Mr Speaker: Before we start today's proceedings, I confirm that I have received a communication in writing from OFMDFM requesting that its Question Time slot at 2.00 pm be deleted from today's business. I am sure that Members will understand the circumstances. At this point, I will also take the opportunity, on behalf of the entire House, to wish Mr Peter Robinson, the First Minister, well and a speedy and full recovery.

Welfare Reform Bill: Final Stage

Mr Speaker: As a valid petition of concern was presented on Friday 22 May in relation to the passing of the Bill, the vote will be on a cross-community basis.

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That the Welfare Reform Bill [NIA 13/11-15] do now pass.

Before proceeding, first of all, I express our sincere thoughts, best wishes and prayers to the First Minister and my party leader, Peter Robinson. We continue to remember Peter at this time, as well as Iris and the family, and we trust and pray that Peter will make a speedy recovery.

No one knows more than I how much we depend upon the ability of our First Minister and my party leader. During all the discussions over the last number of weeks and months, he has been a tower of strength and has been by our side, and I want to personally say that we miss him in the Chamber today. This debate will be the worse for not having him with us as we proceed.

Over the last few weeks, welfare reform has never been far from public consciousness. Much of that has been due to media speculation surrounding our lack of progress and the ramifications that that could have for these institutions and, more importantly, for wider society. As Minister with responsibility for these matters, I feel that it is incumbent on me to say a few words to put today's proceedings into context and to underline my personal commitment, and that of my party, to Members to oversee the implementation of welfare reform measures contained in the Bill together with the schemes of mitigation agreed by the five main parties at Stormont Castle in order to deliver the best possible welfare system for all the citizens of Northern Ireland into the future.

I think that we all recognise that the Bill sets a new and very different course for our welfare systems. No one could possibly argue with the overarching policy intent to reach out to individuals who have become detached from the rest of society and who are, too often, trapped in a state of worklessness and benefit dependency as well as to ensure that our system is fair to the taxpayers who fund it and is sustainable into the future. The Bill represents a concept and a contract with individuals and families who are in need of support. For those who are able to work, we believe fundamentally that work should always pay, and, for the most vulnerable in society, we believe that our welfare system should provide the support that they need.

Those are the basic principles upon which our welfare state was founded, and, in bringing forward this legislation, it was those basic principles that received support from a wide range of stakeholders during the legislative passage of the Bill to this stage. Similarly, it was the engagement of political parties at Stormont Castle in December that helped me to frame not only this legislation but the package of mitigating measures that parties have agreed are essential in order that we do not lose sight of those principles. We can debate the levels of support that are needed and provided as, indeed, we have done during the fraught passage of the Bill, and that is only right, given that the cost of social security benefit in Northern Ireland is in the order of £5 billion per annum. I believe that, if we adhere to the two fundamental principles that work pays and that the welfare system supports, we will go some distance in providing a better welfare system.

As elected representatives, we have a responsibility to ensure that the hard-earned contribution of taxpayers is sufficiently recognised in how we deliver welfare to the wider population. It is undoubtedly a fact that we all, as elected representatives, would like to do more for those impacted by these reforms and who are dependent on social security benefits. That much is evident from the amount of time and the extent of debate that the Assembly has given to the Welfare Reform Bill. However, I firmly believe that the time for talking is now over. I believe that now is the time for decisions and for getting on with the implementation of reforms. Unfortunately, the fiscal reality for Northern Ireland is that we cannot afford a more expansive and expensive welfare system than the rest of the UK. If we spend more on benefits, the harsh reality is that we will have less to spend on schools, hospitals and all the other public services that we rely on. I believe that, with the mitigation schemes that we have negotiated with DWP, Her Majesty's Treasury and internally in our own political structures, we have achieved that balance between mitigating measures in the Bill and spending on public services for Northern Ireland.

It may also be helpful to some Members if I can provide assurances that claimants will be supported throughout the reform process. As Minister with responsibility for the voluntary and community sector, I understand and value the work carried out by the independent advice sector in providing support and guidance to many people in Northern Ireland, particularly when they are at their most vulnerable. On a daily basis, benefit uptake officers in the Social Security Agency (SSA) see the value of that service when they regularly signpost claimants to the advice sector for advice and support on debt or money issues. However, I also acknowledge that, whilst front-line Social Security Agency staff do, on occasions, refer claimants to the advice sector, there is not an agreed process currently in agency guidance.

I want to ensure that the statutory and voluntary sectors work closely together when welfare reform is implemented. I have asked the agency to put in place a process whereby all claimants who would benefit from advice and/or support on debt or money issues will be signposted to the advice sector. It is important that that is introduced into the guidance for decision-makers, particularly those delivering the discretionary support scheme.

I also want to promote the role of the advice sector during the process of the implementation of welfare reform to ensure that claimants understand that independent support and advice is available to support them. The programme of information that my Department will be launching to support welfare reform will include elements that will promote the role of the independent advice sector.

The move towards a system of universal credit (UC), which is designed as an in-work and out-of-work benefit, sits at the heart of the Welfare Reform Bill. The concept of a universal credit was supported and seen as a progressive change by a wide range of stakeholders during the Bill's passage. By the time universal credit is fully implemented, it is anticipated that 37,000 households will be either newly taking up or taking up more benefit as a result of universal credit and that an overall increase in entitlements of approximately £39 million per annum will accrue. A package of transitional protection will ensure that there are no cash losers as a direct result of the managed migration to universal credit where claimants' circumstances remain the same. Universal credit will also tackle other barriers to individuals taking up work, such as providing support for childcare costs, therefore encouraging lone parents to work.

Another issue that was raised was the social sector size criteria, or the bedroom tax as it has become widely known. Members will be aware that my party and I have continually opposed the bedroom tax, and we have secured Executive agreement to measures that will protect current and future tenants from any financial impact of the bedroom tax, initially for the entire period of the new Government.

The Executive recognise that I also have to balance protecting claimants from any negative aspects of the bedroom tax with ensuring the best use of the social housing stock in Northern Ireland and have agreed that I should develop a scheme that protects existing and future tenants from any reduction in housing benefits for their tenancies unless there is a significant change in their personal circumstances or they are offered suitable alternative accommodation.

At Consideration Stage and, again, at Further Consideration Stage, Members may recall there was also a great deal of discussion around the outworkings of the five-party talks held at Stormont Castle in December. Those talks resulted in an agreement to fund a package of mitigating measures to alleviate some of the harsher impacts of various welfare reform provisions.

Let me also put on record my commitment, my party's commitment and that of my party leader to make the necessary resources available to fund the package of measures that the five parties agreed at Stormont Castle. Let us remember that it was a five-party agreement. I have been disappointed in some in the House who want now, almost like Pontius Pilate, to wring their hands and almost to cleanse their conscience as though, somehow, they had not signed on the dotted line. Today, the people of Northern Ireland need to understand very clearly that it was a five-party agreement.

Members will be aware of the subsequent debate on the detail of the mitigating schemes. I reiterate to Members that I believe that we have now attained the balance between what, in an ideal world, we would like to do and what we can afford to do. The schemes agreed between the five main parties of the Assembly will offer additional protections to many. There have been a lot of negative comments about claimant groups not being protected and the marginalised being ignored.

Let us reflect on what was proposed in the Stormont Castle Agreement. For disabled people, a disability protection scheme is proposed to help them to transition from disability living allowance (DLA) to the new personal independence payment (PIP). This will provide for a payment equivalent to up to one year's full DLA payment for people who are unsuccessful in claiming PIP, and it will also guarantee claimants who will receive less under PIP 75% of the shortfall for up to four years. The scheme will also offer victims and survivors who do not qualify for PIP the opportunity to make a claim for a similar payment.

For all benefit claimants and families on low working income, there will be a new system of financial help when they have a financial crisis. This will be related to the levels of minimum wage, and the Executive have agreed to maintain the funding for this service.

For people who might be impacted by the bedroom tax, now or in the future, there will be full protection from any cuts in housing benefit.

For all working-age families receiving universal credit, there will be flexibility in how frequently they receive their benefit and in making direct payments to social landlords. We will also ensure that universal credit payments are made to the main carer in cases where there is concern about the impact of single payments to households.

Finally, I turn to the supplementary payment scheme, which has, in some way, led to today's position. This scheme provides all claimant commitments with full protection. These claimants are families with children, the long-term sick and adults and children with disabilities. It is not accurate for some to claim that my party and I do not support providing protection for those groups. As Members proceed in the debate, I ask them always to be very mindful of the words that they use and the impact that they create on those whom they claim to support and defend. Generalisations often miss the facts and cover the reality of what goes on daily to provide help and support for our many vulnerable and disadvantaged people

The issue is what we can afford and what is deliverable for people who do not currently claim social security benefits. In those cases, we have offered financial support to claimant groups that can show that they are in financial crisis. I believe that our approach has been fair, legal, affordable and deliverable.

Let us remember that those were the criteria that were set out by the First Minister. That was the challenge that was given to the parties over the last number of days. If they had any suggestions, ideas, amendments or proposals, those would have to be within the parameters of what was set out as being legal, affordable and deliverable. It is for others to reflect on the impact of their proposals on the rest of Northern Ireland's public services.

We have come a long way. When we set out on this journey, people said that we could not change things. My predecessor Nelson McCausland negotiated a package of measures, which were the envy of many other jurisdictions. I have heard that said in conferences and in discussions with other persons from the rest of the United Kingdom.

We have now gone further. The welfare reform system that the Bill will bring in is not that of the UK Government. It is distinctly different: it is made in Northern Ireland. Contrary to what is being said, it provides much greater support for adults with disabilities, for children with disabilities, for families with children and for those who are long-term sick. It not only protects existing claimants but ensures that support is available for future claimants covered by the supplementary payment scheme for suffering financial crisis, which is a direct consequence of the changes. It also protects current and future tenants from the financial impact of the bedroom tax.

This is not simply an aspiration. We are putting substantial resources into this. Over the next three years, our proposals will mean that those in need will receive over £200 million more than they would have received under the GB scheme. In UK terms, that is the equivalent of £6 billion. That demonstrates how far we have gone to offset the harsher effects of the UK Government's reforms. That demonstrates how we have ensured that we have negotiated what we believe is best for Northern Ireland. However, there is only so much that we can reasonably do. We need to strike a balance between welfare and other services on which we all, including those receiving benefits, rely. We cannot and should not focus on the welfare system without taking into account the impact on other services, including our health service, our education service and services for our children and young people.

A tremendous responsibility rests on the House today. It is a question of choice: either we adopt the Bill and secure the real additional benefits associated with our proposals for the most vulnerable in our society, or we do not and instead give way to what will be an immensely worse outcome for those whom we serve.

I place on record my gratitude to the Chair and members of the Social Development Committee for their work. To Members of the House, I say this: we have disagreed, debated and negotiated, but there has been in-depth scrutiny of the Bill, much of which has been positive. Much has been achieved, which involved hard work.

I say to those Members who signed the petition of concern: you will have to explain to the people whom you represent why you have failed to ensure that you protected their best interests and that their welfare was at the heart of your actions. I believe that my party colleagues and I, with those who support the Bill, can justify that we have endeavoured in all good faith.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am disappointed by the allegations made by the party opposite that, somehow, I misled the House and withheld papers and that my officials were involved in some sort of clandestine operation. I want to make it very clear, without any equivocation, that I have expended every effort, all avenues and all possibilities. I pay tribute to my officials, who have worked extensively before Christmas, during Christmas, after Christmas and up until today to ensure that we got an agreement. Others need to ask why that was not enough. I move the Bill.

Ms P Bradley: I rise to speak in favour of the Final Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill. I thank the Minister for bringing it forward, and I thank him for his opening comments.

I believe that when we, as Members, were elected to the Assembly, the public entrusted us to protect the best interests of all society, including the vulnerable, and also to ensure that we maintain good financial control. Often, this is a difficult balancing act, and it involves making some very difficult and unpopular decisions to ensure the long-term viability of this region of the United Kingdom. Both the Republic of Ireland and other regions in the United Kingdom have seen austerity measures being put in place. Welfare systems in both jurisdictions have been overhauled to reflect the different economic landscape that we find ourselves in today. In my view, the Stormont Castle agreement, along with the various measures negotiated, as the Minister said, by my party colleague Nelson McCausland, endeavoured to protect those who may be hit worst by welfare reform. As the Minister also stated, all Executive parties sitting around the Chamber agreed to that.

I find that some people sitting in the Chamber today are completely arrogant to the fact that, for some reason, the economic realities of this present economic world do not apply to Northern Ireland. That astounds me. I believe that the Stormont Castle agreement was the best compromise between facing our responsibilities as elected representatives and protecting the most vulnerable of our electorate. The welfare system was developed from an ideology to help those who could not help themselves; it was designed to be a hand-up and not a handout. Unfortunately, over the years, our system has evolved into one where claimants are finding that they are better off out of work than they are in it and where young people are so disillusioned that they now view the welfare state as almost a career choice. We are bombarded with TV shows that depict those who have made a clear choice to live off the taxpayer. The welfare system cannot sustain that, and, more importantly, people who genuinely need help find themselves tarred with the same brush and feeling a stigma about accepting the help that they, of course, so genuinely need.

I believe that the supplementary payment scheme in the Stormont Castle agreement will protect those whom the system is designed to help, while those who are capable of supporting themselves will find added impetus to do so. We have invested so much in providing jobs and training that people should not have an excuse for being able to do nothing. When I was growing up, the mantra was that if you were not earning you were learning. This is not a witch-hunt but a wake-up call. If we do not pass the Bill, we could see a collapse of our institution and a possible return to direct rule, which will mean that welfare reform will be brought in as it has in the rest of the United Kingdom, with no protection for those with disabilities, those who are ill and those with children.

We have a moral duty to accept the Bill, with the supplementary payment scheme, as agreed. We have to step up to the mark and be leaders to protect the most vulnerable.

11.00 am

Mr M McGuinness: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. First of all, I extend my warmest best wishes to the First Minister, Peter Robinson, for a speedy recovery. I want to make it clear that we have in our thoughts and prayers Iris and the rest of the family.

I have worked with Peter for the last eight years in the Office of First and deputy First Minister. Throughout all that time, even though we have different political allegiances and sometimes different political opinions about how we take our work forward, we have never had anything other than a good personal relationship. Of course, there have been commentators out there who, every time they get the opportunity, try to portray relationships here as poisonous and as though people hate each other and so forth. In terms of my relationship with Peter, nothing could be further from the truth. So, it was with great concern that I learned yesterday morning that he had taken ill and been brought to Dundonald hospital and then on to the Royal Victoria Hospital. I think that he has made a major contribution to the progress that we have made here over the last eight years. It is a source of great concern that someone like him could be hospitalised with the illness that he is dealing with. We are very sincerely and genuinely concerned, and we hope that he will recover from this and be back in his job.

Obviously, we are dealing today with very important matters in whether we are going to move forward in the Assembly to ensure that, in our deliverance for citizens, we deal with that on the basis of the huge challenges that we all face against the backdrop of the changes that have occurred in recent times. There is a big focus today on welfare. Obviously, the British Government's approach to welfare is a source of great concern, but this is not just about welfare — this is bigger than the issue of welfare. Sometimes I think that, even within the media and people commenting on the predicament that we find ourselves in, you would almost think that it was the only problem that we face. Our concern is wider and is about the grave implications of the further cuts threatened by the Tories as part of a £25 billion reduction that will be outlined in the July Budget. Obviously, our concern has to be about what proportion of that will affect us.

These cuts, which have been described as “eye-watering” by Tories themselves, will affect the most vulnerable and will lead to the loss of thousands of jobs in vital front-line services in areas such as health and education. They also formed absolutely no part whatsoever of the Stormont House Agreement. Last week I spoke to someone who was in Downing Street and who spoke to key officials there. He said that only one word could describe what is coming down the tracks at us in July. The word that he used, which was not mine but his, was “brutal”.

This week we are facing into a building crisis in the political institutions here in the North. The immediate difficulties that we are facing into have been triggered by the decision to bring to the Assembly the welfare Bill, which, in my opinion, does not implement the protections agreed at Stormont House and subsequently for children with disabilities, adults with severe disabilities, the long-term sick and large families.

Capitulating to pressure and demands from the Tories in London is, in my view, a major tactical error. However, the crisis we are facing, and I say this to all the parties in the Assembly, is not of the making of any of the parties here or in the Executive. The crisis has been created by the austerity agenda of a Tory Administration in London that is attempting to decimate our public services and punish the most vulnerable people in our society.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr M McGuinness: No, I will not give way. In the recent elections, Sinn Féin stood against Tory austerity and for social justice and equality. Our approach was mandated by over 176,000 voters, almost 25% of the popular vote. In contrast, the Tories received only 9,000 votes in the North, just over 1% of the vote. Chris Hazzard got more votes in South Down than the 16 Tory candidates who stood in the Westminster elections in the North. It is a party that does not have a single Assembly seat or local council seat. They have no democratic mandate for their austerity policies here in the North of Ireland, yet they have already taken £1.5 billion from the Executive's block grant.

The British Government's Cabinet of Tory millionaires has announced plans for further eye-watering cuts of £25 billion to our public services and our welfare protections for people with disabilities, the long-term sick and large families. Those new cuts are set to begin almost immediately, and they will devastate our core public services. In meetings that the party leaders attended last week, they will know that I challenged the British Secretary of State Theresa Villiers on two occasions for a breakdown of how that £25 billion raid would impact on the people of the North. She refused point blank to tell me. She told us that we would have to wait for the July Budget. Here we are, talking about vital budgetary matters affecting the future of our people, and we are being told by the Secretary of State that we have to wait until the Chancellor of the Exchequer announces the July Budget before we will know the implications of where the axe is going to fall on vital front-line services delivered by our Departments and of welfare cuts impacting on people who have already been threatened by the Tory welfare cuts agenda.

Of course, it also raises the question as to what is coming down the tracks at us in July. It will even impact on the negotiations that took place during the course of Stormont House in relation to alleviating the plight of those who would be affected by the welfare cuts. There is all sorts of speculation about taxing carers' allowance and taxing welfare recipients. From our perspective, we need to get everything that we are doing here into kilter with the need to ensure that what is coming down the tracks from the British Government in July is fed into our planning for the delivery of vital services for people in the future.

The approach of the Secretary of State and the British Government in relation to the refusal to tell us how that is going to impact on us — indeed, we are not the only people who are not being told; they are not even telling people in England thus far — is absolutely unacceptable. We made it very clear in our election manifesto that the Executive need a viable Budget for front-line public services and welfare protections for the most vulnerable. Sinn Féin will not support a welfare Bill that does not contain those protections, and we will not be part of any agenda that punishes the poor and dismantles public services.

In my view, the measure of any society, and, indeed, of any Government, is how it treats those most in need and those who are most vulnerable.

Mr Humphrey: Will the deputy First Minister give way?

Mr M McGuinness: No, I will not give way. In the face of such devastating Tory cuts, our public services, our welfare system, our Departments and the Executive are, in my opinion, not sustainable. None of the Executive parties stood on a platform of implementing those Tory cuts, and Sinn Féin will not abandon children with disabilities, adults with severe disabilities, families with children and the long-term sick. That is why we moved a petition of concern to stop the passage of the welfare Bill, and I welcome the fact that the SDLP has supported our position.

It has always been my view that the outstanding issues in the Welfare Reform Bill can be resolved, but this requires political will from all parties in the Assembly to protect the most vulnerable. Make no mistake about it: the biggest threat to our political institutions remains the ongoing Tory austerity agenda of cuts to our public services and the welfare state. This is a time when the Executive parties need to stand together to defend our public services, particularly in health, education and welfare. We need to stand up for the people who elect us rather than acting in the interests of a Tory elite. We need an immediate negotiation with the British Government for a Budget which protects our public services and for fiscal powers to give us control over our economy.

Of course, we are not alone in our battle against austerity. I note that the Scottish First Minister, Nicola Sturgeon, will today make an important anti-austerity and anti-cuts speech. Of course, they are on the right side of the argument. They are on the right side of history. I appeal to all Assembly parties to join them. The Scottish Executive have requested a tripartite meeting of the representatives of the Scottish, Welsh and local assemblies. We should take up this offer and develop a common position in the Executive and with the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly in opposition to Tory austerity. The current crisis has come about solely through the actions of the British Government. It can be resolved only by the actions of the British Government. They have attacked the most vulnerable in society, slashed the Budget for public services and undermined the credibility of these institutions.

We in Sinn Féin are clear on what needs to happen. It is the platform that we stood on in the recent election: protections for the most vulnerable; a workable Budget; and powers to grow the economy and create employment. We believe these are the aims that all parties could and should unite around. Sinn Féin has worked and maintained the institutions over the past eight years in the face of great provocation and attack. Power sharing, partnership and devolution are the only ways forward. These principles are the basis of the institutions here in the North. Any undermining of these basic principles by the actions of the British Government or parties will be unacceptable.

What the people require is an Assembly that delivers and has the Budget and powers to make a difference in people's lives. There is still time for the parties and the British Government to change tack and deliver a new Budget that delivers for our public services, economy and people. If a choice has to be made between standing side by side with the Tories or standing up for people here, our economy and public services, I know what side Sinn Féin will be on.

Mrs D Kelly: Many people have attempted to set the context of the debate in a much broader range of positioning and recent agreements than is the case. I think that we have to remember that where we are today with austerity measures is not just because of the ideological position of the Tory party, which, as the deputy First Minister rightly said, has got no mandate here in the North, but because of the more recent crash in the banking regulation sector. We are asking the most vulnerable people in our society to pick up the bill. We ought to remember that in setting the context of the Welfare Reform Bill debate. We do not want to be complicit in the Tory party's morally unjustifiable attack on the most vulnerable and marginalised. There has to be a much broader debate about what type of society we wish to create and live in.

Whilst I was canvassing during the recent election, I was struck by the number of people who are at home all day, having had to give up not only their jobs but a large part of their life to care for others. As you all know, we have an increasingly ageing population. I met a number of people on the doorsteps who are caring for family members who have dementia or indeed have had a stroke and who are still on long waiting lists for adaptations and home improvements. There is little help from others; certainly not from the public sector because there is just not the money to provide that help. That is something that struck right at the heart of me, particularly as I came from a health and social care background. It is those very people, who look after the most vulnerable in society, whom the Tories wish to attack further, if we are to believe their leaked manifesto and budgetary commitments, in which they talked about taxing disability living allowance.

We have not come to our decisions lightly. It ought to be remembered that the SDLP, along with the Ulster Unionist Party and the Green Party, sought to amend the Bill. Over 30 amendments were tabled and rejected by the DUP and Sinn Féin. In fact, the DUP lodged a petition of concern against those amendments, so, rather than us going to Sinn Féin's position, we welcome Sinn Féin following us on welfare reform. I recall that, on the day, we warned Sinn Féin that the bedroom tax was, courtesy of its votes, in the Bill. We hear much today about how we risk losing the mitigation powers for the worst excesses of the bedroom tax, but that is not the case. Scotland has already mitigated the bedroom tax in its delivery of welfare reform.

My party colleagues and I wish the First Minister a speedy recovery. I hope and pray that he makes a good recovery and that his family are supported. As someone whose family have suffered a recent illness, I know the stress that it causes and the effect that it has on the wider family circle. We certainly wish him a good and full recovery. Nonetheless, a few months back, Mr Robinson and, I believe, the Finance Minister were allowed by the deputy First Minister to go off and make a deal at Westminster. That is against the joint nature of the office, and the deputy First Minister could have referred the matter to the Attorney General had he chosen to do so, but he did not. He allowed the First Minister to go off and do his own deal. It was out of those meetings that, we strongly suspect, welfare reform was coupled with the block grant. We feel that we have had a gun put to our head — metaphorically speaking, thankfully — with the threat of fines. The British Government should remove that threat. That is the first thing that they should do.

In their approach to the North of Ireland, this British Government are the most partisan that we have seen in 20 years. In fact, they have threatened to breach the Good Friday Agreement with their proposals on the Human Rights Act and the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). We will not stand for that. We will take whatever action is necessary to fight against that, including redress to the courts if need be. I welcome the intervention of Charlie Flanagan, the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Trade in the South, on that, as well as the Irish Government's robust stand and their challenge to the British Government.

We have been asked to vote for a Bill that we do support and that we had sought to amend. In the recent correspondence that has now been shared with all the parties, I note that other parties shared our concern. On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, Mike Nesbitt registered his protest at the side deals that have been a feature of this Administration and were a feature of the previous Administration, in which Sinn Féin and the DUP are and were the two largest parties. As we have seen all too often, those side deals start to unravel. They are seldom in the interests of all the people right across the community in Northern Ireland and, indeed, are very often in those parties' political interests.

Therefore, over the past week, we have — for the first time, in some cases — had access to some of the papers being exchanged between the DUP and Sinn Féin.

I, like many others, do not know why Sinn Féin was so slow to pick up that the vulnerable — people with disabilities, children with disabilities, and the long-term sick — would not be protected under the Welfare Reform Bill, because those were some of the very amendments that we sought to enshrine in the legislation. We wanted those in statute, not in guidance or regulations. We wanted to make sure that that was part of the type of society that we wished to create and part of the type of protections that we wished to give to those same people.

My party and I recognise the difficulties in setting a Budget and the time constraints that we work within, but it is not yet too late for all parties to get around the same table and thrash out the concerns about welfare reform that we each have. Therefore I ask the DUP to consider the time frame again and whether it would be in the best interests of us all to have a mature negotiation in which all of the parties are included all of the time.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I will.

Mr Storey: If the narrative that the Member is painting to the House and to the public is the case, then why did her party, along with the four other parties, sign the Stormont Castle agreement? Let us be very clear: all the information was available to everybody in the room. I ensured that the most senior civil servants were available: the head of the Northern Ireland Civil Service was there; the head of the Social Security Agency was there; and all the relevant information was there. Why did we have an agreement and why, today, does that agreement lie in tatters?

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his intervention, because it allows me the opportunity to state, again, that we reserved the right to amend. My party tabled numerous amendments, which were petitioned against. Was that the best use of a petition of concern — to petition against amendments — if you were going to seriously listen to our concerns? You cannot have it every way. You cannot say to us, "Let's have a mature debate, let's hear your concerns" and then petition against them so that they are chucked out and do not stand any reasonable chance of being heard or being reflected in the legislation.

There are others who, over the last few days, have spoken to the SDLP about our responsibilities in protecting the institutions. They have said that, once again, the SDLP should bear the full and heavy load for others. And, yes, I am proud to say that the SDLP as a political party puts the needs of the people and the institutions before our own political well-being on many occasions. This time, however, we are fed up with the side deals and the bad grace that often persists between Sinn Féin and the DUP from which we all have to suffer. If it was not for the photo ops, we would seldom see them working in unison for the good of the people.

We are asking Members to reflect on what role they have played in the Stormont House Agreement and welfare reform and to reflect on why we have a loss of confidence in the British Government, which, as you know, will be responsible for bringing forward the other aspects of the Stormont House Agreement: parades and dealing with the past. The SDLP is concerned about how that will be brought about at Westminster, and that is why we have a lack of confidence.

The welfare reform debate is about protecting the vulnerable — protecting children and families — but it was SDLP MPs, such as my colleague Alasdair McDonnell and others, who voted against the welfare and benefit caps and sought to amend many of those amendments at Westminster, unlike some other parties. Here, too, we will defend those who are most in need of a voice.

Others talk about the Tories and making work pay. I think that we could all subscribe to that value or belief, but what are we seeing? We are seeing zero-hour contracts, agency workers and temporary jobs. We are seeing an erosion of many of the rights and entitlements that workers have fought for over the past 100 years, including a decent wage.

I will finish on this note: we have to remember that people here in the North are much worse off, whether in work or out of work, than people in GB. In March 2015, an income tracker by Asda showed that the average disposable income for a family in GB was £185 and only £92 for the people of Northern Ireland. That simply is not good enough. The message that we want to send to the Tories is that we are still a community coming out of conflict. They have ignored our cry for help to move Northern Ireland forward.

Mr Speaker: We need to have some order to hear the contributions.

Mr Beggs: The UK welfare system today is still that broadly envisaged in the Beveridge report in the 1940s: a safety net of support for those who genuinely need it. We want to see the sick, the disabled, the working poor, families, children and our older people all being supported whilst adults who are fit to work but currently are unemployed are supported back into the work space. Ulster Unionists very much agree with the belief that people who are fit to work should be better off in work than on benefits. We want more people entering the world of work, individuals and their families prospering and being better off, and we want Northern Ireland to prosper.

Universal credit was an ambitious project. Despite its shambolic roll-out in GB, it still might just work. The Department for Work and Pensions has claimed the success of transferring the welfare claims of single people to the new benefits system. However, we are still some way from gaining success. Earlier this month, only approximately 52,000 of the seven million prospective claimants were in receipt of the new benefits, but more and more are being added. Until it starts to handle more and more complex cases, there is little on which to really judge the success or failure of the new system.

When the Westminster Welfare Reform Bill received Royal Assent on 8 March 2012, no one could have expected that it would take more than three years before the Assembly reached the Final Stage of the Bill covering similar rules in Northern Ireland. Unfortunately, the scale of welfare administration has become increasingly unsustainable in recent times, and reform was inevitable. The dated system was preventing individuals and families from improving their life chances. The trap of welfare dependency was beginning to catch entire families.

This is the most difficult and controversial Bill that the Assembly has faced in recent times. My party does not like everything in it. We proposed several amendments. We were successful with some and unsuccessful with others. The Bill at least delivers some reform to a system that clearly is no longer fit for purpose. Amendments were made to the GB legislation to reflect local concerns, and extra funding was set aside by our Executive through the Stormont House Agreement discussions to moderate the effects of the changes. This has been built into the 2015-16 Budget.

The aim of the Bill is to simplify benefits, improve work incentives and reduce administrative costs. The changes are occurring against a background of the UK continuing to increase its cumulative deficit. Labour, the Lib Dems and the Conservatives have all committed to Budget break-even; they disagree only over how fast they each would bring it into balance. The reality of the recent UK elections is that there is no going back. I think that Labour is even reviewing the position that it took. I also recall Iain Duncan Smith, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, highlighting that, with the old GB benefits system, it took almost an hour for an experienced welfare supervisor, using sophisticated computers, to establish whether someone would be better or worse off if they worked a few hours more.

We had a very complicated system that was very costly to administer, and there was a lack of transparency as to whether individuals would be better off in work. Benefit traps are preventing our constituents from working to help themselves and their families.

11.30 am

We do have choices. If this Bill is not approved, we will be the only part of the UK using the old benefits system. There will be less funds in many other public areas. Let us be clear that there is no money tree. There is no going back asking for more money. We have been there lots of times over the past three years. There were crunch talks around Christmas last year, and we got an offer of a settlement at that stage. If we do not approve this Bill, there will be even less money for health, less money for education and less money for Departments and other publicly funded bodies.

If this Bill is approved, the potential of further penalties and unplanned departmental cuts will be averted. Penalties were discussed earlier. Penalties come simply when we decide to deviate from the welfare system. The Westminster Government simply take that money off our block grant. That is what a penalty is: we choose to differ, and therefore we pay. How can we argue to other parts of the United Kingdom that that is unfair? How can we argue that to this Government, whose members represent areas where they have a different benefits system? Why should they permit us to introduce a more generous benefits system to Northern Ireland and not pay for it? That is an argument that some would wish to win by going back to negotiations. However, I am firm in the belief that that would go nowhere. Experience of the past three years shows that that is the case.

If we choose to deviate from the welfare system that applies elsewhere in the United Kingdom, we will have to pay for it from our block grant. That is the political and economic reality. Fines have been indicated — essentially clawbacks of our deviation to date — of £14 million, then £87 million and then some £114 million this year. The figure is projected to reach £250 million next year, and I understand that the First Minister has said that it could even be £500 million the following year. This is what is coming down the line if we do not implement change. Politics is supposed to be the art of the possible. That means that we all have a responsibility to examine not only the pluses and the minuses of this Bill but the implications that will flow from the Bill not being approved.

In addition to the welfare clawback or fines, if this Bill is not approved the offer of borrowing will not be there. Remember that, because of delays last year, there was an additional £100 million deficit. We were afforded borrowing last year to avert further drastic in-year cuts. Let us remember that, last year, there were in-year cuts of 4.4% across many Departments and the overall Budget to claw back deficits that were running up. The longer we take to make decisions and the longer we avoid financial decisions, the worse will be the long-term implications. There is poorer and poorer planning around where those cuts can be made, and they are implemented in a much speedier fashion than would otherwise be the case. I understand that, if we do not approve the Bill, the borrowing to cover the £100 million from last year will be required in this year's Budget, and, of course, the hundreds of millions of pounds that were offered to us to pay for a voluntary redundancy scheme will no longer be available. They will not be on the table. That was part of the deal.

What would be the implications of all that and other aspects for the Assembly's Budget, which is with our Finance Minister and is due to be brought before the Executive and ultimately the Assembly to finalise it? Well, to balance the Budget, further cuts would have to be announced. I understand reliably that that figure is in the order of £600 million. The community and voluntary sector has already suffered compulsory redundancies. There is no doubt that if the Budget problem deepens even further if the Bill is not approved, there will be thousands of compulsory redundancies, instead of voluntary redundancies, across the public sector. How else do you balance the Budget? There has to be a balancing of the Budget. If the Executive are not prepared to do that, we know that there are mechanisms within the legislation that will pass that responsibility to senior civil servants who will set the Budget at 95% of last year's Budget.

Take the health service. Failure to implement welfare reform and finalise the Budget could mean an 8% reduction in the health budget — not an increase to deal with those increasing pressures, such as the growing waiting lists and the delays at our accident and emergency centres. There is a huge responsibility on everyone who is thinking of opposing the Bill to explain where the £600 million gap in our Budget comes from. How is that going to be filled? Or, how are we going to avoid the inevitable crash, as I see it, when civil servants will be forced to take such drastic decisions?

The question to Sinn Féin, today, is very clear: vote for the Bill with all of its local amendments and additional safeguards, or reject it and wait a few months for Westminster to implement it for them, with, potentially, no additional protection. If the Assembly survives — I say, "if" — which I think would be highly unlikely, is Sinn Féin prepared to watch these powers and all other powers being handed back to Westminster? There may, of course, be an Assembly election, but, if there is, we will come back to face the same problems, and the same issues will arise. If there is a failure again, in a few months' time, and if there is stalemate, I do not think the United Kingdom Government could sit around while such drastic cuts would be affecting the people of Northern Ireland, in terms of not only our health service but a wide range of public services.

In addition, if the Bill is rejected, the Northern Ireland social security administrative burden will grow and grow and grow. Let me explain. In Great Britain, there is a clear commitment to move to the new computer system. Recently, an official indicated to the Social Development Committee that the ageing UK current social security system cost £1 billion a year to maintain and run. When, eventually, everything transfers to the new system, that system will no longer be required. So, how is Northern Ireland going to run the current social security system with its rules and regulations? What is it going to cost us to maintain that large, burdensome computer system so that we can have the luxury of having different social security rules and regulations here? I have not heard any costs of that. I am not saying that it is going to cost £1 billion, but the administrative burden will cost hundreds of millions of pounds on an annual basis. So, on top of all the other voids, another cost is coming in. The alternative suggested by the official was that we operate a paper system for our social security in Northern Ireland, which, of course, may have even higher administrative costs. Certainly, that is not a practical option.

Over the years, it will be increasingly difficult and, indeed, almost impossible to calculate the difference between the new system and the old system. That is where the uncosted, Gerry Adams, Sinn Féin, Southern-campaign directive guaranteeing protection against all future welfare changes unravels. It is undeliverable, uncosted and irresponsible. It is so sad that we have major parties in Northern Ireland that are prepared to run with the line that there will be no change to the welfare system in Northern Ireland.

I want to put on public record that, on Friday morning, the Ulster Unionist Party met some Sinn Féin representatives in Stormont Castle.

It was one of the last chances to find out whether there was room for negotiation. Remarkably, the Sinn Féin representatives told us at the meeting that they had costed proposals that would guarantee protections for existing and future claimants and that it would be done broadly within the spending envelope already agreed in the Stormont House Agreement. We did not believe them, but we were prepared to, at least, consider it. Surprisingly, four days later, and even in the course of this debate, we have heard nothing. We are still waiting for a copy of those proposals. Sinn Féin was being irresponsible once more, even until the last minute.

It was with bemusement that I learnt that a petition of concern had been placed against the Final Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill in March and has been repeated again for today's debate. Sinn Féin has supported many amendments and approved the details of the Bill that are presented today for final approval. In fact, on the specific issue of contributory employment and support allowance (ESA), an issue on which Sinn Féin now professes opposition, this is what Mickey Brady said on 10 February:

*"I argue that clause 52 ... is a good clause".—

It is so good that Sinn Féin is now wholly opposed to it. Sam McBride quoted Martin McGuinness as having told the Sinn Féin ard-fheis:

"Our protected welfare system has eliminated the Tory cuts", but then Sinn Féin flip-flopped, when the Southern command wagged the Northern tail.

One of the worst aspects of this flip-flopping is the failure to govern: the failure to lead and the failure to take responsibility, with the knock-on adverse effects that will fall on the people of Northern Ireland. Then again, should we really be surprised, considering that this is the party that claims that it stands against cuts, four years after implementing consecutive cuts? The Belfast Agreement, approved by the people of Northern Ireland, accepted Northern Ireland's position in the United Kingdom. This means that we receive UK welfare benefits and, if any changes are proposed, we must pay for them out of our remaining block grant.

Billions of pounds of subventions are already coming to Northern Ireland and, on average, our citizens are in receipt of thousands of pounds more than those in other regions of the United Kingdom. Yes, there is some argument over whether it is £7 billion, £8 billion or £10 billion, but the reality is that our citizens are receiving considerably more funds from public sources than those in any other part of the United Kingdom. Sinn Féin fails to acknowledge that reality. It seems to think that extra welfare costs will be paid for from the money tree, and it seems to wish to emulate the Greek form of economics and bring that to the Northern Ireland economy and government. I do not want such failure. Sinn Féin seemed to be willing to implement welfare reform in Northern Ireland whilst fighting austerity in the Republic of Ireland. That failure to govern or take difficult decisions in Northern Ireland will affect every one of our citizens. Have no doubt of it.

This morning, on Radio Ulster, I heard Paul Terrington, the current head of the Institute of Directors, indicate that stability in the Administration is crucial for economic growth in Northern Ireland. He went on to say that the single issue of stability, the continuation of the devolution process around corporation tax and all those things are in a vacuum at the minute. We do not have political stability to sell ourselves elsewhere or bring in new investment and we do not recognise the realities of financing our local Administration. We are creating instability and making it more difficult to bring jobs in and more difficult for existing employers in Northern Ireland to invest. The issue of corporation tax is being held back. It was a part of the agreement but, if it were devolved, what exactly would Sinn Féin be proposing? Would it propose increasing corporation tax, perhaps to pay for some of the additional welfare benefits? The Budget has to balance, and there seems to be a lack of reality in actions that are being taken by those who should know better. Sinn Féin is showing the citizens of Northern Ireland and, indeed, the Republic of Ireland that it is unfit to govern and cannot create stability either in its decision-making or its ability to live within the Budget.

At the last Sinn Féin ard-fheis, Mr Brady said that, during the recent Stormont House talks, the relentless tide of austerity was abated. How was it abated? Our Budget is determined at Westminster. That is part of the Belfast Agreement, and we have to live within the Budget that comes to us. Sinn Féin was so anti-austerity that it agreed to cut 20,000 posts in the public sector; posts that we cannot afford to maintain. It was so anti-austerity that it was a cheerleader for a Budget that has witnessed its own Education Minister admit that he will have to make 1,500 teachers and support staff redundant by September. Again, how has the tide of austerity been abated?

On top of the supplementary payment fund and all the other protections, he even claimed that Sinn Féin delivered a £564 million welfare package. That is absolute nonsense. Is he claiming that Sinn Féin secured each and every one of the mitigation measures? Is he claiming that Sinn Féin solely secured the additional funding for the transfer from DLA to PIP? Does he forget that many of the safeguards were already agreed over 12 months ago?

The simple fact is that it said originally that it would not implement welfare reform, then it agreed to do it, and then it flip-flopped once again. It is unstable government. It said that future claimants would be protected. They cannot be. That is the reality. How do we continue to calculate into the future, whether it is one year, six years or 10 years, the difference between the benefits that someone in Northern Ireland would get under the old system if we do not change and the system that will be applicable in other parts of the United Kingdom? It said that it has alternatives, but it has never shared them, and we have still not heard today what those alternatives are.

During the Bill's stages, there were decisions by the DUP to kill off the vast majority of formal amendments through the abuse, in my mind, of the petition of concern. Was that done as a diversionary tactic to save Sinn Féin's blushes at the time? Perhaps. But it did, as others said, prevent the Assembly from reaching its view in a simple vote. The Bill we are being asked to vote on today is better shaped than it was three years ago, and there was an opportunity to at least mitigate some of the worst consequences that would flow from welfare reform.

I welcome my party's amendments to the Bill. The early amendments that went down in April 2013 highlighted some of our concerns about the frequency of payments, the need for split payments, the provision of medical evidence and a desire for a Northern Ireland PIP pilot scheme. While the Bill is better for those changes, we would have preferred additional changes, such as improvements in welfare advice.

Let us recognise that there are many positive changes, as the Minister highlighted. The frequency of payment has moved from a monthly universal credit payment to twice monthly. There is provision for split universal credit where there are issues in households. There is the direct payment of housing benefit to landlords to prevent the increasing likelihood of evictions if money that was designed to go to housing benefit was not actually used for housing costs. That is another positive change that was being built in. Then there was the discretionary housing protection. There were other changes, such as the reduction in the maximum period of sanctions from three years to 18 months. Provisions were built in to protect those who have a disability. That was done in a time-limited and proportionate manner. So, significant changes were built into the raw legislation that came here. I am firmly of the belief that, if we do not approve it, somebody else will, at some point, approve a system of welfare reform for Northern Ireland. We do not know whether they will take those mitigations into consideration. The responsibility will pass to others because budgetary and other issues mean that, in the long term, it is simply not sustainable to maintain the position of not adopting these measures.

During its passage, the Social Development Committee undertook the task of reviewing every aspect of the Bill. On behalf of me and the rest of the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly group, I take this opportunity to thank Michael Copeland for his outstanding hard work on the Bill. Anyone who observed his work on the Committee was left in no doubt about his genuine interest in not only ensuring that the reforms did not have a devastating impact on communities across Northern Ireland but that they were as fair as possible. He certainly set this party's course of direction on the Bill.

Aspects of the DUP's management of the Bill and the financial management related to it have been unhelpful. Unsurprisingly, however, after presiding over the mismanagement of previous Budgets, the DUP sought to lay all the Executive's financial ills from last year at the feet of failure to progress welfare reform. That was despite the £87 million in fines accounting for less than half of the £200 million shortfall in the Executive funds. Of course, never ones to miss a chance to spin a tale to suit their own needs, they almost sounded as if they convinced themselves that what they were saying was absolutely true. Of course, it was not. Basic mathematics and honesty were not important. Nevertheless, the failure to progress the Bill came at a cost of £87 million, which we did not have to spend on other public services. Not only were key public services cut to pay for that, but it happened late in year.

Members will recall that the June monitoring round was finalised, I think, at the end of July, and it was then perhaps another couple of months before each Department announced how it was going to claw back the amount that was levied on it within the short, six-month period that remained. That is the worst way that any Government can manage. Short-term clawbacks, little planning and little notice — that is poor use of public funds, and we are in danger of repeating that this year. I say this to those who will vote against the Bill: you bear a huge responsibility. That is coming down the track. That is the political reality, and avoiding it does not solve the problem. Other costs will come back from other Departments to pay for the failure of the Bill to go through. Some parties, such as Sinn Féin, saw no contradiction in standing with posters earlier this year saying, "Stop Tory Cuts" while, at the same time, individual Ministers were implementing the reduced budgets that had been handed to them. I mentioned that earlier.

I will get back to the journey of the Bill. It now appears that it will fall at the very last hurdle. Sinn Féin has looked South and remembered that, there, it claims to be the anti-cuts party.

So, they are expressing their opposition to the Bill, regardless of the implications for the people of Northern Ireland, regardless of the most vulnerable and regardless of potential cuts to our health service — perhaps £200 million is coming out of health. How will you explain that to our most vulnerable citizens who are in ill health and need medical interventions? I would like to hear an answer from any Sinn Féin Member remaining to contribute to the debate. How will they solve that? How will they avoid that? Wishing for something different does not deliver it.

The Dublin leadership of Sinn Féin has viewed the Welfare Reform Bill as a threat to exposing the rank hypocrisy of what its party does daily in Northern Ireland compared with what it says, which is that it opposes austerity in the Republic.

So, the question is clear: is Sinn Féin prepared to reject today's Bill, lose the additional protection that comes with it, terminate the supplementary payments fund and remove all the other positive aspects that were linked to it during the negotiations at the end of last year, all for the sake of a few votes in the Republic of Ireland? As we go forward, I ask the people of Northern Ireland to remember how different parties voted on this matter and, further down the line, when the inevitable starts to happen, to realise who caused it and recall the warnings that everybody clearly understood were coming down the line. Yet politicians, it appears, are choosing to ignore the political reality. I support the Bill.

Mr Ford: I will commence, Mr Speaker, as you did, by extending good wishes on behalf of my party colleagues to Peter Robinson. We trust that we will see the First Minister back in his place and fulfilling his duties at an early stage.

For the record, I should stress that I am speaking from the Back Bench, though I have no doubt that the Minister for Social Development will appreciate the support of at least one Minister in the House today. When I say that I "support" the Bill, it is in the context that Alliance is firmly in opposition to many of the welfare reforms and opposed them in the only place that mattered: the Parliament of the United Kingdom at Westminster. That was where those decisions were taken, not here.

There is much talk about welfare powers being devolved to these institutions. The reality is that welfare powers are not devolved in any genuine sense. Right from the post-war settlement — in fact, possibly even from Lloyd George's old-age pensions, but my memory does not go back that far — we have had the reality that, on the basis that people in Northern Ireland pay UK taxes, they get UK social security benefits. The expenditure under annually managed expenditure (AME) is adjusted to deal with that without regard to the block grant. That is the position that we are in, and that is where we now stand with these measures, which have been passed by the UK Parliament. Our powers to make any change are extremely limited.

It is fine for some Members to say, as Mr McGuinness did, that the Conservatives have a minuscule mandate in Northern Ireland, which is, of course, true. I notice that even the Ulster Unionist Party seems to have realised that casting off the Tories was probably a good thing electorally, but the reality is that, whether we like it or not, whether we approve of the electoral system or not and whether we think that it is fair or not, the Conservatives have a mandate as the Government of the United Kingdom. All parties that accepted the Good Friday Agreement and the principle of consent need to live with that. In the context of a UK Government, the Conservatives have the power to decide things, and we have distinctly limited powers as a devolved region.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: I will.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member acknowledge that, whilst the legislation is required to be approved here and we can deviate from it, we must pay for any deviation? So, we have the authority to change it, but we must pay for it out of our limited block grant.

Mr Ford: I entirely accept the Member's point, which I will go on to in a minute. That is where I believe that the nationalist rhetoric about welfare in this place is simply not correct. We have, as Mr Beggs has just reminded the House again, extremely limited powers to make any adjustments around the margins. We are not an unbridled power or a sovereign state, and we need to recognise the reality of where we are.

12.00 noon

It is fine to talk about issues like the Human Rights Act, where I have no doubt that, because of its particular implications for the Good Friday Agreement, many in the House will seek to oppose any potential changes that the Tories may introduce, but this is not the Human Rights Act. This is the fundamentals of living within our means, dealing with the budget that we are given and making such modifications as we can. We may work with Scotland and Wales on many issues — indeed, in my ministerial role, I work with the Scottish Cabinet Secretary on many issues — but we cannot on the issue of social security, which is fundamentally an issue for the UK, not at all devolved in Scotland in Wales and only nominally devolved here. However, we did make those mitigations and we did make those changes before Christmastime in Stormont Castle amongst the five parties, and then we incorporated them into the Stormont House Agreement, and that recognised the practical limitations of what we can do. We cannot do all that we wish to do. We have to live within the administrative possibilities and we have to live within the financial realities, and we had a very detailed examination of those. Civil servants from DSD and the Social Security Agency put a lot of effort in then, and have since, to put the detail on that, for which we should be grateful, but we need to recognise that that is the reality and that that is what five parties signed up to — to live within the reality, to make the ameliorations and to accept that that was the best that we could do —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: I will.

Mr Wilson: Does he also accept that the changes that were made and presented to the Executive reflected exactly the kind of groups that Sinn Féin and others said, including his own party, that they wanted protections made available to? That has been faithfully reflected, yet oddly enough, despite the fact that the money is there, the protections are there and the groups that were identified are covered, we now face this situation today.

Mr Ford: Yes; Mr Wilson makes an entirely valid point. We dealt with those issues in detail in Stormont Castle and, working with the Governments, we got them into the Stormont House Agreement, yet we are left in the position where it is unclear as to exactly why some people who made that deal have reneged on it.

We also have to recognise that, when we reached the agreement in Stormont Castle, all of that had a cost to other public services — a very significant cost. If I remember correctly, we started off talking about something in the region of £40 million amelioration coming from other aspects of our budget. We got it up to £93 million annual average cost in Stormont Castle, and that is money coming directly from other services — directly from services that are provided to protect vulnerable people and people in need: health and social care, classically so; housing; job skills and employment work; I might even add in the issue of justice. Those who require those services are all seeing a reduction in those budgets because money is being put into propping up the social security budget.

It is not just a matter of health, although Mr Beggs correctly highlighted the fact that health is the largest of those issues. The £93 million in the Stormont Castle Agreement that is being put into social security funding will result in a direct cost, if it is proportionate, of between £6 million and £7 million on policing in Northern Ireland, and we could look at many other examples. We have made that balance; we have sought proportionate changes that would ensure that we maintain essential public services at the same time as we ameliorate welfare cuts, but we cannot go any further than we have gone, and that was a reasonable accommodation. It is the job of a responsible Government to make those difficult decisions. It is great to be in government at a time of expanding finances and nice opportunities, when Ministers can appear in front of cameras and smile at things, but the reality of government is that we need to learn to take difficult decisions, to deal with the difficult hand when we are played it at difficult times, and to be realistic and accept those.

In that respect, it seems to me that Sinn Féin and the SDLP have to prove that they can be responsible around budgetary matters in difficult times in just the same way, frankly, as Members on the other side of the House need to prove that they can be responsible and recognise reality in other respects. The critical aspect is that the Government have to make the decisions based on the context in which we are living at the time.

Power-sharing requires compromise, rising above narrow ideology and reaching an accommodation, and it means aspiring for the common good. That is what was required, and that is what I believe we achieved at Stormont House on welfare reforms. If we do not pass the Bill, all that we agreed in the Stormont House Agreement potentially falls.

Do Members really want that? That will mean nothing at all for the voluntary exit scheme for those civil servants who wish to leave and have built up their expectations over the last months that they will get the chance to go. It will mean absolutely nothing for dealing with the past, new institutions, additional funding for inquests and all that was promised to victims, the bereaved and those who were injured. A lot of hopes were built on that, which now stand the risk of being crushed because people cannot agree the Bill. It will mean an immediate loss of last year's £100 million loan, with an expectation that it will be added to the burden of repayments this year, and there will be nothing at all for the additional funds that were expected to be invested in integrated education and shared education. If we do not agree the Bill, we have the prospect of full-blooded Tory cuts with no amelioration whatsoever.

Sinn Féin is making much about its claims to protect those who are dependent on social security benefits. The reality is that Sinn Féin is leaving them in a worse position. It is leaving them with a loss of public services, whether those be health, justice or job skills services, and leaving people worse off because of continuing fines that are being paid back to the Treasury rather than being put into any services here.

The SDLP claims to be the guardian of the Good Friday Agreement. The Ulster Unionists gave up on the Good Friday Agreement a while ago, we were never quite sure exactly how much Sinn Féin was committed to the full detail, and the DUP would claim that it never supported it. If we cannot work the system of power-sharing that is before us, we call into question whether Members have any commitment at all to the Good Friday Agreement. Members who signed the petition of concern are in danger of abandoning the Good Friday Agreement along with the Stormont House Agreement.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way.

Mrs D Kelly: Under the d'Hondt principles of the Good Friday Agreement, I do not recall the Alliance Party being entitled to two Ministers. [Interruption.]

Mr Ford: I am sorry; I am devastated. If somebody cannot tell the difference between a mathematical formula and a principle, we have a real issue.

If people are prepared to throw out the Bill without recognising the effects that doing so will have on those who are most vulnerable in this society and the dangers that lie ahead for public services in general, those who are dependent on those public services and for victims of the past who are expecting something to emerge from the Stormont House Agreement, they really are contradicting the principles of the Good Friday Agreement as well as those of the Stormont House Agreement.

It looks like Alliance will end up being the only party that is in support of those principles and the only party that is prepared to be fiscally responsible and socially progressive. The Alliance Party is not afraid to accept that difficult decisions have to be taken at difficult times. When people reach an agreement, they should stick to the agreement five months later. We will, therefore, support the Bill, not because we want Tory cuts to be implemented but because we want to stop future Tory cuts being implemented.

Mr Campbell: I join others in wishing Peter Robinson a speedy recovery.

Given the removal of OFMDFM Question Time, it seems somewhat strange, when we in an open-ended legislative debate that could go on for hours, for us to take a lunch break of two and a quarter hours; hopefully, the Business Committee will be able to meet. That seems absurd, but I am sure that the Whips are discussing it as we speak.

A number of issues about the Bill need to be brought to a head. When it comes to what most people in the House would like to see, welfare reform does not divide us. We would all like to see a belt-and-braces, super-duper welfare reform package. I presume that almost everyone in the Chamber, as well as outside, would want to see that in place. However, that is what we would like to see. That is what we would want to see in a perfect world. What we have is not perfect. It is rather imperfect, and there is no additional money. Given that we were told by a Conservative and Liberal Democrat coalition that there was no additional money, does anybody seriously think that the Conservatives, bereft of the Liberal Democrats and now governing on their own with a complete majority, will say, "Yes, we did say that with the Lib Dems in tow, but we have now had a think about it. We are going to give everybody else in the UK a £12 billion hit, but we will overlook that for you people in Northern Ireland and give you a bit more money."? It is not going to happen. It simply is not going to happen.

The reality is that we have to do whatever we are going to do within the confines of our Budget. When we come to that point — I know that there are some, particularly in Sinn Féin and the SDLP, who do not seem to be at that point yet, but everybody else seems to be — we then have to decide what we do. Do we sit tight and hope, Micawber-like, that something will turn up? When my head comes out of the sand, will somebody somewhere, with this magic money tree that everybody talks about and nobody knows where it is, deliver hundreds of millions of pounds to deliver what we would all like to see? It ain't going to happen.

What do we do then? If we all wish that it was better but know that it is not going to be, do we sit tight and then it will get worse? That is what is going to happen; it is going to get worse. Or do we adopt the better way and try to mitigate the worst excesses of a welfare reform system that is, as everybody else in the UK admits, better than what they have? When I speak to the Scots Nats, Plaid Cymru, the Conservatives and Labour across the rest of the United Kingdom, they say, "I wish we had the system that you people have." When I say that we might not have it, they say, "That is your call." We are making it today. This call is being made today.

Over the course of the last month, we have heard from Sinn Féin a number of pie-in-the-sky economic issues.

In fact, I was really glad that our former Finance Minister made the quote before I made it: it was not really Karl Marx economics, it was Groucho Marx economics. I notice that the deputy First Minister referred to the Member Mr Chris Hazzard, and I am glad that he did. Who will ever forget the car-crash radio interview before the election, when the Karl Marx economics of Sinn Féin was that, if you run up a credit card debt, we will write it off? These are the people who will say that we can get a better welfare reform package. Of course, they also said that they want to safeguard not only existing claimants but all future claimants. The current DLA claimant rate, in some parts of Northern Ireland, is three times greater than in the rest of the UK. If it becomes four times greater, do they want to safeguard it? If it becomes five times greater, do they want to safeguard it? Commentators ask, "How do you account for future claimants?". They answer is that you do not. You cannot, because they are future claimants. You do not know what it will be, yet Sinn Féin wants to say that we have to get a budget and reforms that take account of the unknowable.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Campbell: Yes, I will.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member accept that the fantasy economics extends even further than that? On one hand, they claim that there will be £1,500 million lost to claimants as a result of welfare reform over the next five years, yet they believed that, by negotiating with the Government before Christmas for slightly above £500 million, they could ensure that none of the people who will be affected would lose out and that £500 million would cover £1,500 million of reductions. Does he not think that that maybe shows that their grasp of numbers is not great?

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for his intervention. I think he was underselling it a bit when he said that their grasp of the numbers is "not great". "Not great" does not come close. The reality is that we have a Conservative Government in place for, in all likelihood, five years. The subvention is £10 billion a year. People ask why we cannot go it alone. It is 50 billion of those over the next five years — 50 billion of those. That is why we cannot go it alone.

I have heard a lot about anti-austerity. I remember, and I am sure many here remember, that, four months ago, the talk across Europe, in Spain, Italy and various countries, was that anti-austerity parties were on the rise, which they were; that they were getting more votes, which they were, and that they were becoming more strident in their demands. Then, four months ago this weekend past, an anti-austerity party was not just on the rise, but became the Government of Greece. Then we heard, "You are going to see stuff happen now; you are going to see austerity confronted and smashed." What do we see four months later? The Greeks are at the IMF, saying, "Please, can you bail us out? Please, can you do something? We cannot meet your demands." So much for the mighty anti-austerity measures and the great anti-austerity party. I wonder where Sinn Féin, the great anti-austerity party of Groucho Marx rather than Karl Marx, will be?

The reality is that we are where we are. We have got to cut our cloth. People might not like it — I do not like it — but it does not change where we are. We have got to get on, mitigate what we can, do our best for those in need and do our best to secure the best deal — and we have got the best deal in the United Kingdom — or else it gets an awful lot worse. I support the Bill.

Mr Maskey: I am speaking for Sinn Féin, which stands for a number of key principles in its involvement with these institutions, including protections for the most vulnerable, a workable Budget that will enable us to deliver on the Programme for Government across all commitments, and the securing of additional powers to allow the Executive and the institutions to grow the economy and create employment.

I have heard it said over the last number of days that Sinn Féin is sleepwalking into this debate and does not listen to people. I remind people that we do listen. We are, in fact, just out of an election, and those of us who were on the campaign trail spoke collectively to several tens of thousands of people in their homes, on their doorsteps and at social gatherings and public meetings. I assure Members, and anyone else for that matter, that we do listen, and we heard loudly and clearly what people were saying. They are telling us that confidence in these institutions is low, and that they are worried about their future, their welfare and cuts to services. It is regrettable that some of them lay the blame at the door of these institutions rather than where it actually belongs, which is with the British Government; but is a discussion for another day.

The point I would make is that our party came out of the election with 176,000 votes. We are very pleased and privileged to have secured that very significant mandate. We have that mandate across the island of Ireland, in all the political institutions that the people have a franchise to elect into, and we are very proud and privileged to have that.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Maskey: No, I will not give way. Thanks, Minister.

We are proud of that. What is very clear is that the fundamental principles we stood for were endorsed by that high number of people. They are the commitments that we made during the election and they are the commitments that we are going to hold to dearly as we proceed. What will happen in the weeks and months ahead, I do not know, but I do know this, and Martin McGuinness made the point very clearly earlier: Sinn Féin is not remotely interested in these institutions collapsing, but, equally, these institutions are only worthwhile if they are delivering for the people that we collectively represent, and I mean collectively as in all of the parties here.

I will make the point again that the Tory Government, who are the body responsible for the position that we find ourselves in, have no mandate here whatsoever, whereas the parties around the table here do, and we have a responsibility to discharge that mandate to the best of our ability for the people we represent. Nobody in this room, the last time that I checked, represents any electorate outside these Six Counties.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Maskey: No, I am not giving way. I thank the Member.

I just want to make the point that we do listen, and we did listen. Not only that; when we make a promise, we will stand by that promise.

I want to make a couple of points before we go on. People are making remarks willy-nilly. They probably do not understand what they are saying themselves. The first thing is the whole question of fines. People say that we are being fined, and I have heard Members saying that that is money down the drain. Well, actually, I remind people that the money that is being taken off us by the British Government currently remains in the pockets of those welfare recipients. If it were not for Sinn Féin, the SDLP and others who have been resisting those cuts, those people would have had that money removed from their pockets already. Those are the most vulnerable in our society. When all the parties talk about defending the most vulnerable, that is the type of people that we are actually talking about. That money has not been lost or squandered or gone down the drain, as someone mentioned in the last number of days. That money remains in the pockets of those who are most vulnerable and who desperately need it.

I will also make a point for those who like to delude themselves about the machinations of Sinn Féin. Sinn Féin is a national party, and we do not have to be dictated to by one part of the country or another. When people refer to where Sinn Féin in the North takes its orders from, let me say this: Martin McGuinness, for example, is a member of our national executive, our ard-chomhairle, as are a number of other Members on these Benches. We are not dictated to by any one part of the country or any individual. Sinn Féin has a very strong, committed, collective leadership that has representation from throughout the whole country. Let me assure anyone who has any doubts or any delusions in their minds: the decisions that we come to have been thought out, considered and acted upon on a national and collective basis. I think that is what it should be. You will not find any individual in our party faltering against another because our party is united. We are an anti-austerity party. We are a party that wants to work with all of the other parties, building the economies, North and South, and treating people fairly. That is what we will continue to do. As I said earlier, we are very proud and privileged to have received the very significant mandate that we continue to receive, and we will exercise that mandate very judiciously.

I will also make the point that continuing attacks on Sinn Féin during this debate or, indeed, others is a bit futile because it will not resolve anything. In case you have not learned anything over the years, criticising Sinn Féin is not going to make us shift one way or another. We will do what we have to do, what we need to do and what we think is in the best interests of the people who we collectively represent. Criticising Sinn Féin is really a waste of your time.

I did not want to go there, but I want to make one point, particularly in relation to the SDLP and Dolores Kelly's remarks earlier. I think it is very unfortunate that parties seek to waste their time and energy today in the debate taking sideswipes at Sinn Féin, or, indeed, any other party, when the real focus of our dispute has to be with the British Government. I will say this — I do not want to return to it later today, and I hope that nobody else has to — had the SDLP worked in good faith during the implementation period for the Stormont House Agreement, maybe, just perhaps, they might have been able to deliver on some of the points that they have been making.

That is by the by, however, because the last point that I want to make in regard to that is that the people who we represent want us to work together. They do not want us sniping at one another. They do not want parties bickering, complaining or criticising each other. They want us to knuckle down, roll our sleeves up and get to work to tackle those very serious problems that people out there face.

The Minister, in his opening remarks, praised his officials, and rightly so. I want to place on record my gratitude and thanks to all the officials in his Department, including the Social Security Agency, who regularly come to the Social Development Committee and take a lot of time to explain things to and work with the Committee, and likewise throughout the whole Welfare Bill issue. However, by the same token, the Department officials do not set policy. That is the job for the parties around this Chamber. The officials do not set the policy.

There was progress. Parties reached an agreement in the Stormont House talks. We all agreed on that. We may disagree about what precisely we agreed — that is another day's argument — but, nevertheless, we made progress. As I have said, subsequent to that, we had further discussions about implementing the Stormont House Agreement. Ultimately, it came back — the Minister made the point earlier — and we were told by officials via the DUP that the deal that we wanted, which was to support current and future claimants, was not legally, operationally or financially deliverable. We dispute that. What we are saying is that the parties should decide the policy that we pursue, and we then have to get that enacted. Officials work very hard — I want to endorse the Minister's praise of the officials — but they do not set policy. Therefore, our party will not determine its policies based on what officials tell us. We have to listen, learn from what they are saying and work our way round the obstacles. We need to get round those obstacles politically, not simply acquiesce to them. That is the point that I wanted to make about the Department's officials.

Crucially for us, even though progress was made, it was not enough, and we have made that very clear. That is why, on 9 March, we said clearly that we would not continue to support the Bill as it goes through the House: it and the commitments and schemes did not go far enough. Essentially, we have two problems that we have to deal with. Both of those problems —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Maskey: No, thank you. Both of the problems that we face originate in Westminster. They are the savage cuts to the block grant, which are well rehearsed — £1.5 billion over recent years — and the equally savage cuts to welfare, which the British Government want us to impose on people. Crucially, we have more of the same coming to us in July. Let us repeat that we are talking about treating with respect the most vulnerable. They include the long-term sick, large families with children who will be affected by the benefit cap, children with disabilities and adults with severe disabilities. Let me make it very clear that the Department's officials gave us figures for those categories: a family with a child on disability premium would lose up to £1,750; ESA time limiting would cost people £5,100; adults with a severe disability premium would lose £4,500; adults with a disability premium would lose almost £1,000; and the benefit cap would impact on some families to the tune of £2,300 or perhaps more. Those are the figures given to us. Of course, we know that the history of figures is that they could change by this time tomorrow, but it will be for another person to deal with that argument.

I want to conclude on a very simple point. In the last while, we have heard a lot of very strong and solid voices from wider civic society, which has stood together. I want to praise them again for coming to the Committee for Social Development during the evidence-gathering sessions on the Bill. There were people from the trade unions, Churches, community and voluntary sector and rights-based NGOs, including the Human Rights Commission and the Equality Commission. They spoke very well and cogently on the serious and negative impact that the welfare cuts being imposed by London would have if implemented here on the people whom we all represent. We need to focus our minds on those people. We represent people here. We do not represent people in Birmingham or anywhere else. We need to learn from and be in solidarity with all those people. The offer from Nicola Sturgeon to the devolved Administrations to sit down and work together on this issue is a very worthy one, and it would be foolish for anyone not to take up that offer.

I say to those in wider civic society that it is time for those who have identified the problems to work together to find solutions. Solutions do not lie just in the Chamber. Yes, we have the responsibility to pass legislation, or not, as the case may be. Clearly, today, we will not pass it. That is a decision that the Minister has foisted on the Chamber. Nevertheless, I call on wider civic society to work with all the parties here. This problem will not go away. The Bill will not pass today. We are then into unknown territory, and it is up to the parties to work out where we go. I would far rather that the parties —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Maskey: I cannot give way, sorry. The difficulty —

Mrs Foster: You can.

Mr Maskey: OK, I will not give way; it is not the case that I cannot. I do that respectfully. I did not want to go there. This is legislation, and everyone can take as long as they need to talk in the Chamber today. However, the clock is ticking, and the Speaker has warned that he will interrupt.

I just want to finish my remarks on this point: parties here have a major responsibility on their shoulders. We in Sinn Féin have no hesitation in standing our ground against austerity. People inside and outside this Chamber have a responsibility to stand up against the cuts to the block grant and welfare, as well as the cuts that are coming down, yet again, from London from 8 July.

In the same way in which we are talking to people in the Twenty-six Counties over the head of parties, politicians and vested interest groups, I say that people out there in civic society have a voice and should use it very strongly. The people's voice was made very clear to us in the election campaign, and I presume that other parties heard the same.

We have a job to defend the people we represent, particularly those who are most vulnerable. The parties here who want to challenge the austerity measures that are coming from London and want to work with civic society out there, whether it is the unions, the community and voluntary sector, the Churches or all those organisations that very rightly put on the table the very negative impacts of the cuts if they continue to be implemented, should work together and challenge directly where the responsibility lies. Despite the differences around the Chamber, the responsibility for the cuts does not lie with the parties in the Chamber or the Executive. It lies in London. I call on people here and in civic society to stand up to London, stand together and look after the best interests of the people we are elected to represent.

It is time for people who want to equivocate on where the responsibility lies to get off the fence. The Government in London are quite clearly signalling that much more savage cuts will be imposed on us. Those will be to welfare and very important public services. We are saying to people who are against that that we should work together to challenge the British Government that are trying to impose those cuts and, if need be, stand up and name and shame the parties who are willing to acquiesce to that agenda.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension.

I intend to discuss with the Business Committee whether we should resume the debate at 2.00 pm to fill the slot that has been left by the cancellation of questions to OFMDFM. I will communicate the decision of the Business Committee through the party Whips as soon as it has been made.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.31 pm.

Welfare Reform Bill: Final Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Welfare Reform Bill [NIA 13/11-15] do now pass.
— [Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development).]

Mr Wilson: This is an important debate. It is perhaps one of the most important debates that we have ever had in the Assembly. As a result of the decision that the Assembly will make today, we will move into uncharted waters. We do not know constitutionally where this could lead us, and we do not know politically where this could lead us, but the one thing that we do know is that, financially, the consequences of this have been spelled out and spelt out very clearly by the Finance Minister. We can talk in the abstract about the financial consequences of the Budget for this Assembly, but those financial consequences will be felt by every family. That is why the debate should be of importance to the people of Northern Ireland. Every family in Northern Ireland will face financial consequences as a result of the outcome of the debate today.

It is little wonder that the SDLP and Sinn Féin have taken the stance that they have in the introductions to their speeches here today. There is an embarrassment there. Indeed, it is significant that none of the Sinn Féin spokespeople were prepared to take any interventions. That, to me, is an indication of how weak and paper-thin their arguments are. If they were sure of the ground on which they are opposing this legislation, you would have expected them to at least be prepared to stand and debate and discuss it and to answer questions in the Assembly. They have not been prepared to do that. In fact, we have had the excuses that this is a contrived situation and that, somehow or other, the Finance Minister has pushed us into having the Bill brought early.

I remind the Assembly that this has not come out of the blue. We have been trying to get this Bill through the Assembly for around a year and a half now. We have had meetings of all the parties, extensive discussions, negotiations with Ministers in England and even a crisis summit before Christmas last year. So, it has not come out of the blue, but the one thing that we do know is that the Finance Minister has to bring forward the final part of the Budget to the Assembly so that Departments and all those people who are affected by spending decisions of the Assembly know where they stand, so that schools know how much money they have for the rest of the year, further education colleges know what courses they can afford to run for the rest of the year, those who have applied for voluntary redundancy know whether they will be taking it and community groups know what they will have in their budget. I could go on.

There was no alternative but to bring this issue to a head. It is not contrived, it is not forced and it is not something about which the Finance Minister, the Social Development Minister and the First Minister thought, "Let's ramrod this through." It is something that has been in the making for a long time, and there has been an expectation that it is something that we would deal with.

The second argument that I have heard here today is, "Well, if only we had a bit more time, then we could've resolved the issues. Why couldn't we just sit down and talk?". Mr Maskey said we should work together to make more progress. The parties worked together at Christmas and thought that they had made progress. Before that, the former Social Development Minister worked with the DWP Minister in England and got concessions that, as my friend Mr Campbell said, are the envy of other parts of the United Kingdom. Since then, the Social Development Minister, on the basis of the agreement reached before Christmas, brought forward a plan as to how vulnerable groups might be protected, all of which has been presented to the Executive. I point out that nearly all those changes have not been as a result of those who claim to have concern for the vulnerable; they have been as a result of the work of a succession of DUP Ministers who took the lead on these issues.

As Mr Ford pointed out, while Sinn Féin poured out the anti-austerity rhetoric, it was not present when the debates about austerity were taking place in the Parliament of the United Kingdom; it was being too precious about its republican principles. That is how much it cares about the vulnerable. If there had been a real concern about the vulnerable, we would have seen Sinn Féin making its arguments in the place where welfare reform had its genesis: the House of Commons. Indeed, Sinn Féin has made it quite clear that, should there be future cuts, it will not be there to defend the vulnerable because it is a party of abstention. Abstention is more important than protecting the vulnerable. Let us not have any more of this nonsense about, "If only we had more time to talk. We're interested in supporting the vulnerable".

It is significant that, although the Social Development Minister has brought forward proposals that, we are told, are still unacceptable, we do not have a clue why they are unacceptable. Have we had any amendments? Sinn Féin has refused to accept the challenges, but I would have thought that I would at least have heard from its spokesmen today some indication as to where the flaws are. However, we have not heard from them, so what more is there to talk about? We have had extensive discussions with DWP Ministers; we have had changes made to the legislation; we have had the Stormont House Agreement and the subsequent papers tabled from it. There has been no new input from those saying that this is still unacceptable. No changes have been proposed.

The other argument is, "Well, if we all went together collectively to speak to the Prime Minister, perhaps he would give us more money". That has been well articulated here today. Those who put forward that argument know full well that it is nonsense. Anyone who thinks that a party that would not give more money when in coalition with the Liberals will, now that it has won an election, is in power in its own right and is going to introduce more welfare cuts on people in England, Scotland and Wales, exempt Northern Ireland, where it does not have one MP, is living in a fantasy world. Yet those are the arguments that we have had today as to why we should not proceed with the Bill. They are all false and threadbare, and they will have dire consequences because the Bill has to be voted on today. If it is refused and rejected, there will be consequences.

Let us look at what is being proposed. It is not that the Bill is unnecessarily harsh. I remember being on the ministerial group that discussed the Bill. This seems to be a moveable feast because, at that stage, a number of things were highlighted, all of which were dealt with. The first one was the impact that it would have on the social fund, and the Executive put more money into that. The second one was the impact that it would have on people who would no longer be eligible to receive help with their rates, and the Executive put more money into that. The third one was the spare room subsidy and the fact that we did not have the housing stock to move people around, and we got an exemption from that. The fourth one was that there were people who would find it difficult to manage their money, and, if they were paid once a month, they would find themselves short at the end of the month, so we got a change whereby we could make more regular payments. The fifth one was that, in some dysfunctional households, if you paid all the money to one person, they would go out and spend it on drink, so the money should be split, and that was dealt with, too.

All five had financial consequences, of course, in extra administration, but every issue raised was dealt with, and, by the way, it was a DUP Minister who negotiated with a Minister at the Department for Work and Pensions. Those who claim to have a monopoly on being worried about the vulnerable ought to remember that all the issues that they raised were taken on board seriously, dealt with and reflected in the legislation that we have here. We were prepared to put our money where our mouth is and deal with the financial consequences of that.

Then, of course, the issue that came up was that there were still vulnerable groups that needed to be supported. One of the reasons why additional moneys, to the tune of £540 million, £550 million or whatever it was, were found in December was to provide additional support for those groups over six years. The impression has been given that, by some sleight of hand, the Minister for Social Development turned his back on those agreements. The truth of the matter is that, when you examine it, you see that not one penny has been removed. Every single penny of the money that, before Christmas, Sinn Féin and the SDLP thought was a sufficient guarantee for vulnerable people is still in the budget for this Bill.

The groups that they asked to be addressed, children with long-term disabilities and people with severe disabilities, are covered by the supplementary fund. A discretionary fund has been set aside to look at the cases of future claimants. Where they merited payment, they would get it. Despite what Mr Maskey said, the paper states that the losses to those vulnerable groups, especially those with children, will be covered. People will not lose out, yet we are told that this is not sufficient.

Sinn Féin has tied itself up with its rhetoric that not one person would lose out. The truth of the matter, given that the total welfare budget will not rise as fast as it would have without welfare reform, is that some people were always bound to lose out. Let us not pretend that that was not going to be the case, but the groups deemed to be the most vulnerable have been covered. I am sure that the Minister for Social Development will be more than happy to spell out, and will be more competent than me in doing so, the detail of how those people will be covered. By turning our back on the Bill today, they, the very people whom those who signed the petition of concern claim to want to protect, will not be protected.

2.15 pm

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that, in addition to the group of people he is talking about, there is a considerable number of vulnerable people who would have been better off under the welfare reform package that had been negotiated but who, now, will not be better off as a result of this?

Mr Wilson: I was just coming to that. Some 80% of those who will be affected by the changes to universal credit will either be no worse off or better off. Forty per cent, or 80,000, of them will be better off; 40% will be no worse off; and 20% will be less well off — and even they will have transitional protection in that it is only when their circumstances change that they will find that their payments are reduced.

Here is the real danger. I said that we were entering uncharted waters on this. I pay tribute to those parties who recognise that there are difficult decisions to be made and that there are costs involved in that. At least, they have not buried their head in the sand in the way that Sinn Féin and the SDLP have done. They have been prepared to support this. The real danger is what will happen if we do not proceed with this and if we prove that we are not mature enough to take the hard decisions. Being in government means that you have got to take hard decisions. It is one thing to say that we want devolved government and we want more devolved powers — in fact, I heard Mr Maskey say that he wants not just this devolved, but a lot more fiscal powers devolved — but putting up or putting down taxes will be hard decisions to make because they will have consequences. If you cannot deal with the issues that we have before us, how can we hope to deal with any more powers being transferred to the Assembly? If we do not have the ability to do that, one of the possibilities — I do not want to be alarmist. We have muddled through crises before in the Assembly, and the only people to have suffered have been those who have been affected by the delays and the indecision, and the only thing to have suffered has been our credibility. I do not think that our credibility being affected in that way is good for the political process. Some people play fast and loose with it.

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: I will give way.

Mr Storey: The Member will recall, I am sure, a document that was published by Sinn Féin, ironically called ‘Sinn Féin Welfare Reform: The Facts’. That is a contradiction in terms. In that document, Sinn Féin said:

“Sinn Féin will not be part of any agenda that punishes the most vulnerable in our society.”

Yet, in a Department in which it had control, the Education Minister made a decision without reference to anybody else — and I see the Education Minister is in the House this afternoon — and £1.7 million was taken out of the early years fund. Who has that affected? Who has that punished? That was deliberately a target towards families that are now in a very dire situation. So, when it has the control and the power, it attacks the vulnerable, and that is the accusation that it is making against the rest of us.

Mr Wilson: Furthermore, the vulnerable are attacked as a result of the incompetence of Sinn Féin in dealing with the issue of welfare reform. Of course, that £1.7 million reduction in the early years programme, which deals with vulnerable families, could have been avoided by simply passing the Welfare Reform Bill. The money we would have saved in one week, rather than it going back to Westminster, would have ensured that those early years programmes were continued. So, not only has the financial situation been brought about by Sinn Féin, but the Minister decides to attack the vulnerable rather than cut some of his pet projects. Of course, he could have saved that money by not pursuing as rigorously his policy of promoting Irish language schools, but, no, Irish language schools are much more important than those families who would have benefited from the early years programme. Again, we can see the hypocrisy of the party opposite. They use such fine statements as, “We want to protect the vulnerable”, but, when they have to make decisions about protecting the vulnerable, they are not so good at doing it.

That takes me to the absolute crux of the point that I want to make. We do not know where this will lead us, constitutionally, but one of the options, constitutionally, is for the Government at Westminster to say, “Since welfare reform is not devolved to Wales and not devolved to Scotland, and Northern Ireland can’t handle it, we will take it back to Westminster”, and all the protections that I have spent some time outlining here today will disappear. Somehow or other, that is supposed to be a good outcome for the vulnerable and for those who will be mostly affected by welfare reform.

If that is the logic of those who have signed the petition of concern, then it is little wonder that the stock of some Members in the Assembly is so low amongst the general public. That is something that has to be given real consideration. Of course, there might be no immediate decision taken by the Government to take this under the control of Westminster, but the one thing that they cannot allow to happen, and the one thing that we cannot allow to happen, is for this festering sore to remain here, because it is going to be more and more costly. Mr Beggs outlined the escalating cost, and I do not want to go into that. As the gap between welfare payments in Northern Ireland and those in the rest of the United Kingdom widens, we will pay back more and we will also pay for the additional cost of administration as we lose the use of the UK-wide system of administration and have to take that on under our own hat and auspices.

It is probably too late, at this stage, to ask those who signed the petition of concern to withdraw the foolish action they have undertaken. I am not an expert on this, but I suspect it is too late. However, we have spelt out the consequences of it. Putting this on to the Floor of the Assembly was not due to some rush of blood to the head by the decision-makers in the DUP. It was something that had to be done, and was done only after every effort was made to try to resolve the issue. I must say that I am disappointed that we have failed to do that.

I have just one word of warning. Sinn Féin is magnificent with words. This is how Mr Maskey started his speech. He said that the aims of his party were to protect the vulnerable. Well, I think I have shown that they are not protecting the vulnerable in this. He also said they aim to have a workable Budget. The Finance Minister will have a lot to say about how workable the Budget will be if the welfare reform changes do not go through. Mr Maskey also said that his party wanted the acquisition of more fiscal powers. Anybody who would want to add more fiscal powers to the Assembly and to the people who bury their heads in its economic sands would be out of their skull. Indeed, why would you hand fiscal powers to people who clearly cannot even handle the powers they already have?

I do not know whether anybody in the Irish Republic ever watches or listens to the debates in the Assembly. I hope that those in the Irish Republic, who Sinn Féin hope will eventually vote them into some coalition arrangement after the next election, are listening to this debate. If they pay any attention to it, they will realise the financial and political incompetence that rests on the Benches across the way. If their representatives in the Republic turn their backs on economic and political reality, in the way that Sinn Féin has done here, then, if the people of the Republic are foolish enough to put them into a position where they hold the levers in a coalition arrangement, dear help that economy. We do not need the Southern economy to go into a tailspin because of the kind of people who might take up those kinds of positions: claiming to be anti-austerity but not having a clue as to how to run a modern economy in any one way.

We believe that we have brought forward an honest attempt to square the circle of the welfare changes at Westminster, which have inevitable consequences here, just as they did in Wales and in Scotland. In fact, it is significant that, although the Scottish nationalists claim to be anti-austerity, they accepted that those welfare changes had to be implemented. We have brought forward an honest attempt, and we have spelt out the consequences. I hope that, as people cast their vote at the end of the debate today, they will bear all those points in mind.

Mrs O'Neill: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I will start by picking up on some of the comments made by the previous Member, particularly in relation to his commentary on the electorate in the Twenty-six Counties. The Member should cast his mind back to the European elections: half a million people across the island are consistent with what Sinn Féin does, particularly in relation to our policies of standing up for the most vulnerable and for public services. That is something that we are very proud of, and it is not something that we will stand back from. The immediate difficulties —

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: The Member should let me get started.

Despite the fact that, as the previous Member said, we knew that this was coming and we were always going to arrive at this point, we are debating the Welfare Reform Bill in the Chamber today because the DUP and the Social Development Minister decided to move the motion on the Bill, despite knowing that there was no way it would command any kind of support in the House. The reason we are in the immediate crisis that we are in today is that reality.

We have not had the papers come forward. I listened carefully to the Social Development Minister's opening remarks, particularly around the fact that so much information had been provided. There is no doubt that there has been plenty of to and fro in the form of discussions with advisers and across our parties about ironing out all the difficulties and trying to put in place the protections that clearly need to be put in place. However, this is despite the agreement that was arrived at in the Stormont House Agreement, despite the Minister's commitments before Easter that there would be papers coming forward and that we would chart our way through and despite the Minister's promise to the House — I will quote him — that no one in the North of Ireland would be:

I ask the Minister this: are the cuts of £1,750 to the child disability premium not an adverse effect? In my book, that is most certainly an adverse effect and something that the House needs to be very concerned about.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: I am sure that the Minister will take his opportunity when he sums up the debate today to respond to the points. The Minister will have his opportunity to respond to the points that I have outlined. He clearly said, again, that he had done everything that he could to find a way forward, but, again, that is not the case. Where is the bedroom tax paper?

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: Again, the Minister can address these points in his contribution towards the end of the debate.

Where is the bedroom paper? Where is the agreement on the disability scheme? Despite the fact that my party clearly flagged up our concerns and the issues that we need to see addressed, that has not been forthcoming. The Minister created the immediate crisis that we are in today by taking the Bill to the Floor, knowing fine rightly that it will not be agreed today.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way to somebody who cannot respond at the end of the debate?

Mrs O'Neill: Let me get on with my contribution to today's debate. Everybody has the opportunity to put their name down and go through the normal procedure.

The debate so far today has taken a very narrow view. It has been about taking that narrow approach. It has very much been about trying to apportion blame, which is not helpful. It is not helpful to the electorate. We cannot look at welfare as an isolated issue; it is something we need to look at in the round. Sinn Féin has consistently said that it wants to work with the other parties and address the outstanding issues. I have clearly highlighted the opportunities that we have taken. We want to be constructive and continue to be constructive in our approach to all of this. What we have failed to do and what many contributors this morning have failed to do is to focus on the bigger picture. The reality is that there is a black hole in the block grant. The reality is that we have been stripped of £1.5 billion. The reality is that George Osborne has clearly said that he will make more in-year cuts. I challenge the other parties to start looking at the major issues that we have to address collectively in the time ahead. When Martin McGuinness asked Theresa Villiers for confirmation of the implications of what is coming in the July Budget, she did not know. She does not know, but the Finance Minister in the Executive here knows.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: It all leads to the artificially created crisis that we find ourselves in today. I make those points because they are points that need to be made, but I come back to the point that Alex Maskey and Martin McGuinness made, which is that we need to work together. We cannot roll over and just deploy what the Tory Government want — cuts, cuts, cuts to public services.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

I listened carefully to Members trying to play welfare off against public services. That is not the way to look at it. That is a disgrace. This is not about one or the other; this is about all. This is about protecting our front-line services and protecting people in relation to welfare. The public will look at the debate today, as they have looked at the debate in recent times, and they must be asking themselves what the vision of the Assembly is. Do the Executive have the vision to stand up for public services and the most vulnerable? When our electorate looks to Scotland, they see the contribution that the SNP has made. Nicola Sturgeon is standing up today and talking about her anti-austerity policies, and this Executive need to take the same approach. The Scottish Executive have sent out a clear invitation to work with our Executive and the Welsh Executive to challenge the Tories on their austerity policy.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: It is comical that Sammy Wilson referred to people burying their head in the sand, because I very much think that the DUP has an ostrich mentality when it comes to standing up to the Tory Government. There are parties in the Chamber that are very happy to cosy up — [Interruption.] — to the Tory Government and their austerity policies, but not one party in the Chamber stood for the recent Westminster election on the same Tory policy. Not one person put that in their manifesto. The people in the Six Counties did not vote for a Tory policy of austerity; the people in the Six Counties voted for local, elected politicians. [Interruption.] That is why we are devolved. We have an opportunity now to stand up and show the electorate of the North that we will work together and face down the Tory policies of austerity. [Interruption.] People can choose to sit in the Chamber today and try to apportion blame, but it does nobody any good.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs O'Neill: At the end of the day, we need to work together. I can say it 10 times in 10 ways if you like, but the reality is that that is what we need to do. We need to face down the Tory austerity policies, and we need to do it together. [Interruption.] There is still time —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask Members not to make remarks from a sedentary position. The Member has indicated that she is not giving way.

Mrs O'Neill: There is still time for parties in the Chamber to work together. People should change tack and work with the Scottish and Welsh assemblies. They should clearly stand up for the local electorate, for welfare and public services and to protect the most vulnerable. People must work to achieve a workable Budget. We cannot continue with the raids on the block grant and the £1.5 billion black hole that has been created. We cannot continue with that policy. We need to work together. We need more powers to grow the economy, and we need to create employment. Sinn Féin believes that all the parties in the Chamber can work together. You can all sneer all you want, but that is the reality of the situation. Either you sit here and accept what the Tories give you, or you stand up for the people who elect you.

Mr Attwood: I express my best wishes to Peter Robinson in light of his current ill health. I hope that he makes a full recovery.

This might bring a slight smile to the Minister's face — it might be the only one in the next five or 10 minutes — but, when he was here at Further Consideration Stage, I said that, whilst there was definitely a new broom handle, it was still the same old brush. With that precedent, it seems to me that some of the Minister's opening comments, which were, maybe somewhat surprisingly, very slight — I am sure that he will correct that when he comes to the reply, which, no doubt, will last substantially longer than his opening speech — suggested that some new bristles were being attached to the old broom.

