific figures before me for young people who have received a fixed penalty notice, Mr Deputy Speaker. The fixed penalty schemes for the seven offences that were introduced on the basis of the first Justice Act are still at a relatively early stage. However, I am happy to provide the Member with figures when I get them to give him the full detail so far.

Mr Deputy Speaker: As I said, question 2 has been withdrawn.

Policing and Community Safety Partnerships

3. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Justice for his assessment of the effectiveness of policing and community safety partnerships. (AQO 4261/11-15)

10. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Justice for his assessment of the progress made by the police and community safety partnerships in their first year of operation. (AQO 4268/11-15)

Mr Ford: With permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 3 and 10 together.

Policing and community safety partnerships (PCSPs) have now been operational for just over a year, working to ensure a more joined-up approach to policing and community safety issues and making a real difference on the ground by delivering local solutions to local problems.

Some very good work has already taken place, including a range of initiatives aimed at tackling crime and antisocial behaviour. Good examples include the midnight street soccer initiative in Castlereagh, which has given teenagers the opportunity to attend a programme incorporating good relations workshops focusing on themes such as addressing racism and antisocial behaviour; and the Dreamscheme programme, which involves teenagers from six areas in Castlereagh in an intergenerational programme with senior citizens.

Other examples include the launch by Lisburn PCSP of a rural farm watch scheme that has improved communications with the farming community and the wider rural community. Lisburn PCSP has also worked with the other PCSPs in D district on the development of an app as an engagement tool for young people in the area. The app contains useful information for young people on keeping on the right side of the law. I was pleased to be able to attend its launch in Antrim two weeks ago.

There has also been significant work to help strengthen public confidence in policing, and PCSP public engagement events have provided the opportunity for the local community to address their concerns to the police and the PCSP. A major strength of PCSPs is the diversity of their membership. The involvement of political and independent members, as well as representatives of the seven designated statutory bodies, is helping to maximise those opportunities for effective partnership working.

The very positive work that has been done over the past year will now be built upon through the implementation of the plans developed for 2013-15. Those are based on evidence gathered from community engagement and a comprehensive strategic assessment by each PCSP of the needs of its locality.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for his reply. I agree with the sentiments that he expressed about PCSPs. A little money in some of the schemes that he mentioned — Dreamscheme, midnight soccer and stuff like that — leads to very good work in many areas.

Community safety partnerships have been able to access money recovered from proceeds of crime, which has been very effective. I think of the Dundonald area, where computers were installed on a bus that goes around hot spots each evening. Does the Minister see that continuing and will he assure us that money will continue to be recovered from the proceeds of crime?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Spratt for his positive words. It is certainly the intention that PCSPs will continue to be able to draw on assets recovery money. The issue is that we are never quite sure how much there will be from year to year, which creates management issues, but I hope that we will shortly publish plans for dealing with the scheme. We will revise it in light of how it has operated in the first two years to ensure the best possible focus for that expenditure.

Mr Lunn: From a Policing Board perspective, the feedback on PCSPs has been entirely positive so far. They are definitely making a real contribution to local communities. Can the Minister tell us anything about potential amendments to the appointment process for PCSPs, which has been generally regarded as being not totally satisfactory?

Mr Ford: I appreciate the point that my colleague makes. The process for the appointment of members, specifically independent members, has largely followed the previous arrangements for district policing partnerships (DPPs). We will have to see what comes forward from the work being done by the joint committee to review a number of aspects of the working of PCSPs. There is a feeling that, to some extent, it is still a significantly bureaucratic process, and we could do with some efforts to streamline it. We need to ensure that we get a fully representative PCSP that is capable of addressing the needs of its area. The positive news is the good work that is being seen to be done by the PCSPs, but we need to ensure that the background is right to keep that going.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to keep their questions short and concise.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith. Following up on the themes that were expanded on by Mr Spratt about the effectiveness of the engagement of the PCSPs with the community, are there any broad thematic areas of strategic direction where support can be provided by the Department, whether it is through the plans that the Minister referred to, or whatever measure, to ensure that there is much more meaningful engagement with the communities that they represent?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr McGlone for that equally short question. The difficulty that he poses for me is that it is almost a question of whether there should be more central direction from the Department on how PCSPs should operate. I am a firm believer in allowing communities to develop local solutions to deal with local problems. On that basis, I am reluctant to have an excessively prescriptive regime. We hope to see the continuation of PCSPs working well within the general community safety strategy. I believe that that is the case, but it is important that each PCSP work out how best to engage with its local community. At the same time, we encourage PCSPs to share best practice.

Mr Beggs: Does the Minister agree that the strength of a PCSP is the local knowledge and the range of local resources in the statutory and voluntary sector to address local issues and that, collectively, they can frequently address antisocial behaviour, which policing is, perhaps, having difficulty addressing? How does he assess whether a PCSP is not working effectively and assist it to become more effective?

Mr Ford: I agree with Mr Beggs's fundamental point. When PCSPs were established, we hoped that the existing community safety work would be allied to the work of the DPPs and that that would ensure a full partnership with the range of organisations. The key issue is that there was not merely an expectation that police should solve the problems. Assessing effectiveness is, to some extent, the work of the joint committee as it looks to see, in particular, the level of public satisfaction with the work of PCSPs. There will be issues with how PCSPs produce their annual reports and how that shows that they are dealing with issues. I suspect that we will also probably hear from local groups that feel that not enough is being done by their PCSP if the negative is the case, although, thankfully, we have heard little of that so far.

Criminal Justice: Fixed-term Contracts

4. Mr Milne asked the Minister of Justice to outline how often fixed-term contracts are awarded by criminal justice agencies without having been openly advertised and without having regard to the merit principle. (AQO 4262/11-15)

Mr Ford: Since the DOJ was created in April 2010, 13 fixed-term contracts have been awarded by my Department, its agencies and arm's-length bodies, other than the Police Service, without being openly advertised. The PSNI has awarded 22 fixed-term contracts. Of those, 13 were not openly advertised, involving 11 individuals. The PSNI has provided information to the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) inquiry into the PSNI's use of agency staff. The PAC is expected to publish its report in the coming months, and I believe it would be appropriate to await that report.

I would expect fair and open competition to be the norm in the justice sector. Occasionally, it may be necessary to rely on specific expertise to deliver justice business. In my Department, Forensic Science made one such appointment to help to respond to the workload resulting from dissident activity. The Northern Ireland Policing Fund appointed a chair of the board and reappointed six directors. Those were all advertised internally in accordance with its articles of association as a company limited by guarantee. The Northern Ireland Law Commission appointed two individuals, as specific expertise was required to ensure continuity in ongoing projects. The Northern Ireland Policing Board made three appointments relating to its appointment of a human rights adviser.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a chuid freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer. Is the Minister aware that the PSNI has engaged in the practice, even in recent times, of rehiring retired police officers for unadvertised, well-paid jobs? Does he agree that, in order to open doors to newcomers, the PSNI needs to shut the revolving door?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Milne for his question but I am not aware of the PSNI rehiring officers in the way that he described. The appointment of agency staff is a different issue from the specific issue of rehiring. That is the subject of the PAC inquiry, and I look forward to seeing its report.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before calling the next Member, I urge you, please, to keep the questions short. Moreover, supplementary questions should not be read.

DOJ: G8 Summit

5. Mrs Dobson asked the Minister of Justice for the anticipated costs to his Department of staging the G8 summit. (AQO 4263/11-15)

Mr Ford: The PSNI and departmental officials continue to work on the forecast cost of the policing and security operation associated with the G8 summit. The total cost to my Department will not be known until some time after the summit, as some costs, such as compensation claims and legal aid, will be incurred after the event and will be dependent on the level of unrest experienced.

I welcome the Chief Constable's report to the Policing Board last Thursday. He advised that he had received a letter from Danny Alexander, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, giving assurance that the vast majority of the cost of the policing operation will be met by the Government. The PSNI will bear the cost of the purchases and developments that were already built into policing spending plans, some of which have been accelerated as part of the G8 operation.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for his answer. Can the Minister confirm the existence of a PSNI business case for the G8 that includes figures like £4.2 million for the security fence? Does the Department of Justice have its own business case for the summit?

Mr Ford: I thank Mrs Dobson. I am not sure that it would be beneficial to go through in this place all the individual costs, most of which are the responsibility of the UK Government, given that it is 10 Downing Street and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that are organising the summit. However, I can assure her that appropriate business cases have been prepared for anything that falls within the remit of the DOJ.

Mr Givan: This is an issue that the Justice Committee sought answers to only last week, and the official refused to tell us. Can the Minister give us an estimate of the overall cost associated with the G8 and what proportion of that is expected to be borne by the Department of Justice and the PSNI?

2.15 pm

Mr Ford: I thank my Committee Chair for his usual inquisition. The reality is that I cannot give a forecast of what the overall cost will be, because there are sufficiently many undetermined factors and factors that will not be determined until significantly after the conference is over. What I can say is that a sum of money will fall to the PSNI and, hence, to the DOJ. That money is related to expenditure that will already have been in train, for example, for a variety of capital programmes that have been accelerated slightly to enable the policing operation to function well during the G8 conference. Those are issues on which we would have been expending money otherwise. However, as I have said to the House, we have seen the letter that was sent by the Chief Secretary to the Chief Constable, and that makes clear the expectation that the funding, other than that for accelerated spending, will fall to the UK Exchequer and not to the DOJ.

Mr Byrne: Can the Minister give some indication of the quantum of the capital costs that are associated purely with staging the G8? Can he also give an assurance that there will be no revenue difficulties for the police going forward?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Byrne for his question. However, I am always reluctant to say that there will be no revenue difficulties for policing costs, when we look at the kind of events that can happen on the streets and when we do not yet know what it will cost for policing experience for the number of special events happening this summer, as well as the usual issues around parading. Therefore I am very cautious about saying that there will be no pressure on the police in that respect. I am assured that the key additional costs for G8 are being fully funded elsewhere, but, as we look at a difficult financial situation for this year, we will ensure that we do our best to get the best value for money from the DOJ expenditure.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister may be aware that the Scottish Parliament is still trying to recoup some of the moneys from the costs incurred eight years ago at Gleneagles. Can he give an assurance that that will not be repeated after next week's conference?

Mr Ford: It would be a foolish man who would give the prediction that Mr Lynch is asking for. However, I can say that I believe that we have better assurances from the Treasury than perhaps was the case. It would also probably be reasonable to say that working relationships between DFP and the Treasury in that particular role and between DOJ, the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are better than they perhaps were between elements of the Scottish Government and the UK Government eight years ago. I am not sure that I would wish to fall into the trap of getting too closely led on what happened after Gleneagles.

Director of Public Prosecutions: Offences Against the Person Act 1861

6. Mr Boylan asked the Minister of Justice if he will consider making provision to enable the Director of Public Prosecutions to appeal the leniency of sentences under section 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861. (AQO 4264/11-15)

Mr Ford: Without questioning the circumstances of any individual offence, I am unaware of any particular public concern around sentencing in respect of offences under section 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, and I have no current plans for review.

Section 20 of the Act makes it an offence to wound or cause grievous bodily harm. The section 20 offence is what is known as a hybrid offence, which can be tried in a Magistrates' Court or the Crown Court. For such an offence to be subject to appeal by way of unduly lenient sentencing legislation, it must be specifically listed in statute, and the section 20 offence is not currently included.

The seriousness accorded to the section 20 offence was, however, demonstrated by an increase in the maximum penalty on indictment from five years to seven years in 2004. I should add that the more serious section 18 offence of grievous bodily harm with intent is referable as unduly lenient, because it is an indictable-only offence.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, and the Minister for his answer. Will the Minister consider an amendment under fairer, faster justice to make provision for an appeal in relation to a conviction relating to domestic abuse?

Mr Ford: I can only repeat to Mr Boylan that, whilst he may have a point around the issue of domestic abuse, we would need to ensure that there was sufficient evidence to justify it. At the moment, a significant number of section 20 offences are tried in the Crown Court on indictment. Only one third of such offences are tried in the Magistrates' Court. I think that that is a recognition by the Public Prosecution Service of the seriousness of many of those offences. If there is specific evidence of where, he feels, that system has broken down, I would be very happy to receive it from him.

Mr Kinahan: Can the Minister update the House on the progress that has been made in implementing the recommendations of the Lord Chief Justice following the report of his sentencing group?

Mr Ford: I am not sure precisely which recommendations Mr Kinahan is referring to. I am happy to look at any further detail he may wish to give me. The issue of some matters that are being considered for referral as unduly lenient is out for consultation. Those matters relate to a number of issues around excise offences. If there are other offences he wants to make suggestions about, I will happily hear from him.

Mr Rogers: Health service employees are assaulted in the course of their duty. How is that service reflected in sentencing policy?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Rogers for the question because the issue of specifically creating offences that relate to assaults on health service staff or other public servants has been addressed during the past three years. The reality is that there is provision under sentencing guidance for judges to take into account the circumstances in which an assault takes place. That can include issues such as whether somebody is performing a public service as well as issues such as the vulnerability of the victim. I believe that that guidance is in place. The issue of how it is applied in any individual case is, clearly, not for me, but I believe that, in general terms, the provision is there.

Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service

7. Mr Gardiner asked the Minister of Justice if he plans to privatise the Court Service along the lines proposed by his Westminster counterpart. (AQO 4265/11-15)

Mr Ford: I have no plans to privatise the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service.

Mr Gardiner: Will the Minister take the opportunity to affirm that the independence of the judiciary is far more important than saving money and that no price can be put on that cornerstone of our freedom and constitution?

Mr Ford: I certainly agree with Mr Gardiner that the independence of the judiciary is crucial. I am always reluctant to say that no price can be put on any aspect of the justice system, given that we have a limited, finite budget. However, the key point that he makes — to ensure that the courts and tribunals work best in the interests of providing justice — underpins the work that we do in DOJ.

Human Trafficking Action Plan

8. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Justice what discussions took place with agencies on the island of Ireland in the formulation of the annual human trafficking action plan. (AQO 4266/11-15)

Mr Ford: The first annual human trafficking action plan for Northern Ireland was published on 23 May. That action plan is an important step forward and maps out a clear direction of travel in tackling the appalling crime of human trafficking.

I recognise the need to work in collaboration with other partners if we are to provide an effective response to human trafficking. Therefore the action plan was developed in partnership with, amongst others, the statutory bodies represented on the immigration and human trafficking subgroup of the Organised Crime Task Force (OCTF) and the non-governmental organisations represented on the engagement group on human trafficking.

The plan reflects the Northern Ireland response to human trafficking, but it also takes account of the wider context of human trafficking across the whole of the UK and Ireland. For example, the United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre and an Garda Síochána are each represented on the OCTF subgroup and have been involved in the development of the action plan. In addition, a number of the NGOs represented on the engagement group operate on an all-Ireland basis.

I regularly meet the Irish Minister for Justice and Equality. My officials continue to liaise closely with officials in the Department of Justice and Equality (DJE) to identify opportunities for cross-border collaboration. The action plan has been shared with that Department. Obviously, a number of the issues have a cross-border element. My Department also plans to co-host a cross-border forum on human trafficking later this year in partnership with DJE that will bring together statutory agencies and NGOs to facilitate better co-operation and partnership working across both jurisdictions.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer. I welcome his remarks on cross-border co-operation, but I do not see them reflected in the action plan. Does the Minister agree that, in order to act comprehensively against human traffickers, there needs to be a fully joined-up all-island approach to the matter? Failure to do so is a disservice to victims.

Mr Ford: I agree with Ms McCorley about the need for a joined-up plan. Our plan is a Northern Ireland plan that, I believe, correctly takes account of cross-border and UK-wide issues. We are in a particular position in this region, and we need to take account of what is happening south and east of us. I think that we are seeing that happen, and I believe that some of the practical work being done through, for example, the interministerial group on human trafficking, which meets in London, and the North/South work that I do with Alan Shatter and colleagues in Dublin shows that we are getting that joining up without doing anything other than saying that this action plan is the plan for Northern Ireland.

Mrs D Kelly: What resources do you have in place for the provision of aftercare for women and others who have been rescued? Do you believe that the resources you have are adequate to meet the forecasted need?

Mr Ford: I thank Mrs Kelly for her question, although she strayed a little beyond the specific issue of the plan. I believe that, in simple terms, the resources required are all available. Clearly, they operate in different ways. For example, DHSSPS has specific responsibilities for children, and Edwin Poots can answer for those. In respect of the other work that we do, I believe that engaging with NGOs that provide aftercare for adult victims meets the needs that exist. That will certainly be kept under review if those needs increase.

Mr Newton: Can the Minister confirm that one of the major problems for those taken into aftercare is not the pressure exerted on them in Northern Ireland but the pressure exerted on them or their family in their country of origin, from which they were trafficked? Has the Minister given any consideration to that aspect by working with the jurisdictions in those foreign countries?

Mr Ford: Mr Newton highlights a significant point: there is absolutely no doubt that many people are put under pressure, including threats to their family in the country from which they originated. However, I fear that, if I were to go any further in talking about engagement with those countries, I would stray outside my responsibilities as a devolved Minister and into responsibilities that lie elsewhere. I certainly engage around those issues when I attend the interministerial group on human trafficking led by the Home Office.

Police: Injury-on-duty Awards

9. Mr Copeland asked the Minister of Justice for his assessment of the review of injury-on-duty awards for police officers. (AQO 4267/11-15)

Mr Ford: I appreciate that this is an important issue that may be a cause of concern for former police officers. Under regulation 35(1) of the Police Service of Northern Ireland and Police Service of Northern Ireland Reserve (Injury Benefit) Regulations 2006, the responsibility for arranging reviews of an award lies with the Policing Board. Sam Pollock, the chief executive, wrote to me regarding the current Policing Board policy on reviews of injury-on-duty awards. He advised that an injury-on-duty working group had been set up to discuss issues raised by representatives of the Police Federation, the Retired Police Officers' Association and the Disabled Police Officers Association. My officials currently participate in that working group to offer support, clarify the legislative provision and address any concerns that fall within the remit of my Department.

I understand that the working group intends to present its findings by the end of this month. The Policing Board has taken the decision to suspend all reviews until the working group has completed its discussions. I await the outcome of that work with interest. I anticipate that I will be able to provide a more informed and substantive response when I have had sight of the working group's findings.

Mr Copeland: I thank the Minister for his answer. On behalf of former police officers who have had a level of pension rights because of their medical conditions — in the past, those conditions have been described as permanent, but they now appear to be in the process of being reduced — can I ask whether “permanent” no longer means permanent? Further to that, can the Minister support the discontinuation of the current review?

Mr Ford: No; I cannot support the discontinuation because it is not my position to do so. That matter lies quite properly with the Policing Board, and I await the outcome of the review.

Agriculture and Rural Development

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Chris Lyttle. I am sorry; Mr Chris Lyttle is not in his place, so we will move on to Mr Mickey Brady.

2.30 pm

Maximising Access in Rural Areas

2. Mr Brady asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the benefits of the maximising access in rural areas project in tackling rural poverty. (AQO 4274/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As you know, the maximising access in rural areas (MARA) project is an initiative based on the premise that visiting people in their own homes and using a personal touch encourages them to avail themselves of services and grants that they would not otherwise have known about or known where to apply to. Phase 1 of the project ran from October 2009 to March 2011 and provided visits by locally trained enablers to over 4,000 vulnerable rural households. Those households were identified by local people, such as members of community and voluntary groups, postmen, district nurses and GPs, all of whom worked in small, localised project teams. For the 4,135 households that were visited, just over 10,000 referrals were generated to advice agencies and the Social Security Agency for benefit entitlement checks; the warm homes scheme and sustainable energy programmes to address fuel poverty issues; to rural community transport partnerships and Translink for a SmartPass to address transport and access issues; to local councils to receive home safety checks; and to the Housing Executive to receive disabled facilities grants. There were also referrals to local and regional statutory community and voluntary organisations so that people could receive or avail themselves of regional services.

An independent post-project evaluation included a social return on investment that estimated that £8-62 benefit was leveraged from every £1 invested in the project. Phase 2 aims to visit 12,000 households by April 2015 and to build on the learning from phase 1 by integrating an automated questionnaire and referral system and including second visits to support households. Anyone who feels that they know of a household that could benefit from such a visit should let us know, as this project is having a significant positive impact on our vulnerable rural households.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for her comprehensive answer. I had a supplementary question asking her to detail the success of phase 1, but she has already given some detail on that. However, she may want to elaborate.

Mrs O'Neill: Phase 1 has been very successful, and we hope that phase 2 will allow us to build on that further. I am committed to our being able to reach so many vulnerable and isolated people. I welcome the cross-departmental support that allows us to do that.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for her answer so far. Has she had any discussions with the Minister of Education to ensure that rural poverty does not extend to education provision?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said in my initial answer, a lot of the projects are about households. It is about going door to door and reaching marginalised and isolated people who may not know where to go to access services. In the initial stages, it is about signposting, but that leads on to people getting help. One benefit of the project will be that a second call will be made to make sure that people received help. Education is not the focus; it is about access to benefits and rural issues, but the enablers will be happy to assist with any issues that people present to them when they call. They will then ensure that people know where to go to get the help that they need. The beauty of phase 2 is that enablers will go back to check that people got help.

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister give her assessment of the differing levels of rural poverty in the west of Northern Ireland compared with the east?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have statistics with me, but suffice it to say that, given the nature of the west and its rural population, people often live in marginalised and isolated areas. The Executive are mindful of that, and the fact that we have Executive agreement to bring forward these initiatives is a positive step for people in the west who, simply by the nature of the geography of where they live, are isolated and should be targeted. I am pleased with the work not only of the MARA project but of the wider tackling rural poverty and social isolation framework, which is working towards targeting those people.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Ms Michaela Boyle is not in her place to ask question 3.

Rural Development Programme: Wind Turbines

4. Mr Boylan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the environmental impact of wind turbines in rural areas that are funded through the rural development programme. (AQO 4276/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: So far, axis 3 of the rural development programme has offered grant assistance for 56 feasibility studies for wind turbines and the installation of 33 turbines.

A further five wind turbines are being installed as part of larger projects, and the joint council committees have approved a further eight feasibility studies and six installation applications for funding. The majority of these are for farmers diversifying to become energy producers and thereby supplementing their farm income. As an added benefit, the energy created in the process is reducing the carbon footprint. Rural community projects are also being taken forward, which will help to reduce the financial burden on community groups in the current economic climate while reducing their carbon footprint. Every project funded by my Department must have a feasibility study undertaken that includes environmental considerations and an assessment of its viability.

Additionally, as part of the local action group (LAG) assessment process, the environmental impact is considered, as it is for all funding applications. I am keen to support renewable technology as a way for rural dwellers to reduce the amount of money that they have to spend on electricity and to give them a new income stream, particularly given recent rises in the cost of electricity.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Will she outline her support for other renewable technologies?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, and I thank the Member for his question. Back in September last year, I reopened the Department's biomass processing challenge fund (BPCF) for a second tranche. That funds support for renewable energy technologies that are fuelled by biomass, including biomass boilers and anaerobic digesters. Nineteen projects have received letters indicating that they qualify for the award of a grant. The majority of energy produced by BPCF-supported installations must be produced on the farm in direct support of agricultural activities. I support on-farm anaerobic digestion as a means by which farmers can utilise their farm resources efficiently and ensure that they have access to a secure supply of clean fuel.

Grant awards under the scheme are provided at a rate of 40% of total project costs, up to the sterling equivalent of €400,000. Projects claiming payments under the renewables obligation certificate (ROC) scheme for producing renewable electricity will have a deduction applied to their grant award.

Mrs Dobson: The Minister will no doubt be aware of the significant concerns with which wind turbines, especially wind farms, are usually met in local communities. Although I welcome the support that her Department offers through projects through LAGs, will she detail the role that she believes local communities should play in deciding appropriate locations for their composition?

Mrs O'Neill: I am broadly in support of renewable energies and encouraging people to move towards using them. However, proper strategic planning needs to be at the core. Those things should not just be imposed on communities without their views being sought. Although some of the projects look towards giving some sort of incentive to local communities, sometimes that is not enough. In Scotland, the benefits to local communities seem to be a lot more favourable. As I said, although I am broadly supportive of renewable energy, projects should not be imposed on communities. There should be proper planning at the core of a project. If companies want to offer benefits to communities, those should be maximised, because electricity costs are very high. If there are benefits at all for local communities, those should be fully exploited.

Lord Morrow: What joined-up thinking and collaboration is there between the Minister's Department and the Department of the Environment (DOE) on the provision of wind turbines?

Mrs O'Neill: That is obviously a cross-cutting issue, and it is an ongoing discussion at officials' level. I have also had discussions with the Minister of the Environment. My Department has its renewable energy action plan, which was consulted on with DOE. DOE is key in all of this. I am coming at it from the potential for the farming community to be able to install renewable energy projects that will assist it in the longer term. That is the angle from which I am coming at it. Officials and I regularly engage with DOE on wind farms in general. One of the other areas that I have been exploring is wind farms on Forest Service land. However, DOE is firmly in the lead.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. Will she outline what farming-related criteria are used to assess grant aid applications for single wind turbines on farms?

Mrs O'Neill: I am very happy to provide the breakdown of the detail to the Member in writing. That is assessed through the access support system that is in place. People get funding from the Department under measure 3.1 of the rural development programme, which is on diversification.

Agri-Food Strategy Board: 'Going for Growth'

5. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what financial support she intends to provide to primary producers to help them to reach the targets identified in the Agri-Food Strategy Board's 'Going for Growth' action plan. (AQO 4277/11-15)

7. Mr Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the call in the 'Going for Growth' report for the introduction of a farm business improvement scheme. (AQO 4279/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: With your permission, a LeasCheann Comhairle, I will answer questions 5 and 7 together. I welcome the launch of the Agri-Food Strategy Board's report and, in particular, its visions for a single, sustainable, profitable and integrated supply chain. I also welcome the board's recognition of the need for a strong, sustainable producer supply base.

Central to delivering a sustainable supply base is a proposal to introduce a £250 million farm business improvement scheme for producers who are committed to market-focused business development. I welcome that proposal and believe that such a scheme will improve productivity and efficiency at farm level. Provided that the necessary funding can be secured, I believe that we can deliver such a scheme. However, as you are all aware, the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and I have only recently received the report, and we are now taking time to carefully consider each of the recommendations before bringing forward final proposals on this and other recommendations to the Executive.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for her response. The Minister has a substantial underspend in axis 3 of the rural development programme. What plans does she have to use that money to help achieve the targets set out in the report and to increase profitability in farms across Northern Ireland?

Mrs O'Neill: The Member will be aware that I have a major programme of work ongoing for any potential underspend in axis 3. I am committed to making sure that, by the end of the programme, not one penny will be handed back to Europe and that each penny of European money that has been secured will be spent to the best effect in rural communities. I am very much committed to that. I brought forward a strategic projects initiative that has been very successful. It is still early days, but it has been very successful in assessing the projects that have come forward. I believe that we will spend all that money by the end of the programme.

I believe that the new rural development programme will be an excellent vehicle that will allow us to bring forward many initiatives that will meet the recommendations in the report. We are involved in consultations, so it is very timely that we have received the report now. It will feed into the discussions around shaping the new rural development programme. The publication of the report and the fact that we are consulting on the new programme is all good timing.

I definitely believe that the new rural development programme will be an excellent vehicle in the time ahead. However, as I said, it is still early days in considering the recommendations. Although the report is very challenging, I think that it is very doable. There are quite a lot of positive elements in it that the industry, Minister Foster and I welcome.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answers. Will the Minister give me a timetable for the implementation of the report?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said, we received the report only recently and are working our way through each of the recommendations. Some recommendations are, I think, quite simple and easy to implement and others are a bit more long term. There are short-term, medium-term and long-term objectives to be met.

A number of challenges and recommendations have been laid down in the report that are directed towards my Department, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department for Employment and Learning. We need a proper, full and frank Executive exchange of views once everybody has had a chance to fully digest the report and look towards the next steps. My intention is that the work will be done over the next number of months, and that I will bring an implementation plan to the Executive early in the autumn for discussion and, hopefully, for sign off.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. Will she state whether DARD is in a position to provide the £250 million for the farm business improvement scheme that Mr O'Neill has asked for, if possible within the first three or four years of the strategy?

Mrs O'Neill: I will maybe start in reverse. It is not just Mr O'Neill who is asking for it; it is the whole strategy board, which, I would point out, reflects the whole supply chain, from the farmers through to the processors and retailers. That is one of the beauties of the report, which I know the Member acknowledges.

The recommendation for the £250 million is one recommendation among quite a number that we are trying to work our way through. I think that the money being asked for is doable. The money that the board have asked for from the Executive, and the leverage that that would bring in from the industry, would bring fantastic benefits. In my opinion, it is doable, and I look forward to going to the Executive with the plans after I have had discussions with all the relevant Ministers. I hope to get agreement and sign off on that early in the autumn.

Mr Cree: Will the Minister confirm whether her Department has made a bid in the June monitoring round to make a start on securing some of the finances required under the 'Going for Growth' document? If not, why not?

2.45 pm

Mrs O'Neill: No, I did not make a bid in the June monitoring round because it would not be appropriate at this stage. We are talking about significant investment; it is not something that you could take up from a June monitoring round. We need to be a wee bit more strategic about it. As I said, we are working our way through all the recommendations. Some things are a bit simpler and we can turn them around quite quickly. However, some of the major things related to £250 million of investment cannot be bid for through June monitoring. As I said, we have a plan in place to consult over the coming months, and we will go to the Executive early in the autumn with an implementation plan, and, hopefully, get agreement for the way forward. That is the commitment that I have made to the industry, and I am committed to making sure that we meet that timeline. After that, we will see where the Executive can take the funding from or bring it to.

Rural Areas: Inequality

6. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline how her Department is addressing inequality in rural areas. (AQO 4278/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: My Department is fully committed to fulfilling the section 75 statutory duties across all aspects of its business functions and through the effective implementation of its equality scheme. I continue to ensure that equality and good relations are central to decision-making processes and that we work to tackle inequalities and improve access to our services and information for the benefit of our rural customers and communities. My Department has also set out a range of actions and targets in its audit of inequalities to help to address persistent inequalities across our business remit. Along with others, my Department shares responsibilities to take forward a range of measures contained in NI-wide strategies, action plans and UN conventions.

Following agreement of the 2011-12 to 2014-15 Programme for Government Budget, I reaffirmed my Department's commitment to addressing rural disadvantage and inequality by allocating £16 million to initiatives that tackle poverty and social isolation. That is building on the success of work undertaken during the previous Budget period. Our work to strengthen the social and economic infrastructure of rural areas is primarily taken forward through the rural development programme. The current programme runs until 2013 and aims to create more sustainable businesses and jobs, support projects that will enhance the quality of life of local communities, and support strong community infrastructure. The next rural development programme, which will run from 2014 to 2020, is being developed. An equality impact assessment will be carried out and it will go to public consultation during the summer.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Robin Swann for a supplementary question.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for her answer. Most rural inequalities should surely be addressed under the rural White Paper action plan. Of the 94 actions contained in the rural White Paper action plan, how many has the Minister's Department achieved?

Mrs O'Neill: The White Paper is not relevant to the initial question, but I am happy to give the Member an answer, because we have regular cross-departmental meetings to make sure that it is not a shiny document that sits on a shelf but a living, working document. My predecessor Michelle Gildernew was committed to making sure that the project was started, and I am delighted that we were able to see it through. It is an ongoing piece of work. Cross-departmental meetings are held quarterly to discuss the actions. However, I am happy to write to the Member to outline where we are at in delivering on all the recommendations across all Departments.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I apologise to Mr Gerry Kelly, who should have been called first.

Mr G Kelly: Easily forgettable, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis an Aire. I notice that the Minister's voice is all but gone, so I am sorry that this is a short question. Does DARD have a strategic plan to improve the life of rural dwellers?

Mrs O'Neill: The simple answer is yes, we do. I recently consulted on the 2012-2020 strategic plan. In the consultation document, the Department outlined its commitment to promote equality of opportunity and good relations for rural dwellers. The Department has set out its intention to tackle poverty and social isolation. I am strongly committed to the work that I have taken forward around the £16 million to tackle poverty and social isolation. I want to make sure that we continue to roll that out because there are obvious natural inequalities for people who are isolated and marginalised. Those things need to be tackled. It is not the remit of just this Department to tackle those issues; it is every Department's responsibility. However, I am happy to take the lead and to ensure that all Departments play their role in tackling the poverty and isolation in rural communities.

Mr Eastwood: Will the Minister assure the House that there is no differential in Youth Service provision across the North and that people in rural areas are offered the same level of support and service as those in urban areas?

Mrs O'Neill: I absolutely support that. We have taken forward a number of initiatives that have come through the tackling poverty and social isolation project, which is looking at actually funding groups that are in areas providing services and at youth employability. There have been a number of successful projects, and I want to make sure that that continues. There should be no disparity between the services that people get in rural areas and those in urban areas.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that question 7 was grouped.

Organic Farming

8. Ms Brown asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to detail the level of support available to assist organic farmers. (AQO 4280/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: My Department provides financial support for farmers converting to organic production through the organic farming scheme. The scheme compensates farmers for the additional costs associated with converting land to organic production methods. Payments range from £470 to £670 per hectare over five years, depending on land type, and there are currently 31 farmers in the scheme. Support is also provided for organic farmers through the organic management option within the countryside management scheme. That provides an annual support payment of £30 per hectare for organically certified land, and there are currently 6 farmers availing themselves of that option. The organic farming scheme and the organic management option are funded under the rural development programme and are now closed to new applicants.

My Department encouraged development of the local organic sector through the organic action plan group, which was funded over a four-year period from 2005. The group, which was made up of organic stakeholders, produced an action plan containing practical proposals to help develop the sector. It concluded its work in 2009, having achieved the majority of its objectives. To complement that, my Department also provided a capital grant support scheme to help farmers to convert existing animal housing to meet organic standards. Some £2 million of grant aid was provided to 77 projects through that scheme, which concluded in 2007.

Furthermore, ongoing technical advice and training courses on growing organic produce are available through CAFRE's development advisers and technologists. There is a fully operational organic farm at Greenmount College, which farmers can visit to learn more about best practice in organic production methods. DARD supply chain advisers can also provide supply chain and marketing advice. My Department also offers a wide range of support through various other schemes that are open to all farmers, including organic farmers.

Ms Brown: I thank the Minister for her answer thus far. With adequate government assistance, the quantity of organic produce in the food chain would greatly increase, which would be a great benefit to both farmer and consumer. Will the Minister indicate what additional initiatives her Department plans to introduce to strengthen the organic sector?

Mrs O'Neill: The fact that we have had higher commodity prices in recent years has resulted in limited premiums at the farm gate, so I think that has been a disincentive to a lot of farmers from getting involved in organic farming practices. I think the stats are that, in 2006, 224 farmers were involved in organic practices, and, in 2012, that was down to 139. I think that much of that is down to the fact that they are not attracting a premium, so it is not necessarily something that is attractive to farmers who are trying to sustain their income. There is probably a weak market there, but I do think there is a niche market for organic produce among people who are interested in it. The CAFRE advisers, the development work that we are doing and the fact that we still run an organic farm at Greenmount that farmers can look at for themselves to see whether it is something that they are interested in is the type of work that we can do to produce it. However, it is very much market-led, and factors such as higher commodity prices will always have an impact on whether a farmer decides to get into organic farming.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answers so far. I also wish her a speedy recovery. What has been the uptake in support for organic farming?

Mrs O'Neill: The organic farming scheme that the Department rolled out provides support to farmers who want to convert to organic production methods. It is funded through the rural development programme. There are 31 participants currently in the scheme, and they are farming about 1,100 hectares of land under organic management. That scheme is currently closed to new applicants. It actually opened in March last year and 33 applications came forward, but only six of those were progressed through to agreement when they got through all the details. The scheme itself, within the countryside management scheme, is providing support of about £30 per hectare per year to a further six participants with 52 hectares of organically certified land under management. A small number of farmers are still involved in organic farming; however, as I said in my previous answer, that depends on the market and the associated costs of being an organic farmer.

Mr Elliott: Just for clarification, the Minister said that the market was a weak market but also a niche market. Over the past six years, has the number of farmers who are involved in organic farming increased or decreased?

Mrs O'Neill: As I said earlier — it was probably my voice and the Member could not hear me — the number of farmers who are involved in organic farming has decreased. It went from 224 farmers in 2006 to 139 in 2012. I said that fewer farmers are getting involved in organic farming because they are not attracting the premium that they need in order to be an organic farmer. That is because of rising commodity costs among other things.

It is a difficult market for people to get into, but although a small number of farmers are still involved and there is a small niche market for organic produce, the factors that I have outlined show that there is a declining number of people who want to get into organic farming.

Mrs D Kelly: I hope that the Minister's voice will return to full strength shortly.

The Minister said that organic farming was a niche market, and Mr Elliott asked her about that. Does she believe that farmers' markets are a way of helping to further promote organic farming? Is the Department as proactive as it should be in promoting farmers' markets, given the absence of them in many towns across the North?

Mrs O'Neill: Farmers' markets are fantastic. I have visited many of them, and I know that people are interested in the food journey and where their food has come from — the field-to-fork or gate-to-plate story. People like that idea, and I am happy to work with the industry to establish more of those markets because they are very successful. Organic food can often be found at those markets; it is unique produce, and the people who grow it can find a market for it there.

I will continue to work with the farming industry to develop all those things. The fact that the Department provides advice and runs an organic farm at Greenmount shows that we are interested in it and that we want to support anyone who wants to take that method of farming forward.

Ancient Trees

9. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, following the findings by the Woodland Trust on threats to ancient trees, to outline her plans to protect the 3,000 ancient trees that may be at risk from pests and diseases. (AQO 4281/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Woodland Trust's ancient tree hunt project, which has raised public awareness and appreciation of our oldest trees and has resulted in the identification and recording of over 3,000 ancient, veteran and notable trees throughout the North.

The primary responsibility for the protection of individual or groups of trees of special amenity, historical or rarity value lies with the Department of the Environment, which can make tree preservation orders under planning legislation. However, responsibility for prevention, containment and eradication of tree diseases is an important area of work for my Department. A plant health contingency plan is in place to deal with incidents of non-indigenous plant pests and diseases.

In the event of an outbreak, the plan contains procedures for carrying out an initial risk analysis and the establishment of an incident management team, which would develop a plan to put in place prevention, eradication and control measures, including surveys and stakeholder consultation.

This approach has been employed to manage the outbreak of Chalara, or ash dieback disease. Our experience has demonstrated the importance of agreeing a fortress Ireland approach to plant health matters, working with those most likely to be affected by the disease, such as woodland owners and farmers. We are considering views from stakeholders on our draft all-Ireland Chalara control strategy and we hope to publish that shortly.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. I am sure that the Minister is relieved, and I congratulate her on persevering. I am sure that we all wish her a full recovery.

Ms Boyle: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I apologise to you, a LeasCheann Comhairle, and to the Minister for not being in my place to ask question 3. Go raibh maith agat.

Budget (No. 2) Bill: Second Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Second Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill [NIA 21/11-15] be agreed. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Peter Weir, who is in his place.

Mr P Ramsey: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Chamber is very warm today. Is the Deputy Speaker minded to relax the rules on the wearing of jackets?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am very reluctant to take on the responsibilities of the Speaker in his absence. At the same time, I am sure that, if Members are overcome, they can take a little walk.

Mr Weir: I am not quite sure whether I should start by apologising for being in my place to those who have to listen to my speech. There seems to be an indication of heat in the Chamber. I will try my best not to increase that. A particular level of sweat seems to have broken out on the SDLP Benches, so I will try to generate environmentally friendly air to waft across throughout the debate. I know that the Minister is very good at delivering a cold blast of reality, and I suspect that we may get that later in the debate.

I will try to keep my remarks fairly brief. As a member of the Finance and Personnel Committee, I welcome the Bill before us. Like the Minister and others in the Chamber, I have been through quite a few of these debates over the years.

First, it is important to look at the overall financial position. In terms of Budget Bills, we would all like the luxury of having a very large surplus that would allow us to choose between a range of good projects that we all wanted. I suspect that Members will come forward with a lot of good ideas during the debate. There will be a number of worthy suggestions for where the money could be spent. I do not think that anybody would disagree with that, but, in tough economic times, the choice is often between good projects.

We need to recognise the fiscal position that we are in, not only the impact of the recession on all our constituents but we should always bear in mind that the constraint upon us is the block grant provided to us by Westminster. Some in the House will want to go on flights of fancy involving Northern Ireland, in some way, going it alone financially or as part of an entity with the South. We have to face the reality that, when it comes to our fiscal deficit, we are very dependent on the block grant. Estimates vary, but the latest figure for our net fiscal balance is that the Budget is dependent on the subvention of somewhere in the region of £10.5 billion from the rest of the United Kingdom. That does provide a degree of constraint.

There has been speculation about efforts being made to lever in additional funds from the Exchequer across the water. All of us would welcome that, but, ultimately, it would not change the overall picture of our being in a tight financial position. As such, in looking at the way forward, we need to recognise the sensitivities and the impact of national decisions on us in Northern Ireland. We do not have carte blanche to act, particularly on welfare reform. All in the House will look at where we can benefit from devolution or where, in the words of Alban Maginness yesterday, we can look for “imaginative” solutions.

As the Minister said yesterday, every solution has a price tag. We will try to protect the most vulnerable, but we must realise that, with welfare, we cannot be self-sufficient. Consequently, it is vital that we approach the issue with some realism. Similarly, an issue in front of the Committee for Finance and Personnel is that of public sector pension reform. We will all have a great deal of sympathy for those directly involved. Again, we must realise that Northern Ireland simply going off into some type of “ourselves alone” situation is not financially sustainable. Although there has been some dispute over the figures, the Department has estimated that simply ducking out of that reform would cost a minimum of £260 million a year, and the cost would probably rise as the years moved by. That is something that should be a salutary lesson to all of us.

It is important, as was indicated at the Committee, that we take time to ensure that this is got right. However, some want to see the whole issue long-fingered for as long as possible. Indeed, some people have stated outside this Assembly an aim to put off pension reform for as long as possible. That is not in the broader interests of the community as a whole. We have to realise that, if there is an additional cost to the public purse, that is something that has to come out of somebody's pocket. Essentially, as we do not have any major tax-raising powers, that will lead to cuts in other spheres of public expenditure. So, we have to be realistic about our position.

As indicated yesterday, it is important that, in looking at the pressures on all our constituents through the Budget, we try to minimise those pressures as much as possible. One of the levers that we have, which has been used very successfully, is rates. The Minister mentioned a comparison with the position a decade ago, and particularly the vast rate rises that occurred: on one occasion, under direct rule, there was a rise of 18%. A sensible approach has been taken by the Minister and the Executive on the issue of rates to ensure that at no stage during this term have regional rates risen by any more than the rate of inflation. On a number of occasions, those regional rates have been frozen.

Given that they are the wealth-creating and job-creating elements of our society, the measures that have been taken in the Budget to provide support for businesses are particularly useful. We are in a situation with business rates support where the majority of businesses receive that support. Particularly welcomed by some of the groups in the sector has been the level of support that the Executive have been able to give through the Budget to small businesses. The extension of the small business rate relief scheme is highly welcome: it has increased by around 25,000 the number of businesses that have received that help.

As indicated, our approach means that the level of rates that people pay in Northern Ireland is a great deal less than the equivalent across the water, whether it is England, Scotland or Wales. The figures will vary from area to area, but there is several hundred pounds of a difference. That is without the fact that we have taken the decision centrally not to impose water rates; the expenditure on water is met in the block grant. So, there is a considerable advantage to living in Northern Ireland, and there could be a considerable competitive advantage to the situation for businesses.

As a party, we are not giving up on this issue. The Budget needs to act as an accelerator to economic growth. At best, we are seeing a few green shoots of recovery, and I think that it would be widely felt around the Chamber that a more positive attitude from Treasury and the Government across the water as regards corporation tax would be helpful.

Finally, I will mention another issue that is crucial to our economy: capital spend. Sometimes, people accuse the Assembly of not doing a great deal, but the commitment over the decade to £18 billion of capital spend is crucial to the employment situation and to our economy. The indications this year are that we are in a better position to meet that target. Indeed, some of the Barnett consequential in the Budget indicate that we are in a stronger position.

We have seen a range of capital schemes, be they on our roads, through proposals from the Department of Education on new school builds, through the assets that have been unfrozen as a result of the A5 or through the commitment and hard work that is ongoing through the Department of Social Development (DSD). This week, we have seen the official announcement of £2.4 million of funding for public realm schemes, such as the one in Holywood and the one that will soon happen in Bangor.

There is a strong commitment on capital. At a time when the construction industry raises issues, it is vital that, in difficult times, public expenditure is helping to protect that sector of the economy as well as possible. The Budget is something to progress on. Therefore, in the overall picture, I commend the Finance Minister on the Budget and urge the House to support the Bill today.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leat as deis cainte a thabhairt domh sa díospóireacht seo. Ba mhaith liom díriú inniu ar an phróiseas airgeadais é féin, chomh maith le cúpla pointe a thógáil nár thug an tAire freagra orthu i ndíospóireacht an lae inné.

Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I certainly gained an insight into the process of accelerated passage yesterday when the Minister was almost out through the door before he moved the First Stage of the Bill. I know what accelerated passage means now.

I will concentrate on the reform of the financial process. The Minister mentioned that at the beginning of his speech, as did Members in yesterday's debate. I will refer first to a report published by the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, 'Parliamentary Financial Scrutiny in Hard Times'. That compares the level of financial scrutiny across different countries and jurisdictions, and the report notes that the outdated Estimates Supply votes process that exists in a Westminster-style system is a key barrier to effective parliamentary scrutiny of the Budget and financial reports.

The report states that, in countries that use the Westminster model of government, Parliaments cannot realistically amend the spending proposals, and many are barred from substituting a Budget of their own. Instead, they are confined to assenting to spending proposals that are put to them. The report states that the focus of financial scrutiny needs to be realigned with the Budget, spending plans and resource accounts, which requires significant structural and cultural reform. That criticism is true of our Supply-vote-style system, despite the in-year monitoring process.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel carried out an inquiry into the Assembly's ability to scrutinise the Budget effectively and came up with a number of measures to be considered to make that process more accessible and to provide opportunities and sufficient time for Members to contribute to and scrutinise the Budget and in-year processes. One of the measures was a memorandum of understanding between the Assembly and the Executive, which the Minister referred to yesterday. I very much welcome the progress in that area.

Another important recommendation was the establishment of a more regularised budgetary process, including a clearly defined pre-draft-Budget stage. That would facilitate earlier input from the Assembly, irrespective of whether it is an annual or multi-year Budget process. The third important recommendation was that Statutory Committees should use their powers more often to call persons and papers related to financial matters.

In 2011, the Executive launched their review of the financial process in response to the Committee's review document. It highlighted many of the recommendations that were raised in the Committee's inquiry. The Committee stressed that an early strategic Budget phase is one of the most influential stages of the Budget process and is, in fact, an essential requirement rather than merely an aspiration.

So, I welcome that a review of the financial processes has taken place, and I welcome the Committee's recommendations. I would like to hear from the Minister where exactly his Department is on those recommendations. It is important that no Minister block progress in this respect, and I think that it is also important that all barriers are removed and progress is made quickly.

I shall raise a few points that arise out of yesterday's debate. Yesterday, I asked the Minister about the £18 million of European funding for the Titanic project. To be quite honest, I was surprised that the Minister said that, so far, not even one project had been identified for that funding. I want to ask him whether he is concerned that more progress on that issue has not been made.

I will return once more to the revenue-raising targets. The Minister told us yesterday that around £422 million has now been secured. I welcome that figure; it is certainly a resource that is very useful to the Executive here. I said yesterday that the original announcement was £1.6 billion, and I think that the Minister revised that back to £862 million. I remember that, at the time, the Minister said that he would include in the figure only those projects that could be realised. He has now brought in £422 million, so, is there a further £440 million to be realised in revenue-raising measures? If so, can that be done in the time of the budgetary period that remains?

I notice that the Financial Provisions Bill contains no reference to legislation to obtain the £40 million that was to be included in the Budget from the Harbour Commissioners. When I enquired about that, I found out that an arrangement had been made between the Department for Regional Development (DRD) and the commissioners that the commissioners would provide buildings or building space for foreign direct investment. I would be interested to hear from the Minister the details of that arrangement and to know whether that means that the figure of £40 million is no longer available from the Harbour Commissioners.

Another point that I raised yesterday was about the £12 million that has been set aside for the childcare strategy. I said that, to my knowledge, around £300,000 of that has been disbursed to date. I made the point that many community and voluntary organisations involved in childcare are very much waiting on this funding. I cannot recall whether the Minister replied to that one, and I would appreciate his response today. Can he tell us when that particular resource, along with the childcare strategy, will be made available?

Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá mé buíoch díot as an deis cainte a thabhairt domh, agus beidh mé ag súil le freagraí an Aire. Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker, and I will await the Minister's response.

Mrs Overend: It is vital that sufficient budgetary scrutiny take place, not least in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, given its importance in supporting an economic recovery. To that end, I support the sentiments expressed by colleagues that the review of the finance process must be implemented as soon as possible. Further to that, with unemployment levels, youth unemployment and unemployment-related benefits all remaining stubbornly high, we must ensure that all resources are being used effectively. I must say that I remain particularly concerned at the latest PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) 'Northern Ireland Economic Outlook', which shows that we are slipping behind the rest of the United Kingdom in almost every economic indicator. We must, therefore, question whether this Budget is strong enough to reverse that trend.

I will use this opportunity to raise just a few issues concerning the 2013-14 Budget Bill that specifically relate to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. First, the situation with the legal dispute over the European grant to the Titanic signature project has already been raised during various stages of the budgetary process last year and in the past two days. I would welcome the Minister's clarification on how the £18 million request from the Enterprise Minister will be reallocated. Further to queries from my colleague Mr Cree, and just now from Mr Bradley, will the Minister detail when that allocation will be confirmed? We must maximise the benefit from European funding opportunities, and we have seen, through the proposed peace building and reconciliation centre at the Maze, for example, that that does not always happen. I hope that this significant funding will be put to good use.

A vibrant and fit-for-purpose infrastructure is a key driver in promoting growth, and constant improvements must be sought. That is truer than ever for our construction industry, which is suffering badly as a result of the economic downturn. I was pleased to read the latest Ulster Bank statistics, which show modest improvements in the sector. However, major government attention is still needed, as the industry is technically in decline, not least in my constituency of Mid Ulster, where I hear of continuing difficulties in the sector.

The Minister has been granted additional infrastructure spending of over £200 million from the Treasury through Barnett consequentialities during this comprehensive spending review (CSR) period. However, it is not quite clear how that money is being spent. Will he outline what specific projects that money has been, or will be, made available for? I note his words from yesterday's Main Estimates debate, when he said:

"Some of it cannot be spent directly by Departments; it has to be given in the form of third-party loans. It is called 'financial transactions money', and we have to work our way through that to find projects". — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p38, col 1].

I welcome more detail if the Minister can respond on that.

I am also keen to raise with the Finance Minister the issue of alternative financing, including partnerships between the public and private sector. That is something that the CBI in Northern Ireland has also been advocating. The Minister will be well aware that the current investment strategy contains no commitment —

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: Certainly.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member agree that PFI funding should stand up in a business case? Is she surprised to learn that the new health and care centres for Lisburn and Newry were approved by ministerial direction and that no business case as yet has been presented?

Mrs Overend: I thank the Member for his intervention and for a point well made.

The Minister will be well aware that the current investment strategy contains no commitment to use alternative financing until between 2015 and 2021. However the strategy does commit to:

"actively engage with institutional investors in order to attract inward investment into public-private infrastructure."

That leads me to ask two questions. First, what active engagement is ongoing with such investors? Secondly, will the Minister bring alternative financing methods forward into this year's Budget to boost the construction sector?

This is an important year for establishing the future of regional aid and selective financial assistance (SFA). I will not go into the issue in any detail today, as the House debated the topic recently. Suffice it to say, Northern Ireland's situation may well change in the not-too-distant future. I am particularly interested to hear of the alternative strategies being put in place, should the large sums spent on SFA no longer be an option. Indeed, that was a recommendation of the Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee, which considered that area very recently.

I want to conclude by raising an issue of transparency that the Audit Office and the PAC also dealt with, alongside SFA, in the review of the Invest Northern Ireland report, relating to targets currently in place for job creation. At present, we set targets for, and measure, the promotion of jobs, which is the number of jobs promised by investors. We should really be dealing with the number of jobs actually delivered on the ground. Without that transparency, it is impossible to judge value for money in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Moving from job promotion to job creation would allow us to scrutinise future budgets much more robustly. I accept that steps have been put in place to address that. However, I am sure the Minister accepts that it is frustrating for MLAs to not have a clear indication of jobs created as we attempt to assess Northern Ireland's economic position.

Mr Lunn: I had better say at the start that I support the passage of the Bill — accelerated or otherwise — just in case anybody thinks that I may sound a bit negative as I proceed.

We live in a very challenging financial climate, and it is vital that every pound spent is spent efficiently. Therefore, it will not surprise anybody if I refer occasionally to the need for a shared future agenda that means something. It is a subject that has exercised the Alliance Party for many years and which, I am pleased to say, is now beginning to attract attention from other parties, most notably demonstrated by the recent issue of the document, 'Together: Building a United Community' by OFMDFM.

As I go on, I will probably appear to be sceptical about the document, but it is at least recognition that bringing our people closer together is a vital priority, not just for social reasons but for sound financial and economic reasons. The drain on our annual budget has been a source of discussion for many years, and it has been variously estimated at £1.5 billion by Deloitte, £1 billion by the Alliance Party and Oxford Economics, and a much smaller but unquantified amount by the Minister of Finance. Whatever it is — and we will never know for sure how much wastage there is — it is more important than ever that we cut down on waste caused by duplication of facilities and services.

In that respect, I want to highlight the failure of the Executive to bring forward the Education and Skills Authority Bill. That legislation is vital as the first step towards streamlining our education system and enabling progress to be made in every aspect of that hard-pressed Department's activities from early years to GCSE, the schools estate, area planning, procurement and all the rest.

*(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker
[Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)*

The Bill has been in preparation for seven years. The first Bill failed and the current one is stuck with the Executive while the DUP and Sinn Féin eyeball each other and refuse to give an inch; mostly, I suspect, around the argument about grammar schools and their special status. The Minister spoke in the House this morning. The Chairman of the Education Committee is shaking his head, but I do not know: only the DUP and Sinn Féin appear to know anything about this. The Minister —

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I think that the Member should know. If I am not mistaken, the Member is also a member of the Education Committee, and he was party to a report that was produced and delivered to the House. If anybody thinks that, on the basis of reading the report from the Education Committee, there was consensus on the issues around ESA, I think that the Member needs to go back and read that report. Secondly, with regard to money, it is an absolute scandal and disgrace that almost £15 million if not more — nearly £20 million — has been wasted on a project that could have been introduced seven years ago had there been the will to introduce it. Real questions need to be asked by the Audit Office as to what the Department of Education has done in squandering nearly £20 million.

Mr Lunn: I am not sure which report the Chairman is talking about, Mr Deputy Speaker, but he seems to be agreeing with me that there are still considerable concerns about ESA and the potential loss or passage of the Bill.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I am referring the Member to the Education Committee's report on the Education Bill, in which it repeatedly said — I thought it was just for the sake of repeating it — no consensus, no consensus, no consensus. Maybe that is the report that the Member should refer to.

Mr Lunn: I understood that it was a report that was presented to the Education Committee, not the one that we drew up ourselves. Obviously, I am well aware of that, and well aware that there are contentious matters. However, the fact is that that report was delivered to the Executive two months ago. We wait for white smoke to rise, but nothing is happening. In the meantime — [Interruption.] I will move on because I really did not intend to get into that particular discussion today.

While the Executive fiddle, Rome is burning. The present education boards have been shorn of good staff. An unwieldy, inefficient system will continue to leak money, extend wasteful practices, spend money on schools that will probably close, and continue to allow the two main education sectors to coexist, with scant regard for what each other is doing. In my opinion, that is why we look forward to the establishment of ESA, if it ever comes. However, I fear that the good ship ESA is going to hit the rocks again, given the deafening silence from the Executive. In budgetary terms, that would be a disaster. The Minister reassured us this morning that ESA is coming. He did not know when — in this session or this mandate — but there is no sign of it.

I firmly believe that there is enough money in the education budget to provide the service for our children that we all aspire to, but major decisions need to be taken, and ESA is the starting point. The same comments apply to the much delayed review of public administration. Many figures have been bandied about around possible savings from the proposed changes. Frankly, I have no reason to believe any of them, but I am sure of one thing, which is that an 11-council model will ultimately be more efficient than a 26-council model and that budgetary savings will ultimately flow from that efficiency. Why the delay? Again, it is an Executive stand-off. I will not bother to dwell on that or to list the other long-outstanding matters such as welfare reform or the Planning Bill. Suffice it to say that we spend endless hours on private Members' motions, which may well be worthy in intent, but are non-binding and are generally dismissed by Ministers. While we agonise for hours over a few jobs for special advisers or same-sex marriage, the major legislation that we need to pass is pushed back, with inevitable consequences for Northern Ireland plc and the Budget.

I want to comment on some of the proposals in OFMDFM's 'Together: Building a United Community' document. I will start by complimenting the authors because they have used Alliance Party terminology in the title. It is a straight lift from our previous documentation. "United community", for those who may have forgotten, is the designation of Members who have been sitting on these Benches since 2007. It is not easy to be critical of a vision that, in many ways, mirrors my party's aspirations, but this is a Budget debate. From that standpoint, it is concerning that so little detail is available on cost or whose budgets are to be affected. It is not reassuring that, for instance, a proposal to remove all peace walls in Belfast within 10 years should be brought forward without reference to the Minister of Justice, who has finally managed during his tenure to make some small inroads into that problem, or to detail in any way where the finance will come from to progress such an ambitious and sensitive project.

Whether feasible or not, I am not against visionary targets. They will cost money, but we do not appear to have that money or know where it is coming from. Likewise, the proposal to put 10,000 NEETs into employment for a year is being promoted as a means of bringing young people together in the workplace as a driver for social cohesion. Again, there is no reference to the Minister normally responsible for employment matters, and there is no indication of how much it will cost and from what budget it will come, or, for that matter, where the jobs will come from.

If you look at the proposal in the document for 10 new shared campuses, based on the premise that allowing schools to share facilities while remaining separated will somehow bring about a shared future, with greater understanding across the sectarian divide, you see not a single mention of integrated education. I well remember the First Minister's proclamations that he is a devotee of integration, and has been since he joined the DUP. His first speech to a DUP gathering was on integrated education.

The Department of Education has constantly failed to honour its obligation to encourage and facilitate integrated schools, which have proved for 40 years that it is possible to educate our children together in one school, with all the social benefits that flow from that. Instead, we are pursuing a separate but equal shared schooling agenda rather than the ultimately more beneficial — and, since this is a Budget debate, more cost-effective — solution of real amalgamation. Why build two schools when one would do?

The estimated cost of the Lisanelly shared campus is £130 million, and will probably be more in the fullness of time. However, that is the baseline figure that we have to go on for one major shared campus. OFMDFM proposes 10 such campuses. In the House a few weeks ago, junior Minister Bell indicated that the total estimated cost of the entire united community project over 10 years would be around £500 million. There is something wrong with the maths.

Mr Bell also indicated that the money set aside for the A5 project could be utilised, which clearly came as a surprise to Minister Kennedy. I notice that we are to debate shortly a UUP proposal to spend that money on other road projects to benefit the hard-pressed construction industry. So, which will it be? We are talking Budget here. It just does not seem to add up, so I will be interested to hear from the Minister about that. We badly need road projects.

It is obvious that our already strained budgets cannot cope with major extra demands. The 10 new campuses, if they ever go ahead, will probably devour Mr Bell's £500 million all on their own. We need to live within our means and our budgets. The First Minister has hinted at an economic pact with Her Majesty's Government, to be revealed on Friday, presumably as a reward for the progress around the shared future agenda. I am not, as you can probably tell by now, full of optimism about all this, but we shall see.

In the past few days, we have heard of the debacle at the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, with £18 million handed out to contractors for imaginary work. What were the Housing Executive and DSD thinking of? That is not small beer. I would like to know what percentage of the Housing Executive's maintenance budget that would represent.

How about the £2 million paid out to landowners in the west and not recoverable following the delay to the A5? There was the £900,000 spent by the Education Department on a failed assessment programme. If we go back a bit, there were the many instances highlighted by the Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee of incredible waste: the Belfast to Bangor railway line upgrade; the unworkable IT upgrades in various Departments; Balmoral High School; the land at Crossnacreevy that was grossly overvalued — and on and on it goes.

Having said that I will support the passage of the Budget Bill, I will finish by saying that I still support the passage of this Budget Bill.

Mr D Bradley: Really?

Mr Lunn: Yes, but we have a lot of work to do to stay within that Budget. I look forward to the Minister's comments.

Mr Spratt (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I am pleased to be able to speak as Chair of the Committee for Regional Development. As we discovered yesterday, the provision for the Department for Regional Development for 2013-14 is some 6.5% less than the provision allocated in the Estimates in the last financial year. Much of that has come about as a result of the reprofiling moneys in respect of the A5 project. The capital allocation was £240.9 million and capital reductions of £336 million, again relating to the A5 and A8 projects.

Although I was unable to speak in the debate yesterday due to other business in the Assembly, I noted with interest in the Hansard report that the matter of the A5 was handled admirably by other Members. I welcome the suggestions they offered on how the money could be used.

Given that the project is in a state of delay rather than demise, the Minister, quite rightly, pointed out that there is some £113 million in the Budget for the project that needs to be spent in this financial year. The Minister, again quite rightly, pointed out that there is no flexibility to carry that beyond this financial year. The Committee has also been advised by the Department for Regional Development that it is returning £108 million of that in the June monitoring round but has bid for some £81 million to make improvements to our existing roads and for other related matters.

I know that my colleague the Finance Minister has been very generous to the Department for Regional Development in the past monitoring rounds when reallocating reduced requirements, and I hope that his generosity will continue for a lot longer. Currently, the backlog in structural maintenance stands at some £820 million, so this bid is very much deliverable, as has been witnessed in the past. The importance of infrastructure as a contributor to the wider economy cannot be underestimated. The reliance of the construction and quarry industries on those major investment streams has been recognised in the past by the House and by the Executive. I hope that that continues to be a central priority for government in Northern Ireland and that the Finance Minister continues with his welcomed generosity when he considers the out-turns arising from June monitoring.

Minister Kennedy came to the Committee for Regional Development at the end of May and advised that he had submitted a paper to the Finance Minister and Executive colleagues in which he outlined the benefit of accelerating other major road improvements. I am conscious that there is to be a debate on that matter soon, and I do not wish to spoil things. However, I can confirm that the indication was that the programme of works included the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway, the A31 Magherafelt bypass, the A26 Glarryford to Drones dual carriageway and the A55 Knock Road widening in Belfast.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Spratt: I thought that my mention of the A26 might provoke my colleague.

Mr Storey: When I hear the A26 mentioned, it always provokes an interest. Does the Chair of the Committee agree that although it is a very difficult task and challenge for any Department that has to make a decision on how and where funds are allocated, given the arterial route that the A26 is to the north coast and to the premier tourist attractions in Northern Ireland, it is vital that we continue to upgrade a road that has had a very poor road safety record. Clearly, it is an issue that needs to be urgently addressed. I think the Minister and the Executive need to take that matter very seriously.

Mr Spratt: I agree with what my colleague says about the A26. Certainly, it is the gateway and the road to the north coast and to all of that area. There have been many very serious and very tragic accidents and quite a number of fatalities on that stretch of road. Bearing in mind the cost of human life and the folks who, tragically, have been killed there over the past number of years, it is a road that very much deserves to be improved as soon as possible.

I can also confirm that the Committee for Regional Development would support that pragmatic programme. The progression of those works would further protect future budget allocations, should there be a prolonged delay to the A5.

It is vital that the moneys voted to Northern Ireland Departments are used in the most efficient and effective manner and that they meet, if not exceed, the Programme for Government objectives that were set at the beginning of this mandate. It is equally important that the elements identified in the savings delivery plans are achieved. The Department for Regional Development has a savings delivery of £58 million over the coming year, and, at present, the Committee is concluding two inquiries, which, we believe, will deliver the potential for further savings in future years. I hope to bring one of those to the House for debate before the summer recess.

3.45 pm

The Committee has some concerns that the Programme for Government's targets and budgets for sustainable public transport might not be met. We continue to scrutinise the Department and the operator to ensure that that is not the case. I welcome the fact that, on top of the two inquiries into transport integration and delivery structures, the Northern Ireland Audit Office is preparing a value-for-money audit of Translink. I look forward to seeing the PEDU report on that organisation in the not-too-distant future.

On the subject of Translink, two weeks ago, the Minister and his senior officials came to the Committee. One question that they were asked was on the reserves that are held by Translink. Frankly, the Committee felt fully stonewalled by the answers and around how the Department was dealing with the issue. We were finally told that a figure of £8 million for this year was additional to the reserves of previous years, which then prompted a further look by finance researchers in the Assembly. The Committee examined Translink's accounts for 2012. It could see that it had total reserves of more than £19 million. However, the accounts also indicated that it had other reserves of £50 million. They did not indicate where or what those reserves refer to. Translink also held £10.55 million in cash at the end of 2012 and £13.5 million in short-term deposits. Translink was also able to clear a £31 million bank overdraft, which appeared at the end of 2011. Again, no explanation was offered about where those moneys came from.

Translink has just raised fares for the travelling public by up to 8%. It has asked the Department to bid for another £12 million for new buses. It has £19 million in reserves and £24 million in cash. It will be guaranteed a lucrative contract, which has not been widely advertised in other areas, for the next 10 years. It was soft findings, rather than an actual advertisement and procurement process. That is being proposed by the Department. The question must be whether, given the apparently lucrative reserves in Translink, DRD should be allowed to trundle along to the public purse at every opportunity to put business cases for additional cash for an organisation that, frankly, has failed fully to explain transparently the reserves that it holds despite the fact that all members of my Committee have regularly asked questions of the Department and, indeed, Translink on the issue. We have been unable to get satisfactory answers. Before more public money is given, we need to be sure about those reserves.

The Committee for Regional Development has always been supportive of the Minister and his officials in the delivery of their services against and within their budget. We will continue to be strong in our scrutiny of the Department and its arm's-length bodies to ensure that our constituents receive the most effective and efficient services in the most economical way and that the Department delivers on its commitments to the benefit of the Northern Ireland economy. I support the Budget Bill.

Mr Storey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): I wish to comment at the outset as the Chair of the Committee for Education.

As the House knows, the Department of Education is one of the larger-spending Departments. In 2012-13, it spent over £2 billion, according to the Estimates document. The Committee has recently been advised by the Department that it spent around 99.5% of its 2012-13 budget.

I understand that the Education Department has one of the better records in budget forecasting for both capital and resource. From time to time, I am a little critical of the Department and its Minister. However, it would be remiss of me not to comment on the Department's good record in that aspect of financial management and to give praise where it is due. However, I am sure that that will probably decline and wane as I proceed through the comments that we want to make.

There are many demands and pressures on the education budget. A key concern for the Committee is the current substantial maintenance backlog in the schools estate. On behalf of the Committee, I would, therefore, like to record our thanks for the Executive's confirmation of an increase of some £10 million in the school maintenance budget as part of the allocations under the economy and jobs initiative, albeit that that is a small amount in the overall maintenance backlog given the deficit and the challenge. However, any amount of money that can be used to alleviate what are very serious and pressing issues for principals, teachers and staff in our schools is to be welcomed.

The Committee also welcomes the previously announced increases to the capital budget of some 4% in 2013-14 and the considerably larger increase to that budget expected in the following year. I will return to the issue of the capital budget.

A moment ago, I mentioned the Department's record on monitoring and living within its budget. The Committee recently spent some time looking into the savings delivery plans that cover the period in question and pertain directly to the Budget Bill debate. The Committee accepted the Audit Office recommendations on the 2008-2011 efficiency delivery plans. The Committee felt that the Department of Education's failure to comply with DFP's co-ordination of the savings delivery plan was simply not acceptable. The Committee noted the Department's good record in respect of capital and resource budgeting; nonetheless, it strongly felt that it should have participated in DFP's savings monitoring, if only to share its good practice with other Departments. It was regrettable to read in the Minister of Education's correspondence that it was quite clearly a "no" to being involved in the process of the savings delivery plans.

Sharing good practice with other Departments, unfortunately, has not happened. The Committee wants the Department to work inside the limits set by the Budget Bill, which we will vote through in the House today. The Committee, like the Finance and Personnel Minister, wants other Departments to do the same. I hope that, following the good work of the efficiency delivery plans, which is being done by the Committee for Finance and Personnel, common sense will break out in the Department of Education and its good practice in overall forecasting and budgeting will be shared across other Departments.

The Department's resource budget is large. It pays our teachers and keeps what is generally an excellent educational provision running and doing so in a way that is a credit to those involved in the delivery of our education service. The Education Committee wants to see education run more efficiently. It wants to see, for example, the Department's PEDU stage 2 action plans, which have yet to be produced even though the relevant PEDU reports were generated some 18 months ago. Members also want to see more action on the stage 1 PEDU report. The Committee simply wants to be sure that money is not wasted by the Department in the delivery of front line education services.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Member for giving way. Does the Member agree with me that there seems to be a lack of strategic thinking on the saving delivery plans? Take, for example, the saving of £15 million by the boards: that was measured very much at the input stage, but, if you look at the outputs, you see that, as a result of that saving, CASS has been decimated. How can you attack the area of literacy and numeracy if, in some board areas, you have only one numeracy co-ordinator right across the board?

Mr Storey: I agree. I know that, from the Member's experience in his past profession, he has a particular insight into the day-to-day challenges that face our schools and the way in which budget changes can dramatically change the outcome in the way that we deliver education in our schools.

There is an issue with the PEDU reports and the savings delivery plans in identifying the savings that can be made in a way that enhances rather than hinders front line delivery. We will come back to that point in a moment or two. We need to see how the Department of Education could have a better outcome in the Budget process through working with DFP not only for forecasting but for delivering services in our schools.

Efficiency in service delivery is an important issue for us. As we have said, front line services are vital. In education, the front line is the class-room, the teachers, the pupils and the schools. Earlier today, the Education Minister announced a revised proposal for common funding formula schemes. I assure members of the Committee who are present in the House this afternoon that the Committee will have a detailed examination of today's announcement. It may be that members will have to seek guidance from DFP on the matter. The Finance Minister may be asked to comment on elements of the proposals because there is an issue about how we ensure absolute transparency in the way in which funds are allocated to Departments.

Even today in the House, something in the region of £30 million has been announced as additional money through a number of proposals, and we have not yet seen a breakdown of where the money is coming from. I will hazard a guess: if the amount of money that is allocated to small schools support were removed, that would come very close to the amount of money that is being proposed for allocation to other schemes and other elements of the common funding formula. Members of the Education Committee will need to take that very seriously as we look at the issue, because it has an impact on the overall framework that the Finance Minister has tried to set. As an Executive, we have to consider how we deal with the Budget in that, when a Budget is set, it is incumbent on Departments to work within the framework. When a crisis such as the A5 arises, we must, when possible, have sufficient robust methods and structures in place to allocate that money in a way that keeps Northern Ireland plc working to the maximum.

In the meantime and in the context of the Budget Bill debate, the Education Committee recognises the need for the simplification of funding arrangements for schools. However, the Committee wants the resource and capital covered by the Bill to be used to add value to the education of our children, both in measurable attainment and in the less tangible aspects of school life that we, as parents, know benefit our children, whether that be in a small rural school or an urban school with high levels of educational challenge.

The Education Committee has also spent quite some time reviewing the Department's capital programme, both the newbuilds and the school enhancement programme. The Committee welcomes the announcement about the former and looks forward to more news on the latter. The Committee understands that the budget for newbuilds is not a bottomless pit and that not every school that deserves a new building will have an announcement made on its future.

However, given the financial constraints, I think that it is more incumbent on the Department of Education than ever to provide more transparency on the newbuild process and more information on the progress of individual projects.

4.00 pm

We are all aware of the financial constraints on Departments. In previous debates, I asked for more information for Committees on the Budget and the spending process. I repeat that call today, and I also ask that Departments provide more information on their spending to all their stakeholders.

Those comments were made in my role as Chair of the Education Committee. I will, in conclusion, make a few comments as a Member. The efficient and effective use of resources in a time of economic challenge has been and continues to be a key issue for my party and me. As Chair of the Education Committee, I praised the Department for its budget forecasting. I highlighted a number of key areas where the Committee feels that there could be improvements in the financial management of budgets. However, I want to raise a number of issues in which my party feels that there is room for improvement by the Minister and Department. A more effective and closer working relationship between the Minister, the Department and the Committee that they serve could yield more efficient and effective use of the resources in education.

I will highlight two key areas. One is developing new policy without taking account of an efficient use of resources. Over the past number of years, we have witnessed a number of new policy developments that have resulted in the expenditure of significant additional resource through new arrangements that officials argued were essential to ensuring improvement in the system. Despite widespread concern in the system about the usefulness of the particular change, officials forged ahead with the change on the basis that the concerns are being whipped up and that it will be all right on the night.

Six months later, the Committee receives reports that all is not well and that the concerns were not only real but ignored. One prime example was and is the computer-based assessment and the £4 million that was committed to an initiative that was seriously flawed from the outset. That has contributed little to improving the assessment process. Teachers and schools told Committee members from the outset that it was going to be problematic, and it was. Let us remember that the Minister told us that there was no problem or crisis. Just a few weeks ago, the Minister had to come back to the House to confirm that there was a problem and a crisis. I know that the members of the Education Committee are diligent and will have read their folder for the meeting tomorrow, so they will confirm what I am about to say: when you read the gateway report, you see that it raises serious concerns on how we still have many unanswered questions about that process.

The Member for Lagan Valley referred to ESA. When I first came to the House in 2003, ESA was being talked about by the officials and the Department as though it was going to happen imminently. This is the connection; it is not a tenuous link. It is not, as the Finance Minister tried to warn us, going from Dan to Beersheba to include whatever you possibly can in the debate. It is relevant to ensuring that policy is connected to the budgetary process in a way that does not lead to financial challenges or crises. We have money that should ultimately have been spent more effectively and efficiently. Almost £20 million was spent on the ESA implementation team. I ask the House — the Finance Minister is present — whether anyone can really tell us what tangible benefit was given and delivered to our education service as a result of that process.

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Storey for giving way. I take the point about the money that has been spent: it is hard to see the tangible benefit from that money. However, does he not accept that, in the longer term and for the greater good, ESA, in whatever form it appears, may turn out to be a better vehicle for the delivery of the education system than the disparate approach that we have across five boards and all the other organisations?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his intervention. I accept that, if you were to take the eight organisations that were proposed primarily — the five education and library boards and the other organisations — and dismantle or amalgamate them, there are surely efficiencies that could be delivered. However, if you, as a policy statement or procedure, start to bolt on to that efficiency process a raft of other political or ideological agendas, or whatever, you move away from the real focus of why you wanted to do the thing in the first place. I think that that is where have come to with the ESA process.

The performance and efficiency delivery unit (PEDU) reports, and the report on school transport in particular, are prime examples. I commend the Minister of Finance and his officials for what I believe were outstanding reports in their breadth and their detail on home-to-school transport and school meals. They clearly indicated that, across the five boards, there was a huge difference in the way in which services were being procured and delivered. I come back to the point that, whenever you have a disconnect between a policy intent and the way in which a budget is delivered, it leads to issues such as the £20 million that I contend has been squandered on the ESA implementation group.

My second point is on the bureaucracy that is associated with spending, where poor processes and a lack of a decision process costs money. In part, that is similar to some of the comments that I have made. I believe that it is important to have proper procedures in place to protect the use of public money, but, at times, it appears that the Department has developed procedures that negate the efficient spend of that money. Capital spend is a good example, and I know that the Minister has been attempting to make improvements in that area.

It is not acceptable that, once the Minister announces a capital project, the time taken to get that project shovel-ready — the phrase has become very common in the House — is often measured in years before parents and teachers see the bricks on the ground. In fact, it is not now even a case of seeing bricks. I attended the opening of the extension to a primary school that borders the North Antrim and East Londonderry constituencies last week, and there was not a brick to be seen. It was a modular building. I am sure that the Minister of Education is watching the debate with bated breath, but I commend the Department for its use of modular buildings, as they provide quick delivery of a high-standard, high-class educational provision for our children. I think that that is a good example of how the process can at times deliver a very good outcome for us all.

At a time when the effective use of public sector works can play a key role in rejuvenating the construction industry, our poor performance in that area needs a radical overhaul. One has only to look at the rate of progress on existing schemes such as that at Lisanelly in Omagh to make that very point.

I want to conclude by commenting further on the issues that my colleague the Chair of the Regional Development Committee made about the spends following the decisions on the A5. The A26 has been and continues to be a priority. We should use whatever influence we can bring to bear on the Minister for Regional Development and his Executive colleagues. They must give serious consideration to ensuring that the process that they will use to disseminate and distribute the moneys that will come as a result of the A5 project ensures that they are filtered and find their way into the continued and speedy delivery of what is a key route for transport, tourist infrastructure and the general well-being of the people of Northern Ireland: particularly the A26.

I know that Members have other valid and valuable projects in their constituencies, and they have every right to lobby and raise concerns and issues around those. However, I would be failing in my duty as a public representative for North Antrim were I not to place on record in the House, yet again, that I believe the A26 is a worthwhile cause. It is long overdue, and I trust that the Minister for Regional Development will take the same keen interest in the issue as we know that the Finance Minister has. We look forward to seeing progress being made on that as this Budget Bill goes through its process.

Mr Byrne: I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate.

A Budget process offers an opportunity to determine the direction of an economy, even a small regional economy such as the North of Ireland's. The question is what economic pathway is being pursued in the remit of the Budget by the Minister of Finance and economic Ministers in the Executive. Minister Foster recently opened an extension to the Omagh business complex worth £2.3 million, £1.8 million of which was very welcome grant aid from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI). However, the economic background is one of recession and austerity in the public and private sectors. We still have a banking squeeze on business and personal credit. The only finance available at the moment is what is quite often referred to as dirty finance — hire purchase (HP) or leasing finance — for plant and machinery. Thankfully, over the past 10 days, we have seen some new tractors, trailers and forage harvesters on the road; so somebody is availing of this sort of finance.

In terms of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD), we have the single farm payment from Europe, which amounts to about £300 million per annum in total. That funding is crucial to the Northern Ireland economy. However, we also have infraction fines that are running at an accumulative value of about £100 million over the past five or six years. Even in the current financial year, millions are still being provided to meet EU infraction fines. The current CAP outcome is crucial for our farming sector, going forward. We hear some worrying signals, however, that the rural development budget will be reduced, particularly for the UK and the regions therein, including ours.

Here is a question, however: how well are we using rural development moneys in Northern Ireland to help develop small business enterprises? We need to finance more than just sporting and cultural projects. We still have a bovine TB problem in Northern Ireland. The eradication scheme that we have had is a largely failed project. Tens of millions have been spent on this eradication scheme over the past 40 years; yet, unfortunately, the incidence of bovine TB is higher than ever. Indeed, we have the highest incidence in the EU. In the current monitoring round, £12 million is being claimed to meet the cost in the 2013-14 year. We need to get to a better position, ideally to the disease-free status attained in Scotland. Who is creating the urgency in Northern Ireland to really tackle this problem?

The Agri-Food Strategy Board produced an excellent agrifood strategy report. Inherent in it is a target requirement of £400 million public investment to implement the strategy over the next three to five years. However, an effective implementation plan is crucial. A sum of £250 million has been pinpointed as a requirement for a farm business improvement scheme. It is crucial that DARD produces an outline of how that can be financed over the next three to four years. The question is this: what initiatives will DARD bring forward to ensure progressive implementation of the strategy in order to achieve the growth and development targets outlined by the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI) chairman, Mr Tony O'Neill?

The intensive farming sector for pigs and poultry has potential for growth, and we have the potential for managed growth. Moy Park has big development plans for the poultry industry, but there are two major problems: the issue of chicken waste disposal, and the need for banking finance to grow the sector. Moy Park recently intimated to me that it could double its operation in Northern Ireland, but that the biggest single limiting factor is the lack of business finance for farmers who want to become supplier agents to the company.

Turning to the A5 road money, it is alarming to see the number of MLAs who want to pick up that money and spread it all over the place. It was a major project that was outlined at the Hillsborough and St Andrews talks. Former Minister for Finance in the Republic, Mr Brian Cowen, kept it on the agenda and the former Taoiseach, Mr Ahern, made sure that there was total agreement on it. It is a major national strategic project, and I certainly want to see it delivered. I would not want to see it being handicapped in the future. The question now, however, is this: what should happen to the £113 million that was earmarked for expenditure in the current year? What can be done with that money to boost the construction sector and improve infrastructure to help the regional economy? As Mr Spratt outlined earlier as Chairman of the Committee for Regional Development, DRD has a backlog of structural maintenance, which offers an avenue for immediate use of the money.

Most MLAs have cited pet projects in their constituency. I want to mention one that I have mentioned here before, which is what I call the umbilical cord road: the A32 between Enniskillen and Omagh. Given the review of public administration (RPA) and what we were told 10 years ago about a major acute hospital in Enniskillen, I hope that the A32 will not be forgotten. Why do I want to push that and other road projects? The answer is very simple: the construction industry is in the doldrums and I recognise that, as the Minister said yesterday, over 50% of construction activity is currently dependent on public sector projects. If we can give the construction industry a boost at this time by investing in public building projects through the reallocation of A5 moneys, I will support and welcome that. In west Tyrone, we are also waiting for the Omagh area hospital, which is crucial for health service provision but will also create construction employment locally.

Like the Minister, I am a humble economics graduate from Queen's in the mid-1970s. Recently, a book was written by a history teacher who teaches in Omagh Academy, Dr Russell Rees. That book states categorically that the last time Northern Ireland enjoyed a current account surplus in revenue was in 1931. The question we have to ask ourselves is this: what can we do to the regional economy to improve its performance? Is the subvention £8 billion, £10 billion, or, as Sinn Féin says, £4.5 billion per annum? The sooner we get into those figures and start tackling an economic plan that can realistically be developed, the better it will be for everyone.

Mrs Dobson: I welcome the opportunity to speak. I will keep my remarks fairly brief, which I am sure the Minister will be glad to hear. In my role as agriculture and rural development spokesperson for the Ulster Unionist Party, I will focus on a number of specific matters.

As has already been outlined, the Bill makes provision for the balance of cash and resources required to reflect the departmental spending plans in the 2013-14 Main Estimates.

Unfortunately, yet again, the Assembly is being asked to pass a Budget Bill with very little information from the Department. In fact, in so many cases, all we have are the headline figures. Once again, the DARD budget, as well as those for most other Departments, will pass through this House with very little debate on its specific details.

The first point that I would like to raise with the Minister is my annual gripe, which is that DARD has yet again thrown huge sums of money at trying to tackle bovine TB and is about to do it again for another year. The simple fact of the matter is that unless the Department really steps up to tackle the root cause of the problem, it is never going to go away. Millions have been spent, but with very little impact on eradicating the disease. The fact remains that incidences of bovine TB are commonplace, and, in some areas, they are actually higher than they were in 1996.

I see from the Estimates that the veterinary service will receive a net total of just over £40 million this year, and I wonder how much of those costs are going to pay for what are avoidable diseases. I suppose that one welcome development since I spoke in this debate last year has been the announcement of the test and vaccinate or remove (TVR) programme. I will wait to see what impact that will have, if any, on the financial black hole that is DARD's bovine TB strategy, if, indeed, it can be called a strategy.

I note from the Estimates that there is also continued investment in the Northern Ireland Forest Service. Once again, I will make the call that my party believes that further use of the agency's assets is possible — and I do not mean solely from a recreational perspective. I believe that, with a little extra support, staff and encouragement, the agency could become even more economical.

Another crucial issue that is missing from the DARD and DETI Estimates — I am sure that the Finance Minister will correct me if I have missed something — is the absence of resources to help deliver even parts of the Going for Growth strategy. That action plan was released to great fanfare at the Balmoral show, but without resources being directed to it, it cannot ever achieve its targets. To quote from the document:

"Ensuring the successful implementation of the Strategic Action Plan will require support from Government of around £400 million."

Although I would expect the Executive to be in a position to provide — sorry, I would not expect the Executive to be in a position to provide that level of resources up front. I think I was being slightly hopeful there. I believe that the wider agrifood industry deserves to know what level of support it is likely to get, if anything at all, so that it can begin to organise and plan for the future.

I would appreciate it if the Minister could give us a general update on that request for funds, either later this afternoon when he responds to the debate or perhaps in a couple of weeks' time when he announces the June monitoring round.

Mr D McIlveen: I, too, will seek to keep my remarks as brief as possible, as I fear that it may soon be just the Minister and I in the Chamber, and I want to avoid that at all costs.

As a member of the Finance and Personnel Committee, I support the Budget (No.2) Bill. Most of the comments that have been made today have been constructive and reasonably well tempered. Of course there are exceptions to that rule in all debates, and I was particularly concerned about some of the comments that were made by the Ulster Unionist Member for Mid Ulster. I agree with Mr Storey: we are in the real world and we know that, financially, times are difficult and that the block grant is consistently under pressure. We then, as an Assembly, have to be careful as to how that money is allocated locally. I am not insulted by the comments made, nor, I am sure, is the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. However, I expect that the people who will be insulted by them are those in business who have put their hand in their pocket, even over the past six weeks, when they delivered over 1,000 jobs to Northern Ireland. Today, Almac announced 229 jobs. That is to be welcomed, and we should congratulate the company on the delivery of those jobs.

Let us look at the companies that announced a combined total of well in excess of 1,000 jobs in the past six weeks: Mango Marketing; Latens Systems; Greiner Packaging; Vello Systems; Galgorm Castle; Ballyrashane Creamery; Linden Foods; Deloitte; Pharmalink; Merchant Warehouse; Wrightbus; and Glen Dimplex.

We know that times are tough, but when we step up in the Assembly, we have to take on board the work that goes on behind the scenes. We must also take on board the work done and risk taken by the private sector to bring these jobs in. We have to be very careful to temper the language that we use because everyone in the Building is committed to the economy in Northern Ireland going from strength to strength. It is, I am sure, the topic at the front of all our minds, at constituency level and in the business that we do here. So I do not think that the remarks made about jobs being delivered on the ground were helpful. The whole tone was pessimistic and not helpful to the work that all of us are trying to do to rebalance and grow the Northern Ireland economy.

I want to relate most of my remarks to my membership of the Policing Board, so I will focus, just for a couple of minutes, on the Department of Justice budget, the details of which we have before us. It cannot go unnoticed that the provision being sought is nearly 8% lower than this time last year. We have to ask the question: where will that affect, and where will the money be taken from? I know that the Minister of Justice will not get a chance to respond to this debate. However, I think that the concerns have to be made public, and then, hopefully, an opportunity will be given for the Minister to respond in due course at an appropriate time.

It is inevitable that some of the 8% cut will fall on policing, which must concern us. An operational policing model is being consulted on, and I have real concerns that we will find some of our police officers, particularly those of senior rank at district level, in a position of having to choose, purely based on budgets, between response policing and neighbourhood policing. That would be a very unfortunate place to get to, and, therefore, I hope that the Minister of Justice, working within his means, will ensure that the PSNI is sufficiently resourced to meet its commitments at local level.

Taking that a step further, I would find it astonishing, if policing budgets were under pressure, for the Assembly to turn down something that was offered for free and would help policing. Whether we like it or not, in September of this year, the legislation under which the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA) operates will cease to exist. We know for sure that, in England, Scotland and Wales, the National Crime Agency legislation will replace that. In Northern Ireland, it appears that, because of disagreement from a certain side of the House, that may not be the case. This is a time of stretched resources. Policing has made considerable gains in neighbourhood policing and community policing, which has been instrumental in building relationships between communities and the police that, let us face it, many of us would not have thought possible. It would be a travesty if we got to a place where, as a result of cutting budgets, a lot of that work was undone. Therefore, when SOCA ceases to exist, we are going to have to replace it and plug the gap some way. If we are not going to replace it with the National Crime Agency, I throw the challenge out to Members on the Benches opposite to explain how we are going to plug that gap. Do we take it out of neighbourhood policing? I certainly hope not. Do we take it out of response policing? That is impossible; we need response policing to deal with the day-to-day crimes that take place in our Province. So, people need to think very carefully about the road that they go down regarding community policing and about their position on the National Crime Agency.

4.30 pm

The next issue we have to be careful about on the justice side of things is the fantastic event that is happening in Fermanagh next week, which I hope we are all embracing as a good news story. It is going to cost money to make sure that it is secure, and a fair amount of the pressure from a budgetary point of view is going to fall upon the police. We have to make sure, and this is where I would encourage the Minister to use his Westminster role, that continued pressure is put upon Minister Alexander, who made some commitments last week that remuneration for the security costs would be made expediently, quickly and efficiently. I hope that that will be the case, and perhaps the Minister, in his role at Westminster, can continue to ensure that it is.

I am going to say no more than that. The debate has gone on for a considerable time, and there are still some Members who are down to speak. In concluding, I mention again the issue of equal pay: a resolution needs to be found between the DOJ and the PSNI in that regard. There needs to be a greater degree of —

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: Yes; I will.

Mr Lunn: Would the Member not include DFP in that possible solution, given that it is the Department with responsibility for the issue?

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Member for his intervention. It would not have come as any great surprise to him that I did not mention DFP at this stage, bearing in mind that the Minister has made his position on the matter pretty clear. There is a complex issue, and I do not think any Member, ministerial or non-ministerial, will be found wanting when it comes to wanting to find a resolution to it. Pensions and pay issues are complex; we know that. Therefore, we need to try to get to the bottom of what has gone wrong here and see how we can put it right, because there is a moral duty on us to try to find a resolution.

There is the issue of pensions around injury on duty as well, and members of the Policing Board in particular and Mr Lunn will know very well that there is a continued concern around how those who served this country valiantly, fearlessly and with tremendous dignity find themselves being treated regarding their pension provision around injury on duty. That it is something that we will need to continue to try to find a resolution to. I mention these things because they are all budgetary consequential. I have to say publicly that I hope that the Minister of Justice, within the provision that he has sought, has ensured that all those demands can be met.

I support the Budget Bill's passage.

Mr Beggs: First, I agree with the earlier comments of my colleague Leslie Cree that we have a financial process that is not fit for purpose for the Budget. We really must bring about improvement to give greater understanding, accountability and transparency around that financial process. I will highlight some of my dissatisfaction with the current process. There are a lot of detailed figures behind the Budget, and the numbers that make up the figures in the Budget are in the Northern Ireland Estimates 2013-14. I understand from the Business Office that it was placed there last Thursday or Friday. I was unaware that it was there. I am normally at the Assembly on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, and so I picked up my copy yesterday. I am on the Health Committee, and it does not meet again until Wednesday. So we have not had a chance to discuss any of the issues in it. I wonder whether the rest of the Committees have had a chance to discuss the issues in it. Yes, there is an issue of prioritising between Departments and also an issue of prioritising how that funding is being spent within Departments. I would have thought that any functioning Assembly should take constructive criticism and difficult decisions to Committees, and priorities from those Committees should be shared and, hopefully, adopted.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

As I mentioned earlier, business cases for decisions are very important to ensure that that money is spent well. When I was on the Finance Committee previously, the announcement was made that DARD was to move to the new site in Limavady. It might be perfectly logical; I do not know. At that time, I asked where the business case was, because if the proposal stacks up, the business case should show that it stacks up. I am unaware of its ever having been published. Similarly, as I indicated earlier in an intervention about the new health and care centres, I understand that the new centres for Lisburn and Newry have been approved by ministerial direction without business cases being presented and agreed. I am picking up comments that perhaps everything might not be as sweet as it might appear. Have all the GPs agreed to move into that new structure? What is the point of building that new building unless it will all work together effectively rather than creating a white elephant with ongoing costs to the public sector?

I will concentrate my comments on health because that is the Committee on which I serve and I have more information on that area. Everybody recognises that there are huge pressures on our health service, and that affects many people in the local community. We hear stories that people have gone with their loved one to Antrim hospital to find three ambulance crews inside the hospital who cannot go back out because their patients have not been handed over or that the corridor is full with other trolleys because of backing-up due to an unavailability of beds elsewhere. There are huge pressures on our nurses and doctors who work in that accident and emergency department and on those who work throughout our hospitals. I recently learned that the bed occupancy rate in Antrim Area Hospital is 95%. Some may think that that is very efficient, but the difficulty with that is that the optimum figure has been calculated as 85%, because you always want to have a bed available so that someone else who comes through the A&E system can be located at short notice so that necessary cleaning and sterilisation can occur; and so that there is not an overburden on the staff. Let there be no doubt that there are huge pressures on our accident and emergency departments at present.

The four-hour waiting time is the critical judgement throughout the United Kingdom: that is, has an A&E achieved its target of treating 95% of patients within a four-hour period. Last autumn, the Health Committee heard from officials who chose to pick on the 12-hour waiting time figures. They told us that things are starting to turn round and look better. I took the trouble to look at some of the historical figures, and there was a clear pattern in that things tended to improve as you come to the summer period but that, in the winter period, winter pressures exist and waiting times worsen. We were being told that things were starting to get better, but that has not been the outcome. In major A&E units throughout Northern Ireland, there is a downward trend. The best performance in any one month had been going down for each of the past few years, and the worst performance in any month has been going down for each of the past few years. I was concerned about the somewhat relaxed approach from officials who appeared before the Committee. They told us that things were starting to get better, when clearly the trend did not show that. The published figures for March and April show the worst figures for A&E performance against the four-hour target in the past five years, such are the pressures in our hospitals and A&Es. Does the Budget assist and provide the necessary funds for improvement along with all the other planned changes? The Minister made a statement about those earlier today.

When I read the original 2011-15 Budget, I discovered that, several years ago, some £4.569 billion had been allocated for 2013-14. However, I notice that, in the latest Estimates, some £4.671 billion — an additional £102 million — had been allocated. I welcome those additional funds, but are they sufficient? Unfortunately, too many people have to wait more than 13 weeks, and some people have to wait more than 36 weeks to see a consultant. As I said, we have issues with our accident and emergency units. We need a range of improvements, such as increasing primary care provision to ensure not only better services but a better range of services, including GP-led services, whether in surgeries or through aftercare such as the Dalriada doctor-on-call service in my area. It is important that patients do not feel that they have no option but to appear at A&E and that more people can be effectively treated by other means in the community.

What are the additional budget pressures and priorities in the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety? When the presentation was made to the Health Committee, there was a letter from the Minister dated 24 May on his priorities for in-year monitoring in which significant pressures were indicated. Why, three months into a budget, is the Minister indicating significant pressures? Has sufficient money been allocated? When you drill down on what the Minister is saying, it becomes quite interesting. He and his Department have priorities that are not being met in the Department. In particular, under Transforming Your Care, there is a bid for £28 million. This is the flagship policy that we are all relying on to try to take pressure off our hospitals and accident and emergency units, and we are bidding for it in in-year monitoring. That concerns me. Will the £28 million be available to meet the essential needs that have been identified? If not, what will happen?

4.45 pm

There is a further bid of £26 million for the health service in the current year. Again, very early on in the year, the Minister is highlighting the difficulties that exist. In fact, he is saying that this money is needed or an additional 75,000 assessments or 22,000 treatments will not be completed this year. He estimates that that is what is needed above the core funding capacity in the budget. So, if we do not get that bid in the in-year monitoring, there will be a great deal more pressure on the budget. These services are critical to people who need assessment and treatment. Where assessment is concerned, we are talking about orthopaedic services, general surgery, gynaecology, ENT and oral surgery. An actual gap in treatment could arise in orthopaedics, cardiology, general surgery, chronic pain management and plastic surgery.

Again, I ask the questions: can we afford to allow all our waiting lists to extend by that amount? Are we funding the National Health Service in the best way? A bad use of money can happen when, at the end of every year, there is a sudden flood of money and some is thrown at problems. When that happens year on year, the question must be asked whether we would be better looking at the core budget and putting in regular, recurrent funding so that better treatment can occur in the health system. If we know that there is the pressure and we know that we can manage it better by taking that peak out of it and dealing with it in the public sector through the health service, surely that would be better. I recognise that the private sector has a role to play on occasions, but when, repeatedly, year in, year out, the same issue arises, the question should at least be asked: is this the most efficient way to run the health service, or should we be changing the baseline budget to better manage that service?

I see also in the Minister's current funding bid that £1.2 million has been set aside for health and social care and the Fire and Rescue Service during the G8 summit. I thought that the Foreign Office would pay for any additional pressures on services in Northern Ireland related to the G8. So, I pose the question: why is the Department of Health having to bid for money in the in-year monitoring? Will that money be recouped if additional pressures are applied and an argument can be stacked up justifying it? Why is the Foreign Office not providing for those additional resources and for the need that might exist?

One of the key policies in the change process that is under way in the health service is the introduction of integrated care partnerships. However, I have seen little information about whether there are sufficient funds or whether sufficient preparation has been made in governance arrangements so that those organisations can get moving and help to provide additional services in the primary care sector. The bid is also for service changes, voluntary redundancy, voluntary early retirements and general implementation of Transforming Your Care. So, there are some very substantial amounts of money in the in-year monitoring bid that, I would have thought, the Minister of Health would deem essential for addressing the huge pressures that exist there. Of course, at one point not so long ago, we were told that the health service does not need any more money. I will leave that thought hanging so that those who said that can reflect on it.

It is clear that we need to do things better. We need to look at how we administer the money and how we can better provide services. We have to change, and there has to be funding to enable that change. I hope that the funding will be there to enable that change.

The other aspect of the June monitoring bid is that, on top of the current funding bids, there are significant capital bids for the health service. Again, there is £13.5 million for the implementation of Transforming Your Care and another £3.5 million for health and care centres to enable them to take on some more of the primary care work.

There is some money for enabling work at the children's hospital, including an energy centre, and £10 million to maintain existing services. To maintain existing services under the capital requirements, there is a bid in for £10 million. Therefore, the health service needs £10 million to maintain existing services. There is an interesting set of words here:

"in areas of highest risk for staff and patients' service provision".

I am not sure exactly what that means, but it gives me some concern that in-year monitoring is having to pay for maintaining existing services. I am assuming that that is for essential maintenance requirements. There is also £10 million for an ICT bid and a significant amount of money — £8 million — for equipment scanners. We are told that those are cardiac cath labs for the Royal at £3.5 million, a percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) lab at £0.5 million on the Altnagelvin site, and others besides that. I understand that much of that funding is essential to Transforming Your Care — that flagship proposal. I go back to what I said earlier: why has that essential change not been built into our Budget so that we do not have to rely on in-year monitoring? It puts the health of our community and those who need assistance at very high risk.

There will also be changes in how our older population is looked after under Transforming Your Care. The current health policy is not to refer any new residents to the statutory residential care homes but to refer them primarily to domiciliary care. There are areas where sufficient alternatives are not available. For some, domiciliary care can be a very solitary experience, particularly if you have limited family and friends. Whether you are in hospital, residential care or supported housing, having access to family and friends is important for your well-being. It is also important to enable you to recover and improve from any ailment that you have had.

There has to be a review of the capital assets in each locality. Is that contained in the Budget? Where are the proposals to close residential care homes? Are there any alternatives? In Larne in my constituency, I have been made aware, first, that the alternative residential care in the private sector does not have the en suite bathrooms that apparently are the main driver for this, not that that is what the residents said was essential — the quality of care is what they consider essential. Secondly, many of the residential spaces in the private sector are shared rooms, so it is not a private en suite room but a shared room.

The third factor is perhaps the most interesting. I am told that the private sector rooms are full. Therefore, if you shut down some of our residential care homes, there is currently no alternative. It was not that long ago that I learned of a constituent who tried to get their mother into Joymount House and ended up being referred to a home some 40 miles away before getting a location nearer to hand. It is important that there are alternatives locally, including residential care homes. It is also important that there is a range of service provision. It should not be just domiciliary care or residential care. Surely there is a range in between, and I think of sheltered housing. Is there suitable sheltered housing, and is there suitable supported housing where assistance will be at hand for those who need it? Thankfully, there is a firm plan to build a 36-bed unit at Greenisland House in my constituency. It will have 12 beds for people who require minor support, 12 beds for people who require medium support, and 12 beds for people who require higher dependency care. Following the announcement of the closure, there was little development in progressing the alternatives. There were discussions in the background, but there was no real development to move on and transfer ownership to a housing association to apply for the planning permission. Thankfully, within the past six months, that has occurred.

Also, until a year ago, that scheme was not even on the Housing Executive's capital build programme. Has the Department for Social Development's supported housing programme been scrutinised so that there is sufficient capital build to provide essential supported housing so that a range of options can be provided in each community? I have no doubt that there will be a range of needs. Some people may well return to their homes, with the support of family and friends, and integrate back into the community. That is good for them, and it may be what they want. Some may go into residential care, and others may use other areas of support, such as sheltered or supported housing.

This is also important for the health service with respect to efficiency. Someone has to call with those people and give them additional support in their own homes, but it would be much more efficient to have a number of people together in supported or sheltered housing units than to have care workers travelling considerable distances between visits. Efficiencies can be brought in, and more time can be spent meeting the needs of residents and engaging with them.

I would also like to talk briefly about primary school funding in the Budget. For many years, there have been announcements of new primary school funding, but you tend to find that an announcement is followed by a large gap, expectation is built up, and little is delivered. Essentially, you have joined a list.

I would like to highlight a number of primary schools in the east Antrim area where there are needs to be addressed. The majority of the classroom accommodation in Woodburn Primary School is made up of portable classrooms, along with an older school. High quality education is being provided there, it is well regarded by the community and the parents, and it is delivering a vital service, but, as yet, that need has not been recognised. A number of years ago, funding was made available to buy adjacent land and make that early provision, but, ultimately, we need a complete new school. Has that need been addressed in the Budget or by some alternative funding arrangement?

I am open to alternative funding arrangements, because we need to meet the needs of our children, provided that the business case stacks up. It must stack up, and it must show that there are benefits by doing it that way. We do not want to simply borrow and borrow and build a millstone for the future. If the benefits stack up, we should be open to it.

In terms of the Islandmagee new school build, there has been talk of a new school on Islandmagee going back too many years. Originally, three schools on the island agreed to amalgamate, and it was a very difficult process to get agreement between each of the three groups of parents and governors, but it was agreed. There was then difficulty in getting a suitable location. Eventually, after a long, arduous process, planning permission was agreed and land was purchased. Unfortunately, it has been sitting for a number of years, and large numbers of young people have been passing by what will be the front gates of that school, because, as yet, it has not been built.

5.00 pm

There is currently a consultation about possibly building a school for Islandmagee and the surrounding area. I can interpret the surrounding area only to mean Ballycarry. However, when you look at the village and ward of Ballycarry, some interesting facts emerge. In particular, as far as I can recall, the most recent Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA) statistics indicate that 47 newborns arrived in that ward a short number of years ago. They will be coming through and clearly producing a sustainable number of children for any school. Therefore, I concur with the views of the local community of Islandmagee and Ballycarry that there is a sustainable future for a school at Islandmagee and a continuing school at Ballycarry. I hope that funding will be made available for that, and not some time over the horizon but within this Budget period.

It was announced that Corran Integrated Primary School was on the newbuild programme but does not yet have planning permission. I hope that that will progress shortly so that the children who are being educated in mobile classrooms will have a permanent building, be educated in a modern setting and be able to take their opportunities in optimum conditions. I also hope that the poor traffic flow in that area can be addressed. That, to a degree, is a health and safety issue, and it also affects residents.

I am sure that many other issues in this Budget period will require improvements. However, I go back to the issue of insufficient discussions in Committees and in the Assembly on the detail of the Budget. I sometimes wonder what is the benefit of this discussion. I suggest that we need a different process to ensure better understanding and so that improvements can be made where needed.

Mr B McCrea: I wondered why the Member for Mid Ulster did not hang around to rebut the attack by David McIlveen but I now realise that it was because she knew that Mr Beggs was going to speak for some considerable time.

At least Jim Allister turned up, and I welcome him to the Chamber. He is temporarily not here but — oh — how nice of him to make an appearance. It is amazing how these things work. Perhaps somebody will tweet it. Obviously, I cannot do that because I am speaking.

I really do wonder why the UUP and even the Alliance Party are going to vote for this Bill because they have done nothing but go through list after list of things that are wrong, missing or should be done better. What does it take to get you to vote against something?

A brief review of Hansard, and listening to the debate for some time — I have been in the Chamber for a fair amount of it — will demonstrate to you that this process is a mess. What I hear and read is that people say, “We don’t know this and we don’t know that, but, you know what, we have no other option but to vote it through anyway.” Get the information and make a decision, or something else has to change.

I was taken by the brevity of the contributions yesterday, and I will try to act likewise today.

I went to the Business Office to see what discussions it was appropriate to have in this forum and was told that we could talk on some general economic points.

I guess that all of us here are familiar with but take no comfort in the financial trials of the Republic of Ireland, where economic activity has declined by some 11·5% from its peak. What perhaps is missed in this Chamber is that our performance in Northern Ireland is, arguably, even worse. We have suffered a decline from the peak of 11·9%, and that is significantly worse than the rest of the United Kingdom, at 6·2%. It is not just our businesses that have been affected. Ordinary citizens have been crushed by falling property prices, the increased cost of basic supplies, increased unemployment and all sorts of fears about welfare reform. That is an issue that, perhaps, this Budget ought to address. Property prices are now half of what they were at the peak of the market, and employment has fallen by 40,000, with a corresponding increase in claimants to 64,300. That represents an increase of 172%, which is much worse than the rest of the United Kingdom at 85%. You could be forgiven for thinking that things could hardly get worse, but I fear that they will. As a result of the poor performance of the UK economy, Westminster is seeking further savings from the welfare system, largely through below-inflation increases in benefits. Living standards in Northern Ireland, which are already substantially below those of the rest of the United Kingdom, will continue to fall in real terms and relative to the UK. In the previous decade, we were about 80%, measured by GDP, and we are now forecasting it to fall to 75%.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance and Personnel, with his usual combination of wit and charm, attempted to tell us that things were not so bad. I think that he even mentioned that some of the banks’ economists are suggesting that we have turned the corner. I had a look in Hansard at some of the things he said. He talked about the increase in employee jobs during 2012 and about claimants, and he actually said:

“The latest Bank of England forecasts paint a relatively optimistic and positive scenario for the UK”. — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p8, col 2].

I am rather surprised by that, because I have here the annual report from the economic advisory group, which advises the Executive. The Office for Budgetary Responsibility estimates that the UK economy will grow by 0·6% in 2013, the year in which this Bill applies, and 1·8% in 2014. That is down from earlier forecasts of 1·2%. So it is halved this year, and it is lower in the following year. I am, therefore, surprised that there is that optimism from the Minister of Finance and Personnel, and the Bill ought to address those issues.

It is true that the claimant figure has fallen over the past three months, but I wonder — perhaps the Minister will shed some light on this; he referred to it in earlier statements — if that represents a real improvement in the economy or a statistical response to the £200 million economy and jobs initiative announced earlier in the year. That funding focused on providing training, skills and education to those out of work. That is absolutely the right thing to do, but will people on such schemes reduce the claimant count only for the duration of the scheme? When the money runs out, will they return to the claimant count? Are there real jobs for them to go to? Whilst long-term economic development is of strategic importance, it seems to me that the most pressing need for the Executive is to create jobs. I have said repeatedly and will say again that we are not doing enough to tackle unemployment, particularly youth unemployment. The chair of the economic advisory group has stated in the report, in very politically correct language, that the flags protest presented “a clear reminder” to politicians of the need:

“to deliver an improved economic environment which can allow all members of society to become invested in the future of the region.”

That is spelling it out that we need to do more to create jobs or we face civil unrest and further problems.

In its annual report, the EAG stated that it is unclear as to how the Executive have reprioritised their spending decisions in light of the more constrained economic climate and the increased emphasis on the economy. That is the Government’s economic advisory group telling the Executive that it does not see where they have addressed the issues that face the economy. If it does not see that and we do not have the information, it behoves the Minister of Finance and Personnel to explain what he is doing in the Budget to address the issues that his and the Executive’s advisers bring up. Furthermore, the EAG calls on the Executive to seek further ways to divert additional resources towards priority areas that support the delivery of their economic vision. We have not seen any such action. I would like the Minister to identify where it is.

I concur with the sentiments of the EAG in its very rational analysis. However, if I were to table an amendment to the Bill to address those issues, I would be asked, “Where is the money coming from? Which Department will you take the money from to increase spending on youth unemployment or unemployment itself?”. A reading of yesterday’s Hansard and listening to the debate on this Bill will demonstrate that every Department is under severe pressure. In fact, I heard Mr Beggs go through a litany of issues that have not been addressed in the Bill or in the figures. We have a real issue. Given the priority that the Executive have given to the economy, which is well stated, the announcement of the Building a United Community initiative and the encouragement — to use its word — of the economic advisory group, I have come to the conclusion that the Executive must be relying on substantial additional money to be provided from as yet undetermined external sources.

Yesterday, the Minister stated:

"Over the coming months, there will be a number of critical public expenditure issues to be addressed with Treasury Ministers that will have a strategic impact on Northern Ireland." — [Official Report, This Bound Volume, p8, col 2].

What are those strategic initiatives? What are those decisions? Is there an implicit understanding that substantial additional funds — perhaps as much as Mr Bell's £0.5 billion — will be provided by the UK Government? Can the Minister tell us whether that is the case? Further analysis of the figures appears to be redundant if additional sums not included in the Estimates or the Bill are to be found elsewhere. That is what everybody has been saying: there is a hole in the Budget. There is a commitment to do various activities, yet there does not appear to be the resources to deal with them.

The aim to reduce the number of NEETs by 10,000 would have a significant impact on the claimant level, but is it sustainable? That is the real issue. Can we actually tackle youth unemployment and unemployment in general? Do we have the resources? Do we have the will? In fact, when I read the EAG's annual report, what it said was that it depends on whether there is ministerial ownership of the targets and whether Departments work together to actually tackle the issues. I cannot tell from the information put before me, and I ask the Minister directly to explain those issues.

I would like to put other issues connected with DETI and finance to the Minister of Finance and Personnel. The economic advisory group informs us that the biggest challenge facing the development of the economy appears to be access to finance. Twenty-five per cent of the people who were surveyed said that that was the number one problem. I am interested to see whether the Bill will address these issues.

5.15 pm

It is interesting that the second item that it wants to deal with is government red tape. I see no provision for dealing with red tape, the red tape that is throttling our businesses. The economic advisory group outlines a particular concern that UK national initiatives are not working effectively in Northern Ireland. In particular, few Northern Ireland banks have access to the funding for lending scheme. Only the Ulster Bank, as I understand it, is making use of it through RBS; the other banks are not making use of it for various reasons or are delayed in accessing it. How is that tackling the lack of economic growth, which the Bill should be dealing with?

There is also little awareness of the enterprise finance guarantee scheme and the Better Business Finance initiatives. What schemes will the Minister of Finance and Personnel bring forward that are appropriate to Northern Ireland? He says that he is dealing with these issues, but I do not see them addressed in the Estimates or the Bill.

Many of the underlying problems with access to finance in Northern Ireland revolve around the fact that there is a high level of property debt in what might otherwise be sound trading businesses. Perhaps the Minister will tell us how the Executive plan to deal with that issue. Those businesses as sound, can invest if given the money and can move forward. I talked today to WhiteRock Capital Partners about how we get the loan guarantee scheme or whatever, but is £10 million out of a £50 million pot over five years sufficient? We need to do more.

I hear that there are proposals to establish a new business bank geared specifically towards lending to small business in the United Kingdom. Where is our part to play in that? Where is our bank that will lend to our small and medium-sized enterprises, which are the bedrock of our society and our enterprise? What will the Bill do to address those issues?

The EAG goes on to say:

"There is also evidence of an under supply of equity finance".

That is particularly the case for new, high-growth start-up companies. That is an issue that we ought to address if we are serious about creating employment.

Finally, in his submission yesterday, the Minister rather casually said that he was looking for a "c"; there was some "c" missing. The "c" was for "competitive" — the Northern Ireland competitive index. Amongst other things, it reveals that, in a ranking from one to 142, the United Kingdom was eighth, Ireland had fallen to twenty-seventh and Northern Ireland was forty-second. So, when the Minister actually has a look at the competitive index for Northern Ireland, which his advisers brought together, can he tell me whether he thinks that it is appropriate and, if so, whether we are making progress?

The challenge for the Assembly, led by the Minister of Finance and Personnel, is to understand that there is really serious hurt in our society, people feel desperate, households are under pressure and there is concern about jobs and welfare. There are all sorts of pressures on every Department, but we do not have a coherent response to that. No matter how the Finance Minister dresses this up with his wisecracks and his little "Oh, it is OK; I will go and do this", it does not take away from the fact that our economy is lagging behind the recovery in the rest of the United Kingdom. It was first into recession, and it will be last out of recession. We are not doing a good enough job, and the Bill does not address the issues.

I cannot form an opinion on the Bill because, like everybody else in the Chamber, I do not have sufficient information. This is a sham; it is going through the process of pretending that we will deal with the issues when we will not. So, I put this challenge to the Minister of Finance and Personnel, who normally does not bother to respond to me because he thinks that the way to go and do —

Mr Wilson: Because you are a fool.

Mr B McCrea: He thinks that the way to go and do politics —

Mr Wilson: Why? Because you are a fool.

Mr B McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, I am absolutely happy to take an intervention.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Member will resume his seat. I remind Members — that includes Ministers — that they should not shout across the Chamber. Continue, Mr McCrea.

Mr Wilson: He wanted me to respond to him.

Mr B McCrea: Sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker; I thought that the Minister was still in full flow there. I could have sworn for one minute that he wanted to carry on with his discussion about being a fool. We will see who is a fool.

This is mid-term for this Executive and Assembly, but there are challenges out there about who is doing what for the people of Northern Ireland. No amount of smoke and mirrors, no amount of bluster will turn this around if you cannot create jobs. Our unemployment is not responding to the things that we need it to respond to. It is your responsibility; you need to do something about it; and the Executive need to come together as one and tell us how they will address the problems facing the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Jim Allister. I remind Members to make all remarks through the Chair, please. If a Member wishes to intervene, they can ask the Member to give way.

Mr Allister: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am sure that I will struggle with the task, but it seems, after the last few minutes, that I might have to bring some decorum and level-headedness to the debate.

Mr Wilson: As you always do.

Mr Allister: As I always do. I will struggle to do the best I can in that regard.

I have to say that I think that Mr McCrea makes some valid points. He makes a valid point about the predictability of this entire process. By its nature, a Budget will have large elements that are entirely predictable, but, in truth, you could probably take the Budget of last year, tweak a few figures, take the speeches of last year and substitute them for today's — some might say that you would be able to do the same with mine, and maybe that is so — and, really, it would be hard to spot the difference. That is because the predictability around this process lies in the fact that we do not have, in this House, the mechanisms or the personnel motivated to challenge because of the consequence that all but a handful have the same vested interests of being in the Government to whom this Budget belongs.

The point has been made, correctly, that there are some in this debate who seek to ride two horses. There are some in the debate who seek to make valiant, even vigorous, criticisms, of this Budget, and yet it is their Budget because it is the Budget of the Government of which they are a part. Of course, if we did come to a Division, they would be among the first to troop loyally through the Ayes Lobby, setting in a particular context the validity, the sincerity and the strength of the criticisms that they make. Yes, those criticisms might read well in the local paper; they might touch a few buttons with people who think, "Yes, it is right to be exercised about that"; but put it to the test in this House, and you will find that the very people who make those criticisms will do nothing to implement them. They will be among those sustaining and retaining this Budget and this Government whose Budget it is. Those points made by Mr McCrea are particularly and properly made, and I join in endorsing them.

As to the predictability, the lines of this Budget are almost at one, year on year, apart from some tweaks of the figures. Some of the figures are for quite staggering amounts. A point that always occurs to me — I have made it before, and I will make it again — is this: where does all this money come from? It comes from taxpayers. It comes from British taxpayers. It comes from people in this Province, but not just in this Province. It comes from people in other parts of the United Kingdom. One of the benefits of being a part of the United Kingdom is that we can draw down funding of the scale and nature — to the tune of more than £16.5 billion — that is manifested in the Budget. What would the figures be if those in the House who live in a fantasy world and aspire to a united Ireland had their way? What figures would there be for health, education, roads or anything, if that were the source of the finance? Happily, it is not; it is that solid reliable source that is the Union between Northern Ireland and Great Britain. Long may it continue.

I referred to predictability. Maybe it is a reflection of what a sad individual I am, but, when I read the fine print of schedules 1 and 2 relating to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister — I cannot explain why my eye is always drawn to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister — I was a little surprised to see that one of the groups that we are going to fund with the £48 million is the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund. Unless I am badly mistaken, the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund went out of existence at the end of the last financial year. Yet, we have a line in the Budget to support the Victims and Survivors Service and the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund. No doubt, there is a good explanation, but it escaped me in my reading of it.

I am less than impressed by the Victims and Survivors Service thus far in its allocation of funding. Over the coming weeks, it will become clear that there will be considerable disquiet over the comparative levels of funding allocated to innocent victims' groups and non-innocent victims' groups by the Victims and Survivors Service. Some of the letters of offer have been very generous to groups that, in my definition, are not victims' groups at all because they involve the victim makers and perpetrators. That is in contrast to the refusals of funding to genuine victims' groups. The Victims and Survivors Service is not covering itself in glory in that regard.

I was also disappointed today to receive an answer that indicates that there is an imbalance in the staff of the service. Of the 32 staff employed in the Victims and Survivors Service, 16 — 50% — come from the Catholic community, and only 11 come from the Protestant community, which is one third. Why should that be? I was also disappointed that answers received today from OFMDFM state that it is unable to give community background figures for the staff of the groups that it funds. We lavish huge amounts of money on the Pat Finucane Centre, Relatives for Justice and an endless list of groups such as those, and yet OFMDFM does not know and looks like it does not care what the community background is of the holders of posts that it funds. Why should that be? We live in a community in which there is supposed to be accountability for all those issues, but that seems not to be the case in that most sensitive area that pertains to what is called the Victims and Survivors Service. That is a matter of concern.

5.30 pm

Before I leave OFMDFM, let me say that I am, of course, not surprised but disappointed again to see the lavish funding for the Maze/Long Kesh project. If ever there was a waste of £18 million of European money — our money, I might say, that has been recycled and returned to us — it is the funding on that project. It is going to blight that valuable site. It is going to blight it, because the truth, as was conceded last Friday when a group was taken around the Maze site by the First Minister and one Mr Jeffrey Donaldson, is that the price of getting anything on the 360 acres was to agree to the peace and reconciliation centre. That made the point that, as ever, the Sinn Féin veto drives that and many other agendas. That is why that project, if it is needed at all, has been placed not on a neutral site where it would be untarnished but on the most divisive site that you can find, which is at the Maze. The price of getting Balmoral Park and a food park and all the benefits that could flow from that was to agree to a peace and reconciliation centre. That, of course, underscores the tawdry nature of government in this part of the United Kingdom. If ever there was a waste of £18 million of European money, that is it.

In that context, it is interesting that the First Minister is reported to have told a 'Financial Times' journalist today that, although he is Eurosceptic — wait for it — he does not want the United Kingdom to leave the EU. Maybe that is not a surprise. It is a bit like saying that you are against the Belfast agreement but want to keep on operating it. Where have we seen that before? I have to say that, if one is Eurosceptic and does not want to tie oneself to the totally suffocating pressures and bureaucracy of the European Union, I am surprised at the reporting of such a comment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member will resume his seat. I encourage the Member to return to the Bill.

Mr Allister: If I must, but this was much more interesting, Mr Deputy Speaker. [Laughter.] Let me return to health. Of course, writ large through the Budget is the funding of what is grandly called Transforming Your Care. Maybe it would be more aptly called "Transferring Your Care". That seems to be the ethos of much of it. I think, in particular, of the care home saga that emerged in recent weeks and months. It is quite clear that the purpose of this Minister of Health and the Department under his guidance is to disengage the health service from care home provision. I think that that is wrong.

If we value the health service, and I hope that we all do, I believe that a portion of care home provision needs to be retained in that service. Otherwise, we invite the near calamity that occurred in GB when Southern Cross collapsed and 750 homes were under immediate threat and there was all sorts of scurrying around to find a solution to keep the roof over the heads of those who lived in those homes. To go down an exclusively privatised route for care homes is a retrograde step. Yes, there is a place for private care for those who wish to avail themselves of it. However, for the private sector to monopolise care homes is wrong. It will drive up prices and drive down standards, and the health service must retain care home provision.

I note, again from some answers received, that it has quite clearly been a stratagem to squeeze those homes out. That is why one such home — Pinewood in Ballymena — has not had a single admission of a full-time resident in five years. Yes, it takes people in for respite and intermediate care, and, as an aside, should state care homes close, I see no provision for where the respite and intermediate beds will be provided. State homes are being run down to the point at which there is a handful of people in them, and Ministers will then step forward and say, "What can we do about it? They are not viable. They have to close." It is a stratagem of closure; closure by stealth is what we are seeing.

Not so long ago, when the previous Health Minister was apparently going down that road, there was uproar from the Benches of the Minister who is now going down the same road. There were public meetings — including one in Larne in the Finance Minister's constituency — where people gathered to protest the threat to a particular care home there. There was another such public meeting just recently because of the same threat, this time from the Health Minister. Not a single DUP representative came to express any concern at that meeting, because the policy has now been somersaulted on. What was a good stick with which to beat Mr McGimpsey is now a crutch to get them to the same point.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to remind the Member that he is once again focusing on a particular constituency issue, and the guidance is not to do that but to focus on the Bill. Continue.

Mr Allister: I would have thought that the issue of care homes is something that affects all constituencies, and, in the same breath, I think that I referred to one in north Antrim and one in east Antrim. However, I take your guidance.

Mr McIlveen seemed to take exception to some comments from another Member about the job provision figures. For years, we have had this sales pitch about the number of jobs promoted, which is very interesting and always far more impressive but not as informative as the number of jobs actually created. That is the real test. It is not about how many jobs you are promised by some inward investor to whom you promised millions in return. It is about how many jobs are created — not just how many are created but how many last. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) and Invest NI indicate that they are taking some steps towards revealing those sorts of figures. That is exactly the sort of information required to judge whether the inward investment programme is working. Otherwise, we can but judge it against the fact that, for all the announcements, unemployment is still rising.

We are still in the position of being one of the worst parts of the United Kingdom when it comes to unemployment levels. We are still in the position of being one of the worst parts of the United Kingdom when it comes to economic inactivity. Those statistics burden this Budget greatly with the amount that, in consequence, must go on benefits and is therefore not available for any other sort of spend.

I do not intend to speak much longer. I am sure that is good for all concerned, although I did notice, about an hour ago, that the Minister was looking very jaded with the debate. I hope that the last couple of interventions have at least got his attention. I suspect that they also got his wrath, and we will know that shortly. Why delay the moment any more?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Mrs Dolores Kelly. [Interruption.]

Mrs D Kelly: Leave the best wine until last, perhaps.

I am sure that the Finance Minister will share my concerns, and those of all Members of the House, about the financial probity and scandals that have emerged in recent days; for example, in the Housing Executive and, indeed, in the north-west waste facility, where organised crime has moved into the waste disposal industry in a big way. We recognise that there are only 14 environmental crime officers in the Department of the Environment (DOE). In relation to the Bill and the previous reduction of resources in the Audit Office, will the Minister reconsider those reductions in light of the two scandals in recent days and build public confidence that we are shining a light into some very dark places and very dark practices?

On that matter, I want to be disassociated from the comments of Mr Allister on the amount spent on some victims' and survivors' groups. I want to pay tribute in particular to the Pat Finucane Centre and Relatives for Justice, which require that funding in order to stand up against the forces of the British establishment and the worst practices of the past so that we can begin to learn some of the truth of what happened.

As regards victims and survivors, and the amount of funding; is the Minister convinced that the way in which funding has been delivered is meeting the real needs of victims? I am very aware of the identified needs, and assessment has been made by the victims' commission and others. However, in my constituency, access to housing is one example. Having the surety of social housing to the end of their days is all that some victims actually want. They do not want to have to worry about where they are going to live. They want to live out the rest of their lives in confidence and with some degree of security. Is there any scope in how resources are allocated and in the criteria set? Can any of this be within the guidance of the Finance Minister?

Further, does the Finance Minister share my concerns about the non-delivery of the social investment fund? I understand that it has now moved across into Delivering Social Change. A recent question that I tabled revealed that almost £250,000 was spent on management fees but none on project delivery. Is the Minister confident that the business cases presented will stand up to scrutiny? Has he any concerns about what some call the 20% surcharge — or, as others call it, a management fee — that is given out, it would appear, to some favoured groups to deliver the projects, but not necessarily to those who came forward with the ideas?

I have to answer Mr Allister in relation to North/South bodies. I think we all know that they can deliver value for money if given the opportunities to do so. Indeed, there are economies of scale that can be delivered across the island of Ireland. The paediatric children's services are a case in point. That is a pragmatic example of where we can deliver best for people who need an urgent service at some of the worst and most distressful times of their lives.

There has been quite a lot of debate this afternoon. I do not want to add an awful lot more, except to ask the Finance Minister: in relation to the £600 million that is predicted to be taken out of the Northern Ireland economy via the welfare reforms, how does the Budget Bill address those very real concerns and experiences of ordinary citizens?

5.45 pm

The Westminster Government recently made it possible for people to pay their rates over 12 months, rather than the 10-month period that applies in Northern Ireland. Does the Minister of Finance and Personnel have any plans to introduce a system whereby people can pay by direct debit over 12 months to spread the cost a bit more?

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

I thank Members for their contributions to the debate. In particular, since he asked for some acknowledgement, I thank Mr Allister, as well as Mr McCrea, for waking me from the doze into which I had been induced during the grand tour of every school, nursing home and pothole in east Antrim when Roy Beggs was speaking. That will be the last thing that I will appreciate hearing from them, but I appreciate that they woke me and got me interested in the debate again. I hope that I will be able to respond to them later on.

I will very quickly go through some of the points that Members made. I note that many of those who made contributions are, of course, no longer present in the Chamber; I may respond to their comments or I may not, depending on how we get on.

The Chairman of the Committee raised a number of points and talked about the importance of Committee scrutiny, as did a lot of other Members who talked about the passage of this Bill. Mr McCrea was very critical and said that the process was a sham because Members could not have any scrutiny of the Bill. Of course, if he was sitting watching the TV and tweeting on Twitter, as he was yesterday, he would not have had the opportunity to read through the documents and apprise himself of the details.

After the information goes to the Committee for Finance and Personnel, it is available from the Business Office for all Members. However, from the point of view of individual Committees, departmental Estimates should be available for their prior knowledge before the information goes to the Committee for Finance and Personnel. After that, it is available in its full form for all Members of the Assembly. I have no difficulty with scrutiny of the Budget. In fact, I think that that is essential, not only when the Budget is presented, but on an ongoing basis.

I will let the Member get in front of the TV cameras here. [Laughter.]

Mr Bell: Do you want me to speak for you? [Laughter.]

Mr Wilson: It is important that we not only have proper scrutiny of the Budget when it is presented but of ongoing savings delivery plans, etc, and Committees should look at bids that are made during the year.

Mr McKay also raised the issue of the memorandum of understanding on the Budget process. That is important, but we have to be careful that it does not restrict the Executive's timescale for the delivery of the Budget.

A number of Members talked about Transforming Your Care, the delivery of services and the closure of statutory residential homes. There is a misunderstanding. The whole idea of Transforming Your Care and addressing what will happen to residential homes was, first, to try to ensure that we had an arrangement in place — the Health Minister has emphasised this time and time again — that allowed people to stay in their homes as long as they could. That is, of course the aim and object of most families for their loved ones. It is the aim and objective of most people. I have yet to find a resident, a constituent or anyone in my family who actually wants to get into a nursing home.

People want to stay in the environment in which they are most comfortable. If we are to aim for that, there are consequences for the way in which care is delivered. That means greater resources must be made available to keep people at home and support them there. If that is the case, you need fewer residential places, but they should be of the highest possible standard. Many residential homes are old and require substantial capital investment. In today's debate, a number of Members from all parties — well, from most parties, anyway — have talked about how we could find additional resources. One way is through private sector provision, which makes sense if the strategy is to keep people at home for as long as possible and make sure that, if they need to go into residential care, it is of the best possible standard. So we need to make capital improvements to the existing care. If the private sector is prepared to provide that, it releases some of the burden on budgets so that money can be released to do other things. To me, that is a reasonable way forward. If Members actually thought about it and the public were properly informed, it could be regarded as a way forward.

Mr McKay also raised the issue of rural fire stations, and I understand that the Health Minister is looking at that, but projects will be dependent on the budget available to him. Mr McKay also raised the very important issue of public sector pensions. It is essential that we take the legislation forward. Fortunately, a paper was agreed by the Executive last week, which should allow the legislative process to start. We have to have the provision in place by 2015, which means that we need Royal Assent for the Bill by April 2014 to get the regulations through. Again, huge penalties will be imposed on the Assembly if we do not get the legislation through in time.

A number of Members raised the issue of the A26, which I dealt with yesterday when Mr Allister raised it. There is money from the A5 that has to be spent this year. The A26 scheme lies well beyond the 2013-14 financial year, and, therefore, any funding for that will be dependent on what the Executive decide on capital funding as a whole, the priorities that the Minister for Regional Development sets and the funding available in the next couple of financial years.

Mr Weir raised the issue of the £18 billion capital commitment. As a result of additional capital allocations made over the Budget period, the assurances that we have on the increased capital moneys that will be available after the current Budget period, and the fact that the Government will put more emphasis on capital spending, it looks more likely that we will achieve the £18 billion spend over the 2005-2017 period. Of course, there is still some uncertainty, but some of the gap has been closed.