From our point of view, we would like to look further at that and at a lot more, and we will come back to that.

Whilst we have been setting out our stall on welfare today, a number of Members have commented on the fact that the Scottish National Government have been setting out their stall on everything. Whilst I think that some have relied on what the Scottish Government have done today in a rather casual way, it is worth looking at what the Scottish National Party has outlined today, where it outlined it and what it was saying.

The Scottish First Minister went to Hearts Football Club in Tynecastle stadium, and not only did she outline a business pledge with businesses and unions in Scotland and say that she wanted to enter into arrangements whereby a living wage was paid by businesses in Scotland, including Hearts Football Club, which is where they were this morning, she also outlined what their approach to the new Tory Government was going to be.

Whatever our views may be on welfare, we should all take a little bit of time between now and 42 days from now, when the Chancellor will announce the full scale and speed of his first austerity Budget in the lifetime of the five years of this Parliament, to assess what Cameron, the Chancellor and Iain Duncan Smith, who is curiously back in DWP, intend to do, not just to the people of England but to the people of Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Given the fact that the DUP attends Westminster, and I welcome that, it will have to make a decision, which is whether it puts its hands up when the Queen's speech is outlined and when the Chancellor outlines what he is going to deliver in the first months and years of this new Westminster Parliament, which is not just going to have an impact on the people on welfare in Northern Ireland and Britain but on thousands of other people in the public and private sectors, especially those elements in the private sector in Northern Ireland that are dependent on public-sector work.

So, if we step back for just one moment and recognise that there are 42 days until the Chancellor and the British Prime Minister announce what they are going to do, it might bring, even late in this debate, a slightly different perspective that would well inform and well serve all the parties here, especially those parties that will be sitting in Westminster and will have to make calls on what the British Chancellor announces in the first week in July.

Nicola Sturgeon said that she was going to try to attack the scale and speed of austerity, work up an alternative to austerity and that she, John Swinney and her colleagues were saying to the British Prime Minister that he cannot ignore the democratic will of the Scottish people. She made the point, which has been proven time and time again, that austerity slows down economic recovery, and she concluded by saying London had to change their approach or lessen the impact on Scotland.

Whatever we think about welfare, if that is not a pathway for what we should be doing in the next 42 days in our engagement with the British Government, we are ill-serving not just those who are on welfare in Northern Ireland but all the people of Northern Ireland, who will live with all the consequences of what the Chancellor and the British Government intend to do in the next 42 days, the 42 weeks thereafter and the 42 months that will be the early months of the next British Government.

I have to say to Mr Campbell that I do not understand his speech. In one way, understandably, it was all about the moment, the Welfare Reform Bill and what it does and does not mean for the political and constitutional authority of this place. However, I do not understand that, in making those observations about the moment and the Welfare Reform Bill, he had nothing to say about the next 42 days. When Nicola Sturgeon, a few hundred miles away, has so much to say about the next 42 days, I do not understand how we can be silent on all of that, when she and so many others are speaking up.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will, yes.

Mr Allister: Perhaps the Member will tell us what his mentor, Ms Sturgeon, did about welfare reform in Scotland. Was she silent on it or did she resist it and succeed in overturning it?

Mr Attwood: I think that that question suggests that, on this occasion, which is a very rare occasion for Mr Allister, maybe he does not quite understand the constitutional arrangements that exist between Scotland and London and Northern Ireland and London. As I think he probably now recognises, when we negotiated the Good Friday Agreement, we negotiated that Northern Ireland would have devolved powers for welfare —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

The other parties did as well. So we are in a constitutionally and legally different situation from London. However, this is what she then did: she did things that other parties in the Chamber took a bit of time to recognise as useful and some things that parties in the Chamber still have to recognise as useful. What does that mean? It means that the Scottish Government were the first Government to say that, on a pound-for-pound basis, they would mitigate the impact of the iniquitous bedroom tax.

Mr Wilson: No, that is not true.

Mr Attwood: They were the first devolved arrangement that, on a pound-for-pound basis, mitigated the impact of the bedroom tax. When that suggestion was raised on the Floor of the Chamber, Mr Allister, through you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, it came from the SDLP proposal, and the response from other parties was to mitigate it only for existing and not future tenants. The ball has moved on in that regard, and I welcome that, but I will come back to the issue in my closing remarks, because I have questions to put to the Minister for Social Development arising from his opening comments where, again, I think that he created some muddle — to put it mildly — in relation to the bedroom tax.

Mr Allister, what the Northern Ireland Assembly did not recognise, unlike Scotland, was that welfare was so important that it created a dedicated welfare committee. As the anoraks in the Chamber will know, one of the committees regularly covered by the Parliament channel is the Welfare Reform Committee of the Scottish Parliament. That programme recognises that that Government and that Parliament put in place mechanisms to drill down on what is happening on welfare to try to protect the Scottish people.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: That proposal was rejected during the Consideration Stage and the Further Consideration Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill in the Chamber only a matter of weeks ago when the opportunity for us, collectively, to interrogate welfare reform was available. We will live to regret that. Why? Because of the scale of what is about to hit us when it comes to welfare reform, even to the point where the welfare reform Minister in London, Iain Duncan Smith, briefed the papers over the weekend to say that he is trying to resist the British Government's imposition of £12 billion more welfare reform cuts. Iain Duncan Smith is telling the Treasury that that is too far, too fast.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: The architect of welfare reform and welfare cuts is now arguing with his own Government that they need to slow it down, even in his terms.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. We know that he has eulogised the Scottish Parliament on quite a few occasions; some of us might wish that he would go and join it. Since he is eulogising the Scottish Parliament — he is quite right that it does not have the same constitutional powers that we do — it did, for example, have the power to set up a supplementary fund to help those who were affected by welfare reform. Did it do that? It did have the opportunity to introduce separate schemes such as we have done for vulnerable groups. Did it do that?

The truth of the matter is that they did not, because they knew the limits to dealing with the aspects of welfare reform, and it was quite convenient for them to say, "It was the bad English and not us".

2.45 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: It is time for Question Time with the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development. We will return to Mr Attwood after Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Agriculture and Rural Development

Bovine Viral Diarrhoea: Compulsory Testing

1. Mr Irwin asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what plans she has to make bovine viral diarrhoea testing compulsory. (AQO 8249/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): My Department has prepared draft bovine viral diarrhoea (BVD) legislation, which has been approved by the EU Commission and is ready to be subjected to the legislative processes here. Before I can introduce such legislation, Animal Health and Welfare NI needs to demonstrate that it has sufficient private sector funding to enable it to maintain the implementation of the eradication programme without the need for further public funding. This is important, not only because of the pressures on available public funding, but because of the need for industry to lead in tackling this production disease.

Significant progress on this issue has been made recently, and Animal Health and Welfare NI has presented a draft of its viability and sustainability plan, which is being considered by officials. I also have to be satisfied that Animal Health and Welfare NI, which will be responsible for the implementation of aspects of the legislation, has an IT system that is fit for that purpose. While the current system has been adequate for the administration of the voluntary BVD programme, it is not yet sufficiently robust to enable the introduction of legislation. Animal Health and Welfare NI is working with its database provider to resolve those issues.

I would like to highlight the amount of work being taken forward by Animal Health and Welfare NI, in conjunction with my officials, to facilitate making the BVD eradication programme compulsory. In many respects, this project has been breaking new ground, and it has, of course, presented a number of challenges that have taken time to work through. I also highlight the positive contribution that the industry, both the dairy and beef sectors, are making to that ongoing work.

I am hopeful that any remaining issues can be successfully resolved shortly and that I will be in a position to legislate later this year.

Mr Irwin: I thank the Minister for her response. Does she accept that there is frustration in the industry over the length of time it has taken to get this scheme up and running?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, as I said, trying to get to a stage where we have a compulsory scheme has not been without its challenges. This is very much an industry-led initiative. However, we are very supportive, and we have been working with the industry to get us to the stage we are at. I am pleased that we recently received the viability plan from Animal Health and Welfare NI. Things look good, and I am hopeful that we will be able to move forward and introduce the legislation. We have already had the legislation approved by the EU, so, in terms of the Department's role, we are steps ahead. We want to make sure that the viability and sustainability plan is in place and that we have everything set out that allows us to take a staged approach to tackling BVD.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Príomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. How successful has the uptake of the voluntary scheme been?

Mrs O'Neill: Since the scheme commenced on 1 January 2013, over 4,000 herdkeepers have joined the scheme and, between them, have purchased just over 400,000 tags and test kits. That has resulted in over 300,000 test results being uploaded onto the database, with 289,000 of them negative. The level of persistently infected bovines found is 0.51% of tests, which is about 1,500, and for a further 1%, the results are, as yet, unknown.

Mrs Dobson: As we know, the Minister announced, to great departmental fanfare two years ago, that she was going to legislate for compulsory BVD testing. Can she provide an update on the latest estimated cost to farmers per applicable animal if the scheme becomes compulsory?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have those figures on me. As the Member is aware, we announced it with fanfare, and I still speak about it in those terms. This is an industry approach to trying to tackle a production disease. It is important that we move towards tackling production diseases, as opposed to tackling diseases after the fact, and this is very much a preventative approach that will help improve the productivity farmers get from their animals.

The teething problems are a result of industry problems, not DARD problems. The Department has the legislation on the table and has had it approved by the EU. Before I bring the legislation forward, I need to be assured that the industry can respond to what is set out in it. We have been working our way through that, and I am confident that the industry has produced a sustainability plan that looks very positive. This will allow us to go through due process and bring the legislation to the House before the end of this year.

Rural Micro Grants Scheme

2. Mr McCartney asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the recently launched rural micro grants scheme. (AQO 8250/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: The rural micro capital grant scheme closed for applications just last Friday, 22 May, so you will appreciate that it is pretty early to give any definitive view on the quality or range of applications. However, I can say that the rural support networks were extremely busy dealing with enquiries and calls in advance of the application deadline. I understand that over 450 applications have been submitted and that the eligibility screening process will start immediately, with the intention of working towards issuing letters of offer to successful applicants by July.

As Members will already know, financial support of up to £1,500 an application is available for selected projects, and that is intended to encourage rural community and voluntary groups to improve and develop their facilities and assets, which, in turn, will contribute to improved community engagement in the local area. I anticipate that over 150 rural community organisations will directly benefit from the initial £200,000 set aside in my tackling rural poverty and social isolation budget for the scheme. The new programme represents an excellent opportunity for community groups to build on their existing roles, strengthening community engagement and improving the lives of those living in rural areas. The response so far suggests that the programme will have a tremendous impact in our rural areas.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Can she give us some detail on how the successful projects will be selected and the sorts of criteria that she will be using for them?

Mrs O'Neill: The programme opened on Monday 13 April and closed on 22 May. To reduce the administrative burden and the application processing times, once an application is screened against the programme's eligibility checklist, there is no secondary assessment process. That speeds up the whole grant scheme. Each rural support network has been advised of its grant allocation to fund projects in its area, and all eligible applications up to the allocation threshold for the area can be awarded funding. In the event of the network being oversubscribed, selection will be through the use of random selection, which will be undertaken in an appropriate venue and is open to attendance by applicants. Actual selection will be undertaken by an individual who is independent of the entire process, and selection will be verified by attending DARD officials. Random selection is not a first come, first served process. No grant awards will be made until the call for applications is closed and all applications in the relevant network area have been screened for eligibility. I expect that letters of offer will issue before July 2015.

Voluntary Exit Scheme: AFBI Applicants

3. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development how many Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI) staff applied for the voluntary exit scheme. (AQO 8251/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: AFBI has received 246 eligible applications from staff interested in exiting via the voluntary exit scheme.

Mr B McCrea: Does the Minister have any idea of how many of the applicants will be successful in getting voluntary redundancy?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have those figures now. Obviously, AFBI has to work through its processes for making successful bids to the scheme. Suffice it to say, it is working very hard on its strategic plan for 2020, and I am working very closely with it to set out its priorities for the years ahead, particularly around research, development and innovation. I want to work very closely with it to make sure that we arrive at a sustainable plan for AFBI to have a successful and thriving institute into the future.

Mr Byrne: Given the cutbacks, will the voluntary exit scheme for AFBI be able to be self-financing or will extra moneys be available to it to warrant and pay for the scheme?

Mrs O'Neill: The same as other Departments and arm's-length bodies, AFBI will be able to bid into the voluntary exit scheme that is being taken forward across the Executive. As I said, we are obviously operating in challenging economic circumstances, and AFBI has very clearly been set a challenge and a task to look at how it will be sustainable into the future. We want to have a thriving AFBI. I want to work with it, and I have done so over the last period to make sure that what it brings forward is something that will create a sustainable AFBI, and the strategy is set out until 2020. We have that paper nearing finalisation, and it also looks at the costed savings that AFBI could achieve. It looks at income generation that AFBI could achieve, particularly around increasing EU receipts. I will consider the entire package of proposals very carefully before coming to final decisions on the future direction of AFBI and on how we envisage it working.

Mr Beggs: The Minister referred to her application to the voluntary redundancy scheme. She will, however, be aware that her party's opposition to welfare reform, on which the scheme depended, means that it is unlikely to be available. Can she advise us whether she has any funding in her Department to pay for a voluntary redundancy scheme, or will she have to overlook a compulsory redundancy scheme?

Mrs O'Neill: I will not be drawn into speaking about what-ifs. Unless the Member has a crystal ball, I do not think that he can say definitively what will happen next. The scheme is going forward as is at this moment in time; if there are changes, we will have to look at all of that.

Mr Allister: What percentage of AFBI staff do the 246 represent? In particular, does it ease the foolish agenda of trying to close the Crossnacreevy testing station? Is the Minister hoping to hide behind that as a means of delivering that austerity measure?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not intend to hide behind anything. I do not have the percentage figure either. The total number of applications is 246. AFBI was planning for around 200 to go out on the voluntary exit scheme. As I have already stated, that is all part of its strategic sustainability plan up to 2020 that we asked it to develop. AFBI has many an opportunity to look at increasing its income, particularly from EU drawdowns, and particularly since the Executive have a target to increase our drawdown under Horizon 2020. There are plenty of opportunities for AFBI to look at increasing its income, as it has done significantly down through the years, which has helped it to be sustainable. Given the economic climate that we find ourselves in and the current financial constraints, particularly the implications that Tory cuts to the block grant will have for arm's-length bodies, it is more important than ever that AFBI has a very clear vision of where it is going. I am working with it, and its 2020 strategy paper is nearing finalisation and includes AFBI's costed savings proposals showing how it plans to live within its budget. It is also about increasing drawdowns and identifying priorities in areas of work that will really help the industry, particularly in relation to research and innovation.

Mr Poots: Does the Minister recognise that both Scotland and the Republic of Ireland are pouring more resource into research in agriculture and that the attack that she has made on AFBI is actually an attack on the entire agricultural community? The community will not achieve sustainability if it does not have the quality research that AFBI provides, and it will not be able to replace core funding through the other means that the Minister so blandly points out, with AFBI suffering substantial damage as a consequence.

Mrs O'Neill: I can only continue to repeat myself: there has certainly been no attack on AFBI. I have been working very closely with AFBI. There are a lot of misconceptions out there: I have heard figures about reductions in its budget that are incorrect. I understand that a figure of 26% has been quoted. That is very much not the case. On a like-for-like basis, using the same methodology employed by the Department and across the public sector, the reduction to AFBI's budget is about 11.5%. When you compare that against AFBI's overall cost base, the reduction only equates to 7.5%. So, whilst I do not underestimate the challenges that that creates for AFBI, just because something has always been done a certain way does not mean that we should continue to do it that way. This is why AFBI has been tasked, and why I have worked very closely with it, to look at its future direction, how we can work together, how we create a sustainable, thriving AFBI, because a failing AFBI is not in anyone's interests or those of the agricultural industry. I want it to be successful, and I am happy to continue to work with it. We have a strategy in place now. We have a plan, and, as I said, it is nearing completion.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh LeasCheann Comhairle. Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Can the Minister elaborate any further on AFBI's strategic plan for post-voluntary exit?

Mrs O'Neill: It will all come back to the strategic plan, which we are close to completing. That will very clearly set out AFBI's costed savings proposals to show how it plans to live within its available budget for 2015-16 and up to the end of the decade. I am going to consider the package of proposals very carefully before coming to a final decision on its implementation.

3.00 pm

As I said, none of us can continue to do things in the same way. We need to prioritise what we do, consider stopping certain things and find more efficient ways of getting things done. Particularly on AFBI, we need to look at how we can increase its drawdown of European funding. I have clearly set challenging targets, but I believe that it is up for that and the board is working very hard to make sure that it maximises its drawdown of external funding outside of what the Department allocates, which is quite significant. I do not have the exact figure with me, but I think it is close to £40 million of funding. That is the priority, and it clearly shows that there is a will within the Department to focus on research and innovation. I will continue to do that, and I clearly set out my stall in wanting to work with AFBI to make sure that we prioritise the work for the time ahead.

Forest Certification

4. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for her assessment of the benefits for the Forest Service of retaining forest certification. (AQO 8252/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: Following a full reassessment audit by SGS Qualifor, an internationally recognised certification body, I am pleased to report that the Forest Service management system has been assessed and certified as meeting the requirements of a well-managed forest against standards recognised by the Forest Stewardship Council. The certification process recognises the importance of timber production, along with its environmental and social requirements. The impact of that is significant for the timber industry. Last year, it added over £50 million of value to the economy.

In environmental terms, obtaining forest management certification provides independent evidence that Forest Service plans and operations are maintaining and enhancing the biodiversity of our forest ecosystems. The certificate is also important for tourism. Visitors want to know that forests are being properly managed and that plans for cutting and replanting operations comply with the highest standards.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for the detail in her answer. Has the Minister considered further exploiting the potential of our forests, particularly in tourism and recreation?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, an assessment of the potential for forestry tourism development opportunities was jointly commissioned by the Tourist Board and Forest Service, and confirms that some of our forests are strategically important within tourism destination areas because they have the potential to hold visitors as part of a longer visit. The outcomes of that study have underpinned the decision by the Executive to invest £4 million in forestry tourism projects, collectively known as the forestry fund. That work is nearing completion, and many forests have benefited through improvements to poor-quality and outdated tourism and recreation-related infrastructure.

The forest fund also identified a need to establish a baseline of forest visitor figures in terms of numbers and profile. As a result, a forest visitor survey has recently been completed, and a key outcome will include information on the economic value generated by forest visits. The final report is currently being assessed, and I am confident that the survey will provide a clear evidence base for the value of forest tourism. The information gathered by the survey will also provide an important aid to future recreation and tourism investment considerations and partnership working arrangements. Our forests offer a unique opportunity, and attracting more visitors will have a positive impact on the economy of rural areas across the North.

Mr Swann: Does the Minister believe that the Forest Service currently has the flexibility or ability to maximise its revenue-raising potential, either through timber sales, asset sales or even land leases?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I think that the Forest Service has come a long way from what it did in years gone by. We have social and recreational use of forests and we have seen many examples of very positive working in partnership with councils. Alongside that, the Forest Service also has significant income generation from timber, and there have been no challenges or issues identified to me, but if the Member wishes to raise things with me outside of Question Time, I would be very happy to receive them, because it is very important that we maximise the receipts from Forest Service. I continually engage with the Forest Service chief executive on challenges and opportunities, but we are not coming across major issues or barriers to potential income generation. However, as I said, I am happy to talk to the Member if he has any specific issues.

Mr Rogers: Thanks, Minister, for your answers thus far. In the Republic, there are plans through the new forestry programme to plant over 8,000 hectares over the next 10 years. What expansion plans does DARD have for forestation and creation of woodland?

Mrs O'Neill: I refer the Member to the DARD website. We have very clearly set out our plan and targets for planting.

We have our grant aid assistance to help people to plant out. I do not have the actual details of the targets with me, but I am very happy to provide them to the Member in writing. It is not to say that the targets that have been set and where we have got to with them are not without challenges, but I think that the targets run up to 2020. I will provide those details to the Member in writing.

Ballykelly: Private Sector Development

5. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what discussions with the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister she has planned to ensure that, in addition to her departmental headquarters, best use is made of the remainder of the Ballykelly site in attracting significant private sector development. (AQO 8253/11-15)

14. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on her Department's planned move to Ballykelly. (AQO 8262/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle Cheann Comhairle, I will answer questions 5 and 14 together.

As discussed at a recent meeting of the Executive, OFMDFM is taking forward the sale of the site with the exception of the 8.7 acres that has been earmarked for our headquarters and the 85 acres on the lower site that has been set aside for NI Water.

My officials are working closely with colleagues in OFMDFM on matters relating to our relocation. OFMDFM has confirmed that the announcement of DARD's HQ move to the Ballykelly site has generated more interest in the site. OFMDFM is represented on the programme board that is in place to provide the strategic direction for DARD's relocation programme.

A planning application for a new headquarters at Ballykelly was submitted to Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council on 30 April this year. The planning application is for the building and the new access road required to service the building. A series of enabling works and studies are being undertaken at the site and are due to be completed by the end of May. A transportation assessment has been carried out, which concluded that the proposed access road meets the requirements of the new headquarters. My officials have commissioned DFP's Land and Property Services to acquire the land for the proposed access road.

My officials are now working on completing the full business case. I expect that to be completed by November this year, with a view to awarding the contract for construction in December this year and construction beginning as planned in May next year. My officials are also working with DFP colleagues to identify suitable temporary accommodation in the north-west. This will help to facilitate the transition and ensure that the Department continues to provide the full range of its services to the high standard expected throughout the period of transition.

Mr Campbell: Is the Minister aware that the delay and possible derailing of the welfare reform project, which we are discussing today, puts at risk not just the thousands of jobs at Ballykelly but the other thousands of jobs at the Maze site and the tens of thousands of jobs, all in the private sector, that could be created through the corporation tax reduction?

Mrs O'Neill: I do not want to get drawn into that again. I do not think that you need to play welfare reform against the moving of DARD's headquarters to Ballykelly. The Member will know that I have fought very hard for a better distribution of public-sector jobs. That continues to be the case. These jobs moving to the north-west is a major win for construction in the north-west, the ongoing servicing of the building and a fairer distribution of public-sector jobs. That continues to be the case. I will continue on this journey. We have come a long way to get us to where we are now. The planning application has been submitted. I will continue to make sure that we deliver on DARD's headquarters moving to the north-west because I believe that it is the right thing to do for public service. It is a nonsense to start to play welfare reform against DARD HQ.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister have a time frame for the delivery of the planning application process so that there can be no delays in the delivery of the entire project, which is essential for the north-west?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. On 30 April this year, we had a planning application, which was lodged with the new Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council, for the design of the new headquarters. This application also includes details of the new access road requirements. Consultations have been ongoing throughout the design development process between my design team and other statutory bodies, such as Planning Service, the Environment Agency and Transport NI, as well as the ministerial advisory group on architecture. The building has been sited and designed to minimise the impact on the surrounding landscape, with particular focus on the nearby church. The exterior of the building has been designed so as to integrate appropriately into this rural setting, with extensive use of granite, stone and bronze cladding. The building will be constructed in two phases, with the completed building measuring 6,600 metres squared. The building will provide modern office accommodation for DARD staff and will be built to government office standards, making full use of open-plan spaces and modern working practices. Planning Service works to a 12-week target. We expect this to be completed by August this year. We will then proceed to the invitation-to-tender stage, with a view to awarding a contract for the construction of the building by December this year.

Mr Dallat: I welcome the Minister's response. I also welcome the idea of her Department coming to Ballykelly. Would she agree with me that that is only a tiny part of a 900-acre site? Will she please explain to the House why, in her discussions with Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and others, they are scurrying about only this week and talking about a master plan for a site that has the potential to create hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs? Finally, will the Minister tell us where else in the world you would have a site like that, with an airport beside it, a railway running through it and a main road going past it? There is still no master plan, and an economic task force has still not been set up, so —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Come to a conclusion.

Mr Dallat: — what is happening?

Mrs O'Neill: I welcome the Member's positive commentary on the move to Ballykelly and the benefits that it will bring. I know that he has been a consistent supporter of the move.

It is very clear that the Executive, and OFMDFM in particular, have responsibility for the wider site. The fact that DARD has become the anchor tenant has, I think, very clearly led to more significant interest in the site. That is something that is obviously very positive and something that we welcome. The Executive have set out their stall on needing to move to secure investment in the wider site. Maybe over the last month or so, they have very clearly set out their stall on what they want to achieve and the benefits of moving quickly. OFMDFM did a soft marketing test, which very clearly set out that many businesses out there expressed a significant interest in the site. I cannot remember the number, but many businesses did that.

The potential is fantastic. You are right. The location is fantastic, and there is so much potential, particularly from the railway halt and all the other possible travel methods to that area. They are second to none. My main interest is in securing the headquarters in the site, and, as I outlined in previous answers, we are clearly on target to being able to deliver on that.

Mrs Overend: Setting aside the Minister's shameful actions to date on the issue, not least the blatant disregard for public money, does she think that some of the proceeds of the sale of surplus lands could be put into a community fund for the Roe valley?

Mrs O'Neill: Maybe the Member does not understand. When the site is sold off, it will be an Executive sale. The money will not come into DARD, so it will not be my individual responsibility. It will be the Executive's responsibility how the money is spent.

On my regard to public money, I have very clearly set out my stall on why we need a relocation project. I have also very clearly set out my stall on the benefits of moving the headquarters to the north-west. I have also very clearly set out the benefits of moving the Forest Service to Fermanagh and the Rivers Agency to Loughry in Cookstown in the Member's constituency. Maybe she thinks that that is a bad spend of money, but she can answer to the electorate on that.

We have very clearly set out the benefits of spending public money in that way, with the fairer distribution of public-sector jobs, the construction jobs and the long-term economic benefits that it will create, particularly if you take the increased footfall into a small area like Ballykelly. To me, the benefits very clearly weigh up in the spend of public money.

Rural Development Programme

6. Mrs McKeivitt asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the progress being made in negotiations on the new rural development programme. (AQO 8254/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: Since the European Commission's comments on the draft rural development programme 2014-2020 were received on 31 March this year, my officials have been engaged in a process of negotiation with the Commission to address the comments that were raised and to gain approval for our programme as quickly as possible. The negotiations have included seven videoconference meetings with Commission officials in Brussels and one face-to-face meeting. So far, our ANC scheme that was submitted in the draft programme has been informally approved by DG Agri, with minor technical amendments. We are hopeful of receiving informal approval for more schemes shortly.

Once the Commission's comments have been addressed to their satisfaction, the full draft programme will be resubmitted formally for approval. A period of inter-service consultation will then begin with the Commission. Formal Commission approval for the programme should be received by July this year or September at the very latest. In the interim, my officials will continue to work on the necessary business cases and the design of schemes so that we can start to open schemes once the EU and business case approvals are in place.

Mrs McKeivitt: Minister, it is generally believed that we are the last region to agree to the new rural development programme scheme. Can the Minister advise whether any rural groups have been put at a disadvantage because of that delay? What protections will her Department give to the groups to help them to deliver on their schemes?

Mrs O'Neill: It is untrue to say that the majority of other member states have had their programmes approved, because that is not the case. The Commission underestimated the fact that it would have to deal with an influx of applications coming forward last year and is struggling to turn all those around and get approvals out. The reality is that we are not at the bottom of the pile. I noticed that the Twenty-six Counties had its programme approved, which is something I welcome, but, as for our approval, we are working consistently with the Commission. As you can gather from what I have said, there has been ongoing engagement with the Commission, and we are hopeful that we will get approvals in the next months.

Alongside the work that is being done in tidying everything up with the Commission, my officials are drafting schemes and getting things moving. For example, we invited applications for the agri-environment schemes when people made their claim for the single farm payment by the deadline of 15 May, even though we have only had informal approval of that scheme. We are not letting anything sit; we are making sure that we will have programmes open and ready. You will know that rural groups are still receiving funding, but I am anxious that we learn the lessons of the previous programme, that we do not have a slow start and that we get things moving. We can do that only when we have official sign-off from Europe. In the meantime, we have a body of work to get on with.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to topical questions. The Member listed to ask question 1 has withdrawn their name.

Broadband: Rural Areas

T2. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline her position on rural broadband provision. (AQT 2552/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: The Member will be aware that the responsibility for broadband is a priority of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. However, I have been keen to assert myself and make sure that we work to plug the not-spots of service provision. Anyone who lives in a rural area will be alert to the frustration felt by businesses and by families who may have children who are studying. If you cannot get a connection or have a slow connection, it can be frustrating. My Department has invested £7.5 million in rural broadband over the past number of years. We have assisted 1,700 households in getting a connection. That was done through my tackling poverty and isolation package of funding, and we will continue to work with DETI to ensure that we plug the gaps.

Mr B McCrea: Does the Minister accept that there is huge frustration throughout the rural parts of our country that they cannot get what they consider to be an essential utility for modern living and that it is perhaps something that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development should take on board to drive rather than just leaving it to the techies?

Mrs O'Neill: I think I have just answered that. I said that it was very frustrating for people living in a rural area who cannot get a connection. It is the responsibility of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, which has contributed significantly to broadband across the board. My intervention was merely because rural communities that did not have a connection or had too slow a connection to make any difference were frustrated. That is why I have invested £7.5 million from my tackling poverty and isolation pot of funding. It is also significant that we have been able to assist 1,700 households. However, if you are still in an area where you cannot get a connection, it is only natural that you will be frustrated. I can give an assurance that, from my Department's point of view, I will continue to work with DETI to plug the not-spots and address speed issues in other areas.

Young Farmers: Basic Payment Top-ups

T3. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the number of young farmers who have applied for a top-up to the basic payment. (AQT 2553/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have that figure with me, but I am happy to write to the Member. We had almost 2,500 young people applying to take part in the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise-run course, so that in itself was extremely significant. It exceeded the Department's expectations of the numbers that would come forward. I am not sure how many of those translated into applications. The deadline of 15 May has just passed, and we will be able to assess that over the next number of weeks.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister and would welcome written confirmation. She said previously that the top-up payment would be based on 25% of the total direct payments average per hectare, which I think is around €84. Given the Minister's previous answer, I wonder whether she can give some assessment of the financial implications of that.

Mrs O'Neill: The Member is right that €84 per hectare was the estimated figure that we thought we would be looking at. However, that was dependent on the numbers that came forward and the numbers that came out of the scheme. Until we have the final number, I do not want to give a figure that either raises or lowers expectations of the final payment. As I said, it is dependent on the final number of applications that came forward.

Sheep Sector: Country-of-origin Labelling

T4. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline her Department's progress on country-of-origin labelling in the sheep sector. (AQT 2554/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: It is an ongoing issue that we are attempting to get to the bottom of. The Member will be aware that country-of-origin labelling came into effect in April. Prior to that, as far back as last year, we were dealing with the nomadic issue, and we now have the lamb issue, so I am concerned about what that means for all the other sectors in the time ahead. We have been monitoring recent developments very closely. I am doing everything in my power to address the issue. I have had conversations with Minister Coveney in the Twenty-six Counties, DEFRA in England and Phil Hogan, the European commissioner. I have written to DG AGRI and DG Competition in Brussels about being able to get to a position where we can agree a voluntary label that could be used by the industry — and others in the future if needs be. I believe that we can have a resolution to this labelling issue if there is a will and a way. There is certainly a will in the industry; we need a will from the buyers, such as the big companies that ask for particular labels on their products.

Mr Campbell: The Minister outlined a series of conversations that she had been having. While she has been having those conversations, farmers have seen prices go down. They have declined significantly in recent months. How long does she believe it will be before she starts to see those prices recovering, principally as a result of the labelling saga?

Mrs O'Neill: Obviously, pricing is an issue outside the Department's remit; it is a commercial issue. However, suffice it to say that, if there are barriers — if we do not have fairness in or the supply chain or if we do not have conversations across the supply chain — people cannot plan for potential fluctuations in prices.

In terms of country-of-origin labelling, it is my intention to have it resolved ASAP. This is the time when farmers will be selling, so they miss out the longer this goes on. I made that clear to the European Commission, DEFRA and Simon Coveney. I have tasked my permanent secretary — Simon Coveney has done the same with his permanent secretary — with trying to find a solution. It is in the best interests of our local industry that we find that solution ASAP.

Rural Crime

T5. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on her efforts to address rural crime. (AQT 2555/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: I am very aware of the real concerns that levels of crime are causing amongst the farming community, including the number of livestock thefts that have occurred on farms. I have met the PSNI Chief Constable and the Minister of Justice on a number of occasions and made them aware of my concerns. I explained the real worry that this was causing in rural areas and highlighted the need for something to be done. Responsibility for tackling rural crime lies primarily with the PSNI, but DARD, through its veterinary service enforcement branch and CAFRE, works closely with the PSNI, particularly in relation to the detection, tracing and recovery of stolen livestock. I am aware of some local PSNI initiatives to prevent rural crime. Those are to be welcomed. I am also aware of joint work being taken forward by the PSNI and an Garda Síochána to combat crime in border areas. I welcome the multi-agency approach that has recently resulted in the recovery of stolen animals, arrests and convictions in the North and ongoing prosecutions in the Twenty-six Counties.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her detailed answer. Can she give us any details of her discussions with her counterparts regarding fuel laundering and associated crime, particularly in the border areas?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. I have recently had a conversation and a meeting with the Minister of Justice, David Ford, about the measures that have been taken forward right across the island to tackle fuel crime. It is something that is 100% condemned. We need to continue to work together to resolve it. As I said, I think that the multi-agency approach, with the gardaí and the PSNI working together, has been most effective. Whilst it is too early to say, we are hopeful that the new detection mechanism that has been inserted into the fuel, which is being taken forward by HMRC, will yield improvements and act as a deterrent to people being able to launder the diesel and things like that. I raised it also with Simon Coveney at a recent NSMC meeting. In terms of my responsibility, I am very clear about making sure that we are to the fore in doing everything we can. My Department will play its role in tackling fuel fraud but also rural crime in general.

Broadband: Newry and Armagh

T6. Mr Brady asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline how her focus on rural broadband provision has benefited the Newry and Armagh constituency. (AQT 2556/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: My Department has now invested a total of £7.5 million in rural broadband. This investment has already helped some 17,000 rural dwellers, farms and businesses to access broadband services. The broadband improvement project, which is led by DETI and to which I am contributing £5 million, has been responsible for an additional 14,000 rural premises being able to connect to broadband if they wish. In the Newry and Armagh area specifically, 4,591 premises have been connected through this investment, giving rural dwellers in the area the same opportunities as those living in urban areas.

Broadband is a priority of mine. I want to see all rural dwellers in the North being able to connect to broadband if they wish. To that end, I am investing a further £1 million in the broadband improvement project and allocating £2 million of the next rural development programme to tackling the harder-to-get-at areas that still do not have access to broadband. I want to encourage as many rural people as possible to make more and better use of broadband. I have asked officials to carry out a scoping study to see how my Department can encourage more and better use of broadband so that rural businesses and farmers can benefit from the wide range of government services that are now available online.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for her answer. When will all not-spots be connected? Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs O'Neill: The additional funding from the tackling rural poverty and social inclusion budget will help to reduce the number of not-spots to around 20,000. The broadband funds in the new rural development programme will also target those remaining not-spots. Other government programmes are in the pipeline, and these will also impact on the remaining not-spots. Signing of contracts is to take place once the business cases and programmes have been approved. The target date is mid- to late May.

As I said earlier, I understand the frustration within rural communities. We have made progress in reducing the number of people who cannot access broadband. However, we still have a way to go. In terms of my contribution, I am committed to working with DETI and the broadband improvement projects. I have very clearly set out my intention to invest additional funding to tackle broadband and to try to plug the gaps that are there.

Cattle Identification System

T7. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development whether she has any plans to introduce a new, more robust identification system for cattle to deter livestock thieves. (AQT 2557/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: I think that the system that we have in place is a good system. We look at it in terms of tackling rural crime and how we can address it together. One of the areas that is looked at is whether improvement can be made to the tags. A recommendation has not come forward from the industry that is workable for farmers but also acts as a real deterrent. Outside of that, as I said earlier, the focus has to be on collective and multi-agency working across the island with the gardaí and the PSNI.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for her response. Would she be open to giving consideration to making mandatory the freeze branding of the last three digits of ID numbers on cattle?

Mrs O'Neill: Quite a number of years ago, I was involved in the launch of a freeze-branding project at, I think, Clogher mart. That initiative was taken forward jointly with the PSNI and looked to me like a very beneficial project and a good way to go. However, there was not a lot of industry take-up. I am always very happy to keep things under review. If there is an initiative such as freeze branding, which, as I said, has been piloted but did not have a great uptake, I will always be happy to look at it. If there is something that acts as a deterrent, is easy for farmers to maintain and does not put a cumbersome burden on them, I will be very happy to look at it.

Slurry: Safety Measures

T8. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what criteria her Department uses to quantify the impact of the 'Mixing Slurry Safely' leaflet. (AQT 2558/11-15)

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have that information with me. It is all published on our website, but I am very happy to get it sent to the Member.

Mr G Robinson: Does the Minister agree that the impact of information regarding slurry safety must be investigated to ensure that resources are being accurately targeted for best results?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I agree with the Member about farm safety and making sure that everybody plays their role. The Health and Safety Executive is in the lead, and my Department plays a key role in collective working on making sure that we highlight the dangers on farm, particularly around slurry and the devastating impact that that can have. I can give the Member that assurance surely.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Gerry Kelly is not in his place, so I call Mr Steven Agnew.

Puppy Farming: Legislation/Enforcement

T10. Mr Agnew asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, following the BBC 'Spotlight' programme on puppy farming, whether she believes that the problem is that the legislation is too weak or is it that enforcement has been inadequate. (AQT 2560/11-15)

3.30 pm

Mrs O'Neill: I think that it is fair to say that we have some of the strongest legislation, particularly when you compare us with England, Scotland, Wales and even the Twenty-six Counties. The Member will be aware that I have given a commitment and that we have undertaken a review of our legislation to see whether there are ways in which we can improve things. A number of recommendations have come forward as a result of consultation. The Member will also know that I have extended the deadline for receiving contributions to that consultation, given the recent publicity on dog breeding establishments.

Our enforcement officers do a fine job of taking action on reports made to them. However, whilst I believe that the legislation is strong, there is always room for improvement, in everything in life. If we can do something to improve the legislation and help enforcement officers, I would be very much up for that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Time is up. We now return to the Final Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill.

Executive Committee Business

Welfare Reform Bill: Final Stage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Welfare Reform Bill [NIA 13/11-15] do now pass. — [Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development).]

Mr Attwood: Before Question Time, I was about to respond to comments made by Mr Wilson. He said in passing that, maybe, I should go and join the Scottish nationalists. I think that it is more the case that we should be like them, not join them by going over there. Everybody now knows, not just the likes of me, and I have been making the argument for a long time, that Swinney, Sturgeon, Salmond and the rest are the most effective Government on these islands. They are a very effective electoral and political machine, and we should be as close to them as we can on issues of common interest in order to maximise our impact on the thinking of the Conservative Government in London.

The Scottish Government may be leaders in so many ways, but they could learn some things from here about welfare mitigation. Whatever the dispute about some of the detail, some of the principles were good. Nobody in this party will deny that or say that the principles that informed welfare mitigation, which the Minister brought forward further to Stormont House, were bad. The principles were good, and they are principles that could apply to other jurisdictions in Britain, including the Scottish jurisdiction, to supplement the multiple schemes that they have already introduced to mitigate welfare reform.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I want to make a broader point. It was touched on in a number of contributions, but I think that it needs further detail. Whatever the dispute around Stormont House, whatever the issues around the protection of claimants and whatever the responses in the Chamber to the SDLP and Green Party amendments at Consideration and Further Consideration Stage, an environment exists now that is different from the one that existed at any time since Stormont House. Sammy Wilson said that people here should not bury their head in the sand on welfare. I suggest that, if he wants to make that argument, it applies equally that nobody in the Chamber should bury their head in the sand when it comes to the changed environment that exists at the end of May, compared with any time up to 7 May and after Stormont House. Before 7 May, it was anticipated that there would be a hung Parliament. Before 7 May, it was anticipated that either the Tories or Labour would require the support of other parties, which would be a constraint on some of the worst ambitions of either party if it were to lead the London Government. Before 7 May, no party was going to have an overall majority. Now, after 7 May, that is changed. As one commentator put it, when talking about George Osborne:

"Who's going to stop him now? This is a dash to shrink the state, squeeze everything, contract out what can't be cut and return, as his own Office for Budget Responsibility said, to a prewar, pre-welfare state, bare-bones government. These children of Thatcher are ideologues to the core, often without even knowing it. They have breathed in from infancy a 'common sense' assumption that the state is always wasteful, private and market always good, the collective worse than the individualist. As Thatcher said, you will always spend the pound in your pocket better than any government will. Now he tests that – possibly to destruction. All but the NHS, overseas aid and schools will be cut by a third, according to the Institute for Fiscal Studies.”

So, whatever the context was — I will give way to the Minister in a moment — in Stormont House, at Consideration Stage or Further Consideration Stage, let us not bury our head in the sand about the context that exists in these days after 7 May and in the 42-day run-up to the emergency Budget in July.

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I thank the Member for giving way. Obviously, he believes that I work for DWP and not for the Assembly. Does he not argue against his own point? If the case is as he sets out, it puts the onus on the parties that signed the petition of concern, his own party included. If that had not happened, we would have been able to implement the changes and mitigating measures that we had agreed, and which would have taken off the table the worst elements of what we fear in relation to the current process. What you have done is ensure that what is coming down the road is the GB version, and there will be no mitigating measures.

Mr Attwood: I think that there is a long path in the 42 days between now and the emergency Budget. There is some path to travel between now and then. Either immediately before recess or possibly even after it, the Assembly can convene again and come back to the Chamber to pass a Budget, if it is the wish of the parties. A lot of water will flow under a lot of bridges between now and then, and, in that context, we can do more in respect of welfare reform as it is and, potentially, do more in respect of welfare reform and the Budget proposals that are going to emanate from London over the next 42 days.

Mr Storey: Does the Member not understand the parliamentary process? The petition of concern kills this Bill. It will not come back for six months. That is the period of time during which it cannot be brought back. It could be 18 months before we get another Bill like this through the doors of the Chamber. That is the reality.

Mr Attwood: I do not believe that that is the only scenario that faces the Chamber this afternoon, and I will outline why. If you think it is, you should pull the Bill, and tell London to put its welfare penalties where they should be: in the bin. Tell London that we will now join with Nicola Sturgeon and our colleagues in Wales, and say to them, in terms of what is proposed on 8 July, that we want mitigations, changes, amendments, revisions and protections for our people. Otherwise, if you send the message to London today that that is where we are on welfare, the DUP may as well raise their hands for the Queen's speech and for the Chancellor's emergency Budget on 8 July, because you will be saying to London, Minister — I speak through you, Mr Deputy Speaker — that when it comes to it, a party in Northern Ireland will swallow whatever they propose, be it on welfare reform to date, welfare reform over the next three years or the Budget proposals that are going to come in the next 42 days. This is the moment to join with Nicola Sturgeon and say that, whilst good work has been done in mitigating some of the welfare reforms, we want to see the full colour of London's proposals when it comes to welfare and Budget changes, for the reasons that I am now going to outline.

People say that we do not know what London will propose. I understand that, in meetings held last week, which I was unable to attend, the Minister of Finance and Personnel indicated that she and other parties are unsighted when it comes to what will be proposed in the Budget on 8 July. If we are unsighted, we should listen very closely to what the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the CBI in London last week. Here we are, 42 days from the emergency Budget, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, last Wednesday, put up in lights what he will propose. It appears that the new Chief Secretary to the Treasury, Greg Hands, has started to ask Departments whether they can find ways of trimming their 2015-16 plans to fast-track a proposed three-year squeeze.

We have bitter experience of that from 2011. After the election of the coalition Government, the Chancellor went to the House of Commons with an emergency Budget in June. At Further Consideration Stage, I said in the Chamber that there would be a replay of that strategy. Last week, the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the CBI that, when it comes to his emergency Budget in June, there is going to be a replay of what happened in 2011. Osborne told the annual dinner of the employers' organisation:

“When it comes to saving money, we all know that the more you can do early, the smoother the ride.”

He then indicated that the Conservative Party, in its election manifesto, said that it would adopt a three-pronged approach to deficit reduction in the current Parliament: £13 billion of departmental spending cuts, £12 billion in welfare cuts and £5 billion of extra revenue from a crackdown on tax avoided. Treasury sources say the expectation was that the savings would be found from day-to-day running costs — from the pound in the pocket of each person who is in work or out of work — rather than from capital projects. Osborne will use his second Budget of 2015, the one later this year, to outline how he intends to shave about 10% off the £120 billion slice of the welfare budget that is not spent on pensioners. During the election campaign, the Conservatives refused to detail where the cuts would be made, but the Institute for Fiscal Studies said that child benefit and disability allowances would inevitably have to be looked at.

By the time the spending squeeze is over in 2017-18, the independent Institute for Fiscal Studies estimates that — wait for this — the budgets of unprotected Whitehall Departments such as Justice, Transport and the Home Office, will have been cut by a third, once inflation has been taken into account. What does that mean for our Justice Department, or for the Minister's Department, or the Agriculture Department of Michelle, after her contribution to the welfare debate? Change that to unprotected Northern Ireland Departments such as Justice, Agriculture and social security, which will have been cut by a third, once inflation has been taken into account.

That is why the SDLP says to all parties in the Chamber that, given the scale of what the Chancellor has begun to put into the public record and public domain, given that we are 42 days from the scale of all that, which could result in a reduction of one third in unprotected Departments in the Northern Ireland Executive, and given the scale of all that upon all the people who are reliant upon those moneys, be it in the public sector or those in the private sector who are reliant on public contracts, is it not time to stop for a moment and not force through the Welfare Reform Bill? That will send the message to London that, when it comes down to it, that is what the Assembly does in a moment of a crisis when people are talking up the potential collapse of the Executive. That is something that Sinn Féin relied upon as its defence for putting through what it called the best possible Budget in November of last year and in January. The collapse of the institutions was their protection, as they saw it, for putting through the worst austerity Budget that we have seen in this part of this island since 2011.

Is it not time to take time out, Minister, and to say, "Let's not move. Let's gather ourselves and see who our allies are. Let's then go to London."? If we send out the message today that we are going to go quietly when it comes to the scale of what the Chancellor is proposing — he is proposing to get the pain up front rather than later when his tax relief begins to kick in — then we are letting down not only people on welfare, but we are letting people down. They will all suffer the consequences of the scale of that.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I omitted to say earlier that our thoughts and prayers are with him and his family on their recent bereavement. He knows that we have been thinking about them at this time.

Does the Member forget that we had a five-party agreement? We sweated it out, had the discussions at Christmas and had the detail, despite what Sinn Féin says about not having the information and the papers. We did all of that and still, when we had got a five-party agreement, parties in the House could not honour the commitments and keep their word. Now, because of the budgetary issues, we are in the crisis that we are in. It is not because I arbitrarily decided to move the Bill's Final Stage today.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Member for that intervention. I acknowledge his further words today and the words that he conveyed to my family over recent days.

I will deal with that point fully in a moment, but I want him to consider, because he is the welfare Minister, and he will be the Northern Ireland welfare reform Minister, what is now being scoped out in the public and media domains for what the next phase of welfare reform will look like. According to a lot of sources, it has eight or nine different features. Whatever the views of the Minister, the DUP and other parties are on the content or even the integrity of the Stormont House Agreement, I think that what I am about to outline will deliver a withering blow to whatever was agreed at Stormont House unless we all box cleverly and maximise a position of strength when it comes to the Tory Government.

This is what informed sources are now saying is the scale of what the Chancellor, the Treasury and Downing Street are about to propose. First, they are saying that the annual benefits cap — some of this is in the public domain — will be reduced from £26,000 to £23,000 a year. Given the scale of unfunded commitments that are measured by £5 billion in tax breaks and a reduction in inheritance tax, I would be very cautious about believing that a reduction of the benefits cap to £23,000 is even the limit of the Chancellor and DWP's ambitions. Secondly — again, this has been talked about in the public domain — those under the age of 21 who are claiming jobseeker's allowance will be barred from claiming housing benefit. What will be the consequences of that? That could be 42 days away. What will be the consequences of so many —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Can I disturb the Member for just a moment? A Member has a telephone close to the microphone system that is interfering with the Hansard recording. The Member may continue.

Mr Attwood: I will stand up and say that it is not me, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Perhaps others want to declare an interest in that matter.

What will be the scale of that if it transpires?

Thirdly, papers leaked to 'The Guardian' within the past few weeks warn that the £120 billion-a-year legal cap on welfare spending could lead to extremely controversial cuts to benefits. The Minister will be aware that, during the Stormont House negotiations, Mark Durkan repeatedly warned about how London would use its welfare cap there and the notional welfare cap in Northern Ireland to cap welfare spend going forward. The Government could short-circuit so many of the welfare reform proposals that they are clearly intent on imposing by putting in place welfare limits in London and Northern Ireland that say, "You work within that financial threshold". That would drive a coach and horses through any financial envelope that the Minister had been able to secure in the Stormont House proposals. The plans leaked in that memo also suggest that savings could be found by increasing the bedroom tax by applying it to categories of renters other than just social housing tenants. That point confirms that the changes — [Interruption.] — yes, you know what I am going to say — that I introduced as Minister to try to stop profiteering by landlords in the private sector were not subject to the bedroom tax, as Sinn Féin and Mr Wilson tried to claim at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage. Potentially, DWP and the Treasury have plans to apply it to categories of renters other than social housing tenants. The plans also suggest the abolition of statutory maternity pay or alternative proposals to get employers to contribute more to the cost of statutory pay.

Other leaked documents refer to cutting disability benefits, DLA, PIP and attendance allowance and stating that they would no longer be tax-free. Other proposals suggest that those eligible for carer's allowance could be hit by restricting those eligible for universal credit and so on, concluding with this comment from a newspaper article:

"The Trussell Trust charity has estimated that the number of people reliant on emergency food handed out at food banks had increased by nearly a million people under David Cameron's premiership.

But another reason why people should be worried of Mr Duncan Smith's return to DWP is the charity's calculation that nearly half of all those referred to their local food bank between April and September last year were due to failures in the welfare system — including the stricter benefit sanctions introduced since 2010."

I make that point because, on 18 April, every political representative in south and west Belfast got a letter from the Trussell Trust saying that it wanted the cooperation of the political representatives in those areas to help it to communicate and give people access to its south-west Belfast food bank, touching on areas from Twinbrook and Dunmurry to Andersonstown, the Monagh bypass, the Upper Springfield Road, the lower Falls to the Spires shopping centre and all places in between. What we are about to face in the scale and speed of further welfare reform is captured in all that, yet we are being asked to sign off on something from Stormont House, whatever the dispute might be about the details. When it comes to welfare, you begin to wonder whether the Stormont House Agreement is worth the paper it is written on. Whatever the dispute might be, if that was the understanding at the end of December, it is now five months later, and that is the SDLP's best understanding of where DWP, the Treasury and the British Prime Minister now intend to go.

What is the point in the Executive, on the one hand, giving money to support those in welfare need when, on the other hand, the British Government have plans for the Budget and welfare to take much more money away from us when it comes to those who are subject to public funding or welfare support? You begin to wonder what the point is in trying to negotiate and get a position of strength, even though it was not all the strength that we thought it should be, when we end up in a situation five months later in which that is the scale and speed of London's proposals for the Budget and for welfare. I suggest to the Minister that that is at the core of this debate. Whilst you can try to legislate for what the situation was, despite the disputes ever since over Stormont House, is it not a precautionary position and one of strength to ask about the authority of all that when the carpet will be pulled from under all of us with welfare and the Budget? That is not speculation; it is in the parliamentary diary at Westminster. There will be a Chancellor's statement on, I believe, 8 July. He is not hiding what he is going to do. He may be coy about some of its scale, but he is not hiding it.

Do we not have a responsibility to ourselves and to all those who are subject to public funds, whether it is welfare or otherwise, to say, "We need to see the colour of all that to make our best judgements about all this"? It is a very simple commonsensical political point, and I ask the Minister and his party, even in these latter hours of the debate, to consider that.

I want to make three other points. I missed the Minister's very early remarks, so I apologise if I am picking up some of this wrong. I acknowledge that the Minister appears to have moved further in a positive way on independent advice for those who are on welfare benefits and who may be looking for universal credit. As I understand it, and I stand to be corrected on this, guidance will be issued. I welcome that, although a statutory right to independent legal advice is always the position of strength, because it guarantees it in primary law. The Minister is proposing that there be some sense of guarantee in guidance. Guidance is very important, and I have always argued that it is very important. That was a lesson taught to me by Eileen Evason when she advised DSD in my time in that Department.

It is very important, but it is less than primary legislation and less than regulation. I will say this to the Minister: in the conversations that we are going to have to have, we are not walking off this pitch. We will stay on this pitch and will have some further conversations. For reasons that the Minister will know, I was not party to some of that over the last short while, but I would like to be party to it over the next short while. This is only one example, but moving the right to independent advice from a point of guidance to a point of regulation would be helpful. However, I have to say to the Minister that the comments that he made on the bedroom tax only confirmed our worst fears and did not give us any more reassurance. The Minister will recall that, during Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage, Mr Agnew, other Members, and the SDLP questioned the Minister on the bedroom tax. I remind the Minister what he said during Further Consideration Stage on Tuesday 24 February:

"Once the social size criteria restriction is introduced"

— that is the bedroom tax —

"and the claimant residing in either a Housing Executive or housing association property is identified as underoccupying that property, the amount of housing benefit that has been made in payment will be reduced. The mitigation measures will, however, ensure that claimants do not see any difference in the amount of financial assistance that they receive to meet their housing costs. It will be only after that point that an offer of suitable alternative accommodation will be made and only when an appropriate-sized dwelling becomes available." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 102, p211, col 2].

The Minister was asked this question:

"If a tenant's housing benefit is reduced because of underoccupation, the mitigation is on a pound-for-pound basis. If that tenant is then offered suitable accommodation on two or three occasions, let us say, and declines, is the mitigation withdrawn?"

to which he replied:

"The Member has answered his own question: it is all in the term 'suitable accommodation'." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 102, p212, col 1].

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I know that he suggested that he may have missed some of the Minister's explanation. However, further to that, the Minister said today:

"I should develop a scheme that protects existing and future tenants from any reduction in housing benefits for their tenancies unless there is a significant change in their personal circumstances or they are offered suitable alternative accommodation." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 105, p2, col 2].

Does the Member agree with me that the DUP is still bringing in the bedroom tax?

Mr Attwood: That is the conclusion that I would have to make, Minister, in response to Mr Agnew. The point of those questions at Further Consideration Stage was to determine whether the bedroom tax, in any shape or form in any circumstances whatsoever, would or would not be in place. The conclusions that the SDLP, and I know the Green Party, drew from Further Consideration Stage, as well as the conclusion that Mr Agnew drew this morning, seem to be that there will be situations in Northern Ireland where personal circumstances have changed and where an offer of suitable accommodation was made and the bedroom tax, having been mitigated in full, will then be reintroduced for that tenant.

4.00 pm

That is the only conclusion that I can draw from what I heard, and Mr Agnew has confirmed it. From what I heard the Minister say this morning, the bedroom tax is going to be in place. It may only be in place for a very small number of tenants — we do not know — but it will be in place for that number of tenants. That is not mitigation in full, it is mitigation in full with the safety net withdrawn in the event of a change in personal circumstances or suitable accommodation becoming available.

Across this debate, from the hour and moment of the first reading of the Welfare Reform Bill, there has not been any stage where the SDLP has not tabled a petition of concern. Whatever difference of opinion there may have been about what London is at and the mitigation measures that are being proposed, as far as I can recall, at every stage the SDLP has held true and tried to block the Welfare Reform Bill in the event of there not being full and satisfactory answers to the questions in respect of the content of the Bill and now in respect of the content and character of what the Tory Government are proposing in the rundown to, and after, the emergency Budget in July. That cannot be said for every party in this Chamber that tabled petitions of concern at any time.

I remember, at Further Consideration Stage, inviting the party to my right to exit the door behind the Top Table, turn right, turn right again, go to the Business Office and sign a petition of concern to block welfare reform. That was declined. I cannot reconcile it, for the life of me. Sinn Féin now has a right-headed approach in respect of welfare. It seems to me that, belatedly, it has come to that. How could it have had such a wrong-headed approach last November when Martin McGuinness said that the draft Budget — the worst austerity Budget since 2011 — was the best deal possible? How could that wrong-headed approach then endure and escalate to the point of Sinn Féin endorsing that draft Budget earlier this year and blocking every single amendment tabled by the Green Party and the SDLP — every single amendment — that was put to a vote? People can draw their own conclusions about all of that.

I will conclude with this comment, if I may: Mark Durkan coined the phrase last week, in our party meeting and in meetings with the British Government and others, that we needed “mature negotiations”. The Minister is thinking that we are not being very mature about things today, but we need to have a concluding phase of mature negotiations, for a number of reasons.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second, because I want to remind Mr Wilson about a meeting that he was at in London just before the election.

According to the junior Treasury Minister, the London Government have spoken to Departments about how they are going to, in the short term, do adjustments that they can announce in the emergency Budget in July. If that is the conversation that the Chancellor is openly saying is happening in London as we speak, and if there is no similar conversation going on with this devolved arrangement or with the Scottish or Welsh devolved Administrations, what does that say about London's high-handedness? They say that they are having conversations with Departments in London about what more they can cut in the very short term, yet it appears there are no conversations going on with the devolved Administrations. Is it not a breach of the agreement in respect of the devolved arrangements that, 42 days from an emergency Budget, London is having conversations with London Departments but, it appears, is silent when it comes to having conversations with the Northern Ireland Government or with the Scottish or Welsh Governments?

To come back to the reference to Mr Wilson, I make that point to remind people about what was said on Wednesday 11 February 2015, at the Consideration Stage of the Bill to give effect to the proposal in respect of corporation tax. Mr Wilson will remember the meeting because he and Mr Durkan were at the meeting where Mr Gauke, who was then the junior Treasury Minister, gave evidence. This is what I read into the record at Consideration Stage, where I referred to an exchange at the meeting in London on 11 February between Mark Durkan and Mr Gauke:

“This is the reply to Mark Durkan from Minister Gauke when he probed him on what might be the approach of London in relation to a heavy stick being used if our funding here in Northern Ireland was not on a sustainable basis. This is relevant to welfare and to the benefit cap. This is what Mark Durkan said:

‘There is some concern, not just because of the experience on welfare reform, where the block grant was fined unless the Assembly passed a Bill that it otherwise would not have wanted to pass ... will the Minister assure us that the judgment that is made on budget sustainability in a couple of years’ time will not hinge on the Treasury saying to the Executive, for instance, “You do not have a sustainable budget unless you introduce water charges”’ and so on. The Minister said to that:

‘my approach to looking at the finances of the Northern Ireland Executive as a whole, in their totality, is that they need to be on a sustainable footing. When it comes to public finances, whether in Northern Ireland or in the United Kingdom—public finances are the sum of its parts—this is a matter of looking at the totality of the public finances’.

He concluded:

‘in terms of how the Treasury will view that in future, I would not go beyond the wording set out in the Stormont House agreement.’— [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 102, p475-6, cols 2-1].

I will give way to Mr Wilson in a second, but that is what the Minister said, and that is precisely what London did when they came to the welfare penalties. Whether or not they colluded with the DUP — Sinn Féin absents itself from the relevant meetings — they engineered the situation where the imposition of welfare penalties was meant to break the back of the Northern Ireland Government and Assembly when it came to welfare reform. Mr Gauke, not anticipating that the Tories would have a majority Government, was telling Westminster in February of this year that they would go back for round two and that, if there were not sustainable finances, the London Government might again begin to wave the stick.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. It is on the point that he made about five minutes ago, but I will come back to it. He and Sinn Féin have made much of this argument that we have to have more conversations around this issue of welfare reform. Does he accept that, if this goes through today in the form that it is in, there is no point in further conversations? The Bill is dead. The Bill cannot be introduced for another six months. The Bill will then have to go through the process again, and it will be two years before this Bill, in any revised form, can be brought to a satisfactory conclusion through this House. Meantime, all of the financial consequences that stem from this decision will have to be borne by the Assembly and the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: My answer to that is simply that the technical should not get in the way of the political. There have been occasions in the lifetime of the Assembly's mandates —

Mr Allister: That is the reality.

Mr Attwood: Mr Wilson was a Member of the Assembly where things that were done were undone. That is the truth. Mr Wilson might forget that, but things were done that were undone. People who were one designation changed their designation. Why? Because the politics of the moment required the Alliance Party to do so. So, when there are parties in here telling the SDLP that today is make-or-break day, let me remind more than one party in the Chamber that there is precedent in the Chamber that, when the politics requires it, means are found to address that. I will let in Mr Wilson in a second.

The Alliance Party might want to remember that, as might other parties. Ambiguity might not be a very welcome thing when it comes to certainty in politics, especially considering what happened after the Good Friday Agreement, when the lack of certainty and commitment to live up to the requirements of Irish democracy saw this institution go into suspension on more than one occasion. Politics and the people should drive how we address this matter, and ways and means can be found to get round that.

Mr Wilson missed the earlier part of my contribution, and I am not making any issue about that with him. The point I was trying to make was: what is the standing, perhaps even the worth, of the Stormont House moneys or of that effort, or of some of the principles agreed to, or some of the mitigations that are on offer — whatever disputes there might be about them? What is the standing of all of that if loans are given on the one hand and moneys are then taken back through new and deep austerity on the other? That issue has to be faced up to in this debate.

There are Members in this Chamber who, properly, represent Northern Ireland in the Westminster institutions — the House of Lords and the House of Commons — and in 42 days they will be up and down for votes, just like the ones that people are trying to impose on this Chamber today. They will be up and down for votes at the next phase of Budget and welfare cuts. Mr Wilson, if you do not send out the message today that you will challenge and confront all that, then London will draw the conclusion that there are people who are prepared, even if not willing, to do their business when it comes to Northern Ireland politics.

Mr Speaker: There is a considerable amount of interference with the speaker system. Someone's phone is causing problems. Could you please check? I understand that the Principal Deputy Speaker had to draw attention to that as well. Thank you.

Mr Wilson: I think I should apologise, because at least the Member has been generous in giving way, and he did not need to. I apologise for missing his words of wisdom, but unfortunately I had something else that I had to attend to.

He dismisses the processes that have to be gone through as being mere technicalities that can be swept aside if politics dictates so. Would he accept, however, that for a major piece of legislation like this, these are not technicalities? The requirements to present the Bill — a First Reading — then for a Committee Stage, public consultation on that, and then a Consideration Stage, are not technicalities, they are legal requirements. It is impossible to do this by having discussions with the Minister some time in the next couple of weeks and then, hey presto, suddenly everything can be reinstated. Indeed, I suspect that his party would be the first to complain if there was not proper consultation as laid down in the Belfast Agreement; or maybe the Belfast Agreement, as far as he is concerned, no longer matters.

Mr Attwood: I will make a number of points and I will deal with his question, but he has to deal with mine. It is this: you sat in the House of Commons Committee on 11 February when the then junior Minister in the Treasury basically said that they would wave the stick again if they had to. That is what he said. What integrity is left to the institutions of the Good Friday Agreement, the Assembly and the Executive, if London, having deployed the big stick approach previously in welfare, are now indicating that they will deploy the big stick approach when it comes to other issues? That is what he said, and he said it in the context of the devolution of corporation tax powers. It was not some passing reference on the Floor of the House of Commons, or an ad hoc comment made at some Committee in the House of Lords. It was made, and deliberately made, at the Committee that was dealing with corporation tax. It was made deliberately because he was putting down a marker.

At that stage, there was some hope that, whatever Government were in Westminster after the election, they would be a coalition that would, somehow or other, reduce the excesses of the primary partner in Government, but that is gone.

How much more keen and ambitious will London be when it comes to, say, the devolution of corporation tax, to do it on its terms? Its terms are sustainable finances, and we are in the moment of seeing what those look like when it comes to welfare. That is why this debate is so important: if we hold the line now, with others, there is some potential that, between now and the beginning of July, a different scenario might begin to prevail.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way again. Of course, he knows that others did not hold the line. Others had to accept the consequences of welfare changes in Scotland and Wales, where the amount of money going into the economy will not rise as fast as it would have in the absence of welfare reform. Rather than waving a big stick — let us not get paranoid about it — the Government at Westminster are simply doing what you would expect any Government to do. If we volunteer in Northern Ireland to pay higher rates of welfare to our citizens and take that decision as a devolved Administration, that is not paid for by Westminster; we have to pay for it ourselves. I know that the term “fines” has been used, but we are not paying fines. We are paying the difference between a decision that we made here in Northern Ireland and the rates agreed by the Government and Parliament in Westminster.

Mr Attwood: If that could be done, and done right, with the guarantees and certainties that we and other parties are looking for — I will raise other matters with the Minister in my concluding remarks — that would be welcome, positive and good. Mr Wilson answers the question about the past and where we are now, but he does not answer the question about where we will be in the future. Where will we be when DWP and Treasury begin to scope out — as I tried to do in an earlier contribution — the scale of the next phase of welfare reform? The future is 8 July, when we will see what early, deep cuts the Chancellor, Mr Osborne, puts into the public domain in order to get over the hump, before introducing the inheritance tax relief that he thinks will see the Tories elected to a third term with him as Prime Minister. Mr Wilson and the rest of us have to deal with all of that: otherwise, we are being negligent and neglectful of the interests of people in the North.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. I will give way to everybody. I do not have an issue with that, but I just want to go back and make this point because Mr Wilson might not have been here for it. Some dispute the quality of the negotiation, as some outside the Chamber clearly do, but what is the standing of the moneys agreed at Stormont House should the scale of what is taken away from us in July be disproportionate to, if not greater than, what we negotiated?

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: We have to ask and answer that question because, if London is giving with one hand, whatever the nature of that giving might be, and then ripping it all back with the other, it does not make any of us look very clever. Worse, it puts in jeopardy and makes vulnerable dozens, thousands and hundreds of thousands of the people whom we are meant to represent.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way and appreciate that he is being generous in doing so, but this is important. He talks about us being very clever, but if all of what he says is right — the Member is always prophesying doom — will he answer one simple question? Where does the money come from? We can try in the House — as others supported in the past — robbing banks to pay for certain things. We can try to wish money into existence, but, in reality, where will the money come from? Will he answer that, or will we just go back to the British Exchequer with a big begging bowl and say, “The poor people of Northern Ireland require more money, so write us a blank cheque”. Those days are over.

Mr Attwood: I will not bury my head in the sand about the essence of that question, save to say three things. First, whatever others in the SDLP and I said at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage about the doom and gloom that we were about to face, we were not telling even half the truth. I ask the Minister to consider that, because he rightly berated us about the scenario that we would face after May. Our answer was that it would be bad and would be an emergency Budget. What did we get? It is worse than bad and will be an even worse emergency Budget. Maybe, on this occasion, we were right and the wishful thinkers on the other side of the Chamber were less right.

The second thing is that, if that scenario is right about what we are facing between now and 8 July, where is the DUP outlining to the people of Northern Ireland how it will maximise its strength with the rest of us in order to try to minimise the impact of all that? I do not hear anything coming from the opposite Benches. Maybe the First Minister had this conversation for an hour with the Prime Minister in the House of Commons. Maybe a lot of stuff went on, or not. What our people out there need to know is what we will do over the next 42 days, given the scale of what we know is coming. We did not anticipate even half of it in January and February. What is the answer to that? All that I hear is a debate about the moment, important though it is, and not about the next five years, as acute and critical as they will be in the lived experience of the people of this part of the North.

Sinn Féin put it in this tiresome way and said, “Let us unite and have a negotiation”. That is another meaningless phrase. This is about hard, strategic common enterprise. I hear that Nicola Sturgeon used those words on Scottish radio this morning about a common enterprise by the people in business in Scotland to minimise what London will do and, in the meantime, try to mitigate that and confront London.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Remember they have 54 MPs. There are a dozen or more from here. That is a wedge to make things more difficult. I will let Mr Wilson in.

Where is the money coming from? The truth of the matter is that the austerity Budget that was voted through in November 2014 and January 2015 — the best deal possible according to Martin McGuinness — was the worst austerity Budget that we have had in five years. Where is the money coming from? There are multiple proposals out there. We have gone through them before.

Jim Wells, when he was Health Minister, took the bull by the horns and agreed to all-Ireland children’s cardiac care. Fifty per cent of our Budget and over 40% of the Republic’s Budget is for health. Given the issues in the health service and the profile of our ageing population, that amount will grow, but we cannot find tens of millions of pounds. What have we been doing? We have been sitting on our butts. Or, some people have been sitting on their butts with nothing being done until Jim Wells came along. I think that Edwin Poots, to be fair to him, also started to do a bit to take forward the all-Ireland health study, which is in the public domain and was published in 2006. In respect of that, useful stuff has been done in the border area and, now, in children’s cardiac care, but not on the scale and range of what is out there.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. It is one thing for him to say that they predicted that there would be huge budgetary pressures. What he will not admit is that this was not a prediction by the SDLP and Sinn Féin. The SDLP and Sinn Féin are the perpetrators of this Budget problem. We are paying £114 million back to Westminster this year that we should not have to pay. We are losing out on hundreds of millions of pounds of loans that would have been available as a result of the Stormont agreement. We are losing out on capital money that would have been available as a result of the Stormont agreement. That is all because his party has now joined with Sinn Féin today to prevent the economic benefits that may have come from the Stormont agreement. This is not a prediction; this is something that his party, the SDLP, has brought upon the people of Northern Ireland. Why will he not, at least, accept his role in the budgetary problems that we now face, rather than simply trying to say that it is somebody else's fault?

Mr Attwood: For what it is worth, I do think that I get things wrong. I think that Mr Wilson, even when he was the Finance Minister, will accept that principle. I got things wrong in DOE and DSD that I still regret, and, if I had got them right, government and the public in Northern Ireland would be in a better place.

Are there things that we could have done better on welfare? Yes. In my view, the DUP dropped the ball in 2011. They bowled it too short to the London Government on welfare reform and welfare need. Technical things that were useful and welcome were negotiated, but the opportunity to confront London that existed in May 2011 was squandered thereafter. There was an opportunity between 2011 and 2013 to push the boat out very much further before London and the DUP came up with the wheeze of imposing penalties.

Mr Beggs: The Member used the word "squandered". Aside from the £114 million, does he not acknowledge that spurning the offer of the voluntary redundancy scheme, which would enable changes to happen in a sensitive and planned manner, and refusing to pass the Welfare Reform Bill will place the Northern Ireland Executive and our collective Budget in a much worse position? Will he advise how savings are to be made, given the critical situation that our Budget is in?

Mr Attwood: I will answer that question and conclude my remarks generally. I think that it was the Minister who asked whether we would go to London again with a begging bowl. Whilst it is not the appropriate phrase, there will be people in south and west Belfast going to the food bank because they have nowhere else to go to sustain themselves and their families. It is not about going to London with a begging bowl; it is about ensuring that the food bank will be less used and there is no need for more of them in Northern Ireland, given what the Trussell Trust has said about the scale of what is required. [Interruption.] The number of people, Mr Wilson, who have gone to food banks as a direct consequence of how welfare reform has impacted on their life — I will find the figures again —

Mr Wilson: There has been no welfare reform here.

Mr Attwood: Precisely. We learn from what they have done. If the Trussell Trust says to us that that is the scale of need for food banks as a direct consequence of the scale of welfare reform and welfare cuts, let us warn ourselves.

I will answer Mr Beggs's question. Either you accept the scale of what is happening between now and 42 days, between now and the Treasury statement to the House of Commons, or you do not. You will have two Members of Parliament there who will have to listen to it and will have to put their hands up for it, if that is what they are inclined to do. Either you accept that the scale of that, whatever it was before, is now greater and puts more people at risk, creates more vulnerability and puts more people in north and west Belfast and across the North in jeopardy of having to go to food banks, or you do not. If you accept that argument, whatever the history, we are now in a context where, if we do not come together and join the Scottish nationalists to try to do something to impact on the worst excesses of what will be proposed in budgeting and welfare, we will be negligent and neglectful and will let our people down. Even if you do not believe it, you should have the common sense to say that we should exhaust the opportunity between now and 8 July.

I say to the Minister that there are issues that we still want to address, partly because of the election and partly because of the interregnum, if you like, since the election. There are still matters that we want to take forward with the Minister. I make that offer honestly, and I think that he will accept it honestly. The reason I say that is that we believe that, when you get down to it, today is an artificial deadline. The reason that it is an artificial deadline, as Mr Wilson knows, is that we need to have a Budget in place — this goes back to Mr Beggs's question — when the bank account runs dry, and the bank account runs dry in August. Is that not the case, Mr Wilson? He has acknowledged that. The bank account runs dry because the 45% Vote on Account runs out in and around the end of July and into early August.

4.30 pm

It is right that, if we do not have a Budget by then, we are in free fall. You will get that admission from me, if nothing else today: we will be in free fall. However, the point is that we have two months not just to conclude welfare but to put it up to London as fully as we can and as united as we can be on behalf of those on welfare and all the others who are subject to public funding, be it in terms of grants, procurement or jobs. The time frame neatly converges, because, if there is a need to have a Budget by the end of July — God knows we have come back to the Chamber after recess when people wanted to make a song and dance about Red Sky or raise an issue about parading — [Interruption.] I did not bring the Chamber back; I did the right thing in DSD. It was you and the DUP who tried to unpick it and lost.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will.

Mr Wilson: The Member is right: the Vote on Account means that there is money in the bank until the end of July. However, he has also run a Department and he knows full well that there are consequences from a Budget. We know that, as a result of some of the decisions that have been made here — for example, we have had to continue paying money back to Westminster, which has impacted on the Budget — changes will have to be made in the Budget. Expecting a Department, on the last day that the money in its bank account runs out, to start making adjustments in its spending for the rest of the financial year is impractical. That is one of the reasons why the Budget process always started in June and was completed by the end of July. He will probably say that it is a technicality, but he knows that there are processes that have to be gone through and that it is not practical to leave this until the end of July. Hence the reason why this is not a contrived deadline; it is a genuine deadline that has to be met because the Finance Minister would be irresponsible to leave things to the last minute.

Mr Attwood: There is some weight in Mr Wilson's point, but the contention that all this has to be done and dusted and concluded today in order to open the door for the budgetary process on Friday, given that it is two months to the end of July is, in my view, problematic and stretches a point. I welcome the fact that Mr Wilson acknowledges that it is at the end of July, and I acknowledge the point that it is better to do it some time in advance of that. However, the notion that it all has to be done and dusted, sorted and concluded in order to move on to Friday and the Budget process is, in my view, unsustainable. The political point is the self-evident one. We should spend our time exhausting the welfare negotiation between now and 8 July or earlier if we can do it, but not to then say that it is all over and done. London has to understand that we will maximise the pressure on them in advance of 8 July. If we do not do so, we are letting down too many people in Northern Ireland who, this year, are living with the consequences of the worst austerity Budget in four or five years, imposed on them by the DUP and Sinn Féin. We cannot allow that to be done a second time around.

Mr Nesbitt: Let me begin, on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, by offering our sympathies to Mr Attwood on the loss of his mother and by repeating what I said outside the Chamber, which is that the Ulster Unionist Party wishes Peter Robinson a full and speedy recovery from the ailment that has the First Minister in hospital. Our thoughts are with the Attwoods and the Robinsons at this time.

What times they are, Mr Speaker, what strange, challenging and disappointing times they are. I am sure that if Charles Dickens were alive we would be ripe material for his latest novel. It was Dickens who told us that you can live in the best of times and the worst of times; that you can live in an age of wisdom but also an age of foolishness; an epoch of belief and an epoch of incredulity; a season of light and a season of darkness.

It is pretty dark in here today, so let me stretch myself to look for some light. Yesterday afternoon, I had occasion to drive down to Newcastle in County Down. Early in the journey, I stopped at traffic lights, and parked beside me was a very nice, shiny, clean 4x4 that was liveried in the words "VIP courtesy car" for the Irish Open golf. I followed it down the road to Newcastle. There was a young man in the front seat. He was obviously one of the European Tour players. I wondered whether it was his first visit to here and what impression he would get, so I tried to put myself in his shoes. It was very positive. There was some fantastic scenery. From Dundrum on the drive into Newcastle, as the number of posters of Rory, G-Mac and Darren increased, the sense of excitement tended to build.

I was going to an event — I see Ms Ní Chuilín and Mr Rogers here, and they were at it as well. It was an invitation from not the PGA or the European Tour but the GAA. The Gaelic Athletic Association was having a demonstration football match as part of the build-up to the Irish Open golf at the weekend. It was holding out the fraternal hand of friendship to the golfing community. Is that not a huge positive? Is it not what we were thinking about in 1998? Is it not a definition of truly sharing experiences and sharing space, which, in that case, was the space that is Newcastle? That is an example this week in Northern Ireland of the best of times.

Here in the Chamber, however, it is the worst of times. It is an epoch of incredulity. A year and a bit after we failed to reach an agreement under the chairmanship of Richard Haass, we now find ourselves failing to implement an agreement that we did reach at Stormont House last December. Sinn Féin talks about the protection of the vulnerable. That stance is costing £9.5 million a month, or £2 million a week, in so-called fines from the Treasury. The Treasury is implementing welfare reform here in Northern Ireland by deducting the money that we should be saving and taking it off the block grant. That is money that we could and should be channelling to help the most vulnerable. If we give somebody £10 above and beyond the GB system, the Treasury simply takes it off our block grant. Therefore, who is in charge? The Assembly and the Executive? No. We have surrendered control to the UK Government.

Of course, if we listen to the Sinn Féin narrative, welfare reform is evil — pure and simple — but if we listen to DSD officials, we get a slightly different narrative. They tell us that 102,000 households — not individuals — would be better off under welfare reform by, on average, about £38 a week if we implemented universal credit. Yes, some households would be worse off. DSD said that 97,000 would be worse off by £31 a week, but that was before the mitigation package that was agreed at Stormont House.

Martin McGuinness is one of our two First Ministers. His responsibility is to all the people of Northern Ireland, and, yes, that includes the vulnerable. His responsibility is not to the people of the Republic of Ireland. As my colleague Roy Beggs made clear earlier in the debate, Martin McGuinness is being shaken by the tail by Sinn Féin's Southern command. To flip-flop at this time, to claim to have proposals and not share them, and to be focused on your party political electoral fortunes in another jurisdiction is simply wrong, and can in no way be defined as protecting the vulnerable in Northern Ireland.

Martin McGuinness spoke one truth earlier: this is about more than welfare reform. It is about an Assembly that delivers for the people. As the last mandate closed, First Minister Peter Robinson said that our great achievement was that we survived the full mandate. He was right. It was the first time that an Assembly here survived a full mandate since the 1960s and the first time ever that a cross-community, power-sharing government in Northern Ireland survived a full term.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member also acknowledge that, ironically, other Administrations did not survive because of the terrorism that many people here suffered and the shenanigans of the DUP over those years?

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for her intervention. I believe that that is one key factor that history will record in its analysis of the political history of Northern Ireland over the last near 100 years.

Survival may have been the key to the last mandate, but the First Minister went on to say that this mandate had to be about delivery. This one is not delivering. It is failing. Frankly, it is in intensive care. It is about more than welfare reform. It is about our ability to pay our debts, not least the £100 million hole in the 2014-15 Budget. We were allowed to have that on the promise that we would use capital resources to pay that £100 million back during this financial year. It is about the thousands and thousands of our citizens who we said could take the benefit of a voluntary exit scheme and leave the public sector. They said, "Yes, we want that", and now they know that, Tantalus-like, it is out of reach and may remain out of reach because of political failure in this Chamber.

It is not just about that. It is also about avoiding the thousands of compulsory redundancies that may follow if the Budget implodes. It is also about corporation tax and the promise of 35,000 to 40,000 good new jobs that could be created in short measure if we agreed to take corporation tax powers and lower the rate to 12.5% to be competitive with the Republic of Ireland. That number of new jobs would be transformational not just for those individuals but for their families, their communities and our society.

Also at stake is dealing with the past, which was too difficult to handle during the Haass talks. What have we done? We have given victims and survivors what we always give them: hope of better days ahead. Are we going to do what we always do after we give them hope and deny them what we promised? It looks like we are.

What about the mental health and well-being of our people? We have one pretty sparse paragraph in the Stormont House Agreement that commits to helping people with trauma. We have so many such people in this country. To relate it to welfare and to those who claim disability living allowance, 12% of all claimants in Great Britain do so because of poor mental health and well-being issues. In Northern Ireland, it is not 12% but 23%, which is double. There is research that states that the reason why it is so high on a per capita basis here is the Troubles. It is one of the most toxic legacies of our conflict.

Take a map of the Troubles, such as that in the 1999 'Cost of the Troubles Study', which shows the hotspots of bombings, shootings and all those Troubles-related incidents. If you then take a contemporaneous map of mental health issues as measured by attempted and completed suicides, alcoholism and drug abuse, you have a match. The evidence is there. Our higher rates are directly causally linked to the Troubles. We made those people a promise in the Stormont House Agreement, and we are about to fail to deliver on that promise today. We could have had a triple win. Helping people with mental health issues addresses a legacy of the Troubles.

It helps them be less dependent on the welfare state and benefits, and it gives them the opportunity, perhaps for the first time in their lives, to be economically active. That is a triple win. Instead, we are going for a triple defeat. The worst of times seems to be our default option. As a predecessor of mine famously put it, we stand at a crossroads. Will it be the best of times or the worst of times? Will it be a season of light or a season of darkness?

4.45 pm

If we fail today, we are in a budgetary crisis, a few short weeks away from the point at which the permanent secretary of the Department of Finance and Personnel will have to step in and when our Ministers will have to go, cap in hand, to a public official to ask for a budget to do what they want to do. If we reach that point, and we are very close, it will represent the death of democracy in Northern Ireland. So, it is decision time. Will it be the best or the worst?

At half-time yesterday, the exhibition match switched from football to hurling, with a poc fada. A few golfers gave it a go. We are talking about experts in their field. They are world-class athletes — people who spend countless hours on their hand-to-eye coordination. Do you know what, Mr Speaker? They could not do it; they kept missing the ball with their hurl. They threw the puck up; they had a swipe; they missed. They tried again; they missed again; and they missed again. To me, it is a metaphor. It is a metaphor for us in the Chamber, because we keep missing. We keep failing to connect. There is no coordination.

So, when the golfers enjoy the best of times this week down in Newcastle, we are condemning our people to the worst of times. This is failure on an industrial scale; it is failure for hundreds of thousands of our people. In golfing terminology, Mr Speaker, we have failed to make the cut.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr Ross Hussey, and I am quite happy if you wish to speak from a sitting position.

Mr Hussey: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. I have sat here this afternoon and this morning and listened to various speeches. The thing we have to remember is that we are part of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. That is where we are; that is the political reality. The British Government decide how much money is going to come to Northern Ireland. There is not a bottomless pit; there is not a bucket of money that we can go to and take out of every time we want it. We should realise that, and we know that. Anyone who was starting from the beginning with a bottomless pit would, certainly, be looking for a much-improved welfare payment scheme, but, unfortunately, we do not have that.

I am going to quote from the speech made by Pat Doherty, the Member of Parliament for West Tyrone, on welfare reform in the House of Commons —

I am now going to quote from the speech made by Conor Murphy, the Member of Parliament in the House of Commons —

This is how much interest Sinn Féin had for those who voted for them to represent us in Westminster.

Sinn Féin talks about power-sharing. It talks of power-sharing, but it does not want to share power. It talks of agreements. The Stormont House Agreement was an agreement between political parties. What happened when the agreement was made? They reneged. We had speeches here, this afternoon and this morning, talking of "whatiffery". In Northern Ireland, we often hear speeches on "whataboutery". This time, it is "whatiffery". What if the Chancellor does this? What if the Chancellor does that?

Again, in Westminster, my Member of Parliament will make the following speech —

I could almost write it, word for word. I will do it again —

He will not be there to represent me.

They have the hypocrisy to sit in this Chamber and talk about Tory cuts. There are four extra votes for the Conservative Government because members of Sinn Féin will not take their seats. They do not have the opportunity to take the seat in Fermanagh and South Tyrone because it is now taken by an Ulster Unionist.

We hear various things in relation to independent advice and, perhaps, to the independent advice services that we have. The £2 million a week that we are returning to the British Government would be wonderful to give to the independent advice services. How many independent advice services or citizens advice bureaux would dance if they were offered that sort of money? Yet, we are handing it back.

This morning, the deputy First Minister said that the Bill, by going ahead, punishes the poor. Sinn Féin's lack of moral accountability is punishing the poor. Martin McGuinness said that there are huge challenges, not just welfare. The implementation of further cuts is threatened by the Tories, and yet Sinn Féin will not take a seat in the House of Commons to challenge the Tories or anybody else. We all know that, had a Labour Government been returned, there were going to be changes, not for the good of the people of Northern Ireland, but these things are going to happen because we are part of the United Kingdom and must accept the Budget that we are allocated.

We are certainly coming out of conflict and having major issues. Mike Nesbitt made reference to the fact that there are those who suffer from mental health issues. The Stormont House Agreement was a jigsaw, and, unfortunately, that jigsaw is falling to pieces in front of us. Not one representative on the opposite Benches has said anything that does anything for the good of the people of Northern Ireland. Heads are being buried in the sand. I really do not know where Mr Attwood thought we were going to go in two months, because it is quite clear that this Welfare Reform Bill is here today. It either passes today, or there is no Welfare Reform Bill.

It is not often that I quote Sammy Wilson — it is not often that I agree with him — but he made it very clear that this is it. The Minister has made it clear that this is it. We take it or leave it, but we leave it with the possibility of major problems for the Budget in Northern Ireland.

However, it can all be resolved in two months. Somehow or other, money is going to appear from nowhere. Has somebody bought a National Lottery ticket and not told us? I am sure that the Minister would love to win the National Lottery, and maybe, Minister, based on what I have heard from Mr Attwood, that is what is going to happen. "It could be you"; but I doubt it very much.

I have sat here today, and I am not impressed by the options that have been put forward by those on the opposite Benches. We have no option. The safeguards that are built into the Bill are better than those which most people in the United Kingdom have. They are better than most people have in England. Yet we are prepared to ignore all that and allow our Budget to go down the pan. I personally would love to have a situation where everything in the garden is rosy, but we do not have that. There is no money to hand out willy-nilly. There are no more buckets and no more begging bowls. It is time for tough decisions.

I thought that a brilliant expression was used earlier:

"the technical should not get in the way of the political."

What about practical? What about common sense? We either get it right now or make a total mess of it. This is not politics; this is playing for the next election. Nobody is paying attention to the needs of the people of Northern Ireland. Sinn Féin plays to the people of the Republic of Ireland, saying, "Look what we did in the North. We hashed it up there." The SDLP is playing for the next Assembly elections, but none of it is for the good of the people of Northern Ireland.

I ask Members to seriously consider the good of the people of Northern Ireland and accept the Bill brought forward by the Minister.

Mr Dickson: I commence by sending my best wishes to the First Minister and wishing him a speedy recovery. I also add my condolences to Mr Attwood on the recent loss of his mother, who happened to be a personal friend.

Today Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Greens are actually voting for the Tory cuts: full, unadulterated, red, white and blue Tory cuts. Thank you, SDLP. Thank you, Sinn Féin. Thank you, the Green Party. You have just chucked out all the concessions that have been negotiated because, as Mr Wilson and others have informed the House, the Bill dies today because of your petition of concern. Let the electorate hear that. Let the people of Northern Ireland hear that. You are the people who, by killing the Bill today, have implemented full-blooded red, white and blue Tory cuts for the citizens of Northern Ireland.

It is with utter exasperation and a profound sense of déjà vu that I stand here today to speak on the Final Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill. I fear not only that we may have thrown away three years of work and negotiations, but that we are now walking wide-eyed into a major crisis of our finances and public services. Even the much-lauded Ms Sturgeon, First Minister of Scotland, is not putting her institutions at risk by her actions.

In a representative democracy, the public have elected us to represent them and to undertake the duties of government on their behalf. That means spending the money allocated to us in a responsible manner, taking difficult decisions on how to balance the books and stepping up when necessary to do what is best for the people of Northern Ireland. That is what we have been doing. That is what the Minister and the parties have been doing. It is what five parties did when they signed up to an agreement. They were stepping up for all the citizens of Northern Ireland and negotiating with the British Government to deliver what was best for the people of Northern Ireland.

The Alliance Party recognises that, and it will not run away from the difficult decisions today, unlike others. Neither will it continue to kick the can down the road, as it has been suggested by some that we should use the space between now and the Chancellor's Budget. What bit of "no" — when the Tories won — do we not understand in the House? When the Alliance Party signed up to the Stormont House Agreement, it intended to honour it. It is for others to speak about their actions following their signing of it. That stands in stark contrast to Sinn Féin and the SDLP who, in a misguided election strategy, are hurting those that they purport to want to protect, whilst leaving the whole of Northern Ireland in an unbearable state of limbo.

Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Greens are, by their actions, voting to implement Tory cuts in full. People who work in the public services are waiting to hear whether their jobs will be cut due to Sinn Féin, SDLP and Green incompetence. People on long waiting lists, whose life quality could be transformed by simple surgery, wait to hear whether their operation will be cancelled due to budget cuts in the health service. A constituent saw me last week and said that the first appointment she could get to see a GP was 17 June. How much longer is she going to have to wait before she gets that GP appointment? Many welfare claimants call at my offices seeking to find out what welfare reform will mean for them. The fear in those people is palpable. It is undue fear, brought on by the scaremongering of parties to my right.

Today, Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Greens will be creating more vulnerable people in Northern Ireland than they claim to protect. The truth of the matter is that, with our mitigation measures, the vast majority of those people will not be any worse off than they are right now. In fact, as we have heard, many will be a great deal better off. Let us look at an intriguing revelation. Although I know it will not suit Sinn Féin or the SDLP's political purposes, the facts should be heard before the rhetoric, for once. NISRA and DSD figures show that the roll-out of universal credit will benefit — we have heard this figure before in the House today — some 102,000 households by an average of £37 per week. They will receive more — these are the most vulnerable whom Sinn Féin talks about — than they will receive under the existing system. In addition, some 90,000 households will see no change to their entitlement. Therefore, overall, some two thirds of households will benefit from welfare reform, which Sinn Féin, the Greens and the SDLP are now holding back.

5.00 pm

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member not acknowledge that the Tory Government are committed in July to further reductions in welfare of, I think, between £12 billion and £15 billion?

Mr McNarry: What are you going to do about it, Dolores?

Mr Dickson: I will indeed admit that I have read those stories in the newspapers, and I will tell you what I did about it. I stood against a Conservative candidate in my constituency. I was not the person who was elected, but I stood against them. The place to do it was at the ballot box. This is a democracy. They won. We will have to put up with what they throw at us for the next five years.

Under universal credit, more childcare support will be provided to households, meaning that all families, regardless of how many hours they work, will be entitled to childcare. That provides previously unseen levels of flexibility for parents to enter employment and opens up more opportunities for families to supplement their income. Welfare reform will help to make employment financially beneficial and attractive — that, for me, is an important element — by removing the senseless working hours requirements for certain benefits and tax credits, meaning that people who want to work are empowered to do so and will always be better off financially. Welfare reform will also make the system simpler. Currently, many of the most vulnerable in our society under-claim benefits as they are unaware of the elements or entitlements or are intimidated by the Byzantine welfare system that has developed haphazardly in our society, one that all our offices struggle to work with day and daily on behalf of claimants. Those are some of the real benefits of reforming our welfare system, and with mitigation in place.

Northern Ireland has gained an exceptional deal that is looked on with envy by Scotland, Wales and the rest of the United Kingdom, but that is to be blocked by an inability to see that welfare reform has serious positive aspects for all. All in all, it does not suit certain parties' electoral strategies. Sinn Féin believes that there are more votes in scaremongering and maintaining a fear of change than in actually implementing change. Sinn Féin has been caught speaking out of both sides of its mouth at once, with starkly different messages, North and South. While I greatly welcome the mitigation measures that have been put in place to ameliorate the impact of the reform on the most vulnerable, the additional weight that Sinn Féin is seeking to add to the supplementary payment scheme is quite simply unaffordable.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: Yes.

Mr Wilson: Do you accept that we do not even know what Sinn Féin wants added to the supplementary scheme? Despite the fact that it has complained that there has not been sufficient talking about this and that the scheme is not suitable for its needs, we have not heard one suggestion in the House today as to what changes it would like to see made.

Mr Dickson: I entirely agree with the Member. Indeed, it is my understanding that, during the negotiations in the Stormont House talks, officials and others had to assist Sinn Féin and the SDLP to work out figures that they clearly did not understand as the process was being developed and worked through.

If those parties really want the rest of us to put up or shut up, the challenge to you today is to say what you want done and how you propose that it will be paid for. That is the challenge to Sinn Féin and the SDLP: you have to tell us where the money will come from. We cannot print it because we do not print it. We believe that we cannot persuade a majority Government in London to deliver any more money between now and their Budget, and, if they are to be believed, things will get worse, so why do we not bank what we have got instead of squandering it and throwing it away?

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member agree with me that a better time to bring forward suggestions would have been at Consideration Stage or Further Consideration Stage, when amendments could have been made and ideas taken on board? They voted for the legislation at those stages.

Mr Dickson: Indeed, it would. In fact, in a sense, the argument is very hollow on any of what we are trying to achieve in the House today. There is little or nothing that Sinn Féin, the SDLP or, indeed, the Green Member can do by way of proposals today that will change the legislation. The sad reality is that the legislation will lie dead in the water after this evening.

The mitigation measures that have been put in place to ameliorate the impact of reform for the most vulnerable will assist, but we cannot assess every applicant under the old system and then the new system, because as I listened to officials in the Committee for Social Development, I know that, quite simply, the software is not built to do that. We simply cannot pretend that no one is going to be worse off. Put simply, we cannot run a welfare system in Northern Ireland that is completely separate from the rest of the United Kingdom, despite what at least two or perhaps three parties would like us to do. Yes, welfare is a devolved matter, but the reality is that it is also a parity matter within the United Kingdom. We are not a sovereign state, despite what Sinn Féin might like to think it is running. We have no sources of funds other than those from the Treasury. Therefore, we can act only within the parameters set out to us by the Treasury.

The real fight was at Westminster. It is a fight that, as we have said on many occasions before, Sinn Féin chose to sit out. Destroying Northern Ireland's economy and its public services will not serve the electoral strategies as well as it may think. In contrast, in Stormont Sinn Féin has proved itself, at least on occasions, a formidable opposition, but it is nothing but a woeful party of government. It is clearly incapable of taking decisions that a prudent government must and should take involving spending our money wisely, protecting those in need and trying to keep the lights on for all in our society.

Our welfare system is, in essence, a social insurance scheme. Without contributors to our welfare system, it collapses. If we do not have the tax take, it falls. Can people really continue to work as before if they cannot get work and cannot access health care or, indeed, have the skills that they require to carry out their jobs?

I wonder if it is with a second thought to its electoral ambitions in the South that we see Sinn Féin's tag line of protecting the vulnerable for what is nothing more than a political slogan, because it is on that that it is woefully hypocritical. Sinn Féin talks about its care for elderly people walking our dark streets, in A&E having been injured, or of being victims of crime waiting anxiously for the police to arrive. Are those not the most vulnerable people in society? Are they, together with welfare recipients, not the people that we should all be caring for?

Sinn Féin's actions, as well as those of the SDLP, display a wanton disregard for the wider picture for all in our society. They are making people vulnerable through their intransigence. In the end, it is not about the vulnerable; it is about the number of TDs to be returned to the Dáil next year.

The SDLP tells us that it will not be bounced to an artificial date. If Dr McDonnell were here, I would say, "If you are still the leader of your party, the Welfare Reform Act in England received Royal Assent [Laughter.] in March 2012". It has been three years since it came into being. [Interruption.] How much more time do the SDLP and Sinn Féin need?

Dr McDonnell: Mr Speaker, is the Member blind?

Mr Storey: Is there a bright light shining in your eyes?

Dr Farry: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. In the light of the comments made by you, Mr Speaker, last Monday about comments of a personal nature being made from the Floor to Members, calling into question my colleague's eyesight would surely fall under the advice that you gave to Members.

Mr Speaker: I think that the Member is making a very valid point. The debate has been difficult, although it has been conducted in an appropriate fashion up to now. There was a direct reference, and perhaps the Member rose to the temptation, but I think that, if we continue as we were, it would be in everyone's interests.

Dr McDonnell: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I apologise for any personal offence.

Mr Speaker: Thank you for that.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr Dickson: I had a wonderful quip about wearing specs, but do not worry.

In conclusion, we have a good deal, and it is a deal that five parties signed up to, because it would not have been a good deal if five parties had not signed up to it. We need to implement that deal or we will, in my belief, lose it for ever. Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Green Party must face up to the reality of the Government in Whitehall. If they continue to renege on the Stormont House Agreement, and Westminster takes back welfare, we may well lose all our hard-won mitigations and be powerless to soften —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: I want to finish.

We will be powerless to soften the impact of what really will be Tory welfare cuts for the people of Northern Ireland. We need to bank what we have got, not throw it away. The Bill needs to pass today; otherwise, the future for the Northern Ireland welfare system and, indeed, our economy is bleak, not through turmoil and markets or through civil unrest at home but through the shameful abandonment by our politicians of their duty to lead and to govern. I believe that I speak for the vast majority of people in Northern Ireland when I say that I am fed up with the brinkmanship, the constant deadlock and the endless inaction of this place. Today is the day to get on with it.

Mr Kennedy: At the outset, I join others in offering my good wishes to Mr Peter Robinson for a full and speedy recovery and to his family and his party at this time.

This is an important debate, with an equally important decision to be made at its conclusion. I say that not just as a Member of the Assembly or, indeed, as a member of the Ulster Unionist Party but as a member of the Executive. This is a critical day. The almost inevitable outcome today means one thing for the Executive: it represents failure. However, there is an air of unreality to this today, with some parties simply unable or unwilling to accept any responsibility for the consequences of their actions. This is a proper political and financial crisis at the very top of the Executive. The stances adopted by Sinn Féin and the SDLP throughout the debate have been nothing short of disgraceful. Even at this late stage, they should reflect again and withdraw their petition of concern, because, outside of the Stormont bubble, people have rightly become cynical of the crises of politics that these institutions are now accustomed to. This place simply does not relate to the lives of the many thousands of people whom we purport to represent, but the outcome of today's date will have a real and meaningful adverse impact on the lives of those same said people.

I have made no secret of the challenges currently facing me as Minister for Regional Development. I am facing a £60 million cut in resource spending in this financial year. The impact of that pressure is already being felt, and Members are already pressing me on it. Bizarrely, those are some of the same people who will troop through the No Lobby later this evening, having already signed a petition of concern, to save their conscience and make them believe somehow that they are class warriors defending the poor and the vulnerable. How wrong they are, because, when the money runs dry — as it will do, and, by current estimates, will do so by late July or early August — lives will be impacted on, services will be devastated and our political credibility will lie in shreds.

In the next few weeks, as pressure mounts in our health service, as education becomes a wasteland, as essential public services cannot be maintained, as the grass grows even higher, as the gullies are stuffed and blocked even more, as darkness overcomes our street lights and as potholes worsen and road defects increase, does anybody in the House really believe that politicians can keep their credibility? The answer is "Of course not".

5.15 pm

I spoke earlier of the air of unreality in this place today on the issue. Even after this debate and after the inevitable decision is reached to kill the Bill and create a crisis, that air of unreality will continue. It is curious that, as we debate this issue, golfers from all over the world are preparing to participate in the Irish Open at Royal County Down, Newcastle. A huge amount of work and preparation has gone into organising that event, not least by the golfing fraternity and our local superstars: Rory McIlroy, Graeme McDowell and Darren Clarke. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board worked its socks off, and Departments such as mine, including my staff in Transport NI and Translink, have pulled out all the stops. I was in Newcastle over the weekend, and it is looking absolutely pristine. The traders and the townsfolk have excelled themselves, and I saw that at first hand. This is the type of event that the people of Northern Ireland should be enjoying, and for too long we lost out because of political instability.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: Yes.

Dr Farry: I very much concur with what the Member says about the Irish Open, but the Irish Open this week was not just a hook to attract golfers to Northern Ireland: if things had gone differently with our political decision-making over the past number of months, this week we would have seen a major US investment trip to Northern Ireland, with some major blue-chip investors interested in bringing jobs to Northern Ireland. That has long since disappeared, and whether we get it back or not is a major question. The consequences of the delay around welfare are already being felt acutely beyond just golf.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for the point that he makes, and I concur with it. Whilst the Irish Open is a major showcase for sport and tourism, it opened further opportunities for economic benefit to the Province, some of which will now clearly be put in jeopardy by the decision that is likely to be made in the coming hours by the Assembly.

What will we say to the many international visitors when they ask about the current impasse? Frankly, embarrassed silence will not do. It is no longer enough to say, "This is just par for the course in Northern Ireland" and trundle along to the next crisis. The people of Northern Ireland deserve better, and politics in this country must deliver more for the people of Northern Ireland. This place can no longer be held to ransom by Sinn Féin's southern command, with every policy potentially doomed to failure as Martin McGuinness is shaken by the tail again and again by Gerry Adams.

Sinn Féin's cries of anti-austerity simply lack credibility. They continually voted in favour of a Budget that has delivered the severe cuts over the past number of months, and they have presided over those cuts as they have continued to fall across every Department in the Executive. Equally lacking in credibility are their claims that they are standing up for the vulnerable, because today they will set in motion a series of events that will see further drastic cuts to public services that will devastate the vulnerable in our society that Sinn Féin and others purport to defend. Let us not forget how they have sat on their hands since their flip-flop and watched while this place has haemorrhaged £2 million a week that could otherwise have been channelled into public services. So, I appeal, even at this late stage, to Sinn Féin and the SDLP to do the right thing. Accept your responsibilities. Acknowledge the political reality here. It is not too late to bring this place back from the brink.

Mr Speaker: You referred to a petition of concern earlier, so I make it clear that, once it has been lodged and I have validated it, it cannot be withdrawn.

Dr McDonnell: I will be as brief as possible and speak in general because, in the words of a Phil Coulter song, it has all been said now. Everything has been covered and most of the points made. Making the same points again might emphasise them, but it would not make things any different.

At the outset, I put on record my good wishes and, indeed, the very best wishes of the SDLP for the rapid and full recovery of the First Minister, Peter Robinson. We were all a little shocked on hearing of his sudden illness yesterday morning, and we should note the efficiency and the effectiveness of the health service at its best in providing him with appropriate treatment. I would appreciate it if colleagues could convey our best wishes. We may have differences at times politically, but, at a personal and human level, it is important that we take care of each other and have nothing but good wishes and goodwill towards each other.

I want to emphasise that the SDLP remains fully committed to negotiating and achieving a solution to all the issues raised by the Welfare Reform Bill, and we are committed to the Stormont House Agreement. However, we believe that the negotiations need to be mature and responsible, which means that they are not bound by an unnecessary deadline or short-term tactics.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. He is repeating the same line as Alex Attwood. The Speaker, just before the Member started to speak, made it clear that the petition of concern that has been signed was valid. It will, therefore, be put into practice here tonight. Once we vote, there is no more negotiation on the Bill. The Bill is dead, so what will he negotiate about?

Dr McDonnell: The point that I was making, humbly and honestly, was that perhaps this week should not have been and did not have to be the deadline. Useful negotiations were taking place, and there was further room. I compliment the Minister: we may not always agree, but he has been masterly in dealing with the Bill on many occasions. Despite our disagreement at times, he has been honest and honourable in all that he has done.

We have consistently highlighted the fact that welfare is bound into a much broader economic landscape in Northern Ireland. There is a need to take a much more strategic approach to protecting the most vulnerable while creating the conditions required for access to prosperity for those in need of opportunities. I emphasise that we were clear at the conclusion of the Stormont House talks that, while significant progress had been made on a number of selected issues, the overall outcome was not as comprehensive, decisive or complete as we would have wished. We made that clear on the day, and we are still of that view. Nothing significant has changed. The SDLP has, since the Stormont House Agreement, sought to amend the Bill at Further Consideration Stage. We sought to strengthen and improve the emerging proposals by tabling a series of honest amendments and engaging constructively in all the implementation meetings that followed. We believe that this latest deadline is ill judged and ill timed and serves only to undermine much of the constructive engagement that we and others have been involved in during the process.

We have repeatedly highlighted our opposition to the British Government's imposition of arbitrary fines and penalties on the block grant. This shallow, British Government tactic of creating financial stress is a crude attempt to exert political pressure, and, for us, it is both reckless and potentially a very destabilising move politically. We remain committed and willing — I emphasise again — to engage in genuine discussion and negotiation including all five Executive parties, and we call again for an end to the side deals and the back-channel talks that can only lead to further misunderstanding and confusion. We in the SDLP believe that it is only through comprehensive, inclusive and honest negotiations that an equitable and fair settlement may eventually be achieved, not just on welfare but across the whole range of political challenges that face us.

I would like to talk briefly about protecting the vulnerable, because that is what we are about. This protection is not just financial but must be given expression through good advice and support services. I welcomed many of the changes that were made in the development of the Bill, and, again, that is one of the reasons why I commended the Minister. Access to advice and support has improved significantly, but there are still significant credibility gaps in this Bill. We have been told that 37,000 households will be better off, by some £39 million extra per year, which adds up to almost £1,000 per household. Yet we know that somehow or other, even with our mitigating package, something in the region of £100 million a year is coming out of welfare. So, somebody is going to lose. We cannot all be winners.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Dr McDonnell: Yes.

Mr Humphrey: Does the Member accept the point that, yes, many will lose, and because of the course of action that his party and Sinn Féin have set on tonight, along with the Green Party Member, the loss will be much greater? The mitigating measures that Nelson McCausland negotiated will not come into play. If the Tories take it on, it will be Tory cuts endorsed in Northern Ireland by your parties.

Dr McDonnell: I can accept half of what the Member has said, but the SDLP does not endorse Tory cuts.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Member for giving way. Does the Member also agree with me that the Scottish Parliament has already mitigated the effect of the bedroom tax, and there is nothing to prevent this Assembly from bringing forward its own scheme in the same way?

Dr McDonnell: I do not want to gush too much here, but the Minister has reminded us that a lot of this is down to regulation as it is worked through, whether here or elsewhere. The devil is in the detail of the regulation.

Another issue that I want to draw attention to is that, although the bedroom tax has been bought out in the short to medium term, it is still there, and it is our belief that it needs to be removed entirely.

We want to put it clearly on record that we took part in the discussions at Stormont House and agreed to many of the issues discussed there, including the mitigation of £94 million per year, or £470 million over five years. But, at that time, on that day again I emphasise, we made it clear that we thought there were still big gaps that needed to be dealt with as the agreement was fleshed out. We expected those gaps to be filled out by discussions and with agreement as the Bill progressed, but, unfortunately, the genuine amendments to the Bill that we tabled were dismissed out of hand using petitions of concern. That was even before — and this is the more worrying aspect — George Osborne announced his second round of brutal cuts.

There are some further points I would like to make briefly without causing undue delay. A lot of mention has been made of the Stormont House Agreement. There were meetings at Stormont House of the two Governments and five parties. There were even five-party meetings at Stormont Castle, but it appears to me that, in the aftermath, with the discussions, anxieties and stories we hear, there was a third set of meetings between Sinn Féin and the DUP that the rest of us were not privy to. Somehow or other, it seems that many of our problems have arisen in that space.

5.30 pm

The big challenge for all of us here is much wider than welfare. Any movement towards curtailing welfare for vulnerable people at the margins of our society and somehow pushing them towards work requires, for example, a much better and more affordable childcare arrangement to allow young mothers to access work. A lack of adequate childcare here is acting as a major barrier for young mothers who want to work, due to the extra cost of childcare and a lack of reasonable access or availability.

The Government-imposed fines to our block grant around welfare reform are punitive and, we argue, must be removed. We see them as a gun to our heads in everything that we do. The recent threat of further cuts from George Osborne, without much detail, means that we are not having this discussion with our eyes open. Any decisions that could be made today are, in fact, gazumped by a further phase of cuts that will render any decisions that might be made obsolete. They will be swamped and overtaken by his next round of cuts.

There is a clear and real need for economic opportunity to be created and injected in parallel with any changes in the welfare system. It is crazy to talk about people accessing work if there is no work to access. We in the SDLP want a commitment from the two Governments, and, indeed, maybe from Brussels and the US, but from all parties here as well, that we need to be doing more to create more jobs. That is in no way a criticism of what has already been done but a call to take stock and find ways of doing more and doing it better. If we can create a prosperity process, we will be more self-sufficient, autonomous and confident, and, indeed, would have more confidence in our Executive and our Government. From that will flow more tax and more funds for welfare, education and health.

We have, at all times, engaged honestly and honourably in these discussions and this debate. We regret that our genuine needs were not met and we feel that we are left with no other choice but to do what we have to do this afternoon.

Dr Farry: It is very hard to get your head around the stark fact that, after today's vote, if, indeed, parties vote on the basis that they have declared so far, everything will change in Northern Ireland. There will be implications for our political process and our budgeting process. Those implications will be massive and considerable, and the danger is that they will be long-lasting and that all the people of Northern Ireland will pay the price as a consequence. People need to be very clear about what they are doing tonight and not come back in a few weeks and say, "I didn't realise what we were signing up to or what the implications were." People have been warned extremely clearly about the implications.

A different future is available, or was available, to us in Northern Ireland. I go back to the point that I made in an intervention to Mr Kennedy. It was not just the fact that we were due to have a major golf tournament in Northern Ireland this week, which, thankfully, is still going ahead. We were potentially going to have a major US investment trip on these shores, with blue-chip companies potentially looking to invest in our economy. That is now postponed, in the best-case scenario, and, in the worst-case scenario, is lost. That is the very real consequence of even a standstill in the decision-making process that we have had, or lack of decision-making process that we have had, over the past number of months. I hate to think what the implications are going to be if we actually end up taking the wrong decisions, which will plunge Northern Ireland into deep uncertainty. People are already feeling the pain, at best in terms of investment deferred and, at worst, investment lost, so people need to be very conscious of where things are at present.

We have a stark choice before us on these issues. On welfare, the choice is very simple: we proceed with the local variation of welfare reform with all the flexibilities and mitigations that we have negotiated or we see the full blunt force of the stark version of reform that is taking place in Great Britain. No other choices are available. Nothing else has been proposed. No other sustainable, financially solvent approach has been suggested by any party in the Assembly. That is the choice that awaits us. All those who will block this vote tonight are supporting the full version of Tory welfare cuts in Northern Ireland.

All I can think of to try to rationalise the process is that some people just do not want to have their fingerprints on it. They would rather that people suffer than they have to go through the Lobbies and have themselves associated with something that many of us in this Chamber find distasteful.

We recognise that it is our duty and responsibility as the Government and legislators of Northern Ireland. We have to address society as we find it today, not some idealist fantasy land where we can do things differently. We have to face the stark realities before us.

Other major consequences flow from this. Potentially, we will see the unravelling of our budgets. Again, we have what may be viewed as the lesser-case scenario, where the pressures from the unravelling of the Stormont House Agreement build up around us. There will be the loss of last year's mitigation, that is the loan that the Executive received; the fact that we have to pay more in welfare penalties on an ongoing basis; and the fact that we have to fund the voluntary exit scheme. If, on the back of this, we, in turn, do not pass a Budget for this year, we then face a situation where budgets will be struck by civil servants, and there will be astronomical cuts to those budgets — beyond the level faced by any other society in western Europe in recent memory. That is the stark choice that faces us.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Dickson: The Member refers to civil servants having to set our budgets and the crisis that would ensue as a result. Can he tell the House whether he believes that that would include, for example, failure by the Agriculture Minister to pay single farm payments to farmers in Northern Ireland? Would it throw that into crisis? Would it also throw into crisis funding from the European social fund?

Dr Farry: There is an issue around accruals. That is the danger that we face. What may bring this home to some people is almost a reverse of what happened on the back of Sunningdale. We had the famous pictures of farmers blocking the Prince of Wales Avenue with their farm vehicles in protest. This time round, we may see the pitchforks up in protest about the inability of some parties to take decisions on the vital interests of Northern Ireland.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member makes a valid point that the political credibility of this place and its budgetary process will be damaged and tarnished. I would prefer that it were not a Tory-majority Government, as I think most Members would, but, as Mr Dickson set out, that is the reality that prevails in the United Kingdom. Does he agree that, if these powers have to be transferred to the national Government in Westminster, the protections that have been negotiated and the mitigations that are in place to protect the most vulnerable in society will not be there in that context and that, in fact, the people who claim to be protecting the most vulnerable people in Northern Ireland will have exposed those same vulnerable people to the worst type of Tory austerity measures? It is when those measures come into place and the protections are not there that people will come to their doors and those parties will have to explain why they have allowed that to happen. Does the Member agree?

Dr Farry: Yes, very much so. We are, essentially, at the mercy of the Conservative Government; that is where people in the Assembly will leave the people of Northern Ireland when it comes to welfare. We have to bear in mind that, as many Members have said, we are not here as a sovereign state; we are here as part of a wider UK. We receive our money from the Treasury, whether through the block grant in DEL money or annually managed expenditure (AME) money. We are dependent upon that. Welfare reform, in practice, is set at a UK level. We have some ability to mitigate and have flexibilities, and we have maximised our ability to run those, both with regard to our ability to negotiate them and to pay them. Every time we negotiate a flexibility, it has to come off the Budget in some other way. We have done the best that we can, but we have to appreciate that we are not our own masters on welfare. We are part of a much wider political system.

We regularly hear comments that say, "The Conservatives have no mandate in Northern Ireland, so how dare they do all this?" One of the fundamental tenets of the Good Friday Agreement is the principle of consent, which means that all of us, including those parties that do not wish Northern Ireland to continue as part of the UK, have nonetheless accepted, like everyone else, that it will remain part of the UK. That means that they accept, ipso facto, that a national UK Government set policy on national issues. Welfare is one of those issues. The logical consequence of anyone's support of the Good Friday Agreement is that they recognise that reality, even those parties that want to see a united Ireland. That is the stark reality that they have to accept, and, at the moment, they are failing to do so. The Conservative Party may not have much of a mandate in Scotland and Wales and no mandate in Northern Ireland, but it won the election across the UK as a whole, fair and square, based on the electoral system that is in place.

Other consequences could flow from this. We are in danger of losing the voluntary exit scheme for civil servants. Just before I came down to the Chamber, I opened a piece of correspondence that was in my ministerial folder and was struck by a letter from a Member from Sinn Féin. I will not embarrass the Member, but the letter asked what assurance I could give to someone who contacted them about their ability to exit under the voluntary exit scheme. I asked, "Are you serious? Are you having a laugh? Do you not realise the reason why there is uncertainty with the voluntary exit scheme is because of the failure to progress the Stormont House Agreement?" It is absolutely staggering that people are not joining up the dots and making those types of connections.

Corporation tax is already disappearing off into the distance. That was going to transform the economy of Northern Ireland and create many, many new jobs. For sure, there would have been some very difficult decisions about how we would resource it to invest in the other drivers, but we are nowhere close to even having those types of discussions, and being able to get to those points is slipping further and further into the future, if ever. Frankly, if our budgets unravel any further, the notion of the devolution of corporation tax will not be tenable. That is another consequence that we are facing up to.

Perhaps most bizarrely of all, given the nature of the parties that signed the petition of concern — again, that is a further example of its abuse — is the potential unravelling of these political institutions. To be very clear, once we hit the Budget figures that we are contemplating or once we are in a situation that the Civil Service begins to put in place a Budget over the head of politicians, devolution itself will be in crisis. I cannot predict how different parties will react to that situation. Similarly, we could see a situation in which some powers of the Assembly on the administration of welfare are taken back to Westminster as it essentially imposes welfare reform over our heads. So, for the first time, we will see a reversal of devolution. That will be against the grain of what is happening elsewhere in the UK, which is a desire to see more devolution. In Northern Ireland, devolution could go into reverse. That will begin to have implications for the institutions, and if the institutions become unsustainable, that will call into question the Good Friday Agreement itself.

A remark was made about the different arrangements that were put in place for the devolution of policing and justice. Those were very discrete interventions that were necessary to ensure that there was community confidence in the devolution of policing and justice, which built on the Good Friday Agreement. What we are talking about here is a fundamental challenge that undermines the Good Friday Agreement and rips the heart out of it. If there is no functioning Executive and Assembly, there is no Good Friday Agreement. That is where people are intent on taking us based on the logic of what they are doing. I cannot get my head around the fact that parties that claim to be pro-agreement are intent on taking that particular direction of travel. I just cannot understand it at all. When the petition of concern was lodged on Friday, it was the seventeenth anniversary of the referendum in which 71% of the people of Northern Ireland put their faith in a different future. That future is now having its heart ripped out.

There are fundamental points. I made the point about why we are in danger of breaching the Good Friday Agreement, and I referenced the principle of consent and how people are somehow pretending that what that means in practice somehow does not pertain when it comes to welfare reform.

The other aspect relates to power-sharing itself. We have a coalition Government, which is a mandatory coalition. Some of us want to change it and have a voluntary coalition and an opposition, which is a shout-out to Mr McCallister in case he raises the point later. That is an ambition for change which is, again, consistent with the agreement. However, for power-sharing to work in any society, whether it is in Northern Ireland or anywhere else in the world, we have to see willingness on the part of parties to accommodate one another, to have a sense of give and take, a willingness to compromise and a willingness to act in a rational manner. At present, we are in danger of parties not being willing to govern Northern Ireland. They are simply setting their face against any sense of responsible decision-making. We are not here to have a discussion about the nature of any compromise that we would fashion; it is about whether we ever have a compromise at all. People seem to be determined not to have that.

That brings me to the issue of negotiations, picking up on Dr McDonnell's point that certain parties have acted honourably on the issue of talks. I will not go into the concept of the Assembly acting in an honest manner; I will let that one hang for now. The approach that has been taken to negotiations by the SDLP and Sinn Féin has been anything but honourable. We have had endless negotiation around welfare reform for the best part of three years, and today we hear that people are being bounced on the issue, that it is far too soon, that negotiations have not really started or that we can do it so much better. The latest one from the SDLP is that it is committed to having mature and — wait for it — responsible discussions around these issues. That ship sailed a long time ago. It closed, essentially, with the Stormont Castle Agreement and the Stormont House Agreement, which five parties signed up to. I was there, and five parties signed up to the Stormont Castle Agreement. Let us be very clear about that: there were no ifs, buts or conditionality in the room when the five parties, by themselves, made the Stormont Castle Agreement. All five parties were very clear about what they were signing up to do. The fact is that parties have welsched on the agreement that was made and they have gone back, for various political calculations, and changed their mind, leaving us in major difficulties. That applies as much to the SDLP as to Sinn Féin, although they breached their commitments to the Stormont Castle Agreement at different paces.

When I refer to Stormont Castle, I am referring to the deal on welfare. Parties had different approaches to the Stormont House Agreement, and people nuanced how they responded to that agreement in different ways. Some were more fulsome in their support, notably Sinn Féin, and some, including the SDLP, were more conditional, to be fair to them in that regard. However, there was no conditionality around the Stormont Castle Agreement: everyone was very clear about what they were doing because the finances were at the heart of that agreement. The headroom for finances was central to having confidence among the five parties to move on. The notion that someone could say that they were signing up to it in principle does not wash one bit. I was there. I saw what happened, and that is a rewriting of history.

It may well be fine for the SDLP to make the argument that it was seeking to propose amendments to improve the Stormont Castle Agreement. Again, however, any amendments it tabled that sought to change it ran contrary to what it had agreed to as a political party. Indeed, the only parties with any legitimacy in proposing amendments at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage were the parties outside the Executive. The amendments may have been ill thought out and may have been folly in many respects, but they had a perfect entitlement, as parties, to put them forward and have them tested. The SDLP, frankly, was trying to have it both ways, proposing amendments after it had signed up to the agreement that the Minister was trying to put through the Assembly at that time.

Even if we grant the SDLP grace today and say that it had the scope to table those amendments, it tried to do so and failed. They were blocked by a petition of concern, which, ironically, is what they are using today to block the Bill's Final Stage. They cannot really complain about the use of the petition of concern back then given that they are using it today to frustrate any progress. Even if those amendments were unsuccessful, all five parties in the Executive, as parties to the Stormont Castle Agreement, should be giving their assent to the Bill's Final Stage today. That is what they committed to doing, and that is where their duty lies in this respect.

It gets worse in terms of the bad faith around negotiations. Last week, there were productive discussions around the table in Stormont House between the five parties. I do not know what is going on in the SDLP — people are speculating — but Alasdair McDonnell and Fearghal McKinney were at the table, seeking to negotiate in good faith. That is certainly how I picked it up. Other people were concerned that the rest of the party was not there; the other 20 wings of the party were not at the table, giving their view at that time, which should have given us a certain health warning. As recently as Friday morning, I left the room with the impression that the SDLP was still wishing to discuss the issue, even at the eleventh hour, when negotiations should have long since closed. I cannot get my head around how, within a matter of hours, they were proclaiming that they had signed a petition of concern and that, essentially, negotiations were over. Something happened behind closed doors in that intervening period. I believe that Dr McDonnell was, at that time, sincere about trying to find an agreement, but, within a matter of hours, he seemed to have been overruled by the rest of his party, which I thought was in favour of the Good Friday Agreement.

Dr McDonnell: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Dr McDonnell: Does the Member accept that no concessions or improvements were available on anything that we were negotiating for in good faith? We put issues, including a prosperity process and other things, to you and others, but there was no progress or comeback on any of them. Neither was there any comfort on the advances that we sought on the Bill. Frankly, it is a bit mischievous of you to make the suggestions that you make. We negotiated in good faith. We put our needs on the table, but they were not met.

Dr Farry: Let me be very clear to the Member in setting this out: my party acknowledged that there was a point to be made about what the Member terms the "prosperity process". We recognised that we needed to have a further discussion about what economic interventions we can make to build on our existing economic strategy, Programme for Government and economic pact, particularly looking ahead to corporation tax and changes in the nature of devolution across these islands. To be perfectly frank and brutal about it, beyond a slogan, we did not hear in those discussions any substance from the SDLP as to what its prosperity pact actually meant. If anything, it was me, David Ford and a few others, including Arlene Foster and Peter Robinson, who actually put meat on the bones of what the Member was talking about.

Furthermore, it is a matter of fact that, on Friday, discussions were happening between the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Civil Service about putting together a proposal in relation to a prosperity panel for Northern Ireland. The notion that, somehow, no one was listening to the SDLP is far from reality. They were being listened to. People were working with them, and people were being generous to them in trying to find some degree of coherence to what was being said to the other parties. Papers were being put together to put to the party at the selfsame time as its members were behind closed doors, fighting amongst themselves and deciding to put a dagger through devolution and put the institutions in jeopardy. That is what the record shows.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Wilson: Does the Member accept that, in what was the speech by one of the main SDLP members on the issue not so long ago, the prosperity pact was not mentioned? All that was mentioned was the party's total opposition to the Bill. Even then, no suggestions were put forward as to how the Bill could be made. They are now trying to throw a smokescreen up that, somehow or other, a prosperity pact would have got the SDLP on board. That clearly is not true.

Dr Farry: In some senses, that neatly brings me to my closing point. We —

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Dr Farry: Yes.

We have heard a lot about needing more time for negotiations and how negotiations have not really started. I am afraid that, for a lot of us, this comes across as being an excuse to avoid taking a difficult decision. Any excuse is rattled out, the latest one being that we now have the Scottish nationalists in an even stronger position in Westminster and they will be negotiating for something and maybe we should hang on to see what comes from that. That may be all well and good, and, frankly, we should be part of those discussions, but that need not happen to the mutual exclusion of us passing the Final Stage of the Welfare Reform Bill this evening.

We have a duty to progress this legislation because the consequences of us not doing so are so dramatic. I am stunned that people do not appreciate the gravity of what is about to unfold if this legislation does not go through. We can pass it tonight and progress welfare reform and still continue with the discussions to explore what else happens. The welfare reform that we are about to pass in Northern Ireland is a better deal than already applies in Scotland. They do not even have welfare powers. That is something that is up for discussion, and, indeed, there may be a certain reticence about devolving those types of powers, given the implications of people going off on solo runs on these issues. Let us have that discussion with Scotland, but let us not wait for that to do our duty on welfare reform.

Our duty as a Government and an Assembly is to act for the common good of all the people of Northern Ireland and to protect them, including the most vulnerable, from the fate that awaits them either through full-blown Tory cuts, which three parties are committed to voting for tonight — they are actively for Tory cuts — or through deeper cuts in public spending, which will see services cut even further. We already have difficulties with our public spending. People are already suffering. We well know the effect of the cuts. Indeed, the Members who are actually voting for more cuts tonight are the ones who often complain the loudest about the impact of those cuts.

We are going to see even steeper cuts. Those cuts will bite very much on those who are most vulnerable. They are the people who depend on the health service. Whenever operations are postponed or never happen and whenever we cut public health, we see that that has the biggest impact on those who are living in deprivation and who do not get the support, for example, to change their lifestyle to make them more sustainable. Cuts are going to be made to early years education when we are trying to break through intergenerational educational disadvantage, which again is about giving people opportunities. When I end up having to have an impact through job schemes, employment programmes and places at further education colleges and in higher education, that is about giving people a chance to move out of poverty and to have a stake in society. If we look at what David Ford does in Justice, we see that people are dependent on legal aid and on the police being around to give them protection when they are vulnerable. All those things are going to be in jeopardy if we end up pursuing this agenda of more and more cuts. All those cuts will bite on people.

It is not just about cuts. It is about the lost opportunity costs of transforming the economy. If we want to go back to talking about the prosperity process, we find that it involves investing resources in economic drivers. It means spending more money on skills. It means investing in our infrastructure. It means building more office space. It means mobilising all the levers that are there to transform our economy. If we have less money, there is less money to spend on those levers. Job opportunities will be compromised as well. The cost is there and clear to everyone. When we vote tonight, people should be in no doubt about the consequences politically, financially and directly for people.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Humphrey: Last week, the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee had the chief executive and chairman of Invest Northern Ireland giving evidence. They talked about the 18,000 new jobs for Northern Ireland, the huge investment that there has been in getting companies to come here, the wealth that has been created because of that employment, and the importance of setting the rate, date and time for corporation tax. All that is vital to the Northern Ireland economy.

I listened to the leader of the SDLP talk about jobs being created by the two Governments, although I do not know why the Irish Government would have anything to do with job creation here anyway. Those people also said that, when they go away internationally, they know that political stability is absolutely vital to creating jobs in Northern Ireland. The Member already articulated that serious people were to be coming here this week and that that has been jeopardised by the political inertia here. The message that will go out to Northern Ireland plc and offshore will totally undermine all the good work that is being done by Invest Northern Ireland and Tourism Ireland internationally to try to sell this place as a serious place to invest.

Dr Farry: I agree very much with what the Member said. The stark reality is that political stability is fundamental to creating a good investment location, so the point makes itself. With that, I will conclude.

Mr O'Dowd: When I last spoke on welfare, which was, I think, at Consideration Stage of the welfare Bill, I said that, following the Stormont House Agreement and the agreement that we made there, we had an opportunity to move forward on a stable platform, both politically and financially. At that time, I outlined that, seven or eight years ago, when the Executive were reformed and the agreements were in place after St Andrews and the Good Friday Agreement, no one would have guessed that the issue that would bring the Executive and the Assembly to the brink would be an issue like welfare. We may have speculated that it might be an armed group of some type; it might be distrust between the political parties; or it might be a breakdown in civic society over issues from flags to whatever. No one would have speculated at that time that the issue that would bring the Executive and the Assembly to the brink would be welfare.

6.00 pm

Following the Stormont House Agreement and those negotiations, I had hoped that we had reached an agreement that would have been a significant compromise on everyone's behalf but would have given us the stability to deliver change and continued change and stability to our society. So why are we here today? Why are we once again perhaps on the brink of the political collapse of these institutions and budgetary uncertainty? Why are we here today? I emphasise "today", because, despite claims that we have to pass this legislation today, I will argue the opposite. We do not have to pass this legislation today. Nothing in statute states that the process to allow the Finance Minister to prepare her papers for the final Budget Bill for the end of July has to start today. There is nothing to stop it starting tomorrow, the next day or, indeed, next week. So why did parties or, in this case, the DUP decide to bring this to a head? There have been three years of at times frustrating negotiations on welfare, there has been stalemate and dispute, and there have been heated arguments, even around the Executive table, but, over those three years, we made progress.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will let you in in a minute. We made progress to the point at which the five political parties were able to reach agreement in the Stormont Castle agreement. That goes to show that where there is a will, there is a way to solve problems. If the sponsoring Minister continues with the Bill to a vote, options will be closed down and eroded, and we will be left in the scenario that some have painted today on future political stability and our financial position. I will give way to Mr Wilson.

Mr Wilson: Does the Member accept that, first, there are financial implications with not proceeding with welfare reform, and, secondly, the Finance Minister has to bring the final part of this year's Budget to the Assembly in June so that it is approved by the end of July for Departments to have money to spend? To suggest, therefore, that she and the Minister for Social Development could have sat back on their hands and done nothing is simply ludicrous. She could not have a Budget and know for certain what money she had in the Budget unless welfare reform had been resolved and all the consequences of that, including the additional money from the Stormont House Agreement, were in place.

Mr O'Dowd: I certainly would not suggest for one moment that any of our Ministers, including me, should be sitting on their hands doing nothing. At a macro and micro level, I accept that there are implications for not moving forward a welfare Bill, but I think that there is greater opportunity in moving forward on an agreed welfare Bill than on a welfare Bill that is doomed to failure.

The Finance Minister does have time. In your tenure in office, you proved that, because I understand that, in June 2012, you moved the Budget Bill through accelerated passage.

Mr Wilson: [Inaudible.]

Mr O'Dowd: I think that you are agreeing with me. That proves the point. I ask the question again: why are we here today? Why was the decision taken to end negotiations on the way forward? I think that it was around 9 or 10 March that Sinn Féin publicly indicated that it could not support the Welfare Reform Bill because of the schemes of management that had been presented to us. A number of weeks before that, we had been open and frank in our discussions with the DUP that, in our opinion, the schemes that were being presented to us did not honour the letter and the principle of the Stormont House Agreement. So, we did not have to reach 9 or 10 March, which is when we publicly came out against the Bill. However, in the six to eight weeks following that, we had an opportunity for serious negotiations. I accept that, for political parties, a general election takes up significant time. You are never sure which Government will be returned, but why, after the Tories were returned, was there not more energy and enthusiasm from some quarters to resolve this issue? Are we witnessing a choreographed plan? Has the DUP, or elements in the DUP — we have heard about such elements in other political parties — decided to hand back welfare to the Westminster Government? That is a huge mistake, both for the administration of government here and for the protection of — this is a well-used term — "the most vulnerable in our society". It is a huge mistake.

Let us go back to the start of this journey. In 2011, it was mooted that there was to be a radical "reform", which was the term used, of welfare, but this is not driven by reform. All processes and procedures should and can be reformed over time. This was driven by a £4 billion cut to the welfare budget. That is what drove the Welfare Reform Bill. It was not about ensuring that, through universal credit, many more households would be better off or about it making more sense to have one computer system to deliver benefits to citizens, which does make sense. It was driven by £4 billion of cuts. When the Bill was presented to the Executive, we made it quite clear that, as presented, it was completely and utterly unacceptable to us. Every time I think about these debates, the term that rings in my mind is "parity". We were told, time and again, that we could not move away from parity; that parity between here and Britain could not be broken; and that, if welfare reform was being delivered in Britain in this manner, we had to deliver it here in the same manner. We said, "No, we will not do it". We accepted the principle of universal credit as a credible way forward for the delivery of benefits to citizens, but, even within that, there had to be changes.

A phrase that I have used in the Chamber before is that success has many fathers, but failure is an orphan. We are now told that the changes to the Welfare Reform Bill, negotiated with the London Government, were due solely to the negotiating skills of the DUP. Why did those negotiations start? In 2011, we were told at the Executive table that there had to be parity; that the Bill presented to Westminster had to be the Bill presented to the Assembly; and that it had to be delivered in exactly the same way. So, why did negotiations between the Executive parties and the Westminster Government start? I will tell you: we said that we would not deliver welfare reform.

I do not mind who claims that they won concessions, mitigations or the better delivery of services, but let us be honest about why they were delivered. I have to say that I enjoy watching Mr Wilson delivering speeches in the Chamber. He is very animated and passionate, and he does so with some gusto. When the subcommittee of the Executive to discuss welfare reform was formed, I sat on it, along with several other members. When we raised the issues of the social fund, rates, the bedroom tax, fortnightly and split payments, Mr Wilson displayed his usual gusto, enthusiasm and, at times, brashness in telling us that we were economically illiterate and could not govern because we could not take hard decisions. He told Sinn Féin that it could not break parity. Yet, today, Mr Wilson stood in front of us all with his usual gusto and told us that he delivered the social fund, rate relief, bedroom tax reform, and fortnightly and split payments. I am sorry, but history says differently. He led the opposition to those measures. In fairness to him, at least he comes out and is honest about this — he supports welfare reform.

He supports the intent of the policy and has no difficulty — perhaps he has some difficulty — with its outworkings. There are others who hide behind this statement: we have to do it. We have to make the hard choices. We do have to make hard choices, but politics is always about options. You always have an option in politics, and it is up to individual Members and parties to make decisions about where they want to go. If there are people hiding behind that statement who really support welfare reform, I think that they have a duty to come out front and centre and support it.

I listened to Paula Bradley's contribution — she was one of the earliest contributors to the debate — in which she said everything except "Get on your bike and find a job". Everything but. She referred to some of the research that she had apparently carried out on television programmes about benefits claimants. My advice to anybody watching any of those programmes is to turn them off. They are a load of nonsense. If you want to know what life is like for benefits claimants, as political and elected representatives you should already know: they are your constituents. They make up quite a significant proportion of many of our constituencies, and not just various nationalist and republican areas, as has been suggested at times.

Welfare covers many aspects of our lives, both for the working poor and for those who are not working for a variety of reasons. Let me make it clear that I firmly believe that it is the duty of every citizen who can work, and who can find work, to work. The fact of the matter, however, is that it is not as simple as that, because there are high levels of both physical and mental disability in our society. There are high levels of unemployment because there are many areas in which there are no jobs. Perhaps we should follow Ms Bradley's message — she did not say it, but she did not fall far short of saying it — of "Get on your bike, and you will find it". However, there is another responsibility in that equation, and it is the responsibility of government to create an environment in which meaningful, well-paid employment flourishes. That is our duty. It is our job, and it is what we are about, and we have had some success. The previous contributor outlined the role of Invest NI and others in doing that, but we need to do more of it. We need to create job opportunities for people and encourage people who can work to work.

Let us throw out the idea, which is in the ether of the debate, that the majority of welfare claimants are doing it simply because that is what they do. That is not my experience. Perhaps I live in a different world, and those who come into my constituency office are different from those who go into other constituency offices. I am proud to say that I have never watched 'Benefits Street' or some of the other rubbish that is broadcast, but I have seen enough commentary on it to know that it is there for a purpose: to downgrade those people who claim benefits.

Let us look at what benefits are and what the welfare system involves. Working family tax credit, although I accept that it is out of our control, is a benefit. Child benefit falls under welfare. Are we saying that we should cut that? Because the Tories are coming after it. Pensions fall under benefits and, although the Tories have said that they will not cut them, if they are looking for £12 billion of savings in the welfare system, they may well have to go after pensions. Another area is housing benefit, including for those who are working. You can be in a job, go out and be productive, delivering services and changes for our society — indeed, many of our public-sector workers fall into that category — and still be entitled to housing benefit. Let us be very careful in our mindset about the way in which we categorise people who are claiming benefits, because there is a wide-ranging group of citizens who claim them.

The claim that you are not fit for government unless you are prepared to make hard decisions is always used in the context of how you cut services to the working poor, the poor, the disabled and those without a voice. You never hear it being used in the context of, "We had to make a hard decision; we had to introduce a mansion tax". You never hear it being used in the context of, "We had to make the hard decision: we had to tax the bankers more". You never hear it in the context of, "We had to make that hard decision: we had to increase the level of taxes paid by the highest earners in society". You only hear it in the context of debates like this, when it is about welfare or some other element that affects ordinary citizens. Well, you have to make hard decisions if you are in government.

I know about making hard decisions in government. I have had to rationalise the schools estate. Each and every decision to close, rationalise or amalgamate a school has been very hard, and some have been opposed by many in the Chamber. So, do not tell me that being in government is about making hard decisions. I know about making hard decisions, and I am prepared to continue to make those hard decisions.

Do not paint us into a corner by saying, "You are not really suitable for government unless you are prepared to further cut and restrict the quality of life of somebody who is on benefits, whether it is the working poor, disabled children or adults or the long-term sick". That is not making hard decisions in government. To me, that is an easy decision for some. They are quite willing to make those sorts of decisions moving forward. Let us cut out the nonsense about us not being willing to make hard decisions.

People say that we are economically illiterate. Those who ran the economy for generations and who claimed to be the economic masters caused the economic crash. Those who now sit back and benefit from the economic crash in terms of tens of billions of pounds of government interventions are the ones who caused the economic crash. No one on benefits, whether they be working poor or not working, caused the economic crash. None of them were sitting round the board tables making the decisions around the further greed that led to the economic downfall. You have to decide why you are in government, why you are an elected representative and what you want to achieve.

We have heard much over the last few days and months — and the figure goes up and down — about how much the Conservative Government are fining the Executive. We are being told that it is £2 million a week at this stage. Let us look at what we are spending that £2 million a week on. The British Government are using the theory that we are spending £2 million a week more on benefits than we should be spending, and so they are going to take that off our block grant. People are saying that that money is lost and that there should be hip operations, more social housing, more schools and more teachers. Let us not blame people on benefits for the lack of hip operations, the lack of schools and us having less social housing. That is not their fault. The decision on austerity has been taken elsewhere.

Let us look at the £2 million that is going out to benefit recipients, who are your constituents and the people who rely on you to represent them. It is not going on extravagant lifestyles; it is going on food, heating, rent and clothes. It is being spent in the shops in your area. It is being spent in the local economy. It is not being wasted. You may disagree with how it is being spent, but it is not being wasted. So, let us not continue with the myth that £2 million is being wasted. The £2 million is going into the purses and wallets of citizens out there. Carers, people with disabilities and the long-term sick are receiving that money and are using it to survive.

They are the people who are at the centre of the debate.

I listened carefully to Mr Nesbitt's contribution, and he quoted Charles Dickens:

"It was the best of times, it was the worst of times".

It brought back to me a comment made by a group of senior economists in Britain after George Osborne's October Budget. They said that, if he delivers the cuts, which he has indicated that he will, we will go back to levels of poverty not seen since Dickensian times. Mr Nesbitt did not use that quote, but that is what was quoted. Such was the level of concern at that time that even George Osborne, the champion of austerity and the champion of withdrawing the state from citizens, had to rethink his plans, temporarily anyhow. Ahead of the elections, he announced that they are going to further cut public spending by £25 billion, which may bring us even further into Dickensian levels of poverty.

Mr Nesbitt went on to make another comment. He talked about maps, and he said that, if you outline the map of where the conflict raged and overlap it with a map of where most citizens have mental health and well-being problems, they match. There is a third map that you can lie over the top of that, and that is the map of social deprivation. There were those, such as Mr Farry, who expressed concerns about the future of the Good Friday Agreement. The Good Friday Agreement was about delivering change for everyone, and certainly it was about delivering change and hope to those communities that had suffered worst as a result of the conflict. The conflict, by and large, was not fought in the leafy suburbs; it was fought out in areas of high social deprivation. Those are the same areas that, if we were foolish enough to pass the current Welfare Reform Bill, the current guidance and other materials that go with it, will be affected by welfare reform cuts. I am an avid supporter of the Good Friday Agreement, but it has to deliver for those who suffered the most from the conflict: those citizens who lived in the areas of deprivation. That is where we have to make the changes.

We are debating welfare reform, but it is only a chapter in the book. The book is called 'Austerity', and they are about to throw the book at us. The Conservative Government are about to throw that book at us with all the muster that they can gather. We will see further cuts not only to benefits for the working poor and the disabled but to education, health, road services, Minister Farry's Department etc coming at us because that is the strategy ahead.

What can we do about it? Here we are, for want of a better term, a regional Assembly. The Westminster Government have been elected. I respect their mandate. They were duly elected and they have a mandate, but do they have a mandate to ignore the will of the devolved institutions? Scotland proves that they do not. Scotland has rejected the Conservative Government and the Conservative-lite alternative of Labour, and they have said, "No, we are not going down the austerity route. We are sending back MPs who are totally opposed to that". The Welsh Administration, too, have registered their opposition to it, and Mr Attwood outlined some of the measures they have taken.

Every one of the parties, as far as I am aware, who stood in the general election, apart from the Conservatives, went knocking on doors and said, "We are here to represent you. We are opposed to further cuts. We want to stand up for you. In fact, we are going to go back to Westminster's power brokers and we are going to help to form the next Government because we will stop them doing what they are going to do".

The first opportunity they have of standing up to them, they do the opposite. At a very crucial stage in the development of George Osborne's 8 July statement and at the very crucial stage of the Scottish National Party and the Scottish Executive's opposition to further Tory austerity, you are actually sending out a signal to them saying, "We are OK with this. We will deliver that for you. You won't have any trouble from us". Now is the time for us to be standing together. Here am I, an Irish republican, looking to Scotland and Wales for inspiration. Where does the Ulster-Scot unionist stand on that? Where does the Ulster-Scot unionist, who prides themselves on their resolute stubbornness to stand up for what they believe in, stand on that? Let us be clear about this: the rebellious Scots have achieved more in the last six months from the British Government than ye have achieved over this last 50 years being loyal to them. So let us learn a lesson from the rebellious Scots; let us learn a lesson from them and stand with them and the Welsh to ensure that George Osborne, David Cameron and others get a very clear message that, while we respect their mandate, they have no mandate to deliver what they are proposing to do to our public services, to our government and to our people.

People refer to that and say that you will go back and hand out the begging bowl. I find that very, very demeaning, because the truth of the matter is this: we all pay taxes in one shape or another — some more, some less, some whatever it may be. Perhaps there are few out there who should be paying a lot more. We all pay taxes, and I am talking about the general public — people in this room. We send money to the Treasury; we do not go with a begging bowl looking for investment back. We want investment in our society; we want investment to deliver the changes that we need to build a stable society moving forward. People who refer to that as a begging-bowl mentality are doing a great disservice to everyone going forward.

Folks, I think that there is still an opportunity for another option here. I call on the Minister not to move the debate to a vote, because if you move the debate to a vote, you are cutting out numerous options available to the Assembly, the Executive and this society. Be under no illusions — I doubt that you are under any illusions — that the Bill will fall. If your plan is for the Bill to fall and to hand it over to the Conservatives, I also think that that is a mistake. Let us take the time, whether it is hours, days or weeks — whatever we have — to get an agreed welfare Bill moving forward and to work along with the other Administrations in these islands to secure a better and more prosperous future for us all.

Mr Allister: At the outset, I join in the common accord of wishing the First Minister a speedy recovery and of expressing to the Robinson family our thoughts at this distressing time.

What we are witnessing here today is the fact that the chickens are coming home to roost in the failure of mandatory coalition. For years, it has been promised to us as the panacea of good government and that it is the essential and only workable system of government. Yet today, it stands utterly exposed as that which reeks of failure. It is a collective failure of all the parties that support and sustain that unworkable system of government. Of course, as a diversion from that, the blame game has been in full swing today. One side blames the other. I suppose that, in moving the Bill today, the DUP wants to stop the music while the blame parcel rests on the lap of Sinn Féin, and so, largely, it does. One side wants simply to blame the other, instead of anyone in the House facing up to the reality that it is the system of government that has failed. The system that they continue to sustain is failing before our very eyes.

It is the attempt to avoid that reality that has given rise to much of the rhetoric of today. Instead of this House facing up to the fact that a system that has been available and in operation for 17 years is fast coming to the inevitable point of implosion, they want to blame everything but the system and blame the parties within the system. It is the system that guarantees the logjam, and it is the system that guarantees the mutual vetoes, which have brought us to this point. Therefore, the inescapable conclusion is that this is a colossal, seismic and defining failure of the system. That is the point, and unless and until this House grasps it, we will continue to lurch from crisis to crisis.

Of course, this has come against a backdrop of great deception. The deception, for example, that all this was sorted after long nights and long days. Mr Attwood was talking to us about, I think, the 40 days and 40 nights that were looming ahead of us. It was something like that, maybe more, that led to that great moment and great breakthrough of the Stormont House Agreement. The new dawn had arrived. The threat that was crippling the Executive over welfare reform had been removed. All had been resolved, and the first party out of the traps to endorse the Stormont House Agreement was Sinn Féin. Indeed, Mr Martin McGuinness told us it was a “remarkable achievement” and a “fresh start”. He said:

“And it is a fresh start we need to seize with both hands”.

The same hands, on top of everything else that they are responsible for, that since have torn to shreds the Stormont House Agreement. That same party came to this House at the Consideration Stage of this same Bill and repudiated the consistent — one has to concede it is consistent — opposition of the SDLP and joined the DUP and others to sustain this very Bill that, tonight, they are going to kill.

They had attained a remarkable achievement. They had made a fresh start. The fresh start did not last very long, because now they tell us that it was a false start. How they get themselves to that position is beyond the comprehension of most of us. Maybe it was the financial illiteracy that seems to plague them from time to time. Maybe they did think that £564 million was really the same as £1.5 billion, but they said that they had got a fresh start and made a remarkable achievement and that no one, now or in the future, was going to be less well off despite having a fraction of what it would take to ensure that. But, it was a fresh start. It was a remarkable achievement, whether or not, as I said, it was its notorious financial illiteracy at work.

Finally, the penny dropped, whether it was that or it was the old Sinn Féin trick in negotiations of extracting what you can at any given point, you pocket what you have got, and you then come back for more. Has that not been the story of the last 20 years of what is called the peace process? Of course it has, and maybe it was encouraged in that view by some of the things that Mr O’Dowd talked about. It had forced the DUP from a parity position into negotiating for a lavish £564 million uplift by raiding the block grant to sustain welfare. Maybe it was encouraged to believe that, with a little more push, pocketing what it had got and bringing it back to the edge, it would get more. Maybe, this time, it has just pushed too far. We will see.

Maybe it is just Sinn Féin advancing the political agenda that lies at the heart of everything that it does, because this party of Sinn Féin is not in government in Northern Ireland to give us good government and to make Northern Ireland work. This is a party that is quite happy to bankrupt Northern Ireland and to be self-fulfilling in its affirmation that Northern Ireland is a failure. How better to do it financially than to bankrupt it? That may well be the guiding principle that brings it to this point, but, whatever it is, we are at a point of reality check. It is a reality check that shows the welfare reform project in free fall and now hurtling towards irredeemable budgetary crisis.

It is quite clear that, within days and weeks, the budgetary arrangements necessary to govern in this part of the United Kingdom will not be possible as a consequence of the killing of this Bill tonight. The free fall of welfare reform and the inevitable budgetary failure that is coming at us very fast raises fundamental questions about the sustainability and even the desirability of these institutions. What is a devolved Assembly and institution about if it is not about settling the budgetary issues in a manner where the people whom it governs can be governed effectively and efficiently? It is the very core of what devolution is about, and, if, as the Finance Minister has warned, we are hurtling towards the unattainability of a balanced Budget and that tonight will hasten that day, what is the purpose and the point of this institution if we cannot even settle a Budget? If you cannot settle a Budget, you cannot govern. It is as simple and as elementary as that.

What should happen? Yes, the intransigence of those who have brought us to this point should lead to the natural corollary of the repatriation of welfare powers back to Westminster. That should be an elementary consequential step of killing this Bill. More than that, if, in the killing of this Bill, we kill a Budget for this House, what is left?

Why would you not then repatriate all the executive powers of a neutered Executive — neutered of finance and incapable of governing?

Some might hold up their hands and say, "Oh, but that would be the end of devolution". It does not have to be. There is more to devolution than executive power. The devolution that we have has three essential component and active parts: legislative devolution, such as we are exercising now in this debate on a Bill; the scrutiny powers of the Committees; and the executive functions — or malfunctions — that the Executive are largely failing to exercise adequately. If you lose one, do you have to lose all three? It is time we thought laterally and discovered that you do not. Major critic though I am of these institutions, I concede that in its legislative functions the Assembly has performed reasonably adequately and in its scrutiny functions it has performed quite adequately and done some good work. The one area where it fails and where "failure" is writ large is in its exercise of executive functions.

If the worst comes to the worst and we hurtle to the point where the Executive are functionless and pointless, it does not have to mean the end of all aspects of the institutions. Why could you not still have legislative and scrutiny powers as the default position? If and when the politicians in the House wake up to the reality that mandatory coalition has not worked and will never work and that there therefore has to be a better way, such as a coalition of the willing and an opposition, they can repatriate executive functions. Until they do, are we really going to say to the people of Northern Ireland, "All we can offer you is the perpetual dysfunction and perpetual failure of this Stormont Executive"? Better by far to say, "We will give you the scrutiny that a legislative assembly affords. We will give you the legislative functions of a legislative assembly". That will always be the default position in the devolution settlement. Unless and until we can learn from the processes and are ready to embrace the form of executive devolution that would work, namely voluntary coalition and an opposition, it is legislative devolution and the scrutiny powers. You have failed in the delivery of the rest.

Who in the House could stand on their feet to say that the Executive have done anything but fail in the delivery of their executive functions? Tonight, that is indisputably written on the walls of the House — failure on welfare reform, hurtling us to budgetary failure. There is a choice coming, and it is a reassessment and a recognition that it is the system of executive devolution that has failed. The reassessment requires a recognition and a grasping of the fact that we need not cling to a failed form of executive devolution when there is an attainable form. Those who are willing to agree on issues and command the requisite majority govern, whoever they are. Those who cannot and will not form the opposition. You get a Government that works, and, if it collapses, you go back to the default of legislative and scrutiny devolution. When the Executive finally implode, that may well look like a more attractive option than some ever want to contemplate. The sooner those who cling to the coat-tails of the failure of the Executive waken up to the fact that it is not working and is not going to work, the better for us all.

Mr Agnew: It is my first opportunity to wish Mr Peter Robinson well and hope for his full recovery. It is important at times like this that we separate the politics from the person. I have seen unkind comments about Mr Robinson on social media, and I say to those making them — some of whom, I know, are supporters of my party — that the time to knock a politician is when they are on their feet making political speeches and debates and standing as a politician. Mr Robinson is no different from any of us: he is vulnerable to illness, and, at this difficult time, we recognise the man as a person and pass sympathy to him and his family.

My persistent stance throughout the welfare reform debate has been that the figures do not add up. I first made the point when Sinn Féin claimed that, under the deal agreed at Stormont House, no one would be worse off. I made the point that that could not be the case, because, whatever figure we used, whether it was NICVA's figure of £250 million or the previous Social Development Minister's figure of £120 million, that was the scale of the cuts, and the mitigation was £90 million. Those sums can never be made to work. Nothing has changed in the mitigation measures since March, when the Final Stage of the Bill was first to come to the Assembly, which is why the Green Party is still opposed to the Bill and the proposals put forward around it. We have had some information from the Social Development Minister on who will not be worse off under the proposed mitigation measures that have been agreed. However, I cannot even have confidence in those, in that, whilst I appreciate the detail that has been given about the who, what has not been made public is how much each of those categories will receive.

I know that the Minister's predecessor was very dismissive of the NICVA report, which was produced on their behalf by the University of Sheffield. It laid out the figures and laid out by how much each benefit would be cut and the direct impact on Northern Ireland. It did not just give the blanket £250 million; it gave its component parts. We have yet to see a refutation of those figures. I often quote the two figures of £120 million and £250 million because I cannot say which is accurate, but I have yet to see from the Department, the Minister or an official source of the Northern Ireland Executive the breakdown of their £120 million calculation. I have certainly not seen any evidence that £90 million per year would be sufficient to mitigate the cuts that are being made. If we accept that, if we went forward on the current proposals, there would be a shortfall in the mitigation — I can see no other conclusion that can be drawn — we have not seen the detail of who will be worse off.

We have seen who, it is proposed, will be protected, but we have not been given the detail of who is to be worse off. How can we judge today whether that is an acceptable consequence if we do not have that detail?

The Green Party has sought to be constructive throughout this process. At Consideration Stage, we brought forward more amendments than any other party. We made clear the areas of the Bill that we would like to see improved. None of those amendments were passed. Indeed, they were blocked by the DUP and voted against by Sinn Féin, which, as it has been pointed out, at that point, was putting forward welfare reform and saying that the deal that had been reached at Stormont House should receive the Assembly's support.

Last week, when it was clear that this Bill was coming before the House again, the Green Party laid out key areas where we still wanted to see improvements. If we were to have this deadline today — others have debated whether it was a necessary or unnecessary deadline — and accepting that this Bill was coming forward again, we made clear where we needed to see movement: on increased funds for mitigation measures; no bedroom tax; protection of child disability payments and additions; and sanctions.

On increased funds, we have heard some who say that this is not realistic, possible or affordable. We have to bear in mind that the same parties have signed up to corporation tax reduction, which would see £300 million a year come out of the block grant. The same people who say that we cannot afford the so-called penalties, which, as I pointed out consistently, are not penalties but money going into the pockets of the poorest and most vulnerable in society and those who are on the lowest incomes, are saying that we cannot afford those cuts from the block grant. Indeed, the Alliance Party leader, David Ford, when attacking my party in his conference speech, said that we cannot afford his guesstimate of the figure of £200 million of cuts to public services, but, in the same speech, he said that we must progress the corporation tax cut, which would see a £300 million tax relief for big businesses. He says that we cannot afford £200 million — if we take his figure; £250 million if we take NICVA's figure; or £120 million if we take the DSD figure — to protect the sick, the poor and the most vulnerable in society. I made it clear then and will do so again that where my party's priorities lie is in protecting the most vulnerable and ensuring that the first duty of Government is to make sure that people are not driven into poverty, destitution, further hardship or to food banks, which we have seen an increasing need for under the Tory Government.

We hear boasts about the levels of foreign direct investment etc that have been brought into Northern Ireland under this Executive. As a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, I hear it time and time again. Well, in the lifetime of this Executive, the income gap between Northern Ireland and other regions of the UK has increased. Yes, we have had limited growth, but so has everywhere else: it was called the financial recovery and it was global. In terms of what this Executive have delivered, the income gap between Northern Ireland and Great Britain has increased under this Executive. The great boon of foreign direct investment that was supposed to lift us out of poverty has certainly not achieved that in the term of this Executive, and I do not believe that it would be achieved if we reduced corporation tax and took a further £300 million a year out of the block grant voluntarily.

We can talk about cuts being imposed by the Tory Government. I certainly sympathise with anyone who challenges the Tory Government's austerity agenda, but the proposal to cut £300 million from our own block grant voluntarily is this Northern Ireland Executive, which I stand in opposition to, making their own austerity cuts voluntarily. They can blame no one and, indeed, asked for the consent of the Tory Government to do so.

In its five-point plan, the DUP made it very clear that the one issue that it was going to Westminster on was no bedroom tax. Yet, again, the Social Development Minister has confirmed, and we have seen it; the legislation brings in the powers for the implementation of the bedroom tax. Whilst the mitigation measures would protect some from its implementation, the Social Development Minister said today:

"I should develop a scheme that protects existing and future tenants from any reduction in housing benefits for their tenancies unless there is a significant change in their personal circumstances or they are offered suitable alternative accommodation." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 105, p2, col 2].

In other words, as I have said during previous stages, he has made it clear today that, where alternative housing exists and where personal circumstances change, the bedroom tax will be implemented and people will be worse off under this legislation. I do not know how that is reconciled with the DUP's strong stance against the bedroom tax in the Westminster election. I certainly cannot reconcile it. Indeed, I cannot reconcile it with my meeting with the First Minister, who told me that there would be no bedroom tax. Again, the Minister has put it on public record today that, in certain circumstances, the bedroom tax will be applied and people will be worse off because of it.

Another issue that my party has consistently raised and sought amendments on at previous stages is the sanctions regime, which is perhaps one of the most odious parts of the welfare cuts in GB and, indeed, here in Northern Ireland. It is worth remembering that we are debating the legislation today. It is not the Stormont House Agreement, the deals around it or the proposed mitigation measures. None of those are in the legislation, which remains virtually unchanged from the day that it came to the Assembly in October 2012. The legislation that we are debating would allow for an 18-month suspension of benefits as a penalty to claimants. For some, that would mean 18 months with no income whatsoever. We have talked about food banks, and that would mean people subsisting purely on the handouts of food banks with no protection from the state for 18 months. If you are unemployed or on disability benefits, you would see those benefits cut for 18 months. That will drive people to destitution and despair, and we have seen examples in Great Britain where it has driven people to their deaths. That is not something that my party can vote for. That is not something that my party could stand over.

We have seen some reassurance in the Social Development Minister's paper as to where mitigation measures would kick in for the disability additions for children. However, again, the figures to match that are absent, so we are left to trust in whether there will be full or partial mitigation. Indeed, we also do not know where we will be after three years.

As I said, a number of things have been debated. Some have touched on the legislation. We have also discussed the Stormont House Agreement and, indeed, the Stormont Castle agreement, which I was not party to and in which my party was not involved, the Budget and maybe something that has not been talked about so much but that is tied into all of this: the Programme for Government.

It is clear that the Stormont House Agreement, the Budget and, to some extent, the Programme for Government are inseparable. These are agreements between the Executive parties as to how to move forward. You certainly cannot separate the Budget from the Stormont House Agreement, because it was predicated on what was agreed. I cannot explain why some people appeared to sign up to the Stormont House Agreement, and certainly signed up to the Budget, and then seemed to step back. I can say that the Green Party has been consistent in its opposition to the Stormont House Agreement.

Let us be clear; there was almost a sort of gratitude that the UK Government would let us introduce our own mitigation measures. I fail to understand that, because, first, welfare is devolved and, secondly, there was no extra money in our block grant out of which the mitigation fund was going to be taken. That was a decision that could have been taken by the Executive without including it in any Stormont House Agreement, tying it to corporation tax or to public sector redundancies: it was completely separate.

For that reason, I fail to understand those who say that if we do not pass the Bill today the Tory Government will implement the cuts and we will not have any mitigation measures. That is a decision for you in the Executive to make, because it is your Budget and block grant, for which you will seek agreement on how it should be spent. The Tories cannot say that you cannot put in those mitigation measures.

As was pointed out, in fact, the Scottish Government, which currently does not have power over welfare reform, still implemented their own mitigation when it came to the bedroom tax, to make sure that no one would be worse off. We still have those powers and it would still be our decision. Those who say that there will be no mitigation if welfare is taken over by the Government —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way in one second.

They say that because that is the course they intend to go down rather than the one they have to go down.

Mr Storey: I have listened to Members talking today about Nicola Sturgeon and what is going on in Scotland. Let us remind ourselves of the reality in Scotland. Back in 2014, when Nicola Sturgeon was the deputy leader of the Scottish National Party, she said:

“There is no doubt that people in Scotland are paying a heavy price for Westminster decisions. But these figures show that by working closely with our Local Authority partners we have been able to provide support ... we will continue to do all we can to help. However, only an independent Scottish Parliament will give us the powers we need to scrap the bedroom tax.”

Is it not time for Members in the House to realise what the real agenda is here and put the facts about what happens in Scotland rather than create a smokescreen over the real situation?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for his intervention, but it does not take away from my point that what we do with our Budget will be in our power. If we want to put in mitigation measures, whether they are for welfare cuts implemented here or implemented by the Tory Government, we can decide how we spend our block grant. How much that will be is decided by Westminster, but how we allocate it, and whether we choose to protect our most vulnerable, are decisions that will be made by the Executive, and the Budget has to be passed by the Assembly.

We are here today to debate the legislation. The first draft of the Bill came to us in October 2012, and my party sought to make amendments, as did the SDLP and the Ulster Unionists, to improve it. Little changes were made. This is, effectively, still a replica of the Bill that went through GB. It will still increase hardship for the most vulnerable in our society and it is still a Bill that seeks to punish the poor for the excesses of the rich. This is a Bill that neither I nor my party can support.

Mr McNarry: If this Sinn Féin/SDLP blockade is about parties that are privy to official sets of figures adding up differently, will someone, for goodness' sake, tell them to do their sums again? There cannot be more than one reliable set of facts and figures to add up and count. Someone, therefore, cannot count, or someone does not want the calculation to add up. Unless, that is, the figures do stack up and everyone knows it, but it is the incidentals to be added on that tell us the true facts — the areas called “passports into benefits”, which do count and can overload figures officially compiled beyond the simple DLA conversion that we have been working to.

I suggest that we pay attention, because this is more than stalemate. It is about more than a petition of concern. It is beyond adding and subtraction. If you ask the public what they voted for nearly three weeks ago, they will tell you that it was not for a crash at Stormont. Watching the circling of well-worn and well worn-out party wagons collapsing in a pile-up, people out there are demanding to know just what is going on at the House on the hill. At the end of today, will anyone know whether it is a win, a loss or a draw? Are we up for business next week or next month? If the shutters come down for the summer recess, will they be pulled up again for business in September?

Frankly, it is an unacceptable position for parties that willingly formed a mandatory coalition to be unable to voluntarily sustain their duties in government. That is reprehensible and irresponsible. Keeping this cowboy coalition honest and accountable is fast becoming a waste of time. On days like today, and in the realisation that a day like today will probably happen again, it is painfully obvious that this Executive are proving themselves to be a failed entity. Is there a plan on the table today, or tomorrow? Even a majority plan will do, or do majorities, like everything else in this place, count for nothing?

Are we in the territory of the unknown, as described by the Chair of the Social Development Committee earlier? Is it not the case that the only plan that is causing posturing and prevarication — the reform of welfare benefits, sent down for us to adopt — is one outside our creation and beyond our scope of authority? Is it not the case that those reforms are universal across the whole of the United Kingdom? Irrespective of the genuine opposition shown here and elsewhere, they have been adopted and are being implemented in every region throughout the United Kingdom except here. The people out there would like to know what sets us so apart from others. Are our benefit-seekers any different from those in England, Scotland and Wales? Are the reforms not the same for everyone? Is it not the case that, by resisting the reforms in a dishonourable manner, we find ourselves in a House that continues to punish the very people each of us wants to protect?

There is no engagement in trench warfare with the sovereign Government that is going to successfully pull people out of the deep hole that they have dug for themselves by promising that pie in the sky guarantee that no one, either now or in perpetuity, will ever be affected by cuts. Is that the plan? Is that it: make a promise that you could never keep and convince yourself that it is now all a matter of principle? Well, principle, my eye. Smartness and smugness all of a sudden looked daft and embarrassing on 8 May, when Sinn Féin's master tactic fell into its own hole and the Tories formed a single majority Government.

I read that the great strategist, the deputy First Minister, now wants to form a rebel Celtic coalition to fight austerity. He is forgetting, of course, that the nationalists in Scotland and Wales have already adopted the nation's welfare reforms and are working through the previous Government's austerity sanctions. Is he now telling us that he is in negotiations with Nicola Sturgeon and Leanne Wood to join with Sinn Féin? Is he bringing with him the lame-duck SDLP as his co-opted bag carriers? According to him today, we are beyond this Bill. He wants to scupper the July Budget without knowing what it contains. If so, it is going to be a long, hot summer waiting for the autumn, when on the basis of today, the talking has stopped and Sinn Féin, with the SDLP, have isolated themselves from this place. That is an important and pertinent question to ask, and it proffers another enquiry.

In the aftermath of seeing his intransigent stance and negotiating demands rejected, I ask this: what are the deputy First Minister's prospects and intentions? His plan was not just rejected but booted out in no uncertain terms when he was told by the Prime Minister that this part of the United Kingdom will be treated no differently on welfare reforms than any other part of the United Kingdom. I ask this, therefore: can anyone having been so seriously rebuffed in such a dismissive manner remain in office? How can anyone who thought that they were getting it so right be proved so wrong? Can the deputy First Minister stay on when his strategy has collapsed leaving vulnerable people on benefits facing the consequences of his failure alone to deliver the promises that he made to them that their benefits would not now or ever be reduced? Those promises failed to materialise. How could the Scots or the Welsh do business with a man who makes promises that he cannot keep and has used the most vulnerable in a despicable manner in this failed tactic?

Up until 8 May, he had one plan and one strategy: stick it out until Labour wins or, at worst, Labour and the SNP come together in a hung Parliament. It burst, they burst and he is bust with yet another plan decimated and torn up into pieces. Are people not entitled to ask why the deputy First Minister is not out of office three weeks after watching his pie in the sky promises wrecked by five more years of Tories in Government, this time in on their own terms? Did he not choose to use austerity as the stick to beat the Brits with, and has he not now fallen on his own sword?

I know of no Member who welcomes austerity or who does not or will not stand up for the seriously vulnerable.

No single party can claim to speak for the vulnerable, who will be hit the hardest by these benefit reforms, but only one party made irresponsible promises. Only one party misled the public. Whatever the outcome resulting from today, be it direct rule, mounting Treasury fines or calling in administrators to do the work that the Executive cannot hack out together, let alone attempt to put a Budget through until next year, we should fast-track to next month, when the Chancellor will outline the details of further austerity measures and billions more reductions in cuts for everyone from the welfare budget. What then for Northern Ireland? Where is the plan? Where is there even talk of a plan to make adjustments in our financial management for the future, when we cannot agree today to proceed with the Bill?

What state will patient care in our health service be in by then? What will be the continued extent of turmoil in our schools? Tell the people who sent us to do a job, not me, what promises are going to be made that anyone is going to deliver on.

There can be no satisfactory outcome from today's proceedings. We cannot fault the people who think that this place, with its division, is not worth paying for any more. That truly would be a failure that we would be unlikely to recover from, yet we have hamstrung ourselves with overzealous regulations based on mistrust, rather than consensus cooperation. We have not grown up within the experiment that was designed to actually share power, and now we put at risk the very things we want to pass on as our legacy: peace; order; better government and democracy through the union; and devolution. Bust it now, and it will be a long time before that offer is renewed.

Today we have seen recriminations spill over. We see that we are governed not by consensus policies or by a majority within a coalition but by the sharp instrument of the veto and the blunt tactic of petitions of concern. Are we really saying, "Theresa Villiers, it's all yours. Do your best"? Are we so far apart that today we have joined the Crazy Gang?

As I said, I was not privy to an agreement that, at first, called the Prime Minister and a Taoiseach to rush over to Stormont House to seal a deal. I remember it. Nor was I involved in what transpired to be the Stormont Castle agreement. So, I am unable to comment on the common sense of either, but I do see the common sense of what is presented in the House today. Therefore, it is regrettable that we reach this stage of vetoes and rejection, having been unable to have either of those agreements debated in the House with amendments tabled and the petition of concern weapon decommissioned.

In such circumstances, in those talks and given the opportunity, then my suggestion on behalf of UKIP — having not been invited to so-called all-party talks — is to call Westminster's bluff on what we can use without offloading the funding onto our block grant stream. Could we, I asked, and would we, now that evidence has been shown to dispense with parity, look at the role of lifelong carers in the light of these benefit reduction measures and, given the significant evidence that most — granted, not all — benefit receivers who are categorised as seriously vulnerable are looked after at home and cared for on a 24/7 basis by a lifelong carer, do two things for the family and for the person on benefits at the same time? We could increase the lifelong carer's allowance by an extra £500 per year and, in doing so, not get into the benefits argument. They will take their own course, but the family would at least suffer less by increasing the carer's allowance in circumstances where the benefit receiver would be hit the hardest.

I have heard it said before: help the unsung heroes who save this country a fortune, by giving them more to help the people they care for. Why not? For the same type of family, with a lifelong carer in place as previously described, we could also give the household a small but effective rates reduction. I ask you to look at it this way and face the facts. In basic economic terms, we do not have an extended credit line. We lack financial credibility to borrow and, moreover, to be trusted to pay back. We are already overcommitted to large loans, and the attitude of some Members today does little to foster confidence in our abilities to talk any economic sense. So why not talk to the Prime Minister and his Chancellor? Why not put the proposition of increasing the allowance for long-term carers and reducing their household rates free from knock-backs on funding? After all, they might be interested, one day, to call on the 11 votes which three of the parties represented in this place have at Westminster.

I am in no position to negotiate but I am clear that, if those who are in such a position have any sense, they will realise that they are clinging by a fragile thread in finding the attention of the Prime Minister waiting on their next move. The figures I offer are not about me or anyone else determining the vulnerability level of a person on welfare benefits. I simply do not know the categorisation of welfare benefits and how they are defined and equated so that someone is termed more vulnerable than someone else, but that that is how it works. I think that these figures relate only to a lifelong carer looking after a vulnerable person on benefits. My suggestion is to take the next three years. Why three years, you may ask? If we believe George Osborne, that is around the time that, he reckons, austerity will be ending.

Take 10,000 carers at an extra £500 per year on their allowance and that is £5 million; take 20,000 at £500 per year and that is £10 million. Take 10,000 carers with a rates reduction of £50 per year and that is £500,000; take 20,000 with a rates reduction of £70 per year, and that is £1.4 million. So take somewhere between 10,000 and 20,000 vulnerable people, served and looked after by carers; strike a cap and go for it; and, in showing that we care more about people's benefits than party political benefits, can we not find a way out of this? Can we find between £5.5 million and £11 million to ease a vulnerable person's family situation and, at the same time, deal with and ease the pressure on our forthcoming Budget?

It has been a long day, and, as we come to the conclusion of it, if we show how much we in the House care about people, be they on benefits or not, that will go a long way to proving that this place can and should work for everyone. I am not asking people to save this place unless they truly believe that it can be made to work better and to improve on its value. I am, however, asking that we do not let down the people who believe in us, people who have come out to vote for the Assembly in sufficient numbers and trusted us to work for all, not least the most vulnerable in our society. If that cannot be done, and if that is the consequence of today, we should not waste any more time or waste the people's time — this Executive must admit to their failure, fold up and walk away. If that is how we are being asked to leave the House, and this is my last day in the Assembly, shame on the Assembly and shame on those who would put the House in this position.

People may talk about recriminations, and, of course, there will be plenty afterwards. I heard Minister O'Dowd talk about hours or days to put this right, yet I heard Mr Agnew tell the House that we began this in 2012, and here we have a Minister of Education — a failed Minister of Education — telling us that we should devote a few more hours or days.

The conclusion has been made that there is no more time. I compliment the Minister on having the courage to put the Bill before the House today and not waste any more time. If that is the conclusion of the business of the Assembly in which we have all been proud to serve, then thanks, Minister, for ensuring that we do not waste any more time.

Mr B McCrea: First, I extend my best wishes to the First Minister and wish him a speedy return.

I have to admit that, when I saw Mr McNarry stand up to speak with what looked to me like an inch of papers, my heart sank. I asked myself —

Mr McNarry: Is that because it was not two inches? [Laughter.]

Mr B McCrea: Mr McNarry, you finished your contribution talking about a little more time and a few more hours, and I have to say to you, "Please, anything but that". We have talked and talked and talked today, and it is irrelevant. I have watched people around here, and I have never seen so many phones studied with such interest and so many hands to foreheads. This is Groundhog Day. It reminds me of a triple period of Latin: just going over and over the issue. I despair. Not only is the debate irrelevant but it almost says that this place is ungovernable. We cannot get any form of agreement.

7.30 pm

I voted the last time. Mr Humphrey had to go and have a lie down afterwards because he saw me in the Lobby so often. I voted for the Welfare Reform Bill on the basis that it was a five-party agreement. I said to people, "I do not necessarily agree with everything, but the only way that you can deal with these issues is to get everybody together". There is something that I really struggle to understand. There were notable speeches today from Mr Maskey and Mr O'Dowd. I remember the welfare reform debate of 10 February, when Mr Maskey said:

"That deal allows an awful lot more money to be retained by the people who we represent, and that would not otherwise have been available except for the hard work that was carried out." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 101, p407, col 2].

Mr O'Dowd said:

"What we have agreed to in a five-party agreement, which we have all been open about, is that we have ensured that the most vulnerable in our society will be protected. What we have agreed to is that we have a different welfare Bill from that passed at Westminster two or three years ago. As I said in my opening comments, the Stormont House Agreement was about political parties agreeing to work with each other in deed and word."

He went on to chastise the SDLP because he seemed to think that it had done anything but live up to the agreement:

"they have ignored the facts that brought us to those negotiations. Party politics have their place, but, when it comes to destabilising the institutions, you have gone too far." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 101, p437, col 1].

Shame on you, SDLP. How dare you oppose the welfare Bill. Yet we now seem to have petitions of concern. I really do not understand how, over one weekend, it changed from anybody who dares say anything against the Bill is somehow disloyal to democracy and to the people of Northern Ireland to "We need to oppose this". I am sorry, but, as someone who is sitting on the edge of these discussions, I do not understand what has gone so badly wrong. There is something fundamentally amiss with our political processes if we cannot, after months of discussion and debate, come up with some form of agreed position.

I listened to the debates and heard people from Sinn Féin talk repeatedly about their mandate. They said that the Conservatives did not have a mandate here and that Sinn Féin would go and argue for its mandate. I will point out to them that mandates are all very well, but, if you do not have any money, you have to talk to people in a particular way. The issue is that, if Northern Ireland was self-financing, we could do what we liked and spend our money in whatever way we wanted, but, as we do not have money and we get a subvention of £10 billion out of £20 billion that we spend, you have to talk to people in the correct way.

When we talk about £20 billion or £10 billion, people quite often do not really have any idea whether that is a lot of money. They ask, "Does £10 billion here and there count?". Let me give you some reasons why, in my opinion, it is not the case that the Tory Government have suddenly ganged up and said, "Let us see if we can really annoy the Scots, the Northern Irish and the Welsh". Let me give you some facts that I picked up, and I am happy to be corrected on them. Against our subvention of £10 billion a year, the deficit in UK terms in 2013-14 was £148 billion. That is the difference between what we raise in tax and what we spend. The Chancellor talks about bringing down the deficit, but he is not bringing down the debt. The debt is increasing and will peak in 2015-16 at 80% of our GDP. In fact, if you were to take in the pension liabilities, as the Institute for Fiscal Studies thinks we should, it could be at 240%.

I know that the economists amongst us will argue about whether it really matters, given that interest rates are so low, and we can borrow effectively anyway and just carry on. The problem is that it makes us vulnerable to what foreign investors think of the UK, not of Northern Ireland. Our problem is that we simply do not have enough money to pay the bills that we have. If you put the sums of money that are being reduced into perspective, the benefits budget in the whole of the UK last year fell from £215 billion to £213 billion. There was a saving of £2 billion, so that gives you a sense of scale. The left tried to advance the bigger issue, which is that it is unfair that the huge deficit was caused not by the people but by the banking crisis and why should the people have to pay that burden.