Mr Weir also raised the issue of business rate support. I will come to this later, but Mr McCrea asked a lot of questions, without giving very many answers, about where in the Budget was the provision to support the economy. Here is one area in which the Executive have supported businesses across Northern Ireland at a time of recession and in a way and to a degree that has not happened in any other part of the United Kingdom. We have frozen local taxation for businesses. We have reduced rates for 50% of businesses by 20%. We have given new businesses an incentive to open in empty premises by giving them a rates reduction of 50%. Those are the kinds of measures that we have taken to support local businesses in the Budget. That means that we forgo the revenue that would have come from those businesses, and we are talking about tens of millions of pounds' worth of revenue being left in the pockets of businesses to help them reduce their overheads at a time of economic recession. That has been welcomed by a whole range of business organisations across Northern Ireland. That is only one example, and I will come to other examples as I go through the response to the speeches that people have made.

Mr Weir asked about the fiscal position. Sinn Féin Members do not like to hear this, and Mr Allister reminded them of it in his speech, but the value of being a member of the United Kingdom is that, of the £18 billion that we have in the Budget, £10.5 billion comes from the Exchequer and is over and above the revenue raised in Northern Ireland. That is the value of being part of the United Kingdom. As a unionist and as someone who takes a realistic view of the importance of having measures to deal with economic problems in Northern Ireland, it is worth emphasising that point time and time again. I was glad that Mr Weir raised that issue.

Mr Bradley talked about the childcare strategy. The consultation that started on that in December 2013 has finished, the principles have been established, and I have been informed that an announcement by the OFMDFM Ministers is expected shortly. So, I cannot make any comment on the detail of that.

He also came back to the issue of revenue raising. He keeps repeating that there is £1.6 billion of additional money to be raised. That was not a commitment made by the Executive, and it was not a figure that was given by me. It was a figure that I admit was thrown out by the Member for South Down Catriona Ruane. If he wants to ask about the £1.6 billion, let him get an explanation from her. The figures that we have given —

Mr D Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will let you intervene in a minute.

I stated, and the Budget documents state, that, over the four years, £900 million would be raised in additional revenue. We have exceeded the target that we set for ourselves in the first two years. We set a target because some of those revenue streams would have taken some time to generate, but we have exceeded it and have raised £422 million. The Member is quite right that that leaves us with £478 million — at least his maths was correct — to raise, and that can be raised in the remaining Budget period.

Mr D Bradley: I thank the Minister for giving way. There was a figure of £1.6 billion mentioned at the beginning. When I questioned the Minister about that, he said that he had identified £862 million that he thought could be realised and that he was not including any proposals in the Budget that were not realistic. I was asking him about the £862 million. He explained to me yesterday that around £400 million of that had been realised, so I am asking him whether we are on course to realise the rest of the figure.

Mr Wilson: As much as anyone can look into the future and say what will happen, yes, we are. We are ahead of the game at the moment, and the fact that we have exceeded our targets in the first two years gives me some confidence that the £900 million can be achieved. The veracity of the answer that I have given to that question will be better understood in two years' time when we see the performance. However, the performance to date has been encouraging in that, even at a time when we have been in economic difficulties, we have raised more revenue than we expected during the first two years of the Budget.

He also raised, as did Mrs Overend, the issue of the £18 million that DETI was not able to draw down as EU funding, and he said that we will have to look for different ways of raising that. I gave an answer to that yesterday, and I cannot give any further information on it. We are looking at ways in which that money could be spent on alternative projects, and I hope that we will be in a position to update the Assembly in the June monitoring round. I cannot say what will be in the June monitoring round, but I am hopeful that we can make some announcements on that in the June monitoring round in a couple of weeks.

Mrs Overend raised a number of issues. She talked about the economic difficulties that we are in and the recession and said that the Budget is not strong enough to reverse that trend. I say to her and to Mr McCrea, who was at the same nonsense in his speech, that we are a regional economy and we are dealing with a global recession and worldwide banking crisis. I do not think that I, as Finance Minister, have ever claimed, nor would I ever be silly enough to claim, that, even though our Budget involves £18 billion of spend, it will ever be sufficient to reverse all the weight of the global economic pressures on an economy such as ours, especially an open economy that is, therefore, very susceptible to the fortunes of other parts of the world. Arlene Foster is making strident attempts to change the focus, but our economy is very dependent on trade with Europe, the Irish Republic and all those economies that have been particularly badly hit by the euro zone crisis, the banking crisis —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way in a minute or two.

No one will pretend that this Budget is capable of reversing the trend. In the Budget, we have tried to look at how some spending and some redirection of spending can make a difference. I have given one example, and I will give more examples during this speech of what we have done with business rates and how many businesses have said that that has enabled them to start up in empty premises or enabled them to keep on going. I will give way.

Mr B McCrea: I appreciate the Minister giving way. He made the point that Northern Ireland is a small regional economy that is buffeted by the winds of the global economy. The Northern Ireland competitive index, which takes into account the issue that the Minister talked about yesterday, tries to address those issues. It puts us at forty-second, behind the United Kingdom at eighth and Ireland at twenty-seventh. Do you think that that is a good index and the right way for us to judge our competitiveness for the future, bearing in mind that that is advice from the Economic Advisory Group?

Mr Wilson: I do not have the detail of which index he is talking about. The index that he mentioned contains many different measures of how Northern Ireland compares with other regional economies in the world. Of course, we perform very highly in some areas and lower in others. All I can say to him is that we have sought to address many of the issues that businesses have brought to us. I have already mentioned one of those, and I will come on to some of the other points that he made in his speech later.

Mrs Overend also raised the issue of the £18 million for the Titanic signature project, and I think that I have given an answer on that. I was a bit unclear about where she was on the case of alternative finance. It was unfortunate that she took an intervention from her colleague Mr Beggs because, on one hand, we were being encouraged, as other Members have encouraged us, to look at alternative financing, at alternative models and at how we can get the private sector involved. On the other hand, of course, as soon as we try to get the private sector involved, we are criticised for it.

Mr Beggs: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way in a moment or two. Let me just deal with the issue of private funding. Of course, the Health Minister has taken the decision to pilot two projects, in Newry and in Lisburn, using private finance. The issue of value for money is marginal on those and is why he has had to give a direction on the issue. I have supported him on giving that direction, because, unless we are prepared to look at some pilots and see how they work out, we will not know whether that is a particular way forward.

This is where I find the intervention from the Member for East Antrim most surprising. He has been campaigning for similar centres in Carrickfergus and Larne, and he knows full well that, if we are going to have to rely on traditional capital funding for those, the money will not be available for some time and we will have to look for money. Indeed, even some of the health professionals in the area have said that we should look at other ways of doing this. So, he cannot criticise the Health Minister for taking forward pilots that might actually benefit his constituency, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, say that he wants to have some of this in his constituency. It is one of these cases of wanting to have your cake and eat it. On the one hand, you advocate private finance and, on the other hand, as soon as you start going down that road, you try to find every hole in the argument to oppose it. I will give way to the Member, because I hope to get an explanation from him.

Mr Beggs: If the Minister were to look very carefully at what I said, he would know that I was arguing that there should be a clear business case and that it should be a transparent process. Will he not accept that one of the difficulties in this process is that there has been no business case? In fact, the Health Committee was told that no business case is available to date. So, if there is such a marginal issue, why has there not been transparency about it?

The other aspect that I would have thought could well affect the business case is that I am told that many of the GPs in Newry own their own property at present. Why, if there needs to be a pilot, is it not in somewhere such as Carrickfergus, where there is a publicly-owned health centre that is 1960s-based and is operating at perhaps two or three times the capacity it should be operating at and where, I would have thought, the business case would stand up?

Mr Wilson: Let us have this decision made. It really does not matter whether it stacks up or does not stack up. Provided it does not stack up in Carrickfergus, it is better than it not stacking up in Lisburn or Newry. This seems to be the argument that the Member is making.

The process has been clearly transparent. The Minister has made it quite clear that these are decisions that, strictly on value-for-money terms, would not go forward. That is why he has given a direction. The process is transparent enough there. The Minister has taken a risk, and he has done so because he wants to establish whether, once we see these things in operation, this is a model that could be used for the other health centres that he wants to spread across Northern Ireland. Of course, that would then help to deal with some of the issues that the Member raised about waiting time, etc, because the quicker that you can do a lot of the primary care and other small medical procedures in these health centres, the less pressure you put on traditional accident and emergency centres in hospitals.

That was the thinking behind it, and I think that it is worth highlighting the Ulster Unionist Party's confusion on alternative finance.

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Since the Member raised the issue, I will give way.

Mrs Overend: Thank you, Minister. Let me clarify: I asked what ongoing active engagement there is with investors about alternative finance to bring inward investment and suchlike to Northern Ireland and whether he could give any examples.

Mr Wilson: A number of PFI schemes have been used in Northern Ireland. Unfortunately, in the current climate, the options for private finance are extremely limited, which I have said time and again in the Assembly. Many of those who wish to engage in private finance can do so only if they can raise money at very high interest rates, so the charges to us are much higher than you would expect. In some cases, when the scheme is seen by the Treasury as simply bringing money from the private sector in the form of direct loans to the Government, we lose that from the block grant, which is not to our advantage. Why would we take money out of the block grant, which we get for nothing, and replace it with private finance on which we have to pay interest? Those are some of the issues.

When money can be had for a scheme, it is sometimes very expensive. When loans are offered for capital schemes, the Treasury deems that that will score against the block grant, and we finish up paying interest and lose the capital that we would normally get from central government. That has made it very difficult to identify huge sources of private finance. The method that Edwin Poots used for the Newry and Lisburn health centres has been one way to experiment with private sources of finance to see if that might be a way to roll in some extra money in the future.

At least Mr Lunn told us at the very start that he was going to be negative, and I have to say that he lived up to his promise. Mr O'Loan, who used to epitomise negativity in the Assembly, is long gone. He was a master of negativity. However, Mr Lunn even exceeded Mr O'Loan's speeches. When he ran out of current things to be negative about, he started to delve into history. We went back to the Bangor railway and to Balmoral High School. The Balmoral High School issue was about 15 years ago, before the Assembly was even set up. He delved right back in to find examples, in his view, of public finance being used in a way in which it should not have been used.

Mr Lunn did raise a number of issues that I want to deal with. He talked about the RPA. What is happening with the RPA? Why the delay? Actually, there is no delay: we will have elections next year. The Executive have already tried to help the process along with additional funding of £47.8 million, some of which will go towards transition costs, which should encourage councils to get on with the work that they have to do before next year's elections. There is £30 million for rates convergence. We found that additional money, even at a time when there were pressures on the Budget. That is how seriously the RPA is being taken, and we are on track to achieve the objectives and the timescale that we set out.

Mr Lunn mentioned the building of a united community and the First Minister and deputy First Minister's proposals that were published in May. That was debated quite a lot yesterday. It is a high-level strategic document, and as happens with most proposals of that type, detailed work is now being done. The detailed costings are being worked out, and, if there are financial implications for this year, they will have to be dealt with either in monitoring rounds or by some other sources of finance being made available. When the Government were talking about the economic pact, we know that they linked some of what they were likely to do with what is done to promote the shared future. I am sure that they have that in mind as well, and, in their discussions with the Prime Minister, I am sure that they will draw attention to that issue.

He also raised the issue of the £18 million for the Housing Executive, as did Mrs Kelly, and he wanted to know what percentage of that was of the total budget. Given that the total maintenance budget over the period of the contract was £172 million, it represents about £10 million of that total budget. Of course, that has nothing to do with the fact that money has not been allocated to the Northern Ireland Audit Office, as Mrs Kelly suggested. In this year's Budget, the full amount of money that the Audit Office bid for has been allocated. Mr Kinahan accepted that yesterday. The Audit Office underspent its budget by 10% in the four previous years.

If Mrs Kelly is looking for some way to point her finger or someone to point her finger at, maybe she should bear in mind that the contracts that we are talking about started when a Member of her party was the Minister for Social Development. It then appears that the problem with waste disposal and the fraud occurred during the time when he was the Minister for the Environment. So if she is looking for somebody to ask questions of on this issue and on the allocation of finance to the Audit Office, she should maybe not ask me but have a conversation with her own party colleague.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will certainly.

Mrs D Kelly: The Minister has been entirely disingenuous in his last comments. The Minister is very well aware that my party colleagues initiated investigations that uncovered the fraud. Indeed, when I spoke about resourcing the Audit Office, I was talking about the scale of those types of scandals. Can the Minister assure the House that there are sufficient resources to allow scrutiny across all Departments and arm's-length bodies? Minister, I think that you were entirely wrong and mischievous in the extreme in your last comments.

Mr Wilson: I have never been called “mischievous” in the House before. I am sure that the Member knows that. I was simply making an observation that, if there are issues with waste fraud and maintenance overspends, the buck maybe rests with the Minister who was responsible when the contracts were signed or when the fraud occurred. Indeed, I would point out that one of the contracts that was signed over by her party colleague who was the Minister for Social Development at that time was to one of the firms that was named in the report yesterday. All I am saying is that, if questions are to be asked on this, make sure that they are asked of the right individual. As far as I am concerned, the Northern Ireland Audit Office has been allocated the funding that was required and that it asked for. It has underspent its funding in previous years.

Mr Spratt raised the issue of A5 funding. The Minister for Regional Development tabled a number of bids in the June monitoring round for projects. How the A5 money is allocated is not entirely up to me; it is up to the Executive as well. He also raised the issue of roads maintenance. If you look at the record of roads maintenance, you will see that we have spent record amounts on roads maintenance — £109 million in 2012-13 and £120 million in 2011-12.

He also raised the issue of the Translink deficit. PEDU is looking Translink, and it will carry out a further efficiency review. Once that review is completed, I hope that significant savings will be identified in Translink.

Mr Storey spoke about the maintenance backlog in schools. Some £37 million was committed to maintenance in the Budget in this financial year, and additional moneys are allocated when available to deal with the maintenance backlog. In fact, it is significant that part of last year's monitoring process led to an extra £10 million being made available for that. He also raised the issues of savings delivery plans and efficiency delivery plans. I have encouraged Ministers and Departments to co-operate with the presentation of the delivery plans and their scrutiny.

The changes to school funding were announced by the Minister today. Many Members have some concern about the small schools element, although I understand that the Minister has rejected that part of the proposals and will be bringing forward detailed proposals for consultation over the next number of weeks.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for giving way. Mr Storey and I had an exchange of views about the ESA Bill, which is one of the long-delayed matters that I referred to in my speech, but the Minister has not responded on that point. Does he have any views about the delay with ESA and the financial implications of that?

Mr Wilson: As far as the financial implications of ESA are concerned, there were to be administrative savings as a result of having one education body to deal with schools rather than five education and library boards plus all the other bodies. Not only the financial implications but the powers of ESA and the structure of and safeguards for particular schools are important. I am not past the detail of the Bill, but I understand that the Committee made certain recommendations, which hopefully the Minister will have responded to. The reason that the Bill has not come back to the Assembly is that he knows that there is still strong opposition to issues, and those issues have not been resolved.

I am keen to see the administrative savings, but I understand that the Bill will shape the structure of educational governance for years ahead. Therefore, we cannot deal with it flippantly. We also cannot afford to have it pushed through without the real issues, which I am sure many Members have been lobbied on by various school sectors, having been dealt with. All that I will say in response to the Member is that the issue is primarily between the Education Minister and those who listened to all the evidence while the Bill was being scrutinised and made certain recommendations. I hope that sense will prevail so that the Bill can finally come to the Assembly in a form that is acceptable and accepted. Then the process can be got on with.

Mr Lunn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Yes; I will.

Mr Lunn: It is really an issue between the Minister's party and Sinn Féin. That is where the ESA Bill rests at the moment. I know that there are political implications, and I have tried to avoid those today, but the administrative savings and the whole structure of education, in my humble opinion, are crumbling. I know that we are still managing to get good results somehow out of it, and that is a credit to the people who work in the system, as Mr Storey has often said.

The problem at the moment is that it is stuck in the Executive between the two major parties, and the other three parties do not know what is going on. It has been that way for two months. The Education Committee did not so much put forward proposals on the important issues as find itself not able to reach a consensus on them because of differences in the interpretation of the so-called heads of agreement.

Mr Wilson: I am surprised that you have not called us to order, Mr Deputy Speaker, because this is not particularly relevant to the Budget (No. 2) Bill. However, I will say that it is not just an issue between the DUP and Sinn Féin. I have also heard significant criticism from the Ulster Unionists, the SDLP and your party. Therefore, it is not just an issue between this party and Sinn Féin.

Mr Byrne spoke about access to finance. I agree with him that it is a critical issue. Funds have already been made available through the business growth fund and other funds through the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

I understand that Arlene Foster is developing similar schemes and will be applying for funding for some of them. I mentioned one yesterday with the agrifood industry where it is hoped that the Executive will be able to make some provision for giving access to funds and encouraging banks to release funds to supplement what the Executive do to help that important sector of the economy to grow.

He raised the issue of the A2 at Enniskillen. I am not aware of all the details but I was informed that road schemes were recently undertaken around Enniskillen, including the realignment and widening of the A32 Shannaragh Road, as part of the works to improve travelling time between Omagh and Enniskillen. That will improve access to the new hospital as well. The last time I was down, they were doing a lot of resurfacing along the main road to Belfast, too, which, hopefully, will at least make the journey a bit smoother.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for giving way. He referred earlier to the restrictions and difficulties of trying to raise external finance for here. Is any serious thought being given to having some sort of Northern Ireland government bond, given that the savings ratio is so high generally in the community and interest rates have never been more beneficial for those who may create such a bond?

Mr Wilson: I referred to that in response to Mrs Overend's point. Raising money through a Northern Ireland government bond would only displace money that comes from Westminster. We would be paying interest on it, whereas we get capital money for nothing from Westminster. Treasury rules make it difficult for us to raise money in that way.

One method available to us is RRI borrowing, which we use to the full. When we use it, we have to bear in mind that it has implications for revenue in future years because of the servicing of the loans. We could ask for additional borrowing powers. I do not know what the Government's response would be, but those would score against total UK borrowing at a time when the Government are trying to get borrowing down. They would probably be reluctant to look at that. That is a similar way of raising the money but it has implications for revenue spending.

Mr McIlveen raised the issue of the economic conditions and outlook. Mr Allister and Mr McCrea tried to rubbish the job promotion that is going on, and Mrs Overend raised questions about it. Substantial new job announcements have been made by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment over the past number of months. Some are with brand new investors. Some are with investors who came here and showed their confidence in the economy by increasing their employee numbers. For example, Allstate came, saw what was available in Northern Ireland, employed hundreds of people, and has now given an indication of its confidence in the economy by increasing its investment. That is as a result of the hard work done by Invest Northern Ireland, and by the Minister who has been tireless in her promotion of Northern Ireland.

Mr McIlveen and a number of others raised the issue of resources for the G8 summit. We have secured agreements from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on the contribution that it will make towards security costs. Those costs are not yet fully defined and there is still an ongoing conversation. However, the one thing that has been clear in the conversation is a recognition that this is not a Northern Ireland event and should, therefore, be funded primarily by resources from the Treasury.

6.30 pm

Mr Beggs gave us a tour of east Antrim and the various problems faced there. Schools, nursing homes — nothing escaped — as he held us, riveted, on the details of the problems that that constituency faces. Of course, I am well aware of the problems, as one of the Members for the area.

He raised the issue of the Estimates being scrutinised by Committees. As I pointed out, although a combined Estimate was not available until 29 May, individual Departments should have been making available their Estimates for scrutiny by their Committee, so the type of detail that he wanted should have been available. If that is not happening, I am sure that Committees and he himself can be assertive in demanding that type of information from Ministers.

He also raised the issue of accident and emergency provision. There are, on average, 59,000 attendances at emergency departments every month and 10,000 admissions to hospital from those departments. I acknowledge, because I hear from constituents as well, the length of waiting times and the conditions in which people wait, but the situation has improved. From January to March 2012, there were 4,017 breaches of the 12-hour waiting time. By this year, that figure was down to 2,360 breaches. He pointed out something that I am sure we will all be aware of when he said that A&E attendance seems to peak in the winter and drop during the summer. There are very good reasons for that. I hope that I do not have to explain those to him.

Of course, we have made additional funding available to the health service. In fact, I was not too sure where he was coming from. One minute, he was lamenting the fact that there were not enough resources and, the next, he was accepting that, even from the Budget position in 2011, we had increased resources available in the core health budget by £200 million, plus all the additional funding that has been provided in the various monitoring rounds. The Minister has made further bids. Mr Beggs seemed to lament the fact that certain things had to be bid for in monitoring rounds, as if that should not happen and it should all be part of the core budget. You could say that about almost anything that emerges in monitoring rounds. Monitoring rounds allow bids for additional money to try to deal with additional pressures that emerge or which are anticipated. To say that we should not make those provisions or have to make applications in monitoring rounds is a failure to understand how the process works. If moneys become available from Departments, of course other Ministers will say, "I have a priority. I am spending so much money on it at present, and I could spend more money on it if I had it. I will make a bid for it." That, to me, is not a system that is broken; it is a system that is working and showing flexibility. I would have thought that, by this stage, he would at least have understood that.

I come now to Mr McCrea. After being upbraided by Mr Allister yesterday, I am glad that he attended at least most of the debate. His attention span did not quite stretch to the whole debate, but he attended most of the debate today. I suppose that that is an improvement on the record of the new opposition party from yesterday. I listened to him when he said that he did not want any bluster or rhetoric from me. Maybe he should take a lesson in that himself. He is concerned about a lot of things, and I counted how many times he asked, "What are you going to do about this?" The Hansard report may prove me wrong tomorrow, but I thought that I counted that question 14 times. That is fair enough. It is a reasonable question to ask but I think that if you are going to criticise the Executive for not doing things and for not having ideas, maybe you could give us just one little suggestion as to what could be done. He spoke for 20 minutes and 27 seconds. At least I was able to stay awake for his 20 minutes and 27 seconds. [Laughter.]

In the full 20 minutes and 27 seconds that he spoke, I did not get one idea. I got lots of questions — "What are you going to do? What have you done? Where is it in the Budget?" — but not one indication of what he would suggest.

The Member expects the Budget to deal with the fall in property prices. They have fallen by 55%, I think, since their peak. What is the Budget going to do about this? What does he want us to do? Push the property prices back up again to the point at which people who wanted to buy a house were facing house prices of 11 and a half times the average salary: is that what he wants the Budget to do?

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: Let me just finish some of the other points.

What are we doing to create jobs? The Member made not one suggestion on what could be done to create jobs. Indeed, he ignored the fact that at least 1,000 jobs have been announced by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in the past six weeks. What is being done to address the deplorable state of the economy, which has people quivering in their shoes at the prospect of what will happen? Let me give some indications of what is in the Budget to deal with youth unemployment. There is the allocation of record amounts of money for training, especially for young people, on top of money that was given in monitoring rounds last year. There is the money that is being spent on job promotion. We are on course to reach the target of 25,000 new jobs over the four years of the Budget. There is the money that has gone on infrastructure. As one Member pointed out, we are now responsible for 55% of construction jobs in Northern Ireland. There is the money that has gone into starter homes and housing through the Co-ownership Housing Association, which will enable 1,500 people to purchase a new home. It has led to over 50% of the new houses that are being built in Northern Ireland being sold through the Co-ownership Housing Association. Builders tell me that that is the lifeline that has been thrown to them by the Executive when it has been difficult in the private sector market.

There is the record capital spending on roads maintenance, which has been recognised by the industry — the Quarry Products Association and others — as a lifeline that has been thrown to it. There is the record investment in tourism infrastructure as a result of two signature projects, which has led to tourist numbers being up by 30% and nearly 900,000 people going through the Titanic signature project in the centre of Belfast, with all of the attendant impact that that has on the hospitality industry. What are we doing to help the economy? What is the Budget doing to help the economy through the recession? Those are some of the things that money is being spent on.

This bland dismissal that there is nothing in this that helps the economy goes against everything that all the lobby organisations are saying. They actually now recognise that there have been serious attempts in the Budget to help the economy through the recession, albeit, as I said in qualification to Mrs Overend, that we cannot kick against or totally row against the prevailing international economic situation, which, of course, will have an impact on an open economy such as ours.

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way.

Mr B McCrea: I had asked the Minister to give way.

Mrs Overend: Sorry. Excuse me.

Mr Hamilton: Ladies first, Basil.

Mr Wilson: Be a gentleman.

Mrs Overend: We are talking about generalities. I asked the Minister about the £200 million that was coming though for infrastructure from the Barnett consequentials. Maybe he would like to clarify that now. Does he have further details on that?

Mr Wilson: In fact, I should have come to that point in responding to you.

As a result of the Barnett consequentials, money is spread over and allocated for specific years. We do not get it allocated to us and decide to spend it all in one year. We have had money allocated for this year. I cannot remember the figure off the top of my head, so I will not give it. It would be on the record then, and somebody would pull me up for getting it wrong. However, on average, there is, I think, around £50 million over these two years. That money will be allocated during the June monitoring process and further monitoring periods. A lot of it, of course, is to be used for financial transactions, so a load will be used for loans or equity funding. It cannot be used for straight capital projects carried out by Departments. The detail of that will roll out over the next two years, as Treasury has said that that is when the money will be spent. I suppose that there will be some announcements; in fact, I know that there will be some announcements about that in the June monitoring round that is to follow in a couple of weeks' time.

I will give way to the Member.

Mr B McCrea: I appreciate the Minister giving way. He rather surprised me by saying that it is not right to ask questions. I would have thought that he, as the man with all the answers, would have been able to provide them. I want to draw his attention to the EAG work programme to see whether he agrees with it. It states:

"The EAG welcomes the priority directed toward the economy but highlights that only when measures are fully and successfully implemented will the economic situation improve."

It also:

"stresses that ownership, both at Ministerial level and senior civil service level ... is necessary to ensure delivery."

It goes on to say:

"employment creation, rebuilding in the short ... term, is essential".

There is a list of 13 recommendations here from some very learned people. They ask whether you will do something about the banks, about property and so forth. So, some of those questions are already in the public domain. All I was saying is that I would be happy to hear if the Minister was addressing those issues, which have been brought forward by the people advising his colleague, the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Mr Wilson: He should listen to the language that he was reading: "It is only when we see the results" — the results of what? The results of the actions that are being taken? He said that there is nothing in the Budget. Results can only result from actions that are being taken. "Take ownership" — ownership of what? Ownership of issues that are already in the programme and which we are dealing with? Of course, the end product of the effectiveness of the measure will be when we see the outcomes.

All I am saying is that — I have given some examples of the outcomes — we have taken decisions, and those decisions have resulted in jobs being created, the construction industry being supported, businesses having their overheads reduced, and infrastructure being provided that has brought in additional tourists. So, not only have we done things, we have seen the results of that. Of course, Ministers have taken ownership, because they have driven them forward, sometimes — I will say this — in the face of opposition from the negative people in and outside the Assembly. That has to be recognised. He is right to ask questions, but, as I pointed out, if he wants to have some policies implemented, you would at least expect him to have some suggestions. I am not even asking him for a whole pile of suggestions; I am just asking him to give us one or two. We have not heard any.

The Member asked what the Budget was doing about banking. He knows that the Budget is not about banking; it is about how we spend the resources available to us. He also knows or should know, if he has done his homework, that banking is not even a devolved issue. He asked whether we will set up our own business bank: we do not have the ability to set up our own business bank. The business bank is a UK-wide bank. We have, of course, already made representations to Treasury to make sure that the business bank operates in Northern Ireland and provides funding.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: No.

Mr B McCrea: Just one.

Mr Wilson: Just one. If we get an idea from him, I will give way, and then I will finish up.

Mr B McCrea: I just want to point something concrete out to you, Minister. It says that the EAG:

"recommend that DFP"

— that, I suspect, is you —

"and DETI engage with those responsible for developing proposals for a new business bank to support the proposals and to ensure that its design is appropriate and relevant to the needs of small businesses in Northern Ireland."

You cannot say that we should not have something. We need a bank that will finance our small and medium enterprises so that we can create jobs. I do not understand why we cannot agree that this would be a good thing.

Mr Wilson: This is the problem: sometimes, he does not attend, so he does not know; sometimes, he attends and does not listen, so he does not know; and, sometimes, he does not understand, so he will never know. At least he has attended this time, so he cannot say that the question he asked is a result of not having been in the room. Maybe he does not listen or does not understand. What am I just after saying? It is like having a bad pupil at the back of the room. What am I just after saying?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, Minister. Could I be helpful and remind you and other Members that we are now in the process of summing up the debate. I am concerned that we have reopened the debate, and I am sure that no Member here wants that. I ask the Minister to continue his summing up.

Mr Wilson: I will make it clear, and I will say it in simple words. Last week, I met the Minister in London to discuss banking. During those discussions, I raised the issue of a business bank, which has been set up — I hope I am speaking slowly enough — by the Government at Westminster. The issue of whether that business bank would operate in Northern Ireland was raised. The importance of that business bank making loans available to businesses in Northern Ireland was emphasised because of the dysfunctional banking structure that we have. We do not have the power to set up a business bank of our own, but we have made and will continue to make representations to the Government at Westminster for the business bank to operate fully in Northern Ireland and to make loans available to businesses in Northern Ireland to try to overcome some of the problems that we have with existing banks. I hope that is clear enough.

I will quickly refer to the points that Mr Allister made. He should have known better, but I know that his eye is always drawn to the accounts of OFMDFM. I know that he has got a bit of an obsession with OFMDFM. He thought, "Ha! I have got them". I do not know whether he thought it was fraud or what, but he saw a line for the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund, which no longer exists. He is wondering where this money is going. Has he unearthed a new scandal? Now, Mr Allister should know — I am sure he has been involved with businesses closing down and other situations such as that — that, when an operation is closed down, there will always be some residual bills, issues and whatnot to be dealt with. I am sorry to disappoint him, because I am sure that he thought he was on to a great wee story here, but the line in the Budget was simply to deal with the outstanding issues that may or may not arise as a result of bills not yet having been paid by the Northern Ireland Memorial Fund. If that money is not required, of course it will have to be surrendered. It is probably de minimis; it can probably be moved within OFMDFM at some later date.

The Member also raised the issue of the Maze site again. I think that I dealt with that yesterday. It is a great site. It has great employment potential, and the full extent of it will have an immense impact on that part of the Northern Ireland economy. It has clearly been seen as a neutral site; people in their tens of thousands attended the Balmoral show there and enjoyed it. I think that the predictions that he has made about the location of the peace and reconciliation centre at the Maze will prove, with hindsight, to be as spurious as the claims that were made when he predicted what would happen when policing and justice was devolved to Northern Ireland. There is not a whimper about it now, of course. I think that, in four or five years' time, people will look back and wonder what the fuss was all about. He mentioned the location of the centre. Of course, in any coalition, there will always have to be arrangements made to satisfy all parties. Arrangements have also been made to satisfy the concerns of the unionist community. That is why the structure of the board is the way it is. That is why the ability of the board to decide what happens on the site is the way it is. I suspect that Sinn Féin had to make that compromise to facilitate the concerns of unionists. However, we miss the point if we keep on being obsessed with one aspect of what is a very big site.

I have dealt with Transforming Your Care and the job provisions. The Member is wrong to say that unemployment is still rising. The claimant count is not rising and has not risen since December last year. That is a small indication — only a small indication, I accept — of the improvement in the economy.

Mrs Kelly raised the issue of the non-delivery of the social investment fund. You cannot win on this issue. When the social investment fund was set up — I remember it because I was taking the Budget debate through the Assembly — the accusation from the SDLP was that it was some dirty deal that had been done with Sinn Féin to make sure that money was given to all the paramilitary groups all over the country with no accountability or anything else. When you spend two years putting in place governance structures to ensure that good projects come forward; that they are properly scrutinised; that they have local relevance; that local people, who know the groups applying and know the significance of the projects and the impact that the projects will have on their area, do the first sift in scrutiny; and then they come back to the Department and have to go through business cases, you are criticised for the length of time it takes. Either she wanted the money put out the door to paramilitaries or she wanted proper accountability to make sure that they were good projects. I have seen some of the ones in my area. I am pleased with the result. I want to see the money spent; I am sure that OFMDFM does likewise. There are good news stories, so why would we want to hold on to the money? It has to be done. This fund, especially because of the criticism that was levelled at it, has to be seen to be squeaky clean. I hope that, once the decisions get under way, the Member will be pleased with its impact on some of the difficult areas in her constituency.

I thank Members for their contributions to the debate. I am sorry that I took so long in responding. I recommend the Budget Bill to the Assembly.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Second Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill [NIA 21/11-15] be agreed.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Carrier Bags Bill: Second Stage

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Carrier Bags Bill [NIA 20/11-15] be agreed.

I aim to give Members a brief overview of a brief Bill with a big impact and the context in which it has been introduced. I will also summarise its purpose and comment on some of its key features. Members will be aware that I have taken a phased approach to the implementation of carrier bag charging. On 8 April, I introduced a 5p levy on single-use carrier bags. The proceeds from the levy will be forwarded to the Department and, after the discharge of internal costs, used to help fund environmental projects.

On the whole, the levy has been well received by consumers and retailers, and, indicatively, compliance levels are high. In my view, the levy that was introduced in April only caught up with the public mood to try to identify ways and means in which individuals and others can contribute to dealing with the issue of waste and the broader issues of climate change. I think that the public mood was very much in tune with the carrier bag levy, and that is one of the reasons why I think there has been a warm welcome, by and large, for the levy. Moreover, because of the experience in the rest of Ireland, with the introduction of the levy there for single-use plastic bags, we were more prepared for the introduction of the levy than we might otherwise have been.

As of today, no validated statistics are available, but early indications are that the target reduction of 80% is within our reach. That should bring real and sustained benefits to our natural environment, including reduced carbon emissions, reduced air and water pollution and reduced litter in public spaces.

The Carrier Bags Bill now provides for the second phase of charging arrangements. Its principal purpose is to allow carrier bag charging to be applied to a wider variety of carrier bags and to enable those bags to be defined by reference to their price. The Bill achieves that by means of amendments to the Climate Change Act 2008 that are specific to the North.

In practice, I intend to use the powers conferred by the Bill to make regulations that will apply the levy to the cheaper versions of reusable bags as well as to single-use bags. This is because cheap, reusable carrier bags can now be bought for as little as 5p. If the levy did not apply to those bags, customers might simply treat them as throwaway bags and use them only once. That would have significant adverse environmental impacts, because those bags are usually thicker and heavier and take longer to degrade than single-use bags.

The Bill will assert firmly that its purpose, and that of the levy, is environmental, and if that is the ambition and purpose of the law, its effect should be to capture those bags that carry environmental risk, including low-cost, reusable bags. That is the purpose and scope of the Bill. If we did not go for the reusable, low-cost bags, we would risk defeating the environmental ambitions of the original legislation.

The Bill also makes a number of other changes to current charging arrangements. With that in mind, I want to turn to its key features, the first of which is the power to define carrier bags by price. I intend, in the fullness of time, to establish a price threshold to be defined in statute as the cost of a carrier bag without the carrier bag levy. Bags that are priced above the threshold will be exempt from the levy; any bags that cost less than the threshold will be deemed to be low-cost and, therefore, liable for the levy.

That approach is consistent with that which was taken in Ireland for the charge on plastic bags. I should also add that retailers will still be able to operate a bag-for-life policy should they choose to do so, replacing worn out bags for life free of charge.

I am not yet in a position to announce the specific price threshold that will determine which bags will be subject to the levy. Clearly, before making a final decision on that, I want to hear what stakeholders, including representatives from the retail sector here, have to say. In any case, this detail will be in the subsequent subordinate legislation rather than in the Bill. The regulations will, of course, be subject to Assembly approval.

Secondly, the Bill makes a number of changes to the current administration arrangements for the collection of the levy and to the Department's enforcement powers. Those include a power for the Department to impose interest payments in the event of late payment of the levy proceeds by a retailer. It is designed to ensure that sellers cannot seek to gain a competitive advantage by delaying payment. I would hope that the Department would not need to make use of that power, but I believe that it is prudent to include suitable enabling provision in the Bill.

The Consumer Council and the Trading Standards Service have complimented the Department and its officials on the innovative way in which it has rolled out the understanding and the practice of the levy and on how it has been helpful to business interests in their understanding of the ambition of the levy. Therefore, although interest payments may be imposed in the event of late payment, I believe that the model of practice used in rolling out the levy should substantially mitigate that risk.

The Bill will also give the Department additional enforcement powers, including those to permit the inspection, retention and copying of documents. It is drafted to ensure that records kept by sellers are sufficiently comprehensive and that the Department can carry out routine monitoring to ensure that sellers are fully aware of their obligations under the regulations. I have to stress that the management of the levy to date has been done in a way that does not impose any disproportionate burden on retailers, especially small retailers. Retailers have to submit returns only once every quarter and can do so online, which should take a matter of minutes, so we do not believe that, in IT terms, either at the tills or thereafter, the management and payment of the levy places any disproportionate burden on business. Indeed, the view of the National Federation of Retail Newsagents in Northern Ireland is that the levy will result in a lesser burden on retailers than heretofore.

I should also say something about the ongoing monitoring of charging arrangements. Members may recall that, during the Assembly debate on the phase 1 regulations, I undertook to keep all aspects of the regulations under review, including the provision for exemptions. On that basis, the Bill includes specific provision requiring the Department to carry out a future review of the carrier bag charging arrangements and lay a copy of the resulting report before the Assembly. However, in addition, and in response to requests from the First Minister and deputy First Minister, I am preparing to table an amendment during the Bill's legislative passage, the effect of which would be to provide for an ad hoc review of the exemption provision under circumstances to be specified in regulations. In other words, there would be a double review mechanism: a general review of the overall charging arrangements; and, in the event that it were deemed necessary, an ad hoc review. As I said, the precise wording of the clause to be tabled at Consideration Stage will be worked out with the Office of the Legislative Counsel. I will ensure that Ministers and the Committee are kept informed of policy direction.

I advise Members that, in phase 2 of the charging arrangements, I plan to increase the levy to 10p. This will be achieved through subordinate legislation, using powers already available to the Department under the Climate Change Act 2008. The Department's economic modelling, which is informed not only by our sense of the circumstances here but by international experience, suggests that 10p is the amount that will maintain the downward trend in carrier bag consumption. The current 5p levy will allow customers to get used to bringing their own bags before the increase.

Finally, I will refer briefly to the target date for the commencement of phase 2 charging. I remain committed to achieving implementation by April 2014, in line with the Programme for Government commitment. Full implementation requires not only this Bill but subsequent subordinate legislation. I fully appreciate the need for effective Assembly scrutiny of the legislative framework and for a sufficient lead-in time for the retail sector. I will, therefore, continue to keep the implementation date under review. I think that I have said this on the Floor before, but it is worth repeating: when a gateway team came to consider how the original Act was being implemented in the run-up to April this year, it acknowledged that the implementation by the Department, particularly the relevant officials, had been carried out very effectively. Indeed, as far as I recall, the only issue that the team raised with us was whether there was sufficient communication to retailers and customers about when the levy was coming in and what it would mean. The evidence to date generally indicates that people very much understood what was coming and that the business sector was, by and large, well prepared for it.

I will address any questions that Members raise in my response to the Second Stage debate.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): As Chairperson, I welcome the Bill.

The Committee was briefed on the Bill by departmental officials at its meeting on 6 June, when members were informed that the Bill would provide for the second phase of charging arrangements. It will allow the charging requirement to be applied to a wider variety of carrier bags and allow the Department to make regulations that will apply the charge to the cheaper versions of reusable bags.

Members were informed that that approach was similar to the approach in the Republic of Ireland.

Members expressed concerns at the meeting that some retailers are trying to beat the current levy by charging 6p for a bag for life, which is not substantially different from a single-use carrier bag and is treated as a disposable bag. That goes against the principle of the carrier bag levy, which is to lessen the consumption of single-use carrier bags in general. I hope that retailers will be persuaded to stop that practice and embrace the principle of the levy.

I welcome the Department's commitment to another media campaign for the second phase of the charge. The first phase was well publicised, and members of the public seemed to be well informed when the charge came into operation in April. I expect the Department to conduct a similar level of awareness raising this time around.

At the Committee meeting, several members raised anecdotal evidence from smaller retailers that the current carrier bag levy had had an impact on shopping patterns and that some retailers had expressed concerns about an increased risk of shoplifting. Members were happy to hear that the Department's customer relations team had not had many approaches in relation to that and were reassured that the officials would call on any retailers who expressed concern.

Members welcomed the Department's commitment to future proof the Bill to adapt it to changing circumstances in the use of bags. The Committee also welcomed the inclusion in the Bill of a review period, which will look at the impact of the legislation three years after its enactment. It is always important to assess legislation and its impact on the ground and to make changes where necessary.

The Committee also welcomed the fact that the Bill will strengthen the Department's enforcement powers. We all know that legislation without enforcement is pretty powerless, and we hope that the Department will use the powers that this Bill will give it to ensure that the extended levy is strictly enforced.

As soon as the House refers the Bill to the Committee, we will call for written submissions from interested organisations and individuals, and members will welcome their views. I look forward to a good ongoing working relationship with officials to ensure that my Committee is able to scrutinise the Bill properly. On behalf of the Committee, I support the principles of the Bill and look forward to scrutinising it closely at Committee Stage.

I will now speak as the Alliance Member for South Belfast. I have some reservations about the Bill. Extending the charge to include reusable bags is somehow inconsistent with the principle that people should be encouraged to purchase reusable bags where possible. It could be difficult to justify to the public the introduction of a levy on those bags, although I understand the Department's rationale, which is to avoid cheap reusable bags being sold at a lower cost than a single-use carrier bag and being thrown away after just one use. That said, we need to ensure that there is a clear message communicated to the public as to why that category has been added, as, at face value, it seems somewhat contradictory to the aim of the Bill, which is to reduce environmental harm. My preference is, if possible — I know it will be difficult — for the Minister to continue charging just 5p on single-use bags only, as it seems that the current levy is already close to achieving the policy objective of the first phase of the levy.

Although I was supportive of the initial regulation, there are a number of issues that the Bill, with amendments, could provide an opportunity to address. First, there is a range of problems with the list of exemptions from the levy. One example is the small plastic bags used by butchers and in fruit and vegetable shops or sections of large supermarkets. That is not very clear to consumers, who find that they are charged in one shop for something and not in another. I was at a sandwich bar the other day in Botanic Avenue buying a carry-out lunch. If you buy a tub of soup and a sandwich there, you can get a bag free because it contains hot food, but, if you buy a sandwich with a tub of salad, you have to pay for a plastic bag to carry them because they are considered cold food. It is so confusing, and the public can be forgiven for not knowing the difference. Some MLAs have had discussions —

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member raised the issue of what she sees as inconsistency. Presumably, one of the differences is that, if you buy a sandwich, you can walk out with it in your hand, and it does not necessarily need to be put in a bag. It is a bit more difficult to carry out a warm cup of soup simply poured into your hand.

Ms Lo: Quite right, Peter. I agree with that, but I was not buying just one sandwich. The two of us had sandwiches and tubs of salad, and we needed a bag. The person in front of us got a bag free, and the two of us had to pay for a bag.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mr Weir: The alternative is that, if you want a free bag, you could, presumably, have warm lettuce.

Ms Lo: No; I would not like that.

Some MLAs had discussions with interested groups before and after the introduction of the initial levy, and I will be keen to hear what discussions the Minister has had with those who produce carrier bags to see how the first levy has impacted on them and to take on board their feedback.

Many shops, particularly clothes shops in shopping malls, have raised concerns about the difficulty of identifying shoplifters. If customers do not buy plastic bags, they leave shops carrying an armful of clothes. I realise that the apprehension of shoplifters is not for this Minister to deal with, but I wonder whether he would consider looking at the system as implemented in the Republic of Ireland, which allows clothing retailers to offer paper bags at no additional charge to the consumer.

As I stated yesterday during the Supply resolution debate, I want to put it on record that I do not agree that the Department should lose money from its already tight budget to be topped up by revenue raised from this levy. In other regions, such as Wales, the levy has been used to fund innovative and additional environmental projects by the voluntary sector. That should have been the case in Northern Ireland also. The initial levy has significantly reduced the number of bags used here, with some shops noting up to a 98% decrease. That is a great success. However, it means that the £4 million taken from the departmental budget is unlikely to be reached. It seems obvious to me that increasing the charge will be successful in reducing further the number of bags that are handed out. However, that will have the knock-on effect of reducing the income from the levy. With a number of projects continuing to require funding, I am concerned that making up that shortfall may continue to be an issue.

The Alliance Party is not going to stand in the way of this Bill passing Second Stage, and we have sympathy with its aims. However, I believe that close scrutiny is needed at Committee Stage and that a range of amendments could be considered. I look forward to taking part in this process alongside my fellow Committee members.

7.30 pm

Mr Hamilton: I will speak briefly in support of the Bill at Second Stage.

I have to say that I was not a huge supporter of the levy in the first Bill that went through here. I can remember the Bill going through late on in the dying days of the previous Assembly. It was a very short Bill with only about four or five clauses, and it always reminded me of Trigger's brush in 'Only Fools and Horses' because, although it made it through to the other side, it was changed almost completely. It was the same Bill only everything had changed. I was not entirely convinced that it would work, but I am man enough and big enough to admit when I am wrong. It happens so infrequently that I can remember every occasion. I think that I got this wrong in my instinctive view. As time passed, when it was inevitable that this was coming through, I observed, through the perspective of the introduction of the previous levy, the abuse of single-use carrier bags in our countryside and how they were damaging the environment around me. It is clear that, in a lot of areas, particularly around autumn, you see bags that are stuck in trees and hedges and have probably been there for many years in some cases. It is very clear that there was a problem in that it was damaging our environment, never mind the problems and the environmental damage that is done in the creation of single-use carrier bags. So, by practice over the past number of weeks, I have been convinced about the carrier bag levy. I would not say that I have the zeal of a convert or that I am hugely evangelical about it, but I think that it has worked. I am getting there, and I could become evangelical about the carrier bag levy.

Because I have seen it working well in operation, I am supportive of this Bill. I am supportive of this Bill because I have seen already how some supermarkets have attempted to game the system. I can think of one in particular that charges 6p for a slightly better carrier bag. It is not one of the heavier bags or the better bag-for-life things that you can see in supermarkets; it is just a slighter heavier plastic carrier bag and is not much better than the single-use carrier bags to which the 5p levy applies. They have deliberately price pointed it at 6p, so that customers will say, "I am not prepared to pay 5p for a simple, flimsy bag, but I will pay 6p for the slightly better one and I'll get a few more goes out of it". There is a real risk of what is described in the explanatory note as the "substitution effect" taking place, where people will pay for those bags almost to avoid paying the tax. Even though they are paying 1p more, they think that they are getting better value by paying 6p for a bag that might do them on a few more occasions. People themselves will try to work around the system by substituting the inferior 5p bag for the slighter better 6p bag. There is a real risk that, if other supermarkets follow by having a price point at 6p, you will get that substitution effect taking place. The introduction of the carrier bag levy has seen reductions in the number of bags being used, and it has been reported that, in some supermarkets and shops, there has been a reduction as high as 90%. All the good work that has been done could be undone. I do not think that we would row back to where we were, but some of that good work could start to go into reverse.

I accept that, although I am more enthusiastic about the levy now than I was at its introduction, there are outstanding issues. The Chair of the Committee raised some of those concerns.

There is still a confusion about what is exempt and what is not. She herself has demonstrated circumstances in which she was a bit confused about where it applies and where it does not. It is probably the same for a lot of people. The Minister and his Department, including the officials who work in the carrier bag unit, have a continuous job to do in informing the public about the current levy, never mind the changes that this levy will bring in. However, given the relative success of the marketing campaign in advance of 1 April, I have some confidence that they will be able to inform and educate the public about this proposed extension of the levy, in the way that they did about the existing levy.

The Minister said that the current levy had been warmly welcomed. I am not convinced that it has been warmly welcomed by everybody. I think that, generally, the public were psychologically in a position where they knew that lots of these plastic bags were not good for the environment and wanted to move away from that. People were attempting to buy a lot of bags-for-life and to bring some heavier bags with them when they went shopping every week. We are only human; sometimes, we forget to bring these things or to put them in the car. However, generally, the public were in the right space. I am not sure that all traders, particularly small traders, were in the right place and that they warmly welcomed it.

The concerns that traders already have will perhaps be exacerbated by the Bill before us and the extension of the levy that the Minister proposes in it. However, the likelihood of this impacting on small retailers is somewhat less than it was for the existing carrier bag levy. It is likely to be only large supermarkets that are trying to introduce bags that are only slightly better than the single-use carrier bags that will be affected. I do not think that the impact of this extension will be as significant on small retailers as the impact of the current levy. I am interested to hear the Minister's thoughts on whether it will affect larger retailers more than smaller ones.

That all said, this is a natural extension — if not, for some, a welcome extension — of where we are. The current levy has been a success, and I hope that it continues to be so. The aims of the existing levy are to decrease the number of single-use carrier bags and to lessen their negative impact on the environment. There is some evidence of people trying to get around and to game the system as it currently applies. It is only right that we close down that door, and this legislation will, hopefully, do that. I welcome the Bill and support its Second Stage.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom tacaíocht a thabhairt don Bhille seo. I too support this legislation.

From listening to the views of the public, I think that they have embraced this. It is something that they have decided to take on. They have taken up this challenge. It will go some way to mitigating the problems that we have had with single-use plastic bags. In recognising that, I think that we have a job to do in getting the message out about the reusable bag. The public have embraced the payment of 5p for a single-use plastic bag, and lots of them have bought bags at 6p and 10p and stronger bags, and they are using those at present. Once we introduce this new phase, besides the increase from 5p to 10p, the message about reusable bags needs to be communicated properly. Let me say to the Minister and the Department that a lot of good work has been done with traders and the public in getting out the first message. The same level of detail is needed to get out the message a second time.

One of my Committee colleagues brought up the point that people are buying large numbers of plastic bags cheaply over the internet. People are entitled to do that, but it is something that we need to be mindful of. Although there is nothing we can do about that, the clear message for us is that we should try to do away with the single-use plastic bag, and that is something that we need to be mindful of.

There are a couple of key points. Unlike Mr Hamilton, who said that he would speak for only a few minutes, I will speak for only a few minutes, but I need clarity on some clauses.

Full-time equivalent employees are mentioned with regard to sellers. Where are you going, Minister, with that element? I need clarification and to understand better. During the upcoming Committee Stage, there will be presentations, and a lot of traders will be involved in the process.

Some traders with smaller shops have told me that people used to come in to buy one, two or three items, and they got a single-use carrier bag, but they are now buying one item only and walking out. The initial transitional period will have an impact on traders. Has there been any feedback on that? I would like to hear your comments.

Reference is made to payments. Will you clarify when payments will be gathered for the first phase? You talked about interest on late payments. Will you say more about that?

Have you any information on the definition of carrier bags and on charges through work that has been carried out in other places? Is there evidence of best practice on how that has worked in the South or in Wales? Will you give us a definition?

I cannot stress enough how essential communication is in the roll-out. Will you elaborate on records, enforcement and your dealings with traders? How will you get that message out? Will it be a case of spot checks? What are your ideas on how it will be rolled out?

What about the revenue that will be generated? The Chair spoke about shortfalls, and we had some debate about that in the Chamber yesterday. I believe that we should look at new ideas and new ways to generate revenue. We should tackle it through current departmental budgets and priorities. Any money that is generated should involve best practice and good housekeeping. I want the money to be used for that purpose as opposed to using money from our own budget.

I support the Second Stage of the Bill.

Mrs D Kelly: As the Minister stated in his opening remarks, the Bill has been broadly well received. He said that the legislators in the Department were catching up with the public mood. However, it is important to sustain support for the Bill. No one welcomes price hikes. However, the Minister was adamant that the purpose of the Bill is to improve the environment's chances of surviving well into the future, not to be a levy per se. Nevertheless, to retain some of the buy-in, it would be useful if we had some idea of the timescale of the projects so that we get the message out and people can see improvements in their local environment and communities because of the Bill, as well as it reducing the number of plastic bags strewn across our hedgerows and countryside. Broadly speaking, our party very much supports the Minister's proposals in the Bill, and I welcome them.

Mr Elliott: I think that the one word that we can use about most of this carrier bag levy is "phase". That is because we seem to be going through different phases of the carrier bag levy. The first piece of legislation was introduced some time ago, and now we have what I suppose could be called the second phase. Even this second phase has two phases. We have the primary legislation, and we will then have the subordinate legislation coming with the regulations. I raised this question at Committee last week: how many more phases will we have?

Every time that you introduce a charge, a bag of a certain size or a particular type of bag, some retailers and businesses will try to get around that and will try to find a mechanism or a type of bag that they can charge a price for that, compared to the levy, is not overly exorbitant. I wonder what the Minister's thoughts are about that. There was an indication last week that he was thinking of a particular amount of money for a bag. There would be a 10p levy for anything below that price, and you would have a bag for life. You would pay that levy only once, and when you brought your used bags back into the shop, you would get replacements. I would like the Minister to give us some detail of how he envisages that working, particularly among the smaller retailers. Would those bags have to be labelled or branded? How would the retailers know where the bags came from? So, I am interested in getting some detail on that from the Minister.

The small retailers and the downturn in their businesses have been mentioned. It has been raised with me that, because of the carrier bag levy or the reusable bag levy, some retailers have found that, instead of customers going in and spending £15 or £20, they buy only a pint of milk or a loaf of bread and leave without additional goods. I have been told that research indicates that that is a short-term issue. However, it is a matter that I would like the Minister and the Department to keep under review, simply because we do not want those small retailers to go out of business. We want them to survive and to ensure that the small village shop and the high street shop will be there for the foreseeable future. That is vital.

To come back to the issue of the bag for life, I noticed that departmental officials suggested to the Committee that the Minister is thinking of a particular amount of money as a bag charge. I wonder whether he has progressed on that. The officials said that, when the primary legislation goes through the Assembly, the regulations will be advanced but not completed. I am looking for some assurance that those regulations will be brought back to the Assembly for affirmative resolution so that we can at least have a say on them. I also hope that any future review of the regulations will come back for affirmative resolution as well. That is all for now, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Wells: I think that the people of Northern Ireland are akin to the gentleman who bought a new Range Rover to take his bottles to the recycling plant. He was not committed to anything that was going to cause him too much pain. We as a society are quite happy to go out and plant the occasional tree, recycle a bottle or, in this case, cut down on our plastic bags. However, are we as a society prepared to take the major decisions that are required to protect our environment? I do not believe that, given recent experience, even this Minister is prepared to take really difficult decisions to protect our environment. He will know that from a very stormy meeting that I had with him yesterday. So, let us try to save our consciences by doing all the cuddly little things that we can and thinking that we are doing something to solve the long-term environmental problems that this planet is facing. We are fooling ourselves if we believe that, but at least we are salving our consciences for another night's sleep.

Apart from that criticism, I welcome the legislation. I welcome even more the Damascus Road conversion of the honourable Member for Strangford Mr Hamilton. Anyone who can achieve that has certainly got a notch on their bedpost for political achievement. Mr Hamilton was prepared to stand up in the House and say that his initial view of the legislation was wrong. We need MLAs to be prepared to stand up more often to say that we can get it wrong. I was always a closet but enthusiastic supporter of this legislation. Now that Mr Hamilton has supported it, I am a publicly outgoing non-closet supporter of the legislation because I have some backup.

I have noticed a major change in public habits as a result of the previous legislation. I took the time to visit some supermarkets before and after the introduction of the levy, and it was like night and day. Before, the local Asda or Tesco was giving out plastic bags like confetti. People were taking far more than they needed. They were taking enough to do their shopping and another half dozen to take home.

There was a mindset that said that waste did not matter. Those bags were free, so it did not matter that they might take 50 years to degrade or would be hanging in our hedgerows for years, representing a threat to wildlife. They were free, and there is nothing a Northern Ireland person likes more than something free.

The levy was then introduced, and the Minister, in his chauffeur-driven Skoda, went to Coalisland. I never worked out why Coalisland, but there must be a very good reason. Perhaps Coalisland is the centre of the universe. I have hardly ever been in it in my life, but for some strategic reason, he and the media headed to Coalisland. Perhaps he can tell us why.

Initially, there were tales of gloom and doom: shops would close; plastic bag companies would go bankrupt;

the economy would going into free fall as a result of the decision. Then it all went quiet, because, immediately and extraordinarily, the psyche and behaviour of the Ulster shopper changed irrevocably. Within days, people got used to bringing a proper bag for life, as my wife and I had been doing for decades. However, we were few and far between. In fact, I borrowed my wife's car the other day, and she gave off because all the bags for life were in the boot, so she could not go shopping.

People's behaviour changed dramatically. The only pity about the Minister bringing forward this second Bill is that he does not have the hard facts — yet — to prove just how major the change has been. I hear figures of 80% and 90%. I hear one store saying 98%. If that is true, the first Bill has achieved more in this part of the United Kingdom than in the Irish Republic or anywhere else where such legislation was introduced. That is extraordinary.

In my recent standing in queues in supermarkets, it has been a long time since I have seen anyone obtain a bag at 5p. People have been using the reusable bag for life. That is a tremendous turnaround in behaviour. The only other time that I saw a similar change in public behaviour in Northern Ireland was after the introduction of the ban on smoking in shops and restaurants, when obedience of the law was almost universal. Absolutely extraordinary, and it has happened again.

Some of us will be sending the Minister well-placed questions for written or oral answer so that he can tell us before he departs his high office how effective the legislation has been. It is saving a huge amount of plastic from going into landfill or hedgerows. I notice when driving in the countryside a lot fewer plastic bags hanging in trees and bushes in Northern Ireland than was the case three months ago. Therefore, it is having an effect.

What we need from the Minister are the hard facts of the exact position as far as the legislation is concerned. However, I see as far more important that it is taking 190 million plastic bags out of recycling or being dumped as rubbish. It sends out a clear message that the world has finite resources and if we use all those resources, there will be nothing left to sustain the seven billion people on the planet. The sad reality we have to face as a nation is that if China and India wish to consume the world's resources at the rate that we are in Northern Ireland, including Coalisland, we will require four and a half planets to sustain mankind. That is just the fact. The sad reality is that India and China are fast catching up on the consumption of the world's resources. That is the problem. It is going extremely quickly, and we are facing huge difficulty. Therefore, as a western society, we have to make the decision: are resources to be used, consumed and cast aside, or are we going to have to think before we use any element of the world's resources and recycle, reuse and reduce consumption?

That is something that my family and I have been doing in my life for the past 56 years. I suspect that, until recently, most people regarded us as being absolute nutcases for doing that, because the attitude of the Ulsterman, or the Irish man living in Northern Ireland, or the British man living in Northern Ireland, or whatever you want to call him, is eat, drink and be merry. The problem, however, is that there is an ending to that verse: it is that tomorrow thy soul shall be required of thee. The problem is that we are eating, drinking and being merry, but we are not thinking of the consequences for the environment. So, I see this as a tiny, but very clear, step saying that we are not going to waste.

There is not much sense in controlling plastic bags when you can go into a shop and buy any number of cold drinks in tins and bottles, and there is nothing to encourage you to return them. Some people recycle them; I accept that. When I was young, probably before anybody else in the Chamber was born, there was a 5d deposit — that is two-and-a-half new pence — on all containers for soft drinks. Now, I know some of you will think that that was before the Boer War, but I assure you that I am talking about the early 1960s. If you bought what was called lemonade in the old days, you bought it from C&C. I remember that its slogan was, "Big, big bottles", and that is giving my age away. You consumed the fizzy drink, and then you went back to the shop with your bottles. I remember as a child —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Can we come back to the bags, please? [Laughter.]

Mr Wells: I think there is a lesson to be learned for the bags, Mr Deputy Speaker, and at least we are livening up the debate somewhat.

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: I certainly will.

Ms Lo: I have certainly always known that the Member has been a strong advocate for the protection of the environment. Does he agree that we need to bring forward the Climate Change Bill as soon as possible?

Mr Wells: I think that I am being lured on to the rocks of political demise. I am not so slow that I have not had direction on that, so I cannot give the honourable Member for South Belfast my views on that issue as yet, but, no doubt, I will be educated on the subject very soon. [Laughter.] You have totally distracted me. Meanwhile, going back to the 1950s, there was a compulsory deposit on all containers.

Therefore, we still have a problem. Although we may have sorted out the issue regarding the plastic bags, we have not sorted out the problems we still face with a throwaway society. If we needed an example of that, we could have gone to Portstewart strand yesterday morning, after 10,000 people had sunned themselves on that beach, and seen that 14 vans were required to carry off the waste, including, unfortunately, plastic bags, deposited on the beach. We have a long way to go, but this is a step in the right direction.

I am glad to say that this has my enthusiastic support, for what that is worth — practically nothing, I would think. It is a step in the right direction. I agree that we need to put the levy up, but I think the increase to 10p will not make a huge difference, because I think that anyone who has made the decision not to buy a bag has made it on the basis of 5p rather than if it was 10p. The penny has dropped here, and, at last, we have prompted our community to take a rational decision. It shows how sensitive the Northern Ireland market is to pricing, and it shows what can be done. Therefore, I am glad that the Bill is going to get through.

The only other issue is that I would appreciate an update on whether any revenue will be generated by this, but we will not know that until the end of the first quarter. It may be that it has been so successful that there will be a little trickle of income coming in — in dribs and drabs, as they say in south Down — and it will not count for very much. It will be unfortunate if that is the case, because I know that assumptions had been made about a much more substantial income. It may not happen, but that may be an indication that we are a victim of success rather than failure.

Mr Attwood: I will start by confirming for Mr Wells that I was in Coalisland because 'Talkback' invited me to go there. It was nothing more than the fact that 'Talkback' decided that it wanted to broadcast live from a store in the heart of Coalisland, and great it was as well. The carrier bag levy was launched that morning at Primark in Castle Street in Belfast, where, as I recall, I served customers and charged them for the use of carrier bags. I just wanted to clear that up in case there was anything sinister or implicit in the comments that were made by Mr Wells.

I will move on promptly to respond to points that were raised by Members. I acknowledge all the contributions that were made. I thought that all the questions and comments were valid. I will deal first with the comments that were made by Anna Lo. I agree with her that, as before — Mr Boylan touched on this point as well — we need to ensure that awareness-raising interventions continue. As Mr Wells captured in his contribution, the threshold is very good. I will come back to what the trends might be in the reduction in the use of single-use carrier bags over the past couple of months. I think that those figures, when they are validated, will indicate that the threshold of understanding of the issue is very good. We will continue to communicate and raise awareness. However, I think that the baseline is very good. Although we will continue to raise awareness, we will not necessarily have to do so as intensively as we have in the past. That is because of the Department's innovative approach to the exercise, which the Northern Ireland Consumer Council welcomed. That innovative approach includes how we communicate with stakeholders, consumers and retailers alike. We will continue to use that approach, going forward.

I will address Anna Lo's first point. When retailers offer a carrier bag at 6p, that is open to the interpretation that they are trying to defeat the environmental ambition of the levy. Because of that practice and the risk that people might be tempted to use low-cost reusable bags, it is necessary to have the second-phase Bill. I will come back to Mr Elliott's points about why we have a second-phase levy Bill. It is the fact that a very small number of people might tempt consumers to use low-cost reusable bags. That is the very point and principle of having a levy on low-cost reusable bags, which is captured by this Bill.

I hear what people are saying about indications that there might be shoplifting. I have to say that the team that is located in the City of Culture has liaised very quickly with retailers when hard cases have arisen. It has been very prompt to get out on the ground and speak to retailers about what the problems might be. If indications that there may be a problem with shoplifting become a pattern, clearly, we will look at that to see how it might be remedied.

I will respond to Anna Lo's comments in her capacity as a MLA. The point of both phases of the legislation is to encourage people not to use bags at all. I recognise that there will be times and places when people will require bags. That is just an inevitable feature of human life and experience. However, the aim is to encourage people not to use bags at all. The reason for that is that, whatever bag it might be, whether it is the most environmentally friendly bag or the one that does the most violence to the environment, there is an environmental cost around each and all categories. It uses natural or other products, and there are transport and manufacturing costs involved. Even the most environmentally friendly bag has an impact on our environment around transport, manufacturing and other costs. That is why we need to capture as fully as we can — you will not be able to capture everything in the legislation — the bags that have that impact. The reality is that even environmentally friendly reusable bags can have that impact. The potential for displacement or substitution means that we need to have this law. The fact that displacement bags or, to use another term, reusable bags are heavier, thicker and can take longer to degrade means that they need to be captured in the legislation.

I note what the Member says about exemptions. I have said this before in the Chamber, and I will repeat it now: the legislation will be kept under review, and, if there is a requirement to refine or retune the exemptions, we will certainly look at that. At the moment, in my view, there are exemptions that are justified for health, safety and cross-contamination issues, and that includes issues around hot food and hot drinks. I differentiate — I think that people can and will do this more and more, because most of them display high levels of common sense — between that which is hot and that which is cold or that in respect of which there may be a health-and-safety risk and that in respect of which there is not a health-and-safety risk. I will rely on people's wisdom, insight and common sense to work that out for themselves. As the levy legislation beds in and becomes more and more a feature of retailers generally, I think that retailers and citizens will more and more understand that there is a difference, based on health, safety and cross-contamination issues, between one product and another. I will rely on people in that regard.

I reassure the Member that, whilst the purpose of the legislation is environmental, I hope that the levy will enable us to direct resources towards environmentally productive causes. Even though the legislation and the impact of the levy may be more successful than we might have imagined, we will not have any validated figures until July. In any case, a snapshot of three months will not tell the full tale. The tale will only be written at the far end of year 1, year 2 and year 3, when the full deployment of the law has happened. Even on the current estimates — we have downgraded the potential income — the Department believes, on the basis of experience in other jurisdictions from which we have evidence, that in year 1, the income will be £1.7 million, and that in year 2, when the levy goes up and captures a wider category of bag, the income will be £3.4 million. Consequently, given that the internal costs to the Department of the administration of the levy will be in and around £600,000, in years 2, 3 and 4, if those figures are confirmed, there will be substantial moneys available, and those substantial moneys will be directed to environmental causes. So even though we may significantly reduce and continue to reduce the number of carrier bags in circulation, the levy will still apply. As a consequence, there should be a significant revenue flow coming to the Department.

What will happen with that money? I have indicated before and will confirm again that there are five funding streams arising from the levy. The levy, less the internal costs to the Department, will be deployed in full. Every penny that comes in from the levy, save the internal costs, will go to a river restoration fund, a sustainable innovation fund and a natural heritage fund, and more money will go to the community challenge fund and towards rethinking waste initiatives. I want to give that reassurance.

I note that Mr Hamilton said that he was not, unlike Jim Wells, evangelical about this. My sympathy and my judgement go with Mr Wells in this regard. Essentially, what Mr Wells was saying, even though he did not respond in any decisive way to Ms Lo's intervention about a climate change Bill — that was a wee bit disappointing, given the eloquence of his other comments — was that the real issue is that, if people are saying to this Assembly that they think having a carrier bag levy is good law and best practice, can the Assembly not stretch itself to bring in other good law and best practice consistent with the terms of the other contributions made by Mr Wells, save that in respect of the climate Bill? I think that is what people are telling us. They are sending a message to the Assembly. I do not know whether Mr Wells is correct in this intuition, but, if he is and we move faster down the road of reduction of single-use carrier bags than other jurisdictions might, then the conclusion to draw from that is that people want us to move down the road of other interventions in respect of climate change generally. If that is to mean anything, it has to mean that we have challenging emissions targets. In my view, they should be included in a climate change Bill dedicated to Northern Ireland.

Mr Frew: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. This means that all Ministers — until she disappeared, we had been joined by the Agriculture Minister — and all Departments, particularly Agriculture and Regional Development, deploy adaptation strategies around emissions, given that roads and agriculture are the two biggest creators of emissions in government practice in the North. It means that we have the ambition of a low-carbon economy and realise that, if we are to have sustainable jobs in the North, that will ultimately revolve around the added value that Northern Ireland gives to foreign direct and indigenous investors who want to invest here. That market will revolve around having a low-carbon economy and a small carbon footprint.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for giving way. I hear what he is saying, but I question the need for a climate change Bill for Northern Ireland specifically when we have one for the UK, which takes in this jurisdiction. A climate change Bill for Northern Ireland only could well hurt and impede the growth of the agrifood industry because of the reliance on that industry in Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: That is a debate that we will have to have over the next 18 months, because there is a pre-consultation out in respect of —

Mr McNarry: Why are we having the debate now? We are talking about bags.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Minister, the Floor is yours.

Mr Attwood: I was responding to the evangelical approach of Mr Wells and the less-than-evangelical approach of his colleague Mr Hamilton.

Mr Wells: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will. If the Member over my left shoulder has such an acute interest in this issue as to berate me for commentating on it, perhaps he should have contributed to the debate in the first instance. The character of the debate around this Bill and around the carrier bag levy is only representative of the debate that we will have to have around the issue of climate change.

I think that Mr Boylan was right about people embracing the levy. I want to give confirmation about a number of points that he made. There was some indication from one of the traders that there had been a reduction in impulse purchases because people would have to pay for a carrier bag if they were to purchase two, three or four items. Indicatively, that seems to have gone away as an issue, but, clearly, we will continue to monitor it. He mentioned people buying plastic bags from the internet. My sense is that, in the run of things, individual consumers will not flock to the internet to purchase plastic bags for their personal use. If retailers went to the internet to buy plastic bags for their business use, those plastic bags would be captured under the levy scheme. He also asked about what is happening in other jurisdictions. They have approached this differently. It is interesting that there are indications from Scotland and the wider European Union that they are going down the road of introducing charges for carrier bags of whatever category. Although our model is different from that in the South, which captures only plastic bags, and in Wales, where the scheme is administered by retailers, we have borrowed from all that experience in and outwith these islands to shape a model here that works best for us.

I confirm to Mrs Kelly that, on the basis of the revenue figures that we will get in July, we will make judgements about how quickly and how much we can deploy in the environmental schemes that we intend to fund.

Mr Elliott mentioned regulations that might come from the second phase of the carrier bag levy. I confirm that those will be by affirmative resolution. In doing that, our approach around this Bill is no different from the first Bill. The first Bill dealt with single-use carrier bags, and the fine detail of how that was to be managed was by way of regulations. Similarly, this Bill deals with low-cost reusable bags. How that will be precisely managed will be dealt with by regulations. I held back on the second-stage Bill because, in the run down to April and with the introduction of the single-use carrier bag levy, I did not want to create confusion in any shape or form in the mind of retailers or customers. You could have created confusion by saying that you were introducing the levy on 8 April and, the week before, introducing a Bill to deal with the second-stage carrier bag requirements. I made the political judgement to do the first phase of work and get it implemented and operational before we took on the second phase of work. To create certainty and avoid doubt in the mind of consumers and retailers, that was the right approach.

Although I do not have a settled mind and I will listen to the views of stakeholders about the stage at which the levy will kick in for reusable low-cost bags, a figure in and around 40p might be the right threshold. However, I will be influenced by and listen closely to the views of retailers in that regard.

I will very shortly be in a position to give Mr Wells the hard facts that he asked for in respect of the real evidence coming from the retailers about a reduction in single-use carrier bags. Whatever way the figures eventually end up, the number of single-use carrier bags used in the North in the year before 8 April was 250 million. That is an astounding figure. When you work that across to each man, woman and child in this part of the world, it reveals the scale of use and the scale of harm. Even if we were to achieve a 90% reduction — that might yet be beyond our current ambition but not our medium-term ambition — you would still have usage of 2.5 million bags. So, even if we were to reduce our usage by 90%, we would still have that scale of use.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will.

Mr Wells: I think that the honourable Member's maths is slightly out. If it is 250 million bags and you have a reduction to 10%, it would be 25 million bags, not 2.5 million. That is still 12 or 13 bags for every man, woman and child in Northern Ireland per year.

Mr Attwood: You would not believe that I got two maths O levels at a point in my life. It was so many years ago that the maths have clearly escaped my mind ever since. I stand corrected. That intervention only confirms that my underestimation of the impact demonstrates that the real impact of 25 million is still very significant.

I understand what the Member said about our stormy meeting yesterday. It was blunt; I do not necessarily think that it was stormy. Going back to his earlier contribution, the point is that, while we may differ about a planning enforcement matter here or there, Mr Wells and I do not differ on the need for enforcement, be it on planning, waste or, indeed, the few retailers who, in the fullness of time, do not comply with the law on carrier bag levies. They should endure monitoring and penalty. When the ambition of consumers and retailers alike is to see a reduction in carrier bags and when those who use carrier bags make a payment to the Government though the levy, you cannot have a situation in which others flout the law and create a competitive disadvantage to those who comply with the law. That is why, in the Bill, we have made provision for the charging of interest on those who, even after persuasion, monitoring and regulation, still do not comply with what should be best practice. All these matters can be further interrogated by the Committee as we work through the Bill.

The message from people across this part of the world is loud and clear: they want to look for ways and means of dealing with the issue of waste and climate change. This Bill creates a further mechanism to do that, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Second Stage of the Carrier Bags Bill [NIA 20/11-15] be agreed.

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker.]

Adjournment

Portavogie Fishing Fleet

Mr Deputy Speaker: The proposer of the Adjournment topic will have 15 minutes. The Minister will have 10 minutes to respond. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Miss M McIlveen: I am pleased to have been given the opportunity to raise on the Floor of the Assembly the plight of the Portavogie fishing fleet, although I am sorry that I felt that it was necessary to do so in the first instance.

The problems that I will outline relate to Portavogie, as it is in my constituency. However, they could easily be applied to the other commercial fishing fleets in Ardglass and Kilkeel, and I see my colleague Jim Wells, a Member for South Down, who will no doubt mention the problems in his constituency. I also see Sean Rogers.

In preparation for this debate, I took the opportunity to speak to fish producer organisations and local fishermen to try to understand the current hardships being experienced by the fishing fleet in Portavogie. I want to begin by stating that the fishing industry in Northern Ireland is an important part of our economy. The Agri-Food Strategy Board's 'Going for Growth' strategic action plan, published in April of this year, described the fishing industry as having:

"a very long tradition in Northern Ireland", and stated that it has:

"proven to be robust and resilient in the face of challenge."

Portavogie is built around its fishing fleet. Previously, I brought a motion to the Assembly regarding the regeneration of the village and my desire to see greater diversification in the area. Portavogie, more so than Ardglass and Kilkeel, relies almost totally on fishing for it to function. In that debate, I pointed out that, according to a survey commissioned by Ards Borough Council, retail provision in the village consists of one general shop, a pharmacy and a post office. For all that the Minister said in response to that debate, little of benefit in diversification and regeneration is to be seen on the ground. The fishing industry has the potential — I stress the word "potential" — to be sustainable and productive for many years to come. I will come back to that.

The publication by the Agri-Food Strategy Board suggests that the total value of fish landed in 2010 was £20 million. However, local industry sources say that that figure does not include fish landed by Northern Ireland boats in the Irish Republic and Scotland. It is estimated that the value to the Northern Ireland economy is about £56 million. That is a substantial amount that shows that fishing is a valuable asset that needs to be protected.

The industry has met challenges over the years, but, through a combination of circumstances, fishermen face huge immediate problems. The fleet's catches in 2010 and 2012 were better than those in earlier years but followed a number of incredibly poor years for the industry. Those good years helped the fleet to recover following the bad years. However, after a curtailed autumn fishing period in 2012, the fleet has experienced massive difficulties. The boats' ability to leave the harbour has been severely restricted by prevailing easterly winds. Although late September to spring fishing is not the most lucrative, it is essential to provide wages for the boats' crews over that period. With boats unable to leave harbour for long periods, boat owners have had to pay crews' wages from their own pockets just to ensure that they have had a crew on hand for when the weather improved. One boat owner told me that he had not seen anything quite like the prevailing easterlies in his 37 years as a fisherman. The fleet's activities were severely curtailed during that period. Grossing was down over 50%, and the problem was compounded by higher overheads when they got out to sea. Only recently has the fleet been able to fish at its capacity, having lost a full six weeks of the more lucrative spring season.

The Minister's response has been to say that quotas are still there to be caught and the days at sea remain to catch them. That shows a complete and utter lack of appreciation for what fishermen face. Industry representatives have advised me that it will be impossible to make up the lost ground. Fishermen say that the 10-week window is not enough, despite those men being out 18 to 20 hours a day. They realise that, come September, when the good fishing season ends, they will simply not have enough money to carry them over the winter months. Every boat owner to whom I have spoken has told me that. One Portavogie fisherman said:

"I have been 25 years at sea, and I have never seen the village in this state".

A heavy cloud lies over the fishing village of Portavogie.

The fishing industry needs to be shown that it is a valued asset in our local economy. It needs to be shown that there is a Department that knows what is going on in the industry and has a five- or 10-year plan for it. Many of the fishermen to whom I have spoken tell me that much of the fleet faces bankruptcy due to the unique circumstances that they faced this year. There is a real need for immediate financial assistance and a coherent strategy for the fishing industry.

Why do I believe that fishermen should receive a hardship payment? In December 2011, the Minister delivered a commitment to the Commission in Brussels that the fleet would be fitted with new selective fishing gear. To fulfil that commitment, new gear was to have been delivered and developed. However, the gear threatened was a Swedish grid gear, which is impractical for the boats in the Northern Ireland fishing fleet. Various grids were trialled by the fleet, and it was found that the nets were falling over onto the side and a large amount of the catch was being lost. During those trials, fishermen expended thousands of pounds on various grids while losing revenue from lost catches. The Department has not recognised the loss of revenue caused to the fishermen by trialling these highly selective gears, which simply did not work for the type of boat and net used and the conditions faced by the local fleet. The responsibility for that loss lies firmly at the feet of the Minister and her Department.

It was costing boats thousands of pounds as they had to purchase three or four sets. That investment by the fishermen needs to be recognised, but it has practically been ignored over the last 12 months. The Minister has talked about establishing a research and development fund through the European Fisheries Fund (EFF) specifically to develop fishing gear with very low catch rates of unwanted fish, but what about the cost that has been incurred to date?

8.30 pm

The fishermen feel that they have lived up to the Minister's commitments over the last 12 months and have worked with her officials, but there has been no recognition of that. What is incredible is that, despite the requests, the Minister has still not met fishing representatives. Furthermore, the Minister has not submitted any request for a hardship payment to the Finance Minister for consideration. I understand that the First Minister has raised that issue with the Agriculture Minister on a number of occasions, but we have still seen no movement from her on that. The Minister has been asked by both the Anglo Irish Fish Producers' Organisation and the Northern Ireland Fish Producers' Organisation to consider a hardship payment, but that has been refused.

The Minister seems to think that a few weeks of fishing will make up for the losses caused by an ill-thought-out selective gear policy, adverse weather conditions over the winter months and the loss of six weeks out of the prime fishing period. There are a number of reasons why 10 weeks of fishing will not rectify the problem. First, there are not the fish available. Because of the loss of the white fish quota, those who fish for it are now fishing for prawns, so there are more boats fishing for the same product. However, the product simply is not there, and that is not because of overfishing but is due to the unique weather circumstances. The fishermen note that the easterly storms seem to have had a devastating impact on the sea. The seabed temperatures are around two degrees lower than they should be, which inhibits the prawns from moving. Prawns have become the mainstay of the fleet following the restrictions on fishing for white fish as a result of the perceived lack of action by the Minister to assist those fishermen.

Furthermore, because of the late spring, the plankton bloom, which usually takes place in March and, by the end of April, rots and deadens on the seabed, is happening in the second week of June this year. Once the seabed deadens, that will again massively curtail any productive fishing of prawns. Additionally, although costs have risen dramatically for fuel, insurance and fees, the prawn price has been static. Logically, one would assume that, if fewer prawns are being landed by the Northern Ireland fleet, the price would increase, but, unfortunately for the fishermen, because of imported product, the prawn price remains low, so the fishermen are not even able to offset their costs with higher fish prices.

I will give one example: it cost one fisherman I spoke to in excess of £800 per day to go out fishing in the first instance. That is fuel costs and the cost of fees to agents, harbour authorities and producers' organisations, food and insurance. It does not include the wages of the crew or the maintenance of the boat or equipment. That is for an average 65-foot trawler. Yesterday, that boat made two tows of 22 miles in total, and they were only able to catch 10 stone of prawns. On another boat, one crew member worked five days of 18-hour shifts to receive £150 gross. Does the Minister regard that as acceptable? That is at a time when the Minister is saying that there is plenty and that everything will be fine. There are boat owners who have maybe accumulated tens of thousands of pounds to cover them over the winter period but are now at the limit of their overdrafts, some in excess of £20,000 or £30,000.

The fishing industry is a vital part of Northern Ireland's agrifood industry. It can be sustainable, but it needs urgent attention because of those unique circumstances. I have not mentioned the challenges coming from Europe in relation to the new common fisheries policy (CFP) rules or the discard ban, the restrictions on the Clyde or the additional cost of licences to fish in Isle of Man waters. Going forward, the industry needs to be given attention by the Department. There is a palpable sense from the fishermen that they have a Minister who simply does not care, does not know and does not want to know about the fishing industry.

There is further concern that only a small proportion of the European Fisheries Fund money has been committed. That money needs to be committed by the end of 2013 and spent by 2015. I have been told that the Department has said that there has been a lack of quality projects to fund, but where is the proactivity from the Department to develop projects?

The Minister consulted on a decommissioning scheme last year, but the conditions attached to that proposed scheme were simply unacceptable to the fishing industry. A proper, managed and workable decommissioning scheme is required. A scrap-to-build scheme that would develop modern, smaller, more fuel-efficient vessels would be of huge assistance to the fleet as a whole, but unfortunately it cannot be delivered under axis 1 of the EFF. At present, the average age of the fleet is 40 years old. There has been a lack of investment in the boats in recent years as the money made goes on the crews or on the systems demanded of them by regulations, such as the selective gears and automatic identification system (AIS) tracking. Although skippers and boat owners are doing their best, this could lead to safety issues for the crews. The Minister needs to be cognisant of the risks that these men take every time they leave harbour.

Although grants may be available, they are not being taken up. On the one hand, that is because of the bureaucratic hoops that have to be jumped through, including filling out a form that could be 40 pages long, and, on the other, it is because they do not have the money available to pay the balance.

I note from the Minister's response to Members that she will consider support for the full cost of replacing the fishing fleet's current satellite monitoring system. However, again, that is to meet a requirement of European regulations and is not of real assistance to the fishermen or the industry going forward.

The Department needs to take an interest in the needs of the fleet, and it needs to be proactive rather than reactive. I would ask the Minister to put in place a hardship package to assist in getting the Portavogie fleet and others over their immediate difficulties. Beyond that, however, she needs to carry out an audit of the fleet. She needs to produce a strategy aimed at developing a fleet that is sustainable in the 21st century, and she needs to look at a strategy of regeneration for the fishing communities that rely on that fleet.

The Minister and her party often use the word "equality", but where is the equality in her treatment of this sector? She appears to give only a passing nod to the fishermen, but they need to be valued. She needs to step in now with measures that will see them over the present difficulties and work towards a strategy for a sustainable industry and thriving fishing communities. Assurances are needed that a hardship package will be put in place; that there will be an allocation of the axis 1 moneys to quality beneficial and sustainable projects; that there will be a fair decommissioning scheme; and that the Department will be proactive in addressing fishing concerns.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for securing the debate, and I acknowledge that she is not confining it to Portavogie but including other fishing villages around our coastline.

I do not want to descend into sentimentality straight away, but we are all very taken when we see images, particularly black-and-white stills, of how things were 50 years and 100 years ago. I spent a very pleasant Friday evening recently in Portaferry with the regeneration board, where I heard stories about how it was once a centre for shipbuilding. In 2013, it is perhaps challenging to look back and think of Portaferry in that state 100 years ago, when literally thousands of people lined the streets for the launch of vessels that would traverse the Atlantic Ocean and people who were emigrating these shores for a new life in North America left not from Belfast but from Portaferry, but so it was. Equally, when we look back, Portavogie was a fishing village that enjoyed huge prosperity not just from fishing but from the processing of the catch. All of that was built on the hard and, let us acknowledge, dangerous work that was done by the fishing fleet.

I am blessed in that I can speak with a little authority on these issues, because I am supported by Angus Carson, a colleague and very good friend who is a councillor for the Ards area and who was the captain of a fishing vessel for many years. He still resides in Portavogie, and his family is still involved in the fishing industry. I am very aware of the daily impact of what was a very long and hard winter, when the vessels were not able to sail for eight, nine or 10 weeks in a row. Admittedly, the past couple of weeks have been better weeks, but we have to look at that in the broader context of decline and against a background where, if the days at sea do not get you, the quotas will, and, if the quotas do not get you, the days at sea will.

I was lobbied recently by some current and former fishermen who made the point that there was no assistance for the fleet at present. In fact, rather than help, there is hindrance. They have to spend £5,000 on AIS, which is the equivalent of satnav in the modern car. They talk about the monitoring, controlling, surveillance and policing of their work, and they equate it to the taking away of their civil rights. Where else, they ask, would you have a profession in which your every little action is supervised and policed to the extent that it is when you take to the seas? The fishermen call on the Executive to help, not least because they saw the bad weather payments that farmers got. They do not envy farmers; they understand that they deserve what they get.

I was disappointed when given a copy of a letter from the Minister to a spokesman for one of the fishing fleets. First, the Minister argued that the Department would go no further because it had already given:

“a year’s funding of harbour landing and berthing dues that was not provided by any other Administration.”

Secondly, she argued that, in London:

“Since 2008, DEFRA has been paying light dues ... on behalf of its fishing fleets.”

The point is that this year’s funding of harbour landing and berthing dues by the Department was a one-off, whereas DEFRA gives support year on year. It was disappointing that the Minister finished her letter with:

“A further hardship scheme would not represent value for money.”

What would represent value for money when it comes to preserving the fishing fleets and their communities?

I hope that the Minister will address the issue of £18 million in the European Fisheries Fund and whether it was fully allocated in the past financial year. I welcome the fact that there will be a research and development fund, particularly to look at highly selective gear, because those lobbying me said that they did not know whether nets should be of 78, 80, 200 or 300 millimetre mesh. There needs to be clarity on that.

To preserve the fishing fleets, we should look at succession planning to resolve the seemingly endless dispute over scientific evidence. We should do so with a vision for the fleet that is strategic, realistic —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member’s time is almost up.

Mr Nesbitt: — and, above all, offers those living in fishing villages such as Portavogie hope for the future.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members, there has been considerable interest in the debate, and you may take interventions, but I am unable to give you additional time.

Mr McCarthy: First, I thank my Strangford Assembly colleague Michelle McIlveen for successfully bringing this matter to the Floor this evening. I fully support that. Our fishing industry has been in crisis for many years, and, unfortunately, the downward spiral continues.

My experience is with the fishing fleet from my neighbouring village of Portavogie, which undoubtedly suffers in exactly the same way as their counterparts in Ardglass and Kilkeel. They have witnessed a once-thriving industry, at sea and in the onshore processing plants, gradually go down the tubes. Today, in most cases, any work by the fleet is, unfortunately, done at a loss, and that is simply not sustainable. I pay tribute to the fishermen, who have a very hard life. Their work is very hard, and many have lost their life in pursuit of the industry. We must recognise that it is a very hard industry. Nevertheless, they carry on.

At many meetings of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, of which I am a member, the plight of our fishing fleet has been raised, and the disastrous situation has been brought to the attention of the fisheries Minister. Despite her concern and efforts, the downward spiral continues. Much has been said about the common fisheries policy, and hopes for a better future have been raised many times, but, unfortunately, that never happens. At present, the fishing fleet faces hugely increased costs, particularly for fuel. Some of the stories I have heard about how a once proud industry is reduced to skilled fishermen hanging on to their trade by a thread are horrendous. I appeal to the Minister, who is in the Chamber with us today, to do whatever she possibly can and indeed more to introduce some grant assistance or a hardship fund, call it what you will, to preserve this industry before it is lost once and for all.

I recently met some Portavogie fishermen to hear at first hand about the difficulties that they face. These are men who have given their entire life to the industry. They know everything about fishing that has to be known and they know how to run a successful business but, because of the bureaucracy and rules in the industry, they are at their wits’ end as to how to make ends meet. They are being asked to do things at their own expense and they know that is not going to work. They have been on the sea for a lifetime and they know right from wrong, but they are largely ignored. Senior fisheries officials were present at our meeting, and they acknowledged that the fishermen were the experts on these things. They appreciated the unlimited knowledge that the fishermen have. That somewhat pleased the fishermen, because up until now, the bureaucrats from God knows where lay down the rules despite what these fishermen, who have such a vast experience, have said. They were pleased that at least the officials acknowledged that they knew how to go about their business.

There seems to be an uneven playing field for our local fishing fleet. That was the message passed on to the officials. Other boats seem to be able to fish in our waters and get away with a bigger catch, and there are other inequalities, to the annoyance of the locals. I hope that the Minister will listen to the plea from the fishing industry and their representatives and agree to give some support, which is urgently required to keep the industry afloat and to provide for a future industry for our young people, not only in Portavogie, but in Ardglass and Kilkeel.

Mr Bell: I endorse the call for a hardship fund for the fishing community in Portavogie. It is more than just the people who go out on the boats; an entire community has been decimated over a number of years. It has been said in the past; I think that the 2009 figures were somewhere around 650, which is 50% of the previous set of figures that we had for the fishing community in Portavogie before, which stood at something like just short of 1,400. We have got a fishing community that is declining in numbers, and the question that the Minister has to ask today is not so much whether she can afford to do this. I appreciate that budgets are tight — I have seen the Executive’s Budget and there is not a lot of wriggle room in it — but I think the real question for the Minister, if we refocus it a little, is whether we can afford not to do something for the fishing community.

I congratulate my colleague on securing the debate. It is a very relevant debate, because the fishing community is not at fault: I do not think that it can be blamed for the price of fuel, and it certainly cannot be blamed for an easterly wind. I spent a number of hours at the community centre down there in Portavogie last Friday, and I know the area reasonably well. There are songs in history about favourable easterly winds, and I can tell you that the easterly wind that has affected the fishing community in Portavogie at this minute is absolutely nothing to celebrate. Through no fault of its own, we have a community under massive pressure, a community that has never relied on welfare. Historically, if you look at the area and compare it to any other area of Northern Ireland, it compares extremely favourably. These are hard-working, decent people who put in a hard shift for several hours of the day, sacrifice their family time and go for days on end, and all they are looking for is a fair playing field to bring something back home. Through no fault of their own, but because of easterly winds, costs of fuel and restrictions from Brussels, they are on their knees. It is time to allow those people, who have put so much into the system and paid so much into Northern Ireland, to get something back out when they are at a critical point.

In 2011, we lost the 30 fishing jobs at Euro Shellfish. At that time, Sam Warnock of the Northern Ireland Fish Producers' Organisation said something very interesting. He said that the fishing industry was "going down the drain". He said that, for the fishermen, it was an industry that was expected to go on and that they expected to pass to the next generation. However, he concluded, just two years ago, by saying that no young person could go into a bank to get finance to invest in the fishing industry because the banks simply would not support them.

We have heard before about the fishing village initiatives, and we have had the fishing villages task force. However, we need a sense of hope that more will come through from axis 4. When Jim Shannon, the MP for the area, came up with Councillor Robert Adair to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, they raised the issue of what is available to help the community through this period and to allow it to continue. We took that debate on at Stormont with Diane Dodds and the Minister in DEFRA. Everybody realises the nature of the problem, but we now have to focus on the nature of the solution. A fisheries commissioner said:

"I believe that small-scale fishermen greatly contribute to the economic progress and the preservation of distinctive social and cultural ... communities."

Our small-scale fishermen are finding it extremely difficult, and they look to you, Minister, to see —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Bell: — given all the pressures that they are under, whether you can provide hardship funding. As they have put so much in, it is surely now time to give the Portavogie fishermen something back.

Mr McNarry: At the outset, I say well done to Michelle McIlveen. Your case presentation was the best that I have heard in a long time on this matter and on fishing in particular.

Let me trawl another angle to the Members. In any illness, there are two ways to treat the patient: treat the symptoms or treat the underlying illness. Treating the underlying illness is the only way to affect a long-term real cure. My medical analogy is, of course, a reflection on the fishing industry. The symptoms that I refer to are the rules imposed by the EU common fisheries policy. Treating those symptoms is simply another way of saying that we are trying to tweak the rules. But we are still living within the rules.

To treat a sick fishing industry means throwing away the rule book and getting rid of the common fisheries policy in its entirety. Only one party in the United Kingdom is committed to doing precisely that: it is UKIP. The common fisheries policy is the illness facing the fishermen in the fishing community of Portavogie. UKIP deplores the decision to sign over control of British fishing grounds, which contain nearly 70% of Europe's fish, to the EU common fisheries policy. UKIP has made the following pledges, and the fishermen of Portavogie must hear them. The United Kingdom must immediately withdraw from the common fisheries policy. The United Kingdom must reassert our territorial rights, reclaim our fishing grounds, restore our fishing fleet and support our own fishing industry for future generations. The United Kingdom must return £2.5 billion a year in fish sales to the United Kingdom economy. The UK must establish an exclusive economic zone extending 200 nautical miles from the UK coastline, over which the UK alone exerts total control. The United Kingdom must abandon all EU quotas and strictly forbid the shameful discarding of dead fish. Sometimes, up to 70% of catches are discarded, which is a shameful and wasteful total of around 800,000 tons a year. The United Kingdom must require that all — all, not some — commercial species of fish that are caught, regardless of size or species, must be landed and recorded.

UKIP believes that all this will allow a proper government to determine how best to manage the recovery of United Kingdom fishing grounds. To preserve the fish stocks, UKIP has proposed the establishment of a system of movable no-take zones, allowing fish to spawn and assisting recovery in overfished areas. UKIP plans to ban all forms of industrial fishing and pair trawling for bass. As we know, industrial trawlers have helped to cause a catastrophic decline in key fish species. UKIP will strengthen the United Kingdom's fishery protection force to guard British fishing grounds, so it is no more softly-softly. There it is in a nutshell: the cure, not the treatment of symptoms.

With respect, I know that Members to whom I have listened tonight and over many years are genuine and are trying to make things better for the Portavogie fishermen, but what is being suggested is not enough. It can never be enough until we come out of the EU. The real cure and the UKIP solution is to get out of the common fisheries policy and the EU. That is the best thing for the industry in general and for Portavogie in particular.

In the 10 seconds that I have left, I apologise to the Minister. I know that she is ill, but I have a prior commitment, and I am sorry that I have to leave and will not hear her response. I will read it in Hansard.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I join Members in thanking my colleague from Strangford for securing this pertinent and useful debate. I find myself agreeing with much of what she said about the context, although I perhaps differ on her analysis of the situation and the remedies that are or are not available.

All of us agree about the importance of a local fishing industry in Portavogie, Ardglass and, obviously, Kilkeel. We also agree that the local industry has experienced difficult times in recent months, which have brought pressures on the homes of many fishing families in Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel. I will not equivocate: many in our agriculture industry, as in our local economy in general, including construction and farming, are experiencing tough times, which affect many homes across the North.

As Members outlined, the reasons are varied. Crucially, the changing dynamics of the common fisheries policy have created certain pressures that the industry has been tackling over the past number of months, specifically the entire episode with selective gear, which was outlined. To this end, I welcome the Minister's recent announcement that she is establishing a research and development fund that is specifically designed to meet the challenges of European legislation and to enable our local industry to overcome future hurdles in this regard. I am not sure whether final plans have been put in place, but, as far as I can see from the press, it will be a significant investment representing hundreds of thousands of pounds for the adoption of fishing gear in line with European regulations. The establishment of the fund will be matched with an investment by the Minister in the upskilling of our fleet in safety training and upgraded safety features for the vessels. In addition, the Minister has confirmed that, subject to the completion of a business case, she will meet the full cost of replacing our local fleet's satellite monitoring system. That proposal represents hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Taking those three measures as a whole, the local fishing fleet will benefit from a substantial investment by the Minister and the Department that is just shy of £1 million. As our local industry grapples with the evolving challenges emanating from the common fisheries policy, especially any upcoming obligation to land all catches of fish — Members touched on that — we must recognise the significant measures that the Minister has initiated in recent weeks.

Will those measures help solve every problem and difficulty in the industry? Maybe not, but I am sure that the Minister, and indeed, all of us here this evening, will continue to engage with the local industry to help overcome the difficulties that may persist. It is important to lay this out: one thing that will definitely not help the industry is the inevitable detrimental impact of a reduced European budget and EFF that the DUP advocated at Westminster in calling for a reduction in the European budget. That is one thing that certainly will not help the local fishing industry.

Although I wholeheartedly accept the difficult circumstances that our local fishing industry has worked in over the last number of months, I am not convinced that a hardship package at this time represents appropriate use of public funds. Let me emphasise the phrase "at this time". If, indeed, we find ourselves here later in the year, in October or November, and our fishing industry has endured a terrible summer, such a demand for a hardship payment might well be justified. We must recognise that, although poor weather had a detrimental effect on landings in March and April, landings in other months were as expected. As I say, if we are back here in the autumn and we can list months on end during which landings have been decimated, then so be it, but we must be mindful that our most productive months still lie ahead and no fish quotas or days at sea have been lost. There is every chance that the rest of this year may bring great opportunities. Indeed, it should be remembered that, when a previous hardship package for our fishing industry was brought forward in 2008, the fleet went on to land more fish in that year than it had done in a century. That is an important point: there is plenty of time left in this year.

I fully recognise the difficulties that our local fishing fleet has endured — the evolving CFP represents various challenges and will do in the future — but, equally, I recognise the response that the Minister has initiated. On the issue of hardship payments, as I have outlined, I do not think that the time for it is now. If we are still here in the autumn or winter and the case remains the same, that is the time for it. We must make perfect use of public funds.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Member opposite for bringing the debate to the House.

Why is this important? As the Members opposite said, fishing makes a major contribution to our economy of up to £50 million. We are talking about expanding the agrifood industry; surely, fishing is central to that. It also creates jobs in fish processing. Another Member mentioned the solidarity of the fishing community: it goes right through — I was going to say to the chip shop, but it goes there as well.

Our fishermen are experiencing considerable hardship. Fishermen feel aggrieved that, after the terrible winter, farmers got a hardship package and they did not. However, there are many other hardships out there, many of them man-made. One of them would be like the slogan used in the washing machine advert: "The appliance of science". Fishermen know what stocks are in the sea, as opposed to what the scientists think is in the sea. There is that conflict. EU quotas and so on have been mentioned, as have the days at sea, the discards, the charges in Isle of Man waters and the requirement for different gear in different areas. In the past, when a fishing boat went out of Portavogie or Kilkeel and fished up along the Scottish coast and down along the English coast, it used one set of gear. Now it would need three sets of gear to do that. Other things such as plans for wind farms bring anxiety to farmers. Other people touched on that, and there are fuel costs, bank charges, poor prices and all that.

What affects Portavogie will affect Kilkeel and Ardglass. Portavogie is a lovely little fishing port in the borough of Ards. It is the easternmost settlement in Ireland and a real asset to the local community. The fishing fleet in Portavogie is experiencing many challenges that must be addressed, if we are to sustain this local industry. It has a good harbour and a good fleet that catches mainly prawns and herrings. Fish auctions on the quays are commonplace. The history of the fishing industry around our coast is captured throughout our towns. For example, in Portavogie, there are murals on the exterior of the local school. That shows that the people of Portavogie hold fishing in high esteem. So, it is imperative, therefore, that measures are put in place to support the community as it comes under market pressures.

If Brussels imposes further measures on fishermen, it will have a serious impact on fishing fleets and the fish processing industries along the coast. We talked quite a bit about EU quotas, and our Southern colleagues come out of the EU quotas better than we do.

I agree with other Members that we need a hardship payment but not a hardship payment for the fishermen alone; it should be for the fishing communities. Minister Attwood raised the plight of fishermen at last week's Executive meeting. I cannot agree with Chris: the fishermen are on their knees, and this hardship needs to be tackled immediately if we are to have a fishing industry next year. It is essential that the fishing communities and the fishing industry throughout the County Down ports are sustained and protected. I ask the Minister to consider axis 4 and let us know what is happening with that.

Mr Wells: This is the story of the three Michelles: the good, the bad and the very bad. I was not going to go down the route that you were expecting, I can assure you [Laughter.] The good, of course, is the honourable Member for Strangford, the young and virtuous Michelle McIlveen, the fearless champion of the fishing industry in Portavogie and, indeed, throughout County Down. She made a very eloquent case for supporting our fishing industry. Then there was Michelle Gildernew — whatever happened to Michelle Gildernew? — the former Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, who was less hostile, I have to be fair, to the fishing industry than her younger successor. She tried, I think, at times to empathise with the industry. She failed, but at least she was prepared to sit down with the industry and discuss its concerns at length and give a sympathetic ear. Then we have the honourable Member for Coalisland, who has vast experience of a fishing industry in Fermanagh and South Tyrone and is showing all of that experience in her decisions.

I was first elected to the Assembly in 1982, and, on 12 July, all the fishing fleet came in for the holiday period. You could physically walk from one side of Kilkeel harbour to the other on the top of the trawlers pulled up for the Twelfth fortnight. If the honourable Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone were to try that now, she would sink very quickly indeed, such has been the dramatic fall in the number of fishing trawlers not only in Portavogie but in Kilkeel and Ardglass. It is a terribly sad sight to see the decline of the trawling fleet. We have a few pelagics left, we have next to no cod or white fish fleet at all, and now we have all our eggs in one basket: prawns.

The Minister's split personality is interesting. This is the Minister who is perfectly happy to give out — in my opinion, quite rightly — very significant subsidies to the farming community. At the last count, the single farm payment came to £310 million, although that depends on the level of the euro. I was very supportive of the introduction of single farm payments. Society is saying to the farming community, "There are certain restrictions on what you can do in your industry. There are various measures — you cannot pull out your hedges, you cannot drain your wetland and you cannot use fertilizers or pesticides in certain circumstances — and we recognise that that restricts your ability to bring in a decent income. So, we in the European community and in the British Exchequer decided to give you a single farm payment as compensation for the role that you play in environmental protection". I think that that is a win-win situation for the farmer and the general community. What does the fishing industry get? It gets no single farm payment-type payments at all. It gets nothing.

We had the situation that developed at the end of the spring, around Easter, when we had the terrible snowfalls that afflicted my constituency, East Antrim etc. What did the Minister do? Quite rightly, she immediately announced a £5 million emergency payment to the farmers, but it never occurred to her in Coalisland that the wind that brought the snows and the rain to the farmers of East Antrim and South Down also affected the fishing fleet. That was ongoing for many weeks, and they simply could not go out and catch a decent income for them and their families. In her response to a written question that I submitted, the Minister said that any form of subsidy or grant aid would not represent good value. Good value to whom? Presumably, good value to her Department, but with absolutely no thought for the implications for rural coastal communities in Northern Ireland.

I am afraid that the impression that I get from this Minister is "The answer is no. Now what is the question?". There seems to be no empathy, support or understanding for the fishing community. That is unfortunate. Sadly, I have to say this: she knows that there are no votes for her or her party in her stance. There are certainly no votes in the fishing industry in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, and there are certainly no votes for any of her party's main support bases. I wonder whether that is the reason for what is going on.

Mr Frew: I applaud and support the Adjournment debate that has been brought by my colleague Michelle McIlveen. It is a very timely one in support of the fishing industry, in particular the port of Portavogie, which is struggling.

I will blow out of the water some of the myths that have gone around this place tonight. The comment was made that the industry is sick. It is not sick; it just needs to be supported. When the UKIP Member reads the Minister's statement in Hansard tomorrow, I hope that he will read what I have said, and I hope that he will apologise to the industry. It is not sick. It is an industry that is here for the long haul. It is a sustainable industry that, with the right support, can make millions of pounds for the economy and can produce good, decent, high-protein food.

I acknowledge that the Minister is, indeed, ill. She was off yesterday, and, if she has read yesterday's Hansard, I hope that she will acknowledge that, in my lambasting of her with regard to the farming industry, I wished her well in her illness and wished her a speedy recovery. However, let us get back to the job at hand — the fishing industry.

The weather plays a major part, and my colleague Jim Wells said it right: the easterly wind that brought the snow also brought hardship to the fishing industry of this country. That needs to be recognised. You have to draw parallels between fishing and farming; it is all agriculture, or, at least, it should all be deemed agriculture. It is about producing food. When the common agricultural policy and the CFP are produced from Europe, that is an acknowledgement from Europe that those industries — this agriculture — are not your normal industries. There is a social element that we depend on, and it is to produce food and it is about food security. Fisheries are as much a part of that as agriculture. It might be smaller in Northern Ireland, but it is just as important in the food that it produces through its protein. That food could be used and exported all around the world. If we get that right, very little of it will be wasted. It is important that the Minister sees fit to support the industry in the best way forward.

Let us look at the parallels. When we had the snow crisis, which affected only a small sector of farming, we were able to announce within days that we were looking for a hardship fund, and rightly so. We were able to pull millions out of somewhere to relieve the pressure on hill farmers. It is not good enough to say, "Well, it is a small section. The fishing industry is here and there and is comparable to other industries". We should support our fishing industry, and we should acknowledge the weather and its impact. It is agri-food; it is part of the industry.

9.15 pm

We have the 'Going for Growth' document. Let me tell you, the fishermen and the trawlermen, like the farming industry, which is another parallel, cannot yet relate to that document. They can see what it means and what it aspires to but cannot yet see the mode of travel to get from where it is to where it should be. That is a challenge for the Minister. She must bridge that gap and give hope to an industry.

I want to nail a point that her colleague Mr Hazzard made about the EFF and reductions in the budget. That would be OK if he and the Minister could demonstrate why only £10 million of the available £18 million has been committed. We have to get better at using the funding and support that we already have.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Frew: I commend Michelle McIlveen for bringing this before us. I appeal to and plead with the Minister not to turn her face from fisheries and to support them with some sort of funding that will make them even more sustainable and get them by this lean period.

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I hope that my voice holds out until the end of the debate.

I thank Michelle McIlveen for securing the debate. We have another debate at the start of next week, so I welcome the opportunity that we will have then to discuss the fishing industry further. You should not be sorry for securing the debate: it is a worthy topic. I am happy to come to the Chamber whenever needed to discuss it further with all Members.

I hope to be able to address many of the issues that Members raised but also to set out the position that I have taken to date and my assessment of the current position. I assure the Member for South Down Jim Wells that my position is not based on populist politics. I am absolutely interested in making sure that I carry out my role seriously, and I respond to the needs of the industries that I am here to represent and work with. Whilst he may not agree with everything that I do or say, I want to make that point clear from the start.

I understand that the Portavogie fishermen are frustrated. It has been such a difficult year so far with the weather but also towards the end of 2012, as the Member rightly set out in her opening remarks. Members have called for a hardship fund similar to that being offered to the farming community. Whilst I recognise that both sectors were affected by the bad weather, farmers experienced physical stock and fodder losses, which is different, and those have to be replaced.

Poor weather in March and April definitely had a dramatic effect on landings, and I totally take that on board. However, landings in January, February and May were more typical for this time of year. For the year to the end of May, landings of prawns by our fleet into Portavogie were down about 22% overall compared with the five-year average for this stage of the year. Although I fully accept that that is significant for the vessels, particularly when our vessels are not fishing, fish quotas and days at sea are not used up when they are not fishing. The fishing opportunities, the quota and days at sea still remain for 2013. The Member pointed out that she did not accept that there is time to make up the ground. I do not necessarily agree with that assessment.

My colleague set out very clearly the position as things stand at this moment in time. I believe that a pure hardship package is not appropriate at this moment in time. However, I recognise that the industry is going through a challenging period, and I am happy to keep that under review. I take it on board that more changes will arise as a result of the new common fisheries policy.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes.

Mr Wells: The Member may welcome the opportunity to rest her voice for a few seconds. What she said was significant: she confirmed that the catch was down by 22% at the end of March. She seems to be tantalisingly suggesting that, if that situation remains at the end of the year and there is a very significant drop in catch, she will revisit the idea of a hardship package and consider introducing some form of grant aid or help for the fishing community. Can she confirm that that is indeed the case?

Mrs O'Neill: My door is never closed to anything. I clearly said that I did not believe that a hardship package was justified at this moment in time. There are opportunities in the weeks and months ahead for the days at sea to be used and the quotas to be fished. If we find ourselves in a difficult situation further down the line, I will be very happy to look at the situation again. I think that I have made that very clear, and I have put out a press release to that effect. I hope that that message is getting out there. As I said, I believe that, at this moment in time, that is not where we are at.

I recognise the problems that the fishing industry has been dealing with and the challenges that it has ahead, particularly because of the common fisheries policy. We have been looking at what other measures we can take to support the industry. Financial resources will be made available through the European Fisheries Fund to include the establishment of a research and development fund, specifically to develop fishing gear with very low rates of unwanted fish. We will need to discuss the details of that with the industry, but it is anticipated that, over the next two years, some £200,000 of support will be available for the adoption of highly selective devices, and around £300,000 of support will be available towards a complete change of fishing gear. In addition, further financial assistance will be provided to the industry to review and improve skills and safety within the fleet. Finally, subject to the completion of a business case, I will consider support for the full cost of replacing the fishing fleet's current vessel satellite monitoring systems with a new multifunctional system. Subject to approval, that will be worth around £240,000 to the fleet. Contrary to what Miss McIlveen has said, I do not think that that is unwelcome. It is a £240,000 cost to the industry, and it is something that I will be able to support the industry with, subject to the business case. I do not think that that is something to be dismissed and thrown to the side.

I am picking up on some of the points that were made, particularly around highly selective gears. Again, Miss McIlveen picked up on the issue of highly selective gears. Had I not intervened and had I not gone to the Commission in Brussels and talked to it about what our industry was prepared to do, the industry would have had a Swedish grid imposed on it. That is something that the industry did not want. We were also able to get agreement from the Commission not to cut quotas, because we were able to go away and trial our own gear. Those are things that the industry was supporting. To me, that was a very positive move, and, had we not done those things, we would have had a much more difficult 2012. Again, I think that that is testimony to the support that I am prepared to give to the fishing industry: the fact that I am able to go out to Europe and fight the industry's corner and the fact that I went again in December and got an increase in quota. I do not think that anyone can dismiss those as the acts of someone who does not look towards the interests of the fishing community. I put that on record.

The need for the vessel decommissioning scheme is complex, and you will find different views even within the industry. You will have the catching sector's view and the processing sector's view. Even within the catching sector, you will have a good variance of views. So, it is not a simple process. After meeting lots of industry representatives, I undertook to consider the vessel decommissioning scheme again last year. When I talked to the industry, it was made clear to me that it was not something that it was interested in, because it did not want to have a cap on the capacity for the time after that. That was a decision that was taken on the basis of listening to all views. You cannot listen to just the catching sector; you also have to be mindful of the processing sector. They are all equal partners in their contribution to the agrifood industry.

I have set out the three areas that we have worked at in respect of financial assistance, and I have said that I am committed to working with the industry in the time ahead, when we see how the next number of months pan out.

I think that it was Mike Nesbitt who asked about what EFF has been spent to date. There has been just under £10.4 million in grant awarded to 160 projects across six measures, and around £7.12 million of that has been spent to date. It is significant.

Jonathan Bell asked about looking to the future and EFF. By way of an update, I say that the Department is currently considering an axis 4 local development strategy and associated business case. That has been submitted by the south east fisheries local action group (SEFLAG). The business case, once approved, envisages a further investment of £2.5 million of public investment in the fishing-dependent communities in County Down. Consistent with the EFF ethos of a bottom-up approach, the SEFLAG will be responsible for selecting the projects to be funded. The extent of the investment that Portavogie will receive will, therefore, depend on the grant applications that have been made through the SEFLAG's decision on those applications. I am sure that Portavogie will have quite a good opportunity to be able to avail itself of that.

I think that what I have set out makes it very clear that I fully support a thriving, sustainable fishing industry into the future. I was delighted that it was part of the overall agrifood strategy work and part of a subcommittee. That is important because we need to look at future challenges and what the industry needs to survive. I accept that there are challenges, but Members should take it on board that I am taking action and am committed to looking at the industry in the future. I will do that in the time ahead.

In finishing, I will point out that I am from Clonoe, which is a small village outside Coalisland. We are very parochial down my way. I point that out to the Member for South Down. I also put it on the record that I represent Mid Ulster not Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Adjourned at 9.25 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 17 June 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Speaker's Business

Public Petition: Sculpture Celebrating the Shirt Factory Women of Derry/Londonderry

Mr Deputy Speaker: Ms Maeve McLaughlin has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First of all, I welcome the opportunity to present this public petition on the Floor of the Assembly. The issue of the factory girls sculpture for Derry has been dragging on for the past seven years. The work was commissioned, a site was identified and an artist was appointed some years ago. However, work on the original site was halted because of issues outside the artist's control. An alternative site in Harbour Square in Derry was then identified, but, since then, the project has faced a series of obstacles and bureaucracy, resulting in the artist withdrawing her support and services from the project in a very public manner earlier this year.

Part of the artwork lies rusting in storage. This has been totally unacceptable not only to the artist but to the many tens of thousands of Derry women and, indeed, Derry men who worked in factories for many generations and were, in effect, the backbone of the Derry economy. Their role and their stories deserve to be remembered as part of the fabric of Derry's history. Taking seven years to erect a sculpture is not acceptable in anybody's book. It begs this question: did the will exist to do this?

I want to acknowledge those who, over the past number of months, have not let the issue die or have refused to let it go and have been to the fore of this campaign. They are able to join us today. I want to single out a number of people: Isabel Doherty; Clare Moore; Mary Doherty; Margaritta Matthews; and Diana King, who, unfortunately, cannot be here today.

I urge the Minister for Social Development to listen to the people of the city, to unlock the blockages that exist, to allow the story of many, many thousands of Derry women to be heard and to allow this sculpture to be erected in order to ensure that it is a lasting legacy of the City of Culture 2013.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will forward the petition to the Minister for Social Development and send a copy to the Chairperson of the Committee.

Assembly Business

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. According to the public media, last Friday, a significant economic pact that affects the House and the Executive of the House was apparently agreed. Yet again, we come to the House this week and it seems that there is no plan for any statement about that matter. When, if at all, will the contempt of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) for this House be reigned in? Might we expect to have a statement made at some point so that the Members might be informed?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the House will understand that other events are taking place today that may be keeping the First Minister and deputy First Minister fully occupied. Of that, I have no doubt. However, I am sure that they will also be considering how they might inform the Assembly about recent developments.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. My point of order is in respect of a recent interpretation and application of Standing Orders 17(4) and 17(5). The Assembly is governed not only by these Standing Orders but by the precedent set by rulings of the Speaker and yourselves. I refer you to a ruling made by the Speaker on 27 September 2011, where he set out arrangements for the speaking order, who can speak and when people are allowed to speak. Standing Orders call for a consultation between the Business Committee and the Speaker, and I wonder whether the appropriate consultation has taken place. I also wonder why such action should be taken when it affects only one party to its detriment. This goes against the principles of inclusivity in the House, and perhaps it might have been better to wait until the Committee on Procedures had reported before a decision was made.

Ms Ruane: Further to that point of order, I would like the House to know that my party was happy with the way it was working. We believe in inclusivity and are disappointed that it has changed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Sorry, I really need to deal with the first point of order first, and I should have done that.

Speaking arrangements are a matter for the Business Committee in consultation with the Speaker. I do not intend to allow the House to open up this issue or to engage in a debate about the Business Committee's decision. What I will say is that the Committee on Procedures will be asked to consider issues relating to the emergence of new political parties or groupings during a mandate, including speaking arrangements. In the interim, the order in which Members may be called to speak has been revised. I will take no further points of order on the matter. If Members have queries, they should approach the Table. We will move on.

Mr B McCrea: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I have made it perfectly clear that I do not intend to take any other points of order, and I ask the Member to resume his seat.

Financial Provisions Bill: First Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to introduce the Financial Provisions Bill [NIA 22/11-15], which is a Bill to repeal the Development Loans (Agriculture and Fisheries) Act (Northern Ireland) 1968; to enable the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to pay grants to certain harbour authorities; to make provision in relation to the payment of interest on funds in court; to make provision enabling the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to recover certain costs; to make provision for the disclosure of data obtained by the Comptroller and Auditor General for data matching purposes; to enable the Department of Justice to make payments to certain bodies providing services for the police, etc.; and for purposes connected with those matters.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Assembly Business

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is about the use of unparliamentary language in the Chamber. On 24 November 2009, the Speaker made a ruling about expecting:

"standards of courtesy, good temper and moderation." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 46, p81, col 1].

When discussing the Budget (No. 2) Bill, the Minister of Finance and Personnel, from a sedentary position, called me a fool twice. It is on the record. I wonder whether that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Member was in the Chamber. He knows well that that was the time to raise the issue, not now.

Public Service Pensions Bill: First Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to introduce the Public Service Pensions Bill [NIA 23/11-15], which is a Bill to make provision for public service pension schemes; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Budget (No. 2) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Sammy Wilson, to move the Consideration Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Deputy Speaker: No amendments have been tabled to the Bill. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to group the seven clauses of the Bill for the Question on stand part, followed by the three schedules and the long title.

Clauses 1 to 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedules 1 to 3 agreed to.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Licensing of Pavement Cafés Bill: First Stage

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to introduce the Licensing of Pavement Cafés Bill [NIA 24/11-15], which is a Bill to make provision for the regulation by district councils of the placing on public areas of furniture for use for the consumption of food or drink.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Gambling (Licensing and Advertising) Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):
I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the Gambling (Licensing and Advertising) Bill.

The Gambling (Licensing and Advertising) Bill was introduced at Westminster on 9 May 2013. The primary purpose of the Bill is to alter the regulatory system of remote gambling in Great Britain so that it is regulated on a point-of-consumption basis rather than point of supply, as is currently the case. The proposal to reform remote gambling legislation was announced by John Penrose MP, the then Minister for Tourism and Heritage, on 14 July 2011. It is intended that the legislation will come into force in December 2014.

Under the new system, operators who wish to transact with consumers in Great Britain will be required to obtain a licence from the Gambling Commission and will be subject to its regulations, technical standards and social responsibility requirements. That will mean, for example, that operators are required to assist in the fight against illegal activity and corruption in sports betting by informing the Gambling Commission of suspicious betting patterns.

Members will be aware that gambling is a devolved matter. However, the advertising of foreign gambling in Northern Ireland is regulated by section 331 of the Westminster Gambling Act 2005. As part of the current Bill, it is necessary to repeal this provision, which had the potential to leave Northern Ireland consumers exposed to unregulated remote gambling operators. For this reason, provisions will be included that require remote gambling operators to have a Gambling Commission licence to advertise to Northern Ireland consumers. As a result, consumers here can be assured that they will continue to have the same protection as consumers in Great Britain from the advertising of remote gambling.

In summary, I welcome the introduction of the Gambling (Licensing and Advertising) Bill at Westminster and that its provisions will be extended to Northern Ireland. I trust that Members will approve the legislative consent motion before the House, which will ensure that Northern Ireland consumers are protected from advertisements by unlicensed remote gambling operators.

Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for bringing this legislative consent motion to the Assembly. The Minister has, of course, outlined the reason for this.

The Committee considered the idea of the Department here proceeding unilaterally but felt, after receiving advice from the Minister and guidance from the Department, that that would be unnecessary at this point.

The Committee had briefings from the Department on the wider issue of gambling legislation. Of course, we understand that gambling can be a contentious issue. Although the industry undoubtedly provides employment, there are potential risks. We know that individuals, unfortunately, can and do run up unmanageable debts that can have a wider impact on their family and friends. Therefore, the Committee has taken the view that we must strive to strike a balance between the protection of the consumer and facilitating the development of the gambling industry.

Although the Committee supports entirely the LCM before us today, we look forward to discussing with the Department further developments in wider gambling legislation.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Chair of the Social Development Committee for his comments on the legislative consent motion. I appreciate the time that the Committee took to consider the matter when dealing with a wide range of other important legislation.

I welcome the broad agreement for the proposal to extend this to Northern Ireland. Consumers here need to be protected from unregulated remote gambling operators, and the consent of the Assembly is required if they are to benefit from the protection that the Bill provides. I thank Members for their support and seek their approval for the legislative consent motion as tabled.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the Gambling (Licensing and Advertising) Bill.

Integrated Endometriosis Service

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Ms S Ramsey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I beg to move

That this Assembly calls on the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to initiate and expedite an inquiry into the urgent need for an integrated endometriosis service to address the severe suffering experienced by women with this condition across Northern Ireland.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. On behalf of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I am delighted to move the motion. I hope that the Minister is on his way. If not, Mr Deputy Speaker, I ask that a copy of the Hansard report be given to him. This is a very important motion and a very important issue that the Committee has taken on. I accept that, given the day that is in it, people are probably caught up in other places.

Endometriosis is a condition that many people know very little about, and I assume that many in the Chamber know very little about it. It affects one in every 10 women between the ages of 25 and 45. The exact cause of the condition remains unclear, although the disease has been known of for decades.

Endometriosis behaves like cancer, although the abnormal tissue is non-malignant. It is caused by the growth of abnormal tissue in places outside the womb, typically the ovaries. It can spread within and outside the pelvis and can invade the bladder and the bowel. Women who suffer the condition have what they initially believe to be period pain. However, as the disease progresses, women can suffer chronic pelvic pain, pain on urinating and pain associated with bowel movement. It is a long-term condition, and at the minute there is no cure.

The disease not only causes extreme pain but, if untreated, can lead to reduced fertility and, indeed, infertility. There is also a strong link with depression. Women with endometriosis often have to take long periods off work. They develop issues with their body image and relationship difficulties. That can all lead to low self-esteem and depression.

One of the problems that women with endometriosis face is getting a diagnosis in the first place. The symptoms can vary greatly and often mimic those of other conditions. Unfortunately, that means that, on average, women wait from seven and a half to nine years for a diagnosis. A recent survey showed that many women wait nearly two years before visiting their GP about their symptoms and that, on average, it is a further four years before they are referred to a specialist. The condition is progressive, so that, by the time that it has been diagnosed, about 5% to 10% of sufferers have the severe form of the disease. Action needs to be taken to raise awareness among women and GPs on the symptoms of the disease.

Although there is no cure for endometriosis, the symptoms can be managed with pain-relieving drugs, hormone therapies and surgery. Those treatments can help manage the pain, reduce the severity of symptoms and improve fertility and quality of life for a woman living with the condition. Guidelines from medical professionals recommend that women with the disease be managed in endometriosis centres by a dedicated multidisciplinary team. Regional endometriosis centres and networks are well established in England, and long-term data demonstrate that those centres improve treatment outcomes in a similar way to improvements in cancer treatment brought about by the introduction of regional cancer centres.

A single dedicated endometriosis clinic staffed by a consultant gynaecologist runs once a month in the Belfast Trust. However, that is not sufficient to treat the number of women with endometriosis. There is a need for a multidisciplinary team to be set up. That would improve waiting times for surgery, which currently can be anything up to 18 months. It would also allow a more holistic form of care to be provided to help women manage the condition; for example, therapies such as counselling and pain management have been shown to be effective. In my view, that sort of service should be provided in a new women and children's hospital. The Committee has recently learnt that the Department intends to proceed with plans to progress that as two separate projects: a new maternity hospital and a new children's hospital. That is far from ideal. We need a hospital dedicated to women's needs that goes much wider than maternity issues.

A condition such as endometriosis can have a devastating impact on a woman's life — on our sisters, our daughters, our nieces and our friends. Effective and timely treatment needs to be prioritised so that women are not suffering in silence or without the proper support and help that they deserve.

A number of weeks ago, I and other Health Committee members had the honour of attending a breakfast meeting facilitated by Barry Turley. We listened to the stories of two women who suffer the condition. To me, as a young woman — well, I think I am a young woman — it was a condition that I knew very little about. There are a number of reasons why we tabled the motion for today. It is to raise awareness among women, families and communities that women who have the condition are suffering. Some of them are suffering severe pain. It is also to raise awareness among our GPs and medical professionals and among the Minister and his Department that it is a condition affecting a lot of women. We need to get our heads around the issue and ensure that services are put in place, look at what is happening and what is best practice in other countries and lift that so that we can move the issue forward here.

One of the women, in sharing her story with us, told us that she attends three different venues in a certain trust area. She has to tell her story three times, and she has to get three sets of notes prepared. She feels that every time she goes for an appointment to deal with the disease it is back to square one. I appeal to the Assembly to support the motion. I appeal to the Minister in his contribution to the debate to tell us exactly what he is going to do to move it forward. I appeal to all in the Assembly: when we talk about the new women and children's hospital, it is not about delivering babies; it is about something that is women-centred, women-focused and designed for women. The sooner we move to get that in place — we have been talking about it over 12 years — the sooner conditions and diseases such as endometriosis can be dealt with in a venue that is solely for women.

Ms P Bradley: I rise as a member of the Health Committee to support the motion. I agree with the Chair of the Committee on the importance of the motion. I hope that, through the motion, awareness will be spread across our country of the importance of women going to attend their doctor with any of these signs or symptoms.

Endometriosis is a condition that blights many women's lives in Northern Ireland. At present, as the Chair said, the average waiting time in Ireland and the UK from the onset of symptoms to diagnosis is nine years. That is nine years of suffering from severe pelvic pain. It can also include painful intercourse and unexplained bleeding. As the symptoms are often similar to so many other conditions, including certain cancers, the uncertainty of waiting to hear what is causing the symptoms can have a severe psychological effect, not only on the women but on their entire family. Often, by the time diagnosis is made, the disease is at the severe end of the scale and can affect other organs in the pelvis.

Severe endometriosis is more common than uterine and cervical cancer combined. The physical and social costs of the condition cannot be underestimated. It causes women to have absences from work and issues with self-image and mental health, and relationships can be impacted negatively. Women with the disease may experience infertility or problems conceiving, which in itself brings on a raft of problems for them and their family. Some 85% of women with the condition experience depression, with 30% of those being in the severe category. Many women also face issues of embarrassment about their condition that can delay them in seeking treatment or gaining understanding from their work colleagues or friends. We need to look for a solution that deals with all those issues and does not focus just on a medical approach to the problem.

It is recognised in the medical world that a gynaecological approach alone is not always successful in the treatment of the condition and in improving the quality of life for sufferers and their families. The best approach is a joined-up, multidisciplinary one. To that end, the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists/British Society for Gynaecological Endoscopy guidelines recommend that women with severe disease or those with intractable symptoms should be treated in endometriosis centres by a dedicated multidisciplinary team.

I am pleased that the Belfast service has been established, but such is the prevalence of the disease that the service is very much under-resourced and disjointed. This means that the service has had to run on an ad hoc basis, relying on considerable goodwill. We need to develop the service into a holistic, women-centred approach on a single site, where medical and surgical treatment can be offered alongside paramedical therapies.

12.30 pm

The condition is of significant cost to the economy, women and the wider community. We have the skills, we have seen that we have the goodwill, and we have the demand.

What we need now is a master plan for how we will provide women with access to timely help to enable them to effectively manage their condition and get effective treatment early to stop it progressing to a more advanced stage. I support the motion.

Mr McDevitt: On behalf of the SDLP, I support the motion. It is worth noting that conventional gynaecological medical and surgical treatments are not always successful in achieving improvements in quality of life for patients with endometriosis and that the input of members of a dedicated multidisciplinary team is always necessary. Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists/British Society for Gynaecological Endoscopy joint guidelines recommend that women with severe cases of the disease or intractable symptoms be managed in recognised endometriosis centres by a dedicated multidisciplinary team. Regional centres and networks are very well established and are, indeed, the practice in England. Long-term data demonstrates that endometriosis centres improve treatment outcomes, similar to how the outcomes of cancer treatment are improved by established regional cancer centres.

The Belfast service was established, headed by a gynaecologist with a special interest in the management of endometriosis. A colorectal surgeon, a urologist with a specialist interest, fertility specialists, a radiologist and members of the pain management team were also part of that centre. Demand for the service in Belfast has increased in recent years due to growing numbers of referrals from within and outside the trust area. The team has operated on an ad hoc basis, with a considerable degree of goodwill, within the confines of the job plans of the consultant staff involved. However, even though it is on a single site, it is a rather disjointed arrangement. As a result of the reorganisation of the service within the Belfast Trust, the service has fragmented even further.

The caseload undertaken in Belfast far exceeds that which is necessary to achieve recognition of the need for an endometriosis centre. Given that, it is disappointing that there is no sign of any planning for such a centre, even in the face of such demonstrable need. I think that there is consensus on the Health Committee that a single dedicated centre, staffed by a consultant gynaecologist, needs to be established and that, as well as the consultant gynaecologist, there needs to be a pain management specialist, a psychologist, a colorectal surgeon, a urologist, and research and specialist nursing support. In my opinion, that is why it is important that the motion is before us today. Holistic, women-centred and women-focused care is essential to improve the symptoms associated with the condition. Medical and surgical therapies play a central role, but paramedical therapies such as counselling and pain management, including cognitive-based therapies and other alternative therapies should also be offered. Ideally, all those services would be located in a specialist centre.

Waiting times for surgery need to be shortened because the impact of the condition on quality of life and ability to function effectively in a social context is profound. Both my female colleagues who spoke before me spoke frankly and honestly about that. As a man, I feel unqualified to comment on the real impact of endometriosis because it is very difficult to understand just how debilitating such a condition must be.

Ms S Ramsey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McDevitt: Yes, indeed.

Ms S Ramsey: I appreciate the Member saying that, and I know that he is not saying that this is just a woman's issue. It is women who suffer from endometriosis, but the condition has an impact on family life. I have listened to husbands and boyfriends who have spoken about the impact that it has had on their relationship because they cannot do anything to support their wife.

Mr McDevitt: I thank the Chair for that observation. I will close by picking up on that remark and make the point that effective clearance of disease results in significantly improved fertility post-operation. The broken family situation that could arise when a spouse contracts endometriosis can quickly and very positively be addressed if the woman in the relationship has access not just to the medical treatment but to the holistic treatment that is required in order that she can play a full role in family life, if she is part of a family, and can receive the support that is necessary from her spouse and her loved ones. I support the motion.