You could make that argument properly and discuss it with people. It is amazing that, given the amount of contraction that we have seen in social welfare, we have not had more riots throughout Europe. Look at what has happened in Greece — I heard Gregory Campbell talk about it — if you tell people that you are taking their pension off them or reducing it drastically and the reply is that they did not borrow all the money, I can understand why there are problems.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member recognise that the deficit levels were growing out of control under the Labour Government before the crisis struck?

Mr B McCrea: In 2010-11, there was a deficit of £196 billion; the next year, it was reduced to £185 billion; the year after that, it was £178 billion; and now we are down to £148 billion. However, the point, Mr Beggs, is that we are still in deficit. We still spend more than we raise in taxation. Unless you change that —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member not think that the Tories would be better thought of if they were to go after the companies and individuals who engaged in massive tax avoidance rather than picking on the people at the bottom end of the scale?

Mr Speaker: I am struggling to make the connection with the welfare reform debate that we are supposed to be dealing with. We do not have that responsibility. The overview was interesting, but, in my view, the point may have already been made. We should return to the subject matter.

Mr B McCrea: I will be guided by you, Mr Speaker, but the point that I am trying to establish is that the reason why we have to implement welfare reform is that we simply cannot afford to do anything else. It is not because people take an ideological position; it is a fiscal reality. People need to take cognisance of that point of view.

If parties here wish to go to the Government and explain that Northern Ireland requires special dispensation or special measures to mitigate the worst outcomes of welfare reform because we are still a society in transition from a troubled past, that is an acceptable way to go. That argument should be made, but you will not be able to do so if you do not go collectively. Our fundamental problem now with welfare reform is that there are arguments that could be made, but, at the moment, we look like a laughing stock. It looks like we are incapable of making any decision. It is not just the Government of the United Kingdom who think that we are a laughing stock. The people of Northern Ireland are saying, "Whatever you like. It does not matter whether the Assembly stays up or goes down, whether there is direct rule or not or whether we turn up tomorrow or not". Nobody gives two hoots about what we do because we are ineffective at doing anything. I will take issue with Mr Allister. In fact, if I had long enough, I could probably take issue with everybody, but he tried to say to me that he thought that this place was doing quite well with legislation and some oversight issues. I am sorry, but I do not see it. What I see and hear in the country is people wishing that we would get our act together and do something. I give way to Mr Allister.

Mr Allister: To clarify, I was making the point that, as a process, we can generally handle legislation — today is not a good example of that — but we scrutinise legislation in the House and in Committees, and that is relatively successful as an experiment in legislative devolution. The scrutiny Committees do a relatively good job. The point that I was making was that the area where devolution is falling down is within the Executive. That is the big problem area.

Mr B McCrea: I have a lot of time for the points that Mr Allister makes. I do not always agree with them, of course, but he makes good points. However, he stretches credibility to believe that the processes are working. I do not see the processes working here. It may just be that Mr Allister is more generous than I am, or maybe he is in a different place, but I think that we need to do much, much better.

When I last spoke on this matter — it was a late hour, around 11.30 pm — the First Minister told me that I had made a really good point. [Laughter.] The only thing that was more shocking than that was when our new Minister of Finance and Personnel said last week, “I never thought that I would say this, but you made a good speech”. I have gone off and checked with whomever, and I need to rewrite things.

Here is the issue; here is the nub of the problem: in health, which is what I talked to the First Minister about, demand is growing at 6% per annum. That is a good thing, and it is because our people are living longer and we can do more for them. But our income goes up by 1%, and it is not possible politically to go and close hospitals or other buildings. I heard the Minister of Health say that we should not be wedded to buildings, which I take as code for saying that we will have to make some decisions. It is not possible to take decisions like that unless you have all-party support. We all know that it is far too easy for people to stand up and pick holes, grandstand and take advantage of people when they take tough decisions. Everybody says, “Take a tough decision”: the minute you take a tough decision, you get your head in your hands. You cannot work like this. This is what is so disappointing about the Welfare Reform Bill. There must be proper discussions, negotiations and some form of agreed position. You have to do something. Either you renegotiate with Westminster or you accept what you have got or whatever, but you have to do it together.

I will bring my remarks to a close by saying to people here that we really need to be careful that, when we argue from party political positions, try to make a few points and try to score some points on our opposition, we do not destroy that which is most important to us. It is a really good thing that we have a devolved Government here. It is right that the people of Northern Ireland should decide the fate of the people of Northern Ireland. We should take all these powers in our hands, and we should try to do it properly. If we look incompetent, incoherent and incapable, nobody will give us anything.

When it comes to the end of the debate, I will stick to my original decision, because the argument was made at that time that this is what we have to do. No contrary argument has come back in time to convince me to do otherwise. I realise that, by the nature of the debate, there is probably some other process in play. As we get to this stage of the night, the steam has gone out of the argument. All that that tells me as a politician is that there is a deal already agreed with somebody about something that is going to go in a different way. That is the only thing that I can assume. Otherwise, I would see a lot more energy in this place. We do not want this place to fail. We do not want it to stop, because the last time that happened, it took years — in fact, decades — to get it back again.

So, to those of you who will negotiate long and hard in the next couple of weeks, I wish you well. Remember, the fate of Northern Ireland depends on it.

Mrs Foster: Obviously, we miss the presence of our party leader and First Minister, and I know that everyone wishes him well. Hopefully, he will make a speedy recovery and come back to this place. I have no doubt that he will read the Hansard report of the debate at a later date, when, unfortunately, he will find that the quality of debate across the way has not changed and that nothing new has been added today from that side of the House. The debate must focus on the legislation, but, in that context, and as Finance Minister, it is, I think, incumbent upon me to set out the financial ramifications for Northern Ireland should the Bill fall at Final Stage today, as it appears it will.

First, I will look at the background. It has been well rehearsed that the deputy First Minister agreed the terms of a welfare deal with the First Minister some years ago. Then, Martin McGuinness was prevented from delivering on that agreement by others in the background of Sinn Féin. Last year, the First Minister indicated that we could not continue in the fashion that we were, so the Stormont House talks were convened towards the end of last year. Many issues were discussed at the talks, including flags and identity, parading, the past, dealing fairly and justly with the victims and survivors of violence, the need to have corporation tax devolved so that we could effect a step change in the Northern Ireland economy by lowering the rate, a voluntary exit scheme for the public sector, including civil servants, and, of course, dealing with welfare reform.

The agreement, when it came, was comprehensive and dealt with structural and financial issues. The first step was to agree a balanced Budget for 2015-16, which was achieved in the new year by the former Finance Minister through the Budget (No. 1) Bill. Secondly, a comprehensive public-sector reform and restructuring strategy was to be set in place, and this, too, was actioned. Indeed, over 7,200 civil servants applied to exit the service through the voluntary exit scheme. Thirdly, the Corporation Tax (Northern Ireland) Bill was passed in the House of Commons and achieved Royal Assent on 17 March this year. So, the implementation of the Stormont House Agreement was moving along.

The fourth element of the agreement was to bring to the Assembly legislation to give effect to welfare changes. My colleague the Minister for Social Development duly brought the Bill to the House, where various stages were passed. It was only after Sinn Féin had been to its ardfheis in Londonderry that things started to fall apart. After that meeting in the north-west, we were told that Sinn Féin would block the Final Stage.

So, let us go through what happened. The first fact that I want to talk about is that, last December at Stormont Castle, all five Executive parties agreed on how to deal with welfare reform. The Bill and the Minister's proposals for its implementation are entirely consistent with that five-party agreement. The five parties discussed it in detail, and they asked the head of the Civil Service and the head of the Social Security Agency to document their agreement. Before reaching agreement, they read and studied the text that officials had presented. The five party leaders then took that agreement to the Secretary of State and recommended it as the resolution to welfare reform. Indeed, without the welfare deal, there would certainly not have been the Stormont House Agreement. The Stormont House Agreement was signed by all five Executive parties and yet two of them — Sinn Féin and the SDLP — have felt unable to keep their side of the agreement.

Our Government kept their pledge by pushing forward on the corporation tax legislation; in the new year, the former Finance Minister put forward a balanced Budget based on the Stormont House Agreement commitments; and the Minister for Social Development faithfully introduced welfare legislation and, all the while, worked on top-ups for Northern Ireland claimants.

Whatever happened in Londonderry, Sinn Féin has reverted to type and walked away from the implementation of an agreement that it had signed up to. That begs the question: did it not understand what it signed on 23 December 2014? What possible explanation is there for signing up to a deal — a comprehensive deal — and then walking away from it a couple of months later? That is what it has done, and it has now brought its fellow travellers in the SDLP along with it. It speaks volumes about the attitude to responsible government in Northern Ireland, and I totally understand the frustration expressed by my ministerial colleague Stephen Farry earlier after his engagement with the SDLP. Some talked of economic prosperity pacts, while others never mentioned it when they got up to speak today, and that includes someone who spoke for an hour and 14 minutes.

Fact two is that today we are debating the Bill produced as a result of a five-party agreement. When it was presented to the Northern Ireland Executive, Sinn Féin supported it; when it was brought to the Committee for Social Development, Sinn Féin supported it; when it was submitted to the Speaker for its pre-introduction scrutiny, Sinn Féin supported it; when it came to the House for its legislative First Stage, Sinn Féin supported it; when it came to the Stormont House leaders' committee, Sinn Féin supported it; when it was subjected to a full debate at Second Stage, Sinn Féin supported it; when it faced its lengthy Committee Stage and others sought to amend it, Sinn Féin supported it. Throughout this process, until it came to its Final Stage, Sinn Féin supported this Welfare Reform Bill. The principles and narrative of the Bill have not changed; there is not one schedule or clause, not one sentence or word in this Bill that Sinn Féin has not repeatedly supported. Until, that is, at the very last moment of a gruelling and lengthy process, its Dublin bosses cracked the whip and the Sinn Féin Assembly team flipped.

Fact three is that this is an enabling piece of legislation; it creates no change in the level of any benefit. It provides legal authority for the Assembly to improve benefit payments and leaves all the decisions about claimants' benefits levels subject to subsequent regulations. The Executive have already agreed that those regulations can only be introduced by cross-community agreement. The Bill can be passed today, and nothing is lost to those who oppose the Minister for Social Development's proposals. His proposals will be dealt with through regulations. Killing the Bill, when that happens, does not impact on any payment levels. That really does show how contrived and artificial the argument has been today. Because it is an enabling Bill, its defeat would remove the power from the Assembly to improve welfare benefits for at least, I would say, two years. Dump this Bill, as is proposed today by the petition of concern, and welfare recipients will be worse off. That is a fact.

Let me spell out to those outside the Chamber what Sinn Féin and the SDLP are doing: they are removing the only mechanism that the Assembly has to improve welfare payments. You will receive less money not as a result of this Bill being passed but if Sinn Féin and the SDLP kill this Bill. The Minister for Social Development and his staff have been working on transitional protection or top-ups for claimants in Northern Ireland. The detail on all this is not in the Bill, as it is an enabling Bill, but was set out in the DSD paper of last week to Executive colleagues.

Let me spell out the consequences of the Bill not proceeding today for all those who would have received transitional support and top-ups. After today, if this Bill fails, their top-ups disappear as there will be no legislative cover to bring these issues into reality. Instead of having the opportunity of the most generous system of welfare reform in the United Kingdom, we will end up having the same as everyone else. Indeed, all those vulnerable people whom Sinn Féin says it is protecting will get the full implementation of GB welfare reform. I wonder whether Sinn Féin has explained that to its electorate. We have heard much about its mandate today, and I wonder whether it has explained that to its electorate.

Over the next three years, under our proposals, 102,000 existing benefit claimants in Northern Ireland will be better off, and no existing claimant will be worse off. This transitional scheme will collapse if the Bill is defeated. Future benefit claimants can top up their benefits by applying to a sizeable discretionary fund to assist them with any hardship, and this fund will not be available if the Bill is not passed.

Welfare reform has happened in England, Scotland and Wales, which makes a complete and utter nonsense of the claim that we should all go to Westminster together. What utter nonsense I have heard in this House today — "We should all go and see the Government." Welfare reform is already implemented in England, Scotland and Wales. They do not even have welfare powers in Scotland and Wales.

We have heard much about going along with Nicola Sturgeon this morning, but Nicola Sturgeon is talking about the wider economic picture. She is certainly not talking about welfare reform issues. So there has been a smokescreen thrown up by the parties opposite about going to London with Nicola Sturgeon and Carwyn Jones and making great play of the wider economic issues, when we are not dealing with the reality of what is right in front of us in this House tonight.

Because this House has chosen not to deal, and is choosing not to deal, with this issue, we are now facing fines of £9.5 million per month. Nine and a half million pounds buys an awful lot of hip operations and knee replacements. In fact, I think it buys 1,800 hip operations. If the Welfare Reform Bill had been passed before now, the penalties would have been coming to an end once Royal Assent had been granted. If the Bill falls today, those penalties will continue and increase year on year.

We have heard much about austerity this afternoon and this evening and about what is coming down the line. Whatever happens in the future, what happens now should concern this Assembly. If this Bill does not pass — I have said it many times over this past week — £604 million of cuts will have to be made to vital front-line public services, the services that the most vulnerable in our community need and rely upon. That is the size of the hole in our finances at present. There has been a lot of talk about what is coming down the line and what might be happening, but that is the reality of where we stand tonight. I prefer to deal with what is happening in front of me right now.

Let me be clear: my party will not support such severe cuts. Public services would be decimated. Public safety would be endangered. I wonder whether there is anyone in this House who would support £600 million of cuts to health, to education, to victims, to justice services and to job promotion. I am looking round the House, and I do not see anybody putting their hand up for that sort of cut. The only way to avoid having to deal with that issue is to pass this Bill. There is no money tree out the back of Stormont. I have searched; it is not there.

The next thing I wanted to come to was the absolutely ludicrous suggestion that the timing of this debate is in some way artificial. I have heard it from a number of people across the Floor. The statutory requirements compel me as Minister of Finance to action the Budget process by Friday of this week. Today is the Assembly's last sitting day before that deadline and, without the funding that the passage of the Bill would bring, a balanced Budget that the Assembly would support cannot be crafted. That is why the Bill had to be completed this week. There is nothing contrived, artificial or politically motivated about the timing. It is the only legal option open to us to produce a balanced Budget.

Some Members have tried to excuse the U-turn that they have very skilfully managed today on this Bill by claiming that the Social Development Minister's proposals on how the Stormont Castle agreement would be implemented caused them to withdraw their support. Last Wednesday the First Minister called their bluff on this issue. He publicly and privately challenged those who claimed that they were going to oppose the Bill because the Social Development Minister had produced a scheme that was not what they believed they were signing up to last December. The First Minister announced that, if it would lead to them reaffirming their support for the Bill, he would accept any amendment consistent with the five-party Stormont agreement, providing it was within the agreed spending limit, legally competent and operationally feasible. Not one amendment was brought forward by any of the parties opposite, or, indeed, any other party. I think that speaks volumes about the debate that we have had here today.

8.00 pm

The inability to set a Budget because of the fall of this Bill would lead —

Mr Storey: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I will indeed.

Mr Storey: Just to clarify, so that Members are clear on the point, it was suggested by the SDLP, in its contribution to the debate in the succeeding days from Wednesday through to the end of the week, that we look at the issue of sanctions, which we have debated in the House on numerous occasions, and that we set up an all-party Committee of the House to deal with the issue of welfare. That was the sum and substance of the amendments that it brought to the table.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Minister for clarifying that.

The inability to set a Budget because of the fall of this Bill would have severe ramifications and would lead to the permanent secretary in the Department of Finance and Personnel imposing even greater cuts. So great would those cuts be that the head of the Civil Service would be forced to inform Whitehall that the Northern Ireland control totals would be breached, and, in those circumstances, the United Kingdom Government would be forced to intervene.

The final fact that I want to leave with the House tonight — because we have heard a lot of conjecture today — is that our proposals on welfare are the best offer in the whole of the United Kingdom. Defeat of the Bill will reduce the level of payments to tens of thousands of people in Northern Ireland. Members have a clear but stark choice to make tonight. They can pass the Bill — it does not appear that we are going to do that — and protect those who need support from benefits, giving them the best deal in the UK, or — this appears to be the road that we are going down — we can consign welfare recipients to a harsher regime with lower payments, and for what? In the end, Sinn Féin and the SDLP will be punishing those for whom they claim to be fighting. It is just cheap, self-serving, party political posturing that goes on across the way — and, frankly, it is pathetic — just to look like tough guys to the rest of the electorate in Northern Ireland, and, indeed, to the electorate in the Republic of Ireland.

This is a test for the House today as to whether it will pick —

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: I will give way.

Mr Allister: Just before the Minister finishes, if I sense that she is finishing, I have two questions about the knock-on budgetary effects if the Bill is killed tonight. Presumably the 2015-16 Bill, as you said, is premised and balanced on the basis of the Stormont House Agreement, so if the Stormont House Agreement falls then that is not a mechanism to balance the Budget, and, I take it, that is where the £600 million of cuts come from. The Minister said that no Minister in her party will implement that. If matters then pass to the permanent secretary — this is the second point that I want clarification on — does the permanent secretary have the power to dispense the accrual resources — in other words, the matters that arise giving rise to single farm payments etc? Is that within the gift of the permanent secretary, and, if not, what are the consequences?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for that point. Just to be clear, yes, the Budget that we talked about last week and the hole that is presently there in relation to £604 million of debt arises because of the non-implementation of the Stormont House Agreement, and we will not put our hands to supporting such a Budget, even though I will probably have to bring the figures forward to the Executive this week for discussion. If that is not doable then it falls to the permanent secretary to deal with the issue. I have taken legal advice in relation to the use of accruals and have been told that, whilst the accruals will come in to Northern Ireland, they cannot be paid out, because to do that we would need legal authority under the Budget (No. 2) Bill. Without the Budget (No. 2) Bill there is no legal authority to pay the money out, so, whilst the money will come to Northern Ireland, there is no authority to pay out the accruals that come.

There is where the rather large figure of £2.7 billion occurs. It is a very distressing place to be.

As I have said, this is a test for the House of whether it will pick fantasy politics over responsible government. I fear that Sinn Féin and the SDLP have made the wrong choice on this occasion and are playing fantasy politics whilst the rest of us are concerned about public services in Northern Ireland. I support the Bill.

Ms Sugden: Like others, I wish the First Minister well in his recovery. My thoughts are with him and his family.

I have been a MLA for just over a year. I must admit that I am really frustrated and disappointed that the past year has been characterised by several events that have threatened to bring this institution down. In the Assembly, we often get criticised for not doing anything. This past year, I have done a lot. I could work 24/7 if I wanted to, not only on constituency concerns but on the Assembly business that we do here. I think that, to an extent, we do something up here. What frustrates me is that so much work has been done on all the legislation that will pass through the House in the next year, the last year of the mandate, and we have an opportunity to shape legislation that will affect people's lives on a day-to-day basis, but that will all be threatened and undermined because of where we find ourselves this evening. It has led me to believe that the Assembly is no more than theatre, and, to be honest, theatre is only as good as the message that it gives out and how it makes the audience feel. Tonight, the message of the Northern Ireland Assembly is that we are failing. The audience — the people of Northern Ireland — are heckling us. In fact, they are not heckling us; they have actually just left the auditorium. They do not care any more because they are so frustrated with us. That is not a good sign. That is where we are with this Bill: we are no further forward with welfare reform tonight than we were when we heard the First Reading of the Bill. That is not good enough.

I do not feel that we have an option here other than to back the Bill, and I do not like the Bill. In any other circumstances or on any other journey that would have brought us to where we are tonight, I would have voted against the Bill. However, I do not think that we have an option. For me, as a MLA whose work is predominantly constituency work, it is difficult to explain to a woman why she is not sick enough to receive certain benefits. It frustrates me that my constituents are pushed to their physical and mental limits to satisfy box ticking on an application form. It breaks my heart that I have to give a mother directions to a food bank because she cannot feed her child. Those are the shortcomings of welfare, and I have grave concerns about what welfare reform will bring. Equally, I have concerns about the budget cuts that we have, because that same mother was also talking to me about her community transport trips, which may be reduced from five to three. I have had to explain to an elderly lady why she cannot go and meet the only person she will see that week because her community transport has been cut. I have had to comfort a lady who has shed tears because Early Years has been pulled from beneath her.

The cuts are not unique to one party; they go right across the board. Everyone will have felt it. Right now, we do not have any option but to pass welfare reform. It is a shame that we are not even going to have that opportunity tonight. It does not best serve the people of Northern Ireland, but, sometimes, we have to just strive for what we can get. The reality is that the Conservative Government are at the beginning of a five-year mandate. Welfare reform is coming to Northern Ireland with or without the rule of the Assembly. If without, it will be in its crudest form, without the concessions that we have negotiated until this point. Suggesting that we try to move forward and try to negotiate more is irresponsible. The most vulnerable, whom I have heard many of us from all sides of the Chamber talk about, will suffer.

Where is the rationale? I hate to be one to say this, but I think that Sinn Féin's rationale is nothing to do with the vulnerable. It was not before the ard-fheis in Derry, and it certainly was not after it. Like every party in the House — I see it — Sinn Féin is deeply split, although, to be fair to them, they are always the best at hiding it. To be honest, it is not even within the Assembly grouping that they are split; it is North/South. Let us face it: Sinn Féin's direction has not come from Martin McGuinness, the deputy First Minister; it has come from Dublin. I think we are all quite aware of that. I know that they do not recognise the border. Do you know what? That is fine. That is entirely fine, and I will respect that, but Members of this House do not have jurisdiction anywhere else but Northern Ireland, so it is their responsibility to put Northern Ireland first.

On Thursday, I had great faith in the SDLP. I thought that, for the first time in the past year, they would actually show leadership and realise that they should not put their names to a petition of concern. To be fair to them, they did not; they created their own. I sincerely hope that that was not a mistake and that they knew what they were doing when they signed a petition of concern that would be added to Sinn Féin's petition of concern and would render the Welfare Reform Bill invalid. By the sounds of it, that means that the party to my right are either stupid or desperate. At this stage, I feel they are both. Mr Attwood summed it up for me earlier: he said that, because things change, we should be open to taking risks. Number one: if we are going to wait for people to change things in Northern Ireland, we will not get very far. Number two: I will not risk the outcomes of the people of Northern Ireland, and I do not think that any other Member of the House should do so either.

I do not think that this is a case of it being the eleventh hour and that someone has to come and save us. That window of opportunity has passed. Crude as it might sound, Northern Ireland had a window of opportunity following the conflict, but that is closing, and I certainly think that, on welfare reform, that window has closed.

I will not keep you any more than I have done, because the Bill is doomed. I will support the Final Stage of the Bill if only to send out the message that there are some Members of the House who have faced the reality of where we have found ourselves and are starting to try to work with that rather than trying to dream up something that is not possible.

Mr McCallister: Australian Prime Minister, Tony Abbott, said:

"I understand that government should live within its means, value the money it holds in trust from you the taxpayer, avoid waste and, above all else, observe the first maxim of good government: namely, do no avoidable harm."

The Northern Ireland Executive would do well to live up to even some of those basic principles. For example, on the point of living within our means, we get about £9.6 billion of a subvention from the Treasury with no charges, no efficiencies, and we do not have to worry about collecting any revenues. We get sent that from Treasury. That is our cut from the Barnett consequentials, our block grant and a benefit from being in the Union.

You hear all this other talk from Sinn Féin. I agree with many of the Members who have spoken, including Ms Sugden, that, with Sinn Féin, it has much more to do with Dublin and the politics there, with a Dáil election due within the year. It is to do with all those things.

As to the point about valuing the money held in trust, the mantra and the only policy I hear from Sinn Féin and the SDLP is that the Brits should give us more cash. If they gave us more money, we would do even less with it. We would reform nothing. We would not do public sector reform, and we would not do Transforming Your Care or anything else. We certainly would not do welfare reform. Look at the litany of examples of waste. Look at Transforming Your Care, a decade for local government reform and a decade for very limited educational reform. There is also the £700 million that we are borrowing for a voluntary exit scheme. Had we put a recruitment freeze on the Civil Service four years ago at the start of the mandate, we could have avoided that. There are 64,000 empty school places and £2 million a week in fines for not doing welfare reform. We have 21 special advisers, which is more than the total number in Scotland and Wales, at a cost of £2 million a year. I will put that in perspective: the education fund is set at £2 million a year. That is stuff that would make a difference to the lives of our citizens and help to break the cycle of poverty.

Being in government has to be about much more than the car and the photo opportunity. Minister Foster, who spoke a few minutes ago, has the privilege of having a dedicated website, 'Arlene Foster holding things'. Being a Minister has to be much more than that. It should bring with it an enormous opportunity to change things and improve the lives of our citizens, but it must also carry a huge weight of responsibility of being in government and having to make tough and unpopular decisions at times. It requires a Programme for Government that means something. It requires that, if, after negotiations at Stormont House or Stormont Castle, you reach an agreement, you stick to it. Yet, what I have heard from a list of contributors, predominantly from the SDLP, is that we should have more negotiations. We have been negotiating for over 20 years: is it not time that we realised that the peace process is over and we should get on with the role of government?

I am one of the few unionists left in the Building who openly admits that he voted yes to the 1998 agreement. I am one of the few who acknowledges that, 17 years on, we have not delivered on the promise of that agreement. We need to change fundamentally how we do our business here. We have had endless negotiations. Over the last two Christmases, we had the Haass talks, which ran for a number of months, and then, last Christmas, we had 11 or 12 weeks of negotiations ending with the Stormont House Agreement. One of the big successes of that seemed to be that, down at the castle, the Executive had all agreed and gone to negotiate with the Secretary of State.

Given the warnings from the Finance Minister, I should probably have declared an interest at the start of the debate that I am the recipient of a single farm payment, in case I do not get that. We should probably all declare an interest in case we are all on welfare by Friday. I also receive child benefit, if that counts.

We have to face up to our responsibilities and the way that we conduct our government. Everyone in the House will know that I am a believer in having a proper opposition here. I would like the Government and the opposition to be two distinct bodies and not all in one place. That is the problem with us at the moment. The Government and the opposition — the five parties — are all in the one place. For Sinn Féin and the DUP, there is no great risk in this place collapsing or there being an election, because there is no credible, alternative Government sitting in waiting. The only opposition at the moment is provided by the six Members on these Benches. I am proud of that and of the opposition that that provides, but you need to get to a different point. In a normal process and in normal government in London or Dublin a Government who could not get their business through, such as this Welfare Reform Bill and a Budget, would collapse. That is what would happen.

Mr Kennedy: We want an election.

Mr McCallister: If an election would sort it out — I hear Mr Kennedy saying from a sedentary position that he wants one — I would welcome it. The problem is that, because there is no alternative Administration here, we would change a few faces, perhaps, but that is all that would happen. We would come back to face the same set of problems. That is why an election would not solve anything.

I was here for Mr Kennedy's contribution. He painted a fairly gloomy picture of the state of things in DRD, with lights going out and roads not being repaired. I was also here for Mr Nesbitt's contribution. I hope that I detected some signs that they were thinking of leaving the Executive and moving into a position of opposition.

Mr Kennedy: To join you?

Mr McCallister: To join me.

Mr Nesbitt: Leader, leader.

Mr McCallister: I would welcome them with open arms. [Laughter.] I am sure —

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr McCallister: — that Ms Sugden and Mr Allister would make some room for them.

Mr Speaker: Order. I suggest that we have had enough of an exposition of your preferences for an opposition. We should return to the discussion on the Welfare Reform Bill.

Mr McCallister: I am more than happy to do so, Mr Speaker.

When I spoke in the last debate on welfare, I explained why I dislike not only the Bill but a lot of the mitigation measures; they do not get to where you need to be to help people. All the evidence points to early intervention in dealing with welfare and economic inactivity. Minister Farry has launched an Enabling Success strategy with no money. In all the welfare issues that we have to deal with, early intervention is the key. We have to deal with mental health, economic inactivity and educational underachievement, but we are not doing so. We will not help educational underachievement. Mr O'Dowd is back in the Chamber. We were to have committed £564 million over the next six years to mitigate welfare while we cut £2 million from the community and voluntary sector in early years education. That is wrong. That is the wrong priority in the wrong place. All Members will have been to events in here and listened to groups in their constituencies talking about early intervention.

During the last debate, Mr Attwood challenged me to come to west Belfast and speak to people. I could not get Mr Attwood tied down to a date, but I went to the Colin area of west Belfast, which has a similarly sized population to cities like Newry and towns like Coleraine. The impact of early intervention in literacy and numeracy is remarkable. In schools in my constituency, they talk about the difference in early intervention. When you go to the like of neighbourhood renewal events in Downpatrick and look at some of the figures, they were able, for very modest amounts of money, to lift the reading ages of children by up to two years. That is what the Assembly and the Executive should be focused on. Instead, we were about to get an agreement from Sinn Féin that said that it had saved everybody from the evil Tories and that that was just great; it saved them with £564 million of Northern Ireland public money going into it. Meanwhile, we are gutting all the early intervention stuff. So you have groups like NICVA. Who is going to —

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: In a second.

Who will be hardest hit by the cuts? The first five are children and young people, local communities, education, health and social care and disability and mental health. I heard Mr Nesbitt speaking about mental health.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for giving way. I acknowledge that cuts to the early years fund are having a detrimental impact on the community and voluntary sector. When I presented my budget to the Education Committee, I said that we are now among the sacred cows because year-on-year cuts are having a detrimental impact on services. However, it is completely incorrect to say that we are now removing all early interventions. The Department of Education is spending somewhere in the region of £260 million per annum on early years education — £260 million — so it is not correct to say that we are cutting all early interventions.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Minister. Perhaps, then, he will come down with me to Kilkeel and explain to the parents and the children in Kilkeel why their nursery, their early intervention and their early years provision is being cut. That is the reality. That is the difference that it will make to young lives, and that is where I think that we are so fundamentally wrong.

On the scope of this Bill, I do not particularly like the Bill or some of the mitigation measures. As I spoke about in the last debate, I do not think that breaching things like the welfare cap is a good use of public money. Only about two Members — me and Mr Allister maybe — mentioned that in the last debate. However, your petition of concern has forced me, like Ms Sugden, to vote with the Minister. Bringing down this Bill is sheer irresponsibility. It would be bad enough if you were doing that from a position of being in opposition. It would be bad enough if you just let it go to a straight Assembly vote, but to do it with a petition of concern, whereby you know that the Bill is dead even though a majority of members, I suspect, will vote for it, is disgraceful. The most bizarre part of it is that, even if welfare reform started off as coalition policy and you had nothing to do with it, you had "Northern Irelandised" it by the time that you added £564 million to it. We have two parties in this Executive torpedoing their own Executive Government policy, and we somehow turn round and think that this is what passes as normal politics.

The outworkings of today, such as the cuts in early intervention, might not be felt for many years, but a Budget crisis will be very much a crisis made in Belfast. It will not be made in Westminster or anywhere else. We have walked ourselves into this by putting off welfare reform with the only suggestions being more negotiations — why would anyone believe you if you agreed to anything? — or the formation of a Committee. That has always worked well for us. From when this Bill was introduced in October 2012, we have had a Committee to look at the human rights aspect of it, which was set up in late 2012 or early 2013. We had delay and then talks and agreement, all of which was going very nicely up to the ard-fheis, when suddenly there was a change. That has to change.

Look at all the things on welfare that I warned about before. I said that two parties that are so opposed to welfare reform now are up for corporation tax. How very bizarre that they are still up for that. If you want to know why I said to them at the debate that corporation tax will have a long way to trickle down to the people in West Belfast, I will give you one example. An answer from the Minister of Education on the number of people doing ICT for A level by constituency indicated that West Belfast has an average of 17. Just to give you a comparison, South Down has the third highest number with 106, and the constituency with the highest number is Upper Bann at 148. That is the difference. West Belfast is at 17. Young people in West Belfast will not feel the effects of corporation tax cuts. That is not going to trickle down to them.

I have to say to Sinn Féin and the SDLP: you have been in charge of West Belfast from 1966.

It has had four or five different MPs since 1966. It is a disgrace that there are still such levels of deprivation and poverty in that constituency. You are supporting a welfare system that you think is not fit for purpose, but it is the one you want to keep. Somehow you are going to go over and fight a Tory Government. I have some upsetting news — I know you have heard this before — but the Tories actually won the general election a few weeks ago.

They are in with a majority for a five-year term. Sadly, we are stuck with the parties here: one that does not even turn up at Westminster and another that firmly nailed itself to the "EdStone". I am not quite sure what has happened to the "EdStone", but it does not look like it is coming back.

We have to ask ourselves this: if the Assembly had any levels of responsibility, what would it do if one of our councils, for example, pursued an agenda of reckless spending? We know what happened when the South Eastern Education and Library Board got into difficulties. Commissioners were appointed. What would we do? What would Minister Durkan, who was here a short while ago, be recommending if a council got into such a reckless rate of spending and could not balance its books? Would someone have to step in? Would the Assembly or the Minister step in? I ask that because, at the minute, we are almost waiting for somebody to ride in to the rescue to sort this out, whether that is the permanent secretary at DFP or the Secretary of State with more money. That is an appalling place for us to be.

The main Executive economic strategy of cutting corporation tax is all about attracting inward investment, but one of the key things in attracting that inward investment is good governance. We are not going to be portraying good governance when you see that we are actually crushing our institutions, that we will run out of money and that we have one party that will not do welfare reform and another lead party in government that refuses to bring a Budget with what probably would be completely eye-watering cuts. Cuts of £600 million will mean that Minister Hamilton will be taking somewhere around £280 million out of Health. That is going to be a big help to the vulnerable and the sick. It is going to really hurt them. Minister O'Dowd's Department will take the next biggest hit. The only things that saved us in the last Parliament were that Health was protected, Education got a level of protection and we got the Barnett consequential of that. This is no way to run a joined-up government.

It is easier, I suppose, for some of the smaller parties in government to vote against the Budget as long as the bigger two agree. Today we heard from probably half a dozen government Ministers, so at least half the Executive have spoken in the debate, including Martin McGuinness, the joint head of the Administration. The joint head of the Administration is now torpedoing his own Administration's policy on welfare reform, and we somehow think that it is all right to do that. We somehow think that we should carry on. There is an attitude of, "Well, we can buy another few weeks. We can drift along with welfare reform." We are fortunate that we are not a sovereign government because we would be in the care of the IMF if we were. We could not and cannot continue with that.

There is no doubt in my mind that this is all to do with next year's Dáil election. Clearly, the message to voters in the Republic of Ireland is that they should be very wary of who they elect into government. Will they face up to the responsibilities that parties in government need to face up to and deal with them in a serious manner?

Right across the board, we have failures to make decisions. Too much focus has been on all the good things that people want announced but none of the difficult decisions. Nobody wants to talk about water charging or tuition fees, but we want cuts in corporation tax and air passenger duty. We would like VAT on tourism cut to 9%. We want all those things, but we have no concept of how we are going to pay for them. At least £500 million will be spent on welfare reform and possibly another £200 million on top of that, since we worked out that the £500 million will not be enough. Such is the economic illiteracy that at least two of the parties in the Assembly are stuck on. That is a very unfortunate place. It would not be as bad a thing if you were not in government and did not have the ability to sign a petition of concern.

That is why I will vote with the Minister on this Bill. It is hugely regrettable that the renewal and rebooting of the First Minister and deputy First Minister's relationship after the Stormont House Agreement has all been lost. The momentum gained in January and February, by passing the Budget and moving on this issue, has all been lost, and we are going nowhere, to the point where we are about to hit the buffers.

I will leave it at that. I will vote with the Minister tonight.

Mr Storey: First, I thank those Members who joined in numerous comments in relation to the health of the First Minister. I thank them for their best wishes, and we are glad that we have a First Minister who has given us such time and effort, as I said earlier, in regard even to the issues that we are discussing. We thank Members who expressed their best wishes, one and all.

That is where the goodwill seemed to end. It gives me no joy, as Minister for Social Development, to realise that there are two parties that, despite all that has been said and done, and all the progress made, are prepared, by what they have already done with the petition of concern, to consign the Welfare Reform Bill to the bin. My colleague the Finance Minister set the debate in its factual context. Let us be under no illusion, and let it be said on the Floor of the House tonight, that there has been no contrived crisis; there has been no choreography to bring about a situation that we hoped would not really transpire. We are facing the reality of the circumstances that we find ourselves in.

So, all the talking has been done for tonight. All the comments have been made, and it is now up to the Members of this House to determine whether they want to have a Bill that has in it mitigations and measures to help alleviate and support those families and communities — we have all been told about them tonight — that we have concern for, or whether they are prepared to allow others to bring about a situation that will introduce another Bill, because welfare reform will come to Northern Ireland, but it will not be this Bill that will introduce it. I want to mention something that was touched on by the Finance Minister. There seems to be a misunderstanding, either deliberate or inadvertent, of what this Bill is about. It is a piece of enabling legislation, and all the parties have been well aware of the schemes, plans and regulations that would be brought in over time to bring into existence the welfare changes. It seems that that is all to be lost because two parties have decided, tonight, that they want to bring it to an end.

I do not intend to rehearse all that has been said by others, you will be glad to know, but I want to make a few comments as I conclude. Let me turn to comments made by Mr Maskey and by the Agriculture Minister. Earlier, they referred to the financial losses that different claimant groups would incur as a consequence of the changes to the welfare system. They quoted figures from my Department for families with children, adults and children with disabilities, and ESA customers. They suggested that all those claimants would be financially impacted and that we in the Assembly needed to think about the impact that that would have on those groups. Let me say this: the supplementary payments scheme would have provided full protection for all current claimants in each of those groups. It is recorded in Hansard; it is on the Floor of the House; it is a fact. No individual would have suffered any financial loss as a result of the Bill that the two parties opposite are going to vote against. That protection would have initially lasted for three years, and future claimants in each of the groups would also have been able to access financial support when they were facing a financial crisis in their lives. What I proposed in the Bill was real and affordable support that would have ensured that current claimants would not have suffered any financial loss during the lifetime of the scheme, and that financial support would have been available to future claimants who had not suffered any real loss.

Members can look at their phones and try to be dismissive, but that is what you are rejecting tonight. I do not want to hear, tomorrow, all these claims about protecting the vulnerable and defending the poor when, in this House tonight, it would seem that there are Members who are quite happy to vote against a Bill that was intended to do that very thing.

Mr Maskey also referred to the need for political leadership and, while he was commending the work of the officials, he suggested that it is not officials who make the policy. He is absolutely correct. He said that it is important to point out that senior civil servants have a key responsibility to provide Ministers with objective and impartial advice to enable politicians to make informed policy decisions. Let me make this very clear: the advice provided on the supplementary payments scheme rightly pointed out the significant financial consequences, the legal impediments and the operational difficulties of making the types of payments that Sinn Féin proposed for future claimants.

If the party opposite thought that I, as Minister, was going to do something that had significant financial consequences, legal impediments and operational difficulties, it is not living in the real world. The party opposite knows well, as does the SDLP, that my officials and I have endeavoured, in good faith, to do the very best that we could in extremely difficult circumstances.

8.45 pm

Let me refer to the bedroom tax. Some cloud of mist seems to have now descended on the SDLP in that it somehow was not aware of the bedroom tax and its implementation or non-implementation, its place in the Bill and how all that would transpire. The SDLP endorsed the Executive paper on 22 January that set out how the Executive would ensure that the bedroom tax would not be introduced in Northern Ireland. Let me say that again: it endorsed the Executive paper on 22 January. The paper provided that current and future claimants would be protected from the financial consequences of the bedroom tax. The paper also clearly set out that existing and future tenants would be protected from any reduction in their housing benefit. All that was endorsed by the SDLP, so let us not have any of this, "But it wasn't us, Jack; it was somebody else".

Mr D Kelly: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. It is my understanding that, at the Executive, our Minister put on record our party's right to amend. We are under no illusion that the bedroom tax is in the Bill. Mr Agnew and others have stated that there are some protections for some years but not for ever in relation to those who might be subject to the bedroom tax. We tabled amendments and a petition of concern in relation to the bedroom tax a year and a half ago and asked others to sign it. It remains unsigned. Will the Minister at least acknowledge that as fact?

Mr Storey: What we will acknowledge is that, tonight, the SDLP will join Sinn Féin and bring to an end any measures, mitigations and benefit that would come to the people of Northern Ireland, whose champions they claim to be.

Members, we have come to the end of the debate today. It is now up to Members to decide how they will protect the people whom they claim they represent. The decision is now over to you.

Mr Speaker: I remind Members that the vote on the Bill will be on a cross-community basis.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 1 June 2015

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I raise again the vexed issue of the failure of Departments to respond in an acceptable time frame to questions for written answer, and ask for the assistance of your office. On this occasion, I refer to two questions to the Department of Finance and Personnel, AQW 35938/11-15 and AQW 35939/11-15, tabled almost nine months ago, on the important subject of the disposal or sale of the Northern Ireland debt portfolio by the National Asset Management Agency to Cerberus. Despite those questions being tabled almost nine months ago, and despite the importance of the topic, they still go unanswered. It really is a frustration for Members. This is but an example of the continuing failure of Departments to address their responsibility to answer questions.

Mr Speaker: I have considerable sympathy for the Member, and indeed for Members who find themselves in a similar predicament when pursuing legitimate issues in the legitimate expectation that their questions for written answer will be responded to. The Member will understand that this is not something that comes directly under the authority of the Speaker; but I make it clear that I have considerable sympathy with the position that you find yourself in. You have put this matter on the record once again, and I hope that Ministers will take note. Let us move on.

Committee Business

Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, Mr Mike Nesbitt, to move the Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill.

Moved.—[Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister).]

Mr Speaker: No amendments have been tabled to the Bill. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly to group the three clauses of the Bill for the Question on stand part, followed by the long title.

Clauses 1 to 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Long title agreed to.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Consideration Stage of the Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Area Planning: Committee for Education Position Paper

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to two hours for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 15 minutes in which to propose and 15 minutes in which to make a winding-up speech. All other Members called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Weir (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the position paper produced by the Committee for Education on area planning; and calls on the Minister of Education to implement the recommendations contained therein.

The Committee's scrutiny of the area planning process began almost three years ago. In the intervening period, the Committee has undertaken a number of formal and informal evidence sessions with many stakeholders, including parents, teachers, principals, representative organisations, the relevant arm's-length bodies and not forgetting, of course, the Minister and his Department. The Committee also benefited from support from a special adviser, Professor Tony Gallagher. The end result of all that work is the position paper before the Assembly today with its recommendations. At this stage, I would like to take the opportunity to thank all our witnesses, particularly Professor Gallagher, for their contributions to the Committee's scrutiny.

As with a lot of things in life during the last three years, things have changed in the process. The Committee has changed its membership on a number of occasions and has changed its chairmanship twice. At this point, I would like to pay tribute to my two predecessors who were involved in the process, Mervyn Storey and Michelle McIlveen. It is perhaps appropriate in an education debate that there is a feeling of getting up and reading out someone else's homework today, given the work that has been put in over the last three years. Also during that period, the education and library boards have become the Education Authority, viability audits have been replaced with annual area profiles, and the area planning coordination group appeared to change its membership and also became a steering group. The area planning process itself was driven by other longer-term changes, demographic and budgetary, and by the unchanging need, which I think all of us would agree on, to improve education outcomes for all our children.

To be clear at the start, the Committee for Education accepts the need for area planning. Put simply, it is good to plan for education. It is correct to do so on an area basis. It is the right thing to do in order to address expected changes in the school population and to improve provision for all our children. Given the strong importance that all communities attach to education and the equally strong linkages between our schools and our cultural identities, it is perhaps not surprising that the process has proved to be complex and sometimes controversial.

It is also fair to recognise that the process of area planning is made more complicated by the highly sectoral nature of our education system and the lengthy transition period that we faced in the education and library boards becoming the Education Authority.

Having said all that, I must also say that neither the sectoralisation nor the highly charged nature of school planning was a secret or should have been a surprise to anybody. The dogs in the streets would no doubt have told the Department of Education — and we have some very wise dogs in this country — that area planning was a substantial change management challenge. It could also have easily been spotted that area planning would generate significant angst within schools and, almost inevitably, accusations of unfairness and inconsistency. What is concerning is that the Department, the education and library boards and the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) did not seem to fully understand that at the time.

It is anticipated that, now that the Education Authority is in place, there will be a review of area planning, and, looking to the future, hopefully things may change. I trust that, as part of that process, the Department will accept that the Education Authority is not the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) and that, consequently, there is still more than one planning body for schools in Northern Ireland. That being the case, the Department will still have a key role in leading and managing the change in our schools.

At the start of the area planning process, there were many references — they have been fairly constant — to the surplus school places.

First, there was reference to 85,000 and, then, to 74,000. It became apparent to the Committee that the Department was using a different set of figures from those that were used by the education and library boards and CCMS. Members found the use of different sets of figures to be, at first, surprising and, then, confusing.

In a change management system, rule number one is to communicate clearly and consistently and to immediately scotch any suggestions of ambiguity or arbitrary decision-making. The two sets of figures, which differed by around 10,000 or 11,000, and perhaps also the mysterious designation of everywhere outside Belfast and the city of Londonderry as "rural" — I am sure that that designation came as a great surprise to people in Rathcoole, Kilcooley or the Old Warren Estate in Lisburn — appear to amount to clear breaches of that basic first rule of good change management.

We may hear arguments today that the Committee's reference to the Bain criteria is completely out of place and that these criteria are no longer used in any way. I refer Members who make that point to pages 17 and 18 of the Western Education and Library Board's primary area plan, which was published less than a year ago. Admittedly, the reference is to revised Bain criteria of 85 children and composite classes as determining, amongst other things, the sustainability of a school.

The Committee was very much impressed by the evidence from parents and teachers from small rural schools on this issue. The Committee takes the view that Bain-type measures of the sustainability of a school are overly simplistic. The Committee believes that a dashboard of measures that assesses the value added in schools while also recognising the importance of cost is a better way to evaluate provision. We may also hear today that the dashboard is in fact departmental policy. That being the case, perhaps the Department could have advised the education and library boards and CCMS before they published their area plans. Indeed, we hope that the Department will endeavour to make faster progress in actually establishing the dashboard.

I also want to mention the needs model. This is the methodology that the Department uses to project demand for educational provision on an area basis. I suspect that, some years ago, a lot of the assumptions underpinning the model in respect of the level of identification of communities with particular educational sectors may well have been highly accurate and reasonable. I do not believe that that is the case any more. I suspect that colleagues will refer to the outworkings of that in places like east Belfast. We now have an increasing level of diversity in our school population, including many more newcomer pupils from outside Northern Ireland and more children designating as neither Protestant nor Catholic. In parts of Northern Ireland, there is a trend towards a greater level of mixing, which is something to be welcomed. For instance, last week, in my capacity as Committee Chairperson, I met representatives from St Columbanus' College, which is in my constituency, and the Committee previously visited Methodist College. Neither of those schools is integrated and therefore they operate under a label and a certain level of assumptions. Instead, they might be termed "super-mixed schools". The needs model needs to recognise and promote this very welcome organic mixing of the major communities in Northern Ireland. I suspect that, in the debate, there may be others who will want to say how the needs model particularly treats the integrated sector.

The Committee also felt that it was a serious error to omit the further education sector from the needs model and thus from educational planning for over-16s on an area basis. The Committee also commented on the different timescales for and treatments of the two largest sectors in relation to area planning. It simply does not make sense for the Catholic maintained and Catholic voluntary sector to be permitted to plan their provision separately from the controlled and other denominational grammars. This approach undermined cross-sectoral solutions and, coupled with representational issues at the steering group, fed a perception that the controlled sector was not getting a fair deal.

I understand and am glad to say that the controlled sector support council and other groups will have some form of representation in the area planning steering group. I hope that in a future timescale for area planning, reviews will be inclusive and synchronized and will thus promote cross-sectoral and innovative solutions.

Finally, as Chair, I want to talk about consultation. The Committee does not have extensive resources. It does not have easy access to schools or to all parent or pupil organisations. It does not have steering groups that include a wide range of arm's-length bodies. I suppose that, in many ways, the Committee is asking itself how it was able to do a better job at times than the Department and its arm's-length bodies when it simply came to listening to stakeholders. What is wrong with the consultation processes? Why did the Committee consistently receive such forthright and eloquent feedback from teachers and parents on area planning? Why did those same representations appear to fall on deaf ears in DE and its arm's-length bodies?

The Committee believes that it is time for a new departmental mindset in respect to consultation. To be sure, there is no doubt that hard choices and unpopular decisions will have to be made. The Committee however feels that that makes active listening and meaningful engagement much more important. Members particularly felt that, had there been a proper explanation to parents of the benefits of area planning resolution, including a greater linkage with the new capital builds, at least some of the problems, delays and angst that we have seen in some parts of Northern Ireland could have been avoided.

The Committee takes the view that area planning is necessary to deliver a better educational experience for all our children. That will inevitably mean some level of rationalisation of the schools estate. The wide-ranging and difficult process has simply not been managed in a satisfactory manner to date. I hope that, in taking forward the anticipated review of area planning, the Minister will consider and ultimately implement the Committee's position paper. As the Chairperson of the Committee, I therefore commend it to the House.

I want to turn now to a number of points in my other capacity as a DUP MLA. All those points are compatible with the report. In moving forward, there is an opportunity, with the report and the creation of the new Education Authority, to effectively restart, reboot and re-evaluate. We need to ensure that we do that on the basis of a level playing field and a sense of fair play across the sectors. Particular concerns had been raised about the controlled sector, and I am very glad that, when the Education Act was being put through the House, we secured the creation and, indeed, direct representation of the controlled sector body. It is vital that that moves ahead swiftly and that all the pieces are put in place by the Department. I call on the Minister to clarify that.

Secondly, the experience that people have had of the implementation of area planning has been somewhat piecemeal. For the sectors and from a geographical point of view, part of which comes from the division of the different boards and sectors, I am sure that we would all agree that area planning needs to move forward on a much more strategic basis.

Thirdly, we will hopefully shortly see the Department's legislation on shared education, and that is also an area that the Committee has looked at in some depth. As we look to the future, it is important that the linkages are there between shared education and area planning and that many of the old assumptions about the numbers and the lack of robust statistics are tackled. When I was speaking as the Chair, I mentioned St Columbanus' College in my constituency. That is a maintained school, but its intake from the Catholic community is less than 50% of its numbers and, on that basis, it is a super-mixed school. Where there is good practice, be it there, Lisanelly, Methody or other places, that should be taken into account when we look at area planning. Allied to that, we need more robust statistics. We have seen variable measurements for the number of surplus school places, which can be difficult to judge because it can be a moveable feast. In my constituency, very sensible adjustments were made reduce the nominal amount of surplus places in at least two of the local primary schools. In effect, the rooms in their buildings were being used for other purposes beyond the primary school and an artificial number had been created. As we move forward with area planning, we have to ensure that everybody is working off the same assumptions and information.

Finally, as has been mentioned, as we move forward, we need greater listening, particularly to the needs of schools and parents. As was indicated, we need a much more proactive process in that area. In the last couple of years, we saw the problems when the former Southern Board seemed to jump ahead with the proposed changes to the Dickson plan, which clearly went against a lot of the concerns that had been raised locally. I would make the more general point that, as we move forward with area planning, we need to have much more of a responsive nature, be swifter in our responses and have a much greater degree of engagement with the public.

As I said at the outset, from Committee and party points of view, there is good value in the idea of area planning and it should be a no-brainer. Unfortunately, with the way in which the implementation has gone, we have seen a number of flaws within the system.

This debate and the Education Authority's review process provide an ideal opportunity. If lessons are learned from the mistakes made in the area planning process over the last few years, we can have a process on which we can move forward together and in which we look not simply to have greater cooperation and efficiency but to improve the standard of education. The opportunity is there, and I urge the Department and the new Education Authority to grasp it. I commend the report and the recommendations of the position paper to the House.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I speak as a member of the Education Committee on what is an important topic. I recognise the Chair's comments, and it is worthwhile that we reflect on the fact that area planning processes are necessary to advance accessibility and the educational attainment of all our children and young people. It is worth reflecting that the tone coming from the Committee is that things will change in future. It is important to acknowledge that we need to move forward to an inclusive and evidence-based process. We also need to reflect on the additional statutory powers that will exist in relation to area planning processes and, indeed, the Education Authority's responsibility in that.

It is important to reflect on the context that took us to this point and the fact that, in 2013-14, there were approximately 162,000 primary-school pupils in 839 schools. It was clear at that stage that enrolments in one third of primary schools was falling below the Department of Education's sustainable school threshold. We need to be mindful of the indications that we were given of the almost 67,000 unfilled school places: 12,000 in post-primary schools and 55,000 in primary schools. That was a key challenge for all of us, legislators and otherwise.

It was right that we moved to a position of commissioning the education and library boards, CCMS and the other sectors to engage in the area planning process. The process started with the viability audits, and there were indications that 46% of primary schools were evidencing stress, either in formal intervention or in enrolment. There were similar scenarios when we looked at secondary schools and, indeed, grammar schools: stress in either educational attainment or formal intervention.

It is important, however, to reflect on what we have learned through the process to date. We need to be mindful of the level of response to the consultation: almost 50,000 responses. It is also worth noting the geographical differences in those responses. Those from the Belfast Education and Library Board area were largely positive about what was proposed, but there was a stark difference in the responses from my region, the Western Education and Library Board area, which were largely negative. There are lessons in that about the geographical issues.

In the Committee's learning through the process, we listened to individuals such as Colin Knox and many others, who, quite often, cited inconsistency and significant dissatisfaction with the area planning consultation process. Much was said about the process in the Western Education and Library Board area and about the low level of agreement among respondents. Reference was made — we would be foolish to ignore it — to the 7,629 people in the Western Education and Library Board area whose views were ignored. The messages were stark and challenging. Many stakeholders argued that the consultation was tokenistic and failed to meaningfully engage.

At this point, I want to reflect on the learning and make the point that the plans are simply a process, at this point. In my view, it is an evolving process at this point, and it is important to be particularly mindful of the recommendations in the Committee's position paper. Area plans must be reviewed and should be consulted on through a formal, meaningful and robust statutory process. Any actions emerging from area plans, such as new schools, closures or amalgamations, will and should be subject to development proposals. That means that statutory consultation must take place. That is critical.

This is now about leadership from the new Education Authority, as referred to in recommendation 1, to ensure that we learn the lessons and that area planning is undertaken in a transparent way.

Mr Rogers: I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the matter today after the work that the Committee carried out in compiling the report. Before I go any further, I thank Peter and his staff for the way in which they compiled the report. I call on our Minister to take careful heed of the report and implement its recommendations.

The seven years and £17 million that was squandered through ESA did little to help the area-based planning process. The Committee found only a limited impact of area planning to date. Education is the building blocks of an individual's life and our economy. Every child should have access to the highest possible quality of education. A quality education should not be the luck of the draw.

With the Education Authority now in place, it is vital that we get area-based planning right. We lack a precise and clear analysis of the situation at present. Without it, we cannot plan for the future. We have plans from the boards, CCMS and whatever is left over. In addition, our colleges of further education have been left out of the process, despite the integral part they play in our education system. They offer a wide variety of courses, academic and skills-based, and they play a key role in local learning networks and shared education. In one sense, we are encouraging shared education, but, on the other hand, we are cutting off the best vehicle of shared education: the entitlement framework. It is time that we had one cohesive and strategic plan in place that takes account of our unique educational landscape across the North. What was evident was the lack of transparency and the real mistrust felt by parents, schools and other stakeholders around this. They do not feel listened to or confident. The Department is in danger of promoting a culture of competition, with schools trying to outdo each other rather than complement each other. Area planning will not succeed if schools operate in a climate of suspicion. That is something that the Department must address.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

One of the SDLP's main concerns is how rural schools fare in all this — or, rather, any school outside Belfast or Derry, which is the Department's bizarre definition of "rural". As it stands, we are left with a situation where a school in Lisburn must satisfy different sustainable criteria from one down the road in Belfast or where a school in Newry has the same sustainable criteria as one in the rural Mournes. Part of that set of sustainable criteria is that rural primary schools are expected to have more than 105 pupils, and schools in Belfast or Derry are expected to have more than 140. For post-primary, that number rises to 500. Whilst it is certainly important to take into consideration the number of pupils, no satisfactory explanation has been given of the rationale behind those figures. As far as I can see, they seem to be arbitrary lines drawn in the sand. Numbers are important, but we must take into consideration good leadership, the quality of teaching and learning and financial viability. That is just one of the flaws that have been exposed in the Bain proposals. Those flaws will have a detrimental and long-lasting impact on our rural schools, their communities and our rural economy.

I must also raise concerns regarding just how seriously cross-border cooperation is being pursued. As far as I can see, little real consideration has been given to it. Consider, for example, the provision of post-primary education in Fermanagh. A more sustainable and viable option may be a school 15 miles away in Donegal, not a school in Enniskillen that is maybe an hour or an hour and a half away by bus. Excuses used include that it is a different education system and that they transfer at 12 instead of 11, but educationalists know that those issues are not insurmountable.

If there is a will, there is a way. Unfortunately, it is evident that there is not the will for real and meaningful cross-border cooperation to ensure that cross-border communities can be sustained and have viable schools in their own areas.

Through the Education Authority, there is an opportunity for a joined-up approach, but there needs to be a better analysis of the school estate centrally. We have many oversubscribed schools and, on the other hand, many empty desks. I urge the Minister again to —

12.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Rogers: — review these plans and take the opportunity to get this right. I commend the report.

Mrs Overend: I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate. I add my commendation to the Committee Clerk and the Committee staff for all their work on this issue. As the Chair of the Committee said, the inquiry began back in 2012, which was long before I was a member of the Education Committee. However, one could not fail to be acutely aware of the area planning process ongoing in every constituency.

The future of primary and post-primary schools was sent into disarray, not knowing how the area planning process would proceed. There then followed a time of contemplative action. The first recommendation that area planning should happen in a "transparent and consistent manner" is a common-sense approach. It is one that you might not expect to have to suggest because that should already have been a given, but sadly not. The process would have moved along more smoothly if all the various bodies had worked within the same process and at a similar pace. If the whole school estate ideal was to work together for the betterment of all our children, I am afraid that that did not happen either.

I consider the most significant recommendation of the Committee report to be number 5:

"The Committee recommends that the Department should require its ALBs to plan educational provision on a truly area basis to a single timescale including all sectors and Further Education colleges where possible and that cross-sectoral solutions should be given consideration as appropriate."

I actually think that this is not strong enough. Cross-sectoral solutions were explicitly meant to be the norm, dating back to the start of the process, with the viability audits and the first area plans produced by the education and library boards. After all, the Minister said when launching this process on 26 September 2011:

"As part of this process there will be close consultation with the other sectors."

In the Assembly, on 22 October 2013, he said:

"As Minister, I see far too many development proposals that are written as if the school up the road does not exist." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 88, p311, col 2].

Has the area planning process lived up to the rhetoric? Throughout the process of listening to schools and parents across Northern Ireland, we have heard of cases where schools in some sectors were protected at the expense of schools in other sectors just around the corner. Meanwhile, there was also the issue that an area plan was developed without consideration of schools across the border. Before you think that I am referring to the Republic of Ireland, I mean across the borders of different education and library boards. I speak as a member for Mid Ulster, where we have schools in the North Eastern Education and Library Board and the Southern Education and Library Board. It is imperative that the area plans look across that particular border.

So far, area planning in education has not lived up to what it was meant to do. The reality is that sectors have reorganised and rationalised their estates, independent of others, before and after the process was launched quite some time ago. Recent debates in the Assembly have suggested that there is no consensus about where we should be going in a vision for our education system. It seems abundantly clear to me that the Minister has no inclination to take on vested sectoral interests. There is a policy vacuum and an attempt to reorganise a fragmented system where some sectors have their own sectoral bodies with their own agenda and some have been allowed to unilaterally rationalise their own schools estate. That has led to confusion.

Can this process be truly described as area-based planning when the maintained sector has already planned its own future with little regard for shared education, and open hostility to integrated education? There is continuing uncertainty in many parts of our divided education system, and no leadership has been shown by the Department or the Minister. Of course, we debate this report with a growing recognition that we are on the verge of another Budget crisis and that the £500 million extra money for shared education is very much in doubt. How will that affect area planning needs? It needs to be thought through. I trust that the Minister will address that when responding to the debate.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I will end there. I support the Committee motion.

Mr Lunn: The process of area planning, I am sure, has been going on for much longer than the formal process that we have been involved in since September 2011. That is when the Minister commissioned the boards and CCMS to work together to produce a way forward for area planning. Mrs Overend politely suggested that, perhaps, that did not work too well in the case of CCMS. I will go further and say that it did not work at all in the case of CCMS because it has proceeded in its own sweet way for the last four years to plan its own estate. There has been no evidence of any serious input from CCMS by way of a rational, overall, unbiased view of the system that we have.

The Chairman said that there was good value in area planning. Again, that is putting it mildly. It is vital that we get area planning right and that we get it right as quickly as possible. We have already spent four years, and more, on it, and we have had the viability audits, which produced the figures that Ms McLaughlin referred to. Eighty-four per cent of secondary schools are in some sort of stress, according to the criterion used. We have also had the area planning coordination group, which was subsequently replaced by the area planning steering group. If there is some difference between those two, I would like to know what it is. All of that has led to what Members have referred to as the needs model, which is addressed in our recommendation 4.

I will highlight one or two features of the original process. The first requirement was to ensure a network of sustainable schools within reasonable travelling distance. It did not say “within sectors”; it said, “within reasonable travelling distance”. How can you possibly do that without the consideration of cross-sectoral solutions, where appropriate?

Another feature was to identify realistic, innovative and creative solutions to address need, including opportunities for shared schooling on a cross-sectoral basis. Frankly, how does shared schooling help the situation if you have too many schools? It merely prolongs the agony; it does not help the process that we are supposed to be about. That is not to say that shared schooling does not have its place. There is big momentum, at the moment, towards a shared solution. I notice that every primary school in County Fermanagh that was identified as being under stress, or, in other words, under threat of closure, is now involved in a sharing solution. That is how it should be while we make up our minds about what to do about the overall situation.

Others mentioned the requirement to explore opportunities for cross-border planning. As far as I am aware, there has not been any of that. Mr Rogers referred obliquely to the situation in Brollagh in Fermanagh, where there may be a solution, but is that being actively explored? Are opportunities being taken along both sides of the border to explore the obvious opportunities that arise for minority communities? I do not know. Maybe the Minister can tell us.

I will go back to the needs model. I would not want to cross swords with the Minister, because we do not agree on this, but he will probably correct me in due course. The needs model militates against the integrated sector. There is no doubt about that. I accept the Minister’s acceptance of his obligation to facilitate and encourage the integrated sector, but the needs model effectively gives him a let-out, because it means that the other sectors have to agree before there is any increase, or potential increase, in the capacity target for integrated schools. So, let us see where we go with that.

I see that my time is nearly finished. All that the area plans, as they stand, have done so far is produce a lot of anxiety and worry amongst schools, parents and pupils. So, we have to get on with this.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Lunn: Frankly, I propose an independent review — something similar to the Donaldson review of health — with nobody with a vested interest having an input. Let us see what would come out of that.

Mr Newton: I support the report. I want to come back to a couple of things that the Chairman said, but first I would like to outline some of the experiences in area planning that my constituency has had over recent years and to indicate that although, obviously, area planning is essential — taking up some of the points that Members have made — it has to be holistic area planning that covers every sector of our education system.

I will mention a few experiences, Mr Deputy Speaker. I turn first to Dundonald High School, which was recommended for closure by the South Eastern Education and Library Board, and the reaction of parents to that closure announcement or “consultation on closure”, as it was put. The school served the community in the largest or second-largest estate in Northern Ireland, and there was a lot of anger about that. However, that anger turned into a very positive area of work, and the work that parents did along with their elected representatives was recognised by the Minister, who reversed his decision or, rather, made the decision to keep the school open. One of the factors that came out of that, in terms of area planning, was that, while that school served pupils from the local estate, it also served pupils from the Belfast Education and Library Board area. Had Dundonald High School closed, some of its pupils would have gone to Belfast schools, yet there was no consultation or communication between the South Eastern and Belfast education and library boards, prior to that recommendation coming forward. That not talking obviously indicates that there is no real area planning taking place.

The same is true in the case of Orangefield High School. The Belfast Education and Library Board went along and recommended closure to the school's board of governors, the parent board of governors and to the school parents in general. Indeed, it indicated that, in other schools in the area, the cap would be lifted to allow the pupils to transfer in. That was not correct. The cap was never lifted, and the pupils had no chance of getting into the favoured schools, despite the fact that pupils were taken along to the schools and it was indicated to them that they should sit a test to decide which class they would go into in their new secondary school. School uniforms and transport were discussed, but that was not part of an area plan.

In another case, the Minister was threatened with judicial review. That was in the case of the closure of Knockbreda High School and its amalgamation with Newtownbreda High School to form the new Breda Academy. That was really about the concerns of pupils, again, with the merger of a school from the Belfast Education and Library Board area with one from the South Eastern Education and Library Board area or, rather, the closure of one and the formation of a new school. Currently, there is a lot of concern among parents whose children go to the three feeder schools of Strandtown Primary School: Dundela, Greenwood and Belmont primary schools. I hope that that can be sorted out via some degree of area planning, but it is causing a lot of concern to parents and the pupils who attend those schools.

Then there is the ongoing Elmgrove/Avoniel school situation, which involves the closure of one and merger with another. There is a great need for communication with parents to involve them in decision-making, so that they can at least see the rationale to make an argument, and a need for communication with and support from elected representatives. A degree of planning needs to take place, so that we can all benefit from this.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Newton: The Chairman has indicated the need for area planning, and the report sets that out. I do not think it is anything other than a basis on which to build for the future.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I too welcome the opportunity to talk on the position paper. I want to put on record my thanks to the Clerk and his team, who have put an enormous amount of work into the paper, as they do always. It is important to say that. Also, I thank the schools, stakeholders and communities — the pupils and parents — who travelled to this Building. We went out to engage, and people were very welcoming to the Committee over the last number of years as we looked at the issue. It is right to put on record our thanks to them for raising the issues with the Committee.

From the start, it has been clear to me that there is a real need for change. Perhaps what has sometimes not been clear to some people is that it is a process of change. It is a journey, and it simply will not be an overnight transformation. The process will be fluid and will involve different types of review and analysis and looking at exactly where we are going. Perhaps the last speaker, Mr Newton, touched on that when he mentioned Dundonald

High School. I was very privileged to be invited to have a look at the school during the process, and I was delighted to go along. It was clear that it was a school that had suffered, in previous years, as a direct result of no area planning in east Belfast. There had not been enough community engagement, and the leadership of the school had maybe not been what it should have been. The area planning process has certainly been to the benefit of that school. It seems to be on a far better footing and perhaps has a brighter future ahead. That shows where the situation has been fluid and flexible. The Minister was able to meet the needs of that school at that time to afford it that chance. To me, that is what the entire area planning process is about.

Despite the cries, sometimes, of "Crisis" and "Catastrophe", that we have heard about area planning from some quarters, it has not been that. We have had a steady process of change. Some people are perhaps frustrated that the pace of change is not enough or that there is too much change. They see alternative or hidden agendas in it. I simply do not see that. The position paper touches on some of the issues. It mentions some of the tweaks or changes that need to happen or would be fruitful. No doubt the Minister and his area planning team in the Department will look at that as we move forward.

I am sure that Mr Lunn will not be surprised that I do not have the same concerns around the needs model that are outlined in recommendation 4, but I will not die in a ditch over it and I certainly will not divide the House over any disagreement. I am happy that the report reflects, at various points, that some Members had alternative ideas. I also do not recognise in the area planning process the attack on the rural schools that is sometimes claimed. I simply do not see that. The process takes the special needs of our rural schools into consideration, and it was a mistake earlier to suggest that if a rural school does not have 105 pupils it is somehow in danger. It is not. There are various schools — I have worked for some in my own community — with fewer than 105 pupils that are fairly sustainable and are under no direct threat. The area planning process has not been a threat to them. It is wrong to send out messages publicly that this is somehow a numbers game. I have lost count of how many times the Minister or anybody else has said that area planning is not a numbers game and does not come down to numbers. It is about the sustainable schools policy and everything else. It is important to say that. The rural dynamics of the North suggest that we will have schools in rural areas that are under stress. Equally, we will have schools in urban areas that are under stress. If our schools are under stress, then they are not providing the services that we need to be part of an area planning process. Well then, so be it.

The areas we really need to look at to push forward and improve are engagement and consultation, not just for education but for government as a whole. We need to find better ways of engaging with and empowering local communities at the very bottom of society. If this is to be a bottom-up process, we need to ensure that every family, every parent and every pupil feels a part of the process and feels exactly what area planning is. I would hazard a guess that there are families out there who could not tell you what area planning is or what it means, and we need to address that. We also need to be far more imaginative and should not set limits to some of the solutions to area planning. There should be absolutely no limits. We need to see models of all shapes coming forward, and the vested interests of institutions should not be a barrier to that. The Department needs to show real leadership on this. That is what we are starting to see.

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: I will indeed. Go ahead.

Mr Lunn: Going back to the needs model, does the Member agree with me that the Committee noted that no examples had been provided of changes to needs model projections for the integrated sector based on parental demand?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am happy to note that. I just do not see the same criticisms as the Member sees. I also do not see it as the threat to integrated education that the Member outlined earlier.

Finally, given the massive change we are seeing here — this will be a journey of change — it is only right that we also acknowledge the financial environment we are in. We need to have a very fine balance between protecting the interests of the public purse and investing in our education estate. I do not envy the Minister in the difficult job of designing an estate that is fit for the 21st century and the needs of a global education market. I am happy to welcome the report, and I look forward to some of the changes in the future.

Mr McCausland: As a member of the Committee, I want to thank the Clerk, the staff and all others who contributed to the preparation of the report.

As the Chair of the Committee said, it is good to plan, and that needs to be done on an area basis. It is more complex in Northern Ireland than in many other places because of the range of sectors we have and the fact that the Education Authority is only coming into place now.

The recommendations in the report speak for themselves. Therefore, I want to take the opportunity to highlight a couple of situations that I have had experience of with planning in my constituency of North Belfast. The situation with the two Model schools very much came to our minds in the last few days, because you now have two controlled secondary schools in north Belfast — the Boys' Model and the Girls' Model — and the two Ashfield schools at the other end of the city. This year, it was encouraging to see that the number of children who applied to the Girls' Model was around 22 or 23 above the number that could be taken into the school. Eventually, some were accommodated elsewhere, but quite a number are still not settled. It is interesting that, when the letter went out to the parents about the situation, they were offered alternative schools. The schools they were offered as alternatives, since they could not get into the Girls' Model, were seven Roman Catholic maintained schools in various parts of Belfast, an Irish-medium secondary school in west Belfast and an integrated school at the far end of the city. Those were the schools in Belfast with vacancies. There were no vacancies in the controlled schools. The parents in Ashfield were experiencing a similar situation. It is clear that we have not been getting it quite right as yet and that there needs to be a lot more thought to ensure that, as we plan for the future, there is adequate provision in the various areas of the city.

One thing that has fed into that shortcoming in the past has been identifying future need and the way in which that is calculated. There are areas where large numbers of vacant brownfield sites will be developed over the next number of years, many of them for social housing. That needs to be taken into account when calculating future need and therefore how you would plan. When social housing goes into those areas, then, because of the way in which it is allocated, a family with more children will be more likely to be at the top of the list and therefore get one of the new houses when they are built. On that basis, we need to look again at simply having an overall view that, if so many houses are built, so many children will come into the school population. There is a need to review that.

When we spoke to officials from the Department, I was interested to find that, in terms of the linkage between the area plan and prioritisation for new build, there had been several occasions when the prioritisation system was altered and the role of the area plan enhanced within that prioritisation process, yet no equality impact assessment was carried out of that fact. You change criteria, but you do not look at the EQIA implications. Yet, when you have a highly sectoralised system, as we have, with large numbers of controlled schools and maintained schools, I would have thought that it was fairly obvious that you would carry out an EQIA. When the officials were asked, they looked at each other and the answer was, "No, we did not do that". The linkage of area planning into new builds can have a damaging, divisive impact, particularly in the controlled sector, where you find one school being told, "You can have a new school if the other school agrees to close". That leads to friction and division in communities.

We need a system that is responsive to local needs. I encourage the Minister to give careful attention to the things that have been set out in the report. It is a good report, and I commend it to the Minister.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate on the Committee's position paper. I should say from the outset that I support some of the recommendations; I am not so happy about others, but I do not think that they are worth getting into a ding-dong battle about.

Area planning is an essential part of any strategic development of our education system and the schools estate. Every young person is entitled to access and experience high-quality education. There is no debate about that. No child should have to suffer an inadequate educational experience, but we all know that many children have suffered inadequate educational experiences. Our aim as public representatives should be to end that trend.

I have stated many times in the House in previous debates that we, as public representatives, should avoid any temptation to engage in political point-scoring around the issue of our children's education. I am not saying that we cannot have disagreements, but they should be carried out in a mature way. I am not suggesting for a minute that there has been any political point-scoring in the debate today, but it is an issue that we should bear in mind in general when we debate our children's education. It is much too important an issue to become the subject of unseemly squabbling.

I appeal to everyone involved in the debate to have as their primary focus the education of our young children.

For those children to have access to the best possible education, there needs to be long-term planning. That means ensuring that we have the right type of schools where they are needed. Currently, there is a large number of empty desks in our schools. I am not going to engage in a debate about the actual number of empty desks — I know that there has been some disagreement about that — save to say that, where schools are experiencing stress because of falling enrolment trends, there is a need to take action. Sometimes, that may mean the amalgamation of two schools, and, other times, it may mean closure. Whatever the decision, a development proposal must be submitted to the Department and be subject to a statutory consultation.

The Minister has shown that he is prepared to take account of and listen to those who engage in consultations, but what is more important in all this is that there is transparency, openness and consistency in the area planning process. There is a responsibility on the Department to ensure that any consultation is a truly bottom-up process. My colleague Chris Hazzard referred to that. There is no contradiction between an MLA lobbying on behalf of a school that may face amalgamation or closure on the one hand and, on the other hand, supporting the area planning process. That is the nature of the world that we live in.

I have said in the past that sometimes there is an emotional attachment to a particular school, maybe because a parent or siblings went to it.

However, there is a responsibility on all of us as political leaders to ensure that parents, particularly those whose children are in a school that faces amalgamation or closure, and teachers have all the information about the area planning process and about the school that their children are attending. I know of instances in the past when parents were aware of an unsatisfactory inspection report about a particular school —

1.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Sheehan: I appeal to everyone involved to give leadership and to ensure that all the information is out there for parents to access.

Mr Kennedy: This is an important debate. I broadly welcome the recommendations made by the Committee of Education after its consideration of these matters. As a former Chairman of the Education Committee, I can well understand the amount of work involved in producing a report of this nature.

I particularly welcome recommendation 6, which is that the Department of Education and its arm's-length bodies:

“should work with schools, communities and area learning communities to facilitate sharing, cooperation and innovative solutions to area planning problems, particularly in rural areas, so as to promote higher quality, better value for money educational provision.”

The members of the Education Committee and the Minister will know of the issues surrounding the Armagh area planning proposals. I encourage everyone to continue to work to resolve all the issues in a way that will not descend into a winners and losers scenario. Whilst the debate is largely concentrating on general themes to be taken forward in area planning, I want to draw the Minister's attention to my concern about an issue in my constituency, as other Members have done, which needs his urgent attention. Indeed, he will know of the urgent correspondence that he received from me overnight. It is, I believe, relevant to area planning, in that the issue of parental choice should always be a factor in considering outcomes.

The Minister will recall that Markethill High School recently applied to his Department for a temporary variation of some seven places, only to be refused. The school, which is in mid-Armagh, enjoys a deservedly high reputation for its educational outputs and quality, and it is popular with parents. It serves the growing, mostly unionist, population in the mid-Armagh area. At this stage, I should declare a personal interest, in that my wife is a teacher at the school, but I do not believe that that represents a pecuniary interest or is a reason for me not to comment on the matter. Obviously, the school, its leaders and the board of governors were very disappointed by the outcome of their application, but that has been compounded by the decision taken last week by the Minister to grant a temporary variation of some 24 places to St Paul's High School, Bessbrook.

I want to make it absolutely clear that I am not objecting to the granting of the temporary variation to St Paul's, which is also in my constituency, also provides an excellent education to its pupils and is also popular with parents. However, I seek to highlight the different outcomes from the Minister's decisions, and he needs to explain that urgently. These are two successful non-selective schools within a few miles of each other, both serving their local community very well, yet Markethill High School has been denied its request. The Minister should also know that the situation has been further compounded by the very unhelpful comments made by his party colleague Mickey Brady MP MLA, who, in welcoming the St Paul's decision said:

I believe that such comments are not only disgraceful in themselves but give rise to the very deep suspicion felt by people and parents in my community that there is more than a whiff of party politics being played out here — deeply sectarian and offensive politics, too. I listened with interest to Pat Sheehan saying that there should not be any political point-scoring. The Minister needs to address this issue urgently, and he will know that I have requested an urgent meeting with him and other representatives to thoroughly discuss the matter. I hope that the Chairman and the Education Committee also investigate the issue.

These issues all impact on local area planning, and I trust that the House will support my raising of the very serious issues that I have highlighted today. I await with interest the response of the Minister.

Mr Wilson: I also welcome the recommendations of the report, though I suspect that, given the behaviour of the Minister in the past and his current decisions, they will be ignored by him. Mr Sheehan can call that political point-scoring, but I believe that it points to the political reality. This Minister seems to be incapable, first of all of grasping the economics of education or the political implications of some of the biased and party-driven decisions that he makes.

The whole issue of area planning is very sensitive, because people are attached to their local schools. They feel that when a school is closed it is a loss to the community. If people are to be persuaded that area planning and the decisions that result from it are for the good of their community, there are a number of things that they must be assured of. First of all, they must know that there is a degree of consistency in the decisions. Secondly, they must know that the decisions have not been made on a political basis. Thirdly, they must know that the decisions have a good, sound economic basis.

Yet, look at some of the decisions that have come from the Department of Education in recent times. Danny Kennedy illustrated one or two of them in his constituency. We have had many discussions in this Assembly about the opening of an Irish-medium school in Dungiven. How can the Minister persuade people that one of the criteria that will be used when considering the closure or opening of a school is economics — the number of pupils and the sustainability and viability of the school — when we see the kind of inconsistent and party political decisions that are driven by him?

I want to give an illustration of that in my constituency; one which you will be aware of, Mr Deputy Speaker. There is a surplus of secondary school places in Carrickfergus, where there are good schools that all perform well. Yet, only this week, despite that surplus of places, the Minister announced 150 additional places over a period for the integrated school in Carrickfergus. Within a stone's throw of that school, there are two secondary schools that are undersubscribed and which take pupils from all backgrounds and areas. Yet, their position is being undermined by the increase in capacity in the integrated school. That is a proposal that was opposed by the board; it is a proposal that has been opposed by other schools; it is a proposal that does not make economic sense; it is a proposal that robs the other schools of pupils; it is a proposal that —

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Wilson for giving way. Does he not accept that the decision to increase the enrolment at — presumably — Ulidia Integrated College is based on parental demand and parental choice?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Wilson: If that is the case and the Minister is responding to parental choice, looking at the report, he should be granting, and I am not recommending this, far more places to controlled grammar schools and maintained grammar schools because they have the lowest number of unfilled places at 1%. If that is the route that we are going to go down, and that is the route that the Member is advocating, we are in very dangerous territory.

The Minister indicated to me in a written answer that one of the attractions of many integrated schools is that, if people choose an integrated school and travel from a distance, they are more likely to get free school transport. Fifty per cent of those who attend an integrated school get free school transport. That is a massive attraction, but it is an artificial attraction. If he starts basing his decisions on the attractiveness of a school, he will find that we have the problem of increasing capacity in areas where there is already overcapacity and, indeed, of adding to the transport bill for the Department of Education.

We need area planning — I am an advocate for it — and we cannot waste resources at a time when we are in difficulty with expenditure on keeping surplus school places open. However, it must be done on the basis that people have confidence that the decisions have a degree of consistency, are not politically driven and are not driven by a Minister who clearly either does not understand the economics and the politics of school closures or is so driven by narrow party sectarian interest that he is prepared to override that and, in doing so, annoy people and undermine the good work that people try to do in an area.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Fáiltím roimh an deis an rún seo a phlé inniu agus tuairimí na gComhaltaí a chluinstin. I welcome the opportunity to debate the motion and to hear the views of Assembly colleagues — well, the views of most of them. I wish to acknowledge the work of the Education Committee in producing the report and the witnesses who gave evidence.

Clearly, there continues to be significant interest in and scrutiny of the area planning process in many quarters, and that is absolutely appropriate. In responding to the debate, I want to take a few moments to set out my vision for area planning. It is my job as Education Minister to make decisions that will determine the shape of the education system for many years to come. They are often hard decisions, but I make them in the best interests of all pupils. Every pupil is entitled to access high-quality education and curricular experiences, and it is the needs of pupils that are at the heart and purpose of area planning. To carry out area planning is to identify the needs for the future and plan effectively so that we have the right type and size of schools in the right places to meet the needs of children today and tomorrow.

There are many challenges in this work that the report outlines and, on many occasions, recognises. Low enrolment numbers lead to pressures on school budgets, undermining efforts to provide a broad and balanced curriculum. We continue to operate in a restrained financial climate, the severity of which was not envisaged in the Bain report or the sustainable schools policy when they were drafted. I know that any change in the provision in an area, particularly a school closure, can be sensitive for the local community. No one should be under any illusions that, when I stood up in the Chamber in September 2011 and announced my intention to drive forward area planning, I thought for one moment that it would be an easy journey. It was always going to be a difficult journey, both at the strategic and local level. Many of our schools have long been at the heart of their community, and proposing any significant change or impact beyond the school gates also has an impact on the community.

It has to be said that the best way to keep a school open is for the local community to send their children to that school. That is key to keeping a school open. Too often, I have had to deal with school closures where, quite rightly, people have signed petitions that were sent to my Department with thousands of names. However, the most important document that anyone can sign in relation to a school is an admission slip. The admissions form that says that people will send their child or children to a school is the best way to keep it open.

As I have said before, this is a relatively new process that has not been attempted on this scale. In September 2011, I set out the challenges of area planning. Yes, we are learning, and yes, we are listening, and we are continually trying to improve the process. My Department's sustainable schools policy specifies criteria that provide a broad framework for assessing a school's long-term educational sustainability. That policy provides the basis for the current area planning process. The policy's six quantitative and qualitative criteria and associated indicators provide a framework for assessing a school's sustainability. I will remind the House of what they are: quality educational experiences; stable enrolment trends; sound financial position; strong leadership and management; accessibility; and strong links with the community. Those criteria are not weighted, nor are they used in a mechanistic fashion. Any review of a school's future viability is considered on a case-by-case basis in the context of the Department's policies and statutory duties — statutory duties fall into place in recent decisions that I have made on the integrated and Irish-medium sector — and taking account of local circumstances.

It seems to me that the main themes of the recommendations in the report point to the need for clear communication about the need for area planning; how it will be done; how stakeholders can work together and feed into the processes; how we use the tools that we have to achieve these ends — for example, the needs model aligning capital resources with area planning — and the measuring of surplus places. On consultation, I agree with Mr Hazzard that government in its entirety can and should improve consultation methods across many areas, but I have said that in the House before. Take this example — this information is contained in the report — the area planning consultation received 50,000 responses across the boards. That is a significant input from society. I often hear complaints about the variety of localised consultation processes, and I am not in a position to comment on any of them. However, I have said before that if, during a consultation process, your argument did not win out that does not mean that you were not listened to. It is a different context. You may have put an argument or an alternative point of view forward, but the fact that that was not the final argument does not mean that you were not listened to during the consultation process.

Turning to the first and fifth recommendations, I am clear about the necessity to continue to send a message to the education and wider community of the purpose of planning, what it is and what it is not. It is not a hit list of school closures. I welcome the fact that the Committee also recognises that. That is why I agree with the thrust of both recommendations. I agree that the process must be consistent. I have already mentioned the criteria against which any development proposal is assessed. They ensure transparency, consistency and equity in decision making on sustainability across school sectors. That is why, in providing strategic direction, I agreed in March of this year that area plans, both for primary and post-primary schools, would be reviewed, consulted on and published together in all regions for the first time by July 2016. They will then be reviewed on a three-year cycle. I expect to see an annual action plan to accompany the area plan. I expect that action plan to reflect how the needs of all sectors will be provided for and to see the planning and managing authority priorities for schools exhibiting stress and how those schools will be supported and how the sustainability issues will be addressed. The first annual action plans are due in September of this year.

As a result of those changes, planning authorities will be able to bring forward a coordinated suite of proposals that reflect changes needed to deliver the vision in area planning. As Members will be aware, planning educational provision in any area is the statutory responsibility of the Education Authority working in close conjunction with the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools, the integrated and Irish-medium sectors and others. To facilitate openness, transparency and communication, I have agreed that all sectors are represented at every level, from the local planning groups on the ground through to the regional working group and, at a strategic level, to chief executive level.

The statutory development proposal process is the only means by which any significant change to a schools estate can be made. The first step is that the area plan is published and consulted on and changes are made where required. The only significant change to a school, whether that be closure, expansion or amalgamation, is made through the development proposal process, which is down to a detailed two-month consultation process.

Any development proposals brought forward from now on will have been the subject of discussion at local level. All options, including the cross-sectoral option, should be considered at this stage. The views of all stakeholders will then be fed from the local level into the regional plan.

Further education colleges are represented at the area planning and local levels, and I welcome the input of further education representatives, although I note the comments from the Committee in relation to the needs model and the projection of post-16 provision. Duplication of provision is wasteful of everyone's resources and across Departments. Planning authorities must submit a case for change accompanying the development proposal (DP). Robust and verifiable evidence must demonstrate how the proposal is aligned to the relevant area plan and how it will support the implementation of departmental priorities and policies. The rationale for change will therefore be clear to everyone in the school and the wider community.

I turn now to recommendation 2. Changes have been introduced to better align development proposal decisions and capital investment projects. Mr Department's strategy for capital investment in the coming years will continue to focus on supporting the development and delivery of a network of viable and sustainable schools in the context of 'Schools for the Future', a policy for sustainable schools shaped by the outworkings of the area planning process. The criteria and scoring mechanism for the selection of those schools have been included in my 2012, 2013 and 2014 announcements of new-build school projects and are set out in the protocols published on my Department's website.

In order to more closely align capital investment to area planning decisions, an initial gateway was introduced to the protocol in 2014. The first step in the process required planning authorities to ensure that all outstanding area planning uncertainties have been dealt with before a project can be considered for a new build. This was seen as a means of incentivising the relevant authorities to deal with outstanding area planning issues, and was introduced to prevent capital investment projects being announced but subsequently delayed due to the statutory DP process.

The scoring system in the most recent protocol also included significant additional scores for schools where a recent development proposal has been approved and further weight where, following the DP decision, a school was operating on a split site. Again, these changes were introduced to improve the alignment of the DP and capital investment processes. The constrained capital budget, however, remains a significant issue. Lack of capital funding means that it will not always be possible to implement changes approved following the debrief process immediately. My Department will continue, however, to work with schools and the wider communities to explain the constraints and to implement the accommodation changes as quickly as possible.