Mr Beggs: I, too, support the motion. Endometriosis affects thousands of women in Northern Ireland and hundreds of thousands of women in the United Kingdom. In a recent Assembly answer to a question from the Chair of the Committee, the Health Minister indicated that some 1,155 hospital admissions in Northern Ireland in 2011-12 were as a result of diagnosis of endometriosis.

The lack of awareness of the condition is of particular concern, and that is why I welcome this debate. As other Members said, the condition is indicated by a range of very common symptoms, such as heavy period pains, lower abdomen or back pain and fertility problems. There are other symptoms such as discomfort when urinating, bleeding from the rectum, bowel blockage and coughing up blood. Side effects include lack of energy, depression and fertility issues.

The very nature of the range of symptoms results in the involvement of a range of specialists in investigating the undiagnosed condition, including gynaecologists, urologists, gastroenterologists, fertility experts, endocrinologists, as well as specialists in pain management to help sufferers to get through the condition. Ultimately, the gold standard test, which most sufferers will undergo after a long route, is the laparoscopy under general anaesthetic.

Only 20% of the population know about the condition. In a 2006 briefing to the all-party parliamentary group of MPs, sufferers, especially younger women, indicated that only 50% of GPs had taken them seriously. Surprisingly, 33% of gynaecologists did not take women with the condition seriously in the early presentation; indeed, 45% of women with endometriosis had seen a physician five or more times before diagnosis. There is a long and torturous path to travel before the correct diagnosis occurs.

It is particularly concerning because, when the illness has been diagnosed, given the range of ailments that I described, people's worst fears are that it can result in a wide range of other conditions. Ultimately, if they are not receiving appropriate treatment, that can cause great concern for their well-being and mental health.

Often, in the early stages, about two thirds of cases were found to have been misdiagnosed, which resulted in ongoing suffering, poor use of National Health Service resources, frequent accident and emergency department attendances and difficulty in retaining employment. The cause or trigger of endometriosis is largely unknown. It is a long-term condition, which can become chronic.

Another area of concern amongst women with this condition is the patchy nature of the specialist pain clinics across the different health trusts in Northern Ireland. I am aware of concern within my area and that additional resources need to be given to the Northern Health and Social Care Trust's pain clinic, because pain management is often a key issue in trying to improve quality of life.

Treatment can comprise hormone therapy, surgery or even, in the most severe cases, hysterectomy. Surgery is often complicated by the range of specialists required and the lack of joined-up procedures involved. That may result in additional delays and multiple operations on the individual.

What can be done? Like other Members, I support investment to try to create an integrated endometriosis service in Northern Ireland, which will provide and improve the care that sufferers receive. Although the long-term vision is for a new women's hospital, such a building would be a number of years away even if it was commissioned today. So, it is essential that we move now to try to bring together the specialist team that others have talked about in order to provide that integrated service, have a better co-ordinated use of specialists and improve the lot of those involved.

In England, nurse-led clinics have been widely used to increase support for those with this condition. So, I too support the establishment of a regional endometriosis centre with a dedicated interdisciplinary team to improve diagnosis for those who suffer from this condition and to improve their lifestyles.

Mr McCarthy: I am pleased that we have the opportunity to debate this important subject. I thank Sue Ramsey, the Chair of the Health Committee, for bringing it to the attention of the Assembly.

As has been said, endometriosis is a common condition that can affect a wide range of women, particularly those who are in their reproductive years. Based on a demographic read-across in the UK, it could affect over 50,000 in Northern Ireland and maybe twice that number. Therefore, this must be an issue of concern to everyone.

Although the condition can be managed, we must acknowledge that it can have an impact on the lives of women, on their physical and mental health and on their work and lifestyle and that it can cause pain and discomfort and be totally stressful. There is no doubt that this condition has a significant economic cost. Encouraging maximum participation in our economy and other aspects of our society among people of all backgrounds is essential. So, any additional costs involved in the provision of a more integrated service to address this condition should be seen in that context.

It is important to raise wider awareness of the condition and to ensure that sufficient information is widely available. That includes reassuring women that it is not an infection, is not contagious and is not cancer. We must also do more to encourage women to seek advice and treatment, if appropriate, at a very early stage. Surveys show that many women are suffering in silence for a very long time before diagnosis or are waiting too long before visiting their GP to seek a formal diagnosis. The condition can manifest itself in a range of ways. Things are complicated further because the symptoms are not exclusive to endometriosis, which makes direct diagnosis more difficult and means that a laparoscopy procedure is required. Even that is sometimes not definitive.

There also seems to be a need to promote greater awareness of symptoms and diagnosis among medical practitioners. It seems that only a small minority of women suffering from the condition have received a diagnosis, let alone treatment. We also have to recognise that the most effective treatments are the ones that are most individualised to address the specific needs of the woman in question.

The debate should serve as a platform for the provision of a more integrated service and proactive approach to addressing the condition. That should involve better awareness and information; greater understanding of the consequences for individual women, the economy and wider society; encouraging women to seek treatment; better understanding of diagnosis; and wider availability of treatments. My party and I fully support the motion.

Ms Brown: As a member of the Health Committee, I support the motion. It has struck me, particularly since I became a member of the Committee, that there are so many people struggling daily with illnesses that most of us have only ever heard about in passing or, in some cases, not at all. Endometriosis is one such illness. I had a basic knowledge of what it involved, but I have since discovered the sheer misery experienced by those who are inflicted by it.

I apologise if I repeat statistics that other Members have given, but it is a very important issue. Endometriosis is a condition that affects approximately two million people in the UK — that is one in every 10 women — and approximately 1,500 women in Northern Ireland. In 2011-12, just over 1,000 women were diagnosed with the disease. Endometriosis can affect a woman in numerous ways, but it normally presents itself through the experience of severe pain or problems in conceiving children. Diagnosis tends to be made in women aged between 25 and 45, a time that is normally associated with childbirth. Endometriosis does not necessarily inhibit fertility. In fact, symptoms do not usually appear or cause problems in pregnancy but, instead, reappear after childbirth.

Endometriosis can impact on a woman's life in a number of ways, including chronic pain, fatigue, lack of energy, depression, isolation, inability to conceive and difficulty in fulfilling work and social commitments. Aside from the symptoms of chronic pain or inability to conceive, the condition can impact on many other aspects of a sufferer's life, including her social and work life. As with any chronic, debilitating illness, it is hard enough for a sufferer to bear without her having to cope with the additional stresses of a negative impact on her home and work life.

For all the difficulties, there are some encouraging positives. Treatments are available and medical procedures are possible, which can help to alleviate the effects of the illness. The current procedure for women who present to their GP is for a referral to be made to a gynaecologist, who may not diagnose the condition immediately. In fact, on average, it takes around eight years for a diagnosis. Women suffer in silence for an average of two years before speaking to their GP about their condition. Although I accept the potential difficulties in diagnosis and the fact that it is a difficult condition to diagnose, that time delay is unacceptable. It is unacceptable for women to suffer in such pain for so long. Many sufferers state that painkillers are ineffective. It is also unacceptable for women of childbearing age who have the condition to have to wait for a diagnosis, by which time their chances of conceiving a child could be much more difficult.

Although there is no known cure for the condition, treatment is available from medication in the form of painkillers or hormone treatments to surgery. In fact, surgery has a significantly high success rate, with symptoms recurring in just 10% of sufferers. It is imperative that the Department of Health look at the experiences of women suffering from endometriosis and how they can be helped through speeding up diagnosis and management of the condition. I would like the Department, as part of that programme of work, to encourage women who are experiencing pain and upset to consult their GP at the earliest opportunity. The sooner we get a diagnosis, the greater the hope that the impact can be lessened. I support the motion.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As a member of the Health Committee, I also support the motion. I have to say that I did not know very much about endometriosis. I have a sister-in-law who suffers from endometriosis, but although I had heard of the condition, I had no in-depth knowledge of it whatsoever. Other Members gave some detail in the form of statistics etc.

As the Chair mentioned earlier, other members of the Health Committee and I attended a breakfast facilitated by Barry Turley a few weeks back. It was attended by two specialists and some women who suffer from the condition. They gave us a very informative and graphic description of this horrific condition. Some of the slides were graphic but gave some insight into the suffering of women with the condition.

Endometriosis has been around for a long time. As was mentioned, it takes quite a long time to diagnose in many cases. It can affect younger women as well, and the age range of 25 to 45 was mentioned. The specialists who we talked to said that it can affect younger women quite badly. More recently, I spoke to a woman who suffers from endometriosis, and she has been told that some of her internal organs are so affected that she could suffer from a punctured lung, which could be fatal if not treated as an emergency. Although we have been told that the condition is not fatal, it needs long-term treatment, and operative treatment has been successful in a lot of cases. The two women who gave evidence at the breakfast meeting explained how it has affected their personal life and working life and said that their whole lifestyle had been affected. Some have had to change jobs, and they have to be very careful when lifting things and so on.

If endometriosis were a condition that affected men, it would have been treated and dealt with at a much earlier stage. One of the doctors said that, if it was, for instance, a testicular problem, there is no doubt that treatment would be available, it would be taken seriously and GPs would have a much more in-depth knowledge of it. That needs to be addressed. There has to be a multidisciplinary approach and an integrated service. I ask the Minister to take all that into account in his response because it affects so many women in so many ways, and it is important that their voice is heard. One of the good things about the motion is that it has raised the profile and awareness of endometriosis, and, as a result, more people are aware that it is a long-term chronic condition that causes extreme pain and suffering to a number of women.

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I strongly welcome the opportunity to hear the views of MLAs on the motion and respond to it. I thank the proposer for raising this important issue today. Doing so will help to raise the issue publicly and ensure that more people are aware of it.

I should explain at the outset that endometriosis is quite a common condition that affects around two million women across the UK, most of whom are diagnosed between the ages of 25 and 40. Therefore, it should be dealt with regularly, particularly in the primary care sector, and there should be a good understanding of the condition at that level given the numbers of women who demonstrate symptoms. The symptoms commonly vary from one patient to another, but they include abdominal pain, severe period pains, painful sex and infertility.

In most cases, the condition can be treated in the primary care setting. If a patient's GP suspects that she may be suffering from endometriosis, they will usually refer her to a gynaecologist. A couple of Members suggested that diagnosis can take up to nine years. If that is the case, it indicates that the problem is, in the main, with GPs not referring people quickly enough. I have the figures for gynaecology here: of 9,240 patients waiting for an appointment with a gynaecology specialist, 7,712 will be seen within nine weeks and only 25 will wait for more than 18 weeks; and 3,970 patients are waiting for inpatient admission.

Again, 2,657 will be seen within 13 weeks, while 456 will wait for over 21 weeks. That is not quite as good as the first figure, but it demonstrates that people should not be waiting for years to receive that service and that they do not wait for years, certainly if a general practitioner is recommending it. Therefore, if we are urging anything here, we are urging GPs to get the analysis done more quickly in identifying the condition and having the presentation made to a gynaecologist at an earlier point.

At present, there is no known cure for endometriosis. However, the symptoms can often be managed with painkillers and/or hormone treatments. Surgery can sometimes be used to improve symptoms and fertility. Each patient is managed and treated on an individual basis according to her needs and in line with clinical judgement, and patients with fertility issues associated with endometriosis are seen in dedicated fertility clinics, where detailed workups can be performed prior to referral for IVF treatments. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence (NICE) has not at this point issued any guidance that is specific to the management of women with endometriosis, and there is no guidance in development. That is an issue that people who are lobbying may want to take a look at, because it would have a significant impact if NICE were to issue guidance on the issue.

I appreciate the desire of the proposer of the motion to ensure that the suffering experienced by women with the condition be addressed as comprehensively as possible. The Department would prefer to look further at the need for an integrated endometriosis service. Its view is that the needs of endometriosis sufferers are being addressed in primary and secondary care provision and that, therefore, we do not have the compelling case for the integrated service that is being proposed today that we would like to have at this point. However, it is important that we pay attention to the views of elected Members as well as the Health and Social Care Board. We ask the board to ensure that the services to provide for sufferers are given that appropriate priority to ensure that people are not waiting a long time for diagnosis and appropriate treatment in each individual case.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First, I thank everyone for taking part in the debate. One of the key issues is that this is the start of raising awareness, as some Members said. I also thank 'Talkback', which covered the story on Friday. It did so on Friday because it said that it would not get airtime today as someone was coming to town. 'Talkback' covered the issue quite extensively on Friday, and that started the raising of awareness of endometriosis, among not only women but everyone.

I have to say that I did not know anything about it. I had heard it talked about when I was growing up, but, when I looked into it and got the presentation, it frightened me to find out that a lot of women suffer the condition. There, but for the grace of God, go I. Having listened to stories and read some of the detail around it, if I am honest, I thank God that I do not have it. I am committing to ensuring that people who do have it get a better service from the Health Department. I am looking at officials here. As Members have said, it is a debilitating disease. It impacts on people's daily lives. It impacts on women who dream of having a family, some of whom develop fertility problems. It impacts on depression. So, the Committee is committed to looking at it and it is something that we will come back to.

Transforming Your Care talks about early intervention and prevention, and to me that is the issue. If some of our GPs — I do not say all of them; we have a lot of good GPs — need education in this, then that is what we need to do. We need to ensure that when women attend their GP they are not fobbed off as having severe period pains or told, "You will be all right" or "It is a woman's issue". This issue affects everybody. It may be that only women suffer from it, but it affects everyone. Society has moved on from the 1940s, 1950s or 1960s. Women should not be fobbed off or told, "It's period pain. Don't talk about it".

Paula Bradley is absolutely right: today is the start of raising awareness. She pointed out that, whatever arguments there might be about statistics, 85% of women with the condition suffer depression. If I am honest, I must say that it does not shock me that a lot of women who suffer from the condition have depression. When you suffer from chronic pain on a daily basis and are constantly told that there is nothing wrong with you, it is no wonder that people have issues. Paula said that there was a need for a holistic, woman-centred approach on a single site.

What I liked about the motion is that my male colleagues on the Health Committee took part in the debate. Fair play: you have sent out a clear message that this is not just a woman's issue. Conall McDevitt is right that medical treatments on their own were not always successful. He said that there was a need for a multidisciplinary team and a single, dedicated centre so that women do not have to suffer and do not have to attend many sites and retell their story.

Roy Beggs said that he was genuinely concerned about the lack of awareness of the condition. I think, Roy, that there is no argument against that. The statistic that Roy highlighted, whatever the Minister has said about some of the statistics, was that 45% of sufferers had visited their GP five times or more before being diagnosed. Consider how you would feel if you visited a GP once with a chronic condition and no one listened to you and you were told, "It's period pains". Imagine going twice, and again no one listens to you, and you are told, "It's period pains". Then imagine having to go five times or more before the illness is diagnosed. So, there is a need to bring in specialists to deliver that integrated service.

Kieran McCarthy said — I think that this thread ran through all the speeches — that it was important that GPs were made aware of the condition. This takes me back to Transforming Your Care. Unfortunately, over this past couple of weeks, "Transforming Your Care" seem to have become bad words. Whatever the issues around residential care — we will park those — if we are talking about services in the community, early intervention and prevention, GPs need to be a key component. If there is a lack of awareness among our GPs, we have failed right away. The Department and the Minister need to get started on awareness raising.

Pam Brown said that the delay in diagnosis was unacceptable. I could not argue against that, Pam; you are absolutely right. Mickey Brady said that, if this condition affected men, it would be treated better and more options would be made available to deal with it.

I welcome the Minister's input. I agree that GPs are key, and I think that all the Members who have spoken said that. Minister, the motion calls for an urgent inquiry into the provision of an integrated endometriosis service. I know that there are centres in England, so we need to learn lessons from what happens in different places. The Minister said that the Department would like to look at this further because there was an issue about the evidence: I agree. It might be useful to talk to those who are dealing with the condition. So if the Minister has some free time, maybe we can set that up. From working with you over the last year or so, I think that you listen. I might not always agree with you, but there might be an opportunity for you to listen and match the story with the statistics. As I said in my opening remarks, we are talking about our sisters, our mothers and our daughters, and there, but for the grace of God, go I. Minister, I would appreciate it if you took time out to listen to the women.

I remember quoting from a press statement about a year and a half ago during a debate in the Chamber. That statement had been issued by the World Health Organization probably a year before that. It stated that women were still dying in the world because men were in charge. In responding to that debate, the Minister said — I paraphrase — that he hoped that he would change that. I talked to a male consultant about endometriosis — Mickey Brady touched on this — and he said that, if we were talking about testicles, more would be done. To get it right, we need to send out a clear message that we are listening, we are taking on board what is being said and we are going to prove the World Health Organization wrong: the fact that men are in charge does not mean that they are not listening to women's issues.

I thank everybody who took part in the debate. We have a duty to ensure that people in our constituencies are aware of the information that is out there. We also have a duty to ensure that the medical professionals in our constituencies are aware of the issues.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly calls on the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to initiate and expedite an inquiry into the urgent need for an integrated endometriosis service to address the severe suffering experienced by women with this condition across Northern Ireland.

Road Traffic (Speed Limits) Bill: First Stage

Mr McDevitt: I beg to introduce the Road Traffic (Speed Limits) Bill [NIA 25/11-15], which is a Bill to set a maximum speed limit on residential roads of 20 miles per hour.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Fishing: Aid Package

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Frew: I beg to move

That this Assembly welcomes the efforts made by fishermen in meeting EU catch regulations in respect of cod and in reducing other unwanted catches; recognises the expense incurred in purchasing highly selective gears and forgoing valuable catches as a result of using these gears; sympathises with those fishermen whose earnings have been dramatically reduced because of a combination of bad weather and using new fishing gears; and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to deliver urgently a meaningful package of aid designed to assist those fishermen who have helped her comply with the commitments she made at the EU Fisheries Council in December 2011.

I appreciate that business has moved forward much more quickly than most if not all of us anticipated, not least the Minister. I hope that she will be able to join us very soon. I know that she has been caught in traffic as, I am sure, have some Members who wanted to take part in the debate. It is a shame that the Minister will not be able to hear my contribution, because the same thing happened last week when she was sick. I hope that that is not going to be a habitual thing when the Chair of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development speaks.

This is a very important debate about the aid that the Assembly, the Department and the Minister should administer to a very important element of our industry and economy in Northern Ireland. The fishermen and trawlermen of our three main ports have invested in their industry and provided assistance to the Minister and the Department to move the industry forward to meet the needs of Europe. It is significant that the fishermen have been asking for meetings and assistance from the Minister. From this side of the House, it seems that the Minister has turned her face away from fisheries. Within days of the snow crisis, the Minister announced that she had seen fit to give an aid package to hill farmers who had lost stock. That was all well and good, and I supported that because I saw the need and the pain experienced by hill farmers in my constituency and my neighbouring constituency of East Antrim. It was good that we could support that industry while it was on its knees, but, equally, we should recognise the moves that the fishing industry has made in recent months and the pain and hurt that it has had to absorb not only because of the weather but because of things that it has had to put in place, such as highly selective fishing gear, to assist us through European negotiations. Those things have hindered the catch that our fishermen can take. The fishermen were quite prepared for that, even though they have taken a hit. Some of the fishermen and trawlermen have changed selective gear seven times, costing them thousands of pounds. There seems to be no recognition of that or of the pain that the fishermen have gone through from the Department or the Minister.

Last week, we discussed the issue in an Adjournment debate, and I think that that was the first time that the Minister acknowledged that the industry was going through a very bad time. Last week, comments were made that the industry was sick. This industry is not sick. That is scandalous language. This industry, if supported, could do great things in the future. The report 'Going for Growth' states that it could have targets to grow turnover by 34% to £90 million, grow value added by 45% to £22 million, grow external sales by £36 million to £75 million and grow employment by 9%, which is 600 full-time equivalents. So, this industry is not sick. Let me stress again that this industry is not dying. This industry is not a twilight industry that will soon disappear from our shores. This industry is the future of agrifoods. This industry is the future for Northern Ireland's economy. With support, it could do great things for Northern Ireland, and we could export this food, as we already do, all around the world. It is very high in protein and is something that we as a country should be selling as our produce. It is good that we have an industry that could move forward and expand, but, like every industry, it needs support. At the minute, the Minister is turning her face away from fisheries.

The Minister said last week and, when she arrives, will say again that the Department supports fisheries very well. She will name a number of things, but she will avoid answering this question: what is the difference between the hill farmers of north Antrim, east Antrim, the Sperrins and south Down and the fishermen and trawlermen of our three ports? Let us look at the comparisons. They both went through horrific weather.

People talk about the snow crisis. It was the wind that brought the snow; it was the wind that drove the snow to the hedgerows in which all our stock was lost. That was the same wind that left our fleet in our harbours and the same wind that, in the months passed, has hampered, delayed and disabled our fleet from fishing the way it should in what are the harvest months for our fishing industry.

Our fishing fleet makes its money from mid-April to mid-September. During the winter months, they sail only to provide a wage for their workers; if they did not, they would not be able to keep those people on board all year round. So, it is very important that they fish when they can in the summer. We have already lost percentages of that. Some 20% of the profit-making period is already lost, and we have seen the fleet's earnings drop by 50%, compared with 12 months ago. That is another comparison with the farming industry.

The Minister will say that it is because the hill farmers lost stock. Well let me tell the Minister this: the trawlermen have also lost stock, because of the highly selective gear that they have had to implement. In some cases, they have had to implement seven. Not only have they lost thousands of pounds in implementing the highly selective gear, but they have lost stock and catch because of it. They have not just lost cod, which is the reason why they had to implement the highly selective gear; there has been a loss to their prawn harvest. They have lost yield; they have lost crop; and it has cost them in the pocket.

I ask the Minister not to turn her face away from fisheries. Please, listen to what they are saying today through their representatives. I represent north Antrim. There are not many fishermen in north Antrim, but, as Chair of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development, I realise how much the industry means to Northern Ireland. This is agrifood. We should all realise that food has a social element. Europe looks very carefully at food production, food safety and food security, and so should we. It is good to invest in the agrifood industry and to assist it financially, and fishing is a major part of that. I have no doubt that these people need assistance. It is not a sick industry; it just needs to be supported. It could grow to do great things and to import and export all round the globe, and Northern Ireland will glean the benefits. So, I say this to the Minister: please, do not turn your face away from fisheries; help these people to make Northern Ireland a better place by improving its economy and this industry.

There is no doubt that the fishing industry needs that help at this time. It has helped the Minister and the Department. It has implemented highly selective fishing gear that has hurt its crop. That is the comparison to the hill farmers of east Antrim and north Antrim who have lost stock. These fishermen have also lost stock, through highly selective gear, not only in cod but in their harvest of prawns.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Frew: I say this to the Minister: please, listen to the House today and implement assistance to the fishing industry.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I start off by saying that I agree, as I did on Tuesday night, with much of what the Member who has just spoken said, although we can differ on the analysis of the context at the end.

I welcome today's debate on the fishing industry, on the back of last week's Adjournment debate. I hope that we can work in tandem again, and keep working in tandem, to improve the fortunes of one of our most important agricultural sectors. It is a valuable asset within our agricultural sector. We must recognise that our fishing industry endures some of the toughest working conditions of any sector out there, and I am glad that we get the chance, again, today, to reiterate that. As well as that, it contributes tens of millions of pounds to our local economy. We should, therefore, put on record our thanks to the fleet's fishermen for doing that and enduring those conditions.

As was outlined by the previous speaker, the Chair of the Agriculture Committee, and by most of those who spoke on Tuesday last, the past few months have represented real challenges for the local fishing fleet. Those challenges have, without any doubt, placed huge pressures on families in Kilkeel, Portavogie, Ardglass and further afield. As other Members will undoubtedly illustrate in the debate, the reasons for that are very varied. Crucially, the changing dynamics of the common fisheries policy have created certain pressures that the industry has been forced to tackle in recent times and, as the Chair outlined, specifically around the entire episode of selective gear.

That is, perhaps, where I have a step change in the analysis. I agree that the industry is not sick and that last week's comments were unhelpful. However, as the Chair outlined, fishermen need support. I feel that they are getting support. Is that support, in the round, absolutely perfect and what is needed? Perhaps it is not. However, that is exactly what we are here to discuss: how it can be improved. I hope that we can keep doing that and bring forward ideas. I agree with the Chair that the comments about a sick industry were not helpful. I spoke to fishermen on the ground at the weekend. That comment was pulled up as being unhelpful, and they did not like to hear it.

Fishermen have to recognise the support that has been put in place. I welcome the Minister's recent announcement that she will establish a research and development fund that is designed specifically to meet the challenges of selective gear. That significant investment will help in the months ahead. The ideas about upskilling and training are very important and beneficial. The Minister also outlined that, subject to the completion of a business case, she will meet the full cost of replacing the local fleet's satellite monitoring system. That may come as a prerequisite from Europe. However, if that money were not put in by the Department, local fishermen would have to pay for it out of their own pockets. Therefore, it is support.

If we take all those measures in the round, the fishing fleet here will benefit from financial support in the region of £1 million. The final figure might be anything between £0.5 million and £1 million. Again, that is meaningful support. Is there more to do? There possibly could be more to do. Perhaps I will finish on the following point.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. He outlined the Minister's support to the fishing industry at this time. However, he should recognise — I hope that he does — the thousands of pounds that fishermen themselves have spent on selective gear for fishing vessels and fleets. Thousands of pounds have been spent to implement that. Fishermen have also lost thousands of pounds from their catch. The Member also mentioned the vessel satellite monitoring system. Again, that tool is designed to help the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD). It does not in any way help fishing in a practical sense. Therefore, it could be argued that the support is wafer-thin.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr Hazzard: In other parts of Europe, fishermen might have to pay for that satellite system themselves. They will not have to pay here. Therefore, it will not be the burden that it might have been. However, I take the Member's point about what needs to be done. I ask the Minister to take a look at European Fisheries Fund (EFF) opportunities and how they are maximised for the local fleet. Fishermen will tell you that there are opportunities. However, it is a mixture of their not knowing how to maximise those opportunities and the fact that the EFF machinery process strangles the entire process so that the local fishing fleet cannot maximise those opportunities quickly or efficiently.

Many people acknowledge the opportunities to modernise their fleets, but I call on the Minister to look at the EFF machinery process to see whether something can be done to get vital funds and information to make the process a lot more attainable to the local fishing fleet. I think that that will make a big difference, and we should look at it. I ask the Minister to look at that and, if possible, to do something.

As I outlined at the start of my comments, the industry is not sick. It simply needs to be supported in the right way and at the right time. I think that it is being supported. We might be able to do one or two things here to support it going forward. It needs to be future-proofed because, as I said, it is one of our most important agriculture sectors.

Mr Rogers: I welcome the debate. Our fishing organisations have been requesting financial aid from the Minister for the past four months. In last week's debate about the Portavogie fishing fleet, the Minister acknowledged that the industry was going through challenging times.

The issue of selective fishing gears has already been touched on. Since December 2011, the fishing industry has co-operated in looking at these, and the process has resulted in trawlermen having to make seven gear modifications. As the Member opposite said, thousands and thousands of pounds have been spent on that. In addition, as a result of adopting those modifications, each vessel has lost a proportion of its catch — not just cod, which was the intention of the modifications, but the target species of nephrops. The value of the losses can only be guessed.

We welcome the further financial assistance that will be provided to the industry to review and improve the skills of our fishermen, but the worry, particularly after this past year, is whether there will be many fishermen to upskill.

The current vessel satellite monitoring system has been touched on. A sum of £250,000 has gone into that, but, frankly, it is of no practical help to fishermen. In addition, a short time ago, e-logs were introduced to replace fishermen's paper logbooks, and it now costs them £250 to update their software licence. That is just another levy for fishermen, in addition to the light dues and the Isle of Man licensing charges, which deliver no practical benefits to fishermen and are regarded as another tax.

The Minister pointed out that all fishermen in the UK region will soon be subject to the payment of light dues, but she has not told us — this is known out there — that fishermen in the South will not have to pay. So, again, Minister, why are our fishermen — a bit like our farmers — not doing as well from Europe as our Southern counterparts?

The Minister acknowledged the drop of up to 22% in landings, but, in monetary terms, that is a drop of up to 40%. In 2009, her predecessor, Michelle Gildernew, delivered an aid package to local fishermen. However, the earnings of the local fleet are now down by maybe 12% when compared with those from 2009.

The fleet is now halfway through one of the three most productive months of the fishing calendar. We want prospects to improve, but they have not. Fishermen are resilient and hard-working, but enough is enough. The demise of the fishing industry has had devastating consequences for towns such as Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel. If fishermen cannot land product, our fish processing industry will be here only in the short term. Despite being innovative, our fish processors have a limited supply, and to maintain their markets, they have to buy from elsewhere. If boats do not go out, there is less work for the service industry, with the result that businesses in towns such as Kilkeel close week on week.

The Member opposite talked about fishing being an integral part of our agrifood industry. If we really want to capitalise on that, fishing has to have its rightful place. My colleague Minister Attwood recently raised the concerns of the fishing industry at the Executive table.

Finally, fishermen are not sick — they do not want to rely on government handouts. They are hard-working, responsible people, but they need strong support from the Executive.

Mrs Dobson: I welcome the opportunity to participate in this important and timely debate. Commercial fishing, as part of the wider agrifood sector, is an important contributor to the Northern Ireland economy. Indeed, it is a crucial industry for our many coastal communities, providing jobs offshore and onshore, not forgetting the processing jobs and various support services associated with the industry.

In 2011, the total value of fish landed in Ardglass, Kilkeel and Portavogie was some £24.2 million, and, in 2010, processing had a turnover of £67.3 million.

With often damaging consequences, the fishing industry is very much dictated to by rules emanating from the EU. Those rules have major implications for our fishermen, their fleets and their families.

1.30 pm

The commitment given at the December 2011 Fisheries Council to reduce cod mortality, which stems from the cod recovery plan, has imposed obligations on our fleet to reduce cod by-catch. With the Swedish grid being found to be inappropriate for our fleet, fishermen here have spent considerable time, money and effort working to develop highly selective gear to reduce by-catch. That work has meant that significant losses of catch have been experienced, which is recognised in the motion before us.

From speaking to fishermen, I know that the loss of catch has been found to range from anywhere between 10% and 90%, depending on the particular conditions of the day at sea. The willingness of fishermen to engage in work to find a workable and practical solution to the problem must be recognised and commended by us all. However, that willingness must be met by adequate recognition and support from DARD. Support is key to helping ensure that the sector can play its part in delivering further economic and social benefits to our coastal communities and the wider economy.

I do not need to remind Members or the Minister that it is only a few weeks since the publication of the Going for Growth action plan. It has outlined for us how all sectors of agriculture, fisheries and food processing have a part to play in driving our economy forward, but that cannot happen without input from DARD and the industry. The ongoing efforts of the industry to perfect appropriate gear shows that it is willing to play its part and is capable of doing so. It is all the more important that the Minister must not be found wanting.

I will now speak about the cod recovery plan. Relentlessly reducing fishing effort has hit the industry hard, and I note that MEPs approved two reports in Strasbourg last week that are aimed at rebalancing the policy, which has been found not to have been meeting its main objectives by the EU's Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries (STECF). More widely, the common fisheries policy (CFP) is undergoing reform. The centralised Brussels micromanagement of the CFP has damaged the industry, with decisions taken that pay little attention to practical realities.

From speaking to fishermen, it is clear to me that their daily working lives have been hampered by years of rules from Brussels and that the industry would be better served operating outside the CFP. The reformed CFP will simultaneously present the industry with opportunities and challenges, not least the drive to tackle fish discards. That will present our fleet with many problems because of the practical outworking of the policy, which will require extra sorting boxes, ice and space on board boats. Like our farmers, fishermen need maximum support from DARD. Figures show that nephrops landings from areas 6 and 7 during April and May dropped by over 43% and 36% from last year, and that pattern is likely to continue later in the year.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mrs Dobson: Ongoing support is vital if we are to ensure that the industry rises to future challenges.

Mr McCarthy: I support the very important motion before us, which comes on the back of the Adjournment debate last Tuesday evening.

Our fishing industry has been in decline for many years, and despite the efforts of our fishing Minister and the Department, fishermen feel let down. Our local fishing communities, both out at sea and in the processing units on land, have never endured such a lengthy struggle to survive. I hope that the Minister will redouble her efforts to ensure that that decline is halted, and halted immediately.

I remember when Portavogie in my constituency was a thriving fishing village where there was lots of work, both on the boats at sea and in the many processing plants there. There was always activity going on in the village. People were happy. There were plenty of shops in the village, and there was money to be spent. The money was spent in not only Portavogie but neighbouring villages, particularly Kircubbin. I must express an interest: my wife ran a drapery shop in Kircubbin for over 40 years. Many of her customers were from Portavogie, which we really appreciated. Even now, years after my wife retired, those same customers have kept up their friendship. They speak of the hardships and changed times that we are living in compared with the years gone past. Unfortunately, shops in Portavogie are now very few and far between, as are the processing units in the village. The same applies to other fishing villages in Northern Ireland.

The motion calls on our fisheries Minister to deliver a meaningful aid package to assist our fishermen to carry on with the job that they love doing. I hope that the Minister can do something to deliver some form of aid for the fishing fleet. I have to pay tribute to our fishermen, who, probably all the time, put their lives at risk while at sea. Sometimes, unfortunately, lives have been lost in pursuit of doing the job they love doing.

As we said last week, the costs confronting our fishing fleet today are horrendous. There is the cost of gear, oil and labour, and that is not to mention the weather. Following last week's Adjournment topic, the Minister announced support measures for the fishing sector, which are very welcome. However, unfortunately, they do not go far enough. Our local fishermen really feel let down and that the odds are stacked against them. They feel that other outside fishing fleets — and I said this last week — are permitted to fish in the waters that they are not permitted in. In fact, those waters are outlawed to the local fishermen. They are being asked to spend money on gear, etc, while it appears that others get away with it. One is not really sure whether that is correct or perception, but that is the perception of our local fishermen, and they feel aggrieved.

On behalf of our fishing fleet, I implore the Minister, who is with us today — I hope that her cough is better from last week and she is able to deliver more good measures. With her health improving, you never know; there might be something — to listen to the plea of the fishermen and make every effort to revive a once thriving and proud industry.

Miss M McIlveen: I support the motion. I thank my party colleagues for bringing it to the House. Last week, I brought an Adjournment topic on the challenges facing the Portavogie fishermen, which touched on the same issues. As is the way in such debates, the Minister was able to respond, but there was no opportunity to challenge that response. I am pleased that this opportunity has come along so quickly.

Since then, I have again met a large number of fishermen from the Portavogie fleet. The situation is no better. I will respond to some of what the Minister said during the Adjournment debate. She said that the Portavogie fishermen are frustrated. That is an understatement; they are utterly distraught. They are stunned by the freakish conditions that they have faced over the past few months. Regardless of what the Minister says, they feel abandoned by her and her Department.

The Minister recognised that the farming and fishing sectors have been affected by bad weather but stated that farmers experienced physical and fodder losses, which is different from what fishermen are facing. Like other colleagues, I see no real difference. The physical stock on which the industry relies has been badly affected by the weather. The fishermen had to continue to pay their crews and fees during that time with no income coming in. The impact on the fishermen has been seen over the course of eight months. There are tangible reasons why a hardship payment is as appropriate for fishermen as it is for farmers.

The Minister accepted that a 22% fall in landings is significant, but insisted that, although the quota and days at sea still remain for 2013, there is still time to make up that ground. In Portavogie, 50% of the boats were tied up from Wednesday of last week because their owners simply could not afford to leave the harbour. I spoke to one man who fished five 24-hour days only to generate just over £500 from his catch after he had paid for his fuel. From that, he needed to pay himself, his three men, the mortgage on his trawler and insurance of £200. Some boats cannot leave the harbour because their owners cannot afford fuel; they have exhausted their credit, even with their co-operative fuel company.

Why has that happened? It is because thousands of pounds were spent trialling gear for the Minister's Department and valuable catch was lost during those trials. Fuel costs have increased; crews still have to be paid during a bad winter; fishing has been poor due to a bad winter and lower than normal sea temperatures; and there is still a low return on the fish that are being caught. How can they catch fish when they cannot afford to leave the harbour?

During the Adjournment debate last week, the Minister referred a number of times to moneys that will be available over the next two years for highly selective devices and satellite monitoring devices. She said that should not be:

"dismissed and thrown to the side." —
[Official Report, This Bound Volume, p124, col 1].

I do not dismiss or throw to the side any investment in our fishing fleet. However, satellite monitoring devices are enforcement mechanisms; they are not aids for fishing. There are more immediate concerns to be addressed, and the Minister seems to be refusing to do that. While the prawn quota increased by 6%, the price has dropped by 11.5%. Of course, other costs have increased, such as fuel, insurance, e-log licences and Isle of Man fishery licences, to name but a few. The average value of a catch has dropped by 40% since last year.

The Minister said that I should not just listen to the catching sector but should be mindful of the processing sector. I have listened to both, and if the boats cannot go out and fish, the processors will have nothing to process.

The fleet can be sustainable for many years. Under normal circumstances, the fish are available, and we have heard good news this week on improved cod stocks that will be able to be fished in several years. However, these are not normal circumstances and we are not several years down the road. I urge the Minister to place proposals with the Finance Minister for consideration.

During last week's Adjournment debate, the Minister advised that she would not consider:

"a pure hardship package" —
[Official Report, This Bound Volume, p123, col 2].

I believe that she must offer other practical help that can and should be given. In 2009, her predecessor delivered an aid package, yet, compared to that year, earnings are down by 12%. Money is needed to allow the fishermen to function, and assistance could be given to enable fishermen to borrow more from the banks or to give banks the confidence to lend additional moneys. Perhaps the Minister would consider leading a task force to the banks.

Unfortunately, I do not have time to reiterate all that I said during my 15-minute speech last week. However, the Minister can review the Hansard report. I suggest that the Minister demonstrates leadership —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is now up.

Miss M McIlveen: — to show that she cares about the fishing industry and will provide the necessary aid.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Before I carry on, I hope that the Chairman of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development is assured by the presence of the Minister in the Chamber and that that worry has gone out of his head.

Fishing is one of our most important industries, with an estimated value to the economy of £24 million. If we take in what is landed in the Republic of Ireland and Scotland, that figure goes up to something like £56 million. We heard earlier that the processing industry is going down, but we are processing £60 million worth a year, so something must be getting caught.

The Agri-Food Strategy Board's 'Going for Growth' plan, which was published in April this year, described the fishing industry as:

"proven to be robust and resilient in the face of challenge."

That plan and the industry's resilience will be challenged now and in the future. Like many of our other major industries, the fishing industry has suffered from global recession, bank inflation and spiralling fuel costs. We could consider that across the board. Members mentioned the farming industry and we could talk about the cost of fuel for that industry. Likewise, the road haulage industry is paying higher fuel costs. The most recent problem was the weather.

The reality is that we have no say in any of those costs; they are landed on us and we have to pay them. Our industry has to pay them, and, quite a lot of the time, it cannot pass the costs on, although sometimes it does. It is just a never-ending wheel. The banks are putting the squeeze on our businesspeople. All of us here know that there is no wriggle room for businesses with banks.

1.45 pm

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I will be brief. I clap the Member for getting one on me earlier.

The Member can blame the banks, the wind, the fuel costs and everything else, but the Minister and the Department are there to support the industry. What is the difference between now and 2009? Things are a lot worse now, and the Minister should respond, like her predecessor did in 2009, and deliver a substantial aid package.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am sure that the Minister will respond and respond very well.

There is just no room now at all with the banks etc. As we know, the number of bankruptcies is rising all the time in all businesses across the board, no matter what they are. We talked about farming. We know that costs for farming are coming up. We got over the winter, and this incoming year will tell a big tale about farming.

It is known that our fleet is ageing, which makes the boats more expensive to run. Given the cost of fuel, it is not cost-effective to run some of the fleet. We accept that, and the industry accepts that.

We have asked what the Minister has done to date. In December 2012, the Fisheries Council secured a 6% increase in the quota for prawns, which is one of our most important stocks. New ice-making facilities in Ardglass were invested in. By the time that it closes in December 2015, the EFF programme for fishing waters will have indirectly put in €36 million. To date, that funding has reached £1.75 million and, with DARD funds, has been committed directly to projects. Harbour facilities have been allocated £3.35 million, and science projects have received nearly £1 million.

The selective fishing gear project is led by the Sea Fish Industry Authority and a steering group that includes two representatives from our own producers' organisation, local net-makers, AFBI scientists and DARD officials. Funding for the satellite programme, which has been talked about, is not something for the fishing industry. Unfortunately, it is Europe-led. Europe has stated that it is needed, so we have to use it.

I hope that today we can all agree that we have to get together and make sure that we can get the best deal for our fishing industry, as we have done with the farming industry. It is one of our lead industries, and we cannot afford to let it go.

Mr Byrne: I, too, welcome and support the motion. I also sympathise with the fishing communities of Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel. The difficulty is that we have some people who say that there is a problem and others who feel that there is less of a problem. That is a conflicting message to be going out from the Assembly.

There is no doubt that the fishermen are up against it. They have had a poor season due to bad weather, the higher cost of diesel and poor catches in the last year. The big issues for many years have been quotas, days at sea and the total allowable catch restrictions, which have been a particular problem for the cod and the white fish industry in general. Prawn fishing has been largely successful, particularly for Kilkeel. Fortunately, last year, we got a 6% increase in the quota for Irish Sea prawns being landed at Northern Ireland ports. But the question is this: why did Scotland get a 25% increase in its quota, when we got only 6%?

A proper fishing plan is needed. We need some forward planning strategy for the fishing industry. In the agrifood strategy report, 'Going for Growth', reference is made to the fishing industry and some target figures are set, but there is no implementation plan. Therefore, I would say that DARD needs to have a fishing unit that is relevant and up to speed on the needs of the fishing industry and can develop a partnership approach with fishing vessel owners.

Selective gear has been raised as a key problem here. The fishermen feel very sore that they have been forced to change the gear about seven times. That has not meant that their plight has improved; in fact, they would claim that their capabilities in relation to having a successful fishing business have been hampered. The European common fisheries policy has long been a major problem and issue of concern to our fishermen here. We have a very small fishing industry working at three ports, but they are also under restrictions vis-à-vis their fishing in Irish Sea waters, against the restrictions at the Isle of Man, the Scottish ports and what can be landed at the English ports. I contend that, unless we get key officials in the Department who are willing to work strategically with the private sector interests in the fishing industry and with Brussels, we will still, basically, stumble along.

Stumbling along is no longer any good. People who own boats owe a lot of money on those boats. They have big monthly repayments and employees to pay. The bills are increasing, and bank credit facilities are fewer. Let us take a very successful business like Rooney Fish. Mr John Rooney wants to expand the business. He can grow a market overseas for his oysters, but there are big restrictions. Planning needs to allow him to have a larger fish processing industry. He wants to be able to grow oysters inshore. Those are the sorts of things that the strategy would need to examine to make sure that that industry can grow, because there is a market internationally for those oysters. That is the way forward. We have to have better forward planning, a better strategic approach and a better proactive approach by DARD in particular.

I hope that the Minister can outline some support for the fishermen, but it is strategically important that there is a clear positive signal looking to the way forward.

Mr Nesbitt: As ever in a debate on the fishing fleet, I want to pay tribute and give thanks to my colleague

Councillor Angus Carson of Ards Borough Council, who for many years was a captain in the fishing fleet in Portavogie. He is still a resident of the fishing village and has family members who are still involved in fishing and fish processing, so he gives me a direct insight into the difficulties, hardship and frustrations currently felt in and around Portavogie and our other fishing villages.

Today, I have in on work experience a delightful young woman by the name of Georgina from the REAL (Rights, Empowerment, Action and Lobbying) Network, which is a body that lobbies on disability issues. We were touring the Building, and she was remarking on what a wonderful, comfortable and enjoyable place this must be to work. I do not know how difficult the 108 Members of the Assembly believe their job is or what trials, tribulations and dangers they experience daily, but I think that, if you compare our life with that of a member of the fishing fleet, you will find that we get it relatively easy. So, it is important that we focus on the good work that they do.

Later today in Enniskillen, at the Lough Erne resort, eight of the most powerful leaders in the world will sit down to dinner. We have, quite rightly, made much of the importance of food and of showcasing local produce to the world during the G8 summit, so agrifood is important. One hundred years ago, when our economy was really humming, it was based on a few select industrial sectors — shipbuilding, light engineering, linen and rope works — but agriculture was our number one. It remains our number one today, and for the foreseeable future agrifood will be our number one sector. Surely, on that basis alone, we should not be found stinting in the support we offer.

Frankly, the fishing fleet has been struggling of late. Mother Nature has not been on its side. Indeed, as we saw in March, Mother Nature has not been on the side of farmers, who were equally disadvantaged. The support offered to farmers and the support offered to the fishing fleet were not equal. As early as late March, I called on the Executive for support for our fishing fleet. It was a call not for special treatment but for equal treatment. Support and funding are there, which is part of the frustration. The European Fisheries Fund is there, but is it being maxed out? Are we spending it all? Is it all being spent by the Minister in a timely manner? On behalf of the fishing fleet, I respectfully ask the Minister to address that issue, particularly the sort of support that comes out of Great Britain, which seems to be annual support for the fishing fleet for issues such as light dues, as against the one-off support that appears to come from the Northern Ireland Executive.

What is missing, I suggest, and what would be so welcome to the fishing fleet, to the families of the fishermen and to villages such as Portavogie, can be summed up in one short, simple word: hope. We need hope that the Minister will afford assistance that is equal and equitable to fishermen; hope that the EFF will be maxed out in a timely manner for the benefit of the fishing fleet; hope that the endless divisive scientific debate and argument over cod and different fish stocks in various fishing areas can finally be resolved in a manner that the fishing fleet can look on as equitable and honest; hope that succession planning can be brought through in a manner that promotes a sustainable fleet for the future; and hope, indeed, that there will be a future for the fleet. Earlier today, the Minister welcomed the president of the United States to the Waterfront Hall in Belfast. I listened to his speech and was struck by one three-word sentence: "Hope is infectious". Is it too much to ask that, today, in this debate, the Minister infects the fishing fleet with hope?

Mr McCallister: Like my colleagues, I support the motion.

Probably the biggest challenge for the fishing industry is getting the recognition from DARD that it needs and deserves. We hear great talk about agrifood, but, when I speak to fishermen in Kilkeel or Ardglass in my constituency or in places such as Portavogie in the neighbouring constituency of Strangford, there is always a feeling that their needs and wishes are at the bottom of a very long list. In fact, they probably wonder whether they are even on the agenda. It is encouraging that, after not having had a debate on fishing for a long time, two have come along at once, like buses. We need to keep the fishing industry on the agenda and keep talking about the challenges that it faces.

I pay tribute to the Minister for at least working with the sector to develop some of the gear, although the fishermen did not sign up to it; I think that the Minister signed up on their behalf. The Minister has shown some flexibility in working with the industry, and we need that type of work to continue rather than a rigid, straitjacketed approach. I am more critical of the Minister about the slowness to react to a real crisis in the industry. Quite rightly, after the snow in late March, there was a quick response from the Minister and the Executive and a collective response from the Assembly, which is what I expect and want to be encouraged when people are really up against it. Fishing is up against it. The fishing and processing industry is a huge employer, especially in South Down and Strangford, and they make a huge contribution to the Northern Ireland economy. We cannot and should not ignore them. We should try to stimulate the industry and encourage it to continue to improve.

2.00 pm

Certain things are not in the Minister's gift. She has no control over the weather, the banks, labour markets and the cost of labour, the price of fuel or market returns, but she can look at producing the aid package for which the industry has been calling for a number of months. She has the ability to act as her predecessor did a number of years ago and initiate that support. That is where the Minister has a responsibility and a duty to act, not months or maybe years down the line but immediately. She must speak to the industry to find out what the real needs are. She must find out how we can put together a package that she can present to her Executive colleagues and locate funding for that package. That is what the Minister can do to make a difference.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

We have only to listen to the figures that other Members gave. Mr Rogers, my colleague from South Down, listed places where incomes had dropped, catches had dropped and fuel costs had risen. He told us the percentages involved and the impact that all this is having. Michelle McIlveen talked about the impact of fishermen not even being able to fund their boat leaving the harbour. We have to address that. I very much hope that the Minister will say what is being done and what she will do. However, she must respond at a much quicker pace than she has done so far.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member must draw his remarks to a close.

Mr McCallister: I support the motion.

Mr Allister: It is probably an understatement to say that the fishing industry is a very difficult and very dangerous industry. We had a sad reminder of the latter just last week when, off the coast of Southern Ireland, three brothers, all fishermen, tragically lost their life. In the comfortable lives that we collectively lead, it is easy to forget the discomfort in which fishermen operate and the dangers and difficulties that they face. It is an industry that is, sadly, taken for granted, not just by society but obviously, given the response that government makes to it, by government.

The point has been well made that, in recent weeks, we saw a response to the horrendous weather that afflicted our farming industry. Yet the same horrendous weather afflicted our fishing industry but went unheeded and without response. It seems, sadly, that the fishing industry is being taken for granted.

The fishing industry has also been taken for a ride by the European Union. If we contrast the state, the flourishing nature and the aspirations and achievements of our fishing industry in 1973, when we joined the European Union, with the situation in 2013, we see that it is like day and night. The industry has been sacrificed through the folly of the common fisheries policy to the point that it has been run down to near extinction in many places.

In these British Isles, we had the most flourishing and successful fishing industry: today, it is a mere shadow of itself.

That is by no accident but by the design of the common fisheries policy. Although we need to help the industry locally, we need to help it internationally by withdrawing powers over fishing policy from the European Union and repatriating them. European Union control over fishing policy has been a disaster for our fishing industry throughout the United Kingdom. That is a call that I reiterate today.

Under the common fisheries policy, we have seen the absurdity of the lamentably failing cod recovery scheme, which, year on year, has made things worse not better. We have seen the amoral approach to discard policy, where perfectly edible fish, courtesy of a Brussels diktat, by their hundreds of tons have been cast back into the sea to rot. That has happened because someone in Brussels thought that it was the right and smart thing to do. In the current reform of the common fisheries policy, we are told that the discard policy is going to be reversed. The sooner the better, because it has been a scandal for many years.

Also under the reform, we are told that there is to be more regional control over fisheries. Is there? When I look at the detail, the same infrastructural and overarching control of Brussels will exist, so Brussels will still be pulling the strings for how regions behave under the common fisheries policy.

Those cosmetic changes are not what we need. We need the repatriation of fisheries policy to the United Kingdom so that Members in the House, to whom that power could be devolved, can take decisions. They would have to stop hiding behind Brussels and blaming it for everything that goes wrong. Brussels is often properly blamed, but sometimes it is blamed out of convenience. It is time that the policy on fisheries was returned from Brussels to the United Kingdom, because it is an industry that can flourish. When I was a member of the European Parliament Fisheries Committee, I once made a visit to Norway. I was staggered by the contrast in the cod industry there to that here.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close, please?

Mr Allister: There, I saw the vibrant success of the industry outside the EU. Inside the EU, we have seen the destruction of our industry.

Mr McNarry: During last week's debate on the Portavogie situation, I was struck by the fact that the value of the fishing industry to the Northern Ireland economy, if the catch taken by Northern Ireland boats to ports outside Northern Ireland in the rest of the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic is included, is an estimated £56 million. I was also struck by the fact that last week Mr Hazzard totalled the amount of support being given by the Minister to our fishing industry in recent times at just under £1 million. There we have it: £1 million support for a £56 million industry. That is support at a level of less than 2% of the value of the industry.

Fishing is undoubtedly the victim of our EU membership. Our exit is long overdue. Describing the common fisheries policy as the United Kingdom giving away the family silver gives us a clear vision of what has happened and continues to happen. The United Kingdom signed over control of British fishing grounds, which contained nearly 70% of Europe's fish. It signed those fishing grounds over to the EU common fisheries policy. Therefore, when you hear how much EU membership costs this United Kingdom, you need to factor into the gift that it has been given our fish resources going to foreign nations.

EU membership does not just cost us £10 billion net a year. On top of that, we gave away control of our fishing stocks to Europe. In 2008, the United Kingdom lost £3.3 billion because we allowed other countries to fish in our territorial waters under the common fisheries policy. In the same year, we lost £28 billion through businesses having to comply with EU regulations and £17 billion through additional costs resulting from the common agricultural policy. In the same year, £14.6 billion was paid into the EU Budget and other EU funds. The total cost to the United Kingdom of EU membership in 2008 was gross — it was £65 billion. Yet, here we are talking about it and doing nothing.

The very valid point to make in all these debates about seeking to adjust, or tweak, EU regulations or seeking some ex gratia payment from the Minister is that, while those are all welcome and worthy enough measures — and I recognise what the Minister has been doing — they do not address the central problem and core issue. As I said last week, we are treating the symptoms of the illness when we need to treat the illness itself, which is clearly our membership of the common fisheries policy and our membership of the EU.

As has been said, repatriation of the common fisheries policy from the EU is clearly the only way that we will be able to rebuild the fishing industry. If you tell fishermen anything else, you are telling them lies. You are deceiving them and raising expectations when you cannot deliver. You will never be able to meet the expectations of the industry unless you assert our interests over those of every other European nation in our own territorial waters. It is about time that we stood up for Britain, stood up for the United Kingdom and took ourselves out of this nefarious EU and, in doing so, gave back to our nation's fishermen the right and integrity to do their job.

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Fortunately, I have a bit more of a voice to respond to this week's debate. I welcome the fact that this is our second debate on fishing in the past number of days. That, in itself, shows the fishing industry that the Assembly cares about it and that the Assembly and the Minister have the fishing industry's interests at the core of our thinking.

The motion states that the Assembly welcomes the efforts made by our fishermen to reduce by-catches of cod and unwanted fish species. I am happy to support that statement. I especially thank the fishermen, their representatives and the net makers who have worked with us in trialling new highly selective gear over the past 18 months. That work has saved the prawn fleet from the imposition of the Swedish grid, a device that most fishermen regard as impractical.

I further acknowledge that adopting those gears is not without expense. However, my Department has done its best to help with that cost. The 2012 trials were fully funded. Assistance was offered to install the Seltra device following successful trials on both twin and single rig vessels. We also funded a study tour of local fishermen to Norway and Denmark at the end of 2012, which generated further ideas on how to improve selectivity.

I accept that, despite successful trials, the Seltra trawl did not live up to expectations when it was rolled out across the fleet last October. We must remember that that is a time of year when prawn landings are normally at their lowest. Landing figures since 2000 show that October is the worst month for landings, with just 4% of the annual landings made in that month. Indeed, the fleet lands more prawns in August than it does in the last three months of the year combined. So, if you had a choice, you would perhaps not pick that time of year to roll out new gear. That fact, combined with difficulties in setting up the device, coloured opinion against it.

For those reasons, we took a pragmatic approach and gave the industry more time to work with the gear. This year, we continued to look at alternative gears and trialled two further potential solutions suggested by fishermen. Both of them proved effective in reducing cod and other unwanted by-catch, with only a minimal loss of prawn catch. Members have referred to the particularly difficult time that fishermen have had as a result of the poor weather in March and the start of April. I fully accept, as I did in last week's debate, that that has had a dramatic effect on landings. However, landings for the whole fleet in February and May were more typical.

Members have called for an aid package similar to that offered to the farming community. However, I tried to make a distinction in last week's debate and I will do so again. I recognise that the weather impacted the fishing and farming industries. However, farmers have experienced physical stock and fodder losses that have to be replaced.

On the other hand, when vessels are not fishing, fish quotas and days at sea are not used up. Others will dispute whether the industry may or may not have time to make up its quotas over the rest of the year. Some people will agree with that; some will not. As I said during the debate last week, I give an assurance to the industry and to the Members who brought forward the motion that I will keep the situation under review. I am watching the situation very closely.

2.15 pm

Members referred to the figures. At the end of May, prawn landings were down 22% compared with the five-year average at the same stage last year. Looking at the long-term landings data, we see that the fleet will usually land about 40% of the annual prawn catch between January and May. Therefore, the 22% drop for that period represents around 9% of annual average landings. Whilst I accept that the situation is dire for fishermen, I believe that there is an opportunity to make up the catch in the months ahead. However, I will certainly keep that situation under review. I gave that commitment to the House last week, and I stand over it today.

Last week, I also outlined the financial assistance and measures that I have put in place. Some of those involve working with the industry, which I want to work with to carry out an urgent review of need in respect of skills, safety and fuel efficiency. We will have to identify how we can use the tool of the EFF to better effect. I give a commitment to do that in the time ahead and to work with the industry on that.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for giving way. Does she acknowledge that, as I said in my two speeches on the fishing industry, there seem to be inequalities for the local fishing fleet, which says that other fishing fleets are allowed to come into its fishing areas, putting it at a disadvantage? If that is the case, will the Minister ensure that inequalities do not exist in the industry for our fleet?

Mrs O'Neill: I take my equality duty very seriously, and I will make sure that all inequalities are addressed across the Department, whether in fishing, farming or in rural communities. The fishing community quite often asks me about the rules and regulations on where can be fished. I am always mindful of that, and I will make sure that, in any discussions that we have with industry, we look to make sure that we can benefit our local industry.

The motion calls on me to deliver urgently a meaningful package of aid to assist fishermen who have helped me to comply with the commitments that I made to the EU Fisheries Council in December. John McCallister said that I made the commitment in the absence of corresponding with the industry. I assure him that I gave that commitment on the back of discussions with the industry. It made sure that the industry did not have a device imposed on it, because it did not want the Swedish grid. If we were not able to put that proposal to the Commission, the industry, at the start of the year, would have been sitting with a device that was unworkable and did not suit the local fleet. We would be in a much worse and more difficult situation if we had not done that.

Meeting the commitment we gave has resulted in our fleet operating with gear that is as effective and much more practical than the Swedish grid that the Commission was trying to impose upon us. Meeting that commitment has also meant that we have worked towards and made improvements, such as killing far fewer unwanted fish and making a real contribution to stock recovery, which, in the longer term, will be very positive for the fishing industry.

As I said during the Adjournment debate last week, I do not believe that, for the reasons that I have given, an aid package is justified at this time purely because of the bad weather. However, as I said, I am happy to keep that under review and work with the industry over the next number of months.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for giving way at this crucial moment of the debate. I do not agree with her about the 22% figure. The profit-making period is already lost to the fleet, and it will not make that up. It is 50% down on income because of that and the bad winter. What is the difference, Minister, between the situation now and when your predecessor implemented a financial aid package in 2009?

Mrs O'Neill: The hardship package in 2008 was in response to the circumstances at that time. The decision was based on that, and I assume that the business case was based on that and approved by the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) at the time. If you remember, when that hardship package was initiated, it was welcomed by the industry, and, by the end of that year, the fishing industry had caught up. I have to be very careful because I am in charge of public money and am accountable to the Public Accounts Committee. Therefore I have to be able to stand over any proposal that I make. I acknowledge the difficulties and have taken measures to try to assist the industry, and I will keep the situation under review. That is as far as I can go at the moment. Based on my assessment of the situation, I believe that there is time for the industry to make up a lot of the ground that it has lost as a result of the weather. That is the distinct difference between 2008 and where we are now. As I said, I am happy to keep that situation under review.

The measures that I have already talked about around research and development —

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs O'Neill: OK.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister make a commitment that if, at the end of the effective fishing season, those losses have not been made up, she will produce a package? Will she give that commitment as a test of the veracity of her words today?

Mrs O'Neill: I have given a commitment today, and I gave a commitment last week in the debate, that I will keep the situation under review. I believe that there is an opportunity for them to make up the difference that they have lost out on over the past number of months. I am very happy to come back and have a debate in this House in a few months' time, when we can have another assessment of the situation. That is as firm a commitment as I will give. I will absolutely be mindful of the difficulties that are being posed towards the fishing industry and the difficult circumstances that it is working within. That is the commitment that I am giving.

Last week, I outlined the measures that I have taken forward around the research and development fund and working with the industry. Hundreds of thousands of pounds of support is going out into the industry to help it around the selective gear and other measures. I am happy to be able to bring those things forward. Is it enough? That will always be a matter of opinion. People will always have a different view on that.

I move to the issues that Members raised. The task force to the banks is a very practical example of a good piece of work that can be done. We have done that before and talked to banks on the issue of single farm payments, and we are very happy to go around the banks again and talk to them about the challenges for the fishing industry. That is a practical measure that can be done very quickly.

On the issue of reviewing the EFF, Chris Hazzard talked about looking at the processes. I think that there are opportunities that can be explored where we can look towards EFF and use it to better effect. On the back of discussions with the industry, we may be able to do something there. Members of the House will have their own political view on whether or not we should be part of Europe. I am critical about engagement with Europe quite often. I am critical about the bureaucracy and a lot of the red tape that comes with being part of the CFP, but you cannot pick and choose what you want to be part of. If you pull out of CFP, you pull out of CAP and you pull out of infrastructure support and Peace moneys. So you need to have a wider debate around that topic. To me, it is a much bigger picture that we need to be looking at of the hundreds of millions of pounds that we get in support through CAP, CFP, infrastructure support and Peace moneys. That is a bigger debate.

I welcome the fact that we have had the debate again. I have set out my commitments last week, and again today. I want to work with the industry, as I value it as a key part of the agrifood sector. The thinking and process behind the agrifood strategy is around looking at the challenges that are posed to the agrifood industry in its entirety. Everyone — farming, fishing; no matter what end you are coming from — needs to look at the challenges for the industry. We need to look to the future. We need to look at how we can support the industry in the Executive and at how we can work in partnership to make sure that we grow that industry. That is the commitment that I am giving to the House today.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members, the next item on the Order Paper is Question Time, which commences at 2.30 pm. I therefore propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.30 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 2.23 pm.

On resuming —

Assembly Business

2.30 pm

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Has it not gone past 2.30 pm and was the House not to resume at 2.30 pm? Is there a reason why we have not resumed?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member is quite right: it is time for questions to the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I am pleased that the Minister is now arriving.

Transforming Your Care

1. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on how he will address the concerns about Transforming Your Care as outlined in the motion which was debated in the Assembly on 28 May 2013. (AQO 4287/11-15)

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I set out my intentions in response to contributions to the debate on 20 May, and they have not changed. I called a halt to the trusts' consultations on home closure proposals and put in place a new process for consultation, communication and engagement. I will continue to use all options available to me, including the independent sector, to help drive down waiting lists and provide the best possible care for our citizens. I will not introduce legislation that would prevent me from responding in a flexible manner to any healthcare issues that may arise.

'Transforming Your Care' set out a compelling case for changes to our health and social care system and has been widely accepted by those who work in the sector and by the community they serve. We need to make the changes required to improve patient experience, and we need to do it in a transparent and sensitive way. I am committed to doing so.

Mr G Kelly: Go raibh maith agat. Thank you, Minister, for your answer so far. With regard to the recent debacle around residential care, have all residents who are currently in residential care homes been informed that they will not be asked to move from their home?

Mr Poots: As Minister, I have corresponded with every resident individually. I have explained that a new process will be put in place that will be headed up by the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) and that the proposals to close the residential homes have been discontinued.

Ms Brown: In relation to TYC and the spend that the Department is making on private providers, what is the comparison with the spend in previous years?

Mr Poots: The spend in the independent sector was £52.6 million in 2011-12, and it was £24.7 million in the previous year. In 2009-2010, it was £57.5 million. There has actually been a reduction in spend in the private sector under the DUP, as opposed to that under the Ulster Unionist Minister at that time. We continue to drive down waiting lists as well, and we will use the independent sector to assist us in that where it is appropriate to do so.

Mr McDevitt: I note the Minister's reply that he will not introduce legislation that would prevent him from "responding in a flexible manner". I think that we would all agree. However, does the Minister not accept that the point of legislation is to demarcate clearly the areas of health and social care in which the House as a whole wishes him to be able to respond in a flexible manner and, therefore, bring more clarity to the Transforming Your Care strategy?

Mr Poots: Legislation needs to benefit communities and not cause problems and harm. I note the difference in tone between Mr McDevitt and his predecessor, Carmel Hanna, who was MLA for South Belfast. When she was at the opening of the privately built Belfast Institute of Further and Higher Education (BIFHE) Millfield campus, she made the case that PFI opened opportunities for private sector innovation in management, teaching, accommodation and services. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Poots: I remind Mr McDevitt that, in its 2011 manifesto, the SDLP said that it would:

“commission a study into current levels of community service provision leading to a strategy and action plan aimed at greater involvement by the voluntary and community sector in health and social care provision here”.

I agree with what the SDLP has said, and it would be good if the Member got on board with his party.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give an assurance that, at the end of the implementation of Transforming Your Care, there will be and he wishes there to be a section of residential care that will be retained in National Health Service provision?

Mr Poots: I want our elderly population to receive the best possible care. I recommend that all Members visit the Cedar Court facility that Minister McCausland and I opened in Downpatrick last Thursday. When you visit, you should speak to the residents, the care providers — the people who are employed by us — and the relatives. All those people will say, “We were previously in residential care situations, but what is being offered here is substantially better. This is the way forward for health and social care for our elderly population”. I invite any Member to visit such a facility and say that my vision for that is wrong.

Tobacco Products

2. Mr Milne asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, following the recent proposals by the Irish Government for plain packaging of tobacco products, whether he has any plans to take the same action. (AQO 4288/11-15)

Mr Poots: I support measures that lead to a reduction in the uptake of smoking by children and young people, which is why I agreed to the inclusion of Northern Ireland in a UK-wide consultation exercise on standardised packaging for tobacco products. That was led by the Department of Health in London. The consultation responses at a UK-wide level and for each devolved Administration are being considered. Ideally, I would like a UK-wide approach taken on standardised packaging, and I recently wrote to the Secretary of State for Health to encourage him to come to an early decision on the issue.

Mr Milne: It is useful to have those comments from the Minister. Has he had representations from elected representatives against the proposal?

Mr Poots: I am not sure whether we have received any written representation. I have not gone through them all to identify whether that is the case, but I know that arguments have been put for and against the issue. One of the more considerable arguments for this is that cigarette companies are targeting particular groups — women are being targeted with slimline coloured packaging — and there is a significant issue with smuggled tobacco. In Northern Ireland, we have a big problem with criminal activity in illicit trade such as tobacco, fuel smuggling and alcohol bootlegging. One of the biggest problems is that around one third of the tobacco that is sold in Northern Ireland is illegal, and it is being sold at around £2 a packet. If we really want to drive down the number of people smoking, we need to get to the nub of the issue: the criminal industry. A significant issue that is being raised with me is that plain packaging may not be beneficial on that front and may be detrimental. I am not convinced of that argument.

Mr G Robinson: What actions are being taken to address the possible risks from electronic cigarettes?

Mr Poots: Electronic cigarettes are unregulated, and, thus, little is known about the quality, safety and efficacy of such a product. I support the recent decisions by the MHRA to regulate these products within a proportionate regulatory regime. I also wish to look at the MHRA report in detail when considering the potential contribution that such products could make to tobacco-related harm and a reduction in smoking.

Mr Kinahan: I want a bit more clarification. We are told that tobacco companies need to find another 2,300 young people to smoke to keep their market share. Does the Minister agree that the way forward is to keep the graphic pictures on cigarette packets to put people off?

Mr Poots: We are in a consultation process. Australia has introduced plain packaging, and the Republic of Ireland appears to be moving ahead on that, too. Cigarette companies use packaging as a marketing exercise. There is a judgement call to be made on whether that is the greater problem or whether the greater problem would be people potentially being able to provide illicit cigarettes more easily as a consequence of moving to plain packaging. That debate is taking place. I have not committed to either side at this point because I am not fully convinced by either side. I will need more time to come to a decision.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to continue to rise in their place if they wish to ask a supplementary question.

Judith Cochrane is not in her place. I call Ian McCrea.

Hospitals: Waiting Times

4. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on progress on reducing inpatient and outpatient waiting times. (AQO 4290/11-15)

Mr Poots: I am pleased to report that the hospital waiting list statistics for the year ended 31 March 2013 show a marked improvement on the previous year, with a reduction in the total number of people waiting for outpatient appointments and inpatient or day case treatment, compared with March 2012. There was a reduction of 3.2% in the number of people waiting for a first outpatient appointment, from 103,029 in March 2012 to 99,774 in March 2013. Significantly, the proportion of people waiting for less than 9 weeks has risen to 80.2%, compared with 72.6% in March 2012. The number of people waiting for inpatient and day case treatment reduced by 6.2%, from 50,829 in March 2012 to 47,689 in March 2013. The proportion waiting for less than 13 weeks has risen to 68.8%, compared with 64.4% in March 2012.

I welcome the improvement but accept that work needs to be done to reduce waiting times to an acceptable level for all patients. The continued reduction in hospital waiting times is, therefore, a key priority for my Department against a backdrop of ever-increasing demand for hospital services. So I have set more challenging targets to be achieved by March 2014, and I look to the Health and Social Care Board to work with trusts to meet them.

Mr I McCrea: I welcome the Minister's commitment to continuing to drive down those targets. Can the Minister detail figures from other years so that we can see how they compare from year to year?

Mr Poots: In previous years and from last year, there has been a marked reduction. The number waiting for an outpatient appointment was reduced by 6,432 — 6% — from 2011-12, and the number waiting for nine weeks has been reduced by 12,145 or 38%. The number waiting for inpatient admission has been reduced by 5,191, which equates to 10%, and the number waiting for longer than 13 weeks has been reduced by 2,754, which equates to 16%. Members can see that, year on year, we are making a significant dent in waiting times and delivering for the people of Northern Ireland. We will continue that work.

Ms S Ramsey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I was interested in the Minister's response to the question. Is the Minister inclined to take a run at the issue of appointments cancelled by consultants and hospitals as opposed to those who do not weigh in for their appointment? Considering that over 180,000 appointments were cancelled last year, that would have an impact on waiting times.

Mr Poots: I thank the Member for her question. We are certainly looking at how to ensure that there is a better response from those in hospitals who provide the service and that fewer appointments are cancelled by consultants. Hopefully, we can make progress on that front because cancellations do not always come from the individuals who are waiting to see a consultant.

2.45 pm

Mr Dallat: I commend the Minister for any reduction in waiting times. Can he give the House an assurance that the day will soon come when people are not forced to switch to private practice to obtain a consultation?

Mr Poots: I wish that I could give the Member a straight yes to that question, but I cannot. In the health service, we are constrained in many ways because of contracts. The Member will know, for example, that doctors are private contractors. They negotiate in London at a UK-wide level. Therefore, some of the issues that I have that relate to long waiting lists will not be challenged just as easily as that, because we operate under significant constraints. Our acquisition of services to reduce waiting lists reduces the power of individuals in that respect. That should be welcomed, because it will enable us to continue to drive down waiting times and make it less desirable for people to go private. In some instances, it is not that it is desirable; sometimes people feel that they have no choice but to go private because they cannot stand the pain. We are working on reducing that time in order to allow people to have greater choice when it comes to their healthcare.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Megan Fearon is not in her place.

Water Fluoridation

6. Mr Agnew asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the proposals to fluoridate the water supply. (AQO 4292/11-15)

Mr Poots: I am still considering my position on the fluoridation of water supplies in Northern Ireland and will continue to consult Executive colleagues on the matter before I come to a decision. I have not formally brought proposals to the Executive on the matter. If a proposal to fluoridate water supplies is made, appropriate evidence from reputable scientific and medical sources will be considered. We are required under the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 to consult and ascertain public opinion. I recognise that there are strongly held opinions. Should such a consultation proceed, I will welcome the views of all interested parties at that time.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for the update. Can he outline both the nature and quantity of correspondence that he has received on the issue to date? I appreciate that it has not gone out to full public consultation, but I anticipate that he has had some correspondence. Does he agree that fluoridation could not be imposed on society and could be done only with community consent?

Mr Poots: As the Member rightly points out, we have not gone out to consultation. I have received correspondence on it from people who seem to think that the internet is the most reputable source of scientific information available and from people who do not recognise the oral problems that exist in Northern Ireland. We have some of the worst standards in Europe for dental outcomes, particularly for children and young people. People make all sorts of ludicrous claims. I have received correspondence from some people along those lines.

Mr Campbell: The Minister has just referred to the dental health of our younger generation. Can he outline some of the plans, proposals and actions that are being undertaken to ensure that dental decay among the younger generation is reduced?

Mr Poots: We cannot simply sit back and allow dental deterioration in young people. We have to move forward. For example, we have fluoride toothpaste schemes. The schemes were established by DHSSPS and are aimed at five-year-old children in the 20 most deprived areas of Northern Ireland. That is an evidence-based intervention whereby free fluoride toothpaste is given out. The scheme was in place in all trusts by September 2005. Since 2005, we have provided additional fees to be made available to dental practitioners for fissure sealants targeted at newly erupted first and second molar teeth. That evidence-based intervention places a protective plastic coating on teeth when they are at the greatest risk of decay. It reduces food and plaque accumulation and makes the teeth easier to clean. We have also introduced capitation payments for dentists who provide care to children from deprived areas. We have been focusing work on community dental services and high-priority areas, such as providing care for children from socially disadvantaged areas and evidence-based oral health improvement programmes. So, we are doing a series of things and will continue to do so.

It is absolutely incumbent on us to improve the circumstance that we have children as young as two who have had most of their teeth extracted. I know that some Members may dismiss all that and think that it is unimportant that we provide good dental care or ensure that children have a good start to life as regards their dental care, but I think that it is a very important issue. We will be guided on this not by the internet but by the scientific evidence provided to me from reputable sources.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister believe that tackling health inequalities in their totality will help to eradicate oral health and dental issues?

Mr Poots: I accept the Member's point. That is why we engage in schemes such as the family nurse partnership, why we support schemes such as Sure Start and why we will support the scheme that the Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister recently proposed, which will ensure that we provide more help to parents who very often find themselves in vulnerable situations in order to ensure that their children get the best start in life.

Teenage Pregnancies

7. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what progress has been made on reducing the number of teenage pregnancies. (AQO 4293/11-15)

Mr Poots: Good progress has been made on reducing the number of unplanned births to teenage mothers. In 2012, the provisional number of births to teenage mothers was 1,100. That is the lowest figure recorded in almost 40 years and represents a 27% reduction since 2002. A range of programmes and services to reduce the rate of teenage pregnancy has been taken forward in line with the actions in my Department's sexual promotion strategy and action plan.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answer. I welcome the figures, which show that schools and communities do good work around prevention. Minister, can you confirm that Marie Stopes has applied for RQIA regulation of its clinic and tell us the extent of any regulation that the RQIA can offer?

Mr Poots: I will not comment on individual organisations that may have applied for registration — that is an operational matter for the RQIA — but any clinic or organisation that applies for registration would be subject to an inspection by the RQIA on at least an annual basis. The inspection covers areas such as the nature of the built environment; record keeping; employment and regulatory arrangements for staff; and the procurement, storage and dispensing of medication. It will also address the care and welfare of patients; the numbers, qualifications and experience of staff and their fitness to perform their work; professional practice; records; staff views; complaints; fitness of premises; financial viability; and notification of events. However, the RQIA does not regulate the individual services provided by the establishment or the individual procedures undertaken. Furthermore, the RQIA does not have statutory powers to assess clinical decisions.

I recognise that there is huge public interest in providing confidence that the law is being upheld. I know that the Justice Minister has indicated that he intends to bring a paper to the Executive, and I look forward to seeing that.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I welcome the figures. Has the Minister had any discussions with the Minister of Education about teenage pregnancies or teenage parenthood?

Mr Poots: The Health Department and the Department of Education have been working together on those issues for many years. Certainly, education has a key role in providing information to young people and making sure that they are well informed on the issues. We can have no doubt that education played a key role in ensuring that we actually drove down the numbers. We are looking at reviewing the teenage pregnancy and parenthood strategy in the future.

The following recommendations will also be considered: the extension of the sexual health promotion strategy and action plan; actions to resolve and progress issues surrounding young people's confidentiality; the issue of guideline leaflets, which will be taken forward by the sexual health improvement network; and support to the young parents element of the teenage pregnancy and parenthood strategy, which will be adapted by the sexual health improvement network to include information on parenting rights, responsibilities and fatherhood.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer and welcome the reduced figures. As the Minister said, quality sex education has a role to play in reducing the figures. Is the Department taking or planning any joint actions with the Department of Education in that respect?

Mr Poots: On relationship and sexuality education (RSE), the Public Health Agency, for example, is working in partnership with the Department of Education and the education and library boards to provide training and support to teachers. A number of voluntary organisations including Aids Care Education and Training, the Family Planning Association, Love for Life and so forth are commissioned to deliver RSE programmes in youth and community settings. RSE training programmes are also commissioned for parents, carers and staff working with young people.

Health and Social Care Board: Commissioning Plans

8. Mrs McKevitt asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether he has any plans to reinstate the practice of routinely publishing the communications issued to the Health and Social Care Board instigating the development of a commissioning plan for a specific technology appraisal, in order to increase transparency and enable effective monitoring of the process. (AQO 4294/11-15)

Mr Poots: My Department does not currently have any plans to publish the communications issued to the HSC board. The key information from them is already put on my Department's website within a day of the communication being sent to the HSC Board. An annual report is being produced that will set out relevant monitoring information. The first one covers a period of 18 months from the introduction of the new process. The HSC Board web page for the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence has been online since April 2013 and includes a summary of service notifications or commissioning plans issued by the HSC board with respect to technology appraisals since September 2011. The web page can be accessed through the HSC Board's website.

Mrs McKevitt: Will the Minister explain to the House why this region is so far behind the rest of the UK in sanctioning new technology in commissioning for treatment for diseases such as cancer?

Mr Poots: There could be a number of reasons for that. This region has benefits that others do not. For example, if you receive domiciliary care at home, you do not pay for that in this region, but you pay for it in other regions of the UK. That is a substantial expense for our health and social care service, and, if Members are saying that we should remove that service to the public, that would certainly create more funding for other services. There are other things, such as free prescriptions. I have indicated to the House — I have put a paper to the Executive — that I think it is wrong that many people in the Chamber, for example, receive free prescriptions who could well afford them while there are others waiting for cancer treatments who cannot get the drugs because we do not have that funding available. I have suggested that we should have some form of prescription charge so that we can buy specialist drugs to support people who have cancer and other life-limiting illnesses. I would be happy to have the support of the House to drive things forward in order to ensure that we provide the greatest level of care for people who have cancer and other serious illnesses in a way that may be available in other parts of the UK.

Rathmoyle Residential Home, Ballycastle

9. Mr McKay asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether the proposed closure of Rathmoyle residential home in Ballycastle has been halted, pending the outcome of the review by the Health and Social Care Board. (AQO 4295/11-15)

Mr Poots: I want the best available care for all our older people. That means change will be required, and I am already on record as supporting a change in the model of care as outlined in 'Transforming Your Care: from Vision to Action'. I know that Rathmoyle statutory residential care home is one of the sites scheduled for some time for the development of a supported living scheme and that there has been considerable local engagement on those proposals. Where individual care plans have been agreed regarding the movement of residents from one facility to another, I do not wish to disrupt or cause any upset to those plans. However, the pace of change for other residents and clients is important. I want to be sure that no undue pressure is placed on individuals, including those who receive day care and respite provision at Rathmoyle.

3.00 pm

Before any decision is taken on the future of Rathmoyle, my Department will expect the HSC Board to provide an assurance that past consultation, engagement and analysis of responses have followed best practice and that the current arrangements for engagements with residents and families are appropriate. I do not wish to see further change in arrangements at Rathmoyle until the HSC Board assures the Department that good suitable alternatives for daycare and respite provisions are in place and working well.

Social Development

Mr Deputy Speaker: I see that Mr Flanagan is not in his place.

Social Housing Programme

2. Ms McCorley asked the Minister for Social Development for a breakdown of the make-up of the social housing development programme over the last two years.

(AQO 4303/11-15)

Mr McCausland (The Minister for Social Development):

In the 2011-12 financial year, there were 114 newbuild schemes, which comprised a total of 1,410 units, with a housing association grant spend of £139,820,000. Of those 1,410 units, 96 were supported housing units, 181 were rural needs units, and 1,133 were urban needs units. Those units were made up of 984 newbuilds, 275 off-the-shelf purchases, 109 existing satisfactory purchases, 34 rehabilitations and eight re-improvements.

In the 2012-13 financial year, there were 89 newbuild schemes, comprising a total of 1,379 units, with a housing association grant spend of £83,661,000. Of those 1,379 units, six were Travellers' units, 163 were supported housing units, 118 were rural needs units, and 1,092 were urban needs units. These units were made up of 1,036 newbuilds, 130 off-the-shelf purchases, 111 existing satisfactory purchases, 72 rehabilitations and 30 re-improvements.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that sometimes the information given can be unclear as to how many actual houses were completed in one financial year? Sometimes there is too much information about overlap and not enough firm information on what was actually completed in one financial year.

Mr McCausland: I accept that the situation is that work very often starts in one financial year and runs into the next one. However, if houses are not included in the figure for one year, they will obviously follow in the figure for the subsequent year. The important thing is that we have plenty of good information so that Members are well informed. I am always happy to provide information on these matters.

Mr Campbell: The Minister outlined the case over the past number of years. Can he outline what the capacity issue will be in the next two years, for example, as he plans for that time period?

Mr McCausland: The Member raises an important point about capacity. The fact is that, in the 2012-13 year, there was an underspend of £8 million. The reasons for that are several. In one sense, it is the result of the fact that housing can now be provided more cheaply than previously. Indeed, land purchases are much cheaper than they would have been in previous years. Also, in Northern Ireland, we have 29 registered housing associations. However, in both the past two years, less than half of those have been involved in delivering new housing. In fact, in each of those two years, four housing associations delivered close to 80% of the programme. When you have 80% of the housing being provided by four housing associations out of a total of 29, you can see that the others are not contributing in any major way.

That leads me on to another issue, I suppose: that there may be a possibility of looking at another provider. I do not want to go down that road, but if housing associations cannot step up to the mark, there will always have to be a look at a last resort.

We are also looking at the whole social housing development programme, and I have asked the performance and efficiency delivery unit of the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) to carry out a study in that regard. I am not convinced that it will, necessarily, address the housing associations' apparent unwillingness to deliver more. They could and should be delivering more.

We are putting a real challenge to the Housing Executive about how it operates the programme. There is also a big challenge to the housing associations, particularly those that are delivering nothing in the way of newbuilds.

Mr Lyttle: Given the encouragement that the US President gave this morning for more integrated housing — he said that it was essential for peace in Northern Ireland — how much of this housing was of a mixed or shared nature?

Mr McCausland: As the Member will be aware, housing is allocated on the basis of need. In a particular common landlord area, housing will be allocated according to the need in that area. I would not have any details on the precise breakdown of that. If you have a mixed area, it is generally the case that people will come from both communities to live in that area. If an area is exclusively of one community, generally the people who come to live there are from that community. That has been a fact over the past while. The Member will be aware, however, that there were a number of references to shared housing in the recent package of proposals that emanated from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

Mr Copeland: The Minister will be aware, as I am, that the social housing development plan was agreed in January 2012. Since then, the Minister and a number of his officials have intervened and added, in a welcome way, other areas to the newbuild programme. Some of that took place a number of months afterwards.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Can we have a question, please?

Mr Copeland: Given that precedent, will the Minister detail whether he has yet intervened to seek additional changes to the proposed programme in light of the proposals that are contained in welfare reform?

Mr McCausland: As soon as the direction of welfare reform became clear, I met the Housing Executive and challenged it on the nature of the social housing development programme. I posed the question whether, in drawing up that programme, it had taken account of welfare reform. The answer was no. So, I sent it away to do some additional work, and you can see the results and fruits of that starting to come through in the provision of a more appropriate mix of sizes of accommodation.

I would pick up on one point that the Member raised: the social housing development programme. Each year, I am asked to approve a programme, and, last year, only one third of the programme that I approved was delivered. You approve a programme, but what emerges on the ground bears little resemblance to it. The housing associations, for whatever reason, do not deliver on those particular programmes, but other programmes emerge. That is why we need to look holistically at the social housing development programme. There is very little point in bringing me a package of proposals at the start of the year for schemes here, there and elsewhere when what is created at the end of the year ends up bearing virtually no resemblance to that.

Last year, £40 million of the funding for the programme was spent in the last two days of March and 60% of the units were delivered on the last three working days of the financial year. Those sort of issues need to be looked at more thoroughly.

Social Housing: Energy Efficiency

3. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister for Social Development what checks are carried out to ensure the energy efficiency of social housing stock. (AQO 4304/11-15)

Mr McCausland: The Housing Executive has almost completed the production of energy performance certificates (EPCs) for its entire stock. EPCs detail the energy performance of each dwelling and take account of factors such as insulation, double glazing and heating type. The majority of the housing association stock is relatively new, and most of it has been built to level 3 in the code for sustainable homes. Since the last financial year, all new social housing stock is built to new building regulations standards.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. What action has his Department taken to ensure that cavity wall insulation is installed in historical and new social housing stock?

Mr McCausland: I am conscious of that issue and have raised it; first, because of experience of my constituents highlighting the difficulties that they had not only of energy efficiency but of dampness penetrating walls. So, we have put that to the Housing Executive and a work programme is being developed in that regard.

Ms Brown: What is the Minister's Department offering the privately owned and rented sectors by way of energy efficiency?

Mr McCausland: The warm homes scheme is my Department's major energy efficiency improvement scheme. It is also my Department's primary tool in tackling fuel poverty. That scheme is administered by the Housing Executive and delivered by scheme managers Bryson Energy and H&A Mechanical Services. The scheme offers a range of insulation and heating measures to householders in receipt of a qualifying benefit; they may be able to receive help with insulating their homes. Householders eligible for warm homes plus may be entitled to installation of a fully controlled energy-efficient oil or gas central heating system, where no heating system currently exists. The measures delivered by warm homes make a home warmer and more energy-efficient.

We also have the boiler replacement scheme, which is funded by my Department and aimed at owner-occupiers whose total gross income is less than £40,000 and who have an existing boiler that must be at least 15 years old.

In some cases, that has delivered a much-appreciated increase in fuel efficiency of as much as 30%.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline what impact energy efficiency in social housing has on fuel poverty?

Mr McCausland: The three things that cause or contribute to fuel poverty are the cost of fuel, the level of income in the home and the energy efficiency of the home, which we can directly impact on. We can do a lot around income, such as through benefit uptake programmes, which can help in some cases. There is more limited control over the cost of fuels, because that is influenced by international markets. However, energy efficiency of homes is hugely important in being something that we can really tackle and deal with locally.

Housing Executive: Housing Standards

4. Mr Lynch asked the Minister for Social Development whether the standards for housing set by the Housing Executive have fallen in the last five years. (AQO 4305/11-15)

Mr McCausland: The standards for all new social housing are set by my Department, not by the Housing Executive. Key objectives of the housing strategy for Northern Ireland are to reduce the burden on social housing construction and to harmonise standards with those used for private housing development. My Department's current design standards for newbuild social housing, effective from April 2012, require housing associations to continue to build high-quality homes that not only meet the higher energy and carbon emissions requirements of the new building regulations that were launched in October 2012, but ensure that they are safe, flexible, adaptable and accessible.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Have housing associations that have provided the high-quality work that the Minister talked about been instructed by his Department to use cheaper materials or meet the cost themselves?

Mr McCausland: No. In fact, an incentive by way of a modest increase in construction cost allowances of 3% is available to associations that choose to build to the full code level 3 standards.

Ms P Bradley: Minister, what is the Department's policy in relation to compliance with the lifetime homes standards?

Mr McCausland: The Department's design standards require housing associations to comply with lifetime homes standards. Subject to approval, associations may deviate from those, depending on local conditions and viability.

Mr McCarthy: Has the Minister had any reason to exercise deterrents in relation to those that did not come up to the standards expected by his Department?

3.15 pm

Mr McCausland: No; the standard of house building by housing associations has been good. I identified the problem earlier: it is not the quality but the quantity. We are not seeing throughput or delivery. A small number of housing associations are doing an excellent job by building plenty of homes — 80% of the total — but the others are falling far short. They have property portfolios. They own a number of properties and have collateral, so they should be able to borrow and to build, but that is just not happening.

Housing Executive: No-fines Construction

5. Mrs Hale asked the Minister for Social Development to detail the number of Housing Executive homes in the Lagan Valley constituency that are no-fines construction. (AQO 4306/11-15)

Mr McCausland: My attention was seized by the issue of no-fines houses when I learned that some 5,000 Housing Executive properties across Northern Ireland were of no-fines construction. For the benefit of Members: no-fines houses are constructed from a type of single-skin concrete wall with no cavity. I believe that those properties would benefit from a programme of external insulation, and I asked the Housing Executive to develop such a programme urgently for all houses of no-fines construction, prioritising those properties most in need.

In Northern Ireland, over 9,000 Housing Executive homes, including the no-fines homes, are of solid-wall construction: that is, they have no cavity walls. Those include 740 Orlits, 615 Easiform properties, 801 rural cottages and 3,444 pre-1940s terraced houses. Some 2,470 housing association properties are also of solid-wall construction.

As for the number of homes in the Lagan Valley constituency that are of no-fines construction, that information is not available in the format requested because the Housing Executive does not routinely collate information by parliamentary constituency. However, it has advised me that 688 homes of no-fines construction are located in its Antrim Street and Dairy Farm Lisburn district office areas and its Banbridge district office area, which comprise the Lagan Valley constituency.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he inform the Chamber what action the Housing Executive has taken so far?

Mr McCausland: I took that up with the Housing Executive some time ago. Many constituents were coming into my office saying that their houses were cold and damp and had been like that for many years, but were being told that the problem was condensation. When we got to the bottom of the issue, we discovered — not directly from the Housing Executive but from other sources — that the problem was no-fines construction.

There are major issues not only about heat loss but about dampness. I requested an urgent report from the Housing Executive. It produced a paper on no-fines houses with key objectives and recommendations, which was approved by the chief executive's business committee on 3 June. The Housing Executive now has a working group to progress its strategic approach to the thermal performance of all of its no-fines stock. That group will initially consider the technical solutions available and, once options and costs are known, will evaluate the strategic direction for all no-fines houses.

The Housing Executive is also involved in a project that is funded by Technology Strategy Board research and development with seven other partners that aims to carry out an external insulation of five properties in one of the Housing Executive's no-fines estates. I might add that, on a recent visit with the vice-chair of the Housing Executive to look at housing experience as it is delivered in England, particularly in Liverpool and Manchester, I saw at first hand examples of no-fines houses that had been treated with a particular approach that addresses the problem. One of the tenants said that it was a great job because when the work was being carried out, she did not have to leave her home, and since it had been done, she has not turned the heat on for two months. I am sure that people who live in the substandard conditions of many of those no-fines houses — they have possibly been living in them for decades —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr McCausland: — could also benefit in that way.

Mrs Dobson: Will the Minister detail whether those properties have ever been prioritised in previous initiatives to improve their thermal performance? If not, does the Minister believe that that may have been a slight oversight?

Mr McCausland: I think that the word "slight" is inappropriate; it was a major oversight. We await the full report, but I have made direct enquiries about what reports were produced on a particular estate over a period of years. A couple of reports produced in preparation for ECM schemes mentioned the walls but suggested that nothing be done about them. As far as I can gather from the information that I have so far, it seems that there was no approach at all over the years to tackling the issue until I raised it with the Executive. Whether the issue is double glazing installation or houses without cavity wall insulation, it confirms that we have made energy efficiency right up there as a priority.

It sounds as though I am always having a go at the Housing Executive, but, in this case, there are more than reasonable grounds — very strong grounds — for saying that this is unacceptable. People should not be expected to live in cold and damp conditions.

Mr Allister: Good as it would be to make provision for these houses, can the Minister say whether he is being lobbied directly, or indirectly, by a party colleague whose family have an interest in a company that just happens to provide this external insulation?

Mr McCausland: The answer to that is no. I speak as a complete amateur in technical things. I was convinced that the only thing that could be done with these houses was to knock them down. That was until the vice-chair of the Housing Executive took me to look at houses in Liverpool, and, when I saw what had been done there, I was convinced otherwise. I saw not only a house with transformed energy efficiency but the very attractive job that had been done to make it look much more modern in style.

In Northern Ireland, we need to learn from others and look at a range of ways of doing things. I mentioned Liverpool and Manchester, although I recently visited Dundee to look at examples of good practice there and to compare and contrast that with what is being done in England. There is a lot of work to be done on that. The Housing Executive officials with me were also very impressed by the good practice in Great Britain.

Derelict Homes

6. Mr Givan asked the Minister for Social Development what opportunities exist for community-based social economy organisations to carry out building work on derelict and empty homes on behalf of the Housing Executive. (AQO 4307/11-15)

Mr McCausland: The Northern Ireland Housing Executive is bound by its standing orders, Northern Ireland public procurement policy and the Public Contracts Regulations 2006. They require the Housing Executive to procure all supplies, works and services in accordance with the policy and regulations. Although contracts are not directly awarded to community-based social economy organisations, it is possible for my Department to approve direct awards, but there would need to be a compelling business case. My Department is, however, consulting on a policy for community asset transfer, and the Housing Executive is considering potential opportunities to work with community-based social economy projects through such a policy to develop opportunities for social enterprise in social housing areas to foster community sustainability.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for that response. He will know that many community organisations are to the fore in driving forward developments and identifying needs in their area. To that extent, would he encourage organisations, such as those in my constituency — for example, the Resurgam Trust — to continue that work? Would he also encourage the Housing Executive to develop and implement such a policy?

Mr McCausland: I am very familiar with the work of the Resurgam Trust in the Lisburn area. I commend its efforts to promote the social economy model to regenerate local communities and provide real employment opportunities for people in disadvantaged communities. My Department is supporting a social economy growth pilot project through the trust. I am aware that the organisation is keen to explore other opportunities that will become available through the new policy framework for community asset transfer. So the direct answer to your question is yes, we should encourage that, and public sector organisations should encourage a social economy approach where possible.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith as na freagraí. Will the Minister give us some idea of the safeguards that are in place, if any, to ensure that properties that are brought to that particular standard through the Get Britain Building scheme are not subsequently sold on in a speculative transaction?

Mr McCausland: So far, only one housing association has received moneys from the Get Britain Building fund to take forward an initiative that will bring up to 150 empty homes back into use over the next few years.

I take the Member's point on board. My understanding is that the particular model that is being looked at would preclude that possibility. I am happy to get back to the Member with further information if it is required.

Mr Cree: It is self-evident that the longer that a property remains empty, the more costly that it is likely to be to get it back into service. With 20,000 applicants in housing stress, there cannot be an argument for having empty or derelict houses. How many empty or derelict houses are there at present and how does that number compare with the situation in 2007 at the height of the building boom?

Mr McCausland: Empty homes come in different shapes, sizes and styles, and it is difficult to come up with precise figures. Some time ago, we asked the Housing Executive to take forward a piece of work that looked at two areas where we thought there were quite a number of empty homes. When the Housing Executive's representatives knocked on doors and checked back, it transpired that properties that seemed to be empty turned out not to be empty but simply appeared to be so. Therefore, it is very difficult to put a precise number on these things.

However, there are older houses that have been largely abandoned and allowed to run down, and there are new properties that are almost but not quite finished. It is quite a diverse mix. The Member raises a crucial point, which is that at a time of housing need, when the construction industry needs work, it is bizarre that properties are sitting there that could be brought into use. That could create work, create new homes and remove a potential blight, whether in the form of an old house or a building site that becomes a gathering ground for antisocial behaviour because houses are unfinished. It is a three-way win, in the form of houses, work and the removal of blight.

Benefits: Atos assessments

7. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister for Social Development for his assessment of the service provided by Atos, which has resulted in a large number of people losing their entitlement to incapacity benefit or employment and support allowance. (AQO 4308/11-15)

Mr McCausland: Prior to my taking up office in May 2011, the Northern Ireland Assembly approved the Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2007, which set down the eligibility criteria for determining entitlement to employment and support allowance and the requirement to undergo a work capability assessment as part of the eligibility process.

Atos Healthcare was awarded the contract in December 2010, and since June 2011 it has been providing medical advice and work capability assessments to support Social Security Agency officials to make decisions under the legislation.

The services provided by Atos Healthcare are governed by a commercial agreement between my Department and Atos. The agreement includes a performance model with a range of contractual service levels against which the supplier's performance is measured. The work capability assessment is carried out by local healthcare professionals who are employed by Atos to assess the functional capability for work of claimants who are claiming, or being reassessed for, employment and support allowance.

In agreeing to the introduction of the work capability assessment, the Northern Ireland Assembly recognised that it would need to be kept under review, and such a provision was made in section 10 of the Welfare Reform Act (Northern Ireland) 2007. Professor Malcolm Harrington, an occupational health specialist, was subsequently appointed to undertake the three annual reviews in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. To date, 34 out of 37 of his recommendations that are relevant to the Social Security Agency have been implemented. My Department is now working with Professor Harrington's replacement, Dr Paul Litchfield, to examine ways in which to continue to make improvements.

I recognise the concerns that have been raised by some Members about some individual cases brought to their attention. It is therefore important that Atos Healthcare's medical processes, training, recruitment and medical outcomes are regularly monitored and audited to ensure that a high level of service is achieved. In August 2011, my Department appointed an independent health assessment adviser —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr McCausland: — who is a medical health professional, to provide an independent assurance on the quality of all processes and outcomes.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer.

I am sure that the Minister is aware of the contention and controversy around this service, given that the primacy of medical evidence has been relegated and that a large number of claimants have lost their entitlement. Will he tell me what percentage of claimants who lost their entitlement won their cases on appeal?

3.30 pm

Mr McCausland: During the period June 2011 to April 2013, 120,061 claimants completed a work capability assessment. Of those, 34% of claimants were disallowed and 66% were allowed, of which 43% were assigned to the support group and 52% were assigned to the work related activity group. Work is ongoing in regard to the other 5%.

The Member raises the issue of people who win cases on appeal. I do not have the precise figure he asked for in front of me, but I will supply it. The key thing for me is that it is important that all of the relevant medical information is made available at the earliest point in the process. Generally, when appeals are upheld, it is because information that was not available at an earlier stage is provided. I encourage MLAs and people who operate advice services to ensure that, wherever possible, the maximum amount of medical information is input into the system and into the journey for an individual client at the very earliest stage.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That concludes Question Time for today.

Mr McCarthy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Given that we have no further business to conduct today, would it not be reasonable to request that the Minister be allowed to continue answering questions, because there are two very important questions still on the list.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Question Time is up.

Private Members' Business

Fishing: Aid Package

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly welcomes the efforts made by fishermen in meeting EU catch regulations in respect of cod and in reducing other unwanted catches; recognises the expense incurred in purchasing highly selective gears and forgoing valuable catches as a result of using these gears; sympathises with those fishermen whose earnings have been dramatically reduced because of a combination of bad weather and using new fishing gears; and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to deliver urgently a meaningful package of aid designed to assist those fishermen who have helped her comply with the commitments she made at the EU Fisheries Council in December 2011. — [Mr Frew.]

Mr Irwin: My constituency does not have a natural affiliation with the sea, and I am someone who is much more at home with his feet on the green grassy slopes of Newry and Armagh. However, I have empathy with our fishermen in Northern Ireland, who, like our farmers, are not only at the mercy of the weather but are also at the mercy of the European Union and its increasingly restrictive laws and directives.

The task of getting the fresh fish we all enjoy from the depths of the sea to our dinner plate involves a significant operation, with the most risky element of the supply chain involving dedicated fishing crews taking to the high seas to land various sorts of sea life for our food industry. The fact that our fishermen are exposed to significant risk is in itself worthy of admiration. However, when you mix in the restraints placed on our fishermen in terms of days at sea and catch quotas and the significant issues with the weather of late, you begin to realise just how difficult fishing has become around our waters.

The EU common fisheries policy has been no friend to our fleet in Northern Ireland. I support the view that the regulating and managing powers of the EU in that regard should be handed to member states to administer, as that would allow a region to respond to the realities of fishing in its waters and take into account the specific marine environment stocks and the condition of the fish that our fleets catch.

As with many other areas of food production, the EU continues to make life difficult for Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK. I could speak about the poor directives from Europe that have cost our poultry sector, our pork industry and other sectors, whereby the failure of other member states to implement directives has resulted in the unacceptable situation where our industries have spent money to adapt and ended up being undercut by products from countries with much lower standards.

The Anglo North Irish Fish Producers' Organisation has consistently lobbied the Agriculture and Rural Development Minister to offer a financial package to the fleet. That would go some way to sustaining the fishing industry in Northern Ireland following months of hardship. The pressures on the industry here have been intensifying rapidly. The goodwill of our fishermen has been tested to breaking point. In respect of developing fishing gear to reduce unwanted catches, as Michelle O'Neill has requested, seven options have been identified. Pursuit of those modifications has resulted not just in expenditure on developing the gear but a loss of catch and a significant loss of earnings.

Figures for the industry for the first half of 2013 compared with the first half of 2012 make for very concerning reading. That is why this motion has been brought before the House today. The value of the catch of local trawlers from January to June has dropped by 40% compared with the same six-month period last year. The fleet is now halfway through one of the most productive months of the fishing calendar. However, prospects have not improved, which, understandably, has left many disheartened.

I will refer to the comments of some Members who spoke in the debate. Mr Frew said that the industry has invested very heavily to comply with Europe. He believes that, if fishermen were given support, the industry would have a very bright future. Mr Hazzard commented that the fishing industry already receives support but said that it is possible that more could be done. Mrs Dobson referred to the reform of the EU cod recovery plan and the new flexibilities included in that. The House will be delighted to know that it was, of course, the DUP's Diane Dodds who delivered that reform. Mr McCarthy said that the industry had been in decline for many years and that every effort must be made to stop that decline.

Michelle McIlveen, following on from her Adjournment topic last week, said that she has spoken to fishermen and that they are despondent. She said that the bad weather had had a big impact and that a hardship payment would help fishermen through this difficult time. Michelle also welcomed the Minister's acknowledgement of the suggestion that a task force meets the banking sector. I look forward to that meeting taking place.

Joe Byrne said that the big issues are quotas and days at sea. He felt that there is a need for the Department to develop forward planning. Mike Nesbitt said that fishermen work very hard. He actually said that he gets it much easier than fishermen, which is very interesting. Jim Allister commented how dangerous the job is and said that fishermen have been taken for granted. He also stated that the common fisheries policy had been a disaster for the industry.

The wife of a fisherman from Portavogie put the following on her Facebook page:

"Yeah, have to laugh. The most productive part of the fishing year ahead. How much exactly does she think the men will earn in the three months from now until the end of the September? God forbid this year is like last year. The weather will turn again come September. A year's salary in three months? Yeah, right."

Does the Minister understand the reality of the situation? When did the Minister last speak to fishermen about the industry and how they feel it is going?

Mrs O'Neill: Will the Member give way?

Mr Irwin: I will.

Mrs O'Neill: I can assure the Member that I regularly engage with fishermen and that I correspond with them in writing, by e-mail and in person.

Mr Irwin: The Minister told the House today that she will keep the situation under review. Many in the industry will see that as a fudge. Those in the industry who are suffering want action. Saying that there will be a review is putting it off until another day. If there is going to be a review, the Minister must conduct it immediately.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I understand what the Minister has said. However, when I ask the Minister about the fishing fleet and the assistance that she can give to it, it takes her more than the 10 years — sorry; the 10 days — allocated to answer those questions for written answer. It sometimes feels like 10 years. I believe that the Minister is turning her face away from fishing.

Mr Irwin: I agree with the Member.

In 2008-09, a financial package for the industry helped it through that period. Since that, the industry has managed very well, but it has hit a real bad spot at this time. I, and many of us here, believe that if some assistance was given to the industry at this time, it would have a bright future. We call on the Minister to not only act on a review but to act immediately and give some help to the fishermen.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly welcomes the efforts made by fishermen in meeting EU catch regulations in respect of cod and in reducing other unwanted catches; recognises the expense incurred in purchasing highly selective gears and forgoing valuable catches as a result of using these gears; sympathises with those fishermen whose earnings have been dramatically reduced because of a combination of bad weather and using new fishing gears; and calls on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to deliver urgently a meaningful package of aid designed to assist those fishermen who have helped her comply with the commitments she made at the EU Fisheries Council in December 2011.

Mr Flanagan: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Sula dtosaímid leis an ráiteas, caithfidh mé a rá go bhfuil brón orm nach raibh mé anseo inné chun an cheist a bhí agam a chur ar an Aire Forbartha Sóisialta. Ministerial Statements

Planning Policy Statement 16: Tourism

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to make a statement to the effect that I am now issuing Planning Policy Statement 16 on tourism and bringing it into effect.

This document will supersede the current policies for tourism in 'A Planning Strategy for Rural Northern Ireland'. With the spotlight of the world on us and with the particular attention on Fermanagh, this new policy is timely and relevant. It attempts to shape how we can manage and plan tourism developments and, as we do so, safeguard our great heritage. With other Executive Ministers, I was down in Enniskillen last night at a press function. Given the weather, the scenery and the scale of attention, it clearly is a great opportunity for Fermanagh and the North, and this tourist policy will fit neatly into maximising those opportunities as we go forward.

I wish to acknowledge all who contributed to the policy, particularly since the consultation on the draft. The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and her officials, the chair, chief executive and staff of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and Department of the Environment (DOE) officials have been essential to today's outcome and the signpost that it offers towards sustainable tourist development. As I will outline in this statement and in the answers to the questions that I will be asked, it deals with tourist development in settlement areas and in rural areas. It protects from inappropriate development and safeguards tourism assets, but it creates opportunities at the same time.

The PPS takes account of the emerging tourism 'Priorities for Action' plan being brought forward by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, which sets out a new vision, strategic direction and targets for tourism.

The targets for achievement by 2020 are to increase visitor numbers to 4.5 million and to double earnings from tourism to £1 billion — that is, to increase earnings by 100% in the next six to seven years and to make tourism a £1 billion a year industry. All of that will revolve around the scale, wonder and beauty of our natural and built heritage. Six of the 10 top visitor attractions in Northern Ireland are from our built and natural heritage. The tourism opportunities around them will create jobs for many people. All those targets reflect the tourism industry's potential for further growth. They also underline the potential for tourism as a key economic driver. As the tourism sector grows in a sustainable way, so do jobs, services and facilities.

The aim of PPS 16 is, first, to ensure that the planning system can play its part in achieving those targets and to manage the provision of sustainable, high-quality tourism developments in appropriate locations in the built and natural environment. This is not a free-for-all for tourism development in settlement areas and rural locations. It is a pathway for the provision of sustainable, high-quality tourism developments. As one of the planning policies in the statement outlines, we will be rigorous with regard to character, design and quality.

Secondly, the PPS also continues the thrust of existing planning policy to safeguard these assets from insensitive development so as to protect their intrinsic quality and attractiveness to tourists. Given that six of the 10 top visitor attractions are in our built and natural heritage, we would be cutting off our nose to spite our face if we were to permit insensitive development that would impact on their intrinsic quality and their attractiveness to tourists, and there could be job losses.

Our cities, towns and villages have a lot to offer to tourists. As well as transport links, accommodation, restaurants and shops, our settlements boast places of historical or cultural interest. They provide entertainment and other attractions. I have only to look to my right to my colleague from the Foyle constituency to be reminded of an example of how our cities, towns and villages — our settlement areas — create opportunities, not least in this year of the City of Culture. Tourism benefits from the synergy created between new developments and existing businesses and facilities, and urban areas offer the greatest potential for generating optimum levels of tourism spend. It is at the heart of the policy that tourism development should preferably revolve around settlements, whether they are defined as villages, hamlets, towns or cities, because, when such a synergy is created, tourism and tourism development opportunities can arise. That is why PPS 16 has a general presumption in favour of tourism development in settlements.

The policies in PPS 16 also recognise that tourists visit different areas for different reasons and to enjoy different experiences. That is the second big theme in the planning policy statement: how do we have sustainable, high-quality development in areas outside settlements in our rural locations. Not all forms of tourism development will be suited to an urban location. PPS 16, therefore, facilitates sustainable tourism development in the countryside, and the final document has moved on from the draft to provide particular flexibility and additional opportunities.

The focus of PPS 16 with respect to sustainable, high-quality development in the countryside will be to promote such development in appropriate locations and be sensitive to the rural context. It ensures that such development is sustainable in the broader planning policy context of the regional development strategy 2035 and PPS 21 on sustainable development in the countryside, and it seeks to not allow random, inappropriate or excessive development in the countryside.

PPS 16 makes provision in the countryside for tourist amenities by allowing development that requires a rural location — for example, an angling centre or a mountain bike trail. Similarly, it allows for tourist amenity proposals that need to be located close to an existing tourist attraction in the countryside, such as a visitor centre associated with a particular site of historical or archaeological importance.

As regards proposals for tourist accommodation in the countryside, PPS 16 removes the criticised tourism needs test that currently applies. It was widely criticised in the consultation on draft PPS 16. It was felt that the needs test did not answer the requirements of potential sustainable and high-quality rural development opportunities. Replacement of the needs test with specific criteria tailored to different forms of tourism development will improve the transparency of policy and make it easier for developers to make sure that their proposals accord with planning policy. I encourage people to read through the various clauses in the document.

PPS 16 and the various expressions of policy therein provide for new hotels, guest houses and tourist hostels in the countryside where the proposal involves the redevelopment of an appropriate existing building. Executive Ministers raised some issues about self-catering accommodation because there was a concern that there would be not enough or too much self-catering accommodation development in rural areas. There are three types of opportunity whereby tourism development in the countryside will be considered appropriate. Such opportunities include self-catering in association with existing tourism accommodation such as a hotel or guest house or in association with a tourist amenity such as a golf course or where the self-catering proposal involves the restoration of an existing clachan. In all those cases, the policy requires the units to be retained for tourism use and not used for permanent residential accommodation, and that will obviously be conditioned in any planning permission that may be granted.

An element of flexibility from the draft PPS is the provision for a new or extended holiday or caravan park in the countryside subject to the proposal providing a high-quality and sustainable form of tourism development and being based on an overall design concept that demonstrates respect for the surrounding landscape, rural character and site context. Given that this is a move from the draft policy, it has been informed not only by DETI and the NITB but by the caravan organisations themselves.

Occasionally — I stress that it will be rare rather than necessarily occasionally — unique proposals for major tourism development proposals may be put forward. PPS 16 sets out an exceptional circumstances policy that allows for such a proposal, providing that it can demonstrate exceptional benefit on three levels: benefit to the regional tourism industry; sustainable benefit to the locality; and the requirement for a countryside location.

The tourism priorities for action plan states that it is important to value what the tourist values, and that is reflected in PPS 16. Unmanaged and unsustainable development is not in anyone's interest. If permitted, inappropriate development would prejudice the longer-term interests of the tourism industry.

Northern Ireland boasts great assets, such as the city walls, the Causeway and glens, the Mourne, the Fermanagh lakelands and numerous historical sites and blue flag beaches that are valued and visited by those of us fortunate enough to live here and by tourists from further afield. Those assets are vital in providing a high-quality and often unique visitor experience and serve to underpin our tourism sector. PPS 16 continues the existing policy to safeguard tourism assets from inappropriate and harmful development in order to maintain their integrity and tourism value.

PPS 16 also includes general and design criteria applicable to all forms of tourism development to ensure the delivery of sustainable, safe and high-quality tourism schemes. Design is being increasingly embedded into the planning process and into development generally, whether on the tourism side or across other sectors of public spend. More and more design is being built into proposals. That is part of PPS 16, and the relevant Executive Ministers recently wrote to me signing off an urban design guide to ensure that, if we are to grant planning permissions, they should live up to better and higher design standards.

PPS 16 provides a planning policy framework that is right for Northern Ireland by striking a careful and sensitive balance between environmental concerns and requirements and the development of the tourism industry. It underpins the work that I am doing in other areas, such as the recently announced half a million pound regeneration fund for coastal communities and the £1 million dereliction fund that has been made available to tackle dereliction and spruce up a number of areas in Northern Ireland.

10.45 am

Importantly, PPS 16 will contribute to our economic prosperity by safeguarding our rich and diverse tourism assets and by ensuring that future tourism development is sustainable and of high quality. I take the opportunity, as I did at the beginning of the statement, to put on record my thanks to DETI and the NITB, as well as DOE officials, for their invaluable input and contribution to the development of PPS 16. This version is better and more comprehensive and creates more opportunities in a proper manner for tourism development. Executive colleagues welcomed PPS 16 at a meeting in June, and I now commend it to the House.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I thank the Minister for his statement and welcome the new PPS 16. As the Minister said, it is very timely. In my experience, friends and family who visit Northern Ireland from crowded cities such as Hong Kong and other places always want to go out to the countryside. The Minister mentioned the much criticised tourism needs test that applies, particularly in rural areas. The Minister said that the replacement of the needs test by specific criteria tailored to different forms of tourism development will improve the transparency of policy. Will the Minister expand a bit more on the specific criteria in the new PPS 16?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member, and I hope that more and more people come from crowded places to this slightly less crowded place. There are not that many crowds down in Fermanagh at the moment, certainly on the protest side.

In the planning policy statement, I refer Members to TSM 1 to TSM 7. They contain the three phases of the planning policy. TSM 1 is the presumption of sustainable and high-quality development in settlements. As I indicated, that covers everything from a village right through to a city. A settlement is defined as the line in the ground that defines a settlement limit, however you might describe that settlement limit. Within that limit, there is a presumption in favour of development.

The second phase of the document is TSM 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. They are the policies that deal with the specific issues of potential high-quality and sustainable development in rural locations. Previously, you had to prove a need in order to have a tourist amenity, such as self-catering in a potential hotel, guest house or tourist development, but now specific criteria are captured in TSM 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. They cover the full range of potential high-quality and sustainable development in the rural location. I will give you one example. I refer Members to the document, where it is detailed what might happen for each and all potential tourist development in the rural landscape.

TSM 4 captures the exceptional benefit test. Although there may be proposals that do not qualify under any other planning guidelines, is there an exceptional benefit test whereby a proposal could happen, whereas otherwise it would fail the policy requirements? Those tests are threefold: it requires a countryside location; it is sustainable for the locality; and it brings exceptional benefit to regional tourism. In that way, the needs test is no longer in place. There is a criteria-based assessment and so on and so forth in respect of the other potential opportunities, be they self-catering, hotels, guest houses or tourism accommodation.

The third element of the planning policy statement is, first, in respect of design and, secondly, in respect of safeguarding tourism assets. The three streams converge in the planning policy, which, in a balanced and proper manner and in a sustainable and high-quality ambition, is the right approach for tourism going forward.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for his statement. Minister, you referred to tourism development in the countryside. I will keep on the theme of rural tourism, to which the Committee Chair referred: to what extent do you see potential for those living on farms and wanting to diversify to put a tourism project in place and become more involved in tourism? How would that develop under the new PPS 16, especially in relation to the rural development programme?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his question. When it comes to a rural development and tourist developments in general, three opportunities are presented to people. The first is what is now captured in the planning policy statement. The second is what is already captured in PPS 21, which governs rural location. The third is what is already captured by development plans. So, when it comes to shaping tourism opportunities for people who wish to develop in a rural location or who live in a rural location, there are now three opportunities. With PPS 21, you could, for example, convert a farm building into a potential tourist amenity. Under development plans — this is particularly relevant given the Fermanagh plan — areas and opportunities are identified in the local development plan for tourist opportunities to be developed. I would like to think that in 700 days, on the far side of the devolution of the development plan functions to local councils, they will take that forward more and more in the development function. The third opportunity is what we have here, identifying the criteria that will govern all potential rural opportunities.

I stress that the presumption in favour is in respect of settlement developments. Thereafter, there will be potential for favourable outcomes if they qualify under the criteria for various tourist development. When you capture all of that and given the opportunities therein, there are clear opportunities for those who want to locate tourist accommodation in a rural location or those who live in a rural location and want to develop tourist accommodation.

No planning policy is captured in this proposal for bed and breakfasts because we believe that opportunities already exist for them. I suggest that that is a clear opportunity for those who live on and may farm the land in going forward.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire. I welcome the Minister's statement, but the key to all of this is having a proper rural tourism strategy. There are good opportunities out there, but I want to pick on two key elements with respect to development in open countryside.

First, there are opportunities within the angling fraternity as regards promoting chalets and guest houses. You mentioned that DETI was involved in the process. We do not have a proper rural tourism strategy yet; we have not cracked that nut. What in this policy will deliver for those who want to get into groups such as the angling fraternity —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member that there must be a question somewhere.

Mr Boylan: Yes, I will just finish this — and provide chalets and guest houses?

Mr Attwood: As I indicated in my statement, DETI is developing an overarching tourism strategy. When it comes to tourism generally or a rural tourism strategy in particular, that Department is taking forward that work. When that work matures and is completed, it will be complementary to the planning policy statement that has been issued and approved by the Executive. It lays down the planning considerations around rural tourist development. In my view, that will be an essential piece of the jigsaw in the overall rural tourism strategy for Northern Ireland. Therefore, it falls to DETI to take forward the tourist strategy. However, as I indicated in my answer to Mr Anderson, subject to what that overarching regional strategy may be, local councils might now be beginning to think about what dedicated local tourism strategies might look like on the far side of the reform of local government, when development plan functions transfer to local councils and, indeed, as was agreed by the Executive a number of months ago, when additional tourism functions fall to local councils in 2017.

On the point about angling, I refer the Member to TSM 5 in the policy, which deals with self-catering. That might be an option for the angling fraternity, which represents a huge tourism opportunity for this part of the world. You have only to look at Fermanagh to see that in very sharp relief as we speak. What does TSM 5 say about self-catering? It says that there can be self-catering development where there is existing tourist accommodation — if there is a hotel, for example, there might be an opportunity for self-catering development in and around it — or there can be self-catering associated with an amenity. Fishing is, if you like, an amenity, and I suggest that there will be clear opportunities for self-catering in association with an amenity, be that a golf course, a bike park or a river or lake that is used by the fishing community. Thirdly, there can be self-catering in respect of an existing clachan. What is a clachan? It is a group of family-associated accommodation that may go back centuries or generations. So, there are self-catering opportunities in rural locations in each of those ways, without a free-for-all or an opening of the dam. They are policies that apply to the rural area, as opposed to the settlement. Those three examples of self-catering development, if it is of high quality and good design and is done in a sustainable way, are part of the answer to the Member's question.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the Minister's statement as yet another example, if it were needed, of the way in which he is driving change in his Department. The Minister mentioned the development plan and tourism development functions that will transfer under RPA. We all know about the issues with the interpretation of planning policy statements. Are there any plans in the Department to do some joint training across councils and the Planning Service to embed this planning policy statement?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for remarks and her question. Certainly, my sense in the Department was that there was a training capacity issue, be it on the interpretation of PPS 21 or on the management of renewables applications for the likes of wind turbines. That is why dedicated training was introduced into the planning regime in respect of PPS 21 and individual wind turbine applications. That was to ensure that people understood what the policy meant; that there was consistency in the application of policy between divisional planning offices; that planning decisions, whatever the outcome, were made in good time and were based on good evidence; and that there was no uncertainty or doubt. You see the evidence of that with PPS 21 and renewables applications, particularly for wind turbines.

Given that this will be a more flexible, criteria-based policy, it is accepted that there will be a requirement for some level of training in order to ensure that there is consistency and avoidance of doubt, that there is certainty and that the policy lives up to the ambition that has been set by myself and the Executive.

So there will be training around this to ensure that it works well and achieves the policy's ambition as we move forward. Part of that will be the training regime that will be put in place in the run down to local government reform.

There is a group in my Department working with councils, the Northern Ireland Local Government Association, the National Association of Councillors and the Local Government Staff Commission. It has scoped out all of the training needs, especially around the planning function, in the run down to local government reform. Clearly, given that it will be part of the transfer of planning function and that it is a new policy, it is one element in which people, be they planning officers, councillors or council management, will all require training.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for his statement. I wonder whether the planning policy will actually be a help or hindrance to future development. The jury will be out for a period of time. My question follows on from Ms Lo's question on the criteria-based assessments as opposed to the needs test. Will those criteria include issues of natural tourist attractions, such as the Mourne, the Causeway Coast and, indeed, the Fermanagh lakeland? Would the Lough Erne golf resort, which we see in the spotlight now, actually get planning permission under that policy? There was not always a golf course or other attractions on that site.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member. I believe that laying down criteria and then working that through operationally on decisions is a better standard against which to judge an application than the needs-based test. That can end up being more uncertain, arbitrary and subjective. It is better to have an objective criteria-based approach to making policy than the one that there was heretofore. The fact that in the consultation, which now goes back some time, there was such widespread criticism from across the range of stakeholders, especially those who have the leading responsibility for tourism development in the North, including NITB, and that they had drawn those conclusions is testament to the weakness of the needs-based approach and the strength of a criteria-based approach.

If you go through the TSMs that are now part of the policy, you see that, as I indicated, there are two elements that are very relevant to the Member's question. The first is TSM 8, which lays down the requirement to safeguard tourism assets. Therefore, whilst there will be a criteria-based policy for sustainable, high-quality rural development, it has to be measured against TSM 8, which safeguards tourism assets. So, while there are going to be opportunities for rural, sustainable, high-quality development, if it fails the test of safeguarding tourism assets, there might not be development in one area or another.

On the other hand, there is also going to be an exceptional benefit test. So, while something may not fulfil the other standards that are outlined in the planning policy, if there is an exceptional benefit to regional tourism, it is sustainable locally and it requires a countryside location, it might be granted. In that tension, we can work through what the right answer is. We safeguard tourism assets, but there will be rare occasions where exceptional benefit might see some developments. I am not saying whether or not those new standards would apply to the Lough Erne golf resort, save to say that, in terms of the use of that piece of land for tourism opportunity, a hotel of a matching standard would, of course, have a high standard. My judgement is that, under previous policy or under this future policy, it gets over the line.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire.

I welcome the amendments to draft PPS 16, which was universally accepted as a disaster because it would have devastated the rural tourism economy. As Tom Elliott said, the Lough Erne golf resort would not have been developed under that policy. I have not yet seen the policy as a whole, but the previous policy stated that the strategy encourages development to be sited where there is a choice of transport, with the location not dependent predominantly on access by car. How has that changed under the new policy, given that very many of Fermanagh's most visited tourist attractions, such as the Marble Arch caves, do not have public transport?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his question. He is right to identify — I do not know whether I would share the use of the word "disaster" — that a lot of good work has been done since the consultation between, as I indicated, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and NITB. Some of those conversations were between me and senior staff, including the chief executive of NITB. This has been fashioned in a way that certainly creates more opportunity while not endangering Fermanagh's heritage, including the caves.

I recommend that the Member looks at the policy as a whole, because it captures in TSM 1 the presumption of developing in a settlement. Why would you have presumption of development in a settlement? That was indicated in part of the Member's question. There you have synergy, with restaurants, parks, hotels and other accommodation, transport infrastructure, and provision for car parking and public transport. Where all that is gathered in a settlement area, whatever its scale and dimension, and whatever you might call it, there should be a presumption of development, because therein is a synergy, with those tourism assets being developed.

The point of the reconfigured policy, as opposed to the draft policy, is to recognise that there are major assets such as the caves. Last night, I saw some sights that I had not seen before in Fermanagh, such as Castle Coole, which goes back 230 years. That house is viewed as the best of that vintage on the island of Ireland. Anybody who goes to look at it would draw that conclusion. Mr Flanagan has, no doubt, been there before, but I had not. I recommend that everyone should go and have a look at it. It is a wonderful building in a wonderful location, and it was a wonderful night. Congratulations to Invest Northern Ireland and the Tourist Board for putting that event together. Even in the two or three hours that I was there, the point of the exercise was well proven, because some of the most high-profile media figures that you see on your screens from day to day were sitting in the marquee, eating the food and having conversations about how wonderful this part of the world is. So whatever the toing and froing might be at the G8, and whatever our parties' views about what should or should not be the outcome, it was a wonderful event.

The purpose of all the other supporting TSMs, beyond that which sees development in settlement areas, is to say that if there is an opportunity around Marble Hill; sorry, around Marble caves in Fermanagh — I mixed up Marble Hill strand and Marble Arch caves. If that is high quality, is sustainable and is self-catering around an existing amenity, it may fulfil the policy test, which may drive tourism development and, therefore, drive tourism jobs and tourism spend, and that would, ultimately, benefit everybody.

Mrs McKevitt: I welcome the Minister's statement today. Tourism is a fast-growing industry, particularly given the potential for job creation right across our region, with farmers and those already in the tourism business getting a good wake-up call, and I think that the statement falls well into that. Has the Minister any plans to bring to a conclusion any outstanding planning applications currently in the system that fall into this planning policy, particularly given that, in the south Down area, we are in the process of building the likes of bridges, which will be new tourist attractions?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for her question. As she will be aware, planning permission for Narrow Water bridge was issued quite a number of months ago, and there now seems to be a much more positive atmosphere around all that. It is my understanding that, in the past number of days or the next number of days, an application in respect of the proposed ferry link between Greencastle and Carlingford has been or will be received; that has not come in to the system, or it has just come in. Clearly, there will be issues around that that will have to be interrogated.

A number of other individual applications regarding potential tourist opportunities in and around the Mournes are being dealt with at local offices. These are very challenging applications given their location, but it may be that, around this policy, there will be a pathway to work through those and come out with a decision, whatever that decision might be.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. Minister, PPS 16 is out today and the same old restrictions are still there. I did not see any reference to them in your statement. I am talking about areas of special scientific interest, areas of outstanding natural beauty, conservation zones, and so on, which have been very restrictive to planning applications over the years in rural areas, especially in my area of the glens. Am I right in thinking that, for example, under exceptional circumstances, this new PPS 16 has the wherewithal to override these present restrictions? Otherwise, we will come back to the same old arguments that we have had for years to try to get planning permission, especially for the farming community and the non-farming rural dweller.

Mr Attwood: I think that the Member is reading the mood of the House wrong and he is reading the content of the document wrong. The reason why the policy has been brought forward is to reconfigure the approach to sustainable, high-quality development in the rural location; the presumption in favour of developing in settlement areas; and criteria-based assessment regarding a range of categories of tourist opportunities in rural areas.

Now, if it ends up that we have the same outcome as we did under the previous needs-based test, the Member might be justified in drawing that conclusion. However, to draw that conclusion about "the same old restrictions", to borrow his language, about this policy, which has been shaped in that environment and reworked since the consultation in order to acknowledge that there might be a need for more opportunities that are appropriate, sustainable and high quality in the rural location, I do not think is right. I do not think that you can draw the conclusion, based on a document that has just been issued, that it is going to have the same old restrictions when the policy content is about trying to rework old restrictions and having the right constraints and the right opportunities going forward.

Part of the assessment is clearly going to be the wonder and scale of our natural heritage, expressed through the designations that the Member referred to, but I hope that the Member is not suggesting that a consequence of this policy will be that every area of outstanding natural beauty will fall foul of a proposal and that there is going to be an exceptional benefit to build whatever tourist amenity might be in the middle of such a designation. That is not going to be a consequence of this policy. Exceptional benefit, which is what the Member referred to, will be restricted to regional tourism benefit that is sustainable locally and that requires a countryside location. That will be a very measured and discerning policy rather than one that sees the building of tourist amenities in every designated area in the North. That is not the intention of the policy.

I believe the policy will deal with appropriate, sustainable, high-quality development in the rural location, the presumption of development in settlement areas and criteria-based development in other areas. I think that will create more than enough opportunities if it is interpreted and applied properly to ensure that the worst fears articulated by the Member, who may not have fully read the document, will not be realised.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Minister for his statement. We very much welcome the publication of PPS 16. It has been a long time coming; I think it got lost somewhere between PPS 14 and PPS 21. Will the Minister tell us whether the new policy will ensure that more weight is given to an application's additionality to tourism development in an area as well as more flexibility? Will more flexibility be afforded around areas such as roads? I am thinking particularly of the only caravan park in Derry, which is on the outskirts of the city, and which has been unable to get planning permission, despite being of a very high standard, and now more than ever is in very high demand.

Mr Attwood: I understand why the Member says that the policy was lost. However, it has now been found and published. Hopefully, that is the standard going forward. Yes, arising from the consultation, and because of the conversation with stakeholders, there will be elements of further flexibility. That is captured in the various elements of the planning policy.

Remember that the planning authority, be it the Environment Minister when it comes to article 31s or the senior planning management team in a divisional planning office when it comes to local applications, is the executive authority; ultimately, it has to make the judgement call. Whatever the advice of a consultee might be, be it Roads Service or another, including internal consultees in the Environment Agency, as long as the executive authority is making a decision based on good evidence and proper process, it can make a decision contrary to that advice. I have made it very clear to the planning management that it is the executive authority. Roads Service or the Environment Agency is not the executive authority; they are there to give best advice. The planning authority does not have to be railroaded into taking best advice. On the far side of that, it can make a decision contrary to the advice that it is given, where there are good grounds, process and evidence so to do.

I am very aware of the particular case that the Member is referring to. It remains under consideration, including by me.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What does the Minister deem a unique proposal under the exceptional circumstances policy? I am thinking of an application in my county of Derry. I do not know whether the Minister is aware of a planning application to build a life-size Noah's ark as part of a tourism project. Maybe the Minister would deem that to be a unique proposal.

Mr Attwood: I was not aware of that particular proposal, but I would like to hear about it. I am surprised that there has not been some publicity about it, but I am sure that, after today, there will be, for good or ill.

As I indicated, there are three criteria in the exceptional benefit test. It has to have exceptional benefit to regional tourism, so it is not a locality-based proposal. To go back to Mrs McKeivitt's question, a tourist lodge development in the foothills of the Mourne might be viewed as having local benefit. However, it might not be viewed as having regional benefit, depending on how you interpret it. It has to have exceptional benefit to regional tourism; it has to be in a sustainable locality; and it requires a countryside location. On the far side of that, an assessment can be made of the merits of any application, including the particular one that you refer to. However, it will be a rare case. This is not going to be a mechanism that will approve many things that might otherwise have been refused. Due to the exceptional benefit and the high threshold that is suggested by that, it will be a smaller number of rare cases rather than many. I wait to see whether, under current planning policy, PPS 21, this planning policy statement or the exceptional benefit test, that particular proposal crosses over the line.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. He said that the policy provides for new hotels, guest houses and tourist hostels in the countryside where the proposal involves the redevelopment of an appropriate existing building. Will the Minister clarify whether that is the only case for development, and, therefore, that he will oppose any greenfield sites?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member. If you go through TSM 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, you will see that there are quite a number of opportunities for rural development, be it hotels, self-catering, guest houses or tourist hostels. As I said, PPS 16 does not refer to bed-and-breakfast opportunities because we think that there is sufficient policy cover in other areas of planning law and policy to capture those.

As for hotels, guest houses and tourist hostels specifically, I refer the Member to TSM 3 of the new planning policy statement, which suggests that such proposals should replace existing accommodation or be newbuilds on the periphery of settlements. TSM 3 states that for hotels, guest houses and tourist hostels generally. For the exceptional benefit test, something may be of such scale and importance that it moves beyond TSM 3 and is covered by TSM 4.

Steps 2 Success

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning):

I wish to make a statement about the procurement and introduction of the new Steps 2 Success programme that has been developed by my Department. Steps 2 Success will replace the main adult return-to-work programme known as Steps to Work. This is scheduled to take place in June 2014.

The current programme, Steps to Work, has been in operation since 2008 and has served Northern Ireland well. That is demonstrated by its performance results, which have been independently assessed and verified. Although it is a strong programme, it is clear that the new challenges posed by a range of factors, including benefit changes as a result of welfare reform and the need to secure improved performance, mean that a next-generation programme is essential.

I am confident that, in developing a replacement programme, we are building on the strengths of Steps to Work. The contracts for delivering Steps to Work will end in 2014, and, with the ongoing economic uncertainty, it is important that we have a new employment programme in place that addresses the needs of those struggling to gain, or indeed regain, a foot on the employment ladder.

Steps 2 Success has been designed to improve the performance of my Department's employment programmes for unemployed and economically inactive benefit customers. The significant rise in unemployment, high levels of economic inactivity and the introduction of universal credit have established the need for a step change in the delivery of employment services.

Although our current and forthcoming employment programmes are open to a range of clients, the persistent challenge of long-term unemployment in this society should, in particular, compel us to have the most effective and efficient set of interventions possible. In particular, there is a need to focus even more on positive outcomes and sustained employment for programme participants to ensure value for money and to make sure that no one is left behind.

The key aim of Steps 2 Success is to help eligible benefit recipients to find and sustain work, thereby supporting the needs of employers and the economy. Our policy objectives will be to increase the number of participants finding and sustaining employment; support those most in need, regardless of employment barriers; maximise the flexibility in the programme approach; and build a programme that can adapt to changes in the economy and the needs of clients.

Although we would have developed a successor programme to Steps to Work in any event, in developing the Steps 2 Success programme, my officials have endeavoured to ensure that it is future-proofed and designed to meet the requirements of the impending universal credit conditionality groups. Universal credit — the single working-age credit that will replace a number of social security benefits — should come into effect across Northern Ireland from April 2014. Nevertheless, Steps 2 Success will stand on its own feet, independent of decisions that are made on welfare reform.

Steps 2 Success is also part of a wider assistance package being developed across the Department's employment service. Alongside the new programme, we have developed a more work-focused tailored service for all our customers. This service improvement is being rolled out across the jobs and benefits office/jobcentre network to enhance and strengthen the help available to all customers who are seeking work. Jobseekers will continue to receive initial help and support from an employment service adviser. These advisers will deliver an enhanced front line service using diagnostic tools and support to help customers to find and sustain work at the earliest opportunity.

There is a wide portfolio of provision that front line staff can avail themselves of to support clients at the earliest stage in getting back to work.

To inform the development of Steps 2 Success, I asked my Department to commission a study, which was carried out by the Centre for Economic and Social Inclusion. Its remit was to consider the feasibility of an outcome-based employment programme. Inclusion entered into discussions with a wide range of stakeholders, such as employer representatives, our current delivery partners and representatives of the voluntary and community sector, to inform the development of a potential delivery model for a new employment programme for Northern Ireland. Inclusion also looked at models for employment programmes in other places.

The feasibility study that was produced was then used as the basis for the initial high-level design for Steps 2 Success, which was issued for public consultation in July 2012. Alongside the consultation exercise, officials arranged information sessions for all interested parties. A total of 175 people representing 83 organisations attended the sessions, and participants raised key issues around the proposed programme design, objectives and eligibility. In particular, there was significant interest in proposals for the contract area and duration of the programme, supply chain management and funding.

The consultation exercise has been invaluable to the Department. We received over 80 written responses to the consultation document with a range of useful suggestions on how we might improve the programme design and delivery. Significant time and effort went into making sure that the development of Steps 2 Success took account of the views and opinions of key stakeholders, many of whom have experience of delivering support to unemployed people, including those with health or disability issues that impact on their employability.

There has also been productive engagement with the Committee for Employment and Learning over the past year. The Committee was briefed on a number of occasions on our emerging thinking and has provided some invaluable feedback. That engagement provided the Department with a lot of information to consider, and, as may be expected, there was a variation in the number of members agreeing and disagreeing with the proposals. Crucially, however, there was broad support for the majority of the design features outlined in the consultation document: the objectives of the programme; the flexibility of the approach; the non-specified hours of attendance; the proposed programme length; assessment of the supply chain as part of procurement; the need for providers to demonstrate support for smaller organisations; the code of conduct for lead contractors; and higher payments for higher performance. There was less support for the following initial proposals: automatic entry for recipients of employment and support allowance and incapacity benefit; treating Northern Ireland as a single contract area; capping the contract duration to three years; the random allocation of customers to providers; and the 40:60 split between attachment fees and outcome-related funding.

The comments and opinions were carefully considered and assessed, and a number have influenced the amended design features of the programme. Adjustments were made to a number of design features: the entry points for employment and support allowance; three contract areas instead of one; the contract length; the removal of the random allocation of customers to a lead contractor; and the amount to be paid for attachment and outcome funding.

I am confident that these positive changes to the final design of Steps 2 Success indicate my Department's commitment to listen and respond to the views of others. I am equally confident that we are building a programme that will be responsive to the needs of unemployed people in Northern Ireland. This programme will also provide a challenging but exciting prospect for our delivery partners.

The design of Steps 2 Success is now complete. The programme will primarily be available to people receiving jobseeker's allowance (JSA) and those in the employment and support allowance work-related activity group. JSA claimants aged between 18 and 24 will be mandated to Steps 2 Success if they have failed to find work after nine months on benefit. Those aged 25 and over will be mandated after 12 months on benefit. Over-25s who have concerns about their ability or opportunities to secure employment without more expert help can request referral to Steps 2 Success when they have been in receipt of jobseeker's allowance for six months or more. When customers face significant barriers that cannot be easily addressed by the employment service, they may be referred to Steps 2 Success early. This early entry may include customers with more specialised needs, such as drug or alcohol dependency, people with a disability, ex-prisoners or those who are homeless.

11.30 am

Steps 2 Success will be accessible to people who are still receiving incapacity benefit. Those receiving income support as a lone parent or carer will be able to volunteer to join Steps 2 Success if they wish to get more help to find work. Customers in the ESA support group who are deemed to be unable to work can join Steps 2 Success voluntarily at any time if they wish to seek help to find work. Anyone not receiving one of those benefits can continue to receive help and advice from the employment service but will not enter Steps 2 Success. Once referred to Steps 2 Success, participants will remain with the contracted provider for up to 12 months, while those with significant barriers or health-related problems may remain for up to 18 months to receive more intensive help to prepare for and find work.

Flexibility is at the heart of the Steps 2 Success programme design, with the objective of ensuring that contracted providers do whatever works best for each individual to ensure sustained employment. In essence, contracted providers will work with participants to jointly identify their employability needs and determine the best way to meet those needs. That flexibility will be underpinned by a service guarantee tailored to each of the customer groups. The service guarantee will ensure that all participants receive high-quality, personalised support. Each participant will receive a copy of the service guarantee and will know what level of service they can at least expect to receive while participating in the programme. The number of hours of attendance and work-focused activity required of participants while on Steps 2 Success will be determined by the provider in agreement with each customer and depending on their needs. The service guarantee for each conditionality group will include a minimum level of participation to ensure that no one is left without regular contact from the provider or a subcontracted delivery organisation.

Contract management will play an important role in ensuring that an effective service is provided to Steps 2 Success participants. My Department will ensure that contracted providers deliver a service suited to the needs of their participants.

Steps 2 Success will be delivered in three contract areas, with one contracted provider responsible for each area. The model provides the opportunity to develop local initiatives and to engage a local supply chain in the delivery of the programme. In each contract area, the contracted provider will be required to deliver provision and provide access for all participants across the full geographical area and to develop a supply chain that can meet the needs of all participants. The initial contract period will run for four years of referrals, with an option to extend for a further two-year period, subject to satisfactory performance and achievement of targets.

Funding to contracted providers for the delivery of Steps 2 Success will consist of three main elements: an attachment fee, payable when a customer is accepted on to the programme by the provider; job entry, payable when a Steps 2 Success participant finds full-time employment, which is defined as 16 hours or more; and sustained employment, payable at intervals from three to 12 months after a client has sustained employment. In recognition of the Department's responsibility to help people acquire the skills and experience to find work, we will also pay providers an additional payment if a participant finds work while gaining a relevant accredited qualification through Steps 2 Success. Higher funding levels will be payable for harder-to-help clients with more significant barriers to work, such as those who are early entrants and require more specialist support.

Funding for Steps 2 Success will be based on a 50:50 split between attachment fees and outcome-related payments at baseline performance level. That level is set by my Department on the basis of previous programmes, such as Steps to Work and Pathways to Work. The outcome-related funding element will be paid in stages, commencing with job entry and at subsequent intervals of sustainment for up to 12 months. Higher funding levels will also be available where a contracted provider exceeds performance targets and helps significantly more participants to find and sustain employment. Steps 2 Success participants who remain unemployed after completing their time on the programme will receive ongoing help and support from an employment service adviser for up to 26 weeks. If they still fail to find work, they will then be referred back to Steps 2 Success for a further 12 months.

The Steps 2 Success procurement will involve a two-stage tendering process. The first stage will commence in early July and will consist of a prequalification questionnaire, which will be an examination of the suitability and capability of potential suppliers to perform the contract. That process will ask questions regarding statutory requirements, technical or professional experience and financial standing. Successful organisations at stage 1 will then be shortlisted to progress to stage 2. That will be the full invitation to tender and will commence in October 2013.

Information sessions to provide an overview of the final design of Steps 2 Success and the detail required for those who wish to tender for the contracts have been arranged. The sessions will take place on 20 and 24 June 2013, and a high level of interest in attending them has already been indicated.

I cannot emphasise it strongly enough that the development of this bespoke programme for Northern Ireland is a prime example of the advantage of having a devolved Administration. We have been able to design the programme to meet the specific needs of people who require help to find work, while considering the viability and capability of local partners who may well play a key role in the delivery of Steps 2 Success. Although the Work Programme in Great Britain has been in the spotlight for a number of reasons, we have been able to monitor and learn from its performance. That insight has helped us to avoid some of the pitfalls that have become more apparent.

It is important that Members understand that Steps 2 Success is a very different proposition to the GB Work Programme. Not only have we learned from their mistakes, we have also set our own path. Key differences include the undertaking of a detailed and comprehensive consultation process to build on the model from the feasibility study and to design a model that is appropriate for Northern Ireland; the introduction of a service guarantee setting minimum standards; payment for job entry; keeping the attachment fee for the full duration of the programme, which means not moving to a purely outcome-related funding model; a simpler model, with fewer categories of clients and simpler administrative processes; and additional funding for providers when a participant finds work and achieves a recognised qualification via Steps 2 Success.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to update the House. I look forward to updating Members further on the outcome of the Steps 2 Success procurement exercise and the ongoing achievements of the programme following its introduction next year.

Mr Swann (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): I thank the Minister for his statement. He has outlined the policy objectives for the programme and indicated that its intent is to increase the number of participants finding and sustaining employment. Has he baselined the policy objectives, and does he have any defined targets to measure against? Also, what are the real long-term prospects for those on the programme? Will they simply be given short-term contracts and then, after a few months, find themselves right back where they started?

Dr Farry: I thank the Chair for his questions. I will also put on record again the excellent engagement that we have had with the Committee on the issue. We look forward to continuing that as the process unfolds. The Member has asked two particular questions. The first one concerns what sort of targets we have. It is important that we have targets and that we recognise that the programme is about improved performance. At present, we work on the baseline performance of Steps to Work of around 29%. We would like to see revised targets for the new programme of 32% of people moving into sustained employment. If contractors are able to exceed that 32% target, they will become eligible for higher-level payments, so that is an incentive to move beyond that.

A lot of people wonder why the percentages are in the 20s and 30s: that is the norm for such programmes. I want to see our programme in Northern Ireland not only exceeding our performance hitherto but exceeding what is happening in Great Britain. I would like to think that, given that we have learned lessons from what they have tried to undertake there, we will be better placed to do that.

The second point that the Chair makes is about what happens in the longer term. Outcomes are based on sustained employment. We measure that in terms of someone being in work for at least 13 weeks after they leave the Steps 2 Success programme. Again, there is monitoring beyond that as well. It is important that we recognise that there is always a churn in the job market in any event, but this programme is not designed to simply shift people around and massage figures. It is really based on getting people into work and enabling them to keep the work that they gain through the help that we will, hopefully, provide through the programme.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for his lengthy and detailed statement, which I welcome. As he said, much of it has been discussed with the Committee. There is some concern over the four-year duration. There was a possibility that there might be six-monthly or, perhaps, quarterly reviews of the contracts. Has that been decided, and have the account managers been appointed?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions. I stress that this is a major investment in public support and for the organisations that win the primary contracts. The rationale for the contract duration is to make this an attractive proposition to ensure that we get bids. There will be a necessary investment from organisations to begin with, and it will take time for companies to move through a break-even point before it becomes a successful proposition for them.

Some may be concerned that organisations could well make a profit or surplus on the back of the programme, but there is a very strong rationale for engagement with the private sector. There will be aspects of what we are trying to achieve as a Government that will, at times, be better delivered by the private sector, the community and voluntary sector or by elements of the social economy. It is important that we try to ensure that we drive as much efficiency and effectiveness into the scheme as we can, because it is fundamentally about achieving jobs outcomes for the people of Northern Ireland. The deliberations around the contract duration have been framed by those considerations.

Ms McGahan: I thank the Minister for his statement and for the intervention that is being made under Steps 2 Success. What evaluation process will he put in place to ensure that employers do not exploit the scheme for cheap labour and it is not used to massage the unemployment figures?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. The scheme will be carefully monitored and scrutinised, and I draw the Member's attention in particular to the guarantees that we intend to put in place.

It is worth referring to what happens in Great Britain, where they talk about what is, in essence, a black box. People referred to the work programme there are, essentially, out of sight and out of mind. There is no real relationship with the jobcentres in Britain, and the providers are left to do with the participants what they will. The ethos there is strongly about simply getting results at any cost. We are taking a different approach here. It could be called a "grey box" approach: we want to give flexibility, but equally there are important accountability issues that I have been very mindful about from day one. First, we have to ensure that the providers are not picking off the easier cases and ignoring those who face larger barriers to engagement in the workplace. If anything, we are trying to incentivise the schemes to deal with those who face real barriers. Equally, we want to ensure that we provide genuine opportunities for people and that it is not simply a means by which people are exploited.

On the Member's wider point, I am very clear that I am not interested in simply shifting people around categories and trying to massage figures. The figures are what they are. The ultimate judgement by which we will have to assess the success of what we are doing in the labour market is the economic participation figure. I have already talked about what we are doing around economic inactivity, but I am not interested in taking people off inactivity into unemployment or vice versa. We have to get people into real jobs.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I wish his Department well with Steps 2 Success. Will he acknowledge the contribution of the strategy board and the skills directorate of the One Plan in the north-west? Furthermore, will there be a special measure in the north-west area that fits into the priorities of the One Plan for a subregional bespoke skills and training programme?

Dr Farry: I thank Mr Ramsey for his question, which, although linked to the subject, is slightly tangential. Regardless, I congratulate him on his plug for the north-west.

I can give the Member some good news in that we have agreed to allocate a member of our skills division to work directly with stakeholders in the north-west. A senior official from my Department will work with the skills directorate of the One Plan to better draw together and focus on skills issues in the north-west. There will be a very clear linkage between what is happening on the wider skilling issues and what is happening with employability issues and creating opportunities for people. So, hopefully, through that intervention, we will be able to provide a more effective service in the north-west. I appreciate that there are acute issues there that need to be addressed.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the statement from the Minister this morning. Having visited the city last week with the Employment and Learning Committee and seen some excellent work happening there, I welcome his confirmation that a DEL skills official will be attached to the One Plan in Derry. I also look forward to welcoming the Minister to East Belfast tomorrow. How important has the public consultation and engagement with wider stakeholders been in arriving at this particular model?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions. We try to get around as best we can.

At times, there is a lot of cynicism around public consultations, with people thinking that they are just a paper exercise that Departments go through and that they have their mind made up in advance. People think that taking on board the views of stakeholders is a chore for us and that, in practice, we simply ignore them and just do what we originally intended. Generally speaking, that is not the case in government, but this is a very good and specific example where that absolutely was not the case. The consultation and the wider engagement with stakeholders has had a significant impact on the shaping and design of this. I am very conscious that we must be careful not to design things in a bubble and that we test our initial thoughts to make sure that they are achievable and workable in the particular circumstances that we have in Northern Ireland. I like to think that the wider community will see the impact on the representations that have been made, particularly those of the key stakeholders who have taken the time to engage with us.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh ráiteas an Aire. I thank the Minister for his statement. He will hardly be astonished to know that I remain to be convinced about the overall benefits of the scheme. In yet another lengthy statement, some key information has been omitted, particularly around the financial aspects of the scheme.

Will the Minister outline the payments that will be made to the agencies to help clients find employment? Will he outline why he has chosen to make lucrative payments to middlemen or middlewomen and not to those involved in either creating the job or finding the job? That money will be taken out of the local economy and sucked into administration through further unnecessary outsourcing and privatisation.

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions. He has been consistent in his approach to this over the past number of months, at the very least.

I stress that, ultimately, this is about increased help for people, particularly those who have been out of work for a longer time, to find sustained employment. That is good for them as individuals, and it is good for the economy in Northern Ireland. If we have that as our starting base — I hope that there is consensus around that in the House — we then have to ask ourselves what the most effective means are of achieving that. I do not approach this with any major ideological position, and I ask the Member to do the same. We should be pragmatic about this.

We have to work on the basis of solid evidence on the nature of interventions that will be of assistance in finding people work. At times, that means bringing in the private sector. Such businesses and organisations can be more effective than the public sector in delivering particular outcomes. Sometimes, yes, they may well make a profit on the back of that, but that is part and parcel of the incentives involved in bringing in their expertise and technique.

In response to your colleague, I made it clear that we were not giving the private sector a blank cheque and that there would be a minimum service level agreement with them all as guarantees for those who are on the schemes. We want to ensure that everyone is addressed and worked with.

This is not, ultimately, a cost-cutting exercise. I know that the Member has that concern, which he alluded to in the question. This is not about our finding a means of trimming the amount of money that we spend on helping people back into work. We are working on the assumption of a similar spend to that on Steps to Work. We are seeking to use the money that we spend on Steps to Work in a different way and, through a different programme design, to get a better outcome and increase the number of people who move into sustained employment.

If anything, this could end up costing us more. If that is the case, I would welcome that, because it would be a feature of the fact that we would be paying out additional payments to those organisations because they have exceeded their targets for moving people into employment. If we are in that territory, we will be doing very well. The benefits to the wider economy — people being in work, paying taxes into the system and spending their resources elsewhere in the economy — will be there for us all to see and benefit from.

Mr Douglas: I welcome the Minister's statement. Many of the participants in these programmes will have little or no qualifications. Once they gain recognised qualifications, what guidance will they be given about a route to further education?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. He, like others, well recognises the context in which we are operating in Northern Ireland. At one end of the spectrum, we are doing very well in turning people out from higher education. We have a higher participation rate than virtually every other region in the UK. At the same time, we have a bigger profile of people with low or no qualifications. They are often the people who need the most help to move into the job market. Opportunities for people with low or no qualifications will diminish as the nature of work changes, so there is a real requirement to drive up qualifications on a whole range of levels.

One of the very particular design features of this system is flexibility, and that is to encourage the new providers and their subcontractors to work with people on an individualised basis around their particular needs. There is also an inbuilt incentive for people to gain qualifications, which is different from the work programme in Great Britain and is, therefore, another advantage of devolution. We are responding to Northern Ireland's very particular skills landscape and trying to give people individual, tailored help.

Mr McAleer: Will the Minister explain why he plans to implement this scheme as opposed to extending the Step Ahead 50+ scheme, which would pay a decent wage for a decent job or a proper wage for a proper job?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. Step Ahead 50+ is a very limited and narrow intervention for, as the title suggests, those who are over 50. It is anticipated that that will run until to March 2015, the duration of the current Budget period. In the wider context, this scheme is a replacement for Steps to Work as the main all-age return-to-work programme. We have to replace Steps to Work because it is coming to the end of its natural lifespan.

I made the point that we would be exploring this irrespective of whether welfare reform was happening or not. There are particular issues in relation to Steps to Work that we need to review and improve. While it has been an effective scheme in some respects, it is overly cumbersome in that 10 contract areas is too many and there is not sufficient flexibility for the current providers to address the very particular client needs that they come across. Hopefully, through a revised programme, we will deliver a more effective service for clients of all ages across Northern Ireland.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. Northern Ireland's unemployment figures are very worrying, with our claimant count the second highest of all 12 UK regions. I wish the Minister well in his endeavours to bring those figures down. The Minister advises that those who have been on benefits for nine months and 12 months will be mandated to take part in the programme. What will happen if an individual does not wish to take part in the programme? Will there be sanctions, and, if so, what are they?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for reminding the House of the context in which we are operating. We have a considerable challenge with respect to unemployment. The House will be aware that things have begun to change and that there are some very tentative signs that the unemployment situation is changing, but it is very early days, and we cannot afford to be complacent. If anything, we need to redouble our efforts, particularly if the economy is in an upswing, because, in that context, we can reap the rewards of a programme such as this.

She also mentioned people being mandated and asked what happens if they do not agree to that. At present, under Steps to Work, people are also mandated. It is important that people understand that this is not a new concept but one that has been accepted in Northern Ireland for the bulk of the past decade, if not longer. There is nothing new in it.

If someone does not go on the programmes, it is then to be considered what sanctions are deployed. It is worth reassuring Members that sanctions are deployed in a very small minority of cases. The number of cases of people not going on the programmes when they are suggested is very few and far between. Indeed, in the past, people have volunteered to go on the programmes rather than having to be mandated, because they understand the value of work and do not want to be on benefits. That situation will be even more acute when universal credit comes through. After that, there is still discretion on whether sanctions are deployed, and the individual circumstances will sometimes be taken into consideration. At present, sanctions through Steps to Work will be used in the smallest minority of cases — we are talking about a range of 1% to 2% of claimants. That should put it into perspective and give Members a guide.

Mr B McCrea: Unaccustomed as I am to speaking twelfth in this Assembly, can I ask the Minister whether it is true that approximately 70% of the people on the programme will not find work after it and that those who do will find low-paid unskilled work? What role does the programme play in the Minister's attempt to try to reduce long-term economic inactivity?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions. It is worthwhile explaining the nature of the statistics. At present, 29% of people move from Steps to Work into sustained employment, which is 13 weeks of employment, and we hope to increase that to a revised baseline of 32%. On the surface, that suggests that 70% of people therefore are not successful through the programme and do not move into work. However, some of those people will, in turn, in part through their experience on Steps to Work or Steps 2 Success in the future, find their way into work in due course. Others will have the opportunity to go back to, in the first case, the employment service advisers and, subsequently, into the employment programme after six months to receive further assistance. It is important that we recognise that there is a constant churn in our economy with people moving through those different programmes. There is not an automatic read-across that says that, by definition, 70% of people are therefore not availing themselves of opportunities.

He is right to highlight that this is part of a wider suite of programmes. It is focused on people who are unemployed and is also there to pick up on people who are coming through the various inactivity categories. The House will be aware that we are developing an economic inactivity strategy in conjunction with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and other Departments. The baseline analysis was published in April this year, and discussions are moving well with the different Departments. We hope to issue a strategy for public consultation in autumn this year.

Mr Newton: I welcome the Minister's statement — all seven pages of it. It requires some scrutiny. I also welcome the fact that he has built in incentives; that is a good thing. The statement says:

"Higher funding levels will also be available where a contracted provider exceeds performance targets and helps significantly more participants to find ... employment."

The target is 32%, and that leaves 68%. That seems a low target for such an ambitious scheme. Can I ask him to define what the term "significantly" means in the context of this incentive?

12.00 noon

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his questions and for his general welcome for the scheme. People may find that the targets are low, but I reiterate that they are very much in line with the targets of work programmes elsewhere, if not, indeed, higher and more challenging. It is useful to refer to the early stages of the work programme in Great Britain, where the current achievement rates for sustainable employment are much lower than those that we are talking about for Northern Ireland. So, we are seeking to do better than elsewhere.

There will be people who do not avail themselves directly of the opportunity of Steps 2 Success. Some of those people may find work of their own accord indirectly after they exit Steps to Work or Steps 2 Success, or they can go back into the scheme.

The Member referred to enhanced payments. We are essentially talking about people moving beyond the 32% target. In such cases, those people would be eligible for a considerably higher payment level. That target refers essentially to the current 29% starting point, so it is not a massive increase. However, the amount of effort that it takes to increase these figures by 1% or 2% is considerable. This is a situation where there is a lot of stickability in the statistics, and that has been found in other jurisdictions. I would like to think that the way that we have designed the programme will put the new providers in the best place possible to try to exceed those targets.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. Although I welcome the intervention under Steps 2 Success, I have some concerns about the incentive-based approach as outlined in the statement. That is because a provider will be under pressure to get a participant a job, even though it may not be of a meaningful standard. Will the Minister tell me what he is doing to ensure that the standard and quality of work that is on offer reflects meaningful employment that is not menial?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. I fully understand his and some of his colleagues' reservations and that it is easy to be cynical about these types of exercises. I want to try to reassure him again by stressing that we have sought to learn the lessons from the work programme in Great Britain. This is not the work programme from Great Britain being extended to Northern Ireland; this is a bespoke Northern Ireland employment programme. We are doing things differently to Great Britain. I highlight that we will have a draft service guarantee for the people who will be going through Steps 2 Success. We are happy to share the current draft of that guarantee with members of the Committee and, indeed, with Members of the House, to reassure them of the level of engagement that is involved.

In common with what I said to the Member's colleagues, this is not about employers picking off the easier cases and letting people simply sit neglected in the system; there will be requirements for regular engagement with advisers, as well as encouragement and incentives to address those people who have real barriers. It will also ensure that the opportunities that will be provided to clients will be real and meaningful.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before calling the next Member, I ask Members to please check their mobile phones. At least one is interfering with the system. I am sure that we would not want Hansard destroyed, would we?

Ms Lo: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I welcome the Minister's statement, and I commend him very much for the very thorough process that he undertook to review and revise the programme. I believe that it is much improved.

The Minister mentioned that there will be three contract areas instead of one. Where are those areas geographically, and what is his rationale for dividing them into three?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her comments and questions. At one stage, we were minded to go for Northern Ireland as a single contract area, with two or three providers potentially in competition with each other. That would have been more consistent with the situation in Great Britain, where there are about 10 contract areas, each with two providers covering a large geographical area. Equally, we could not stay with the current 10 areas, which was an inefficient system with too much money being spent on management and administration rather than on front line delivery. There was concern about moving to a single contract area, so on balance, we felt that moving to three contract areas with one provider in each would be a better localised solution. We will perhaps not achieve the same economies of scale that can be found elsewhere in the United Kingdom, but we will provide a better service that will be more linked in with the local supply chain and that will take account of the nature of our current jobs and benefits offices.

The three contract areas will also reflect district council boundaries. I am happy to share the detailed breakdown with Members. In essence, there will be a region around greater Belfast that will include the council areas of Belfast, North Down, Ards, Castlereagh and Lisburn. There will be a northern region that will include the council areas of Strabane, Derry, Limavady, Coleraine, Moyle, Ballymoney, Ballymena, Larne, Carrickfergus, Newtownabbey and Antrim. There will be a southern region for the council areas of Fermanagh, Omagh, Magherafelt, Cookstown, Dungannon, Craigavon, Armagh, Banbridge, Newry and Mourne, and Down. Hopefully, that gives Members a sense of what we are talking about for the three new areas.

Executive Committee Business

Budget (No. 2) Bill:

Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call on the Minister of Finance and Personnel to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Budget (No. 2) Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Deputy Speaker: As no amendments have been tabled, there is no opportunity to discuss the Budget (No. 2) Bill at this stage. Further Consideration Stage is, therefore, concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Pupil Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Deputy Speaker: The next two items of business are motions to approve statutory rules that deal with matters relating to the disclosure of pupil and higher education student information. There will be separate debates on each of the statutory rules. However, the Minister and Members will be allowed some latitude to address the broad policy issues that are common to both sets of regulations during the first debate. I hope that the House finds this useful.

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Pupil Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Mr Deputy Speaker, as you pointed out, the second motion is very similar to the first one. Members of the Assembly, the two sets of regulations that come under your consideration today are part of a wider programme of work to utilise existing government information for the production of population and social statistics. The Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 created a non-ministerial Department, the Statistics Board, to promote and safeguard the production and publication of official statistics that serve the public good. The Act extends to Northern Ireland, and these regulations are made under powers contained in that Act.

The first set of regulations relate to pupil information from the annual school census, which has been identified as an important source of data that could be used to improve population and social statistics.

The school census is owned by the Department of Education. Regulations have been made in Westminster and Cardiff to allow the equivalent GB Departments to pass such data to the UK Statistics Authority. The regulations before Members are required to allow the Department of Education to pass that information through the Statistics Authority to the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA).

The information to be shared is simple demographic data. Although the regulations will allow access to personal information, it is forbidden to publish any information that could identify an individual, and the data must be held under conditions of strict security. The regulations were considered by the Committee for Finance and Personnel and the Committee for Education, and no objections were raised. Therefore, I recommend that the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Pupil Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his short opening remarks. As he outlined, the regulations will enable the Department of Education to disclose selected demographic information from pupil records to the Statistics Authority for use by NISRA in developing population statistics.

Given the cross-departmental relevance of the legislation, Committee members agreed to seek comment from the Committee for Education before coming to a final view. The Committee noted the significance of robust statistics, especially relating to the Barnett formula, and queried whether the proposals were anticipated to lead to any change in what has occurred in any previous collection of data. A NISRA official confirmed that no changes were anticipated.

The Committee also noted correspondence from the Committee for Education, which indicated that it was content with the policy proposals contained in the SL1 and that the proposed rule be made. After consideration, the Committee confirmed that it had no comment to make on the policy proposals at that stage.

The Committee, at its meeting on 5 June, formally considered the statutory rule and the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules. After technical scrutiny, the Examiner raised no issues, and the Committee therefore agreed to recommend that the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Pupil Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed by the Assembly. Therefore, on behalf of the Finance and Personnel Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Wilson: This is a fairly easy one for me today. I thank both Committees for their work on the regulations. They are helpful regulations, in so far as they will improve the information available between censuses on population movement and change etc. That is useful for informing lots of government decisions. I thank the Chairmen and Committees for their scrutiny, and I am pleased that the officials were able to satisfy them that the information will be secure and used only for the purpose that has been set out, which is to give us a better understanding of changes in population and social conditions. Therefore, I commend the motion to the Assembly.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Pupil Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Higher Education Student Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move:

That the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Higher Education Student Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

This is a bit like a repeat of a BBC programme.

I am asking the Assembly to affirm the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Higher Education Student Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013.

12.15 pm

This is the same as what we will be doing with pupil information, except that these regulations cover information that is available on students who attend higher education colleges. The regulations' purpose is to give us important data on population changes and social statistics. They have already been made in Westminster to allow the equivalent GB Departments to pass on the data to the Statistics Board, and the regulations simply enable the Department for Employment and Learning to pass on information to the Statistics Board and the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency.

As with the first set of regulations, the information shared is simply demographic data. Although the regulations will allow access to personal information, I assure the Assembly that it is forbidden to publish any information that could identify an individual. The data will be held under the strictest security conditions, which have been discussed with the Committee for Finance and Personnel. The regulations have been discussed by that Committee and, in this case, the Committee for Employment and Learning, and no objections were received. Therefore, I recommend that the regulations be affirmed by the Assembly.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. As the Minister outlined, this is pretty straightforward. The Committee sought comment from the Committee for Employment and Learning this time, as opposed to the Committee for Education, and the Committee for Employment and Learning indicated that it was content with the policy proposals contained in the SL1 and that the proposed rule be made. After consideration, the Committee for Finance and Personnel confirmed that it had no comment to make on the policy proposals at that stage.

The Committee formally considered the statutory rule at its meeting on 5 June, together with the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules. He raised no issues by way of technical scrutiny. The Committee therefore agreed to recommend that the regulations be affirmed by the Assembly. On behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Wilson: Without further ado — since there is no debate on the motion and since Members seem to be satisfied that it is a useful exchange of information — I ask the Assembly to support the motion that the regulations be affirmed.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Statistics and Registration Service Act 2007 (Disclosure of Higher Education Student Information) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2013 be affirmed.

Public Bodies (Abolition of the Registrar of Public Lending Right) Order 2013: Assembly Consent Motion

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): I beg to move

That this Assembly consents to the Public Bodies (Abolition of the Registrar of Public Lending Right) Order 2013 in the form of the draft laid before the UK Parliament on 8 May 2013.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Public Bodies (Abolition of the Registrar of Public Lending Right) Order was laid in draft form at Westminster on 8 May 2013 by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

The Public Bodies Act 2011 allows British Ministers to abolish, merge or transfer functions of public bodies listed in the appropriate schedules. The proposal to abolish this body was included in the schedule to that Act. A consent motion is required because section 9 of the Public Bodies Act requires, where appropriate, the consent of the devolved legislatures before an order can be made under the Act.

As part of the reform programme, the British Government are seeking our consent to abolish the Registrar of Public Lending Right and to transfer that function to the British Library. The Registrar of Public Lending Right is a small body that makes payments to authors and illustrates when their books are borrowed from public libraries. It is a low profile but very important function that underpins book lending by our library service. This is essentially an administrative change that will have no effect on the operation of the public lending right scheme in the North. Even though this is a devolved matter, we do not make a financial contribution to the scheme, and that will continue to be the case. I commend the motion to the House.

Miss M McIlveen (The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure): As already indicated, the Assembly agreed a legislative consent motion on 7 March 2011 in relation to the Public Bodies Bill. Section 9 of the now Public Bodies Act 2011 requires, where appropriate, the consent of the devolved Administrations before an order can be made under the Act. Hence, the consent motion that is before us today.

At its meeting on Thursday 23 May 2013, the Committee considered correspondence from the Minister advising of her intention to seek the consent of the Assembly to a draft order being made under the Act. As outlined, the draft order relates to the abolition of the Registrar of the Public Lending Right and the transfer of its functions to the British Library.

The Minister has advised that the draft order proposes an administrative change aimed at creating savings and will not result in any change in service received either by authors or by the library service here. At its meeting on 23 May, the Committee indicated that it was content for the Minister to proceed with laying the statutory instrument. At the Committee's meeting on 6 June 2013, members formally considered the statutory instrument and agreed to it. That is reflected in the minutes of that meeting. On behalf of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee, I support the motion.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Go raibh maith agat arís. I thank the Chair of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee for her response on behalf of the Committee. As the Chair outlined, and as outlined in my correspondence and accepted by the Committee, this is essentially an administrative change that will have no effect on the operation of our public lending right scheme. Therefore, I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly consents to the Public Bodies (Abolition of the Registrar of Public Lending Right) Order 2013 in the form of the draft laid before the UK Parliament on 8 May 2013.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately upon the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The sitting was suspended at 12.23 pm.

On resuming (Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Regional Development

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As Mr Gregory Campbell is not in his place, I call Mr Adrian McQuillan.

North West 200

2. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister for Regional Development how many times he met the organisers of the North West 200 before this year's event to ensure that the road closures order would give greater flexibility to ensure that racing was not disrupted. (AQO 4318/11-15)

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): At the outset of Question Time, as it is the first opportunity that I have had, I place on record on behalf of myself, my party and, I hope, the whole House a tribute to the iconic images that Northern Ireland has benefited from as a result of the G8 summit. I think that the whole House will share that sentiment, particularly in light of the very impressive contribution made by Hannah Nelson yesterday at the Waterfront Hall in the presence of President Obama.

After the washout of the 2011 North West 200 race, I met representatives of the 2 and 4 Wheel Motorsport Steering Group Ltd on 15 June and 7 September 2011. Subsequent to that, my officials met the group on two more occasions, the last being on 26 November 2012, when the group agreed to provide more details concerning aspects of its proposals, which included a broad range of issues. At my request, I recently again met representatives of the 2 and 4 Wheel Motorsport Steering Group Ltd and the North West 200 on 28 May 2013 to discuss the cancellation of races at this year's event.

Looking ahead, I have advised Executive colleagues that I will seek their agreement to introduce a single-purpose Bill to amend existing legislation to provide for contingency practice or race days in the event of bad weather. To enable those arrangements to apply to the 2014 racing season, I will seek Executive agreement to progress the Bill by accelerated passage. I trust I will have the support of all in the House in doing so.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his answer, which I certainly welcome. Does he agree that the main issue with the road closure order is the need to vary it so that racing can happen on whatever day has the right sort of weather?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his encouraging remarks. I believe that there will be widespread approval for the measure that I intend to propose, after further consultation with the organisers of the race. I will seek Executive approval for policy clearance to draft a Bill by the end of June 2013 and publish it as part of the public consultation; to have my officials brief the Regional Development Committee in early July; and to carry out public consultation during the summer in order to return to the Executive in September to seek approval to introduce the Bill and have it progressed by accelerated passage. My officials are continuing discussions with representatives of the sport to confirm the most appropriate policy approach to be taken.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht an fhreagra sin. Minister, I know a group of bikers who have come for the past three years and seen only one day's racing. Have you given any consideration to the groups of bikers who come maybe from Europe and certainly from England and abroad? Have you considered perhaps having some racing on Sundays?

Mr Kennedy: The promoters have not raised that issue with me at this point. Interestingly, however, the legislation is silent on Sunday racing. It is up to the promoters of road races to decide which days they want a road closure order to cover. It is also the promoters' responsibility to ensure that there is effective notification of proposed road closures to those most likely to be affected by them.

The Isle of Man has its own road racing legislation, but there is no corresponding provision in the Northern Ireland order, and it is not proposed to mirror that arrangement in the Northern Ireland legislation.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for his response. I am sure he realises that we are all revved up about this issue. The Minister appreciates that this is not about a one-day race or the one day that it takes place; it is about an event that brings tourists into not just the triangle but across Northern Ireland and, indeed, Donegal for a week or more. Can the Minister assure us that there will be an opportunity for the local community to be engaged in whatever changes are needed to ensure that the race has flexibility and that the race organisers continue to enjoy the support of the people who live there and who, after all, are the most important people?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for accelerating that question to me. It is crucial that the event retains the huge public support that it already has, particularly from residents and inhabitants of the area. The full potential of the north-west is, perhaps, still completely unrealised. That is why I hope that, as part of the discussions, we can look at the issue of support funding for an international event that brings so many tourists to the north-west, particularly, to enjoy the sights and sounds of the north-west, particularly. That combination will be crucial in moving forward and in ensuring that everyone has a contribution to make.

Mourne Coastal Route

3. Mr Rogers asked the Minister for Regional Development what discussions his Department has had with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment regarding the Mourne coastal route signage issue, which advises visitors that the route is unsuitable for coaches. (AQO 4319/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am fully aware of the specific issues surrounding the signing of the route for coaches. Recently, I met and listened to concerns from representatives of the Kilkeel Development Association and, indeed, my party colleague in the area, Councillor Harold McKee, and others, regarding the advisory wording included on some of the signs which indicate parts of routes that would be unsuitable for large coaches. I have put in place arrangements to have that wording removed from signs as soon as possible. I have agreed to that change as I believe it is better for the Tourist Board to provide supporting literature that will allow coach operators to plan their routes through the Mourne in the full knowledge that stretches of routes may be difficult to negotiate in a large coach. The production of literature showing routes for coaches is certainly not uncommon in other parts of the United Kingdom and is used for driving trails in the Yorkshire Dales and Dartmoor.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for that, and I welcome the response. Minister, will you give this accelerated passage for the tourist market for this summer? Will the signs be updated ASAP?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his positive response. I have instructed officials to make arrangements to have the wording removed from signs as soon as possible. I remain hopeful that the work will be completed in the next week or two, prior to the commencement of the summer holidays.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his reply thus far, and I too welcome the wording being removed. On the wider issue of the roads being unsuitable for coaches, will the Minister instruct his Department to look at the roads? We are talking about one of the nicest coastal routes in Ireland. It would be a pity if large parts of it were unsuitable for coaches, as we are bringing in more coaches to the area.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. Of course, part of the beauty of the Mourne is their unspoilt nature. It would not do for me to provide a motorway on some of those locations. The Member will know, of course, that rural roads receive ongoing structural and maintenance repair, and that remains the case for roads in the area of the Mourne. However, I accept the point that he makes. I think the Mourne is one of the key areas in the overall tourism product that Northern Ireland has much to shout about, and so I hope that the contribution that I am making to that with regard to signage is a positive one.

Mr Hussey: I am sure the Minister is aware that some of the traffic that comes into this part of the world comes from the Republic. Perhaps, at this stage, Minister, you would take the opportunity to reaffirm your commitment to the "Welcome to Northern Ireland" signs.

Mr Kennedy: I am very grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. It is certainly not a plant, because I do not have an answer for it.

The "Welcome to Northern Ireland" signs express a welcome to Northern Ireland. How pleased we have been in recent days to welcome international visitors and important politicians, their entourages and their colleagues. The feedback on the G8 summit and on Northern Ireland has, I think, been very good. Iconic images going out all over the world can only be a positive thing for Northern Ireland tourism and branding Northern Ireland as a potential destination. I think that "Welcome to Northern Ireland" signs enhance that.

DRD: Together: Building a United Community

4. Mr Dickson asked the Minister for Regional Development for an assessment of his Department's responsibilities under the Together: Building a United Community strategy. (AQO 4320/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: Transport is central to a more inclusive, shared and integrated society. I am pleased that the Together: Building a United Community strategy recognises the importance of the work being carried out across my Department to the development and maintenance of good relations. In particular, I welcome the acknowledgement of the contribution of mobility and connectivity to the creation of a more united and prosperous community. The work I have taken forward on making public transport more accessible and designing transport networks such as the rapid transit scheme will bring communities together and ensure access to key services and facilities. However, there is much more to be done to build on the framework and vision established by the strategy. I am, therefore, pleased that I have secured the agreement of my Executive colleagues to a detailed discussion of the strategy at our meeting on 27 June 2013.

Mr Dickson: Minister, you referred to the iconic scenes of Northern Ireland in the past few hours. Sadly, some of those scenes have been marred by illegal and unlawful flags and other emblems flying from lamp posts and properties that are under your control and responsibility. In building the united community strategy, what actions will you take to attempt to have those flags removed?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. Of course, he will know that my Department's policy, which has been approved by previous Ministers, does not endorse or support the unauthorised use of departmental property for any purpose. That includes the erection of roadside shrines to terrorists, for instance. However, the Department must also take into account the safety of those who are asked to undertake removal and the risk of escalating the problem. Unauthorised memorials on the properties of the Department's arm's-length bodies are matters for the boards of those organisations.

With regard to the removal of flags from lamp posts, my Department has signed up to the joint protocol on the display of flags in public areas. It is generally not perceived to be the lead agency under that protocol. PSNI, OFMDFM, the Housing Executive and DSD are better placed to assume that lead role in arranging for the removal of flags and emblems through their contact with community groups, local elected representatives and other relevant contacts. My Department's main role under the protocol, when called upon by the lead agency, is to provide the access equipment and the resources to remove unwanted flags when agreement has been reached that they should be taken down and the local community is unable to gain access to them easily. The onus is, of course, on working with local communities, as the Member will understand.

Mr McDevitt: I welcome the Minister's assertion that sustainable transport does indeed play a significant role in bringing communities together. Given that it is the beginning of Bike Week, can he tell us specifically what steps he hopes to take in the next few months to make cycling one of the ways in which we will be able to bring people together in this region?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I suspect that he, rather shamelessly, wants me to mention him for having won the MLA bike race for the third time in four years. He will correct me if I am wrong. In fact, he is good at that.

I commend Bike Week to Members. I thank those who participated in the G8 trophy event this morning and hope that everybody is sufficiently recovered. Cycling represents an opportunity for people to find benefits, either for health reasons or in helping the environment, and to show that it is possible to use alternative modes of transport. As Minister, I have attempted to do that, and I will continue to roll forward with it as we seek to improve facilities for bike users and cyclists on the roads in our towns and local areas.

2.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I suspect that, if there had been a stretching championship, the Member might have won that as well.

I call Mr Danny Kinahan. Let us stick to the subject.

Mr Kinahan: Thank you very much. I will stick to the subject. I am glad that the Minister has secured discussion on DRD's role in Together: Building a United Community. Will he detail whether there are any new issues for DRD in the strategy?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. Indeed, the strategy reflects the importance of my existing transport and planning policies and programmes in the promotion of good relations. There is a commitment to ensure that future funding is directed on the basis of the themes in the strategy. If this were to result in the allocation of additional resources to the Department, I would be happy to consider new or additional transport initiatives.

Road Building

5. Mr Ross asked the Minister for Regional Development how much his Department has spent on road building in the last 12 months. (AQO 4321/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: In the past 12 months, my Department has spent in the region of £62 million on major strategic road improvements and £10 million on local transport and safety measures, of which £4.7 million was on minor network development schemes and projects for Belfast on the Move. Within those figures, over £4 million has been spent on the A2 Shore Road widening scheme at Greenisland. That scheme started in March 2013 and is proceeding very well, with minimal disruption to the travelling public. It remains on target for completion in June 2015.

My Department received specific funding for the A5 dual carriageway project. Following the recent ruling on the scheme, I wrote to the Finance Minister on 9 May 2013 to declare a reduced budget requirement for the 2013-14 year. In my view, it is essential that we quickly redeploy that reduced requirement to provide support to the construction sector and the local economy at this most difficult time. I consider expenditure on roads to be a specific example of activity that improves vital infrastructure and facilitates short- and long-term economic growth, while providing much-needed local employment.

Mr Ross: The Minister, in his answer, alluded to the fact that the money for the A5 will not be used for that project and that he wants to redeploy that money into other projects that have been suggested by him and his party colleagues. How many of the alternatives projects that have been suggested are procurement-ready and have had vesting completed?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. I have to correct his interpretation of my remarks. I have made it clear and continue to make it clear that the A5 scheme has been delayed; it has not been abandoned. The Member will know that it remains an Executive priority. It is important that not all our eggs are in one basket any more. I inherited that situation when I became roads Minister. To deal with that very issue and looking at financial allocations, there are schemes that I want to bring forward. They might currently be described as procurement-ready but not shovel-ready. They include the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson scheme; the Magherafelt bypass; the A55; and the A26 Glarryford scheme along the Frosses Road. Those are in the next wave of strategic schemes to be carried out. I hope that the Member and his party, at Executive level particularly, will give me the necessary assurance and the finance to bring forward other schemes so that this Executive do not have to hand back money to the Treasury.

Mrs Overend: Can the Minister detail when it will be possible to commence the alternative schemes that he mentioned ahead of the A5?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question, and I have no doubt that she will continue her interest in not only the A6 scheme but the Magherafelt bypass scheme. In general, Members will know that it takes around a year to procure a major road scheme, and, as I have outlined, there are several schemes in the strategic road improvement programme that have been advanced through their statutory procedures with a view to proceeding to procurement, subject to approval of the final business case. As I have said, they include the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway, the A31 Magherafelt bypass, and the A55 Knock Road widening in Belfast. In addition, proposals to provide dual carriageway on the A26 between Glarryford and Drones Road were examined by a public inquiry last autumn. Subject to the outcome of the public inquiries, it could be possible to commence construction on these schemes late next year. It is important that other schemes that may be in a position to be progressed ahead of the A5 are given full consideration by the Executive.

Mrs McKevitt: Is the Minister concerned about the deterioration in road maintenance? Has there been an increase in insurance liability claims in the past 12 months?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question. The impact of the winter conditions in successive years has led to a concern about the roads that we are responsible for improving and maintaining. Aside from building new roads, that is an important consideration that I have. It is estimated that approximately £122 million a year needs to be spent on structural maintenance to maintain the network that we have. That is a challenge, and I can tell you that, in the initial allocations from the Finance Minister, I was not in receipt of anything near that amount. However, I am very hopeful that, through the June monitoring process and the fact that I have offered up capital that might have been spent on the A5 scheme, my Department will benefit from an additional allocation to help maintain our roads. As I travel around Northern Ireland, I see the impact of the winter conditions and the overall condition; it concerns me, and rightly so. Therefore, as roads Minister, I want to make the strongest arguments to bring into my Department moneys and resources that we can use to deal with those defects.

Road Resurfacing: Newtownabbey Borough Council Area

6. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the carriageway resurfacing schemes that Roads Service has scheduled in the Newtownabbey Borough Council area during the current financial year. (AQO 4322/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: My Department has one resurfacing scheme currently scheduled in the Newtownabbey Borough Council area during the remainder of the current financial year. It is anticipated that this scheme at Shore Road, Whiteabbey, will be completed during the summer months. A further resurfacing scheme within the 2013-14 programme on the Old Carrick Road from Doagh Road to Carnall Road has already been completed. My Department also completed some 7.4 lane kilometres of resurfacing in the Newtownabbey Borough Council area during the 2012-13 financial year. That included four major schemes at Beverley Road, Antrim Road, Monkstown Avenue and Station Road. In total, approximately £3.5 million was spent on structural maintenance in 2012-13, including carriageway and footway resurfacing and patching.

For this financial year, my Department has been allocated £62 million against a currently assessed requirement of £130 million. As I said, to address the shortfall, my Department has made a bid in the June monitoring round for additional funding for structural maintenance. I hope that the Member will support the bid, which will allow me to enhance the road surfacing programmes across all council areas.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his very comprehensive answer. Over recent months, utility companies have done a lot of work in the Glengormley and Cloughfern area, and they have left footpaths and roads in a rather undesirable condition. Does the Minister have any plans to review the criteria for the reinstatement of roads after utility companies have finished digging up the roads and footpaths?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question. She raises an important issue in which I take an interest because I am concerned when I hear reports of utility companies disrupting surfaces or not leaving them in an appropriate condition. There are agreements with the utility companies, including times by which they are expected to complete work to a satisfactory standard, following inspection from Roads Service officials, who check that the quality of the reinstatement is as it should be. If the Member has set examples, I would be happy to hear from her about them so that we can carry out further investigations.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister have any plans for resurfacing work on the Castlefin Road in Castlederg?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for her question. She may be shocked by this, but I did not anticipate that Castlefin Road, Castlederg, would feature at Question Time. I am happy to provide the Member with an update as quickly as possible.

Translink: Accounts

7. Mr Spratt asked the Minister for Regional Development when the 2012-13 accounts for Translink will be laid before the Assembly. (AQO 4323/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: As in previous years, the annual accounts of Translink for 2012-13 will be laid before the Assembly before the summer recess. At this stage, we aim to have them laid by 4 July. We lay the annual report and accounts in the Assembly in accordance with the guidance on the procedures for presenting and laying the combined annual report and accounts, which is that the accounts should be laid as soon as possible after the auditor has signed the accounts — normally two weeks later. The 2011-12 Translink accounts were laid before the Assembly on 6 July 2012, and the 2010-11 accounts were laid on 29 June 2011.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for his answer. Is he concerned that Translink is giving press briefings to individual hand-picked journalists before it lays its accounts before the Assembly and, I assume, the Department? Will the Minister give an undertaking that Translink and his departmental officials will answer questions about the 2011-12 accounts? It appears that Translink has considerable reserves. It states that there is £50 million "other" reserves, but there is no explanation of what those are.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I know that he and the Committee have recently been exercised on the issue. I will meet Translink senior executives later in the week and will raise the Member's initial concern with them.

Part of the debate has been played out in Committee and in the local press. It is important to say that, as Minister, I am absolutely certain that there is no cosy relationship between me or the Department and Translink. Translink is put through its paces in an appropriate manner. That we are able at least to be civilised to each other after such things is a useful template for everybody to copy.

Let me also say that Translink has had a very successful past 12 months, with over 1.5 million more fare-paying journeys on bus and train services. More and more people are using the railways and, last year, passenger journeys reached almost 11.5 million. Rail fares in Northern Ireland have not increased in real terms since 2005 and bus fares here have fallen in real terms in that period. That is in sharp contrast to Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland.

We are carrying forward profits earned in 2012-13 to further invest in the business and keep fares as low as possible. We are working hard, and I think that some recognition should be given to Translink for the performance that it has been able to confirm at this point

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Football Clubs: Antrim Borough Council Area

1. Mr Clarke asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how much has been invested in football clubs in the Antrim Borough Council area in the last five years. (AQO 4332/11-15)

Ms Ni Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure)

I thank the Member for his question. As the Member will know, Sport NI has primary responsibility for the distribution of funding for sport. Over the past five financial years, Sport NI has provided almost £230,000 of Exchequer funding to football clubs in the Antrim Borough Council area. Furthermore, I made a bid to the Executive last year for additional funding towards a programme aimed at promoting equality and tackling poverty and social exclusion through sport. In 2012-13, the IFA received £500,000 through that programme, and that has benefited football clubs across the North, including those in the Antrim area, through a range of projects and initiatives. In the Member's constituency of South Antrim, Crumlin United Football Club received almost £230,000 for a 3G pitch and floodlights, and the Greenisland Football Club received over £4,000 to purchase football equipment.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for her answer and welcome the money that has been invested. Will the Minister use her good offices to see what more money can be delivered to the south Antrim area given the underinvestment there and the strong provision needed for football?

Ms Ni Chuilín: I will certainly take that on board. The Sport Matters monitoring group, which I think Antrim Borough Council is represented on, looks at the Sport Matters strategy. It looks at the lack of provision and how collectively, even through other Departments, we can try to bridge some of the gaps.

I agree that many areas, including, as I am sure the Member would argue, his council area, have a greater need for facilities to increase sports provision. Given our budgetary constraints, we are looking at other ways of working better together to provide much-needed facilities in those areas. I am happy to hear any suggestions that the Member may have. I am really keen to try to get as many people as possible involved in sport.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for her answer and her Department for the funding for Crumlin and Greenisland. Is there any possibility of funds coming from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister's (OFMDFM) Together: Building a United Community initiative? That could help the Minister to expand not only football but all the other sports that would get people to share things.

Ms Ni Chuilín: I was delighted that sport was mentioned as an area in which more provision could be made. In response to the question, where we can work collectively to try to bridge the gaps, that is better. The statement had a greater focus on access for people with disabilities, and I think that the Member would agree with that. I am not excluding that, and there is certainly more room for improvement.

I am happy to look at every opportunity that is available to me now and at potential opportunities, even from a cross-departmental point of view, to try to get better facilities and better participation in sport.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Will the Minister tell me what live funding opportunities are available to soccer clubs across the North?

Ms Ni Chuilín: The Member will be aware that Sport NI has no live funding applications or programmes that soccer clubs can apply to. It is at the early stage in the process of developing two new capital programmes to support community and club performance around sporting facilities' needs. I anticipate that some of the proposals will be brought forward over the coming months. It is important that we look for new opportunities, particularly as we approach the next comprehensive spending review (CSR) period, when we will all be looking at how we can enhance sport provision across the board.

Mr Lyttle: Why have the Sport NI stadia safety, community capital and places for sport funding streams been closed to amateur football clubs since December 2010?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will appreciate that another Minister took that decision. I have received concerns from a number of people involved, and not exclusively from those in soccer but in sport across the board. Bear in mind that we are where we are, and that is not a good place to be. As I said to other Members, we are actively looking at what we can do, and not just across each Department. We are also looking at the potential for new programmes to be brought forward. As I said, those programmes are in the very early stage of development. Sport NI has identified that as a gap. I look forward to seeing what the proposals are, sharing them with the Committee and then with the rest of the Members.

Marching Bands: Uniforms

2. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in light of the recent report by RMS McClure Watters into the 'Socio-economic Impact of the Traditional Protestant Parading Sector in Northern Ireland' and as £55 million of economic and social benefits are generated each year by the sector, would she fund new uniforms for some of the 660 marching bands, as this would also boost the local textiles industry. (AQO 4333/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I am aware of the research findings in the report that was funded by the Department for Social Development (DSD). I believe that the social impact of marching bands and other expressions of cultural interests are just as important as any economic impacts. My Department, through the Arts Council and the Ulster-Scots Agency, offers funding to marching bands from all communities to maintain and develop the level of music-making in the sector. My Department is primarily concerned with the funding of musical instruments and tuition, to ensure that artistic expression can be celebrated and embraced. It does not fund the provision of uniforms.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for her response. Given the decline in the textile industry in Northern Ireland, and the positive impact that marching bands have for good in many areas here, will the Minister at least consider working with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) and DSD to explore further the possibilities that I raised?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am happy to meet any Minister at any time about any subject. All Ministers are charged with meeting the public interest test. There is clearly an interest here in providing musical instruments and tuition, because those foster skill and talent. Uniforms for bands is always seen as a private thing that clubs bring forward, but I am happy to meet any Minister to see what, if anything, can be advanced.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. What funding is available to marching bands and what penalties, if any, will bands that participate in antisocial and sectarian behaviour face?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The funding for marching bands is fairly significant. Between that provided by the Arts Council, the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure (DCAL) and the Ulster-Scots Agency, the funding has been significant. For example, in the past three years, the Arts Council has provided over £600,000 for musical instruments. As well as that, over £26,000 has come from the Awards for All small grants programme, and over £650,000 for musical tuition was provided through the Ulster-Scots Agency.

The bands who apply to the Arts Council and Ulster-Scots Agency know that any involvement in antisocial or sectarian behaviour is part of the ongoing monitoring process, and if evidence of such involvement is found, both agencies will deal with it robustly.

Mr Dallat: Given yesterday's events, and the lecture by the US President, has the Minister any ideas or incentives by which she could encourage marching bands from both traditions to march together?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have to say, in short, no, I do not have any ideas. It would certainly be an interesting collaboration. I know that some bands, particularly in small rural areas, are part of the community, regardless of how we feel about the bands, their music or anything else. I believe that there have been certain events at which bands have come together, not to collaborate but to display their music and talent. The challenge lies in supporting the development of music and talent in bands rather than focusing on any other area.

Mr McCarthy: The Minister told the Assembly that her Department has significant funds for marching bands. The Ballywalter Flute Band in my constituency has been invited to represent Northern Ireland at London's Lord Mayor Show in the near future. Does the Minister have some funding that could be directed to that area so that they can put on their best and get to London for the show?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I haven't any money on me. [Laughter.]

Mr McCarthy: I did not ask you that.

Ms Ní Chuilín: No, but you may as well have, Kieran; to be honest. To be frank, the Member is well aware of the Arts Council, its structures, its committees, its lobbies and all the rest. It surprises me he does not know that the first place to go is the Arts Council, but I wish the Ballywalter Flute Band all the best.

Casement Park: Social Clauses

3. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an overview of developments on the social clauses and investment in the community that arise from the Casement Park development. (AQO 4334/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Social clauses criteria have been agreed between the Department and the GAA for inclusion in the IST tender documentation. Socio-economic returns have been incorporated into the Casement Park tender documentation to include specific obligations on a successful contractor to deliver the following: significant opportunities for the long-term unemployed; significant opportunities for apprenticeships for those from areas in the sectors of society suffering greatest social need; the delivery of weeks and months of employment placement and opportunity for students; the delivery of supply chain development and the targeting of small and medium enterprises; the delivery of effective and ongoing engagement with the local community; and to undertake practical proposals to develop a wide range of social returns for areas and communities in the proximity of the projects. In addition, the Member will be aware that, with regard to our investment in the community, there will be a dedicated community space for projects that will bring much needed work and jobs to the area, which has not received an adequate amount of investment over the past years.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Príomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí. I thank the Minister for her answer. Could she provide a summary of the agreed social clauses for the Ravenhill, Windsor and Casement Park projects?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will give a flavour of the Ravenhill project, and am happy to write to the Member on the rest, because they are quite detailed. For the Ravenhill project there is a contract to employ seven long-term unemployed people, create four new apprenticeships, to have 5% of the workforce in recognised apprenticeship schemes, to have two student placements and to have five practical proposals post-contract, which will develop a wide range of social returns in the area. It is the same for Windsor Park. That contract includes the employment of 17 long-term unemployed people, the creation of nine new apprenticeships, to have two student placements and, again, to have practical proposals post-contract. I believe that a targeted initiative such as this will bring added value to stadia development in the community.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her answer on social clauses. She will be aware of concerns among local residents in relation to the overall Casement project. Recently, a scale model of Casement Park was exhibited in the Westwood Centre. Were there any positive developments arising out of that to reassure residents in relation to the current concerns that, not unsurprisingly and naturally, they are expressing?

2.45 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: All Members have to support residents who have concerns and try to work through those. When those concerns are reasonable and we can do something about them, we should. The Member is right to say that there has to be a scale model, because that is a strict criterion of his colleague the Environment Minister when going forward for planning permission. I received a lot of positive feedback on that, particularly because I think the impression that people had, until they saw the model, was that it was going to be of a different size and specification.

There is an ambition to see what employment can be brought to west Belfast. We are still having discussions with the residents. I will be meeting them fairly soon, and I have met them before. I, my Department and the Ulster council of the GAA will be meeting them again, and that process will continue until the application process for planning permission closes in September.

Mr Copeland: Can the Minister confirm whether Casement Park is caught by the same European directive as Windsor Park in respect of potential illegality surrounding state aid?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will appreciate that I cannot go into detail on that because I am actually fighting challenges over state aid. However, as I have said in my legal argument, I believe that this instance of state aid for the stadia is totally permissible. I will certainly defend very robustly the contribution of DCAL and the Executive for the development of all the stadia.

World Police and Fire Games

4. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the World Police and Fire Games 2013. (AQO 4335/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do not know what happened there, but you shimmied very quickly, Jimmy. I thank the Member for his question. Following the outcome of the bracketing process, the company has confirmed that 56 sports will be offered during the games, and it is estimated that over 7,000 athletes will compete. As of 11 June, the total number of athletes to have registered for the games is 5,815, with an expectation of reaching over 7,000. The company has exceeded the target of £1.4 million of sponsorship, with a total amount of £1.6 million secured. The World Police and Fire Games schools packs were launched in October last year. They provide teachers with a comprehensive set of education resources to inform children and young people about the games and get them involved in the event throughout 2013. The company has also developed a social benefit strategy and a legacy plan to ensure the social inclusivity of the games, and has appointed three charity partners as part of that plan.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for her answer. In relation to some of the negativity that is going around, particularly from one journalistic source, about the reduced numbers that were predicted, will the Minister give us some indication of the spin-off that is still expected from the 7,000 competitors and the people who will accompany them? The situation is good, given the present economic circumstances. Will the Minister and the Department be positive about the numbers that we have secured at present?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I share the Member's concerns. I experienced the same thing last year before the Olympic and Paralympic Games, particularly around the torch relay. I will not be petty, but there was a degree of eating humble pie by a certain section of the media after the success of that. The weather did not dampen people's spirits.

I expect people here, even though it is mainly based in Belfast, to come out and support the 7,000 athletes, plus their family members and friends who will accompany them. We will all give them the welcome that we are known for. There will also be a cultural programme, and the work with schools is excellent. The places available for volunteering have been oversubscribed. We will give the visitors a good welcome and, not only that, we will make sure that they come back. I think that that is important. I look forward, all being well, if God spares us, when we all come back here in September, to seeing the slant that some people are going to have to put on the success of the World Police and Fire Games.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí. I thank the Minister for her answers so far. Will she outline, first, whether the lower number of athletes means that the organisers have failed to meet their targets and, if so, how can the Department work with them to ensure that those targets are met?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Thank you very much for your question. There are many reasons why the number of athletes, in terms of one of the original targets, has not been met. The main thing is the recession, which has had a global impact. But, in fairness to the company, it has adjusted this and still provided.

It is worth putting the information in context, in answer to your question and the one that Jimmy Spratt raised. At the 2012 London Olympics and Paralympics, 10,500 athletes competed in 26 sports, which cost around £9 billion. At next year's Commonwealth Games in Glasgow, there will be an estimated 6,500 athletes in 17 sports, which is costing £523 million.

By comparison, with our contribution of almost £7 million for 56 sports for 7,000 athletes, the World Police and Fire Games are not just better value for money, given the concerns and questions that some people have. They will also provide a lasting legacy not just for 2013 but beyond for the services, schools and people that will be involved in the project.

Mrs McKeivitt: I thank the Minister for her response and, in particular, her positive comments about the Games. This is our opportunity to showcase our region at its best, and she mentioned the volunteers and the huge response that the Games have received from the public, and how we are going to sell our brand. On a positive note, does she have the details of the opening and closing ceremonies of the World Police and Fire Games so that we can showcase that at its best?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The opening ceremony is going to be at the King's Hall. We are still working on the closing ceremony. I appreciate the Member's sentiments and the consistency of her positive approach and that of other Members to the World Police and Fire Games.

As I said earlier, the fact that well over half the volunteers have been subscribed to the programme is itself a testimony. They will be involved, not just in the opening and closing ceremonies but in every aspect.

I am aware that one of the Member's colleagues has offered his services. I am not too sure what the World Police and Fire Games uniform looks like, but I know that he was eager to wear pink Lycra for the Giro d'Italia. I know and hope that Members of this House will be involved in the opening and closing ceremonies and some of the events that we are going to provide between 1 August and 10 August, and I look forward to seeing you all there.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: You should call Members by their proper names. Miss Judith Cochrane.

Mrs Cochrane: Question 6, please.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Sorry, question 5?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Sorry; my mistake, Judith. I call David Hilditch.

Sport: Female Participation

5. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what steps she is taking to increase female participation in sports. (AQO 4336/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Political censorship, David; say nothing.

Females are significantly under-represented in sport in comparison with males. To help address the problem, my Department's strategy for sport contains a specific target to deliver a 6% increase in women's participation by 2019.

To ensure that that target is achieved and published, the Sports Matters action plan contains a series of actions that embrace a range of organisations across the sport and leisure sector, including promoting increased female participation through a range of departmental investments and encouraging other parties such as district councils and governing bodies of sports and clubs to do the same.

I have sought to promote female participation and success in sport publicly in a number of ways. I have been working very closely with the female sports forum, which aims to increase opportunities for women and girls to participate in sport.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for her reply. The 'Sports Matters' document certainly highlights the deficit. This week, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure will be looking at the community sports hubs in Scotland. Does the Minister agree that the establishment of community sports hubs in Northern Ireland would present an ideal opportunity to develop female participation in team sports?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do, in short. The Scottish models have been looked at as exemplars for lots of things, and I have been looking at some of those issues, including the community hubs for sport, in the same way that the Committee looked at hubs for the creative industries. We need to look at collaborative approaches, but they need to be targeted and we need to put in the investment on a targeted basis.

The results should be, and have to be, better. There should be increased participation of females in sport, not just for DCAL but for social development, social inclusion and health reasons.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answers. What organisations are contributing to the Sport Matters targets for increasing female participation?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I met a delegation from Ulster Hockey, which is one member of the Female Sports Forum. There are many other members, including representatives of soccer, GAA, rugby and tennis. As I mentioned, district councils have been involved in the Active Communities programme. The Ulster council of the GAA is delivering a number of programmes, such as Gaelic 4 Mothers, recreational games for adults, Go Games, and coaching and development workshops.

The IFA has also done great work on expansion for junior girls' leagues and the growth of women's senior leagues. It has held open days to introduce girls to soccer, and it has delivered the Score pilot project, which provides clubs with the tools to enable them to encourage more girls to take part in sport.

Ulster Rugby, through its women's development officer, has delivered a number of programmes, including Play Rugby Girls initiative and the Girls' Schools Cup. Sport NI is also working with a number of the governing bodies to support and develop the Female Sports Forum to try to get more women and girls involved in sport.

Pleasure Grounds: North Down

6. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when her Department received and will comment on the new draft pleasure ground by-law proposals for the North Down Borough Council area. (AQO 4337/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: That question has been transferred to the DOE, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle.

Commonwealth Games: Queen's Baton

7. Mr Allister asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how her Department will promote and mark the arrival of the Queen's baton as part of the Commonwealth Games celebrations. (AQO 4338/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Responsibility for promoting and marketing the arrival of the Queen's baton as part of the Commonwealth Games celebration rests in the first instance with the Commonwealth Games Council, which is the lead body for commonwealth sport here. I understand that NICGC, which has been engaging with the organising committee of the Glasgow 2014 Commonwealth Games, is considering events to be held between 20 and 23 May 2014, when the baton relay will visit here. My Department, through Sport NI, will work closely with the NICGC as it takes forward its preparations and celebrations for the 2014 Glasgow games. Further details on events planned to promote and mark the arrival of the baton as part of the Commonwealth Games will be provided by NICGC nearer the time.

Mr Allister: We all recall the success of the Olympic torch relay and the enthusiasm of the Minister to be seen and be present when the torch arrived. Will we have the same enthusiasm and presence when the Queen's baton arrives in the run-up to the British Commonwealth Games?

Ms Ní Chuilín: To pass the baton back to the Member, I will be totally enthusiastic about supporting athletes, organisers, coaches and families who are participating in the Commonwealth Games of 2014. To expect or suggest anything else is just churlish.

Miss M McIlveen: Following the success of the Olympic torch relay and the anticipated arrival of the Queen's baton in 2014 as part of the Commonwealth Games, will the Minister outline whether there will be a community-based relay event to mark the opening of the World Police and Fire Games this year?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have no details about a community relay event for the World Police and Fire Games. I am meeting the company to try to finalise that, because it has been suggested. However, we need to see details rather than outlines. It would be a good idea. Given the number of children and young people who are involved in volunteering in schools, it is really important that they are involved in a significant event like this.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Chris Hazzard is not in his place to ask question 8.

Rugby

9. Mr Hamilton asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how her Department is assisting in the development of grass-roots rugby. (AQO 4340/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Sorry, what number?

Mr Hamilton: Number nine.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will give you any answer, just hold on. [Laughter.] Responsibility for the development of grass-roots rugby here rests in the first instance with the governing body of the sport, namely the Irish Rugby Football Union and its Ulster branch. Over the past five financial years, my Department, through Sport NI, has provided £2.8 million to rugby through a number of funding programmes to assist in the development of sport at grass-roots level.

3.00 pm

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Minister for her answer. Given the recent success of the Ulster rugby team and the development of rugby in Northern Ireland, does she agree that the number of coaches operating in Northern Ireland is too low? Will she endeavour to work with Ulster Rugby to develop the number of coaches and spread that right across Northern Ireland so that our rugby players can have even more success?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely. I have been and will continue working with Ulster Rugby. At the minute, we are working very closely on the development of Ravenhill, and grass-roots development is included in that legacy. To be fair — I am not making a point — it needs to go outside grammar schools and include everybody. Some of the kids, even from different sporting codes, are now getting involved in rugby. That is a good thing, and I am sure that the Member agrees.

Northern Ireland Assembly Commission

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Ms Dolores Kelly is not in her place.

Parliament Buildings: Flag

2. Mr Allister asked the Assembly Commission what progress has been made in increasing the number of days on which the Union flag can be flown at Parliament Buildings. (AQO 4348/11-15)

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Member for his question. I want to be clear that the Commission has not set out to increase the number of days on which the Union flag will fly at Parliament Buildings. Instead, at a meeting of the Commission on 5 February 2013, the Commission tasked officials to bring back a report, following consultation with Assembly parties, to simply review the number of days on which the Union flag flies from Parliament Buildings; to detail a range of options; to set out how a process of public consultation could be carried out; and to outline the arrangements for carrying out an equality impact assessment (EQIA). There was to be no predetermined outcome. Parties were invited to submit written statements. The Assembly's Research and Information Service has analysed the responses, and a paper detailing a range of options on the way forward will be considered at the Commission meeting on 26 June.

Mr Allister: Previously, the Commission announced that, when it had received the representations of parties on 12 April, it would proceed to public consultation and an equality impact assessment. We are now more than two months beyond that date. Why is there feet-dragging on this important issue?

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Member for his question. What the Commission agreed was to detail a range of options and to set out how a process of public consultation would be carried out, including an EQIA, not to go ahead and proceed with that. We will look at a number of options in the report when it is brought to us next week.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Judith Cochrane for her answer. Does she agree that the Commission took a very wise position in June 2002 when it decided that, rather than the contentious issue of flags being part of its work, it should be dealt with by the political parties? Does she think that that is the best way forward and that any other suggestion or motion to the contrary undermines the terms of the Good Friday Agreement, particularly on parity of esteem?

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Member for his question. Yes, in 2000, the Commission agreed that the flags issue was a political matter that is best handled by the Assembly. However, the procedures of the Commission allow Members to bring a motion forward at any time. The Commission member brought that motion forward, and, as I said, options have been looked at. I have not seen the paper yet — I will see it next Wednesday — but one of the options may be to, for instance, ask the Assembly working group to look at this and take it forward.

Mr McGlone: To clarify, will the Commission leave it until the deliberations of the working group on flags and symbols, which was commissioned by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM), are complete?

Mrs Cochrane: As I said, the Commission will look at the way forward on Wednesday. We will look at the options detailed, and I imagine that one of the options will be to await the outcome of the working group. At this stage, I cannot comment on exactly what the Commission will decide to do.

Mr Copeland: It seems that at least two different lists are used by different bodies to designate designated days. Can she explain the reasoning behind the differences between those two lists?

Mrs Cochrane: When the Assembly agreed to adopt a designated days policy, it was based on the draft flags regulations, and I can provide a list of those. The list of regulations is issued each year and is generally 15 days in total. There are exceptions, however. For example, the regulations permit the flying of the Commonwealth flag alongside the Union flag on Commonwealth day, and on Europe day, they permit the flying of the European flag alongside the Union flag. The Assembly Commission operates within the existing statutory guidance for this area.

Assembly: Prompt Payment

3. Mr Agnew asked the Assembly Commission what percentage of invoices received in the past year were not paid within the 10-day prompt payment target. (AQO 4349/11-15)

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Member for his question. On 1 December 2008, Mr Nigel Dodds MP, the former Minister of Finance and Personnel, announced a non-statutory prompt payment target for Northern Ireland public sector entities. At that time, the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) issued further guidance to accounting officers highlighting the commitment of Northern Ireland Civil Service Departments to the better payment practice code. Although it is recognised that the Assembly Commission is not an Executive Department, it is committed to applying best practice principles. So, to that end, this target has been applied from the date of its introduction.

During the previous financial year, from April 2012 to March 2013, 96·2% of all invoices were paid within the 10-day target, meaning that only 3·8% of invoices were not paid within that target time.

Mr Agnew: I thank Mrs Cochrane for her answers. Does she agree that, although there has been some bad practice in the private sector in delivering prompt payments to contractors and subcontractors, the public sector should lead by example in this? I certainly welcome the figures that she outlined; they are very positive. Does she agree that such figures need to be seen across Departments?

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Member for his question. Yes, I do agree with you. We continually monitor this target, and the Assembly's finance office monitors and reviews it quarterly. In addition, each year the Commission publishes in the annual report and resource accounts its policy on payments to suppliers, including details on all third-party payments, as well as the performance against this and other targets. For the past four years since this target was introduced, the Assembly Commission has succeeded in paying between 95% and 96% of invoices within 10 days of their receipt.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank Judith Cochrane for her answer and welcome the figures. What specific measures are being taken to ensure that targets are also met?

Mrs Cochrane: The targets are met. I think that that is the answer that I have already given. We have the target, and we are hitting 96·2% along the way. In comparison with the other Departments, the Assembly Commission is aware that the Comptroller and Auditor General issued a report on financial auditing in November 2012. That report included a comparison of prompt payment performance across the Northern Ireland public sector as a whole. The report shows that the average 10-day prompt payment performance for Executive Departments for the 2011-12 financial year was 89%, with 93% being the highest performance by any single Department.

Assembly: Printers

4. Mr A Maginness asked the Assembly Commission whether any assessment of the high consumption of ink by the new HP printers has been carried out. (AQO 4350/11-15)

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Member for his question. The IS Office, together with engineers from the HP printers supplier, have examined a number of devices that belong to Members. Their tests have concluded that the devices are operating correctly in line with the normal consumption of toner-based and industry-standard tests. It should be noted that the consumption of toner in any laser printer is very much dependent on the type of printing job that is submitted. For example, the use of colour in print jobs should be minimised to allow the best yields from the toner cartridges.

The use of "economy" mode can reduce the consumption of toner ink by up to 50%. I know that Assembly Commission staff have written to Members again to say that they would assist in ensuring that the printers are set at the correct mode and are updated. Assembly Commission staff have reissued guidance to constituency staff about the best and most efficient and effective ways to use printer consumables. Furthermore, as I said, the IS Office will visit any constituency office to update, brief and advise Members accordingly.

Prior to the implementation of printers in constituency offices, comparable cost studies were carried out that revealed that the consumables that the stationery and IT consumables supplier currently provides offer the best value for money. Based on feedback from a survey of Members and staff that was issued prior to the purchase of the printers, the key concern was reliability of the printers. Most Members will recall that there were umpteen problems with the previous printers. Our staff had to maintain them regularly, which is why they were upgraded. The issues were addressed in a business case that IT developed for the project. The primary objective, therefore, was to provide offices with modern and reliable printer facilities.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member for his response. There is clearly a problem, and I am grateful for the way in which the matter has been outlined by the Commission. However, I am not certain that the ink that we are using is value for money, which puts pressure on Members' allowances for stationery and consumables. It may be that the Commission will have to look at the issue and even go to the independent panel about it. Any additional measures that would help staff in constituency offices would be welcome.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Can we have a question, please?

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member and the Commission review the position further?

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. A number of Members have written formally to senior staff expressing concerns about the printers. I can understand that a number of Members are frustrated, given the independent panel's two separate determinations. One was to restrict and reduce the budget for consumables to £1,000, and, on top of that, there will be a reduction in Members' office costs allowance by £5,500, which most Members feel will have an adverse effect. That has compounded matters. Given that the panel is independent, I am not sure that the Commission has any role in lobbying for or championing that cause. It is up to all parties in the Chamber, and if they have concerns that the service that they provide at constituency level is being adversely affected, I encourage them to request a formal meeting with the independent panel.

Mr Spratt: I accept all that you said about the printers' quality and reliability compared with the old ones. Given the high cost of replacement cartridges for these machines, what examination was done? The cost has trebled or quadrupled at least. That needs to be examined to find out whether a similar product can be bought at a better rate than is being offered to Members.

Mr P Ramsey: I share the Member's concerns. It is an ongoing issue that senior management reviews continually for any new tendering. The Member is correct. With the old printers, it cost around £30 to print 1,000 pages. With the new printers, the cost had doubled, but it has not tripled or quadrupled. That causes concern, and when there is a new procurement process, senior management will be conscious of that to try to get a better deal for Members. But I reiterate: the biggest problem facing Members is the independent panel's determination, which has significantly reduced the budget for consumables and, at the same time, reduced the office costs allowance.

Mr Hussey: In deciding which equipment to purchase, what matrix was used to ensure value for money over the life of a printer?

Mr P Ramsey: When the printers were originally commissioned, each constituency office received training. A full assessment was carried out on their viability, and there is no doubt about the quality of the printers is good.

There is a difficulty, and I accept that a number of Members have said so. This has been discussed a number of times at Commission meetings, and I had a meeting with the Director General about it.

The IS Office met several local suppliers to gain an understanding of leading manufacturers and the range of devices and features available in the current marketplace. As a result, the IS Office accepted offers of trial equipment from Hewlett Packard, Canon UK and, latterly, the manufacturers of the old printers, OKI Ltd. Those trials allowed the IS Office to evaluate new printing technologies and their potential application in the Assembly and at constituency level. The devices were assessed against the following criteria: ease of use, performance and additional functions, duplex toner-save and use of generic consumables. Each criterion varies across the range of devices. The trials were undertaken in June and July 2012 and involved making the loan devices available to key secretariat users. The printers are about high-speed, secure and confidential printing using PIN codes. I impress on the Member that there was a lot of evaluation leading up to this decision, and a lot of tests and trials of other equipment took place. These are the findings of our procurement and tendering team.

3.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 5 has been withdrawn.

Parliament Buildings: Roof Project

6. Mr Rogers asked the Assembly Commission whether the roof project will impact on Committee meetings. (AQO 4352/11-15)

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Member for his question. The Assembly Commission has recently been granted planning approval to proceed with the roof project on the basis of technical solutions detailed in the stage D report presented by our design team. Although this solution is likely to be less disruptive than other options that were considered, there will be a major construction project such as we have not seen before, and it will not be without some noise or disruption to the House. The Commission has confirmed that no noise and disruption to plenary sittings will be tolerated during the construction period and is looking at options to mitigate disruption to Committee meetings. These include the possibility of relocating some or all meetings and further restricting the contractor's working arrangements to include Committee meetings. There are clear cost implications associated with placing restrictions on the contractor, and it is important that such restrictions are agreed in advance so that additional costs are not disproportionate. The Commission has requested further information that will allow it to determine and agree how best to deal with the noise and disruption. Members will be kept fully informed about any potential impact on Assembly business.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Member for his answer. Is it likely that Committee meetings will be held outside Parliament Buildings?

Mr P Ramsey: The Assembly Commission recently looked at a variety of options, including holding the meetings here. Some staff will be decamped from the Building because of the seriousness of the work and the disruption, particularly to level 4 of the Building. There is an option to hold all Committee meetings outside Parliament Buildings, and the cost of that is being tied down. There is also an option of retaining the integrity of Committee meetings within Parliament Buildings, but with that come restrictions on the contractor. We would have to ensure that there was no disruption and noise when Committee meetings were taking place because of a number of factors, including recording the meetings for Hansard and television. So we intend to hold a further Commission meeting, as Judith Cochrane outlined. We need to resolve this before the summer to get the best deal for the House.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I wonder whether the Commission wants to start taking suggestions for alternative locations because a number of us would throw out various places. Will Pat outline to the House when he expects work to start and conclude on the roof project?

Mr P Ramsey: The project will last for about 12 months. We hope that work will commence soon after the summer recess and certainly before the new year. We are looking at alternative venues, but they bring increased costs, not just the cost of holding the meetings but the cost of hiring rooms and the transport of staff, including those in Hansard. All those options are being examined corporately by the Assembly Commission, and we will go for the option that means least disruption to Committees and brings value for money.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions to the Assembly Commission.

Mrs D Kelly: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I was delayed in coming down to the Chamber and so was not in my place to ask the first question. I apologise to you and to the House.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you very much.

Private Members' Business

Broadband: Rural Areas

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Flanagan: I beg to move

That this Assembly welcomes the investment by the Executive in improving access to high-speed broadband; recognises the continuing need for improvements in broadband infrastructure in many rural areas; and calls on the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to work with local stakeholders to identify the areas that are in greatest need and to target investment on those areas to provide equitable broadband speed, cost and reliability.

Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I am delighted to move the motion, which hopefully will not prove to be too contentious. I hopefully will not need 10 minutes, because I do not think that it needs 10 minutes.

The motion is very simple: it calls for improvements to broadband provision, particularly in rural areas. I do not think that anybody can be too upset about that. As a rural MLA, I, like many other elected representatives, receive regular complaints from citizens and businesses unable to receive the same standard of broadband as their urban counterparts. They feel that they are being left out of some of the investment that has taken place recently.

The starting point should be that we acknowledge and welcome the considerable investment that has been leveraged into the telecommunications infrastructure as a result of Executive funding. Broadband or telecommunications is not a transferred matter, so it is not the responsibility of the Executive. However, the Executive can make interventions where they feel that there is a need. That has been very positive and is largely welcomed. However, an awful lot of the frustration that has historically been out there is still there, and we need to reflect on that.

Very many areas are still in the Dark Ages when it comes to broadband infrastructure and access to telecoms. I could spend the next five minutes listing the townlands, hamlets, villages and towns in my constituency that are simply cut off from the network, but, to Members' delight, I will not do that. We will be told by other contributors and by the Minister that there are viable alternatives to the now privatised entity that continues to receive millions of pounds of public funding and has considerably improved its network in recent years, particularly in the North of Ireland, thanks to proactive investment from government. That has not happened in Britain. For high-speed, superfast broadband, we are definitely to the fore across these islands, and that is to be welcomed. However, there is still the same problem as there has always been with rural access.

Coming from a telecommunications background, I know the existing alternatives fairly well. However, given their speed, the cost for consumers, the government intervention that would be required and the reliability of satellite mobile and the other forms of wireless technology, nothing really compares to fibre to the property (FTTP). However, it is far from fibre to the property that we are at the minute. I do not think that a figure has been calculated to see how much that would cost, and I do not think that we will see it any time soon. Recent improvements in fibre to the cabinet (FTTC) have made a considerable difference in many urban areas and just outside urban areas, but, once you get beyond the street lights of most towns, villages and cities, you do not really see the impact of that, and it has been left to alternative providers to fill the gaps.

On the latest technological advancements, we will see the roll-out of 4G in the coming period. I know that some operators have begun that process with investment in Belfast in recent months, and that will continue. Satellite provision continues to improve in speed and reliability, but it is still quite costly, and some people are dissuaded from switching to satellite because of the large sign-up and set-up costs. However, we have yet to see how the additional funding that has been secured for improving broadband provision will be used. The Executive and the British Government have allocated funds, but we have been told previously and, I presume, will be told this time that it will be left to the market to determine the best technology. To date, that approach has not solved all our problems despite the improvements that I have noted. I know that the Minister will go into more detail on that in her response, so I will not steal her thunder.

The hardest-to-reach areas are still without adequate service, but urban areas, which were already receiving over two megabytes per second, are now in receipt of over 70 megabytes per second, which is more than adequate for any household. We still have the anomaly that people living in the countryside cannot get broadband through their phone line. That is a source of frustration for many people. There is no equality in coverage. One of the main reasons for that is that we are dealing with private companies that are driven primarily by their shareholders and their desire to have a profitable outcome. That is where the Government need to intervene. The Government can take two approaches. They can take a carrot approach, whereby people are given financial or other incentives to invest in what would be termed non-profitable areas, or the Government need to use a stick, which can be done through better regulation and better targets being set by Ofcom and those being properly policed. We have to see how this will pan out. The European Commission and the European Parliament are setting targets for the British Government, and the Minister's telecommunications action plan and the Programme for Government talk about giving every household broadband of at least two megabytes by 2015. All the targets are there, but the main questions are "How will we get there?" and "How much will it cost?"

There is a feeling among rural dwellers that they are being treated as second-class citizens by telecommunications providers and that the policies and interventions of the Executive could be improved to better serve rural dwellers. Some changes could be made to ensure that the much-needed money would have a much greater impact.

We all know that it is very unlikely that rural properties will connect directly to the fibre network any time soon. One of the only ways that we would see that would be through the introduction of a universal service obligation if that were to be imposed on providers. To date, there is no mad clamour to introduce that. There has been some discussion about it in recent years, but that has not really progressed. As far as I am aware, the responsibility for doing so currently lies with the British Government, as do most telecommunications and broadcasting powers. Whether that remains the case and is in our best interests is something that we need to debate as an Assembly and as a society.

The whole concept of a universal service obligation is nothing new. It is something that we are well used to. It exists for landline phones and postal services. If you look across the board at how people access services, communicate and manage their everyday life, you see that broadband is now an essential part of that. It is considered every bit as essential as both those services, and it should be delivered to every property adequately as regards speed, reliability and cost.

As regards solutions and technologies that would deliver high-speed broadband and reliable mobile phone coverage, DETI needs to give greater consideration, when the tender that it is working on is rolled out, to whether a greater point score can be given to providers who can provide broadband and mobile phone coverage in the one process. They are similar problems. The lack of mobile phone coverage is a completely separate debate, and we could delay the House for another hour and a half talking about that, so I will not go into the detail on that, except to say that, if the Executive go down the route of trying to invest to bring 2G mobile phone coverage up to an adequate standard, it is possible that it will still not be as good as the 4G service when it rolls out. So, it is my view that the money that the Executive put into mobile phone coverage from the mobile infrastructure project should be done as part of the roll-out of the 4G services, if that can be timed correctly.

I will speak briefly about my area and the much-rumoured telecommunications legacy from the G8 summit. Like, thankfully, all the trouble that was going to be caused, it has failed to materialise.

3.30 pm

The police erected a mast at the Lough Erne resort. Fortunately, that will remain; it is a very welcome addition. The temporary masts in Enniskillen town centre are unlikely to remain, and will not solve many of the problems in rural communities. From a local point of view, that is deeply disappointing, given the ludicrous promises made in advance of the G8 summit.

The motion calls on the Minister to work with local stakeholders. The Department recently carried out a consultation exercise that identified postcode areas in greatest need. There were a considerable number of responses to that consultation and its findings were made available to the Committee. It is good to see that the Department is looking at areas in greatest need. I will rest my case there.

Mr D McIlveen: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this subject. I have been lobbied heavily on this issue in my constituency of North Antrim. When it comes to broadband, we seem to have patchy coverage to say the least. This is an important issue for very many families in my constituency. It affects not just people working from home or in businesses, but regular people like me and you, dare I say it, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.

It is very frustrating when connection speeds are so slow at times. However, there is something even more frustrating: broadband providers are treating everybody almost the same, regardless of the speed of the internet service that they receive. That was clearly demonstrated by correspondence that I received from one constituent:

"I live in rural North Antrim. I am writing to ask you what is currently being done by the NI Assembly to improve broadband connections for those of us currently without access to fibre-optic connections. Our connection speed at the above address is 0.5Mbps. I understand that the average connection speed in the UK is 7Mbps, with of course many others receiving much faster speeds."

In our household, I have a final year student at university, another student based across the water but studying here during the holidays and also a secondary school pupil. All of my children require good access to the internet for their studies. It is very frustrating to have to live with slow speeds on a day to day basis — even finding the contact details for my MLAs took 10 minutes due to the time taken to download photographs. At the same time we are still paying the same price for our connection as people receiving far faster broadband speeds."

That last point is crucial. That letter, like others, prompted me to continuously seek to improve broadband provision in my constituency. I am in regular contact with the internet service providers. I also periodically issue mail drops to keep constituents updated. Despite that, my constituent hit the nail on the head about the pricing of broadband when we do not receive the speeds that we would hope for.

I know that much is being done by the Department to tackle this issue, mainly from a broadband provision perspective, and I commend the Minister on that. I also commend her work on the next-generation broadband project and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) telecoms action plan. Those initiatives have been effective in rolling out much better broadband capacity for our Province. However, a lot more is still to be done. I know that the Minister is aware of the challenges, but this is not an issue only for the Department; there is a private sector interest as well, and it has to step up to the mark in delivering the infrastructure required to provide us with much faster broadband, particularly in rural areas.

I commend and support the motion, and I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr Rogers: I welcome the motion today. First, we need to acknowledge the advances that have been made in the extension of broadband infrastructure throughout the North in recent years, but there are many black spots, especially in our rural areas. The lack of modern ICT infrastructure in rural areas is one of the main messages I get from rural businesses and communities. Rural businesses need effective infrastructure if they are to be successful, to realise their potential and to contribute to economic growth, and to maximise their economic resilience by providing greater flexibility and competitiveness, supporting innovation, enabling business to do new things and to develop currently unknown services and applications, and supporting that competitive economy. In fact, there is a big rural/urban divide.

Minister, I know that Fermanagh is the centre of the universe today, but the same cannot be said for access to broadband. Recent announcements of 100-megabit technology that is offered in cabled areas and urban settings, while rural areas struggle to obtain even basic broadband services, help to illustrate the rate at which the digital divide is widening. The latest software is developed using that 100-megabit technology, and one can only imagine how it will function when you have to use it on a 0.5 megabit connection.

In reality, there are areas in Northern Ireland where fixed-line solutions are not possible, for technical and commercial reasons. Recent developments in mobile and satellite technology are welcome. The £5 million investment in rural broadband that was announced by the Agriculture Minister is a good start, but it is a basic service if rural businesses are to grow and prosper.

I am disappointed that our amendment, which called on the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to work with stakeholders as well, was not agreed for today. We cannot address the issue fully, as the Minister responsible for rural affairs is not present. The is not just a DETI responsibility; it is an Executive responsibility.

The rural White Paper action plan places a strong emphasis on improving broadband for business, but its targets are not challenging enough. Rather than having a target to:

"extend access to high speed broadband services to 85% of rural and urban businesses", a more challenging target would be to extend it to 85% of rural businesses. That is, if "rural" is outside the 30 mile per hour limit, rather than simply outside Belfast and Derry.

This week, Northern Ireland is on the world stage for the right reasons. Fast and efficient broadband is the train tracks on which the economy recovery engine must travel. The superhighway that links Europe with America, North and South, travels past our door. Project Kelvin is there; we just need to get on at the station.

Economic recovery will mean developing both foreign direct investment and small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). While much of the foreign direct investment is based in our urban centres, our SMEs are operating across the North, from Castlerock to Kilkeel and from Portavogie to Strabane. Central to the economic recovery is a strong network of SMEs across the country, and central to that development is a fit-for-purpose broadband infrastructure. Could you do the same job in a rural SME in south Down as you could do in the science park? In many cases, you could, but look at the benefits: living and working in a rural environment; up to three hours' less travel a day, saving in monetary and environmental terms; leisure on your doorstep, such as a walk in the Mourne or mountain biking in Castlewellan; cheaper office space; lower house prices; and friendly people.

All rural dwellers should have equal access to broadband services as their urban counterparts. Our farmers need broadband, be it for online applications for single farm payment, stock monitoring, stock records, VAT or PAYE returns, to name but a few.

Our schools need a good service. That was one of the many problems we had with computer-based assessment. Our rural schools have ongoing problems with connectivity. It sounds good, in theory, if you have a 5-meg speed, but once you split it across 20 computers it is very, very slow.

Our tourism industry needs a superfast broadband service for many reasons, including marketing and booking information. Transforming Your Care also needs a good broadband service. In conclusion, Minister, I commend the work that has been done to date, but there is more to do. DETI has a lead role to play with Executive colleagues to ensure that our economic recovery train can leave the station with the right broadband infrastructure.

Mrs Overend: The rapid emergence of digital technology has changed consumers' service needs and demands. The fact that we are having this debate today is evidence of how government must be responsive to that. The motion refers to the provision of equitable broadband speed, cost and reliability. I am sure we can all agree with that aspiration, especially those of us from rural constituencies. For example, in Mid Ulster, I have been contacted by those in the business community and individual consumers who are struggling with access to broadband because of their location. That cannot be allowed to continue. I am, therefore, happy to support the motion. I hope that it will lead to a renewed focus on addressing some of the problems that still persist in various parts of Northern Ireland.

The Executive have taken steps to improve the situation. That is to be commended. DETI has been working through the next generation broadband project to ensure the development of a modern, efficient infrastructure, which is essential for economic and social development. It also has in place a telecoms action plan, which proposes that, by 2015, virtually everyone in Northern Ireland should have access to broadband of at least two megabits per second and that 90% of premises will have superfast broadband speeds of 24 megabits per second. I am sure that the Minister will detail the work of her Department much more fully in her contribution as well as outlining the budgetary commitment to rural broadband in particular.

The Department of Agriculture and Rural Development (DARD) has also invested £5 million from the rural development programme to tackle this issue. The Department of the Environment (DOE) has announced changes to the planning system to boost mobile phone and internet coverage in Northern Ireland. That has improved the speed of the planning process. Applications are no longer needed to replace, alter or extend an existing mast or antennae or to install a limited number of antennae on an existing mast. All of that is good work that is being done at a devolved level. It must be continued and developed.

Further to that, we have also received significant support from Westminster in this vital area. George Osborne, in his 2013 Budget, announced his intention to re-profile funding for broadband to support local delivery. In the previous 2012 Budget, £13.7 million of investment was allocated to Belfast for the delivery of ultra-fast broadband to up to 113,000 residents and 9,000 businesses and high-speed wireless connectivity to up to 63,000 residents in key areas. An additional £50 million was also made available to fund a second wave of super-connected cities, with cities across the UK eligible to apply for funding.

That 2012 Budget also set out investment in mobile infrastructure to deliver improved coverage, including on the A2 between Londonderry and Newry and the A29 between Coleraine and Armagh, which, as you know, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, is a very important route because it travels directly through Mid Ulster. Although it is, of course, split between urban and rural areas, I ask the Minister to outline in her response the current situation with that funding and the work that is under way as a result of it.

It is also topical to raise the issue of the G8 summit. It has been said that Fermanagh has received increased broadband for the purposes of hosting the summit. I am sure that residents will be pleased about the improved provision. However, it is important that there is a more permanent solution for that area of Northern Ireland.

Despite the ongoing work that I have outlined, issues remain unresolved. I mentioned my constituency at the outset. Many Members will have had similar experiences with their own constituents expressing concerns at weak broadband coverage and "not-spot" areas. In the past, the Minister has admitted that her own broadband service in County Fermanagh is sometimes intermittent. We cannot allow a situation to persist whereby some people in rural areas are being subjected to a service that is much inferior to that in other areas.

Recently, I heard concerns being raised by the First Minister about displacement of jobs should enterprise zones be set up in a specific area in Northern Ireland. The fact is that such poor broadband provision is having a similar effect in rural areas because it is leading businesses to relocate elsewhere. Earlier, my colleague from south Down mentioned farmers. They are unable to relocate. Yet, they are being encouraged more and more to complete applications online.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member must bring her remarks to a close.

Mrs Overend: This is a serious issue. I support the motion.

Mr Lunn: First of all, I apologise for not being here at the start of the debate to hear Mr Flanagan's introductory comments. I also have to apologise because I will not be here much longer after I have spoken. These things, sometimes, happen.

3.45 pm

When you see some of the figures from Ofcom — 95% of consumers in Northern Ireland have access to superfast broadband services, which is the highest in the UK — you might wonder what the problem is. However, there is still a problem in some rural areas and in other areas where some people get a reasonably fast broadband connection, but others down the street do not. So there is still work to be done, but I acknowledge the work that has been done, particularly by the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

In the information pack, I read about the project to upgrade 1,265 cabinets, which I will come back to in just a moment. That is an example of necessarily slow but steady progress. Each one of those cabinets may not benefit 20,000 people, but it will benefit a number of people, and, gradually, we will whittle away at the last 5% who are not satisfied with what they have at present.

When we have these discussions, I often use my home as a test case. We have not had broadband coverage worth the name for the past 10 years. I periodically check the anticipated speed by testing the line with BT. I tested it again this morning in preparation for this debate, and I was told that I could expect a broadband speed of 2.5 megabytes, with margin of error of 2 megabytes. So, that did not advance my cause very much. I then took the trouble to phone BT to discuss it, and I found out, to my enormous pleasure, that I can now get 10.8 megabytes using some kind of BT product, which will not cost me any more than am I paying for the use of a phone, with BT Sport also thrown in. I can announce to the House and the world outside that I have taken that deal. The reason for that increase is that the antiquated Stoneyford exchange now has a fibre optic connection to whatever cabinet serves my property. That will be good news for a lot of people in the immediate locality. That is what we have to do: increase it step by step.

I acknowledge the work done by the Minister's Department and the Agriculture Department. I encourage them to do more as quickly as possible and to work with the private sector. I know that the private sector can do things that government cannot do in case they distort the market, but I am sure that, with intelligent co-operation, we can get there and make things even better than they are now. Having said that, I will support the motion.

Mr I McCrea: Like others, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. Mid Ulster is divided up into about two-thirds rural dwellers and one-third urban dwellers. Like other Members who represent the constituency in the House, I am more than aware of the difficulties that people living in rural Mid Ulster have in achieving a decent connection. However, I have to give credit where it is due. Having led the delegation from Cookstown District Council, which included councillors, officers and, indeed, businessmen from the constituency, that met the Minister to deal with broadband issues, I can truly say that, on every occasion, the Minister had a listening ear, and I think that that is because she represents a rural constituency and, therefore, understands the problems. I certainly never came away from any meeting or discussion with the Minister feeling that she was not willing to do her best to help, and I have no doubt that that will continue to be the case as we move into the future.

My colleague referred to educational needs, and this is certainly vitally important for our young people. I, along with my colleague Alastair Ross, attended an Open University event up here, and an important aspect of its work is done via the internet. It is important that we try to ensure that our students have access to decent broadband speeds.

There are rural businesses out there that have the opportunity to win contracts to fix computers across the world, but they depend on superfast broadband speeds to be able to achieve that. That enables them to log on to a computer on the other side of the world and deal with problems, which saves them a lot of money. It is certainly something that the superfast broadband can help with.

I know that, in my council area, there has been a lot of focus on consultations that the Department has been carrying out, and people responded to the postcode issue of "not spots" or slow speeds. It is important that people take the opportunity to respond to these, because people can be missed. It is important that we can truly say that we have 100% coverage; that that is a real figure. Sometimes, you make a comment — this has happened to me — only to receive an e-mail saying, "Well, what about me?" It is important that we do all that we can to achieve superfast broadband, but it is not something that can be realised in every area, especially in rural Northern Ireland.

One of the strangest conversations I have had with a constituent was with someone whose cabinet across the road in front of his house had recently been upgraded to fibre optic. He was straight on the phone to get his line upgraded, only to be told that his house was covered by a cabinet that had not been upgraded and that was about a mile up the road. He was very disappointed, I have to say, and no matter how much I or others tried to explain it, he could not accept that this was in any way acceptable. It is important that we do what we can.

I have no doubt that the Minister will do everything that she can in making her bid for Westminster funding to ensure that a fair share of that money is spent here in Northern Ireland so that our rural dwellers have an equal opportunity to access the type of broadband that people who live in urban areas have. I commend the Minister for the work that she has done up to now, and I look forward to working with her to ensure that rural dwellers get the adequate service that they feel that they should have.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I speak as a member of the ETI Committee. I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this debate. A lot of the points have been made, so I just want to make a number of observations.

As a Member who spoke earlier said, this is an important issue not only for rural businesses but for rural families. The motion clearly calls on the ETI Minister to work with local stakeholders to identify the areas that are in greatest need and to provide solutions or to target investment accordingly.

It has been suggested that, at present, everyone in the North has access to broadband services. We are told that a broadband service of 512 kilobits has been available since 2005, but the reality, as Members have said, is that, in many areas, consumers enjoy speeds of at least 2 megabits per second, which is about four times as fast as 512 kilobits per second. I welcome the fact that DETI is considering how to address the issue of the remaining homes and businesses, particularly in rural areas, that suffer from that lack of provision.

Much has been made of Project Kelvin and the opportunities that that gives us in relation to data connection and connectivity, particularly with North America. However, it is my contention that this has not been marketed to its full capacity. Service providers are considering upgrading to 4G. That begs the question of why there is such a focus when we have so many gaps in current service provision. It is my understanding that, under the Communications Act 2003, the Department can make investments to deal with the extent of telecommunications. As Members said, the Department will initiate a procurement process to allow telecommunications suppliers to offer solutions that will deliver on some of those challenges. That is very important.

Ofcom's infrastructure report contains fixed broadband figures broken down by council area. Before I am accused of being a north-west whinger again, it is important to reflect on the north-west, for example, when we compare Derry, as a connected city, with places such as Limavady.

The figures speak for themselves when 12.7% receive less than 2 megabytes in Derry and 24.7% in Limavady. I also highlight that the infrastructure report shows that 82% of premises in Derry are covered by all mobile operators, but 3% of premises in Limavady are covered by all mobile operators. Those figures cannot be ignored and speak for themselves.

Like everybody else, I welcome the tens of millions of pounds of public money that has rightly been invested in improving rural broadband since 2007. We now need to look at all forms of technology and exploit it to find out what can best improve the situation. As was stressed, fibre-optic cabinets may help, but they will never deliver broadband to every area required.

In conclusion, I suggest that government policy needs to enhance telecommunications rather than prohibit it.

Mr G Robinson: Broadband provision in rural areas has been difficult in all constituencies. One of the most problematic areas is in my constituency. I appreciate that, although the Minister can encourage businesses that provide broadband, she cannot force them to provide the necessary infrastructure. It is also worth noting that the many billions of pounds to provide the high-speed broadband infrastructure are not currently available to the firms.

I am aware that high-speed broadband is an infrastructure item that inward investors look for when citing a business expansion. With so much business being done online, it is seen as a must for investing in mainly rural areas. There is a former MoD base at Ballykelly in my constituency. As we seek to develop the site after DARD's proposed relocation, high-speed broadband would be one of the items on the shopping list. The range of businesses requiring high-speed service includes R&D, entertainment, call centres and design. All those areas have the potential to create high-value employment for the areas that they locate in. Therefore, high-speed broadband would be desirable where at all possible. If there is any way in which the Minister can assist the provision of high-speed broadband services, I feel confident that it will be beneficial.

In the north-west, we really are open for business. We want to provide every possible inducement to potential investors. I ask the Minister, as a priority, whether it is possible to prioritise areas for the provision of high-speed broadband connections to enable business start-up, expansion and investment to become a reality. A Member mentioned problems in Limavady, and I agree that there are problems there.

Whatever the outcome of today's debate, I hope that the Minister will explore whether any further assistance can be given for the provision of this much-sought-after business infrastructural necessity.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas le moltóirí an rúin as é a thabhairt faoi bhráid an Tionóil. I thank the proposers for bringing the motion before the Assembly.

Although the motion is about harder-to-reach rural areas, it has to be acknowledged that there has been considerable investment by the Department and, to some extent, DARD to help and support the roll-out of higher-speed broadband.

Nevertheless, I think that what probably motivated the motion was that many areas, particularly but not exclusively rural areas — I will come to that in a minute — are hard to reach. Some of our towns still have significant problems, but I will stick to the motion.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

4.00 pm

This issue is causing problems. Aside from normal consumers and family members in households, schoolchildren still have difficulty downloading homework, and students have similar problems with their casework. Likewise, some businesses are also having problems, for example, architects and designers who need to download files when working from home. Indeed, in this ICT age, as we seek to develop the potential for software and software development, many people could do that type of work from home. However, to do that, they need the support of good broadband services.

Other businesses, such as those in the agrifood sector, need good broadband services for the transmission of data, particularly temperatures, feeding, watering and other conditions. In hen houses, for example, data feeds from a number of hen houses into one central base, and up-to-date and exact information about feeding, watering and the like is crucial to the end product of good food.

As mentioned, a major investment delivered some fibre-optic transmission, which has been of tremendous benefit and given a boost to many areas and businesses. However, there are other areas where problems remain despite that very significant and welcome investment. The UK Government, through Broadband Delivery UK, have made funding available to allow for a basic broadband service of 2 MB per second, and DARD recently made an investment in rural broadband delivery. Earlier today, the SDLP had an amendment to ensure that that would be done in a complete context, given the nature of the motion.

Obviously, there is a variety of options at the moment, be they satellite or other types of new technologies such as wireless or whatever. However, the reality is that many of those technologies do not reach people in rural areas. Mr McCrea and Mrs Overend mentioned the problems in Mid Ulster, and there have been a number of particular problems and difficulties along parts of the Tyrone lough shore and the Sperrins area of south Derry.

Scotland clearly has an ambitious plan for digital connectivity, which is aligned with a target of delivering broadband coverage at a speed of 30 megabits per second to all by 2020. That aligns with the European Commission's digital agenda for Europe, which has the same target. That significant work contextualises the huge task ahead of us, which is to roll that out and come somewhere near those targets for constituents of mine and others.

Of course, when we discuss broadband and the facilities that it provides to us, we always have to look at the technology in our hands: mobile phones, particularly smart phones, are being increasingly used to conduct business of multiple types. I spoke earlier about software development, and the variety of apps available on smart phones never ceases to amaze me. To make sure that those apps work, we must have good connectivity.

On 21 January, the Minister told us that, at 88%, Northern Ireland was the third lowest for outdoor 2G mobile services and, at 55.9%, the second worst of England, Scotland,

Wales and the North for 3G. We are now preparing for 4G, and, hopefully, most of it will be delivered by the end of next year. I have met EE, and, over the past six months, it has invested very significantly in upgrading the 3G network, and 4G remains with it —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr McGlone: Sure. However, it still has to be delivered. On that note, I support the motion.

Mr B McCrea: I am afraid that I cannot support the general goodwill towards DETI on the issue. I am rather disappointed by the progress that we have made. The top four of 200 local authorities in the UK surveyed by Ofcom for broadband black spots were Omagh, Fermanagh, Dungannon and Cookstown, and 10 of the top 20 were in Northern Ireland. There seems to be something of a problem in the way in which we are approaching the issue.

In looking at the progress of UK broadband projects, I note that Scotland managed to close its consultation on 28 November; that the Highlands and Islands — part of the Scottish allocation — finished their consultation on 14 January; and that Wales completed its consultation on 23 February. You may ask why those dates are important. The answer to that is because Northern Ireland closed its consultation on 12 October. However, the other three jurisdictions that I mentioned are in procurement. They have been through their consultation process and are actively placing service.

There are many areas in Northern Ireland without broadband, and not just the ones that I highlighted. Even in my constituency, people in the likes of Magheraconluce simply do not understand why they cannot get broadband. Therefore, there seems to be something of a problem. I wrote to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Industry about when she would be able to publish the results of her consultation. She wrote back to me on 10 December and said that it would be published on the Department's website by the end of 2012. We are now in June and have not yet had the consultation published. I have written repeatedly to the Minister asking her what the problem is. The general position seems to be that there was a mistake of some sort in the consultation process. I invite the Minister to explain what it was.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. Given that he said that he has repeatedly written to the Minister, will he confirm whether those letters came from his Lagan Valley constituency office, where he is having connectivity problems?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr B McCrea: I am not sure what that point added to the serious debate that we are having. I will carry on with my questions for written answer, which are a matter of record and the Member is free to look at.

However, on 2 January, the Minister wrote to me and said:

"I anticipate that a contract will be in place in 2013".

Given that we have not yet published the results of our consultation and are now in June, that seems to me to be a challenge. I wonder whether the Minister will confirm whether she anticipates a contract being in place in 2013.

I also had correspondence from the Minister on 26 March. She told me about the state aid rules and said that they were updated at the end of January 2013. However, I also have information that BDUK gave clearance to a range of issues, at the behest of the European Commission, in an umbrella agreement in November 2012. I cannot understand, Minister, why it is possible for Scotland, the Highlands and Islands and Wales to move forward, yet we are still not able to get our procurement issues sorted out.

Finally, I have a letter from the Minister dated 21 April, in which she states:

"It is my intention to publish a document in the near future that will ... detail ... responses received".

Perhaps the Minister will tell us what "the near future" means. Will she give us a date when she will do that? The letter also states that she will:

"provide a final opportunity to help determine the area of intervention, in accordance with State Aid rules."

Does that mean that we have to go through the consultation process again, or are there some other issues that we want to address?

It is not an issue for just that Minister to address. From the rural point of things, it is also one for Minister O'Neill, who said in response to a question raised by the Enterprise Minister's colleague Mr Craig:

"The BDUK project deadline is 2015, but they"

— presumably BDUK —

"tell us that, as soon as they get on the ground and start working, which will be some time after next month, they will be in a position to deliver a lot quicker than that." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 85, p242, col 1].

If there has been a mistake in the consultation process, I would rather the Minister came forward and told us what that is, that we resolve the matter together, that we try to get broadband into rural areas as quickly as possible and that we all work together for the betterment of the people of Northern Ireland.

I have —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Would the Member bring his remarks to a close, please?

Mr B McCrea: I have not brought this forward in any form of attack. I am merely asking the Minister questions, because I have written to her repeatedly but am not getting answers. The people of Northern Ireland deserve answers.

Mr Storey: I support the thrust of the motion.

I wonder whether the proposer of the motion will clarify to the House whether the mobile coverage he had when he was protesting against the G8 last night was of sufficient strength. Is that something that he has come to the House today to complain about? Maybe his expertise in this matter is gained from his former employment at Carphone Warehouse. I honestly think that he should have started with his own Minister.

It is not often that I find myself in agreement with Basil McCrea: I need to be very careful going into that territory, because people might think that I have some idea of moving parties. Let me scupper that completely: I have no intentions of that; I am quite content and am staying where I am. It was the last point he made in relation to the ARD Minister. A few weeks ago, we had an announcement from the ARD Minister that £5 million was being given to the rural community in relation to this issue. We heard in a recent statement that the ARD Minister met BT on the issue; but where is the delivery? Have farmers in the rural community of north Antrim been identified and informed that, somehow, the ARD Minister is going to help meet their needs and come to their rescue?

Telecommunications is an ever-moving technology. Northern Ireland needs to continually reassess where it is with regards to the telecommunication provision that we have.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: Yes, I will give way. It will give me another minute.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member asked whether the ARD Minister has given £5 million to the rural community. The information I am aware of is that the £5 million set out by the ARD Minister was actually given by DETI to help the scheme that it is taking forward, not for the Minister to hand directly to rural communities. The point that Mr McCrea highlighted is the reason why the DARD £5 million has not been implemented yet. It is not because the Minister has not gone around north Antrim handing it out to individual farmers; that is not how it works.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Storey: That is not how it is being presented by the ARD Minister in press releases. I will stand corrected, but I did not think that there was much reference — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Storey: There was little reference to DETI in the press release that came from the ARD Minister. It was as though the ARD Minister was going to be the person responsible for that provision.

We need to ensure that we continue to make progress on provision where there is an identified need. Other colleagues have clearly identified the need in their own areas. My party colleague Mr McIlveen, from our constituency of North Antrim, has highlighted the particular issues for families and young students. He and I and our colleagues in North Antrim have had useful discussions with DETI — I commend the Minister and her officials for the way that they have responded — particularly with regard to mobile coverage in Dervock in north Antrim, where coverage is not just abysmal, it is not even present.

I also welcome the assistance of Ofcom in working to ensure that the operators provide a service and step up to the mark so that, when you come into the village of Dervock in north Antrim, you have a signal. Currently, when you reach the 30 mph speed limit sign in the village, the signal completely disappears. The lack of provision for that community is totally and utterly unacceptable.

4.15 pm

I commend my colleague Mr Rogers — he is not in the House at the moment — who sits on the Education Committee. He gave a very good overview of the issues that face rural communities, particularly farmers, students, families and schools. I have no doubt that the Minister will tell us, when she replies to the debate, the further steps that need to be taken to keep Northern Ireland moving forward so that we get to the right place in relation to telecommunications, both in broadband provision, which is good for our economy in both rural and urban situations, and in mobile coverage.

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I thank the Members who brought the motion to the House. We have had many opportunities to discuss telecoms in the House, but I am more than happy to come to the Floor. I think that I indicated to the House that I would not be available today but, when I saw that Phil Flanagan had tabled a motion on telecoms, I made sure that I was here to answer it, and I am very pleased to do that.

I am happy to agree that there is a continuing need for further improvements in broadband infrastructure both in rural and urban areas. Nevertheless, I think it would be useful to remind Members that many telecommunications matters are reserved — I think Mr Flanagan made that point himself — and that my Department has only limited powers to intervene in what is a privatised and independently regulated market. It is regulated, of course, by Ofcom. Although public funds can be used to encourage private sector investment, it is ultimately a business decision for providers to decide how or whether they wish to participate in any joint venture.

I am a little bit disappointed by the second part of the motion, which fails to recognise that we have been working regularly and extensively with stakeholders, both those who deliver services — I think that I have had more meetings with telecoms providers recently than at any time — and those who receive them. That point was made by Mr McCrea. I have met many delegations from right across Northern Ireland about difficulties with broadband or mobile signals.

The motion does not recognise that issues of need have to be balanced against technical viability and value for money. If we intervene, it will be with public money, so we need to ensure value for money. Members also need to appreciate that I cannot compel a broadband provider to invest in a particular area or indeed what charges they can apply. We can encourage and try to cajole broadband and telecoms providers to work with us, but we certainly cannot compel them to make those changes.

Despite all the constraints that I have mentioned, over the past four years we have channelled some £45 million of government money into initiatives aimed at stimulating improvements in the reach, speed and quality of broadband services across Northern Ireland. In that regard, the latest infrastructure report produced by Ofcom has pointed to the success of our next-generation broadband project in contributing to the availability of superfast broadband services right across the region. That report is worth reading and I encourage Members, particularly certain Members, to do that. At 95% of premises, we in Northern Ireland have the highest superfast broadband availability of the four UK nations.

That is not me saying that; the regulator is saying that. Colleagues need to acknowledge that.

Furthermore, Ofcom has reported that the average connection speed in Northern Ireland has more than doubled in the past year and is now the highest in the UK; that the percentage of premises with connections receiving less than two megabytes has significantly decreased, by some eight percentage points; and that the region has the lowest percentage of premises in potential broadband not-spots at just 0.6%, which is less than half the UK average. I am not saying that, if you are in that 0.6%, it is not frustrating; of course it is frustrating, which is why we are looking at ways to intervene.

Those achievements are notable and laudable, but I have to recognise that the market is very fast-moving, that the technology is changing and that the requirements of the end user are ever increasing — a point made by Mr Lunn — with the effect that broadband access in some areas is not keeping pace with demand. That is why we are committed to looking at further ways of increasing the availability of high-speed broadband. I talk about availability: we have noticed that there has been a roll-out of superfast broadband, but the take-up in some areas has not been as high as some of the providers had anticipated. I do not know whether that has to do with price or whatever, but some of the technology that is already there has not been taken up.

My officials are progressing a project aimed at achieving universal access to standard broadband services with a minimum download speed of two megabytes and at providing superfast broadband to at least 90% of premises with speeds in excess of 24 megabytes by 2015. We proposed a potential area of intervention and engaged with the industry and the public late last year, as we heard from Mr McCrea's précis of my correspondence with him. We wanted to affirm where we should intervene.

We have heard a lot about the other regions and how they have finished their consultations, but we need to acknowledge that the reason why they have finished their consultations and are going out to tender is that they are further behind than us on broadband interventions and, therefore, there is more scope for intervention. I want to put it on record that there has absolutely been no mistake. I know that some people in the Chamber are desperate for headlines, but I am sorry to disappoint them: there has been no mistake in relation to the ongoing consultation.

Members need to be aware that the process, by its very nature, is subject to continual refinement from the market and from consumers. It is also important to note — it is sometimes missed in the House — that we need to comply with state aid rules, so that whatever we put forward complies with European regulations. I hope to publish the outcome of that engagement soon, coupled with details of our refined intervention area, which of course will be subject to consultation so that everyone can have the chance to intervene again.

It is important that we get it right. I do not want us to intervene in an area where the providers have already intervened, meaning that there is a double intervention, which is not allowed under state aid rules. I will not be engaged in that, because I want to be engaged in interventions that will have the maximum impact across Northern Ireland.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: I will, if it is a sensible point.

Mr B McCrea: Is the Minister aware that the European Commission state aid SA 33671 UK 'National Broadband Scheme for the UK — Broadband Delivery UK' was agreed in November 2012? Are we part of that agreement for state aid, or do we have some additional hoop to go through that others do not?

Mrs Foster: It is not a matter of an additional hoop to go through; it is a matter of making sure that our intervention is state aid-compliant. Of course, the policy has been agreed. The policy context has been agreed for this area, otherwise we would not have been able to consult in the first place. We need to make sure that there are no double interventions, that we intervene in the appropriate places and that the European authorities are content. The last thing that we want to do is to have a breach of state aid. Then the whole thing would grind to a halt, and we would not get anywhere.

If the Member would like to speak to my officials — I make the offer genuinely to him — about this whole area, I am more than happy to accommodate him. That would, perhaps, be a better way of doing it than has happened heretofore. I am happy to accommodate him any time he wants to come and have those conversations with officials.

A further project is being considered to improve 3G mobile coverage and lay the platform for the widespread delivery of 4G mobile services across Northern Ireland by 2015. Because of the broadband-carrying capabilities of those technologies, there is also potential for them to be used as an alternative in areas where services delivered using the more traditional technologies continue to present a challenge. Mr McCrea referred to the fact that he had a constituent with a cabinet across the road who could not get the service. It is difficult to understand why such people are unable to access those services, but they are connected to different wires, which come from a different box. The problem is that the wires are static in the ground and cannot be changed, whereas mobile technology can accommodate some of that demand. So, I hope that we can use some of the new mobile technology to make a difference to connectivity across Northern Ireland. The intervention area for that project will also be informed through a public consultation.

I will not have a chance to answer all the points that have been made. It is a familiar story. We all have constituents who have difficulties with broadband. I sympathise with those people of course. We are trying to make a difference through the interventions that we make. I take issue with Ms McLaughlin's point that our policy should enhance rather than prohibit: I do not prohibit the advancement of telecoms. I want to put that on the record. We are trying to make a real difference to telecoms in Northern Ireland. I look forward to going up with another Member, Mr Robinson, to Limavady on Thursday. No doubt, all the businesses there will have the opportunity to speak to me about their individual difficulties.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom buíochas a ghabháil le Comhaltas as ucht a n-inchuir sa díospóireacht inniu. I will speak in favour of the motion. I welcome the contributions from Members who spoke in the debate.

I will start by responding to some things that the Minister said. She is right to say that this is a familiar story. However, each story is individual to the person telling it. I read a press statement about 18 months ago about a certain company receiving funding to address the issues around broadband in rural areas. It mentioned three or four counties in the North. So, rather than run to the Minister to find out exactly what it was about, I decided to contact the company. I set up a few meetings with my colleague Conor Murphy to try to get that company and others to make presentations in rural communities so that we could hear exactly what was going on. Three companies turned up on the night. The topic discussed was satellite and wireless technology and the money that was given to those companies to address the issues around that technology. Eighteen months later, I am still waiting for answers and people are still contacting me.

I have been engaging with the Minister. I have asked for a meeting, and she has committed to meeting me. I recognise the work that has been done, and the Minister has outlined the work that she has done. However, in my experience, there is a lot of work to be done in Newry and Armagh. I want this matter put to bed, and I want the equality issue brought onto the agenda: these people should have the same rights and the same access to services as everybody else. Clearly, they do not. We can talk about 3G, 4G and 2G, but there are people who are still taking their children into an urban setting to print off documents, finish off exams and everything else.

I have been here for six years, and we have had this debate three or four times. I welcome the Minister coming to the debate, and I am sure that it can be frustrating. Some Members said how frustrating this issue is. It is frustrating when you have to go back, time and again, on the phone to talk to constituents who keep asking, "Where are we at?". I have three or four e-mails here, and I will go through some of the points in them. I will also try to get to some of the points that Members made.

4.30 pm

Mr Storey, who is away now, was correct when he talked about students, farmers, businesses and rural businesses. Sean Rogers was the same; he mentioned rural businesses and support. In this climate, when nearly every other motion over the past number of weeks has been about economics and trying to grow the economy, rural businesses are finding it very hard to be competitive. This provision is vital to enable those people to access a proper broadband speed. I watched the Minister carefully during the debate and listened to her respond to some of the comments from Members. This is the first time that I have had a good opportunity to speak about broadband, and I will meet the Minister after this to discuss it.

I want to give you some idea of what is happening in the constituency. I will pass on the details of some of the businesses that have contacted me to the Minister. One business has offices in Armagh, Dublin, Cork and Manchester. They get large e-mails and try to talk on the phone, because that is their only means of communication. They try to read the e-mails and discuss the issue with people in Manchester and Dublin, but the line keeps breaking up. That is not acceptable. One Member mentioned the fixed line. Nearly every house in the country has a landline. I want you to think about that. We have new terms such as "not-spots" and "POPs", which are points of presence, as the Minister is well aware. So much money was given to BT to address some of the issues. It picked out the easy bits — the urban settings — that they could deal with. We are now left with isolated spots in the rural areas, and we cannot address them.

There are stories from people saying that they cannot access Skype and cannot do business. It is not only businesses; it is individuals as well. The Minister answered a question here — I do not know how long ago it was — about a review of the money that she had given to a certain number of companies. She was to come back here and tell me when that review was to be carried out, but I have not heard anything back. About 15 businesses and rural individuals in a five-mile radius keep coming to me about broadband access. They still cannot access it.

I welcome the £5 million intervention from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development. Unfortunately, I am speaking last in the debate, but I want you, Minister, to come back to me about that £5 million at some point. Will you ensure that the moneys that will be spent will be used to address the gaps and the lack of broadband provision in rural areas?

I want to pick up some points that Members made. Mr Flanagan talked about some issues with the tendering process, and I had hoped that the Minister would respond to that. Maybe she will come back in writing on that. I do not know where we are at now with the three companies that I was dealing with that got money to provide broadband. That still has not happened. Are there problems with the tendering? I do not know. You can look in Hansard at the point that Mr Flanagan made about the tendering process.

Mr McIlveen hit it on the head when he said that it was frustrating. It is not only frustrating; people are paying for poor broadband speed. I do not understand why that is still acceptable. Mr Rogers talked about rural businesses. I agree with him: we hear about that all the time. We can talk until we are blue in the face. I can see that the Minister is frustrated, and we obviously recognise that a lot of work is done through her office —

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Boylan: Yes.

Mrs Foster: The Member can say all that he likes about contracts, and I will look at Hansard to see what Mr Flanagan actually said. I thought that he was talking about the ongoing consultation, not the previous tenders. Those tenders have all met the conditions that were set down for them. Will he accept that, without the intervention of those companies, whether Onwave or whoever and, in particular, BT — there has been a lot of talk here today about BT not delivering — and of the Department, we would not have the infrastructure that we have?

Mr Boylan: I thank the Minister for her intervention. I agree about the work that has been done, and I will maybe stand corrected about the tendering process. However, I will say this about the moneys that were given out: I invited these people — you are right: you can talk all you like about how it is up to them whether they take it or not — and they were willing to come out and engage with the public. I am talking about accountability for public moneys. We gave money to address the issues, but they have not been addressed. They could have stayed away, and that would have been grand. If you feel, Minister, that you have done your bit where the review is concerned, all that I am saying to you is that those companies have not gone back to the individuals I have engaged with. So, in the future, when we are dealing with the contracts, maybe there should be more accountability.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly welcomes the investment by the Executive in improving access to high-speed broadband; recognises the continuing need for improvements in broadband infrastructure in many rural areas; and calls on the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to work with local stakeholders to identify the areas that are in greatest need and to target investment on those areas to provide equitable broadband speed, cost and reliability.

Road Improvement Schemes

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. As two amendments have been selected and are published on the Marshalled List, an additional 15 minutes have been allocated to the total time. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and a further 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. The proposer of each amendment will have 10 minutes to propose and five minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Before we begin, the House should note that both amendments cannot be made, as they are mutually exclusive. So, if amendment No 1 is made, the Question will not be put on amendment No 2. I hope that that is clear.

Mrs Overend: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the current position of the A5 western transport corridor scheme; further notes that the construction of the corridor was an Executive commitment; and calls on the Executive, given the substantial delay in the scheme, to provide immediate support to the Minister for Regional Development to progress other road schemes in place of the A5, including the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway, the A26 Glarryford to Drones Road dual carriageway, the A31 Magherafelt bypass and the A55 at the Knock Road, Belfast, to support the local construction industry.

Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. It goes without saying that the motion is important, so it follows that the debate is also very important.

The difficulties encountered by the A5 scheme, which I will return to, have created a huge opportunity to pick up and run with other schemes that are procurement-ready, that may begin ahead of the A5 and that would best support our local construction industry. We all know that no scheme can move beyond the procurement-ready position unless a commitment to funding is made. So, the purpose of the motion is to present the Assembly with an opportunity to say what commitments should be made.

It is worth bearing in mind that progressing roads infrastructure projects makes a real, positive difference to the economy.

We get the short-term benefits of solid employment and the longer-term benefit of a reliable infrastructure and a significant economic driver.

I accept that my party colleague the Minister for Regional Development is not simply free to re-profile the funding of the A5 and that he requires the support of the Executive to do so. I put the challenge to the parties of those Executive Ministers: do they support the projects that we specify in our motion? If they do, can we expect the Ministers from those parties to act accordingly at Executive level?

Today is an opportunity for the House to support our local construction industry by supporting the motion and to say very clearly to the rest of the Executive that we should not sit around waiting for the A5 to happen. When or if it happens, this is about taking the right decisions and taking them early. We would be failing that very construction industry and the people working in it — from quarrying to design to building — if we were just to say no to the credible alternative options available. Surely it is better to focus on progressing schemes more broadly than to focus narrowly on delivering a single scheme, irrespective of delay, and the consequential impact on the economy.

I say that despite having my local schemes very much in mind, primarily in Magherafelt and Cookstown. I am not shy in making clear the virtues of schemes that are local to me. The Magherafelt bypass features in the motion, along with a number of other sound schemes because they are procurement-ready. That means that, if the Executive were to give the go-ahead, we could commence work on some if not all of these schemes next year. That means that, next year, we could have workers employed on the ground, supporting jobs and the economy.

The Magherafelt bypass has been sought after for many years. Its local benefits of improved journey times, reduced congestion and the improved quality of life for people in Magherafelt are clear. Indeed, on Friday, I again met members of Magherafelt Chamber of Commerce, as did other local representatives who are here today. They clearly outlined research that has been undertaken to show that traffic congestion in the town centre would reduce by 25% and that congestion on the A31 road from Castledawson roundabout would be reduced by 35%. Without a bypass, Magherafelt is a very congested town with average daily traffic of 24,893, which is 3,000 more than the A6.

I congratulate my Ulster Unionist colleague Danny Kennedy for getting the scheme to a procurement-ready position, and I urge other Executive Ministers, in particular the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Sammy Wilson, to get behind him and the Magherafelt bypass scheme with not only an early funding commitment but an immediate one. I also take the opportunity to urge the Finance Minister to support the calls for the 10% top-up compensation for landowners, in line with Westminster.