Turning to recommendation 3, I do not accept that there are shortcomings in the current measurement of school surplus places, nor do I understand the assumption of co-dependency between enrolment and curriculum. I do recognise, however, that it is not the information itself that could be improved, but how it is used. All six interrelated criteria set out in the sustainable schools policy are used to assess development proposals and the sustainability of the school, including finance, enrolments and quality of education. The Department can already seek the advice of the independent professional educationalists, the Education and Training Inspectorate, on every DP. Schools have access to the services of CASS. So, without more detail, it is difficult for me to see how an independent education improvement service would operate, although I understand it relates to a previous report of the Committee.

I turn now to recommendation 4. In order to plan effectively, the statutory planning authorities need information. The Education Authority publishes, and uses, information on enrolment, finance and attainment levels for every school, primary and post-primary, in the annual area profiles. Mr Lunn stated that he and I disagree on the needs model, although I note from the report that the Committee itself has several different opinions on the needs model and its worthiness. Let me be clear: the needs model is a planning tool, whose purpose is to give numbers for growth in three broad sectors for the planners. The needs model estimates school population projections at district council level and provides an indication of the numbers of pupils who will attend grant-aided schools over a 10-year period. It is up to the planning authorities, in consultation with the integrated, Irish-medium and other sectors, to make the case for change. I am open —

Mr Lunn: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Just one moment.

I am open to considering the shape and use of the needs model in response to any suggestions put forward by the local area groups and area planning working group.

Mr Lunn: Thank you for giving way. You seem to be accepting that there may be some shortcomings in the needs model, but can you provide an example of when integrated sector totals have been adjusted to recognise growth beyond that suggested solely through population change? Maybe Ulidia is one.

Mr O'Dowd: Standing here, I am not in a position to give an example, but what I am saying to you is that the opportunity is there, although, I have to say, much of the debate referred to the challenges that area planning faces in relation to sectors in this society. When you listen to the debate in the Chamber, you can hear that there are people who are clearly in favour of one sector or another and are totally opposed to one sector or another. That just reflects the challenges that we have in relation to area planning.

Turning to recommendation 6, I do not see the focus of area learning communities being area planning. I think that would take them away from their objectives. Finally, on recommendation 7, I am more than happy —

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I am running out of time. On recommendation 7, I am more than happy to review our consultation processes.

Turning to some of the individual comments made during the debate, I have to say that I found it astonishing that Minister Kennedy came into the Chamber, in an unusual sidestep from protocol, and made serious accusations against me as Minister about a school where his wife works.

Mr Wilson: Only because they were deserved.

Mr Kennedy: Answer.

Mr O'Dowd: At a school where your wife works. You state that your concern is non-pecuniary; I totally reject that assertion.

Mr Kennedy: Answer.

Mr Wilson: Only because they were deserved.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr Kennedy: Answer.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): All remarks should be made through the Chair.

Mr O'Dowd: So keen was Mr Wilson to attack me as Minister that he backed up Mr Kennedy's argument, not even knowing what Mr Kennedy's argument was. In fact, when he finished his speech, he had to go over and ask Mr Kennedy what his argument was. I am more than happy to deal in the realm of reality — more than happy to deal in the realm of reality — but I am not going to stand here, be insulted and have accusations made against me by Mr Wilson, who does not even know what the argument is about — he does not have a clue what it is about — and by a gentleman who has come into the Chamber to defend a school that his wife works in. I think that is completely unacceptable.

Mr Kennedy: I declared an interest.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr O'Dowd: On that point — [Interruption.]

Mr Kennedy: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. You will confirm that, in the course of my remarks, I made the personal relationship absolutely clear in relation to my wife being a teacher at Markethill High School. I declared that openly before the House. We are listening to a political smokescreen, as usual, to hide old-fashioned bigotry.

Mr O'Dowd: Further to that point of order —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. Can I deal with this one first, please? A point of order has been raised, and the Member did declare his interest in the course of the debate, which is appropriate. Members, can we move on with the issue, please?

Mr O'Dowd: Further to that point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. The Member has made a serious accusation against me of being involved in bigotry, which is completely —

Mr Wilson: It would not be the first time.

Mr O'Dowd: It has now been backed up by Mr Wilson from a sedentary position and is completely against my code of conduct as a Minister. I would like the Speaker to investigate this further in relation to both gentlemen.

Mr Wilson: There are probably plenty of examples for him to look at, too.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): It is important that all Members listen carefully to each other and treat each other with respect. Can we now move on?

Mr O'Dowd: Can I just clarify it with you? Are you going to look into that matter in relation to the serious accusation that has been levelled against me in the Chamber?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I will ask that the Hansard report be reviewed, but I point out to the Minister that the code of conduct for Ministers is not an issue that is dealt with by the Speaker's Office, as far as I am aware, but we will ensure that the Hansard report is reviewed. Can we now move on, if the Minister has finished?

Mr O'Dowd: I have, yes.

Mr Weir: On behalf of the Committee, I would first of all like to thank all of those who contributed to today's debate, particularly the Minister, who has come along to give his response on it. I think we got into a little bit of the ding-dong that Mr Sheehan earlier indicated that we had avoided; perhaps indicating that, whatever else, Mr Sheehan is not a prophet.

1.30 pm

This has not just come out of the ether. As has been indicated, the Committee did a lot of work and gathered a lot of evidence. It was good to see that a number of contributors thanked the Committee for the work that it had done, and I reiterate in particular the thanks to Professor Gallagher for his work on the position paper. It is important that the Department and the Minister study the recommendations of the report and, even if there is disagreement on some of them, find some of the information to be useful and enlightening.

Before highlighting the key contributions to the debate, I would like to briefly remind the House why the Committee undertook this work. Sometimes, Committees undertake scrutiny for ideological or even political reasons; in the past, there has even been the accusation that Committees have brought reports simply to annoy, embarrass or generally admonish Ministers for the sake of it. I am sure that that has never happened in this House, but there is that accusation from time to time. This is not one of those occasions. The Committee began its scrutiny more than two years ago in response to the concerns and complaints of schools and parents. The Minister referred to the vast quantity of responses on area planning. That shows the importance of the issue to people. When Committee members set aside the time and listened, they found that the concerns were reasonable and the complaints addressable.

I think that everybody has acknowledged that area planning is a significant challenge. That said, I think that the Committee genuinely believes that the recommendations in our position paper are eminently doable and would go a long way to getting buy-in by schools and parents in the area planning process. The Committee understands that a review of area planning will be undertaken. That is a crucial set of circumstances. It hopes therefore that there will be discussions with the Department on the subject in the not-too-distant future. From that point of view, this is not the endgame for the Committee but merely a staging post.

I will turn to some of the themes that emerged from contributions. Two things that were fairly consistent throughout all the contributions were that everybody accepted, without reservation, the need for area planning and change and that having empty desks in schools was a problem that needed to be sorted out in a strategic manner. Similarly, it was admitted by everyone, to varying degrees, that there were flaws in the area planning process itself. On those two positions — the need for area planning and acceptance of the flaws in its implementation — there was a wide spectrum of views. Probably the most enthusiastic on area planning was Chris Hazzard's contribution. Others, like Mr Wilson and Mr Kennedy, were considerably more sceptical on the issue. However, I think that everyone on all sides accepted that there was a need for change. Maeve McLaughlin highlighted that it needed to be evidence-based and indeed that there was much to reflect on and learn.

Mr Newton: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that never again should a consultation process be undertaken by an area learning partnership or whatever in the sense that pupils, teachers and parents perceive there to be a predetermined outcome to that consultation process and, indeed, that, as indicated under recommendation 6 of the report, sharing, cooperation and innovative solutions ought to be sought in area planning?

Mr Weir: I completely agree with the Member. I think that it has been highlighted by a number of Members that even, shall we say, those who are most robust in their defence of what has happened in area planning would accept that there has not been that full level of consultation and inclusiveness. The need for inclusiveness as we move forward was highlighted, for instance, by Maeve McLaughlin and Chris Hazzard. Sandra Overend highlighted that the position on implementation, particularly in consultation, left things in disarray. Seán Rogers said that there was a feeling out there that parents just were not being listened to. This seems to be a fairly consistent theme. It is right that one of the key elements of our report's recommendations is that there has to be both inclusiveness and a feeling of real, positive engagement. If people take a view that area planning has a different motivation or, indeed, is coming with a predetermined outcome, proper results will not actually arise from that.

A number of Members raised the issue of cross-border cooperation, particularly Seán Rogers and Trevor Lunn and, perhaps in a very different context, as she admitted, Sandra Overend. That lack of joined-up thinking has been highlighted.

While the Minister accepted that there were some problems, he was a little reluctant to see too much in the way of problems. However, a number of Members raised the needs model and, indeed, how up to date it was and whether it reflected reality. Trevor Lunn, Robin Newton and Sammy Wilson raised that issue. Trevor Lunn raised the issue of whether it was responsive enough to the needs of the integrated sector. Sammy Wilson also raised the integrated sector but had a slightly different view of the appropriateness of the needs model. One of the things that were abundantly clear — it was raised by Nelson McCausland and Robin Newton — is the extent to which future needs that are based on demography do not appear, in individual cases, to have been taken into account all that well. We have seen situations in which there has been a danger of schools closing in almost a domino effect and pupils perhaps being shuffled around. A number of Members — Robin Newton, Nelson McCausland, Sammy Wilson and Danny Kennedy — raised very specific issues about their constituencies. Whatever the vision and widespread buy-in of the idea of area planning, it has perhaps been seen to fail to respond in individual constituencies. Indeed, one of the concerns raised was that, at times, the Department has taken a too-rigid approach to the variation in enrolment numbers and that there has perhaps been a failure to respond to local needs. While that is a slightly different issue to the needs model, the fact that the needs model has also not fed in properly to things has also been significant.

The variation between the sectors in pace and process was highlighted by a number of Members, particularly Sandra Overend, Trevor Lunn and Nelson McCausland. As highlighted by Seán Rogers, there is a need, on a cross-sectoral basis, to be a lot more strategic in our thoughts. There is clearly a feeling from the Committee that, in proceeding, we need to ensure that all sectors feel that they are on a level playing field and will be dealt with fairly.

Mention was made — it is also referred to in the report — of the need to be all-encompassing of the different sectors. For instance, Seán Rogers raised the issue of the exclusion of further education colleges. Indeed, if we are looking at overall area planning for the post-16 category of pupils, that also needs to be brought in.

A number of Members, including Chris Hazzard and Seán Rogers, raised the importance of rurality and the need to ensure, as we move forward, that the needs of genuinely rural communities are taken into account. That leaves aside the argument raised about the issues around the definition of rurality. If I can turn —

Mr Elliott: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way briefly.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way when he is making his winding-up speech. He mentioned rurality. Over recent times, there has been an indication that some schools in the Catholic maintained sector in Fermanagh, such as Brollagh and St Aidan's in Derrylin, will be retained, and that is very positive. However, in the same respect, the Minister closed down Lisnaskea High School last year, a very important school in the controlled sector, and now plans to amalgamate the Collegiate Grammar School and Portora and close the Collegiate.

Mr Weir: The Member will be aware of the circumstances in Fermanagh a lot better than I will. This highlights the point made by a number of Members: we need a level playing field and something that is cross-sectoral and strategic in nature that, consequently, takes into account all the sectors at the same time and at the same level and recognises that the needs in rural Fermanagh are not the same as those in Craigavon, Bangor or inner-city Belfast. There has to be that flexibility as well.

I turn briefly to the Minister's remarks. He set out his vision for area planning with the needs of children at the centre. He highlighted budget pressures and the sensitivities of local communities to school closures and amalgamations. I do not think that anybody would particularly disagree with his vision, but I suppose that the issue is whether what happens in practice matches that vision.

The Minister, while not accepting everything in the report, accepted that improvements to area planning were required and indicated that they were in hand. He accepted the need for consultations to be improved but argued that the existing process had been engaged with by a large number of respondents. Again, we come down to the issue of simply getting the responses. I appreciate the Minister's point that, if the final decision is not necessarily what you wanted, it does not mean that there has not been proper engagement. However, we need to see an improvement in the quality of the engagement. The evidence given to us was fairly consistent on that.

The Minister highlighted the planned improvement and synchronisation of area planning, with action plans being issued in September 2016. He advised that development proposals would take into account cross-sectoral solutions and confirmed that the FE sector will be directly involved in future area planning. He referred to revisions to the capital programme criteria. A bit disappointingly, he disputed recommendation 3 and referred to the sustainable schools policy. We believe that recommendation 3 needs to be properly taken on board. He advised that it was for planning authorities better to interpret and make use of the needs model. However, there are some concerns about its accuracy. The Minister did not accept recommendation 6, which was also disappointing.

If we look at this in an optimistic way, we all accepted the need for area planning. There has been an acceptance throughout the House of some of its flaws. The key challenge to the Department, the Education Authority and all those involved is the extent to which changes are made to ensure that all future implementation is fit for purpose. I can, perhaps, distil this into one exchange that occurred. The Minister, while he did not, unfortunately, support all the recommendations in the report, he made reasonably positive noises about them. My colleague Mr Wilson expressed cynicism that whatever noises the Minister made, he would, ultimately, simply ignore the recommendations. That is the key test.

I find myself in the unusual position of saying that I hope that Mr Wilson is wrong. The key challenge to the Minister, the Department and the Education Authority is that we have area planning that does what it says on the tin and that has not simply a good vision but a practical outworking that delivers change in our school system that is inclusive, fair, strategic and allows all sectors to feel that there is a level playing field. That is the key challenge for us all as we go forward. I commend to the House the motion, the Committee for Education's position paper and its recommendations.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the position paper produced by the Committee for Education on area planning; and calls on the Minister of Education to implement the recommendations contained therein.

Private Members' Business

Human Rights Act 1998

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other contributors will have five minutes.

Mr Dickson: I beg to move

That this Assembly recognises the vital importance that the Human Rights Act 1998 plays in the lives of citizens of the United Kingdom; further recognises the importance of this Act to the Good Friday Agreement and the devolution of policing and justice powers; and rejects any attempts by the Conservative Government to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998.

I welcome the opportunity to move the motion on the subject of the Human Rights Act 1998. It is an issue of the utmost importance to our everyday lives and in maintaining confidence in the institutions of government here in Northern Ireland. This year, 2015, marks the 800th anniversary of the Magna Carta, the document that laid the basis of our constitutional parliamentary democracy and which, for the first time, imposed real limits on the state and instituted meaningful rights for its citizens.

1.45 pm

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: I will.

Mr Allister: Does the Member agree that a key component of Magna Carta, to which, I hope, we all subscribe, is that the nation state would have sovereignty in the making of its own laws and in the interpretation of its own laws? That is the very thing that the Member, in his motion, wants to destroy.

Mr Dickson: I think that, as I progress through what I have to say, Mr Allister will understand that I do not subscribe to that view.

Since then, the people of these islands have progressed far through revolt, revolution and reformation. Today, we enjoy rights and freedoms that our ancestors could barely have fathomed. It is perhaps ironic that, today, we stand here debating the potential rolling back of those hard-won rights. Our Prime Minister, buoyed by a slender and unexpected majority in the Commons but held back by the need to fight fires on his right, is seeking to mount a populist, rather nonsensical and, indeed, damaging attack on the constitution of the United Kingdom. It is an attack that could ultimately lead to the UK sleepwalking out of the European Convention on Human Rights. I and the Alliance Party will meet Mr Cameron and Mr Gove's misinformation with facts. We will meet their attacks on the liberties of our constitution with resolute opposition. We hope that other parties in the Assembly will join us today in making such a statement.

Perhaps it is worth reminding the Assembly of the ultimate origins of our modern Human Rights Act. The 20th century was one of intolerable wickedness on the part of state actors. Improvements in communications and technology made government control much more efficient, and it ushered in the era of the totalitarian state in the interwar period. The rights and dignity of individuals became subservient to the aims of the state and a handful of individual rulers who usurped power. As we know, millions of so-called undesirables — political dissidents, the mentally ill, Jews, homosexuals, Gypsies and other minority ethnic groups — perished as a result.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: No, I want to make progress.

Ultimately, one of those states began the most devastating and brutal war ever witnessed. More than 60 million people died, the vast majority of whom were civilians who died at the hands of a state actor. Nothing was in place — nothing — to limit the executive power of those monstrous regimes. Post-war, we affirmed “never again”. Under the direction of Winston Churchill, the rights of European citizens were to be clear, guaranteed and inalienable through the groundbreaking European Convention on Human Rights, with its court independent of any Government. With the incorporation of the convention of rights into UK law by 1998, citizens have had the direct ability to secure their rights ultimately at the European Court in Strasbourg. Unlike before, there was a natural progression through the domestic courts, which increased the UK’s participation in reaching judgements.

Rights are quite often described and considered as an abstract concept until one finds oneself and one’s rights violated, so perhaps a few tangible examples of when and why the Act provides justice to our citizens will be helpful to begin with in this debate. The case of the British Airways employee Nadia Eweida, who had been told to remove a small cross necklace that she was wearing, was taken to the European Court in Strasbourg under the Human Rights Act. Our Government — the British Government — argued that her necklace was not a generally accepted means of practising religion, and so argued that it was not a human rights issue. However, the court disagreed; it found that her rights to freedom of thought, conscience and religion were violated.

Another example of the use of the Human Rights Act helped to get justice for Patience Asuquo, who was brought to the United Kingdom as a domestic worker and nanny. For two and a half years, she was abused, physically and mentally. She was not paid or given time off, and her employer withheld her passport. The police were initially uninterested in that gross violation of her rights, but article 4 of our Human Rights Act, which prohibits slavery and forced labour, forced the police to investigate on her behalf and prosecute her employer.

Would a British bill of rights, as it has been called, provide the same protections? I, for one, do not wish to have either the Conservatives or the right-wing newspapers of this country deciding which rights are fundamental and which are frivolous. Undoubtedly, social rights would take a back seat. Furthermore, we would find that writing that out of our law would make the UK’s position on the ECHR and the Council of Europe untenable. How preposterous would it be that states that constantly flout human rights laws, such as Russia, Turkey and Azerbaijan, remain full members of the ECHR while Britain feels it too onerous to comply with the rules at Strasbourg?

As the text of the motion asserts, the Human Rights Act also has a central significance for the people of Northern Ireland. In the hard-won peace settlement of 1998, which most parties here are supposed to be committed to, we enshrined these fundamental rights into the very functioning of our institutions. The Good Friday Agreement required the United Kingdom to incorporate the ECHR into law in Northern Ireland to ensure access to the courts for our citizens. Furthermore, the Patten report, which forms the very foundation of our modern Police Service, instils an ethos of human rights into the very heart of policing, with strong observance of the ECHR. Removing that from the statute book would have a profound impact on the way in which we hold police accountable, and may even undermine confidence in communities that were traditionally ambiguous, at best, towards the police.

It is the right to appeal to a higher court outside the grasp of the British Executive that maintains confidence in our system of justice, policing and governance overall. It is, indeed, part of an international treaty between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom. I am heartened that the Irish Government continue their commitment as a guarantor of the agreement. I just wish that the United Kingdom Government would fully recognise their responsibilities. Scotland has indicated that it will oppose outright any changes to human rights law, and we must send a similarly strong message to Whitehall. Unlike other battles, this one is only beginning and it is one that we can win.

The rhetoric from Whitehall and the right wing of the Tory Party has cooled, and the repeal of the Act has been shelved. Nevertheless, we must keep up our guard. The Prime Minister and others may spring this irrational policy back at any time in an attempt to satisfy the right wing of their party. I hope that no party here represented at Westminster would contemplate backing such a shoddy policy and undermine fundamental rights for the people of Northern Ireland to suit their political purposes.

I have heard people say so often, “Human rights are for other people. I do not need human rights. What have they ever done to help me?” I would like to leave on the record today the words of the Lutheran pastor, Martin Niemöller, an outspoken critic of the Nazi regime of the 1930s and 1940s, which may offer an interesting perspective on the rights of society. Writing of the years before his arrest, Niemöller said:

“First they came for the Socialists, and I did not speak out —

Because I was not a Socialist.

Then they came for the Communists, and I did not speak out —

Because I was not a Communist.

Then they came for the Jews, and I did not speak out —

Because I was not a Jew.

Then they came for me — and there was no one left to speak for me.”

These injustices are the origins of our Human Rights Act. We must step up to protect our rights or risk losing them. I encourage and urge the House to support them.

Mr McCausland: The motion before us today has been somewhat overtaken by events. Prior to the election, the Conservative Party’s position was, as I understand it, that it would move directly to a repeal of the Human Rights Act 1998. Since then, it seems to have moved to a position of consultation. However, I tend to support the initial position, which is that we should move to repeal the Human Rights Act because, quite frankly, it is a cause of concern to many people across the United Kingdom, given the way in which the human rights agenda is operated and the way in which that agenda has been hijacked, particularly by the political left in order to further its agenda of evading and circumventing the political process. What they are unable to achieve at the ballot box, through the democratic process — things for which they cannot get support amongst the people of the United Kingdom — they seek to have implemented by use of a human rights agenda and the courts.

Reference was made earlier to the Magna Carta. That is not the only occasion on which the United Kingdom has had a proud record on human rights. We might also refer to the Glorious Revolution, the Williamite settlement and the Bill of Rights contained in it. Moving beyond our own shores, we might also think of the influence of such people as our own Francis Hutcheson and his teachings in respect of the Scottish Enlightenment on what happened in the American revolution.

I was taken very much by the comments made by some of the “special interest groups”, as they are described in Northern Ireland. We have, first, the Committee on the Administration of Justice (CAJ). Some years ago, Fiona Murphy, on behalf of the Committee on the Administration of Justice, said:

“For Northern Ireland, the Human Rights Act formed part of the Good Friday agreement. Not only would creating a ‘British’ bill of rights be unacceptable to people in Northern Ireland, it would undermine an international peace agreement.”

So, the fact that it was a “British” bill of rights that was being proposed was an anathema to the Committee on the Administration of Justice, which perhaps tells us more about CAJ, its political stance, its political bias and its political position than it does about any proposed bill of rights.

Ms Ruane: Will the Member take an intervention?

Mr McCausland: I am happy to.

Ms Ruane: I ask the Member to withdraw his comments about CAJ. In my view, and from my experience, CAJ is a collection of individuals from across the political spectrum and none, with human rights experience, academics and human rights activists. It is a bit disappointing to hear the comments made about an established human rights group.

Mr McCausland: The fact that Caitríona Ruane rushed to her feet to defend CAJ probably says more to reinforce what I have said, because it is an organisation that has frequently operated to a Sinn Féin agenda more than anything else.

Ms Ruane: Please. This should not be —

Mr McCausland: Sorry, Mr Speaker, we cannot have two Members on their feet at the one time.

Ms Ruane: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. That is a very dangerous statement to make, and it is absolutely untrue. I ask the Member to withdraw it. The CAJ is not working to a Sinn Féin agenda. It is absolutely wrong for somebody to say that in the House.

Mr Speaker: I know that the Member is well enough experienced to know that there should be no personal references across the Chamber. I have made that clear previously. I heard the personal remarks. I will, if necessary, review Hansard if we do not proceed in a more respectful manner. We can make our arguments without, I think, impugning the reputation or the motivation of Members.

Mr McCausland: Mr Speaker, if you do reflect on what was recorded in Hansard, you will see that I referred to the Member, because the Member had spoken, and I also, I think, referred to her indirectly. I did not refer directly to her or speak to her; I was referring to what she had previously said.

Bear in mind that one of CAJ's previous directors spent time as a director of a republican ex-prisoners' organisation. I think that to be the case. Furthermore, I think that the current director was, certainly at one time, a member of the Communist Party of Northern Ireland. That sort of pedigree says something about the organisation. It helps to explain why it finds it offensive that there would be such a thing as a British bill of rights.

We also had the comments on this matter from Amnesty International. I will move on, because my time has virtually gone.

The unionist community is critical of the Human Rights Act, the way in which it has been interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights, and of the fact that it has been abused on a regular basis by criminals and terrorists who have used spurious challenges to avoid deportation.

If we are going to protect human rights, let us think about the human rights of innocent victims, rather than the supposed human rights of those who are perpetrators and want to avoid justice.

This is simply a way of evading or circumventing the political process. It is a very undemocratic position, with a lot of this human rights agenda and human rights sector. Therefore, I certainly welcome and support what the Conservative Party seeks to do, whether in part or in whole.

Mr Speaker: As Question Time begins at 2.00 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. The debate will continue after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Caitríona Ruane.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We start with listed questions. I inform Members that question 14, should we get to it, has been withdrawn.

Football Stadiums: Funding

1. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the £36 million funding for the development of subregional football stadiums. (AQO 8264/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for his question.

The Executive endorsed an investment of around £36 million for subregional stadia development for soccer as a priority in the next comprehensive spending review (CSR) period, and a resource budget of around £600,000 was allocated by DFP in February to allow my Department to start to the development of the programme. A strategic outline business case has been developed and was submitted to DFP for approval in February.

My Department has been developing the programme and has worked closely with the Irish Football Association (IFA) to ensure that it is aligned to the IFA facilities strategy and that the Executive and DCAL's priorities have been fully incorporated into the programme. Programme-specific details — eligibility criteria, funding strands, funding limits — are currently being finalised. Plans for formal consultation with key stakeholders are under way.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for her response. Are clubs being given all the necessary information to assist them to make their applications? Who will administer the fund? What is the number of clubs that are likely to benefit? Will the funding be spread across the Province?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. As I said in my primary answer, the terms of reference and the consultation are being developed by my Department. Clubs that are interested in applying for subregional facilities will know of the workshops that will be planned as part of the IFA's consultation roll-out. They will get all the information they need in order to make a decision and help them shape up an application. If the Member has any particular clubs in mind, it is important that he contacts the IFA as part of that consultation to ensure that it gives the clubs all the information that they need. It is really important for clubs to have as much information as possible in advance of committing themselves to an application. I assure the Member that, once that process has happened, the IFA will make recommendations, but, at the end of the day, the decision on which clubs receive funding as part of that programme is mine.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I ask the Minister to expand on her response and give further clarity on who is responsible for the subregional programme. What form will public consultation on that programme take?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her supplementary. Primarily, DCAL is responsible for the development of the subregional programme for soccer and additional facilities for the other two of the three big sports thereafter. In relation to consultation, as I said to Mr Anderson, it is important that all the clubs have as much information as possible. I am confident that the IFA will roll out a very robust consultation process that will probably last around 12 weeks in order to ensure that clubs right across the North have an option to get as much information as they need before submitting their application.

Mr Lyttle: I welcome the much needed funding for football stadium facilities across Northern Ireland. Will the Minister give us a bit more detail around the likely timeline for the allocation of that funding?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am sure the Member heard — maybe he did not — my primary response to Mr Anderson. Initially the subregional programme was not due to kick in until the next CSR, which I suppose, without the added year on the mandate, would have meant this year. Not waiting for that, I have already put money into a specialist in DCAL to continue the work on the subregional stadia programme. The outline business case is with DFP, and I imagine it will be approved sometime in the summer, although it is freezing in here and you would not imagine the summer has started. Hopefully, when we come back from the summer recess we will be looking at the consultation process, which will last 12 weeks. I imagine that, certainly before the end of the year, applications will be submitted and we will be considering them. It is substantial money: £36 million is to be distributed among soccer clubs in the North.

Mr Beggs: The Minister has alluded to the process of determining who will be successful. Will she also indicate when the funding will be available and when it must be delivered by, so that it does not drag out? Can she also indicate any other limitations or constraints on the funding so that any urgent issues, such as health and safety situations and essential improvements, can be made to benefit the junior game?

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, two of the criteria need to be around planning permission and security of tenure. It is important that groups and clubs that apply have a long lead-in period, particularly around planning permission, if they are going to look at developing facilities outside their current footprint. That, in itself, will take time, and we need to work with and support clubs through that process. I am happy to do that. The subregional programme was really going into the next mandate to be spent across that mandate, well in advance of the end of it. It is important that clubs get the information and support they need to make an application. They need to make an application on the basis that, if successful, they will need a further lead-in period to seek security of tenure, if they have not already got it, as well as planning permission in order to spend substantial capital moneys.

Sport: Participation

2. Ms Sugden asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what proportion of the £17.5 million Sport

NI-administered National Lottery funding will be allocated to facilitate females, older people and people with disabilities to participate in sport. (AQO 8265/11-15)

6. Ms Fearon asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline Sport NI's plans to deliver £17 million of Lottery funds for sport and physical activity in the community. (AQO 8269/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: With the Deputy Speaker's permission, I will group questions 2 and 6. I thank the Member for her question.

On 18 May this year, Sport NI announced plans to invest £17.5 million of lottery funding in sports facilities projects across the North over the next five years, which will result in significant investment in sporting and leisure infrastructure and will help to increase participation in sport and physical activity across the communities.

The programme will be delivered through three strands: a single-facility strand, a multi-facility strand and a performance facility strand. Sport NI has indicated that £8.75 million — half of the total — will be allocated to single-facility and multi-facility strands, which will benefit sports clubs and communities. The investment will also contribute to DCAL's priorities, such as targeting social need and tackling deprivation through sport, by providing improved sporting and leisure access across our communities, including those who are in under-represented groups, such as females, older women and people with disabilities.

Ms Sugden: I thank the Minister for her response. What influence will local authorities have in distributing the money to ensure that it is distributed where it is needed?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I understand that local authorities have been in discussions with Sport NI for some time. Most, if not all, local authorities by this stage — particularly before they amalgamated into the super-councils — should have prepared a facilities management plan for their area based on their facilities management plan, which is based on clearly identified need. They were entering into discussions about the potential and possibilities for any mergers in the future.

I understand that those discussions are ongoing. With the facilities management plans and with the identified need being detailed right across the North, it is better to get the spend where it is needed and where it can be spent quickly and for the benefit of the community. I am sure that the Member will agree with that.

Mr G Robinson: Could the Minister outline how she intends to ensure that the money will be equally distributed in all areas of Northern Ireland?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am sure that the Member heard my response to Ms Sugden, and, as he comes from the same constituency, he certainly will have seen the investment that went into Coleraine. We need to ensure that local government works collectively with Sport NI and any other potential sources of funding to have many needs addressed throughout the community but primarily to make sure that there is access and participation for all — not just in soccer clubs, GAA clubs and rugby. They make up a big percentage of sport on this part of the island, but we need to include as many other sports as possible and even people who just want to use it to enhance physical activity through walking clubs as well.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Could the Minister tell us how DCAL will promote greater participation in sport and physical activity for older people, young women and people with disabilities?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I know that he has been listening, and, as I said, district councils, the Active Communities programme and even Sport NI all work closely with a number of the sporting organisations and bodies. That is important. Some of the bodies include Special Olympics and Disability Sports NI, which has the 5 Star Disability Sport challenge. It is important that we work with all the governing bodies, and, in recent years, there have been very good examples of the three big sporting bodies working together to look, in particular, at older, more seasoned athletes and people who used to play and have maybe let it pass for other activities. There has been a participation gap for women, and all people with disabilities need to be included in the proposals as well. It is important that we look at where the gaps are and do our best to try to close them.

Mrs McKevitt: Has it been determined what percentage of the overall fund will be awarded to each of the three strands, namely the single facility, the multi-activity facility and the performance facility?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Yes, money has been set aside for each strand. For example, the single-facility strand has a budget of approximately £2 million, and that is primarily aimed at increasing participation in sport in community and club structures. That can range from anything from £10,000 to £100,000. I will definitely get all the details. The multi-facility strand has a budget of almost £7 million, and those awards are anything from £100,000 to £1 million. The performance strand has a budget of almost £9 million, and, while there are no limits on that, it would be for fairly big capital programmes. It will be done on the basis of the assessment of that capital project overall. That is to be welcomed, because, when local government and sporting bodies were talking about coming together at the start, they were always shy of a few hundred thousand pounds, which made the projects unviable. This is an opportunity to try to bridge that.

Marching Bands

3. Mr Middleton asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what plans she has to source funding to restore the musical instruments for bands scheme. (AQO 8266/11-15)

4. Mr Douglas asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what social, economic and cultural benefits marching bands generate locally. (AQO 8267/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I understand that questions 3 and 4 have been grouped. I thank the Members for their questions.

Unfortunately, there is a shortfall in my Department's capital budget for 2015-16, which means that it must be restricted to meeting contractually committed expenditure only. The earliest that my Department can consider capital allocations beyond contractual commitments will be after the outcome of the June monitoring round is known. The musical instruments for bands scheme is therefore on hold, and I will submit a bid in June monitoring. In addition, the ongoing promotion of some pipe band contests and solo competitions and, for example, the all-Ireland fleadh, have been examples that I have used to try to bring additional money in.

2.15 pm

I am still very supportive of the role that the culture in musical bands and the marching bands tradition has to play here, but given the situation that my Department is in financially, it is something that I hope will change in the not-too-distant future.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for her answer. Following a study recently undertaken by DSD outlining the significant benefits that bands have on the local economy in Northern Ireland, does the Minister agree that such funding is value for money? Will she ensure that it is a priority as the outcome of the June monitoring round?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The study is not recent; it is a few years old, but I suppose that it is something that the Department can rely on if it so wishes. It pointed out the amount of money that was invested, particularly around the Twelfth, but I would be loath to use it because the gaps in the study did not point up the amount of money that is potentially lost. However, I value the role that marching bands have to play, so I wish to separate marching bands from that study, if the Member does not mind. I do not think that the study lends itself to the cause of the marching bands, but I have made a very robust bid for June, and I hope that that is met.

Mr Douglas: Will the Minister outline what sort of funding has come from the Arts Council for Northern Ireland under the musical instruments for bands scheme?

Ms Ní Chuilín: In recent years, it is well over half a million pounds. In fact, it is probably well over £700,000 so far. Given the demand and the need for marching bands from all traditions right across the North, there is a demand for that funding pot to be increased. The June monitoring round will help to bridge a small gap, but, fundamentally, we need to look at not just the role of marching bands but music, even for young people and not-so-young people of our age, Sammy, who want to pick up a musical instrument and get involved in jazz, traditional music or other forms of music. I think that we need to look at the long term, acknowledging the roles and the importance of marching bands in the community, but other forms of music are also demanding pots of money.

Mrs D Kelly: Given various Departments' responsibility for the promotion of good relations, I wonder whether you or any of your officials have given any consideration to having additional criteria for grant aid for musical instruments to bands so that they have to show respect for other communities in the usage of them?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I appreciate the Member's question. It is something that comes up usually before the summer recess or directly afterwards, and it is important. First, let me assure the Member, because it has been raised in this House on several occasions: any band that is in receipt of funding from the Arts Council, for example, and that has broken the law and may be subject to criminal proceedings, will not be a recipient of grant-aided funding. That is clearly laid out in the Arts Council's criteria. There has only been one band that that applies to, and it has not applied for funding this year. It is important that they not only sign up to but demonstrate good relations and mutual respect. That is part of cultural diversity that we all aim and claim to be part of. We need to see what that looks like.

Scarva Demonstration: DCAL Assistance

5. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what financial and practical assistance her Department can provide to the Scarva demonstration on 13 July. (AQO 8268/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. DCAL provides funding for festivals, and it is distributed through the community festivals fund. As the Member is aware, the fund is administered by local councils, which also provide match funding, set criteria and make individual funding decisions. I have been advised by Armagh City, Banbridge and Craigavon Borough Council that the Scarva and District Cultural Society has been awarded funding for the Royal Thirteenth event in 2015 through the community festivals fund. In addition, the Ulster-Scots Agency has been approached by the organisers, and a meeting is to be held shortly, with a view to the agency providing some entertainment at the event.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for her response. Given that the demonstration on 13 July in Scarva is one of the largest one-day cultural events in Northern Ireland, attracting some 100,000 visitors annually, and given its contribution not only to the local economy but to the preservation of culture and heritage, does the Minister not believe that there should be a joined-up approach to funding?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There will be a joined-up approach to that and other events. My money going through the councils means that it is joined up: that is DCAL and local government providing community festivals funding. The Ulster-Scots Agency has come back with a very positive response, so that is another joined-up event. I am sure that the Member is aware of other funding opportunities that he, others and the organisers can approach. Certainly, I think that that is an example of where joined-up government will have an outcome.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline how applications to the community festivals fund are evaluated?

Ms Ní Chuilín: We rely on work involving local government, the Department and the Arts Council. There is a policy and guidance framework, and the councils work very closely with event organisers to make sure that they are aware of the conditions. That is also clearly laid out in a letter of offer that the councils provide. Councils provide DCAL with the evaluation. It is important that festivals consider what they are applying for from the very start and ensure that the conditions of their grant have been met. That should come out very clearly in the evaluation. It is fair to say that those small bits of money are normally applied for by the same groups every year, so it is in their best interests to come back with a very strong evaluation. To be fair, most of them do.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. Is there any stipulation in the community festivals fund that events must have a cross-community aspect?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Not that I am aware of. I know that, for some time, some groups have very naturally worked together across the community. However, I am also aware that single identity work has been ongoing. We need to try to encourage mutual work across and between communities as much as possible. Certainly, most of the councils are very familiar with some of the groups. As I said in answer to the previous question, for a long time, the same groups have been applying for small bits of money to provide valuable festivals, but I do not think it is incumbent on councils to insist on cross-community work. When it is not there and there is no possibility of it being there, it is off-putting for groups that are trying to do it.

Mr McCarthy: The questions so far have all been about funding — £36 million for this and £17 million for that — Casement and Windsor Park. Will the Minister advise the House that, if she and her Executive colleagues do not get their head out of the sand very shortly, there will be no funding for anything in Northern Ireland, let alone —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. The Member will resume his seat.

Mr McCarthy: — the Scarva demonstration.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member is long enough here to know that the question should be directed at the question on the sheet.

Mr McCarthy: The Scarva demonstration.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Sorry, is the Member questioning the decision of the Chair?

Ms Ní Chuilín: To be fair to the Member, he is normally one of the people who jumps up and asks for £10 million for this and £2 million for that, and that is his job — he represents a constituency. However, I will not take lectures from Kieran or anybody else on trying to protect those who are most vulnerable. If the Member has a specific question about something in his constituency that might need support — the Member writes to me quite a lot — I will be happy to respond, but I will not take any lectures from people who want to go into water charging, prescription charging and taking free travel from the elderly. I do not think so.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Minister, the same rule applies to you.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Sorry.

Casement Park/Windsor Park: Update

7. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the redevelopment of both Casement Park and Windsor Park. (AQO 8270/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Construction work at Casement Park has been delayed following the outcome of the judicial review in December of last year. Since the ruling, the GAA, DCAL and the relevant team members have studied the judgement to ensure that any new planning application fully addresses and takes into account the points that were raised by Justice Horner. There remains a strong resolve within the Ulster Council of the GAA to submit a new planning application. I anticipate that a 12-week planning consultation process to support the planning application process will commence in the coming months.

Windsor Park is under construction, and, notwithstanding the recent issues regarding the west stand, the project has progressed very well. The project team and the IFA are striving towards delivering the required spectator capacity for the forthcoming Euro 2016 qualifier against Romania on 13 June. On 20 April, it was agreed that the west stand should be demolished. After receiving approval from the IFA's insurer, the west stand has been demolished, and the details of the next steps are being developed between the IFA, the insurer and the project team.

Mr Ross: Does the Minister agree that it is important that we get a stadium the size of Casement Park, with the associated capacity, for Northern Ireland to bid for major events such as the Rugby World Cup in 2023 and other events? On that basis, is she confident that there will be a planning application submitted at an early stage, and is she confident that that will get approval so that we have a capacity of in and around 30,000, which will allow us to bid for major sporting events?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member has pointed out the issues that were raised as part of the strategic outline business case for the all-stadia programme, in which the three sports were going forward together. We have a fantastic facility at the Kingspan Stadium, Ravenhill, which is providing great opportunities not only for people on the field but for those off the field. The same will happen with Windsor Park, and I hope the same will happen with the redevelopment of Casement Park.

I anticipate the Ulster Council bringing forward a planning application in the autumn. They will use the summer to consult. They will consult widely and ensure that the comments that were made by Justice Horner in December of last year are fed into that consultation. I agree that there needs to be a capacity of at least 30,000, not only to meet the conditions and criteria of the business case but to attract other events that were laid out in the business case and as part of the consultation. It would be an absolute tragedy if people decided to set their face against something, but they need to have an opportunity to talk about the difficulties that they have around planning. I hope that the 12-week consultation process will be an opportunity for people to do that.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat a LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister provide details on the actions that she has taken to address the safety concerns that were raised by the chair of the safety technical group (STG) at the CAL Committee meeting on 30 April?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He is a member of the CAL Committee, so he will be aware that I went to the Committee. I want to ensure that safety is paramount: it has been, and always will be, paramount to me.

In line with good practice and programme management, in relation to the allegations that I heard on 30 April, I instantly initiated a project assessment review of the stadia programme, which will include a specific focus on the issues raised around the Casement Park project. The review has been commissioned through the CDP and will be undertaken by independent experts. Normally a report is published to the Department, but I will ensure that the Department publishes the report publicly so that people see that as much as can be done is being done.

I am reluctant to get into anything else because there is a whistle-blowing allegation, and it is important that people have the confidence to come forward and make such allegations and that it is not subject to public consultation.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister advise us of what she thinks about the emergency exit plan for Casement Park?

2.30 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member is talking about an exit plan for a previous application. He is on the Committee, and I have heard and seen some of the questions that he has asked. The Member will know that, as part of any new planning application, new plans will be brought forward. I assure the Member and other members of the CAL Committee that I will ensure that, as part of the consultation process, the Committee will see any new design, including exit plans, evacuation plans or anything else that comes with it.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for the updates. Can the Minister advise on who is responsible for the liability or for recouping the costs of the repair to Windsor Park and the recent construction problems that there have been in one of the stands?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The IFA is working that out with the contractor and its insurer, and I am led to believe that this is being done with a can-do attitude. I am very certain that the liability not only for the demolition but for the completion of a new west stand will not come from DCAL or, indeed, the public purse. That will be sorted out between the IFA, the contractor and its insurers.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We now move to 15 minutes of topical questions. Question 1 has been withdrawn.

Casement Park: Safety Considerations

T2. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether she agrees that it is surprising that, given the worldwide expertise and experience that exists in stadia development and building, safety considerations for such a relatively small stadium arose only at the very last minute, and whether she believes that she should have known about them at an earlier stage. (AQT 2562/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: If the Member is referring to Casement Park, safety considerations are there at the start, the middle and the end. Safety considerations for any big capital programme are there throughout. However, what was different was the level at which the safety concerns were reported. The allegation that they were suppressed is something that I completely refute. I am looking forward to the outcome not only of the review but of the investigation to see what lessons can be learned.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does she agree that, perhaps, in retrospect, we might have been better to have gone ahead with a super-stadium at the Maze and avoided all this nonsense?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member is aware that there was not political agreement for that, so it is kind of a moot question. I have absolutely no doubt that it is something that is in the past, and there is nothing that we can do about that now. The three governing bodies are getting on with developing their programmes. Let me assure the Member that the work and the relationships between those three governing bodies are really good, and I have no doubt that those relationships will endure well beyond the completion of these projects.

Casement Park: Committee Inquiry

T3. Mr Dickson asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to assure the House that she will cooperate with the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure by attending its meetings as part of its inquiry into the debacle over Casement Park. (AQT 2563/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Not only can I assure the Member that I will, but I have already been to the Committee, and I anticipate being back at the Committee. I will be fully cooperative.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Ian McCrea for a topical question.

Mr I McCrea: Thank you, Deputy Speaker. Sorry, I think the —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I apologise. We need a supplementary question from Mr Dickson.

Mr Dickson: Minister, thank you for your assurance that you will fully cooperate. Given the concerns around this project, can you assure the House that no corners will be cut in respect of delivery of what is clearly a pet Sinn Féin project for west Belfast?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I resent that remark. I think that that is ridiculous, to be frank. I am surprised, because the Member is normally more sensible than that. I will certainly ensure that safety is paramount in the redevelopment of Casement Park, as it will be for the other facilities. Not only have I gone in front of the Committee but so have my officials. We will continue to do so if and when needed, and I will leave it at that.

Windsor Park: Completion Date

T4. Mr I McCrea asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether she can give a date for when the work at Windsor Park will be completed, given that the difficulties with the stand have cast doubt over the original date of November this year. (AQT 2564/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will appreciate that we are working that out, but I do not anticipate a very big delay. He is right that completion was due by November 2015. I imagine that the delay will be just a few months, because, to be fair to the IFA, it has a great team there. It is working very closely with the Department and has a very good working relationship with its contractors, which is not always the case with capital builds. I anticipate that the delay will be a matter of a few months rather than several months.

Mr I McCrea: The IFA not only has a great wee team working on it; it has a great wee team that plays in the park. Perhaps the Minister will join me in congratulating the young Cookstown lad, Stuart Dallas, who scored his first international goal last night alongside Cookstown's Aaron Hughes, who is now the most capped outfield player. Given that a European Championship game is scheduled for 13 June, can the Minister give any details about whether the temporary arrangements that the IFA hopes to have in place will still be in place for that match?

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, I join the Member in congratulating his constituents. He manages to weave them in, but that is what topical questions are about. Congratulations to young Stuart on his appearance.

I am working through the processes for 13 June with the IFA at the minute. Everything that I have heard thus far has been in the right direction; it has been encouraging and positive. The IFA is working through the procedures and protocols to do what is needed, not only to have as much capacity as possible, but to have done that against the backdrop of a lot of challenges, particularly around the Kop stand. I am happy with developments thus far and content that everything is going in the right direction to ensure that maximum capacity is there to help to meet the rules.

Cross-community Sports Programme

T5. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the cross-community sports programme element of the Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC) strategy. (AQT 2565/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member has raised the topic of community relations before. The programme is developing very well. DCAL is one of a number of Departments working towards the overarching strategy of T:BUC. The pilot scheme that we had in the greater Village area and the Falls/Grosvenor area has worked very well. I knew that even before I got the results of the evaluation. We are talking to colleagues in OFMDFM about rolling it out, not only in deprived areas but in rural areas. I am very happy with the direction that it is taking.

Ms Lo: I am pleased to hear that it has been progressing well. Does the Minister intend to evaluate the whole process and produce a report?

Ms Ní Chuilín: As I said, the first programme was a pilot scheme. The evaluation of that scheme stated that it was successful, that there was a need for it, and that there is a need for more like it. Some of the tweaks in the programme came from the young people who participated, which is very good. If anything, the lessons that we have learned are that we need to incorporate those young people's ideas into the design of the next programme. That is happening at the minute, and I have no doubt that, once the overall T:BUC programme is finished, OFMDFM will ask each Department to provide contributions to an overall evaluation report.

Casement Park: Emergency Exiting

T6. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, further to recent evidence given to the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure by Mr Paul Scott, to advise the House when she, as Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, became aware of the concerns about the emergency exiting at Casement Park. (AQT 2566/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member is on the Committee: he was there on 23 April when my officials were at the Committee; and he was there on 30 April when Mr Paul Scott made his allegations. He will know the answer because I told him when I was there. Perhaps he did not understand me when I said that I was not aware of the seriousness of the allegations that Mr Paul Scott made until I heard them when he gave evidence to the Committee on 30 April. Since then, I have initiated two very robust processes. His colleagues in DFP are involved in that investigation and review, certainly the review, anyway. It is not just DFP: the British Westminster Cabinet Office is also involved in the investigation.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister. Will the Minister give an assurance that any new design proposals for Casement Park will deal with the emergency exiting issue and not bury it as in the past?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I wonder at the coincidence of his and Basil's question; maybe he is reading from the same script. Let me give the Member the same assurance as I gave to Basil McCrea and to anybody else listening: I will ensure that safety is paramount. I have done so and will continue to do so. Any new plans submitted as part of a new planning application will be subject to at least 12 weeks' consultation. I anticipate that the CAL Committee, of which Mr Dunne is a member, will not only see the plans but have an opportunity to contribute to the consultation. I am sure that he will look out for exiting, egress, access and, indeed, any other aspect of concern. I am delighted to see so many people supportive of the redevelopment of Casement Park.

Music, Musical Instruments and Tuition

T7. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for her assessment of the importance of music, musical instruments and tuition, particularly for children, and to outline the action that she could take to resource a strategy to maximise uptake, in light of the fact that he does not quite know how we have reached this new, depressing level where it appears that we are about to start politicising musical instruments and music, which, of course, should be about harmony. (AQT 2567/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not sure what the Member was referring to. I have not made it political and would resist any attempt to do so. I understand that the Member is coming from the same position. Some time ago, I met the marching bands forum, which is one aspect of musical tuition. There are others: I have met people from Comhaltas and from the all-Ireland fleadh committee in Derry and so on. I went to the Ulster Fleadh and all the rest. I also met children and young people who are involved in jazz and contemporary music, and the fact that music is important to them is important to me. Music is my thing, and that is something that I fully appreciate, participate in and see the importance of. It is important that, where possible in these financial circumstances, we invest in opportunities for children and young people to get involved in music.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister for her response. In the context of her latter remarks, will she undertake to liaise with her colleague the Education Minister to maximise the availability of musical tuition and music for all our children?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely. Not only are John O'Dowd and I sitting next to each other today, but our offices are close together. We have done so and will continue to do so. I have spoken to many principals and, indeed, boards of governors about not only music but art and physical activity in school. It is important that, within their current budgets, schools ensure that those subjects are not an afterthought but are built right into the criteria.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Mr William Irwin is not in his place. I call Mr Thomas Buchanan.

Angling: West Tyrone

T9. Mr Buchanan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what engagement she or her officials have had with angling clubs to help to further that sport, given that she will be aware of the important role that angling plays, especially in tourism, in West Tyrone. (AQT 2569/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: It is a valuable asset not just in West Tyrone, which obviously has some beautiful scenery, but right across this island. Angling clubs have worked very closely together for years and will continue to do so. Angling is very important, and not just for community participation; it is intergenerational and helps increase tourism, particularly along the waterways that have a good yield of trout. I am, have been and will continue to be very supportive of local angling clubs.

Mr Buchanan: Will the Minister give an undertaking that she will meet the angling clubs in West Tyrone to help iron out any of the difficulties they may have?

2.45 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly. I have met many angling clubs, and I am sure that I will continue to do so. If the Member has angling clubs in his constituency that he wants me to meet, I am happy to do that. Just find the office and we will get that sorted. It is absolutely no bother.

Carryduff GAC

T10. Mr Ó Muilleoir asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for her assessment of the contribution of Carryduff GAC to sport and the community in south Belfast. (AQT 2570/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am happy to recognise the contribution of Carryduff. I know it is a big club. Like many clubs across sport and physical activity, the work it does, particularly across generations, is actually keeping people well, fit and safe.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Tá an t-am ag éirí gairid. Thank you for squeezing in the last supplementary question, Mr Deputy Speaker. Will the Minister give a commitment to visit the club and see the good work that is going on there? With over 1,000 members, it is the biggest club in Ulster, but, sadly, it does not get the resources it is entitled to.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am absolutely happy to visit Carryduff.

Education

School Enhancement Programme: Funding Cuts

1. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of Education why schools that were successful in the first phase of the school enhancement programme have now had furniture and equipment funding withdrawn. (AQO 8278/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): As the Member knows, the Executive Budget has been cut by the Westminster Government by £1.5 billion over the last five years. As a direct result of that cut, there is significantly reduced money to spend on front-line services such as education. I have taken every action possible to protect education funding and the front-line services within the Department of Education's remit, ensuring that the priority is keeping teachers and classroom assistants in classrooms.

To date, furniture and equipment allocations have been made to five of the 22 school enhancement (SE) projects on site. I recognise the issues this raises for the remaining SEP projects, and I have allocated a further £1.8 million for the furniture and equipment need at capital projects on site. That is expected to fully meet the furniture and equipment requirement of SE projects in 2015-16. DE officials have prepared an in-year bid to the Department of Finance and Personnel to address the shortfall in funds for the furniture and equipment requirements in other capital projects currently on site.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his answer. Is he assuring everybody who has been told that they will not receive funding for furniture and equipment in schools that that will be remedied by his Department? The impression given is that they have new classrooms but no furniture.

Mr O'Dowd: I am assuring everyone who is listening that I am trying my best and we are exploring options for how we fund furniture and equipment going into the future. It depends on the project. For instance, in school enhancement programmes, if additional classrooms are being provided to schools, there will certainly be a shortage of furniture, but, if we are replacing classrooms or an existing room, there will already have been furniture in that room, so we have to ask how we use that furniture and equipment going into the future.

As I said, the Member is aware that £1.5 billion has been cut from the Executive Budget. All Departments are suffering as a result of that. When we look to the next three years and at the spending plans of the Conservative Government, we can see that there will be further cuts to our public services, hence the reason why we are in the middle of the crisis we are in at the minute and why there are talks going on in other places. We wish success to those talks. That is the reality of reduced budgets — reduced front-line services.

Early Years Fund: Reductions

2. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister of Education what representations has he received regarding the reductions to the early years fund. (AQO 8279/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chomhalta as an cheist. I appreciate that the reduction in funding has come as unwelcome news to the early years sector. By far the majority of correspondence I have received on the matter has been from MLAs. I have had one invitation directly from a recipient of the fund. I have answered 51 Assembly questions on the topic and 27 correspondence cases on behalf of nine of the 153 groups. I have received petitions on the matter from two of the current 153 recipient groups. In my response I have once again highlighted the cuts to the Executive Budget as a result of Westminster spending plans.

I recognise that some worthy programmes may be impacted upon as actions are taken to protect front-line services within the Department's remit.

The early years fund was established by the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety in 2004 to help to sustain certain early childhood services when Peace II funding ended, and it has remained available only to those applicants who were in areas of greatest need at that time. A recent review of the fund has highlighted the inequitable nature of the fund for this reason. Importantly, there are children across the North who are equally deserving of support who cannot benefit from the fund and whose situation must also be considered. It is essential that any funding is allocated in a fair and transparent manner to ensure that those who need it most can avail themselves of it.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Given the fact that each £1 that is invested in early years education saves £18 further on in each individual's life, does he agree that the £2 million that was invested in this particular initiative was money well spent, considering that, as he said, it benefited 153 communities, created 177 jobs, created 2,500 early years places and helped 620 children with special educational needs —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Have we got a question?

Mr D Bradley: — and 250 children whose first language is not English? Does the Minister not consider that to be a very good investment and money well spent?

Mr O'Dowd: Investment in early years is very good investment, but I contest the Member's figures and the way in which he has presented them. This fund has not created 177 jobs; in some instances, it sustains jobs. It has not created 2,500 preschool places; they are funded from an alternative budget. Not one preschool place will be lost as a result of the cut to the early years fund. I am trying to avoid ending the early years fund, but 2,500 places will not be lost. Indeed, only this weekend, we published the figures for children who have been successful in gaining a preschool place. We now have up in the high 99% of children who have achieved preschool places, so how have we lost 2,500 places?

I accept that organisations that are losing funding, quite rightly, have a right to lobby for funding, but I do become concerned when I read and hear alarmist figures that have no substance and cannot be backed up in any way. I will support early years funding because I believe that it is a good way forward. I will not support it on the basis of alarmist figures from anyone.

As regards early years funding in the future, Members may recall a debate in this Chamber — I think that it was in December 2014 — when a motion was put before Members to support classroom activity solely. As I said before, my party colleagues put forward an amendment which covered a wide range of areas. That was rejected. The Assembly called on me as Minister to invest in the classroom. That is exactly what I did at the end of the budget with very limited resources. You cannot now come back to me and say, "Oh, by the way, what about the early years fund, youth services and all these other services?" When it came to the crunch and the vote in this Chamber in December 2014, you all voted for funding to go directly into the classroom. That has an impact on the early years fund.

Mr Weir: The Minister has already referred to it, but, whatever scale of early years funding is available, can he indicate what practical measures will be taken to ensure that applications are treated in an open and accessible way and that it is not simply a case of it being rolled over to groups that have received it in the past?

Mr O'Dowd: The Member makes a very valid point. This has been a concern. The review that was carried out on the early years fund highlighted the concern that, in fact, it was a closed fund. If you were in at the start, you stayed in. No new applications were made to that fund. I am seeking a way forward for the early years fund. I am trying to establish a budget line for it. I will make a bid in the June monitoring round. I will also examine very closely my own budget to see whether we can continue the early years fund throughout this year. My preferred option would be to open it up to a new programme. The provider of that programme would be open for further discussion and debate. I want to open up a new programme, to which all relevant groups will have an opportunity to make a bid. They will then be judged against the criteria, and funding will be awarded in an open and transparent way.

I understand that there are frustrations from both sides of the argument on early years: organisations that are losing money currently, and those that did not get money in the first place. I am trying to open up a new pathway, but I have to secure funding first.

Mr Allister: I am disappointed that I sense a lack of sympathy from the Minister about a situation that is of his creation. Surely he realises that a number of playgroups and preschool arrangements are vitally dependent on a significant contribution to keep their doors open? Talk of a new fund will not solve the problems of those who face a situation in September in which they may lose a huge percentage of their funding, have to lay off staff and even have to close their doors. Now is the time to address the matter urgently. Does the Minister not agree?

Mr O'Dowd: The Member does not sense a lack of sympathy from me; he senses a sense of reality. The Member will know that groups that are affected by funding cuts will of course lobby. As I said to Members previously, I am at times frustrated when I hear some of the claims that are broadcast on the airwaves and when I read in the newspapers about the impact that this will have on preschool places and a wide range of community infrastructures. Those claims do not stack up when you look at the situation in detail.

Preschool places are funded from a completely different budget line to the early years fund. I have made several commitments today that no one will be disadvantaged in obtaining a preschool place because of an end to the early years fund. I want to support community and voluntary organisations because they play a vital role in our society and our communities, but I also have a responsibility. I am sure that the Member will agree that any fund that is created should be open to everyone; it should not be a closed fund, as is the case with the current fund. I am sure that he will also agree that groups that are as equally deserving as groups that currently achieve funding from the early years fund should be allowed, at least, to apply to the fund and be judged against the criteria.

Sometimes, I am accused of being somewhat blunt on a number of matters. My responsibility is to achieve funding for early years moving forward. I am looking at my budget, and I will make a bid in the June monitoring round. Both of those matters will be explored, and I hope to come out the other end with a successful conclusion to them.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline what funding is available to deliver those programmes at the moment?

Mr O'Dowd: From the early years fund that we have been discussing, there is still £900,000 available between now and the end of August. To complete the year, I need an additional £2 million, and that is what I am seeking.

The Department of Education spends somewhere in the region of £220 million annually on early years interventions, which includes funding to early years, preschool and other early years organisations. That is quite a significant and worthwhile investment from the Department of Education. I will emphasise this time and again: we have the funding for preschool places and to keep those places in the future. The challenge for me and perhaps the Executive is to find the £2 million that will keep the early years fund running. I will say it again: we have to open up that fund to other bidders.

Ligoniel Primary School: Accommodation

3. Mr McCausland asked the Minister of Education whether he will work with the Education Authority to provide an additional mobile classroom to meet the accommodation requirements of Ligoniel Primary School. (AQO 8280/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Ligoniel Primary School is a controlled school and, as such, falls under Education Authority control. It is for the Education Authority to prioritise its minor works budget allocation in line with the priorities that I have identified. Those priorities include inescapable statutory requirements, such as health and safety and obligations under the Disability Discrimination Act, as well as existing contractually committed works. The Department has recently approved a temporary variation to increase Ligoniel Primary School's admissions and enrolment numbers. That was granted following confirmation from the school that additional pupils could be catered for within the existing school buildings and that no additional accommodation would be required.

3.00 pm

Mr McCausland: The Minister will be aware of the history of the situation. Back in the 1980s, at the height of the Troubles, several classrooms and toilet and storage facilities were separated from the rest of the building so that a nearby nursery school could be accommodated in the suite of buildings. The position now is that the school is able, just about, to bring children in but is not able to meet the requirements that would normally be expected for seven-class provision over seven years. Will he at least enquire as to what might be done by the Education Authority about the provision of one mobile classroom, which would ensure that the school was able to meet the full requirements of the seven classes and, therefore, there would be no need for composite classes?

Mr O'Dowd: I am more than happy to raise the matter with the Education Authority, but I also suggest that the Member raise the matter with the authority himself. He may already have done so. The authority has a responsibility to be as open and frank with elected representatives as it is with the Minister, but I am more than happy to raise the matter with the Education Authority and report to the Member on Ligoniel Primary School.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response to that question. We are now in June, and many schools that are making plans for their September intake find themselves in the same position as the Ligoniel school. Will he expand on the work that DE is doing with the Education Authority to ensure that schools have a good line of communication with the authority so that steps can be taken to inform them whether they will be provided with additional classroom accommodation in September?

Mr O'Dowd: As I said in my original answer to Mr McCausland, it is for the Education Authority to prioritise its minor works scheme. It may have set its priorities. The minor works funding this year has reduced dramatically for all the reasons that I have already rehearsed during this Question Time. There are significant pressures on minor works programmes moving forward, and the Education Authority has to prioritise in light of disability discrimination, health and safety and other statutory obligations. It is vital that there is open and clear communication between the Education Authority and schools. Schools need to know what their accommodation will be in September because it will come very quickly. I am more than happy to raise the concerns expressed by Members in the Chamber with the Education Authority, but I urge Members also to contact the authority directly. As I said to Mr McCausland, it has a duty to be open, frank and transparent with elected representatives as well.

Nursery Schools Admission Criteria

4. Mr Moutray asked the Minister of Education whether he has any plans to revise the criteria set by his Department for nursery school admission. (AQO 8281/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Legislation requires that all preschool settings give priority to children from socially disadvantaged backgrounds. Preschool settings are responsible for setting any subsequent criteria. Priority is given to children from socially disadvantaged circumstances in the preschool admissions process because research has shown that they experience more difficulty at school than any other children. This is part of our wider efforts to tackle educational underachievement. 'Learning to Learn: a Framework for Early Years Education and Learning' includes an action to implement remaining actions from the review of preschool admissions, including one to examine the definition of socially disadvantaged circumstances with a view to ensuring that the relevant criteria are up to date and, if need be, expanded. I also want to examine the criteria to ensure that they do not disadvantage low-paid working parents. I have asked my officials to consider the issues associated with extending the priority criterion.

Mr Moutray: I thank the Minister for at least part of his response, but I remain unconvinced that he realises the depth of feeling on the ground about the criteria that are enforced on schools, leaving working families disadvantaged compared with those on benefits. Will he confirm that, given the increase in the birth rate and its impact on already overstretched provision, he will consider extending the provision that currently operates on a part-time basis, especially in places such as Waringstown, where there is considerable oversubscription?

Mr O'Dowd: The Member has raised a number of points. Regardless of parents being on benefits for whatever reason, my job is to look after the children in these matters. Children from socially disadvantaged backgrounds are at a greater disadvantage when starting school than those who are not. That is an evidence-based statement. There was a debate earlier around early interventions, early years etc. If we make an early intervention, we ensure that the child has a greater opportunity to succeed in education, and we save money further down the line. I accept that there is an argument from low-paid families who face financial challenges and are out working and trying to make ends meet. I accept that there is a further responsibility on my Department to assist those families. As I said, I am asking my officials to look at how we broaden the social disadvantage criterion. It was caught up in the welfare debate, but I think that we can move it on in conjunction with the welfare debate or separate from it. It is now time to move that on.

In relation to part-time and full-time provision, evidence-based research shows us that there is no significant difference between part-time and full-time provision for a child. Ideally, I would like to provide up to four hours for all children. The finances are not there to do it, but I am satisfied that the provision that we make in part-time is good for the child's development.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Does the Minister have any intention to widen even further the prioritisation criteria for preschool admissions to the working poor?

Mr O'Dowd: As I outlined to Mr Moutray, I intend to try to move this forward. As I said, it is tied up in the welfare debate. It may be tied up in that further because, as I speak, I am thinking that the Conservative Government may well do away with a number of benefit entitlements. We are concerned about the future of family tax credits and what bandwidth those will be in. The goalposts may continually change on us, but I want to assist low-income families who are out working and who, quite rightly, recognise that there is a disadvantage to their children as well.

It is also worth noting that the social criterion operates only for 25% of children who apply for preschool places, and I am in a position to say that over 99% of children who applied for preschool provision this year have been provided with that. No one, at the end of the day, is being left out because of the social disadvantage clause. I am an elected representative; I know about the heat that it can cause around some of these issues, but I believe that the principles of the policy are right. They are making a difference to our educational achievement, but I recognise that there is an argument to widen the criterion.

Mr Rogers: Thanks, Minister, for your answers thus far. The sustainable schools policy guidelines for travel time to school state that primary-school children should not travel for more than 30 minutes and post-primary-school children should not travel for more than 45 minutes. Will the Minister provide some guidance on travel time for preschool children?

Mr O'Dowd: As the Member is aware, there are no set criteria for travel time for preschool children, but we certainly would not want them to travel for longer than that set out for primary-school children. We try to provide services as close to the family home as possible, although that is not always possible. I suspect that the Member's question has been triggered by the letter that parents receive if they are not successful in getting a place. That gives the entire list of preschool providers in an area, some of which may be 30, 40 or 50 miles away. There is no suggestion in the distribution of that letter that parents should consider sending their children that far. It is a generic letter sent from the regional offices of the Education Authority to parents. Every parent will receive the same. I understand why it causes some concern and, at times, anger among parents when they receive it, but it would be more expensive and a logistical nightmare to break it down into even smaller areas. We have to think about those matters as well.

Mr Lunn: The Minister has, rightly, highlighted twice that over 99% of applications for preschool places this year have been satisfied. Does he have any concerns about the balance between the statutory and non-statutory sectors and in the long term, perhaps, the need, as funds allow, to redress that balance in favour of the statutory sector?

Mr O'Dowd: There has been an ongoing debate in education for many years about the value of each of the sectors that provides preschool education. I would just caution the Member on some of these matters. The second question that I was asked today was about the early years fund. That fund goes into the community and voluntary sector and it allows that sector to provide preschool places and early years intervention. It also allows it to be sustainable and provide very many other services in the community. I would caution against removing preschool places in the community and voluntary sector in favour of the statutory sector for a variety of reasons, including that we would decimate the community and voluntary sector's funding.

Education and Training Inspectorate reports show that there has been a constant improvement in the delivery of preschool education in the community and voluntary sector. We will ensure that that continues. I have invested more and more money. I cannot remember the exact percentage but, over the last number of years, the amount of money that I have invested in preschool settings in the community and voluntary sector has risen quite considerably. That allows the sector to invest and provide more and more curricular activity for the children involved. It also allows the sector to provide training and decent wages so that it attracts the right staff. All those things are at play, so it is not simple. Even during my time on the Education Committee, there were some quite lively debates on this matter between the various sectors. I have no doubt that those debates will continue.

Mr McNarry: Going back to Mr Rogers's question, the Minister's answer and the idea of the generic letter, the Minister quite rightly identified parental anger when that generic letter is received. There is a geographic list of where they can go. On the basis that that can be misinterpreted and provoke anger — it certainly has among my constituents — will the Minister be in a position in future to ensure that such a letter is worded more carefully and more appropriately so as not to cause any consternation to parents? The message that he has given in the House today is perhaps one that parents and schools would like to hear. Perhaps his press office might do something about —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I think that we have got the gist of the question, Mr McNarry.

Mr McNarry: — getting that answer out. Would he go along with that?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes. I find myself in the strange position of agreeing with you. You have a point about communication. It is about the use of language and the information on these matters given to parents, elected representatives, the media etc. I have raised it. During the review a number of years ago, one of the areas that I raised with the then education boards was the use of a generic letter. I am more than happy to return to the Education Authority and work with it on that. I am not ruling out any options, but I do not think that there is an opportunity to break it down into tighter geographical areas because, logistically, that would be quite difficult. However, I do believe that there is an opportunity to reword the letter in a way that sets out to parents exactly what is meant and the intent of the letter.

Early Years Fund: Reductions

5. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Education, given that the funding for groups such as Mother Goose playgroup in North Antrim has been cut significantly, to outline his current strategy for early years funding. (AQO 8282/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: As I have set out, the Executive's Budget has been reduced by the Westminster Government by £1.5 billion over the last five years. I have taken every action possible to protect Department of Education funding. However, it is simply not possible to protect every element of it. I have endeavoured to minimise the impact as far as possible by ensuring that all groups that currently benefit from the early years fund will continue to receive funding to the end of the current academic year on 31 August 2015. I have committed to review my budget and any other opportunities for funding to establish whether a fund can be established for the early years sector that would be open to all applicants and not just current recipients and aligned to the priorities of DE.

I fully recognise the importance of the fund. As I have said to other Members who have asked questions on this, over 11% of the entire DE budget, somewhere in the region of £220 million, is dedicated to early years. That includes fully funded early years programmes, identifiable funding for nursery schools, nursery units of primary schools and the foundation stage. It also includes other relevant expenditure such as that allocated to special educational needs, early years capacity building and extended schools funding.

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Minister for his answer. I appreciate the time constraint. I am sure that the Minister would agree with me that there is no group in society more vulnerable and more in need of protection than children of preschool age. Therefore, what assistance is his Department going to give such groups — particularly in rural areas, which are going to be particularly hard hit by the reduction in funding — to help them to source funding from other sources?

3.15 pm

Mr O'Dowd: My first priority is to try to achieve funding to continue through this academic year, up until 31 August. It is important that we do not lose important community assets in isolated communities, particularly isolated rural communities, through the loss of the early years fund. I am conscious of the situation and will continue to monitor

it. I have not admitted defeat on this matter yet, but if I am not successful in identifying the £2 million in my budget or achieving the funding bid to the Executive, we will work very closely with the organisations that are currently funded to signpost them to other funding organisations.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I can take one very brief question from Mr Chris Lyttle.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his answer. I am sure that every MLA recognises that we have to incur budgetary reductions, but how can the Minister justify a 100% reduction to the early years fund?

Mr O'Dowd: Because I am in an area now where chipping away a few hundred thousand here and a few hundred thousand there does not work any more. The Member will, as he said, appreciate that all budgets are under severe financial pressure, but I have to save tens of millions of pounds. In the past, I was able to take a percentage away from a budget line; I am now at the point where I have to end budget lines to make the savings required. It is far from satisfactory to me and, I am sure, to anyone in the House, but that is the reality of the current financial situation.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We now move to topical questions.

Sentinus: June Monitoring Round

T1. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of Education whether he will make a bid for the Sentinus STEM programme in the June monitoring round, albeit that he is delighted that the Minister is seeking extra funding for early years. (AQT 2571/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: No. I have to be realistic in that this is the June monitoring round. Traditionally, there are very limited opportunities to obtain money from this monitoring round. I have had to prioritise my bids. I have made bids that, I believe, are, possibly, important to the Executive and the House and based on the lobbying that I have received. The early years fund has been top of that list, so I have included it and not Sentinus. That does not mean that it is not important; it means that I am being realistic about what funding I can achieve.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for his answer, although I am very disappointed because STEM is necessary in enriching our students' learning and to our economy. Has he any plans to seek extra funding for the Sentinus STEM programme in future rounds?

Mr O'Dowd: I will keep my options open for future funding rounds. However, the Member will be aware that funding is still going into the Sentinus STEM programme. It still has a budget line; it is still able to carry out very good work in that area. So, it is still operational, and I will keep my options open going into future monitoring rounds.

Foyle College/Ebrington Primary School Sites: Future Use

T2. Mr Middleton asked the Minister of Education for an update on what discussions, if any, are taking place on the future use of the Foyle College and Ebrington Primary School sites after the completion of their new build. (AQT 2572/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The future use of the sites will be a matter for Foyle College and the Education Authority, which will be the manager of the Ebrington school site. I am aware that there are suggestions in the Derry area as to what the future use of that school and school site should be. In that case, it is a matter for discussion between the proposers and the relevant ownership authorities.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that it is important that those sites be of use to local communities? Will he work with the relevant authorities to ensure that those sites are of benefit to the local area and are not left in dereliction?

Mr O'Dowd: I am more than happy to work with the relevant authorities on that matter. In fairness to him and other representatives in Derry, you always have a plan and a call for what should happen next. That is a credit to you all. I know that there is some discussion about educational opportunities for the site, perhaps from the further and higher education sector, which would seem interesting and exciting. I do not want to see sites lying derelict anywhere; I want to see investment, growth, jobs being created and community infrastructure being strengthened.

The way to do that is through the use of former, for want of a better term, government sites. I appreciate that Foyle is under the ownership of trustees etc, but I am more than happy to work with anyone who has ambitious plans for moving forward.

Capital New-build Programmes: Amalgamated Schools

T3. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Education to outline the situation in regards to capital new-build programmes for amalgamated schools, particularly for two primary schools in Omagh town: St Colmcille's Primary School in Brook Street and Loreto Convent Primary School in Brookmount Road. (AQT 2573/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: As the Member will appreciate, I am not in a position to comment on the individual schools. During an earlier debate on area planning, one of the recommendations in the Committee's report was that investment should be aligned to area planning, which my Department already carries out. Where there are amalgamations or development proposals that have come to a conclusion and are being implemented, capital should be aligned with them. We are doing our best on that in the Department. The Member will also be aware that the Department of Education has taken a 20% cut to its capital funding this year, which is proving difficult for the delivery of the full scope of the projects that we hoped to have on the ground either in this year or next.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he accept, however, that, in a situation where we have an amalgamation of two primary schools on different sites, it poses particular problems for the management and the principal of those schools? Should priority be given to those situations?

Mr O'Dowd: As a general principle, I agree that that provides additional hurdles for the principal and senior management team of any school, but I also advise the Member that, in terms of scoring for capital projects, there is a score for amalgamation. If a school has amalgamated, it will score additional points in relation to the building policy. Therefore, the school and the amalgamation is recognised as part of the capital programme. Speaking in general terms, at this stage I do not have enough funding to move all projects forward in the future, but I will continue to try to secure funding.

Post-primary Schools: Admissions

T4. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister of Education how he views situations in which local post-primary schools are hugely oversubscribed and have to turn away local pupils who live in the local area, attend local feeder primary schools, are in the top categories of the admissions criteria and come from families that have been associated with those schools for generations. (AQT 2574/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: This is one of the pillars of area planning. There was quite a good debate — apart from sections of it, I have to say — earlier in the day about area planning. The Committee report is worthy of very careful consideration by all Members involved. We have to ensure that we have in place an area plan that recognises population shifts, growths and declines and that our schools, both primary and post-primary, are able to adapt to that in the future. However, there are areas where, in my view, area planning should be much further advanced than it is and managing authorities should have in place plans that would respond to variations in population growth at any time.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas fosta leis an Aire as a fhreagra sa chás seo.

I thank the Minister for his answer. In the absence of area plans, in cases where there is a proven need for extra places will the Minister look at other possibilities that will fulfil the need in the meantime?

Mr O'Dowd: I will, and I have. The process is called temporary variations. There will be instances where it is the appropriate method to move forward and others where it will not. However, that does not negate the responsibility on managing authorities to bring forward area plans that meet the need of an area.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Question 5 was withdrawn.

Special Educational Needs Provision

T6. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister of Education what is being done to standardise special educational needs (SEN) provision throughout the Education Authority area. (AQT 2576/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The Education Authority is working to develop a regional approach to the delivery of the current SEN framework. The purpose of that regionalisation is to ensure equity of access for all children to special educational needs services and to promote a more cohesive and harmonised approach to supporting some of our most vulnerable children across all the Education Authority regions. The provisions in the Special Educational Needs and Disability Bill and revised SEN regulations and statutory code of practice will provide a rounded and considered package of measures that will contribute to a more responsive and less bureaucratic framework moving forward.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. How will the Education Authority regionalisation, together with current SEND legislation, impact on SEN provision and the statementing process?

Mr O'Dowd: One of the rationales for bringing forward the Education Authority legislation initially and one of the very strong arguments for bringing forward the Education Bill was to ensure that we had harmonisation of services across all regions. One area of concern was the provision of SEN services, where one board area might provide different services from the one next door, so that children literally half a mile apart were receiving different services.

There is an opportunity for the Education Authority to bring forward plans for a regional service that meets the needs of all young people. The SEND Bill is about modernising the statementing process; it is not about the deletion or removal of the rights of any of our children or their parents. It is about strengthening the legislative basis on which we move forward and, indeed, speeding up the statementing process, which is very often a matter of frustration for parents. I am sure that all elected representatives in the Chamber have experience of working on behalf of parents on the statementing process and are aware of the difficulties in approaching that. The SEND legislation is about modernising a very convoluted and complicated process.

Donegall Road, Fane Street and Blythefield Primary Schools: Amalgamation

T7. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Education whether he agrees that, given the protests on the Donegall Road about the proposed amalgamation of Donegall Road, Fane Street and Blythefield primary schools, the proposal does not have local support and has, in fact, caused a lot of uncertainty for parents and teachers, and whether he believes that this premature decision will go ahead. (AQT 2577/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: I am not in a position to comment on an individual proposal, especially one that is in pre-consultation mode with the Education Authority and the local community. I encourage everyone with an opinion on this to make it known to the Education Authority and keep their mind focused on the fact that education delivery is not about buildings but about the provision of good education for all our young people. I do not mean this in a disrespectful way to anybody involved in any of the protests, but I am not as interested in "Save our Schools" as I am in saving our education.

Ms Lo: The problem with this is the lack of a site and lack of certainty about when and where the school will happen. Will the Minister consider putting forward a firm proposal on where the school will be before he decides to close the three schools?

Mr O'Dowd: It is not the job of the Minister to do so; it is the job of the Education Authority to, first, bring forward a development proposal if it wishes to do so. I will then go into a two-month consultation period, during which I am more than happy to meet elected representatives, parents and representative groups to discuss the proposal. I do not wish to go into the detail of any development proposal that may come to me on this matter, but the general principle is that it is up to the Education Authority or the managing authority to bring the proposal forward. It is not the job of the development proposal to develop a site; that is separate again. It will be a matter for the Education Authority to identify a site for any future proposed amalgamated school. They are joined issues, but two separate issues in terms of how the decision-making process works out.

GCSEs: Attainment

T8. Mr F McCann asked the Minister of Education to outline the key points in the report released by the Department last Thursday that showed figures for the number of pupils who had achieved GCSEs. (AQT 2578/11-15)

3.30 pm

Mr O'Dowd: It makes for welcome reading. We have seen a continued increase in our young people achieving five good GCSEs from A to C or equivalent, including in English and maths. Now, 63.5% of our young people leave school with that. That is almost five percentage points up on the last report from a couple of years ago. So, the intense focus on raising standards is paying off, from the initial investment in early years, right through primary school and into post-primary school. The hard work of teachers, parents, pupils, communities and community leaders in raising the focus around the need for educational improvement is beginning to pay dividends for our young people.

Mr F McCann: The percentage of pupils achieving GCSEs from A to C in 2009-2010 was 71.9%, which increased to 78.6% in 2013-14. That is to be welcomed, but can the Minister outline how his Department intends to continue that upward trajectory?

Mr O'Dowd: As I outlined, this is a multi-agency approach. I use the term "agency" advisedly. We debated this much last year when we were making changes to the common funding formula. The evidence shows that a child from a socially deprived background is less likely to do well in education. So, we have to invest in jobs, community infrastructure and families and have to ensure that people are given an opportunity to be everything that they can be from the family home. When they go through the school gates, we have to ensure that our teachers are motivated and focused — thankfully, the vast majority of them are — that there is a strong board of governors and strong leadership in the school, and that the school has close links with the community and the community is playing its part. If any one of those pillars falls down, the child is automatically disadvantaged. Yes, the Department of Education will continue to focus inside and outside the school gates, but we have to ensure that the family and the community are supported as well if we want to see continued educational improvement for our young people.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Members, time is up. You may take your ease while we change the Table.

Human Rights Act 1998

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly recognises the vital importance that the Human Rights Act 1998 plays in the lives of citizens of the United Kingdom; further recognises the importance of this Act to the Good Friday Agreement and the devolution of policing and justice powers; and rejects any attempts by the Conservative Government to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998. — [Mr Dickson.]

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an rún seo, agus gabhaim buíochas le Páirtí na Comhghuaillíochta, mar is díospóireacht an-tábhachtach í seo. I welcome the motion and thank the Alliance Party for bringing it forward, because I believe that this is a very important debate.

For the record, Sinn Féin called for and supported the Human Rights Act, and we are deeply concerned about Tory plans to consult on or any attempt to repeal the Act. The implications of the plans to repeal it and reject the current oversight role of the European Convention on Human Rights are enormous for the administration of justice, policing and equality in the North. It is also a direct attack on the Good Friday Agreement and the international treaty signed by the British and Irish Governments, which gives legal effect to the agreement. Not only was the agreement approved by referendum, it was incorporated as a treaty between Britain and Ireland and was lodged with the United Nations. It is treaty series number 50, 4705. Article 2 of the treaty binds the British Government to implement provisions of the multiparty agreement. I have some of the agreement with me. Paragraph 2 of the section on rights states:

“The British Government will complete incorporation into NI law of the European Convention on Human Rights ... with direct access to the courts, and remedies for breach of the Convention, including power for the courts to overrule Assembly legislation on grounds of inconsistency.”

It was very disappointing and worrying to hear the cavalier attitude of Mr Nelson McCausland earlier, who threw out wild, inaccurate claims about CAJ. He is not here now. He may be busy with something else, or he may not be interested in human rights. Maybe he did that because it was the easy option. Maybe he did not have his work done on preparing for the debate. I would like to read something into the record about CAJ, because the claims made about it this afternoon were nothing short of disgraceful. CAJ is an independent human rights organisation. It has cross-community membership in the North. CAJ seeks to ensure the highest standards of justice and campaigns on a broad range of human rights issues. CAJ seeks to ensure the highest standards and administration of justice by ensuring that the Government comply with their obligations in international law. It is a member of the International Federation of Human Rights (FIDH) and has received many international human rights prizes, including the Reebok human rights award and the prestigious 1998 Council of Europe human rights prize.

I understand that the Cheann Comhairle is looking at the comments, and I am sure that I speak for the entire House, maybe with the exception of some in the DUP, when I say that I assure the membership of the CAJ, the human rights community and human rights academics that Mr McCausland's comments do not reflect the view of the Assembly. As I listened to him, I was struck that the human trafficking law came into effect today, spearheaded by Lord Morrow. There was a wonderful event in the Senate, which I attended because I believe it is a very important piece of legislation, and practically the entire DUP Assembly team was there, and they applauded and gave a standing ovation to a woman who fought for human rights on the platform of human rights. Yet, an hour or so later, we have a Member of the same party making such spurious, inaccurate and wild allegations about the human rights community. So, I hope that the contributions of the DUP in the human trafficking debate reflect the ethos of the sentiments that I heard, rather than the ill-thought-out contribution of Mr McCausland.

I respectfully suggest that he rereads the quote that Mr Dickson read out at the end of his contribution. Sinn Féin will continue to work to ensure that we have the Human Rights Act as it is, and, as a society coming out of conflict, we badly need that. It is one of my favourite quotes; so I am sure that Mr Dickson will not mind if I repeat it, because I think that it is important that we all listen to it again. It was from Pastor Martin Niemöller, who was a Protestant pastor and social activist:

“When the Nazis came for the Communists, I did not speak out —

As I was not a Communist.

Then they locked up the Social Democrats, I did not speak out —

I was not a Social Democrat.

When they came for the trade unionists, I did not speak out —

As I was not a trade unionist.

When they came for the Jews, I did not speak out —

As I was not a Jew.

When they came for me, there was nobody left to speak out.”

Mr Attwood: I thank the Alliance Party for bringing forward the motion today. I agree with Mr Dickson's comments in respect of the direction of travel of the Prime Minister and the new justice secretary in England. I will not be as casual as Mr McCausland when he said that this debate was overtaken by events, given the lack of references to the Human Rights Act in the Queen's Speech.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

Mr Dickson: The Member might not have caught up with the news today, but, at lunchtime, Number 10 recommitted the Prime Minister to breaking the link. He is determined to proceed.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Attwood: I was not aware of that, but it corroborates my point that we have not been overtaken by events. My view is that the reason why the Prime Minister might have made that comment today is that, in the fullness of time, on the eve of an in/out European Union referendum — and this party will vigorously campaign against withdrawal from the European Union — the British Prime Minister will trade a yes vote to stay in Europe for a no vote for the Human Rights Act. In order to bring dissident elements in the Tory party into line to try to get a possible yes vote over the line, he will throw other things into the negotiation to try to justify a yes vote. One of those things will be doing damage to the Human Rights Act.

As Members have outlined, at the heart of the Good Friday Agreement is a rights-based approach. As I have said endlessly in the Chamber and in other places, that is because, when our national conflict was fully evolved, it revolved around issues of law, order and justice.

On many occasions, the narrative of conflict on this island was informed and defined by disputes about issues of law, order and justice. The failure to have in place proper rights, provisions and standards fuelled and added to those disputes. That is why the wise authors of the Good Friday Agreement, in their interventions in respect of policing, justice, human rights and equality, created structures and architecture to mitigate and legislate against invasions of rights and protections in the future such as we had in the past. If, through the stated commitment that Mr Dickson has brought to my attention, the British Prime Minister will do damage to the Human Rights Act, let us be very clear: we are undoing and doing damage to the Good Friday Agreement; we are undoing and doing damage to the rights, the culture and the approach that are at the heart and centre of our new democracy and stability going forward; and we are doing damage to protecting people's rights.

Generally, the Human Rights Act is a sword to deploy against wrong, but it is also a shield to protect what is right. That is the essence of the Human Rights Act. When you cut through the fog that the British Prime Minister and others are trying to create, you see that it is something that protects the citizens of not just Northern Ireland and Britain but the rest of the island and far into the wider European context. It is a sword to deploy against the wrong, but it will be a shield to protect the right. We must never move away from all of that.

We want to go further. For all the strength of the Human Rights Act and the European Convention on Human Rights that it reflects, there are many more provisions. If, going forward, we are to have a rights-based approach on this island, especially in the northern part, we must consider the many other examples of international codes and conventions on the protection of human rights that have application to our society. When we were negotiating and implementing Patten and when the legislation was being passed in the House of Commons and the House of Lords, the code of ethics built into its architecture and into the new beginning to policing went beyond the European Convention on Human Rights. It was informed by the wider principles and provisions of UN conventions. Is anybody any less for the fact that our Police Service has a code of ethics that, when upheld, is to the benefit of each citizen and each community in the North? I think not. Those examples — there are many others — are good grounds for why, even at this late stage, we should look for a bill of rights, which was committed to in various agreements entered into by governments and parties heretofore. There is a further opportunity to build into the architecture of Northern Ireland a bill of rights relevant to the particular circumstances of here.

Mr Speaker, I agree with the comments made by various Members about what Mr Nelson McCausland said. When you review Hansard, I urge you to note that in his comments about members and former members of the CAJ, he named one person, he identified two others and he purported to visit on them various political allegiances as well as the allegiance of that organisation. If that is not a reason to name somebody in the Chamber, I do not know what is.

Mr Elliott: I welcome the opportunity to debate this important issue in the Chamber and, indeed, further afield, as I might have the opportunity to do in the days that lie ahead. When you hear some in the Chamber talking, you would think that the only reason why we have freedom today in this society is thanks to Brussels, the European Court or the European Convention on Human Rights. Even a cursory examination of the facts tells a totally different story. History tells us that the British people did not need a European-based Human Rights Act to guarantee their freedom and liberty. It was not the United Kingdom that witnessed the rise of the twin ideologies of communism and fascism in the first half of the 20th century. Rather, it was western Europe that fell under the sway of fascist dictators like Hitler, and Russia was conquered by Marxism. The political stability of the United Kingdom endured with a constitutional monarchy in which Governments were changed at the ballot box. People shunned divisive and destructive ideologies, and political freedoms remained protected by our own laws and courts.

3.45 pm

The European Convention on Human Rights was a post-war construct, a package of laws designed by nations, including the United Kingdom, that was aimed more at preventing continental Europeans from ever again going down the path to destruction and madness that those who had been prepared to follow the fascist leaders of the 1930s trod. By the end of the war, Europe was also aware of the cruelty and misery that accompanied communism, and the subsequent experience of the people of Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, to name but a few, bore that out. In other words, the European Convention on Human Rights was intended to guarantee basic rights that had been utterly usurped in western Europe during wartime and were being usurped in eastern Europe during a Cold War of peace by Soviets.

The 1998 Human Rights Act was introduced by Labour and put the European Convention on Human Rights into British law. It meant that people in the UK could bring cases about their human rights to domestic courts, but it also meant that the Strasbourg court became the final court of appeal for human rights cases. It was never intended to provide protection for criminals and terrorists, nor did the British people ever vote to give judges in Europe the power to overrule British laws and judicial decisions.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to give way.

Dr Farry: The Member is, to an extent, conflating the Human Rights Act with opposition to the European Convention on Human Rights. Given that the Ulster

Unionist Party has been keen to cite clauses of the convention in its submissions on parading, does he not feel that he is in danger of losing the point that his party is trying to make for its own political self-interest, never mind the good of the community as a whole?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Elliott: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I thank Mr Farry for his intervention. I am pleased that he is so concerned about the parading organisations in Northern Ireland. It is a pity he would not show more sympathy and respect for them when they are trying to exercise those basic human rights and have a peaceful and legitimate parade. Instead, he stands on ceremony, and some of his party colleagues try to stop some of those parades, which is unfortunate.

I noticed that his party colleague Mr Dickson cited a number of what he claimed to be positive examples from the European Convention on Human Rights. What about the like of the Qatada case, where the Home Office spent at least £1.7 million over eight years on trying to deport a man once accused of being Osama bin Laden's right-hand man in Europe and was repeatedly thwarted by human rights laws? Such cases are very negative, and the UK Government, with a British rights policy, should be able to bring them to a positive conclusion rather than being stalled by human rights law in Europe.

What was wrong with the Prime Minister's statement that:

"I want these decisions made by British judges in British courts, not in Strasbourg."

As far as I am concerned, that is quite a legitimate request. It is a legitimate position to take, and I support it. Why can the UK not have its own bill of rights instead of having to rely on Strasbourg and Brussels to that extent? I do not see the absolute basis of the Alliance proposals, and I will oppose them.

Mr D McIlveen: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. If I was to stand here and list all the reasons why I am proud and happy to reside in the United Kingdom, we would be here till late in the evening. However, in the top ten of my favourite things about being part of the United Kingdom is the fact that we are not bound by a written constitution in the way that other countries are.

All that we have to do is look west to the United States to see how destabilising to a national Government a written constitution can be. We have seen in recent days in the United States how they are sometimes tying themselves in knots over constitutional issues. I am glad that our forefathers in the United Kingdom established a system of government that is agile, flexible and able to move with the people.

Already, I think that the very core of the debate has been missed by some of the contributors. This is not a debate about human rights in the United Kingdom; this is a debate about a piece of legislation called the Human Rights Act, which, I believe many would argue, has failed to deliver what it was designed to do. We all know that the Act was brought in in 1998 by a massive majority Government in the United Kingdom that wanted to try to ensure that fewer cases were brought directly to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg and to try to deal with issues internally before it got to that stage. Whilst I am broadly supportive of that principle, this Act has failed to do that. The people who are arguing against any sort of a change in the Human Rights Act are, in my view, afraid. All that they are doing is admitting their fear of change and of making a piece of legislation that has not worked better. That is what this debate is ultimately about; it is what the debate at Westminster is about. It is about how we can make the human rights protections for people in the United Kingdom better. That is at the core of this argument.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: I gladly will.

Mr A Maginness: The Member says that the Human Rights Act has failed. In what respect has it failed? It has brought into British jurisprudence and here in Northern Ireland the values and the standards of the convention. That is what it has done, and it has been very successful in embedding itself in the jurisprudence of this jurisdiction.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr D McIlveen: I thank the Member for his intervention. In my view, it has failed in what it was ultimately set up to do, which was to try to ensure that fewer cases went to Strasbourg and that more were handled within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom. That is not the case because there are more cases now being handled by the European Court of Human Rights.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: I really am running a bit low on time. There are more cases now being brought to the European Court of Human Rights than when the Bill was introduced. That is the point that I am trying to make. That is why Westminster is now looking at this issue and saying that something has to change.

I support my colleague's contribution today, and we will be voting against this motion. Why are some Members concerned about how the existing Human Rights Act has been used? Why is there a suspicion in some sections of this House that the Human Rights Act and the legislation that has flowed from it have caused problems and are something that we should be concerned about? I think that the people who have been advocating on behalf of the Human Rights Act have a responsibility too. It is highly irresponsible to claim that human rights legislation and the equalities that are supposedly flowing from that should be used as a Trojan Horse to grind people down. That is a misuse of a particular piece of legislation.

When, under human rights legislation, a business in this country is taken to court, challenged and loses for failing to promote something that is not even legal in this jurisdiction, we have a serious problem. Human rights legislation is being used adversely and as a weapon against people. As Mr Elliott mentioned, on the issue of parading, human rights legislation has been used to trample down the human rights of other people, particularly in the community that I predominantly represent. Therefore, when human rights legislation has been used in such an erroneous way, and when a new Government come in and start to look at how it can be better and how trust can be regained in the human rights agenda, it is entirely unreasonable for people who have been using it as a weapon then to cry foul. Of course, on that basis, people are starting to look at the human rights legislation and say that something has to change because, in many cases, it has been used as a weapon to beat people. As Mr McCausland said this morning, when people have failed in their political objectives, they seek to railroad their opinion on other people through other objectives and in an undemocratic way. That is why we oppose the motion.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Beidh mé ag labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin seo. I will speak in favour of the motion tabled by the Alliance Party. It is fair to say that most people would have a degree of suspicion when a Government try to repeal, or propose to try to repeal, a very recent and significant piece of legislation. Mr Attwood, in his contribution this afternoon, gave us more food for thought with his scenario around the European referendum, which I think is worth considering.

The question that we should ask ourselves is why it was necessary, particularly in the context of an international treaty — the Good Friday Agreement — to have the Human Rights Act as part of it. When people start to examine the need for it, particularly in this state as we try to repair the damage and the lack of confidence in many of the institutions, particularly around policing and justice, it is only natural and understandable that people in Sinn Féin, supported by the SDLP and the Alliance Party, will do all that they can to ensure that the principles of the Good Friday Agreement will not be undermined and that the Human Rights Act will remain very much a part of the judicial process and, indeed, the justice process.

I found it strange, in the course of the debate, that Mr McIlveen talked about the virtues, although perhaps that should be “virtues”, of the British constitutional system. He said that if he had to list all those virtues, we would be here for the rest of the evening. That might be the case from his perspective, but he then went on to question why a Government, when elected with a large majority, bring in what they think to be a vital piece of legislation. That is one of the virtues of the British constitutional system: that Governments do that and do it for the right reasons. People can question it, but that is one of those virtues.

Other people commented on the performance of Nelson McCausland. It was very interesting that he did not make any particular point about either the strengths or weaknesses of the Human Rights Act; he seemed to attack the people who supported it and he listed some of them. He implied that, if you were once a member of the Communist Party of Ireland, you should not seem to have any opinion on human rights. In fact, if you have an opinion on human rights, it is detrimental to his position. Mr McCausland almost rebuked the British Prime Minister for daring to slow down the process of examining that legislation, yet I heard Jeffrey Donaldson say, on Radio Ulster, that it was at the intervention of the DUP that the British Prime Minister changed his mind. I am not sure whether Nelson and Jeffrey have had a discussion on that issue.

As to the need for and the desire to ensure that the Human Rights Act remains, there is the idea, underpinned by the Good Friday Agreement, of a rights-based approach. The British Prime Minister may have his reasons, and Mr Attwood outlined some view of that. However, when Tom Elliott was speaking, he said that Britain does not seem to have a need for the Human Rights Act. If that is the case, why fear it? If all the laws in Britain are so good and wholesome, why fear the Human Rights Act? The Human Rights Act only protects people who believe that their human rights are being undermined.

4.00 pm

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way. I did not say that they did not need a Human Rights Act; I was not speaking against it. I was merely saying that there were human rights in the United Kingdom long before there was intervention by Europe. I think that is bound to be broadly accepted. On your point about the control of policing or other aspects of life in Northern Ireland, you can still have that without being part of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McCartney: Thank you very much, a Cheann Comhairle. I suppose that is a fair enough point, but our view is that you strengthen rights and give people more protection. Why oppose it, therefore? It has been pointed out by many, many people in many, many avenues. I have heard people make different arguments here — unionists have used the European Convention to promote aspects of legislation that we were featuring here. You cannot take the view that it is good one day but so bad the next that we have to do away with it. Everybody in every piece of legislation has their favours and puts weight on it, and then some days they will not. The best way to ensure that a rights-based approach underpins all that we do in the Assembly is to have a Human Rights Act to assist that process.

Mr Givan: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. It was interesting that, in opening the debate, Mr Dickson failed to provide any proper examples; indeed, some of the arguments put forward I regard as entirely spurious. One was that, if Britain withdrew from the European Convention on Human Rights, Russia would somehow become non-compliant. They are already non-compliant; they are one of the primary states that flagrantly breach the European conventions and are consistently up before the European Court of Human Rights. There was also a point on policing, which Mr Elliott covered, about how the police would not be accountable for how they carried out their duties from a human rights perspective. That is simply not the case. As others have said, human rights did not just arrive in this jurisdiction through the Human Rights Act and the European Convention on Human Rights. Some of the arguments put forward have been questionable.

The main concern that I have with the Human Rights Act is that it allows the courts to subvert democracy in the United Kingdom. It openly invites judges to intervene and change laws in the United Kingdom, contrary to what at times is the democratic will not just of Parliament at Westminster but of the Assembly here. That has been recognised openly by Sir Declan Morgan. He said in a speech in 2012:

“in my jurisdiction the incorporation of significant elements of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law has caused a change in the relationship between the judiciary, the executive and the legislature.”

The relationship has been changed through the Human Rights Act, which allows the courts to look at convention rights and change the law. Any democrat would resist unelected, unaccountable judges being responsible to develop the law on issues of social policy — some of them very sensitive — crime and national security.

Why should we be subject to the judgements of a European court in Strasbourg giving prisoners the right to vote? In my constituency, I do not particularly want over 1,000 people in Maghaberry being given the right to vote. It would be enough to elect a councillor on the new council. Why should we be subject to those court judgements, when that court has ruled consistently against our ability to deport foreign nationals who have engaged in serious criminal activities? There are a host of judgements that do nothing to enhance what are proper human rights but instead have denigrated the human rights that are encapsulated in the European Convention.

In and of themselves, very few, I think, would be able to argue against those convention rights, but the court in Strasbourg has interpreted the convention as a living instrument and applied proportionality, so that somehow judges sit over society and say, "This is what I think is proportionate. This is what I think is more reflective of what a democratic society would want, and therefore I will make the ruling and make a change". That is a change that elected representatives, mandated by the people, should be responsible for making, irrespective of those decisions.

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that it is not simply a question of democratic deficit but of how the courts have taken on mission creep and that what has happened has gone beyond the original intentions?

Mr Givan: "Mission creep" sums it up very well in terms of what the 1998 Act has facilitated, brought in by the Labour Government.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: No, I will not. Mr Dickson said that he did not want the right-wing Conservatives and right-wing media being responsible for what human rights should be in the United Kingdom. It was OK when it was the left-wing liberals of the Labour Party and the Lib Dems, his sister party, at Westminster. It was OK for them to make such a sweeping change in the law, but it is not OK for those of us who value democracy being responsible for those decisions.

I am opposed to the 1967 Act that Westminster legislated for, but at least it was democratically elected people who brought the change in; it was not the judges or the courts. I am opposed to other things that have been brought in, like gay marriage in the rest of the United Kingdom, but at least it was through the democratic process that it happened; it was not some cultural warrior wearing a wig in a courthouse who brought in the changes. That is what the Human Rights Act facilitates in the European Convention on Human Rights — changing sensitive social policy issues that should be for the House to decide on.

The European courts have allowed terrorist foreign nationals to remain in the United Kingdom when they should have been deported. Why? Well, the view is that it is their right to a private life and family life, the family life that actually allows prisoners to engage in creating families through artificial insemination. In a 2007 Strasbourg court judgement, that is what was facilitated for prisoners. Seriously, I appeal to Members: democrats should take back control of those decisions. We should not allow the subverting of democracy that has been engaged in by some members of our judiciary and happily facilitated by other so-called democrats who cannot get their way through this House or at Westminster to make changes but are happy for a judge to do it.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. When you review the comments of Mr McCausland, will you also review the last comments of the Member who just spoke? He referred to current members of the judiciary subverting our democracy.

Mr Speaker: I will take a look at it when I am considering the other remarks.

Mr Givan: Let me finish with a quotation from the Home Secretary, Theresa May:

"the law in this country is made by the elected representatives of the people in Parliament. And our democracy is subverted when judges decide to take on that role for themselves."

Mr A Maginness: On the point that Mr Givan has raised in relation to judicial activism, that is common to all jurisdictions. Go to the United States, Canada, any continental country or Dublin, and you will see that judicial activism in one shape or form takes place. That is the reality of any democratic society. The courts play a role where the law is being interpreted. It is a fact of life, and as politicians we have to accommodate that.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, sure.

Dr Farry: Does the Member agree that democracy should not be conflated with simple majoritarian rule? Democracy is not only about elected representatives making decisions but about having courts to uphold people's rights. Human rights and the rule of law are also cornerstones of democracy in the widest sense of the concept.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr A Maginness: Yes, I accept that. It is a much wider concept than simply majoritarian rule, as we know here to our cost.

The fact is that we are trying to develop a system here where government is based on consensus. It is not working terribly well, I have to say, but, nonetheless, that is and should be our aim, and it is certainly the aim under the Good Friday Agreement. The Good Friday Agreement called for the convention rights to, effectively, be integrated into our legal system and into our courts.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. Mr Givan made the point about the number of pieces of law that came into effect because of democracy.

Given that the Good Friday Agreement, which, admittedly, his party does not support, was endorsed by the majority of people in Northern Ireland and in Ireland as a whole and introduced the Human Rights Act into Northern Ireland, should we not defend it on behalf of our people?

Mr A Maginness: Well, yes. I accept the generality of the point, although it did not actually introduce the Human Rights Act per se: that was coterminous with the Good Friday Agreement. If there had been no Human Rights Act on its way through Parliament at that stage, it would have had to be legislated for. I would remind people that also promised in the Good Friday Agreement was a bill of rights for Northern Ireland, which was supplementary to the convention rights that came into being here as a result of the Human Rights Act.

The Human Rights Act was a great achievement by Tony Blair and his Government. It is very important. It has embedded convention rights. Mr McIlveen is absolutely right that it was a deliberate attempt to bring convention rights into British courts. That was the right thing to do. In fact, it is so embedded now that there is no way, even if you were to repeal the Human Rights Act tomorrow, that you would change the jurisprudence now, which is human rights-based and convention-rights based. It is just simply inconceivable that you could do that. That is the way judges and lawyers think. There is no way in which you can remove that from our jurisprudence, whether in London or in Belfast. You just cannot do that. That is a fact of life. If you do not believe me, read what the former Attorney General Dominic Grieve said. He said that the Act is "well embedded". Further to that, he said that it is well embedded in the constitutional settlements that underpin devolution throughout the UK, making it difficult to do anything against the wishes of the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish Governments. What the Tory Government are presently attempting to do is wrongheaded because it will not work. It cannot work. It certainly cannot work without the consent of the various constituent parts or devolved Assemblies throughout the UK.

The further point that one has to make is this: if you were to repeal the Human Rights Act, the convention rights still stand because Britain, the UK, is part and parcel of the European Convention. It is a treaty member. It has a solemn obligation to carry out and obey the values and what has been laid out in the convention. It is the duty of the Westminster Government to do that unless the British Government withdraw completely from the European Convention. It is inconceivable for a leading country in Europe, indeed throughout the world, to withdraw from the convention. It is just absolutely inconceivable and is something which, in effect, is nonsense.

Indeed, people have said that the reason why the repeal of the Human Rights Act was put into the Conservative Party manifesto was simply as a last-minute attraction to those people who traditionally supported the Conservatives but were not quite supportive enough —

Mr Speaker: Thank you.

Mr A Maginness: Sorry: I will finish there.

Mr Weir: I am glad that Mr Maginness is not infringing on our human rights by carrying on beyond his allotted time. [Laughter.] I find myself agreeing with him on one point at least. Like a stopped clock, it may be that we agree twice a day. On his last point —

Mr A Maginness: Just be careful what you agree with.

Mr Weir: Well, I am sure that you will have no problem with what I agree with, which is the motivation behind the Conservatives' pledge in their manifesto. I suspect that it was to create a sort of UKIP-lite appeal. Clearly, it is difficult to know the cause and effect, but the Conservative manifesto ended up getting 331 Conservatives elected while one was elected from UKIP. Whatever the large volume of votes there was for UKIP, it seemed to have a degree of success. If I were being cynical, I suspect that the Conservatives perhaps believed that they would be forced into some form of situation in which there was a coalition Government and they wanted to have various things that they could jettison to show that they were willing to accommodate, most probably, the Liberal Democrats.

4.15 pm

I appreciate that the movers of the motion tabled it well before the Queen's Speech, so they cannot be held guilty on that point. However, to some extent, the motion has been overtaken by events. It is undoubtedly the case, I think wrongly, that David Cameron is rowing away from this faster than the Coleraine rowing team that competed for Great Britain in the European rowing cup at the weekend. There is no doubt that he intends to abandon this and, hence, we saw the watering down of the commitment in the Queen's Speech. To some extent, the motion has become irrelevant. Like Don Quixote, we are tilting at windmills if we see it as a central point.

There is a degree of revisionism as well. To be fair to Mr Maginness, he, at least, slightly corrected that impression. The concept that the Human Rights Act 1998 was in some way central either to the Good Friday Agreement or to its passage by way of referendum is a high level of revisionist history. As indicated, the Human Rights Act was a pledge of the Blair Government in 1997. Irrespective of whether there was an agreement in Northern Ireland, a UK-wide Human Rights Act that would incorporate that into domestic law would have happened, and it was not, in that sense, a deal-breaker. As somebody who, for past transgressions, was involved in the negotiations on the Good Friday Agreement, I know that it was not a central element. Those of us with long enough memories know that, for anybody you spoke to at the time of the agreement, whatever side they voted on, prisoner releases, decommissioning, the formation of Government and the reform of the police were the key elements. I do not remember meeting anybody in the street during that period who said that the incorporation of the Human Rights Act was a key element of the agreement, but perhaps I move in different circles than some in the House.

Principally, the reason why I oppose the motion is, as highlighted by Mr Givan, a concern about judicial activism and its pushing of the boundaries. There is a degree of mission creep. As indicated, the courts always have to interpret the law and there is obviously, therefore, a balance to be struck. However, within a democratic society, I am concerned that we are moving in the wrong direction. There has to be a greater level of democratic accountability, and, to some extent, the courts see it as their role more and more, and above the democratic decision, to enforce what they see to be right. That is a danger in any democratic society. It is more dangerous when that judicial intervention comes from outside the democratic framework and is therefore not accountable. We are in a situation in which it is not simply British judges or even judges in Northern Ireland who are reaching particular decisions. The European Court is also taking part.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Weir: I will give way briefly.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he not accept that the judges are making their rulings and decisions based on laws that were created through democratic processes? They are making those decisions in the context of democratic laws.

Mr Weir: No, I do not accept that. They have gone beyond their remit in many cases.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Weir: We have seen, particularly in the European Court, mention being made of prisoner rights. I suspect that, if somebody was elected from Maghaberry, they may have a little bit of difficulty attending council meetings in the new Lisburn and Castlereagh City Council, even with the modern technology of video links.

Nevertheless, there has been a degree of mission creep. If you were to go back far enough, I suspect that, among those who helped to set it up, the likes of Churchill would be spinning in his grave at the prospect. It goes beyond that. The United Kingdom and, before that, its constituent parts have a long history. If we were simply talking about abandoning the Human Rights Act and having no human rights protection at all, I would probably support the motion, but we are not. We are talking about putting in a British Human Rights Act, an Act that would build on the long tradition of the British Parliament. This year is the 800th anniversary of Magna Carta, and there has been a movement from that, traditionally through an unwritten constitution and various Acts of Parliament. Those are the protections that we have in place, and I would like us to be dependent on those rather than the Human Rights Act. For all those reasons, I urge people to reject the motion.

Mr Allister: I detect among those who support the motion a considerable degree of muddle and misrepresentation of the situation. I do not think that anyone who is opposed to the present Human Rights Act is opposed to the existence of human rights. Indeed, I would have thought that each one of the rights that the convention adumbrates — the right to life, the right to family life, the right to freedom of expression — are rights that we all cherish and that, in any British bill of rights, we would expect to see enshrined in law. That is not the issue with the Human Rights Act; the issue is that it makes us, in the interpretation of that, subservient to the often politically motivated decision-making of a foreign tribunal. That is the problem.

The problem with the Human Rights Act is, in essence, summed up in sections 2 and 3. Section 2 makes it clear that, when it comes to interpreting the Act and any of the convention rights, any court in the United Kingdom must take into account not just the judgements of the European Court of Human Rights but even the opinions of the European Commission on Human Rights. Anyone who knows anything about European jurisprudence will know that the commission throws the ball as high as it can in all these cases, yet here we have legislation that says that, in adjudicating in our own courts, we must take into account even the opinions of the activist agenda promoted by the European Commission on Human Rights. Section 3, in similar terms, indicates that all our legislation must be interpreted in a manner compatible with the convention rights. This is the nub of the issue.

Mr Givan put his finger on it when he said that the problem is not the rights: the problem is the aggressive activist agenda of the European Court of Human Rights in interpreting those rights and in forever pushing the boundaries and substituting itself as the lawmaker and implementing in the law that which never would have a mandate from those who are supposed to be the lawmakers. That is the problem. It was rather neatly summed up by a comment from the current British judge on the European Court of Human Rights, a renowned Eurocrat, who said:

“the open textured language and the structure of the Convention leave the Court significant opportunities for choice in interpretation; and in exercising that choice, particularly when faced with changed circumstances and attitudes in society, the Court makes new law.”

That is the nub of the issue. New law should be made primarily and in the main by Parliament and by Assemblies, not by the European Court of Human Rights sitting in Strasbourg. It is the pushing of that activist agenda and that judicial activism that are the real problem. That is why the Government, if it is their view, would be right to abandon the structure of the current Human Rights Act in order to liberate the United Kingdom, its Parliament and its courts from the constraints imposed by that judicial activism from Strasbourg. That is why it is right to aspire to re-establishing the sovereignty of the United Kingdom in making and interpreting its own laws. That is what those who oppose the motion aspire to. That is not an irrational position to take, nor is it an anti-human rights position. It is very much compatible with human rights, and that is certainly the position that I take. I find it rather nauseating to be lectured in the debate by some Sinn Féin Members —

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Allister: — who piously quoted those remarks. I remind the House that, when the Provos came for the security forces —

Mr Speaker: Thank you. The Member's time is up.

Mr Allister: — they were silent. When they came for the drug dealers, they were silent.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I call Mr Steven Agnew.

Mr Allister: When they came for the informers, they were silent. Enough said.

Mr Speaker: Mr Agnew, I have one other name on the speaking list. I cannot award you the normal extra minute if you take an intervention.

Mr Agnew: OK. Thank you, Mr Speaker.

Tom Elliott gave me the strongest argument to support the motion. When he talked about the origin of the European Convention on Human Rights in the Second World War, he said, “It wasn't us who had a problem. We had human rights. We had rights in Britain. We've a proud tradition of human rights. It was those other countries in Europe that had the problem”. What better reason is there to spread the values of Britishness that Mr Elliott is proud of — indeed, I am proud of them as well — across the rest of Europe? The conflict that we saw was because of the lack of common international agreement. We took those values for granted here, but other countries had to be brought to the table. We still see Europe doing it with countries such as Turkey, which is looking to join the EU. There is a requirement to bring it to the table on human rights. What stronger reason can there be for a collectivist agenda for human rights?

The clue is in the name: human rights. They are not British, Irish, German or French rights; they are human rights. They recognise the common values, needs and protections that we all require, regardless of borders or where we happen to have been born. Those are the values that we should protect. They are the reason why we should be proud, at times, to cede some power; in return, there will be collective agreement that no citizen in Europe should live without the most basic protections for humanity.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way briefly.

Mr Givan: Is it the protection of the victims who suffer persecution that we are all interested in, or is it the rights of foreign nationals engaged in terrorism or to give prisoners more rights? That is what has been happening through the European courts.

Mr Agnew: In his speech, Mr Givan talked about deportation as if, somehow, that in itself deals with the problem. Of course, that just says, "Well, it's not our problem any more. We can export the problem". It is about having a collectivist approach to work together. If we stand alone, we are lesser. The Little Britain approach espoused by UKIP and being supported by others today actually weakens Britain. It may give us more powers over some of the issues outlined to make the decisions within a UK context, but, on the international stage, we make ourselves irrelevant. We go it alone and stand alone, and we would be the weaker for it.

The irony in some of what is being said is that the repeal of the Human Rights Act would not exclude the UK from the remit of the European Court of Human Rights. The effect would simply be that we could not take such cases in the UK. The irony is that those who seek to repatriate powers would actually be saying, "Our courts will not deal with these cases. Our citizens will have to go to Strasbourg or Europe". They would be given no recourse to justice under human rights law in the UK. In terms of a British —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will not give way. I have only one minute.

The other problem is that the Tories have not outlined which rights they wish to take away from us. This is clearly not about strengthening our rights. There is nothing to stop the UK Government giving their citizens additional rights over and above those given to other citizens in Europe. Will they tell us which rights they wish the people of the UK not to have that their European neighbours have?

Why does Mr Cameron believe that we should have lesser protections than our European neighbours? Why does he feel that such protections should not apply to all our citizens?

For those reasons and for the benefit of humanity, including the people of the United Kingdom, I believe that we must keep the Human Rights Act.

4.30 pm

Mr B McCrea: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I appreciate the efforts that you have made to let me speak. I will say at the outset that I spent five years as chair of the Policing Board's human rights and professional standards committee. During that time, I got to look at a number of really interesting issues from a human rights perspective, guided by one Keir Starmer. There were interesting debates, including on the introduction of the taser, which not everybody agreed with, and changes to stop-and-search powers, which not everybody agreed with. I got to understand how the human rights legislation framework works, which is why I am a big advocate for it.

When I listened to the speeches today, one of the issues that disturbed me a little is that human rights terminology has got itself a really bad name, much of it not justified. Look at the number of cases that actually come before the Court of Human Rights. Of the 2,082 complaints against the United Kingdom last year, the court rejected 2,047. It found no violation in 23 and upheld just 12, which is 0.6%.

Mr Givan made what I thought was a most appalling speech. Heaven help us if we ever live in a country where Mr Givan has the say-so about what happens. I actually think that there is no better testimony for why we need a Human Rights Act than what Mr Givan said. Let me deal with the issue that he brought up about prisoners not being allowed to vote. The court did not say that every prisoner should or should not be allowed to vote. What it talked about was proportionality. If you are in prison for only six months, should you be allowed to vote or not? Of course it is different if you are in there for 30 years. In the democratic mandate that he wants to fight it —

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: No, I will not let you come in because you would not let me in. If you cannot have a debate, do not try to interject. This is a democracy, and I will have my say.

Mr Speaker: I remind you not to point across the Chamber. Address each other with respect. Thank you.

Mr B McCrea: What the court does say though, for example, is that a blanket voting ban on every single prisoner is not consistent with the convention by which Britain is legally bound. Interestingly, that is a view that a parliamentary Joint Committee emphatically endorsed last week when it said:

"The Government has failed to advance a plausible case."

It is when you get down to the nitty-gritty and understand the whole issue of human rights that you get sensible decisions. I really do believe in a separation between the judiciary and the legislators. I think that it is right that you should legislate, but the reason why I oppose mandatory sentences in almost every case that comes through here is that, when you look at individual cases, you see that there is always something else to be taken into consideration. We should support the judiciary. The judiciary should be independent. The judiciary should not be beholden to legislators in the way that Mr Givan thinks that it should be. I have to say that this place will be a much worse place if we get political interference in the courts.

We talk here about whether human rights affect us. They affect all of us. What is the problem with defending the right to life, the right to a private life, the right to free assembly, the right to a fair trial or the right to legal representation? What difference is a British judge going to make to a European judge? Let me conclude by saying that this is not Europe imposing its views on us. This is Britain imposing its values and principles on Europe. It was borne out of the atrocities of the Holocaust; it was borne out of states that do not have our 300 years; it is something that we gave to Europe and the world, and we should support it.

Dr Farry: Today should be an opportunity for the Assembly to unite and, indeed, to send a very strong message to the UK Government. The message is one of particular significance, coming from a devolved Assembly. I suppose that the jury is still out on exactly how the Assembly will vote in a few minutes' time. While we note that the item has been dropped from the Queen's Speech, that there will not be an immediate rush to legislation and that there is a fresh commitment to consult, I do not think that there should be any room for complacency, because the Prime Minister is clear that this is an issue that they intend to address by one means or another during the course of this Parliament. To be ever so slightly optimistic, I think that there may be some appreciation of the complexity of what they are presenting, of the fact that they have not thought through properly what they are committed to, of all the implications that will flow from it, and of the difficulty, as Mr Maginness outlined, of, if you wanted to do so, disentangling yourself from the jurisprudence in case law that has been built up over the intervening 17 years.

There is a number of core themes and, probably, three arguments in relation to the motion. The first is that the repeal of the Human Rights Act and its replacement with a so-called British bill of rights is something that is wrong for the UK as a whole. We should be clear in saying that. It will mark a regression on human rights; it will risk clouding the commitment of the UK to the European Convention; and, indeed, it may be part of a slippery slope where the UK attempts to withdraw from the Council of Europe and from the convention itself. We will see a weakening of enforcement mechanisms in relation to the domestic route for human rights, and it may mark a return to the status quo ante that some of us may recall before the Human Rights Act, when people had to go directly to the European Court for redress for their human rights abuses. That process was very lengthy, very costly and, indeed, very selective. I am not sure that that is entirely something that we should be aspiring to as a society.

The Human Rights Act allows the courts to challenge primary legislation and, indeed, to overturn secondary legislation. I do not think that we should see that as a threat in any shape or form. The Act also allows the courts to take into account judgements of the European Court. Again, we should not see that as a threat. It is also worth stressing that the convention and, as a consequence, the Human Rights Act, is a framework of rights. Very few rights, in themselves, are absolutes, and, in most cases where rights are cited, balance and proportionality have to be applied to the situation.

I come from the perspective that rights are natural and universal. Through conventions, we recognise rights and ensure that they can be enforced, but those documents were written at a particular time and in a particular context. Very few people who were around in 1950, when the European Convention was being put together, would have envisaged the range of social, economic and political issues that governments and citizens around the world are confronted with today. The world moves on, and the way in which conventions and, indeed, domestic bills of rights, are interpreted changes as well. That is a perfectly natural process and part of a democratic process.

There is also a danger that we will send a very damaging message around the world and, indeed, to Europe, in particular, especially in the context where, regrettably, human rights continue to be contested and unsecured in some societies.

There is also a very direct implication for Northern Ireland, given our circumstances with continued divisions and the legacy of our troubled past. There are particular commitments in the Good Friday Agreement that we need to be extremely mindful of as an Assembly. We also have to bear in mind the particular implications for the new beginning for policing. I see that the DUP has entirely deserted the Chamber. However, it is worth stressing that the rather silly argument was made that, if we do not have the Human Rights Act, the police will not, all of a sudden, start breaching human rights. Of course, that will not be the case. The important point that has been lost is that the presence of the Human Rights Act and the human rights approach to policing is a very important confidence-building measure in the new beginning. That is the relevance of the point. It is not a comment on the police or, indeed, their intention, if they did not have this safeguard behind them.

It is worth referencing the commitment in the agreement:

"The British Government will complete incorporation into Northern Ireland law of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), with direct access to the courts, and remedies for breach of the Convention, including power for the courts to overrule Assembly legislation on grounds of inconsistency."

I am glad that Mr Weir has now joined us. He may dismiss the importance of bill of rights considerations at the time of the Good Friday Agreement itself, but it is important to recall that, over the 20 years prior to the agreement, when people were talking about the potential for a settlement in Northern Ireland, a bill of rights for Northern Ireland or indeed a bill of rights for the UK as a whole was always at the cornerstone of those discussions. It was not a bolt-on at the last minute in the agreement; it was recognised by many parties as being of absolute core importance.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way on that point?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Weir: I appreciate the point that the Member has made. The contribution that we have made is to say that what is being at least nominally proposed by the Conservative Government, if taken at its height, would actually be a British bill of rights. It is not saying that there should not be any form of rights or that there should not be any human rights protection. It is specifically as regards the incorporation of the European Convention. Indeed, as Mr Allister indicated, the issue is the idea of foreign judges essentially dictating what happens within the sovereign territory of the United Kingdom.

Dr Farry: The Good Friday Agreement itself is very clear on the issue. It is about the European Convention being directly enforceable through local courts and the power to challenge legislation. There is no ambiguity in that regard. There is a separate debate — I recognise that it is entirely separate — on whether we should build on the European Convention through a further Northern Ireland bill of rights. No doubt, we can return to that at another stage, but it is not the direct item for discussion today.

My colleague Stewart Dickson set out the context of the debate and cited important case studies. It is worth putting it again on the record that those were not about situations where human rights were being abused by criminals and terrorists, given the narrative that primarily comes from a certain quarter of the House.

Nelson McCausland got rather tied up in the issue around the CAJ. Without going into too much of that, it is worth putting it on record that, if there was a comment about the inappropriateness of a British bill of rights, it was not, as the Members may seek to suggest, because of an objection to the concept of Britishness; it was a comment about regression away from having a Human Rights Act and enforceable European standards in domestic law. That was the context in which that point was made.

Like others, I was disappointed by the contribution from Tom Elliott, who, very quickly, seems to want to throw his lot in with the Conservative Government. I am also concerned that, given the clear commitments in the agreement, the Ulster Unionist Party now seems to have completely abandoned all the commitments that it made back in 1998. Again, there seemed to have been a bit of confusion between the Human Rights Act and the European Convention itself. I reiterate the point that a number of parties in the Chamber have made great play of citing the European Convention when they are proposing reforms in relation to the contentious issue of parading. When it suits people, when they have a particular political issue to pursue, they are very happy to cite the Human Rights Act and the European Convention.

Let me clarify for Mr McIlveen that the Ashers case that he cited is primarily an issue in relation to domestic equality law. In the context of wider human rights legislation, it was not primarily a human rights case that was taken. Again, he talked about a written constitution: an important element of a written constitution is checks and balances. It is not about pure majoritarianism.

Mr Givan's comments were very disappointing. He talked about courts subverting democracy, entirely missing the point that democracy is not simply about majoritarianism and what happens in legislatures; it is also about the rule of law, human rights and the role of the courts. The courts are part and parcel of democracy. They are not someone outside democracy who comments on what happens; they are an integral part of the democratic process.

Again, I stress to Mr Weir that the legacy in terms of discussions around bills of rights and how central they have been to the political discourse in Northern Ireland goes back, I think, to Sheila Murnaghan, who first introduced the issue into the predecessor of this Assembly in the 1960s. The issue has been well discussed for over 50 years. We need to be careful in throwing out that issue.

Finally, I come to the comments made by Mr Allister, which were essentially about putting national sovereignty first. Mr Agnew adequately addressed those points when he said that this is about a wider international and European context. We should be a beacon for the rest of the world and set extremely high standards. We all benefit from those high common standards being applied across the piece.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 2 June 2015

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Ministerial Statement

North/South Ministerial Council: Environment

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, I wish to make the following statement on the nineteenth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in environment sectoral format, which was held in Armagh on Wednesday 13 May. The statement has been agreed with Minister Kennedy who, along with me, represented the Northern Ireland Executive. I chaired the meeting. The Irish Government were represented by Ann Phelan TD, Minister of State at the Department of the Environment, Community and Local Government (DECLG).

Ministers had a discussion on the review of the agreed NSMC work programme for the environment sector and noted that an interim update will be provided to the 5 June 2015 NSMC plenary meeting. They also agreed that an update paper on the matter will be brought to the next NSMC environment meeting. Ministers also agreed that collaboration on the drawdown of EU funding for environmental projects and research will continue to be a high priority.

The Council noted that the first phase of the air quality research study has been completed and that the key findings have been noted by Ministers. The interim report was shared with a group of key stakeholders, and that will inform the next phase of the study. A copy of the interim report has been placed in the Assembly Library.

Ministers noted the establishment across both jurisdictions of a collaborative evidence programme known as ShARE, enabling stakeholders to deliver evidence to underpin their activities as regulators to derive maximum benefit from the funding and resources invested.

The Council noted that the all-island research project into the environmental impacts of unconventional gas exploration and extraction is ongoing.

Ministers noted that a joint €72 million INTERREG VA programme has been adopted by the EU Commission covering the terrestrial, freshwater and marine environments. The Council noted that the EU Commission announced the opening of the LIFE 2015 programme on 1 June 2015 and, in preparation for its launch, potential applicants to the programme from both jurisdictions attended the LIFE application training course in Dublin.

They also noted that the official launch of the Northern Ireland Horizon 2020 strategy took place on 31 March 2015 at the Commission's offices in Belfast and that the cross-border roadshow event on the Horizon 2020 societal challenge 5 programme was held at the end of May 2015.

The Council noted that the carrier bag levy, introduced on new single-use carrier bags by the Department of the Environment on 8 April 2013, was extended on 19 January 2015 to low-cost reusable carrier bags. Ministers welcomed the introduction of the Food Waste Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015, which were made on 22 January 2015 and will restrict the amount of food waste being landfilled.

The Council noted that the DOE consultation on a quality action plan for recycling, which incorporates proposals for a material recovery facility code of practice, closed on 6 March 2015. Ministers noted the proposed reform of waste enforcement and the establishment of three lead authorities for waste enforcement in Ireland.

Ministers also noted the proposed regulatory changes to be introduced by the Department of the Environment, Community and Local Government to provide for regulatory controls on type 8 plants and the successful coexistence of those and composting plants in the overall waste treatment infrastructure in Ireland. The Council noted the intention of the Minister for the Environment, Community and Local Government to introduce a full producer responsibility initiative for tyres and waste tyres. It also noted that DOE officials are working with DECLG officials and that that will assist the DOE in considering the desirability and feasibility of introducing similar proposals in the North.

The Council noted that two illegal waste landfill sites will be addressed in the repatriation programme during 2015. It also noted that both Environment Ministers and their Departments are continuing to target resources at joint enforcement action against illegal operators, which includes the exchanging of intelligence and information on problem areas and carrying out coordinated inspections.

Ministers expressed continuing concern at the impact of fuel laundering and stressed the importance of closer cooperation between agencies to tackle the issue. They agreed that relevant officials would provide an overview of the issues at the next environment NSMC meeting.

Ministers welcomed the publication in Northern Ireland of the consultation documents on new draft river basin management plans (RBMPs). The Council noted that the consultation on the timetable and work programme for the development of the second-cycle RBMPs in Ireland closed on 31 January 2015 and that the responses are being considered.

Ministers also welcomed the continued cross-border collaborative work on the development of the river trusts, including the provision of funding by Ireland to the Rivers Trust organisation in Northern Ireland to assist with the development of river trusts in Ireland, including the development of a new cross-border river trust in Inishowen in County Donegal.

The Council noted that DECLG has given its support, in principle, to a DOE proposal to seek INTERREG funding for a cross-border pilot initiative to provide electronic signs that give real-time data on bathing water quality in certain designated bathing areas. The Council also noted the initial engagement between DRD and DECLG to discuss areas in the water sector that offer opportunities for mutual cooperation.

Ministers welcomed the continued coordination on the Clean Coast and Coast Care schemes and noted the success of the symposium that was held in November and involved representatives from both jurisdictions. The Council noted that the 2015 awards for beaches in each jurisdiction were announced in May 2015.

It was agreed to hold the next environment meeting in autumn 2015.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I thank the Minister for his very comprehensive statement. I am very pleased to hear of the many issues that were discussed. Certainly, there are very good opportunities for cooperation and collaboration between the two jurisdictions. Will the Minister outline some of the key findings of the interim report on the air quality research study? Moreover, when will the final report come out? Does he anticipate any legislative changes coming from the recommendations?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Ms Lo, Chair of the Environment Committee, for her question. The research that the Member referred to is still under way, and the interim report marks the end of just the first phase of the research. The interim report, which is available in the Assembly Library, sets out the context of the study and presents information on air pollutant emissions, health impacts, the fuel market, fuel poverty and measures that have been used in other member states to address the problem of air pollution from households burning solid fuels. Much of this information is already available in the public domain, and it was indeed the subject of a debate here several months ago. I will be presenting the key findings of the study once the second phase has been completed and a final report produced. I very much expect that to be later this year. I do not want to pre-empt the outcome of the second phase by predicting whether legislation will be required, but, in her capacity as Chair of the Environment Committee, the Member will certainly be kept abreast of proceedings.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his full statement this morning on many issues, and I welcome the introduction of the food waste regulations. What is his Department doing by way of working with the 11 new super-councils to ensure that all the bio waste that can possibly be collected is collected for recycling across Northern Ireland?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Deputy Chair of the Committee for her question. It is very important that the Department work in collaboration with the 11 councils. I addressed this issue in a previous Question Time to another Member. It is important that there is consistency across the new councils. I suppose that that has proven difficult where you have an amalgamation and a reduction from 26 to 11, where councils with different practices and policies are being stuck together.

Currently, there are three waste management partnerships in the North. We have Arc21, with which the Member is very familiar, the Southern Waste Management Plan (SWaMP2008) and the North West Region Waste Management Group. I have gone on public record to say that I believe that we should have one management group or one overseeing body dealing with waste management right across the North, and I believe that that would lead to greater consistency across all the councils.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. Is the Minister at liberty to pinpoint the location of the two illegal waste landfill sites, which are to be addressed in this calendar year? Can he also outline the scale of the problem at both locations?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. I am at liberty to disclose the locations of these sites; unfortunately, however, I do not have the detail right here. It is, as usual, along the border. I will certainly get the exact locations to the Member before the close of play today.

In total, 17 sites have been identified, with an estimated total of 273,000 tons of waste to be removed or repatriated from North to South. A total of 10 of those sites have been completed thus far, and, this year, we hope to do sites 11 and 12.

Due to budgetary constraints, I suppose, they have gone for the low-hanging fruit, so, of those 17 sites, it is safe to say that the 10 that have been cleared so far are those that present the least problem. However, it is important that those two sites be cleared this year, which will leave five sites remaining, and that we work together to ensure that they are repatriated on schedule by 2017.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his detailed and worthwhile report on the environment and environmental issues. I note in the report a reference to the drawdown of EU funding and a commitment to collaborate. Will the Minister enlarge on that and indicate whether there is match funding between North and South for European funding? Is there any further development that might be useful in dealing with a wide range of environmental issues that affect us both North and South?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. There is, indeed, a good degree of collaboration between North and South in the drawdown of European funding. There is a variety of reasons why there has been a lower overall drawdown of competitive EU funding here than in the South. That is why it is important that we work with them and learn from them.

First, as a member state, Ireland has direct access to more opportunities for engagement in Europe, and, while much of that is now offset by European task force structures, formally the Barroso task force, differences remain. I referred to the largest funding source, Horizon 2020, which totals about £80 billion across the EU. Some 70% of drawdown is by higher education or university establishments. Unfortunately, we do not have too many of those here — some might say that we do not have enough. In addition, here in the North, we have a limited number of companies that engage in R&D. There were only 535 here last year. For the majority of the other funding programmes, drawdown has to be match-funded, so a project proposer must be able to provide a percentage contribution — up to 45% — from its own resources.

On the positive side, my Department is funding the Northern Ireland contact point for Societal Challenge 5 in the Horizon 2020 programme, which includes climate action; environment; resource efficiency; and raw materials. My Department has also provided limited support to a small number of projects, but, given the current financial situation, I am unable to commit to any new funding. That again underlines the importance of working with companies and with other jurisdictions in order to maximise the funding that we can draw down from other sources; notably, in this instance, Europe.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his statement. It was pleasing to see that the interim air quality report has been completed. Considering that 42% of households in Northern Ireland are in fuel poverty, does the Minister still agree with me that the banning of certain types of coal and other solid fuels may exacerbate the problem? Can the Minister inform us how he plans to engage with the industry?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for the question. As I said, that was the subject of a debate here a few months ago during which many Members raised the issue of fuel poverty. The interim report, as well as being placed in the Assembly Library, has been shared with relevant stakeholders, including people working on fuel poverty and some representatives of the industry.

I share the Member's fears about the potential impact of a ban on certain household fuels; however, it is imperative that we see what the next phase of the study brings and that, should any change be required, it is managed in a sensitive and sensible manner.

Mr Middleton: I welcome the statement from the Minister. Can he give any indication of the long-term costs associated with illegal waste at the Mobuoy site in Campsie and what action he is taking to recover the costs from the perpetrators?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. There was an earlier question on waste that had been illegally disposed. The Member's question refers to a well-publicised site in our constituency. I am firmly of the opinion that the polluter should pay. Unfortunately, to date, the polluter has not paid. The taxpayer has paid, through my Department. Indeed, to date, in the region of £1 million has been spent on managing the waste deposited at that site. An eye-watering figure of over £50 million for the total clean-up was put out there, most notably in the Mills report, although that would involve removing all the waste from the site. A range of options is currently being looked at by the Department and the Northern Ireland Environment Agency, with the help of external experts, to manage the waste on the site in a way that will represent least risk to the environment and best value for the taxpayer.

Mr Rogers: I also thank the Minister for his statement and welcome the ongoing cooperation between North and South, particularly on the movement of waste and fuel laundering. What areas will be considered by the Department in the review of the North/South programme?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. It is important that we keep the work programme under almost constant review. DOE is considering, for example, extended scope for discussions and joint working in current NSMC work programme activities on important topics such as habitat and species protection, biodiversity and climate change. DRD, as I indicated in my statement, has also advised that opportunities do and will exist for collaboration in the area of water and sewerage services.

Mr Campbell: Hopefully, the Minister will not have a marathon session to cover today, as I understand he successfully concluded one the other day. He will be aware of the number of fuel laundering plants that have been uncovered, and there is an emerging perception that fuel launderers simply wait until the fuel has got into the ground and then report it to the authorities. In other words, they get a clean-up done at no cost to them and a cost to the taxpayer. What is he doing to ensure that is clamped down on and ceases to be the standard procedure for fuel launderers?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. I, too, hope that we are not here for a marathon session. However, having had a brief look over the Justice Bill, I would not be surprised if we all are. It might be more painful than the marathon I completed on Sunday.

Fuel laundering is a huge issue. It causes not only great damage to our environment but to our economy, and it costs an awful lot of money to clean up. Over the past three years alone, my Department has spent over £900,000 cleaning up after fuel launderers and, while DOE and NIEA are not responsible for enforcement or legislating — the enforcement body is HMRC, along with the PSNI — we are charged with cleaning up after these criminals.

The point that Mr Campbell makes about these fuel launderers leaving out their rubbish in the way that you or I might leave out our milk bottles for the milkman to collect is a good one, and it is why my officers are working with their colleagues in HMRC and the PSNI to find these fuel laundering sites, clean up the waste left behind and, most importantly, ascertain where it has come from. The Environment Agency is helping to deter, disrupt and prosecute offenders where sufficient evidence can be found.

Unfortunately, to date, we have not been great, collectively, at finding that evidence and getting prosecutions. As well as work being done by the NIEA, the transport regulation unit in my Department continues to focus on taking action in cases involving hauliers who used illegal fuel or transported illegal waste.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for the update. He mentioned the research project that is being carried out between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland on fracking. Have any issues of concern been raised with the Minister in relation to the company involved in carrying out that research project?

Mr Durkan: There have indeed been some concerns raised about one of the companies involved in carrying out research in that project. I have to say, however, that they are not concerns that I share.

Mr McCrea: Following on from my colleague's question about fuel laundering, the Minister may be aware that there has been an increase in the number of fuel laundering sites in my constituency, in Draperstown specifically. Whilst I welcome the fact that there has been one arrest in that respect, many people involved believe they are beyond the law and are free to carry out the activity without fear of arrest. Can the Minister ensure that the agencies involved are doing everything they can to ensure that they pick it up early, when the information is given to them, and that arrests are made, rather than waiting until, as my colleague said, the damage is done, people are away and someone else picks up the tab?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. Unfortunately, I am not in a position to ensure that arrests are made. That might be a question better placed with one of my ministerial colleagues. However, the fact that there have been so many questions on fuel laundering underlines its importance. It is an issue that I will raise on Friday at the NSMC plenary session in Dublin.

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I am sure that the Minister of Justice will be surprised that he has arrest powers.

Justice Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to move the Consideration Stage of the Justice Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of Amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are five groups of amendments and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn.

The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 5, 20, 40, 43 to 46 and opposition to clauses 7, 8, 9 and schedule 2 stand part, all of which deal with committal and court process reform. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 6, to 11, 17, 19, 21 to 29 and 68, which deal with administrative schemes for protection, disclosure and information sharing relating to vulnerable groups. The third debate will be on amendment Nos 12, 16, 49, 51 to 67, 75 to 78 and opposition to clause 86 stand part, which deal with regulation-making powers, technical and miscellaneous amendments. The fourth debate will be on amendment Nos 13 to 15, 18, 30 to 33, 35 to 39, 47, 50, 69, 70 and 72, which deal with criminal records, evidence-gathering and evidence-handling. The fifth debate will be on amendment Nos 34, 41 and 42, 48, 71, 73 and 74, which deal with offences.

Valid petitions of concern have been tabled in relation to amendment Nos 34 and 50. Each will therefore require a cross-community vote. I remind Members who intend to speak that, during the debates on the five groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group has been completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If all that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clauses 1 to 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 7 (Abolition of preliminary investigations)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 5, 20, 40, 43 to 46 and opposition to clauses 7, 8 and 9 and schedule 2 stand part. These amendments deal with committal and court process reform. Amendment No 1 is mutually exclusive with clause 7 stand part. Amendment No 2 is mutually exclusive with clause 8 stand part. Amendment No 4 is consequential to amendment No 3. Amendment No 44 is consequential to amendment No 43.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

(The Minister of Justice)]

Mr Allister: I will speak to amendment No 1 and the other amendment in my name and some of the others in the Minister’s name.

My amendments and opposition to certain clauses focus on the important issue of committal in criminal proceedings; that is to say the process by which someone is returned for trial in the Crown Court, a process that is conducted within the Magistrates’ Court but which, nonetheless, is an inherent component part of the trial process and therefore is as entitled to the application of the provisions of article 6 towards a fair trial as any other part of the trial process. Yesterday, we had a debate in the House on the whole subject of human rights and the application of the European Convention on Human Rights, and one of those key rights is the article 6 right to a fair trial. That, of necessity, also extends to ensuring that the committal process is equally fair.

I will just take a moment to outline the current provisions of the law, which have stood for some decades. They provide that before anyone is committed for trial before their peers in the Crown Court, this committal process has to be gone through whereby the essence of the evidence against someone is presented in written form in a set of committal papers. A magistrate then reviews those papers, and there is an opportunity at that time for the defence and indeed, in some circumstances, for the prosecution, rather than simply proceeding on the papers of the case, to have selected parts or all of the evidence called to be heard in the Magistrates’ Court. The purpose of that, of course, is to test the validity of the evidence if that is the desired tactic being deployed, because one can only be returned for trial in this jurisdiction if the court is satisfied that there is a prima facie case against the person. The House will recognise that that is distinctly different from the ultimate test in the Crown Court: before one can be convicted, there has to be proof beyond all reasonable doubt.

Of course, in the committal process the threshold is substantially lower; it is that there is a prima facie case against that person.

In our current system, we have the option of what is called a preliminary investigation (PI), whereby evidence can be called before a magistrate to assist him or her in deciding whether there is a prima facie case. The system more prevalently, almost overwhelmingly, used is what is called a PE. It is a quirk of language. We call it a PE, but, in fact, it stands for preliminary inquiry and, in the legislation, it is spelt with an i as you might expect. Quite why it is called a PE might be a matter of some speculation, but it is deployed to distinguish it from a PI, which is a preliminary investigation at which evidence is actually called. With a PE, the evidence is simply assessed on the papers.

In most cases, overwhelmingly, the accused and the prosecution are satisfied with the process proceeding on the papers by the PE route. There might be a number of reasons for that from the defence perspective, including the fact that the threshold that I have mentioned is low: you have only to show a prima facie case; it is not the business of showing beyond all reasonable doubt. Secondly, more often than not, the defence would wish to keep their powder dry on the evidence that is coming down the tracks at them and not cross-examine witnesses at the first opportunity in the Magistrates’ Court, because to do so would flag up the defence’s detail, tactics and approach. Therefore, in the terms that I have used, more often than not, the defence would want to keep their powder dry for the Crown Court trial.

In consequence, under article 34 of the Magistrates’ Court Order, there is the capacity to have a little bit of both, PIs or mixed committals, where you do not have all the evidence called, as in a preliminary investigation, but selected portions of the evidence are called on request in what is called a mixed committal. It is a right that exists but which is very sparingly used. Answers from the Minister demonstrate that, in the last year, there were but 56 occasions on which there was either a PI or a mixed committal. The Minister will tell us what percentage that is of the many hundreds of cases. I do not have the figure to hand, but there will be hundreds, if not thousands, of returns for trial in that same year and, out of that, a minuscule number — 56 — were held by way of PI or mixed committal.

ULet us just pause and realise that in this jurisdiction, according to what this Bill wants to do, a citizen can and would, in every case, end up on trial in the Crown Court without a single statement against him ever being sworn or a single witness against him ever being heard, and would be committed simply on the committal papers. Let us consider further how committal papers are accumulated and how they come about. They come about very simply by that arm of the prosecution investigative service, the police, interviewing the witnesses, writing down the statement of the witness, presenting it in as cogent and persuasive a way as possible, one might think, and the witness signing the statement. The witness never takes an oath to say, “this is the truth” and is never at all tested to see if it is the truth, but the papers presented in that fashion are then compiled and, on that basis, that individual is returned for trial.

At the beginning, I mentioned article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the right to a fair trial. Of course, in most of continental Europe there is a very different system, where committal takes place in front of an investigating magistrate who actually probes, asks questions and interrogates the witness. The product of that is a committal where evidence has been tested. In our system, such as the Bill wishes to impose in every case, there is no facility for that. I have already indicated that in the vast majority of cases, everyone — prosecution and defence — is content with that. The defence are content because, usually, they want to keep their powder dry on these issues because they recognise that you only have to show a prima facie case.

There are a minority of cases, however, which are of themselves inherently weak, very often because they rely on a flawed witness — a broken reed. You will never read in a set of committal papers anything that indicates to you that this is a flawed witness. The statement will always read persuasively. I do not think I have never read a set of committal papers where it jumps out of the page that this is a witness that you could not believe. The defence might well know matters about that witness which, if they were before the magistrate, would cast that evidence in a very different light. The only way they can ever get that before the court in committal proceedings is to ask for that witness to be called and cross-examined to demonstrate that that witness is not a witness of truth. There are cases where that is the only evidence — of course, in most cases it is more than one — and if that is the only evidence then the magistrate, as in these 18 cases out of 56, will quite properly say that he cannot return the accused for trial because it does not reach the standard even of a prima facie case, and that the proceedings need to end. In doing that, the public purse makes a saving.

It is to preserve that facility for that tiny number of cases that I move these amendments.

I move them in the context of accepting the general premise of what the Bill wants to do on committal proceedings. The general mode of progress should be PE — no evidence, just the written committal papers. I accept that premise, but why would you want to exclude something that is not exploited, as we have seen from the numbers, and can save money in the longer term? More importantly, it can deliver justice at the earliest possible stage. Why would you want to deny that to those we represent: our citizens? If they are charged with a criminal offence, surely they are entitled to expect that we will have protected that facility.

11.15 am

The purpose and purport of my amendments are to say, "Yes, let the general norm be preliminary enquiry, where you simply do it on the papers, but let there be the safeguard — the failsafe — that the defence can seek to persuade the magistrate that, in the interests of justice, he should hear a particular witness. If he hears that witness, justice might be better served."

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment.

Let us embrace the norm that the Minister wants to embrace, but let us keep open the exception, which is on the basis that the magistrate would have to be persuaded that it is in the interests of justice for a PI or a mixed committal to take place. That is the right and sensible way to go on the matter.

Mr McCartney: The Member's first amendment mentions the interests of justice, and he has just spoken about it. It was said at Committee on a number of occasions that there should not be investigation at that stage in sexual cases. Does the Member agree that, in the particular case of sexual offences, it may not be in the interests of justice to call a witness, particularly the victim?

Mr Allister: I see the point that is being made, but I have to try to relate it to the principle that there are cases of all types and descriptions. I do not think that sexual cases necessarily are any different, although they are much more sensitive. There are cases where the evidence is shallow and comes from a flawed source, and where the probability is that, upon trial, the case will collapse. The real question is this: in those circumstances, why wait for that? Why put everyone through that? Why not take the opportunity of testing the matter at the first opportunity, where it might well fail even the prima facie test? That could happen in a sex case as well as a non-sex case. It is not a very straightforward or easy issue, but, if the amendment passes, there would be a facility to the House at Further Consideration Stage to consider that matter further. I might take a view on it and the greater number in the House might take a different view, but you will never get to take that view if you simply accept the Bill as it is. Therefore, by accepting these amendments, you leave open the door to consider that possibility.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way. I am interested in the first amendment that has been referred to. I am looking for the Member's assessment of:

"shall apply only when the court is satisfied that a preliminary investigation is required in the interests of justice".

Is there any definition around that? How is it defined? Are there any criteria around it?

Mr Allister: The phraseology "the interests of justice" is not at all foreign to our criminal law, and I think that the magistrate will be well able to apply it. Yes, there is a certain generality to that, but the essence of how I would see this evolving is this: the norm is your preliminary enquiry and committal on the papers, but if, for example, the defence knows that the primary witness is an utterly flawed witness and expects that witness to crumble on cross-examination, the representatives of that defendant, if this was the tactic that they decided to take, would open before the magistrate a submission to the effect that, "Because of facts a, b and c, which we believe must be put to this witness, you might well find that this witness is unbelievable and unreliable, and, therefore, in the interests of justice, you should allow that exercise to proceed so that you, the magistrate, can be satisfied that there is in fact a prima facie case." It would be for the defence to demonstrate and satisfy the presiding magistrate that it was in the interests of justice for evidence to be called.

I think that we can trust the district judges, given their experience, enough to know when a proper case of what is in the interests of justice has been made out before them and to decide on that course of action. Otherwise, everyone, no matter how flawed the witness might be though looking good on paper, will forever be returned for trial. In the past year we have seen, in the minuscule number of cases where evidence has been tested — 56 — that the case fell apart in 18. There did not need to be a trial, and the state was saved the cost. That would more than cover the cost of the corresponding PI.

In fact, I think that PIs are unlikely to be used very much at all. In my own experience, the mixed committal was far more readily used because no one really had an interest in a full-blown PI where every witness, the police mapper and everyone else was called to give evidence. One wanted to get to the core of the issue and go for the witnesses that really mattered. Therefore, mixed committal is far more likely to be the mechanism deployed. It is a very measured approach to this issue. It accepts that the norm should be a return on paper, but it keeps the door open in the interests of justice so that the process might not be burdened with cases that, in other circumstances, would not be proceeding and that, in the interests of justice, should be tested.

That is the essence of the thinking and the logic behind these amendments. I trust that that recommends itself to the House. As I say, it is very modest and very measured in its approach. The House would be doing the right thing, and not doing any great violence to the integrity of the Bill, if it was to accept it. It is taking the best of the present system and stitching it into this Bill so as to give that added layer of protection in circumstances where it is justified, but putting the hurdle, essentially for the defence to cross, to get to that point. At the moment, one, as of right, can say, "I want a mixed committal. I want a PI." That would be removed by these amendments, You would have to cross the hurdle of demonstrating that it is in the interests of justice. Who in the House should be opposed to doing something in the interests of justice? I would have thought no one, and therefore I fail to see the difficulty in that regard.

I should explain that amendment No 1 deals with preserving the exceptional right to a PI, and amendment No 2 deals with preserving the exceptional right to a mixed committal. Since schedule 2 removes from our legislation all references to preliminary investigations, you have the amendment to oppose clause 9 and to oppose schedule 2 so that, of necessity, those references remain in our legislation.

I will say a few words about a couple of the Minister's amendments. Amendment Nos 43 and 44 deal with clause 79. The Minister wants to amend that clause so that it will read:

"It is the duty of all persons exercising functions in relation to criminal proceedings in the Crown Court or the magistrates' court to reach a just outcome as swiftly as possible."

I suggest to the House that, wittingly or unwittingly, that now embraces the work of juries in the Crown Court, because juries are persons exercising functions in relation to criminal proceedings in the Crown Court. Are we really saying in this House that we want to have a statutory obligation on a jury to reach a just outcome as swiftly as possible? I do not know how many jury charges when I have not heard the judge, at the end of his charge, say to the jury, "Now, ladies and gentlemen, the case is over to you. You take as long as you need to reach a just decision." Are we now going to say that the jury is going to have to be told, "You reach a just decision, but do it as quick as you can"? I think that would be a very foolish road to head down. Therefore, I think that the Minister needs to look at what he is seeking to do in clause 79. Certainly, to my reading, persons exercising functions in relation to criminal proceedings will include the jury.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr A Maginness: It is on another point, but I sense that the Member is about to conclude. Has the Member any comment to make on clause 11, "Direct committal: indication of intention to plead guilty", or, further to that, clause 12, "Direct committal: specified offences"? Is the Member content with those clauses? Are they affected directly or indirectly by your amendments?

Mr Allister: I am grateful to the Member. I do not think that either is affected by my amendments because, where the accused has an intention to plead guilty, it is hard to imagine circumstances in which he would have an interest in the calling of evidence and the hearing of the accusations against him, so I do not think that that is likely to apply. Likewise, the clause relating to specific offences is probably something that I am content with. I am sure that if this were a justice Bill I was writing, it would not be written like this, but I recognise that I am only one voice in the House and that I have to tread warily in trying to encourage the House towards a view that I might take on some matters. I think I have attempted to be measured in the approach I have taken to committals in the hope of bettering the Bill, as I would see it. So, I have not ventured further than that with regard to other clauses.

If I may, I will finish on the point that I was putting to the Minister about the juries. I might have my own issues with clause 79, but if it is intended to be directed at professional persons exercising functions in relation to criminal proceedings, that would exclude the juries, but that is not what it says. Maybe that is the answer for the Minister, if he thinks there is a problem there. I raise that and trust that the Minister will respond. I trust that he will also respond, in a considered way, to the genuine concerns that I have raised in the House about the committal process and that, rather than rush headlong into throwing out everything on committals and going on a paper exercise solely, he will recognise that there are advantages to retaining, in a very restrained form, the facility to have the mixed committal, or, indeed, the PI, in the interests of justice.

11.30 am

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): With your indulgence, Mr Deputy Speaker, before addressing the amendments, I wish to make some general remarks about the Bill.

The Committee welcomes the Bill, particularly as it seeks to improve services and facilities for victims and witnesses. A number of its provisions and a number of the amendments brought forward by the Minister are as a direct result of the findings and recommendations of the Committee's inquiry into the criminal justice services available to victims and witnesses of crime, which was completed back in 2012.

The Committee also supports the Bill's other main aims, which are to speed up the justice system and to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of key aspects of it. As well as the main clauses, the Committee also considered a wide range of amendments provided by the Department of Justice, both at the start of the Bill's Committee Stage and during it, some of which relate to provisions in the Bill, while others are on unrelated matters. The Committee also considered two proposals for amendments from the Attorney General for Northern Ireland and a proposed amendment from Mr Jim Wells, which he had provided when he was a member of the Justice Committee.

Given the wide range of policy areas covered by the provisions and the proposed amendments, the Committee spent a considerable amount of time undertaking detailed scrutiny, and it sought a wide range of views to assist in its deliberations. Written evidence was sought from interested organisations and individuals, as well as from the Department of Justice and the Department of Health. The Committee received 52 submissions and a significant number of petitions and responses from individuals on the amendment that would restrict lawful abortions to National Health Service premises. The Committee took oral evidence from a wide range of organisations and officials from both Departments. The Attorney General and the Director of Public Prosecutions also attended to assist the Committee's consideration of specific issues.

I put on record my thanks to the members of the Committee for their contributions to the discussion on, and consideration of, the Bill at Committee Stage. The detail in the Committee's report demonstrates that we considered all aspects of the Bill and the range of proposed amendments in a full and thorough manner. I also thank all the organisations and individuals that provided very useful written and oral evidence and the Department of Justice officials, who provided additional information and clarification throughout the process. Of course, I also put on record my thanks to the Committee staff, who ensured that members were in a position to fulfil their obligations to scrutinise the Bill.

I turn now to clauses 7, 8 and 9, which would abolish preliminary investigations and mixed committals, and the amendments by Mr Allister to introduce new clauses 7A and 8A, which, as he outlined, are intended to retain preliminary investigations in some limited circumstances, in what he described as the "interests of justice". There was a divergence of views in the evidence received by the Committee, with the PPS and Victim Support Northern Ireland both supporting the Department's proposed changes but ultimately wanting to see committal proceedings abolished altogether, while the Law Society is of the view that the proposals are flawed.

The Law Society does not support the assertion that committal proceedings slow down the process, and, whilst it indicated that it understood the concerns expressed about vulnerable witnesses, it highlighted the point that special rules already exist to ensure that they are not unduly subjected to the stress of having to give evidence. It expressed the view to the Committee that a more measured approach would be for district judges to have limited discretion to allow the calling of key witnesses where they believe that it would be in the interests of justice to do so, and that appears to be what Mr Allister is seeking to achieve with his amendments.

In contrast, however, Victim Support told the Committee that the experience of being cross-examined on one occasion is highly stressful for victims and witnesses and that to be required to give evidence more than once compounds the anxiety and is contrary to the interests of justice. That is a point that the Deputy Chair made in an intervention to Mr Allister. It has long been a firmly held opinion that the abolition of preliminary investigations and mixed committals would represent a significant step in addressing some of the considerable trauma and distress experienced by victims and witnesses of crime during the court process.

The PPS also welcomed the proposed changes, believing that they could result in an eight- to 10-week saving in the trial process.

The PPS views the committal process as a luxury and a historical anomaly that no longer exists in other parts of Great Britain, and which is expensive to the public purse not only in the extra cost to legal aid but also in the burden it places on the PPS. The director highlighted that defendants will retain the right to challenge the sufficiency of the prosecution's evidence through the Crown Court's no bill procedure pre-trial, or through the trial process itself, and viewed the proposals as rebalancing the process and providing greater protection for victims and witnesses. He also provided examples of cases where committal had added considerable delay to the progress of the proceedings or impacted negatively on witnesses.

Mr Allister argues that PI can save the public purse, but we also heard arguments that were the opposite of that. When the Committee considered this part of the Bill it noted that, whilst the proposals aim to streamline the procedure for moving business from the Magistrates' Court to the Crown Court, and are expected to result in some improvement in efficiency, the Department's stated primary driver for abolishing preliminary investigations and mixed committals is to reduce the impact on vulnerable victims and witnesses.

From its inquiry into the criminal justice services available to victims and witnesses, the Committee is fully aware of the concerns raised by, and the experiences of, victims and witnesses in relation to having to give evidence twice. Members also appreciate the excessive length of time it takes for many cases to be completed and the need for reasonable measures to be taken to streamline the system.

The Committee noted that figures provided by the PPS indicated that very few defendants who were the subject of committal proceedings were not committed for trial. In 2013, out of a total of 2,289 defendants, only six were not committed for trial by a district judge. This represents approximately 0.3% of defendants who were the subject of committal proceedings. In 2014, four of the 1,938 defendants who were the subject of committal proceedings were not committed for trial.

Given the benefits to victims and witnesses, the evidence, which indicates that very few defendants who are the subject of committal proceedings are not committed for trial, and the fact that under clause 7 district judges will retain their existing power to decide whether a prima facie case against the defendant is disclosed by the evidence and can discharge the defendant on the basis that no such case exists, the Committee agreed that it is content with clauses 7 to 16. One Member, Mr Maginness, indicated that he had some concerns, and I am sure he will outline them during his contribution this morning.

The Committee also supports amendment No 3, which will allow for the direct committal of any co-defendants who are charged with an offence that is not a specified offence so that, in the interests of justice, all defendants can be tried at the same time.

I move on to Part 6 of the Bill, which will expand provision for the use of live video link facilities in courts, prisons and psychiatric units, and to amendment No 20, which the Minister is bringing forward. The main issues raised in the evidence received by the Committee focused on wider issues relating to the use of live links generally, particularly with regard to children and young people and their ability to understand and participate in proceedings and give informed consent, and the ability of a defendant to access legal representation and communicate with their legal representative. Indeed, it is an issue that formed part of a discussion at a recent justice seminar that the Committee held in this building.

Committee members are aware of the current use that is made of video links with little or no evidence of problems arising and, when considering the proposals to expand their use, noted that there are statutory requirements that the person must be able to see and hear and to be seen and be heard for a live link to take place, otherwise the hearing must be adjourned. It is the responsibility of the courts and the judiciary to ensure and monitor compliance with those requirements.

In relation to the impact of live links and the ability of children to understand and participate in proceedings, the Committee noted that consultation with the judiciary in the past indicated that, from their perspective, a live link facility whereby the child can speak directly and more visibly with the bench can assist the contribution they make, and an on-screen, face-to-face exchange can be more effective than when the child is sitting more remotely in a busy and possibly intimidating courtroom.

The Committee sought further information on any consultation that had been undertaken with young people on their experience of live links and their views on the proposed changes. The Department advised that staff and six children in the juvenile justice centre, all of whom had experience of using live links, had been interviewed and were very supportive of the system. There was a generally high level of satisfaction, and reasons given for preferring live links included that it is less intimidating, more convenient and private, does not require the child to speak or stand in front of everyone and that care workers can be there to help. The Department also confirmed that, in conjunction with the Courts and Tribunals Service and the Office of the Lord Chief Justice, it will produce guidance for the courts, legal representatives and defendants on their new arrangements for the use of live links for certain hearings at weekends and public holidays, before the provisions are commenced.

The Committee also explored the estimated savings to be made by extending the use of live links and noted that the use of live links for first remand at weekends and public holidays would reduce 330 judicial days to around 52 days.

Given the benefits of extending the use of live links, the assurances provided by the Department regarding the various legal requirements set out in statutory frameworks for the use of them, which operate under the authority and supervision of the courts and judiciary, and the fact that the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety had requested the provisions in respect of persons detained in hospital under mental health legislation, the Committee agreed that it was content with clauses 44 to 49. The Committee did, however, question whether clause 46 required amendment to provide the same safeguard as is provided in clauses 44 and 45, which places a responsibility on the court to adjourn proceedings where it appears to it that the accused is not able to see and hear the court and be seen and heard by it and where that cannot be immediately corrected. As a result of that, the Minister has brought forward amendment No 20 today.

I now want to briefly comment on amendment No 40, which relates to clause 78. Together with clause 77, it provides legislative support to a non-legislative scheme being developed to provide a structured early guilty plea scheme in the Magistrates' Courts and the Crown Court. The Department informed the Committee that, on the advice of the Attorney General, it intended to bring forward that amendment to remove a regulatory-making power in subsection 3 of clause 78 that has been identified as being of no practical benefit. The Committee agreed that it was content with that approach.

Noting the purpose of clauses 77 and 78 and having sought reassurances regarding the protections available for children and vulnerable adults and the assistance provided to people with communication difficulties, the Committee also agreed that it was content with clauses 78 and 79, although several members outlined concerns and reservations regarding the duty to be placed on solicitors, with views expressed that it is unnecessary as, in practice, a solicitor would inform a client of the position anyway; it could potentially create problems and conflicts between solicitors and clients; and would not deliver efficiencies.

I will move on to clauses 79 and 80 and amendment Nos 43, 44, 45 and 46. Those clauses introduce a statutory framework for the management of criminal cases, and, through regulation, the Department of Justice will be able to impose duties on the prosecution, defence and the court that will set out what must be completed prior to the commencement of court stages. The Department can also impose a general duty to reach a just outcome as swiftly as possible on anyone exercising a function in relation to criminal proceedings. I listened to the contribution from Mr Allister. I am speaking on behalf of the Committee. I do not think that the Committee's understanding of what "swift" meant was that it should be rushed through the system. We just meant that we did not want to have unnecessary delay. That is certainly my understanding of where the Committee was coming from on that issue. The Department has included those provisions in the Bill in response to the Justice Committee's recommendation in its inquiry into the criminal justice services available for victims and witnesses that case management should be placed on a statutory footing as a means of tackling delays in the system. All the evidence received by the Committee on those provisions recognised the serious problem of delay in criminal proceedings and the negative impact that it has on victims, witnesses and defendants, especially children and young people, and support was clear for measures to address avoidable delay, including statutory case management.

Having sought the advice of the Assembly Examiner of Statutory Rules regarding the range of powers in the Bill to make subordinate legislation, the Examiner drew the attention of the Committee to the regulation-making powers in clause 79(2) and clause 80 on the grounds that both clauses are at the core of the Bill's main purposes and are therefore significant for that reason and as they are likely to and intended to have a major impact on the conduct of criminal proceedings. The Examiner considered whether the regulation-making powers in clauses 79 and 80 should be subject to the draft affirmative procedure but was satisfied that they could be left subject to negative resolution if there was a built-in statutory requirement to consult the Lord Chief Justice, the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Bar Council and the Law Society given that, if the regulations are to be workable in any proper and meaningful way, they will need to have a major input from those involved. The Committee referred the matter to the Department for consideration, and the amendments today address that issue and a proposal by the Attorney General that the general duty to progress cases should be placed in the Bill rather than providing a power to make regulations to do so.

One issue that was consistently raised during the Committee's inquiry was the adverse impact that the length of time it takes for cases to go through the criminal justice system has on victims and witnesses, many of whom are unable to move on while they wait for the process to be completed. Whilst recognising the complexity of the issue, the Committee noted that avoidable delay in the criminal justice system was not new and, in its view, has been going on for far too long. Given the detrimental effect that it has on victims and witnesses, as clearly demonstrated by the evidence received in the inquiry, the Committee believed that substantive action was required.

While delay is a common complaint with regard to the entire criminal justice process, one of the key frustrations for victims and witnesses is the length of time that court cases take and the number of postponements and adjournments that frequently occur. The Committee was of the view that a statutory case management scheme would be beneficial and have an overall positive effect in addressing delay and, ultimately, the experiences of victims and witnesses and, therefore, recommended to the Minister that that should be taken forward in the next available piece of justice legislation. The Committee, therefore, welcomes and supports clauses 79 and 80 and the proposed amendments that aim to address avoidable delay in criminal proceedings.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In the wider concept of the Bill at Second Stage and Committee Stage, we were very supportive of the main principles of the Bill because it is designed to improve the operation of the justice system by improving services to victims and witnesses who find themselves in the court system. Part of that was speeding up the efficiency and effectiveness of justice. In that particular context, we are very supportive of the idea of a single jurisdiction, although the Committee said that, in the operation of that, it did not want to see any disadvantage given to people in terms of travel, particularly for witnesses and victims. The Committee made its views known and wrote to the Lord Chief Justice to see how that operation and consultation process will be carried out.

Similarly, we were supportive of the idea of prosecutorial fines for low-level offenders, up to a maximum of £200, as an alternative to taking people into the court system. In all the evidence that we have heard, it appears that sometimes the longer people are in the system, the harder it is for them to get out of it. We were mindful that, in the past, there were issues around the collection of fines, and we said that we did not want the impact that more fines were being imposed. That creates problems further down the line, but that is something that the Committee will look at when the fines and enforcement Bill comes forward.

Another major part of the Bill as it goes through its various stages is about how we treat victims and witnesses. The victims' charter and many steps such as the care unit are all very significant steps forward in doing that properly. Indeed, many of the things in the Bill were part of the Committee's inquiry into victims and witnesses. Speaking on behalf of my party colleagues, we got a good insight from that inquiry and from meeting many of the groups that work with victims and witnesses and the whole system. Indeed, we saw many of the gaps in the system, and the Bill goes some way now to begin to fill some of those gaps. I know that it is an ongoing process, and that is to be welcomed. Indeed, we will turn to that when we talk about the amendments tabled by Jim Allister.

I will turn to that part of the Bill now. At Committee Stage and throughout, we have always been broadly supportive of, if you like, refining or reforming committal proceedings to help speed up the process of making trials take place quickly and within a reasonable time frame. Mr Allister outlined that. Over a long time, committal proceedings have evolved to a situation where the overwhelming majority of cases now proceed straight to trial, with an agreement of what will be contained in a trial process.

It was brought to the Committee's attention that a small number went between PI and mixed committals. I think that there were 56, but 18 did not return for trial. That gave us some cause for concern. We heard that when we were conducting our inquiry into victims and witnesses; indeed, when representative groups and the Prosecution Service came before the Committee, they outlined the situation. That is why I asked for the intervention to define the interests of justice. There was a feeling among groups that putting a person, particularly a rape victim, through the process of cross-examination twice was unfair. Sometimes, even though the person who went through the process was a very credible witness and would have come through the first run, so to speak, of the cross-examining process, the Public Prosecution Service and victims' groups said that their resolve was weakened by the process, and that they found the second attempt or second run at a trial very daunting.

Jim Allister talked about the best of the current system being kept but then, obviously, to put in some protections. In some way, I think that that goes a long way to ensure that you do not have a system where, when a person is charged, it is a trial and there is no testing for prima facie status anywhere in the process. In that situation, it is worth considering those amendments. I think that the offer was held out that if "the interests of justice" becomes the framework in which the magistrate, from a defence or a prosecution point of view, can put forward a proposition that it is not in the interests of justice to proceed, then the magistrate could take that into consideration. I accept the point that it is sometimes difficult to say that in all rape cases or all particular cases, but the experience of the groups is something that will assist us if this goes through this stage. I do not want to make that assumption either way. However, it would be helpful if what is meant by "in the interests of justice" could be defined at Further Consideration Stage.

It is worth noting that, in the small number of cases among the thousands of prosecutions in any given year, only 56 went to that stage, but 18 did not proceed, and that is over 30%. That, in itself —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will.

Mr Allister: First of all, can I correct the figure? I did the maths wrong. There were 74 recourse to committal; 56 were returned and 18 were not. Sorry; I misled the House, and I apologise for that. That is according to an answer from the Minister to Lord Morrow a few weeks ago.

On the issue of the rape victim and the undesirability of putting the rape victim through giving evidence twice, I would have thought that that itself would be a consideration that the magistrate would apply when applying the test of “in the interests of justice”. I would have thought that that was something that went into the scales in deciding what is in the interests of justice. Yes, I am more than open to further refinement of that at Further Consideration Stage but, already, it is probably something that would go into the scales of deciding what is in the interests of justice.

Mr McCartney: I accept the figures, but the rejigging is still a high enough number to be worried about.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I appreciate the Member giving way, because there seems to be a little confusion about the figures. I have the figures for the number of cases not committed, which were sent to the Justice Committee by the PPS in March. It had originally been suggested that 51 cases out of 1,743 were not committed in 2013; in fact, as Mr Ross said, only six out of 2,289 were not committed in 2013, and only four out of 1,938 were not committed in 2014. It seems that there was a bit of confusion, because there were other reasons — for example, when cases were withdrawn or a caution was accepted. Those kinds of issues have made the difference. However, we are talking about minuscule numbers that proceeded to full hearing and that were not committed.

Mr McCartney: I thank the Minister for that. I want to take up on the point, particularly in the case of rape. I accept that any magistrate, when he is considering the threshold around the interests of justice, will have that in mind. Again — this came out very clearly in our inquiry and in evidence given to the Committee — that often puts off a person from even coming forward as a witness when they know that there is the possibility that they will be cross-examined twice.

That is why I am looking for some sense that exemption is there. Perhaps then, in the interests of justice, if the defence felt that the witness was not a good one, it could be examined in that context. What we are looking to see, particularly to protect a person who has made the allegation of rape, is the magistrate going in with the threshold and it being up to someone to convince the magistrate that it was in the interests of justice for them to be called, rather than the reverse. That is the important caveat that we would put in. It is with that in mind in particular that we are supportive of these amendments, so that at Further Consideration Stage, there can be a second run at trying to get this right.

Most of us accept, and the Minister has given the figures, that it is a small number, but it is an important part of a trial process, and we have to be very, very careful that we do not just wipe it out without giving some consideration to the fact that there are many cases in which a person has not gone through the unnecessary procedure of going to trial. We also have to ensure that the right to a fair trial is not simply legislated away.

The Chair covered amendment No 43. The Bill talks about coming to:

“a just outcome as swiftly as possible.”

Perhaps the Minister will address that, because if there was any sense that a jury should do something swiftly rather than justly, it just needs to be cleared up procedurally. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mr A Maginness: I listened with considerable interest to all the contributions, particularly that from Mr Allister in relation to preliminary investigations. I also take the point that we are trying to modernise our system and make it better and that we want to be innovative. That is all very well and good, and, in general terms, I support that, but I have to remind colleagues that we are making law, and we are making changes that are substantive and fundamental to the whole trial process. Obviously we are talking about pre-trial, but it ultimately affects the trial process nonetheless.

Once you make changes, they are permanent: you do not go back. The history of the criminal process in Northern Ireland, in Ireland generally and in Britain shows that it has stood the test of time in many respects. It is of great value, and it is something that we should not forget about. Once we interfere with the process, we could do irreparable damage to it. I say that as a health warning more than anything else, but when we are considering changes that are quite fundamental, we should bear that in mind.

During the course of discussion in relation to committal proceedings, I expressed misgivings to officials and colleagues on the Justice Committee in relation to the changes that were being proposed. The committal proceedings are an important filtering process that allow the defence, the prosecution and the court at large to test appropriately the strengths or weaknesses of the charges that people are faced with. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that that is an important process. I know that the notion now is that you can get rid of something that was described by the PPS as a historical anomaly. You can get rid of that, and you can describe it as that, but there is a contemporary value to a historical legal development.

12.00 noon

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Ross: You mentioned how it was an effective filtering mechanism. Will the Member accept, given that the numbers are so low for the last two years that figures are available for, that there is an argument that, if it is a filtering mechanism, it is not perhaps a very good filtering system?

Mr A Maginness: It is an interesting point that you raise, and it is a point that was raised by the PPS and, indeed, the Department of Justice. People did talk about minuscule numbers. In a way, you can turn that argument around and say that the amendments that Mr Allister is putting forward to retain, at least vestigially, the committal proceedings in the interests of justice does not really affect the situation as greatly as the Department or the PPS have suggested. If it is so small and so minuscule, why interfere with the process to the point of extinction? I am not against, as it were, reforming the committal process, but it is the extinction of the process that worries me. At least, there should be some residual power given to the court to test the evidence if it is truly in the interests of justice.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way. He talks about not extinguishing the process. In fact, that is exactly what happened over a decade ago in the Irish jurisdiction and in the England and Wales jurisdiction. That is not what is being proposed here, although there was a strong body of evidence that we should have moved to complete extinction. We will be maintaining PEs and, therefore, we will be maintaining the bulk of the process that has been abolished in the two most equivalent jurisdictions already.

Mr A Maginness: I do accept the point that the Minister has made. It is a valid point and a point of some strength, but I do say to colleagues in the Chamber that, whilst we can reflect on the experience of other jurisdictions, we have to make up our own minds ultimately in this jurisdiction, doing the best that we can to preserve what I think is valuable in the system. The Minister —

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Dickson: Following on from the point that the Minister has made regarding reform and ultimate removal of that, particularly in England and Wales, the first stage came in 2001 and the removal came in 2013. There is no body of evidence of the detriment that perhaps you and Mr Allister are proclaiming may happen here. Therefore, there is a substantive body of evidence — likewise in the Republic of Ireland — that is demonstrating to us, in this particular case, about cautious reform. You are right to say that the law should be reformed cautiously, but, on the basis of 2001 and 2013, this seems to be a caution that we should be prepared to take today.

Mr A Maginness: Again, I understand the strength of Mr Dickson's point, but I think that we have to balance our own experience with the experience of others.

I believe that we have to be cautious in relation to something as sensitive as a criminal trial. I err towards being cautious and I remain to be convinced that the English experience is as smooth as the Member suggests; and I am not saying that facetiously.

The Minister made a point about committal proceedings, and I accept that this would not see the end of those proceedings. There will still be preliminary enquiries, but the preliminary investigation and mixed committals will be abolished, or repealed, as a result of this legislation if it is passed. That is the stated aim of the Department, and the departmental officials were quite forthright in saying so. I am not so certain that this is the destination to which we should be going. This is being seen as an intermediate stage on the way to achieving that.

I think there is still value in having a form of committal proceeding. In the circumstances and context of what Mr Allister is proposing, the Minister's aim would be achieved to some extent, insofar that the committal proceedings would be reformed. There will be very few preliminary investigations, but they will be looked at rigorously by the court in the interests of justice. I think it is important, in those circumstances, that the House takes that into consideration and believes there is value in keeping that failsafe mechanism in our current legislation. Therefore, I think that Mr Allister's proposals are to be preferred to those that the Minister has suggested, and we will be supporting Mr Allister's amendments.

Having said that, I recognise, as the Committee Chair said, that arising from the Committee's investigation into victims and witnesses, there is an important need to be protective of witnesses, particularly those who are vulnerable. Further provisions may have to be made for those vulnerable witnesses; but I do not think that it is beyond our capacity to create a situation whereby vulnerable witnesses in particular are further protected during the course of preliminary investigations, on the rare occasions on which those investigations would take place.

If there are various pre-trial issues that would normally be dealt with at a committal level that are not dealt with, there may be a greater preponderance, when something comes to trial, of no bills or applications to the Crown Court judge to deal with matters that should properly have been dealt with at committal level. You cannot call witnesses to examine those issues at that stage, nonetheless there could be further hold-ups in the smooth running of a Crown Court trial. That would be disagreeable and not intentional, but it could happen as a result of the changes proposed by the Minister. I ask the House to take that into consideration, because the aim of this legislation is to speed up the process, not delay it further, and that is a very laudable aim.

Mr Deputy Speaker, I welcome the single jurisdiction, although we have had county court divisions in Northern Ireland for many years, and it is a pity to lose them. We are losing a bit of our history but, nonetheless, given the efficiencies arising out of a single jurisdiction, perhaps we can overlook that little bit of history. Mr Allister is, of course, the Traditional Unionist Voice, but I was minded when he was speaking that he might well now be called the "Traditional Legal Voice" in this House. It is important that we look at changes to our system. The proposal in relation to prosecutorial fines is worthy, and it is important that we move in that direction and be innovative and imaginative in what we do; I welcome that.