I am less interested than others in the blame game of why the A5 became a stalled scheme. It must be difficult for Sinn Féin to stomach the fact that the scheme that it lauded found itself with a substantial delay, based on the decision taken when its man Conor Murphy was in charge. I know that it is a sensitive spot and that sensible discussions on alternatives may make things particularly uncomfortable for Sinn Féin, but these decisions and discussions need to take place.

Some time ago, I referenced the work of the Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR) on the importance of infrastructure for the economy. At a point in time when austerity and cuts were being held up as the only agenda, the IPPR presented a more sophisticated argument. It argued that the Government could take advantage of historically low interest rates by borrowing £30 billion for investment in infrastructure at a cost of just £150 million a year. This investment, it was argued, would act as a huge economic stimulus and provide an infrastructure legacy that would create a positive environment for business, focusing on transport and improving the movement of goods, services and people. I accepted that argument, and Boris Johnson also agreed with it. It is important that the argument is made once again here this evening.

Let me turn briefly to the proposed amendments. I take no issue with the SDLP amendment as it acknowledges the need to consider alternatives seriously, and the economy is not best served by being rigidly attached to a single proposal. I understand that they are seeking to argue for additional schemes, despite the fact that they may be some way short of the procurement starting line.

In contrast, the DUP amendment will be a body blow for the local road construction industry and the many people involved in related industries. I was surprised that the DUP tabled such an amendment, and I look forward to DUP members trying to explain why they no longer believe that the projects mentioned are worthy enough to be specifically considered. Their inability to put their name to sensible road projects in a number of constituencies, mine included, is disappointing to say the least. It is disappointing that such a party political amendment has been tabled when we need to be working together to lay the foundations for future economic activity.

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: You will get your chance in a wee second.

When dealing with jobs and the economy, we should rise above party politics. Decisions should be level-headed and objective. That means taking the best possible decision for our regional economy at all times. We all know that levels of economic activity continue to be disproportionately high in Northern Ireland compared with elsewhere. We all also recognise that improving our regional economy and regional economic prospects is a tremendous challenge. That means that we need objectivity and sound judgement. This motion reflects those two important principles, and, in this House, it is our job to ensure that the Executive hold to them. Of course, if that means getting the Magherafelt bypass under way next year, my constituents will certainly not complain. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr Byrne: I beg to move amendment No 1:

Leave out all after the second "corridor" and insert

"remains an Executive commitment; and calls on the Executive, given the substantial delay in the scheme, to provide immediate support to the Minister for Regional Development to progress other road schemes until construction work begins on the A5, including the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway, the A26 Glarryford to Drones Road dual carriageway, the A31 Magherafelt bypass, A32 improvements between Enniskillen and Omagh, the Enniskillen ring road and other road priorities in the west and the A55 at the Knock Road, Belfast, to support the local construction industry."

In the amendment, we outline some schemes that we believe should be a priority at this stage.

The A5 saga is discussed in strong terms in my part of the world. I will not go into the whole history of why the A5 became so important after what happened to the railway in 1964. However, those of us who live in the counties of Donegal, Derry and Tyrone were greatly pleased that as a result of the St Andrews Agreement, a major flagship peace-dividend project was earmarked as a national primary route for joint Government support and action. It was a major achievement that the project was flagged up as evidence of the economic dividend of peace. To say that we were disappointed by the outcome of the recent court case is an understatement. However, I fully recognise the sense of what the Minister said about not going to an appeal. That was sensible, given that 11 of the 12 issues were successfully dealt with and only the habitats issue was outstanding.

The question now is this: what should happen to the money? Some £113 million was earmarked in the current year to be spent on the project. We do not want the Executive to lose the money to the Treasury, so we must be sensible and realistic. I state again, however, that it is crucial that the A5 project remains an Executive priority. When the outstanding issue is dealt with, I hope that work can start.

There is a road that I refer to as "the umbilical cord": the A32 between Omagh and Enniskillen. It has been in poor repair for a long time, but, thankfully, Roads Service has completed two repair schemes in recent times. The Minister was at the opening of the Shannaragh section in the past year, and it is a very welcome development. Given that other outstanding sections of the road are in a very poor state — the Esker bog and Cornamuck areas — we hope that the Department will advance schemes in the coming year to address the difficulties on those sections of the A32.

We earmarked other road projects in the amendment because we believe that the money was allocated to the Department for Regional Development (DRD) and, in particular, road infrastructure. I support what Mrs Overend said about what road infrastructure projects can do for the construction industry and the local economy. We have mentioned the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway. Those of us who travel on that road realise that it is a bottleneck, and we hope that something can be advanced there. I totally agree with the need for the Magherafelt bypass. It has been in the planning for a long time and hopefully can be advanced.

Given that Fermanagh is featuring strongly on the world stage, the ring road around Enniskillen is crucial, and other sections of roadway in the area are vital for the development of Enniskillen as a tourism and economic centre.

We have also referred to the A55 road at Knock, in case I am accused of being very parochial. However, in the spirit of what is happening with the overall economic development of the region, it is important that those projects be advanced at a time when there is a crying need for construction work and development to commence.

Last week, the Minister of Finance said that over 50% of all capital construction work comes out of the public purse. If we can use the £113 million this year, hopefully a number of projects can be started and construction employment can be increased.

I do not want to rehash all the A5 issues, but I certainly want to hear a reconfirmed commitment to that project from the Minister. I hope that the Executive collectively will not resile from the A5. I hope that the outstanding matters relating to what did or did not go wrong with officialdom can be rectified. Hopefully, the scheme can be got back on track.

There is not much more that I want to say, Mr Deputy Speaker. My colleagues Mr Dallat and Mr Mark H Durkan will speak later in the debate.

Mr Spratt: I beg to move amendment No. 2:

Leave out all after the second "scheme" and insert

"to bring forward suitable capital projects which will improve our infrastructure, provide a much needed boost for the construction sector and be delivered within the available time frame."

I want to make it clear that I am speaking not as the Chair of the Committee for Regional Development but as an MLA.

My party is not against any of the projects listed in the motion. However, we want to ensure that the funds drawn down are used in a timely manner and do not end up being returned to the Treasury. That is the most important issue in all of this. We must also ensure that there is an even spread of funding across the Province, and we want the Minister to assure us that all schemes across the Province have been looked at in the round.

As has been mentioned already, it is estimated that £113 million must be spent in this financial year. It is no secret that the Minister has already requested £61 million for DRD in the June monitoring round. It is interesting that Mrs Overend said that all the projects were procurement-ready and then went on to say that money could be spent next year. There is still some confusion over whether vesting has taken place on some of the projects, confusion over whether the full procurement processes have taken place and confusion over the situation with the public inquiries into the schemes. The Minister added some confusion earlier this afternoon, which perhaps he will clarify in his remarks, when he spoke about the situation with the A26. He said that it was at its public inquiry stage at the moment and might well be able to go "later this year" — I think that that is the phrase that he used. Given that we have £113 million to spend, and that we need to spend it in this financial year, I would have thought that we need to have shovel-ready projects that will be able to move, and move swiftly now that we are already in this financial year. We need to get the construction industry and everybody else moving. That is certainly our perspective.

The upgrade of the A26 Glarryford to Drones Road would particularly benefit people travelling from Ballymoney, Ballycastle and other areas, as well as those visiting the north-west of the Province. Added to that is the fact that incredibly serious and fatal accidents have happened on that road, a matter that I know my colleague Mr Storey has raised regularly. All that needs to be addressed. However, I am concerned that there is an issue in relation to the public inquiry. The Minister needs to tell us whether all the vesting is in place so that spend could start immediately on those projects.

The motion refers to other projects, such as the A6, the A31 and the A55, but we have to question whether the Department is in a position to start work at those locations.

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Spratt: I am happy to give way to my colleague.

Mr Newton: I thank the Member for giving way. He mentioned the A55 Knock Road in the East Belfast constituency. That has been in the system for 40 years; that is the priority of the project. Having said that, there was a consultation process and a public inquiry, and the vast majority of the residents who attended the public inquiry and made representation to it expressed their concerns about the A55 going ahead. That was predicated on dozens of properties that had been purchased to make way for the A55 over the past 40 years.

Mr Spratt: That is a speech.

Mr Newton: I just want to come to this very important point, Mr Deputy Speaker. There was a consultation process. I wonder if the sponsors of the motion took the time to consult with local residents and RACKS, which is the community group in the area, or with the local representative for the Ulster Unionist Party on his concerns about the A55 proposal.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that interventions should be brief.

Mr Spratt: I know one thing, Mr Deputy Speaker: I will not give way to my colleague in future. He has made a speech to the House. I accept some of the points that he has made, and it is for the Minister to answer those points. It raises another issue of whether all the public inquiry stuff has been properly dealt with. The Minister, wrote a platform piece for today's 'News Letter', or somebody wrote it on his behalf. In it, he stated:

"When I took over as Minister in May 2011, it was clear that I inherited a situation where all the eggs were firmly in the A5 basket".

He went on to endorse the roads named in his party's motion to the House today. Is the Minister not now guilty of taking all the eggs out of one big basket and spreading them across a number of smaller ones? Is he not restricting the potential for the reallocation of the A5 budget? Are there not other worthy causes, not only within the roads infrastructure but in Northern Ireland Water, which will have massive benefits for the construction industry as well? Can money not be allocated there to alleviate flooding and other things, which is also a commitment of his Department, along with other Departments?

In fact, a number of questions that the Regional Development Minister needs to answer relate to improvements to road infrastructure. Is it possible to use funding for road improvements that was previously allocated to a capital project? Are other projects ready to go in respect of schemes that have not been mentioned today? If so, will the Minister identify those projects to the House? Will he identify whether there are any vesting issues in respect of the projects that have been named today that need to be fulfilled by the Department?

5.00 pm

It is vital that these questions are answered so that the funding can be used and not lost. That is the pivotal point of all this. It must be said that the responsibility for the reallocation of the A5 funds does not necessarily rest with the Regional Development Minister alone. The Executive have a responsibility in relation to that. It was clear from comments made by my colleague, the Finance Minister, last week that the Finance Department has been generous as regards the DRD budget in the past two years.

He said:

*"£109 million in 2012-13 and £120 million in 2011-12."
— [Official Report, Vol 86, No 2, p66, col 2].*

That was in relation to the roads maintenance budget. That budget is some £800 million in arrears. There is a backlog that would allow the construction industry to get to work quickly. I ask the Minister whether there are shovel-ready schemes with capital money in that budget that can go ahead to improve the roads infrastructure. Has the Department fully looked at the options for how the money can be spent, because roads maintenance is one area where the Department is very good? We know what happened over the winter period, for instance.

Probably one of the major complaints that we all hear, apart from housing and other issues, is the condition of some roads throughout the Province. The Minister has mentioned that regularly, so has everything been looked at for the reallocation of that money? According to the Minister, the A5 scheme is off the table only temporarily. Obviously, money is being spent now that has to be spent: £113 million this year. In future years, however, if it runs on, there will be other issues, so we need to look at all roads.

I have raised quite a number of points on which I hope the Minister will be able to give some answers. On that basis, I am pleased to —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Spratt: — recommend to the House the amendment in my name and my party colleagues' names. I ask that everything be looked at in the round and that the money is spent to help the construction industry, which is the aim of all of us.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. The A5 western transport corridor is extremely important. It will connect the north-west of Ireland to cities such as Belfast and Dublin. It is also an important internal east-west link within the Six Counties. It is not a road to nowhere, as some commentators would have us believe.

The A5 dual carriageway is essential for the economic development of the north-west. Informed predictions suggest that it could be worth around £1 billion to the economy and could provide hundreds of jobs during its construction. According to the Institution of Civil Engineers, every £1 invested in infrastructure generates an average of £2.84 for the economy, and for every £1 million invested in infrastructure, 28.5 jobs are created. The benefits are very clear.

The construction sector has taken a massive hit. We met the contractors directly affected by the A5 decision and, more recently, the Quarry Products Association. Thousands of workers rely on strategic roads projects such as the A5, but are now forced overseas to work or to join ever-increasing dole queues. We also recently met the president of the NI Chamber of Commerce and the chief executive of Enterprise NI. Two of their six key priorities include lobbying for the green light for strategic projects and the promotion of trade overseas. Within that strategic context, the A5 western transport corridor is the biggest single infrastructure project on this island. That is acknowledged by the chambers of commerce along the route, which have been working hard on the campaign.

The A5 delay is having a wider impact on regional development across the island, as we are in the most westerly part of the EU. It is particularly affecting the N2, N14 and N15. That topic will be dealt with later in the debate by Seán Lynch, our party's regional development spokesperson and Deputy Chair of the Committee for Regional Development.

Alternatives to the A5 have been suggested online, such as an upgrade to two-plus-one standard. According to the public inquiry report, however, there are over 1,300 accesses and entrances along the existing A5, and each is an accident waiting to happen.

An online solution, or an upgrade, would require the bypassing or the vesting of homes and businesses in settlements such as Sion Mills. Indeed, everyone has the right to use the road. That includes families who live along that road, and strategic traffic that is making its way to the major cities on the island. However, it is the interface between the strategic and local traffic that gives rise to frustrations, tailbacks and risk-taking. The construction of a completely new carriageway to separate the strategic and local traffic would reduce journey times and make travelling a great deal safer for everyone. Along with the new dual carriageway, the current A5 will be maintained as an A-class road.

Unfortunately, the A5 has taken many lives over the decades. Anyone who has browsed the comments left on the action for the A5 online petition will not have failed to be moved by the very personal stories of people who have lost loved ones on that stretch of road. It is a fact that road safety increases as the quality of the roads improves and that dual carriageways are safer than single carriageways. Indeed, according to statistics provided by the PSNI to the 'Ulster Herald', there were 97 recorded collisions on the A4 between 2005 and 2010, with, unfortunately, nine people losing their life. Thankfully, since the A4 dual carriageway opened at the end of 2010, no one has lost their life on either the existing A4 or the A4 dual carriageway, and recorded collisions dropped dramatically to two and six respectively by the end of 2012.

On economic, social and safety grounds, there is very little alternative to the A5, and it is imperative that the single issue relating to the EU habitats directive, which is currently delaying the project, is dealt with swiftly and competently so that the project can get back on track.

With regard to the motion —

Mr Spratt: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member has mentioned the habitats directive. I notice that attempts are being made to move the blame to previous occupants of the Department for Regional Development, but is it not the same officials in the Department who should have dealt with that, no matter who the Minister was?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McAleer: Thank you. Yes, I agree with the Member; that was a very good comment. I understand that it is being dealt with. We picked that up through the Regional Development Committee; it is being overseen by an independent third party body. It is something that the Minister will probably want to pick up on as well.

I move now to the motion and the amendments. According to the latest ISNI reports, and, indeed, comments made earlier today in the Chamber by the Minister, virtually no strategic projects will be shovel-ready by the end of 2014. If the motion and amendment No 1 were to be implemented, it could increase the risk of all, or part, of the £100 million-plus reduced requirement from the A5 western transport corridor not being spent on projects in the Six Counties this year and, in fact, being declared back to the British Exchequer and lost to the local road-building industry.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close.

Mr McAleer: Amendment No 2 recognises that it is for the Executive to decide which capital projects should be brought forward to improve our infrastructure and to give a well-deserved boost to our local construction industry. In that context, Sinn Féin will be supporting amendment No 2 and voting against the motion and amendment No 1.

Mr Dickson: I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. I also rise to speak in support of amendment No 2. Coming from east Antrim, I am in a reasonably good position to understand the consequences of delays and hold-ups in a major road scheme, the A2 having taken decades to get to the point that it is acknowledged, Minister, it is getting to today. Along with all my colleagues in Carrickfergus Borough Council, I continuously lobbied for over 30 years to keep that project alive. I trust that those in the west will not have as long to wait for their project to commence.

However, following various legal proceedings which are not the subject of today's debate, the A5 may not be going ahead for a period or into the future. As that project is currently in limbo, I think everyone can agree today that what we should be doing is considering how we use that money for alternative projects. That is what today's debate is about. It is very clear: there should be no question of the money being returned to the Treasury, as it was, and has been, allocated to Northern Ireland and should be spent in Northern Ireland on appropriate and beneficial schemes. As has been said, due to the differing budgetary rules, this money must be switched only to other capital projects and, given time constraints, they have to begin relatively soon. Hence, the much-hackneyed term, "shovel-ready projects", which has been used in the debate already.

The motion and the two amendments share the same sentiment. We are not that far apart on those matters. However, for simplicity's sake and maximum freedom to choose the best projects, we prefer the wording of amendment No 2. I genuinely have concerns about the inclusion of name-specific road projects. Although it is tempting to attempt to prioritise them, we would prefer that, rather than a list of projects outlined in the motion, the best-value-for-money and readiness test would be applied across a broad range of projects and Departments, as well as all of those projects.

Mrs Overend: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: Yes.

Mrs Overend: I just want to clarify a point. Compare the motion and the second amendment. First of all, our motion asks for support for the Minister for Regional Development to progress other roads schemes in place of the A5 scheme, including the ones that we have listed. One can, therefore, add other schemes if one wants to do so. We just wanted to include those specific ones. I will have to intervene again because I cannot remember what my other point was.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Dickson: Thank you. I acknowledge the point. I will address it shortly.

We know the problems that face the construction sector and the boost that it gets from major capital projects. That is why the Assembly should not constrain itself to a pork-barrel list of road projects. Instead, we should make the money that is released from the stalled A5 scheme available to all capital projects. I acknowledge that that is in the motion.

Mrs Overend: I will come in again, if the Member will let me.

Mr Dickson: No. Thank you. I need to finish this.

It is for that reason that I genuinely believe that we should make that money available not only for road projects but for other Executive projects, such as the upgrading of healthcare trust homes, work that would benefit the construction industry, and the public transport system, to which I will return in a moment.

Despite the potential extension to the Assembly's mandate, there is still a very tight turnaround time within which to give large projects the go-ahead. We do not want to get bogged down in arguments over whether a project was included in an Assembly motion. Given public transport's place as the poor relation to roads, we should not limit ourselves just to road schemes.

Mr Byrne: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: I am nearly finished.

We should look to see what capital projects for cyclists, buses or trains await funding, all of which could prove beneficial to the construction and other indigenous industries in Northern Ireland. For those reasons we will support amendment No 2.

Mr Girvan: I speak in support of amendment No 2. In doing so, I want to refer, as my colleague did, to the article in today's 'News Letter' which calls for immediate support for other roads projects, namely the list of four. I appreciate the intervention about the motion including other schemes. However, the point is that, as has already been indicated, the four road schemes that are mentioned could not start until 2014-15, which is the next financial year. That is referred to in the article, if it is correct. If that is the case, why do they need immediate support, because support cannot be given to those schemes.

In light of that, if that were the case, what did the Department intend to spend on those schemes in the current financial year? Perhaps, the Minister could refer to that in his response. I would like to find out what the Department intended to spend out of its budget for the current financial year if it had not believed that it would have the windfall of £113 million for a project which, because of the courts, has not got the go-ahead. We know that, perhaps, there is more to it than that.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Member for giving way. Given the fact that some of the schemes that were referred to by Mrs Overend cannot go ahead until next year, I would have thought that it would be too late to start them in January, with only three months until the end of the financial year.

In fact, those schemes need to be ready to go right here and now.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

5.15 pm

Mr Girvan: I thank the Member for his intervention. That is exactly the point: we do not want to hand back money to the Exchequer next year because we were not able to make the spend.

I appreciate that it is somewhat late in the day to deal with the matter and that we have a very small window for going forward. Some Members mentioned that a lot of planning is needed for vesting and such areas. That has to be dealt with, but it takes time. Even projects that are under way took time, and I am thinking particularly of the A8 in my area. I read a newspaper report that said that Ballynure was to get a bypass in 1929, but work on that scheme only started lately, and there have been major concerns about it.

I am sure that most of us hear day and daily people's concerns about the upgrade and maintenance of existing infrastructure as opposed to the addition of new infrastructure. I know that the Department spends a sizeable amount of money paying out on claims for damaged wheels, tyres and suspensions because of the proliferation of potholes in our main roads and, in particular, our rural roads. That needs to be looked at, as it would benefit, in a major way, the whole of Northern Ireland, not just one region.

The fact that spend on roads creates employment has been mentioned. I genuinely believe that we have to look at what is going on with some of the schemes that have been appointed. The lead contractor might be from Northern Ireland, but few people from the local community are benefiting from working on the job. So, I wonder where that money is going. Is it going to other people who are, ultimately, taking it out of the country? Something needs to be done about that.

I really do not think that some of the schemes in the proposals can be delivered within that window of time. I appreciate that some of those have been mentioned for some time. However, it is one thing to have a desire or a wish list, but it is another to have something that is ready, capable and ready to deliver. We need to make spend on the ground today so that we do not lose money next year. I support amendment No 2.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I also support amendment No 2, which will mean that the spirit of the motion is that the A5 remains an Executive priority. The difficulty I have with the SDLP amendment — I support all the projects listed — is that the A32 between Omagh and Enniskillen, which I support as well, needs to be ready to go. As for the Enniskillen ring road, or the Enniskillen bypass as it is better known, much as I want that to be implemented so that people can drive across it this year, the reality is that it is — pardon the pun — miles down the road. It is not that my party or others have not been working to push that project forward. We have a cross-party group, which includes all the constituency MLAs and the MP, that comes together under the stewardship of Fermanagh District Council, and that is one of the key strategic projects in the county. Indeed, the Minister had a meeting in his office here with Minister

Foster, me and a number of other MLAs. However, the project is not shovel-ready. We can all write down a list of —

Mr Byrne: I thank Mr Lynch for giving way. Does the Member accept that the first amendment asks for the A5 to remain an Executive commitment and adds another condition by stating:

“until construction work begins on the A5”?

Surely those are the two ways best to protect the project.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lynch: I thank the Member for his intervention. I agree: the best way forward is that the project remains an Executive commitment. That is our position.

The fact remains that the money from the A5 needs to be spent within a short time frame, as Members across the way said. The Chair said that there was approximately £113 million that needed to be spent. The Minister said today — we should all read the Hansard report of what he said — that there are few shovel-ready schemes. We have this huge surplus of money, and the Executive need to consider other suitable capital projects, which may not necessarily mean road projects. That is the reality if those projects are not ready. The money needs to be spent in a manner, as amendment No 2 states, that:

“will improve our infrastructure, provide a much needed boost for the construction sector and be delivered within the available time frame.”

As my colleague said, we have met representatives from the construction industry. The delay in building this project is frustrating for us all — there is no doubt about that — particularly for people who were waiting to go on site. We know that there were a lot of workers — I have met some of the contractors — who were waiting to go on site for six months. I welcome the Minister's commitment, given to the Committee and the House today, to the A5 project.

We understand that there will be a small delay of maybe a year to 18 months on this project. I trust that the Minister will work as speedily as possible through the necessary assessment process as indicated by the judge. Hopefully, once it has been given the go-ahead following the resolution of any outstanding issues, the Executive will move immediately to push forward with what is essentially a project of huge economic benefit.

Mr Storey: I wish to place it on record that, as far as I am concerned, in the issue before the House, a priority for me as an MLA for North Antrim is to ensure that the A26 project that has been listed is progressed. If we had bottomless financial provision, all the other schemes either listed or in some other programme would also be provided, because we need to see continual progress being made for the benefit of our construction industry and for the benefit of our roads infrastructure.

Let us come to the reality of why we are here. In proposing the motion, the Member said that we needed to take the right decisions. The right decision has been made about the A26. The only thing is that it is taking a long road to get to its provision. It is regrettable that there seems to be an attempt on the part of the Ulster Unionist Party to make this a political issue. I am disappointed. The Member for North Antrim can shake his head, but the reality is that that is what this is about. I am disappointed that the Minister — someone who I work closely with; someone who I respect in the House — has allowed himself, both in today's 'News Letter' and in the motion, to politicise the issue of the provision of roads. That is the disappointment that I have. We all like to have our day in the sun, saying that we lobbied the Minister, we wrote to the Minister, we have asked for this road or that provision; that is what our job is about. That is our daily bread; it is why we are here. However, there comes a time when we as Members have to set aside, as best as we can, the politics of the issue and look at its merits. I am disappointed that, today, the Member who proposed the motion, on the one hand, tried to distance the UUP from previous decisions that led to the judicial announcement on the A5 and, on the other hand, the Minister being unable to take any decision on the listed projects without the hand of other Executive Ministers to progress those schemes.

I have a file that I did not bring with me today, but I brought some correspondence on the A26 in Ballymoney. The correspondence would probably stretch from the Glarryford junction to the Drones Road junction because it has been an ongoing issue for many years. Some of my colleagues in Ballymoney Borough Council have campaigned for many years. I declare an interest as a member of Ballymoney Borough Council. When I was first elected to the council, the issue was to the fore. In recent correspondence, what did the Department say? Let us look at what Máire Cairns from the Department said on the Minister's behalf:

"However, it is envisaged that the earliest this scheme could proceed would be 2015-16".

That was in May 2012.

Mr Spratt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: Yes. I hope that you do not take as long as Robin Newton.

Mr Spratt: I will be very brief. Does that not indicate that, when it comes to the £113 million that we are talking about, the scheme is not shovel-ready, despite the spin that the Ulster Unionist Party has put on it?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for that intervention, because it leads to the correspondence of 2 July 2012. It states:

"As intimated previously, the earliest timescale envisaged for proceeding with this scheme is likely to be 2015-16".

Let us move on to the correspondence of September 2012:

"As I explained in my previous correspondence, the earliest timescale envisaged for proceeding with the construction of this scheme is likely to be 2015-16".

This afternoon in the House, I hear the Minister saying in response to a Member that it was quite possible that the project could move into next year. Is the Minister seriously telling us that he is now in a position, without ambiguity or any reference to the Executive, the other decisions that have been made, the statutory rules, the process that he has to go through —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Storey: Will the Member tell my constituents clearly and plainly whether the scheme is happening? I want clarity before I leave the House and travel home —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Storey: — on the A26 to Ballymoney.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Beidh mé ag labhairt in éadan an ruín, in éadan an chéad leasaithe agus i bhfabhar an dara leasaithe. I speak against the motion and the first amendment and in favour of the second amendment.

The fact is that the A5 was and remains a critical part of the infrastructure on this island. It was one of the most major projects to be brought forward. Two of the three remaining sections of the vital connection between the first and fourth city on this island were included in the A5. The Chambers of Commerce along the infrastructure route — the western transport corridor — said that 30% of the trade from the north-west would use the A5. The A6 is equally important. It connects the second and fourth cities on this island. That also remains as an Executive commitment and is, indeed, included in the Programme for Government.

5.30 pm

I was very worried when I saw the motion because it seemed to be a reversal of policy on the A5. It specifically says "in place of the A5", and that seems to fly in the face of some of what the Minister has said to us over the past couple of years. Thankfully, the deputy First Minister has echoed the commitment to the A5 in recent times, and that has been reflected by a number of other parties across the island. There is a call for support for the Minister for Regional Development — he certainly would have my support for a number of issues if he were to bring them forward in a timely manner — but there has to be a prioritisation of schemes, as outlined in the most recent ISNI investing activity report.

I was also rather worried about amendment No 1. Essentially, it would allow a number of projects to leapfrog one another. We all have competing priorities, but there are those of us who know what the prioritisation of individual jobs should be. When the A5 was announced, the Member for Foyle, who is sitting to my left, called for the moneys to be redirected to the A6. I do not know whether the wording of amendment No 1, including:

"other road priorities in the west", is exactly what he meant by that.

I do not have any terrible issue with the other projects outlined in the motion and the amendment because a number of them would benefit my constituents. They include the upgrade of the A26 Frosses Road, which would take many travellers from the north of the constituency. I also have no issue with the A6 at Moneynick, the Castledawson/Randalstown connection. I sit there every morning of the week for anything between 20 and 40 minutes. The Magherafelt bypass would also speed up my travel time to Croke Park on the occasions when I can get tickets.

The A6 is also a very strong commitment, and I am disappointed that the SDLP amendment does not put that forward. As people know, Dungiven has been waiting for 43 years for a bypass. As a very fresh-faced seven-year-old —

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ó hOisín: No, I am nearly finished.

Mr Dallat: You know why you are not giving way.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Ó hOisín: I just want to make my point. As a fresh-faced seven-year-old in 1970, I attended a Dungiven bypass exhibition. Forty years later, I took my seven-year-old to a Dungiven bypass exhibition. The point is that the number of people who travel through Dungiven has gone up to somewhere in the region of 25,000, and that has created health issues. Other Members mentioned fatalities on major roads, but, in the Dungiven area, the amount of nitrous dioxide poured into the air is 10 times the level of elsewhere.

I want a number of the projects to be taken forward. There is a risk, and I think that the Chair of the Committee for Regional Development touched on it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Ó hOisín: The funds should be drawn down in a timely manner, and the questions about vesting, public inquiries and procurement should be addressed by the Minister.

Mr Dallat: It seems that hypocrisy know no bounds in this debate. We had Mervyn Storey — he is now absent from the Chamber; he uses it these days only to make announcements and then clear off — speaking for the A26, which, of course, I support, and we have just had Cathal Hasson making an emotional plea on behalf of the A6. Both will go on to support an amendment that is virtually a blank cheque for the Minister or, perhaps, the Executive, if everything that we hear is true. I can understand the DUP —

Mr Ó hOisín: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is my contention that Members should be known by the name by which they want to be known: I use the name Cathal Ó hOisín.

Mr Dallat: I apologise. I was not even aware that I had done that, but you get used to something for a lifetime, and it is sometimes hard to change.

I can understand this from the Chairman of the Regional Development Committee and his friends, but I do not understand the Sinn Féin men from the west. I really do not. They are backing an amendment from the DUP. History is important, and I think that we all appreciate it. The history of the A5 is that there was an acknowledgement after the Good Friday Agreement that there was a terrible weakness in the infrastructure in the west. That is the reason for it.

The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment keeps telling us, every time she comes here, that she cannot influence where inward investors go. However, we can, and it is by improving the infrastructure in the areas that lack jobs, which, of course, is the west. That is why our amendment —

Mr Spratt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dallat: Not at all. You have had more than your fair share.

That is why the SDLP amendment, accepted by the Ulster Unionists, seemed fair and logical: it recognises that that £113 million should be spent in the area for which it was hard-fought.

You see, this is not just about roads. It is not a wish list for what road goes where. It is about the concept of addressing things in the past that were wrong. For whatever reason — we will not go into the history of it — there is a serious infrastructure deficit. Included in that are roads such as the A6, a project that we fully support. I am on record as having supported the A6 week in and week out, from A to Z —

Mr McCartney: Where is that in the motion?

Mr Dallat: — the A32 and, of course, the A26. I am sure that the Member who is shouting out from a sedentary position will put his name down to speak and take his chance.

Mr McCartney: Where is the A6 in the motion?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Dallat: Sorry. I will tell you where the A6 goes. It goes to the city that you live in.

Mr McCartney: Where is it in the motion?

Mr Dallat: It is one of the few — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. We will have one Member speaking through the Chair at any one time.

Mr Dallat: Mr Deputy Speaker, I was sure that I was that Member, but obviously not.

I suspect that Belfast and Derry are the only two cities in Europe — they are the only ones that I am aware of — that are not connected by a motorway or at least a decent dual carriageway. Our amendment addresses that and deals with it.

Cathal Ó hOisín referred to Dungiven, of course. I was in Dungiven and heard the speeches from the previous Minister for Regional Development, Conor Murphy, and all the promises that were made. I heard Mr Spratt, I think it was, wanting to apportion blame to officials for the faux pas and the disappointment. However, I am sure that Mr Spratt would join me in saying that the buck stops with the Minister. The previous Minister was responsible when this package was put together. Let no one get away from that.

Look, I have said it before and I say it again: the west is seriously disadvantaged, not just in roads but in jobs. While people want to talk about tarmac, I want to talk about people. I want to address the serious issues that the Assembly was set up to address. President Obama told us yesterday about the long road to go, and when I see what is going on here today, which is this convenience between the DUP —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Dallat: — and Sinn Féin, and, of course, they are always dependent on the Alliance Party for support. I see that President Obama was absolutely right: we have a long road to go. Those men from the west need to reflect —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Dallat: — on what they are doing.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will the Member acknowledge that it is not only men from the west? As a female MLA from the west, I would like to be recognised as such, thank you.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr G Robinson: I will be brief. As a Member who represents East Londonderry, I realise that the A5 money needs to be put to constructive use by the Minister and the Executive. Rather than see the £113 million redirected to the Exchequer, I appreciate that there are many worthy causes in the form of water and sewerage projects and transport issues. Some of the schemes, as my colleagues said, are not shovel-ready, but two projects in my constituency are overdue. They are the Dungiven bypass, which poses great health and safety problems for the residents and motorists of that area, and the Gortcorbies climbing lane between Limavady and Coleraine, which needs urgent work.

The other roads priority is surely the A26, or Frosses Road, project, where so many fatalities have occurred over a long period of time. As a person who travels along that road quite often, I know that it is one of the most dangerous roads in Northern Ireland. I think that something needs to be done urgently.

I support amendment No 2.

Mr Allister: I support the motion. I think that it is balanced and realistic, because it does not just recite a wish list but very importantly says that the money that is available here and now should go to other road schemes so that it might not be wasted.

I start from the premise that if money is allocated for road schemes then, fundamentally, unless there is very good reason, it is road schemes that it should be spent upon. We arrive at the situation where the A5, a flawed scheme as demonstrated by the court ruling, is now something for which we are all paying a very considerable price.

What has struck me most about the debate is the base politics of it. The base politics lies in the DUP/Sinn Féin amendment; amendment No 2. It is quite clear that what is being played out here is a desire to siphon off roads money into projects —

Mr Flanagan: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I ask you to ask Mr Allister to correct his term. It is not a DUP/Sinn Féin amendment; it is a DUP amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is a DUP amendment. Mr Allister has the floor.

Mr Allister: We will see, when the vote comes, just whose amendment it is.

It is quite clear that what is afoot here is to rob the roads Minister of any opportunity to announce any new projects, lest he get any kudos for it, and to garner them to the DUP/Sinn Féin cabal so that, for example, the First Minister and deputy First Minister might have the vanity opportunity to announce a new capital project for something or other. Hence the desire to squeeze out of the roads budget capital money to spend in other Departments where political capital can be made out of those announcements. That is the basic truth of the matter. That is what lies behind amendment No 2. It is plain to anyone listening to the debate that that is what is afoot. I think that it would be a scandal if the money were whipped away from roads.

My real concern, and I would like the Minister to comment on this, is that an outcome of this is that we could see a double whammy to good, deserving projects, such as the A26. We could see the A5 money being taken away for some other vanity project. Maybe the DUP/Sinn Féin are going to spend it on their new pet project, the Maze, or some capital project such as that. Who knows? We could see the A26 losing out, because the money is taken for some non-roads capital project. Then the A5 will be resuscitated, and by the stage at which we should have been reaching the A26, it will be trumped by the A5, and those road projects that have faithfully been taking their place in the queue, like the A26, will be trumped. That is what I mean by a double whammy. They do not get the fallout now from the loss of the A5 — it is taken from them — and they do not get it later, when the A5 is reinstated, because they are then knocked out of the programme.

I listened with amazement to Mr Storey say that his priority was the A26 — such a priority that he is going to vote today to delist it from the motion; take it out of the spending priority that the motion would give it, and reduce it to something far less important than the other pet projects that the DUP has in mind.

Mr Swann: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Swann: I know that Mr Storey is not here, but Mr Frew is missing as well. He said in a debate on the A26 that:

"At no time have we ever not supported the upgrade of that road." — [Official Report, Bound Volume 64, p298, col 1].

Does that tie in with Mr Storey's attitude here today?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Allister: I think that Mr Storey's priorities are quite clear: it is, with the DUP, to corporately support whatever vanity capital projects would bring most glory to their Ministers. If that causes casualty to the A26, so be it.

5.45 pm

The whole A26 saga is very interesting. The Minister sent a paper to Executive colleagues. Today at Question Time he rather pointedly said that he trusted that other parties in the Executive will support the projects that he is putting forward, knowing that they are probably about to undermine him.

Other Ministers have had the opportunity to declare themselves on the projects that the Minister has identified. I would like to hear from the Minister, and from others, if they know the answer, whether the rumour is true that the Health Minister decreed in a response that the A26 and none of the other projects are of strategic importance. If that is right, that is a scandalous thing to say. We are talking about a road where more people die every year than on most roads. We are talking about a road that is crying out for improvement. Is it the case that a DUP Minister has dared to say that the A26 is not a strategic project and has no strategic importance? Is that what we are seeing playing out in amendment No 2?

Mr Girvan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Girvan: Was it not clear that the A26 is programmed to be done in 2015-16? Why can it not be done until then? Are there reasons behind the delay until that point?

Mr Allister: As the Minister said during Question Time, it could now be done in the latter part of next year — 2014-15 — but the point I made earlier is that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: — if, by 2015-16, the A5 is back on track —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: — it will be taking all the roads money, and the A26 will suffer yet again.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member's time is up.

Mr Agnew: The plain fact is that the A5 has been a disastrous project from start to finish. It was a politically driven project, and when the Republic of Ireland pulled out of the programme, I think that was the time for the Assembly to reflect and to change course. Some £58 million has been wasted on the project to date, and, although the Minister pointed out to me how much of that was spent under a previous Minister, it has been an Executive project, and each of the parties on the Executive must take responsibility for their part in pushing it forward.

There were a huge number of objections to the project. I commend the Alternative A5 Alliance campaign to get the road stopped. Over the weekend, some have questioned what role people power and protest have to play. This is a clear example of people taking on the Executive to say that they do not want something. They have done so legally and have challenged it through the courts. It is another example to the Executive and the Assembly of the fact that you cannot simply ignore environmental regulation. It may come from the EU, and some in the House may not like it, but you cannot simply bulldoze through environmental regulation just because you do not like it. It has to be complied with, and that is something that the Executive and Assembly need to learn.

We now have an opportunity to reflect, change course and reallocate £113 million. The lack of imagination in the House is astounding, because all we can think of is what other road projects we can invest the money in. That really concerns me, especially when I look at the balance of spending between roads and public transport. We see year-on-year increases in the millions of pounds that we spend on roads, yet, since 2006, we have seen a real-terms decrease in how much we spend on public transport. Is that because our public transport system is so great? Is it because it is one of the finest in Europe? I do not think so. I think it is because we undervalue it and underinvest in it. We have the opportunity to change that.

Some may question whether there are shovel-ready projects in public transport. There are other capital projects that have been alluded to that may be ready. I certainly know of a school, St Columbanus' College in my constituency, that was ready to go ahead with a newbuild until capital funding was cut. There may be projects like that in which we can invest in the short term, with a guarantee that the money comes back to the Minister's Department to be spent on public transport in future rounds.

I have lost count of how many motions I have spoken on and how many questions there have been on fuel poverty. Everybody talks about it and likes to tell stories of their constituency where they know someone who is living in fuel poverty. But what have the Assembly and the Executive done about fuel poverty? They continue to allow energy-inefficient homes to be built and they continue to subsidise the fossil fuel industry and prioritise private car transport over public transport.

We need to change course and we need to change that imbalance in spending. I will leave this Chamber today and drive back to my home in Bangor, simply because this Executive and this Assembly have, over the years, failed to provide a public transport system that would allow me to travel to and from work —

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Certainly I will give way.

Mr Dallat: I just picked up on the fact that the Member is driving back to Bangor. Does he agree that we have a world-class railway operating between Belfast and Bangor which is the envy of west Belfast and, indeed, the rest of the country?

Mr Deputy Speaker: We are almost out of time for this debate, so there is no additional time on this occasion.

Mr Agnew: OK. Very briefly, to Mr Dallat, I use that railway regularly and it is an excellent service. It does not have a stop in Bangor, and I certainly do not have a public transport option to get to it. That is my point: I am 10 miles away from my home and I do not have a public transport option. I am between one large town and another. That should not be beyond the Executive and the Assembly, and until we address the imbalance in our spending on public transport it is a problem that will continue.

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): Mr Deputy Speaker, I would be grateful if you could indicate just how long I am allowed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Fifteen minutes.

Mr Kennedy: It was quite a lengthy debate, and an interesting one, which I obviously welcome. I particularly want to put on record what the current situation is, what the background has been and what my hope is, as roads Minister, for the future.

It would be helpful to confirm the current position of the A5 dual carriageway scheme. Since Mr Justice Stephens's ruling in May, it has been the subject of much comment, and also much misinformation. The proposal to upgrade the A5 to a dual carriageway was originally a joint commitment, which was to be carried forward as a result of the St Andrews Agreement by the British and Irish Governments. Following the Irish Government's public position of deferral of the majority of their funding commitment, the Executive announced a £330 million funding package to bring forward elements of the A5 carriageway project between Londonderry and Strabane, and Ballygawley and Omagh.

As an Executive commitment, it will require Executive approval to restructure the funding of the project and to deploy resources to other procurement-ready schemes. Schemes are unable to move beyond the procurement-ready position until a commitment to fund a scheme has been made. That is a crucial point which I hope Members will take time to appreciate.

Mr Justice Stephens's ruling quashed all the statutory orders for the proposed A5 dual carriageway, effectively bringing the process back to where a public inquiry has been carried out and the inspector's report has been received. It has been well documented that the judge dismissed 11 of the 12 grounds of challenge, but held that there was a need to carry out an appropriate assessment under the habitats directive. It is also well documented that the decision at the beginning of 2011 to dispense with the appropriate assessment and proceed on the basis of a screening exercise took place under my predecessor's tenure. Those are the facts.

In reaching his judgement, the judge gave greater prominence to the evidence of the Loughs Agency, as provided to the public inquiry, as opposed to the expressed support of the Northern Ireland Environment Agency for the screening advice that was provided by DRD's appointed environmental consultants. I have asked for a report to be prepared to address, among other things, the impacts on the special areas of conservation and proposed mitigation. That report will be consulted on publicly, and the findings of the exercise will allow me to undertake an appropriate assessment. The appropriate assessment process has commenced, and I expect to receive the report within the next two months.

I have also asked for a third-party review of the project consultant's work in respect of the entire appropriate assessment process. That review will include the scope of the report to inform the appropriate assessment, as well as an overview of the environmental statement. Public consultation on the report, to inform the appropriate assessment process, is expected to commence in late summer 2013. Providing that hurdle is navigated, and if issues subsequently emerge from either the public consultation and/or the review that require a public inquiry, my completion of an appropriate assessment will take in the region of a further 12 months. Additional time would be required to arrange and hold a public inquiry and await and consider the inspector's report. All of that could take us to the end of the financial year 2014-15, when issues such as nesting birds and associated environmental issues may further delay a scheme. Clearly, if a further legal challenge were to emerge at any point, that too would impact on timescales.

I paint this scenario chronologically to assist in quantifying the delay. Of course, I bear in mind that I do not, and should not, at any stage prejudge the outcome of the appropriate assessment. The judge's ruling was very clear on that point. As a result of the court ruling, the ownership of the land was returned to the original landowners from 15 April 2013. Departmental officials wrote to landowners on 23 April, updating them on that situation.

Naturally, the Department recognises that some works already completed need to be reversed and has instructed its contractors to carry out such works at the request of landowners. Landowners are free to arrange for works to be carried out privately. In such circumstances, appropriate payments will be made, provided all works are agreed in advance with the Department. Many landowners have opted to carry out some or all of the reinstatement works themselves. Compensation for those works will be paid based on DARD rates. Copies of those rates have been sent to the relevant landowners and their agents.

Meetings have been held with the vast majority of affected landowners, and the scope of works has been agreed. Works to be completed by the Department's contractor have already started on site and will be completed within the next few months.

Officials wrote further to those landowners who have already received 90% compensation payments on 7 May 2013, giving them the option to either sell property by agreement or return the money and revert to the position prior to the land being vested. On the issue of the 10% top-up — and I met the Ulster Farmers' Union on that issue — I wish to make it clear that I support the GB system being extended to Northern Ireland. I have pursued that issue with Executive colleagues, and I will continue to do so.

Following the recent ruling on this scheme, I wrote to the Finance Minister on 9 May 2013 to declare a reduced budget requirement for 2013-14. It is essential that we redeploy that reduced requirement quickly to provide support to the construction sector and the local economy at this most difficult time.

I consider, as roads Minister, expenditure on roads to be a specific example of an activity that improves vital infrastructure and facilitates economic growth and, at the same time, provides much-needed local employment.

Looking forward, there may well be, given possible chronologies, knock-on implications for 2014-15. Therefore, a number of weeks ago, I provided an options paper to the Finance Minister and Executive Ministers for other major road schemes that could commence ahead of the A5 in that year. I await Executive consideration of the issue. Meanwhile, my officials are further exploring and making ready those options, given the potential timelines and risks associated with progressing the A5.

*(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker
[Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)*

Those projects include the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dual carriageway, the A31 Magherafelt bypass, the A26 Drones Road dual carriageway and the A55 Knock Road widening in Belfast. As Members have said, the A6 is an important east-west link and is essential to improving travel between Northern Ireland's two primary cities. The 14 km stretch between Randalstown and Castledawson presents a significant bottleneck, particularly during peak times. The proposed dual carriageway would reduce journey times and would be fundamental to business and trade, particularly for the west of the Province, by providing increased accessibility to the International Airport and to the gateways located along the eastern seaboard corridor.

The proposed dual carriageway on the A26 between Glarryford and Drones Road was examined by public inquiry last year. I want Members to listen up: subject to the outcome of the public inquiry, it could be possible to commence construction in mid- to late-2014.

The A26 is an important link road to north Antrim and the north coast tourist resorts. The project is also fundamental to business and trade in that area and provides increased accessibility to the International Airport and to the gateways located along the eastern seaboard corridor. The A26 has been the subject of much comment today, but it is worth restating that, generally, vesting will not take place until the budget for a particular scheme is in place. As budgets are not yet in place for the four schemes, the vesting orders have not been made. The direction order has been made, and the environmental statement has been published for the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson, the Magherafelt bypass and for Knock Road. I anticipate being in a position to issue a departmental statement on the A26 this autumn following consideration of the inspector's report from the public inquiry. If everything were to proceed positively — read my lips — construction could commence, as I said, in autumn 2014. However, it is important not to prejudge the inspector's report, which is with the Department for consideration.

It has been mentioned today that the proposed Magherafelt bypass has been waiting over 40 years. Everything is waiting 40 years. I have been in position for two years. The bypass extends from the A31 Moneymore Road at its junction from Coolshinney Road in the south to the A6 Castledawson roundabout in the north. By providing a direct link to the A6 north-western key transport corridor, the mid-Ulster region will benefit from increased accessibility to the International Airport and to the global gateways along the eastern seaboard corridor. That is fundamental to their business and trade.

I was interested in Mr Newton's support — I think — for the Knock Road project, because it, again, is 40 years old. I, too, am well aware of the concerns of local residents, who have important views to be taken into consideration. That is why the road-building exercise can be long and sometimes torturous. The Knock Road carries 45,000 vehicles a day, and the proposed improvement would upgrade Belfast's outer ring and fill in the missing link in the only section of that route without two full lanes in each direction.

The SDLP amendment mentions the A32 between Enniskillen and Omagh, and other schemes, but those schemes are at a much earlier stage than the four I highlighted previously, and I am not in a position to bring those to construction either this year or next year.

I will quickly run through some of the contributions from Members. It has been an interesting debate, and I am glad that it has taken place. I hope that Members will look at my comments on the record because, as roads Minister, it is my role and responsibility — I make no apology for it — to bring forward road schemes that will improve the overall infrastructure of Northern Ireland. That is a fundamental requirement of my role as Minister for Regional Development, and I will not shirk from that responsibility. I want to make that absolutely clear.

My difficulty with the second amendment is that, while it highlights the merits of a much needed boost to the construction sector, it does not say the "road construction sector". I have a slight nervousness about that. As roads Minister, I want to put forward road schemes that will improve the overall infrastructure because, in turn, that will improve the economy.

Sandra Overend referred to the positive effect of roads schemes on the economy and mentioned the Magherafelt bypass. I would have been surprised and disappointed if she had not. Joe Byrne listed nearly every road in the country and wanted it all done, and that is fine, too.

However, I at least welcome support in the overall context of the matter.

I think that Mr Spratt —

Mr Elliott: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Kennedy: I have to make progress, unfortunately.

If I move to Mr Spratt's contribution, I should say that I think that nobody wants to give money back. As a member of the Executive, I do not want to give money back to the Treasury in London. That is because, in my view, that money has been earmarked for road schemes, so I believe passionately that it should be spent on road schemes. The difficulty in the past has been that all the eggs were in one basket. However, in its own way, the motion seeks to redistribute the eggs into different baskets so that the schemes can be brought forward for the positive benefit of everyone across Northern Ireland.

The question was asked about my priorities. My priorities are clear. They are to progress strategically important projects at the earliest opportunity. I am saying clearly that I am not wedded to any single project. As roads Minister, I cannot be. My commitment is to take the right decisions for the economy and for the infrastructure, and I ask other Executive Ministers, as well as other Members of the House, to support me in so doing. I am not playing games, and I am not interested in playing games. I commend all these projects to the Assembly.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Ian McCrea to make a winding-up speech on amendment No 2.

Mr I McCrea: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. First of all, I thank those Members who spoke in support of our amendment, as well as others who contributed to the debate. I want to put on record my appreciation to the Minister for coming along and for outlining his position. Mind you, Minister, we read it in the paper this morning before you came, but it is nonetheless helpful that you came along to hear the issues that Members raised.

Given that those who were in the Chamber heard what everyone said, I do not intend to regurgitate what other Members said. However, I want to follow on from what my colleague Mervyn Storey said by discussing projects that are in my constituency. Although the Minister said that that money was allocated for roads projects, I believe that it is important to say that it was allocated for a road project. I want to see the money spent on roads as best possible, but like every other Member, I have a wish list for my own constituency, whether for roads or schools or any other building. So, I think that it is important that we focus on projects that can be completed in the time in which this money is available.

The Minister will know that, like his party colleague and my constituency colleague Sandra Overend, I have never missed an opportunity to highlight the need for a Magherafelt bypass. He referred to the project being over 40 years old. I can recall 37 of those years but not the additional ones. Nonetheless, a scheme for a much-needed bypass has been on the agenda for as long as I have had birthdays.

Mrs Overend: Will the Member give way?

Mr I McCrea: Quickly.

Mrs Overend: Would the Member not therefore be minded to support the Ulster Unionist motion, which specifically calls on the Minister to support the Magherafelt bypass?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr I McCrea: Thank you. The Member will know, as I already stated, that I will support amendment No 2, which is in my name and in those of some of my colleagues. I think that in response to the debate, the Minister said that he could not specifically detail which projects he could go forward with. So, I do not believe that it is best for us to restrict the Minister about which projects should happen and which should not. As I said, I think that there are other roads projects to consider, and I have no doubt that the Minister will have others that people will bring to him. So, I do not think that it is a positive thing to restrict the Minister's hands if this money is to be spent specifically on roads projects.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr I McCrea: Quickly.

Mr Dickson: I will follow on from the Member's point. Does he share my disappointment at the Minister twice stating very firmly that he is the roads Minister? Surely he is a lot more than the roads Minister. He is the Minister for public transport, and he is the water Minister. He is the Minister for Regional Development. Therefore, the budget needs to spread and shared.

Mr I McCrea: I am sure that the Minister, like everyone else in the House, knows that he is the Minister for Regional Development and has all those portfolios to look after. I wish him well in doing all that.

I commend the members of Magherafelt District Council, including the Minister's colleague George Shiels, who has been very vociferous in promoting the Magherafelt bypass with the Minister. Indeed, I commend my colleague Councillor Paul McLean, who was the chairman of the council. I have taken every opportunity that I can to lobby the Finance Minister and, indeed, the First Minister on that project. The Minister knows that I have done the same with him.

So, I do not apologise for supporting the Magherafelt bypass, but it is important that, as we move forward, we move the projects away from being procurement-ready to being shovel-ready. I do not like the phrase, but it is important that, instead of putting a list before the House today, we are honest with people about the projects that are ready to go and the money that will be available to spend on these projects to ensure that, for the people of Magherafelt, the bypass is delivered. I ask the Minister to ensure that, in the case of the Magherafelt bypass, whatever needs to be done is done as soon as possible to ensure that, if this happens to be one of the projects to go forward, it can be delivered as quickly as possible.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. The A5 project is possibly the most important infrastructure project in the North and remains a major priority for the SDLP. However, as this money is now in real danger of going back to the Treasury, we believe that it should be spent on the named roads to ensure that there is a direct benefit to the roads construction industry and to the west in particular. Over the years, the north-west has continually been ignored for infrastructure and investment.

The A5 project is more than just a road. It is a vital driver that will be used to address the economic and social deprivation facing the western area. It will create links with the Republic that will open up opportunities and revitalise a long-neglected area. It is not, as Mr Agnew believes, politically driven.

Some Members expressed concern that the named schemes are not ready, and we want to test whether procurement earmarking can be advanced any more quickly than DRD is saying. A similar line was taken by DRD under its previous Minister, Conor Murphy, on the planned delay on the Derry-Coleraine railway line. However, although that decision emerged under, and was enunciated by, his predecessor, the current Minister and his Department were subsequently able to find and accept that some of us were right in suggesting that some of the planned work could be re-profiled and expedited.

Although we can see that money in this cycle will not now be used for the A5, we must still be vigilant and determined to guarantee the earmarking of moneys brought forward for the A5 scheme once all the procedural and technical details are worked through. To this effect, I welcome the deputy First Minister's comments last month that the Executive are committed to advancing the A5, although I now have to question the value of those words, given the subsequent commitment that he gave to a cross-sectoral and cross-party deputation from the west that this money will now remain in the west. Indeed, he intimated that it would be for the A6 in particular.

We welcome the assurance from the Minister that he is committed to keeping the money in roads, and today we ask that he remains committed to putting that money towards roads in the west. We want the money to be used for the same aims but on different roads, now that it has transpired that spending on the A5 in this round is not possible.

6.15 pm

Under the previous Regional Development Minister, the Derry-Belfast road improvement was de-prioritised. We name that road in our amendment, so that should assuage Mr Ó hOisín's concerns. Not only will the improvement of the A6 improve the quality of life for the thousands who commute to Belfast, it will make Derry more attractive to investors and more accessible to tourists.

To those content to describe us from the north-west as "whingers", I say this: give us less to whinge about. To paraphrase Woody Allen, just because we are paranoid does not mean that people are not out to get us.

That is the whinge over; now for the wind. Sandra Overend moved the motion and spoke of the difficulties encountered by the A5 scheme. She said that this cloud creates a silver lining, and it is important that we grab that and use it wisely.

Joe Byrne spoke of the road projects identified and highlighted the need to progress each one in order to benefit not just their respective area but the region as a whole.

Mr Spratt worried that the Minister was putting all his eggs in different, smaller baskets, but I contend that you cannot make an omelette without breaking eggs, and the road construction industry is starving.

Mr McAleer spoke of the contribution of road improvements to increased road safety, but he proceeded to oppose a motion that calls for roads to be improved, which is bizarre. His party colleague Seán Lynch opposed our amendment because it de-prioritised the A5, yet, following an intervention from my colleague, accepted that it protected the A5 as a priority.

Mr Storey lamented the politicisation of road provision and then launched a political broadside against the Minister.

We believe that the DUP amendment, and Sinn Féin's support for it, conjure up the image of carrion crows picking over the bones of the A5 scheme to see what they can scavenge for their respective Departments.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member please draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Durkan: One really has to wonder what their positions would be, or how they would differ, if either party had the DRD portfolio.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for his earlier response.

On 14 June 2011, two years and four days ago, I made my maiden speech in the House, believe it or not. The motion was tabled by Mr Mervyn Storey, and its subject was the upgrade of the A26 and how it was a priority that needed to be brought forward. How things have twisted and changed since then. There have been rather unexpected contributions in today's debate, and they will be noted in constituencies such as mine, where we have been working really hard to raise the profile of the A26 project and have it developed to the stage of being procurement-ready. My party colleague the Minister has the great A26 scheme at that procurement-ready point where work could commence next year. He did say that, Mr Storey. You asked for clarification, and the Minister gave the date of autumn 2014 as clarification.

As Mr Dallat pointed out, Mr Storey supported the A26 scheme in his contribution; Mr McCrea supported the A6 in his; and Mr Ó hOisín supported him. Gentlemen, just throw off the shackles of your party for once and support the motion. Look at the amendment tabled in the name of the DUP, which we have heard will be supported by Sinn Féin and the Alliance — the triumvirate that we are used to seeing in this place when one of them gets into difficulty. That is also the case when a Minister gets into difficulty. If the Minister belongs to any other party, they say that he should resign, but, as Mr Spratt pointed out earlier, it is the officials who are to blame if a Sinn Féin or DUP Minister is at fault.

The A26, as Mr Allister pointed out —

Mr Girvan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: No. I am making progress. [Interruption.] The A26 is high on the list of the most dangerous roads — [Interruption.] Sorry, but there is no point in shouting from a seated position, Mr Storey. You left the —

Mr Storey: Will you take an intervention?

Mr Swann: No. I will not. I will not take an intervention from someone who left the Chamber during the debate. If anyone else does that during any other debate, you lambaste them and name them in the Chamber, so I will not give way. [Interruption.]

Mr Storey: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. May I just clarify that I left the Chamber to give a pre-arranged interview to UTV, so I was not running away from Mr Allister, Mr Dallat or anyone else.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member may resume.

Mr Swann: Thank you very much, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. In his contribution, Mr Storey mentioned his time in the sun. I think that he has had another opportunity to top up his tan.

A number of other factors come into play when a region is trying to attract foreign direct investment along with taxation powers and prospective employee skills, and infrastructure is one.

Mr Spratt: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Is it not wrong for a Member to make scurrilous remarks about another Member in the House that are totally out of context and totally out of order? Will you examine the remarks that Mr Swann has just made and refer them to the Speaker?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We will, of course, study Hansard. It is wrong for Members to make scurrilous remarks. I remind the House about the Speaker's rules, which have been laid down very clearly, about good temper and moderation in the presentation of arguments. Mr Swann may resume.

Mr Swann: Thank you very much, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I am happy to take direction from the Speaker. As you know, I have done so in the past.

There is little point in us lowering corporation tax in our region if our young people do not have the right skills for the employers that we seek to attract. In the same way, lowering tax or development skills will not go the distance in attracting investment if we do not have a competitive and sound transport infrastructure in place. It goes without saying that people in North Antrim and, indeed, East Londonderry expect their local representatives to back absolutely the schemes that matter most to their constituency, namely the A26: no ifs, no buts and no maybes. Not only do they expect but they are entitled to that full, unequivocal support, and that will be evident later today. People know that the A26 could be easily slotted in ahead of the A5 scheme, given its current predicament, only that was of Sinn Féin's own making under its man, Conor Murphy. Many other schemes could also be slotted in ahead of the A5, and we have heard a number of them talked about today. Every Member had the chance. Mr Dickson referred to the pork-belly list that we brought forward, but every Member who spoke in the House added his or her own scheme to that pork-belly list.

Importantly, the schemes that were listed are all procurement-ready and on the starting blocks waiting for the green light for funding. The issue here for debate is all about funding: future funding and making the best use of existing funds. Nevertheless, the Finance Minister, to whom the motion was tabled, passed it to DRD, and the DUP accused us of playing party politics to avoid backing the motion, a motion that is of sound common sense. That is why the DUP tabled its amendment, an amendment that is vague and non-specific.

From an Ulster Unionist point of view, there is no place for party politics when it comes to jobs and the economy. For us, it always has been and always will be about doing the right thing and doing what is right for Northern Ireland. It is simple: at this time, we need to do all that we can to support the road construction industry. Among our other knowledgeable bodies, the Confederation of British Industry backs our judgement on this one. As my party colleague Sandra Overend pointed out, so does Boris Johnson, and he gets the odd thing right too, and it is not just his sound judgement when it comes to sourcing great buses from Wrightbus in Ballymena.

We believe in taking a long-term approach, an approach that will make the best decisions now and for our future generations, handing on to them a positive infrastructure legacy. It is right to say that the decisions made today will impact on business competitiveness and the standard of living of our young people for many years to come — the sort of talented people that we saw yesterday enthused by President Obama. On the subject of American presidents, let me offer you a reminder of one of Bill Clinton's more memorable sound bites during the 1992 presidential election, when he said, "It's the economy, stupid." Let me rework that for today's debate: let us not be stupid about the economy.

In conclusion, let us make it clear that we expect the Executive to make the right decision on the capital available from the A5 both this year and next. Let us make it clear that it should be a decision that best supports our hard-pressed construction industry. It is true to say that if government spends the money wisely and thinks of the big picture, the benefits can be enjoyed by many for years to come.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I put the Question on amendment No 1, I remind Members that if it is made, I will not put the Question on amendment No 2, as that amendment will have been overtaken by the decision on amendment No 1.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will Members who are not staying for the Adjournment debate depart quietly and in good order?

Motion made:

*That the Assembly do now adjourn. —
[Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.]*

Adjournment

Schools: Dickson Plan, Craigavon

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The proposer of the Adjournment topic will have 15 minutes. The Minister will have approximately 10 minutes to respond. All other Members who wish to speak will have approximately five minutes.

Mr Moutray: I appreciate the debate being taken this evening. This issue is close to my heart and has exercised me greatly. In the Craigavon and Tandragee area, party colleagues and I have been experiencing an unprecedented lobby to retain the Dickson plan form of education. I speak today safe in the knowledge that it is the will of the overwhelming majority of my electorate.

Some Members may be less familiar with this unique education system. The Dickson plan system is a form of education that is unique to Craigavon and Tandragee and has served both areas well for decades. The aim of the debate today is to raise awareness of the imminent threat to Dickson and to ultimately ensure that it is preserved for many years to come.

The Dickson plan is a two-tier system in which the majority of pupils in the Craigavon Borough Council area and parts of the Armagh city council area attend junior high schools for three years before transferring to Lurgan or Portadown senior high schools or Lurgan or Portadown colleges to complete their compulsory education at Key Stage 4. It allows for an academic selection process at age 14, as opposed to 11, with pupils taking internal exams that are set by individual grammar schools and entering a grammar or senior high school at age 14.

Many people in the area have availed themselves of and benefited significantly from being part of the two-tier system, and they are now making exceptional contributions and differences to society. I went through the system in the second year of its existence, and, in more recent years, my three children have benefited from the Dickson plan. Dickson has served the area well. Analysis shows that it has provided higher than average examination results year on year, which substantiates our argument about the tangible benefits that such a system has provided for the many thousands who have participated in it.

All is not well, however. Unfortunately, it would appear that there is a concerted effort on the board's part to decimate the system that has consistently served the community well. In recent days, we have witnessed efforts by the Southern Education and Library Board (SELB) to, for the want of a better word, cobble together a fudged consultation that has no sound evidence and is in fact blatantly outlining its preferred option. We are all long enough in the tooth to know that there is no way an options appraisal or consultation should be loaded towards one option, especially if the two options included have been deemed viable by the board. However, I will elaborate on this later in the debate.

The benefits of Dickson are clear. Academic selection is delayed from taking place at age 11 and instead takes place at the age of 14. At the age of 11, children transfer to one of the local junior high schools, and then, at the age of 14, they move to one of the two local controlled grammar schools — the highly successful Lurgan College or Portadown College — or to attend Craigavon Senior High School, which is outstanding in its educational achievements, particularly its focus on vocational courses. It provides a unique educational experience that seeks to ensure that children's individual educational requirements are met, whether they be academically or vocationally challenged. The Dickson plan also strives to ensure that children's full potential in education can be met, so that they can not only flourish as pupils but go out into further and higher education and the world of work and make a significant contribution. That has even been realised by the chief executive of the SELB, who would appear to agree with me on the success of the two-tier system. Recently, he wrote in a letter addressed to parents:

"Your options are unique because the school your child attends at present is part of the Craigavon Two Tier System. This system is highly effective with all schools producing good examination results and each school providing pupil-centred pastoral care and promoting home-school relationships to support pupils."

The local community in Craigavon wishes that highly successful system to be retained. That was proven on no fewer than two occasions recently. In the first instance, an initial public consultation on post-primary provision in the Craigavon area carried out by the Southern Education and Library Board (SELB) revealed that some 83% were in favour of retaining the system as is and addressing the estate issue that has plagued the Lurgan campus of Craigavon Senior High School for many years. Eight per cent of respondents to the SELB consultation supported the eventual creation of a comprehensive system in the post-primary sector through the introduction of a collegiate structure. Eight per cent versus 83% speaks volumes.

The SELB, however, has recently displayed an attitude of utter contempt and disregard for the opinions expressed by local people. It has chosen to ignore the overwhelming majority and has recently formulated a further consultation that endeavours to force a bilateral system on the people of Craigavon and Tandragee. In doing so, it has released to the post-primary schools in the area a further consultation that details two options for the future of post-primary education. Only one of those options — option B — will ensure the continuation of the highly successful system that we have. The other option — option A — seeks to force a system of comprehensive education on a community that does not want it. Option B is the only option that will retain distinctive grammar school provision, providing equality and parity with other areas. It will also address the estate issue that the senior high school campus in Lurgan has been subjected to.

Option A would mean a loss to the area of the Lurgan and Portadown colleges, which would undoubtedly lead to the migration of many families out of the Craigavon area to avail themselves of educational establishments in other areas that have grammar school status. A migration of children and young people would have a devastating effect on our local economy and would be disastrous for business and trading in the borough of Craigavon. Indeed,

I would go as far as to say that people will relocate from the Craigavon area, stripping the highly populated area of Craigavon of young and vibrant families who are best placed to contribute to the economic recovery of the area if they are nurtured and educated and later return to work in the area. Local services would, no doubt, be affected by such a loss.

Option B is the only option that will retain Craigavon Senior High School. Indeed, it proposes the creation of a single 14- to 19-year-old campus of Craigavon Senior High School. That would ensure increased accommodation and curricular provision, and it would enable the school to build on its already long-established high-quality education provision that is focused on vocational subjects. The creation of a 14- to 19-year-old campus would also grant further financial viability, as the management of a single campus for four instead of two year groups, as outlined in option B, would guarantee the long-term sustainability and viability of Craigavon Senior High School.

Although option A claims to retain the Dickson plan system, the community has not been fooled. Indeed, I believe that the SELB has blatantly misled in the consultation, owing to the fact that option A would lead to a single all-ability comprehensive school being forced on the people of Lurgan, Portadown and Tandragee. Young people would all be forced into one institution on the basis of a one-size-fits-all approach. That will not and cannot meet the individual educational needs of the young people of the Craigavon area. Ultimately, young people who need support for their educational needs would not receive the level of tailored assistance that they currently enjoy in the senior high school. Those who need to be stretched and academically challenged would not be able to enjoy that in settings such as the Lurgan and Portadown colleges. Both have a rich history and are famous for their ability to nurture and grow young people's knowledge base. Some of our young people are more academically gifted, and some are more vocationally gifted. That is how the world works. However, forcing all young people into one comprehensive school would lead to their individual skills being ignored. As such, their educational development would be stunted.

The Democratic Unionist Party MP, MLAs and councillors have listened to the people. We have taken to the doors and consulted with the public. We are unequivocal in our support for option B in the most recent consultation. Option B is the only option to retain the Dickson plan as is and provide a newbuild for a senior high school through an amalgamation of Lurgan College and Portadown College. Option A is a smokescreen and an attempt to lure people into a false sense of security. It claims to retain the Dickson plan, but it in no way does that.

The debate is particularly timely as the SELB advisory subcommittee will meet tomorrow morning. I trust that it will not be led by officials but will make the right decision, not only for present generations but for future generations. Parties in the Chamber have members on that Committee, and I hope that they will use their influence on this vital issue tomorrow.

In closing, I want to quote from the famous C. S. Lewis, whose father, incidentally, attended Lurgan College. He wrote:

"The task of the modern educator is not to cut down jungles but to irrigate deserts."

Many deserts have been irrigated, and many pupils have reached their full potential through the Dickson two-tier system. Minister, I urge you not to axe a system that has widespread support and is so precious to the community that it has served so well.

Mrs D Kelly: I have four children, three of whom went through the junior high and senior high system under the Dickson plan. My other child attended Lismore Comprehensive School, which I think is the Minister's alma mater. I have to say that both systems served my children well. The important thing was that they and their parents had a choice, which is critical.

A number of interesting things are happening in the Upper Bann area, particularly in Craigavon. As the Minister and others in the Chamber will know, there is a great emphasis on providing opportunities for shared education. There is also an area learning plan in the Craigavon area.

Research published some time ago suggested that the Dickson plan and streaming at age 14 was a system that served young people's needs much better because they were better informed and more mature, and it is hard to argue against that. There are also, of course, a number of young people from the Craigavon area who vote with their feet. I am not sure how many are involved — I am sure that the Minister can give us the figures — but something like up to 200 young people from Upper Bann travel to grammar schools outside their immediate location at age 11.

We must urgently get some certainty in our education system and schools and ensure that parents' choice comes first. However, more importantly, we must ensure that each child has access to a good education — the type of education that meets their specific needs and ability to learn. Although many of the schools in Craigavon are rightly recognised for their high academic achievement, over 20% of young people still do not achieve the basic grades at GCSE and A level. So there is something fundamentally skewed in the provision of education in the area.

The SDLP opposes academic selection at age 11 for very good reasons, and I am sure that the Minister will again articulate some of the research that backs up that position. However, other reports have been commissioned — I am grateful to the Assembly's Research and Information Service and the Education Committee's research for providing analysis on these matters over the past few years — and, as far as some of their authors were concerned, the jury was out on the Dickson plan.

Children have to get used to disappointment. We cannot all be stars, and we cannot all be A*s. I know that, at age 14, a cohort of maybe 80-plus will get into the senior high school system, and others will go into another system. Some children are rightly very disappointed. I know that a number of parents pay for extra tuition fees for their children, even at the age of 14. That is not available to all parents, and many may make sacrifices for that. However, it is also about whether parents have the economic ability to contribute to such tuition classes.

Some of the reports related that the collaboration that ought to work across the educational sector could be improved on to improve the outcomes of the Dickson plan. I hope that those involved in the Craigavon area learning plan will take it forward.

I am very concerned about the future of Drumcree College, and I am sure that the Minister shares my concerns. Its numbers have dropped drastically to 200, yet Lismore Comprehensive School has either 1,160 or 1,260 pupils. Drumcree College is the only post-primary Catholic maintained school in the Portadown area. I am not too sure whether the Minister can shed any light on the matter, but one of the facts that I ascertained is that Drumcree College is not included in the Craigavon area learning community. Therefore, it does not have the same access to some of the potential shared education as Lurgan College, St Michael's Grammar School and other schools in the district.

Therefore, the Dickson plan —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring her remarks to a close, please?

Mrs D Kelly: — provides the ability to choose subjects and career pathways at age 14, which is a much better age at which to do that. We should not throw the baby out with the bath water. We must have a system in place —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mrs D Kelly: — that has the confidence of all.

Mrs Dobson: I welcome the Adjournment debate and thank Mr Moutray for tabling the topic. My views on the current Dickson plan structure are clear to all Members present, and I believe that they are shared by the vast majority of pupils, parents, teachers and the public in the catchment area. From the outset, I put on record my deep admiration for the dedicated service and leadership of all principals and staff, past and present, of controlled primary and post-primary schools in the catchment area.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Does she agree with me that there is huge public support for the retention of the Dickson plan system in the area that it serves, including parts of my Newry and Armagh constituency, and that it continues to produce top-quality education for pupils and students in that region? Does the Member further agree that it would be unwise of any Minister of Education to ignore the views of the overwhelming majority of parents by seeking to impose a solution and attempting to dismantle the Dickson plan?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mrs Dobson: Yes. I thank my colleague for that intervention. He makes valid points and is 100% right: his is a widely held view of the Dickson plan. It is very popular in the area.

In recent weeks and months, as the threats to the Dickson plan have amplified, I have had the opportunity to meet personally many of those involved. Indeed, families across upper Bann are waking up to that very real threat. Uncertainty is playing heavily on the mind of many people — parents, grandparents and great-grandparents alike. Families such as mine have much for which to be grateful to Mr Dickson; namely, for putting in place a system that has educated generations of children in upper Bann, which has directly resulted in making Craigavon the commercial and industrial hub of Northern Ireland that it is today. I am sure that even the Minister is not oblivious to those strongly held feelings.

The retention of the principles of the Dickson plan will guarantee the future of Lurgan and Portadown colleges as selective grammar schools for 14- to 19-year-olds, and that should be a key consideration in any future arrangement. That having been said, I am fully aware of the much publicised and long-unaddressed accommodation issues at Craigavon Senior High School. However, in seeking to address those issues, there is a duty not to irreparably damage schools and, by implication, the education of pupils who attend schools that are not experiencing the same dire level of need.

The outright rejection of the SELB's previous area planning proposal for a collegiate system by 86% of respondents came as no surprise, but the threat did not end there. The most recent proposal of option A, as mentioned by Mr Moutray, with its proposed dilution of grammar school education at Lurgan and Portadown colleges, would be wholly unacceptable to so many in the community. However, there are a number of conflicting interests at play here.

Minister, I wrote to you twice last month highlighting concerns about the process adopted by the SELB in effectively pushing option A. In an almost steamroller approach, rules and conventions were set aside, including the scheme of management for controlled schools, and, indeed, the Nolan principles of public life. I am sure that all in the House will agree with me that decisions made by those in a position of authority must be visible and beyond reproach. That is why I wrote to you calling for an immediate public inquiry into the entire SELB area planning process — an inquiry that I am confident will highlight the failings in due process and result in the reset button being pressed on the current threat to the two-tier system.

There is also clear evidence that option A, with its dilution of the grammar schools, would run contrary to the agreement at St Andrews — an agreement that many claimed would ensure that any future Education Minister would not be able to superimpose a non-academic selection system on schools. The First Minister is also on record admonishing the Environment Minister over John Lewis and saying that it should not be a matter for one Minister. Surely this issue is of greater impact and should therefore be a matter for the Executive as a whole, rather than one Minister being allowed to take a frankly blinkered and dogmatic approach.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: No, my time is nearly up. As a member of the Education Committee, I have raised and praised the Dickson plan and its outcome for generations of children in Craigavon on countless occasions. Although the clear and present danger facing the Dickson plan comes from the SELB area planning, it is equally clear that a much greater long-term threat comes from the proposed Education Bill. The Ulster Unionist Party is united in its determination to oppose that Bill and the ultimate power it would give to any future Education Minister.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring her remarks to a close?

Mrs Dobson: If the SELB is threatening the Dickson plan system, I submit that that threat would pale into insignificance compared to those present under the Education and Skills Authority (ESA). I support the Dickson plan, and urge its retention.

Mr Anderson: I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate this evening. I thank my colleague Stephen Moutray for securing the debate. The threat that Dickson is currently under has caused much public outcry, with pupils past and present, teachers, principals past and present and parents making strong representations to us as elected representatives to do all that is physically possible to protect the Dickson form of education from the metaphorical axe that the SELB is wielding.

The Dickson two-tier system has delivered consistently for the people of Craigavon and Tandragee, with many thousands of our young people over four decades having availed themselves of that unique educational experience. Indeed, many have publicly hailed the success of the Dickson plan form of education in recent days and weeks. We have heard Mr Moutray refer to the chief executive of the SELB.

However, I wish to quote from a retired former principal who has recently commented on the proposals. Mr Harry Armstrong, former principal of Portadown College, stated:

"A proposed change to any established educational system, particularly one as successful as the two-tier system, must be judged very critically whether or not an improvement is likely, and, in that process, all those affected now, and in the near future, should be fully briefed on the details, implications, knock-on effects and possible consequences."

He has also been extremely critical of the lack of detail on the proposals and the absence of any real opportunity to tease out all of the implications. I have to agree with him on that, and I believe that the SELB should be held accountable for its unacceptable bias in its most recent consultation, when it clearly weighs heavily towards option A. I believe that Harry could still educate us on a thing or two. Indeed, I suggest that the SELB go to him for some extra tuition on that very matter. I believe, along with him, that the proposed collegiate bilateral fails on three criteria: the probability of increased educational standards, the increased financial efficiency, and the probability of the effect on the morale and level of motivation within the affected schools, and its effect on the degree of involvement, commitment, support and confidence of parents, boards of governors and the wider community.

We have been out in the community discussing the threats to the Dickson two-tier system; and, time and again, its distinctive features, such as delayed selection at age 14 as opposed to age 11, have been raised.

7.15 pm

The community also believes that there is a real benefit in schools having their own separate identity and autonomy. If a comprehensive, all-ability school is imposed against the will of the community, it will undoubtedly lose the backing and buy-in of that community and will result in a loss of families from the area as they seek the education that they require for their children elsewhere. At present, the cherished and respected Dickson plan system of education is under severe threat from people who wish to rid the community of a system that it overwhelmingly wishes to retain.

The SELB has brought forward proposals for the future of post-primary education in the Craigavon area. Option A would, ultimately, impose a system whereby, after children attend one of the local junior high schools, they would transfer to the bilateral all-ability comprehensive school where a one-size-fits-all method will be adopted. Meanwhile, option B is the only one that seeks to protect the Dickson two-tier system. Only option B will protect the provision of quality grammar school education in the Craigavon area and the high standard of vocation-oriented education that is offered by Craigavon Senior High School.

The SELB has also ignored the primary school sector and has not consulted it, even though there are 12,000 primary pupils in its board area. The impact of the proposed changes will be felt the most by those pupils. If the system is destroyed by option A, it will undoubtedly lead to fewer children attending local primary schools as families migrate to other areas. More children will take the AQE test to transfer to grammar schools outside the Craigavon area. Indeed, the uncertainty that has been created by the SELB has already had an impact on parents who have decided to send their children elsewhere because of the difficulties and hurdles to come.

The Minister needs to look closely at the consultation process on which the SELB has embarked, given the issues that Members have raised in the House today. The public does not want to see the introduction of a comprehensive system in the Craigavon area. In fact, 83% of people said that in the previous consultation and I know that the SELB has received a similar deluge of responses to the most recent consultation.

I will finish with another comment by Mr Harry Armstrong, who stated:

"The two-tier system has been an outstanding success and should be regarded as a hugely valuable asset to this community. It may not be absolutely perfect but, in my view, the perceived imperfections can be corrected, with good will, inside the system."

Mr Irwin: I thank my colleague the Member for Upper Bann Stephen Moutray for securing this debate. There is one Dickson plan school in my constituency of Newry and Armagh, namely Tandragee Junior High School. The Dickson plan has served the Upper Bann and Tandragee catchment areas well for over 40 years. The achievements of pupils who were educated through the Dickson plan have been notable and, year on year, the results speak for themselves.

The unique attribute of the system whereby selection is carried out at age 14 means that young people are streamed to a school that better serves them at that stage of their development, matched to their emerging and growing abilities. That fact has been clearly demonstrated in the results. Indeed, in the recent consultation that was carried out by the SELB, 86% of people expressed a desire to retain the system. That comes from an overall satisfaction among parents, many of whom came through the Dickson plan themselves.

The phrase, "Do not fix what isn't broken" has been well used in relation to this issue over recent months and it is applicable to this debate. The option that makes the most sense is option B, and I have no hesitation in stating my desire to see the system retained. The pursuit of option A by the SELB and the Minister does not have the support of my constituency, and many view option A as the removal of choice that would lead to a reversal of the reputation that the area enjoys for providing an all-encompassing educational experience for pupils.

The creation of a single-site senior high school in Portadown with a four-year model, and the retention of Portadown College and Lurgan College will ensure that choice is retained and that, most importantly, children are streamed to schools that meet their needs. Again, why fix what is not broken?

I have spoken to people in my constituency who have sent or currently send their children to one of the Dickson plan schools. Their overall response is one of contentment with the system.

Parents and pupils are content with the Dickson plan and see it as having a very valued future in the Craigavon and Tandragee catchments.

If we listen to the strong arguments put forward for its retention by the schools that have spoken out, we cannot countenance a comprehensive system that would undoubtedly dilute and undo the tremendous work that has been done through the Dickson plan since its inception. In my constituency of Newry and Armagh, we are listening attentively to arguments for and against a wide range of proposals for the future of controlled education in the constituency. There are options being debated for schools in Armagh city, Markethill and, as the debate today has highlighted, in Tandragee through the Dickson plan.

"Choice" is the key word in the argument, and it must be upheld. Tandragee Junior High School continues to perform magnificently and, as a school in my constituency, caters exceptionally well for its pupils. Indeed, it performs admirably financially. The school is a fantastic resource and continues to develop and ensure that its pupils have the very best opportunities. Those attributes are noted and supported through this debate, and I fully support the efforts of my party colleagues in Upper Bann to put forward a clear message to the SELB and the Minister. That is a message that I fully support, add my voice to and agree with.

Mr Kinahan: I speak on behalf of Mr Gardiner, who is chairing a board of governors meeting this evening. I thank Mr Moutray for securing tonight's debate.

I start by going on record as saying, as others have, that the Dickson plan has served the north Armagh area well over the last 40 years. It removed the negative aspects of selection at age 11, allowed late developers to develop and provided what was, in many ways, a model school structure that the entire Province would have done well to follow. It has also produced some notable educational achievements and a long record of excellent examination results in what are some of the Province's best schools. Why it needs to be altered escapes most people in north Armagh.

Support for the Dickson plan remains vigorous and strong across the Craigavon area. Recently, a consultation by the Southern Education and Library Board on the post-primary area plan, as we have heard, demonstrated that 86% wanted to retain the system. With that level of support, we have to ask the Minister why he persists with his attempts to dismantle it. Do his plans for the future of education command that level of support in the rest of the Province? The answer is definitely no. When we look at the ESA Bill, from the survey that I have done, a similar figure — 85% — do not even know what is in the Bill, so they do not know whether to support it or not.

It is clear that the Minister intends to use force on the education system. Indeed, the maintained sector in Lurgan has already been submitted to that. Now the Minister wants to extend that to the controlled state sector. This is a system that —

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I do not think it is appropriate for a Member to stand up and accuse a Minister of using force in his role. If the Member has an accusation to make about me abusing or not following my ministerial code of conduct, he should make that through the formal channels instead of making wild allegations such as that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I did actually note that remark. I remind the Member about the Speaker's ruling about good temper and moderation in language.

Mr Kinahan: I take back the word "force". It is the mental method of making it happen, which is a type of force, but I take back that comment. Now I have lost my place.

Many people now want to recreate the grammar schools that we have in England and that have been a great success there for the last 50 years. Those schools are the one way of giving people a chance, especially the disadvantaged. We should retain that here, in the form of the Dickson plan, in Northern Ireland.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kinahan: I would like to carry on for a moment.

I have called on the Minister many times to sit down with us and discuss the future of selection and grammar schools openly with all parties. However, to date, despite his saying that he has an open door, we have never yet had a chance to do that. Consensus has to be the way forward, and the Dickson plan is one of the best examples. We should go forward in that manner.

Recently, in the national press, we heard Sir Michael Wilshaw, the Chief Inspector of Education, say that the present state system in England was failing to nurture the brightest people. That is the system that we are trying to put in place here. The report says that bright children are being systematically failed by England's non-selective secondary schools. The Dickson plan here assures that that does not happen.

We need to be clear that the destruction of the Province's grammar schools is Sinn Féin's aim. Most of us suspect that that has more to do with denying opportunity to children whose parents cannot afford private education so that they cannot get on in the world than it has to do with educational ideas. The Sinn Féin plans will end up creating an underclass. These often illogical and discredited educational ideas, which I have referred to in previous speeches as Marxist, are very much Sinn Féin's Marxist text book of the 1970s. I feel that they are often based on prejudice rather than on facts. The principle that should guide educational change should be to retain what is working well in the system and to build up the parts of the system that are not working. It should not be to dumb it all down.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Kinahan: We are here to support the Dickson plan and option B, and I am glad to see such good support from many of the other parties. I hope that they will do the same in opposing the ESA Bill.

Mr Storey: I place on record my appreciation to my colleagues in Upper Bann, who, for a long time, have campaigned on many of the challenging issues in any structure or any system, no less when an area plan is being presented for a particular location. I place on record my appreciation to the MP for the area and my MLA colleagues. We have met representatives from the schools in Craigavon numerous times over the past number of years. That was a new experience for me because, in my part of the world, in north Antrim, the structure of Dickson and the two-tier system is totally foreign to us. However, it is abundantly clear that the people whom Dickson serves have given their support to that system.

I welcome the fact that the Minister is here. We have had our differences on many issues, and I am sure that we will continue to have them. However, on these occasions, he commits himself to be here to listen to the arguments. I know that it always heartens him when I stay on and participate in these debates.

Let us get to the core of the issue. The education and library board will determine the future of Dickson tomorrow. I wanted the Member to take an intervention. I want the Ulster Unionist Party to give us an assurance in this House tonight — I will be happy to sit down and allow it the opportunity to do so — that it has done all that it can to ensure that its party members who have a vote to cast do not in any way support option A tomorrow. It is fine to come to this House, throw salvos at the Minister and blame everybody else, but a decision will be taken tomorrow by the education and library board. Will that be endorsed by those over whom, we believe, the Ulster Unionist Party has control? The focus of the debate has to be on ensuring that what parents have bought into and what pupils have benefited from is maintained and improved upon.

7.30 pm

I have no doubt that, like any other system, there are issues in the Dickson plan that could be improved upon and enhanced. However, when I see the conditions that prevail at the minute at the Lurgan campus of Craigavon Senior High School, I think that it is scandalous that we have young people in such conditions and that they are basically hemmed in by and landlocked in a provision that I think is well past its sell-by date. The Minister well knows that I have repeatedly suggested that, whenever we look at these plans, we put in a capital alignment plan that says, "This is what will happen should a proposal be agreed on about the future structures in your area." Of course, we know that Lurgan College does not have the capital provision that it was promised. Let us also remember what is different about the Dickson plan: we are talking about schools that are in the controlled sector. So, as passionate as my party and I are about the matter, let us remember that some have come late to defending the controlled sector. Some have decided that it is probably now politically advantageous for them to advance the controlled sector, but let us also remember that it is not all about just one sector over another. It is about the tapestry of educational provision, whether that is in the junior or senior sector in Craigavon, a grammar school or a non-selective secondary school. I think that that provision has served us well, even though there are issues and challenges that I believe we have to address.

Mr Moutray: I appreciate my colleague giving way. He referred a second ago to the meeting of the education subcommittee of the SELB that will be held tomorrow morning in Armagh. Can I confirm that our representative on that subcommittee will vote for option B? Like the Member, I hope that the Ulster Unionists can confirm tonight that its two representatives on that board will also fall in behind us.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I also thank him for that confirmation. It is easy for us to accuse others and to tell them what they should do, but there is an opportunity for people at the meeting of the education and library board to indicate clearly where they stand on the future of the Dickson plan.

I would not agree with Mr Kinahan that you can somehow replicate the Dickson plan across Northern Ireland. That is because there are people in many other sectors of our education system who would not be comfortable replicating what is in that plan. However, if we go to Kilkeel, we find that another system operates there, and if we go —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Could the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Kinahan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: Yes. I do not have time, but I am happy to give way.

Mr Kinahan: Thank you very much for giving way. I was not proposing that we replicate —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the Member's time is up. I call the Minister of Education.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas le Stephen Moutray as an ábhar díospóireachta seo a ardú. I thank Stephen Moutray for raising this topic of debate.

A Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle, I am very clear that my main aims as Education Minister are to raise educational attainment levels and to close the performance gap that is still evident in our system. To help to achieve that, we must ensure that all our young people have access to a broad and balanced curriculum. We must ensure that we equip our children with the knowledge and skills that they need to be active contributors to society and to the economy in the future. We must also ensure that none of our children is left behind. I will return to that subject later.

To do that, we need a network of schools that are educationally and financially sustainable and can deliver the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework. We also need to make best use of the resources available to us. That will require change. It will require sectors coming together to plan to meet the needs of all children, regardless of their background or where they live.

I appreciate that change can be difficult. It takes strong leadership to bring forward a change process for the greater good, and it takes courage to implement that change. Area planning provides us with the opportunity to bring about that change and to develop creative and innovative solutions that are in young people's best interests. It is, of course, for the school managing authorities in the first instance to plan the future pattern of education provision. They must take the broad view and set aside narrow sectoral interests to put the interests of children above the interests of institutions.

At this point, it may be worth reminding all parties in the Chamber that they have no representatives on the boards. The DUP representative there is representing whichever council he or she was nominated from. The Ulster Unionist representative there is representing the council by which he or she was nominated. I would be concerned if we were to start bandying about what our party colleagues are going to do. They are answerable to other structures, rather than party structures.

Mr Storey: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr O'Dowd: Very quickly.

Mr Storey: Will the Minister accept that, given that they represent local authorities, based on the survey that has been carried out, the majority of those in the local authorities are exercising their right to express an opinion that is opposed to the plan?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not questioning the members' voting tomorrow. They will vote as they see fit. What I am saying is that they have to be careful not to go into the room representing political parties.

In one sense, it is fortunate that I am here as Minister, but, in another, it is unfortunate because then there would be an alternative voice on the Dickson plan coming from the Floor. To the Members opposite, the Dickson plan is two schools: Lurgan College and Portadown College. Indeed, during Question Time in this Chamber once, I had to remind Members on the opposite Benches that there were more than two schools in the Dickson plan. There is Clounagh Junior High; Craigavon Senior High; Killicomaine Junior High School; Lurgan Junior High School; St Mary's High School, Lurgan, in the Catholic sector; St Paul's Junior High School, Lurgan, in the Catholic sector; and Tandragee Junior High School. Then, there are the colleges: Portadown College and Lurgan College and St Michael's in the Catholic sector. I appreciate that, tonight, we are dealing only with the controlled sector because of the role of the SELB and so on, but the Members opposite had to be reminded of those other schools because they were fixated on the needs of only two of the schools: Lurgan College and Portadown College. That is where the mistake lies in their debate.

The origins of the Dickson plan, a feature of our current educational structure in the Craigavon and Armagh areas, lie in agreed local arrangements, but it cannot be viewed in isolation. An area plan should meet the needs of all the children in the area. I am on record as stating that the Dickson plan is a form of academic selection. Many Members have said that it is academic selection at 14 and that makes it better. The flaw in the plan is that, at 14, children are separated into different schools, and no one has ever given an explanation for that. Why cannot those children be educated in the one educational centre, where they remain among their peers and school friends who they have gone to school with since primary school? Why do we have to separate them at 14 to ensure that they have an excellent education? Selection involves rejection.

Mrs Kelly made the interesting comment that children have to learn failure. That is an interesting philosophy, but, the difficulty for me with this arrangement is that children who experience failure usually come from the lower socio-economic groups. That is totally unacceptable.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will go on, because I am conscious of the time.

The statistics on free school meals at the schools involved in the Dickson plan make interesting reading. At Tandragee Junior High School, free school meal entitlement is 13.7%; at Craigavon Senior High School, it is 20.9%; at St Paul's Boys High School, it is 25.6%; and, at St Mary's Girls High School, it is 21.3%. Now to the two schools that the Members opposite are most interested in. At Lurgan College, it is 5.3%, and, at Portadown College, it is 4%. Is the Dickson plan serving all of the children of the Craigavon and Armagh areas? On those figures, it is not.

Let us move on to educational attainment in the Dickson plan area. In fairness to the controlled sector in the Craigavon area, I do not think that all its views have been reflected here tonight. Both before and since becoming Minister, I have had the opportunity to engage with a wide sector of the educationalists in the Craigavon area. I disagree with some of them, and some of them disagree with me, and others have their own points of view around many matters. I engage with others regularly. It has always been done in a courteous and respectful manner, even among those who disagree with each other, and I hope and have no doubt that that will continue. The latest school leavers' data shows that the Dickson plan schools underperformed against both the Southern Board and overall averages at GCSE and at A level. So, how can Members say that it is world-class and that it is a leading educational system when it is actually underperforming against schools in the Southern Board area and against grammar schools here as well? The facts speak for themselves. At GCSE, 57% of school leavers achieve five or more A to C grades in the Dickson plan schools as against 61% for the Southern Board area and 62% across the North. For three or more A levels at A to C, the figure for the Dickson plan is 35% as against 37% for the Southern Board and 36% overall. Of course, there are variations across the Dickson plan area, but none of the schools beats the Southern Board average, and none of them beats our local average.

I am also concerned about the 43% of school leavers in the Dickson plan area who do not achieve five good GCSEs including English and maths. Does it serve all the children? Not according to that figure. It was also notable that three selective 14- to 18-year-old schools admitted far fewer pupils entitled to free school meals than the non-selective schools. That mirrors the position right across our selective sector.

My focus is on addressing educational underachievement wherever it exists and driving out inequalities in our education system, and I apologise to no one for that. Mr Kinahan seems to be better versed in the English education system than in our own. I suggest that he reads up on our education system. I am not sure that even he believes some of the stuff that he comes out with about my party, Sinn Féin, and what I do and do not believe in. It is fantasy politics, and sometimes it is quite dangerous politics. I suggest that he reads his speech before he comes into the Chamber and ensures that whoever writes it for him does not put in any of that stuff. I suspect that Barack Obama knows more about the education system here than Mr Kinahan does.

With changes across the sectors, Members will be aware that —

Mr Kinahan: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I was called up earlier for something that I said, and I would also like you to look at what he has just said.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: OK. We will do that.

Mr O'Dowd: Members are aware that the Catholic sector is moving away from the Dickson plan towards having a single school on one site. Interestingly, it has been proposed that that school will be a non-selective voluntary grammar school. That is achievable under current legislation because grammar status refers to a school's ability to charge fees, not its admissions criteria. The school will also hold on to its voluntary status. So, there is a very interesting proposal in the Catholic sector: a non-selective voluntary grammar school that meets the needs of all the children in the area. I put a challenge to those who support the Dickson plan: why can that not be achieved in the controlled sector?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is almost up.

Mr O'Dowd: I await the outcome of the discussions with the Southern Board. I will take all the evidence on board before I make any final decisions on the Dickson plan area. My decisions will be evidence-based. I assure Members that, when I make my decision on the Dickson plan area, I will not ignore 43% of the children who live there.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 24 June 2013

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. The parading season got off to a relatively peaceful start at the weekend. However, you, Mr Speaker, and the House will be aware of an incident in north Belfast at the Tour of the North parade where a Sinn Féin MLA was videoed impeding, it would appear, a police officer in carrying out his duty. Obviously, the Police Ombudsman has a direction and a system to investigate police officers, but can you advise what we, as a House, can do to ensure that we investigate fully what appears to be the attempted physical impeding of a police officer carrying out his duty by a Sinn Féin Member?

Mr Allister: Further to that point of order —

Mr Speaker: Order. Let me deal with this point of order first. This is a procedural matter. Members will know that, in dealing with procedural matters, I always advise them to go to the Business Office and to speak to the Clerks. A motion of this nature can be very complex. It is not a difficult motion, but it certainly needs to be fully explained to the Members who believe that they should bring such a motion to the House.

On the procedural matter, I will not go into the issue of the matter of the day that was submitted to the Business Office. I have made my decision on it and turned it down. So, where procedural issues on motions coming to the House are concerned, please talk to the Business Office. That is where we should leave this issue.

Mr Allister, if your point of order is on procedural issues, I am happy to take it.

Mr Allister: Thank you, Mr Speaker. Can you confirm to the House that, under the code of conduct for Members, it is stated as our public duty that MLAs should uphold the law? Therefore, given Mr Kelly's loutish behaviour last Friday, what investigation will be conducted —

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member knows that the issue very much rests with the Standards and Privileges Committee, which is where Members should be directed. Order. Let us move on.

Executive Committee Business

Suspension of Standing Orders

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 24 June 2013.

Mr Speaker: Before we move to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 24 June 2013.

Mr Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House and no dissenting voices, I am happy that cross-community support has been demonstrated.

Planning Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister of the Environment, Mr Alex Attwood, to move the Consideration Stage of the Planning Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment)]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshallled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list.

I inform Members that a valid petition of concern was presented on Friday 21 June 2013 in relation to amendment No 24. I remind Members that the effect of the petition is that the vote on amendment No 24 will be on a cross-community basis.

There are three groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 19, 21 to 23, 27, 31 and 33. The group deals with environmental and cultural protection, economic development, well-being and shared use of the public realm, together with Mr Agnew and others' opposition to clause 6 stand part. The second debate will be on amendment No 20, which deals with economically significant planning zone schemes. The third debate will be on amendment Nos 24 to 26, 28 to 30, 32 and 34, which deal with appeals, commencement and technical amendments.

Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (General functions of the Department and the planning appeals commission)

Mr Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 19, 21 to 23, 27, 31, 33 and opposition to clause 6. The amendments deal with environmental and cultural protection, economic development, well-being and shared use of the public realm. Mr Agnew: Planning is fundamental to everything that we do in society. How we plans our towns, cities and rural areas is key to our health and well-being. That is why it is important to get planning right. My concern about elements of the Bill and some of the amendments that we will debate today is that we are in a rush to get planning quickly, at the expense of getting it right. No one would argue against making planning more efficient. There is no doubt that our track record has been poor, and it favours neither developer nor objector. It favours no one if development is slow or decisions are slow. I have no doubt that the Environment Minister will point out that we have seen improvements. I share the desire of, I suspect, many in the House to improve the efficiency of the Planning Service, but I do not think that we should do so at the expense of getting planning right, and I fear that we may be travelling in that direction.

Planning is for the long term. We have to plan not just for today but for decades and future generations. I am concerned that certain elements of the Bill and some amendments are very much about the here and now: quick fixes and knee-jerk reactions to current events rather than good planning for long-term sustainability.

Elements of clauses 2 and 6 cause concern for many. We are concerned that we will see a polemical argument, a debate between those who support communities and those who support developers. I am afraid that there will be a division between those who support communities having their say in planning and those who seek to restrict and deny communities the right to have a say in how their town, city or area will develop. There will be those in the House who have a holistic view of our society and those who reduce everything to mere pound signs. This could be a debate between those who look to the long term and those driven by solely economic short-termism. We see a tension between those who want fairness and balance in the planning system and those who wish to load the dice. There are those who want to see Northern Ireland open for business and those who would leave us wide open to the exploitation of our communities and environment.

Those of us who have opposed fracking and look to the planning regulations to ensure that any decision on fracking and other major developments of that kind, specifically petroleum developments, have been assured that we will have strong regulations and will not make the mistakes that were made across the Atlantic in America, where a deregulated system allowed the health and well-being of communities to be put at risk for the search and drive for profit and cheap energy. We have been told that that will not happen in Northern Ireland, but my fear is that that is exactly what will happen if we pass some of the amendments proposed today.

Clauses 2 and 6 were of major concern to many at Second Stage. For those who see the importance of planning in furthering the well-being of our society as a whole, there is concern that the economic drivers in clauses 2 and 6 are over and above other concerns such as environmental protection and social well-being. There was some debate about how we should amend those clauses, whether we should amend them at all or simply reject them and how we should take things forward.

It is very much my view that the inclusion of sustainable development in the Bill was sufficient to promote economic development and that sub-paragraph (c), mentioned in clause 2, is not required because it was already implicit in the term “sustainable development”. There are two ways to approach this. Alliance has tabled amendment No 2, which would remove sub-paragraph (c). That is certainly one avenue that the Green Party looked at. However, there is another way: if we are to be explicit about sustainable development, we can spell out its aspects.

One of the definitions of sustainable development is to seek a balance between the competing needs of economic development, social well-being and environmental protection. If we remove economic development, we are accepting that it is implicit in the sustainable development clause. I am certainly willing to support the Alliance Party's amendment to do that, but I suspect, in advance of the debate, that there will be those who will preciously protect clause 2(1)(c), “promoting economic development.” If it is the will of the House that that must remain, and if we are going to be explicit about one element of sustainable development, indeed two, because promoting well-being is there as well, we should be explicit about environmental protection. If we are not, it will leave many concerned, as is often the case, that environmental protection is the lesser cousin of the economic agenda.

Amendment No 3, which has been proposed by the Green Party, and amendment No 4, which has been proposed by the UUP, and their consequential amendments, seek to be explicit about environmental protection and to make clear in the Bill that that is a material consideration. I am interested in the views of the House on the two wordings. It is clear that the Green Party and the UUP are of a similar mind in what they are trying to achieve through those amendments. We favour the term “promoting environmental protection”, to be consistent with promoting well-being and promoting economic development. That would ensure that we did not send a signal that we thought that one was greater than the other, because, whilst it is often perceived that the Green Party is interested solely in promoting the environment and environmental protection, ultimately, we seek to achieve a balance between economic development, social well-being and environmental protection. We believe that our amendment would achieve that, but we certainly do not object to the Ulster Unionist amendment. If the House is of the mind to reject amendment No 3, we will certainly support the Ulster Unionists' amendment, but, as I say, amendment No 3 is the wording that we feel most appropriate. However, I am willing to listen to the views of Members on that issue.

I do not think there is anything to fear from the inclusion of a paragraph on environmental protection. As I said, sustainable development inherently includes environmental protection, as it does the protection of social well-being and the promotion of economic development. Therefore, it is already implicit in the Bill, but if we have sought to make well-being and economic development explicit material considerations, we should give equal weight to environmental protection. For that reason, I ask the House to support amendment No 3.

Another approach, which was considered by the Green Party, is to explicitly define sustainable development, as the Alliance Party seeks to do with amendment No 5. In tabling amendment No 3, the Green Party has attempted to pull out explicitly the elements of sustainable development. However, I have concerns about explicitly defining sustainable development using the definition proposed by the Alliance Party. I am certainly sympathetic to that objective, and I will let the proposers speak for themselves, but I believe that it is an attempt to ensure that the balance of competing needs between environmental protection and economic development are protected in the Bill.

Sustainable development is a complex principle, and I am concerned about the definition that amendment No 5 sets out, because it simplifies sustainable development and, perhaps, in doing so, restricts how it can be applied, possibly not only in this Bill but in other legislation such as the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2006, which has a sustainable development clause. I am uncertain as to the outworkings of defining sustainable development in that way.

My other concern is about how that definition has been applied already in planning policy. The definition has been lifted from PPS 1. If planning decisions and the Planning Service had a history of promoting sustainable development in the way in which I understand it, maybe I would be more content to support the amendment. However, the record to date is that, with current planning policy and guidance, we still have not got to real sustainable development as I understand it. At times, economic drivers still seem to trump the other two pillars of sustainable development, which are social well-being and environmental protection. I have concerns about amendment No 5. I will certainly listen to the proposer and be informed by the debate. However, at this point, I just want to outline those concerns.

Amendment No 1 has been proposed by the Green Party. It inserts the word “social” before the word “well-being”. I want to explain our intention with that amendment, because it is one that we have taken some time to consider. There is uncertainty as to how well-being will be interpreted. I argue — and it fits with some of what I have said already — that well-being should be fairly narrowly defined in the sense that “well-being” could mean financial well-being, but that is already covered by the promotion of economic development. It is my contention and that of the Green Party that “well-being” should mean social well-being — public health and the well-being of society. In one sense, it is narrow in that it should be restricted to that and should not be about economic well-being. However, in another sense, it is general as opposed to specific: in general with regard to society as opposed to the individual.

Another of my concerns is that “well-being” could be looked at as an individual's well-being. Certainly, one could assume from the outset that any developer who proposes a development will see their well-being being promoted by the development. The key question, however, is whether society's well-being — social well-being — is bettered by any development. That is how I would like to see that element of the Bill being defined. Again, I will be interested to hear from the Minister and others about their understanding of "well-being". It is not a clearly defined term, either in the Bill or elsewhere in law. It is, certainly, the aim of amendment No 1 to make it about wider society's well-being, public health and social well-being.

Clause 6, again, is a clause of major concern. Whilst many people have concerns about the agenda behind the inclusion of "promoting economic development" in clause 2, I think that it is not simply the agenda of clause 6, but its actual outworkings, that cause real concern. The consideration of economic advantage and disadvantage, in my view, takes planning beyond where it belongs. I can explain that only by looking at specific examples. If somebody wants to change the use of retail premises to a café, it will, of course, be to the proposer's economic advantage. However, to the café down the road, it will be a disadvantage. Is it for Planning Service to make the judgement as to whose economic advantage is prioritised? Is it that of the existing premises holder or the proposed development? Is that what the planning system is there to do? I am not convinced that it is, and I worry about that.

I said at the outset that we all want to see a more efficient planning system, but I think that this will do the opposite and lead to legal challenges over every supermarket that is proposed. Although there seems to be some attempt here to streamline the planning process for major economic development, I think that, through this clause, every major economic development will be challengeable in law, because someone will, undoubtedly, be economically disadvantaged by a significant economic planning application.

Although I have concerns that the agenda is to prioritise economic development over other concerns such as social well-being and environmental protection, my major concern is that this will not even do what it seeks to do. It will just clog up our planning system further, and that is the last thing that Northern Ireland needs. The last thing we need is more inefficiency in our system, slower decision-making and more legal challenge. Again, there will be some debate today about how we address that.

I believe that clause 6 is detrimental, and that is why I stated my intention to oppose it. I think that the UUP amendment improves the clause by looking at environmental advantage and disadvantage along with economic advantage and disadvantage. Even with that amendment, I still think that it is a bad clause and will still oppose it. However, I support the amendment, because I appreciate what it seeks to do, and because I think that it would bring balance through the twin priorities of environmental protection and economic development. Nevertheless, I do not think that it will make a bad clause a good one, and that is why I still intend to oppose the clause but support the UUP amendment.

Moving on to amendment No 6, which deals with the promotion of shared use, the Green Party certainly supports the principle of doing everything we can to increase shared housing and shared living in our society. If the amendment can help us to bring that about through our planning system, we are willing to support it. I will leave it to the proposer to go into more detail on the intention of the clause. I will listen with interest and respond more fully when I make my winding-up speech.

I welcome amendment Nos 7 and 22, as proposed by the Minister, as they provide for a review of clauses 2 and 6 after three years. Again, I repeat the point that that will not make clause 6 a good clause, but it will offer some mitigation if the clause is, as I have suggested, harmful rather than helpful to our planning system, because, in three years' time, we can come back to look at the clause and reform it, and that is equally the case for clause 2. So, I welcome the Minister's amendment, as I see it as being only helpful to the outworkings of the Bill.

Finally, amendment No 27 proposes to provide protection in law for what is currently our one and only UNESCO world heritage site. I think that the protection of the Giant's Causeway is a no-brainer. I have talked about the fact that, to date, there has been some tension between environmental protection and economic development. However, here is a site that is of value in both respects. It is a wonderful example of Northern Ireland's natural heritage, which we rightly promote all around the world. Indeed, we have a responsibility as a society to protect what is a world heritage site. It does not belong to us — we certainly benefit from it — but, as a world heritage site, it has been deemed to be of importance to the world. It is a phenomenal achievement and privilege to have such a site in Northern Ireland, and we have a phenomenal responsibility to protect it on behalf of the world. I urge the House to support the amendment.

12.30 pm

The Giant's Causeway is a great economic driver. It is the second most visited natural heritage site in Northern Ireland. I am proud to say that the most visited natural site in Northern Ireland, Crawfordsburn Country Park, is in my constituency of North Down. However, I will accept that, when it comes to bringing in foreign tourism, maybe the Giant's Causeway brings in more than Crawfordsburn Country Park. So, it has huge economic importance to us. Any risk of losing that UNESCO designation must be avoided. In recent weeks, UNESCO has said that the site does need protection in law. I think that we should accede to that request and ensure that we maintain good relationships with UNESCO in the maintenance of the site and help the UK facilitate its duty to protect the site. More than that, we should do the right thing. We are guardians of this site for the world, and we have a responsibility to protect it.

Mr Speaker, I will draw my comments to a close. As I said at the outset, planning can often get lost in technicalities. It is not something that we see as much public debate around as we maybe do with some other Bills, because it is complex in its nature. However, there is no doubt that, from our health to our economic well-being, planning is fundamental to everything we do as a society. I will conclude by saying that its importance is being recognised by the wider public. Like me, every MLA will, I am sure, have had their inbox filled by calls for us to amend the Bill. I hope that we will be shown to be a listening Assembly and deliver a Bill that gives communities the right to have a say in how their towns, cities and rural areas are planned. More directly, that will show that, when this Assembly is lobbied by vast numbers of our citizens, we listen and respond to their requests.

Mr Hamilton (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I shall speak initially on behalf of the Environment Committee. Unfortunately, the Chair has found herself not able to fulfil her duties today. I will do my best to be an able substitute. I will follow that with some comments made in a personal capacity.

Let me begin by welcoming the Consideration Stage of the Planning Bill. After the Marine Bill, the Committee urged the Minister to ensure that there were no undue delays with any of his other Bills at Consideration Stage. The Minister has listened to that and taken those comments on board, as the Committee only agreed its report on this Bill just over two weeks ago. I hope that that is an example of the swift and speedy nature that, I think, the Minister, and all of us, wants to see in the planning system. Maybe this is an example of how that might work in practice.

The Committee gave the Planning Bill very careful consideration. It was referred to us on 22 January this year. The Assembly subsequently agreed to extend Committee Stage until 7 June. That allowed us the time to put out a call for evidence. Over 100 organisations and individuals responded to us with their views on the Bill. I want to put on record the Committee's gratitude to all those who put the time and effort into responding. A number of consistent themes emerged from the evidence that we received. I will begin by addressing the issues on which there was broad consensus.

The Planning Bill's key objective is to bring forward the implementation of a number of planning reforms that are in the Planning Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 before the majority of planning powers transfer to local government in 2015. The majority of those who responded had no problem with that as an objective and neither did the Committee. Bringing forward these reforms means that not only will they be allowed to become understood and established in advance of the transfer of powers but their benefits can be realised much sooner. It is sensible that that should happen, and it is notable that none of the 34 amendments on the Marshalled List seeks to prevent the accelerated introduction of those reforms.

There was much greater concern about clauses 2 and 6. Those clauses provide for the introduction of two new reforms that were not in the 2011 Act. Clause 2 provides for the Department, when exercising particular functions, to do so with a new objective of promoting economic development. That sits alongside the other objectives of furthering sustainable development and promoting or improving well-being. Clause 6 provides that material considerations in the determination of planning applications include a reference to:

"considerations relating to any economic advantages or disadvantages likely to result" in granting or refusing planning permission.

There was considerable concern about those new provisions. Many people were worried that clauses 2 and 6 would provide for economic considerations to be given greater weight than any other considerations in planning policy and when determining individual planning applications. As a result of those concerns, the Committee paid particular attention to those clauses. Given the extent of the concerns that were raised, I think that it is important to emphasise that clauses 2 and 6 do not provide for economic considerations to be given greater weight than other considerations in planning policy or when determining individual planning applications.

The Committee acknowledges the concerns that are sincerely held by many of those who responded to its call for evidence. However, we have taken our own legal advice on the clauses, and the Committee is satisfied that those concerns are unsubstantiated. It is right that the planning system should promote economic development, but it must do so while promoting sustainable development and improving well-being. Creating a statutory objective of promoting economic development does not diminish the other statutory objectives that the Department has when exercising its planning functions. Equally, providing a statutory basis for economic considerations to be material considerations in no way limits the other considerations that may be material when determining planning applications.

The Committee therefore supports clauses 2 and 6, subject to amendment Nos 7 and 22, which the Minister tabled, being made. Those amendments in no way alter the policy underpinning clauses 2 and 6; rather, they simply provide for a review of the operation of the clauses to be undertaken within three years of their coming into effect.

Where clause 2 and its three objectives are concerned, the Committee said that the Minister should confirm to the Assembly that the terms "promoting", "furthering", and "improving" shall each be treated as meaning the same thing. The Committee went on to say that if the Minister considers that there is potential for those different terms to be interpreted as having different meanings, he should table an amendment to the Bill to provide for a consistent approach. The Minister has not tabled such an amendment, so I would be grateful if he would confirm that he is therefore satisfied that those different terms shall not be interpreted as having different meanings.

The Committee noted that the Department will bring forward a single strategic planning policy statement (SSPPS) and that that statement shall provide a comprehensive consolidation of planning policy. That statement will be crucial in elaborating and clarifying a number of issues that the Bill will introduce. The Committee recommended that the Minister should confirm at Consideration Stage that the Department shall bring forward the draft single planning policy statement at the earliest opportunity. I look forward to hearing the Minister give that confirmation.

Having made the Committee's position clear, let me now turn to the amendments. I shall start by addressing the amendments to clause 2. Amendment Nos 1, 8 and 14, which Mr Agnew tabled, seek to amend the Department's duty to promote or improve well-being to a duty to promote or improve social well-being. A number of those who contacted the Committee were unclear about what was meant by the term "well-being" or how it could be promoted. The Department told the Committee that it will elaborate on the promotion of well-being in its single planning policy statement. That statement will also address social considerations as well as other issues. The Committee was satisfied with that approach and, as such, does not see the need to amend clause 2 in the manner that Mr Agnew proposes.

Amendment Nos 2, 9 and 15 from the Alliance Party would have the effect of removing the Department's duty to promote economic development. I emphasise again that the Committee is satisfied that clause 2 does not provide for the Department or the Planning Appeals Commission to give greater emphasis to the objective of promoting economic development than it does to the objective of furthering sustainable development or that of promoting or improving well-being. However, clause 2 does define the objective of promoting economic development as an objective separate from the objective of furthering sustainable development. Treating those objectives as separate does not have the effect of giving one greater weight than the other.

It is right that the promotion of economic development should be a separate objective. The Department says that, without compromising the wider purposes and principles of the planning system, it is timely, appropriate and legally correct to affirm through the Assembly and the Planning Bill that economic considerations are material when it comes to preparing planning policy. The Department goes on to say that that reflects the Programme for Government and the direction provided by the Executive for the economy. The Committee agrees that that is the case. It would be entirely wrong, therefore, to remove the Department's duty to promote economic development. The Committee does not support those amendments.

I will deal with Mr Agnew's amendment Nos 3, 10 and 16 and the Ulster Unionist Party's amendment Nos 4, 11 and 17 together. Mr Agnew's amendments would create a duty for the Department to promote environmental protection, and the UUP's amendments would create a duty for it to protect the environment. The amendments therefore effectively seek to do the same thing.

We all agree that the Department must protect the environment. However, it is already the case that the Bill provides a duty for the Department to further sustainable development. That duty will encompass environmental protection, so there is no need for a separate duty to protect the environment. Indeed, if we create a separate objective of promoting environmental protection, what does that mean for the sustainable development objective? Is a sustainable development objective in any way meaningful if it is separate and different from environmental protection?

The Department assured us —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: I suspect that I know what the Member is going to ask. I will give way, but I may answer him later. In the absence of the Chair doing this, I am reporting on behalf of the Committee. I will happily let him in now, and I will try to pick up on the point later, as long as he bears that in mind.

Mr Agnew: I appreciate the Deputy Chair giving way, with those conditions. Perhaps you will answer this in your own remarks later or in your role as Deputy Chair. Why was it felt that promoting economic development, which is part of sustainable development, needed to be explicit, yet explicitly putting in the protection of the environment or promoting environmental protection would somehow undermine sustainable development? That seems incongruous to me.

Mr Hamilton: I did know what the Member was going to say. It is as if we are telepathic in some way. I would rather come back to that and answer it in my personal capacity, if that is OK, rather than do so on behalf of the Committee. If I forget and fail to do so, if the Member reminds me before I finish, I will come back to it. There is quite a lot to cover, as the Member, I know, appreciates. There may be a momentary lapse. It is not trying to avoid the issue. I will address it; if I fail to, remind me.

Let me see whether I can find my place again. I have plenty of time, anyway. We are not going anywhere, of course. The Department assured us that the single planning policy statement shall elaborate on the duty to further economic development and address the issue of protecting the environment. The Committee was content with that and therefore does not think that the amendments are necessary.

Amendment Nos 5, 12 and 18 from the Alliance Party seek to provide in the Bill a definition of "sustainable development". We asked the Department during Committee Stage to comment on the principle of doing that, and we gave it a specific amendment to consider. The Department told us that sustainable development has not previously been defined in planning or any other legislation in Northern Ireland. The Department went on to say that sustainable development is a concept the meaning of which has evolved and is likely to continue to evolve over time. The Department looked at the amendment and said that, although well-intentioned, it may have had the unintended consequence of limiting or reducing the scope of the concept that it wishes to promote. The Department considers it more appropriate, in line with other jurisdictions, to provide a fuller explanation of what sustainable development means in the planning context through policy and guidance. This approach allows greater flexibility to respond as the concept evolves. The Committee was content with this approach and therefore does not support amendment Nos 5, 12 and 18.

Amendment Nos 6, 13 and 19, again from the Alliance Party, would require the Department to have regard to the desirability of promoting the shared use of the public realm between persons of different religious belief, political opinion or racial group. The Department told us that it was committed to proactively promoting shared, safer and welcoming spaces through the planning system. However, it suggested that this objective would be best dealt with through the forthcoming guidance on sustainable development, and the Committee had no objection to that. Therefore, the Committee does not support these amendments either.

Amendment No 7 provides for a review of clause 2 within three years of it coming into operation. I have already said this is an amendment that the Committee asked the Minister to bring forward; so, we thank him for doing that.

I now move on to Clause 6. Again the Committee gave very considerable and careful consideration to the issues raised with it on clause 6 and the Department's responses. The Committee also sought its own legal advice. The Committee concluded that it is appropriate that considerations relating to any economic advantages or disadvantages are included in the material considerations that the Department and councils must have regard to when determining a development application. In fact, this provision will simply provide a statutory basis for something that already happens in practice. It is right that this continues to take place.

Priority number one in the Executive's Programme for Government is to grow a sustainable economy and to invest in the future. It would be wrong if the planning system were to impede that objective by dismissing economic considerations when determining planning applications. However, that does not mean that economic considerations are the only considerations that need to be taken into account when applications are determined. If it were the case that clause 6 provided for economic considerations to outweigh other material considerations, the Committee would not be content. However, clause 6 does not do that. Providing a statutory basis for economic considerations to be material considerations in no way limits the other considerations that may be material, nor does it mean that economic considerations will be given greater weight than other material considerations. Clause 6 is clear that the inclusion of economic considerations within material considerations is without prejudice to the generality of the requirement of the Department or councils to have regard to the local development plan, so far as they are material to the application and to any other material considerations.

The Department will consult on and publish further policy and guidance on how it intends to take a balanced and proportionate approach on economic considerations; an approach that works in the public interest. Therefore, having given careful consideration to all the relevant facts, the Committee is satisfied that the concerns expressed to it about clause 6 are unsubstantiated. Nonetheless, the Committee believes that there would be value in undertaking a review of the impact of clause 6 within three years of its provisions coming into effect. The Committee, therefore, supports amendment No 22, in the name of the Minister, that would provide for such a review.

Amendment Nos 21 and 23, from the UUP, seek to provide that considerations relating to any environmental advantages or disadvantages are included in the material considerations that the Department and councils must have regard to when determining a development application. Undoubtedly, this is already something that planners do. Had these amendments been suggested or put to the Committee, we could have considered them and given a view on them to the House. However, that unfortunately did not happen.

Amendment No 27 from the Alliance Party requires the Department to have regard to the desirability of protecting the outstanding universal value of world heritage sites and preserving their character and appearance. The Committee did not give explicit consideration to this amendment, so I make no comment on it on the Committee's behalf.

Finally in what is just my introduction, I turn to amendment Nos 31 and 33, which relate to the commencement of the relevant sections of clauses 2 and 6. Amendment No 31 in the Minister's name provides for them to be commenced on Royal Assent and amendment No 33 from Mr McCallister provides for them to be commenced four months after that. When considering commencement issues, the Committee noted that the Department had signalled its intention to elaborate on key issues through the single strategic planning policy statement. The Department also said that it intends to consult widely on the planning policy statement before clauses 2 and 6 are commenced.

The Committee was concerned about the potential for a delay to the commencement of clauses 2 and 6. Despite the Department's stated intentions, it could not guarantee that the consultation on the single planning policy statement would occur by a specific date. Consequently, it could not guarantee that the commencement of clauses 2 and 6 would occur by a specific date. The Committee did not think that this was acceptable, and it asked the Department to bring forward an amendment to provide for the commencement of the relevant aspects of these clauses on Royal Assent. Amendment No 31 provides for that, and the Committee thanks the Minister for bringing it forward. In doing so, it is self-evident that we oppose amendment No 33. Mr Speaker, you will be glad to hear that that concludes my comments as Deputy Chair of the Committee. I nearly said "Chair", but I would have been promoting myself.

I want to say a few things that pick up on the question that has already been asked of me by Mr Agnew. It is very clear — there is no point in hiding it or trying to brush it under the carpet — that the view adopted by me or my party colleagues will be very different from the approach adopted by Mr Agnew. We are old and mature enough to sensibly discuss and debate our differences.

I listened to Mr Agnew say, in his earlier remarks, that the last thing Northern Ireland needed was these clauses. I think that he was specifically talking about clause 6. When Mr Agnew used that phrase, it rang a bell. I remember reading a magazine article just last week in which Mr Agnew said that the last thing we needed was the G8 summit, which went down so well that he will forgive me for not taking his advice that this is the last thing that Northern Ireland needs. His judgement on what is the last thing Northern Ireland needs is somewhat in question.

I suspect that clauses 2 and 6 are perhaps a bit of a sideshow in the debate, but, during its consideration, the Committee concentrated its time on them. I support clauses 2 and 6, as does my party, because of what they do in highlighting and underscoring not something new or novel, but something that is already the case. I have heard various terms used to describe what some people believed clauses 2 and 6 will do in giving economic considerations additional, supreme or determinative weight. That was not the conclusion of every investigation that the Committee made, every response that it received from officials or every consideration of the Committee itself, and it is not a conclusion that I came to personally.

Economic considerations are already a material consideration in the planning system. Clause 2 puts that into the legislation, which, I suppose, begs the question from some as to why we want to do that. I support those clauses, as brought forward by the Minister, for two reasons. The first relates to what we, as a place, were trying to do last week during the G8 summit, which was, to repeat that oft-used phrase from last week, to emphasise to the world that Northern Ireland is open for business. It is fair to say that our planning system has not covered itself in glory down through the years. I appreciate that that is probably more — Mr Agnew mentioned this — to do with its efficiency and speed. There is a lot of work to do to make our planning system much more efficient and swifter in dealing with all planning applications, but particularly those of economic consideration that have the potential to create a large number of jobs.

Although the Minister and I will disagree on some of the decisions that he has taken —

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): Only one.

Mr Hamilton: Just one? I really do not think that we have time to go into that. I do, at least, welcome the fact that, following his predecessors putting in place various mechanisms and starting to deal with article 31s in particular, the Minister has grasped the problem. I do not think that the way in which he has done it has necessarily solved the problem, because he has taken a very personal involvement in it, which does not mean that the system itself is as agile and swift as I think it should be. However, I think everybody would agree that that is where we should be going.

When we are selling Northern Ireland and saying that it is open to business, folk, including us, will talk about the people, the skills base that we have, our excellent telecommunication system, and the infrastructure that we have invested in. However, you will never hear anybody talk about the planning system in Northern Ireland. That is not one of the things that make it on to the list of positive points about Northern Ireland when we go to North America, the Far East and the Middle East to sell Northern Ireland. It should be, and I want to see it become something that we can sell to people.

These clauses and the amendments that we will debate have the potential to mean that the planning system in Northern Ireland is something that can respond, in certain circumstances, to economic considerations. For me, because it is already a material consideration, it is about highlighting and emphasising something that is already there, so that the world that is looking into Northern Ireland and perhaps wanting to invest in Northern Ireland, but has a choice of several places to invest, can see on the face of planning legislation that the Assembly and Executive mean what they say when they say that we want to promote the economy and put growing a sustainable economy as our number-one priority in Northern Ireland.

The second reason I think the clause is needed is that I am not persuaded — Mr Agnew opposed this, and you would expect him to — that in every case planners do give fair and equal consideration to the economy. The presence of economic considerations on the face of the Bill is a reminder to planners and those within the planning system that that is something that they should consider. I appreciate that others will disagree with that, but I believe that there is an urgent need for clarity in respect of economic considerations within our law.

We heard extensive evidence in Committee and had an excellent morning at the stakeholders' event in the Long Gallery. There were quite a lot of views expressed, and I will refer to some of those later. One contributor from Queen's University said that there was no proof that planning is holding back economic development in Northern Ireland. I fundamentally disagree with that. I think that there is any number of examples. I appreciate that some of those examples may be more about a lack of speed and efficiency in the planning system, but I think that there are innumerable examples — and Members in the Chamber can point to examples in their own constituency — where the planning system has not assisted economic development but has in fact impeded it, and has cost Northern Ireland jobs at a time when Northern Ireland desperately needs jobs and when thousands of people from these shores are emigrating to everywhere and anywhere around the world to get employment. Our planning system is not working in a way that it should to ensure that those people and those communities are not ripped apart by the need for young people —

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. As Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, I know only too well the impasse that has been created in the rural development programme over planning and the fact that it has led to delays in spending that money that has come from Europe, which the rural community and the farming industry need so desperately. That is only one example of what the Member has said.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member.

Mrs D Kelly: I appreciate the Member giving way, but I think the Chair of the Agriculture and Rural Development Committee was being somewhat extravagant with some of his claims in relation to planning holding up rural development. I think that what has held up rural development is the failure and the constant changing of the criteria — I am sure the Member will acknowledge — by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and it perhaps giving people only three weeks' notice if they need planning applications in situ before they can apply.

Mr Hamilton: I think I have enough on my plate dealing with the Planning Bill without getting involved in a spat on the rural development programme, although, of course, you would expect me to agree with my colleague. I think he is right, and I have seen evidence in my constituency of planning being a factor in not getting some of that money on the ground. Although, of course, Mrs Kelly is right too in that there have been other reasons why some of that money — which, of course, is our own money coming back to us from Europe — has not been able to be invested on the ground. There is any number of reasons. I think there is more than one culprit on that one, so I accept both Members' contributions, although I give supreme weight to Mr Frew's contribution.

The question is: if economic considerations are already a factor, and what is being done here is highlighting, underscoring and underlining what is already the case, then what is there to fear from having those clauses? Other criteria, including sustainable development, are already there. There is not a separate category for them; they are alongside. In fact, economic development is the third of the three included in clause 2.

Perhaps now is an opportune time to address Mr Agnew's point about what I was reporting back earlier on behalf of the Committee. My own view as to why what he was suggesting, and his amendment — and, indeed, the Ulster Unionist Party amendment — are unnecessary is because of the view that I take, which I am sure he will absolutely disagree with, that, at the present time, the sustainable development element of it is the one that is emphasised far too much in the planning system, and less so the economic development one. The Member is shaking his head, and I know that he will disagree with that view. There is no way that I will be able to persuade him nor he me. I think that the sustainable development aspect has been interpreted far too much towards environmental protection.

1.00 pm

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: I will give way in a second. I do not think that it needs to be emphasised in the same way as economic considerations.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I am not going to try to convince him to change his analysis. I disagree with him that sustainable development has been overemphasised, but he is right to say that we will not convince each other today.

I am just seeking clarification for all those who are concerned about clause 2. Is the inclusion of promoting economic development about, in the Member's words, highlighting, underscoring and emphasising what we already do, or is it seeking to change the balance, as he seems to be suggesting with that point?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his contribution. If anything that I have said infers that I wish to tip the balance in the other direction, I apologise. That is not my intention, and it is not what I want to see coming from this. I will not be implementing the Bill; that is the Minister of the Environment's job, and he can speak for himself.

I will make the point clearly now that it is not about adding extra weight, supreme weight or determinative weight to economic considerations; it is to highlight, underscore and emphasise the fact that proper weight should be given to economic considerations. It is not additional or special; it is about having the correct, right and proper amount of weight that should be given — and should have been given historically — to economic considerations in the terms of the planning system.

I appreciate that that is the Member's concern and that it is shared by many others, but that is not my reading of it. That is not the intention that I have in supporting the clause, nor do I think that that is the Minister's intention in putting it forward. He can speak for himself, and an assurance from him in that regard probably carries more weight than one from me. I am glad that the Member asked the question because it allows me to state my hope for the clause.

This has not come out of the blue. For some time, there has been a clear demand and requirement for economic considerations to be considered in the proper way in the planning system. An attempt was made through Planning Policy Statement (PPS) 24 which was, ultimately, unsuccessful, and there is already a presumption in the planning system for development. Given that and the fact that previous attempts have been made unsuccessfully, I am surprised that there are some people who are surprised that this clause is in the Bill at all.

It is fair to say that there has been widespread opposition from a few quarters to these clauses. That opposition has been voluminous in its noise if not in its numbers. In closing, I want to touch on some of those.

I have heard various people opposing the Bill, and it is worth noting where that opposition is coming from. Those stakeholders who have opposed the inclusion of clauses 2 and 6, and who have persuaded some Members to put down amendments in this group that would remove key aspects of those clauses, have themselves been in the vanguard of opposing many major economic planning applications in Northern Ireland.

I have heard various reasons being put forward as to why these clauses should be opposed. At the stakeholder event that the Committee hosted in the Long Gallery, I heard one organisation say that clause 2 and, in particular, clause 6 will pit developer against developer and resident against resident. I have news for that organisation; that is what happens every day in planning in Northern Ireland. We have developer against developer and resident against resident, as well as resident against developer. That is the nature of planning; it has always been thus and will continue to be thus. It is an adversarial system. Sometimes, I wish that it were less so, but that is a fact of life. I do not think that we should be put off clause 2 or clause 6 because it will cause arguments over planning applications.

Some of the things that the Minister of the Environment has had to deal with in his term in office have been controversial and have hit the headlines, but there is nothing quite like an extension to a house for causing a bitter row between two neighbours. So, resident fighting resident and developer fighting developer is nothing new in the planning system.

Ms Lo: I thank the honourable Member for giving way. Does he agree that more than 6,000 people signed a petition and sent e-mails to MLAs? Surely, those people are not all from environmental organisations.