I refer the House to clause 78. Amendment No 40 relates to 78(3). I am unhappy with clause 78. I think that it is unnecessary. It imposes a duty on solicitors to advise clients about early guilty pleas, and this will be a statutory duty imposed on solicitors. I do not think that it is necessary. Any solicitor worth his salt will advise his client on an early guilty plea. It is unnecessary for this House to impose a further statutory duty on the solicitor. It could also complicate the relationship between the solicitor and the client. Clause 78(5) says:

"If a solicitor contravenes this section, any person may make a complaint in respect of the contravention to the Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal."

I do not know how such a tribunal would deal with this matter. It seems to me that there are certain matters between a solicitor and client that are indeed privileged, and it could well be that, where there is a dispute over whether the solicitor gave this advice, there would be breaches of privilege. Whether or not that happens, it complicates the relationship between the solicitor and the client. This clause could have unintended adverse consequences. I ask the Minister to look seriously at withdrawing the clause, which does not in any way add usefully to the role of a solicitor in a criminal trial. It really is ill thought out. I quote:

"The solicitor must notify the court by or before which the client is tried, in such manner and before such time as magistrates' court rules or (as the case may be) Crown Court rules may require, that the solicitor has complied with subsection (2)."

I am not certain, Mr Deputy Speaker, that it is really necessary. It just overcomplicates things. It is almost a bureaucratic response to the courtroom situation that will not help resolve matters.

I know what it is intended to do, but I am not certain that it is the right thing to do in all circumstances. I am tempted to oppose clause 78 standing part of the Bill, but I would like the Minister to look at it seriously, because I do not believe that there is any great value in it.

I have nothing further to say about any of the other amendments or about this section.

Mr Elliott: We have got to a stage with the Bill at which the Committee has looked at it in some detail and a number of other, almost unexpected, amendments are coming forward. That is what democracy is about and what this place is about. It is about listening to those issues and to people's concerns.

On this particular group of amendments, I entirely understand where the Department is coming from in its attempt to streamline the court system at an early stage. I respect and understand that. Mr Allister proposes interesting amendments. The Department's proposal is to take that opportunity for the defence to bring forward its case at an early stage completely out of it, whereas Mr Allister's proposal appears, from what I hear, to be a halfway house between the two. It still gives that opportunity for defendants —

Mr Ford: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. The Department's proposals do not remove the opportunity for the defence to put the case; what they remove is the opportunity for the defence to cross-examine witnesses. The key point, as I understand it, both in the Committee's first report on victims and witnesses and in its consideration of the Bill, was the pressure that can be put on vulnerable victims and witnesses.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for that intervention and information. I accept that point, Minister; I have no argument with it. I listened to Mr Ross, who, quite rightly, put over the view that the witnesses appeared to support the Department's proposals and felt that it was quite difficult in the sense of maybe having to give evidence on two occasions. Obviously, it would be overly burdensome. However, if I remember rightly, the Law Society did not feel that the proposals were right and was opposed to them. We cannot take everything that the Law Society says in general terms as gospel, but I am just putting the point down that, in fact, there was opposition to the proposals as well.

It has been an interesting debate, and I have to say that I have a lot of sympathy for Mr Allister's proposals in that respect, as I feel that they have merit. I will listen intently to what the Minister says about them and to what Mr Allister says in his winding-up speech — just to keep them on their toes — to convince my colleagues and me of the proper route to go down.

I want to move on to clause 78, which Mr Maginness interestingly touched on. It is an aspect that I raised several times during Committee Stage. Mr Maginness and I have slightly different points, in that he spoke about the early guilty plea and the onus on solicitors to inform their clients of that. I understand that, but my point was that someone has to give that advice. I felt that, if it has to be the solicitors, I do not have a major issue with it.

My main concern with clause 78 is the pressure that there will sometimes be on the client and defendant from an early guilty plea. Indeed, I raised it on several occasions. Some defendants may feel under huge pressure to say, "OK; I'm going to get away with a much more lenient sentence if I put in an early guilty plea", and that is the advice that may be given. The solicitor will be under no obligation to say — and should not say, I assume — that if you are definitely not guilty you do not put in an early guilty plea. However, I know from speaking to many defendants in the past that they have even felt under pressure as it is to put in an early guilty plea when they are adamant that they are not guilty.

It is quite easy for people who are standing on the side to say, "Well, look, you should not plead guilty if you are definitely not guilty." If a defendant is looking at the difference between a four-year custodial sentence and maybe a much more lenient sentence, they do feel under that pressure. I know that from speaking to defendants in the past. Maybe I differ slightly on the reasoning around it, but I have always had those concerns about clause 78.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to give way.

Mr Allister: I suggest to the Member that there is another consideration to which this clause gives no regard, in practical terms. More often than not in the course of a trial and the criminal process, a key component can be the eventual delivery of disclosure in a case, which can be quite truncated and delayed. The eventual delivery of disclosure in a case can cast an entirely new light on certain pertinent issues which touch upon the relevant sentence, yet this compulsion under clause 78 to herd people towards the earliest possible plea may be something that, in fact, does not do justice to the situation. If and when there is disclosure, which despite all the promises does not often meet the time frames, it can cast the matter in an entirely new light and leave someone very much wrong-footed in terms of what they did or should have done.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for that intervention. It was not an aspect that I had particularly looked at, but it obviously brings a new angle to the entire debate around clause 78.

I will listen to the debate on Mr Allister's amendments as it moves on. I just want to put on record that I am minded at this stage to favour them because they bring balance to the law itself. However, we did go through the entire Committee Stage in discussion on this. I think that we need to return to clause 78. Like Mr Maginness, I am of a mind to oppose it here today. I will listen to the debate further.

Mr Dickson: Perhaps I will make a few opening remarks first of all. The Bill marks the third Justice Bill that has been brought forward by the Department and the Minister as part of reforming our justice system and, indeed, making it fit for the 21st century. In those circumstances, I would like to commend the Minister for this and express my support for the process of reform and my opposition to those who wish to derail that.

Like the Chair of the Committee, I place on record my thanks to staff in the Department of Justice, to those who came to give evidence to the Committee, and to the Committee staff for the incredible amount of work that they put into assisting us to prepare the report.

Group 1 refers mostly to the reform of the committal and court process. We have heard arguments in respect of this. Mr Allister's amendment will oppose the reform of the committal system and seek to retain some form of mixed committal. We must recognise that the origin of this clause was, in fact, the consultation with those who have profound experience of the justice system, as the Committee Chair pointed out, as victims.

In the current system, victims and vulnerable people are often compelled to experience the trauma of giving evidence twice; once at PI or mixed committal and again at the trial itself. I do understand that Mr Allister may have concerns, perhaps suggesting that these are important in the interests of justice. I fully understand that position, but as I am very sure he is aware, it is the trial that determines the innocence or guilt, not the committal proceedings.

As the Minister has indicated in a number of interventions, and as I hope others will take into account when coming to their view in supporting this today, a preliminary inquiry will still be undertaken by a magistrate, with the inbuilt safeguards to ensure that the defendant is sufficiently represented. In fact, defendants may even be able to make a submission to the court personally. If it is found that there is insufficient evidence for a trial, the defendant can be discharged at that stage. I am satisfied that the Minister's plans are sufficient to safeguard the rights of victims and defendants in that area. Therefore, I will not be supporting Mr Allister's amendments.

I welcome amendment No 20, which relates to the provision to enhance live-link facilities in our courts. That will help ensure that offenders are able to see and hear the court during the trial, and vice versa; otherwise, the trial will be adjourned. Other departmental amendments will ensure that the Bill works more efficiently regarding early guilty pleas, and that will avoid delay in criminal proceedings. I intend to support those amendments.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.25 pm.

On resuming (Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Employment and Learning

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question 6 has been withdrawn.

Childcare: Careers

1. Mrs Hale asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline any initiatives designed to encourage a career in childcare. (AQO 8292/11-15)

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): My Department plays a full and active part in the delivery of the Executive's Bright Start initiative, particularly in relation to the recruitment and development of the childcare workforce. Since 2011, my Department has provided funding support for 355 employees to commence training in childcare learning and development qualifications across 205 settings at a cost of over £300,000. Level 5 training for managerial staff in childcare settings will become a mandatory requirement in 2016 and, as a result, my Department will no longer provide funding support. This is because increasingly limited resources are targeted at encouraging employers to upskill their staff beyond the legislative or mandatory requirements that they must meet.

All further education colleges provide a range of high-quality full-time and part-time childcare courses at a variety of skill levels. In the last academic year, childcare-related provision accounted for over 2,500 enrolments across Northern Ireland. In addition, Stranmillis University College provides a degree course in early childhood studies and the Open University in Ireland provides a range of degree courses in early years and in childhood and youth studies.

My Department's employment service supports clients seeking employment in the childcare sector and offers a range of services to meet employers' recruitment needs. Vacancies in the childcare sector are regularly advertised on our recruitment website and employment service staff have recently worked with childcare providers Employers for Childcare in the delivery of job fairs. These events promoted childcare as a career and offered opportunities for industry-related training and employment opportunities. In the past year, my Department's Bridge to Employment programme has assisted 19 people into employment in the sector through customised training related to the skill requirements of specific vacancies. The careers service can also provide advice and guidance for those who wish to work in the childcare sector.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his very detailed answer. Given that we are in times of increased austerity, will he tell the House how his Department is encouraging males, in particular, and individuals from minority communities into the sector?

Dr Farry: It is worth stressing that all our opportunities are open to people across the community irrespective of their gender or their ethnic or religious background etc. Obviously, where there are particular areas of under-representation we are always very keen to encourage more applications. We often talk about the under-representation of females in certain areas, and the Member has asked questions on that particular theme in the past. The reverse also applies in other areas. We want to make sure that we maximise the talent pool to our best advantage as a whole. There are also particular opportunities through the apprenticeship strategy and the forthcoming youth training strategy. Again, gender considerations will be built into those areas to ensure that we have a balanced representation of people coming forward into new opportunities.

Ms McGahan: I thank the Minister for his responses so far. What initiatives has he taken with employers in the childcare sector to encourage participation in the Steps 2 Success programme?

Dr Farry: The Steps 2 Success programme is for people who are unemployed. We have a number of contractors who, in turn, appoint subcontractors. They are there, based on an outcome-focused approach, trying to get people into employment. They will be looking for every opportunity that exists and will provide the relevant training and encouragement to people to take up those opportunities. No doubt where they see growth in opportunities they will be incentivised to move in that particular direction.

Mrs Overend: Does the Minister believe that there is currently sufficient childcare provision to enable parents to take up part-time training courses or employment?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. That is a slightly broader issue than our approach to supporting training for childcare. However, looking at some of the different programmes that we are bringing forward, we are very conscious of the issues that participants may be facing, and childcare may well be one of those. Perhaps the most recent example that we can cite is the economic inactivity strategy, where we have recognised that, in terms of the inactive population, one of the target groups is those with family commitments. Often, that will predominantly be females with childcare responsibilities. We are looking to see how we can provide innovative solutions to encourage people who are interested in working but perceive barriers to overcome those barriers and participate fully in the labour market.

Ms Lo: Minister, I was speaking with Employers for Childcare this morning about the shortage of childcare workers. It told me that there is a great shortage; it cannot recruit enough qualified childcare workers. Apparently, trying to get qualifications is very expensive; it can be up to £1,200 per course to get people qualified. Is there —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to her question.

Ms Lo: — any possibility of helping or subsidising those courses?

Dr Farry: We are looking a range of different provision. One of the interesting developments that will be coming forward shortly is the outcome of the review of youth training. In particular, we will be looking to see how we can support and incentivise training for people leaving school at 16 or other young people between the ages of 16 and 24 who have not accessed employment or do not yet have the qualifications to do so. There will be particular opportunities under that strategy in the field of childcare.

John J Sweeney Scholarship

2. Mr Ó Muilleoir asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the importance of the John J Sweeney scholarship in applied peace and conflict studies being based at the International Conflict Research Institute (INCORE) at Ulster University. (AQO 8293/11-15)

Dr Farry: I very much welcome the introduction of the John J Sweeney scholarship at Ulster University's international conflict research institute. The scholarship is open to all US citizens who have been offered a full-time place on Ulster University's MSc in applied peace and conflict studies and who are members, or have a familial connection to a member, of the American Federation of Labor-Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO). This fully supports my Department's stated aim to increase the numbers of international students studying in Northern Ireland. It is a coup for Ulster University which will further enhance the institution's international standing. This is the first year of the scholarship, and my officials have been informed that there are already 18 applicants for this year's intake.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire fosta. Thank you, Minister. Given the recent appointment of Tom Moran as chancellor of Queen's University, how can we encourage increased interest via the diaspora in our universities? John Sweeney was, of course, an eminent member of AFL-CIO. Is there a way in which we can join together to encourage other labour unions to support scholarships at our universities?

Dr Farry: First of all, I very much welcome the appointment of Tom Moran. It is an excellent appointment. I have already written to congratulate him in that regard. Our universities have to be very much outward-facing. They are not here as universities servicing a local market; they are part of Northern Ireland's wider outreach to the world. They should be seen as global players in their own right.

We have some very particular challenges at present with the very regrettable cuts that we have had to pass on to universities. We are seeing a situation where we are losing places. Our universities will be very keen to encourage more and more international students; that has been a long-standing commitment, not least in terms of our current higher education strategy. However, we also have to be very mindful of offering opportunities for local students. There is a very real danger of the displacement of students out of Northern Ireland to Great Britain or the South of Ireland, or, indeed, people not going to university at all.

For sure, we can do a lot more around scholarships. If more scholarships come forward, including from local businesses or major investors in Northern Ireland, that will, in itself, create opportunities. For example, we have a new scholarship programme in computing and engineering that has about 20 places on offer. That is moving in that direction, but we need more of it. However, scholarships, in and of themselves, cannot make up the shortfall and the pressures that the sector is, very sadly, facing at present.

Performing Arts Courses

3. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister for Employment and Learning, given the proposed closure of the Belfast Metropolitan College Tower Street campus, how he will ensure specialist performing arts training remains available and accessible for young people. (AQO 8294/11-15)

Dr Farry: Preparing our young people for the jobs of the future is a priority for my Department and the Executive's Programme for Government. That includes the provision of training in the performing arts. Although Belfast Met's Tower Street campus will no longer offer dance and drama courses beyond the end of the current academic year, students currently enrolled at Tower Street will be able to continue and complete their studies at the college.

Belfast Met has been working closely with South Eastern Regional College (SERC) on options that might be offered to those wishing to commence performing arts courses from September 2015. The £12 million investment in the new SPACE facility at SERC's Bangor campus will offer students wishing to pursue a career in this area a wide range of high quality courses that will be delivered in a world-class learning environment. The courses will mirror those currently delivered at Belfast Met. SPACE includes rehearsal and production studios and a theatre that can permit the staging of professional productions. Performing arts courses will also continue to be provided at SERC's Lisburn campus. Other colleges, including Northern Regional College's Ballymoney and Newtownabbey campuses, offer a range of performing arts courses from level 2 through to level 5. Students will be able to apply for courses commencing in September.

Mr B McCrea: That is all very well, Minister, but it does not really address the issue. The performing arts associations have issued a statement; I am sure that you are aware of it because Dan Gordon has been quite vociferous. Bangor is too far away for many people, and it does not offer the specialist courses that the industry needs. People would like to know what you are going to do about it.

Dr Farry: The first remark to make is that we are getting very close to a sense of parochialism in that, if it is not in Belfast, it does not work. I am surprised that a Member for Lagan Valley, who actually has performing arts offered in his constituency in Lisburn, is buying into the argument that, if it is not in Belfast, it cannot work. We have colleges across Northern Ireland delivering performing arts courses very successfully. If you take the logic of what is being said to its conclusion, if it is not in Belfast, it does not matter. That is a terrible message to send to the other five colleges and, indeed, students who are functioning there.

I am sure that the Member is very much aware that we are going through an unprecedented level of cuts in Northern Ireland. I would not like to see any courses being cut, but the sad reality is that we are passing on a £12 million cut to the FE sector this year. I know that the Member is not responsible for the Budget mess that we find ourselves in, but I would like to think that he would at least acknowledge the context in which the colleges are operating and their need to take some very tough decisions. The fact is that this particular decision by Belfast Met has a very clear mitigating factor in the context that we have a brand-new, state-of-the-art facility coming online in Bangor in September. It is 13 miles from Belfast. If we are suggesting that, if it is not on people's doorstep, they cannot function, we are in very real danger of missing the point, not least given the fact that we have a Northern Ireland of six counties and six FE colleges.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister give a breakdown of the current labour market information pertaining to specialist performing arts?

Dr Farry: I am happy to write to the Member to give an indication of any figures that we have on file from the employment service on some very particular vacancies that may exist. We are also developing in conjunction with Ulster University a skills barometer that will give us much better real-time information on where there are emerging opportunities in the economy. I am not diminishing whatsoever the importance of performing arts to the future of our economy and, indeed, the wider creative industries. They are of absolute importance, as are many other subjects.

I say particularly to the Member, given that he is from Sinn Féin, that the answer to the dilemma that we find ourselves in very much lies within the power of his party and the SDLP to adopt a different approach to the Budget madness that we are facing. The singular approach around welfare has already had major knock-on consequences. Unless we have a change of course, we are going to see this situation deteriorate even further and end up with people asking similar types of questions but not actually joining the dots as to why certain things are happening.

Mr Lyttle: I have had the privilege of visiting the Belfast Metropolitan College Tower Street facility. In what is clearly a vibrant learning environment, I met acting and dance students from Belfast, Donegal, Austria and America, some of whom have already performed in shows like 'Vikings' and 'The Fall'. What would the Minister say to students and professionals who genuinely believe that it is a wrong decision by Belfast Metropolitan College to apply a 100% reduction to this provision and who are genuinely concerned and have reasoned arguments that the provision at SERC Bangor is not an appropriate alternative?

Dr Farry: People should visit Bangor. Indeed, I think, 20 students took the opportunity, only this past weekend, to go down to talk to local staff, view the emerging facilities and see for themselves the real value of the investment that is being made in students for everyone across Northern Ireland.

Freight Transport and Logistics Training

4. Mr Hussey asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the importance of training in freight transport and logistics in relation to local economic development. (AQO 8295/11-15)

Dr Farry: The relevant training and skilling of the workforce is vital for local economic development. That applies not only to the transport and logistics sector but to all sectors of our economy. My officials work with businesses, universities and colleges to identify, plan for and meet workforce development needs through a range of curricular provision, from entry level to foundation degrees.

I have commissioned the Northern Ireland Centre for Economic Policy to develop a Northern Ireland skills barometer. That will indicate where there are skills gaps, where they are emerging and where they are forecast to emerge over the medium and longer term. The barometer will help to shape all areas of skills provision.

The Ulster University delivers a BSc(Hons) in transportation and a master's degree in transportation planning. The university is also planning to introduce a specialism in logistics/supply chain management as part of its business studies programme. The Northern Regional College provides two courses at level 3 for transport managers. In the academic year 2013-14, there were six enrolments, and there were nine in the current year. That course will be available for the forthcoming academic year as well.

Recently, my officials met representatives from the sector to discuss how they can work more closely together. That includes liaising with the employment service to assist in filling some current vacancies, and with the Careers Service on the promotion of the sector within schools. The Department is willing to work with and support the sector, wherever possible.

Mr Hussey: I thank the Minister for his response so far. In your response, Minister, you made reference to the BSc(Hons) degree and the MSci in transport planning at UUJ. Is it not the case that those are going to be stopped? Is that not very short-sighted?

Dr Farry: As I said to Mr McCann, a moment ago, a whole host of things, which, on the surface, seem very short-sighted and nonsensical, are happening, but we are in a situation where, in the forthcoming year, we will be taking £16 million out of higher education and £12 million out of further education. Universities are going to have to take some very difficult decisions. The decisions that were taken were those for Ulster University to make. It is its job, not the job of the Department, to determine which courses are offered and which are not. The universities are seeking to rationalise the courses that are on offer. In that way, they are better placed to maximise the number of opportunities for students in Northern Ireland. I appreciate that there are particular consequences for the sector from those decisions. We are in discussions with the sector, and opportunities may well emerge to address those particular high-skilled demands. In particular, I draw your attention to the apprenticeships strategy and the fact that we have money under the change fund for pilots. To my estimation, that type of course, particularly given its vocational nature, would lend itself very readily to a higher-level apprenticeship. Through that course, we may actually see the needs of the sector being not only addressed but addressed in a more efficient and effective manner.

Mr Campbell: Will the Minister undertake to examine such issues as the one that was brought to my attention in my constituency, in which a private sector company, an expertise of which is training people for HGV courses, has found it extremely difficult to compete with other companies whose practices are not as in-depth and comprehensive as theirs? Some allegations were made about dealings that were not entirely in keeping with legislation that restricts companies like the legitimate company that came to me.

Dr Farry: I would be very happy to take a look at the issue, if the Member could drop me a line or an email to set out some of the issues. Some of the factors will be whether we are talking about an entirely private sector situation or about some degree of public-sector involvement. The potential way forward, the Member suggests, would be set in the context of the contracting of a lot of the skills offer that we have and the provision within FE and higher education. I am more than happy to look at the points that the Member has raised.

Mr Dallat: I am sure that the Minister agrees that transport and logistics is not exactly a new phenomenon. Indeed, it probably dates back to the days of the red flag. Will the Minister explain to us why he is only making plans now for the development of this and why these subjects are not integrated across a range of degree courses, so that we can catch up with the rest of Europe, which is light years ahead of us in training people for transport and logistics?

Dr Farry: The issue probably predates the red flag; people were transporting things before the motor car was invented. We have historical provision. The situation is evolving, and I have explained why that is the case. At the same time, under my watch, we are developing a new approach to vocational training, in the apprenticeships strategy and the strategy on youth training. If the Member wants to go down the avenue of asking, "Why is this only being done now? This is not rocket science", I would remind him that his party held this Department in the first mandate of the Assembly, from 1999 onwards, and there was no revolution in vocational training — if I can use the term "revolution" when we talk about transport — at that particular time, but it is now being addressed.

Youth Unemployment: Foyle

5. Mr Middleton asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the strategies being pursued, or proposed to be pursued, to reduce the level of youth unemployment in Foyle. (AQO 8296/11-15)

Dr Farry: My Department has a wide range of measures to address youth unemployment in Foyle and will be implementing the new initiatives from 2015-16 to improve opportunities for young people across Northern Ireland.

The youth employment scheme was introduced to help those aged between 18 and 24 to develop skills, compete for jobs and sustain employment. In the Foyle and Lisnagelvin jobs and benefits offices' catchment areas, a total of 1,200 young people participated between July 2012 and March 2015. To date, over 400 participants have moved into subsidised or unsubsidised employment. A refreshed youth employment scheme will be introduced from June 2015, subject to funding being available.

The main employment programme, Steps 2 Success, is delivered by EOS NI in the Foyle area. Steps 2 Success is available to all eligible jobseekers, irrespective of their employability need or age. Clients who are in receipt of jobseeker's allowance and aged between 18 and 24 will be mandated onto the programme after nine months on benefit.

I recently introduced Into Work Training Support, enabling clients to undertake short training courses to improve their employability. In addition, enterprise allowance, a new measure of support for clients seeking to start their own business, was made available from April.

The Department is leading in the development of the United Youth programme. The target group for the pilots beginning in 2015-16 are those aged between 16 and 24, who are not in education, employment or training.

We are also undertaking a review of youth training. It is planned that the new proposed youth training system will be available to all young people aged between 16 and 24, facilitating progression into an apprenticeship, further education or sustained employment. A series of pilot initiatives will be implemented during the current financial year, prior to implementation in full in the next year.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for his response and welcome the new initiatives and those that he already has in place. Will he advise what conversations or engagement he has had with other Departments about getting out the message as to how young people can get involved in these initiatives?

Dr Farry: We have certainly encouraged other Departments to offer opportunities, and I am pleased that all my ministerial colleagues understand the logic of that. We have also spoken to arm's-length bodies and to district councils about offering placements. However, in the current financial context, we have a situation where there is an inevitability about a lot of the public-sector organisations wishing to shed staff. In that context, opportunities in the public sector are going to be very limited or, indeed, next to impossible. We have to have a wider discussion around the continued problem of youth unemployment. The Member will be aware that, in 2012, the Executive came forward with a major package of funding over three years to fund the youth employment scheme. Sadly, given the context around the Budget, it was never going to be viable for the Executive to renew that particular pot, so we are now in a situation where, from existing resources — there is even a question mark over those, as the Member will be aware — we are trying to offer a more limited package of opportunities in direct interventions to help young people.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I noted that he said that of the 1,200 young people who participated in the youth employment programme, 400 had moved into subsidised or unsubsidised employment. Can the Minister break that figure down further and give us an indication of how many moved into quality or sustainable employment?

Dr Farry: We are happy to come back to the Member with the precise figures, but it is important to bear in mind the range of different job opportunities out there for young people. Some will be of a permanent nature and some will be of a temporary nature. All are of worth, and it is important that we do not create some sort of hierarchy or dismiss opportunities. It is very important that we encourage young people to get that experience because it allows them, in turn, to progress to other opportunities, or to go back into further education or higher education. The worst possible situation is that we get defensive about opportunities and end up with young people being left on the shelf so that their education or training goes rusty. If they have not invested in skills, they will very quickly be overtaken by other cohorts of young people coming through. They would then face a life of unemployment or economic inactivity, so it is very important, for a whole range of reasons, that we encourage people on that journey.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Of course, the Foyle constituency has the highest levels of any type of unemployment in all the Westminster constituencies. That was the case long before the welfare discussion, or crisis, as the Minister likes to talk about.

What progress are we making in increasing the maximum student number (MaSN) at the North West Regional College, which will, of course, be essential in trying to tackle youth unemployment and underemployment?

Dr Farry: First, I concur with the Member that there are major structural issues in relation to unemployment and economic inactivity, which is the hidden form of unemployment, and that both are particularly high in the Foyle constituency. It is a bit of a stretch to jump into the issue of MaSN and the potential expansion at Magee —

Mr Eastwood: [Inaudible.]

Dr Farry: — but let me stress that we are processing the business case and waiting for revised information to come forward from the strategy group. If we are to see the expansion of MaSN, we need to have the funding to do that. I am happy to bid for that, but we have to have a sense of reality about it. I mean —

Mr Eastwood: That is not what I asked you.

Dr Farry: — we are talking about a situation in which we will need recurring money, in excess of £29 million or £30 million every year, to facilitate that. That is on top of the very deep cut to higher education that we already face.

I hear the Member mentioning from the sidelines that that is not what he asked. He asked whether there was any progress on increasing MaSN. There is no point in increasing MaSN if you do not have the money to back it up: it is an utterly futile and pointless gesture to make.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member that when he asks the Minister a question, he allows the Minister to answer without being interrupted.

Apprenticeships: South Antrim

7. Mrs Cameron asked the Minister for Employment and Learning how many people took up higher level apprenticeships in South Antrim during 2013-14. (AQO 8298/11-15)

14. Mr Girvan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the number of apprentices in South Antrim. (AQO 8305/11-15)

Dr Farry: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I wish to group questions 7 and 14 and request an additional minute for the answer.

The latest published figures indicate that, at the end of January this year, 461 apprentices from the South Antrim constituency were undertaking Apprenticeship NI-funded training in a range of subject areas. Engineering has the highest programme occupancy in any single area, with 88 apprentices. Of the overall number, 228 apprentices are working towards level 3 apprenticeship framework qualifications, including 46 undertaking level 2 en route to level 3, and 233 are working towards level 2 apprenticeship framework qualifications.

The Department is in the early stages of testing higher level apprenticeships as part of the implementation of the new strategy. Between 2013 and 2014, those opportunities were taken up by 106 people across Northern Ireland. However, it is not possible, at this stage, to break the figures down to a constituency level. Seven high-level pilots are under way across five occupational areas including professional services, ICT, engineering, accountancy and life sciences, and off-the-job training has been tested by four further education (FE) colleges, including the Northern Regional College (NRC). They are working with employers including Schrader Electronics, Acute Engineering Surveys (AES) Ltd and Michelin to deliver an engineering apprenticeship.

In total, there are now over 120 higher-level apprentices working with 46 different employers across Northern Ireland.

2.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions. Question 1 has been withdrawn.

Post-19 Special Educational Needs

T2. Ms McGahan asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on his Department's review of post-19 special educational needs for further education and disability employment services in her constituency. (AQT 2582/11-15)

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her ongoing interest in the area. As she will know, we conducted an audit on further education provision across Northern Ireland in those areas, and we are trying to preserve things in the face of pressures in the sector, and, indeed, in other sectors, at present.

The issue of transitions is being discussed at Executive subcommittee level. It is one of the topics that was discussed by the Bamford committee dealing with mental health and learning disability issues, and an action plan has recently been agreed across Departments on how to co-ordinate services better. There is a range of different players involved. My Department has a role to play in further education. There is also a role for the Department of Education in planning better for transitions, for the Department of Health in day-centre provision and for DRD on transport facilities. Work is under way with Departments to try to ensure a more coordinated approach, but it is important to bear in mind that, as with everything at this stage, we are hampered by a lack of finance.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his response. What engagements have you had with South West College regarding post-19 special educational needs in Fermanagh and South Tyrone?

Dr Farry: As the Member knows, the college is extremely proactive in almost every area of its work and is very much part and parcel of the community. We have had ongoing discussions with the college on the whole spectrum of its activity. Like others, it is trying to do its best in very trying circumstances to ensure that it can continue to deliver. It is conscious of issues around trying to ensure that there is a level playing field for provision across all areas, and, in that regard, it is not any different from any other college, given that there are always issues around ensuring that there is equal provision in different parts of Northern Ireland. It is almost impossible to provide that, given the nature of geography and funding limitations.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next Member, I want to say that Hansard is having some difficulty with the mics. Members should direct their mic towards them when speaking. Thank you.

Strengthening the All-Ireland Research Base: Update

T3. Ms Boyle asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the strengthening the all-Ireland research base programme. (AQT 2583/11-15)

Dr Farry: A number of different initiatives are under way, and, as the Member will know, it is important that we seek to develop more and more collaboration on high-level research. A global phenomenon is what is expected. Several years ago, I signed an agreement with Richard Bruton, my equivalent in the Republic of Ireland, for a partnership between Science Foundation Ireland (SFI) and my Department to support collaborative funding for research on a North/South basis. Indeed, we announced a number of such projects during May. The Member is hopefully aware of that, and we can provide further details if she wishes to receive them.

The Executive are very keen that we maximise the drawdown from Horizon 2020, and some very challenging targets have been set. The collaboration that we do, particularly around the SFI-DEL investigators programme partnership, gives us a very strong foundation on which we can then move into Horizon 2020. Other collaborations are already happening in that regard, and, of course, given that it is European funding involved, they are very keen to push collaboration between different jurisdictions.

We are very hopeful that there will be some very strong progress on Horizon 2020 over the coming months, and I urge the Member to look out for that.

Finally, I stress that we are privileged to be part of the US-Ireland research and development alliance, which is an agreement between both jurisdictions on the island and the US State Department. That sponsors a number of collaborative projects. We are seeking to build upon all our different strengths and to make a much bigger impact.

Ms Boyle: I thank the Minister for his response. Can you detail any specific areas of research taking place under the programme? How are they advancing? Go raibh maith agat.

Dr Farry: We will send on a copy of the press release and associated information that will list all the programmes that are happening. I will not attempt to list all the areas off the top of my head, but the Member will be aware of the general priorities that we have for research, particularly life sciences, cybersecurity, agriculture, agrifood, nanotechnology and other areas of life sciences. Those are areas where we believe there are strengths on both sides of the border. We are very keen to build on existing strengths, but we will ensure that the Member has the full list of projects, who is undertaking them and the institutions involved with them.

FE Colleges: Governing Bodies

T4. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister for Employment and Learning when he expects to make an announcement on the reconstitution of the further education colleges' governing bodies. (AQT 2584/11-15)

Dr Farry: It is not a form of reconstitution as such because we are going through a process of gradual incremental change, but there are a number of governor posts that we will seek to fill in the coming weeks. That is at a fairly advanced stage. Given the nature of public appointments, as the Member will well know, I, as Minister, simply sign off on the specification at the outset of the process and then I have no role until recommendations come forward to me from the panels that study the applications for me to make the final appointments. We are not at that stage just yet, but my understanding is that that will be with me in the next few weeks.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answer. In the same vein to do with further education colleges — the Minister might have partly answered this earlier — with the transfer of community development and urban regeneration to councils next year, how does the Minister believe that colleges can collaborate with our local councils to tackle underachievement and low educational standards in their areas?

Dr Farry: I am happy to encourage that. In January, I hosted a dinner between the incoming chief executives of the 11 councils and the directors of the six FE colleges to spark those types of conversations. A number of initiatives are being pursued already in that regard at different speeds in different parts of Northern Ireland. I am hearing some very strong noises about the Northern Regional College and BMC. It is very proactive in that area with Belfast City Council, so, in the Member's area, that work is happening.

There is a very clear opportunity for community planning and urban regeneration for colleges. Also, when they are developing their community plans, skilling and upskilling will be key elements for what they are seeking to do on the economy, and they will quite rightly be looking to FE colleges to provide a lot of the solutions. We are encouraging FE colleges to be the first point of contact for businesses and, by extension, councils at a local level, appreciating that Northern Ireland is not homogeneous and that there are different specialities in different areas, so, again, that is an opportunity.

We also recently devolved what was formerly known as the Department's skills solution service to the FE colleges. Previously, when businesses wanted solutions to their training needs, they went to centralised services. We now take the view that that is better devolved through the FE colleges, where they already have a business development infrastructure, and it is best to build upon that and have that seen as the first point of contact for local businesses. So, we will reroute contacts back to the FE colleges with a stronger localised knowledge to engage with their local community.

JTI Gallaher Workers: Assistance

T5. Mr Frew asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the ongoing work to assist the JTI Gallaher workers. (AQT 2585/11-15)

Dr Farry: There are a number of different initiatives that we committed to doing. One is the potential pursuit of an application to the European globalisation adjustment fund. On previous occasions, I reported to the Assembly the parameters around which a bid needs to be made and the potential difficulties we perceive in trying to see how JTI would fit into it. Ultimately, it will be a decision for the Department for Work and Pensions in London on taking forward a bid, given that it is the national Government in that regard. Again, that is a discussion that we will have to have. That bid can be made only in the context of the redundancies becoming live. As the Member knows, they are still some time away. This is a rather unusual situation to come before us.

While not wishing to disrupt the factory's ongoing work, which is of importance and which, if anything, has been intensifying in recent months, there is a commitment from JTI to work closely with the Department and the Northern Regional College over a skills audit and to then see what additional courses can be put in place to facilitate the retraining of workers who are affected by redundancy.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for his very detailed answer. Will he give the House an assurance that he will continue to work and provide support to JTI employees and that he will also work, as he and his officials have been doing, with Invest NI and the council, which has now set up a working group on the issue?

Dr Farry: I am happy to give the Member that reassurance. I am conscious of the interest of the outgoing Ballymena Borough Council, which, if my lingo is correct, is now Mid and East Antrim Borough Council. I know that it is very keen to work with them. We also highlighted the potential for a critical mass of highly skilled workers, particularly with engineering skills, to come on to the market. As the Member knows, there are engineering companies out there that are keen to recruit. We are seeing what we can do to match workers coming out of JTI with opportunities. Again, we need to be conscious of the timescales in this, because we want to respect the company's ongoing business needs, but I am more than satisfied that there is a full commitment from it to work with us at the appropriate time to make sure that we fully implement the opportunities that are there to assist the workers.

IT Skills: Development

T6. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister for Employment and Learning what further measures he can take to expand the range of skills in IT, especially as, during the general election campaign, in which, although not elected, he had the honour of standing as a candidate, he attended a meeting at which a distinguished local businessman claimed that he could double his workforce in IT if the skills were available, albeit that the Minister has put effort into developing skills, but the businessman was claiming that there is still no breakthrough in the range of IT skills. (AQT 2586/11-15)

Dr Farry: I welcome the Member's interest in the IT sector. It is a sector with huge potential for the local economy, and it is also one that has grown very significantly over recent years. Indeed, it never really experienced a recession as such, unlike some other areas. We have an ICT working group that brings together universities, colleges, Departments and the business community to map out the needs of the sector. Indeed, a meeting has been scheduled for a couple of weeks to review progress on that.

There is a global shortage of IT skills, so Northern Ireland is not alone in having that particular pressure point, but we have a range of different interventions that we are taking forward. We have seen a significant increase in the number of places at university and an increase in the interest and application rate to them. We announced the rebuilding of the Bernard Crossland Building at Queen's earlier this year to facilitate expansion in that regard. Notwithstanding the cuts that the higher education sector is facing, I am pleased that it has given a commitment to seek to protect narrow STEM subjects, which are of particular relevance to the IT sector.

We are also looking to develop higher-level apprenticeships in IT, and, again, one of our early works under the new strategy is a sectoral partnership on that. We also developed a number of different academies under our Assured Skills programme, working predominantly in the IT sector in areas such as data analytics, cloud computing and software testing. Again, that is proving a very good way of providing, in effect, a conversion course for young people to enter the IT sector.

Obviously, we would like to do more. What is important is that we have the resources to do more and that, through careers, we have a good throughput of young people who are interested in skills and careers in this area.

2.45 pm

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I congratulate the Minister on his appointment and welcome him to his first Question Time as Minister. Question 12 has been withdrawn. We will start with listed questions.

Mr McGimpsey: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I join you in welcoming the Minister.

Labour Force Survey: Estimates

1. Mr McGimpsey asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of the latest adjusted labour force survey estimates for Northern Ireland for the period January to March 2015. (AQO 8307/11-15)

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): First, I thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, and Mr McGimpsey for the congratulations.

I am pleased that the latest figures demonstrate that the economic recovery is progressing. That is evident across both short-term and long-term indicators. The claimant count measure, which is best used as a short-term indicator, shows that the number of people claiming unemployment benefits has fallen for the twenty-eighth consecutive month, reducing by 20,500 over that period. The labour force survey, which is best used for examining medium- to long-term trends and making cross-country comparisons, is showing similar improvement, with the current unemployment rate at 6.2%, which is down considerably on its previous high. That same positive trend is also reflected job growth with nearly 30,000 net new jobs added to the local economy since the start of 2012. However, I do not want anybody to feel that I am complacent, despite those positive figures. All of us will recognise that we still have a number of labour market challenges to address.

Mr McGimpsey: I thank the Minister for quoting those figures. Can I quote him two other figures that he omitted? The figure for the economically inactive is the highest in the UK and is up 4,000 from this time last year. Most crucially, our rate of youth unemployment is also the highest in the UK, up 3,000 from last year. Will the Minister undertake to give the same deal to our young people as young people get in Scotland? In Scotland, when young people leave school, they are offered a place in education, training or employment. That way, we will not have an indictment on this House that young people in their hundreds and thousands leave school to go on the dole.

Mr Bell: The Member makes a strong point about our young people that concerns all of us greatly. In terms of economic inactivity, if you look at the European standard measurement, you see that we are slightly below that, and we are slightly below the figure in the Republic of Ireland. I fully accept the concerns that he has expressed.

It will be a joint approach by Minister Farry and me, in conjunction with DSD, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and Invest Northern Ireland. We have a strategy called "Enabling Success". That is what we want to do: enable success. To do that, we have to tackle what the Member rightly points out as the high level of economic inactivity here. The strategy will look at how we can reduce the persistently high levels of economic inactivity in Northern Ireland by helping economically inactive groups to make the transition towards and into the labour market. Key within those target groups are the long-term sick, the disabled and those with family commitments. In particular, I have in mind lone parents and carers.

The draft strategy was agreed at the Executive on 16 April and was published by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Minister for Employment and Learning on 20 April. Implementation has begun on key points, but I will just give two because I am conscious of the time. We have worked on a competitive pilot testing process to test innovative ways to reduce inactivity, and work has begun to develop the proposed way forward for that process. Secondly, we are establishing and facilitating a strategic forum to oversee the delivery issues, improve coordination and increase public awareness of those who are economically inactive.

Mr Spratt: Can I too be associated with the remarks congratulating my friend the Minister on his new appointment? Since Northern Ireland has had an economic downturn across the whole Province and suffered job losses, what assessment does the Minister have for future job creation in the South Belfast constituency?

Mr Bell: The Member makes his point well, and I thank him for his congratulations. I suppose that South Belfast, like all our constituencies elsewhere in Northern Ireland, was impacted by the downturn. However, I am pleased to say that I believe that things are now moving in the right direction. For example, the latest figures show that there has been a sustained fall in the number of people claiming unemployment benefits in South Belfast since early 2013. That is a fall of almost 1,200, equivalent to a fall of approximately one third.

In light of both the Member's question and what Mr McGimpsey raised about the concerns for young people, it is particularly welcome that we see significant falls in the number of claimants amongst young people aged 18 to 24. They have fallen by more than 600 since the recent peak, and there have been improvements in the number of long-term unemployed — those who have been claiming benefit for 12 months or more. Those numbers have fallen by more than 300 since the recent peak. It is important that the Member raises his constituency, but, when we look at job opportunities and at addressing unemployment in South Belfast, we should not become overly localised. New jobs in any part of the city will create opportunities for people right across the city of Belfast and beyond. I look forward to further progress in those areas.

Composite Economic Index

2. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of the implications of the Northern Ireland composite economic index on driving local economic growth. (AQO 8308/11-15)

Mr Bell: First, I believe that the composite economic index provides us with a good short-term measure of how the local economy is performing, in the absence of GDP figures. However, to clarify, this measure does not drive growth; it measures growth. The latest results showed that local economic activity expanded by a relatively modest 1.1% on an annual basis. However, it is pleasing that the growth was driven by the private sector, which posted 2% growth over the year. The index shows that our production sector has been performing particularly well, with services also posting solid growth. While the construction sector is still facing difficulties, I welcome some emerging signs of growth in that sector.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. I also offer my congratulations to the Minister on his recent appointment to his new role.

The economic index shows that local economic growth has been flat in three of the last four quarters. What proposals does the Minister have to ensure that we have sustainable local economic growth?

Mr Bell: I thank the Member for his congratulations. One of the key levers for growth — this is not only what I believe but what the Ulster University economic panel has told us — is to see us develop our corporation tax rate. We simply need a date for when we are going to develop a reduction, and we need the rate to give to businesses. The research is clear: there is a strong economic case for lowering corporation tax. Many Ministers, including the First Minister and deputy First Minister, worked hard to achieve that. If we are to follow the research and reduce the rate to 12.5% in 2017, let us for a moment consider the prize for local economic growth of where we could be: we could create almost 40,000 additional net jobs, and we could see our economy grow by 10%.

In particular, for the West Belfast constituency, I note also that there have been some improvements recently. On an issue that has been a theme in the House, the number of young people aged 18 to 24 who were claiming unemployment benefit in West Belfast has fallen by 900 since the peak.

That is equivalent to almost one half of all young claimants. We have to continue to provide job opportunities, particularly for those young people. Generally, the number of people claiming unemployment benefits in West Belfast since early 2013 has fallen by almost 2,000, which is equivalent to approximately one third.

Mr Dunne: I, too, congratulate the Minister. As a north Down resident, there is no doubt that he will do a good job. Will the Minister give his assessment of the economic impact and the need for political stability in Northern Ireland following the need for a decision on welfare reform?

Mr Bell: The more stability we have, the more we can drive forward the promotion and creation of jobs and build a wonderful future. I know that talks are under way, so I want to be diplomatic in what I say because I want to see those talks reach a successful conclusion and I do not want to see anything that would jeopardise them.

We should all remember where we were in 2011. We set a target to create 25,000 jobs. I was there when that target was lifted from 20,000 to 25,000, because I remember that the First Minister really wanted to drive job creation at that time. We are sitting today with 37,277 jobs; a 49% increase on the target that we set ourselves. We set ourselves a target to have £1 billion of investment, and we have got £2.7 billion of jobs investment; a staggering 167% increase on where we were. We set ourselves a target of £300 million in research and development, and we have delivered £520 million; a 73% increase. We looked for £28 million in the growth loan fund, and we have delivered £30.8 million.

Northern Ireland is very much open for business. We saw the most tremendous Dubai Duty Free Irish Open and the PRO12 rugby final. I spoke to hoteliers in Belfast who had completely sold out back-to-back and were struggling to get people accommodation. We have a great country with great sporting events and an economy that has the potential to grow by almost 10% and deliver some 40,000 new jobs. Friends, that is a prize that none of us can afford to lose.

Mr McKinney: I, too, congratulate the Minister on his recent appointment and I welcome the figures that he just reflected on. However, does he agree that the target figures that he mentioned for corporation tax will not shift us sufficiently from the 66% reliance on the public sector and 34% reliance on a weakened private sector to allow Northern Ireland to stand on its own two feet?

Mr Bell: Unemployment today is at 6.2% and, over the previous four years of this Assembly period, we have, for the vast majority of that time, had lower unemployment per capita in Northern Ireland than the rest of the UK. We have had significantly lower unemployment than the Republic of Ireland. If you take that 6.2% and add to it some of the things that we are trying to do, particularly around growing the tourism industry to a £1 billion industry by 2020 and improving on our golf tourism, think of all of the jobs that will flow from that.

Sometimes, it is important to look at what we have done and where we need to go. Look at the results of just the last year, and I congratulate my predecessor, Invest NI, the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee and all the people who worked so hard to deliver all this. In 2014-15, 13,829 jobs were secured. That was the highest ever. We created 9,410 jobs; again, that was the highest ever. We put in £1.4 billion of investment; the highest that we have ever done. We brought 25 new investors for Northern Ireland; again, the highest figure ever. We also got a customer satisfaction rate of 85%; the highest ever recorded.

Northern Ireland is very much open for business. Many of us saw, over the last couple of days, significant investors here for the sporting events taking time to look at what Northern Ireland has to offer. I tell you this: they went away very impressed.

3.00 pm

Labour Market Survey: Derry and Strabane

3. Mr McCartney asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, in light of the recent labour market survey, which listed Derry City and Strabane District Council as the area with the highest percentage of people claiming jobseeker's allowance, what additional interventions are planned in the areas of highest unemployment and of greatest need. (AQO 8309/11-15)

Mr Bell: Under local government reform, local councils now have the responsibility for some local economic development functions. Invest Northern Ireland is a statutory partner in the community planning process and will actively work with a range of stakeholders to address the social and economic issues in the local area. Invest Northern Ireland is also co-funding the development of an integrated economic strategy for the council area.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Indeed, I congratulate him on his recent appointment to the post. The Minister will be aware that the business start-ups that were administered through the local councils have been cut, particularly in neighbourhood renewal areas, where they were of some value. Has the Minister any proposals to alleviate that cut?

Mr Bell: It would be good to take a wee look at where we are for the Member's constituency; I did that in the research to answer his question. The number of new jobs brought to Foyle by Invest Northern Ireland has increased by 156% in five years, from 340 in 2009-2010 to 871 in 2013-14. I congratulate all those in the Foyle constituency who worked so hard to make that a success. Of the 2,496 jobs that were promoted in Foyle during the five years, 1,269 were in locally owned companies and 1,227 in externally owned companies. We have a good balance between locally and externally owned.

The Member raised the point of start-ups. Over the past five years, the regional start initiative (RSI) has offered support to 892 people in the Foyle constituency area, helping them to develop their business plan for a new business. In addition to the RSI, Invest Northern Ireland has offered £1.4 million of assistance to start-up businesses in Foyle over the last five years. Invest Northern Ireland support for business development and investment in the region has been targeted not only at job creation but at other business development activities, such as research and development and skills development. Really, it is all about targeting and underpinning business competitiveness to sustain jobs and eventually lead to what we hope will be growth and more employment opportunities in your area.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for his answers so far and wish him well in his new post. Can the Minister outline — he touched on this in his previous answer — what investment in research and development is being made in the Londonderry and Strabane council area?

Mr Bell: I gave some of the figures for the new jobs that have been promoted. I also gave some of the figures for the start-ups and the investment that has gone in. We will continue with that, right across the board, in Foyle and in East Londonderry, where 904 jobs were promoted in locally owned companies and three in externally owned, while support was provided to 826 people in the East Londonderry constituency as well.

There is a good news story to tell about Londonderry and Strabane specifically. Unfortunately, I do not have a long time to tell it in; I get two minutes. Let us look at two particular areas in the Strabane and Londonderry area. Let us look at Waste Systems Ltd. It designs and manufactures equipment primarily for use in the waste and quarry industries. Since its foundation six years ago, turnover has increased steadily year by year. The company, currently based in Plumbridge, County Tyrone, has secured a number of awards and accolades in recognition of the innovative nature of the product, with virtually all sales being exported outside Northern Ireland. Two grants for research and development offers have been issued to support the development of equipment to separate light waste and stones from a biodegradable product.

The second one that I will briefly touch on is Seagate Technology Ireland. A major research and development project in the area was announced in October 2014. It provides the read/write heads for Seagate's final hard disk drive products. All output from the Springtown plant is supplied to other parts of the Seagate group, mainly in Asia-Pacific areas.

Mr Dallat: May I just add my congratulations to the Minister and tell him that I strongly believe in the old adage that a new brush sweeps clean. The Minister made reference to East Derry. Will he, being that new brush, agree with me that we desperately need an economic task force set up in the north-west to identify the strengths of the region but also to establish why there has been a dearth of potential inward investors to that region, which has been savaged over the last decade, with losses of jobs in industry, textiles and farming?

Mr Bell: I thank the Member for his congratulations. Certainly, if there is anything that we can do for the constituency, my door is open to do that. I will certainly try to encourage and push. Many Members in the House have sat with key investors from right across the world over the past week. They were over for the golf, and we used the time to talk to those investors. Karen McKeivitt is shaking her head, and there are many others. We have to let business go where business goes, to a certain extent, but we will certainly try to look towards what we can do to support jobs and job creation.

It is important, because, in East Londonderry, the number of jobs promoted increased by 68% over the past five years. That went from 151 in 2009-2010 to 254 last year. As I said earlier to Mr Middleton, when you take a breakdown of the 907 jobs that were promoted during those five years, you see that, staggeringly, locally owned companies had 904 of those and externally owned companies only had three.

Over the past five years, the regional start initiative has offered support to 826 people in the East Londonderry constituency area to help them develop their plan to develop their new business. In addition to the RSI, Invest Northern Ireland has offered £0.8 million of assistance to start-up businesses in East Londonderry over the last five years. So, the door is open. Let us encourage to build upon what we know are very highly skilled and highly motivated people working in that constituency area.

Hotel: Downpatrick

4. Mr Wells asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what assistance his Department can provide to encourage the building of a new hotel in Downpatrick. (AQO 8310/11-15)

Mr Bell: New hotel developments may benefit from capital support from Invest Northern Ireland if the promoter can demonstrate that the project is market-driven with the capability of attracting visitors from outside Northern Ireland and not displacing business from similar projects. New hotel projects offering at least 30 rooms may be considered for support. Invest Northern Ireland is happy to engage with any promoter who may meet the criteria for support.

Mr Wells: I join others in welcoming Mr Bell to his position, and I am sure that he will join me in congratulating the previous holder of the position. He is building on a very firm foundation laid by Mrs Foster, who achieved so much in that role. Will he accept that it really is very regrettable that a town the size of Downpatrick does not have a new, large, modern hotel at the moment, and that the issue of displacement does not arise because there is really no provision over a very wide part of east Down?

Will his Department continue to work with those who already have planning approval for a hotel in the town to ensure that this facility, which has been missing for so long, is brought back to the area?

Mr Bell: The Member makes two very good points. First, I thank you for your congratulations to me and my predecessor, Arlene Foster, who did an amazing job. Her record speaks for itself. More jobs were created in that four-year period than in any previous four-year period. We have more foreign direct investment per head of the population than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. The targets that I outlined earlier were passed significantly, which shows the level of competence and professionalism that Mrs Foster gave to the job.

If the Member has a promoter or developer who wants to see me about a hotel, I will certainly work alongside them. We have to keep to the rules that I laid out. It is the same for everybody right across the place. Over the past weekend, south Down in particular showed the very best of what Northern Ireland could be. Not only was it stunningly beautiful but it brought in some of the world's best golfers. Not only did the sell-out crowd of 107,000 behave marvellously but 1,100 volunteers, many from the south Down area and many others from golf clubs across Northern Ireland and further afield, gave of themselves to make that such a success.

On Saturday night, I had a difficult conversation about hotel accommodation with Gerry, Alison and their team, who did a marvellous job with Visit Belfast. We were at the Pro 12 rugby final, and, on the back of that and the hugely successful Dubai Duty Free Irish Open, you simply could not get a hotel space in the Belfast area. That, I think, that will add to the pressure to increase the number of hotels elsewhere.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, congratulate the Minister on his new role. He referred, of course, to the success of the Irish Open. On the back of the recent Irish Open in Portrush, we have seen that whatever north Antrim can do south Down can certainly do better. Unfortunately, in recent years, be it through Invest NI or the tourism bodies, south Down has played second fiddle to areas such as Belfast and north Antrim. Will the Minister now pledge not just to wait for hotel developers to come to his Department and Invest NI but to proactively engage with people and business interests in south Down to build what can be a primary tourist resort not just in the North but in all of Ireland?

Mr Bell: I am more than happy to speak to anybody. The door will be open, and we will make time available. South Down is definitely riding high. Not only do you have one of the world's best golf courses, you have a population and volunteers willing to serve and develop the tourism industry there. I want to build on that. I want to encourage that. That is what this is all about.

I also put on record my congratulations to Minister Ford and Minister Kennedy. In all my life, I do not think that I have ever travelled as easily into Newcastle as I did on Friday, Saturday and Sunday. The transport arrangements were fantastic. The security was low-key but brilliant.

A number of us were with South Down MLAs in Montalto House, and we spoke privately to key investors. I would love to tell you just who those people were because you would get an indication of the depth of their ability to promote jobs and boost the economy, but, due to commercial sensitivity, I cannot. Without exception, every person who visited south Down came away overwhelmed by the generosity of its people, its beauty and the fact that not only could you put on a world-class event but you could do so to a world-class standard. Anything that I can do to build on the legacy that the Dubai Duty Free Irish Open has left us — with 107,000 spectators, it must surely rank as the best ever, as far as I am aware — and develop the tourism offering, consider it done.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the periods for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

3.15 pm

Mr Lyttle: I add my congratulations to the Minister on his recent appointment. I thoroughly enjoyed scrutinising and supporting his work in his former Department and look forward to working with him in his new post. I also add my congratulations to him and everyone involved with the successful Irish Open at the weekend, perhaps in particular to Rory McIlroy for being the ambassador that he has become for this region.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to a question.

PricewaterhouseCoopers: 'UK Economic Outlook'

T1. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment how he will respond to the key challenges listed in a recent edition of PricewaterhouseCoopers' (PwC) 'UK Economic Outlook', which, although it confirmed that Northern Ireland has, thankfully, enjoyed falling unemployment, an expanding workforce, modest recovery in exports and property and a vibrant hospitality and tourism sector, found that there are ongoing challenges to increase the average wages earned by people in Northern Ireland and productivity. (AQT 2591/11-15)

Mr Bell: I thank the Member for his congratulations. They are much appreciated. He did a tremendous job scrutinising me in my previous role, and I look forward to working with him in future, particularly for East Belfast, which is an area that I love. The one thing that Chris and I share with Rory McIlroy is that we are old school friends. I think that I am the oldest among the three of us, sad to say.

I will address your other point, but I want to address your point about Rory McIlroy first so that it does not get lost. The importance of Rory McIlroy cannot be overestimated. He came in as the world's number one golfer and used all his influence. I talked to many of the other golfers, and I know for a fact that he could have been doing a thousand other things, many of which would have been financially more lucrative, yet he set aside all of those, not only for the Rory Foundation but to bring a top-class list of golfers here. We are indebted to him for what he did.

As to where we need to go in the future, we need to create high-value jobs. I think that that is what the Member was referring to. We have to do that by investing in our research and development and our skills base and by looking to where the key areas for growth are. The Member mentioned tourism, and we are looking towards growing that to a billion-pound industry by 2020. A theme of the question was golf, and we are specifically looking to golf tourism. We are currently bringing in somewhere around £33 million from that, and we want to grow that to £50 million. With the successful Irish Open, a future Irish Open in 2017 and hopefully, if everything works out, the Open in 2019, we are on a trajectory to achieve that.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his answer. What impact is the current impasse on welfare reform and the uncertainty over budgets having on the economy and the potential investment that he will be working to achieve in Northern Ireland?

Mr Bell: With talks under way, I hesitate to say anything that could be considered undiplomatic. However, let me say this: I am told that business relies on security and stability. Northern Ireland has been given a unique opportunity to govern itself through these devolved institutions. We have significantly surpassed many of the targets for jobs, investment, research and development and growth loan funds, as I outlined earlier. We have surpassed all of those. We have done that because we have a highly skilled and motivated group of people. We now attract more foreign direct investment per head than any other part of the United Kingdom. One of the key factors behind that is that a significant majority of all the businesses that have invested in Northern Ireland have subsequently reinvested. I can give a sales pitch, but, more and more, I point investors to people who have invested in Northern Ireland and have subsequently reinvested, because that is the ultimate vote of confidence in Northern Ireland, its people and their skills.

We have no option but to come to an agreement. When we sit with the prize, what will people say if we lose that prize of up to 40,000 jobs and a 10% growth in our economy, something that is in our hands if we can reduce corporation tax? There are some significant businesses that I cannot name that work on a three-year cycle and are ready to start immediately increasing investment in Northern Ireland when we get a date and a rate for corporation tax. Friends, that is very much the way forward.

Invest NI: Programme for Government Targets

T2. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an assessment of Invest NI's delivery of its Programme for Government targets, while also congratulating him on his appointment. (AQT 2592/11-15)

Mr Bell: Invest Northern Ireland cannot be congratulated highly enough. My predecessor took so much of that work forward. The facts bear repetition because they speak for themselves. When we sat down to create the Programme for Government, we asked Invest Northern Ireland to be strategic and to look for a realistic target that it could achieve. It told us that its target at that stage was 20,000 jobs. I remember that in those discussions with the Executive, and particularly with the First Minister, we said that we wanted a target of 25,000 jobs. We pushed that because we wanted to sweat every asset that we had.

Here we are, in Northern Ireland, with 37,277 jobs — almost a 50% increase on what was meant to have been a very difficult target to achieve. We need to continue with our levels of investment in jobs, and we have done that. We set the target of £1 billion, and I can say today that we have put £2.7 billion in place. That is a 167% increase on investment on where we were before.

One of the key drivers is research and development, for which we set a very competitive target of £300 million; we achieved £520 million. We have been talking to companies; I have been talking to them from early this morning, and they are particularly interested in R&D. We are looking at a 73% increase in R&D on what was meant to have been one of the most difficult targets. There have been difficulties with exports; I do not shy away from that. I will continue to push at that, but we all have to realise that, in exports, if the euro falls 15 points against sterling it will automatically create challenges for our market.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for his answer so far. Will he update the House specifically on the most recent figures for 2014-15?

Mr Bell: I will give some of them out again. I am happy to reiterate them because they represent the strongest performance that we have ever had. The headline results for 2014-15 show that 13,829 jobs were secured and 9,410 jobs were created — the highest number that we have ever achieved. It is fuelled by investment, and the investment that we made in 2014-15 amounted to £1.4 billion — the highest rate of investment that we have ever achieved.

We are constantly trying to source new investors. Success often follows success, and in 2014-15, 25 new investors, more than we have ever had before, came to Northern Ireland. The important thing is to ensure that the customers and the people whom Invest Northern Ireland serves are satisfied. The latest figures that I have for 2014-15 show that 85% of investors have recorded a customer satisfaction rate for the work that is ongoing. That shows that Northern Ireland is in a very healthy position, and the onus is on all of us to build on it.

Belfast International Airport: Additional Routes

T3. Mr Clarke asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, after congratulating him on his appointment, whether he has had any discussions with Belfast International Airport or the airlines about the possibility of increasing the number of routes operating from South Antrim. (AQT 2593/11-15)

Mr Bell: I thank the Member for his congratulations. I visited Belfast International Airport (BIA) as part of a tenth anniversary celebration of the United Airlines route, and it was very productive. When I looked at the number of people from not just the airline industry but the travel industry who were there for that celebration, I thought that it shows just what a critical role Belfast International Airport plays. I met Graham Keddie, and I have met him on a number of occasions subsequently at different events. We will continue to do what we can to support the airport's route development endeavours. We support the international airport through the provision of tourism cooperative marketing assistance for airlines that serve BIA. We also organise Northern Ireland-specific stands at the annual World Routes conference. The next World Routes conference takes place in September in Durban in South Africa.

I was delighted to announce last month that Belfast has been successful in its bid to host Routes Europe 2017. That is a huge opportunity for Northern Ireland, because that is a major conference that brings together decision makers from the airlines, airports and tourism authorities and that gives them an opportunity to negotiate and build relationships that will go on to shape the world's future air routes network. To have that in Belfast is a huge vote of confidence for Belfast. The number of people involved from all around the world will provide a significant boost for our economy. We will work with BIA to develop new routes where feasible.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for that very fulsome answer. I am sure that, given that he is a Minister representing Northern Ireland, the Minister will, like me, be concerned at the flow of traffic leaving this area to go to Dublin Airport. I am sure that you agree with me that more needs to be done to promote Belfast International Airport and to prevent so many of our residents on this side of the border heading south. What more can be done to try to prevent that flow of traffic to Dublin and to keep people here in Belfast?

Mr Bell: My Department is in ongoing dialogue with our airports. We want to attract the routes to destinations that are currently served by Dublin Airport and that could be served directly from Northern Ireland. I think that all of us in the House would want to see direct access to destinations such as Germany, Scandinavia and Canada. That would provide increased choice for Northern Ireland residents, but it would also improve our linkages to important business and inbound tourism.

Support that we, as a Department, provide to Northern Ireland's airports is provided in a range of ways, including the tourism cooperative marketing assistance and organising the Northern Ireland-specific stands at the World Routes conference. We are also scoping the potential for a specific air route development fund for Northern Ireland.

The Member talked about the international airport. I was also delighted, in my first weekend in office, to fly back on the new KLM service from Schiphol. That is hugely successful for what it can offer. I was delighted to talk to many of the representatives of KLM, who gave me an indication that orders into the future were extremely healthy. The level of connectivity is key to growing our economy; having a direct flight into, in that case, George Best Belfast City Airport is huge for business. It gives us direct access to America and the Middle East through Schiphol, as well as return. I regard the continuing development of those air routes vital for our economy, and I intend to keep it fairly top of the in tray.

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Regional Development

Coleraine to Londonderry Track Renewal Project — Phase 2

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Trevor Clarke has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister for Regional Development. I remind Members that, if they wish to ask a supplementary question, they should continually rise in their seat. The Member who tabled the question will be called automatically to ask a supplementary question.

Mr Clarke asked the Minister for Regional Development, given the well-publicised pressures on other essential aspects of his Department's budget, what plans he has in place to fund phase 2 of the contracted Coleraine to Londonderry track renewal project.

3.30 pm

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): I believe that the important, and very good, announcement I made earlier today on the commencement of phase 2 of the Coleraine to Londonderry rail project is very good news for the north-west and for railways and public transport. The path to today's announcement has not been straightforward, and it has not been without criticism, but I have remained committed to the north-west and to this project. Today is very tangible evidence of that commitment. We successfully delivered phase 1 on time and on budget. The second phase announced today will safeguard the future of the line and enable an hourly service to be run on it.

Translink's profile of capital spend for this project is one third in 2015-16 and two thirds in 2016-17. Translink's corporate plan includes this project in its plans for this year and next. I can reassure the Member that budgets are in place for this year. This project is a key Programme for Government commitment and, accordingly, it will be prioritised next year. I will make the funding available from my departmental capital budget. The Member will know that budgets have not yet been set for next year. As you are aware, the overall cost of £46 million is higher than originally envisaged, but it reflects the real market we are competing in. The project should be substantially completed by December 2016.

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I thank the Minister for that answer. I also want to put on record my thanks to the Minister for briefing me and the Deputy Chair yesterday on this and other aspects of what is good news for the north-west.

The only bit I am trying to draw attention to today is in relation to the budget. The Minister has outlined the pressures he faces in relation to the £70 million of his capital budget. We went into this project with an estimated £40 million, so there is an extra £6 million in terms of the capital cost. Where is the Minister going to find that additional £6 million? The other alarming part is that his chief accounting officer and the chief executive of Translink have suggested that it does not represent value for money, but you have given them direction to go ahead with it. It is those areas that are concerning me today, Minister.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Chair of the Committee for his question. This has been a challenging project to deliver, and there have been issues that we have had to deal with. On the overall budget, as I said in my original answer, next year's budget is not fixed. However, the fact is that capital moneys will be allocated to the Department for Regional Development. I made it clear to both the Department and Translink that I see this as a priority scheme. It is a Programme for Government scheme and, therefore, has the priority of not only my Department and Translink but the Executive. I will make preparations for it on that basis.

I remind the Member that the caution of the chief executive of Translink and the permanent secretary of my Department was simply a consequence of their own financial responsibilities. They both agreed that to proceed with this project was the best thing to do, given its importance to the north-west and to transport generally. There is no dispute between me and my permanent secretary or the chief executive of Translink.

Mr Spratt: What has the Minister done in relation to the senior officials in the Department and the senior management in Translink who created the shambles in the first procurement process?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. The Member will know that I instigated a PAR (performance assessment review) report, which is being made available to the members of the Committee for Regional Development. I am also indicating today that a copy of that report will be placed in the Assembly Library for all Members to consider. That deals with the issues.

The original problems were caused by a guesstimate, effectively, which was woefully underestimated at something in the region of £20 million. It is worth saying that this work could never have been completed — the work involved could never have been done — for that sum of money of £20 million. A more realistic assessment was carried out at my behest. We have moved to that situation, and we are now able to progress this important scheme. I think that it is positive as we go forward.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his statement, and I welcome it absolutely. It would be churlish not to do so, but, as you rightly said, Minister, this has not been without its hitches. In fact, phase 2 of the project should have been finished at the end of this month, but it has been allowed to go on. I am worried about the fact that it will not be completed, substantially, by the end of December next year. I also welcome the publication of the project assessment review. I cannot see anything in it that the Committee should not have been supplied with at an earlier date. The one line in the statement that bothers me, in reference to the budget of £46.4 million, is that it has created a difficulty. Will the Minister expand on that?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question, and I acknowledge that he has welcomed today's announcement. This is a scheme that there have been challenges in. I believe that the timescale that we are operating at at this point is not that different from the timescale that had been previously hoped for and indicated. That is welcome.

In terms of the capital investment, when I arrived in this Department, the Coleraine/Londonderry line was on a life support machine. There had been insufficient investment, and it was ready, ultimately, for closure. I take pride in the fact that we were able to resurrect it. Lazarus is going to be alive and well here. I hope that that fact can be recognised. I take considerable pride in the fact that it was the Ulster Unionist Party that breathed life into the project and has made it viable. Into the future, people will enjoy the benefit and the additional connectivity that it brings between Belfast and Londonderry.

Mr Dallat: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, we are talking about the railway, which Michael Palin described as one of the wonders of the world. This is a day for celebration; it is a day when we can all get together and say, "Success." Yes, the Minister is an Ulster Unionist, but I do not mind that, because, since he took over the portfolio, he has invested almost £70 million in this railway. He took it over when, as he said himself, it was on life support. Let us look to the future. Can the Minister assure us that his ambition to create a fit-for-purpose station at Derry which is able to accommodate the increasing number of people from the north-west who are choosing rail as a means of travel is still on target?

Finally, this is not just about the north-west; this is about the railway network of Ireland as a whole. It is a fabulous day for everybody.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his complimentary remarks. I know that he, personally, has been a long-standing supporter of the retention and upgrading of the line and, in difficult days, has given support to the overall project. I thank him for that. The Member will know that the old Waterside station is a popular option for the potential new transport hub.

Translink is in the process of negotiating about sites and it will take forward a feasibility study. We will also be actively pursuing EU funding sources. There are not sufficient funds available to us to indicate whether it is possible at this stage, but we will pursue options whereby we can make that dream a reality too.

Mr Hussey: I, too, thank the Minister for his announcement. I know that it will be welcomed by my colleagues in the Foyle constituency and the citizens of Londonderry. I have two questions for the Minister. The first relates to phase 1. Has there been an upsurge in the numbers of the public using the line since phase 1 was completed? Secondly, can you give us an indication of when this project will actually start?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member and thank him for his encouraging comments. In line with the success of rail in Northern Ireland and the major investment that my Department has put into it, I am pleased that this line has shown considerable increase in usage, even in the current circumstances. The number of journeys last year on the line amounted to something like 2.2 million, which is very considerable indeed and represents a 12% increase on the previous year. To those who doubt the wisdom of investing in this rail project, or indeed of investing in public transport, I think that that answers that. The public wants to use this system but we need to improve and upgrade it. Hopefully, in the future, we will achieve an hourly service because that is what the public needs and demands. The work will begin almost immediately, hopefully later this month, and it will continue through to successful completion by the end of 2016.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister clarify whether this commitment of £46 million encompasses everything that was to be done under phase 2, including the loop connection? If not, how and when is that to be provided?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question, and I am happy to confirm that the project includes the provision of the loop service in the Bellarena area. It is a comprehensive project that will meet in full the requirements of phase 2 of this important development.

Mr McNarry: Previously, I have asked the Minister to resign over his lamentable ministerial performances. In the light of him blatantly overriding, in cavalier fashion, advice from his permanent secretary and the Translink CEO by this intention to sink an overspend of £6 million into this project — some might say £26 million in real terms — which is not value for money as they have advised him, will he not resign forthwith?

Mr Kennedy: I am sorry that Mr McNarry has become the Victor Meldrew of this Chamber and can see nothing of a positive nature, particularly, it seems, from his erstwhile colleagues, but we will leave that aside. It might be easy to make hits like that from the luxury of Strangford, but when you need transport connectivity to be improved between Belfast and Londonderry, this is essential work. That is why it was a Programme for Government commitment by the Executive, why it is supported by the vast majority of Members and parties in the Chamber and why, though it has been challenging, we have been able to bring it to a successful conclusion. I have to say that I am disappointed in the ongoing tone adopted by Mr McNarry, which leaves him little more than a Poundworld version of Nigel Farage. [Laughter.]

Mr Easton: I welcome the Minister's statement. It is a good news story for Northern Ireland. In his statement, he mentioned that phase 2 will be substantially completed by 2016. Has it got the potential to go into the 2017-18 financial year? Have there been any other capital schemes that you have had to put back to find the extra £6 million for the project?

3.45 pm

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his welcome of the announcement and of the project itself. I very much hope that we can meet the target. Translink and, no doubt, the contractors will be working to achieve the completion date, which we outlined today, of the end of 2016. We have made provision in this financial year, and I have indicated that I am prepared to treat it as a priority in the next financial year. Hopefully that will resolve the issue of finance.

As for other commitments and capital projects, those are brought forward by Translink on an ongoing basis and will be considered in their own right, subject to the availability of funding.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Mr Speaker: Members will take their ease while we get organised at the top Table.

Executive Committee Business

Justice Bill: Consideration Stage

Clause 7 (Abolition of preliminary investigations)

Debate resumed on Question, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 20, 40, 43, 44, 45 and 46.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Much of what I had to say was touched on earlier in the debate.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Lynch: Regarding the PIs, the Member who moved the amendments made some very compelling points around the concept of “in the interests of justice”. We all want a system that removes avoidable delays, however doing away with PIs completely may not be in the best interests of doing that. There was some debate around the possible exemptions if the amendment is passed, and that is something that the Committee can tease out in further consideration.

Regarding amendment No 20, put forward by the Minister, we support extending the range of matters that can be dealt with by way of video link. However, we must not undermine the effectiveness of the participation of the accused. Single jurisdiction is to allow better coordination of courts, judges and witnesses, thus speeding up the process. The switching of cases can also be in the interests of victims and witnesses, and we also welcome that.

Regarding clause 77, we raise concerns over the process of early pleas and would not want a situation where people unnecessarily plead guilty or vulnerable people are pushed into pleading early without full knowledge of the case and the implications.

Regarding clause 78 and early guilty pleas, I have some sympathy with what Alban Maginness raised earlier for solicitors via client relationship. We are not convinced that it is the statutory duty of a solicitor, and I look forward to the Minister’s response and seeing whether he has some compromise position that can be agreed.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): Before I respond to the points made in the debate, I trust I will have the same indulgence as other Members to make a few general points and to start off —

Mr Speaker: You are not even guaranteed that.

Mr Ford: The Deputy Speakers are so much kinder than you, Mr Speaker.

I would like to start off, initially, by thanking the Justice Committee for the very detailed work that it has done in the consideration of the Bill and progressing it to Consideration Stage today. In particular, I thank the previous and current Chairs — Mr Givan, who, unusually, is not here to hear me praise him, and Mr Ross, who is — and the Deputy Chair, Mr McCartney, who has been around throughout. I thank them for their support and commitment in ensuring that such a long and complex Bill with such a large number of amendments was properly scrutinised by the Committee.

It is worth noting that the policy content of the Bill at introduction and my proposed amendments to introduce new policy additions to the Bill have survived the Committee’s scrutiny without any significant change, and I am grateful for its support for the vast majority of amendments. I take it as a measure of the success of the hard work that has been done by my officials and their dedication in ensuring that properly developed policy proposals were put to the Committee. Whether or not it is appropriate, I add my thanks to the Committee staff for their reciprocation of that work. There was just one aspect of the Bill that the Committee felt unable to support: the clause that deals with supplementary, incidental, consequential and transitional provisions. We look forward to dealing with that later.

Let me turn to the proposals by Mr Allister and his opposition to three clauses standing part, opposition to schedule 2 and his alternative measures as amendments. This measure was put forward by the Department with the support of the Committee in direct response to the views that had been expressed by victims’ organisations about the impact on victims and vulnerable witnesses of often having to give traumatic evidence twice: once at the preliminary investigation or a mixed committal and again at the full trial itself.

Committal is the process that is used to determine whether there is sufficient evidence against a defendant to justify sending them to the Crown Court for trial. It does not determine innocence or guilt; that is the job of the trial in the Crown Court. Mr Maginness referred to the committal process as an important filtering process. When we see that 99.7% or 99.8% of cases progress through the filtering process, it does not seem to me, as it did not seem to the Committee Chair earlier, that there is much of a significant filter.

At present, as Members have said, committal can occur in two ways: either the preliminary investigation (PI), in which witnesses give evidence and are cross-examined, or a preliminary enquiry (PE), where the judge in the Magistrates’ Court decides if there is sufficient evidence to commit the defendant solely on the basis of the examination of the papers. We also have mixed committals, which essentially are a combination of both approaches, with some people being subjected to questioning.

Mr Allister suggested that there would be a potential saving of resources in a number of cases — it appears to be a very small number of cases — that might not proceed to full trial if we continue to maintain PIs and mixed committals, but the reality is that they are, in themselves, resource-intensive. Frequently and generally, counsel are instructed, sittings have to be arranged and slotted into court timetables, witnesses have to be called and there is an estimate that it adds significant time to the process.

Clauses 7 and 8 would abolish PIs and mixed committals, meaning that all committal proceedings would take place by way of PE. It is worth noting, however, that, although it would be no longer possible to require witnesses to give oral evidence, there are safeguards built into the process that would protect the interests of the defendant. Mr Allister acknowledged that the vast majority of cases proceed by PE. In fact, what needs to be taken account of is that many of them will have started off as PIs and become PEs only during the process, with witnesses having been summoned and potentially vulnerable victims and witnesses subjected to a degree of concern. Then, on the day itself, they may not have to give evidence but will have had all the concerns about potentially having to do that. In the PE process, the defendant would still be able to make representations on their own behalf that could include making a submission to the court that there is insufficient evidence to return him for trial. The decision on the sufficiency of evidence is a judicial one, and, where the judge believes that the evidence is inadequate, the defendant can be discharged at that stage. Furthermore, as has been highlighted, if the defendant is committed for trial, he would still be entitled to make an application for a “no bill” to the Crown Court to be discharged before arraignment. Of course, as I said earlier, importantly, the Crown Court determines the sufficiency of all the evidence against the defendant in determining innocence or guilt beyond all reasonable doubt. Mr Allister’s amendments would essentially retain preliminary investigations and mixed committals where they were required in what he has termed the “interests of justice”, but I believe that the amendments are unnecessary because the safeguards that I have just outlined already uphold the defendant’s rights to a high standard.

I listened carefully during this section of the debate to the comments from Mr Allister and Mr Maginness. At particular times, we need to take account of those in the House who have legal experience, but we do not have to go with them entirely. Mr Maginness described Mr Allister as representing the “Traditional Legal Voice”, although from his words it is clear that there are two members of the “Traditional Legal Voice” in the House. For me, the fundamental question is this: do we go with the work that the Committee has done over the last five years on protecting victims and witnesses, or do we go with the “Traditional Legal Voice”? Mr Speaker, I know whose side I am on in that debate.

Mr McCartney: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way.

Mr McCartney: I was part of the process in the Committee over those five years and do not consider myself as having any legal voice, but I think that there are merits in the amendments.

Mr Ford: I hear Mr McCartney say that he sees merits, but I see demerits. I see the danger that vulnerable witnesses and victims will be put into court twice and subjected to questioning. That does nothing to enhance the interests of justice. If it puts people off giving evidence at a Crown Court trial, it is damaging to justice, and that was the clear evidence from bodies such as Victim Support, an organisation with experience of supporting people in court.

All too often, as I said, the experience in the courts is that cases scheduled for PI or mixed committal proceed on the day as a PE without calling oral evidence because the evidence in the papers is not disputed. However, the distress to victims and witnesses who have been preparing to give oral evidence in difficult circumstances has occurred. I do not believe that the hardship faced by victims and witnesses in circumstances where they may be required twice, at committal and again at trial, to give evidence that is often — frequently — traumatic is in the interests of justice. The evidence has to be presented at trial; it does not need to be tested.

Mr Ross clearly highlighted the fact that the key issue for the Committee, from its first independent inquiry, has been to ensure that victims and witnesses are treated properly and fairly in the court system. Mr Maginness said that we might need to find some other way of protecting victims and witnesses, but none of those who have spoken against my proposals and in support of Mr Allister’s amendments have explained to the House today what further protections there could be if we were to require vulnerable victims and witnesses to appear in court twice. We have no indication of how we will protect them, and nothing has been put forward today to suggest how that could be done.

The reality is that PIs were abolished in the Republic of Ireland in 2001. Abolition started in England and Wales that same year and was completed a decade later, and there is no suggestion that there has been a serious impact on the interests of justice in those two jurisdictions. We are not going as far as England and Wales. We are continuing to protect PEs, and we are continuing to give the circumstance that a judge will have to consider matters on the papers, and the defendant will have the right to put his case at a PE. That is significantly greater protection than is the case in the two most equal neighbouring jurisdictions.

I believe that clauses 7, 8 and 9 as proposed strike the appropriate balance between upholding the rights of the defendant and protecting the needs of vulnerable victims. Surely, that is the interest of justice that really matters to the people whom we represent. That is what we want to see, not people being subjected to the kind of cross-questioning that leads to some withdrawing their evidence before it gets to the Crown Court because of the way in which they have been treated.

We can talk all we like about district judges in the Magistrates’ Court having to determine what is the interest of justice when it comes up, but I think it very unlikely that any district judge presented with a barrister standing up and saying, “In the interests of justice, I want a PI”, will find it easy to resist such a pressure. There is little evidence to suggest that that kind of pressure is easily resisted. Therefore, what is being talked about today as an exception is likely to become the rule. In fact, it could even exist in a greater number than is currently the case.

I also noted one comment made by Mr Allister. I wrote it down, and I hope that it is accurate. No doubt, Hansard will tell.

He referred to the concept of a PI not questioning everybody and said that “One wanted to ... go for the key witnesses”.

4.00 pm

“Going for people” could have a couple of different meanings, and, sadly, the wrong meaning is what many who are victims consider to be the way in which they are treated by opposing barristers. If they have to do that once, they should not have to do it twice. On that basis, I ask the House to support clauses 7, 8 and 9 as they exist and schedule 2. I certainly will not be supporting amendment Nos 1 and 2, and I request the House to reject them.

Let me turn to some of the other amendments that are in the group.

Mr Elliott: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way.

Mr Elliott: The Minister said that he will not be supporting Mr Allister's amendments. Does he or does he not believe that Mr Allister's amendments are a halfway house between what is currently in legislation and what is being proposed in the Bill?

Mr Ford: Mr Elliott asks an entirely reasonable question. It seems to me that what is being proposed by Mr Allister is, in effect, maintaining exactly the current position. The halfway house is what I am proposing: to keep PEs and not go the whole hog and abolish any committal hearing, as has happened in England and Wales, but instead remove the opportunity for PIs. That is the halfway house. That allows the defendant to make the case. The case has to be put on paper, but there is not the opportunity for witnesses to be put in a very difficult position twice in court, and that is the fundamental issue that I am concerned about: to protect vulnerable people from the effects of having to go into court twice, when they are the people who are dealing with traumatic situations.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will.

Mr A Maginness: I am not suggesting in any way that the Minister is misleading anybody in the House, but to say that it is a halfway house is wrong, insofar as there is the total abolition of any exercise for testing, cross-examining or examining-in-chief a witness. That goes completely. Therefore, in that sense, what you are proposing cannot be considered to be a halfway house. Effectively, from now on in, if the clause were to pass, what you are proposing would be totally a paper exercise. Mr Allister is suggesting that that does not meet the justice of the case, as it were, so that, in fact, there is an opportunity — admittedly, a very limited opportunity — for a witness or some witnesses to be examined.

Mr Ford: I am afraid that I have to continue to disagree with "Traditional Legal Voice". As far as I am concerned, the papers are still examined and the defendant still has the opportunity to make representations to the district judge, and all that is removed is the opportunity to cross-question witnesses. That seems to me to be a halfway house when compared with total abolition. Mr Maginness said that we are abolishing the right to call witnesses, and he is absolutely correct in that. However, that is all that we are taking away from the normal committal procedures that have existed in this jurisdiction, as opposed to the complete abolition of committal procedures that exist in the two adjacent closest jurisdictions — the Republic and England and Wales. I am afraid that, whilst we might debate whether it is partial — 50%, 53%, or whatever — I believe that the procedures that I am putting forward are, in Mr Elliott's terms, near enough to the halfway house.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I thank the Minister for giving way. The Minister, as I have, will have heard many Members talk about the absolute importance of putting victims at the heart of the criminal justice system. Is it not the case that what the Minister is proposing today came out of a piece of work that the Committee did after it had listened to what victims and witnesses told the Committee to do, which was to try to bring about a system of justice that protects victims from being traumatised — potentially twice — and going through a mini trial before the trial? Actually, Members pay lip service to putting victims at the centre of the criminal justice system. When it comes to having the opportunity to do that and to make changes that will stick up for victims, Members, if they support the amendments today, are not going to be doing that and are in fact not listening to any of the evidence that the Committee took during the past number of months.

Mr Ford: I could not put it better than the Committee Chair has put it. I noticed, whilst he was speaking, that the first Committee Chair, Lord Morrow, sat behind him. He will remember the work that was done in the first Committee, shortly after devolution, when the prioritisation of work by the Committee was on how we dealt with victims and witnesses. Work being done in the Department was taken over by the Committee, which produced a comprehensive report that the Department accepted and sought to put in place.

Unfortunately, if Mr Allister and Mr Maginness are listened to today, we will undo that work entirely and send out a very dangerous message. Since nobody else seems to wish to intervene at that point, let me seek to make progress and look at my amendments on the committal for trial provisions in Part 2.

Amendment No 3 inserts new clause 12A to supplement the existing provisions for direct committal in chapter 2 to provide for the direct committal for trial of any associated co-defendants. In evidence to the Justice Committee, the Public Prosecution Service indicated that, where a person is to be directly committed under clause 12, it would be necessary, in the interests of justice, to allow for the direct committal of any co-defendants who are charged with offences related to a specified offence so that all defendants may be tried together. As a consequence of new clause 12A, there are some minor textual amendments to clause 14, which are delivered by amendment Nos 4 and 5.

Similar amendments that include references to new clause 12A are also required to schedule 3 in a number of places. Those are amendment Nos 61 to 67, and I take it that they are acceptable to the House since they do not seem to have been mentioned.

A number of Members spoke about live links, and many spoke in support of amendment No 20, which relates to the Bill's provisions to enhance live links in courts. That amendment places a requirement on courts to adjourn proceedings for failure to comply with certain orders or licence conditions, where the offender attending by live link cannot see or hear the court or be seen or heard by it and that cannot be corrected immediately.

The Bill provides for that safeguard in relation to committal proceedings in clause 44 and live links from another courtroom at weekends and on public holidays in clause 45. That is part of enhancing the operating of the court system, particularly taking account of the single jurisdiction. The amendment does not involve any change of policy: it corrects an oversight and ensures consistency with other live-link provisions in the Bill.

Amendment No 40 adjusts clause 78 regarding the duty on a solicitor to advise a client about an early guilty plea at the suggestion of the Attorney General. It certainly appears that in this case the Attorney General does not belong to "Traditional Legal Voice", because his advice was to go with clause 78 and this amendment and not oppose it, as was advised by our two in-house barristers. The Attorney General helpfully commented on the clause to suggest that, as it already sets out the nature of the duty on the solicitor together with the penalty for non-compliance, clause 78(3), which provides that the Law Society must make regulations with respect to the giving of advice, could be omitted.

Mr Maginness spoke at some length against clause 78(4), and there may be issues there that we could reconsider at Further Consideration Stage, but he did not seem to make a case against the entire clause. There is no doubt that if we wish to encourage people to make early guilty pleas when they are guilty and to avail of the benefits that will result from doing so, it is important that we make it absolutely clear to their legal representatives that they have a duty to inform those who are charged with offences of the position that they are in. Indeed, too often we see cases where pleas of guilty are entered at the door of the court, with all the cost that that has for the justice system. In such cases, there are no benefits for the defendant if matters have been postponed to that date.

So, the clause is part of the Bill as a result of a suggestion that was made by the Justice Committee when this policy was examined and my officials briefed it in 2012. In addition, Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland previously commented that such a provision would be helpful in encouraging early guilty pleas. It is a matter that is well worth consideration, and if there are details, particularly about clause 78(4), that Mr Maginness wishes to discuss with me between now and Further Consideration Stage, I am happy for that to happen.

The final amendments in the group are amendment Nos 43 to 46, which make adjustments to the regulation-making powers in clauses 79 and 80 to reflect comments and advice from the Examiner of Statutory Rules, following his scrutiny of the Bill's delegated powers memorandum.

Clause 79 and clause 80 provide that the Department may make regulations to impose a general duty on persons exercising functions in relation to criminal proceedings to reach a just outcome as swiftly as possible and to make regulations in relation to the management and conduct of criminal proceedings. The Examiner questioned whether two sets of regulations were, in fact, necessary and suggested that the regulation-making powers be combined. The Examiner also suggested that the case-management regulations might be made following consultation with the Lord Chief Justice, the Public Prosecution Service, the Law Society and the Bar Council.

Mr Allister expressed concerns about the possible effect on juries and asked whether this was something that would put pressure on the way that juries considered verdicts. Like Mr Ross, I do not believe that that would be the effect of this regulation. It is most certainly not the intention, but I am happy to give the House an assurance that I will examine the matter further with my officials. If there is a need for an amendment to deal at Further Consideration Stage with the specific issues of juries, I will bring that forward, subject, of course, to Executive approval, unless the Committee does it for me. The fundamental point that Mr Allister or certainly one Member made about ensuring that professionals should be subject to that requirement is absolutely right, because it is part of the process of speeding up justice.