Mr Hamilton: I do not know. Maybe the Member has a better understanding of who is signing the petitions. If we are going to run this country on the basis of signing petitions, we are all going to put ourselves out of a job very quickly. I will not dwell on that too much, because it might be too popular a proposal.

Mr Weir: You could start a petition on that.

Mr Hamilton: Yes, there would probably be more than 6,000 signatures.

I am not going to cast any aspersions on the sincerity of the people who signed the petition. Equally, I am not going to bow to the fact that 6,000 or 60,000 people signed a petition. There was great similarity in the e-mails that I have received on the Bill; albeit, I have not received as many as Mr Agnew seems to have received. Maybe, I have been ignored.

I reject strongly Mr Agnew's summation of the debate. I agree that there is an unfortunate division when it comes to debates about the economy and the environment. I have engaged, and have tried to do so positively, with people from the environmental sector to see what could be done to change the tone of the debate, because it frustrates me that it invariably comes down to an us-and-them type of attitude. We are very used to us-and-them type debates in the Chamber, but this is a very unfortunate and unnecessary division and schism that happens in debates of this kind. People are characterised as being for the economy but against the environment or for the environment but against the economy. Those two silos are not fair or correct.

I recall a debate I brought forward earlier this year on how we could develop our historic environment to encourage and grow the economy. So, the two are interrelated. I do not want anything coming out of this Bill, through clauses we are discussing now or later amendments, to do any violence or damage to our wonderful environment in Northern Ireland. We have something that is incredibly special and is worth protecting and looking after. As we go out to the world and sell Northern Ireland as a place that is open for business, the fact that we have such a fantastic, rich and diverse environment is something that we are selling to people.

Unfortunately, the debate has gone down very traditional lines. Some of the comments about these clauses and other amendments have been ridiculous and pathetic. I listened at the stakeholder event to representatives of one environmental organisation discuss their understanding of the effect of clauses 2 and 6. They said that those clauses would result in car parks, abattoirs and bingo halls potentially being built at the front of Stormont. My party is not that supportive of bingo halls, so I will gloss over that. Having been on a council that spent an absolute fortune to close down an abattoir, at great expense to the local ratepayer, I would not be supportive of putting an abattoir out there. On sitting days on Mondays and Tuesdays, the idea of a car park might be one that has some appeal. That sort of hyperbole does not do any justice to a sensible debate. We deserve to have a sensible and rational debate about the economy and the environment and where we stand on both of them, instead of coming out with comments like that, which are designed to scare and worry people.

I do not want to see anything coming out of this Bill or any piece of planning legislation that means that bingo halls are being built at Slieve Donard, that abattoirs are being built at Crawfordsburn Country Park or that car parks are being built in front of Carson's statue. That is just to scare people, and I will not be scared from supporting the proper weight being given to economic considerations.

I have worries and concerns about other comments that were made, not least those that were made during a Committee evidence session with representatives from the Council for Nature, Conservation and the Countryside, the role of which is to advise the Minister in his work. The representatives were pressed by Mr Elliott on whether there was a conflict between sustainable development and economic development in the Bill.

The response from people who advise our Minister on these and other issues worried me deeply. They said:

"The risk of conflict is considerable. Sustainable development encompasses a lot more than just economic development and is based on the concept that we will not damage the prospects of future generations by what we do today. Economic development, I am afraid, does not have any of those considerations."

This further comment was a wee bit more bombastic:

"Economic development is selling the golden eggs for a while and then deciding that you want to kill the goose as well."

We all want economic development in Northern Ireland. We desperately need economic development to rebalance and rebuild our economy. Those sorts of comments from people who advise our Minister of the Environment are not at all helpful, useful or constructive. I am happy to share the comments with the Minister, and I ask that he takes a look at them and addresses that issue. It is not a helpful contribution to the debate to say that everybody involved in economic development has no consideration for future generations or for the environment in which we live and is out only for a fast buck. I do not think that those comments are at all helpful.

I will sum up, and Members will be glad to hear that I am summing up. Clauses 2 and 6, which have been the focus of much controversy, are not the big bad monsters that some people fear they are. I hope that some of what I have said has helped to alleviate some of those fears, although I doubt it. I hope that what the Minister says will do an even better job alleviating fears. It is about giving proper weight — not additional, extra, special or determinative weight — to economic considerations at a time when we need to consider the economy in everything that we do. I support the inclusion of clauses 2 and 6 and oppose Mr Agnew's amendments, as well as those of the Alliance Party and, indeed, the Ulster Unionist Party.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom cúpla focal a rá. I would like to say a few words at this stage of the Bill. I will concentrate mostly on clauses 2 and 6, because those are the clauses that most of the debate will be about. I have heard people say that we did not properly consult on this and that and that amendments have been tabled on the Floor of the House and all that. I am speaking on a group of amendments as it is my turn in the sequence, but I will not have a chance to hear some of the amendments being proposed by Members. So, I am actually responding before I hear the debate and the arguments that will be put forward. That is no different to what people are saying to us about amendments coming to the Floor of the House and about a lack of proper consultation. I will be responding to the group of amendments that sits in front of me.

Before I start, I want some clarification from the Minister about some of the amendments relating to environmental protection. Is that not already covered in EU law and other policies that we have here? Is there a need to include it in this process if it is already there? I would like clarification on the environmental provisions that are being suggested.

I want to concentrate mostly on clauses 2 and 6. People believe that economic considerations will overtake all other elements and criteria in the assessment of an application. I do not believe that that is the way of it. We cannot sit in here arguing for the creation of jobs and the need to grow the economy while having a planning system that may not facilitate that. I will go on record and say, to be fair to the Minister, that there have been changes over the past number of months in what he has brought forward and tried to do. It is good experience for anyone who has been a councillor to get to see exactly what planning is all about. In all the applications that I have challenged on behalf of constituents, no matter whether they are small-scale or large-scale, I have honestly never seen a decision swayed by economic weight or considerations. I certainly would not support something that will destroy the open countryside.

1.15 pm

I will comment on some of the amendments. Mr Agnew's amendment No 3 talks about "promoting environmental protection". We had a good debate on that at Committee Stage, and people had a good opportunity to participate. I genuinely think that the policies that we have at present facilitate the protection of the environment. The legislation does not pave the way for the introduction fracking. Other Members are entitled to their view on that.

Under clause 6, it is up to developers to prove the advantages and disadvantages of their application. I hope that, when they make their arguments, Members answer a question that I have asked of everybody. I have asked people to give examples of where economic considerations have given a greater weight to the approving of an application. Some Members see the two clauses as impacting on and destroying the whole of the North. The intervention from the Chair of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development was interesting. I have seen examples of applications that are waiting for funding and support — Dolores Kelly made an intervention about the process — and it was the planning process that caused the problem. We need to get all this right and address some of the concerns. Maybe the Minister will touch on the new planning policy statement that he proposes. There has been consultation on that, and there will be another opportunity for consultation. It will bring in a single policy, and it is a good opportunity.

There are some fears about the economic argument. Local authorities will now go through a process involving area plans, designations and zoning land. There will be an opportunity for people to do that. As it sits at the minute, some of the draft area plans are not fit for purpose. At present, applications are geared towards industrial development sites, but you still cannot have a recycling centre beside a food hall. In some cases, that has happened. We need to look at that.

Members still have to speak about their amendments, and I want to hear more from those who tabled them. However, I am mindful of the fact that we went through a good process in Committee. As the Deputy Chair outlined, we were against some of the amendments that have been proposed. Those amendments have come to the House, and people are entitled to table them. I will listen to Members speak to the amendments before I make a judgement, but I want to pick up on one or two. My first point concerns the three-year review. Two Members have put down an amendment about "protecting the environment". It is in the names of Mr Elliott and Mr Swann. Mr Elliott came up with a good idea on that. I thought it was a fairly reasonable amendment for the Minister to adopt for a three-year review of how the economics will be rolled out. I support that amendment. On the one hand, he is saying that it was his suggestion, but, on the other hand, he is talking about protecting the environment. That is counterproductive. Is he saying that, on the one hand, he supports the economic aspect and we will have a review and, if it is doing too much damage, that is grand; or, on the other hand, is he asking for further protection for the environment? That is the way that it reads to me. Maybe the Member will clarify that in his contribution.

Mr Agnew's opposes clause 6. Clause 6 was supported by the Committee, and I am of the view to support that. However, I am also of the view that we maybe need to look at putting in different measures. Maybe the Minister will talk about how he will qualify the economic advantages and disadvantages of a planning application. Maybe he will clarify his views on that.

I move to some of the fears of people who oppose the Bill. I think that I received 600 e-mails over the weekend on this, and there are genuine concerns from people. They sent me views on clauses 2 and 6 and others but did not make any suggestions on how we could enhance the Bill with some of those protections and assessments. Maybe, at a further stage, we could have a look at that. With that in my mind, I bring my remarks to a close. I look forward to the debate on some of the other amendments.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the opportunity to make a contribution to the debate. The Bill is, of course, designed to improve the planning system for everyone in the North of Ireland, not just those with a special interest in the economy nor indeed those with a special interest in the environment. I found it interesting that, thus far, some of the other clauses to improve the planning system have not been touched on.

If I may, I will widen the debate. I endorse the comments of the Deputy Chair, speaking on behalf of the Committee. As a member of the Committee, I expressed concerns about clauses 2 and 6 and asked for particular legal advice to be given to the Committee. I was satisfied with that advice, and I believe that it allayed any concerns that I or my party might have had.

Clauses 7 and 8 are on the powers to decline subsequent or overlapping applications. These would be welcome to many individuals in the community who see vexatious use of the application system by some businesses that have not applied for planning approval at the start of their business and, when that comes to the attention of planning and enforcement teams, vexatiously resubmit applications to delay the enforcement of the action taken by them or, indeed, the courts. Certainly in my constituency, those clauses will be most welcome.

I also note amendment No 13, tabled by Anna Lo. It is on a shared future, and the SDLP is keen to hear more about how that will be worked out in practice.

I listened carefully to the two previous contributors, Mr Hamilton and Mr Boylan, on their support for clauses 2 and 6. They talked about Northern Ireland being open for business. However, it is a sad reality that there are many brownfield sites in existing development zones. There are numerous empty commercial and industrial premises and empty shops in town centres. Given those empty premises, it is questionable whether planning is the sole driver of economic development.

Events over the weekend and those of recent months relating to the flag protests did not do the Northern Ireland economy any favours. This is about resolving some of the reconciliation and shared future disagreements between our two main communities. I know that OFMDFM hopes to put together a working group later in the year. Those issues have as much to do with Northern Ireland being open for business as any planning legislation.

I ask that people consider this: if clauses 2 and 6 are not intended to give any added significance to the economy over sustainable development or well-being, the only rationale that I can think of for their insertion is a PR exercise. That how I see it.

Mr Boylan also talked about the environment. He is right to say that the environment is already substantially protected through the wild birds directive, areas of special scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty. Wetlands areas and world heritage sites are also protected, and there is the habitats directive. We already have a substantial amount of legislation that has a basis in EU, national or local law. I do not think that we have to support any further amendments in relation to the environment.

I refute, of course, Mr Boylan's attempts to support his Minister in relation to the expenditure on the rural development programme. Some of it had been held up by planning — I fully accept that — but Mr Attwood's predecessor, Mr Poots, introduced a streamlining process for planning applications where there was significant economic consideration or a grant application. As I understand it, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and the Department of the Environment worked well together in adopting a sensible approach to such applications. However, I know that the rural development programme changed its criteria substantially during the course —

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us not get into a debate on the rural development programme. Let us deal with the Planning Bill before the House.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Mr Speaker. You will appreciate that the two matters were linked by an earlier contributor, so I had to set the record straight.

I have made a number of points on the first group of amendments that, I hope, suggest to the House that there are amendments that we cannot accept at this stage. We are reasonably content that clauses 2 and 6 do not do harm to the environment or sustainable development.

Mr Elliott: I welcome and support the overall principles of the Planning Bill. Many in our society — developers, objectors and, indeed, the Planning Service itself — want to see a speedier planning process. At times, it has been very frustrating for all involved. The principle of the Bill is very welcome, in that it aims to improve that.

We in the Ulster Unionist Party have no difficulty in principle with the parts of clauses 2 and 6 that relate to economic development. We have made that clear at all stages. We believe that they are reasonable and acceptable. We were told by the Minister, departmental officials and other MLAs that those clauses would not give additional or overbearing weight to matters of economic development, over and beyond other aspects. Therefore, I do not see how our amendment to put in "protecting the environment" could have any overbearing weight either. We are trying to put it on a par and include a level of equality and, I suppose, simplification in the process. They are quite simple amendments, and I feel that they could gain widespread support not only from Members but from the wider public and community.

1.30 pm

We hope that, by and large, people will want to see the environment protected in a practical and sustainable way, at the same time as ensuring that the promotion of the economy in Northern Ireland is to the forefront. So, we do not see any difficulty with the two aspects sitting side by side.

I know that there is a slight debate over the wording of Mr Agnew's amendment. His is "promoting environmental protection" and ours is just "protecting the environment". We feel that ours is simpler and much more straightforward. I dare say that Mr Agnew will disagree and say that he is trying to keep the promoting aspect on a similar basis to what it says in the other parts of the clause. I accept that, but I feel that ours is more straightforward.

Amendment No 5 is about the definition of sustainable development and has been tabled by the Alliance Party. I feel that there have been a number of attempts to define sustainable development. I do not see a general agreement around that definition. I would like to have a further debate on that. I do not see us being able to support the amendment at this stage, simply because there has not been enough discussion around it. I would like to hear from the Minister about whether there have been any further attempts to get a clearer and more definitive definition of sustainable development.

Mr Boylan referred to me on the issue of amendments being tabled by the Minister about having a review and a mechanism for reporting back to the Assembly on clauses 2 and 6. That is something that I proposed in Committee. It is very welcome, and I am pleased that the Minister and the Department agreed to take that issue on through an amendment. I fully support that, but I do not see what Mr Boylan's issue was with me tabling amendments that included protecting the environment. You can actually review that, because it would be part of clauses 2 and 6. So, you would be reviewing that in the three years as well. I do not see what the problem with that aspect was. Again, I am at a loss about exactly where Mr Boylan was coming from on that aspect.

The review and reporting mechanism will be a very valuable tool in the Bill, particularly regarding these clauses. I hope that that system allows people to feed into it and allows developers, Assembly Members, any elected representative and, indeed, the wider public to explain exactly how they feel that the two clauses are progressing. I know that there has been an indication that a lot of damage could be done in three years, but I think that, by and large, particularly if our amendments are accepted, given that they allow for protecting the environment, the damage, if there is any at all, would be limited. Again, that reporting mechanism will be helpful to the overall process.

I look forward to the House supporting the Ulster Unionist Party amendments. We will be happy to support the Minister's amendments. I have concerns around the definition of sustainable development, but that is an aspect that can be worked on further and can come back for discussion later.

Ms Lo: I would have liked to say that I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Bill as the Alliance Member for South Belfast. However, in light of some of the amendments tabled at the last minute, I speak with a heavy heart. As I have stated previously, I do not think that the Minister should have moved the Consideration Stage today. That would have allowed everyone the opportunity to assess the amendments cooked up by Sinn Féin and the DUP working closely together behind closed doors.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for giving way. Now that she is in the early stages of her speech, maybe she will explain to the House why she decided to abdicate her responsibilities as Chair of the Committee, something that she is exceptionally well paid for. Today, she refuses to do her duty as Chair, which has been transferred to the Deputy Chair. It would be understandable if the Member were not here today, but she is here in full flight. Maybe she would like to take a few minutes to explain to the House why she has abdicated her responsibilities.

Ms Lo: I welcome the Member's intervention. I had thorough discussions with Paul Gill, who acted as the Committee Clerk and worked with us on the Planning Bill. I wanted the Deputy Chair to speak on this because it seems that there is a conflict of interest. I strongly objected to clauses 2 and 6, and I made it clear during Committee Stage that I would not support them. Therefore, for me to say that the Committee supported it while I wanted to say, "But I did not" would have clouded the issue. For clarity, we thought that it would be better for Mr Hamilton to make the speech on behalf of the Committee.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. There is precedence for this. For example, I sit on the Standards and Privileges Committee. When it was recommending sanctions against Mr Wells for what was deemed by the Committee to be a breach of the code of conduct, the Chair, Alastair Ross, chose, with the Committee's agreement, not to present the Committee's report because he had a conflict of interest, as he did not support the Committee's recommendation. That is quite common practice where there is a conflict of interest — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. I ask Members to return to the Planning Bill. Let us not get into the business of Committees, which is really no business of the House. Let us move back to the Planning Bill.

Ms Lo: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I hope that that clarifies the position.

The Alliance Party is fully supportive of the original intentions of the Bill. There is no argument from this corner of the House that our planning system in Northern Ireland could not or should not be modernised and strengthened to provide much faster decisions on applications. We did not, however, support some of the measures in the Bill, as we believe that they are counterproductive to those aims.

With regard to amendment Nos 2, 9 and 15, I ask the House to remember draft PPS 24, which was brought forward twice by Environment Ministers and overwhelmingly rejected by public opinion. In fact, 75% of respondents strongly opposed the draft policy. Clause 2, as it currently stands, is an attempt to bring it through once again, this time through the back door without full public consultation. That is not just my opinion. A brief overview of the consultation undertaken by the Committee showed just how widely rejected clause 2 was by the environment sector. The Committee received 112 submissions to its consultation, and, of those, eight were in favour of clause 2 as it is written, and the vast majority — 80 submissions — were not in favour of the clause or felt that it required more clarity on the definitions.

In fact, in its submission to the Committee, Friends of the Earth deemed the Planning Bill to be worse than PPS 24. PPS 24 related to major applications, but these clauses will apply to all clauses.

Alongside Friends of the Earth, many of those who are not in favour of clause 2, as it stands, are experts in the fields of planning and environmental protection. I ask the House this: what is the point of consulting people on the ground if we do not listen and take account of what they have to say and of the advice that they offer us? The opposition against this clause and clause 6 is not restricted to experts and the sector alone. We need only look at the hugely successful "Amend the Bill" campaign to see the strength of feeling among the public. At the last count, over 6,000 letters of support were sent, and over 100 were sent to my office alone.

Bringing greater definition and tightening to the clause is what the Alliance Party has sought to do with the amendments in my name. Removing the mention of economic considerations and defining sustainable development, using the definition from PPS 1, clearly shows that economic considerations are one of the three key pillars of sustainable development. Those are social development; environmental considerations; and economic development. I can see no reason, need or merit to give extra mention and weight to economic development as it is already considered as part of sustainable development. In fact, in September 2011, when the Minister was rejecting draft PPS 24, he said that:

"economic considerations are already a factor in planning decisions and are already dealt with in a balanced way alongside other material considerations, including social and environmental factors."

I would like to know what or who has changed the Minister's mind and why he now feels that economic considerations should be put on a statutory footing, not just in a planning policy statement. I am asking the Assembly to remove economic considerations from the clause not because I or my party believe that they are not important, but because they are already considered, as I have explained, as part of sustainable development, and, therefore, should not be given extra weight over social and environmental elements, both of which are included in the definition of sustainable development.

I, along with many respondents to the Committee, believe that the additional mention of economic considerations may be counterproductive for a number of reasons. First, if economic considerations are allowed to trump other considerations, it could lead to a proliferation of speculative planning applications. That will do nothing to speed up our planning system, which is already under considerable stress.

Secondly, when introducing the notion of economic development, the Bill does so with ambiguity. It does not define economic development, possibly because there is no universally accepted definition of economic development. Economic development is not as simple as promoting growth through job creation. It requires a long-term perspective. For planners to be able to make decisions on the clause, extensive guidance will be necessary. That guidance will not be immediately available upon the enacting of the clause on Royal Assent if other amendments are successful, but I will come on to that later. Planners are trained to deal with issues relating to the use and development of land, but it should not be their role to promote economic development. It may also prove necessary for the Planning Service to hire economists, which is, I am sure, not within its current budget at this time of reduced public spending.

1.45 pm

Thirdly, economic considerations that go beyond land use, such as job creation or economic growth claimed by the developer, cannot be adequately monitored or enforced after the granting of planning permission. You cannot go after them after you have granted planning permission.

I believe that the inclusion of economic development in this clause places the economy in competition against the environment. Both must be — and, indeed, are — integrated. You cannot consider one without the other. As the Northern Ireland Environment Link states:

“the environment is the envelope in which the economy must exist”.

I urge the House to support my amendments. They bring clarity to the clause and define sustainable development, thereby proving that we do not need mention of economic development, as it is already a clear part of that.

I believe that the amendments in the names of Mr Agnew and Mr Elliott also have merit. We have listened to the debate thus far and will continue to do so in reference to those amendments — I am not precious about my own amendments.

I will now speak on the amendments relating to shared use. Aside from its attempts to prioritise economic development, the Bill offers us the opportunity to think about how we design the space in which we live, work and socialise. Through the Bill, we in the Assembly can prove our commitment to create shared public spaces for everyone by placing the need to consider the shared use of the public realm on a statutory footing in planning decisions.

We heard grand talk from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) in recent weeks after the launch of the strategy Together: Building a United Community. Here is the chance for them to show us through action that they are truly committed to building a united community by making the consideration of shared use of buildings a statutory obligation. Those amendments would ensure departmental focus on actions that would promote good relations and help to ensure that the rhetoric and vision of cohesion and sharing, about which we have heard for so long, become a reality. It is important to note that shared space does not mean neutral space. It is not the aim of the amendments or the Alliance Party to create sanitised territory. I believe that there can be a vibrant place for all ideas and identities where people can come together.

Research of the omnibus survey that was carried out as part of the public consultation on cohesion, sharing and integration highlighted a high degree of support — 91% — for the provision and expansion of safe and shared space. In the 2010 Life and Time survey, 82% showed a clear preference for living in mixed areas, and 87% of respondents believed that better relations will come about through more mixing. I agree with those 87% that this is not a matter over which we can afford to be complacent. I urge the House to give statutory weighting to the consideration of sharing in planning decisions by supporting amendment Nos 6, 13 and 19.

I considered tabling amendments on social well-being that were similar to amendment Nos 8 and 14. Well-being, in and of itself, is a broad concept, taking in many factors. The inclusion of the word “social” before “well-being” may well be beneficial in focusing the minds of planners when making decisions on applications to consider the impact on mental health, and other similar factors. The Alliance Party will be supporting those amendments.

I will now speak to our amendment on world heritage sites. We are truly lucky in Northern Ireland to have a UNESCO world heritage site. Many other countries would love to have that. World heritage sites are recognised as the most special places on earth. They are chosen because they possess outstanding characteristics that make them valuable to all the people of the world, regardless of where they are located. I believe therefore that it is our duty as legislators to do all that we can in our power to protect our world heritage site. It is my opinion that we have not done that so far.

The proposal for a massive golf course development in Runkerry, right on the periphery of the Giant’s Causeway, was approved without proper consultation with UNESCO. Indeed, in February, when I was visiting the Giant’s Causeway, UNESCO recommended:

“The State Party is advised to strengthen the position and recognition of World Heritage sites in national law, including in all regions of the State, so that developments that create negative impacts on Outstanding Universal Value are not permitted;”.

It makes sense that prestigious world heritage sites should be protected through a country’s planning system. Therefore, the responsibility lies with us to legislate for the care of the site. As Members will be aware, there is not protection in law for world heritage sites in Northern Ireland. I do not believe that that is an acceptable state of affairs, and the amendment seeks to put that right. By putting in place legal protection for our world heritage site and any potential future sites, we are sending a strong message to the world about the importance of our heritage and the value that we place on it. Mr Speaker, let me be clear: it is my opinion, and that of the National Trust, that should the amendment not pass, and we do not protect our world heritage site in legislation, we will not get another one and may well lose the one that we have.

All Members would do well to bear in mind the economic gain —

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mr Attwood: I choose not to ask Members to give way, but given the claim that has just been made, and the scale and severity of that claim, Mr Speaker, in which the Member said that should the amendment that she is proposing not be passed, we would not get any further designations of world heritage status and the current designation of the causeway would be at risk, I have intervened. Will she put into the Library, any correspondence or documentation that she or any third-party organisation has got that confirms and justifies that sort of remark?

Ms Lo: I welcome the Minister’s intervention. That is a view that was given to us this morning by the National Trust. I believe that there was a conference last week. I will seek further clarification from the National Trust, and I will certainly speak to the Minister on the issue, perhaps tomorrow. However, that was certainly the view that was given to me this morning. I agree with the Minister that it sounds very severe. It is something to which we need to give very careful consideration.

All Members would do well to bear in mind the economic gain — I am sorry for repeating that — that we get from having a world-renowned brand such as a world heritage site in Northern Ireland. Let us be under no illusion: world-heritage-site status has been revoked before and it will happen again. When it happened in Dresden, it was termed “an embarrassment”. If it happens here, it will be nothing short of humiliation. We have been well warned. We should absolutely heed those warnings.

Although it is easy to draw the inference that the amendment is solely about the Giant's Causeway, that is not the case. The amendment does not relate to individual development proposals, but, instead, is intended to show that we take our international obligations and reputation seriously. Indeed, we aspire for other special places in Northern Ireland, such as the historic walls of Derry, to, one day, be recognised around the globe as world heritage sites. I know that I caused a bit of controversy when I compared Derry's walls to the Great Wall of China, but, having visited both sites, I was really very genuine in doing so. As I said, if we would like other places, such as the walls of Derry and the beautiful Marble Arch Caves, to be considered, we need to establish protection for them in law.

Let me assure the House that protecting world heritage sites in law is not about constraining economic development. Instead, it ensures that the outstanding universal values — those characteristics that make a site so special — are maintained. In fact, world heritage sites bring significant investment and draw tourists from all over the world. Since the opening of the new Giant's Causeway visitor centre this time last year, Northern Ireland Tourist Board figures show that there have been visitors from 160 different countries. I urge the House to support amendment No 27.

I will now speak on the intention of Steven Agnew, my party colleagues and I to oppose the question that clause 6 stands part of the Bill. Many stakeholders' submissions stated that clause 6 is worse than clause 2 and that, if enacted, it could render the planning system unworkable.

The fundamental principle of planning is the consideration of the use and development of land, which has been well established in case law over the past 40 years. Clause 6 now tells planners that they have to weigh economic advantages and disadvantages when they determine planning applications, which may, consequently, cause a great deal of uncertainty and delay through legal challenges. That could slow down the planning system, which is totally counterproductive to the aim of planning reform to speed up planning applications and decisions.

There are always two sides to a coin. When planners have to take into consideration the advantages and disadvantages of granting an application, that could be open to exploitation by applicants and objectors. It will also lead to more bureaucracy or costs for applicants and objectors in having to furnish convincing economic elements into their arguments. Will that provide a level playing field for the small community against a large developer who can afford to employ an economist to lay out their case?

Again, as I said earlier, there is no legal mechanism for planners to monitor or enforce claimed benefits following the granting of planning permission as such issues cannot be secured through planning conditions. As developers know that they cannot be held to account on their claims, is there not a danger that they may inflate the economic-development contributions on their applications? If this fails, we will support Mr Elliott's amendment. Perhaps I should not have said that. Obviously, I urge Members to support our call for clause 6 not to stand part of the Bill.

2.00 pm

I turn to the amendments on commencement. I have to say that I am deeply disappointed that members of the Environment Committee requested that the Department bring forward an amendment to make clauses 2 and 6 operational upon Royal Assent, possibly in December this year, rather than by a commencement order when the Department is ready for them. It is totally disgraceful that, at Committee Stage, MLAs not only ignored the views of 88% of respondents to our consultation who said that the clauses should be amended or dropped, but actually pushed for them to be accelerated into action as soon as humanly possible.

Time and again during our stakeholder event, departmental officials assured Committee members and concerned individuals that clauses 2 and 6 would be clarified and guided by the new single strategic planning policy statement so that economic development would be interpreted as having the same bearing as the other two objectives of social development and environmental protection. They categorically stated that a draft SSPPS would receive a full public consultation, and that only when the finalised SSPPS was in place would those two clauses take effect through a commencement order.

If this amendment is agreed today, it will create a vacuum because, when determining planning applications, planners will have to rely on current planning policies without the revised and updated guidance on the definitions and boundaries of the two new clauses on the promotion of economic development and the assessment of economic advantages and disadvantages. That really is putting the cart before the horse.

Why is there such a hurry to speed up the function of promoting economic development at the risk of planners not being properly guided and trained to work within the new legal provisions? Northern Ireland has the highest planning approval rate in the UK. In the last quarter, 99.5% of planning applications in Fermanagh were approved. You can say, therefore —

Mr Elliott: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mr Elliott: Does the Member accept that, although a high volume of applications were approved, a number were actually withdrawn before a decision was made, which escalated the approval rate?

Ms Lo: I understand that but, if you look at the figures, you see that only 0.5% were rejected.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. I echo the point made by Mr Elliott. As somebody who serves on a local council and receives an amended planning schedule each month, I know that, if a planning application is clearly heading towards a rejection, the applicant will quite often withdraw the application before it gets to the stage of a final determination, because that gives them other opportunities. On that basis, although I do not doubt the accuracy of the figures that have been given to the Member, they can be entirely misleading and give the wrong impression.

Ms Lo: I think that Members would agree that, certainly, planning approval speed has improved. The Minister mentioned that yesterday morning on television. Therefore, we cannot really say that planning is currently creating barriers for economic growth. As Dolores said, planning is not the only reason for the downturn in economic growth.

I oppose the Minister's amendment, but support Mr McCallister's, which will hopefully give the Department more time to produce the necessary guidance for planners.

Mr Anderson: As a recently appointed member of the Environment Committee, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate and to make a few comments on the amendments in group 1. It has been an interesting debate so far. Listening to some of the points raised has been a steep learning curve, in the sense that some of the issues coming forward are not my thinking or how I would see it.

The amendments in group 1 are proposed mainly to clauses 2 and 6. Like many Members, I am sure, I have received numerous correspondence from people who have environmental issues in relation to those clauses. While understanding some of the reasoning that those people might have, and recognising the need to protect the environment, I believe that there has to be a sensible and balanced approach as we move forward. I have been completely convinced in my short time that clauses 2 and 6 as drafted allow for that balance and are in the best interests of all concerned. My party supported the Bill at Second Reading and Committee Stage. I support clauses 2 and 6 and do not see any need for most of the amendments in group 1.

I believe that the amendments go a long way towards stifling economic growth, at a time when we must grasp every opportunity to recover from the prolonged economic downturn. My colleague the Deputy Chair has already stated the economic impact that planning can and does have on job promotion. Therefore, it is vital that economic factors are given the importance that they deserve when planning decisions are made. We cannot allow our hands to be tied behind our backs in this matter. Every effort must be made to promote economic growth, and the planning process is crucial to that promotion.

As an elected representative for council and at Assembly level, I, like others who have two jobs in the political sphere —

Lord Morrow: One non-paid.

Mr Anderson: As my colleague says, one non-paid.

We are very well aware of the importance of the planning process for many of our constituents and the impacts that it has on aspects of life. We could stand here all day and recount many, many incidents where the planning process has had a great effect on constituents. I know that many people have been frustrated with the planning process for too long. When people speak about the red tape and bureaucracy in our system, they will often cite the planning process as the top example, where delay seems to follow delay. Anything that helps to speed up this often lengthy and cumbersome system should be widely welcomed by everyone. It will be welcomed across the community, not least by the hard-pressed business sector.

I picked up on something Ms Lo said. She stated that the amendments in some way are not designed to stifle economic development. However, I question her reasoning. The more I look at the need to help the economy to move forward and the planning issues, the more I question some of the amendments and the reasoning behind them. It is clear to me that clauses 2 and 6 —

Ms Lo: I thank the Member for giving way. What we are saying is that economic development is not unimportant; it is very important. No one would dispute that, particularly now, when we are seeing so many young people unemployed, and we have a brain drain and all the rest. We are saying that, by saying "sustainable development", that already includes economic development, so you do not need to say it again. You add weight to it by saying it a second time.

Mr Anderson: That is the Member's view; it certainly is not the view of me or my party. I think we have to get economic development on some sort of a level playing field here, and we do not believe that that is happening at the moment. That is not to say that other issues are not important, but it is one's interpretation. I believe that clauses 2 and 6 help to level that out.

It is clear that clauses 2 and 6 are designed to help the planning process in a way that is equally favourable to those projects in economic development that are designed to develop our economy. The planning process, as it currently operates, can delay a perfectly good business project, not just for months but, in some cases, as I have seen for myself, for years. What sort of message does that send to potential local investors and inward investors from abroad? It is absolutely essential that we do not get so hung up with environmental concerns that we cannot see the wood for the trees. I am very disappointed when I look at the amendments in group 1. With a few exceptions, they will have the opposite impact to what we need. They will weaken the Bill and further frustrate economic growth.

The economy is at the heart of the Programme for Government and has been since May 2007. The proposed amendments to clauses 2 and 6 run contrary to that. If they are passed, they will send out the wrong signals and frustrate the chances of economic growth. As I have said before, I fully understand the need to protect the environment, and I accept that it is a difficult balancing act at times, but the Bill, as drafted, allows for that balance to be taken into account. It will give equal weight to planning applications that will stimulate and grow the economy. Surely we need to do everything in our power to speed up such planning applications? We all know of good local business incentives that have been killed off by the planning process. These vary from small, local initiatives to much bigger, international companies. We can argue about the threat to our environment from some of these applications, but too often we see good, sound business planning applications turned down on what seem to be very weak grounds. The chances to create jobs and to boost the local economy are therefore lost and jobs go elsewhere. Such planning decisions have a knock-on effect for other potential investors, who are then discouraged from putting in their own applications, and so more potential jobs are lost.

I also note that some members of the Environment Committee, including the Chair, have indicated their intention to oppose clause 6 in its entirety. That is to be regretted.

It is imperative that we do all we can to promote and not stifle economic growth. I support clauses 2 and 6 and oppose the amendments proposed by the Alliance Party, the Ulster Unionist Party and Mr Agnew.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am not an expert in planning policy, planning permission or any of that kind of stuff, but if you saw me on the site of a proposed development, you might think otherwise, like most other elected representatives.

I rise following my party colleague Cathal Boylan to articulate our view on this proposal and on the proposed amendments. Personally, I am a concerned citizen who is worried about the impact that liberalising planning laws in favour of developers at the potential expense of the environment, built heritage, the natural environment and public health would have. Therefore, I support the amendments to clause 2 tabled by Mr Agnew, which include a reference to social well-being and promoting environmental protection. I am glad that these amendments have been tabled, and that the strong lobby calling for protection of world heritage sites, for greater promotion of environmental protection and the inclusion of the promotion of social well-being is being heard.

I would like to know how sustainable development is assessed. We have seen one attempt by the Alliance Party to define “sustainable development”. I do not think that that will receive consensus here today. I think that the consensus is that it is best to leave that to the Department and the planners to determine. Thankfully, this has been a fairly rational debate. We may see a debate later that centres around whether powers are being taken away from the Department of the Environment. I do not think that anybody is too keen at this stage to take away the Department’s role in defining “sustainable development”.

2.15 pm

The amendments to clauses 2 and 6, which we support, are sensible. They ensure that the required balance between environmental protection and economic development is struck. I am happy to support them. On that note, I commend all the citizens who have energised themselves and let their voices be heard. To date, over 6,700 messages seeking these amendments to be made have been sent. I am happy to support them and to let those people know that their views have been heard.

It does not matter to me what form of communication people use to correspond with their elected representatives, whether it is a hard copy of a petition, an online copy of a petition or somebody simply copying and pasting an e-mail to articulate their views. Whether they drafted the thing themselves is irrelevant. If it is their view, it has a right to be heard. That is a very important point. We, as a democracy, need to remember that there are members of our community out there who have a particular interest in this area, and they should not simply be dismissed out of hand.

There are widely held, very genuine and well-founded fears in our community that enacting clauses 2 and 6 without the amendments would provide too much emphasis on any potential economic benefits, regardless of how unfounded those often ludicrous claims of economic development are.

One of the biggest fears from the outworkings of the proposed Bill is to provide greater rights to developers at the expense of the environment. It will be no surprise to anybody in the House that I am particularly concerned about the issue of fracking. There are widely held concerns out there. They may not have come to the fore about the development of nuclear power plants or the hotly contested overhead North/South interconnector, which is currently trying to get its way back into the planning system.

The amendment contains the proposal to weigh up economic and environmental advantage and disadvantage. Are we to expect the developer to commission that piece of work? Will we see an organisation such as Tamboran, which proposes to carry out hydraulic fracturing in half of Fermanagh, pay a consultancy firm to carry out that work? How can we be sure that that work will be a fair assessment and that it will not be weighted too heavily on the economic benefits side and talk down any potential environmental negative points? That is something that we often see with environmental impact assessments —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will in a second.

That is often something that we see from environmental impact assessments that are carried out by consultants. We all know that paper does not refuse ink, and we all know that whoever pays the piper calls the tune.

I am happy to give way.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. I want some clarification. Is the Member telling us that he, if not his party, will vote for the amendments in group 1? How does his argument sit with the OFMDFM amendment in group 2?

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for her intervention. I would not like to be ruled out of order by starting a debate on group 2. I have articulated that we are going to support some of the amendments in group 1. We will support Mr Agnew’s amendments on clause 2, the UUP amendments on clause 6 and some of the Alliance amendments, particularly the ones on world heritage sites and greater sharing. I will come back to that in a minute. That is actually the next part of my speech, Dolores, so thanks for bringing me to that.

Amendment No 7 proposes a review that will be carried out in three years. That review will be welcome. I am happy to support it, but I am hopeful that it will be more than just a fig leaf to those who have concerns about the Bill. I have been as clear as one can be when talking about a political opponent that, in my view, the Minister is doing a good job. I fully support a number of decisions that he has taken. There are, obviously, some decisions that many people oppose, but I can think of a number of examples of very good decisions from the Minister. He is to be commended for that. It is funny, because one of the reasons that we are often given for why clauses 2 and 6 are needed is that they will speed up planning policy. However, the people who usually say that come from across the Benches and from the party that held the Environment portfolio during the entire previous mandate when most of these decisions remained unmade.

Although I am not personalising the issue, going back to the Minister, one of the first things that he did when he came into office was to carry out a review of PPS 21 and how it was being implemented. That was very welcome. However, that was two years ago, and that review has yet to be published.

Regardless of what his party does with its Minister, an election is scheduled for just under three years' time, so the Minister may not be in office then. Will the Minister give an assurance that the review of the Planning Bill, if enacted, will have some strength? We have been told that the review of PPS 21, which is hopefully near completion, will not make any changes to that policy. All that it will do is look at how it is being implemented. As citizens, rather than legislators, are we expected to take some solace from the fact that a review of the Planning Bill will commence within three years? If the Bill is enacted, will the team carrying out that review have the power to make changes or, at the very least, outline truthfully the impact that this change in policy will have had? Is it the case that the review will be completed and published within three years, or will it just commence within three years?

What will happen if it transpires that, by the time the review commences or concludes, some disastrous decisions are made on the basis that the so-called economic benefits have been given preference over the negative environmental damage that has been caused? What will happen if, in three years' time, we are faced with a situation whereby fracking is taking place across Fermanagh, or even in Belfast city centre, as the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) has now proposed, or a nuclear power station has been constructed across Belfast lough from Titanic Belfast, and every town and village in the North contains a waste incinerator of some sort? Will those developments be closed down, will efforts be made to repair the environmental damage or will we simply be told that it is too late, that it has already happened and that we can make changes in the future? Will new legislation have to be drafted to further change this Bill if it is enacted? That would, of course, be subject to a political veto from some in the House.

I want to give the public an assurance. The Bill, if amended properly, would not provide greater facilitation for things such as fracking. Fracking will not have a positive economic benefit on our community or our society. If the Bill is amended properly, fracking will be looked at in the round, including its economic disadvantages and its impact on the environment.

I agree with some consideration's being given to the potential economic benefits of proposed developments. However, that has to be balanced with social well-being and promoting environmental protection and sustainable development. As MLAs, many of us will have served as councillors, and as councillors and MLAs, all of us will have seen small-scale developments being turned down that should have been approved. Had their economic impact been taken into consideration, they possibly would have been approved. However, it is far harder to calculate that for much larger developments, because the long-term impact on our environment and society is much harder to measure.

Mr Eastwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Yes, surely.

Mr Eastwood: I take it that the Member will not argue for Fermanagh's becoming an economic zone if the later amendments that Sinn Féin and the DUP tabled are agreed.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. It is my understanding that no areas have yet been outlined as proposed zones. That needs to be dealt with. I am happy to contribute to and to participate in that debate when it comes up. We are coming up to Question Time, and I am finishing my contribution. I will deal with amendment No 20 later on.

As I said, we also support the Alliance Party amendment that would give greater recognition and protection to world heritage sites. I am told that we also support the Alliance Party amendment on greater sharing. I suppose that my gut tells me that, if we did not, it would appear to go against the notion of a shared future. I do not really know how you could oppose it and not be called some form of a bigot. However, I find it difficult to comprehend how that would apply in a planning context, particularly where an organisation, such as a Church or religious order, planned to develop a site. I would like the Alliance Party to clarify later what it means by the amendment.

John McCallister's amendment demonstrates the problem with grouping amendments for debate. I am speaking in my slot to a group of amendments, but, as Cathal outlined earlier, I really do not have a clue what the thinking is behind John McCallister's amendment. Therefore, I cannot really comment on it. I hope that he has some idea of what he is talking about. We will listen to what he has to say, because I have not yet heard any of his logic or rationale behind it. I spoke quickly to John about it, and I will not speak for him or steal his thunder, but the amendment sends out a clear message to the Minister that he needs to bring forward the required PPS as soon as possible, to ensure that there is no gap.

We all know that planning is not perfect here. Each of us could think of examples of where things could have been done differently or better. There is definite scope for reform in the planning system, but it depends on what kind of reform you want and what the outworkings will be. Those are my comments on the first group of amendments.

Mr Speaker: I ask the House to take its ease as we move into Question Time at 2.30 pm. We will return to the Planning Bill after Question Time, when the next Member to be called will be Peter Weir.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Education

Mr Deputy Speaker: I advise Members that question 11 has been withdrawn and transferred to the Department for Regional Development, and the Member has been notified.

Post-primary Schools: Craigavon

1. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Education, given the support for retaining the Dickson plan, to give an assurance that he will choose option B if there is majority support for it in the responses to the public consultation on the Craigavon post-primary proposal. (AQO 4353/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I am aware that, following the public consultation on the draft post-primary area plan, the Southern Education and Library Board (SELB) issued an options paper to the boards of governors of all of the controlled post-primary schools in the Dickson Plan. The paper summarised the two main options arising from the area plan consultation and asked for boards of governors' views.

That consultation with the boards of governors is not a ballot with results deciding the outcome of the process. Rather, the returns will be taken into account by the SELB alongside all other evidence and data, including departmental policy, when deciding the way forward. For example, if we examine what is happening in Lurgan we can see that, despite the best efforts of the board of governors, senior management team and staff in Craigavon High School, Lurgan campus, they are not in a position to deliver the entitlement framework. The school is also facing a serious financial deficit. I cannot ignore those facts and neither can the managing authority. A solution must be found.

Area planning is about providing strong, vibrant schools, delivering high-quality education by using the limited resources available efficiently and effectively. In that context, it is my firm view that the Dickson plan is no longer fit for purpose. The Member will be aware that the Catholic education sector in Craigavon proposes moving away from the Dickson plan and academic selection. I believe that the best course of action for the controlled sector is to do likewise for the educational benefit of all the children and young people in that sector.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Members, there have been a number of conversations happening in the Chamber. I ask you to give due courtesy to the Minister and the Member asking the question.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for his response, albeit somewhat predictable, following statements that he made last week. To date, there have been over 2,000 responses submitted to the SELB in favour of option B opposed to a handful in favour of option A. Is the Minister really intent on riding roughshod over the will of the people on the issue? Where is the parental choice he champions, if that is the case?

Mr O'Dowd: As I said in my answer, a consultation process on any issues carried out by my Department, or, indeed, any other Department, is not a ballot. It is not an election. We do not put proposals to the public and say, "Vote for them". However, if the Member wants to use results coming back, then five of the seven boards of governors in the Dickson plan within the controlled sector have said — [Interruption.] The Member is keen on majority rule. Five of the seven post-primary schools in the Dickson plan area have said that they prefer option A.

I have to decide, if and when the SELB sends me a firm proposal, whether it is option A or option B. Either of them is fit for purpose, but my decision will be based solely on this: will the proposal meet the needs of all young people in the Dickson plan area, not just those in the two schools that the Member opposite concentrates on? He only ever concentrates on Lurgan College and Portadown College. There are more than two schools in the Dickson plan area, and more than those pupils who attend those schools. All of those children need a voice and need looked after.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his response. Will he tell us a bit more about the meaning of "consultation"? How does he intend to take this decision forward?

Mr O'Dowd: The consultation on the draft area plans that has now concluded, as with all consultations carried out, is to ensure that the public are fully informed of the proposals in front of them, that they can respond to those proposals and that, if there are any issues within the original document that have not been foreseen by the proposers, the public or elected representatives can bring them forward. Nowhere in any piece of legislation regarding consultation does it say that it is a ballot weighted for those in favour of an option or those against the option. If the Member can point me towards legislation where it says that, I am happy to follow those instructions, but none of the Ministers or Departments work on the basis that a consultation is a ballot.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. Will the Minister outline how those schools in the Dickson plan perform educational attainment-wise compared to the average across the North?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his question. The schools in the Dickson plan area have many qualities. There are good schools in the Dickson plan area. However, my role as Minister and that of the Southern Education and Library Board is to ensure that the provision for all young people in that area is good or better.

Members on the opposite Benches would have us believe that, in comparison with the Northern average, the Dickson plan schools are leading; indeed, some of them have referred to those schools as world-class. I will quote the statistics, and Members and the public who are listening can decide whether they are world-leading or even leading across the North. The Dickson plan average for five or more GCSEs including English and maths is 56.7%, and the average in the North is 62%. The Dickson plan average for three or more A levels is 34.7%, and the average across the North is 36.4%.

Examinations are only one way to measure the success of any school or education system, but it is clear that we require change in the Dickson plan area. We require an education system that meets all the needs of all young people in that area, not just a minority who have very vocal support in this Chamber.

Primary Schools: Additional Places

2. Lord Morrow asked the Minister of Education to explain the rationale for the allocation of additional primary school places for September 2013, when the controlled primary sector has been allocated less than 20% of the additional places of the overall primary allocation. (AQO 4354/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The Department has the authority to grant additional places by way of a temporary variation, which is for one year only. This is a tightly controlled power, which is applied only in circumstances where children do not have a place available to them in a school in their preferred sector and within a reasonable travelling distance from their home, or where exceptional circumstances pertain. Temporary variations are used to address short-term demographic pressures in an area and are not about meeting parental preference for a particular school because a child has failed to gain a place in the normal transfer process.

Although there have been more temporary variation requests this year from the maintained sector than the controlled sector, I can assure the Member that each request is considered uniformly, in line with existing policy, and that the rationale for either granting or refusing places remains the same, irrespective of the sector or the school.

There will, of course, always be schools that are more popular than others for a range of reasons that regularly seek temporary variations to increase their admission numbers. However, such schools can be allowed to grow only in the context of the overall area plan through the development proposal process, which addresses the impact that that may have on other schools in the surrounding area. It is simply not sensible or responsible to grant additional places to some schools while others in the area have empty places.

Lord Morrow: In a written reply to a question that I submitted on this issue, the Minister stated that there were 182 additional places in the Catholic maintained sector, 63 in the integrated sector and 38 in the Irish language sector. It strikes me that the controlled sector is at the poor end of the Minister's thinking. Does he accept that that is not a fair distribution of the additional places that were allocated this year?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept the allegation. I put it to the Member that he should present more stirring evidence on any allegation that I treat the controlled sector differently from any other sector. Each case of temporary variation is measured against the criteria and each one will be judged on its merits, not on which sector it comes from or anything else. The Member may make these wild allegations, but he has no substantive evidence to support them.

Lord Morrow: They are your figures.

Mr O'Dowd: With respect, the figures reflect decisions that were made on the evidence that was presented by the schools and the parents in each case, and nothing else.

Lord Morrow: Prejudice.

Mr O'Dowd: If the Member is accusing me of prejudice, that is an allegation that I take very seriously. There are mechanisms in this Chamber —

Lord Morrow: We will use them.

Mr O'Dowd: — and outside it for the Member to bring me to account, and I invite him to use either. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Members not to make comments from a sedentary position.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. How does he intend to balance his aim of allowing good schools to grow while maintaining a sustainable schools estate?

Mr O'Dowd: I intend to do that through area planning. We need to allow popular schools to grow, but not at the expense of other schools or by the survival of the fittest in that sense. Area planning is taking its course. The post-primary plans have been through the consultation process. We have brought the boards and the managing authorities together to advance that further. The primary-school consultation ends at the end of this month, and I invite anyone who has not responded to do so. Once that consultation information is gathered together, I will bring forward further proposals as to how we allow popular schools to grow in a planned and managed way.

Mrs Overend: Can the Minister give a commitment that undersubscribed Irish-language schools, and nursery schools for that matter, will not be awarded additional places at the cost of places that are needed in the controlled sector? That is a concern in my constituency of Mid Ulster.

Mr O'Dowd: I do not know why that is a concern, because it has absolutely no basis. It is a wee bit like what the previous Member to speak from the opposite Benches said: it has no basis whatsoever. Parents who wish to send their children to Irish-medium schools are perfectly entitled to do so, and parents who wish to send their children to an Irish-medium nursery are perfectly entitled to do so. It is not measured against the availability in the controlled sector or any other sector.

Primary Schools: Mergers

3. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Education what measures he will take to ensure that local community identity is taken into consideration when merging primary schools. (AQO 4355/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: My overarching priority, when faced with a proposal for any reshaping of education provision, is to ensure that all children have access to a high quality of education, whether that is through a school amalgamation or another area solution. I also want to make sure that any such changes are sustainable.

My Department's sustainable schools policy and the guidance for area planning support the need for schools to remain closely integrated with their local communities and for those communities to engage fully with the planning process. It is important that local communities continue to be proactive in supporting and engaging with the area planning process.

Throughout the consultations on the area plans, I have emphasised that local input is key to helping shape education provision in a given area. I value the input from local community representatives, and I have met many groups to listen to their views on proposals contained in the area plans and in relation to development proposals that have been published. Any reasonable proposal from a local community that provides for viable and sustainable provision that will deliver high-quality education will be considered in the area planning process.

Mr I McCrea: In his response, the Minister has given a positive commitment to ensuring that community identity is safeguarded. Does the Minister understand that there are concerns among parents who have sent their kids and other family members to different schools and fear that, as part of the merger, their identity will be lost? Can he give an assurance that the Department will safeguard that identity?

Mr O'Dowd: I guarantee the Member that each case will be looked at on its merits. It is difficult to know what the Member means by "identity". However, with regard to amalgamations of schools or where schools are to close, the needs and identity of a community have to be taken on board. The identity of a school may mean different things to different schools and different communities, and they will be able to give voice to that identity during the consultation process. I assure the Member that that will be taken on board before any decision is made.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his responses. What assurance will he give to small rural schools? Will local solutions be given full consideration where the Department wants to merge a small rural school with an urban school?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for her question. I have previously said in the House that we are not involved in a numbers game here. We are involved in a debate on the quality of education, whether it be rural schools or urban schools. I have given assurances to those schools in many ways. Last week in the House or the week before, I gave a practical assurance to small schools by not removing the small schools funding from the common funding formula proposal. That should give surety to schools on my intentions on the provision of rural education.

2.45 pm

I cannot be specific about the amalgamation of a rural and urban school. There may be a proposal, but it will depend on the locality, the distance between the two schools, the community, and responses to the consultation process, etc. It is worth noting that, in the sustainable schools policy, everything outside Derry City Council area and Belfast City Council area is classed as rural. So, the geographical area that we refer to as rural in our policy is quite expansive. Each proposal will be judged on its own merits.

Mr A Maginness: On a related matter, will the Minister explain his rationale for not giving additional places to maintained schools that have a history of oversubscription, such as St Francis' in Loughbrickland and Christ the Redeemer in Lagmore?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not sure how that is associated with this question — it is perhaps more associated with the previous question — but I am happy to respond to it. Mr Morrow just accused me of being prejudiced, but the Member gives two good examples. I turned down the school in Lagmore, in west Belfast, for an expansion, and I turned down a Catholic school in my own constituency for a temporary variation. I do not see how I can display fairness more than by being prepared to turn down a school in my own constituency.

Mr A Maginness: Why? What was the rationale?

Mr O'Dowd: Why? The sums did not stack up. If I were to give those schools greater numbers, schools around them would lose numbers. I invite the Member to send me a list of the schools that he would like me to take pupils out of, because that is effectively what you would be doing. When you give one school greater numbers, another school loses out. No Member ever comes to me and says, "I want you to take children out of these schools and put them into that school." Members always come to me and say, "We want more pupils for that school." However, they never tell me where we will get them from. That is why that decision was made. It was the right decision for the area and for the provision of education in the area.

Further Education: Area Planning

4. Mr Swann asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of the potential benefits from education boards taking account of the opportunities and synergies arising from integrating further education in the area planning process. (AQO 4356/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Area planning aims to ensure that there is a network of sustainable schools capable of delivering the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework. Schools have close links with the further education sector in planning and delivering a curriculum that meets the needs of their pupils, particularly in the delivery of applied or vocational courses. That helps avoid duplication, maximises the impact of scarce resources and enriches the educational experience for pupils, teachers and schools.

I fully recognise the important role that further education (FE) provision has in planning for the future. I included in the terms of reference for area planning an objective to take full account of appropriate and relevant FE sector provision for 14- to 19-year-olds. I expect planners to take account of that to ensure the efficient use of resources and avoid duplication of provision. The post-primary plans provide the foundation on which to move forward. Those will be further developed to ensure that they comply fully with the terms of reference. That development will most likely require further investigation and discussion between the education and library boards, in their role as planning authorities, and the FE sector.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for his answer. Is it too late for boards to receive new ideas in the current phase of area planning? I know that the Minister received a copy of 'A Better Way', which outlines proposals for education in Ballymena. However, there will be those in your Department and in boards who will see those proposals as a step too far and simply go for the easy option of closing schools. Will the Minister give me some reassurance that he will consider that document?

Mr O'Dowd: I can give the Member this reassurance: I make decisions in my Department. Someone in my Department may think that a step is too far, but I will decide whether it is a step too far. Is it too late for proposals to be brought forward? In relation to area plans, it is too late. However, it is not too late for proposals to come forward for individual schools or a group of schools. You would then enter a two-month consultation process. At that point, I would encourage every school that is affected by a development proposal, whether directly or indirectly, to bring forward any alternative proposal that they may have. I guarantee that I will give them a fair hearing before making any decision on that development proposal.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister seems to be in right form today. What measures are in place to facilitate collaboration between schools and the further education sector, particularly in terms of meeting the criteria of the sustainable schools policy?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for his question and for his concern about my well-being. I continue to examine ways of making more formal the collaboration between the Department of Education (DE) and the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL) on further education colleges in area planning. Coincidentally, one of my deputy permanent secretaries has moved to become permanent secretary in DEL. That is my loss and DEL's gain. One of the first things that we did after he departed was send him a letter to say that we want to strengthen links between Education and DEL on area planning. I am continuing to explore ways to formalise that better. We are doing a good job, but I think that we can do even better through a more formal way around planning between the two sectors.

Mr Lunn: Does the Minister accept that the further education sector has not been given as full an opportunity to participate in the area planning process as it could have been and that there may be opportunities to increasingly use that sector to deliver the entitlement framework?

Mr O'Dowd: It is not up to me to speak on behalf of the further education sector. It is up to the Minister for Employment and Learning to respond to that question. I am up for further discussions and consultation with DEL and the further education sector, and I know that the sector is as well.

I have provided substantial funds to ensure that the entitlement framework continues to be funded properly and to ensure that the resources are available for schools to use further education colleges. However, my primary responsibility is to ensure that post-primary, primary and nursery education are funded before I move beyond that scope. I note that the Minister for Employment and Learning has entered the Chamber, and he may want to respond to you on those matters later. We continue to discuss those matters with DEL. In recent days, my permanent secretary sent a letter to the permanent secretary of DEL to see how we can formalise those links better, because there is clearly a wealth of resources in the FE colleges that we should be tapping into. Many schools and area learning communities are doing that, but if it can be improved upon, we will explore it and see what we can do better.

Mr McDevitt: Has the Minister met the Minister for Employment and Learning to discuss the issue? What guarantee can he give the House that the good practice emanating from local area partnerships is being disseminated across other partnerships?

Mr O'Dowd: I have had wide-ranging discussions with the Minister for Employment and Learning during our terms in office, and, yes, we have discussed the matter. I have also met representatives of the further education colleges and discussed the matter. I repeat that we recently corresponded with DEL on how we can improve our discussions on area planning and on the use of further education colleges.

The Member mentioned working relations between the area partnerships and other partnerships. I am not sure what point he is trying to cover.

Mr McDevitt: I am not allowed to clarify.

Mr O'Dowd: I know that. The area learning communities have good working relationships among themselves and with further education colleges. Can those be improved? I suspect that they can, and we are working to improve them.

Delivering Social Change: Teachers

5. Ms McGahan asked the Minister of Education for an update on the Delivering Social Change signature project to employ 230 recently qualified teachers. (AQO 4357/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM)/DE Delivering Social Change project is progressing well. The principals of the selected schools have attended information sessions, and the first advert for recruitment of the teachers will be published during the week beginning 24 June. The 230 recent graduate teachers will be in post from September onwards. The project will ensure extra support for children in primary schools to achieve the expected levels in reading and maths at Key Stage 2. It will also provide tuition to pupils in post-primary schools who are not predicted to get at least a C grade in GCSE English and/or maths. A strategic oversight group led by the Western Education and Library Board was established with membership from the employing authorities, teaching unions and other educational stakeholders to develop and implement this important project. Detailed information about the scheme is available on the Western Board's website.

I am also pleased to announce that I am funding an expansion of the project and will be adding an extra 36 posts to bring more primary schools into the project and to ensure that every qualifying post-primary school has at least one full-time teacher, increasing from one to two teachers for larger schools.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. How many schools have so far confirmed their participation in the scheme?

Mr O'Dowd: The recruitment advertisement for the scheme will be placed in the papers from the beginning of this week, and the first tranche of teachers will be in post in September. I understand that, to date, 213 schools have formally confirmed participation in the project. The majority of schools have indicated that they are seconding a member of staff to deliver literacy and numeracy schemes and recruiting a recent graduate teacher to backfill their post.

Mr Dunne: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, and I thank the Minister for his answers to date. Can the Minister ensure equality of opportunity across the education sectors and that external opportunities will exist for young graduates rather than just internal transfers from within the school systems?

Mr O'Dowd: I can certainly guarantee the Member that there will be equality of treatment across the board. The scheme has been agreed with OFMDFM and is quite a detailed proposal. A lot of preparatory work went into it, and there was some delay in the delivery of the project. However, I think that the preparatory work was vital.

Where the delivery of the scheme is concerned, a school has to agree a work plan with the Department and the board before any newly qualified teacher will be provided. It has been agreed that the best use of any newly qualified teacher is up to the school. In those circumstances, a number of schools have said that they want to release a more qualified teacher to do the detailed work on GCSEs, because they have the skills base. The newly qualified teacher will backfill, which is an unfortunate term but is one that is recognised in the education sector. They will be teaching in classrooms, which is beneficial not only to the young people who are in front of them but to the newly qualified teacher. That is because it will give them classroom experience and will allow them to put that on their curriculum vitae when they go to look for full-time posts.

Mr Elliott: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker, and I thank the Minister for that. Given that figures show that fewer than 20% of last year's teaching graduates received full-time work, what does the Minister plan as a longer-term strategy in and around this as opposed to a plan for the short term?

Mr O'Dowd: I would like to see this programme roll out into the future. It is not dissimilar to what is happening in Scotland, where newly qualified teachers are given a year's work placement. It has its benefits, most importantly not only to the pupils involved but to the newly qualified teachers. That is because it gives them school and classroom experience that they can put on their CVs. I have backed up this project with money from the Department, and I am putting an extra £2 million towards the project, which will allow an additional 38 teachers to come on board this year. I hope that I will be in the same position to do that next year as well. So, I would like to see this programme of work being mainstreamed in the future.

Schools: Boards of Governors

6. Mr Storey asked the Minister of Education for an update on his plans to reconstitute boards of governors. (AQO 4358/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Most school boards of governors are due to be reconstituted during the 2013-14 school year. A working group, which includes staff from my Department, the five education and library boards and the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools, has been established to oversee the reconstitution process. We are fortunate to have a large number of people — over 10,000 — who willingly and freely give their time and talents to serve as school governors. I pay tribute to them and hope that many will want to continue to serve their communities in this important role. I want to see the reconstitution as an opportunity to encourage people from all walks of life to volunteer to serve as school governors. A governor recruitment campaign is planned for the autumn, and I hope that Members will join me at that stage in encouraging more people with the right skills and experience to volunteer, particularly people from groups that are currently under-represented on school boards of governors.

Mr Storey: In the light of the Minister's attempt today to convince the House that he is impartial in all the decisions that he makes and that he does not in any way give preference of treatment to any sector, what guarantee can he give the House that he will ensure that the controlled sector is not disadvantaged, particularly in the absence of a controlled sector body to oversee and assist in ensuring that the controlled sector is no longer treated as second class in our educational system?

Mr O'Dowd: The Member will be aware that, if the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) Bill and ESA were in place, the controlled sector would have a fully functioning body. That is the best way to ensure that the Member's concerns are allayed. However, I assure the Member that I have no wish or want to discriminate against the controlled sector. I put it up to any Member to show evidence to this House or to the public, the media or a court of when I have acted in any way adversely towards the controlled sector. I put it up to any Member to bring that forward, because they will not find the evidence for that.

The Member has a further guarantee. The reconstitution of boards of governors is tightly controlled under legislation, and I will ensure that that legislation is followed to the letter of the law.

Employment and Learning

United Youth Programme

1. Mr McGimpsey asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the design of the United Youth programme announced by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister on 9 May 2013. (AQO 4368/11-15)

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): Following the announcement of the programme, my officials met officials from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister (OFMDFM) to contribute to the scope, detailed design and content of the United Youth programme. Further meetings will take place to take forward more detailed design. The programme may involve a range of measures including structured employment, work experience and volunteering and leisure opportunities, along with a dedicated scheme designed to foster good relations and a shared future. It is therefore much more than a work placement opportunity. I will, however, want to ensure that the final programme design complements the various initiatives that I have put in place under the Executive strategy Pathways to Success for people who are not in education, employment or training (NEET) plus other training and employability schemes that are in place and delivering results.

Mr McGimpsey: Bearing in mind that we have one in five young people unemployed and that the programme has huge potential for that sector, when will we know the details and time frame for the roll-out of the programme and how much each successful applicant will receive as payment, stipend or wage?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question and supplementary question. Let me clarify that we do not have one in five young people unemployed at present:

that figure relates to those who are actively seeking work. It does not take into account those who are in full-time education. Obviously, the figure is still of considerable concern to us, but I want to put it into its proper context.

This is still very much a work in progress, and we are in the early days of discussions between Departments. I understand the eagerness of the Member and others that the details of this be released as soon as possible, but it is important that we get the programme right and ensure that it delivers real results for young people and builds on the existing programmes that we have, rather than doing them damage. I am confident that we can work through this and ensure that we are able to deliver it. I share the aspirations that the Member has outlined: to expand significantly the work that my Department and the wider Executive do to interact with young people, give them a stake in society and ensure that they have a sustainable future in our economy.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh míle maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. How will the outworkings of the proposal impact on the number of young people who are economically inactive?

Dr Farry: We need to see how it will work out in practice. We need to see how many people go through the various schemes during each year. However, the more we engage with our young people, the greater the impact that we will have in giving them meaningful activity and, most importantly, job opportunities.

I also highlight the importance of working through the education system and, rather than having a situation where people become NEET and we try to address that, we need to anticipate where there are vulnerabilities with young people and put in place sufficient support to engage with them, support them through education and support them in their transition to the world of work in due course.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I welcome the fact that he has had discussions with OFMDFM officials since the announcement. Will he detail the discussions that he had with OFMDFM officials before the announcement?

Dr Farry: As the Member well knows, the scheme, alongside the other components of the package, is something that was not necessarily shared with other members of the Executive. It is fair to say that I am over the shock of that experience, and we move on from it. I certainly recognise the desire and the central importance of this aspect of the wider Together: Building a United Community proposals. I understand the ambition that lies behind them and see merit in our ability to increase significantly the impact that we have in dealing with young people. My focus now is to work with other Departments to ensure that we have a very good programme in place for Northern Ireland that delivers those results.

Mr Allister: Can the Minister yet give an assurance to the House that the funding of these matters, which are being imposed by OFMDFM, will not adversely impact whatsoever on any scheme currently funded by the Department for Employment and Learning (DEL)?

Dr Farry: Once again, we are working through the details on all of this, but I have been considerably reassured by the comments that my advisers and officials have reported from discussions that they have had with their counterparts that there is a desire to build on existing provision. There are commitments that additional funding will be made available to implement not just this scheme but other aspects of the wider proposals. Again, that has still to be formally confirmed.

I take the opportunity to highlight the fact that our Pathways to Success strategy is funded and resourced to the end of this comprehensive spending review period, which is March 2015, but we need to give consideration to what the landscape and funding will be beyond that. Obviously, this programme is not a short-term intervention; it is meant to be a long-term intervention over the coming years for the young people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I again ask Members to respect the Chamber and the Minister or Member who has the Floor.

IT Skills

2. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the provision of skills for the IT industry. (AQO 4369/11-15)

Dr Farry: Skills in science, technology, engineering and maths — STEM subjects — are becoming increasingly important to our economy. That being the case, I am providing an additional 1,200 STEM undergraduate places by 2015 and a 60% increase in publicly supported PhDs in economically relevant areas.

In recognition of the high growth potential of the ICT industry in particular, I have identified ICT as a priority sector for my Department. I chair an ICT working group, which includes representation from employers, colleges, universities and other Departments. In June 2012, I launched the related ICT action plan in order to address the specific skills issues within the sector. Progress since then has been significant. For example, Queen's University and the University of Ulster have over 100 students enrolled on the new MSc courses for non-IT graduates, with many already securing employment in the sector. Undergraduate applications have also increased by over 24% at both universities. In addition, a new A level in software and systems development will be available in Northern Ireland from September 2013.

The Assured Skills programme continues to support the growth of the ICT industry. An example of that is the successful Software Testers Academy, on which a third cohort will commence training in September. That model is being adapted to meet the future needs of the ICT sector in the areas of cloud and data analytics.

Thirty-two apprentices have been employed in the local ICT sector through an apprenticeship pilot programme. A second cohort is now in train, and a higher-level apprenticeship in ICT is being piloted. Also, the wider review of apprenticeships will be of direct relevance to the ICT sector.

While these measures demonstrate our proactivity and the significant progress being made, we keep the action plan under review to ensure its responsiveness to the economic context.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his very full answer. What next steps does he envisage to build on the good progress that has been made in this sector?

Dr Farry: The Member is right to stress that this has to be something that we constantly seek to evolve; we cannot be in a standstill situation. It is worth highlighting some of the additional measures that we are now considering; indeed, there will be a meeting of the ICT working group on Wednesday to review progress and look at the new steps.

The current review of apprenticeships has major potential for the ICT sector in Northern Ireland. It will provide a form of on-the-job training in a much wider range of areas and skill levels. We are also in preliminary discussions with our universities to see whether we can encourage and increase capacity. Members will know that I have stressed that we have had a significant increase in applications for computer science at both universities, which is very much to be welcomed. However, there will come a point where capacity is reached, and we need to consider how we can move beyond that.

Also, perhaps most interestingly, we today announced the launch of the Deloitte Analytics Training Academy, which has been developed in conjunction with Belfast Metropolitan College. Again, that will take non-ICT graduates and train them in a specific area that is of relevance to our ICT sector. I suspect that Members will hear a lot more about data analytics over the coming months. It is a major growth area in the ICT sector, and one that I believe Northern Ireland is well placed to have a real impact on regarding growth.

Mr Newton: How did the Minister determine the number and the categories of students for each of the areas that he mentioned? In order to halt any frustration there might be that young people may not get a job when they qualify, has he agreed the numbers with the sector skills council?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. We could put an unlimited number of people through these areas; sometimes budgets are constraints. The ICT sector in Northern Ireland is growing. It is a major area of indigenous growth and one in which we attract significant inward investment. We are poised for tens of thousands of new jobs to be created over the coming decade or longer, and that is in the current context where we do not have a lower level of corporation tax. In the event that we had the power to lower our corporation tax, the number of jobs that we could create in the sector would be hugely significant. Therefore, it is important to do all that we can to prepare our young people in that area. There are pressures for ICT skills across the world, and it is important that we are as proactive as possible in Northern Ireland. There is significant demand for ICT-skilled workers in Northern Ireland, and our challenge is to make sure that we keep up with that. At this stage, there is no risk of an oversupply of people trained in the ICT sector.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí. In his responses, the Education Minister was at pains to say how close the working relationship was between both of you and what a good job you are both doing. You are definitely within the top two for me: the top two Alliance Ministers in the Executive, of course. Can the Minister outline what discussions are ongoing to increase the number of schools that offer computer science as a qualification instead of ICT?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. He is not too bad himself, most days. Obviously, there are good relations between my Department and the Department of Education; indeed, I am due to meet the Minister next Monday to advance a number of issues of joint concern.

The new A level that will be offered in local schools from September is an important development. It is important that we make a distinction between an A level in computer science and an A level in ICT. It is the ability to programme that really makes the difference in people's employability further down the line, and that is what companies want to see from the skilled young people coming through. There have been initial attempts to advertise the new A level to schools, but we also need to see an increase in the number of teachers who are able to educate young people in the A level. We also need to move away from the situation — I appreciate that this is not the policy of the Department of Education — where people publish sometimes slightly misleading tables for A-level results because there is an inbuilt incentive for schools to go for certain qualifications that will boost them in artificial A-level league tables rather than focus on the qualifications that will make a real difference to a young person's progression in the world of work.

Lisburn Training Centre

3. Mr Craig asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what plans his Department has for the future of Knockmore training centre, Lisburn. (AQO 4370/11-15)

Dr Farry: Following the construction of the new Lisburn campus of the South Eastern Regional College, the former Knockmore facility became surplus to requirements. The property was advertised through a public sector trawl, and the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company expressed an interest in acquiring the site. The disposal procedure has progressed under the guidance of Land and Property Services. Contracts have been exchanged, and title searches are under way. The sale is expected to be completed by the end of July 2013.

All engineering classes and a limited number of motor vehicle and construction courses were relocated from Knockmore to the college's new Lisburn campus in April 2010. That campus now has bespoke provision for engineering, construction and motor vehicle repair courses. Industry standard equipment is available in the college, including lathes, computer numerical control machines, milling machines, woodwork equipment, a mortar mill, vehicle hoists and vehicle testing equipment that replicates an MOT centre. The South Eastern Regional College's other main campuses are in Bangor, Newtownards, Downpatrick, Newcastle and Ballynahinch, with Downpatrick, Newcastle and Ballynahinch having recently built premises.

Mr Craig: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. I regard the potential sale to the Translink holding company as a good move as it is, potentially, a new stop to service the new Balmoral/Maze site. Does the Minister agree that there are increasing pressures on the technical college in Lisburn due to its success in having huge numbers now coming into the college? Is there anywhere else that can be used to expand the capacity of that college in Lisburn?

3.15 pm

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his comments. It is my understanding that we will see a park-and-ride facility emerge from the sale if it goes ahead. I will take on board his comments in relation to capacity at SERC. It is not something that has been raised directly with me, but I will undertake to ask the director if there are difficulties and, if so, how we can address those difficulties. I pay tribute to SERC for its successes. We will look to see how we can further consolidate the position of that college alongside the other colleges in Northern Ireland.

Armagh: Educational Village

4. Mr Irwin asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the proposal to create an educational village in Armagh city incorporating the Southern Regional College, Armagh campus.
(AQO 4371/11-15)

Dr Farry: While I have not seen any detailed proposals for an education village, I understand that the aim is to deliver a number of new schools on a site adjacent to the Southern Regional College's (SRC) College Hill site. The Southern Regional College provides an integrated education experience. The college will shortly present a business case regarding the building of a state-of-the-art facility aimed at providing young people with the skills needed by employers and the economy. That will likely indicate that redevelopment on the current College Hill site will be the preferred option. If the business case is satisfactory, it is likely that the scheme will progress in the very near future.

Proposals in relation to schools will be a matter primarily for the Department of Education, and I understand that no discussions have taken place at this early stage. The redevelopment of SRC can stand on its own merits and will not prejudice any other educational developments in the vicinity in the more distant future. Any school developments close to the SRC campus would further facilitate access to the entitlement framework. That opens a rich range of vocational education to help to prepare our young people for the world of work and entry into higher-level qualifications. I want young people to share experiences and not just to share physical facilities, whether that is in further education, the wider education system or society as a whole.

Mr Irwin: I thank the Minister for his reply. Has the Minister met any of the local groups, especially the Armagh Consensus for Post-Primary Education group?

Dr Farry: I have had discussions with the Southern Regional College, and I am aware that a public meeting is being held in Armagh on Wednesday evening. I look forward to having discussions with them in the near future, but I stress that my primary interest at this stage is in relation to the Southern Regional College. That development can go ahead and stand on its own merits. The wider implications for the education estate in Armagh will be for the Department of Education to take forward, rather than me.

Mrs Dobson: Can the Minister give the House an assurance that the Southern Regional College's plans for new campuses in Craigavon and Banbridge are on schedule? Can he give the House an update on progress?

Dr Farry: There already is a campus in Banbridge, and we do not anticipate any change in that regard. There may be a business case coming through for a newbuild for Craigavon that will be a replacement for the current campuses at Lurgan and Portadown. That is somewhat further off in the distance, as no site has yet been identified for that, but work is definitely under way in regard to having a better state-of-the-art facility for the Craigavon area.

Mr Dallat: Given that we are talking about campuses that are on shared sites, will the Minister take this opportunity to acknowledge the outstanding contribution that colleges of further education made during the darkest days of the Troubles? Does he agree that there is an opportunity now, given that there is a review of further education, to seek out further examples where colleges of further education can be integrated with other schools?

Dr Farry: I concur with the broad thrust of what the Member has said: our FE system in Northern Ireland is world-class. We should celebrate it, but we should also seek to build on it.

The overarching governing policy document for the FE sector, 'FE Means Business', goes back to 2004. We are reviewing that with a view to having a new policy called 'FE 2020', which will be heavily shaped by our review of apprenticeships.

The FE sector is flexible and addresses a range of education needs and outreach with the economy. I see great potential for the sector to grow further in Northern Ireland. In turn, we have a duty to ensure that campuses and facilities are state-of-the-art and up to speed.

Mr Lyttle: What role will integrated training and education have in creating a more shared system?

Dr Farry: It is worth stressing that our further and higher education systems are integrated. They may not have the capital I before them but that is what they are about. People go into them from different backgrounds and are taught alongside each other. We should welcome that in Northern Ireland. Of course, FE campuses in different parts of Northern Ireland will tend to reflect the demographic make-up of their immediate areas. However they are open, equal facilities that cherish diversity and welcome everybody from whatever background.

University of Ulster, Magee Campus

5. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the expansion of the University of Ulster Magee campus.
(AQO 4372/11-15)

Dr Farry: The One Plan has an aspiration for a university with 9,400 full-time equivalent students by 2020, including 6,000 full-time undergraduates. There is an interim target of an increase of 1,000 undergraduate places by 2015 at the Magee campus of the University of Ulster. Since taking office, I have been able to allocate 572 additional full-time undergraduate places to the University of Ulster, which undertook to deploy those at Magee. That represents excellent progress towards the 2015 target.

I will continue to seek opportunities to secure additional higher education places in Northern Ireland, thus offering more choice to our young people who may otherwise seek to study elsewhere.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Minister for his response and his efforts in securing the additional places for Magee. What is his assessment of the outline case for the expansion of the university that is with his Department? Will he also clarify whether additional work is needed to develop the business case? Go raibh maith agat.

Dr Farry: At this stage, whether or not there is a revised business case from the University of Ulster, it will not make a huge difference to what we are doing. There are two routes by which the university at Magee can expand. One is through the university making internal reallocations of student numbers, and that is an issue for it as an autonomous body. Members are entitled to lobby on that, and I have no doubt that the Member and her colleagues will do that. They will note, however, that the university is making a major relocation from Jordanstown to Belfast.

The other route is through additional places that the Executive or my Department may fund and resource in relation to the expansion of the higher education system in Northern Ireland. Over the past two years, we have managed to make considerable incremental improvements, more than we anticipated when the Budget was set in 2011. We have made good progress towards the 1,000 target. I am not ruling out further expansions in the university sector over the coming months and years. No doubt the Member will push me hard on that regard.

Mr P Ramsey: As the Minister outlined, the expansion is part of the One Plan, which is a main economic driver, managed by Illex but overseen by the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. What discussions, formal or otherwise, has the Minister had with the First or deputy First Minister in relation to expansion at Magee?

Dr Farry: We had a number of discussions on that issue over the past number of years, in particular on the tuition fee settlement for Northern Ireland. It is worth stressing that there was no expected expansion of the university sector in Northern Ireland when the Budget was set in 2011. However, we made a number of bids that were successful and will continue to do that over the coming months. I certainly recognise and respect the strength of feeling in the north-west towards Magee and how importantly it is viewed as being a driver in the economy. I know that some people would beg to differ, but I like to think that we have managed to make a significant dent in respect of the 2015 target, beyond that which, I think, people had a right to realistically expect back in 2011.

Mr G Robinson: Is the 2015 target realistic?

Dr Farry: I think that it is realistic. Of course, it is not one that I set, and neither was it set by the Executive. Bearing in mind that we are just over two years into the current comprehensive spending review period, the fact that we have allocated 572 places to Magee, out of a target of 1,000, is, I think, very good progress, and we will see how we go with regard to the target.

Mr Cree: The Minister will be aware of the importance of the Belfast campus and the advanced stage that it is at. Does he agree that that should not necessarily be at the expense of the expansion of the Magee campus? Can he give a commitment that that will not be the case?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. It would be wrong for me and, certainly, for Members to try to set Belfast against what is happening in the north-west, and I know that that has not been the case with regard to what the Member is getting at. The Belfast expansion is an important one, and it is one that I welcome. It has the effect of building up Belfast as a university city.

If Belfast, and indeed Northern Ireland, is to be internationally competitive, our higher education system will be a key driver in that regard, and the more that we can consolidate the position of the higher education sector in Northern Ireland, the better placed we are going to be. An expansion of higher education in Belfast is not mutually contradictory to an expansion in the north-west, and I am happy to work on both those angles and, indeed, on other parts of Northern Ireland.

STEM Careers: Female Participation

6. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what measures he has put in place to increase the number of females pursuing a career in science, technology, engineering or maths. (AQO 4373/11-15)

Dr Farry: From the statement I made to the Assembly on 4 June, the Member will know that I am particularly concerned about that issue. We need to encourage young women to consider studying science, technology and mathematics (STEM) in school and to consider careers in those areas. On leaving school, females tend to be better qualified than males. Females are also more likely to progress to higher education, with around 60% of our university enrolments being female. However, despite proportionately more females than males participating in higher education, females account for fewer than 30% of those graduating in STEM subjects, excluding medicine and health. Over 70% of students in ICT and over 75% of those studying engineering and technology are male.

As part of the STEM strategy, my Department is working in collaboration with organisations such as e-skills uk, Improve and Semta, which are actively promoting STEM careers to females. The wider Bring IT On campaign activities, many of which are funded by my Department, engaged with over 12,000 females in 2012-13. As part of that, more than 590 girls took part in computer clubs for girls, which are extra-curricular clubs aimed at inspiring girls to consider IT-related careers.

In association with the Equality Commission, the STEM business subgroup is running a seminar on Wednesday, entitled "Are you getting the balance right?" The seminar will identify additional steps that businesses can take to make careers in STEM attractive to women. I will follow the outcomes of that seminar and the work of the subgroup with great interest.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does the Minister agree that it is vital that we get the gender balance right so that we can encourage more females into the STEM projects and encourage them to go into careers in the STEM projects?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question and supplementary question and fully concur with what he has said. To begin with, I will go back to ICT, where we have a major imbalance in participation between the two genders. If, for example, we had equal participation from females and males in that sector, we would not only address any particular skills pressures that we have but would place Northern Ireland in an extremely competitive position internationally. That shows the potential of getting this right and ensuring that we attract people into those careers.

There are cultural myths built up around these, and there are certain stigmas building up around certain careers. They need to be broken down to ensure that people from all backgrounds and from both genders have a productive career in some of the high-growth sectors in which our economy is set to grow over the coming years.

3.30 pm

Mr Weir: I rise to speak to the first group of amendments. I will try to keep my remarks reasonably brief. I believe that we could well be in for quite a long day, so I do not want to add to that.

The group 1 amendments largely break down into five separate categories, and I will touch on each of them. First, a number of amendments from the Alliance Party touch on shared space and a range of related issues. I can see where the Alliance Party is coming from. However, I have a little difficulty in my own mind in working out how those issues could be fed directly into a planning decision regime. I am not quite sure of the compatibility. I understand and have sympathy at least with the direction that the Members are coming from. Although I would not be in a position to support them today, I understand that those issues may be subject to debate at Further Consideration Stage. Indeed, I suspect and understand that the Minister may make noises later about looking at them and that there may be the prospect of giving them further consideration. Therefore, I do not want to touch on them too deeply.

As with a number of the amendments, including ones that I tabled and that we will come to later, the shared spaces amendments and, indeed, a number of others, have rightly been tabled at Consideration Stage. The Committee has not has an opportunity to consult on them. However, I think that that is the nature of Consideration Stage; it is the opportunity to table such amendments.

Secondly, the amendments to clauses 2 and 6, largely speaking, fall into two categories. A number of amendments — in fact, probably the bulk of those in the group — might be described as simply providing additional language to clauses 2 and 6. That refers in particular to those from the Ulster Unionist Party and to some from Steven Agnew and the Alliance Party. Again, I would question some of those amendments. I suspect that the Minister will deal with them later. I know that other Members have questioned this particular aspect of them, and I also question the extent to which they add any particular value to what is there. I believe that they pretty much cover a range of areas that are already covered either in current planning law or, indeed, in the requirements in European legislation that are already in place. I do not think that simply to bring those requirements in again adds a great deal to the Bill or, indeed, to the current situation. Obviously, the Minister will deal with them later.

A number of amendments — specifically, the Alliance Party's amendment Nos 2, 9 and 15, as well as the proposal to oppose that clause 6 stand part of the Bill — might be described, effectively, as wrecking amendments. Let me make it clear: we have looked at clauses 2 and 6 with a high level of detail. I do not find favour with those amendments.

When we are looking at trying to enhance society in Northern Ireland, I believe that the economy will be a vital component. It is important that we follow through with the Executive's principal objective, which is to promote economic development. To that extent, we have simply got to look beyond our ivory towers at times and to the problems that exist, for example, with job creation and youth unemployment. In particular, when we look at all sides of the community, we see the number of young people who have had to leave these shores to find work elsewhere.

Clauses 2 and 6 are, largely, a clarification of the current legal position. In many ways, they put economic development very much at centre stage. However, they do not alter the fundamental position of planning law in connection with economic development. I think that it is helpful to have that degree of clarification. So, on that front, I back the Bill as it is currently drafted.

Clause 6 has been mentioned. For the Member who spoke previously, the issue with clause 6 was whether the economic advantages and disadvantages would in some way be sent out by the applicant to some sort of lobbyist to produce figures. That is not the way in which it is designed to work. Clause 6 is designed to allow economic advantages and disadvantages to be taken into account. Therefore, it is a matter for assessment by the Planning Service, and I do not believe that we have a great deal to fear. One of the spurious claims is that that will lead to a degree of conflict. I know that the Deputy Chair raised that concern earlier. As someone who has been involved in planning cases for many years, I have to say that that happens on the ground at any stage at present.

Those who are portraying the issue of economic development as a major problem for, for instance, residents have to realise that weighing up economic advantages and disadvantages can be a double-edged sword. As someone who has tried to suggest more often that a planning application is inappropriate rather than appropriate and who has, on occasion, represented residents in cases involving the Planning Appeals Commission, I know that one of the arguments, or attempted arguments, used is that it would not be of economic advantage, only to be told that that is not a material consideration. Therefore, it can be used as a device for both applicants and objectors. When you look at the net position of economic advantage and disadvantage, you see that it cuts both ways.

There is the fairly obvious direct opposition to clause 6. As I said, there are also the three wrecking amendments — amendment Nos 2, 9 and 15 — which try to remove the references to economic consideration. The feeling that economic development is the love that dare not speak its name in planning and that the words cannot appear anywhere in the Bill is somewhat perverse. It has to be balanced against the other provisions.

I thank the Minister for amendment Nos 7, 22 and 31. I suspect that those amendments may be one of the few areas on which we find common ground today. The issues came through the Committee, and I think that the Department has taken our concern on board by tabling the amendments. A review was suggested, and, in many ways, the timescale of that review has been fast-tracked into a three-year period following the determination in 2013. Amendment Nos 7 and 22 provide for that review, which is a sensible way in which to assess how the legislation is working in practice, and I think that that is to be welcomed.

Similarly, it was the mind of the Committee to suggest amendment No 31, which provides for clauses 2(1) and 6(1) to become operational on Royal Assent. The point was made that Royal Assent will not be instantaneous. I have every confidence that the Department will be able to produce in time the guidance and, indeed, the additional planning guidance that is needed. The Department clearly agreed with and adopted the Committee's position. At times, we have seen legislation put in place but a lack of incentive on the part of various Departments to implement it. Putting in place a strict timetable after Royal Assent is in line with what is in the Bill.

I want to touch briefly on amendment No 27, which proposes a new clause. Again, although criticism has been levelled in a different direction, I will not criticise others for the fact that there has been no consultation on the proposed new clause. The Alliance Party is entirely within its rights, as is any individual, to propose such a clause, so I do not criticise on those grounds. However, I believe that the —

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: Yes.

Ms Lo: It should not have come as a surprise to you, Peter, because it was in the Community Relations Council (CRC) submission, and we discussed it in Committee.

Mr Weir: With respect, I do not remember any proposal of that nature coming forward, but I am saying that I have no problem with it. I just find it a little bit contradictory, given that others were criticised for tabling such amendments at this stage.

The intention of the amendment has not been overly cleverly disguised, because it is quite clear that it is a direct challenge the Runkerry decision. It is clearly its intention to add weight to the opposition to that decision.

I have to say that I believe that the Department, in reaching its assessment —

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way.

Ms Lo: I am sorry, I misheard you. You are talking about the world heritage one. I was not looking at the Marshalled List. I referred earlier to the one about the CRC and shared use. It is my mistake.

Mr Weir: I accept the remarks of the Chair. I am saying that this was not something that was brought forward at Committee. Having said that, I believe that it is the perfect right of any Member to bring forward whatever amendments they want. Whether there was an attempt to disguise this as a general clause, it seems to me that it is a very direct attack on the Runkerry decision. There will be issues on which the Minister and I differ. However, I believe that he approached the Runkerry decision with a high level of prudence and evaluated all the factors in front of him when reaching that decision. This relatively blatant attempt to undermine the decision taken by the Minister and the Executive is, I think, a naked attempt to simply get additional legislation that could, presumably, at some point, be used in some level of legal challenge. I think that that is relatively unworthy. Therefore, I am opposed to amendment No 27.

With those remarks, I look forward to the rest of the debate.

Mr McCallister: Like other colleagues, I wish to see a greatly improved planning system. I would like to see one that can react speedily to the demands on it. Representing a constituency such as South Down, which is split between two planning offices, I would like to see a planning system that is consistent and does not determine results depending on what side of a boundary you fall.

I will speak predominantly on my own amendment. There seems to be some disagreement about the reasoning behind it. I will try to explain. I suppose that the main point for Mr Flanagan is that, when it comes to fracking, he is going to have to get off the fence and say what he really thinks. Anna Lo, when talking about my amendment during her contribution, talked about the dangers of having a policy vacuum before the strategic planning policy is unveiled. My amendment is an attempt to try to close the gap between when the Bill presumably receives Royal Assent and the time when the planning policy is ready. The idea of withholding enactment for an additional four months is to try to close that gap, so that the vacuum that Ms Lo talked about would be as narrow as possible. That is the reasoning behind it.

I think that I detected concern from other Members who spoke in the debate. The two clauses in question seem to go to the very heart of the debate. There is some debate as to whether we are just putting into legislation what is already in certain policies or whether we are giving it a new level; hence, we come to the other amendments, tabled by Mr Agnew, Mr Elliott and Ms Lo. To me, that means that amendment No 33, in my name, makes perfect sense, because it does help to narrow that gap. It would not mean that we would withhold the Bill from passing. It does not stipulate that. It stipulates that the Minister has an additional four months to get his planning policy statement properly nailed down and put before us, so that we do not have the vacuum that Ms Lo talked about. I think that that is an important point to make and would be a useful inclusion in the Bill.

I hope that Members will think about that when we vote on the amendments, because I think it adds to the Bill and strengthens the opportunity for the Minister to bring forward the strategic planning policy. That is an important point.

3.45 pm

It is important that we protect the environment, as Mr Elliott said, and give it necessary weight by including it in the Bill. I will support some of the amendments that have been proposed by Mr Elliott, and I would like to see the House support them because there is a consensus in some parts that you cannot ignore the environmental implications of planning decisions. It would be wrong to do so. Although there is general agreement that we want to see the economy improve and speedier planning decisions, we want the right decisions to be made and to see the reasons for those decisions in a much more transparent manner. We cannot ignore the environmental considerations in those decisions. That is why I am supporting those amendments.

The Giant's Causeway is our one site with UNESCO world heritage status. It is important that we reflect on the fact that we have a site of that standing in Northern Ireland. It is right and proper that it has that status. The Bill will change the way in which planning may be looked at up there; it will give it extra protection and lift the standing of a highly regarded site on the world stage. We should be encouraging that.

We have two more rounds of debate to come, and this has been billed as probably the least contentious of the three. I am surprised that Mr Wells may not support the UNESCO status issue, but he may be persuaded by the power of other arguments. I encourage Members to look at amendment No 33 as a useful addition to the Bill that will narrow the possible policy vacuum caused by not having a strategic planning policy in place.

Mr Attwood (The Minister of the Environment): I thank everybody for their contributions. There are some broad matters that I have to touch upon in responding to the debate generally, and I will then turn to specific matters. Some of those broad matters I will touch on in the debates on the subsequent groupings of amendments, because I think those comments will be better made at that time.

We are elected and employed, and we will not and should not be re-employed unless we demonstrate that we measure up to the opportunities and the ambition of being a legislative Assembly. This is the third piece of legislation that has come through this House from my Department in my time as Minister: the Marine Bill, the second Carrier Bags Bill and the Planning Bill. It is a matter of regret to me that the two other pieces of legislation that I hoped would have had their First and Second Stages before the summer, namely the road traffic Bill and the local government Bill, which would have made five pieces of legislation, are still with the Executive, although I continue to travel in the expectation, or merely only the hope, that they will get through the Executive this Thursday.

It would have been my ambition to have five pieces of substantial legislation at various stages of the process by now. Why? Because we have to define ourselves more and more by law and good law and more law, when required. That is the task that I, as Minister, set myself. I will come back to it later in response to Anna Lo on the second group of amendments, but that is one of the reasons why I could have taken the casual option and not moved the Bill this morning. However, to have this Chamber and government in good repute and to try to create good law on behalf of the people whom we represent, it was my judgement that it was a better course of action to bring the legislation to the House this morning and give the House the opportunity to interrogate what the Committee had come up with and what the amendments tabled today represented. Hopefully, on the far side of today and the Further Consideration Stage, you will have good law on behalf of the people whom we represent. Others will argue that I should not have moved it. In my view, that was good authority, good politics and good practice. We should try at all times to judge ourselves against those standards, if we are to measure up to the requirement of being a legislative Assembly.

It is probably inevitable that a Consideration Stage of a Bill looks primarily at the amendments. However, the amendments touch on one or two clauses in a Bill that has 28 clauses. Tom Elliott and Dolores Kelly touched on the point that the purpose of the Planning Bill in its initial drafting is nothing to do with some of the amendments that have now been tabled. We should not lose sight of the wood for the trees: the purpose of the Planning Bill — at times, I received contrary advice from officials in this regard — was to bring into the life of planning now, particularly in advance of RPA in 700 days, the structural and architectural changes that will make planning more and more fit for purpose. Look through some of the clauses in the Bill. What does it try to create? A statement of community involvement; pre-application community consultation; who might conduct public inquiries; matters that might be raised at a planning appeal; what should be the shape of planning agreements; what we do about tree preservation orders; and what the power should be of the Planning Appeals Commission to award costs. In those five or six examples was an attempt to put into the life of planning now the structural changes that will make planning more fit for purpose now and, in particular, more fit for purpose when planning is devolved to local councils in 700 days.

Why did I make that political judgement, which, I think, remains the right one? I made it because devolving planning to local councils in May or June 2015 is an enormous challenge and a great opportunity. The more we can get it right now and in the next two years, the more it will be right for the councils and all those who live in the new council areas. That is the primary purpose of the Bill. Whatever the debates today might be around the amendments, we should not lose sight of the fact that that is the primary purpose of the Bill. There has been a relative lack of comment from Members today about what the Bill is really about as opposed to what some people think it is about or what others may want it to be about. We should not lose sight of all that.

Mr Boylan raised an interesting point. It was interesting because of what it revealed — that is not a criticism of Mr Boylan; I live with planning every day. It is in my face and in other people's faces, if that is not too rude a comment. There are things going on that I and others know about, but they might not be widely known about, even though they reflect well on the planning system. The example that I will give, before I give a series of examples, came from Mr Boylan's contribution. He said that you could have a situation where pharmaceutical or life science industries were located on industrial sites and could have their business opportunities and potential growth compromised by the fact that an applicant — Mrs Kelly knows about this; she knows what I am going to talk about — especially one from, let us say, a waste background, attempts to build a waste facility next to them. Mr Boylan said that the planning system needed to deal with that and give certainty to life science businesses that their future ambitions would not be compromised by having a dirty plant nearby, as they need a clean environment, clean air and all the rest.

In October 2011, there was a planning appeals decision in respect of an applicant who had been denied planning permission. What for? A waste facility. Where? Next to Almac in Craigavon. On the far side of that planning appeals decision, we went away and changed planning guidance to ensure that, in the future, if an applicant came along to create something that was not compatible with, for example, existing pharmaceutical or life science businesses on an industrial estate, the guidance would be that that should not happen. What did that do? It gave confidence to the likes of Almac to invest, and out of that confidence — a confidence that was contributed to in many other ways, including by DETI and INI — came the announcement two weeks ago of new jobs in Almac.

The point of that story is that, when there is a problem in planning that is hostile to or an impediment to economic opportunity — surely jobs in the life science and pharmaceutical industries are added-value employment opportunities in this part of the world — you have to go at it hard and try to solve it. You can solve it, as that example demonstrates

Complementary to that were the comments by Simon Hamilton, who said that I had a personal involvement in article 31 decisions. In my view, planning Ministers, whoever they are, should have a personal involvement in article 31 applications. Why? Because they are decided by the Minister, they have significant economic opportunity and they are particularly challenging because there could be consequences for our heritage and environment. I do not think that having a role in article 31s is personal to me; it is a role that all planning Ministers should interrogate. So, just as the Almac example demonstrates that a problem identified in the planning system can be resolved and worked through in a way that enables further development and economic opportunity, similarly, when it comes to article 31s, the Minister, whoever that Minister is — I am sure that the Ministers before me should have been and would have wanted to be judged against the same standard — should personally be involved. If necessary, he or she should micromanage consistent with good evidence and good process. The consequence of that is that a decision has been made on 75% of the 60-odd article 31s that I inherited in May 2011. Yes, some of them are going to planning appeal, but a decision has been made on about 75% of them.

The point is that, whatever about people tabling amendments — people are entitled to table amendments, and I welcome the debate, because the more we get to the essence of what is required around planning, the better we are, even if, as I will say in a minute, I do not like some of the amendments — there are ways and means in the planning system, in a complementary way to the Planning Bill, to do that which is necessary to achieve a planning system that is most fit for purpose.

Two Fridays ago, on the way back from London, I had a meeting in the City Airport. Who with? Tony O'Neill from Moy Park. Why? Because, given the crisis we have had with our meat, Moy Park has an ambition to potentially build or to help people to build 400 chicken houses over the next period. Why? Because, on the far side of that, there will be 2,200 jobs. What is the benefit of that? Beyond the fact that there will be work for people, it will build up the profile of agrifood in the North when the consumer and even the big retailers have big issues around the agrifood chain. So, that is another example of how — whatever about the Bill and whatever some in other Departments think they can do when it comes to the planning system — unless you actively manage the planning system, you will not be able to change it. If you actively manage it and have a series of interventions around planning, working with the law as it may or may not be passed by the Assembly, you can get to a far better place.

4.00 pm

I am not in denial about there being issues around the planning system, but nobody should be in denial that many of those corners have been turned over the past while and there are still corners to turn. I met one of the trade organisations recently. It wrote to me that there had been some changes and improvements but really the thing had not changed much. Yet, after hearing the narrative around where planning is and the ambition to change it further in the future, they left that room with the conclusion that planning was to be different. People in the Chamber today have been, in my view, somewhat casually saying what the weaknesses are in the planning system, rather than talking about the scale of what has and has not happened.

I will give some further examples. The planning system has seen decisions on new article 31 applications for Windsor Park, Narrow Water bridge, the police college and others all in or around six months or less. Windsor Park was decided in 11 weeks. When it comes to renewable energy applications — I have figures here, and I will lodge them in the Library — over the last year, more than 600 individual wind turbines applications have been issued. When it comes to the issue of renewables — in my view, Ireland's biggest economic opportunity — the problem is not planning; the issue will be whether those who got the approvals can pay the cost of taking them forward and whether they will get grid connection in any case. So, a look at the Department's actions in changing planning guidance around life sciences, the article 31s, the renewable energy applications, permitted development rights, the timelines generally for minor, intermediate and major applications and so on and so forth demonstrates more and more the good authority of the planning system, which must more and more demonstrate that good authority in the future. That is the narrative that has to be told, rather than the casual approach of some who think that the planning system has not changed that much and needs more fundamental review.

Mr Hamilton commented on what was said to the Committee in respect of the Planning Bill by the statutory adviser to the Department, the CNCC. I was not aware of those comments. I have had differences of opinion with the CNCC or its members heretofore, but, whatever that person did or did not say — people are wise enough to draw conclusions about what that person is purported to have said and whether it is or is not valid — people have the right to dissent. My view is that there is much to dissent from. Our society is the better because people demanded the right to dissent, and there was much from to dissent from over many decades. If people do not dissent, what is the point in many things? Whatever about that individual's comments about the Planning Bill, I will be very precious about protecting that person's right to express those views. If they are not the prevailing wisdom around things, so be it.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I am sure that you are glad to hear that I will deal now with the amendments that have been tabled. I intend to go through them, because I am not somebody who thinks that there should be a one-size-fits-all approach to amendments and that we are for all of them or against all of them. Although I have a view on the character of the amendments that have been tabled today — I advised my Executive colleagues this morning of my view of them — I want to explain in some detail what there may be an opportunity to move forward positively, what we should just oppose and what I am prepared to accept the will of the House on, where one or two particular amendments are concerned, although I am not willing to support them.

Before doing so and having been prompted by the Deputy Chair of the Committee, I will just confirm a number of matters that, I think, are important, because the Committee asked for this reassurance. First, before doing so, however, I again acknowledge the Committee's co-operation and hard work during the process. As the Deputy Chair indicated, this moved very promptly on the far side of the Committee Stage, unlike — he did not name it — the Marine Bill, which did not move so promptly.

Mr Hamilton: They balance each other out.

Mr Attwood: It does balance things out, although there was maybe a lesson in the Marine Bill. We took time to get it right. Maybe, on this occasion, others have not taken time to get things right. I am sure that we will come back to that when discussing the second group of amendments shortly.

Given that the Committee asked about this and I want to advise the Assembly of it, I also confirm that the Department will publish the single strategic planning policy statement at the earliest possible opportunity. I intend to do that with the aim of publishing it for public consultation later this year. The Chair of the Committee is noting that as I speak.

I will explain why we are going down the road of a single strategic planning policy statement. It is my view that there are too many words on planning in the North and not enough clarity on the meaning and outcome of all those words. Borrowing from the Scottish Government's experience — they are reviewing their single planning policy statement, and they gathered it all in one place in a single statement and collapsed the number of words down but did not change the fundamentals of the values, law or policies that should inform planning going forward — I think that that is the right approach here. So, as part of the most radical reform of planning in a generation in this part of the world, capturing in a single planning policy statement the purpose and principles of planning and planning policy statements in a way that provides a pathway to all those who want to understand and navigate the planning system, be they developer, community or third party, is, I think, the right approach.

Consultants were recently appointed, and they are already in conversation with external organisations about the shape of all that. The intention is that, by the end of this year, there will be a consultation on the single strategic planning policy statement. There is also the further ambition thereafter that, in time for the devolution of planning functions to local government, we will have a single strategic planning policy statement to help everybody but particularly the councils as they undertake the heavy responsibilities of planning going forward.

The Deputy Chair invited me to confirm this, so I will also advise that the statement will elaborate on planning policy in relation to the threefold policy requirements in clause 2, which might be broadened before the end of the day: furthering sustainable development, promoting or improving well-being and promoting economic development. As Members have rightly pointed out, those principles and words need to be shaped so that those who are engaging with or are responsible for the planning system have greater certainty about what they all mean.

Without getting into some of the more controversial words, I will give you an example. It is my understanding that the clause promoting or improving well-being was a consequence of a late discussion at the Committee Stage of the Planning Bill that became the Planning Act 2011. As I understand it, there had not been much conversation about what promoting or improving well-being might be. There might have been some intention that the word "well-being" was being borrowed from the wider concept of the power of well-being, which at that time was being discussed in the Local Government Bill as part of the character of local government reform on the far side of RPA.

Therefore, the concept of promoting or improving well-being needs further definition, and it will be further defined through the single strategic planning policy statement. I will come back to that in a moment.

The Committee for the Environment asked me, a request that was repeated by the Deputy Chairperson, to confirm to the Assembly that the words "promoting", "furthering" and "improving" can be treated as meaning the same thing. The sections in the Planning Act 2011 that relate to sustainable development and well-being have different words: one has "furthering" while another one has "promoting" and "improving". Now we have an amendment that deals with promoting economic development, and, subject to the will of the Assembly, there may even be, under clause 2, a new sub-paragraph (iv) inserted in section 1(2)(b) of the 2011 Act to deal with environmental protection.

It seems that there are multiple words that mean the same thing, or might mean the same thing. Having taken advice at the request of the Committee, I cannot confirm to the Assembly that the words "promoting", "furthering" and "improving" can be treated as meaning the same thing. Consequently, I intend to table an amendment at Further Consideration Stage that will provide consistency of approach for the three, or perhaps four, statutory requirements that relate to the concepts of sustainable development, well-being and economic development. I will do so in order to ensure that, rather than have multiple words that might not mean the same thing, we try to have the same words that mean the same thing around those concepts.

I now turn to the amendments. First, I will deal with amendment Nos 1, 8 and 14, standing in the name of Mr Agnew. He said that he wanted to insert the word "social" but then went slightly further. I will check the Hansard report, but I believe that he said that, when he used the word "social", he meant public health. That only confirmed my concern about what was intended. I accept that the amendments are well-intentioned, but I also have to conclude that the narrowing of the word "well-being" to "social well-being" and the further narrowing of the word "social" to mean public health is not the way to go forward.

For example, there was an initial proposal in the local government Bill that councils should have a power of well-being. It may well be that when the legislation comes to the Assembly, it will be a different power — the power of general competence. There is a view among many parties that the power of general competence is a better power to give to councils if it is used wisely and properly and does not allow for the expansion of local authorities' responsibility beyond that which it is proper for them to do.

If we are going to have in law a concept of promoting or improving well-being, which is to be defined by a single strategic planning policy statement, it is better to use the word "well-being" rather than narrow it immediately to "social well-being" and then narrow it further, employing the words used by Mr Agnew. If it was originally the intention to borrow that concept from the wider power of well-being in the local government Bill, I do not think that our councils will have been very impressed that "well-being" was to be narrowed to mean social well-being, and potentially narrowed again thereafter.

For the purposes of the Bill, to be consistent with the 2011 Act that was endorsed by the parties in the Assembly, and to ensure that well-being is not narrowly defined — it should not be conceptually narrowly defined but should be more broadly defined under the single strategic planning policy statement — it is better to retain the word "well-being" in the Bill rather than the more narrow concept of "social well-being". I invite Mr Agnew to reflect on that. That is why I said that there cannot be a one-size-fits-all solution. This is an example of where the better and wiser approach is the one that gives the planning process the capacity to shape that solution.

4.15 pm

Remember that the single strategic planning policy statement will be subject to Executive approval. It will not be a unilateral act by a Minister: it will go to the Executive, as all planning policy statements have to. We witnessed one last week, namely PPS 16 on tourism. That had to go to the Executive, and it was then interrogated by the Assembly. It is better to keep that concept wide. Without putting words into the Member's mouth, my sense is that most people will want the concept to be broader rather than narrower. The Member might wish to reflect on that. If the amendment is moved, I will urge Members to not support it for the reasons that I have outlined.

There is a series of amendments on environmental protection, namely amendment Nos 3, 4, 10, 11, 16 and 17, which require the Department to carry out its functions under part 2 of the 1991 order with the further objective of promoting environmental protection. As I will outline in some detail, issues around the environment are already promoted, when it comes to their protection, legislated for and, in practice and policy, accommodated in the planning system. I will explain that in some more detail when it comes to the amendments in respect of UNESCO world heritage sites. Although I have given the Executive the advice that these amendments should not be backed, in this case, unlike with the previous amendment, the will of the Assembly can prevail. When it comes to this issue of the environment, if the will of the Assembly is that, in one way or another, the view is to be reflected on the face of the Bill, so be it. I understand why the Assembly might want to go in that direction.

The advice I have given to the Executive is to oppose these amendments because there is an issue around process when it comes to some of them. It is not the best of process — and you can end up, as a consequence, not having the best of law — to have amendments of substance coming in at late stage in the absence of consultation, even though tabling such amendments is the entitlement of Members. It may be that the great legal authority in this place would give the advice that, as long as there has been an Assembly process, the threshold of consultation has been achieved. That may be the case, and it may ultimately be the view of the High Court in the event of any challenge, but I do think that —

Mr Flanagan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

I do think that when it comes to substantial amendments, there is a better approach, even if the approach of substantial amendments coming in at the Consideration Stage is not a fatal one when it comes to legislative authority.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for giving way. He said that the amendments on environmental protection or promoting environmental protection have not been out for public consultation. Does he not agree that the substantial number of pieces of correspondence that we have all received calling for those measures to be introduced is a form of consultation? It may not have been proactively started by his Department or by the Committee, but that is the overwhelming view of the majority of the people who have contacted MLAs.

Mr Attwood: I do not discount or diminish in any way the campaign that has been conducted over the past number of weeks. Does that legally qualify as consultation? Does that meet the higher threshold of participation? Does that attain the various requirements in respect of consultation under our legislation, never mind wider policy? No, it does not. The reason I make that argument is that, last week, Stephen Hammond, a Minister in the Department for Transport, wrote me a curious letter in which he accepted the need for a new consultation on what the options might be in respect of the future of the Driver and Vehicle Agency (DVA) office in Coleraine and the 300 or more jobs up there and around the North. Why did he make that argument? It was because I made an argument to him and to his predecessor over the past two years that there are requirements generally and specifically in respect of consultation in Northern Ireland, that the threshold of consultation had not been fulfilled in respect of the DVA jobs, and that, in any case, there had not been a proper assessment of the impact of closure.

We have legally preferred mechanisms for consultation, never mind the higher requirement of participation. Amendments that come at this stage do not qualify. Nobody should pretend that they do qualify, whatever about 6,000 pieces of correspondence from whomever those might have come, as important as those are and as important as it is that we take heed of them.

That is my concern about these amendments. That said, given that, in my view, some of these amendments are not fundamentally deficient and there are other amendments that we will come to later this afternoon that, in my view, are deficient fundamentally, politically and in policy, governmental and legal terms, if the will of the Assembly is to pass one or other of these, that is for the Assembly to determine. However, I have made the argument to my Executive colleagues that I do not think that this is an amendment that should be accepted on environmental or process grounds. I will comment on it further after I give way.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for giving way. I appreciate what he is saying. Obviously, I think that the Ulster Unionist Party amendment would give the environment more protection. Does the Minister accept Mr Anderson's argument that the amendments proposed to clause 2 would stifle economic growth?

Mr Attwood: No. I will come to that when we deal with the amendments relating to the concerns about economic development, but I do not accept that argument. I suppressed a planning policy statement 18 months ago. Why? In my view, it was a legal minefield and it gave too great a priority to economic issues. What is different about the clause as drafted, and what might be different if the clause were amended, is that it does not give any greater weight to economic considerations. It restates some material considerations in the planning system but does not elevate any of those considerations to a point where they are greater than others. All considerations, those in the Bill and others that might not be, and all the planning policy statements and all the policy and practice generally will inform the outcome of a planning application. I would not table clause 2 as currently drafted if I were not reassured in that regard. I will come back to that point shortly.

On amendment Nos 3, 4, 10, 11, 16 and 17, I will say that the environmental protection agenda is catered for through a wealth of European, national and local legislation, policy and practice. The Department is already bound by statute, such as the EU habitats directive, to protect the environment. In addition, the Department is bound by regulations such as the Planning (Environmental Impact Assessment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1999 and the Environmental Assessment of Plans and Programmes Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2004. The 1991 order contains provision for the protection of listed buildings, conservation areas and trees that are subject to tree preservation orders.

Furthermore, the Department has well-established policies for environmental protection such as PPS 2, PPS 6, PPS 11 and PPS 15. Consequently, I argue that the Department is statutorily bound to protect the environment in the exercise of its functions, that it is fulfilling that role, and that this amendment is, therefore, not required. Members have heard what I have said. They have heard the advice that I have given to the Executive. If the will of the Assembly is different, that is for the Assembly to determine.

Mr Wells: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way.

Mr Wells: I am interested in what the Member is saying. Most of the directives that he has quoted are aimed at the protection of natural habitats — SPAs, SACs, ASSIs, etc. I had a problem in my constituency about five years ago with the mass demolition and replacement of old houses in places such as Newcastle. In one case, one house went down and an application came in for 35 apartments. That met massive opposition from the local community. The building was not listed, there was no TPO, and there certainly were no natural history issues such as any plants or animals of importance. Could it be argued under the new clause 2 that the construction of those apartments would have created 15 temporary jobs and one full-time job looking after the apartments? In that situation, how would the existing protections override the economic benefits?

Mr Attwood: It will come down to the words that are used, and the courts will adjudicate on that. If there are words that give elevated status to any material consideration, be it about the heritage, the environment, tourism or economic development — if there are words that, on the far side of this law or a single planning policy statement or within the current planning policy statement policy or practice, and that, after proper interrogation and assessment by the relevant authorities, including the Executive and the Assembly, give some enhanced and elevated status in the way that Mr Wells might be hinting at, you would be worried. However, that is not what is on the face of the Bill and is not a consequence of it. That is not happening in the planning system at present. I had concerns about PPS 24, and I suppressed it because, in my view, it carried the risk that issues of economic priority could have an enhanced status in a way that was damaging to the wider material considerations. I suppressed that approach, but I am satisfied with this approach. Anna Lo is not here at the moment, but I will come back to the reasons for that approach subsequently.

I am satisfied that clause 2 as it is, or even clause 2 as it might be amended, subject to the amendment that I will move at Further Consideration Stage next week, does no violence to the material considerations in the planning system. Yes, it certainly restates one in the Bill, but in restating those words in the Bill, it will, while putting them in law, not have any material impact on enhanced status for that matter when it comes to planning applications. It is curious that the advice given independently to the Environment Committee — I have not seen that advice, but it is referred to in its report and was commented upon at some length by Mr Hamilton this morning — and the advice that I have received from lawyers all confirms the view that although there may be something written into law, if the words in the law do not give something greater status, enhanced status or greater priority, then, on the far side of a planning application, it cannot be treated in that differential way when it comes to economic development.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for giving way and for providing a wee bit of clarity. If this will not give any greater weighting to the economic materials, what is the purpose of the Bill and the two clauses?

4.30 pm

Mr Attwood: That is a fair question. It might even be a question that you might want to put to your colleagues in the Executive. It is a question that might be put to other members of the Executive. I did not go out of my way to seek in the Bill anything further than what was in the Act when it came to clause 2. However, others thought that it was important, and I understand why they thought it important to send out the message that the planning system in Northern Ireland is welcoming but will not compromise, as I see it, on all the material considerations that gather together in advance of a planning decision being made. I thought that it was interesting that Mr Hamilton outlined at some length and repeatedly that, whatever the words are in the Bill, they do not add in any way, shape or form to economic development having any enhanced status in the planning system. I took a note of his words, and they will be in the Hansard report. Mr Hamilton will confirm that he said that. I did not seek these words, but I did seek getting planning legislation onto the Floor of the Chamber because, in my view, you can never do enough to reform planning to make it more fit for purpose. In particular, the run down to RPA meant that we had a responsibility as legislators to try as best as possible to create a planning system that is as fit as possible for our colleagues and the management of councils and the officials in the planning system who will transfer across to councils. In my view, we had a responsibility to try to make that as good as it could be to ensure that they could make decisions as good as they could in the interests of the ratepayers, citizens and communities that they will represent on the far side of May or June 2015. In accepting that that was a requirement to release something from the Executive, I made sure that, as Mr Hamilton has confirmed and my legal advice and my own judgement confirms, there is nothing in those words or in any of those words that does violence to the wider material considerations and to the proper process when it comes to clause 2 and its impact on planning decisions.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Mr Boylan asked an important question on clauses 2 and 6. He asked about clarifying what economic advantages and disadvantages might be taken account of, and Anna Lo also referred to this matter. How would the assessment be made? Would planning officials have the capacity to make these economic assessments? Would you not have to end up employing all these economic consultants to help the planning system make judgements? Given that economic development is already a material consideration and has been for as long as I know, it is already part of the narrative around planning decisions. Some may argue — I do not — that somehow or other these words in the Bill enhance that requirement. I do not agree, but, in any case, economic considerations have been part of the planning system forever and a day, I assume. That certainly goes back a long time, and rightly so because the planning system is, clearly, an economic driver. Economic drivers result in economic development and economic opportunity for our people. Therefore, around some of the suite of planning policy statements is the issue of economic opportunity.

Ms Lo: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

This day last week or certainly within the past two weeks, I outlined to the Assembly the consequence of PPS 16 on tourist development. We said that when it came to tourist development outside settlements in the rural countryside, there will be three opportunities for self-catering accommodation in the countryside around existing amenities, existing hotels and a third example that has gone put of my head as I speak. The point is that PPS 16 shapes the rural and settlement tourism strategy in a way that, on the one hand, creates sustainable and high quality accommodation and which, on the other hand, enables economic development to happen. I will give way to the Member.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for giving way. Does the Minister agree that although economic development has always been considered as a material element, that was only in policy? You are now putting economic development into the statute book, and it is on a legal footing.

Mr Attwood: I put this to the Member: do the amendments proposed by the Alliance Party and others — in fact, three parties — to advance environmental protection or the environment generally all of a sudden create some priority around the environment, compared with the other elements in clause 2? No, they do not. If those amendments are passed, or if the Bill as drafted is passed, it creates or expresses in law issues that are already, in practice, considered as material considerations. It does no more and no less than that. The advice given to your Committee and to me, and my own judgement, is that that is the situation. If there were words of greater extravagance — whether on well-being, sustainable development, economic development or the environment or environmental protection — or words that added something more, your fears would be justified, and the worst fears of many of those who wrote in might be justified. However, that is not what is in the Bill. People should draw their conclusions from what is in the Bill. To do that, they have to read what is in the Bill; and what is in the Bill, in respect of economic development, is what is in policy as well. It is no more and no less.

Let me go back to Mr Boylan's question about clarifying economic advantages and disadvantages in respect of the amendments to clauses 2 and 6. That work is still ongoing; I indicated that earlier. However, in order to be helpful, and as the SPPS guidance might be a toolkit for planners and planning authorities, including the councils in the future, I can tell you that assessment of economic advantages and disadvantages is likely to focus on three key areas. The first is a proportionate approach, depending on the scale, size and location of the proposal; secondly, the long-term sustainable economic advantages or disadvantages; and thirdly — this will be of interest to people who see in this some worst fear — economic advantages and disadvantages in the public, as opposed to the private, interest. So, when it comes to the strategic advice that might be given on the far side of this law being passed, if that is what happens, there will not just be an assessment of what is in the private interest; there will be an assessment of the economic development that is in the public interest.

The clause as was drafted was accepted in order to move the Bill into the Assembly and to get planning more fit for purpose generally in the rundown to RPA, and although some have read their worst fears into it and others have genuine anxieties, I differentiate between the two. Those who create worst fears around any aspect of public policy in the North should be treated, in my view, with some caution. However, I am sure that many of the people who wrote in have expressed their genuine concerns. In all those ways, and I say this cautiously, there is a triple lock. The triple lock is this: the words in the law are no different from the material consideration words; the guidance will be in the image that I have outlined; and, in any case, if you begin to stray beyond that, there will be ways to hold you to account, including through the courts.

Mr Wells: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes, Mr Wells.

Mr Wells: I have received probably more correspondence about this issue than anything else, apart from same-sex marriages. It is important that we deal with one of the reasons for opposition that was given to me. The Minister has now outlined the three factors that constitute economic public gain. Someone asked me whether that is not an economist's dream. Already out there, consultancies will be being established all over Northern Ireland, not only to represent applicants who have to meet that criteria and draw up a very comprehensive statement of the economic benefits of their proposed developments, but for opponents, who will also be forced to go out and hire economists to draw up arguments in opposition. I am not expressing a view either way, but it is important that we establish whether this will require applicants and opponents to engage the services of highly-paid, expensive consultants to argue both sides?

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for his question. In one way, it brings me back to the contents page of the Planning Bill. The first thing is that, if you go to some of the planning seminars these days, Mr Deputy Speaker, with all due respect to them — I have a lot of respect for them — you will find firms, legal and otherwise, looking for new streams of work. If there is any place that they are looking for those new streams, it is around European obligations, the wild birds directive and the habitats directive, in particular. If there is to be a legal challenge or if developers or applicants are going to look for opportunities to impede work or maximise their opportunity out of this Bill, I am sure that there will be plenty of professionals who will be giving them advice so to do. Without anticipating the next stage of the Bill, that is why I told the First Minister (FM) and deputy First Minister (DFM) that their proposals about economically significant zones run counter not just to the Northern Ireland Act but to the European Convention and European obligations. Why do I say that? Because, as we learnt around the A5, such obligations can be very challenging, without getting into the rights and wrongs of that particular judgement. The requirements around the habitats and wild birds directives can be very challenging, and you cannot short-circuit them. You cannot go round them. You cannot go through them. You have to honour and be seen to honour them, but the FM and DFM, or their parties, are proposing amendments that, in my view, try to short-circuit them.

When it comes to Mr Wells's point about whether there are people out there who will look at the Bill and think, "happy days", I think that there are people out there who are looking for opportunities to give best advice to their clients, be it companies or communities, about the demands and challenges of the planning process, not least because of the habitats and wild birds directives and other European obligations. As long as they are giving best advice, and as long as the community, the applicant and government comply with best process, I do not have any problem with it. I will come back to that point.

One of the frustrations about this debate, which has been highlighted by that question, is that, if the Planning Bill is passed, and this was one of the ambitions of bringing the Bill forward earlier than might have been the case, there is going to be, through clause 5, pre-application community consultation. Why? It is so that you create equality of arms as best you can between those who have a development proposal and those who might be affected by that proposal. It is so that you build into and embed within the planning process and outcomes the interests of the citizens and the communities. That is why clause 5 requires, when it comes to significant economic applications, a pre-application community consultation. Not only would they have to conduct that, but the developer or the agent acting on behalf of the developer would have to submit a report to the planning system, which I hope will be the Department of the Environment (DOE), not the FM and DFM. They would have to submit a planning application that reports on how that community consultation might happen.

On the one hand, there may be people out there who, for self-serving reasons — a number of developers in particular, in my view, have self-serving reasons around the planning system in the North as well as genuine reasons regarding their approach to the planning system — will look for opportunities to maybe manage this Planning Bill, especially if it is amended as people are suggesting, for their own interests. But, as long as they comply with best advice and best law, and as long as there is more equality of arms between citizens, the community and those with development proposals, the fear that Mr Wells outlined can be mitigated. I will give way.

Mr Wells: The Minister has been his usual articulate self, I must say, and he has certainly been dealing with the points from his perspective very well. To some extent, he has helped explain things to Members. I have a final point. He says that those consultants are out there, and I accept that, but does the very fact that he has now outlined the three criteria which must be assessed for public benefit not compel developers to put that in as part of the planning application? That is something which, perhaps, they may not have had to do before. Is that not going to be costly?

4.45 pm

Mr Attwood: I try to be a Minister who accounts and tries to disclose. That is why I indicated the likely content of the single planning policy statement, after the process is exhausted and after the Executive have or have not agreed to it, when it comes to issues around clauses 2 and 6 and the economic advantages and disadvantages. I gave you an insight into what the thinking might be. It might be that that will be adjusted because of the process of consultation, never mind when the Executive, or more particularly, some Ministers in the Executive, get their hands on it, and Mr Wells might have some sympathy with that view.

I tried to be helpful, but I would not draw conclusions today on the basis of what I said about what might happen in 18 months. We will see what the process leads to; we will see what the single strategic planning policy statement ends up with, and we will see what the words in the guidance might be in respect of all those issues in these clauses, including the one around economic development.

I would not rush in and draw conclusions, but I give the reassurance that, in drafting the single strategic planning policy statement, it will not be a developers' charter nor a developers' free for all: it will be the balanced outcome that I think has been demonstrated over the past couple of years. It was not easy to tell Moy Park the outcome of the Rose Energy proposal, because it is one of our biggest employers in the North. Agrifood is one of our greatest opportunities in the North, and there is opportunity to grow it disproportionately over the next number of years. That is why, before Mr Wells came in, I was talking about the conversation that I had with Mr O'Neill from Moy Park. However, in those circumstances, the environmental imperative had to prevail, just as, in exceptional circumstances, I had to recognise the economic opportunity in respect of the Runkerry hotel and golf club proposal.

Mr Wells: I thank the Member for giving way. I have to ask this question, because it has been put to me scores of times. To be fair to the Minister, he has taken points that have been raised by the public and answered them very well, so I have no complaints. Scores of people have talked to me about fracking, and there are very diverse views on fracking: some think that it is the ultimate panacea to our energy problems and others, mostly in Fermanagh and south Tyrone, are bitterly opposed to it.

We know enough about fracking to know that an economic assessment of fracking would show that the economic benefits to Northern Ireland would be profound. Only a fool would not realise that a cheap source of energy available in Northern Ireland that does not have to be imported and is readily accessible would bring profound economic benefits to Northern Ireland. The other side of the argument is that it would have profound environmental consequences. Given the model that the Minister has outlined, I would have thought that the economists would win hands down. The economics are so pronounced in favour of the Northern Ireland economy that the economists would win the argument hands down. Does that not put those who are opposed — the local communities — in a very difficult position?

Mr Attwood: I heard that argument being made in respect of the Moy Park proposal for a chicken litter facility on the banks of Lough Neagh. I have to be careful because the applicant has lodged a notice of appeal and the papers are being prepared. However, I have heard the argument that, given the scale of the chicken litter issue in the North, given the risk of infraction from Europe, and given that it was only around that time that the competition for alternative mechanisms to deal with chicken waste were commenced by Invest Northern Ireland (INI) and the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI), the economic imperative has to prevail. People were saying that this is one of our biggest employers with the opportunity for big growth and, in a situation where people are looking for food security, how can you say no? In my judgement, the call should have been made earlier than I made it, and even I should have made the call earlier than I made it. However, in my view, the environmental and heritage imperative prevailed.

I had a look at the site privately, because I try to do that with article 31s. Irrespective and independent of the issues around roads, transport, the residential amenity and going into and out of small villages, it was literally on top of a lough.

On the far side of the Planning Bill, based on the factors that I took into consideration at that time, if any Minister were to look at it in the same way as I do, they would make the same decision in respect of that sort of application because the law and the words in the law are not materially changed. If they were materially changed, there would be enhanced consideration of economic development, but they are not. Consequently, if I had to make a decision on the far side of the Bill, as clause 2 is drafted, I would have no basis in law, policy or practice to give any enhanced standing to the issue of economic development when it came to that proposal. That is where I draw the reassurance. I would not have allowed — I need to be careful — I would have resisted that clause at the Executive if I had thought that the decision in respect of a Moy Park/Rose Energy application would, as a consequence of that clause, have led me or a future Minister to make a different judgement. I will give way to the Member.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for giving way. I fully accept that he is dealing with his response to Mr Wells in relation to clause 2, but the argument that Mr Wells made in relation to clause 20, which is in the next set of amendments, would not have much hold: Fermanagh could be declared an economically significant zone and fracking could be allowed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this is a convenient time to remind Members to avoid going into the next set of amendments.

Mr Attwood: I will not get into the next set of amendments, but, in response to Mr Wells's comment about fracking, my view is that there should be an enhanced precautionary approach. It is only on the far side of all the science that a considered judgement can be made in respect of fracking. All the science that is emerging from America, from the island of Ireland because of the exercise being conducted by the Northern Ireland Government and the Republic Government, as well as the research and science in Britain and the working group on unconventional fossil fuels as part of the European Union, will create a narrative around the science and research in respect of fracking.

In my conversations with the American EPA over the past two St Patrick's Days, my sense is that they are more cautious about fracking in America because they have less information than they might otherwise want around what is being carried out in respect of fracking, not least in the relevant shale fields in Pennsylvania. There should be an enhanced precautionary approach. For the reasons that I outlined in respect of the Rose Energy application, the law in respect of the Bill does not give any enhanced economic reason to say yes or no to any energy application than might otherwise be the case. That is and remains my view.

I want to address a point that was made by the Chair of the Environment Committee, who is not present at the moment. He said that our planning system is not working as it should, and he referred to applications by farmers where there are grant requirements. All I can say to the Member, in his absence, is that the Agriculture Minister wrote to me some months ago and asked me about a timeline issue in respect of about 22 applications where farmers had the opportunity to draw down a grant as part of the diversification or development of their farming interest. We interrogated all those applications. Most were at a very advanced stage, if not already approved, and those that had not been approved were managed in such a way as to make sure that grant requirements were fulfilled. There were one or two cases where there were more fundamental issues around the application for planning permission in terms of agricultural development, but in 90% to 97% of cases the planning system had already been advancing those applications in a timely fashion because they recognised that there was an opportunity for development on one hand and there were timeline restrictions on the other. I will provide that information in the Assembly Library if people are minded to read it. Those cases that needed to be encouraged along, were encouraged along. Again, that is an example of the planning system demonstrating itself to be more fit for purpose.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, just for the record, did you mean the Chairperson of the Agriculture Committee rather than the Environment Committee?

Mr Attwood: I did, sorry. I apologise to Mr Hamilton.

The next amendments that I want to touch on are Nos 5, 12 and 18 in respect of sustainable development. In amendment No 5, my sympathy is with Mr Agnew, who said that he was cautious about putting into law a definition of "sustainable development". I say to the proposers of that amendment that that is wise advice.

If you were to look at what is viewed as the best authority when it comes to the concept and definition of "sustainable development", you would look to a UN report of 1987, known as the Brundtland Commission. I think she was a former Norwegian Environment Minister, and as I understand it, subject to correction, she was tasked by the UN to chair a group that produced 'Report of the World Commission on Environment and Development: Our Common Future'. It sounds quite dated now because much of its language and concepts is now part of the growing daily narrative, here and in other jurisdictions.

That report tried to capture what sustainable development might be. But, sustainable development today is conceptually different from what it was when Brundtland reported to the UN, because whilst that commission saw sustainable development around the concepts of environment, economy and social impact, it is now increasingly recognised that sustainable development broadens into issues of resources and the management of resources. Therefore, the point that Mr Agnew may have been getting at is that sustainable development is a changing concept. What it was in 1987 is different from what it is now.

Consequently, whilst it is right to have the words in the Bill, which is why in one of the better times in the Assembly the Chair of the Committee was able to win the argument — or at least to win the vote — when it came to “sustainable development” being in the Marine Bill, the words “sustainable development” are right to be in the Bill subject to amendment at Further Consideration Stage. However, to go beyond the words in the Bill is to limit the capacity of our planning system and government to shape sustainable development going forward.

I very much accept the principle and agree with the words, but urge that we do not go beyond the words for the purposes of the Bill. Leave it to the single strategic planning policy statement to define that, and to define it in the shape of things to come, because our understanding of these issues will have to be upgraded over the next short space of time.

I had a conversation with somebody this morning, I cannot remember who, about the fact that unless Northern Ireland appreciates and grasps the niche marketing opportunities as well as the sustainable opportunities for being a low-carbon economy, we will suffer the consequences of that in the years to come. The issue of sustainable development is part of the wider argument about low carbon and low carbon footprint and being a world leader in carbon reduction and low emissions. It was understandable why Mr Agnew differentiated this particular amendment from his sympathy with many others. I urge the Chamber to adopt that approach in respect of that amendment.

5.00 pm

Amendment No 6 deals with the issue of shared use. I want to read into the record something on where the Department is in respect of shared use. I had a conversation with Anna Lo earlier today. I think that this amendment is, in many ways, a stand-alone amendment from the other amendments on the Marshalled List today. Why do I say that? I had the same conversation with Mr Weir, and I think that that is probably why Mr Weir said what he said in his contribution. In many ways, the planning system shapes a range of material considerations. So, regardless of whether it is economic development, sustainability or issues around the environment or tourism, the planning system has, within itself, a body of policy and practice, values and principles, if you like, as well as the law, to guide itself and others through the planning process leading to planning decisions. However, when you step back from it, it says very little, and is close to silent around the concepts, values and principles that we need to address and embed within the life of our society generally.

I, therefore, said to the Chair of the Committee, in her personal capacity as an MLA for South Belfast, that, regardless of whether the Chamber was minded to support amendment No 6 tonight, it might be useful to have a further conversation between now and the Further Consideration Stage to see whether the words are right or if there should be better words to give expression to the concept and value that Anna Lo rightly articulates in respect of her approach to shared space and public realm.

I differentiate amendment No 6 from others, because, unlike one or two others, it is, in my view, not fundamentally flawed; there is silence within the planning system around this concept and value; and it is something, which, at a political level, the Assembly needs to shape more and more, and if an opportunity to shape it more and more arises through the Planning Bill, maybe the right thing to do is to adopt the amendment or to look to an adjusted amendment at Further Consideration Stage that lives up to the intention of what is on the Marshalled List. Consequently, regardless of whether the amendment is moved or voted on — and I have to be careful, because I do not want to lose the opportunity — I would like to see something in the Bill, one way or the other, and see if we can work the amendment or adjust it in order to see something when it comes to the Further Consideration Stage, without prejudice to what the Committee might do today.

May I briefly —

Ms Lo: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

Ms Lo: Minister, can you elaborate? Give me some views on how it can be improved?

Mr Attwood: The words might be the right words. I am taking legal advice to see whether they give proper expression to the agreed sentiment or intention behind the Member's amendment. I will get the lawyers to look at it; I have not got advice, as I speak. That is why the Chamber might be minded to accept the amendment and see if there can be further adjustment, if necessary, between now and Further Consideration Stage, or, if it is not moved, try to get the right words for Further Consideration Stage, so that there could be an agreed position that would capture this.

Whatever my misgivings about the limitations of what FM and DFM produced recently in respect of our divided community, I do not think there is any difference in the Chamber around finding more and more ways in law, policy and practice of giving shape and definition to the sentiment that the Member has outlined with regard to public realm and shared space. I do not think anybody is going to differ with that ambition. When I wrote to Executive colleagues about this amendment this morning, I said that I would like to think that, at Further Consideration Stage, we would find further words on the face of the Bill, if further words were required. I gave that political and ministerial commitment. It may be that the Chamber will say that the words, which I know to have been interrogated in the Building, are sufficient. I am just saying that I cannot stand over the words as they are until I have got legal and policy advice. It may be that the words are fine. It may be that they require adjustment at Further Consideration Stage.

Very briefly, beyond that, the Department is looking, as part of community planning and the training programme in the run down to the transfer of planning functions, at what we will do to embed in the life of councils understanding and ambition with regard to the shared future generally and shared spaces in particular. We cannot have a situation in which we devolve planning functions, including the statutory function of community planning, and not, as part of the story, look at ways in which councils might be able to work through the issue of shared space in the run down to the review of public administration (RPA) and thereafter. We will look at that.

I also acknowledge that, as part of that amendment, there is a proposal in respect of good design. The Department, working with Queen's University in particular, has been working through issues of good design. Recently, I circulated to relevant Ministers a new design guide, 'Living Spaces: Urban Stewardship and Design Manual for Northern Ireland', which is meant to ensure that, when it comes to urban centres and inner-city neighbourhoods, the opportunity for shared space or "neutral urban space", to put it in a different way, is part of how we try to design urban areas going forward. I hope that that will be published in the near future.

I want to spend a little time — I will not delay much longer — on the proposal on world heritage sites in amendment 27. Before I make any particular comment on the current situation, I want to make it very clear that our existing planning system provides a high level of protection for the world heritage site through regional policy PPS 6 and the emerging draft northern area development plan, which contains restrictive policies with regard to proposed development in and around the site. A similar policy response — I want to stress this because the comments that have been made by UNESCO have, in part, been made from a highly uninformed place — as opposed to a legislative one is adopted in Scotland, England and Wales for the protection of other world heritage sites. That approach is in accordance with article 5 of the world heritage convention, which requires member states:

"To ensure that effective and active measures are taken for the protection, conservation and presentation of the cultural and natural heritage situated on its territory" and to:

"endeavor, in so far as possible, and as appropriate for each country:

1. to adopt a general policy which aims to give the cultural and natural heritage a function in the life of the community and to integrate the protection of that heritage into comprehensive planning programmes".

What we are doing is what England, Scotland and Wales have been doing. I rebut any argument that what we have been doing has, somehow, been running a coach and horses through protections and policies that we have in place when it comes to the Giant's Causeway. To emphasise that point; the relevant policies that are contained, both in PPS 6 and the draft northern area plan, are very clear. PPS 6 policy BH 5 states that:

"The Department will operate a presumption in favour of the preservation of World Heritage Sites. Development which would adversely affect such sites or the integrity of their settings will not be permitted unless there are exceptional circumstances."

One cannot be any clearer than that: it will not be permitted unless there are exceptional circumstances. Again, I rebut those who claim that the Runkerry decision somehow opens the door for development in that area. I will come back to that point in a second.

Secondly, policy COU 10 of the draft northern area plan on the Giant's Causeway world heritage site states unmistakably that:

"No development will be approved within the World Heritage Site unless there are very exceptional circumstances directly related to the provision of essential facilities for visitors and which would not be detrimental to the landscape or scientific interest of the Site."

Relate that across and apply those standards to the Runkerry decision. In my view, those who step back from that issue and look at it fully and properly will see the application of proper policy on one hand and a proper outcome on the other.

Thirdly, DNAP policy COU 12, which deals with the distinctive landscape setting of the Giant's Causeway heritage site, states:

"No development within the Distinctive Landscape Setting outside of settlement development limits will be approved except" in a small and defined number of instances. Again, that is the standard against which the Runkerry application has been and should be judged. Finally, DNAP policy COU 14, which deals with the supportive landscape setting of the Giant's Causeway world heritage site, states:

"Development proposals outside of settlement development limits that comprise modest scale, non-residential tourist facilities that are essential for serving the requirements of visitors to the World Heritage Site only, will exceptionally be permitted in the Supportive Landscape Setting to the World Heritage Site."

When you take all that together, you see that those are some of the most, if not the most, restrictive planning policies in the Northern Ireland system and possibly the British system as well. However, even the strictest planning policies can be outweighed by other considerations in exceptional circumstances, and that is what happened with the Runkerry decision.

A comment in this afternoon's debate gave rise to my concerns. Anna Lo said that, should the amendment on the world heritage site not be agreed, we would not get any more world heritage sites designated — I will come back to that in a second — and we might be putting the world heritage site designation for the Giant's Causeway in jeopardy. When the Member was questioned about that, she said that that advice had been given to her by the National Trust, arising from the meeting of the UNESCO world heritage committee at Phnom Penh in Cambodia over the past two weeks, which is what, I presume, she was referring to. The message that the National Trust conveyed through a Member to the House this afternoon was that, should the amendment not be passed, we will not get any further world heritage site designations and the existing one might be in jeopardy.

I would like to ask those who gave that advice to reconcile it, if they can, with the comments, many of which I do not agree with, of an individual called Mr Tim Badman. Mr Tim Badman is a senior official in an organisation called the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN). The IUCN gives advice to the UNESCO world heritage committee on world heritage sites. This is what

Mr Badman, whom I will come back to shortly, said in an interview with Seamus McKee of the BBC last week. Mr McKee asked:

"How close does it [the Giant's Causeway] come to being put on the danger list by UNESCO?"

Mr Badman, who is the senior adviser to the UNESCO world heritage committee and was, I believe, speaking from Phnom Penh, where, I presume, he was for the purposes of the world heritage committee meeting, said:

"That is not a discussion that we have had."

Mr McKee further interrogated Mr Badman:

"If nothing is done following this UNESCO report, does it put at risk the world heritage status of the Giant's Causeway site?"

Mr Badman replied:

"I think that it is not the discussion we are having at this stage."

Those were Mr Badman's words live on radio within the past 10 days. I presume that he was speaking from Phnom Penh further to whatever decision UNESCO made following the advice it had been given on world heritage sites. So, in respect of the danger list, he said:

"That is not a discussion that we have had"

"it is not the discussion we are having at this stage."

Yet, somebody advised a Member of the House, apparently this morning, that, should the amendment on the world heritage site not be passed, no more properties in Northern Ireland would get a world heritage site designation and, indeed, that the existing world heritage site might be in jeopardy. I would like an explanation of that. If Mr Badman, who, I would suggest, is far closer to UNESCO than some other people, said that on the record, how is it that some other people advised the House, through the Member for South Belfast, as she outlined this afternoon. We deserve some answers.

5.15 pm

Further than that, as I come to the end of my contribution, I want to make two things clear in respect of whether or not UNESCO was informed about what was happening in respect of the planning application for the Runkerry golf and hotel resort. In 2010, as often happens in respect of world heritage sites, UNESCO asked for a state of conservation report. That state of conservation report was provided to UNESCO. In August 2010, the Government of Northern Ireland, through the UK Government, our intermediary for the purposes of managing the relationship with UNESCO, asked UNESCO whether it had any issues in respect of the state of conservation report. UNESCO said that, if it had any serious concerns, it would get in contact: radio silence. In April 2011, the National Trust contacted UNESCO in relation to issues around the planning application at the world heritage site: radio silence until January 2012, in the eye of the decision being made in respect of the Runkerry planning application. So, here we have an organisation that has great authority and deserves and has earned a lot of respect. Yet, when it is asked by this Government whether it has concerns about the planning application at Runkerry or the state of conservation report, which includes reference to the planning application at Runkerry, there is radio silence. Even when the National Trust contacted UNESCO, there was radio silence for over seven or eight months. Yet we are now being asked, given the scale of protections that already exist for the world heritage site at the Giant's Causeway — I read only some of them into the record this afternoon — to put into domestic law further protections in the terms of the amendment. In my view, the policies and protections to date are substantial. In my view, UNESCO has questions to answer in respect of how it did or did not respond around the planning application and state of conservation report. In my view, to do anything further whilst we work through all that is not the right approach. As a consequence, I urge people to resist the amendments and ask people outside the Chamber to answer some of the questions that I have put on the public record.

In any case —

Ms Lo: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Attwood: I will, in a second.

In any case, last June, I asked UNESCO to send a person to visit the world heritage site: it did so in February. Since February, on three occasions my permanent secretary has asked that the adviser to UNESCO provide a copy of the report submitted by that individual arising from his visit in February. On every occasion, we have been stonewalled. So, on the one hand, we are being asked to put into domestic law further requirements in respect of the world heritage site, but, on the other hand, the advisers to UNESCO stonewalled me, the Government in Northern Ireland and the Government of the United Kingdom in London in respect of information that I and this Assembly are entitled to see. Why should that be so?

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for giving way. The Minister said that we have a raft of policies to protect the world heritage site, and yet a decision has been made that is now causing some concerns for UNESCO. Surely UNESCO has come back and expressed a lot of concern on this. Is that not an indication that we should have stronger protection such as it is recommended we put in domestic law?

Mr Attwood: What I find curious is that there is already a hotel on the grounds of the world heritage site, yet a proposal for a hotel development outside the world heritage site on adjoining lands and much further away from the stones is somehow to be resisted. I find it curious that there is development within the world heritage site, and rightly so: the visitors' centre. Yet, development outside the world heritage site much further away from the stones is to be resisted. If there are questions to be asked, there are questions to be asked of everybody about why a hotel development closer to the stones is acceptable but one outside the world heritage site is not. Why is it that a development proposal for a visitors' centre, which I support, is acceptable, yet a development proposal outside the site is not acceptable? There is a tension in that regard, and, if UNESCO, through its advisers, is not prepared to share with me after repeated requests information that it should have shared with me arising from the visit of its specialist in February 2013, I will have questions to ask about what is or is not happening. I want to work with all those who want to protect the scale, wonder and beauty of our heritage in Northern Ireland, but if I am prepared to work with them, they must show better form when it comes to working with me.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for giving way. As I understand it, the hotel has always been there. It was built there before the designation of the world heritage site, so it has been standing there all along. It is also a listed building. The visitors' centre was built on a brownfield site and there had always been a visitors' centre there. In fact, DETI went out and had a competition and accepted a plan to build a visitors' centre. That fell through, and the National Trust took over to build the centre. That is my understanding.

Mr Attwood: However, the outcome is the same. There is a hotel on the world heritage site, and there is significant development on the world heritage site. I do not have any issue with either. Some people have an issue with the other development on the world heritage site, namely the big car park with the big car parking costs: I do not have any big issue with any of that. What I have an issue with is why, where there is an exceptional circumstance, where there is an opportunity to create infrastructure in arguably our biggest heritage assets, namely the north coast and where there is an opportunity to create tourist jobs, tourist spend and tourist opportunity, development within the site is allowed yet development outside the site with a hotel very close to Bushmills is being resisted.

If I am to be held accountable through the courts and through here for the decisions that I and the Department make — I have no difficulty about that — then UNESCO and its advisers should also be held to account, so that, just as people are satisfied that I am doing things right or not so right, everybody can be satisfied about whether UNESCO and its advisers or those who advise UNESCO are doing everything right and are seen to be doing everything right. That is a fair way to proceed. As regards this amendment, my view is that the protections that we have at the moment in policy and practice are exhaustive and extensive. On those grounds, I recommend to people, as I did to the Executive this morning, that we resist the amendment when it comes to world heritage sites.

Finally, I will deal with amendment No 33, which deals with the commencement clause. The amendment proposes that clauses 2 and 6 are commenced within four months of Royal Assent. As people know, I have tabled amendment No 31, which seeks to commence clauses 2 and 6 on Royal Assent. I agreed to table the amendment on behalf of the Environment Committee, the majority of whom are keen to see clauses 2 and 6 in place as soon as possible. In those circumstances, I do not see any reason to delay their commencement, and, given that the planning system becomes more and more fit for purpose, the work that has to be done before Royal Assent will, I think, be done. I therefore urge Members not to accept amendment No 33 and to support amendment No 31 commencing clauses 2 and 6 on Royal Assent.

Mr Agnew: I will try not to delay the House for too long. The Minister has fairly comprehensively commented on each of the clauses. I do not wish to go on for too long.

One thing has emerged from the debate. There have been concerns from some in the House about clauses 2 and 6 promoting economic development over and above other aspects of planning considerations. Those who have sought to defend clauses 2 and 6 effectively said, "They do not do anything, so do not worry". That brings us back to the question of why they are there. Mr Hamilton reiterated — I want to get his words right — that they are there to highlight, underscore and emphasise the role of economic considerations in planning law. Essentially — it has been alluded to — we are seeking investment in Northern Ireland. We want to send a signal to investors that this is a place open for business. What concerns me is that, as was highlighted by Mr Flanagan and others, 6,700-odd of our constituents have said to us that environmental protection is important to them, yet some in the House would send no signal or comfort to them. They say, "Environmental protection is a consideration, just like economic development is a consideration already in planning, but we want to send a signal on economic development. As far as you are concerned, your calls for environmental protection will be unheard and unheeded. We do not want to send a signal to you, because you do not come with bags of cash". That is a summation of some of today's debate. Indeed, the Minister pointed to the example of the Lough Neagh incinerator. He said that he would not have taken a different decision had the Bill been passed. Such controversy, such time in the House, such debate and all the trouble of amendments for something that effectively will do nothing: I find that odd. I stand by my assertion that clause 6 will do harm. We will see how that plays out should it be passed unamended.

Ms Lo made the point that she felt that the Minister should not have moved this stage. The Minister responded that he believed that it was to the good repute of the Assembly to progress the Bill. However, I think that Ms Lo's point was that consideration needs to be given to some of the new amendments. That ties in with something that the Minister said about process and consultation on a certain amendment. We have to look at how we better consult. There is a problem. The deadline for amendments, through no fault of any of us in the Chamber, was Thursday. We are debating the Bill today, so that does not give a lot of time for consultation. As a Member who is not on the Environment Committee but has a lot of interest in what comes out of the Planning Bill, I have little opportunity to influence the Bill other than through tabling amendments at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage. It is right that Members take that opportunity to table amendments, that we debate them on their merits and that we do not dismiss them due to the imperfect process that we have in front of us.

I will briefly go through the amendments. Amendment Nos 1, 8 and 14 are tabled in my name on behalf of the Green Party on the issue of social well-being. I welcome the support that was expressed by the Alliance Party and Mr Flanagan, who said that his party would support the amendments. I come back to some of the Minister's comments on the amendment. He talked about seeking to narrow the definition of well-being to social well-being and to further narrow social well-being to public health. He said, "subject to Hansard", and I suppose that I will make the same caveat. My argument is that social well-being should include public health but not be narrowed to a definition of public health. However, I would equally argue that public health has a wide definition. It is not simply about health or illness in the medical sense but wider public health, wider well-being and wider mental health. The advice that I have been given is that public health is a very broad concept that would not hamstring councils when they receive planning powers but provide a broad concept. I sought to ensure that well-being was not interpreted simply as another economic measure — financial well-being — and that, equally, well-being was not applied to individual well-being but to public well-being and general well-being. We live in a materialistic society, and well-being is too often narrowly defined by the pounds in our pocket. There is a wider public social well-being, and that is what I sought to reflect in the amendment. That is certainly its intention and, I would hope, its outworking, should it be passed.

5.30 pm

Two similar amendments were tabled by the Green Party and the Ulster Unionist Party concerning the promotion of environmental protection and the protection of the environment. To some extent, I will speak on them together. When speaking on those amendments, Mr Hamilton suggested that sustainable development was already too strong a consideration in planning and expressed concern at putting in a further environmental protection. I do not know if Mr Hamilton is saying that he is in favour of unsustainable development and we should have a bit more unsustainable development because we have too much focus on sustainable development. Was he perhaps repeating a common misconception about sustainable development that it is somehow more about environmental protection than promoting economic development and seeking a balance between economic development, social well-being and environmental protection?

At times, it may appear that environmental policies have somehow been given a greater weight, but that is simply because they were given no weight for so long. It is like anything new. We notice environmental protection because, with sustainable development coming into planning policy, environmental protections were introduced where there were few or little before. Before the concept of sustainable development was taken on board, we effectively had an unfettered planning system. This is very much my interpretation, but I do not feel that environmental protection or sustainable development have been given too much weight. I find it hard to understand why anyone would argue for unsustainable development. I do not see what good that would do. It concerns me that we may be getting back to economic short-termism in our decisions: we have events and we are in economically difficult times, so anything economic must be good, even if, when we look at it on the whole, it can be more damaging than good, particularly in the medium- to long-term.

I commend the “promoting environmental protection” amendment to the House and, as the Green Party amendment comes first, I urge the Ulster Unionist Party to show the same generosity of spirit. I have said that I will support its amendment No 4, should amendment No 3 fail, and its amendment to clause 6, which I think will improve the Bill. I ask the Ulster Unionist Party to support amendment No 3. That will show solidarity between two parties that are seeking to advance a similar cause.

The thing that I am unclear about from those who oppose, and I am looking at my notes in case I have missed something, is that I have not heard from a single Member — with the exception perhaps of Mr Hamilton — about how inserting environmental protection or its promotion into the clause would do harm in the system. I do not believe that I heard it from the Minister. He certainly alluded to the fact that we have much environmental protection under EU laws. However, it is important, as I said at the start of our debate on the Bill, that we send a signal that Northern Ireland values environmental protection, not because the EU says that we must, but because Northern Ireland values environmental protection. We have the opportunity to send that signal by supporting amendment No 3 and subsequent amendments or by supporting amendment No 4, should amendment No 3 fail. We have to be clear that the Assembly supports environmental protection, rather than saying that this Assembly will accept that it is required of us under EU law.

Amendment Nos 2, 9 and 15, spoken to by Ms Lo and tabled by the Alliance Party, aim to leave out the promotion of economic development. I have some sympathy with that because it seeks to achieve what the Green Party sought to achieve with promoting environmental protection amendments, which is to ensure that there is balance and that economic development is not given undue weight. I absolutely accept, as I am sure that Ms Lo would, that promotion of economic development is, rightly, a material consideration in our planning system. As pointed out by the Minister and by others who oppose it being withdrawn and those who promote the inclusion of economic development, it is in planning legislation already. It is part of sustainable development, so the only rationale that I can find for its specific inclusion is that we want to send a signal. Well, let us send the signal, actually, that we are still committed to sustainable development, whether by leaving “economic” out and “sustainable development” to stand by itself, or by including “environmental protection”, so that we explicitly have sustainable development spelt out in the Bill.

Peter Weir described the Alliance amendment as a wrecking amendment. He, again, referred to our current economic situation, job creation and youth unemployment. I certainly do not see it as a wrecking amendment, particularly if we accept that it adds no new material consideration by taking it away or leaving it in. If we accept the argument that the promotion of economic development does nothing to any planning decision, I do not see how you can wreck something that does nothing.

Amendment Nos 5, 12 and 18 were, again, spoken to by Ms Lo and tabled by the Alliance Party. They seek to define sustainable development, and we have had some discussion on that, so I will not rehash what has been said. In my opening remarks, I raised my concerns about defining sustainable development and doing so in this way, and we have heard from others. I think that it was Phil Flanagan who raised concerns to that effect that the Department had voiced to the Committee. Indeed, the Minister said that he concurs with some of the concerns raised. The amendments are well intentioned. The Green Party looked at and considered tabling such an amendment, but we could not find a definition that we were content would protect sustainable development in a way that truly reflects the broad understanding of what “sustainable development” means. For that reason, I still have concerns with amendment No 5 and do not intend to support it.

Amendment Nos 21 and 23 from the UUP aim to insert “environmental” into “considerations” of “economic advantages or disadvantages” in clause 6. I think, again, it is seeking to do what many of us have sought throughout the Bill and what all those who lobbied us through email have sought. It is about ensuring that balance remains. For that reason, as I said, I still cannot get beyond the fact that clause 6 will do damage.

It was a long time ago now, but I have to come back to Mr Hamilton’s assertion that my judgement should perhaps not be trusted because I said both that this was the worst thing that could happen to planning and that the G8 was the worst thing that could happen to Northern Ireland at this time. I am not sure that the final judgement has come back on the G8 because, with a bill of £60,000, and we still have not been told how much we are footing —

Some Members: Sixty thousand?

Mr McCallister: Sixty million.

Mr Agnew: Sixty million pounds, sorry. I thank Members for the correction. We are yet to find out what percentage of the bill for the G8 that Northern Ireland will foot, but, at Gleneagles, the Scottish Government footed two thirds of the security bill. If we were to foot that we would be looking at a bill of something like £40 million, and I definitely think there would be a debate about whether we got £40 million worth of value out of the G8. I will also add very briefly, without going too far off the Planning Bill, that it is thanks to those protesters who went out and protested peacefully and to the unions for marshalling that parade that the rally against the G8 went off so peacefully and successfully and was an advert for peaceful protest more than anything else.

Anna Lo raised the point that 88% of respondents to the Environment Committee sought to withdraw the proposed amendment to clause 6. Much has been made about sending out a signal and sending a message. I think we have to send out a signal that we are listening, and that when a Committee consults, it does so in a genuine way and listens to the concerns raised. Mr Hamilton and Mr Weir both alluded to the fact that, in planning, there is already conflict between developer and developer, neighbour and neighbour and resident and developer. I think that clause 6, in putting in legislation that planning must consider economic advantage and disadvantage, can only widen the scope for legal disagreement. I think that is the concern. It is not that there will be those for and against — of course that will always be the case — but that we will give a wider scope for legal challenge and reduce the efficiency of our planning system when we are seeking to increase its efficiency.

Amendment Nos 7 and 22, tabled by the Minister, have been broadly welcomed across the House. Mr Elliott mentioned that he proposed them at Committee Stage, and Peter Weir welcomed the fact that the Minister had followed the Committee’s recommendation. It appears, from my reading of the House, that those amendments should go through without controversy.

There is some debate over amendment Nos 31 and 33 in the timing of the enactment of clauses 2 and 6. Mr McCallister laid out that his amendment was an answer to the concerns, which Ms Lo highlighted, that between the enactment of the Bill and the production of the single planning policy we could have a gap, and that a four-month delay would give the Minister adequate time to bring forward the single planning policy statement and give more time for consideration of that. There was some debate about whether the four-month delay was the right way, or whether that was the Minister’s amendment to leave the enactment with the Department. Mr Hamilton, speaking as Deputy Chair of the Committee, indicated that the Committee’s position was closer to the position of the Minister.

5.45 pm

Amendment No 27, tabled by Ms Lo, deals with legal protection for world heritage sites. It caused some considerable debate and there was much argument that it was driven by the decision on Runkerry. There is no doubt that that decision has, perhaps, highlighted, for those who feel there is a need for it, the need for this legislation.

The argument was made that putting protection for world heritage sites into legislation could influence whether future designations are made. The Minister made a challenge for evidence of that and, I would argue, rightly so; but Ms Lo was highlighting the significance of the site. Again, this is where there has been, perhaps, some inconsistency in the arguments. We are being told that protections already exist for the site, so we do not need this amendment. However, I come back to the argument that the promotion of economic development is a material consideration in planning. Either we need to put material considerations into law or we do not; but if we do, let us be consistent about it.

On that basis, I follow the argument that I made in respect of clause 2, which is that if we are going to put material considerations into law, let us do so consistently and across the board. Let us give legal protection to the world heritage site in domestic planning law and make it clear that we value the site and will give it maximum protection.

The point was made about the hotel that is currently on the site. Ms Lo rightly pointed out that it was built before the designation. The other thing to note is that it was built by a private developer, although it is now managed by the National Trust. There was a private development on the site before it became a world heritage site, so to say that there was a development on the world heritage site is factually inaccurate. There is a development on a site that is now designated as a world heritage site. It was not designated as such at that time and, therefore, the protections were not in place. Therefore, it is arguable whether that hotel would ever have been built if we had this law. Had the site been granted world heritage status at that time, I am not sure that the same planning decision would have been made. The National Trust took on that building — as a listed building — in order to preserve something that already existed. It is important that we put the Bushmills Hotel into its proper context and do not mislead people.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way? As someone who was a manager up there, I know that the Member is not referring to the Bushmills Hotel but to the Causeway Hotel. The Bushmills Hotel is down in the village.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for the correction; it is, of course, the Causeway Hotel. It has been a long day and it is going to get much longer.

I want to put that on record because there is confusion around that issue, some of which is genuine and some of which has been deliberately created in order to damage the reputation and the authority of the National Trust.

I have left amendment Nos 6 and 19, the Alliance Party amendments on supporting shared use, to the end of my winding-up speech because, as the Minister said, they are, to some extent, standalone amendments that introduce a new element into the Planning Bill. There seems to be broad support for these amendments, and the Green Party supports their principles, which I welcome. A number of Members sought clarity on their outworkings. We have heard from the Minister that we have got the principle right; there seems to be agreement on the principle. There is some question about whether the wording is right, and I will leave it to the proposers of those amendments to decide how to take that forward. They might invite amendments at Further Consideration Stage or hold back the amendments and work on a cross-party basis to improve them for the next stage.

It is a fundamental principle that we include shared use in the Planning Bill to signal an intent, as Ms Lo said, to put the OFMDFM policy of building better communities into practice. It is easy to talk about these things, but it is much harder to do them. Putting that in legislation would only be a start. There would then be a challenge for the planning process, in whatever form it takes at the end of this Bill's passage, and once powers are transferred to councils, to implement that. As part of a wider raft of Executive proposals, it would help us to move towards a genuinely shared future, in which we share our built and natural heritage.

There has been much debate on this group of amendments about the balance between economic and environmental factors and social well-being. The debate has been balanced and largely courteous. I anticipate that the tone and the balance of the debate on the next group of amendments might be different.

I thank the House for its consideration of my party's amendments and the other amendments and I look forward to the outcomes of the votes.

Mr Boylan: I beg to move amendment No 20: After clause 3 insert

"Economically significant planning zone schemes

3A.—(1) In paragraph (2) of Article 2 of the 1991 Order (interpretation) after the definition of "development order" insert the following definitions—

"economically significant planning zone" and

"economically significant planning zone scheme" shall be construed in accordance with Article 13A;"

(2) In paragraph (2) of Article 9 of the 1991 Order (development plans) after sub-paragraph (d) insert—

"(dd) an economically significant planning zone scheme;"

(3) After Article 13 of the 1991 Order insert—

"Economically significant planning zone schemes

Economically significant planning zones

13A.—(1) An economically significant planning zone is an area in respect of which an economically significant planning zone scheme is in force.

(2) The adoption of an economically significant planning zone scheme has effect to grant in relation to the zone, or any part of it specified in the scheme, planning permission for development specified in the scheme or for development of any class so specified.

(3) Planning permission under an economically significant planning zone scheme may be unconditional or subject to such conditions, limitations or exceptions as may be specified in the scheme.

(4) An economically significant planning zone scheme shall consist of a map and a written statement, and such diagrams, illustrations and descriptive matter as OFMDFM thinks appropriate for explaining or illustrating the provisions of the scheme, and must specify—

(a) the development or classes of development permitted by the scheme;

(b) the land in relation to which permission is granted; and

(c) any conditions, limitations or exceptions subject to which it is granted; and shall contain such other matters as may be prescribed by regulations made by OFMDFM.

(5) OFMDFM may at any time make an economically significant planning zone scheme in respect of any area or alter a scheme adopted by it in respect of any area.

(6) Articles 5, 6, 7 and 8(1) shall, subject to paragraphs (7) and (8) and with any other necessary modifications, apply to the making or alteration of an economically significant planning zone scheme by OFMDFM as they apply to the making or alteration of a development plan by the Department.

(7) Without prejudice to the generality of paragraph (6), “prescribed” in Articles 5 and 6, in relation to the making or alteration of an economically significant planning zone scheme by OFMDFM, means prescribed by regulations made by OFMDFM.

(8) Paragraph (1) of Article 8 shall apply to the making or alteration of an economically significant planning zone scheme by OFMDFM as if, for the words from “the Department” to the end of that paragraph, there were substituted “OFMDFM may adopt the scheme or the alteration of the scheme—

(a) by order made with the consent of the Department of the Environment; or

(b) by order, a draft of which has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, the Assembly.”.

(9) OFMDFM must not make an economically significant planning zone scheme in respect of any area in relation to which a simplified planning zone scheme is in force.

(10) Without prejudice to paragraph (6), OFMDFM may make regulations with respect to—

(a) the form and content of economically significant planning zone schemes; and

(b) the procedure to be followed in connection with the making or alteration of such schemes.

(11) In this Article, and in Articles 13B to 13F, “OFMDFM” means the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

Economically significant planning zone schemes: conditions and limitations on planning permission

13B.—(1) The conditions and limitations on planning permission which may be specified in an economically significant planning zone scheme may include—

(a) conditions or limitations in respect of all development permitted by the scheme or in respect of particular descriptions of development so permitted; and

(b) conditions or limitations requiring the consent, agreement or approval of OFMDFM in relation to particular descriptions of permitted development; and different conditions or limitations may be specified for different cases or classes of case.

(2) Nothing in an economically significant planning zone scheme shall affect the right of any person—

(a) to do anything not amounting to development; or

(b) to carry out development for which planning permission is not required or for which permission has been granted otherwise than by the scheme; and no limitation or restriction subject to which permission has been granted otherwise than under the scheme shall affect the right of any person to carry out development for which permission has been granted under the scheme.

Duration of economically significant planning zone scheme

13C.—(1) An economically significant planning zone scheme shall take effect on the date of its adoption and shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of 10 years beginning with that date.

(2) Upon the scheme’s ceasing to have effect planning permission under the scheme shall also cease to have effect except in a case where the development authorised by it has been begun.

(3) The provisions of Article 37(2) to (6) apply to planning permission under an economically significant planning zone scheme where development has been begun but not completed by the time the area ceases to be an economically significant planning zone.

(4) The provisions of Article 36(1) apply in determining for the purposes of this Article when development shall be taken to be begun.

Alteration of economically significant planning zone scheme

13D.—(1) The adoption of alterations to an economically significant planning zone scheme has effect as follows.

(2) The adoption of alterations providing for the inclusion of land in the economically significant planning zone has effect to grant in relation to that land or such part of it as is specified in the scheme planning permission for development so specified or of any class so specified.

(3) The adoption of alterations providing for the grant of planning permission has effect to grant such permission in relation to the economically significant planning zone, or such part of it as is specified in the scheme, for development so specified or development of any class so specified.

(4) The adoption of alterations providing for the withdrawal or relaxation of conditions, limitations or restrictions to which planning permission under the scheme is subject has effect to withdraw or relax the conditions, limitations or restrictions forthwith.

(5) The adoption of alterations providing for—

(a) the exclusion of land from the economically significant planning zone;

(b) the withdrawal of planning permission; or

(c) the imposition of new or more stringent conditions, limitations or restrictions to which planning permission under the scheme is subject, has effect to withdraw permission, or to impose the conditions, limitations or restrictions, with effect from the end of the period of 12 months beginning with the date of the adoption.

(6) The adoption of alterations to a scheme does not affect planning permission under the scheme in any case where the development authorised by it has been begun before the adoption of alterations has effect, and the provisions of Article 36(1) apply in determining for the purposes of this paragraph when development shall be taken to be begun.

38D.—(1) An economically significant planning zone scheme shall take effect on the date of its adoption and shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of 10 years beginning with that date.

(2) Upon the scheme's ceasing to have effect, planning permission under the scheme shall also cease to have effect except in a case where the development authorised by it has been begun.

(3) The provisions of section 64(2) to (6) and sections 65 and 66 apply to planning permission under an economically significant planning zone scheme where development has been begun but not completed by the time the area ceases to be an economically significant planning zone.

(4) The provisions of section 63(2) apply in determining for the purposes of this section when development shall be taken to be begun.

Alteration of economically significant planning zone scheme

38E.—(1) The adoption of alterations to an economically significant planning zone scheme has effect as follows.

(2) The adoption of alterations providing for the inclusion of land in the economically significant planning zone has effect to grant in relation to that land or such part of it as is specified in the scheme planning permission for development so specified or of any class so specified.

(3) The adoption of alterations providing for the grant of planning permission has effect to grant such permission in relation to the economically significant planning zone, or such part of it as is specified in the scheme, for development so specified or development of any class so specified.

(4) The adoption of alterations providing for the withdrawal or relaxation of conditions, limitations or restrictions to which planning permission under the scheme is subject has effect to withdraw or relax the conditions, limitations or restrictions forthwith.

(5) The adoption of alterations providing for—

(a) the exclusion of land from an economically significant planning zone;

(b) the withdrawal of planning permission; or

has effect to withdraw permission, or to impose the conditions, limitations or restrictions, with effect from the end of the period of 12 months beginning with the date of the adoption.

(6) The adoption of alterations to a scheme does not affect planning permission under the scheme in any case where the development authorised by it has been begun before the adoption of alterations has effect; and the provisions of section 63(2) apply in determining for the purposes of this subsection when development shall be taken to be begun.

Provision of assistance by Department to OFMDFM

38F. The Department must provide such administrative and other assistance for OFMDFM as may be necessary to enable OFMDFM to carry out its functions under sections 38A to 38E.

Modifications of references to planning permission, etc., granted by the Department or councils

38G. In this Act, or in any provision made under this Act—

(a) any reference to planning permission granted by the Department or a council except where prescribed by regulations made by OFMDFM, includes a reference to planning permission granted under an economically significant planning zone scheme;

(b) any reference to a condition, limitation or exception subject to which planning permission is granted, except where prescribed by regulations made by OFMDFM, includes a reference to a condition, limitation or exception subject to which planning permission is granted under an economically significant planning zone scheme.

(9) In section 61 of the 2011 Act (duration of planning permission), in subsection (3) after paragraph (e) insert—

“(ee) to any planning permission granted by an economically significant planning zone scheme;”.

(10) In section 236 of the 2011 Act (rights of entry), in subsection (1)(a), after head (ii) insert—

“(ij) economically significant planning zones;”.

(12) In section 250 of the 2011 Act (interpretation), in subsection (1), after the definition of “development order” insert the following definitions—

“economically significant planning zone” and

“economically significant planning zone scheme” shall be construed in accordance with Section 38A;”.

(13) After Schedule 1 to the 2011 Act insert—

(3) In this Schedule, “prescribed” means prescribed by regulations made by OFMDFM.”.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak on the second group of amendments and to clarify why we want to —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Members to leave quietly please. Continue.

Mr Boylan: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will clarify why I want to move amendment No 20. You can see that the amendment is eight pages long, so I do not propose to go into every single detail of it. I will try to condense the amendment down to exactly what it tries to do.

This point was brought up earlier, but this is not paving the way for fracking. The amendment will create opportunities for economically significant planning applications. In that, we are trying to create certain zones for economically beneficial planning applications. It is probably the same principle as simplified planning zones. I will outline the reasons behind it. This amendment is not about OFMDFM taking over this role, and article 13A(8) talks about working in conjunction with the Minister of the Environment. Over the past number of months, we have debated economics in the Chamber, and we have talked about growing the economy. That is one of the main principles for and priorities of the Executive. It is about creating —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Boylan: Yes.

Mr Allister: The Member pretends to the House that this clause anticipates working with the Department of the Environment, and he referred to article 13A(8). Is it not quite clear that paragraph 8 includes a very strong alternative that, if the Department of the Environment does not co-operate, “by order” a draft can be laid and approved by resolution of the Assembly, which is another way of saying that the ruling DUP/Sinn Féin cabal can override the Department and force its will? Is it not rather disingenuous to pretend that this is anything but a takeover? If it is about co-operation, would that be the same sort of co-operation that the Minister for Employment and Learning had in the announcement of the schemes by the First Minister in which there was no consultation whatsoever and that affected his Department?

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for his intervention. Clearly it states that at article 13A(8)(b). The Minister is here, and he will get the opportunity to say whether he wants to work with the Office of the First and deputy First Minister.

I will go back to the point that I was trying to make about why we tabled the amendment. We need to look at creating opportunities and jobs in our constituencies throughout the North to try to keep our young people here. Our young people are leaving, but if there were jobs here, they would not leave. Therefore, we want to promote and create opportunities to try to develop employment in some sectors so that we can keep our young people here.

I want to make a point that is similar to part of the argument that I made earlier on clauses 2 and 6. I said to the Minister about area plans. The area plans as they sit are not fit for purpose, but the Minister highlighted one thing, and I thank him for that. He did a bit of homework for me on Almac and what he said about a pharmaceutical company earlier. Minister, I do not believe that that is how we should go about our planning. I know that you created an opportunity to do that in that one instance, which is fine, but surely we should look at certain zones for growing the economy. In the absence of proper plans and draft plans, there is an opportunity to bring forward those types of zones so that we can create employment and grow the economy.

You mentioned pharmaceuticals. Will the Minister outline where we have an area for clean technologies to encourage clean industry throughout the North, or wherever, in any of the area plans that exist now? There are complaints and slights being made in the media about OFMDFM visits across the world to try to promote the North and attract investment. That is what we as an Assembly are trying to do. Every Minister gets up and fights his own corner for moneys and to develop and promote his Department, and here is an opportunity to go across the world to try to invite and attract investment, and the message clearly coming out is that this is not a place to do business.

The Minister is on the Executive, so he will be more aware of those arguments than I am. That is why we want to try to bring this forward. It is about tackling deprivation, it is about tackling disadvantage, it is about creating jobs and it is about attracting investment. The Minister's Department has all the knowledge and all the facts and figures. It has done all that for area plans, and it knows what areas could be zoned. It is about moving the process along. I have to say that the Minister has done some good work on some of the planning applications in recent times, and I want to put that on record, but I will use this as an example, and the Minister will be able to respond —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Boylan: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: It is very nice of you to say what a wonderful job the Minister has been doing. It is very generous indeed, but the effect of the amendment that you are proposing seems to make his position rather redundant. You may well say that it is a good idea that we are trying to develop jobs and all those initiatives, but presumably the next Department that you will be looking to bring similar powers to will be the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. We do not really need it either, because we can do it all from OFMDFM. The objective may be laudable, but, under the Belfast Agreement, we set up a mandatory coalition in which people were given executive powers in a different way, and this particular amendment appears to cut right across that. Any party signing up to that really needs to consider its position in the Executive.

6.45 pm

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for the intervention, but I refer him back to new clause 13A(8)(b). I am glad that you mentioned DETI because the issue of significant applications goes right across Departments, and they all have a role to play. I said at the start, however, that it is in conjunction with the Minister of the Environment. The Minister can get involved in the process, and he will speak for himself in relation to this matter.

In praising the Minister for some things that have happened, I want to use one example. Dmac Engineering, a company in County Tyrone that the Minister is well aware of, has an opportunity to create 80 jobs and retain 150 jobs. I will stand corrected on the numbers, but it is certainly to create 80 jobs. An application process has been going on certainly for at least the past two and a half years and originally for maybe six years. It is sitting there and no decision has been made. I visited the company the other day, and it has an opportunity over the next short while to attract £10 million worth of investment. We are still in a situation where those decisions are not being made. The Minister can respond to that.

Mr Wells: That is an issue of great concern. However, my understanding is that Arlene Foster when Minister of the Environment announced a process whereby any application of that nature, which clearly has a significant economic benefit, could be referred to the strategic planning division, in Millennium House, Belfast. Provided that all the i's were dotted and t's crossed, they promised that they would turn applications around within six months. I have had several such applications in south Down. For instance, Down High School, the new school in Downpatrick, was turned around in even less time than that. So, I am intrigued why that application, which is clearly important to the people of County Tyrone, was not referred to that division and turned around far more quickly.

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for his intervention. Obviously, the Minister will have to answer that for you. I went to visit the place, and it is an application on what I would class as a brownfield site. I do not know why it has not been approved. The Minister may argue that it is an old sand quarry. I think that it would be good use of an old place and should be considered a brownfield site. Yet here we are sitting two years and four months or two years and six months after the application was made.

So, we are still dealing with that sort of issue in the Planning Service, and obviously the Minister will respond in relation to that. I cannot understand it. Why would you turn that application down? Why has that process not moved forward? The Member mentioned moving it to the strategic planning division. Only the Minister can answer in relation to that.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Mrs D Kelly: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. He spoke about how OFMDFM will make decisions, and probably quicker than any other Minister or Department. Yet we are into the third year of the social investment fund and the money has not been spent. That fund was set up to tackle deprivation and to support our young people, yet Mr Boylan would try to promote OFMDFM. Mind you, some staff in OFMDFM now refer to working in North Korea. Is that the sort of Government that Mr Boylan wishes to promote for the people of the North?

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for her intervention. We will go back to discussing the Planning Bill. If any other Department wants to bring any other legislation, you can debate it another day, but we will talk about this issue.

As I said, it is about creating jobs and attracting investment. Minister, the amendment gives you an opportunity to work with OFMDFM to zone certain areas and encourage and attract investment.

The Minister can clarify the point in terms of area plans, draft area plans and what is available. I go back to the point that I made at the start: our young people are leaving. We are educating people, and they are going out of the country to America and Australia. We are not doing enough, and we need to look at some process.

This is only a process, by the way, for the Minister to get involved in to try to bring forward zones to attract investment of economic significance and to try to promote jobs.

I will leave it at that. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I rise on behalf of the Committee for the Environment.

Some Members: Hurrah.

Ms Lo: However, I can offer no comment from the Committee on the substance of amendment No 20 because we have not had the opportunity to come to a position on it.

Some Members: Shame.

Ms Lo: The first that we knew of the amendment was at the end of last week. Therefore, not only does the Committee not have a position on it, we do not even know the Department's position on it. It is disappointing, particularly given the significance of the amendment, that the Assembly has to consider it today without the benefit of its having been scrutinised by the Committee.

If I may, Mr Speaker, I will now speak on amendment No 20 in a personal capacity. To say that I was shocked when I saw the amendment would be an understatement. To submit such a substantial amendment, with such far-reaching consequences, right at the deadline for submission is, in my opinion, unacceptable, even though, procedurally, as Peter may jump up and tell me, Members have the right to do so.

Mr Wells: On a point of order, Mr Speaker.

Ms Lo: I am sorry: as Mr Weir would tell me. Peter and I are on first-name terms all of the time.

At Committee, I worked closely with my colleagues, including Mr Weir and Mr Boylan. They were aware of the likely amendments that I would seek. To not extend similar courtesy to Committee colleagues shows that this is Sinn Féin and the DUP riding roughshod over the Assembly and, indeed, the environment sector, which has not been consulted on this at all and is deeply unhappy with it.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. She talks about giving prior notice. However, there was no notification to the Committee of the amendments on the world heritage site and shared space. As I have indicated previously, I have absolutely no problem with that; it is the role of MLAs to put forward amendments in connection with those matters. As I indicated, although I can see where those Members are coming from, there was no prior notification of their amendments. I perfectly accept the Member's right to put forward whatever amendments she wants. However, with respect to her, she should not then be critical of others putting forward amendments when she has been guilty of exactly the same offence.

Ms Lo: I thank the Member for his comment, but if he had read all the written submissions, he would have seen the suggestions from the CRC and the National Trust.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mrs D Kelly: I am sure that the Member will agree that there is quite a fundamental change and difference between this amendment and the amendments to clauses 2 and 6, which other Members tabled last week, and which Sinn Féin opposed at Committee and of which it now supports some, but not all, this afternoon. We are a bit confused about Sinn Féin. I note that Mr Boylan has only one representative with him. Perhaps, Sinn Féin will not support OFMDFM's clauses. I live in hope that they might catch themselves on, rather than be led by the nose through the lobbies with the DUP on the matter. The clauses that are now being debated in the second group of amendments are fundamentally different. They deal with the creation of a third planning authority. Clauses 2 and 6 pale into insignificance.

Ms Lo: Absolutely. I could not agree more with the Member.

Mr B McCrea: Well said.

Ms Lo: Absolutely: yes.

Those Members know that they have the numbers behind them, thanks to Whips, to pass the amendment irrespective of the consequences or strength of feeling against it. We have seen a huge campaign being mounted against clauses 2 and 6. My office received massive amounts of correspondence on that. I am sure that others did, too. I cannot imagine the amount that we would have received had the amendment been on the table from the outset. I am sure that it is obvious from my comments that the Alliance Party will oppose this DUP/Sinn Féin power grab — it is a power grab. If we allow OFMDFM to have power over planning decisions, where will it stop?

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Given the track record of OFMDFM on many other things, does the Member agree that if this were to go ahead, the Planning Service would be plunged into further despair, with more waiting, etc, and that it would be of no benefit to people who want to make progress?

Ms Lo: Absolutely. It would be counterproductive to aim of the Bill, which is for people to benefit from a more streamlined and speedier planning system. The next time we have a Bill from DRD, will OFMDFM steal the right to make road infrastructure decisions? Will it attempt to take control of prisons from DOJ? The amendment has the potential to set an incredibly dangerous precedent, and I urge all Members to think carefully about its potential effects before voting, despite what the Whips might say.

The amendment could give OFMDFM the green light to approve fracking in Fermanagh — a corner of this country that we were so proud to show off to world leaders just last week. At first glance, the amendment seems to give a very free hand with respect to development. There is a case for relaxing the criteria, but giving blank cheques is wrong. We could see a repeat of the desecration of Drumclay crannog, where a road was built through the 2,000-year-old site. Who knows what could happen at our only world heritage site, where we have already allowed a golf course development right on its boundaries?

If the amendment is made, I truly believe that nowhere in Northern Ireland is safe, especially if we cannot protect the examples that make Northern Ireland such a special destination to visit, such as the ones I just laid out. Indeed, Friends of the Earth said:

"the new economic clauses 2 and 6 will result in planning chaos where nothing is special and nowhere is safe."

The overwhelming opinion of the sector is that this new clause is much, much worse than clauses 2 and 6. In fact, as Dolores said, clauses 2 and 6 pale into insignificance by comparison.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mr Weir: We have been told that there has been absolutely no public consultation or opportunity to express views on this. How, then, can the sector express a view that this is a lot worse than clauses 2 and 6. Surely there is a contradiction there.

Ms Lo: I have been getting responses from the sector since Friday, and I met some of them this morning as well. A lot of them are in the Lobby and outside the Building today. I am sorry that you have not gone out to see them. Some of them have put tape across their mouth to show that they object to the amendment.

I believe that this amendment is not only undemocratic but hugely arrogant. For two parties to decide that one Department should hijack power from another and then get administrative support from the original Department truly left me lost for words.

Mr Weir: Obviously not.

Ms Lo: I shall continue. I want to firmly place on the record that my party's opposition to the amendment is not opposition to the concept of enterprise zones. Opposing the amendment will not and does not have to block the introduction of enterprise zones. Alliance is supportive of such zones and further acknowledges that there needs to be a co-ordinated and strategic approach to identifying the zones, including special planning zones. However, this is not the process that should be gone through to do this. In fact, I am incredibly surprised at Sinn Féin supporting the amendment. Only very recently, it strongly opposed the last-minute introduction of an amendment to the Justice Bill on the basis that it was an abuse of process. Here it is now doing that exact thing. Mr Speaker, the Alliance Party will be firmly opposing the amendment.

Mr Hamilton: I am in favour of the amendment to create economically significant planning zones. Before I get into the reasons why, I want to address some of the reasons that have been put forward as to why the amendment should not pass this evening and should be opposed. I reiterate the point that Mr Weir made in response to the Chair of the Environment Committee in respect of the complaints that there have been about the process. It seems wrong and hypocritical for some to even argue that the amendment has not gone through some sort of due process. By the way, we are democratically elected by the people of Northern Ireland. That is our job; we are here to do that. We are, therefore, exercising that right by doing this. I defend the right of anybody to bring forward an amendment at Consideration Stage or Further Consideration Stage of this Bill, or indeed Consideration or Further Consideration Stage of any Bill. That is our right. That is what we are here for. That is the process of the House; we have the right to do that. The complaint that some sort of process has not been properly applied in this case is inaccurate. We would not be debating the amendment this evening if it was inaccurate or wrong. To do that at the same time as putting forward amendments themselves — unfortunately the Chair seems to have departed as I am addressing her remarks — the Alliance Party, the Green Party and the Ulster Unionist Party have put forward amendments that were not brought forward explicitly for a ye or nay vote in Committee. Aspects and concepts may have been discussed, but no amendment was put forward. No notice was put forward to any Member of the House until the amendments appeared on the notice of amendments last week and subsequently on the Marshalled List. So, I believe that it is wrong for someone to argue that, on the one hand, this is wrong and the process has not been properly followed in this case, yet, on the other hand, do themselves what they accuse others of. It seems to be that if it suits them, it is okay and fine, but if it does not suit them, it is wrong, it is a travesty and it is a problem of process.

I am sick of the criticism that is levelled at the DUP and Sinn Féin, the two biggest parties in the Executive. We hear the criticism, time and time again — Mrs Kelly is very good at it, as are others, including Mr McCrea, who was here earlier — that OFMDFM and the two biggest parties never do anything, never take any decisions and never get anything done. Here is an example of a decision being taken that will, I believe, have a significantly beneficial impact on the economy in Northern Ireland. At a time when we desperately need decisions to be taken that have a significant, important and beneficial impact on the economy in Northern Ireland, at a time when jobs are scarce and we are fighting a global battle to get jobs to come to Northern Ireland, this is another arrow in the economic quiver of Northern Ireland that will attract investment to Northern Ireland. Instead of losing investments, as is sometimes the case, I think that we can use this as an opportunity. Look at our neighbouring jurisdiction in the Irish Republic. It is not just corporation tax that they use to attract people in. They have the opportunity of quicker planning approvals, and have used that down through the years. So, on the one hand, they are using their lower tax regime to attract people and get their interest in the first instance, and, on the other hand, they are offering quick planning approvals in pre-designated areas. That is something that we should be doing. Those are the sorts of examples that I appreciate and am prepared to learn from on a North/South basis. That is the tenor of the amendment —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: I will give way.

Mr Allister: If I follow the Member's argument, he is saying that the introduction of economic zones can speed up the process, with certain presumptions about planning permission, etc. That might be so. However, if one were persuaded that there should be these economic planning zones, how does it follow that they should be run by OFMDFM and not by DOE?

Where is the necessity to extract it from the proper planning Department to put it into the dysfunctional office of OFMDFM? Where is the logic, other than the desire to engage in a power grab?

Mr Hamilton: I was going to come to that point later, but I will come to it now, given that the Member has raised it. Although this is not an enterprise zone, it is not dissimilar in some of its characteristics to an enterprise zone. It is my understanding that most parties here have at least been, if not fully supportive of that, supportive of the concept and of exploring the possibility of enterprise zones for Northern Ireland. I know that Mr Durkan, the MP for Foyle, has called for one in the north-west. The Alliance Party supported that in its submission to the independent review of economic policy in Northern Ireland a few years ago, and I believe that Mr Nesbitt's party has, at times, explored the possibility of doing it. The fact that we will now explore enterprise zones for Northern Ireland was included in the economic pack announced just over a week ago by the Prime Minister, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister.

Although this is not an enterprise zone, one of the key characteristics of such zones, as the Member will know, is relaxed or different planning regimes within them. A zone, by its very definition, is a line that is marked on a map and inside that, in the English, Welsh and Scottish examples, there is a different, more relaxed, quicker planning regime than would prevail outside of the lines. There are similarities between what is being proposed here and what is being proposed as an enterprise zone, which is something that I think we should actively explore for Northern Ireland.

I have not answered the Member's question yet, but it should go to OFMDFM and not to the Department of the Environment because of the clear cross-cutting nature of something significantly large and economic such as an enterprise zone. If you are bringing in something that has an element of planning, rates, telecommunications and tax powers, which we are yet to have devolved in respect of capital allowances, you cannot have the Environment Minister alone acting to draw that line. It is a cross-cutting issue. It mirrors very clearly the key priority within the Programme for Government, which is growing our economy. That priority is in the ownership of the First and deputy First Ministers on behalf of the whole Executive. That is why I think it is appropriate that it be there, that they take that decision and work alongside the Minister of the Environment and his officials to ensure that what goes into it meets with whatever restrictions are placed within the economically significant planning zone.

I have also heard criticisms that this is somehow revolutionary and that we have never had this sort of thing in Northern Ireland before. If Members would care to take a look at the wording of what is before them today and compare it to wording that they passed and improved in the 2011 Planning Act in respect of simplified planning zones, they will see that there is a great similarity between the wording of section 33 (3) in the 2011 Act about simplified planning zones and what is contained at the suggested new article 13A (3) in the amendment.

Mr Wells: As the Member knows, this amendment has been a very recent addition. Many Members who have received a lot of correspondence about clauses 2 and 6 have only had one or two comments made about this particular significant development, but one comment that I received asked why simplified planning zones have not been used. We recall that these were passed in the 2011 Act; they seem to provide a very flexible process to enable quick decisions.

Secondly, could the Member answer the point I raised with Mr Boylan: why have we not been using the strategic planning unit model, which I have used? He will be aware of the Down High School situation, where, by referring it to that strategic unit — that is a hard word to say at this time of the night — and getting all of the authorities around the table at Millennium House, we were able to get a very quick decision on what was a very significant planning application for south Down. Of course, for reasons he is aware of, there were delays, but that was not because of planning. I have also had some experience of referring cases in Kilkeel to that unit. We have had two models that would seem to deal with some of the issues that he has raised, neither of which seem to have been particularly effective in his opinion.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his intervention. I would divorce the two slightly. I do not know why there have been no simplified planning zones; I am not the Minister of the Environment. That question is probably better directed at the Minister. I agree with the Member that it is a device that would potentially have been very useful. It would have done some of this work, but it has not been used. The Member will know that that power will transfer to local government after RPA and the reorganisation of local government. However, what is proposed in the amendment is a power that regional government will retain.

I think that strategic projects are somewhat different. I will rely on the Minister, but perhaps more so his officials to give him some figures that he might use at a later stage of the debate, but I understand that the experience to date has been very good. Another project, which the Member will be aware of, that went through in rapid time was the new Downe Hospital site. Quite a lot of public sector projects have gone through in under or around six months. That is a significant improvement on what had previously been the case, and I very much welcome that. I remember welcoming that in the House way back about five or six years ago in the first Programme for Government that we produced as a new Assembly. So, that issue is talking about time as opposed to zoning a particular area. However, the Member made good points. I do not know why simplified planning zones have not been put in place. That is an issue for the Minister. Perhaps we will see more of them when local government gets control of planning. I would welcome their use in certain cases.

The point has been made that this is some sort of revolutionary step that is being taken. I will make the point again that, in 2011, the House approved something called a simplified planning zone. That was not radically different in its complexion, nature and construction from the economically significant planning zones that are before us. If Members look at the clauses in that legislation on those zones, they will see that they are almost word for word the same. This is not something completely new, revolutionary and out of this world. Only two years ago, the House approved almost entirely the same thing.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: Yes.

Mr Allister: Forgive my ignorance; I was not in the House when that legislation went through. He said that there is a parallel. Did simplified planning give those functions to OFMDFM?

Mr Hamilton: No, it did not. Like any good barrister, the Member knows the answer to the question before it is asked. It did not. In the future, as I said to Mr Wells, that power will transfer to local government and will not be retained by regional government. That is the key distinction. Ms Lo made the argument that this is something completely outrageous, new and different and that we have never seen it before. I accept the Member's point, and that is a key distinction. However, it is not radically different in complexion from what was approved through simplified planning zones two years ago.

There have been a lot of criticisms of this amendment. I think that a lot of scaremongering has gone on about what its effect will be — we are going to have some sort of planning free-for-all across Northern Ireland, as though entire counties, several counties or council areas will be zoned and anything and everything can happen in them. I do not think that this device will be used in a great number of cases. I do not think that it will be used half as much, or even one tenth as much, as people seem to suggest. However, of course, it suits some people's arguments to scare the lives out of people and to say that, all of a sudden, you will wake up in the morning and everywhere in the countryside will be concreted and there will be fracking platforms all over County Fermanagh and so forth.

As I said when I was talking about clauses 2 and 6, we are fighting hard around the world to try to get investment into Northern Ireland. I have not heard anybody disagree with the thesis that our planning system is not as good as it should be in dealing with major economic planning applications. We have so many advantages as a country — great people, great skills, great infrastructure and great telecommunications — but we do not have a great planning system. Here is something that we can hang on the door of Northern Ireland. We can say to people that not only are we open for business but we can afford them the opportunity to get planning for the investment that they want to make. That is an investment that, in a very fluid global market, they could quite easily take to the Republic of Ireland, Scotland, Wales or the Far East, but this will allow us to say to them that that they should bring it to Northern Ireland and that we, as a Government, will do things to help them get there as quickly as they can so that we create the jobs that bolster our communities and give people opportunities. It will mean that folk who have, as Mr Boylan said, been educated and trained in our excellent education system in Northern Ireland do not have to leave Northern Ireland to get the sorts of opportunities that we want to see them get.

7.15 pm

The amendment is not revolutionary, and it will not lead to some sort of planning free-for-all. It is not only competent and in order but will potentially be of great benefit to Northern Ireland and our economy.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: The Member has been here long enough. He knows that I was building to a crescendo. I was trying to finish off. I will give way to him because he is my friend.

Mr Wells: There would not have been much sense in me asking you to give way if you had built to a crescendo and taken the standing ovation. I could not then have intervened.

The Member reassured the House about the nature of the projects that would be involved. Some of the comments that I have received ask what there would be to stop OFMDFM designating Fermanagh as a strategic planning zone to facilitate fracking.

There is no question about it: the one thing that everyone is agreed on is that fracking could be of the most enormous economic benefit to Northern Ireland. Regardless of where you stand on the environmental issues, there is no doubt that a source of cheap, reliable, non-imported fuel would have huge benefits for Northern Ireland. It may be that a large company will say that it could develop most of Fermanagh for fracking. Is the Member reassuring us that that could not happen?

Will he give some indication of the size of the projects that we are talking about here? Are we talking about 50-acre sites or 100-acre sites? Are we talking about shopping centre complexes or Belfast harbour? I am just intrigued as to what would constitute one of these special zones.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member. He is going to delay us even further now, as I am going to have to respond to all those points.

I suppose that I do not know. I do not know precisely what will happen, and that is where assessments will have to be made of each case or each particular area that the Department would consider.

The Member mentioned the size, scale and acreage of land, and I think that you could conceivably have very small zones and quite large zones. However, I would be extremely surprised if any single county or council area were zoned in totality as an economically significant planning zone.

On the particular issue of fracking, even if a line were drawn around an entire county with that particular consideration, other aspects would have to go through, not least the various licences that would have to be granted by the Minister's Department and that of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Fracking will not happen in the morning just by drawing a line around County Fermanagh. There are other stages that would have to be gone through, which I think would be fairly significant and high hurdles.

I passed the Member a report earlier that I noticed over the weekend in 'The Economist'. It discussed the oil and gas boom in North America. I do not know whether he has had the chance to read it yet, but it makes —

Mr Eastwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: Yes, I will.

Mr Eastwood: Would those licences that you talked about be seen as cross-cutting and need to go to OFMDFM for a decision?

Mr Hamilton: I do not think that there are any plans to make it so —

Mrs D Kelly: There is still time.

Mr Hamilton: It is still early yet. There is still Further Consideration Stage to go. No, I am only joking. That would not be competent.

The Member is inviting me to rehearse issues and delay the House even further. The reasons that OFMDFM would take a role in this is because of the cross-cutting nature of economically significant planning applications for our number one priority, which, I hope we all agree, is growing, rebalancing and rebuilding our economy.

As I said, I think that what we have here is something that has the potential to give us an advantage in an area in which we have heretofore not had an advantage when we have been selling Northern Ireland: planning. When you look at the likes of the strategic projects unit that the Member for South Down talked about, and other reforms and changes that the Minister is bringing forward, I think that this is a useful tool to have in our toolbox as we go out into the world and try to attract investment to Northern Ireland. I think that, in a quieter moment, the Minister would perhaps admit that this is not a bad thing to do. I suspect that he is not in favour of the methodology; in fact, I know that to be so by his comments. However, I think that he and most of us would agree with the ability to act swiftly and promptly, to win investment instead of losing it, by marking out a zone on a map and saying, "There is a more relaxed planning regime here, in certain circumstances, than there would be outside of that line", taking into account the sensitivities of the environment of that area. I think that that is a good thing that most people would agree with.

So, I support the amendment because it is not revolutionary, will not result in some sort of free-for-all, and because it is proper to do so.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hamilton: Nop; I am going to finish. I cannot have three build-ups to a finish. This is not revolutionary. This is not a free-for-all. It is completely competent. It is the proper way to do it, and it is consistent with the way that other people have brought this forward. I urge the House to support it.

Mrs D Kelly: It is timely that Mr Hamilton should finish on the issue of revolution, because, in preparing for the debate, I looked at some of Sinn Féin's policies. One policy that seems to transcend the border is its cynical manipulation of the Irish people. Only yesterday, at the Wolfe Tone commemoration in Bodinstown, Pearse Doherty quoted Wolfe Tone when he said:

"If the men of property will not support us, they must fall. Our strength shall come from that great and respectable class — the men of no property."

Then, Mr —

Mr Speaker: Order. I have given the Member some latitude. I am interested to see how she may weave what she is saying into being about the Planning Bill. I think that doing that will take a wee bit of expertise, but I am happy enough to listen to the Member.

Mrs D Kelly: It is coming right now, Mr Speaker; because Mr Doherty then went on to say:

"Today's 'men of property' — the bankers and the speculators and their friends in high places — have brought huge hardship to Irish families."

He went on to talk about people losing their jobs; the very points that Mr Boylan made as he introduced the amendment containing this clause. Mr Doherty said:

"Bondholders, bank executives and financiers still live affluent lifestyles, receiving huge salaries and bonuses", and he said that others who have had "no hand" — I paraphrase — "in the financial catastrophe" — hardworking families — pay for their greed.

Yet, we have the Bill this evening. I looked at Sinn Féin's economic policy on its website, and there is no mention there of planning as a tool to promote the economy. No mention whatsoever. However, in its introduction to its economic policy for the island of Ireland, Sinn Féin lays much of the blame for the South's woes, in particular, on corrupt government, "greedy developers" and speculators. That is the context of Sinn Féin's economic policy. This evening, its members are promoting a planning clause that is half-baked and came at the eleventh hour, as Ms Anna Lo said.

The DUP and Sinn Féin came up with this proposal for economically significant planning zones where, if a developer meets certain criteria in a designated area, there will be a presumption of planning consent. Although the DUP and Sinn Féin have been working on this for weeks if not months, including actively consulting with the Executive's principal legal adviser, the Attorney General, they have not seen fit to share their proposals with DOE or other government colleagues until the last moment. Why is that?

As a result, the proposal is half-baked and, according to advice from senior counsel, not competent. Had they worked with the Environment Minister, he might not have agreed with them but they would at least have had a competent amendment. So, why did they not involve the Department responsible for planning? Why did they table this significant amendment only minutes before the deadline for submission? It is yet another indication of how this DUP/Sinn Féin junta does business. After all the soft words on a shared future, and after Cameron, Obama and the G8, we get back to the reality of how OFMDFM does its business. Despite the honeyed words, they do not want a collegiate approach. This amendment proves that they do not want to work in partnership. They not only want to have their way without any consultation with others, they want to grab legal powers from DOE and take them into OFMDFM. As others have said, yet another power grab, hot on the heels of trying to take over the Belfast metropolitan area plan, and it is all contrary to the Good Friday Agreement.

They even hide behind a couple of Back-Benchers, when we know that this comes from Peter Robinson and Martin McGuinness. Why is the amendment so urgent now? During this phase of devolution, we have had three DUP planning Ministers before the current Minister. Why did they not do it when they ran the DOE? They had plenty of time to do it properly, consult, take advice, get the legal requirements right etc, but now they want to rush it through with unseemly haste.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I will.

Mr Wells: The difficulty I have with some of the Member's argument is that the Minister had the powers of simplified planning zones, which could have dealt with some of the issues that have been raised, yet they were not used. When the Minister comes to speak, he has to explain to the House why, when there was a tool that could have sped up economic development in Northern Ireland, which was approved by the Assembly and controlled by his Department, he did not use it. Secondly, I would be grateful if he would say why, given the fact that so much effort was put into creating the strategic planning unit, there were still great difficulties in delivering important economic cases. I am not saying what I particularly feel about it, but there are certainly questions that the Department has to answer.

Mrs D Kelly: I do not think that any of us will stand over all the planning decisions that the Department will make. As Mr Wells knows, there are a number of legal objections to some strategic planning that have to go through due process. This amendment and the clauses being proposed this evening will not allow for due process in relation to any of these economically advantaged planning zones. I am sure that the Minister will answer more fully, but Mr Wells said that in representing his own constituents he required the strategic planning unit to invoke those powers, so it is not just open to the Minister but to other elected representatives to invoke and ask others to invoke the powers available to them.

Sinn Féin and the DUP do not seem to recognise that the turnaround of strategic planning applications has improved vastly under the current Minister. Do they not realise that he has made great headway on clearing the backlog of major planning cases that had accumulated under the last three DUP Ministers? Do they not recognise that there has been a record-breaking planning performance on major economic projects? The six-month turnaround target is being met, and there are cases of exceptional performance: the Windsor Park stadium proposal was turned around in 11 weeks. So, the argument that the amendment is needed to facilitate inward investment is nonsense. The present system is capable of delivering rapid turnaround for major inward investment.

So, why has the DUP, after doing no planning reform for years, decided to seek radical change over the past few years? I think that this question has to be asked: who is really behind the amendment, or what is the DUP and Sinn Féin's motivation for it? It is quite clear that the DUP is driving the amendment. Most likely, Sinn Féin has been bought off by the promise of a designated zone in some Sinn Féin constituency. Perhaps Mr Boylan or another Sinn Féin Member would like to reveal where they intend to designate the zones. Is the real reason behind this to remove, at one fell swoop, all opposition to DUP plans for fracking? The current planning Minister has taken a strongly precautionary approach on fracking. Is the amendment a device to get around Alex Attwood's opposition?

As we speak, Westminster is debating the Northern Ireland Bill, which, among other things, will deny any real progress on transparency around political donations. We should never pass a DUP-inspired measure such as this until such times as there is transparency about political donations. The amendment stinks to the heavens. It is a DUP-led amendment, and Sinn Féin is being led by the nose. That is why it has flip-flopped on many of the other amendments on the Order Paper today. They are trying to take the bad look off their support for the DUP development free-for-all, but they will have to answer for their deeds. Phil Flanagan will have to explain why the fracking he claims to oppose could be easily facilitated by OFMDFM if the amendment passes. Cathal Boylan, who is leading the proposal for Sinn Féin, will have to explain why interconnectors, power lines and even power stations could run through the heart of Armagh if this is passed. Peter Robinson's supporters in East Belfast will have to ask him why the City Airport has been given a longer runway to land more, bigger and noisier planes booming across the suburbs of Belfast.

There is already a reasonable balance in planning between facilitating economic development and protecting the environment. This proposal, done on the back of an envelope to please God knows who, destroys that value. It is a power grab by OFMDFM, and it affords a ridiculous amount of discretion to politicians who persistently refuse to come clean about the developers who fill their party coffers.

7.30 pm

Mr Kinahan: I welcome the Bill and anything that makes planning more speedy, improves the economy and betters the environment, but I, like many others, was shocked and horrified when I saw the amendment. The Ulster Unionist Party does not support amendment No 20.

It is over a year since I left the Committee for the Environment. Then, we had just hurried through a Bill with 242 clauses. We needed to get it through so that we could have a better planning system. If I remember correctly, it required 16 other bits of legislation. Why on earth have we got to this point today, when all those DUP Ministers and others in the past could have improved things themselves? Like Mrs Kelly, I question the motives behind the amendment. If we look back to the beginning of this Assembly mandate, why on earth did the DUP not take this Ministry? It says that it can now change the system because the election system allows it to, but the DUP would have been allowed to take the Ministry had it chosen to at the beginning.

Look at what the DUP has allowed to happen to education, where one Minister is running the system to the point of almost cataclysmic destruction. We can see what is happening, but the DUP does not challenge it. Here, we have a Minister who is especially good at defending the environment, but they are trying to take his powers away.

Let us look back at the whole basis for the institution in this Building. It was meant to work through consensus, but, today, we see the opposite. We see a way of taking power away and not working together, yet all we ever hear from the Executive and others is that there is no agreement and that nothing is happening. OFMDFM is completely the wrong Department to give this sort of power to. In my two brief periods on the OFMDFM Committee, the Department would not provide information or documentation, and we never had anything to scrutinise. It was quite the worst of all Departments for a Committee to work with. Therefore, we cannot, surely, consider giving it the extra powers that are being proposed today.

Let us look at the two parties that are in OFMDFM. One has traditionally shown that it is not for the environment and the other has, from time to time, shown that it has no idea how to run an economy, the two absolute keys to what we are doing today. There has to be more behind this; there has to be more hiding.

Over the past few months, we have seen what is now known as the “So what?” style of government, where the rest of us do not matter and other Ministers are not spoken to or listened to. Today, as we have heard from the Chair of the Committee, the amendment has not even been run by the Committee, yet it sounds as if it has been worked on over the past two months with the Attorney General and others. Now, we are all being steamrolled. It stinks.

When I came into politics here, I heard stories of control freakery. I was amused and did not really believe that it happened, but we now see it almost daily. Someone said to me the other day that it is not just control freakery; it is not power sharing but — we have heard this before — power snaring. It is all designed to get more power to the two major parties. No wonder the rest of us are cynical.

If the two main parties can create these zones, they can do anything they like with them. They can put them nicely in place before the next election to make sure that they get more votes. Lots of money is sitting unused in the strategic investment fund, and they can do the same with that. If we put those two things together, we have not just control freakery but the buying of votes on the grandest scale. We have to put that in front of the electorate and show them how badly things are going.

When I was involved in the Bill, I was pleased to see that it would give powers to councils and was going to talk to the community. When I asked the then Minister what he meant by “community”, he said those who live there, those who work there and those who pass through. By the end, it meant everybody was going to be included in the planning system. Today, we seem to be going in a different direction: the only people who will be included will be OFMDFM.

Looking at amendment No 20 in more detail and all the powers that are in it is rather like looking at the Education Bill. Within it is a mass of little powers that can be passed onwards, such as the power to make orders and the power to decide how long the period can be. We have just heard that the areas could be any size, so the powers could take over any place, any type and anything. That is what we have to warn the public against.

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for giving way. He mentioned the public and the community. Is he not aware that the community is crying out for employment and jobs? That is one point that I want to make, because that is what is happening in my constituency. The other point I want to make is this: does he recognise that the current area plans are not fit for purpose and are not there to help attract, develop and create jobs?

Mr Kinahan: We all want to see jobs created by everything, but we want to see jobs created fairly, and we want to see a system used that everyone can be part of. That is democracy.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. This is nonsense: Mr Boylan is just trying to cloud the issue. The fact is that there are already a huge number of empty commercial premises, industrial sites and retail town centres. If there is an opportunity for economic development, is he saying that OFMDFM has failed, alongside DETI, to bring in foreign direct investment? Is he criticising their failure to create jobs and the rising level of unemployment?

Mr Kinahan: Thank you. I agree very much with that. The failure that we are seeing is the failure in how this Assembly works: it is not joined-up government. Instead of going for joined-up government and trying to work together, they are trying to take all the powers to the centre and leave everyone out. That is absolutely blatant in what we are seeing today.

Moving on to enterprise zones, I will read out what the First Minister said last June:

“I have some concerns about the issue of enterprise zone status. If the whole of Northern Ireland was being considered as an enterprise zone, I would be very much in favour of it. One difficulty that I have found with previous enterprise zone exercises is that they are often the cause of displacement. You are not really adding jobs to our economy. You can boost an individual area but very often at the expense of adjoining areas because companies move into the enterprise zone. We have considered the issue, and if, in the wider context, it was thought suitable for the whole of Northern Ireland, we would welcome that. However, I retain the concerns that we may not bring in new jobs but simply move the jobs from one area to another.” — [Official Report, Vol 86, No 1, p27, col 1].

I would love to know what has changed since he made that comment. What they are trying to start today is exactly the same thing. How will they deal with the displacement as we move things around Northern Ireland instead of creating the jobs that have been spoken about?

I have spoken for long enough. The Ulster Unionists oppose the amendment. We see it as OFMDFM wanting control of planning, avoiding the democratic process and trying to take more control: as I said, power snaring.

Lord Morrow: It is difficult to know where to start in this debate. Listening to some of the Members who have spoken, you would think that war had been declared today and the Department of the Environment was going to be stood down and was no longer going to exist. One Member was quick to point out that Sinn Féin is being led by the nose by the DUP and has succumbed to the great devious plans of the DUP. Other Members think that it is the DUP. I have no doubt that, when they speak, it will be the DUP's turn to get it and they will say that Sinn Féin is leading the DUP by the nose. On and on it goes, but, of course, none of it is true. I listened to Mr Kinahan and thought that Corporal Jones would have a field day in here. He would be crying out that we are all doomed. The world is probably going to end tomorrow. There will be no more planning or anything else. We will all wake up some morning and Northern Ireland will just be one big area of concrete, probably painted green, according to some. Of course, that will not happen.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

One of the significant criticisms of planning in Northern Ireland is the time that it takes to turn around economically significant planning applications. My comments are not directed at the present Minister, although he is not completely free of any criticism. Much of it is not attributable to him, despite his comings and goings on the the John Lewis planning application and the fact that we still do not know where we are on that one. I suspect that, in years to come, a decision on that planning application will eventually be arrived at.

Northern Ireland has a reputation, rightly or wrongly — I think it is right in this particular instance — as one of the slowest areas in which to obtain planning permission, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister has recently taken some important decisions and put a degree of speed and urgency into some of these issues. Some might say that it is a little too late. The criticism may be unfair, but, despite the recent progress, the perception remains. Therefore, it is important that the Executive send out a signal that we are in a position to grant planning permission quickly for economically significant applications and use that as a tool to attract investment as opposed to deterring it, as at present. The purpose of the amendment is to provide an alternative approach that could lead to a much faster planning process.

I would also like to make a few points in relation to the clause. In many respects, this provision is similar to simplified planning zones — the point has already been made, but it is worth making again — which are already provided for in statute but, to the best of my knowledge, have never been used. That begs the question “Why?”. There should be no issue about the effectiveness of the provision.

OFMDFM will have a key role in such applications, given the significance of economic growth to the Programme for Government and its statutory role in relation to cross-cutting issues. However, there remains a key role for the Department of the Environment. Responsibility for carrying out the day-to-day work will remain with Department of the Environment planning officials who have the relevant expertise. That is way it is, and that is the way it will remain. In addition, schemes will require the consent of DOE or the affirmative resolution of the Assembly. That will increase the democratic legitimacy of such decisions, which Mr Kinahan said was going the opposite way. Post the 2011 Planning Act coming into force, that will provide a role for the regional Administration to create zones. The 2011 Act merely envisaged a role for local government.

This provision provides a further option to help speed up the planning process. If it proves unnecessary, nothing will be lost by having it on the statute book. Conversely, if we do not create it, the option will not be open to us. This provision is not intended to create enterprise zones but to provide a faster process for obtaining planning permission through zones drawn for the purpose of attracting investment. Furthermore, it will be an important selling point internationally and will allow local companies to react more quickly to emerging opportunities. When the Executive published their Programme for Government, they put the economy at the centre of all their thinking. I could be wrong, but I do not recall a single MLA, never mind a party, getting up in the House and saying that that was the wrong way to go. That can only be complemented with a Planning Bill that is fit for purpose, so I ask Members to stop and think about that.

I am long enough about local government to recall that, in 1973, we had what was known as the old east Tyrone area plan. It covered the time from 1973 to 1993, which was a long period. Alas, we did not get a new area plan until, I think, about 2003, so that plan was 30 years in existence. Does anybody but anybody think for a solitary second that that was good forward planning and the type of planning that we need? I can speak with some authority, because, in our borough council, our planning strategy is out of date again. We have been told, “We will not bother with it now, given that local government is about to be reformed. We will just let it sit there, and we will work on the old one”. We are always working behind the times, and we do not seem to have an up-to-date plan. Those things need to be taken into account.

I know that we are talking about zoned areas, and Mr Hamilton outlined graphically what is envisaged for such areas. I say to the MLAs who are trying to whip up a bit of emotion and to push the panic buttons that they should stop and think of what we are trying to achieve for Northern Ireland. Everybody around the Chamber says, “Let us stimulate the economy”. Nobody is opposed to that, but let us put in place the infrastructure, mechanism and the necessary Planning Bill to complement that rather than having to wait and wait while those who might come here to invest move on elsewhere.

I will take the John Lewis example. John Lewis has made it clear that, if it is not at Sprucefield, it will consider going to Dublin. We have been told that umpteen times. The Minister will have an opportunity to correct this when he gets to his feet, and he undoubtedly will, but I suspect that his priority for a place such as that is to have it in the centre of Belfast or somewhere. However, John Lewis said that it will not go there. The Minister said, “You have to come here, and, if you do not, we will combat you in such a way that will make you ineffective wherever you are”. That does not sound like good planning. As I said to the Minister in Committee recently, we had a situation up in Londonderry that took the Department six years to make a move on. That was not the Minister's fault, and I have said that. However, it is symptomatic of the thinking on planning, which is to say, "Let us take our time". Yes, let us do things right, but, if you do not get it right in six years, you will not get it right. Therefore, we have this situation.

I am glad that Anna Lo has found her voice again, and I must congratulate her on that. She said at one stage that she was lost for words. At one point, she was not prepared to speak as Chair of the Committee. Now she has found her words and her strength and is back speaking as Chair of the Committee. I laud her for that. It is good to see that she has got her courage back and is back on her feet. I look forward to seeing her again in the Chair on Thursday at the Committee. She said that she was amazed that Sinn Féin had gone for this. Let me say to the Committee Chair that I do not know what she has been doing over the past 40 years. Those of us who have watched Sinn Féin do the things that it has done are not a bit amazed at anything that it does. It will twist and turn and babble about in whatever direction the wind might take it.

Therefore, you need not be one bit surprised by what it will do. It cannot be, on the one hand, Sinn Féin leading the DUP by the nose and, on the other hand, be the other way around. Mr Kinahan said that this was the big power parties grabbing all the power and bringing it to themselves. Well, some of us, perhaps not him, are long enough in the Assembly to remember when two other parties — namely, the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP — were in power. We know very well how they treated the rest of us.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Yes.

Mr Wells: Does the Member remember standing outside Hillsborough Castle at 2.00 am with a group of other DUP MLAs, as we were totally excluded from yet another round of important constitutional talks, which were dominated by the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party? Basically, anyone who was not part of that cabal —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. It is nice to learn of the history, but can we come back to the Bill, please?

Mr Wells: Mr Deputy Speaker, I was simply referring to the point made by the Member. Does he recall those many nights?

Lord Morrow: Yes, I remember the nights and the days of isolation in here when we were treated like something that sticks to your shoe. I remember it very vividly, and I will never forget the memory.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Yes, I will. Come on ahead.

Mr B McCrea: Following up on that point, would the Member say that things have changed and that this is now an open, inclusive and tolerant Assembly, where everyone's opinion and voice is heard? Does he think that we have made progress since his party became the dominant party?

Lord Morrow: I suspect that it is a bit like beauty, in that it is the eye of beholder. Some of us do feel that things are much better than they were. I certainly am one of them, because at least I now have a voice, which I did not have before when I was not listened to.

There are those who are either putting it up or who are, as I suspect, trying to whip up emotion in the House that this an attempt to take away power from the Minister of the Environment. No, this is attempt to get our economy going and to put in place a Planning Act that will have some relevance to the modern-day world that we are all trying to live in and take this Northern Ireland that we all claim to love so much out of its economic depression and into something new.

Dolores Kelly said that she thinks that this is a whole revolution in planning. I see nothing revolutionary about it. I think that it is simple, straightforward common sense, and let us as an Assembly adopt the amendment. The Minister, when he reconsiders, will probably see the wisdom of it. I suspect that, when he is speaking, he might even say that he has, in fact, thought it over and will give it his full support.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I will stop there, for I suspect that there are others who want to say something.

Mr Elliott: Although Mr Boylan is not in his place, I say that, for once, I felt a sense of sorrow for him when he was proposing the amendment. It is not often that I have a sense of sorrow for Mr Boylan, particularly in the political field, but I had some sympathy with him because I got the distinct feeling and impression from him that he was very unenthusiastic about the amendment. He certainly did not seem to show much vigour for it. He did not seem even to be totally across the amendment or, indeed, know what it was about. Again, I suspect that he probably did not have much more notice of the amendment than the rest of the Members in the House who did not see it until it came on to the Marshalled List on Friday. Therefore, I suspect that he was almost speaking to it against his will, but obviously that is a choice that Mr Boylan made for himself, as others did, if that is how they were treated over this matter.

I believe that the amendment is a power grab. I listened to Lord Morrow and Mr Wells, and I recall Mr Wells standing and objecting to many things. Most of his objections were to things that Sinn Féin was about. He even went to Dublin to object to Sinn Féin and, indeed, Republic of Ireland interference. However, what we now see is a power grab by Mr Wells's party and Sinn Féin. I do not know, for the life of me, why you would want to put the level of power that is in this amendment into the control of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. We have witnessed how slow they have been to react and take decisions on many other issues. I chaired the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister for a period, and we could not even get some correspondence from them. We could not even get updates from them, let alone decisions. How this will speed up the processing of significant planning applications, I have no idea. All that I foresee is much more procrastination, delays for applications that do not fit their bill and, obviously, the speeding up of applications that do.

That is why I have significant concern about why they want to take these powers or for us to give them those powers.

Mr Eastwood: Will Member give away?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to give way.

Mr Eastwood: Given the Member's expertise as a former Chairman of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, is he confident that that Committee sees lots of fast-flowing information from the Department? Do things get held up for year upon year, like the childcare strategy, the social investment fund (SIF) or all the other things that we have been waiting to come down the line from the Department? Is he confident, as a former Chair of that Committee, that that Department is capable of handling even more responsibility?

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for that. As well as asking me, he should perhaps ask those who are looking forward to the childcare strategy. He should ask those people and groups who have made applications to the social investment fund how they feel that it is working. No, I do not believe or have confidence that we will have quicker or better decision-making. I believe that if you asked many of those organisations in our society that have had to deal with the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, including many victims' groups, you would find that they would be extremely sceptical about the level of competence in that office.

I do not believe that passing this amendment would be good for the Assembly, the public of Northern Ireland or wider communities in society. A number of amendments have been tabled, many in extremely simple terms, as compared with this particular amendment, which is very detailed. Why were we not discussing this amendment in much more detail at an earlier stage? We should have had the opportunity to do so, particularly with such a comprehensive amendment. If the Attorney General has an opinion on this amendment, I would like to hear that before we take a decision on it. I am extremely disappointed at the mechanism that has been introduced and by the fact that those two parties feel the need to make such a power grab from the Planning Service and the Department of the Environment. It will not be valuable to wider society. I notice that they even have the audacity to indicate in the amendment that they want Department of the Environment staff to provide the administrative support for it, so that they do not have to do that. They want the Department to provide administrative support, but OFMDFM will take the decisions.

We should not approve this amendment, and I call on Members of the Assembly to draw back from it. No one can say that I am not a fair person in that respect. I have supported the economic parts of clauses 2 and 6, which, I believe, will be helpful to wider society; but I do not support this amendment.

8.00 pm

Mr B McCrea: I have a certain amount of amazement, which might be the right word; astonishment; just incredulity —

A Member: Incredulity?

Mr B McCrea: Thank you. When people say, "words leave me", it is not often —

Mr Wells: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the honourable Member for Lagan Valley to use a word that is not known in the English language?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has the Floor and the ability to use a word, provided that he provides some sort of translation so that Members can appreciate and understand it.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Members opposite for their assistance in this matter. Obviously, they have had some time to consider the implications of this amendment. I have to say that I have never seen the like of it. It is spectacular in its ambition. It is just astonishing in its scale and scope. They are, at a single stroke, going to do away with the Department of the Environment.

Lord Morrow started his contribution with many points that I can agree with. I hope that I do not misquote him. If I do, he will, no doubt, correct me. He started by saying that you would think to hear people talking here that war has been declared. Yes, that is exactly what I think: war has been declared on this Assembly. He said that you would think that the DOE was to be stood down, never to be heard of again; that it would be gone and it would be lost. That is exactly what is going to happen: the Department will be no more. It will be redundant. It will be absolutely without purpose. [Interruption.] If Lord Morrow wishes to make an intervention, I will take it.

Lord Morrow: When the Member started, he said that, if he misquoted me, I would no doubt put him right. So, I propose to do that. There is no attempt, no plan, no proposal or no intention. Is there any part of that you do not understand? There is no intention whatsoever to do away with the Department of the Environment. The Minister is even relaxed about that; I can see it on his face.

Mr B McCrea: I can only take the Member's assurances on that. Having read the amendment — and I can base this only on what is in front of me — it seems to me to take huge powers away from the Department of the Environment. It seems to me to make the position of the Minister of the Environment absolutely and totally redundant. It is not necessary. It can take every single power it needs to and go and do things. I heard the Member extol the virtues of this amendment.

Mr McGlone: I thank the Member for giving way. As I listened to the debate and read some of the proposals contained in the amendment, I thought that it is not even that they are stripping the Department of powers, which is one thing. When I sat through the consideration of the Planning Bill, I heard that one of the ideas was to give the power of simplified planning zones and the like over to the new councils under RPA. In fact, the whole of thrust of RPA, and some of the key responsibilities associated with it, are being stripped before they can be RPA-ed. That is the craziness of this.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for his intervention. Usefully, he pointed out something that even I had not seen regarding the entire scope of this audacious plan. It is not just the Minister or the Department of the Environment. It is RPA. It is the councils. It is the whole democratic process. Frankly, this is brilliance. This is fantastic. What will the next amendment be from the DUP? Will it be that we do not actually need the Assembly, and that they will just have a meeting between the two of them?

Mr Allister: We need the salaries.

Mr B McCrea: We need the salaries. It may well be that there is some modest role for some of us round here. I am not sure, at this late stage, whether anybody outside the Chamber is listening. The media may well have got their package and put it to bed. They do not see this. This is so big and brilliant. If you are going to try to slip something past, make it big and so audacious that nobody will even look at it.

I have to say that, when I heard the arguments put forward about why we should agree to this amendment, I might have had a certain amount of sympathy about its objectives. It might be, as was suggested, that we do need to do something about our planning process and have some way of dealing with these things. There is no doubt that Northern Ireland is somewhat slow in comparison with other jurisdictions and that we need to find ways to fix that. However, if you are going to do that, why take powers away from the Minister? Why not give him the powers to let him move forward on this? He will probably not thank me for this, but I have to say, grudgingly, that he is one of the better performing Ministers. He is actually trying to do things; he is moving things forward. I may not agree with every single thing that he does, but he is at least competent, on top of his brief and trying to make a difference, and you are trying to take the power away from him. I really do not understand why, when you find somebody doing something good, you tell them that you do not want them to do it any more.

Lord Morrow: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will give way in just a moment. The challenge is out there. I have to say this to Members present: understand what we are doing here. The whole of our Executive, our Assembly, and our democratic and constitutional position was built around the Belfast/Good Friday Agreement. The whole idea was that, because of the special circumstances that existed in Northern Ireland, we would have to have an Executive, with executive powers. The clue is in the words — executive powers — which are vested in the Minister.

We have a very specific process — d'Hondt or whatever system is adopted — to try to make sure that there is a division of powers. It is not the same as in other places where, perhaps, the Assembly would take every single decision, because, at the time, people complained about majoritarianism. This amendment is a fundamental attack on that process. Let us not pretend that this is just some minor piece of work and that we are just slipping it through for the good of Northern Ireland, "Move along. There is nothing happening here." This is a fundamental strategic attack on the democratic procedures in this place. I will say — I note that Mr Weir is agitated in his seat. Normally what happens — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. It is clear that the Member does not wish to give way.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. Of course, some people can make little witticisms and comments about language and all of those things. It is all grist to the mill. It is all about saying, "This is not really serious and you people over there are only taking up time. It doesn't really matter because the decision is already made."

I put out a challenge to some of the people who are present, because I have made my position quite clear, and my colleague Mr McAllister, I am quite sure, will say the same thing. It may well be that Members have some cunning plan, that they are not actually being led by the nose by anybody and that this is something that the two major parties have worked out amongst themselves and said, "Do you know what? We will just dispense with the others. Let's move on." I have to ask this question to other Members who will speak against the amendment: what are you still doing in the Executive? Why are you staying in a position where, day after day, week after week, they rub your nose in it? They take the powers and they let you have a Skoda. I think that is the limit of what you are getting. The way things are going, pretty soon they will ask you to drive the Skoda, and they will be in the back.

I listened to the Chair of the Committee when she said — I think that I have got this correct — that she truly believes that, if this amendment is passed, nowhere in Northern Ireland will be safe. She also said that it was undemocratic. She mentioned, and I agree with her, that this is not to say that you are against the concept of enterprise zones or trying to encourage some way of moving our economy forward. However, this is not the right process. This is a disgrace. I know that Members from the Alliance Party feel strongly about this. However, they really have to consider how they are going to carry on in the Executive if they are going to be treated like this repeatedly.

I come to the UUP's position. I heard that some people were talking about raising a petition of concern, but did not get support from the parties that had the voting strength to make it happen. Mr Kinahan came up with words such as "it stinks" and he said that the amendment was a power grab and that the two main parties were acting together, and they should not even be trusted with it. Does anybody actually read those speeches? Does anybody actually listen to what Mr Kinahan says? Then he says, "how do you vote? What do you do next?"

Everybody who is not in the DUP or Sinn Féin should understand that they are being marginalised. You are being made even more redundant than you already are, and if you had any self-respect, you would look at this and say "if it is the Minister of the Environment today, it will be the Minister for Regional Development next and the Minister of Justice after that." This is not just a land grab; this is a power grab. This is really serious. This is a fundamental attack on these institutions.

I then get to the stage of saying "what is the SDLP going to do about it?" There are issues, and I am waiting to hear from the Minister. I would like to hear what he has to say. As I have said before — and, no doubt, he will deal with me appropriately for daring to say — he is doing a good job, but this is something where I expect him to come forward, put on the armour and come up fighting. I know that the SDLP is the guardian of the Good Friday Agreement — the Belfast Agreement — and it cannot see any change, but this was never the way it was meant to be. This was not what was supposed to happen. We were supposed to get around collectively and do what is best for Northern Ireland, trying to work out how we could all move it forward, getting the expertise that is in all parties working together, and that is fundamentally not happening.

If the rumours of a move for this Minister are true, I think that will not be helpful for Northern Ireland. What we need now is somebody who knows what they are doing and is able to resolve the planning situation that we are in. It requires expertise, and it requires somebody who is on top of their brief. It does not need OFMDFM wandering around saying, "We are going to do this. We are going to do that. We are going to take your money. We are going to take your resources. We are going to take all these things." That is not government; that is bully-boy tactics. That is anti-democratic — the people in this House in the DUP and Sinn Féin. I heard Lord Morrow talk — with some eloquence, I might add — about how, in previous days, he was excluded, he was left out, he was not listened to —

Mr McCallister: He kept resigning.

Mr B McCrea: He did. He kept resigning because of it. When he was doing all those things, I kept thinking that he was about to say, "And now it is all going to be different", but is it really? If you felt so aggrieved by what went on in the past, you should be ashamed of yourself trying to bring this particular point forward. You should reflect on the things that went wrong in the past and try and make it better. I have to say to you —

Mr McGlone: Thanks very much for allowing me to make an intervention. During all this, a key element appears not to have even been looked at, which is what sort of equality impact assessment has been done on this. We hear time and time again of OFMDFM, on the face of it, putting equality at the heart of the agenda here. Let us hear what it has done about this and what equality assessment has been done in regard to this one.

Mr B McCrea: That is an excellent point well made. What assessment on equality or anything else has been done? This is somebody who has come along and said, "Right, I tell you what. Let us not worry too much about the detail. Let us just take all the power to ourselves. Let us put in every single caveat we can get and say that we are in charge. We are going to go and do this. Let us ride roughshod over the Assembly. Let us ride roughshod over people who have a democratic mandate. Let us go on and do what we think is best."

Understand this, folks: the real challenge for Northern Ireland is how we work collectively for the benefit of all the people of Northern Ireland. This procedure is not it. I will say quite emphatically, in case you have misunderstood my sentiments in this, the Northern Ireland 21 party will be voting absolutely against this, and we will challenge all those people who will join us in the No Lobbies to consider the position as far as the Executive goes.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thought that someone else was down to speak before me, but I am raring to go following 21st-century-politics man here. I am glad to see that he has dropped the rhetoric of 20th-century politics.

8.15 pm

This is the political part of the debate. Most of the debate so far centred around the environment or economics. This is a debate on largely a single issue to do with politics and how our system of government is structured and arranged, and how decisions are made.

Personally, I share many people's concerns about some of the potential outworkings of this amendment. It could have been handled better. In the manner of trying to get buy-in from across the Chamber, people could have been given much more than a couple of pages of text from a legislative document on a Thursday. However, that is what we have, what we have to deal with and what we have to put at the heart of this: not how the thing was made even though there have been fairly reasonable criticisms of that process.

We all share the acknowledgement that planning reform is required. That is what we have been debating for most of the day. We are largely agreed that decisions often take too long, and too many are challenged in the courts on insubstantial grounds, further delaying potential investments and impacting negatively on the potential for job creation.

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Go on ahead.

Mr McGlone: I am glad that you took us into the heart of the court. A fundamental principle in a democratic society, that of the right of the citizen or community to have their case heard in court, is about to be removed as a result of this amendment. That is a major issue, which is fundamentally anti-democratic and anti-citizen.

Mr Flanagan: It is hard to argue with Patsy. Fortunately, I have a technicality: that is a matter for the group 3 amendments, so I get out of it on those technical grounds.

Mr Eastwood: Perhaps I will ask you a question because I asked you one earlier and was ruled out of order, and rightly so, because it was a question more about this group of amendments. As someone who has been very vocal and very good in the campaign against fracking, will you or will you not now be arguing for County Fermanagh to become an economic zone under this legislation?

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. Arguing whether County Fermanagh should or should not become an economic zone is hard because, once again, all we have is the text of this document. What is quite clear is that many areas around this region are completely underdeveloped.

A recent leaflet published by the DUP boasted that £1 billion of investment was leveraged into east Belfast. Areas such as your own in Derry and my own in County Fermanagh could only cry out for that sort of investment. This will not solve many of those problems. There needs to be a sea change in how government deals with people and encourages inward investment to those areas. I will come to your point about County Fermanagh, Colum, and if you are not satisfied with my response, I will let you back in.

There is political disagreement in the House on how we bring in planning reform, and that is wholly legitimate. It is not one of the easiest arguments that ever had to be made to get your head around the detail of this. Some claimed that this amendment will pave the way for fracking. That is a possible outworking of the Bill, but, thankfully, I can state that that will not happen. That will not be an outworking of this Bill.

On the contrary, —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will in a minute, Jim. On the contrary, this amendment will transfer any decision on whether fracking goes ahead from a single Minister to a group of three Ministers, including the First and the deputy First Minister. I have been supportive of all the Environment Minister's comments on fracking, apart from the one on the BBC when he was misquoted. He has not said one thing about fracking that I would disagree with, so I was always hopeful that if a proposal for fracking came before the current Environment Minister to weigh up, he would take the right decision and not allow it to go ahead.

However, there is always the reality that that Minister will not be in that office for ever and that the SDLP will not always hold that portfolio. It is fairly well known around this place that the DUP regrets letting the environment portfolio go. They did not realise how much power they had in that Department.

Mr B McCrea: [Inaudible.]

Mr Flanagan: Technicalities, Basil.

I do not know whether the amendment actually removes somebody's right to challenge this in court. If the amendment stands up, is approved and successfully becomes law, what will actually happen is that responsibility for —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I am sorry, Jim. I forgot that you wanted to intervene.

Mr Wells: I am intrigued and interested because, as the Member is aware and as I mentioned, several of those who had the time to contact me about the Bill indicated their concern that it could lead to fracking. I am not expressing a view one way or the other on fracking. The Member seems to indicate that he knows that that definitely will not be the case. Obviously, he has been briefed by his side of OFMDFM on the specific projects that the Bill will cover through the proposed amendment. I would be very interested if he could give us an insight into the nature of those projects, because I think that that would allay many people's fears.

A Member: You have not been briefed.

Mr Wells: I have not. I am not on the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

Such an insight might allay fears. If we are talking, for instance, about taking a derelict part of the shipyard and designating it as one of those zones, which would enable it to be regenerated and rejuvenated quickly, I do not think that anybody could object to that. The Sirocco Works in east Belfast has been lying in a totally derelict condition for several years. If the Bill enabled the quick regeneration of that site, I do not think that people would have problems.

However, some of the people who contacted me asked what would stop somebody from designating Fermanagh as a zone to enable the huge economic benefits that fracking would bring to accrue for Northern Ireland. That does not mean that you are in favour of fracking: it is an economic fact that fracking would bring millions, if not billions, of pounds to Northern Ireland. Fermanagh would be designated as a zone and away we would go. The Member has obviously had assurance that that will not happen, and I would like to know where he got that assurance and how he can be so specific.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. I will deal with his actual question in a second. I have not heard anybody here argue against the principle of economically significant zones. I think that the problem that those who are not in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister are arguing about is that power is being taken away from the Minister of the Environment. That is their concern, not the actual zoning process. However, I stand to be corrected on that.

If a proposal for fracking in Fermanagh or any other substantial process comes forward, in the absence of consensus between the First Minister, the deputy First Minister and the Minister of the Environment, the decision will transfer to the House to allow MLAs of all parties and of none to have a proper debate on the issue and to give each one of us a vote on whether it happens.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

I reassure people that Sinn Féin's position on fracking is crystal clear. It has passed motions at successive Sinn Féin ard-fheiseanna outlining its opposition to fracking. That is how Sinn Féin policies are made: they are debated and decided on at our annual ard-fheis. At the past two years' ard-fheiseanna, motions have been passed that outline our firm opposition to fracking. I can say firmly that if a proposal for fracking were to come forward, and there were no consensus between the First Minister, deputy First Minister and whoever the Environment Minister was, and it came to the House, Sinn Féin's 29 MLAs, in line with that policy, would use a petition of concern — it would seek another MLA — to stop that proposal from going ahead. That is our position on fracking. That is how clear it is. We are opposed to fracking, and we will use whatever legislative mechanisms are open to us to stop it from going ahead.

Mr Swann: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Go ahead, Robin.

Mr Swann: Can the Member give the same reassurances about lignite in north Antrim?

Mr Flanagan: Unfortunately, Robin, I do not have a list of Sinn Féin motions from successive ard-fheiseanna. However, if Sinn Féin's position is that it is firmly opposed to lignite in that area, and it comes to the House for a vote, we would vote against it and stop those things happening. That is how our party policy works. It is debated and decided by our membership. It is not decided by our parliamentary party here. It is not decided in Connolly House or any other place. It is decided at our ard-fheis, where every member of Sinn Féin goes to debate and decide on our policies. We will stick to that.

At present, we have only 29 MLAs. If we were going to introduce a valid petition of concern, we would need the support of at least one other MLA. I am hopeful that we could find an MLA somewhere in the House to support the proposal.

Mr B McCrea: Here.

Mr Flanagan: Is there somebody shouting in the corner? Basil?

Therefore, I would be fairly relaxed —

Mr McGlone: Thanks very much for giving way, Mr Flanagan. We have heard about two very contentious and sensitive issues in different parts of the North — fracking in the part of the country that you are from and lignite mining in north Antrim. What about the right of an individual or a community that is under threat or feeling vulnerable to take a judicial review on those issues? That right and democratic entitlement is being diminished and denuded. Under the proposals, we are moving almost to a totalitarian planning system. It is the fundamental right of citizens to challenge such matters through the due process of law.

Mr Flanagan: Once again the technicality that gets me out of that at this stage is that that is a group 3 amendment, and we are still only on group 2. The Assembly will vote on amendment No 20, which is in group 2. We will then debate the group 3 amendments, which include what you are talking about. That is a separate issue, and I do not want to be ruled out of order, but I will contribute to that debate later on.

A Cheann Comhairle, that is all that I have to say on the amendment. I am not overly exercised about this. Many people are genuinely concerned that it will lead to fracking, but I can say that that will not be the outworking of the amendment.

Mr Speaker: Before I call Mr McCallister, I wish to advise the House — Members will know this — that a valid petition of concern has been tabled to amendment Nos 21 and 23. Of course, the impact of the petition is that, after the Question has been put on amendment No 20, proceedings will stop. The Questions on amendment Nos 21 to 23, and so on, will be put tomorrow. As we will not have reached amendment No 24 tonight, the debate on group 3 will also take place tomorrow. The Business Committee will agree the arrangements for the rescheduling of the Bill's Consideration Stage when it meets, hopefully, tomorrow morning.

Mr Weir: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I obviously appreciate those arrangements, but for the benefit of the House, will you clarify that the remainder of business outside the Planning Bill will be debated tonight?

Mr Speaker: That is what I was coming on to. We will, of course, proceed with the remaining items in the Order Paper tonight. I think that Members need to understand that when a petition of concern is put into the Business Office on the evening or day on which the issue is being discussed, the vote cannot then be taken until the following day. That is the impact of a petition of concern. I wanted to alert the House early to the situation at the minute. Hopefully, the Business Committee will meet tomorrow at 9.30 am, when we will try to accommodate the Minister and Members and reschedule the Bill's Consideration Stage for debate.

Mr McCallister: Like many others in the House, I am concerned and dismayed by the amendment. We are told by Sinn Féin and the DUP that this is about economic regeneration. I do not think that anyone in the House is against creating jobs. Goodness knows, given our youth unemployment rates and general unemployment rates, we need to create jobs and do much more and much better than we have been doing. However, it is a little drastic to think that our planning system entirely grew our economy and then caused it to flatten out.

8.30 pm

Mr Hamilton, in response to an intervention from Mr Allister, said that the reason why they needed to seize that power from the Department of the Environment is that it is a cross-cutting measure. Therefore, they would presumably need the power to move the rates in the economic zones and change other such things. However, what Department would not be included in that if it is so cross-cutting? We have no idea where the zones will be.

Will some of them be in rural areas? Would we need the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, or is DETI going to be involved through Invest NI in trying to stimulate that? Will that be more power than OFMDFM needs to secure for itself, or is this effectively a warning to Ministers from other, smaller parties to bring legislation at their peril because DUP and Sinn Féin will try to stick something into that legislation?

I will give way to Mr McGlone.

Mr McGlone: Thank you, Mr McCallister. We have heard about the void that exists around equality proofing for this very significant move today in the Assembly, but might it also be useful to hear whether there has been any stab whatsoever at rural proofing, which moves into another Department and the much vaunted aims of the rural development strategies and the likes, in regard to this proposal that we have before us today?

Mr McCallister: Rural proofing has proved more to be something to put in a press release; there is very little evidence of it ever taking place. The Member represents a fairly large rural constituency, as do I, and could certainly confirm that we have not seen much evidence of it in any shape or form right across a range of government policies. You would need those cross-cutting decisions if you were doing that, so it makes an interesting point as to why, even if you accepted the argument about this amendment, and on the very intervention that Mr Allister made, would you not keep the power with DOE? Why would you take it back to the centre? If this was seriously about a collective, cross-cutting, reasonable approach by the Northern Ireland Executive, all Ministers would have their shoulder to the wheel to try to regenerate our economy, to stimulate where possible, and to speed up the planning process. As I said in the debate on the first group of amendments, there is no one in this House who would not like to see a faster, more responsive planning system. There is probably no one who does not get frustrated when, sometimes, issues in planning that should be very straight forward seem to take an inordinate amount of time to resolve. That is something that we all want to see addressed.

However, to go back to my point, why take the power back to OFMDFM? Let us go through some of these issues. Mr Flanagan has tried to convince us that, whatever happens, he and Sinn Féin will protect the people from Fermanagh whatever their view on fracking. He says that they will not allow that to happen and that they almost have enough signatures for a petition of concern, but does anyone really think that this will keep coming back to the Assembly for debate on every single planning issue?

I will give way to Mr Kinahan.

Mr Kinahan: Thank you very much. Has the Member considered what will happen in the future when different parties are in OFMDFM? You might not be able to guarantee that there will be no fracking because we will have different parties making different decisions. No one can give a guarantee.

Mr McCallister: I am sure that Mr Kinahan was not suggesting that NI21 would be there just so soon — [Laughter.] — but, at some point, there will be different parties in OFMDFM, and there will be different parties looking after these issues. I hope that, when parties are doing that, they work to form a proper Programme for Government and work through it, instead of cobbling huge amendments onto a piece of legislation at the last minute.

I will give way to Mr Wells.

Mr Wells: My understanding is that the Member is incorrect; that, under clause 8, if agreement is not reached between OFMDFM and DOE, any proposal to designate one of those zones automatically comes to the Floor of this House for agreement and could be subject to a petition of concern or whatever. In the absence of any of the individuals who drafted it, I do not have total assurance on that, but my understanding is that if he reads it carefully, he will see that if Mr Attwood as Minister of the Environment says no to the designating of one of these zones, that proposal must then be approved by the Assembly.

Mr McCallister: Considering the way in which we are bringing in this amendment at the moment, I am sure that that reassurance is fairly cold comfort to many Members on these Benches and, I imagine, the Minister. Maybe OFMDFM will take away that power with an amendment at Further Consideration Stage; I think that they will probably try to grab that one as well.

If we move part of planning into OFMDFM, and if it is also in charge of the planning appeals system, is there a conflict of interest? It would be useful if the Minister would comment on whether he has had any legal advice on the issue. Is it reasonable to let OFMDFM continue in the role of appointing and working with the Planning Appeals Commission, or do we need to look at that system if the amendment is made tonight? There is a very direct conflict of interest that must be challenged. OFMDFM would be making decisions on economically significant planning zones. As Mr Hamilton mentioned earlier, planning tends to be adversarial. Not everyone jumps for joy when every decision is made. Therefore, it is very unwise to have the Planning Appeals Commission with OFMDFM if OFMDFM becomes an extension of our planning system. That is entirely wrong. It should not be allowed to happen. It is a very strong argument for why we should reject the amendment outright.

I see that Lord Morrow is not in his place. He will not be disappointed to hear that I agree entirely with my colleague Basil McCrea. If you look at a series of decisions that have been taken lately, you have to ask why some parties stay in the Executive. Only last week, we discussed and debated what might happen to the A5 moneys. Again, Sinn Féin and the DUP took it upon themselves to decide that they would be best placed to look after those moneys. Look at this decision. We have a Minister of the Environment from one of the smaller parties in the Assembly, and powers are being taken away from him.

Although I do not agree with every decision that Minister Attwood has made; at least he has made decisions. One of the things that you find out sometimes when dealing with some business leaders is that people like decisions to be made. The Minister has proven that he is not afraid to do that. However, this attempt to take power from a Minister goes to the very heart of what our agreement has been about over the past 15 years. It is no great secret that I would like to see us moving to a model of government and opposition. If ever the Assembly needed an example of why we should have a government and opposition, this amendment is it. We have a Minister who is having powers removed from him through the amendment, and he can do nothing about it. He can speak passionately about it and maybe give some background to some of the legal advice that he has been given; but can he stop it? No. That is fundamentally wrong. If you look at other systems of government that have any sense of collective responsibility on the Executive, that could not happen, but that is what is happening now, and we should not have that system in place.

As my colleague Mr McCrea said, there have been two examples inside a week of Ministers from smaller parties having their policies ridden over roughshod. Those parties and Ministers should seriously think about the way forward and whether they want to continue in an Executive that disregards their views and the policy agendas they are setting out, and uses a planning Bill to insert a huge amendment — it could almost be a Bill on its own — that completely changes the Bill and has such a dramatic effect on the functions of a Department and the way that our Executive will function.

Like many colleagues on these Benches, I will certainly be firmly voting no and will continue to speak out against something that we believe so strongly about. This amendment is wrong, and it should not be passed tonight.

Mr Allister: The position that we have arrived at is a most illuminating commentary on the system of government in Northern Ireland. We appoint, by a specific means, Ministers to various portfolios. We appoint an Environment Minister, and planning is a large part of his portfolio. That Minister is then ambushed by an eight-page amendment to a Bill that he, in good faith, has brought to the House, and that has been through the relevant Committee of the House, without a whisper of that ambush. The amendment was presented to the House a few hours, in working terms, before the Bill was due to have its Consideration Stage. Not just the House but, most particularly, the specifically appointed planning Minister has been ambushed. That is, I suggest, a most illuminating commentary on how government works or does not work in this House. It is also an illuminating insight into the political motivation and intent of the ambushers, and the respect or disrespect in which they hold their Executive colleagues.

It is one thing to take a certain attitude to those of us who are outside the Executive in this corner of the House. However, to take that same overbearing, pull-a-fast-one attitude to Ministers in the Executive is quite staggering. This has to be the most audacious power grab that the House has seen for a very long time. Indeed, it is such a power grab that it would do any totalitarian regime proud. Totalitarianism may be no stranger to Sinn Féin, but you would have thought that those who call themselves the Democratic Unionist Party might have some hesitation about it. Clearly not. Totalitarianism rules supreme in this amendment. This amendment is about garnering all power to themselves. It is clear that the DUP has learned a lot from Sinn Féin and that it is now “ourselves alone”.

8.45 pm

It is about garnering all that power of a strategic nature on planning to themselves and, in the doing of that, humiliating the planning Minister in the House in such a calculated and deliberate fashion that it can only be intended to humiliate him. No consultation whatsoever. No pulling him aside after an Executive meeting and saying, “We were thinking about this. What would you think?”. No. They hit him with the detailed, considered, eight-page amendment, about which he knew nothing — no more than any of the rest of us, outside those two parties, knew anything about it — while, all the time, going through the motions of debating the Committee Stage of the Bill, knowing all that time what was intended and what was going to happen. That is, I think, even by the standards of this House, quite, quite shocking.

Some people, of course, will be delighted by this direction of travel. The development donors to the Democratic Unionist Party will be delighted by this direction of travel. I am sure that some of them are rubbing their hands with glee, thinking that investments made are going to make a good return. When they think that things are now safely in the hands of the First Minister, who knows about a good £5 land deal, I am sure that they are much comforted about where things are going strategically on planning in this House.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: Given the well-founded accusations that he has just made, does the Member not express surprise that the once talkative DUP have not thought to stand up from their Benches and say, "That is not the case. That is not what is happening". Why is it that the DUP, on this particular issue, remains silent against the charges that you have made? Would you, Mr Allister, take an intervention from any DUP Member who would like to challenge your assertion?

Mr Allister: I will certainly take any intervention from anybody who wants to tell me about the Fraser donations, the Sweeney donations, the Campbell donations —

Mr Speaker: Order. I just warn the Member of the allegations that he is making in the House. Members will know that I allow them quite a bit of latitude when it comes to Bills in this House and amendments to them, because I understand that, when it comes to amendments, there are sometimes wider issues. However, I warn the Member not to go down the road that I think he might want to go down.

Mr Allister: I do not think that I made any allegations that are not public knowledge.

So the proposition is that a Department, OFMDFM, with no planning officers in its ranks — yes, it has 400 staff, but none of them works as a planner, and it may have special advisers by the legion, but none is a planning specialist — should become the strategic planning Department for economic zones in Northern Ireland. The Department that cannot even answer questions in the House in a timely manner and cannot address strategies that are its responsibility in a timely manner; the most failing, dysfunctional Department of all the failing, dysfunctional Departments that there have ever been; that Department, because we need economic regeneration, will take upon itself the strategic planning function. Even it must know that it has neither the capacity nor the ability to do the job, yet it has an irresistible urge to power-grab on the issue, knowing full well that the losers will be the people of Northern Ireland, who want a functioning, working, good planning system but who are to trade in what they have for the standard dysfunctionality of OFMDFM. No matter what way you look at that proposition, it is utterly indefensible.

Even if we take the proposition that there is a need for a co-ordinated approach to economic zones and that you need to have economic zone planning — let us all accept that argument for a moment — why would you ever want to remove those economic zones from their natural home and hinterland, the Department of the Environment, where the rest of planning resides? Even if we need economic zones, that is no justification whatsoever for extracting them and delivering them to OFMDFM. The fact that they are going there is confirmation in itself that this is just about power and the grabbing of power.

There is much in the eight pages of amendments that goes unanswered. We must have had the most hapless, uninformative speech from the proposer of an amendment that the House has ever heard from Mr Boylan, who patently knew and understood nothing about the detail of those eight pages. Someone said that his heart did not seem to be in it. That may be so. I do not know what the deal was whereby Sinn Féin agreed to the DUP driving force on that power grab, but I know that it was a deal. I do not know what the trade-off was — whether it was the Maze or something else — but it patently was a trade-off. It is obvious to the House that the driving force for the amendment comes from the DUP Benches and that Sinn Féin Members are largely passengers, though willing passengers.

Mr Boylan's speech was a classic example.

The only Member in the House — of course, he is ever eager to please, no more so than now, when he can see the limousine beckoning —

Mr Hamilton: It is only a Skoda.

Mr Allister: It is only a Skoda. Well I am sure that Mr Hamilton aspires to much more than a Skoda. [Laughter.] The ever-eager-to-please Mr Hamilton seemed to be the only one who had any grasp of what anything in those eight pages might actually mean. I did try to intervene with him latterly to ask for some illumination, because we are in the bizarre position where the Minister will not be able to answer the questions because he has not seen the draft for any longer than the rest of us have, and it would have been patently cruel to ask the proposer the question. [Laughter.] So one is left with no one to ask. Let me ask one question, and let me go no further than the first of the eight pages of the amendment, where it says, in the proposed article 13A(2):

"The adoption of an economically significant planning zone scheme has effect to grant in relation to the zone, or any part of it ... planning permission for development specified in the scheme or for development of any class so specified."

Let me re-read that, leaving out some of the superfluous words, so that I can make the point that I want to make:

"The adoption of an economically significant planning zone scheme has effect to grant in relation to the zone ... development of any class so specified."

Is that class as specified by the use classes order? Answer comes there none. Or, is it as specified in some other way? If it is class as specified in the use classes order, does that mean that, by creating an economically significant planning zone, we grant, at a stroke, planning permission to anything that is in a particular class of development? If you grant planning for mining, offices or anything else in the use classes order, you are gifted, without any further questions from any upcoming user, that area for mining, offices, manufacturing or anything that is in the use classes order. You are gifted planning permission without even having to ask.

Where does that stand with the long-established fundamental principles in planning that say that, when you come to make your application, you have to address the basic issues of location, siting and design?

Mr Hamilton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: I will when I have finished.

Where does that stand if you are gifted a global right to have a particular class of development in a zone and you never, it seems, have to address in that zone the questions of location or siting and you certainly never seem to have to address the question of design?

I will give way to the Member.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for giving way. The aspect of the amendment that the Member is railing against so strongly is, verbatim, the same as section 33(2) of the Planning Act (Northern Ireland) 2011, which allows for the creation of simplified planning zones in Northern Ireland. He is very angry — a lot of people were nodding their heads around him as he railed against this aspect of the amendment — about a piece of legislation and a principle that the House agreed when it passed the 2011 Act.

Mr Allister: That sounds a bit like the Nuremberg defence to me. I was not here when the 2011 Act was passed; if I had been, I would like to think that I would have asked that same question. I am sorry that no one else did, but the question still needs to be answered. [Interruption.] Are we now just giving a carte blanche in these economic zones to anyone —

Mr Hamilton: We already have.

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Mr Allister: Are we just giving a carte blanche in these zones to anyone who comes up with any scheme, no matter how hare-brained, provided that it is in the class that is being used?

Mr Hamilton: It is exactly the same —

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us not have a debate across the Chamber. The Member has the Floor.

Mr Allister: Whether it is the same as something else is neither here nor there, because here we are talking about potentially huge, unspecified, unlimited economic planning areas, and you are just going to say that you have carte blanche to do what you like. You do not have to worry about design or anything else. Is that really what the proponents of this amendment, whoever they may be, want?

9.00 pm

Mr McGlone: I thank the Member for giving way. I did sit through the passage of the previous Planning Bill. I mentioned this earlier, but for Mr Hamilton's ears' benefit, I repeat: the simplified planning zones were to be handed down for consideration, after the implementation of RPA, to local councils. Therefore, I go back to my original point: they are taking the powers that were supposed to be handed over to local councils and putting them at the centre. That is not democracy in my book.

Mr Allister: I tend to agree.

The situation is this: there is supposed to be devolution of some planning powers to the new councils. What is going to be left for the planning Minister? The strategic planning that touches on the economy through the zonings, with no limitation on their extent, will be removed from him. The Minister stood at the Dispatch Box earlier and said that he was here to put forward good law. He said that it was his aspiration, as Minister, to bring to the House good law. Although there is a challenge for those who peddle this amendment, there is also a challenge for the Minister. Does he think that this amendment is good law? If he thinks that it is bad law, will he return to the House at Further Consideration Stage and say, "Approve this bad law." That is the challenge that the Minister will have to wrestle with.

Is he prepared to be overborne by the DUP/Sinn Féin cabal in the House and be brought to the point at which something that he brought forward in good faith as good law can be overwhelmed by what he thinks is bad law and yet still bring it back to the House? Or will the Minister find the courage to say, "I will move no further stage of this Bill if it is made into bad law by the passing of this amendment."?

As Mr McCrea suggested to him, will he go one step better and say, "There is a limit to which I will be humiliated. There is a limit to which the rights that the SDLP has in this Executive will be trampled on." When you get to the point of denuding a Department of key, fundamental powers, the time has come to go. If anything good is to come out of this amendment, it could be that. At last, those who have been trampled on and used as doormats might act, whether it was forcing them to announce an A5 project that they did not even believe in and then, when it began to fall, humiliating them by saying, "We will decide where the money will be spent", or saying to the planning Minister, "Any planning powers that matter, we are taking them from you."

There surely has to come a point at which the parties in the House who are treated in that way by those whom they prop up in the House reach the point of saying, "There is a line. It has been crossed, and we must go because we can do no other." That would be the dignified and honourable thing to do. I trust that even yet some will find the courage to do that. Government in this House will be the better for it, because at least then you will force the issue of opposition in this House.

The situation with the planning Minister is scandalous. I do not agree with all his decisions: I most certainly did not agree with his John Lewis decision or his Rose Energy decision, but he is the Minister. He is the man who has been given the authority. I say in his defence that it is wrong that, for the political expediency of the ruling cabal, he should now be humiliated in this way and robbed of such powers as he has. For what it is worth, I will most certainly vote against this amendment.

Mr Agnew: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the amendment tabled by the developers' union party and its colleagues Sinn Féin. This amendment has nothing to do with good governance and everything to do with centralised power and control. We had hours of talk about the balance provided by sustainable development, the balance between environmental priorities, social needs and economic priorities. That all goes out the window with this amendment.

In the debate on the first group of amendments, there was talk of a wrecking amendment. This is the wrecking amendment. This is the amendment that wrecks the Planning Bill and, indeed, that will wreck our planning system if it is allowed to go through. It will allow for complete deregulation of planning at the whim of the First and deputy First Minister where they so decide. Balance, fairness and community planning will all go out the window in areas where OFMDFM decides. In the debate on the first group of amendments, I spoke of the loaded dice. This amendment loads the dice very much in favour of developers and against communities.

The DUP, the developers union party, had four years in the environment Ministry —

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member will know of the ruling that I made some time ago that Members should call parties and other Members by their proper names.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Speaker for his guidance. The DUP had four years in the environment Ministry to create better regulation of our planning system; it promised that. The DUP failed in that regard, so it has gone from better regulation to deregulation and is being supported in that by Sinn Féin.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. He talks about regulation while the DUP was in charge of the DOE. We brought forward the 2011 Planning Bill, which, in terms of the number of clauses, is probably one of the largest Bills ever to come in front of the House. Apart from anything else, that legislation created simplified planning zones. This is effectively the model for economically significant planning zones. Very major steps forward were taken. I appreciate that the Member's hands, and those of the Member who spoke before him, are clean in that they were not here at that time. However, a very lengthy and substantial piece of legislation was brought forward in the last Assembly.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention because it allows me to make the point that just because I was not an elected representative during the passage of the last Planning Bill does not mean that I have not looked at its provisions. This is not simply about simplified planning zones. As has been pointed out, those already exist in legislation so there would be no need to provide for them again. As has also been pointed out, the simplified planning zones were for councils with between 40 and 60 members to designate. Those are based in their local community, make decisions on their local community and are accountable to their local community. These are zones designated by OFMDFM —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will finish the point and then give way.

These zones are designated by OFMDFM with much less accountability and much less debate and dialogue, as it is an office of two. The other difference is that there are exemptions in respect of where you could have the simplified planning zones; for example, areas of conservation. There are various protections in that legislation that do not exist in this amendment. That is why it is not simply a case of that legislation being reinstated. If it were, we would not need the amendment. It centralises what was supposed to be devolved to communities and councils, but it also goes further than current legislation does. I will give way to Mr Wells.

Mr Wells: I understand the Member's concerns and see where he is coming from. However, is he being entirely fair? The proposed article 13A(8) states that the zones will be designated with the consent of the Department of the Environment. If that happens —

A Member: Or.

Mr Wells: I am coming to the "or".

If that happens, there is no problem because, presumably, the Minister of the Environment will be perfectly happy with the designation and the process or it will be approved by resolution of the Assembly. It is not simply a question of OFMDFM taking the power unto itself. The first lock is that the DOE has to approve it, and if that is not the case, my understanding, unless I am totally wrong, is that any designation then has to come before the House, which is a democratic Chamber for all of Northern Ireland, for approval. Is the Member being entirely fair in his criticism?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I talked a lot about the short-term nature of some amendments to the Planning Bill. In the short term, OFMDFM made the calculation that its two parties have the deciding votes in the House; so, passing something through the Assembly Chamber would not be a great obstacle. I take the Member's point about the Environment Minister, but for all I know, it is his party's intention to take that Ministry back in the next mandate. Indeed, it might decide to do a reshuffle in this mandate if it feels that the Environment Minister is being a blockage. So, I am not reassured about that.

Mr Boylan: I thank the Member for giving way. I listened to Mr Allister say that I had not read the amendment. I did read it. He picked up on the point about proposed article 13A(8)(b). Would you not encourage the Minister, under proposed article 13A(8)(a), to work with OFMDFM? He has the opportunity to do that now, and he also had an option to bring forward simplified planning zones through the 2011 Act anyway.

Mr Agnew: The Minister can work with his OFMDFM colleagues, but they clearly did not work with him on this amendment. My understanding is that simplified planning zones are to be devolved to councils. Maybe the Minister wanted the power to lie there. I will let him answer that. When the DUP held the Environment Ministry, it had the power over economic planning zones, and three subsequent Ministers did not use that power. It is unclear why the need has arisen.

There was some debate on fracking, where the planning zones would be, and whether there would be one in Fermanagh. I will put in the caveat that I, like other Members, heard about this amendment only on Thursday evening and if I am wrong, I stand to be corrected; but my understanding is that there is nothing in the amendment that prevents Northern Ireland being designated as an economically significant planning zone. It was said previously in the debate that nowhere is safe, and that is absolutely the case. If Northern Ireland becomes an economically significant planning zone, we absolutely will see the free-for-all that Members on opposite Benches have said that we will not see. They may not choose to go down that road, but we have no guarantees that they will not do so, and I contend that no sane Parliament would give such powers away so easily. Indeed, only a insane asylum would grant such powers to an office such as the Office of the First and deputy First Minister.

We have seen the outcomes when the First Minister gets involved in planning decisions, and I reference Knock golf course as just one example. Parties in this House, with the exception of the Green Party, do not declare who donates to the party. So we do not know. Whoever takes on OFMDFM, and the point —

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Yes.

Mr Dickson: On a point of information, Mr Speaker, the Alliance Party, along with the Green Party, publishes the donations to our party. They are very clear on our website, and it would be interesting if other parties in this House did the same.

Mr McCallister: We have not had any yet. [Laughter.]

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I will give way again if I am wrong but, the last I looked, the Alliance Party had not received any donations over the limit set at which it will declare donations. The Green Party deliberately set the limit lower than the £7,500 that is designated. Unfortunately, we do not get donations over £7,500, so we declare every donation over £500 to ensure transparency.

What we do not have is transparency in our planning system, so, potentially, developers are giving money to political parties. Those same political parties will be given even more control over planning decisions if this amendment passes. There is already suspicion of corruption in the Planning Service. To be fair, politicians, with the exception of the Environment Minister, do not have a great deal of say in planning decisions. If we give politicians, namely OFMDFM, even more power, particularly over significant economic planning decisions, the suspicion of corruption will only increase. I challenge any party in this House that wants to see public confidence in the planning system to publish their donations, whether or not they are required to do so by law.

Planning was supposed to go to communities. A big element of the Planning Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 was to put communities at the heart of planning and to devolve planning to councils to make it more accountable. This amendment flies in the face of that and, indeed, takes things in the opposite direction. It puts the power into OFMDFM, with one of the supposed objectives being to speed things up. I will not have been the first person to have had a chuckle at the suggestion that OFMDFM will speed things up.

Let us look at OFMDFM's record on delivery; I will try not to take as long as OFMDFM does. We saw delay on the social investment fund. On the childcare strategy — hardly the most controversial of political hot potatoes — we have seen delay. We have seen delay on the shared future strategy. Every time the ethnic minority development comes up, it sees delay. The sexual orientation strategy? I have not seen it yet; it has been delayed. As Mr Allister pointed out, we even see delays in a departmental function as simple and basic as responses to written questions from Members. If you want something done quickly, do not send it to OFMDFM, because you might not see it again.

Mrs D Kelly: In due course.

Mr Agnew: In due course, as the Member says. As Stephen Nolan would say, they are working towards it. He is working towards 15 stone, but he has not got there yet.

This amendment is two fingers to everything that is good planning. It is two fingers to balance, it is two fingers to fairness and it is two fingers to community engagement. It has been purported that Northern Ireland must show itself open for business, but, time and again, this Executive seem to want to show that Northern Ireland is wide open for business to exploit our natural environment and, indeed, to exploit and drive development despite opposition from our communities. My colleague John Barry often says that the poor sell cheap, and we will certainly have sold out Northern Ireland if we pass this amendment. We will not know for some time what the true costs will be, but I fear that they may be catastrophic.

Finally, as has been made clear in the debate, the position at the Executive table on this issue is far from unanimity. Indeed, it seems that there is rarely unanimity at the Executive table. One thing that I can say is that there is unanimity in opposition from those of us in the back corner.

If ever there was a piece of evidence that suggested that the smaller parties should come out of the Executive, it is this amendment. It has been pointed out that Danny Kennedy was given his portfolio and his budget, and a chunk was assigned to the A5. The A5 was the disaster that some of us predicted it would be, and the money was taken back.

The Alliance Party was told, "We do not like you having two Ministries. We are going to take one off you." To be fair, maybe it is stuck with OFMDFM, but that has not happened yet. DEL is still here, so they must have OFMDFM working on it. They were told, "We are taking a Ministry off you because we are not happy with that." Now, the Environment Minister has the audacity to make planning decisions on article 31 applications which the First and deputy First Minister do not like, so they are going to take powers from him as well.

I think that we can agree that, if you are not in the Sinn Féin/DUP cabal, you are not really in power. I know that the Minister talks about the difference between being in power and being in government, and I would say he is increasingly in government but decreasingly in power.

Mr Attwood: I will respond to that last comment later.

I thank Mr Boylan, Mr Hamilton and Mr McCrea, and Mr Allister nearly got round to it — acknowledging whatever contribution I have made as Minister. I hope that my party colleagues were listening very closely to that. [Laughter.] Thanks to all of them.

I will even acknowledge it myself, in that I did not take the advice of Members to my left, yesterday and this morning, who said that I should not move this Bill. That was the advice I was being given: not to move the Bill. So some of those Members who have spoken with raised voices and greatest eloquence are the people who, this morning, said to me, "Do you really want to do this?" The debate on the first set of amendments and that on the second prove the point, in all its dimensions, about why this Bill needed to be debated, in terms of good and bad law, governance and politics. That is what we have now begun to touch on.

It seems to me that you could filter through all the comments that have been made in respect of this amendment. You could replay this sometime tomorrow. The third group of amendments, and in particular that one that tries to frustrate citizens who go to the courts to challenge public policy through judicial review. When you filter through all that — and this has been picked up by a number of Members — you will see that this has been the most one-sided debate about significant law that I can remember in my lifetime in this Assembly, and, arguably, in my lifetime in politics, and that has been quite a long time. It has been relentlessly one-way traffic, as to where the good and bad arguments lay.

Mr Elliott began, followed by Mr Allister and one or two others who spotted, very quickly, that the person who moved this amendment had nothing to say and displayed no conviction about what he had to say. It fell to his party colleague, Mr Flanagan, to hint, in a manner that you never hear in the ranks of the republican movement, of a sense of dissent and difference within that particular organisation. To be fair to him, Mr Hamilton put a brave face on it. At least, unlike Mr Boylan, he valiantly tried to defend the Bill, and Mr Allister referred to that as well. For reasons that I will explain, he will feel somewhat embarrassed very soon, in some of the language that he used in defence of this Bill, particularly in the way he sourced its contents in the Planning Act 2011.

I will put that aside. The word “humiliated” has been used about me. You could use a lot of words to describe some of what has been happening over the past while, and I will go back to the narrative around these amendments, because I think, in that, there is something to tell. However, it comes down to whether the whim of the DUP, at the behest — let us be clear about this — of the British Government, is going to again prevail over Sinn Féin. That is what is at the heart of this debate.

Although Mr Allister said that there was not a whisper about all this — I will explain the narrative in a second — there was a whisper about all this. It was a whisper that was published on 14 June. It was in a document that was written and endorsed by four people: the Rt Hon David Cameron, MP; the Rt Hon Theresa Villiers, MP; the Rt Hon Peter Robinson, MLA; and Martin McGuinness, MLA. It was the so-called economic pact ‘Building a Prosperous and United Community’. What did those four individuals say? In an act that was, in my view, potentially hostile to the democratic and devolution interest, the four of them said that they were committed to:

“Creating a planning system that supports economic growth”.

They also said:

“The Executive will establish a new process for economically significant planning applications, and make new arrangements in relation to applications for Judicial Review of planning decisions.”

So, whatever the narrative may have been over the past number of days regarding these amendments, there was a narrative before recent days. It was a narrative that was, in part, driven by the British Government, with the assistance of the Democratic Unionist Party and with God knows what when it comes to Sinn Féin. It was their agenda, not simply the DUP agenda. Sinn Féin has to ask itself this question:

did we struggle for so long to have devolution in this part of the world, control of our own law and our own destiny, only now to see that responsibility of power pass to a British Government who, on the basis of the Budget negotiations, demand of this Assembly new law when it comes to economic zones and impediments to judicial review? That is the question that Sinn Féin has to ask.

It is a question about where political authority resides. Does it reside in the democratic will of these institutions and in the democratic will that is expressed through Ministers in these institutions? Or, are we going into reverse and back to the days when London calls the tune, pays the piper and can use Northern Ireland as a place to sample and test new law when it comes to significant planning applications and judicial reviews (JRs)? Is that where we have got to after all these years of democratic struggle to achieve democratic institutions? Four people, without reference to the Executive in the North, without reference to the Committee for OFMDFM, decide that this is the character of law in the future. What does Sinn Féin have to say about all that?

I know, because one or two people in the DUP ranks opposite have spoken to me. I know that, within the DUP, there is anxiety about this proposal, the economic zones and judicial reviews. I do not think that the DUP is devoid of wisdom in this regard. I know, because its Members come in to speak to me about individual planning matters, law and policy. I know that they have an insight, one, two or more of them, into what is in the interests of the community and the citizens in the North.

9.30 pm

Given the rather embarrassed way that the DUP Members have conducted themselves on the Floor this evening, they have to ask themselves and their party whether they are going to allow bad law and bad politics to become prevalent through a Bill that is all about good planning and good law. Over the next short space of time, they have to decide whether they are going to review their position.

I want to deal with Simon Hamilton's comments. As another Member said, Mr Hamilton at least put his head above the parapet. At least he was prepared to take the thing on the chin, and at least he was prepared to put some argument into what is bad law and bad politics. Consequently, I think that he is entitled to a response, or even to responses, that, in my view, he will not enjoy in one or two regards.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

His first point was to berate Anna Lo for tabling significant amendments at Consideration Stage, which is a late stage in the Assembly process. As I indicated, I wrote to Executive colleagues earlier today and tried to adopt a very consistent approach to all the amendments, even to those that my party will have voted for tonight. I went into the Noes Lobby on that amendment, because it was my view that the integrity of being a Minister, having given advice to other Ministers, was to hold that position, even though my party went to a different place.

In the paper that I gave to Executive colleagues, I contained my recommendations. I can tell you that a lot of Executive Ministers did not follow my advice. My advice was that, save for Anna Lo's amendment on a shared space and public realm, for a number of reasons that I outlined earlier in the debate, they should not agree to these amendments. However, part of it was because there are issues around consultation, if not in law, certainly in practice, and there are issues around good politics and good practice to see, visited upon the Chamber very late on in the debate, very substantial amendments. I held that position. So I say to Mr Hamilton in his criticism of amendments coming in very late to the Chamber, that that standard applies to everybody and to all parties. Although there will be a time and place where there should be some discussion about late amendments, I think that, whatever the detail of each amendment and taken in the round, the approach to the Bill at this stage has not been satisfactory in legislative terms or in the authority of the Assembly processes.

However, in making his argument in defence of the amendment that he spoke to, Mr Hamilton repeatedly relied on simplified planning zones in the Planning Act 2011. He made the argument that what was being proposed in the DUP/Sinn Féin amendment on economic zones was precisely the same, exactly the same and no different —

Mr Hamilton: No, no, I did not: that is a misrepresentation. I never said that.

Mr Attwood: Let us go back to the Hansard report — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: Let us go back to the Hansard report. I suspect that Mr Hamilton has just had his card marked in the point that I am about to make. It is the case that, in bringing forward their proposal for economic zones, the DUP and Sinn Féin have borrowed heavily from article 33 and subsequent in the Planning Act 2011 on simplified zones. However, it is article 38, which refers to simplified zones, that has somehow disappeared from the DUP/Sinn Féin amendment. It has been utterly redacted, deleted, gone, ignored and sidelined. If we look at the practice of simplified planning zones in sections 33, 34, 35, 36, 37 and 38 of the Northern Ireland Planning Act 2011, the title of section 38 is:

“Exclusion of certain descriptions of land or development”

I am a bit surprised that Mr Allister did not pick up on the point, but I am sure that he will pick up on it now. Even if the economic zones proposed by the DUP and Sinn Féin are in the image of simplified planning zones, why is it that a key element of the legislation on simplified planning zones in the 2011 Act is gone from this proposal? And there is silence.

Section 38(1) states:

“The following descriptions of land may not be included in a simplified planning zone—

(a) land in a conservation area;

(b) land in an area which is—

(i) designated as a National Park ...

(ii) designated as an area of outstanding natural beauty ...

(iii) declared to be an area of special scientific interest”, and so on and so forth.

Here we have legislation proposed by the DUP and Sinn Féin in which they say that they rely on the model in the 2011 Act, but it is not the model in the 2011 Act. It looks like the model in the 2011 Act, but it is not, because the model in the 2011 Act, expressed through section 38, excludes certain descriptions of land or development. What is that land? It is some of the most precious heritage land that we have in the North of Ireland.

What surprises me more around the point is simply this: I took legal advice last Wednesday, following the sharing of the amendments with me by the DUP and Sinn Féin, through their SpAds, on Tuesday afternoon. Twice on Wednesday evening, I spoke with our counsel, who is widely recognised as one of the best environmental barristers on these islands, and who has given good advice not just to my Department but to other Departments historically and recently.

In order to try to see wisdom prevail in the FM and the dFM over these amendments, I shared that legal advice with them this morning. I have yet to see their legal advice, whoever might have produced it and whatever it might say about the amendment. Whatever about their failure to disclose — if that is the case, and if, during the debate, that has been disclosed to me, I welcome that — I took the bull by the horns and shared my legal advice with the FM and the dFM earlier today. Therefore, having shared that legal advice, I am a little surprised that that legal advice has not percolated through the Building to the Benches opposite so that they could at least anticipate the point that the FM, the dFM, their SpAds and other people have anticipated. What does that legal advice tell me? I am going to read some of it into the record so that people will know and can go forward with their eyes wide open when it comes to this model of zone that the DUP and Sinn Féin — the FM and the dFM — are trying to impose on the Assembly. The legal advice states:

“There are problems with the European obligation in that the proposals”

— that is, the FM and dFM proposals —

“envisage that planning permission will be granted by the designation of an ESPZ for whatever is specified in the scheme.”

In connection with the lack of exclusion of designated areas, the legal advice states:

“There is no exception made for sites designated pursuant to the wild birds directive, special protection areas or habitats directive.”

What did we spend last week discussing in the Chamber? What will we spend Thursday discussing at the Executive meeting? We will discuss what happens with the A5 moneys. What was the problem with the A5 moneys? I might not necessarily agree with the court, but it decided that there had been some breach or otherwise of the habitats directive. Therefore, we have been warned by the courts about the conduct of government when it comes to assessments to do with the habitats directive and the wild birds directive. But what do the FM and dFM decide? They decide to bring forward an amendment that excludes the relevant clause from simplified planning zones. The consequence of that, as my legal opinion states, is that no exception is made for sites in their proposal designated pursuant to the wild birds directive or habitats directive, which have the protection of articles 6(3) and 6(4) of the habitats directive.

Those matters, my legal opinion advises, were recently emphasised by what? By the Alternative A5 Alliance case 2013 and the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Union in Peter Sweetman and Others v An Bord Pleanála, which states:

“since those provisions prohibit the grant of consent unless there are no likely significant effects caused to the designated site by the development or, following an appropriate assessment, it is found that there will be no adverse effect on the integrity of the site. Article 13A(2) would be in breach of the directive since it could grant consent for a Natura 2000 site without any of the protections required, and thus grant consent in breach of article 6(3).”

The legal opinion adds that that would expose DOE to challenge to the legality of the provision and expose the UK to infraction proceedings by the Commission. It continues:

“In our view, the proposals would fail the legislative competence requirements of section 6 of the Northern Ireland Act since section 6(2)(d) would apply as the draft currently stands.”

I could read more because it goes on more about how that amendment tabled by the DUP and Sinn Féin is, as it stands, in breach of European requirements and Convention requirements, and of our own domestic law in the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Mrs D Kelly: Would the Minister be surprised to learn that some are already referring to this Planning Bill as a special powers Act?

Mr Attwood: I do not know what people are referring to it as, because I have been in the Chamber all day. However, if the political point being made is that at a certain time in our history another Government in this part of the world took onto itself disproportionate powers that were hostile to public policy and the public interest, given the history of this part of the world in respect of special powers legislation, that seems to me to be at least arguably accurate.

Mr Hamilton made his defence of that particular piece of legislation. He did not state or did not know that parts of the 2011 legislation were not included and that I shared legal advice with FM and dFM and all Executive Ministers in a paper circulated before the debate today. As things stand, that is the advice that I rely on. It may be that others got legal advice; I cannot imagine that they did not get any legal advice. However, I would like to test the advice of others against the advice that I have, and we will see where all that ends up.

Mr Wells made a series of thoughtful and decisive interventions. They are worth reading if people did not hear them because they challenged the amendment and the opposition to it. That was a balanced approach because, given his background, I can understand why he would want to assess these matters.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. He made a point that deserves an answer: if the law has simplified planning zones, why do we not avail ourselves of them? That is a fair point. It so happens that we have had simplified planning zones in one shape or another for 20 years and have not availed ourselves of them. Whatever my accountability for the past couple of years — and I will give accountability for the past couple of years — they existed in legislation before the 2011 Act, and they were not taken forward.

There may be many reasons for that. If you look at the experience in Britain of taking forward simplified planning zones or their equivalent legislative vehicle over there, you see that they do not take them forward very much either. If there is a place where they have been taken forward with a bit more enthusiasm, it is, as Mr Hamilton pointed out, in Dublin, for example with the Dublin Docklands Development Authority. Therefore, it is, certainly, a fair question to ask why simplified planning zones should or should not be taken forward, as long as people are fair in saying that we had them before and nobody used them, or did not use them very much, even though they were part of the “legislative armoury”, which is the language that Mr Hamilton used, of this part of the world for the past 20 years. I do not resist using legislative mechanisms that we have and that might not have been used before.

9.45 pm

A developer on the north coast had a completion order process served upon him. A third-party financial interest came in to clear up the site, or, at least, most of it. We had been in contact with the agent for the third-party financial interest to say that there was still 20% to be done and to get round to it. Urgent works notices were not deployed in this part of the world for nearly 40 years. There have been more deployed and more threats of their being deployed in the past two years than in the previous 40 years. In the past couple of weeks, we demonstrated that, in actions that have been taken in respect of a waste company in the north-west and mechanisms that were not used previously regarding enforcement policy and practice against environmental vandals. In my view, and subject to what the courts might or might not discover in due course if the matter goes to court, we demonstrated that.

Recently, I had a seminar with building control staff from all the councils, saying that they have mechanisms in use, through pollution control orders and improvement Acts, to enforce against those who let sites go to ruin or where there are health and safety risks in each council area. I do not dispute that there are mechanisms that could be used, and used more. They might even be simplified planning zones, even though the ambition is that those will go to councils. However, as I indicated in the debate on the previous group of amendments, given the scale of what we are trying to drive forward with planning reform and change, the devolution of planning and all the rest of it, we have concentrated our efforts in other places. Perhaps, we should concentrate our efforts on this. If we are concentrating our efforts on simplified planning zones, let us do it correctly under European and domestic law. Let us not do it wrongly, as proposed in this particular amendment and the politics behind it, which I intend to deal with shortly.

I will give way to Mr Wells.

Mr Wells: First, the reason why I have raised so many questions is that, as I said earlier, apart from the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill, this particular piece of legislation has attracted more e-mails, letters and phone calls than any other subject. That was before many people knew about the more dramatic changes that were introduced by OFMDFM. Therefore, I felt duty bound to reflect the concerns that I have heard. I have to say that some of those concerns were answered very well. Some have not been answered as clearly.

The Minister's argument would be stronger if there were a clear track record of using simplified planning zones in Northern Ireland to produce real results. What he has told us is that, in fact, that legislation has been on the books for 40 years and has never been used. On top of that, there is also the concern that the strategic planning section of DOE's Planning Service, as it was, was meant to be the panacea to deal with that. Mr Hamilton and I quoted two very concrete examples — Downe Hospital and Down High School — where the system worked really well to produce a brand new hospital and permission for a school in record time. However, clearly, the impetus for amendment No 20 is that there is still concern that there are far too many projects out there that were never given the benefit of a simplified planning zone or were never properly handled by the strategic planning unit and are still sitting, festering away, with no decision. Exasperation with the performance of his Department has led to the situation.

Mr Attwood: To be fair to FM and dFM, I did not pick up any exasperation with the Department's performance in the past couple of years. There may have been historical exasperation. There may still be a need to deal with the causes of exasperation. However, I think that the narrative of the past couple of years suggests, as I indicated earlier, that corners have been turned.

Strategic planning, Mr Wells, is responsible for article 31 applications. If there is any family of applications that might indicate and give opportunities for Members of the House, including Ministers, to tell the development world about where the nature of planning is now, article 31 applications and the strategic planning teams who are responsible for them demonstrate that. How? Decisions have been issued for 75% of the article 31 applications that I inherited.

Why? Because the new article 31 applications that have come in over the past two years — there are fewer of them because of the economic circumstances — are, by and large, being handled in six months or less. That is why there have been decisions in respect of Narrow Water, Windsor Park, the movement of the Balmoral show to Maze/Long Kesh, the Maze/Long Kesh proposal itself, and the police college. So, if people want evidence of where the planning system is and of where strategic planning is, there is good evidence that you can rely on and advocate. Does that mean that strategic planning has got everything right? No.

As I have indicated on a number of occasions, although there is now good authority in the Department around decisions in respect of individual wind turbines, we need to show more authority around decisions in respect of individual wind farms, for which there are over 30 applications still in the system. I have some frustrations about how those are being managed, and I think that there are opportunities to take them forward, while recognising that community opposition, resistance and concern about wind farms is growing. So, if you want evidence, there is evidence beyond the examples that Mr Wells talked about and the one that Mr Boylan talked about, DMAC, which I will come back to shortly.

I now turn to the issues raised by Mr Boylan. As I said, he was not as valiant in his efforts to defend the legislation as his colleague in the DUP. I would like to make some points in response to the issues that he raised. The first point was that I should work with the FM and DFM. I could probably work better with a lot of people, including those around me, but I will put that aside for a moment. This goes back to Mr Allister's comments about whispers. The first time I got any sense at any time that there was anything happening was when I was invited to join a conversation with the FM and DFM about four or five weeks ago. That conversation, for which Mr McDevitt was present for part of, dealt with dealing with the past and the potential chair. They then asked to speak to me about planning; that is what I was told. In that conversation — I hope that I am not breaching some ministerial code on ministerial conversations —

Mr McDevitt: I was present; it is OK.

Mr Attwood: No; you were present for that bit, but you were not present for this. I might be in breach. If I am, I apologise. Given that the point has been raised, I think that I should confirm the situation.

We had a conversation primarily about judicial reviews. I said to them — I believe this to be the case — that the issue is not that there are many applications for JRs. In tomorrow's debate, I will confirm the number of JR applications, which have been presented as a huge impediment and as sending out a bad message about the planning system in the North. There were 13,000 planning decisions made last year, and there were four or five judicial reviews. Most of those were not taken by the development community; they were taken by me in challenging the Planning Appeals Commission and by the National Trust in challenging me on the Runkerry decision. There were four or five cases where ordinary citizens went to court and said that they did not think that public policy was conducted properly when it came to the planning process. We had a big conversation about that and about how it could be improved.

In my view, without trying to interfere with judicial independence, I think that there are issues with how judicial reviews are handled on the far side of leave being granted. That is not a legislative matter, and it is not the Executive's function to address it. The Lord Chief Justice and the senior bench have the rightful authority to do that. We had that conversation, and, in passing, we touched on other planning matters. That was the height of our conversation.

The next time I became aware of anything developing was on Tuesday, when my Department was contacted, and a conversation arose between SpAds. Following that, I saw a draft. I then met the FM and DFM at lunchtime on Wednesday and explained, as I have today but probably in less detail, my view on these clauses. I have been asked to work with the FM and DFM, but that is how they have worked with DOE on a significant piece of planning legislation. I do not think that John O'Dowd, as Minister of Education, would be too happy with that approach. Without getting into too much detail, because it is his responsibility, I have seen examples, be it at the Executive table or in other places, where other Ministers have indicated that they are not happy with how some things have been handled around the Executive table. I think there should be some sympathy — and that is not, in my view, being humiliated. You might think that is being humiliated; I think that is bad politics and bad government by others when there is an opportunity for good politics and good government by us all. I do not think that is very satisfactory.

Mr Boylan made a strange comment about area plans not being fit for purpose, as if the problem with planning is area plans not being in place. There is a problem, but the answer to the issue of area plans is not to give this function to OFMDFM. The answer to dealing with area plans is to make sure that we get devolution of the development plan function to councils in 700 days and, in the meantime, contrary to what somebody might have said earlier, to prepare the councils so that they hit the ground running, so that they take forward the development plan function and so that, as quickly as possible thereafter, councils are endorsing development plans, because plan-led development is the best development that we can have. That is the answer. The answer is not to give some sort of development plan — that is not actually what is being spoken about — function to OFMDFM.

Mr Boylan dismissed the intervention that has seen the protection of pharmaceutical and life science plant when it comes to other developments in industrial zones. He said that he does not believe that is the way to go about changing planning. Too right it is the way to go about changing planning. It is to say that there are added-value jobs when it comes to pharmaceuticals and life science, and that if there is a problem, and there has been a historical problem, you get it sorted. Once you get it sorted, you get more investment. Do not tell me that is not the way to go about things when it is clearly one of multiple means to go about demonstrating that planning is getting more and more fit for purpose.

I realise that I am going on, and I will now conclude. There are just two comments I want to make in concluding. The first is that the only case that has been raised in this entire debate about a failure of planning beyond the perceptions about failure of planning — and I could give you a lot more examples of failure of planning than have come out in this particular debate — but the only hard example, purportedly, has been DMAC.

Mr Wells: And John Lewis.

Mr Attwood: And John Lewis. I am delighted to deal with John Lewis. Briefly, I will not get into the issues about DMAC, as that is an ongoing matter that has historically been before enforcement and has been to planning appeals. I suggest that if you want to interrogate the file — I have, and I am not exaggerating when I say that those files are six feet high. What are the issues? Should you allow an industrial zone to be developed outside the settlement limit in Coalisland, adjacent to residential homes? That is a matter of policy and a matter of principle that will have consequence if you do not get it right.

Secondly, should you allow development there when there are alternative commercial sites not very far away, because land has been zoned and developed by INI for commercial development in that part of the world? But there is a company that thinks that is not good enough for it, that it has some reasons of commercial confidence why it cannot move to those sites rather than to the site on which it has, and this is the third point, built without planning permission. Let us not portray a particular issue about DMAC in this simple for/against development argument; it is more complex. It is a fair point, I think, and it is a point made against me, that that matter should be decided, but let us not pretend that it is simply, "Let us have development or let us be opposed to development".

I want to conclude —

Mr Wells: John Lewis.

Mr Attwood: Let me deal with John Lewis and give you the advice I gave to a planning inquiry. I did not collapse the planning inquiry. Who collapsed the planning inquiry? It was one of the parties to the planning inquiry. If they were so sure and certain about the commercial viability of their project and about the rightness of their argument about that site in terms of planning development, then they should have exhausted that planning process. That planning process was being conducted outwith government by an independent body called the Planning Appeals Commission. If they believed in that project, and if their clients believed in that project, then they should have exhausted that process, and then we would have seen what would have happened on the far side of that.

Mr Byrne: Will the Minister give way?

10.00 pm

Mr Attwood: I will in a second, Joe.

The second thing is that I lodged in the Assembly Library the planning advice that I gave. Nobody has said to me that that planning information was wrong. What was that planning information? It was a deep interrogation and assessment of the impact of not only John Lewis but the 19 other stores that would have been built out at Sprucefield. What was the information? It was that the impact on every town and city within 60 minutes' travel time of Sprucefield would have been significant, if not catastrophic. Nobody, be it the developers of Sprucefield, John Lewis, anybody in the Chamber, any retail organisation or any chamber of commerce in any part of that travel zone, has said that that information was flawed or false. If that was the information, my obligation was to follow the existing planning policy when it comes to retail and comply with the RDS 2035, which says that you favour in-town and edge-of-town development over out-of-town development. In the fullness of time — I hope that it is sooner rather than later — the wisdom, for what it is worth, of that advice will be demonstrably proven to be correct. If we do not fight the battle of in-town/out-of-town development and just leave everything to go to the edge of town, which is hostile to the business model of many people, even perhaps to that of John Lewis, we will live with the consequences for a long time to come.

I give way to Mr Byrne.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for giving way. Does he agree that only four or five major developers seem to resort to JR quite often, including on the issue of a secondary school planning application in Carrickmore?

Mr Attwood: As I indicated, I will read into the record tomorrow the number of JRs that we have had in Northern Ireland in each of the past three years. Although the threshold on occasions can be low for the granting of JR on planning issues, let us not exaggerate the scale of JRs around planning.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will.

Let us protect the principle of JR. It has been a mechanism to interrogate public policy — I will finish here, because I know that I am straying — for 40 or 50 years in this jurisdiction. The citizens and communities of this jurisdiction have had the benefit of that. Let us be very measured and wise when we start interfering with JRs, not necessarily on the planning side, because the consequence is elsewhere.

I have outlined that I have concerns about the legislative competence of this law. I know that the minds of people not very far away will be whirling. They will ask how, in advance of Further Consideration Stage, they can rectify all of that. When people, in the way in which this has been handled, have shown their hand, the credibility of these amendments has run out of steam nearly before the ink was dry. Parties in the Chamber need to recognise that they over-reached. It is beyond legal competence. Even if they try to rehabilitate the legal competence of those amendments, this is not where people want things to go.

Beyond the issue of bad law and bad politics, which I explained previously, there is an issue of good government. That has been touched on by a number of Members. It is about whether OFMDFM should assume a further significant operational responsibility. I say unambiguously that that is not good government. Why do I say that? I will give only three or four examples. Others have been touched on. There has been a review of North/South. If people want economic opportunity on this island, we should grasp the North/South economic opportunities on this island. New jobs potentially could arise by taking forward the 2006 British and Irish Governments' proposals on an all-Ireland economy and taking forward the good work that the relevant Health Ministers North and South have been doing, and so on and so forth. That is low-hanging fruit when it comes to job opportunities. It is about marketing this island more and more as an island in the global market to compete properly. Where are we with the North/South review? It was meant to start in 2007. It is now more than six years later. It may be that the next North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) meeting in early July might tell us something more.

The DUP has been allowed to strangle the North/South review, which was a condition of the re-establishment of devolution in 2007. That review has been slowed down, it has been strangled and it has no output. The consequence of that —

A Member: Hear, hear.

Mr Attwood: Yes, you may well say "Hear, hear", but what message does that send to all those who are out of work and who might have the opportunity of more work on this island if there were more North/South opportunities?

Where have they gone with the social investment fund? In 2011, £80 million was put in the budget line for that initiative. Now, well into 2013, hardly a penny of it has been spent, so much so that, in my view, when it comes to spending that money in the next period of time, there is a danger that it could be spent on pet projects or on any projects just to get it spent. The case is similar with a shared future.

What is the lesson of the amendment? It is that you do not give responsibility to those who do not have the operational capacity to take it, and you do not give responsibility to those who have not been too good with their own responsibilities or to those who have tabled legislation that is outwith the Assembly's competence and hostile to European requirements. Instead, you recognise the challenge to the planning system and work within it to make it better and more fit for purpose. That is the experience of the past two years, and that is what we should build on. The House should reject the amendment.

Mr Weir: Often, when I follow the Minister of the Environment, I am reminded of the batsman waiting in the pavilion after a very long partnership who has had the pads on for a very long time. I should perhaps at least be thankful that, in the second group, the Minister kept his remarks, by his standards, to the very epitome of brevity. If you like, he moved not so much from test-match Alex Attwood to not quite Twenty20 Alex Attwood but, perhaps, at least to limited overs Alex Attwood. I think that the House should at least be grateful for that.

A very wide range of issues have been covered in the debate. Perhaps unsurprisingly, given some of the people who contributed, a lot of it seems to have centred not on the amendment itself but on a wide-ranging attack on the evils of OFMDFM. Sometimes that was driven down to the evils of the parties in OFMDFM. It veered, at various stages, towards being quite snide towards some of the individuals who are there, and some came close to making very scurrilous accusations. Unsurprisingly, some of the parties devolved the debate down to something that was not simply critical of the Bill; they used it as a device to say that three of the parties in the Executive should fall on their swords — I think that a number of people in the back row would be quite keen to push them on to those swords — and leave the Executive. That is clearly entirely a matter for the three parties concerned.

In the wide range of matters that were pushed through this debate, even the Minister had a little jaunt toward the North/South Ministerial Council. We heard the razzle-dazzle of Basil McCrea, who found this utterly amazing. Although, to be honest, I suppose that, if you are in NI21 and you come across a policy, you would find that amazing; the surprise would be stultifying for you. Occasionally, the debate even touched on the contents of the Bill. As one of my colleague was saying, perhaps if I were to express that in Irish, NI21 would understand it a lot better. [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Weir: A range of issues have been discussed. We even had one Member who seemed to be completely confused about community planning and seemed to equate this proposal to community planning without realising that the two are completely separate.

Let us take a look at some of the issues and at the facts of what is in the proposition and not the fears or the hype that have been expressed. We have gone from potentially concreting all of Fermanagh to designating the whole of Northern Ireland as an economically significant zone. None of that has any basis in fact or reality. We have been told that this is a power grab and that it will create a new planning authority for Northern Ireland, yet OFMDFM will not have the power to take a single decision to grant a single piece of planning permission. That power is not contained in the amendment, but that fact is not convenient for some of those who criticise it.

Similarly, we are told that it is a power grab off the DOE, yet not a single power that is currently exercised by the DOE that is affected by this proposal is taken from the Environment Minister. Article 31 determinations were mentioned. There is no interference whatsoever with article 31 determinations. Mention has been made of simplified planning zones. There is no interference with simplified planning zones. Indeed, the legislation specifically indicates that an economic planning zone cannot be on a simplified planning zone. The two are kept completely separate.

Although I appreciate the point that was being made, my colleague Mr Hamilton was misquoted to a degree about the simplified planning zones. The point is that the principle of being able to grant permission on a zone on a wide and indeed relatively unfettered basis — there are opportunities in the legislation to make it conditional — is granted by the 2011 Act. The amendment is drawn, at least in part, word for word from the simplified planning zone provision. It seems a rather contrived logic that says that we are perfectly happy for a council to give utterly unconditional approval in a particular area but the regional government cannot. That seems to me to be perverse.

As indicated, this is not a replica of simplified planning zones or enterprise zones, although facets of both are within the amendment. It is an opportunity for regional government to intervene to secure international investment and economic opportunity post 2015, when simplified planning zones will be a matter purely for local authorities. Similarly, Members have asked, "Where does democracy reside?". It is clear where it resides. Not a single decision to grant planning permission can be taken by OFMDFM. Where does it reside? As indicated, it lies with approval by the DOE or of the House — all 108 Members giving their view. How much more democratic could you get?

Fracking has also been mentioned, and I know that some people are concerned about it. The reality is that the amendment gives a more democratic opportunity to obtain planning permission than exists at present. It is also clear that fracking is an issue that goes well beyond planning powers. For it to be approved requires a lot more than that. In the future, it will be something that may or may not be looked at.

The Minister mentioned the legal advice that he got, specifically about the power to grant assent in an area subject to, for example, the habitats directive. The reality is that the amendment does not give the power to grant a single planning application. Therefore, I do not disagree that it would clearly be legally wrong to grant permission in such circumstances, but that is not something that this planning amendment permits. Any planning application for any significant zone would have to come to either the DOE or the Assembly as a whole. Any direct application of that nature would fall foul of European law. Therefore, although the Minister may well have got an answer to a particular question, he was not asking the question that arose from the legislation.

As for people complaining about a lack of detail, I have to say that the one thing that you cannot say about the amendment is that it lacks detail. We have eight pages of detail in it. If any of that detail needs tweaking between now and Further Consideration Stage, Mr Boylan and I will be open to doing that.

Fundamentally, this is about providing an additional economic tool for Northern Ireland. It has been mentioned that there have been discussions with the Government, but our interest, above all, is in doing the best for the people of Northern Ireland. For instance, an economic conference is due to take place in October. None of this impacts on the current planning system, because, as indicated, none of the normal article 31 development control and DOE powers is affected whatsoever. However, it gives an extra economic tool to the Northern Ireland Executive. At the end of the day, the Assembly and Executive have placed economic development at the heart of the Programme for Government — economic development in very tough times and in the face of a worldwide recession. We have seen young people from across the community having to migrate because they have not had that economic opportunity.

10.15 pm

We can all climb into ivory towers, as some people seem to want to do in spiteful party political attacks on the representatives of OFMDFM, and say that economic development is essentially a bad thing, which is the message that I have got from some people, or we can, as an Assembly, step up to the job and actually support economic development. There seem to be some parties and individuals in here who are very supportive of economic development, right up to the point of taking any decision or any vote that actually supports economic development. This is a tool that can be used by the Executive to further Northern Ireland, to make us more competitive and to ensure that we are fit for purpose in terms of investment. This is a clear test.

Mr McDevitt: [Interruption.]

Mr Weir: I see a Member who has been absent for most of the debate heckling from a sedentary position. Talk is fine, but action is what is needed. By passing the amendment, we will show commitment to our young people, commitment to investment, commitment to jobs and commitment to economic development. That is the key test for parties in the Chamber tonight. Therefore, I have not just great pleasure but great honour to say that we as an Assembly and those of us who will support the amendment have ambition for our community for the future. I urge anyone who has that similar ambition for economic investment and jobs for our young people to show their mettle tonight and vote in favour of the amendment.

10.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the Speaker's ruling earlier this evening following the receipt of a valid petition of concern in relation to amendment Nos 21 and 23, no further consideration of the Bill will take place today. The Business Committee will agree the arrangements for the rescheduled Consideration Stage when it meets tomorrow. I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments as we move to the next item of business.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Budget (No. 2) Bill: Final Stage

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Budget (No. 2) Bill [NIA 21/11-15] do now pass.

Members will be pleased to know that I will be brief on this, and I hope that my brevity will be matched by their brevity.

The passing of the Final Stage of the Budget Bill by the House will enable Departments to continue to use resources and spend cash on public services for the remainder of the financial year. As I have said on many occasions, the Budget position is continually moving. Monitoring rounds, including the June monitoring round that will be announced next week, will amend the opening position reflected in the Bill. Looking forward, the outcome of the UK spending round, which is to be announced on Wednesday, will also have an impact on the block position. As is customary, I will bring updated legislation to the House in February 2014 to authorise the final position for this financial year.

The public expenditure issues and, indeed, many other issues around this Bill have been debated fully over the past two weeks. I do not propose to repeat them in my opening remarks tonight. I will leave that repetition, which I hope will not be too tedious, to Members. It is important to state that the provision in the Bill represents the third year of Budget 2011-15, as agreed by the previous Assembly in March 2011. Members will be aware that there have been a number of changes to the position since then and that those have been agreed by the Executive and brought before the Finance and Personnel Committee for scrutiny in advance of this debate. The Committee has agreed accelerated passage, for which I am grateful to it. Indeed, I welcome not only the accelerated passage provided for by the Committee but the scrutiny that the Committee undertakes. I expect that my officials will continue to provide financial information to the Committee in as timely a manner as possible so that it can exercise that role.

Transparency in public finances and the financial processes that underpin them is to be welcomed, and I encourage other departmental Committees to exercise a similar level of scrutiny over departmental Estimates information.

A number of Members have expressed frustration at the Bill's technical nature and its lack of transparency on the Budget position. I agree. My officials can provide summary tables that help to reconcile the Estimates and Budget figures, but the process remains opaque. That is a nuance of the current financial and legislative practices, and the review of the financial processes is an opportunity — I keep repeating this point — for the Assembly to reform those practices, which I agree are technical and difficult to grasp. I hope that we can make progress in the near future.

I will turn my attention to the remainder of this financial year and the challenges that lie ahead. We can safely say, even at this stage in the year, and indeed at most stages throughout the year, that there is demand for additional resources, and those demands are wide-ranging and worthwhile in their own right. However, we do not hold an infinite supply of money, and despite what some Members suggested in previous debates, there is no hidden pot of cash in the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP). We are able to supplement our Treasury allocation with additional receipts, regional rates and reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing, but we must exercise careful management. We will have to make decisions going forward on what is a prudent level of borrowing, because that has a financial impact on resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL). Indeed, I will raise that point with Executive colleagues when we begin to think about 2015-16. In the meantime, we need to ensure that our budgets are well managed and utilised to the maximum benefit of our society. The Budget Bill shows the upper limits of spend for each Department, and those limits highlight the need for each and every Minister and public body to prudently manage the resources available to them throughout the remainder of the year.

As an Assembly, we must ensure that every penny spent on the provision of public services is spent wisely and on high-priority services. With that appeal, I will bring my remarks to a close. I hope that, as I said, the brevity of my opening speech will be matched by the brevity in speeches around the Chamber at this late hour, because I am sure that we all want to get home.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will be as brief as possible. As previously outlined by the Minister, the Bill makes provision for the balance of cash and resources required to reflect the departmental spending plans in the 2013-14 Main Estimates. As I indicated during the previous debate, the Committee agreed to grant accelerated passage to the Budget Bill on the basis of having been consulted appropriately on the expenditure provisions in the Bill. It is imperative that the Department meets the requirement for appropriate consultation, given the importance of the Bill progressing through the Assembly before the summer recess.

I reiterate that proactive scrutiny by statutory Committees of departmental financial forecasting and out-turn data will enable them to identify issues in real time and obtain assurances that any necessary preventative or corrective action will be taken in year. That will help to ensure that no moneys are returned to Treasury as a result of underspends beyond the thresholds agreed in the Budget exchange scheme and that retrospective action is not needed to regularise any excess spend. To facilitate that additional scrutiny, the Finance Committee is sharing with the other statutory Committees the monthly forecast out-turn data, which is co-ordinated by DFP. In addition, prior-year forecast out-turn figures for each Department will be circulated to the other Committees in sufficient time in advance of the Main Estimates, subject to those figures being provided by the Department on a timely basis. Each Committee is also encouraged to pre-schedule briefings on their Department's draft Estimates before those are collated and published by DFP centrally. That additional information and scrutiny should add value to the plenary debates on the Estimates and Budget Bills going forward.

I also explained during the Supply resolution and Second Stage debates that the Committee is taking forward work, in collaboration with the Department, to develop a memorandum of understanding on the Budget process. That should, in conjunction with other measures, help to improve the Budget and financial processes and related parliamentary scrutiny and accountability. I indeed welcome the Minister's support for the work that is being undertaken to bring forward the memorandum of understanding. As the Assembly and DFP officials continue to develop the draft document for both parties' consideration and approval, I am confident that, in addition to providing for a regularised Budget process and more effective Assembly input, it will set out arrangements that are sufficiently balanced and flexible to enable the Executive's budgetary timetables to be met.

This development offers the potential for ensuring that the Assembly and its Committees can add more value to the Budget process and that they are afforded the time and information to enable them to undertake constructive scrutiny and to exercise influence at the most appropriate stages in the process. In undertaking more effective oversight of the Executive's Budget and expenditure, the Assembly can play an important part in helping to ensure efficient and effective delivery of the Executive's strategic priorities, including the objectives in the Programme for Government, the economic strategy and the investment strategy. I look forward to the proposals coming to the Committee and to the wider Assembly in due course.

Finally, in terms of the Committee's forward planning, it would be helpful if the Minister could provide an update on the expected areas of focus for the Whitehall spending review 2013 and the implications that those might have for the Executive's Budget in 2015-16. Moreover, perhaps the Minister could also indicate what the likely time frame is for any local Budget process in that regard and, indeed, whether any consideration is being given at this stage to reviewing departmental budgets for 2014-15. Although that would inform our planning going forward, in the meantime, in terms of the business before us today, on behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Girvan: I will speak in favour of the motion on the Final Stage of the Budget Bill. The Minister alluded to some points, and he asked for no repetition. There used to be programme on TV called 'Just a Minute', where hesitation, repetition and deviation were not allowed. So, I think that we need to be very careful that we do not do any of that.

I support the Bill. I appreciate that the Committee has gone through quite a few meetings on this matter. In doing so, it came out that some Departments are not necessarily giving us a full breakdown of their total spend. I understand that that creates some difficulties at some stages. However, it is important to move ahead here this evening and to allow Departments to make their spends for the rest of the financial year. In doing so, I appreciate that we are working with a Budget that is decreasing through the cuts that the Westminster Government have made to the block grant.

The Departments here have had to manage with a reducing Budget over the past number of years and have managed to do that very well. I will put on record that there are Departments that have managed to make their full spend and did not have to hand back excess amounts of money late in the day. I appreciate that we will have our spending reviews coming forward in June, and, at that stage, it will be possible to see where we stand with all the moneys that are allocated. Should we need to make adjustments, doing so early in the financial year is very important.

So, we support the Bill. We will keep it brief, which I think is helpful. Members have had an opportunity to debate most of this at the earlier stages, and I appreciate that we are just going back over what has already been agreed.

Mr Byrne: Mr Bradley cannot be here this evening, so I am entrusted with deliberating on his behalf. Although I am conscious of the overall budgetary constraints that face the Executive, we on this side of the House have always called for a more imaginative deployment of the economic and financial resources that are at our disposal. This is more than just demanding more money for certain existing programmes; it is about identifying and then investing in the areas of the economy where government intervention can yield the highest returns.

Although we have a small regional economy and do not have the power to alter the prevailing economic forces in the global economy, we do have the ability to build on our own inherent strengths and to leverage those areas that are substantially under our own control.

This is what makes public expenditure such a vital economic lever in the North. Last week, the Minister referred to the contribution that public capital expenditure is making to the construction industry. I think that we all recognise that and very much appreciate it.

10.45 pm

That is why we should invest more heavily in the success of our agrifood sector and in tourism. Those are two sectors in which there is very good potential, and it is substantially in our own hands as to how good our product offerings are and how competitive they can be. The Agri-Food Strategy Board is seeking £250 million for farm business improvement over the next three years. Hopefully that can be realised, if there is the right focus on it in the Department.

In particular, I want to commend to the Minister and the House the whole area of heritage-led investment. Heritage, built and natural, is a critical aspect of our tourism offering. It features strongly in our priority tourism signature projects and is a big part of what makes the North of Ireland an interesting, absorbing and unique place to visit. The Ulster American Folk Park in my constituency is a vital tourist attraction in my part of the world, and I hope that it gets capital investment to develop further.

We have a tremendous array of heritage assets, although many have not been developed or presented optimally, while others have been neglected and fallen into dereliction. We risk losing them all together, yet those assets can be of economic benefit in the development of our economy. I want to mention in particular Herdmans' Mill in Sion Mills, which could act as a very good industrial heritage centre.

Those matters were recognised by Arlene Foster when she had ministerial responsibility for our main heritage assets. In 2009, she established the Historic Environment Strategic Forum (HESF) to address some of those issues. Subsequently, her successor in that office, my colleague Alex Attwood, commissioned a study into the economic value of heritage through the HESF. Last year, the consultants reported, in their 'Study of the Economic Value of Northern Ireland's Historic Environment', that the sector contributed an estimated £532 million to our economy and sustained around 10,000 jobs. Importantly, the study concluded that although the historic environment contributed significantly to the economy, there is scope for that to increase considerably.

As a proportion of value added per capita, analysis shows that Northern Ireland has some catching-up to do when compared with Scotland, Wales and the Republic of Ireland. The consultants also found that every £1 of public expenditure on heritage generated between £3 and £4 of private investment, which is a very solid multiplier. Although in that case the multiplier is an estimate, Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) research, based on data from the Department's listed-building grant scheme, found that every £1 of Department of the Environment (DOE) money invested produced £7.60 in private investment. Not surprisingly, the experts' study recommended that the Executive drive a proactive strategy for the economic development of the historic built environment.

None of this is soft and sentimental. It is hard economics and finance. That is why no less a hard-nosed financier than the Minister's own Assembly Private Secretary, Simon Hamilton, once in possession of that research, brought it straight to the Chamber and got Assembly support for a motion calling for greater priority for heritage-led development. If, as is suggested, the Minister finds himself doing fewer jobs in the future and is succeeded by Mr Hamilton, we should have genuine support for heritage-led development from those who hold the Executive's purse strings.

The Minister knows well the potential of our built heritage in the Carrickfergus area, where de Courcy's castle requires a new roof. He will also be aware of the enormous scope for Northern Ireland to leverage the heritage offerings around St Patrick. It would be remiss of me not to mention Armagh city, the ecclesiastical capital of Ireland, where there is huge scope for heritage-led development and where assistance for the major regeneration of the old prison on the historic Mall would be hugely beneficial.

I could go on, but it is late at night. All that I will say is that there are opportunities for stronger investment potential from some of our capital expenditure.

Mr Cree: This Bill will authorise £8.271 billion from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund and a further £8.558 billion for use by the Departments and other bodies. At Second Stage, the Minister made the point that it can be hard to translate the figures into real-world public services, though it is essential that the legislation is passed so that money may be expended. Indeed, he repeated that this evening, and he is right. That is why we did so much work on the review of the financial process: to make things easier to understand; provide direct read-across; and be more accountable to scrutiny by Committees and the public at large. After all, it is public money.

Despite being approved by the Committee for Finance and Personnel, the Minister and this House, final clearance has not been given by the Executive. We understand that the Minister of Education has withheld his agreement and, therefore, has a veto in progress. The Minister told us earlier this month that he discussed the matter with his recalcitrant colleague, but without success. Enough is enough. When will the Executive act to improve this clumsy system that we are all still labouring with and that is a barrier to effective parliamentary scrutiny?

The Ulster Unionist Party will not attempt to block the Bill's progress today, but there are still areas of concern that need clarity. First, we were told by the chair of the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation that some £20 million has been agreed to construct two major roads linking the new Balmoral show site to the motorway network. Can the Minister confirm that the Budget figure of £8.75 million includes those road costs?

With respect to the historical institutional abuse inquiry, does the Budget have an allocation for 2013-14? There is potentially a substantial outlay in that area, and again, we must have clarity.

We are also aware that the Welfare Reform Act is imminent, but I have not yet identified any provision for costs to the Northern Ireland Assembly in the Budget figures. Again, I would appreciate the Minister's advice in this regard.

I also note that, in the financial year 2012-13, there was an overcommitment. Will the Minister advise what the actual out-turn position was and the amounts carried forward under the Budget exchange scheme?

The First and deputy First Minister recently announced the Together: Building a United Community strategy. Although there has been much talk about its likely cost, no moneys have been included in the Budget. I raised the matter at the Main Estimates stage but was not favoured with a reply on that occasion.

That brings me to the economic pact as announced recently by the First and deputy First Minister and the Prime Minister. It gives the Executive an additional £100 million in capital borrowing powers to, I assume, take forward some of the projects contained in the Together: Building a United Community strategy. Perhaps the Finance Minister could be more prescriptive about the nature of those extra borrowing powers.

That economic pact also made a number of other rather vague promises of action in other areas, and I will mention just a few. First is access for Northern Ireland to the infrastructure guarantee scheme. Perhaps the Minister could confirm what the eligibility for our businesses are at present to that scheme and how that criteria will change in light of the announcement.

Secondly, there is to be a substantial programme of work to examine the unlocking of the financial potential of Belfast port. I am sure that Members would appreciate information on what that programme of work will entail and, indeed, whether that will have any effect on the Budget for next year.

Lastly, in the pact, there is a commitment to examine the potential for devolving additional fiscal powers to Northern Ireland. Given that, at times, the Finance Minister appeared less than enthusiastic about the devolution of corporation tax, I am interested in what his ambitions are for this particular commitment and in how he feels that it may impact on future Budgets.

I look forward to the Minister's response in due course.

Mrs Cochrane: I, too, welcome the opportunity to speak at Final Stage. I will keep my comments short. Most points have been covered. We live in a very challenging financial climate, and it is vital that every pound that we spend is spent efficiently. Collaboration between Departments is imperative, and we must continue to focus on early intervention and prevention to produce savings. However, we must not focus on our public sector spending only; we should also focus on the importance of supporting our private sector, given that it is the wealth-creating and job-creating element of our society. We must also strive to have measures in place to assist its growth.

Most importantly, we need to tackle division in our society, not just for social reasons but for sound financial and economic reasons. As I said before in the Chamber, I welcome the fact that other parties have finally come round to the Alliance Party's way of thinking. Some might even say that we have been leading change. The 'Together: Building a United Community' document is a step in the right direction, but shared-future sound bites are worth nothing unless serious and achievable targets are in place. There are financial implications related to the document and, although we have been told that detailed costing are being worked out, I remain concerned that they have not been fully thought through and may place further demands on our Budget without actually producing adequate results, but that remains to be seen.

I welcome the fact that future-proofing for all shared future policy and spending commitments has been recognised, and that will assist in effective budgeting and spending in Northern Ireland. That, along with improvements in the financial process, should help us as Members to better scrutinise our public spending as we go forward and ensure that it is not wasted on maintaining division. I support the Bill.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I speak initially as Chair of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. When I spoke in the debate on the Main Estimates on 11 June, I said that the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment always tried to ensure that Invest NI was adequately resourced to meet future demands as we work to rebalance and rebuild the economy. It is encouraging to see a considerable upturn in Invest NI's activity, which is reflected in the resource bid in the June monitoring round to cover expected pressures from the increased selective financial assistance, and I hope that the Minister will be able to support that. Some of those funds have been very useful in supporting the growth of small business in the North and projects for research and development.

Although the Minister of Finance informed the Committee in the past that appropriate funding will be made to Invest NI to cover new inward investment, it is essential that Invest NI can proceed with certainty when pursuing and negotiating competitive and sometimes sensitive foreign direct investment (FDI) opportunities. I hope that the Minister can provide assurances to the House that the Budget allocation to Invest NI is such that the organisation can proceed with a high level of certainty that funding will be available to cover existing commitments, the potential for growth, and cater for any form of optimistic new levels of investment.

I will now speak as a constituency MLA and as the SDLP's spokesperson for the economy. This process offers us an opportunity to determine the direction of an economy, even one as small and as regional as our own. The question is this: what economic pathway is being pursued by the Executive? We face a future framed by recession and beset with cuts disguised as austerity measures. However, in the midst of all that, there are opportunities, and I have outlined some of them.

I speak as an MLA and as Chair of the all-party Assembly working group on construction. Indeed, there has been discussion of late on the readiness of various construction projects to avail of funding. Even though projects are shovel ready, other issues come into play, as is the case with the provision of the policing and emergency services college at Desertcreat. I had a short chat today about the necessity to ensure that the construction industry is best protected. All major projects can be protected by a simple measure — not by investment — through the introduction of project bank accounts. Given some of the nervousness expressed already around the project, that would be vital for such a major project to ensure that it goes ahead and gives optimism and confidence to the community and, at the same time, protect the interests of those small businesses, suppliers and services that need protection at this time, as many of them are vulnerable and susceptible to be preyed on by some people who use them, frankly, as a supplementary bank.

The point must be made that the construction industry is crying out for those shovel-ready projects on roads or other things. The diversion of funding from the consequence of the delay on the A5 project, if that is what it is, gives rise to the potential for other new roads projects. Some Executive Ministers may prefer the likes of newbuild schools or health estate projects.

11.00 pm

At this point, I have to mention the long-awaited Magherafelt bypass, which has been sidelined in the Executive. The glimmer of light that emerged during the recent Assembly debate on the reallocation of the A5 funding appears to have been snuffed out through the vote in this Chamber when some Members who spoke out of the corner of their mouths to assert support for it did quite the opposite. Nevertheless, questions remain about whether deliberations around adjustments in finances will now lead to something tangible happening on the site at Desertcreat and on the likes of the Magherafelt bypass. That would do a lot to consolidate the position of many small firms and suppliers right across the North. Likewise, it would give some of our young people a bit of hope.

On the subject of the construction industry, last time around, some £15 million was handed back from the social housing budget. Social housing is a proven great investment. Not only does it provide the necessary element, which is a roof over people's heads — in the difficult circumstances resulting from the recession, many people are now in a position where they need such housing — but it provides tangible employment in our community.

There is a similar opportunity in retrofitting homes in the public and private sectors. I have to emphasise again — the Minister has heard this before, but it is helpful to hear it again — the requirements in the green new deal. That project was thrown out without the good elements being worked on to ensure that, in essence, we were saving fuel for people in fuel poverty, we were creating jobs and we were helping the environment. Believe it or not, that was an investment to save. It was helping to prevent people, particularly those suffering from fuel poverty related illnesses, from being admitted to hospital. Those are very significant and substantial bills.

On a final point on the green issue, tremendous potential may arise from the new green investment bank for construction projects. With some support and a little nudge from the respective Departments, we could see coming to the fore a variety of projects that could give a huge injection to employment, hope to our young people, and, through the likes of the green new deal and the green investment bank, help for our environment. That is one of those circumstances where you can actually spend to save.

The Minister and the rest of the Executive should seize those opportunities as they present themselves to maximise the potential of a variety of schemes and help to set out a path for the rest of our economy. Go raibh míle maith agat as do chuid ama, agus gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith.

Mr Wilson: I thank Members for their contributions to what has been a fairly short debate, thankfully, at this Final Stage of the Budget Bill. Of course, it is not the case that there has not been significant discussion on the Budget. As the Chairman pointed out, there was a lot of debate at Committee level, and officials were brought along to explain the detail of the Estimates. We had two substantial debates in the Chamber on the Bill, when many of the points that have been raised by Members tonight were discussed. Nevertheless, I think that it is important that Members have the opportunity to make some points.

A number of Members, including the Chairman of the Committee, Mr Girvan and Mr Cree, talked about the importance of the scrutiny of the Budget. I have said time and again that I have absolutely no difficulty with Budgets being scrutinised. If our aim and objective is to ensure that funds that are made available to Departments are used most effectively, that requires scrutiny. That can be the scrutiny that the Chairman spoke about whereby Committees, at an early stage, on a month-to-month basis, look at the monthly forecast data that is available to them before the Estimates come to the Finance Committee, which then publishes them; or scrutiny at Finance Committee level or here in the Assembly. All of that is important. Of course, the more transparent the process, the better. I share Mr Cree's frustration on this. He expresses it every time he speaks on the issue, and he is quite right. I do not even mind that repetition, because if it finally gets through to those who are holding back the financial processes legislation that we have to bring through the Assembly, that will be a good job well done.

I have said on many occasions that we have sought to reach accommodation with the Minister for Regional Development and the Minister of Education, who were opposed to this. However, the one thing that I will resist and on which there can be no compromise is what seems to be a sticking point with the Education Minister, namely that where there are reduced requirements, the Minister should make up his mind what happens to those. If money that the Assembly voted to be spent in a certain way is not going to be spent in that way, it should be returned for the Assembly and Executive to decide on what direction it should go, otherwise you have financial anarchy.

The Chairman and Mr Cree also raised the issue of the review of public spending — the spending round outcome — which will be announced on Wednesday. I know that I have good relations with the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, but even he does not share in advance with me that kind of information. We will be made aware of it on Wednesday. What we do know, and all the indications are, is that there will be further tightening of resource money and loosening of the money that is available for capital spending.

We will not know the exact implications for Northern Ireland until Wednesday. However, I will write to Executive colleagues and the Committee to inform them of the outcome as soon as it is known. Once the Executive then agree a timetable for the local Budget process, that will be communicated to the Committee. So, I cannot give either of the two Members any further information on that.

I am glad that Mr Byrne replaced Mr Bradley, who is not in the Chamber, because his speech was considerably shorter than Mr Bradley's speeches usually are. So, we can at least be happy that, for whatever reason, Mr Bradley was not here tonight and Mr Byrne spoke on his behalf. He made a point that sounded like something from one of Mr Bradley's speeches, namely that we need more imaginative use of the Budget. I am still waiting to hear practical suggestions as to what more imaginative use the SDLP wishes to see of the Budget.

He talked at length, and quite rightly, about the potential of tourism. However, look at the imagination that the Executive have shown in relation to tourism spend in Northern Ireland, such as on infrastructure with the Titanic signature project, the Giant's Causeway centre or, in future, the Gobbins cliff path in my constituency, which, it is said, will be as attractive as the Giant's Causeway, bringing more tourists along the Antrim coast.

Money has also been spent on promoting Northern Ireland to bring people in. Huge investment has gone into the City of Culture in Londonderry and into the Irish Open, which brought people to the north coast — to your constituency, Mr Deputy Speaker. There is the money going into the World Police and Fire Games. Those are all imaginative ways in which the Executive have committed funding for tourist projects, and of course into things such as museums, etc. In all that we have already proven that when we identify a market, we will use public money to try to pump-prime that market.

Mr Cree raised a number of points, one of which was his desire to see the Maze project forwarded. He hoped that there would be money to provide greater access. I thought that the Ulster Unionist Party stance on that was that it did not want anybody to go near the place.

I thought it was against it. Actually, he wants roads into it so that people can get in and enjoy the economic benefits that can be released from that vast site: the thousands of jobs; the opportunities for the development of agricultural research and agriculture-related activities; and the tourist activities and, indeed, the heritage activities in the museum, which celebrates our contribution in the Second World War. I am glad to see that, at least, there is no unanimity in the ranks of the Ulster Unionist Party on the Maze project and that some people see that it has benefits and actually want to find ways to spend money to get more people to go there instead of putting people off with all the negative stories that we normally get from them.

Mr Cree: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: Well, I suppose that, since I mentioned him, I had better give way.

Mr Cree: In case there is any confusion, I was just trying to find out where the money was.

Mr Wilson: Money has been allocated to the Maze project. It is up to the corporation to decide how that money will be spent. The one thing that we know, the one thing that it has said and, indeed, the one thing it has been successful with so far, is that it has put an infrastructure in place that has already attracted tens of thousands of people to the site this summer when they went to the first agricultural show on the site. Of course, that is an indication of the potential for that site in the longer run.

Mr Cree also raised the issue of overcommitment and some other issues. I could, probably, give him answers on some of them, but, as they will all be contained in the statement on the June monitoring round, I would probably get in trouble with the Executive, much as I would love to give him answers on some of those issues now. He will have to wait for a week or two to get answers to questions on the overcommitment, how much money we carry through on the budget exchange scheme and some of the issues around the Belfast port, such as how much money was meant to come from that.

The Member raised the issue of fiscal powers. Again, it is not an issue in the Budget, but I have made my position clear: as far as the devolution of fiscal powers is concerned, if there is a good, strong economic case for devolving fiscal powers to Northern Ireland, of course, I will support it, and I will push it with the Treasury. If there is not, I do not believe in the general devolution of fiscal powers. Indeed, I agree with Vince Cable, who, the other day, commented that the general devolution of more fiscal and tax-raising powers to devolved Administrations across the United Kingdom would weaken the Union. I believe that it would have that effect, as well as not being economically advantageous either. Of course, if you are dependent on the Exchequer, as Northern Ireland is, why would you seek greater autonomy? The one thing that you can be sure of is that that autonomy will not be to your advantage in the long run.

Ms Cochrane talked about the importance of the shared future and the need to spend money on it. Of course, the First Minister and deputy First Minister have already made announcements on that. Contained in the Budget is the ability for them to spend money on some of those projects. The economic pact enables them to draw down further resources for that. Where there are schemes, there are opportunities in monitoring rounds throughout the year. A number of Members have mentioned schemes that have not been funded in the Budget because the cost is not known. As I said at the very start of my speech, the Budget is not a fixed document. There will be changes to it throughout the year, and opportunities will arise for bids to be made as projects become available.

Mr McGlone raised the issue of Invest Northern Ireland being adequately resourced. As far as I am aware, in all of the time that I have been Finance Minister, there has never been a complaint that, when Invest Northern Ireland needed money, it was not made available to it. In fact, I remember that one of my first actions as Finance Minister was a unbudgeted commitment to Invest Northern Ireland for the now very successful investment in carbon technology at Bombardier. We actually top-sliced Departments' budgets to make sure that we met that. Of course, that has paid off handsomely in the form of jobs in that important sector of aircraft production.

Mr McGlone asked for assurances that there would be resources for the organisation to proceed and to take up the opportunities that appear to be coming now from increased foreign direct investment. The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment will, no doubt, make bids in the monitoring rounds, and, given the priority that we have attached to the growth of jobs and to the economy, those bids will be honoured.

The Member also raised the issue of the Magherafelt bypass. He talked about Members speaking out of the side of their mouth, but I am not too sure which Members he was referring to. I have actually met Magherafelt District Council and discussed the issue with it at length. I want to make this clear to him: of course we want to proceed with road schemes, especially important ones such as this, if the money can be spent this year. However, the fact is that the land in Magherafelt has not even been vested. Of course, the procurement exercise would then have to be gone through. That being the case, the money cannot be spent this year. Therefore there is no point in asking for money to be put in the Budget for the Magherafelt bypass scheme when that scheme cannot spend a penny this year. He knows as well as I do that we cannot carry the money forward, so why would you make commitments to spend money on something when, at an early stage, you know that it cannot be done?

Mr McGlone: Thanks very much for giving way, Minister. I hear exactly what you are saying about the money being available for this year. I am aware of those issues. Is that a commitment that, subject to those issues being addressed, the money will be available as soon as possible for that scheme?

Mr Wilson: All that I can make commitments on is the money that is available this year. In fact, I think that he would be the first to criticise if I were to say that, despite the fact that we do not know what money will be available next year, despite the fact that we do not know what demands will there be on the Budget next year and despite the fact that I do not know the mind of the Executive, including his own Minister, when it comes to these decisions, I will give an assurance to the Assembly that money will be spent in a certain way next year, even though we do not know what money we will have, what demands will materialise and what decisions the Executive will take.

All that I can say is that, if there are capital projects that are ready to run and have high priority, they will, of course, feature heavily in any discussions in the Executive. However, let me make this clear: anyone who suggests that, somehow or other, there is a scheme that is ready to go in Magherafelt and that it has been denied money either by me as Finance Minister or by the Executive is absolutely wrong. Money cannot be spent on the Magherafelt bypass this year. The Member knows it, I know it, and everyone else who is involved in the decision-making process knows it. Unfortunately, that is the way that some Members play politics. They suggest that certain things could happen when they know full well that they cannot. Nevertheless, they try to make an issue of it.

Mr McGlone: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wilson: No. I have dealt with the Magherafelt bypass.

This is not really a Budget issue, but I agree with the Member that the greater use of project bank accounts on public construction contracts where there is a substantial element of subcontracting ought to be the norm. It safeguards subcontractors from main contractors who use them like a bank, and it safeguards them against main contractors who are perhaps in a shaky financial position. Payments are made to the main contractors, but, if they go into administration, the money does not get paid to the subcontractors. I, therefore, encourage all COPEs to use project bank accounts more often. I know that some of the main contractors do not like it, because it removes some of the flexibility that they have in the timing and the amount of money they hand out. Nevertheless, in my view, it is the main way to protect the supply chain in the construction industry.

Mr McGlone: I would like some clarification on that please, Minister. By the way, I thank you, on behalf of the all-party working group on construction, for your co-operation in driving this on. Is there any way in which you can ensure that that is good practice right across Departments? Can you, as Minister of Finance, through CPD or otherwise, ensure that the use of project bank accounts becomes good practice across Departments?

Mr Wilson: We have discussed this at the procurement board, on which there is representation — usually permanent secretaries — from across the main spending Departments. We have been saying, "We want to see your COPEs using project bank accounts where that fits the criteria, where the value of projects is of over £1 million and where there is a big element of subcontracting". At the end of the day, individual COPEs will decide what kind of tenders they want to put out. We cannot direct them to do it, although I think that the Member's all-party group on construction and others can keep putting pressure on there.

That is all I want to say on this. We are now into the third year of the Budget, and we are probably turning a corner. The gloom and doom when the Budget was first introduced in March 2011 is beginning to dispel. We have managed our way through the first two years of the Budget when we were told that we would not be able to do so. There is still a need, of course, for Departments to ensure that money is spent effectively so that we get best value from the resources that we make available to Departments. I want the Assembly to ensure that every penny spent is spent effectively, and I therefore ask Members to support the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Budget (No. 2) Bill [NIA 21/11-15] do now pass.

Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr Wilson (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That this Assembly agrees that the following provisions in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill, which relate to the treatment of same-sex marriages in Northern Ireland and gender recognition, should be considered by the UK Parliament:

- clauses 10(3), 12, 15(1) to (3) and 16;
- paragraph 2 of schedule 2; and
- schedule 5 (as introduced in the House of Commons on 24 January 2013).

As the Assembly is aware, the main purpose of the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill is to allow same-sex couples to marry either by way of a civil ceremony — that is, in a register office or approved premises — or, provided that the religious organisation concerned is in agreement, on religious premises. Although the Bill essentially relates to England and Wales, a number of the substantive provisions are stated to extend to Northern Ireland. The motion covers all Northern Ireland-related provisions bar clause 13 of and schedule 6 to the Bill. Before I speak to the provisions covered by the motion, I wish to say why I have not included clause 13 and schedule 6.

Schedule 6 allows for the making of an Order in Council that provides for marriages in overseas consulates or the marriage of service personnel overseas. On the former, I wanted to be sure that appropriate administrative arrangements would be put in place to take account of the law in Northern Ireland. However, I was unable to secure sufficient assurance in that regard. Therefore, I am not recommending that we allow that to go through in a legislative consent motion or that we allow it to be taken through Westminster on our behalf. On the latter, I believe that it is essential that suitable protections are put in place not only for members of the clergy but for other people who object to same-sex marriage because of their religious convictions. Authorised officers will not be allowed to opt out of performing same-sex marriages: I think that that is wrong. In other contexts, such as the provision of healthcare services, the Government have allowed for conscientious objections. I cannot comprehend why it has not been done in this instance. In the absence of suitable protections, I am not prepared to move a motion in respect of clause 13 and schedule 6.

I turn now to the provisions that are covered by the motion. Clause 10(3) and schedule 2 provide for how a same-sex marriage from England and Wales will be treated in Northern Ireland. Ordinarily, such a marriage will be treated as a civil partnership. However, paragraph 2(2) of schedule 2 allows for the making of an order that provides that an English or Welsh same-sex marriage is not to be treated as a civil partnership or is to be treated as a civil partnership that is subject to conditions. Such an order can be made only with the consent of the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP). I have agreed that, where DFP consent to such an order is required, it will be given only with the consent of the Executive.

I am sure that Members will recognise the need to take account of the interface between the law in Northern Ireland and the law in England and Wales. By providing for English and Welsh same-sex marriages to be treated as civil partnerships, we are utilising an established legal framework, namely the Civil Partnership Act 2004. We are treating those marriages — this is the important point — in the same way as we already treat overseas same-sex marriages. It would not be a defensible position if we were to recognise as a civil partnership a same-sex marriage conducted in, say, Belgium or Sweden but not one conducted in England or Wales. It would leave us vulnerable to court action.

With the introduction of same-sex marriage in England and Wales, it will be no longer necessary to end an English or Welsh marriage or civil partnership prior to the issuing of a full gender recognition certificate. Paragraph 12 of schedule 5 provides for the amendment of the Gender Recognition Act 2004 to take account of the new arrangements in England and Wales. It also amends the Act to allow for the correction of errors and applications to a court to quash the grant of a gender recognition certificate obtained by fraud.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Very often, legislation will provide for consequential or transitional matters to be dealt with in secondary legislation. This Bill is no exception. Clause 15 allows for the making of an order dealing with consequential transitional matters, and clause 16 sets out how the orders and regulations will be made. Clause 16(6)(b) has been amended to provide that the Secretary of State or the Lord Chancellor must obtain the consent of the Department of Finance and Personnel before making an order or regulations that would amend Northern Ireland legislation that is within the competence of the Assembly. That is a change from where it was originally, where they simply were obliged to consult us; now, they require our consent. Otherwise, we would not accept a legislative consent motion in respect of that part. As I mentioned, it has been agreed that, if the order-making power is to be exercised, the Department will seek the agreement of the Executive.

I have summarised the provisions covered by the motion. Before I close, I want to say a quick word about the overall policy position. I appreciate that we all have our own views. Not everyone in the Assembly will support the policy position on same-sex marriage or the decision to treat English or Welsh same-sex marriages as civil partnerships. However, the Assembly — this is important — has rejected the option of same-sex marriage on two occasions. The Executive have clearly accepted that there is no consensus in favour of same-sex marriage and so has agreed the motion, which I commend to you. Therefore, I ask Members to do likewise and support the motion.

11.30 pm

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. In order to inform today's debate, the Committee for Finance and Personnel, at short notice, endeavoured to gather evidence from a representative group of stakeholders on the policy aims of the LCM. The Committee reported its findings and recommendations within the very tight time frame required, and the report was circulated to all Members and published online on 14 June.

At the outset, the Committee was mindful that, on the basis of recent debates in the Assembly, it is evident that a slight majority of elected Members here are not in favour of same-sex marriage. Therefore, until such times as that position changes and agreement is reached on policy reform, there is a need to put in place practical arrangements for same-sex married couples who move here from Britain or, indeed, from other jurisdictions. While adopting a pragmatic approach and recommending that the Minister is supported on the LCM, the Committee nonetheless has raised key concerns on which I hope to receive some assurance from the Minister today. Before going into these in more detail, I shall perhaps give Members just a few headlines at this point.

In particular, the evidence highlights the need for the implications of the proposed policy to be very carefully assessed both prior to and following implementation. Clearly, the approach being proposed will leave the North out of kilter with an increasing number of jurisdictions around the world. In European terms, aside from Britain, this will include Spain, Denmark and the Netherlands, to name but a few, with the rest of Ireland also considering legalising same-sex marriage. Indeed, it was pointed out to the Committee that the North would be the only jurisdiction west of Germany not recognising same-sex marriage.

It is also clear that the proposed policy is likely to run into legal challenge on human rights or equality grounds, and I personally believe that, ultimately, the North may be forced by the courts to move on the matter. In particular, we will have a situation where there may be an unequal regime of human rights protection here when compared with Britain. In addition, there is a possibility that the policy will be tested against our distinctive equality protections and the impact on section 75 groupings. There will also be a clear need for guidance or information to be issued in relation to the legal status and position of adoptive parents in same-sex marriages and their children, should they move from Britain to here.

Other notable issues raised were pension anomalies, the order-making powers of the Secretary of State, potential economic considerations and administrative problems for same-sex couples who have been married in Britain and have moved here. There is also a lack of clarity about why there are no provisions in the LCM for overseas marriage, and the Minister referred to that.

Perhaps it would be helpful if I gave some more detail of the evidence gathered and the issues and concerns raised. The Committee's attention was first drawn to the proposed Westminster legislation following correspondence from the Human Rights Commission in March that was forwarded to the Department. The Department informed members that the Minister was considering a request from the British Government in respect of the provisions in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill that relate to this jurisdiction. The Committee sought further clarification from DFP on the differences between the rights, benefits and entitlements of people in a civil partnership and those of people in a same-sex marriage, on how these could be impacted in cases where same-sex married couples move to the North from Britain and on whether DFP had sought any legal advice on these issues. It was not until 14 May that the Minister notified the Committee of his intention to pursue an LCM, subject to Executive approval, in respect of a number of provisions in the Bill. The memorandum accompanying the LCM was subsequently laid in the Assembly on 24 May, at which point the matter stood referred to the Committee for reporting to the Assembly within 15 working days, as provided for in Standing Order 42A.

In the context of this time constraint, Members agreed to seek an oral briefing from departmental officials, to commission the Assembly's Research and Information Service and to invite some relevant stakeholders to provide written comment on the LCM. The Committee received a briefing from the Assembly's Research and Information Service and took initial evidence from DFP officials. Written submissions from the Church of Ireland, the Presbyterian Church, the Rainbow Project, the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission were also considered. Members agreed to take up offers of oral briefings from the Rainbow Project and the Human Rights Commission and to receive a final oral briefing from DFP officials. Members also noted that the NIPSA LGB&T group had indicated that it would have welcomed the opportunity to make a stakeholder submission but was unable to do so because of the time constraints arising from the LCM process.

The details of the Committee's deliberations were set out in a short informal report issued to all Members last week. I shall, however, summarise the key points now for Members' convenience and for the record. It was evident from the submissions and oral briefings that there is a lack of consensus on the principle of legislating for same-sex marriage in the North. However, it was also immediately apparent that the policy of the LCM will leave the North out on a limb in comparison with developments in other jurisdictions in relation to legislating for same-sex marriage. Nonetheless, the Committee accepts that the approach planned for the North under the LCM aligns with the current majority view in the Assembly, as expressed in recent debates on same-sex marriage, and that such regionalised policy variation on transferred matters is a natural outworking of devolution. That said, members were also mindful of the strongly held and divergent views on the issue and of the need for careful assessment of the implications of the proposed policy before and following implementation.

A key issue to emerge in the Committee's evidence gathering was a potential anomaly regarding human rights protection. Members were advised by the Human Rights Commission that it was unclear whether or not the introduction of same-sex marriage would change the current definition of marriage, as protected by the Human Rights Act 1998, and that an unequal regime of human rights protections in the different jurisdictions may be created. That may be problematic, as the Human Rights Act is designed to have equal force across the jurisdictions. This could lead to appeals and subsequent rulings in the Supreme Court that would have to be applied to the courts here. Having considered the evidence received on this point, the Committee concluded that certainty on the matter would be established only following the outcome of any future legal challenge.

Also arising from its investigation, the Committee queried the extent to which the equality implications of the LCM had been robustly examined. Members noted that the completed equality screening form initially published by DFP acknowledged that the policy would have an impact on several of the section 75 groupings but also stated that there had been no opportunity for the customary consultation due to time constraints. I note that a revised screening form has been subsequently issued by DFP, using the updated format, but this does not appear to provide additional information, and, indeed, the reference to the absence of the customary consultation seems to have been dropped.

Related to the equality considerations is the issue of how gender reassignment cases will be handled locally. Concerns were raised by the Rainbow Project about the emotional and cost —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKay: Yes.

Mr Wells: The Member showed a week ago that he can stand up, speak ad lib and be clear and interesting. He is not that good when it comes to getting the head down and reading. Can we get back to the normal performance that he is so capable of?

Mr McKay: I thank the Member for his intervention. I ask the Member to note what time it is. It is important that I relate and put across the views of the Committee accurately, given the sensitivity of the issue, but I note the Member's concerns about my delivery.

Related to the equality considerations is the issue of how gender reassignment cases will be handled locally. Concerns were raised by the Rainbow Project about the emotional and cost burden that would fall to those in a mixed-sex marriage or civil partnership, which must be dissolved in the North for a full gender recognition certificate to be issued to a partner who wishes to change gender. The Committee believes that this issue should have been included in the equality screening exercise that has been undertaken in relation to the LCM policy. I note that this is particularly relevant because, in the Equality Commission's policy screening pro forma, "transgender" is one of the main groups identified as relevant to the section 75 category entitled "men and women generally". Because of these initial concerns, the Committee, in its report, called for a view from the Equality Commission on the Department's equality screening in advance of today's debate. That response was received last Friday afternoon and was published on the Committee web pages in time for today's debate.

In its response, the commission raises a range of issues in respect of DFP's equality screening.

These include: one, the lack of evidence gathered for the wider policy context of same-sex marriage in addition to that for the narrow focus of the LCM; two, the absence of assessment of the issues in respect of gender reassignment and pension entitlement; three, the lack of information presented on numbers in the LGBT community and in civil partnerships affected by the policy; and, four, the failure to engage with external organisations at an early stage of preparing the screening document.

The Equality Commission has also pointed out that the Department's equality scheme commits it to reviewing a screening decision if a consultee raises a concern that is based on supporting evidence. The commission has indicated that it will be advising the Department directly in relation to the screening form and its equality scheme commitments. It has also indicated that it will propose to DFP that, as a result of screening the policy, further monitoring information should be collected to inform any potential future policy options and the potential equality impacts.

Finally, in terms of its recent communication, the Equality Commission reiterates its recommendation that:

"civil partners should have the right to have their civil partnerships registered on religious premises in circumstances where faith groups do not object to hosting civil partnerships on their premises".

I return to the other issues identified in the Committee's report. During the oral hearings with Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP) officials, members queried anomalies in respect of adoption — in particular, the policy difference that would arise between the position here and that for same-sex couples in England and Wales and their ability to adopt. The DFP officials were keen to emphasise that the responsibility for adoption lies with the Department of Health. However, the Committee believes that there is a practical requirement for information to be made available to ensure that the position for adoptive parents moving from Britain to here is clear, as well as the legal status of their children.

A further issue that arose from the DFP evidence was in relation to pensions. The departmental officials confirmed to members that the provisions in the Bill to amend the law on gender reassignment in England and Wales will have implications for pensions of some same-sex spouses moving to the North. However, the Department sought to assure the Committee that those differences will affect a small number of people, are a legacy from the past and will eventually cease to exist.

Members' attention was also drawn to provisions in the Bill that will give the Secretary of State order-making powers in respect of devolved areas. The Committee welcomes the clarification from departmental officials that the consent of DFP will be required to make such orders and that the proposals will also have to be agreed by the Executive. The Committee will wish to be consulted on any such proposals in the future before the Department brings them to the Executive.

Other potential issues arising from the policy of the LCM were highlighted by the representatives of the Rainbow Project. These included a potential economic impact from the North having a different policy position on same-sex marriage to Britain and potentially the rest of Ireland. In particular, it was argued that that can be a factor influencing the investment decisions of some multinational companies in terms of their human resource. The Rainbow Project also highlighted the potential administrative problems and potential punitive impacts on same-sex married couples who move to here from Britain and inadvertently declare themselves married on official documentation.

One final issue is the lack of clarity in relation to why the LCM does not cover the provisions relating to marriage overseas, as had been indicated on the accompanying memorandum. The Committee has asked for further information on communications between the Department and Whitehall on that matter, and the Minister has referred to that today.

I believe that the range of issues that have been detailed and that have arisen from the evidence, not least the most recent communication from the Equality Commission, underscores the Committee's recommendation that there should be a review of the practical and legal implications of the policy within three years of implementation.

Also, in looking ahead, as Chair of the Committee I must also point out that this exercise has highlighted a major flaw in the LCM process. This LCM contrasts with previous experience — for example, in relation to the LCM on air passenger duty — when the Committee was given early warning of the intention to bring a motion and was able to press ahead and complete a detailed and thorough evidence-gathering and scrutiny exercise in advance of the memorandum being laid and the 15-day period commencing.

I believe that the process will need to be refined and improved in order to ensure that the Assembly is given sufficient time to examine carefully any proposed legislation in Westminster that relates to devolved matters.

Finally, having highlighted the issues that were raised in the evidence sessions, I can confirm that the Committee recognises the need for pragmatism in this matter. In the absence of an agreed alternative, the measures that are contained in the LCM are necessary to avoid a situation in which same-sex couples who were married in England and Wales would have no legal status in the event that they move here. As such, the Committee for Finance and Personnel supports the Minister in seeking the Assembly's agreement to the legislative consent motion that is before us this evening.

I will now make a couple of brief comments on my party's position. Obviously, we do not agree with the Minister's policy position on this matter, but we support the LCM today, not because we feel that it is sufficient but because we do not wish to disenfranchise further those couples whose marriages are performed in England and Wales.

This is a rights issue, and legislation is going to be introduced in England, Wales and in Scotland. As we heard in the evidence that was given to the Committee, everywhere west of Germany, it would seem, is going to have this legislation introduced. It would be unfortunate were we to find ourselves alone in not giving these rights to same-sex couples.

A test case in this matter is inevitable. We look forward to such a case being brought, and we hope that it will be successful.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. It is interesting how Sinn Féin, having fought for "Brits out", is very much in favour of "Brits in" when it comes to this particular policy. On the legal issue, does he not agree that, ultimately, it is for the democratically elected people in this Assembly to set the law, not for judges and courts to usurp the responsibility that rests with the legislators who set the legal framework for these issues?

Mr McKay: I thank the Member for his intervention. It is interesting to turn that on its head and say that the DUP wants to see the current policy position in Dublin being the policy up here as well. We can all play games with that, but we believe that this is a rights issue and that members of the LGBT community have rights.

The most concerning thing for me is the evidence that has been presented of bullying, discrimination and prejudice towards those in the LGBT community. This is an issue in the United States as well, and you find that where LGBT people have rights recognised by local legislators, incidents of discrimination, bullying and, ultimately, in many cases, suicide, are reduced. That is one of the main issues that we need to have in the back of our minds.

These rights are being introduced in other countries in Europe, and the sky is not caving in. Of course, people have different views on the matter. They have different religious views on the matter, and they are entitled to those views, but, at the same time, members of our community, regardless of their race, colour, creed or sexuality are entitled to live their lives in the way that they want to.

I hope and believe that this Assembly will, ultimately, vote for a progressive approach to this particular issue, and I think that we are pretty close to it. There are only a handful of votes in it.

I will not keep Members any longer, given the time of the evening. My colleague, Caitríona Ruane, will elaborate on our party policy as the evening continues.

Mr Weir: I rise to speak on this legislative consent motion as a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. Given the lateness of the hour, I will try to make my remarks fairly brief, and, in order to assuage any potential criticism from my right-hand side, I will try to do so without any notes.

I guarantee that I will be dull but nonetheless satisfy the Simon Cowell of the Assembly, who is to my right.

The Chair has gone through in a very thorough fashion the process and the discussion that took place at the Committee. There was a limited opportunity to discuss the issue at the Committee and to receive evidence on it. I think that that is the nature of the LCM. On that basis, and as the Chair indicated, there was not a consensus on the issue. That should not particularly surprise us. Where some of the submissions that were made are concerned, it was perhaps not surprising that the submissions that were made on behalf of the Presbyterian Church and the Church of Ireland were in favour of the LCM. In contrast, when the Rainbow Project came in front of the Committee, it indicated that it was unhappy with the LCM and would prefer that it were not passed.

That lack of consensus is not surprising, because I think that it reflects the differences in views that have been expressed on the issue. We have had two debates on the subject. There is no point in rehearsing the detail of those debates, as they were fairly lengthy and the various parties' positions were fairly well staked out in them. My party has consistently taken the view, which I support, that the definition of marriage should not be redefined. To that extent, I am comfortable and happy with the LCM.

As indicated, the legal position is that, if the LCM does not go through, there is a potential anomaly that would mean that people coming from England could be in a different legal position to those from Canada or France who are in a similar situation. The Chair mentioned a court challenge being made at some point. I have no doubt that, at some point, someone will try to make a legal challenge on an aspect of this. If we did not pass the LCM, I believe that we would be in a fairly indefensible legal position. The LCM is the best opportunity to defend the current position in Northern Ireland. I am comfortable with the LCM, because it preserves and reinforces the current definition of marriage in Northern Ireland as something that happens between one man and one woman. My party and I are comfortable with that and will continue to support it.

It is wrong where we have judges trying to impose rulings against the democratic will of any institution. We on these Benches will very much defend the view that it should be the Assembly —

Mr McDevitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way briefly.

Mr McDevitt: It may be pedantic of me to say this at 11.50 pm, but it is a bit churlish for the Member to complain about a judge trumping the democratic will of an institution when this legislative consent motion surrenders our democratic will to another institution. So, by virtue of the motion, we are handing over authority to make a decision on this matter to the British Parliament, which, like everyone else, will be subject to the judiciary.

Mr Weir: The Member shows as much ignorance of constitutional law as he does of the composition of this legislative consent motion. This legislative consent motion is consistent with the current definition of marriage. As the Minister said, when the legislative consent motion was originally discussed with the Government, the idea simply was that the Secretary of State could make changes and would simply have to consult with DFP.

It is enshrined in the legislative consent motion, and it is part of the constitutional theory on devolution, that any changes that are specifically put in this legislative consent motion require the consent of the Department of Finance and Personnel. In effect, any changes will require the consent of the House. Therefore, I believe that we have a degree of protection. I suspect that this debate will be held on other occasions in the future.

Mr McDevitt: [Interruption.]

Mr Weir: The Member can make a late gesture to be called up to the British Lions with a —

Mr McDevitt: The British and Irish Lions.

Mr Weir: British and Irish Lions. I am always very happy for anybody from an Irish background to be embraced in the broader British tradition as part of the British Isles. Indeed, whether the Member will be an adopted son on that basis remains to be seen. The Member is making gestures about trying to pass the buck, but, if he had read the legislative consent motion, he would know that it means that the House and the Department of Finance and Personnel will have to consent to any changes. This gives us the best opportunity to defend the institution of marriage, defend the current definition of the institution of marriage and, indeed, defend the integrity of the House by ensuring that any change in any subject will require the consent of the House. Therefore, I am very happy to support the legislative consent motion on behalf of the DUP.

Mr McDevitt: I may as well start off where Mr Weir ended. For anyone to come to the House and say that the DUP is the last great bastion for whatever it defines marriage to be is a bit like King Canute facing the monumental tide that came in all around him. It is just the height of this House that we would engage in a debate like this at 11.55 pm —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr McDevitt: I will in a second, but let me just get started.

It is the height of this House that we would do so with straight faces and then turn around and tell our electorate that we have defended the institution of marriage and kept it as whatever it is that the DUP believes it should be. Whatever marriage is, it will be what the DUP believes it has defended it to be.

The legislative consent motion means that we have to do what we have to do. I agree with the Chair of the Finance Committee that it is very probable that, even in doing the bare minimum, we will be challenged, and successfully so. It is the height of indictment of any legislature that it would make law knowing that it was flawed. I regret to say that this is not the first time that we have done so tonight — it is the second time. That seems to be becoming the way that one party at least likes to do its business in the House.

Mr Weir seemed to have a really important point that he wanted to make.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. I have a number of points. Although I stated clearly the DUP's position on this issue, and the DUP will hold to that position, it is not simply the view of the DUP. On the two occasions that this has been debated, a clear majority in the House has expressed a view, so it is not a case of one party trying to impose its will. Mysteriously, in previous debates, a number of your colleagues were not present to support the SDLP position, and I see that the Member is bereft of colleagues tonight as well. I should also point out, slightly pedantically, that he somewhat misses the point in relation King Canute. King Canute's actions showed the limitations of his power rather than his arrogance, but that lesson may have been lost on the Member opposite.

Mr McDevitt: No, it was not. The DUP is well aware of the limitations of its power, which is why it insists on carrying on in this legislature in the way that it does. There is no other legislature that would take the DUP seriously when it carries on like this or, indeed, where it would be in any way strong enough to carry on like this.

The situation is that we have to do the bare minimum. We have to do the right thing for people who, perfectly legally, exercise their right to engage in a civil, legal marriage in another part of the UK. It is really quite sad and disappointing that we are having to do this, first, at this late hour and, secondly, in a de minimis, or least possible, way and in an almost begrudging fashion. It says everything about what we need to change in this institution that that is the tone of tonight's debate and the way in which it is being conducted.

The SDLP will support the LCM because the SDLP will not take any steps that would in any way reduce the opportunity for people of the same sex to be able to enjoy the protection of the law, irrespective of what part of the UK they entered into their same-sex marriage. It is a matter of deep regret that we do not take a more mature, honest and grown-up approach to a proposal to change the law with regard to civil marriage. It is not a change to the law on church marriage because it would never be binding on a church. It would not, in any secular state — I believe that we all live in one — affect in any way an individual's right to their belief or freedom from prejudice for their beliefs.

12.00 midnight

Mr Cree: I thank the last Member who spoke for allowing me to be the first Member to speak this morning. I was going to say "today", then "tonight", and it is now "this morning".

The Finance Minister is seeking the Assembly's approval for a legislative consent motion on the marriage Bill that is making its way through the legislative process at Westminster. As the Committee Chair outlined at some length, we considered the issue in some detail in the Finance Committee and received oral evidence from the Human Rights Commission and the Rainbow Project and written submissions from a number of other organisations. I will not seek to rehearse that work, as Members will be aware of the Committee report that was produced as a result.

The legislative consent motion is necessary for the purposes of recognising same-sex marriages in England and Wales as civil partnerships in Northern Ireland. It is important to state that that is how overseas same-sex marriages are treated in Northern Ireland at present, and it, therefore, follows that it should be the practice for England and Wales as well should the marriage Bill complete its passage through Parliament.

The LCM recognises that there is not sufficient consensus in the Assembly to change the current definition of marriage but ensures that the protections contained in civil partnerships are extended to same-sex couples who have married in England and Wales. It must also be remembered that the Civil Partnership Act is an established legal framework that has been in operation for nearly 10 years. So, we are not reverting to some untried and untested situation that will result in grave difficulties.

I will conclude by saying that I believe that a legislative consent motion of this nature to be the most sensible way forward. I recognise that it is not the preferred way for some, and, indeed, the issue of same-sex marriages is one that Ulster Unionists can vote on according to their conscience. In summary, the motion should ensure that all same-sex couples in Northern Ireland have the option of the protections of a civil partnership, and it will also bring England and Wales into line with how other countries that have legalised same-sex marriage are treated here. Importantly, it recognises the will of the majority of the Assembly, which is to keep the definition of marriage as it is.

Mrs Cochrane: I speak this morning on behalf of my party in favour of the legislative consent motion. While we are all aware of the differing views across the Chamber on same-sex marriage, the same-sex marriage Bill will pass in England and Wales, and we must therefore make adequate arrangements to determine how those in same-sex marriages in England and Wales will be recognised in Northern Ireland.

Many people in Northern Ireland have strongly held views that marriage should remain between one man and one woman, and we respect that. However, it has to be noted that the Presbyterian Church and the Church of Ireland both accept this legislative consent motion. The Church of Ireland says that it does not impinge on the church's understanding of marriage, and the Presbyterian Church feels that it is a very necessary motion to help safeguard the current marriage legislation.

As has been laid out by the Minister and others, the legislative consent motion seeks to implement certain sections of the same-sex marriage Bill, which will mean that English and Welsh same-sex marriages can be treated as civil partnerships in Northern Ireland by using the established legal framework of the Civil Partnership Act. I recognise, however, that that does not go far enough for some, in that civil partnerships are not identical to marriages in terms of rights, registering with a religious institution and adoption. However, at this point, Northern Ireland needs to have measures in place so that those in same-sex marriages in England and Wales will be recognised in legislation in Northern Ireland. This is, therefore, a step in the right direction. I support the motion.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Sinn Féin supports this LCM not because it is sufficient in addressing the issue of marriage equality; it is not. Nor do we support the motion on the basis that the debate has concluded on the issue; it has not and cannot. We support the motion so as to not disenfranchise further those couples whose marriages were performed in England and Wales from the very limited legal recognition that would be offered by the provisions.

Níl muid ag tacú le LCM an lae inniu cionnas go sílimid gur leor é le aghaidh a thabhairt ar cheist an chomhionannais pósta; ní leor é. Níl muid ag tacú leis cionnas go bhfuil deireadh leis an díospóireacht ar an ábhar seo; níl deireadh léi. Táimid ag tacú leis an rún le nach mbainfear fiú an t-aitheantas an-teoranta atá sna forálacha seo de na lanúnacha sin a pósadh i Sasain agus sa Bhreatain Bheag.

I use the term "marriage equality" rather than the title given to this LCM of same-sex marriage very deliberately, because we are not asking for any special or separate definition of marriage, nor do we want to change, or fundamentally alter, what marriage means, which is to love, commit and form a union with another and for that union to be protected and recognised by law. We want all people, including same-sex couples to have the right to marry. That is equality.

Eleven countries and nine US states now provide for marriage equality. Let us not delude ourselves that there are no consequences for not legislating for marriage equality here. Research in the US demonstrates that there is a direct correlation between the level of acceptance of lesbian and gay people and the level of legal equality. Put simply, there is more anti-gay violence and stigma in places where there is less legal equality. That fact alone places a heavy burden on this Chamber, and I hope that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, who has looked very bored since she came into the Chamber, takes note of that.

I note the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel's comments on the short notice that was given by the Minister of Finance and Personnel on this matter, the strong possibility of a legal challenge on human rights or equality grounds and the unequal protection of human rights here compared with Britain. I also note the failure by Minister Sammy Wilson to carry out a full equality impact assessment (EQIA) when he knows full well that there are adverse impacts for various section 75 categories. That is poor leadership indeed by this Minister.

I love the way the DUP and, indeed, the UUP jump up and down shouting parity, except when it does not suit them. The Minister's failure to lead — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: — contrasts with the leadership shown by ordinary people in England, Scotland, Wales and the North and South of Ireland. I was at the constitutional convention, where a hugely significant percentage of people voted for equal marriage. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Ms Ruane: I also pay tribute to the people who organise Pride, which is happening as we speak. I hope that the Members opposite will join their former Lord Mayor of Belfast Gavin Robinson in Pride. I look forward to celebrating equality with my gay brothers and sisters this week and next week, and I, along with my party colleagues, will be joining proudly in the Pride parade.

The state has a duty to treat all of its citizens equally. The Minister has failed abysmally to do this, but I am hopeful and I know that we will have marriage equality in this part of Ireland. We just need to look at the DUP's record in trying to prevent various aspects of gay rights. The never-never brigade, the "Save Ulster from Sodomy" brigade, the party that tried to prevent decriminalisation of homosexuality failed on that count. It said "never, never, never" to civil partnerships, yet one of the first civil partnerships — again I note the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment —

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: I will, certainly.

Mrs Foster: It is better to be in that brigade than the east Tyrone brigade. That is what I was saying, if the Member wants me to say it again. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Ms Ruane: That is the most pathetic comeback that I have heard.

We have had the never-never brigade to civil partnerships, and now it is lauding civil partnerships. Yet, one of the first civil partnerships in Ireland was in Belfast. That was another unsuccessful campaign by the DUP.

In the debate on April 29, here in this Chamber, we had the "never, never, never" to equal marriage. Now, they say that they will do a little bit to try to make sure — [Interruption.] I have to agree with my colleague Conall McDevitt: I wish that you could be on this side of the Chamber and look at yourselves making nonsensical comments. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: Watch this space, folks. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: I have absolutely no doubt that there will be equal marriage in Ireland, North and South. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Ms Ruane: The island of Ireland will ensure that all our citizens, regardless of gender, disability, race, political or religious belief — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, Members.

Ms Ruane: — or sexual orientation will be treated with respect and equality. I would like to end by saying that the work carried out by all our groups that are fighting for equality for our gay and lesbian, bisexual and transgender community stands in stark contrast to the failure of the Ministers opposite.

Mr McCallister: At the outset, I think that it is fair to say that this is not ideal. It is probably a case of us doing as little as possible on this issue. I accept the Minister's point that the mood of the Assembly has been tested twice on this issue and, despite the two petitions of concern on those occasions, it fell short of even a simple majority, so there is not a settled will in the House on changing policy. Therefore, we are stuck in this position of having to accept the legislative consent motion. As I have said, I do not think it is ideal, but if we vote against it, or if the legislative consent motion were to fall, it would create a policy vacuum, with no one quite sure what would be the legal position of our fellow citizens in same-sex marriages who move here from England and Wales.

Perhaps the Minister will clarify in his winding-up speech whether, if the Scottish Parliament legislates for equal marriage, the motion also protects people who have been married in Scotland and later move to Northern Ireland.

I take on board the points made by other colleagues. The Chairman of the Committee for Finance and Personnel reminded the House that, possibly, in a few years, this will be the only part of western Europe that does not have equal marriage. How long or how sustainable that policy position would be is anyone's guess. I agree with Ms Ruane and Mr McDevitt that a court challenge to that position is very likely. However, we are in the position of having to accept this motion to avoid a policy vacuum. There are issues about adoption that I am sure that the Minister will clarify, although my understanding is that adoption orders are almost impossible to break, and so families moving here should be protected by legislation on adoption.

We have been presented with this motion and we have effectively no choice but to support it.

Mr Allister: I am implacably opposed to same-sex marriage. By any proper definition, marriage — indisputably and irreversibly — is the union of one man and one woman, and so it must and should remain. So long as I have a voice in this House, and this House has any control over it, that is the manner in which I will express myself.

12.15 am

I trust that this legislative consent motion will not be necessary, because I yet hope that the Westminster Parliament will not take this most retrograde of steps by devaluing and redefining marriage in this perverse way and that this legislation will yet fall, and, if it does, of course, this legislative consent motion will not be necessary. If it does not fall, there is an issue to be addressed, arising from the fact that, regrettably, there would be the capacity for same-sex marriage in some parts of the Kingdom and, therefore, in this part, where it would not be possible, there would be an issue with couples that have gone down that particular path. Foreign couples that have gone down that path avail themselves in this jurisdiction of civil partnerships, and I think it would be high impossible legally and constitutionally to construct an arrangement whereby those who, within the United Kingdom, go down that path would not also, in a way that could be defended, have to be afforded the same situation of civil partnership. That in no way means that I endorse or support civil partnership. I do not, but it is a recognition of the legal reality in that regard.

Once more, those who decline to accept the settled will of this House — twice, I think, in six months — in rejecting same-sex marriage talk loosely about legal challenge and all sorts of things. Whether they clutch those matters to themselves as a comfort blanket or something else, I do not know, but let us be very clear: there is no such thing in human rights law that applies in Northern Ireland to a right to same-sex marriage. It does not exist in the European Convention on Human Rights, though some might wish it to exist. It is not there, and, therefore, this pretence that, in some way, we are in breach of our human rights obligations is utterly bogus and false.

Whether we end up as the last place west of Germany, whatever the significance of that is meant to be, where same-sex marriage is not recognised and legislated for is neither here nor there. What matters is that we do right, and the doing of right means that we do not endorse that which is wrong; namely, same-sex marriage.

Mr Agnew: I think it is regrettable that we have this legislative consent motion that says that we will not recognise as married those couples who enter into a commitment of marriage in England and Wales. It is regrettable that we would seek to tell others that we do not value their marriage and their commitment as we do the marriage and commitment of others.

I am reassured, despite Mr Allister's contribution and some from others, that we will see marriage equality in Northern Ireland eventually. Just as, under the penal laws, legal recognition of Presbyterian marriage was denied for a long time, and just as Presbyterians now have their marriages recognised in law, same-sex couples will one day win their battle to end discrimination against them — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Member has the Floor.

Mr Agnew: — and have their marriages recognised. There are attempts here to shout me down. Just as I will not be shouted down, the LGBT community will not be shouted down when fighting for its rights.

Mr Wilson: What a man? [Laughter.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr Agnew: I will not be churlish, Mr Speaker, because we have seen progress this evening. It was pointed out that the “never, never, never” brigade has, to some extent, moved on. For the first time, to the best of my knowledge, the Assembly will support legislation to give recognition to civil partnerships. Although we have civil partnerships in Northern Ireland, that happened during a period of suspension. Although we failed to bring forward a sexual orientation strategy, which seems to be stuck in OFMDFM, and although we failed to legislate for full marriage equality, I am pleased with the progress that has been made. Under a DUP Minister, we will see support for legislation, albeit not for equal marriage, but to recognise civil partnerships. I hope that when they see that society does not collapse and the end of all morality does not arrive, some day they may come to accept full marriage equality and that society will be enhanced and not degraded.

Mr Wilson: I will reply to a number of the points made during the debate. I will deal with a number of the general points before I go into some of the specific contributions.

A number of points were made by Members, and the last Member to speak referred to this as well. Thankfully, Caitriona Ruane has left the Chamber, and we all rejoice when she disappears. Unfortunately, she is reappearing again. In her contribution, she said that this was lauding civil partnerships and that it was somehow a recognition of civil partnerships. Of course, it is nothing of the sort. As far as the legislative consent motion is concerned — Mr Allister outlined the position in his speech, and I made it clear in my opening speech — as a result of legislation that went through under direct rule, when people whose single-sex marriages occur in other countries come to live in Northern Ireland, they are recognised as being in a civil partnership, so we would have had an impossible situation. The position that the majority of Members and I hold is that we do not wish single-sex marriage to be introduced into Northern Ireland, nor do we wish to have that imposed on us by the courts. Without passing this legislation, we would have been vulnerable to cases of discrimination. Therefore, by accepting this part of the legislation, we are simply regularising the position between England and Wales and other parts of the world and what would happen to same-sex couples who are married in those places when they come to live in Northern Ireland. It is not acceptance, and it is not welcoming civil partnerships. It is simply accepting the reality of what is required to protect the position that, I believe, is representative not only of the majority of the Assembly but the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland.

I believe that although most of the speeches tonight were in favour of widening the legislation, those who spoke in favour are out of step with the community here in Northern Ireland. Mr McDevitt, of course, seems to be out of step with a good lot of his party, who have not even come near the place to support him in his stance. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. The Minister must be heard. Order.

Mr Wilson: The second point, and we have to make this clear, is that this has nothing to do with people's rights.

Ms Ruane: Shame. Shame.

Mr Wilson: Those who have quoted those rights —

Ms Ruane: Shame.

Mr Wilson: The Member is saying “shame” from a sedentary position. She is one to lecture anybody about rights. Nobody has sought to crush the rights of people in Northern Ireland, including the right to live, as much as the Member who sits on the opposite Benches.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Wilson: So, she need not complain and say “shame” when I talk about rights. The last person in the world who should be talking about rights is the Member from South Down.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Wilson: Let us look at the rights issue. The human rights legislation makes it very clear. Article 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights defines the marriage right. In fact, the Minister made it clear in a letter to the Human Rights Commission that it does not by any stretch of the imagination require the right to same-sex marriage to be enshrined in article 12. In fact, when the Minister wrote to the Human Rights Commission, she said that there is no requirement under domestic or human rights legislation to introduce same-sex marriage. That is the opinion of the Minister who took the legislation through the House of Commons.

The second point that the Committee Chairman argued is that the Human Rights Act requires it to have equal force across all jurisdictions. The Human Rights Commission argued that point. In her response to the Human Rights Commission, the Minister made it quite clear that, on the extension of marriage in England and Wales to same-sex couples, which would affect the interpretation of the Human Rights Act, the courts in England and Wales will consider the legislation and then apply the Human Rights Act in that context. Where domestic provision differs in the United Kingdom, it is clear that the application of the Human Rights Act, according to that provision, may differ. So, there will be different outcomes in different countries across the United Kingdom.

The Minister went on to point out that that had already been shown to be the case with anti-terrorist legislation. What would have been regarded as a right in England and Wales on arrests and detention was different in Northern Ireland because the laws were different. It was a different local situation. So, there is no justification under the law for the appeal to the European Convention on Human Rights or to the Human Rights Act. It is not a rights issue. It is not an equality issue. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, there is no need —

Ms Ruane: Will the Minister take an intervention?

Mr Wilson: No, I will not give way to the Member.
[Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order. Let us not have debate across the Chamber. The Minister is making a winding-up speech, and he should be heard. It is quite obvious that the Minister has no intention of taking an intervention. Let us move on. Let us moderate our language in the Chamber and display good temper as far as possible.

Mr Wilson: I normally take interventions during debates, as you well know, Mr Speaker, but the one thing that I have made quite clear is that I am not going to give the Member on the opposite Benches any platform to pretend that she is interested in human rights of any sort when her record on human rights, and, especially the human rights of innocent victims in Northern Ireland, is very clear for all to see.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Wilson: I will not give her an opportunity to carry out an exercise in hypocrisy in any debate.

Mr Speaker: Can we get back to the motion, please?

Mr Wilson: Yes, I will. Mr Speaker, the point that I was making is that this is not a rights issue and it is not an equality issue. Article 12 of the European Convention on Human Rights makes it quite clear that men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family according to the national laws governing the exercise of that right. That makes it clear that domestic laws in each state and jurisdiction govern the right to marriage. If our law defines marriage as being between a man and a woman, that is compliant with the Human Rights Act. Therefore, this is not a denial of people's human rights, even according to the legislation that Members appealed to during the debate.

12.30 am

The third issue is that, somehow or other, I denied the Committee the opportunity to scrutinise this legislative consent motion properly by bringing it late. Let me make something clear: it was evident from the very start of the Bill's passage through the House of Commons that parts of it applied to Northern Ireland and would require a legislative consent motion. I made it clear to Members that I contacted the Minister, and my officials contacted the Department in England. We wanted to change certain things in the legislation. There was no willingness to engage with us on that or to make those changes until the very last moment, when changes were made. Mr Weir made the point that, if there were to be changes in the legislation — for example, in regulations — our consent would be required rather than simply consultation with us. I believed that that was essential, and we got that.

We also sought safeguards on consular marriages to ensure that we did not finish up with sham marriages and people from Northern Ireland trying to get around the regulations. We could not get those safeguards. Right up to the last moment — indeed, in the week before Final Stage in the House of Commons — I had a conversation with the Minister about it. She was not prepared to move on that, and we were not prepared to move either.

When it came to armed forces marriages, because the authorising officer, regardless of his or her opinion, would have been expected to conduct these, I was not prepared to give consent.

So there was negotiation right up to the last minute. The other reason for time pressure is that the Government at Westminster, in their obsession to get this legislation through, has a very tight timetable. They pushed the Bill through to the House of Lords and want it pushed through there as well.

Negotiating to get some of the changes that we wanted, clarifying issues that we were not going to get agreement on and the urgency of the Government at Westminster meant that we did not have a great deal of time to scrutinise the legislative consent motion. I was not running away from its scrutiny; I would have been quite happy for it to be scrutinised by the Committee. If there had been more time to do that, of course we would have done so.

A number of Members raised the issue of adoption. The situation is that regardless of someone marrying or entering into married or in a civil partnership in another part of the United Kingdom, once they have adopted, it is irreversible. If a same-sex marriage couple came to live in Northern Ireland, their adoption of any child would still stand in Northern Ireland. Adoption is dealt with not by my Department but by the Department of Health.

The Committee raised the question of whether we will review these changes within a three-year period. The answer is no. I have no plans to review the arrangements because I do not believe that a review is necessary. A review would be necessary only in the context of looking at whether we were going to relax the legislation further or go for same-sex marriage. I have made it clear that, as far as my party and I are concerned, and as far as the Assembly is concerned at the moment, the position is fixed: we are against same-sex marriage. So we will not carry out a pointless review of the arrangements.

Some suggested that the legislative consent motion did not go far enough and wanted us to go the whole way and allow full same-sex marriages. I have made it quite clear why I am not prepared to do that. I noticed that Mr McDevitt, in his contribution, asked why we could not have a much more mature and honest debate about the issue. Of course, other Members said that all that they want is equality for people who are gay and want to get married, etc, because it is their right and it is unfair that they do not have that opportunity. I just want to make something clear: there is a balance to be struck in all of this. It may affect a minority of people. However, I suspect that not even all those who are homosexual or lesbian would want to be married anyhow. Therefore, it affects a very small minority.

The legislation and, indeed, even its explanatory notes make it quite clear that there are serious implications for those who do not agree with the changing of the definition of marriage. Some people have talked about the protection that is afforded to ministers. First of all, I do not believe that those protections are as strong as the Government have said they are. In the explanatory notes to the Bill, it is explained that people such as florists, people who drive wedding cars, people who print the stationery and registrars who have to perform the marriage would all be affected by the legislation if they decided out of conscience that they did not want to print the stationery, drive the car, provide the flowers or be the registrar. The explanatory notes make it quite clear that those people would be breaking the law. Then, you go beyond that to include teachers, social workers and others who are in public service who take a different view of this. Of course, that is one of the reasons why I have rejected the armed forces part of the Bill. Before the legislation has gone through, we have already seen people being dismissed from post because they have posted on Facebook their opposition to some of the changes that have been proposed. The Bill has not even gone through yet. It affects a wide range of people.

Mr McDevitt: You should see what “you” are saying on Twitter tonight.

Mr Wilson: The Member cannot dismiss the discriminatory impact that that kind of legislation has on the wider community. It is for that reason that I believe that we have probably got an arrangement that, first of all, protects the position that the majority of people in Northern Ireland wish to have, namely that we do not have same-sex marriage and we do not have it imposed on us by the courts — because we would create a situation where people could easily take the matter into the courts — and that, at the same time, we do not hurt the vast majority of people, and a wide range of people, who could be swept up in the implications of the legislation.

Mr Givan: I thank the Minister for giving way. Does he share my concern — I am sure that he does; he has mentioned it — that it would be used to discriminate against those, particularly of a Christian faith, who oppose same-sex marriage and that the very people who, even in the Chamber, would argue that it needs to be done to protect the minority lesbian, gay and bisexual community would be the first to use same-sex marriage as a charter to persecute Christians in their objection to give the services that they provide?

Mr Wilson: The Member is absolutely correct. It probably does show the kind of dual standards that apply in much of the debate. The very people who shout the loudest about the discriminatory and unfair impact of that would be quite happy to see the unfair impact being imposed on other people who are not part of their charmed circle or the little group that they wish to represent, even though, as the Member has pointed out, they are, probably, the majority of people in Northern Ireland.

I recommend the legislative consent motion to the Assembly. It has the expressed support of the Executive, the Committee in its report, and I hope that it will have the support of the Assembly.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly agrees that the following provisions in the Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Bill, which relate to the treatment of same-sex marriages in Northern Ireland and gender recognition, should be considered by the UK Parliament:

- clauses 10(3), 12, 15(1) to (3) and 16;

- paragraph 2 of schedule 2; and

- schedule 5 (as introduced in the House of Commons on 24 January 2013).

Care Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr Poots (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions of the Care Bill, as introduced in the House of Lords on 9 May 2013, contained in sections 38 to 40 and schedule 1 dealing with cross-border placements; and chapter 2 of Part 3 and schedule 7 dealing with the Health Research Authority.

The Care Bill, which was introduced in Westminster on 9 May 2013, emanates from the UK Government White Paper, 'Caring For Our Future: reforming care and support', which set out a long-term programme to reform care and support in England. The Bill also takes forward many recommendations from the Law Commission report on adult social care, which concluded that existing care and support legislation is in need of updating. Essentially, the main purpose of the Care Bill is to modernise care and support law and consolidate a number of existing pieces of legislation into a single, clear statute.

Although the majority of provisions in the Care Bill apply to England only, Members will be aware that any proposed changes in a Westminster Bill that relate to a devolved matter have to be agreed by the Assembly by means of a legislative consent motion (LCM). There are two aspects of the Bill that will require an LCM. The first relates to the status of the Health Research Authority (HRA).

The Department of Health established the HRA on 1 December 2011 as a special health authority with the core purpose of protecting and promoting the interests of patients and the public in health research. The Care Bill proposes to abolish the HRA as a special health authority and establish it as non-departmental public body. The Department of Health's rationale for doing so is to give the HRA greater independence in its role of protecting and promoting the interests of patients and the public in health and social care research and to allow it to take on a wider range of functions. Among other things, the Care Bill imposes a duty on the HRA to co-operate with the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety (DHSSPS), and that will require an LCM. What is important to highlight to Members is that the proposed change to the status of the HRA will not change its relationship with Northern Ireland, nor will it affect the arrangements that currently exist between it and the DHSSPS.

The second provision requiring an LCM relates to cross-border care home placements. By "cross-border", I mean within England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. At present, health and social care trusts are prevented by law from arranging placements in care homes in England, Scotland and Wales, and those difficulties are mirrored across other UK regions. An informal extra statutory arrangement, regularised by the Department of Finance and Personnel (DFP), exists where clients are placed from Northern Ireland to elsewhere. However, the Care Bill intends to provide a clear, co-ordinated and, more importantly, a statutory basis for care home placements across the UK. In so doing, it will also provide a greater degree of personal choice for clients.

Each of the four UK countries has powers to draft subordinate legislation that would allow trusts and local authorities to place care home residents across the UK. However, efforts to secure the necessary co-ordinated approach to the drafting of subordinate legislation have not proved successful.

The Department of Health in England approached colleagues in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland with a proposal that the separate powers that the four UK countries each have to draft subordinate legislation be consolidated into the Care Bill as a means of securing the necessary co-ordinated approach.

In practical terms, the provision in the Care Bill is perhaps best explained by an example. In the case where a person receiving a care package in a care home in England is sent to Northern Ireland, the sending administration, which is England, will bear the cost of the person's care package. However, the person will ultimately be treated as a resident in the receiving administration, which is Northern Ireland, for the purposes of general entitlement to healthcare services; for example, if they have to be admitted to hospital. In short, this means that the receiving administration will have to bear the cost associated with any healthcare treatment beyond the person's agreed care package.

The Bill also includes provision to allow for the situation where there is a dispute between a local authority in England, Scotland or Wales and a health and social care trust in Northern Ireland about a person's residency to be resolved for the purposes of these provisions. The Care Bill will provide an enabling power to draft subordinate legislation within each of the four UK Administrations that will be taken forward in a co-ordinated way. The subordinate legislation will provide detail on how the cross-border arrangements will operate. It will also provide detail about the arrangements for the resolution of disputes.

I also advise Members that discussions are ongoing between the four UK Administrations with a view to introducing a clause at amendment stage to provide for temporary local support in a situation where someone is receiving a social care package in UK country other than the one that is funding their care, be it residential or non-residential, from a care provider whose business subsequently fails.

12.45 am

The proposed provisions of the Care Bill that require the consent of the Assembly will allow Northern Ireland to continue its existing relationship with the Health Research Authority under its new status and, as I said earlier, will provide a clear, co-ordinated and statutory basis for making care home placements across the UK. On that basis, I ask the Assembly to support the motion.

Ms S Ramsey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Members will be glad to know I have only 25 pages of speaking notes. I am only joking; I will be brief.

The Committee supports the motion. We took evidence on the Bill from departmental officials on 15 May, and we signed off on our report on our findings on 12 June. As the Minister said, the legislative consent motion is required in relation to two issues: the abolition of the existing Health Research Authority as a special health authority, and cross-Administration care home places. In effect, agreeing the motion will allow the Health Research Authority to continue to co-operate with and provide services for our Health Department when it becomes a non-departmental public body. Although that is a fairly technical issue, it is important nonetheless.

The more significant issue is the fact that the motion will provide a legal basis for local authorities in England, Wales, Scotland and our own health and social care trusts to meet an individual's care needs, including accommodation, anywhere within the four jurisdictions. The Committee welcomes this move because it will allow people who want to be placed in accommodation near their family or friends to do so. Many people who have left here over the years to find work may wish to return here for the latter part of their life, and it is right that people should have that choice. There should be equality for an older person whose children have all moved across to England, for example. Again, it is right that they should be provided with care in England in a place close to their family. The Committee welcomes and supports the legislative consent motion.

Mr Wells: I will be brief, which is unusual for me. The Committee has considered this legislative consent motion and is perfectly happy with its contents. I think we have all dealt with situations as constituency representatives that have featured complexity and bureaucracy that arose from people wishing to transfer their care from England to Northern Ireland or vice versa. It was always complicated. There was non-statutory provision, and it is now right and proper that the four Departments are getting together and are ironing out the difficulties through an LCM.

Legislative consent motions can often make a great deal of sense. There is no sense in reinventing the wheel, particularly when legislators in GB are taking the lead. I support this legislative consent motion.

Mr McDevitt: I am happy to echo the Minister, the Chair of the Committee and the Deputy Chair. There is strong support for regularising the situation for people who left these shores many years ago and may want to return home for their final years. The SDLP is content to support the LCM.

Mr Beggs: I, too, support the legislative consent motion. There is a major piece of legislation going through Westminster at present, and aspects of it will have implications for us, as has been mentioned. It is the wish of the English Health Minister that the Health Research Authority change its standing from a special health authority to a non-departmental public body. We cannot organise health research individually as a small region of the United Kingdom, so it is right and proper that we work with other regions of the United Kingdom to maximise the benefit of any health research. I have been told that this proposal will result in mutual benefit to each of the regions, and it will be business as usual.

The other aspect has been referred to by others. It is perhaps something that will more easily touch our constituents at some point in their lives, or someone whom they may know of. It is the aspect of someone who may have moved to England, Scotland or Wales through employment, and they may have fallen ill or had an accident and been required to go into residential care. The Bill will enable them to transfer back closer to family and friends here in Northern Ireland and enable that care to be picked up from the original health authority in which they received a package. Of course, there is a reciprocal arrangement for someone from England, Scotland or Wales who may have been working in Northern Ireland and may have lived here, and may eventually have had to receive residential care and support. That, too, will enable them to move back, if they so wish, closer to family and friends.

I am very comfortable with this legislative support motion. I express the support of the Ulster Unionist Party for it.

Mr McCarthy: The legislative consent motion may be relatively narrow in its immediate focus, but it touches on some wider and very important policy matters. The Care Bill covers a range of issues other than those addressed in this specific LCM, and it will fall to the Department, the Executive and the Assembly to further consider those as they relate to Northern Ireland.

LCMs can serve as an efficient device to more speedy action. There are some very specific aspects of Westminster Bills where there is an issue of speed or of ensuring a consistent and standardised approach across the different devolved regions of the UK. I am content with the change of governance in relation to the Health Research Authority, as has already been mentioned. The functions that it undertakes should not be lost. The need for research in the health sector and the wisdom of taking decisions based on sound scientific evidence should be clear to everyone.

The issue of adult social care is a huge one; it is of great importance to me and to the wider community. As demographic changes produce a much older population, which is welcome in many respects, we will have to significantly review and change our policies, programming and resourcing of adult social care. I acknowledge that we have had a recent Northern Ireland consultation, and I anticipate detailed discussions on our way forward.

This LCM offers the prospect of better co-ordination across the different jurisdictions, and the resourcing and support of former residents of one region who are placed in other regions. While this is welcome in principle, there remains some uncertainty, as evidenced by the last Committee session on this issue, regarding whether this will be delivered in practice and the extent to which choice over relocating to a home in another region will be facilitated.

On behalf of the Alliance Party, I support the LCM.

Mr Poots: I thank the Members who have contributed to the debate. I see that NI21 has disappeared. Perhaps NI stands for "no interest" in the health service at 1:00 am. I thank the Members who have contributed. I also express my thanks to the Health Committee for taking the time to examine the provisions of the Care Bill that require a legislative consent motion. The positive engagement that took place with the officials was very helpful in coming to this conclusion.

Without further ado, I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions of the Care Bill, as introduced in the House of Lords on 9 May 2013, contained in sections 38 to 40 and schedule 1 dealing with cross-border placements; and chapter 2 of Part 3 and schedule 7 dealing with the Health Research Authority.

Renewables Obligation (Amendment No. 2) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to move

That the draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment No. 2) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013 be approved.

This statutory rule is being made under powers contained in the Energy (Northern Ireland) Order 2003, which prescribes that this Order must be laid in draft for approval by affirmative resolution of the Assembly. The changes that I bring forward in the draft Order will amend the current Renewables Obligation Order (Northern Ireland) 2009 by introducing a six-month extension for eligible combined heat and power projects supported under the Northern Ireland Renewables Obligation (NIRO). This proposed amendment was previously introduced by the Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013, when it came into operation on 1 May 2013. However, the policy objective was not correctly translated through to the legislation as per the policy intent. I now wish to rectify this situation.

As part of the changes to the Northern Ireland renewable obligation, my Department consulted on retaining the 0.5 renewable obligation certificate (ROC) uplift for combined heat and power (CHP) projects to the end of September 2015. The uplift will cease in the rest of the United Kingdom at the end of March 2015.

The removal of the CHP uplift across all three renewables obligations coincides with the introduction of a renewable heat incentive (RHI) for large-scale biomass, meaning that once the uplift has been removed, new CHP projects will take the relevant electricity-only ROC and, subject to eligibility, the RHI.

My Department will shortly consult on an appropriate RHI tariff for biomass over 1 megawatt in Northern Ireland. Although this is intended to be in place by 1 April 2015, the proposed tariff will not be confirmed in legislation until next year. This presents a difficulty for large-scale biomass CHP projects that are already in development or nearing financial close, which may accredit after 1 April 2015 but do not yet have a clear indication of the appropriate RHI support level.

Given the longer lead-in time to introduce an RHI tariff for large-scale biomass in Northern Ireland, my Department proposes to introduce a six-month extension of the 0.5 ROC uplift until 30 September 2015 for CHP projects accrediting under the NIRO. Eligible projects, which must be commissioned and accredited under the NIRO by 30 September 2015, will receive 2 ROCs.

As currently worded in the Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013, a biomass CHP station accrediting during the extension period will only receive 1.9 ROCs and not 2 ROCs as the policy intended and for which support was received at consultation. That small difference has the ability to significantly affect the economic viability of biomass CHP stations. For that reason, this Order is required to amend the current Renewables Obligation Order (Northern Ireland) 2009 by inserting a new version of article 26 that was introduced in the May Order.

In conclusion, the amendments that are contained in this Order are designed to ensure that, in the absence of an RHI tariff, biomass CHP projects in development or nearing financial close have clear sight of support levels after 1 April 2015. It is important that we have a mix of renewable technologies in Northern Ireland and biomass can make an important contribution.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will reduce my 20-page speaking brief down to 10. I am just joking.

The Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment considered and approved the original draft Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order 2013 at its meeting on 11 April. The Committee considered the proposed Renewables Obligation (Amendment) Order at SL1 stage at its meeting on 23 May. The Committee is content that the new amendment Order does not change the policy intent of the previous Order but is being brought to correct a drafting error in the original Order that relates to the policy objective to introduce a six-month grace period/extension for biomass combined heat and power projects. The original Order does not allow this policy objective to be implemented as intended.

The Committee was, therefore, content to approve the new amendment Order at its meeting on 13 June so that the error can be corrected.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Chair for outlining the Committee's position. The Order introduces a change that will ensure that those who are investing considerable sums of money in biomass CHP projects now have clear sight of support levels in 2015 given the lead-in time for such projects. It will allow the NIRO to continue to adapt to the needs of industry. It will also ensure investor confidence, which is what we want. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Speaker's Business

Public Petition: 'Magee Expansion: Time to Make it Happen'

Mr Speaker: Ms Maeve McLaughlin has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes to speak on the subject matter.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to present this public petition to the Assembly. It calls for the expansion of the Magee campus of the University of Ulster, and it will also be formally presented to the Minister for Employment and Learning.

As has been well noted, the expansion of Magee is central to the economic regeneration of Derry and the wider north-west region. Despite the economic analysis conducted by Oxford Economics, the plans by the lobby group University for Derry, the launch of Magee's plans in January 2009 and the sign-off of the One Plan two years ago this month, we still have not seen a robust business case submitted to the Department. Despite the university's expansion being identified as a key catalyst programme for Derry and the region, fewer than 4,000 students have been added to the university rolls in the past 28 years. Since the expansion proposals were announced in June 2001, when there were in excess of 3,000 students, the enrolment now sits at 4,466.

The petition, therefore, calls on the Department for Employment and Learning and the University of Ulster to expand Magee by increasing student numbers, widening the range of courses offered and building a bigger campus. The petition was signed by thousands of people from all walks of life across the North and the north-west. That is clear evidence, if ever we needed it, that, whatever our differences, we can unite and get behind the Magee expansion project.

Now that the petition has been signed and the message sent, what next? The University of Ulster must develop that business case if Magee's expansion is to be taken seriously by any credible funder. If an organisation wants to spend public money on as much as a box of paper clips, it must write a business case. A business case is a detailed document that includes an economic appraisal plus other material about the context of the proposed investment. Government cannot and should not make a decision to fund a project unless there is a business case. Unfortunately, the University of Ulster has only a strategic development plan, which is a very brief preliminary document introducing the basic project concept and identifying key issues at the earliest stages of project development. It is a step before the business case and therefore not the business case.

People in our city and region remember too well the campaign for the university in Derry. We owe it to the young people to stop the brain drain and provide the types, numbers and quality of courses that are linked to the economy and ensure that future generations are afforded the choice of education and employment in the north-west region.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: I will forward the petition to the Minister for Employment and Learning and send a copy to the Chair of the Committee.

Ministerial Statements

British-Irish Council: Summit (21 June 2013)

Mr P Robinson (The First Minister): In accordance with the requirements of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following statement on the 20th summit meeting of the British-Irish Council (BIC). The summit was hosted by the Northern Ireland Executive and took place at the Magee campus of the University of Ulster on 21 June. All Executive Ministers who attended the summit have agreed that I should make this statement to the Assembly on their behalf.

The deputy First Minister and I were pleased to welcome the heads of delegation from the other BIC member Administrations to the summit. The United Kingdom Government were led by the Deputy Prime Minister, the Rt Hon Nick Clegg MP. The Irish Government delegation was led by an Taoiseach, Mr Enda Kenny TD, and the Scottish Government by First Minister, the Rt Hon Alex Salmond MSP. First Minister, the Rt Hon Carwyn Jones AM, led the Welsh delegation. The Government of Jersey were led by the Chief Minister, Senator Ian Gorst, and the Government of Guernsey by the Chief Minister, Deputy Peter Harwood. Finally, the Isle of Man Government were led by Chief Minister, Hon Allan Bell MHK.

In addition to the deputy First Minister and me, the Northern Ireland Executive were represented by Arlene Foster MLA, Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment; Carál Ní Chuilín MLA, Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure; Danny Kennedy MLA, Minister for Regional Development; Alex Attwood MLA, Minister of the Environment; and David Ford MLA, Minister of Justice. A full list of participants is attached to the statement that has been provided to Members.

The summit again underlined the British-Irish Council's unique and important role in furthering, promoting and developing links between its member Administrations through positive, practical relationships and in providing a forum for consultation and exchange of information on matters of mutual interest within the competence of the relevant member Administrations.

The Council welcomed the hosting of the summit in Londonderry during the city's tenure as UK City of Culture 2013. In recognition of the significance of the occasion and of the development of a formal Council work stream on the creative industries, the first item on the agenda was a presentation to the Council by Shona McCarthy, chief executive of the Derry/Londonderry Culture Company. The presentation highlighted the social, community and economic benefits to the north-west arising from Londonderry's selection as the first UK City of Culture, as it aims to act as a catalyst for building the economy and delivering a lasting legacy for the people of the city and surrounding area. The Council then had a useful question-and-answer session in which support and advice based on the Derry/Londonderry experience was offered to those English, Scottish and Welsh cities now shortlisted to be the next UK City of Culture.

Recognising the significant social, economic and other benefits arising from the creative industries, and in line with a previous proposal from the Government of Jersey, the Council agreed to establish a new BIC creative industries work sector to further share best practice and to consider areas for collaboration. The new work sector will be led by the Government of Jersey. The Council requested that the new work sector and the secretariat should prepare a work programme for approval at the next summit to be held in Jersey in November 2013.

The Council discussed the current economic situation in each member Administration. This has been a regular item on the BIC summit agenda, and the discussions on this occasion indicated that while all Administrations continue to experience difficulties in some specific sectors, they are, in general, less pessimistic about the economic outlook than in previous years. Nevertheless, it was the universal view that there remains no room for complacency and that efforts must continue to be made to address the consequences of the economic downturn.

The Council also recognised the common challenges of moving to low-carbon energy sources to reduce greenhouse gas emissions while ensuring security of supply at a pace that minimises the impact on low-income families and business competitiveness.

The Council considered the policies that are being implemented to enhance investment in diversity in energy generation at large central and small local scales. It also considered how these policies might encourage profitable investment in energy efficiency while stimulating more energy security, job creation and supply chain development.

The Council referenced the continuing importance of the all-islands approach, which was agreed by the Council in 2011, to enable opportunities for commercial generation and transmission and to facilitate the cost-effective exploitation of renewable energy resources.

The Council reviewed the latest position on youth unemployment across the member Administrations. In line with commitments at previous summits, the Council recognised the need to consider the full range of instruments that are available at national, British-Irish Council and European levels to generate employment opportunities for young people and to intervene at the earliest opportunity to ensure that young people do not become long-term unemployed. The Council therefore agreed with a proposal by Senator Ian Gorst, Chief Minister of Jersey, that the next summit in Jersey should have youth unemployment as one of its themes.

The Council received an update on the work that has taken place across each of the Council's eleven work sectors since the previous summit in November 2012. The Council noted the secretariat's progress against its business plan and, recognising the economic constraints affecting all member Administrations and the efficiencies made in the previous financial year, approved a 20% reduction in the budget of the secretariat for 2013-14. It endorsed the publication of the first BIC annual report, covering the calendar year 2011. We will place a copy of the BIC annual report in the Assembly Library.

Finally, the Council noted that the next BIC summit would be hosted by the Government of Jersey in November 2013 and agreed that it would focus on youth employment and the new creative industries work sector.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I understand that this was the 20th summit of the British-

Irish Council. What does the First Minister believe to be its greatest achievement?

Mr P Robinson: If the Member looks at the statement he will see immediately that the greatest achievement is the sharing of information and learning from the experiences of others on things that we should and should not do. I believe that it is a useful gathering of the leaders of the various Administrations in the British Isles, and I hope that I will get full encouragement from my unionist colleagues to maintain that east-west link, just as others will be encouraging us to maintain North/South links.

Mr G Robinson: I thank the First Minister for his statement. As a relative newcomer to a focus on the creative industries, how do we compare with other, more established BIC regions in that regard?

Mr P Robinson: First, when we talk about the creative industries in Northern Ireland there is a tendency to think immediately of film and television. Of course, the creative industries go much further than that into music, digital work and even architecture. However, the trendy side of it, which is the film and television industry, was at a very low level when devolution occurred. That has built up very significantly in Northern Ireland, and we are now recognised as a centre that major television and film producers should be looking at.

We are glad that we are now moving into a fourth season of 'Game of Thrones' for HBO, and we are pleased that Universal is coming to make 'Dracula' here. I might suggest that there are one or two bloodsuckers that might be found somewhere to get bit parts in that film. There is a range of other television opportunities; 'The Fall' is experiencing rave reviews, and I am glad to see that it is going into a further season as well.

We can see how it has been building up. Indeed, the HBO television series has created something like 700 or 800 jobs in Northern Ireland, so there is a massive opportunity.

Education is not just about what you know; it is about what you can do. This is a real opportunity for people to show what they can do through the creative industries.

10.45 am

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. Will he expand on his discussions on youth unemployment and reassure us that that issue will continue to feature on the clár of the BIC meetings?

Mr P Robinson: There is an overall feeling that youth unemployment is far too high. Relatively speaking, Northern Ireland is in the bottom quarter when it comes to the youth unemployment rates of European countries, but it is something that we need to pay a lot of attention to. Outside the youth unemployment figures, we have a very large section of young people who fall into the economically inactive category, the not in education, employment or training (NEET) category. That is one of the reasons why the deputy First Minister and I brought forward the proposal for 10,000 placements for young people who are NEET.

We are active in that area, and it has been agreed that it will be the focus of our September summit in Jersey. There is a lot of evidence on the issue. The statistics for the United Kingdom show that Scotland has a much lower level of youth unemployment than anywhere else, so perhaps there are lessons that we can pick up from Scotland. Northern Ireland comes next on the list, with a lower rate than England and Wales.

Mr Eastwood: I welcomed seeing the British-Irish Council in Derry. We in Derry are happy to teach anybody any lessons, whether they are about culture or anything else.

Given the north-west gateway initiative and the understanding in the One Plan that university expansion and higher numbers of university places in that region is essential to economic development, what conversations have the First Minister's Executive colleagues and their colleagues in the Irish Government had about trying to bring that about?

Mr P Robinson: As the Member would expect, we have not had conversations on this issue at the BIC. In the Executive, we have had conversations on the matter, although it is probably more appropriate that the Employment and Learning Minister deals with the issue rather than me.