The amendments that are proposed to clauses 79 and 80 are intended to give effect to the Examiner's comments, and I am grateful to him for his suggestions. I believe that they move us into a better place, subject to the proviso of that subsection 4, which I will happily look at, if it is subsequently required.

In the context of this group, I am happy to commend the amendments in my name to the House, but I ask Members to reject the proposals that are put forward by Mr Allister, as I do not believe that his amendments are actually required in the interests of justice, and I fundamentally believe that there is a very real danger that, by putting pressure on victims and witnesses, they could damage the interests of justice.

Mr Allister: This has been a good and informative debate. I am grateful, as a single Member of the House, that the amendments that I tabled have been discussed in the manner in which they have and that they appear to have gained some traction during the discussion. I regret that the Minister does not seem to have caught the mood of the House in that regard and still clings to propositions that I think many in the House are now questioning.

I think that one's confidence in the Minister's grasp of the issue was considerably undermined when he told the House in answer to Mr Elliott that, in fact, the effect of my amendments was to maintain the current position. Nothing could be further from the truth. I am staggered by the Minister's lack of knowledge of the import of section 31 of the Magistrates' Courts Act. Under the Magistrates' Courts Act, the starting point is a PI, and section 31 says that, if the prosecution requests a PE and the accused does not object, a PE takes place. So, the current position is that the accused has a veto on a PE, and the norm is a PI unless everyone agrees otherwise.

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr Allister giving way. My point was that, in circumstances where a district judge is presented with a barrister saying that, in the interests of justice, they are looking for a PI, my belief is that that is very strongly likely to result in a PI being held, because it will be extremely difficult for any judge to resist something that is claimed in the interests of justice. Whilst I acknowledge that the starting point, which is Mr Allister's point, may be different, the practical effect will mean that there will be virtually no difference from the present stage.

Mr Allister: I think that the Minister is now raising a different point. That is not the point that I am dealing with. The Minister said that the effect of my amendments was to maintain the current position. I am making it plain that the current position starts on the presumption of a PI, and only if the accused does not object can it proceed to a PE. That is light years away from both the Bill and my amendments, because the amendments are premised on the presumption that you will have a PE and nothing else. Only in circumstances where the defence could make a case for something else and persuade the presiding judge of the need for that in the interests of justice would you have something other than a PE, a committal, on the papers. That is light years away from the current position under the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981. Therefore, it is wrong for the Minister to suggest that these amendments want to only continue the present position.

4.15 pm

As to having a barrister or solicitor say to a judge that, in the interests of justice, they want a PI or a mixed committal, and that the judge will simply roll over; well, I have probably been in more courts than the Minister has, and I have yet to meet judges who would just roll over like that. They will be searching, they will be wanting to be persuaded on those issues, and they will not be easily persuaded. To simply put in the legislation that something is required in the interests of justice does not mean that, if a solicitor or a barrister were to stand up and say that to the magistrate, it would be accepted. The professional legal representative would have to lay out a case, argue why it is against the norm, in the interests of justice, and convince the court. That is not an easy process, because the presumption is against: that the norm is a PI committal on the papers. What I am proposing is radically different from what the Minister sought to represent it as.

I want to pick up a few other points made in the debate. The Chairman of the Committee indicated that this was very much the desire of the PPS. I am sure that it is. I am sure that the prosecuting authorities would like to cut out this vital part of the criminal justice system, but justice is not just about the prosecution. Justice is also about the defence. I think that some Members in the debate have lost sight of the fact that, when the state is involved in the process of bringing someone to court, which could result in that citizen losing their liberty, then there are big issues at stake. It is not just a matter of saying that we are interested only in the prosecution and that, if the prosecution says that this is the way to go, that is good enough for us.

Equally, it is not the case that we are interested only in the perceived victim of a crime. Yes, victims of crimes are very important, but the whole thrust and purpose of the criminal justice process is to see whether they are victims, whether there is a crime, and whether someone who is accused is guilty. To steamroll over that and say that we must abandon any protections for the defence, or that we must ignore all of that in the interests of victims, might be understandable at one level, but it is disproportionate in its application.

This House, this Justice Bill and this Justice Minister need to have regard to all within the justice field. That includes the citizens of this community who stand on the wrong side of the prosecution and who are being prosecuted. You cannot simply say that you are only interested in devising a system that protects and promotes the interests of the prosecution. If you do so, then you arrive at a criminal justice system that will bring itself into disrepute. People who are then convicted will have cause to ask, "What sort of a system was it that convicted me?"

The system has to be foolproof and protective of the interests of all in order to be a worthy system. I totally understand the need to protect victims, but you also need a criminal justice system that protects the interests of all, including those who are innocent until proven guilty. That is something that some people are very quick to forget. We all — whoever we are, whatever we are accused of — are innocent until proven guilty, and there can be no shortcuts. There should be no shortcuts in the process that eventually delivers a due verdict of guilty. Once you start making shortcuts, you undermine our criminal justice system, which lies at the heart of society, ensuring that the innocent are protected and the guilty do not go free. It seems to me that there has been such a rush to abandon some of these tried and trusted processes that we are in danger of losing sight of that.

Mr Dickson told us, "You still have your PE." At the risk of repeating myself, what is a PE? A PE is a presentation of the prosecution case, unfiltered and unchallenged, including witness statements written at their height by police officers to present the case in the strongest possible light, with no one ever having sifted or tested any of it. That is what you get served up in a PE: the papers in that form. Provided it shows a prima facie case — just a prima facie case — you are returned automatically for trial. Someone else said, "You can make a no bill application." Well, a no bill application rests on precisely the same premise, namely that there is not a prima facie case, the only difference being that it is a Crown Court judge rather than a magistrate who decides. He decides it on the papers, not on the hearing of evidence.

The Minister gave figures on cases to Lord Morrow in a recent written answer. I heard him quote other figures in interventions, but they do not seem to square with the figures he gave in that reply to AQW 44580/11-15, where he said that of 78 PI mixed committals in 2014-15, 18 resulted in no return. A quarter of the cases did not result in return. That is a quarter of that minuscule number of cases, and some would say to this House, "Never mind the fact that there was not sufficient evidence to return them for trial. Just return them anyway." I do not think that is a right and proper approach to justice in any society. If you have built into a system the preliminary hurdle of a PE/ mixed committal/PI, such as we have had, then you should be slow to wash it all away.

The House has the opportunity in these amendments to take a measured, modest middle road and say that, yes, the norm is a committal on the papers — a PE — but if the interests of justice cry out for a testing of evidence, because there is a prima facie case that a witness may well be a liar, with convictions for perjury or whatever, then rather than brush that under the carpet, the magistrate should be able to be persuaded that he needs to hear that witness if he is to know whether he would do the right thing in returning the defendant for trial on the say-so — the untested, unsworn say-so — the mere written statement of such a person, when he has before him evidence that challenges that person's fundamental bona fides. Surely the magistrate should be in a position to say, "Right, we need to hear that witness, and I will decide, as the magistrate, whether that witness is believable." That happened recently in a case in Craigavon. A prosecution was brought and a witness known to the defence to be riddled with inconsistencies was prevailed upon through the mixed committal process to be cross-examined. The evidence fell apart, and three people who were going to be returned for trial were, rightly, instantly discharged. Yet, the Minister would say to us, "Never mind all that; just commit them for trial." That is wrong, and I believe that it is wrong for the House to hand away that basic but very modest shield, which protects against situations such as that. That is why I say to the House that it is right to go for the retention of that modest aspect of mixed committals and PIs.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for giving way. There has been some discussion throughout the debate on this group around vulnerable witnesses, and I wonder whether the Member has given any thought to that. He replied to Mr McCartney at an earlier stage, but I wonder whether he has given any thought to vulnerable witnesses and how that could be built into his proposals.

Mr Allister: Yes, I have been giving some thought to that. I am not sure that I have got the answer, but I reiterate a point that I made to Mr McCartney, which is that you only get to that point if you approve the amendments and then try to improve on them at Further Consideration Stage. If you reject the amendments, of course, there is no protection whatsoever for recourse to mixed committals for anyone.

On the question of how you would protect vulnerable witnesses from the ordeal, and yes, it can be an ordeal, of possibly being cross-examined twice, it might be possible at Further Consideration Stage — I am sure that the Department would be more than capable of coming up with language that would capture the spirit of this — to add to the amendment as it presently stands, which states that it:

“shall apply only when the court is satisfied that a preliminary investigation is required in the interests of justice”.

It may be possible to add a rider to that to the effect that, in the case of a vulnerable witness, that could happen only in exceptional circumstances, so that you would have two hurdles for the defence to cross if they were seeking to have a mixed committal. You would have the hurdle of demonstrating that it was in the interests of justice. I make the point that I made to Mr McCartney: the condition of that witness would itself be a matter informing the balancing exercise on what is in the interests of justice. It might be possible to supplement that further by making it plain on the face of the Bill that only in very exceptional circumstances would there be an expectation that a vulnerable witness, defined in whatever manner, would be subjected to this process, if that is a genuine concern. For some, it might be. I think that it is not beyond the ingenuity of the Department, if these amendments pass and if there is a feeling in the House that a little more needs to be done in that regard, to find wording to that effect. I certainly think that there are possibilities there.

Mr Douglas: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Douglas: Earlier, the Member mentioned that the prosecution would keep its powder dry. Will you just explain to the House what that means?

4.30 pm

Mr Allister: In fact, I said that the defence would keep their powder dry. It might be surprising to some that, since the presumption in the Magistrates' Courts Order is of a preliminary investigation, namely the calling of evidence, there is such acquiescence in there just being a committal on the papers in 98% or 99% of the cases.

There could be a couple of reasons for that. One might be that since the threshold to be returned for trial is not that you can demonstrate proof beyond all reasonable doubt, but just that you can demonstrate a prima facie case, that is not very hard to do. The defence might well take the view that they can ultimately win the case by showing that there is not proof beyond reasonable doubt, but, on these papers, there is a prima facie case, so there is no point. Or they might take the view that if they have the witness called and cross-examined now, and do not succeed in stopping the case at this time, they will have forewarned the prosecution witnesses as to their line of attack and therefore it might be more prudent for the defence to keep their powder dry. That is what I meant. That is one of the reasons why, though the premise of the Magistrates' Courts Order is that PI is the starting point, in reality, there are very few PIs; because of those considerations. I think that the Minister said that 99.8% of cases progress to trial. If that is so, what is he afraid of? If these amendments are so minuscule in their impact, what is he resisting? I really do find it hard to believe that anyone would think that it was a retrograde step to write into legislation that something can be done “in the interests of justice”. Is it not the interests of justice that we want to serve in our criminal justice system?

Mr Ford: I thank the Member for giving way again. A few minutes ago, he mentioned vulnerable witnesses, however defined. I wonder whether he could give us some thoughts as to how they might be defined in the context of a Magistrates' Court hearing.

I will digress by way of an example. Some four and a half years ago, while I was Minister of Justice and had faced a certain amount of questioning in this place, I was a witness in a civil case in the High Court. I must say that even in that context, as Minister of Justice, I felt just a little vulnerable when I was being subjected to questioning by an opposing QC. I am not sure, however, that I would have qualified as “vulnerable” in any sense of the term. I acknowledge that we are talking here about preliminary hearings in criminal cases, not civil cases. I wonder what thoughts Mr Allister, who says that a vulnerable witness could be however defined, might have about the definition.

Mr Allister: I would have thought that the definition might be rooted in one or two alternative possibilities. You might root it in the nature of the charge, be it incest, a serious sex charge or whatever. You might root it in facts which could be put before the court about the actual vulnerability of the witness. That might include medical evidence etc. There are possibilities on which, if Members of the House had concerns about that, the Department could assist in how you would frame that. Those seem to me to be the two avenues that you would look at; the type of case it is, because there seems to be most concern about the serious sex cases, or the nature of the personal circumstances of the witness themselves.

My own view, for what it is worth, is that all of that can be adequately catered for in the test “in the interests of justice”, but if the House thinks otherwise, at a future stage, namely the Further Consideration Stage, it can refine that further. Personally, I think that “in the interests of justice” is wide enough to enable arguments to be made by the prosecution. It is not just the defence who have a say in these applications: the prosecution equally has a say to go for a mixed committal, for example. The prosecution equally would be able to bring forward reasons why it would not be in the interests of justice. That might include the matters that are taxing some people's minds in this debate.

If we are talking about something being hedged around by the prerequisite of everything being done in the interests of justice, what we are fearful of? That is the essence of the amendments: that you could only depart from the norm of your committal on paper by the PE process in the interests of justice. Surely our criminal justice system should, above all else, be serving the interests of justice. On that basis, I recommend the amendments to the House.

Mr Speaker: Members should note that, as amendment No 1 is mutually exclusive with clause 7 standing part, should clause 7 stand part, I will not call amendment No 1. Before I put the Question, I remind Members that we have debated Mr Allister's opposition to clause 7, but that the Question will be put in the positive as usual.

Mrs D Kelly: I am pleased to move the second group of amendments and to welcome this opportunity to outline the SDLP amendments regarding domestic violence. I would like to begin by putting on record my thanks to Women’s Aid Northern Ireland for its advice on and insight into the tremendous work that it does to help victims of domestic abuse and for their help in tabling these amendments. I would also like to express sincere gratitude in particular to Aoibhinn in the Bill Office for her hard work and support in helping to draft these amendments and also, of course, to our own party policy staff.

Domestic abuse can affect anyone regardless of socioeconomic status, gender, religion, age, race or sexuality. However, whilst there are increasing reported incidents of males suffering domestic violence and people in same-sex relationships also suffering domestic violence, the vast majority of victims of domestic abuse are women and the perpetrators men.

Domestic abuse thrives on happening in private, but it is a matter of public concern. On average, here, in Northern Ireland, five women lose their life to domestic violence each year. PSNI statistics indicate that 27,628 domestic violence incidents and 12,720 abuse crimes were reported in 2013-14. In fact, Mr Speaker, an incidence of domestic violence is reported to the police every 19 minutes. That works out, on average, at over 400 incidents per week. It is estimated that one in four women will experience domestic abuse in their lifetime, and it accounts for approximately one fifth of all recorded violent crime in Northern Ireland. I repeat: one fifth of all recorded violent crime is committed by someone the victim should be able to trust, and often in the place in which the victim should feel safest of all — their home.

Victims and survivors of domestic violence may endure the most horrific sexual and physical violence. According to police statistics, there are, on average, 35 previous experiences of domestic violence by one victim before they actually make that call for help.

In England and Wales, it is estimated that two women die at the hands of a former or current partner. They are women like Clare Wood, for example, whose murder triggered the introduction of Clare's law in England and Wales. It is a domestic violence disclosure scheme that we want to see established in Northern Ireland. I think we have to ask ourselves why women here should not have the same protections afforded to them as women in other regions in these islands do.

I think it is fair to say that the majority of people now recognise that domestic abuse is not exclusively sexual or violent. It can be psychological, involving controlling and coercive behaviour, and it can involve financial manipulation through denying someone economic independence. That is intended to make someone feel utterly hopeless and worthless. Mental and emotional torture that reduces a person to a shadow of themselves is abuse in itself, but, as well as that, it often precedes violent and physical abuse. Indeed, one would say it is characteristic of the grooming that many women experience before that first physical attack.

Whilst attitudes around domestic violence have progressed, they have not progressed far enough. When faced with incidents of domestic abuse, many people ask, "Why doesn't she leave?" rather than, "Why does he do it?", or even, "How does he get away with it?". Only last week, I dealt with a case, in my constituency office, of domestic violence. I am sure each of you, in your constituency offices, have had to help victims get rehousing, psychological counselling or help with their financial circumstances.

We in the SDLP saw the Bill as an opportunity to introduce the provisions that would provide greater protections for those suffering domestic violence and those at risk of domestic abuse. Our amendments would see the introduction of domestic violence protection orders and notices and, indeed, Clare's law in Northern Ireland.

Our first amendment, amendment No 21, was drafted to ensure that prosecutorial fines could not be issued in lieu of appearing in court for a domestic abuse offence. Such fines would not only belittle the seriousness of domestic abuse, but, possibly, harm someone who is a victim of financial abuse and who, ultimately, would face this cost, and it would make the implementation of a disclosure scheme more difficult. If the Minister can assure us that domestic violence offences will not be subject to prosecutorial fines, we are satisfied that this does not need to be included in the Bill.

Mr A Maginness: That is amendment No 6.

Mrs D Kelly: Sorry, that refers to amendment No 6, the first amendment in the group.

I will elaborate on our other amendments. A domestic violence protection notice enables police to ban a perpetrator from returning to their home and from having contact with a victim of domestic abuse for up to 48 hours after —

5.00 pm

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. I come at this from a sympathetic point of view, and I just want to tease out an issue which I think is relevant, particularly when we talk about domestic violence protection orders. I know that the wording in the amendment is on "reasonable grounds" but this is quite a big power that allows the police to potentially remove somebody from their home before they have been convicted of any offence. The Member has rightly pointed out that not all domestic violence is sexual or violent abuse, so I wonder where she sees the threshold or the need for any evidential base for the police to issue such an order, and how we ensure that these sorts of things are not abused by people who, potentially, could be in a difficult relationship which is not actually suffering from domestic abuse. It could, potentially, be abused as a way to remove a man from a house.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you for that intervention. The introduction of these schemes in England and Wales has been piloted, in particular, in three areas in England. There is a very helpful Home Office report available, which looked at the schemes and evaluated them. Almost 6,000 such orders were applied for, and only two were turned down. The constable who is called out to the scene has to get the domestic violence protection order approved by a senior officer — that is, a superintendent. The order is only used where there are no other enforceable restrictions available to the police, so I believe that there are safeguards, and it ought not to be willy-nilly.

In addition to the evaluation report following the pilot schemes in England, it was recommended that training should be provided for police officers and magistrates in applying such schemes. It is my hope and, I am sure, the intention of the PSNI and the Department of Justice to ensure that such training is provided. I have spoken to police officers in preparation for today's debate and in tabling the amendments, and the police would welcome having these resources available to them to better protect women in society, so I am satisfied that there are adequate safeguards.

The domestic violence protection notice lasts for 48 hours, and then application has to be made to the Magistrates' Court for a notice lasting up to 28 days. The whole intent behind the notices and orders is to support victims who might otherwise have had to flee their homes and to give them a breathing space to access support and consider the options available to them.

If it helps Members to set it in some form of context, in the year 2013-14, over 700 families had to be rehoused as a consequence of domestic violence. The introduction of these orders would mean that the perpetrator is the person who has to leave the home, and not the family. In addition, that time allows the victim to access Women's Aid or other support services to help them make the decision that is right for them for their future well-being and that of their family.

In 2010, Criminal Justice Inspection undertook a review of the way that domestic violence and abuse cases are handled by the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland, and it made a number of recommendations, including the introduction of domestic violence protection orders and notices, so it already has the support of the criminal justice inspectorate in Northern Ireland.

In March 2014, a domestic violence disclosure scheme, more commonly known as Clare's law, was rolled out across England and Wales. In February 2009, Clare Wood was violently murdered by a former boyfriend, George Appleton, who had previous convictions for the harassment and assault of former partners. Ms Wood had contacted the Greater Manchester Police in the months leading up to her death, to report that Appleton had caused criminal damage, harassed her, threatened to kill her and sexually assaulted her. Clare's law enables the police to disclose information to an individual who has asked police to check whether a new or existing partner has a history of domestic violence or, indeed, a violent past. Police will subsequently consider disclosing information if their checks find that this individual may be at risk of domestic violence from their partner.

It was reported in January 2015 that 3,760 applications for disclosure had been made in England and Wales, and at least 1,335 warnings issued, only 10 months after the scheme was launched.

We want to see a similar scheme launched in Northern Ireland to make it harder for perpetrators to reoffend.

I am very pleased to report, following consultation with all the parties, that a number of Members have expressed their support for the intentions behind the amendments. Implementing domestic violence protection orders (DVPOs) and domestic violence protection notices (DVPNs) would make a real difference to the lives of people affected by domestic violence, including, I should remind the House, children living in those homes. Local research has found that there are some 11,000 children living with the reality of domestic violence every day in Northern Ireland. Having this scheme available to us would help to move the social perception of domestic violence on.

I met the Justice Minister on 21 May and had a very productive discussion. I was pleased to find that he is supportive of the amendments but was advised that the wording of the drafts requires further tweaking. Likewise, his officials advised that the introduction of Clare's law will require a public consultation, and that he fully intends to do that. To give the Department time to come back and meet these principles, I have agreed not to formally move the amendments at this stage if we receive a ministerial assurance that amendments regarding domestic violence protection orders and domestic violence protection notices will be introduced at Further Consideration Stage, which I expect should be forthcoming. Likewise, I will not move the amendment regarding Clare's law if we receive a ministerial assurance that a public consultation is being brought forward.

I will move on to the other amendments in the group, which are about prevention, protections and disclosure relating to vulnerable groups. I will speak very briefly on the amendments because I am sure they will be spoken about in detail by the proposers, the Minister and members of the DUP. The SDLP is largely supportive of the amendments. Amendment Nos 7 to 10 relate to clause 33 on victim statements. The proposed amendments will extend the scope of a victim statement in certain circumstances to include how a victim's family has been affected. The SDLP is supportive of those amendments. The SDLP is also supportive of amendment Nos 11 and 17 in relation to disclosures. Amendment No 11 inserts a new clause on disclosure for purposes of victim and witness support services and victim information schemes. Amendment No 17 also inserts a new clause in relation to Department of Justice disclosures to the Disclosure and Barring Service.

Both I and my colleagues in the SDLP are supportive of the DUP amendment that would be similar to Sarah's law. The amendment would provide guidance for agencies to consider disclosure of information in relation to relevant previous convictions of any specified sexual or violent offender where it is necessary to protect a particular child or children from serious harm. I am sure that the proposers of the amendment will speak on it in much more detail, but it is an amendment that we in the SDLP support. Amendment No 68 proposes to insert a new schedule in relation to witness support services and victim information schemes. My SDLP colleagues and I support that amendment.

I would like to close by returning to the SDLP amendments in relation to domestic abuse. I have been extremely heartened by the support that the Department and other parties have expressed for the amendments and look forward to working with other Members in the future to tackle domestic violence and abuse in our society. I truly believe that DVPOs, DVPNs and Clare's law will help to bridge a gap in how we tackle domestic abuse. Thank you.

Mr Ross: First, I want to cover Part 4 of the Bill, which improves services and facilities for victims and witnesses by providing for the establishment of statutory victim and witness charters and providing a statutory entitlement to be afforded the opportunity to make a victim personal statement, through amendment Nos 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11.

As I highlighted earlier, these clauses and amendment No 11, which introduces a new clause and schedule to the Bill to create information-sharing powers for the purposes of victim and witness support services and victim information schemes, are as a direct result of the findings and recommendations of the Justice Committee's inquiry into the criminal justice services available to victims and witnesses. The evidence that the Committee received during the inquiry clearly demonstrated that engaging with the criminal justice system as a victim and/or a witness or as a bereaved family is a daunting experience that can entail encounters with a number of criminal justice agencies and voluntary sector organisations from the time that the crime is reported, through the police investigation, the prosecution decision-making process, the court process, sentencing and beyond. The evidence also illustrated the significant difficulties that victims and witnesses face with the criminal justice system and the criminal justice agencies, and their experience of the process was, and still is, often frustrating, demoralising and, on occasions, even devastating.

The cooperation of victims and witnesses in the criminal justice process is vital to achieving convictions and ensuring that justice is done, and it was the Committee's strong belief that much more could and needed to be done to redress the balance and ensure that an effective and appropriate service is provided for them. The Committee therefore made a number of recommendations to the Minister, including that a victim and witness charter providing statutory entitlements for victims and witnesses in terms of information provision and treatment should be introduced; that a formal system for the completion and use of victim impact statements should be introduced; and that a more effective mechanism through which victims can automatically be provided with timely information based on an opt-out system rather than the current opt-in system should be developed.

The statutory charters created by the Bill will set out the services to be provided by criminal justice organisations, the standards that should apply and how victims and witnesses can expect to be treated. They are intended to make the criminal justice process less daunting and more responsive to the needs of victims and witnesses of crime. They will apply regardless of a victim's relationship to the accused or offender, and family members of the victim are also entitled to access support services. There is also a right of complaint to an independent body, and the Committee has sought assurances from the Department regarding the mechanisms in place to monitor compliance with the charters. There was widespread support for victim and witness charters in the evidence received on the Bill, with Victim Support indicating that, in its view, the victim charter will have a demonstrable impact on the experiences of victims and witnesses of crime in the criminal justice system in Northern Ireland.

The creation of information-sharing powers by way of amendment No 11 to provide for a more effective mechanism through which victims can automatically be provided with timely information about the services available to them in the form of victim support services, witness services at court and access to post-conviction information release schemes was also broadly welcomed, as was placing victim personal statements on a statutory footing and thus providing an opportunity for a victim to explain the impact of an offence or alleged offence. Amendment Nos 7, 8, 9 and 10 will allow a victim or a bereaved family member to include, in a victim statement, the impact a crime has had on other family members, and the Committee views that as a useful and welcome addition.

The Committee fully supports clauses 28 to 35 and amendment Nos 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, and I commend the Minister for listening to the Committee, accepting its recommendations and implementing them through this legislation.

I will touch briefly on amendment No 17, which inserts a new clause to facilitate the exchange of information between Access NI and the Disclosure and Barring Service for barring purposes. The Committee noted that a wide range of stakeholders, including voluntary organisations that work with children and the Department of Education and Department of Health, welcomed the proposal. Given that it provides an additional safeguard for vulnerable persons and ensures that legislation on vetting and barring is operated consistently across the United Kingdom, which is important, the Committee supports that amendment.

I now want to move on to clause 17, which relates to prosecutorial fines, and amendment No 6, which Mrs Kelly and the SDLP have brought forward today. The evidence received by the Committee on that part of the Bill acknowledged that providing options such as prosecutorial fines to deal with low-level offences outside the courtroom frees up police and prosecutor resources, as well as court time, that can be better used to deal with more serious offending. Wider issues regarding fine collection and enforcement were raised. The Committee will have an opportunity to consider those in more detail in the next justice Bill, which is due shortly, and that will hopefully address at least some of the concerns.

Specifically, in relation to prosecutorial fines, the main focus was on how they will operate in practice. The Committee considered a range of issues relating to the operation of prosecutorial fines, including whether additional safeguards were required in the Bill to prevent the fines being used for repeat offenders or for serial or serious offenders. The Committee felt that it was entirely appropriate, to get public confidence, that those were used for minor offenders. Women's Aid advised the Committee that it was firmly of the view that the fines are not appropriate for domestic violence offences and, if used, could deter victims from coming forward.

In response to the concerns raised, the Department outlined that prosecutorial fines will operate within detailed Public Prosecution Service guidance that will form part of the code for prosecutors and will stipulate the circumstances in which a prosecutorial fine may or may not be offered. The guidance will be subject to consultation. The Department was of the view that this provides a more flexible approach than including further provisions in the Bill and is consistent with the principle of prosecutorial independence. The Department also confirmed that it did not envisage that prosecutorial fines would be a suitable disposal for offences of domestic violence or other serious offences, and any instances of such a fine having been issued previously to an alleged offender would be taken into account when making future decisions. In its view, repeat fines should not be offered, except in the most exceptional and meritorious circumstances.

5.15 pm

Having considered the information provided, the Committee agreed that it was content with the provisions in the Bill for prosecutorial fines, but we want to see the draft guidance that the PPS will develop to ensure that it adequately addresses the circumstances and frequency with which prosecutorial fines can be considered and offered to an offender. Members may, however, feel that, rather than relying on the PPS guidance to prevent the fines being used for domestic violence offences, Mrs Kelly's amendment would provide a safeguard in the Bill. Although I noted the comments that she made and, as long as everyone is supportive of ensuring that it would not be appropriate to offer prosecutorial fines in those circumstances and that it is part of the guidance, that is probably assurance enough for most Members.

I now want to touch briefly on the amendments that Mrs Kelly has tabled to the Bill to bring in domestic violence protection orders to replicate the position in England and Wales. Whilst the Committee has not considered the amendments, the issue of domestic violence protection orders arose when we were looking at the clauses relating to violent offences prevention orders (VOPOs). I directly questioned the Department on whether violent offences prevention orders are designed to deal with domestic violence offences and whether there was an argument for the introduction of domestic violence prevention orders as well. The Department explained that the legislative proposals for the VOPO had been developed with the needs of victims of domestic violence in mind. It had been made offence-based and not sentence-based, and the threshold of qualifying offences was lowered intentionally to include the offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm where the offence takes place in domestic or family circumstances, because of concerns raised during and post public consultation around the issue of tackling domestic violence.

The Department, however, acknowledged that, while VOPOs will provide some additional protections for victims of serious domestic violence, there remains a gap for the immediate protection of victims in the short term. The Department indicated that further consideration of how best to ensure that type of protection would form part of a broader consultation on a range of domestic violence initiatives to take place in 2015-16 as part of the implementation of the new domestic and sexual violence and abuse strategy and subsequently confirmed that it was considering consulting on domestic violence protection orders. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to the proposed amendments, which could provide greater protection against domestic violence offences.

I will now turn to amendment No 28, tabled by Mrs Kelly, Mrs McKeivitt, Mr Maginness and Mr Eastwood, and amendment No 19, tabled by my colleagues Mr Frew and Lord Morrow. Both amendments would introduce similar disclosure schemes, mirroring or improving on existing legislation already here in Northern Ireland or across in Great Britain, often referred to as "Sarah's law", in the case of my colleague's amendment, or "Clare's law", in the case of the SDLP amendment. Neither of the amendments was discussed by the Committee, so I make my observations on this in a purely personal capacity. I wanted to first of all congratulate SDLP and DUP colleagues for tabling the amendments. Whilst I would caution against anyone thinking that these measures alone will keep women and children safe, I support the principle behind both amendments and appreciate the motivations of those who tabled them.

I will look at amendment No 19 first. We know that, whilst they are popular with the public, some people dismiss such laws and are highly critical of them. Indeed, there are examples of how legislation aimed at protecting vulnerable people can go terribly wrong. We do not have to look too hard to find Megan's law, which was one of the initial types of disclosure schemes that operated in the United States, when a series of laws was introduced in the early 1990s after the horrific rape and murder of a seven-year-old girl, Megan Kanka. These required law enforcement authorities to make information available to the public in relation to registered sex offenders. In some US states, it means that offenders' crimes, names, photos and even addresses are published online for the public to view. The information is often published in local newspapers or in pamphlets delivered door to door by some neighbourhood associations. That type of unfettered disclosure led to vigilante-type attacks on individuals and properties. Individuals or gangs tracked down offenders or alleged offenders, which, in some cases, even resulted in murder. I am sure that many people would have little sympathy for those who have violated young children, but this law becomes particularly dangerous when people take the law into their own hands and hunt down those who have the misfortune of having the same name as or looking similar to a registered sex offender or who live in an address previously occupied by a paedophile. Sometimes, when emotions run high and people are highly charged, they act before they think.

In the aftermath of the murder of Sarah Payne, when tabloid newspapers in the UK named and shamed those whom they suspected of being child sex offenders, there were, of course, vigilante gangs hunting down paedophiles in the UK. At that time, one of the worst cases of mistaken identity, which would be amusing if it were not so tragic, was the case of the young doctor in Wales who had her home attacked and spray-painted with the word "paedo" after being named in her local newspaper, which described her as a paediatrician. We need to be responsible, and we need to strike the right balance when it comes to disclosure legislation. Largely, in the United Kingdom, I think, we have done just that. We have learnt from the early experiences of the disclosure of information and made recent legislation that much better.

In the UK, the sex offender disclosure scheme, known almost universally as "Sarah's law", following the tragic murder of Sarah Payne in 2000 — it is referred to as "Mark's law" in Scotland, following the murder of Mark Cummings in 2004 — is greatly improved legislation, certainly compared with its US equivalent. It certainly provides the blueprint for today's amendment. The main difference is the way in which the information is disclosed. Unlike the US, where information is published online for everyone to access, parents in the UK have to go to the police to enquire about someone who is close to their child and ask whether they have been convicted of a child sexual offence. The police then determine whether to release information to the concerned parent. Whilst that is a valuable tool and something that I hope the Assembly supports today, we need to examine safeguards to ensure that the information disclosed is appropriate and the individual in receipt of the information uses it responsibly — otherwise, we could end up in the same position as the US. I know that Mr Frew has given particular consideration to the issue and intends to outline that when he speaks on his amendment shortly.

I also welcome the fact that the Department has indicated that it supports the amendment and is willing to work with Mr Frew to ensure that the legislation is implemented in a way that improves public safety and does not lead to unintended consequences. That is good, in that it ensures that we will have good law. I further welcome the fact that the Northern Ireland law would go further than the law in Great Britain by including a wider range of offences that could be disclosed. Of course, that measure alone will not prevent children being at risk. It will offer parents and guardians some comfort, but we also need to ensure that potentially dangerous sex offenders living in the community are effectively monitored by the Probation Board and legal authorities. Therefore, I hope that, when we discuss budgetary issues in the House in the future, Members will be keen to encourage the Minister to ensure that the Probation Board is adequately funded to carry out that vital work.

Similarly, the SDLP amendment that seeks to introduce Clare's law — as the Member said, it was introduced after the murder of Clare Wood in 2009 — could and should have a positive impact. However, it must be crafted correctly, as the Member who tabled the amendment acknowledged, and, in order to receive broad support, it must be introduced in conjunction with other measures that keep women safe from potentially abusive partners. I understand that the domestic abuse charity Refuge opposed Clare's law. I also noted remarks made by Karen Smith, who is the CEO of another domestic abuse charity, Nia. She warned that Clare's law carried a serious risk of giving women a false sense of security and pointed out that most instances of domestic violence are never reported to the police. If a woman is told that her partner has no history of domestic violence, she may be lulled into trusting her partner when previous abuse had not been recorded by the authorities. I say that not in any way to rubbish the amendment but simply to alert Members to the fact that legislation alone does not solve some of the most distasteful examples of abuse in our society. Without appropriate accompanying support, they may not be as useful a tool as they should be. I suspect that the Members who tabled the amendments would not be at odds with those comments either.

In both cases, I urge the Members to work in collaboration with the Department and charities to ensure that any legislation passed makes a positive difference. I trust that the Assembly will support measures believed to help to deliver greater protection to vulnerable people.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I support all of the amendments tabled by the SDLP. I welcome the fact that the Member who tabled the amendments has met the Justice Minister to explore some of the measures that she has proposed.

I agree that this is an opportunity to legislate to tackle the very severe crimes of domestic and sexual violence in this part of Ireland. We will be doing a disservice to vulnerable groups if we allow the Bill to pass without closing gaps and tackling violent offenders.

I recently met Women's Aid in Enniskillen, and the Member opposite from my constituency, Tom Elliott, was with me. Regarding the degree of domestic violence that exists, it was a learning experience. Dolores Kelly outlined some stark statistics, and, across the island of Ireland, about 100 women have died at the hands of partners or ex-partners over the last 10 or 15 years. If it was happening in any other way, there would be an outcry.

The degree of domestic violence that takes place in this day and age is unbelievable. Women's Aid was at capacity and needed more resources to cope with the people whom it was meeting on a daily basis and arriving at its door. Dolores Kelly is right: we as politicians have had people arrive at our offices at all times of the morning and afternoon. I am happy to say that we have a good working relationship with Women's Aid in Enniskillen.

As legislators, we should be doing all that is possible to tackle the perpetrators of this grave crime. It is in that context that I welcome the series of amendments that the SDLP tabled. They will offer a new tool — namely, domestic violence protection orders and domestic violence protection notices — to police officers who are responding to domestic violence. Those have been rolled out through a number of pilot schemes in England and Wales. Initial examination of the schemes was positive. However, there are challenges, and I will read some of them out. I am not knocking the new tools completely, and they will be valuable to us as we move through further legislative stages.

The challenges include the absence of sentencing guidelines for breaches, the lack of a clear outline of the court process, difficulty in defining success, and complexities and bureaucracy. Those are things that we can learn from. Bureaucracy and time pressures were major barriers to the widespread use of DVPOs. A reluctance to use them was heightened by a lack of understanding. Dolores Kelly mentioned that there is a need for police officers to be trained in that area. I was reading in a document, which I got only in the past 24 hours — thanks to Mrs Kelly — that some police officers were not taking training up as it was a nuisance. That is something that all police officers need to be aware of.

I want to mention the good work that was done in the Committee on victims of and witnesses to crime, and I commend the Minister for moving forward some of the key recommendations, as the Chair mentioned, such as the victims' charter, which gives victims the opportunity to make personal statements. Hopefully, those things should improve victims' experience of the criminal justice system.

Amendment No 68, which was tabled by the Minister, is to be welcomed. It provides for disclosure of information by both the police and the PPS to bodies that are providing support services for victims and witnesses. Regarding the introduction of violent offences prevention orders (VOPOs), the Committee acknowledged that there is a gap when it comes to violent offenders who are a risk to the public. Similar to sexual offences prevention orders (SOPOs), the proposed measures can be a tool for managing those who pose a risk to society at large. Sex offenders and violent offenders will have to notify specific personal details to the police for the duration of an order determined by the court, and these measures should be welcomed.

5.30 pm

Although to the Member who moved the amendments I may have seemed very critical, I think that there are lessons for us to learn. I look forward to the later consideration in the Committee. It is a serious problem not only in the North of Ireland but throughout Ireland.

Mr Elliott: I welcome the opportunity to debate these amendments, or rather, to discuss them. There is not a huge amount of debate involved in this grouping.

Nevertheless, it is very important, and I welcome Mrs Kelly's proposals on domestic violence issues. One thing that has concerned me for many years is that there is no offence around domestic violence, although I suppose that these proposals go some way to putting one in place. There may not be a specific offence, but at least domestic violence protection orders are being put in place. I accept the Member's issue around not moving the amendments and trying to regulate them or put them in a better perspective, but I do welcome them in the round and welcome and support the principle behind them. I see no difficulty with them from the Ulster Unionist perspective.

By and large, a lot of these amendments are very good and positive and have the potential to make matters a great deal better for people who are involved in domestic violence relationships. I hope that they make society better because anything that we can do in that respect is welcome. I listened to Mr Lynch talking about visiting Fermanagh Women's Aid. I suppose that Women's Aid throughout Northern Ireland is no different. You probably hear the same stories and the same difficulties that arise in those areas. I put on record my thanks and appreciation to Women's Aid for the work that it carries out because it is an excellent service, and it provides that service irrespective of what background you come from. I know that it is always a difficult issue when I raise the matter with Fermanagh Women's Aid of how some other organisations help and support it. The one group of organisations that it always highlights that could do a little more is the Churches. It has said that there is potential for Churches and religious organisations to support and assist it in many ways. I hope that the amendments from the SDLP will assist all of that.

Amendment No 19 is around Sarah's law. I welcome the principle and the proposals around that, and I look forward to it being taken forward as well. I want to touch quickly on amendment No 68, which is on the sharing of information. Again, it focuses on victims' information schemes. That can only be positive and good. There is quite a lot of detail in that amendment, which proposes a new schedule. I welcome the opportunity for victims to avail themselves of that better information because that is the one aspect in the legal and court systems that victims are quite often critical of. They say that they do not get a reasonable level of information.

Mr Deputy Speaker, if you do not mind my saying it, it is a bit like going to another place that I am now elected to. Sometimes, the information that you get is not always helpful and may be limited in the areas that you require it for. Maybe going there, it is easier to ask than it is for victims to come forward to the Court Service to try to find out what they need to know. I welcome that amendment, and, by and large, I think that the amendments in this group are less controversial than some of the others.

Mr Dickson: I agree with Tom Elliott that the amendments in this group are less likely to be controversial but are, nevertheless, highly important when it comes to dealing with these matters. They relate primarily to prevention, detection and disclosure in relation to vulnerable groups. I support these amendments. I commend Mrs Kelly and the SDLP for the work they have done and I know that work with the Minister will be ongoing to conclude this matter in a satisfactory way.

As others have done, I pay tribute to the work of Women's Aid, and indeed to the other women's support organisations that exist in every constituency across Northern Ireland, for their work in the east Antrim area.

I welcome the amendments to clause 33, which allow for victims of crime to convey the impact of the crime on themselves and their families through victim statements. The rationale for considering that crime does not impact only on the person most directly involved is that we have social connections with others around us, which mean that we can be profoundly affected by a family member becoming a victim of crime. I support the principle of incorporating the experience of the victim of crime but, ultimately, it is up to the judge, having heard all the evidence, to pass sentence as he or she sees fit. I am content that the Department has left it to the judge to decide whether to take such a contribution into account. This helps to ensure continued confidence in judicial independence in these matters.

I also welcome the addition of clause 35A and schedule 4A, which are common-sense additions to the Bill and will make a fine difference to many victims of crime by ensuring that they are better informed, as Mr Elliott said, about the services available to them and will provide support as they progress through the judicial system.

I particularly welcome Mr Frew's amendment. I confess that, originally, we had some concerns, not with the policy aim, but that the range of information that could be disclosed might be too broad and might extend beyond that for which, for the best of intentions, it was designed. I am delighted that Mr Frew and the Department have been able to work together in this area to ensure that the amendment is effectively incorporated into the Bill, ultimately enabling the police and parents to protect children from individuals who could cause them harm. I therefore support that amendment and further departmental amendments that will come forward to refine this, not forgetting the work that Mrs Kelly has been doing in these matters. I support these amendments in group 2.

Mr Frew: I will propose and speak to amendment No 19, which deals with new clause 43A. Before I move on to that, I would like to say that I broadly welcome the work done by the SDLP on their amendments regarding the domestic violence protection order. I feel that there may be work to be done, and I sincerely hope that it can be done in the interim to allow successful amendments to be made and come into effect in the Bill. I wish Members all the best in that, working closely with the Minister, of course. I certainly support that in principle.

I move on then to the DUP amendment sponsored by my colleague Lord Morrow and me on what will be the Northern Ireland equivalent to Sarah's law. Sarah's law was passed in England after the tragic murder of Sarah Payne. It became known as the child sex offender disclosure scheme, launched in England and in Wales in 2010. Since then, there have been just under 5,000 requests made for information and disclosures, and over 700 disclosures have been made. That certainly tells me that there are 700 people who have been given information that could go some length to protect children under their care. There is an equivalent scheme in Scotland — Mark's law — which, of course, the Chairman of the Justice Committee mentioned earlier. That scheme is called Keeping Children Safe and is also a very important piece of work.

Whilst we all support the principle of Sarah's law and Mark's law in GB, we have to be mindful of the facts and how it would fit into Northern Ireland. That is why I pay tribute to the Minister and his officials, who have worked with me and Lord Morrow to ensure that we have an amendment that is fit for purpose and that fits Northern Ireland and the rigours and regulations that are in place here. Of course, the Minister will reserve the right to amend it, as he sees fit, in the Further Consideration Stage. I give him a commitment that I will work with him over the coming days and weeks to ensure that we can get something that is fit for purpose and best to meet the needs of and protect the children in Northern Ireland.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for giving way, and I commend him for bringing the amendment. I just wonder whether he can provide a little bit of clarity. I will read it out here:

"Guidance under this Article must contain arrangements for the consideration of disclosure".

I just wonder about the thinking behind the inclusion of the word "consideration", if the Member would be so kind as to elucidate.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I will get to the detail of the wording of the Bill later in my contribution, but, of course, he will know that, in some cases, information should not and will not be disclosed. That consideration should be with the people who are the experts on that, namely the PPANI agencies. It is very important that they retain the management of it and the right to disclose, or not to disclose, if that may be the case.

Of course, the scheme proposed in the amendment goes further than in GB, because, unlike the child sex offenders disclosure scheme in England, it includes not only child sex offences but sex offences, domestic violence offences, violence and hate crime offences — all of the PPANI-specified offences. That is vital, because then it becomes much more holistic and widespread in the proper sense because it will afford even greater protection for children and it will allow as many people as possible to apply if they see fit. If they are concerned or suspicious about a person, or the activities of a person, they will be able to apply. Of course those are all serious crimes. It is a wide spectrum of crimes. They range from the highest seriousness to the lowest risk, so it is important that people retain the right and the power to disclose and not to disclose.

I also pay tribute at this stage to the NSPCC, which has worked alongside me and Lord Morrow, advising us on best practice and measures, informing us of the current arrangements already in place and assuring us of the work that it and other agencies within PPANI do that helps to protect and safeguard our families and children. I also pay tribute to Lord Morrow of Clogher Valley for his assistance in supporting the amendment and helping me. The House will know that Lord Morrow has been asking questions of the Minister on this very issue for a long time, and I am glad that he is able to come on board with me as we propose this amendment.

I would also like to thank the Bill Office for its work and assistance throughout the last number of weeks, and for helping and assisting me where and when it needed to. It is a very good office that does tremendous work, usually all behind the scenes, and silently works away.

5.45 pm

The crux of why we need this, Northern Ireland's equivalent to Sarah's law, is that there is no doubt that this is a really serious issue that many in society and society itself grapple with. Certainly, sometimes, it falls short of the requirements that are needed to deal with these serious issues. There is absolutely no doubt that we and the agencies within PPANI cannot stop crime. It is as simple as that. We have to ensure that we can manage, resolve and deal with crime to the best of our ability. Measures have to be in place to ensure that that is the case.

Of course, we know that there are some 1,200 convicted sex offenders being managed in our communities and region. In my policing district — the old H district — there are 118. That information came from questions that my colleague Lord Morrow asked the Minister. People are living in our communities who have maybe served time in prison for very serious offences. They need to be managed and monitored to ensure that they do not pose a risk to children and vulnerable people. We also know that just under 500 sexual offences cases are going through the courts at this time. That information was, again, gleaned through a question from Lord Morrow. Of course, cases will range from the most serious to very low-risk, which nonetheless is crime. That is something that, at first, alarms me but also assures me that there is detection out there. I am sure that some of those cases, as they go through the court process, will be resolved in one way or another with people being put behind bars for a long time.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. He might help me. He mentioned PPANI. Given that he quoted the figure of 1,200 cases going through the courts, does he have any information on the different categories: 1, 2 and 3? It would be useful to put in perspective the quantum of people whom we are trying to manage. If he has that information to hand, it would be really good to hear it.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for the intervention. I do not have that information to hand. He goes some way to proving the point that it is not just sex offenders whom we need to worry about; it is actually the risk that they pose. There will be many sex offenders who have served their time and their punishment and will be a very low risk or no risk to members of the public, particularly children. He raises a valid point, and I will come to it at a later stage.

We also know — this is important — that many cases of sexual or physical abuse, particularly of children, go unreported and undetected. Often, the abuse is carried out by family members and others who are known to the victims. That should not be lost on the House. This amendment will not solve that. We have to make sure that we do everything that we can to assist those victims and the people who are involved in PPANI to deal with the issue and get as many of those people as possible brought to justice and, more importantly, protect the victims in those families. They are so vulnerable. They may well even be listening to the debate today. I plead with those people to come forward because help is available and they should avail themselves of it.

The amendment would amend previous legislation, the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008. It would insert into that Order further items. Basically, it would state:

“Guidance under this Article must contain arrangements for the consideration of disclosure, to any particular member of the public, of information in the possession of the agencies about the relevant previous convictions of any ... sexual or violent offender, where it is necessary to protect a particular child or children from serious harm caused by the offender.”

As I said, that would be added to the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008. That Order provides:

“Guidance under this Article may contain provisions for the purpose of facilitating co-operation between agencies, including ... provisions requiring agencies to maintain arrangements for that purpose and to draw up a memorandum of co-operation; and ... provisions regarding the exchange of information among them.”

It is vital that agencies have decent lines of communication so that they can share information that may be relevant to the cases and individuals they are working with. That is basically what PPANI does. That is why the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 is very important and is relevant to the amendment that we are discussing.

The document ‘Guidance to Agencies on Public Protection Arrangements’ is issued by the Minister of Justice under article 50 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008. The guidance states:

“All ‘agencies’ listed in Article 49 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 have a duty to give effect to this guidance in exercising their functions which contribute to the more effective assessment and management of the risks posed by certain sexual and violent offenders. The guidance is issued to the following agencies: Police Service of Northern Ireland; Probation Board for Northern Ireland; Northern Ireland Prison Service; Youth Justice Agency; Department of Education; Department for Employment and Learning; Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; Department for Social Development; HSC Boards and HSC trusts; Education and Library Boards; Northern Ireland Housing Executive; and National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children”.

All those bodies are now linked and communicate with each other. It is more than that; they have to relate to and go with that guidance. It is important that they give effect to that as it leads to greater protection for our people and most definitely for our children. Of course, with that document, there is already a vehicle through which disclosure can be made. It is vital to get that across.

Before I touch on that, I will talk some more about the arrangements within PPANI, because it is important that the House understands what PPANI is and what it does. The agencies involved in PPANI have worked very closely to protect the public in Northern Ireland and take their responsibilities very seriously. It is chaired by the Probation Board NI. The arrangements came into force in 2008 and have been subject to positive inspections by the Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland. The strategic management board of PPANI comprises senior representatives from the police, the Probation Board, Northern Ireland prisons, Health and Social Care, the NSPCC and the Government, and it meets four times a year. Through local area public protection panels, it provides the framework for local operational cooperation.

All convicted sex offenders are subjected to a static risk assessment on conviction that uses a scoring matrix to give an initial indication of risk. Where an individual is assessed as medium- to high-risk, they are subject to multi-agency assessment and risk management. All offenders have a designated risk manager who is normally someone from the police or the Probation Board Northern Ireland. Ongoing or existing disclosures are overseen by local area public protection panels in a multi-agency way, and risk is increased according to ongoing assessments using a range of domains. Through the use of an internationally recognised dynamic risk assessment tool, part of the assessment will always look at the issue of disclosure. The PPANI agencies support the use of controlled disclosure as part of a risk management plan and, in doing so, follow the principles set out in the Minister of Justice’s statutory guidance. This takes account of legal and procedural requirements in relation to the principles overseeing lawful disclosure. Controlled disclosures are made in Northern Ireland — I stress that they have been made in Northern Ireland — as part of risk assessment and management. They may be made to third parties — for example, people in positions in churches or community groups, relatives or carers — where it is necessary to protect the general public. The decision to do this must be based on compelling risk and will be taken by a senior police officer of Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) rank in consultation with other PPANI agencies.

It is vital to stress, once again, that we have had disclosure in this region. However, I propose that it becomes a two-way mechanism, a vehicle through which members of the public can get information that will help family members, guardians and carers to manage the risk to their family. We all know that, at times, people ring our constituency offices to say that they have heard a rumour, which then spreads like wildfire. I have had experience of cases in which that has led to instances of mistaken identity. People have been assaulted or had their property damaged because of rumours and innuendoes and all sorts of information going out in all directions. People are genuinely worried, concerned and fearful for their children and the children in their care.

We propose that that mechanism goes two ways, so that members of the public who hear concerns and rumours can apply for that information, which must be child-centred. They must be responsible for children. This is not a nosy neighbour charter, nor is it some vehicle that the press can use and exploit. I would not propose it here if it was. Some of our media outlets have been reckless and sensationalist with some of the information around this serious issue, and that has led to people being attacked. Any attack on any person or property is wrong: if you break the law you should expect to be subject to the law. That applies to anyone in this society.

I believe that this will go some way to relieving the pressure and removing the vacuum that leads to misinformation and wrong information. It will also mean that, if there is a disclosure, those receiving that information have a responsibility to use it for the sake of their children and the people whom they care about. It is not for them to disclose that information in a reckless way to other members of the community who then may take the law into their own hands. That is not what this is about. That in itself will be an offence. It is right and proper that, when people are armed with information that will help them manage the risk to their family, they do not divulge it. There is absolutely nothing to stop other members of the community applying for information about the same person or similar people in an area. It is important that that two-way system works.

This will also help PPANI because it could work as an early detection system.

There is no doubt about it: PPANI and the strict guidelines that I talked about earlier, which were issued by the Minister in 2008, work well. I would go as far as saying that ours is probably the best system in the United Kingdom and better than systems in other places in the world, but it is not failsafe. Sometimes, people slip through the net and issues go awry. That is why this could also lead to an early detection system.

6.00 pm

Why would people apply for information on someone else to be disclosed? I believe that people would use the mechanism when they had suspicions about someone — maybe someone is acting suspiciously or people are talking about them. Is it not better that PPANI hears of their concerns? Is it not better that people can apply for disclosure on those individuals? Is it not better that they are able to risk-manage their children as best they can? If it comes back that there is no issue with a person, is that not better than people wondering, people being concerned and frightened, and unreasonable people taking the law into their own hands? It would then become a bigger issue than the rumour mill in the local pub, shop or youth club. That is why this law is essential for Northern Ireland.

I will go through some of the issues. We will not ignore the arguments against; we will go through them. Some say that this may lead to more vigilante-type attacks, but we know that such attacks happen now on the streets of our towns, villages and cities. It happened in my constituency only last month. A lot of attacks have been cases of mistaken identity. This law, under which disclosure would be made only when necessary to protect a child or children, would, I believe, remove that risk. If people knew exactly what the truth was and were armed with that information, they could make informed choices about what they did in the future — where their children went and what they did. To me, that is very important.

It is important that responsible people get to hear that information. Why is it that parents are the last to know? If we can share information between agencies, whether it be the NSPCC, the police, the Probation Board, the Prison Service or the education board, why can we not disclose that information to responsible parents? They are the ones whom we task with bringing on society and bringing up their children in a responsible manner.

We know that there are social networking sites that name and shame sex offenders and child sex offenders. Our newspapers have also been irresponsible, and that has led to attacks. People's names have been issued in papers, as have their addresses or areas. It is very important that the media, even tonight, as they report on this amendment, take a responsible approach. I plead with the media to ensure that they understand this thoroughly.

There is already frustration and fear among the public, and I believe that the disclosure scheme will go some way to alleviating that pressure. Of course, many who have been punished and sanctioned for committing sexual offences may well have reformed and been rehabilitated. In that case, they will pose little or no risk to the public. It is all about risk; it is not about cautions or prosecutions on a list. That is very important when you look at that amendment. If PPANI is involved in the administration of this, which it will be, and, if the PSNI has a very major say, if not the final say, on it, they will be able to consider each and every individual case, which is right and proper. However, it will not only be convictions. The words "relevant previous convictions" may also mean findings and cautions that relate to the offender's specification in guidance under article 50. The amendment could therefore go some way to assuaging the fears of our people.

This may be a negative argument, but we also hear that it could lead to a flood of requests coming in. It might do. People could point to the flood of requests in England, Scotland and Wales, and that might well be the case here. However, the aim of the scheme is to give parents, carers, guardians and all other interested bodies, parties and people a more formal mechanism for requesting information about a person who has or may have contact with their child or be close to them, if they are concerned that that individual is a child sex offender, a sex offender or a violent offender. As I say, this should not be used as a nosy-neighbour charter, as a revenge weapon for someone who has a grudge or by the media. However, I believe that it cannot be used for that because PPANI will be the one administering it with the PSNI.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will.

Mr B McCrea: I am sorry for interrupting all the time, but you bring up some interesting points. This has just occurred to me: is there any notification? If a person has requested information about person x, does person x get to know that someone has made that request?

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his contribution, because that is a very important point. In many cases, that is the procedure. Even now, in many cases, if PPANI proposes that people should have information disclosed to them and is managing and monitoring the sex offender, it will have approached that sex offender to say, "Why are you here? Why are you doing this? Why are you in this relationship? You should not be in a relationship. We need to tell your new partner — the single mum — that her and her children may be at risk". That is what happens at present in many cases. In many cases, that is the right thing to do, because, although we have to manage and monitor these people, we have to make sure that they do not reoffend. That is key here. That is the reason that we need to make sure that this is managed properly and appropriately. That is why, at times, it is good and proper to disclose to the sex offender or the person who may pose a risk to family members.

People have also argued about striking a balance between the need to protect the public and enabling people who have served their sentence and rehabilitated themselves to move on positively with their life. This is not putting a mark on anyone for the rest of their life if they are totally rehabilitated, have reformed and have moved on positively. This is all about risk, and the level of risk that they pose to a child under someone's supervision.

People have also argued in the past about an onus or responsibility shifting away from the state and on to ordinary members of the public. I do not believe that that would be the case, as responsibility will still lie with the PPANI agencies. That argument misses the point somewhat, in that this is all about information-sharing. It is all about arming parents and members of our society who care for children with that information. Of course, as was said earlier, not all sex offenders pose the same risk. Again, it will be determined on a case-by-case basis and by a number of factors. It is already in use in PPANI. Many individuals are not known about, nor do they have criminal convictions. Those individuals will pose the highest risk in our community. That is why I am mindful of the fact that, even with this law, there needs to be education and awareness. Members of our public need to be able to assess, judge and monitor for themselves the people in their communities. If they are fearful, they can apply for this scheme.

In closing, Mr Deputy Speaker, the child protection disclosures will not solve crime; they will not end child abuse or sexual crime. Giving the public information about individuals' previous crimes and risk levels is just one part of this very complicated jigsaw. It is vital that sex offenders serve long and sufficient prison sentences.

Like all parents, we, of course, believe that prison is the best place for those who harm children and commit serious sexual crime. However, all prisoners are released eventually, so they have to be thoroughly risk-assessed and rehabilitated before they are released to understand that what they have done is wrong. Then, they need to be managed and monitored for a long time, with constant reassessment. I am dedicated in the pursuit of keeping children, and all our citizens, safe; that is my motivation for this amendment. How can it help? It can help by making sure that parents are among the first, not the last, to know, and they can use that information to assist them in keeping their children safe.

I am delighted that the majority of Members who spoke did so in favour of the amendment. I hope that the amendment goes before the House tonight and is passed. I give a commitment, as will my colleague Lord Morrow, that we will work with the Minister in the days and weeks ahead to make sure that this amendment becomes law and provides safety and assurance for the parents, teachers and carers of our society and community, and that the youngsters, young people and children whom we want to protect will be given a greater degree of protection.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Members, this section has been running for approaching three hours, and it seems to me an appropriate time to have a break. So, I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting for about 20 minutes. Actually, we will come back at 6.30 pm sharp, when the next Member to speak will be Raymond McCartney.

The sitting was suspended at 6.12 pm and resumed at 6.34 pm.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will concentrate most of my remarks on amendment No 19, tabled by Paul Frew and Lord Morrow. I have just a couple of wider remarks in relation to the group of amendments that we are debating. My party is broadly in support of the Minister's amendments. We will support his amendments on victims, witnesses and other aspects of disclosure.

I remarked earlier today that the Committee's inquiry into victims and witnesses informed many of these amendments and, indeed, a big thrust of the Bill. From an earlier part of the discussion, I hope that, as we come to define what we class as a vulnerable witness or a witness who should be exempt at a particular stage of trial proceedings, the inquiry and some of the work that we have done will inform that as well.

My colleague Seán Lynch dealt with the amendments tabled by the SDLP, and I note that when Dolores Kelly was speaking she mentioned that she may not be moving some of the amendments, in light of a commitment from the Minister to a process of consultation. That is to be welcomed because the wider we consult and the more scrutiny there is, the tighter the legislation will become. That point applies to amendment No 19, tabled by Paul Frew and Lord Morrow. Even when Paul Frew was speaking today, you could see how the information was becoming wider. Perhaps we missed out because it was not tabled earlier so that it could have gone through the Committee Stage. All of us would then have been in a better place to know the issues. You made the point about how sometimes this is presented in the media, and I noticed in the commentary over the last 24 hours that you can see how there can be a tendency, although not in any malicious way. It nevertheless narrows down what the amendment is trying to achieve. Last week, Mr Frew spent some time with Seán Lynch and me explaining the content of it. We appreciated that. He was very precise when he said that he wants this classed as "child protection disclosures" rather than, as he said, some sort of wide hunt to find where certain people live and how they live out their lives.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. He is right, and I thank the Member for the support of his party for the amendment. It specifies sexual or violent offenders. "Specified" means that it is within the remit of PPANI. That is why it is wider-reaching than just child sex offenders, because of course children can be harmed by more than just child sex offenders. It is a broader remit. I am quite content with that because they are all within the PPANI arrangements, and all those types of offenders will be monitored and managed by PPANI.

Mr McCartney: I thank the Member for that intervention and the information. At its core, most of us are reasonably content that something is put in place to provide additional protection for children, never mind whether they are vulnerable or not. Most of us support that, and the broad thrust of this is around that, so that is why we agree in principle. Certainly, and perhaps in the commentary and other contributions this afternoon, there may be some place at Further Consideration Stage to tighten up what we believe may be gaps, but that is something we can come back to. I say that in light of some of the commentary over the last 24 hours, but what has been said here today has helped to close that particular gap.

One of the big parts of this for us is that people are asking what should be disclosed, when it should be disclosed, how it should be disclosed and who it should be disclosed to. That is important, because the Member talked about PPANI and what they already have in place. They have a good system in place. I think that most people are happy with what they do. As the Chair said, no matter what protections you have in place, it will not, in every situation, prevent further crimes from being committed. You are trying all the time to try to close that down.

When he was introducing his and Lord Morrow's amendment, the Member talked about working alongside the NSPCC. That is the appropriate way to go about this. It has it at its core, even in its briefing document for Sarah's law. The idea of safeguarding a child is at the centre of all that it does, so that was the right approach. It even talked in the document about the idea of a regular independent evaluation of the work that is being carried out. That is something that we can maybe put to it as we go forward. The Member talked about situations where it could be abused or overused. Maybe that is not the right phraseology, but you want this to be taking place in a situation where it is about protecting children. People have real fears, and, when they have real fears or real doubts, they have a process that they enter into.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will indeed, yes.

Mr Frew: The Member makes a very salient and good point. I would be all in favour of a review of this because, in the PPANI guidance and the actual legislation, it asks to be constantly reviewed. I think that not only the child protection order but the PPANI arrangements should be reviewed to make sure that they are fit for purpose and that the standard operating procedures are used. That is best practice all round the world.

Mr McCartney: The Member's amendment refers to article 50 of the Criminal Justice Order. Specific within that is the idea of consultation and using the agencies and the experts in the field to continually provide guidance so that it is refined. I welcome the fact that this will be strict and that, when a person receives the information, they will be bound by legislation and cannot disclose it. In other words, if someone gets information on an individual, damning as it may be, they then cannot share it, because, as you said, the potential for vigilantism or sensation in the media is increased as a result of that. The Member touched on the fact that this is already in place. People can go to PPANI and find out certain information. You do not want someone to be able to use this maliciously in the rumour mill. They could ask for information on the person and the person has no record at all, but the person might then say, "I tried to find out information about such and such." People might say, "Well, why would somebody ask about a person if there was no reason to do it?" The person might be totally and absolutely innocent of any offence. We have to make sure that that is done.

The Member touched on the idea of balance and risk being at the heart of it. When you have risk and balance at the heart of it and guidance from the experts, I think we have the basis to proceed. We are broadly supportive of the amendment. Saying that, as the Member said, between now and Further Consideration Stage, much like Mrs Kelly has offered to the Minister, if this could be tightened up so that we do not end up bringing in legislation and there being unintended consequences, we will be broadly supportive of the amendment.

Lord Morrow: I rise to speak primarily on amendment No 19, standing in my and Mr Frew's names. We have no hostility towards the other amendments in the group. I think that I overheard the Minister say that a little bit of fine-tuning may still need to be done around the clause and the amendment, and that is understandable. As one who has steered a Bill quite recently through the House, I am quite aware of what fine-tuning sometimes means. I have that experience, and I think that I am the better because of it. I understand that this one will have to go through that mill again and even come out better at the other side, but we do not have a problem with that at all.

We do not have any problem with Mrs Kelly's amendment, and I hope that she, too, will reach a satisfactory conclusion with it and come back to the House with it. I think that she will find that we here on these Benches are ready to support it because we see great merit in it and we hope that it makes it into the Bill eventually and onto the statute book.

The amendment to the Justice Bill in my name and that of my colleague Mr Frew, I believe, is very important. I believe that it will enhance the Justice Bill and Northern Ireland will be a better place if it eventually reaches the stage where it becomes legislation.

I have an overarching concern for the protection of victims of crime and the prevention of further victims, and I make no apology for that. I am sure that anyone who follows questions for written answer will be aware that I often put down questions in relation to the fate and welfare of victims, and I make no apology for that; hence our efforts here today to try to bring in an amendment to the Justice Bill.

In an ideal world, there would be no victims of crime, but since no such world exists — quite the contrary — the very least that we as legislators must do is to protect and prevent. It is incumbent on us. We have a moral and legislative duty to look after victims of crime at whatever phase, whatever age group or whatever their position is in society. Children are, by default, vulnerable. They depend on adults to guide and nurture them and protect them from harm. They are utterly reliant on adults for safety and survival. They also rely on adult judgements. When the adults in question are not aware of danger, we have to ask the question, "What then?". How can an adult be expected to ensure the safety of a child if they themselves are oblivious to the risk? I believe that is where Sarah's law becomes a necessity.

The wave of revulsion following the horrendous case of eight-year-old Sarah Payne was universal, and I am sure that no one in this House is unaware of that particular situation. That a child could one minute be out playing with her siblings and then be snatched by a sexual deviant to act as his plaything before being brutally murdered caused widespread abhorrence. It later emerged that her murderer had a previous conviction for abducting and sexually abusing another eight-year-old girl five years earlier but was free to roam the countryside uninhibited, ultimately finding his next victim in that little girl, Sarah.

Something had to be done. That challenge was taken up by Sarah's mother, Dr Sara Payne, who fought a gruelling campaign for disclosure, thereby allowing those caring for children to make informed choices to ensure safety. I pay tribute today to Dr Payne and her work. Having suffered a tragedy too awful to comprehend, she sought to ensure safeguards for other children to prevent a similar fate to that of her daughter. I believe that demonstrated overwhelming strength in the face of such horrific circumstances, and, as was to come during her campaign, adversity. However, she prevailed, and she succeeded.

I have been lobbying for the introduction of Sarah's law in Northern Ireland for two years now. During that time, I have had setbacks, on most occasions chiefly because of a fear of information, which has been discussed again and understandably so, being passed erroneously, leading to vigilante-type attacks, but, in latter days, things have begun to change, and I welcome that, too. I lay the credit for that with my colleague Paul Frew, who discussed the issue with me and started to drive it forward.

I am proud, of course, to be the co-sponsor of the amendment. We both agreed that disclosure in the correct circumstances could allow parents and carers of children to risk-manage potential situations of danger or threat. The Minister, while not entirely unsympathetic in the early stages, reiterated his concerns on the potential of community reprisals. That was not lost on us, but the whole principle of Sarah's law centres on controlled disclosure, and that gives us confidence to know that information is released carefully by the PSNI and only to the people who are directly responsible for a child's safety. I think that it is important to say that.

A genuine application for disclosure will have the child in question at the centre of the equation. It is ironic that a person applying for a job that would bring them in contact with children or vulnerable adults is required to undergo a check with Access NI that discloses all previous convictions to prospective employers, who are duty bound to protect the information imparted. The process enables employers to ascertain whether the applicant is suitable for the position and thereby adhere to risk management and ensure that their own safety policies are secure; yet a parent or a primary carer, the first point of contact for a child, does not have that straightforward screening process to allow for risk management consideration.

Coupled with the restrictive regime currently in place and a lack of awareness on the right to ask for disclosure, Northern Ireland has been lagging behind. The existing scheme in England and Wales is known as the child sex offender disclosure. What we are proposing today will be known as the child protection disclosure, making the child and their welfare the nucleus of the scheme. I have conducted significant research on sexual and violent offenders residing in the community, and I am not exaggerating when I say that some of the case studies have been quite horrific and horrendous. I believe that several of those cases could have been prevented if parents and carers had been aware of previous issues. I remain unable to ascertain how many requests for disclosure under the current scheme in Northern Ireland were made since its introduction and, of those, how many were granted. I am still in the process of trying to obtain those figures.

There was much media consternation asking why we should introduce legislation that is apparently already there, but it would appear that they are not reading the amendment or do not understand the breadth that we are intending to cover. Let me make it clear, if I can: the current Northern Ireland equivalent of Sarah's law permits only the disclosure of a previous sex crime against a child. It is very limited in scope and differs in range. To underscore that, I quote a reply to a question for written answer that I submitted to the Minister. In March this year, I asked what challenges or difficulties would be faced by introducing or enforcing Sarah's law in Northern Ireland. I got this reply:

"The PSNI has made the Department aware that there could be potential difficulties in making changes to the current system of disclosure, including problems arising through loss of control of such information. As well as possible risk to the safety of individual offenders, there may be an increased risk of attacks on other individuals as a result of misinformation, and, of more general importance, a decrease in the overall effectiveness of the agencies' efforts to maximise public protection, as offenders go to ground and fail to comply with arrangements to manage the risk they pose."

That was not a satisfactory reply, as the issue of child safety did not even feature and focus was entirely on the offender or perceived offender. I believe that justice should be victim-centred, not offender-tailored, and it is not the first time that I have said that in the House — justice should be looking after the victim primarily.

However, positive engagement did follow, and shortly after, it became clear that the Minister acknowledged that the current process could be altered and enhanced. With the Minister's support, we seek to widen the parameters and, therefore, create a stronger defence against risk. We want to see all crimes of a sexual or violent nature flagged up and considered.

Our amendment seeks to reduce the risk to children from a number of angles, including the potential for domestic violence. I will give a very basic example: as the law stands, parent a can inquire about a person who they believe has shown concerning behaviour towards their child. If the person in question has no convictions for child sex offences, parent a, providing they have been granted disclosure, will be told that there is nothing on file. However, the person in question may have convictions for violence or aggressive behaviour, which could still be classed as a risk to the child. Therefore, our amendment permits the violence conviction to be taken into consideration within disclosure, with the safety of the child being the overall driver.

I also emphasise the issue of awareness. In my ongoing correspondence with the Lucy Faithfull Foundation, which championed Sarah's law in England and Wales, there was great concern about the awareness of the law and how it was incumbent on the agencies to ensure that people were fully aware that the scheme exists. I place on record my thanks to the Lucy Faithfull Foundation, and in particular to its director of research and policy, Donald Findlater, who has been of tremendous support in this matter.

Awareness is clearly the key, so I will do my bit by stating the following: everyone with responsibility for a child's welfare has the right to ask. Let me emphasise that: they have the right to ask. The lead agency in our case — the PSNI — is the only body with the capacity to ask, “Who has the right to know?”. We do not seek to gainsay the decisions of the PSNI in relation to a refusal of disclosure, but it will have sound reasons for doing so, which will be explained to the applicant.

Initially, the Minister was reluctant to alter current legislation, but, following engagement with my colleague Paul Frew, common ground was found, and the Minister accepted that more could be done, and we very much welcome that. That engagement has produced an extremely worthy amendment that incorporates not only the principles of Sarah’s law but more. I thank the Minister and his officials for engaging in a very positive way. I have to be careful because I have found myself coming into the House on many occasions and congratulating the Minister. I look at him, and then I look at myself and ask, “Who has got it wrong here?”.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Right, I better do that.

Mr Ford: I thank the Member and would like to assure him that I find it equally embarrassing. [Laughter.]

Lord Morrow: At least we have something in common: we are both embarrassed.

Sincerely, I thank him for being constructive. His staff have also been very constructive on this issue, and we very much appreciate that. I thank the other parties in the Assembly Chamber that today indicated their support for this amendment. I realise that there is some tweaking to be done here and there, but that will be carried out, and we will come back to the House when that has happened.

I want to mention a particular case that came to my attention only today. It involves a child being sexually abused over a period by a sex offender with multiple convictions. It is not a historical matter — it is recent and happened in Northern Ireland. I cannot help but think that, if disclosure had been applied for and the information known, in this instance, and in others like it, the child involved would not have become another victim.

I had other stuff to say, but much of it has been said, and the hour is getting on. In conclusion, let me repeat what others have said, which is that legislation on its own will not be sufficient. There is not a Member in the House who does not accept that, and those of us who tabled the amendment come from that position, too. Legislation on its own is not the cure. We recognise that, but having effective legislation in place can be a real deterrent in times when it is needed.

Mr Douglas: Like the previous Member to speak, Lord Morrow, I will try to be as brief as I can. That said, Mr Deputy Speaker — where did he go?

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

As I was saying before you joined us, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will try to keep this as brief as I possibly can. Hopefully, my speech will be as good as your handover.

I have about 22 pages here, but I will try to keep it down to 20 if I can. I am only joking.

7.00 pm

As a member of the Justice Committee, I welcome the debate. I want to focus on the amendments relating to domestic violence. As I said, it is a timely debate. All that we have to do is look at our television screens. We hear it in our communities, and we read in the media about the horrors and the impact of domestic violence on too many families in our communities. First, I support in principle the work done by Mrs Kelly and her colleagues in the SDLP and, indeed, their amendments on domestic violence. I welcome them and will certainly support them in principle. Moreover, I pay tribute to two other colleagues, Mr Frew and Lord Morrow. I will support Sarah’s law and, indeed, Clare’s law, which Dolores Kelly mentioned.

Mrs Kelly clearly outlined the horrors for women who experience domestic violence. One of the things that we have recognised over the years is that it affects all aspects and every area of society. I suppose that, in the past, it was always about disadvantaged communities and people who were living in poverty or whatever, but domestic violence affects the whole community across Northern Ireland. Mrs Kelly reminded us that Women’s Aid is at full capacity. It is a wonderful organisation, and, when we talk about austerity measures and big cutbacks, it is the sort of organisation that we should support day in, day out for the work that it does on domestic abuse and domestic violence. Like many others, I pay tribute to Women’s Aid for the work that it does on a 24-hour basis, but there are other organisations as well. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, you will know of two of many in east Belfast: the Cregagh women’s centre does excellent work with women, as does the recently formed Pitt Park Women’s Group on the lower Newtownards Road. I see the work that they are involved in with women and children and the positive impact that they can have on the lives of so many people. I think that the women who work with victims of domestic violence will support the Bill. They will say that this is a good news story for them and the work that they do. I have been involved in community work for 25 years, and I have seen at first hand the impact of domestic violence on families. It is not just about women but about their children, their friends and the break-up of families — the horrors that Mrs Kelly outlined.

I also want to highlight something else, and maybe the Minister will address it. I am not sure whether I am on the right track here, but does the Bill deal with domestic violence against men? Over the years, a number of men have come to me, even since I opened up my office on the Newtownards Road four years ago. Some of those men tend to come in when they have a few beers on them and have a sense of Dutch courage. It is horrendous. One man who came to me said that he was suffering serious domestic violence daily but his biggest fear was his partner’s three brothers, who were quite hard men in a sense. It was the fear of them rather than the fear of retaliating. He did not want to retaliate; he loved his partner. Maybe the Minister will look at that and confirm whether the Bill will address those issues. I am not sure what the scale of this is, and I think that it is much more difficult for men to admit that they suffer domestic violence.

As Mrs Kelly said, one in four women suffers domestic violence at some stage in her life. That is a terrible statistic, and it is indicative of the breakdown of society. Again, I ask the Minister to look at that. For me, the amendments will definitely improve the lives of victims of domestic violence, and I hope and am assured that the Bill will help in the fight against domestic violence. I believe that these proposals will make a difference.

I conclude by welcoming the protections that the Department has outlined in the amendments, and I look forward to the broader consultation that, as the Chairman of our Committee said, will take place between now and 2016. Hopefully, it will form a new domestic and sexual violence and abuse strategy, something that we can get our teeth into and can plan for into the future. I look forward to the Minister's response to the amendments.

Mr Givan: I welcome the opportunity to speak to this group of amendments. I will speak specifically to amendment No 19 in the name of my colleagues, Mr Frew and the Lord Morrow, and amendment No 68, tabled by the Minister. At the outset, I acknowledge the thanks of the Minister in the group 1 debate for the work that I did in some of the Committee's scrutiny of the Bill when I held the role of Chairman. I appreciate that very much. I too pay tribute to the officials and the Committee staff for the support that they provided when I was there to ensure that we were able to do our job and do it well. As always, that has continued under our new Chairman, Mr Ross. The Committee demonstrates how MLAs can hold Ministers to account, scrutinise legislation and come forward with proposals that help to shape good law. It is testimony to the good work that often goes unnoticed in the broader public debate. We are often shrouded in crises — certainly that is very real at the moment — but good work goes on behind the scenes in the Committees, where members of all parties work collectively to get the best legislation.

I now touch briefly on amendment No 19. First, I pay tribute to Mr Frew and the Lord Morrow for tabling it. Any Member who tables an amendment is to be commended — I know that Mrs Kelly has done the same — as it requires significant work. Obviously, they have been able to do that, and it would appear to me that they will be successful today in their efforts to bring forward something for the good of society. I commend them.

It is important that in any society the rights of the child are paramount; that is at the heart of this legislation. The concerns of parents and guardians are to the fore in this, as it empowers them with the information to make sure that their child or whoever they are responsible for looking after is protected. The legislation will empower those with responsibility for children to make decisions for the good of the child whom they are concerned with. It also addresses the concerns of the community, which is very much exercised by the issue, and wants our children to be safeguarded and protected. Those are the three most important pillars of the legislation: the children, those with responsibility for children and the broader community at large.

Secondary in all of this are the rights of the predators who have carried out the most heinous crimes against children. Their rights should always take second place to the rights and needs of children. Sexual offenders, in particular, are some of the most deviant and manipulative criminals in our midst.

Given that we have in the region of 1,200 sex offenders in Northern Ireland, every one of us in our constituencies has to deal with the reality that there are sex offenders in our midst. It is right that we take on the public concerns that exist and try to address the issue.

The Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland (CJINI) did a report on the public protection arrangements for Northern Ireland and how sex offenders are monitored. It is true to say that that report gave an outstanding analysis of how public protection arrangements are carried out in Northern Ireland. That is a tribute to the different criminal justice agencies that are responsible for it, and it is worth putting that on the record; but I believe that more is required, and the amendment will provide further information through the disclosure being made, because it moves the right to privacy that the paedophile is currently afforded into the hands of the parents and guardians. This is a step that is worth taking. It will protect children, because the information will now be provided to those to whom it is relevant so that they are empowered to act.

In closing on this amendment, in my own constituency I have dealt with a family — obviously, I am not going to name them — who came to me in great despair because of an individual who had sexually abused their young daughter. That individual had served time in prison, had been subsequently released and was living in my constituency. Their fear was that the perpetrator, the paedophile, could offend again and that there was nothing they could do to warn others. They spoke to me about their desire to hold up placards outside community facilities where they knew the individual was residing and was going to shop. They wanted to be able to do that. Now, we do not believe that that is the right thing to do in our society, but they felt very concerned for others that the individual may well commit another offence.

Obviously, in the vast majority of these cases, because children are involved, anonymity is granted to the perpetrator in order to protect the child. The perpetrator is often afforded protection from the public knowing who they are. Again, the family felt very much aggrieved that, for obvious reasons, they did not want their daughter's name to be known publicly, but they wanted the public to know who the perpetrator was. However, the only way that that could be done was if they were to waive their right to anonymity.

Today, I will be able to go back to my constituent and say that, if there are concerns about that individual, the parents of children who may well live beside that person and who may well have concerns will now be able to go to the relevant authorities to seek information, which will be given to them. They will then be able to take actions to protect their own children. I know that this will be of comfort to that particular family whom I have been seeking to help for a number of years. That is what this is all about; protecting children and empowering parents and guardians to be able to take measures so that they are protected. I think that that is the right thing to do and I commend my colleagues for bringing it forward.

Briefly, I welcome amendment No 68, which is around agencies being required to disclose information to victims and witnesses of crimes. That will add to what is contained in the Bill around a victim's charter, something that the Committee has been pushing for a number of years now, on the back of a Committee inquiry that was carried out. Victims, who are often also witnesses in criminal offences, often felt that they were secondary to the whole process and that the PPS, the Police Service and others were more concerned about how the system was operating. The victims and witnesses often felt that they were not central to the process but were subservient to it. This further amendment helps to make the victims and witnesses central to going through the criminal justice system. I think it is a welcome amendment that should have our support.

Principal Deputy Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to make that contribution.

7.15 pm

Mr B McCrea: For five years, I was the chair of the Policing Board's human rights committee. One of the best things that I ever got involved with — it is a funny thing to call “best” — was working with Women's Aid. We had a great seminar. Earlier, I heard Seán Lynch talk about the fact that the police occasionally need a bit of training for when they come across issues of domestic violence. That was one of the things that we were able to engage with and explain to people: that it was not just “a domestic”, but a serious issue. I will not rehash the statistics. We all know them. It usually takes a considerable number of events to happen before the woman — and it is usually a woman — will come forward and make a complaint.

We looked at all sorts of issues about how to ensure that somebody, having made a complaint, follows it through. In fact, domestic violence is one of the few areas where you can actually prosecute without having the witness. I got some more experience. I know that this is not to everybody's liking, but I did manage to take a case through to the European Court of Human Rights on behalf of a lady who had suffered domestic violence. It was quite an education on how positive it was for her to deal with those issues.

What is really interesting for me is the fact that Mrs Kelly has brought forward a fairly comprehensive range of amendments. I accept, because she has accepted, that it may be that we need to look at the drafting of those matters. Nevertheless, it is a pretty good framework for something to be done on, and I commend her for it in general terms about how we make sure that those who are under pressure actually get support when it is needed. I will put it on record that I am a little bit disappointed that we cannot get into the nitty-gritty and talk about it now, but since we are going to look at it again and come back, that will be the time to really look at it. Congratulations on that; I hope that it will see some positive outworkings at Further Consideration Stage.

I will move on to information. I listened to Mr Givan talk about amendment No 68 on sharing information. The reason why I was not in my place, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, was that I was checking whether I had misunderstood what was in the amendment. If I have, obviously the Minister or the proposer will get the chance to clarify it. It seemed to me on reading the amendment that there was specified information that bodies were allowed to give to other people, such as the name, address and contact telephone number, so that they could be provided with services. I am not sure whether it goes quite as far as Mr Givan was suggesting, whereby you would get more information during the process. If that is what is required, maybe that, too, will need to be looked at at Further Consideration Stage.

Certainly, I think that the most frustrating issue for any victim of crime is that it seems to take a long time for anything to be resolved. You sit waiting for information, hoping that somebody is doing something, and you are not sure whether anything is actually happening at all. The odd word to the wise about what is going on is deeply comforting. The problem, of course, for any criminal investigation is that if you are giving out information and trying to keep people informed, good and all as that is for the victim, you run the risk of compromising the investigation. Whilst I am supportive of agencies working together and getting support to victims, I would like to look a little bit further at the next stage at what exactly that amendment seeks to do.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will indeed.

Mr Givan: The Member is questioning whether amendment No 68 will actually help victims. I will just refer the Member to that amendment. Subsection 3(1) states:

“A member of ... the Public Prosecution Service may disclose relevant information ... to the Department for the purpose of enabling the Department to provide information ... to the victim”.

It gives the example of the “prisoner release victim information scheme”. That is what amendment No 68 relates to. It is about sharing information that could be used to enable the victim to get more information.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for providing clarification. As I said, I did not have the chance to pick it all up. I note that the amendment runs to quite a considerable number of items, three pages of detail, and that that is but one element of it. I am sure that he would join with me in saying that, whatever information can be given to victims, at whatever stage, is a bonus for them.

Some have said that the rights of the victim should take primacy and that they should not in any way be equated with the rights of the perpetrator, which should be secondary. To be honest, I am not sure if that is not being a little generous. The issue with our criminal justice system is that victims of crime need to be absolutely front and centre. That is what a criminal justice system is for.

I will move on to a number of points on Sarah's law and Clare's law. I asked Mr Frew some questions on that issue, and I am grateful for the information that he provided. I want to say something about the way that this started off in my thinking. Mr Ross will probably not like this, but I thought that he gave a very good and balanced position. I was concerned about issues of improper disclosure, vigilantism and all those issues. He dealt with all those issues, and I thought that that was what was really good about the debate.

I then listened to Mr Frew going on. I was right there with him 100% on 80% of what he said, but I was not just so sure towards the end when he started to deal with who would have access to the information. That is probably just one of the things that we will tease out as we move forward to Further Consideration Stage. I asked about a couple of issues. To whom do we should disclose the fact that an inquiry has been made? If a parent has a concern about x, they will go forward and ask whether x is a problem. The answer that Mr Frew gave me was that that is absolutely right, that happens already and that if x is a problem he should rightly be talked to and it would be taken forward. The question that I was not sure was addressed and that maybe ought to be addressed is what we do if there were 4,000 people making an enquiry but x was not a problem and the inquiry produced a negative result. Do we build up the fact that lots of people had asked about x? There was a suggestion that it would be good if PPANI noted that there were suspicions about that person or whatever, but that would indicate to me that there would be some sort of a register of the number of times that an inquiry had been made. Is that what is envisaged under this rule? I am happy to take any clarification on that point. Maybe it is not the right time.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member seeks clarification and I am happy to give it to him. In the current system, there is risk management and the monitoring and management of sex offenders. If an application is made, some of things that are assessed are whether it is child centred, whether it is on a particular child or children and the concerns around that. If that is the case, there will also be an assessment of whether the person who is applying is the right person to obtain that information.

If it is deemed to be such a risk that someone else should have disclosure of that information, it is within the gift of PPANI to disclose that information to them. It may be the case that the offender should know that they are doing something that is wrong, or not right, and that they should mend their ways. That is all about the management of sex offender or violent offender in every situation. As I said earlier, it could be used as an early detection system by PPANI whereby it might just safeguard some of its actions and monitoring and policing of those offenders.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for the information. We need to look at the idea of an early warning system and consider how that might work. I gave Mr Frew a mark of only 80% because he started out so well talking about why this amendment was not going to deal with vigilantism, getting things wrong or putting out inappropriate information. That is the thing that needs to come out from this debate.

I have in front of me a piece of paper that says, "Does Sarah's law work?". I am rehashing some things that have been said by different people, including Mr Ross. It cites the appalling case of a Mr Ebrahimi, a disabled Iranian national who was subjected to a sustained campaign of victimisation and attacks because he was wrongly branded as a paedophile. He ended up being murdered. We talked about some other issues, including the story of the poor doctor who was forced out of her home because people misunderstood the description of her. The whole issue of vigilantism is really important.

I am not being critical, but as I drove into Stormont this morning, I listened to Frank Mitchell's show on U105. He was taking people's views, and one particular person thought that we should round all the offenders up and send them off to an island somewhere to deal with the issue. Lord Morrow is not in his place, but this is the point that he raised when the police were talking about this. If you want to manage these situations, you must not drive things underground. I asked a question about the PPANI categorisation. When I was on the Policing Board, I went to Carrickfergus and saw how the network operated when a particular situation arose. I do not know if these numbers are correct now, but there were 10 category 3 offenders, the most serious offender category, in Northern Ireland at the time. There were 1,200 general offenders, let us say 60% of whom were category 1 and 35% of whom were category 2. The really serious ones were category 3. If a person whom we know to be dangerous goes missing, the question for the authorities is this: do we alert the public and tell them that that person is no longer under our control, because that will cause panic, or do we try to manage the situation? I bring that up just to show that there is a pretty fine line in how we move forward on this.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will indeed.

Mr Frew: That brings me back to my point. The Member asked whether the sex offender or violent offender would be notified of a disclosure. That would be the subject of a PPANI assessment because there may be a case where there is a rumour and someone applies and the sex offender may have done nothing wrong at that point. It may, then, be wrong to disclose information that someone had applied for. That would all be in the PPANI risk assessment. To be honest, we could dabble in this all day and night and we still could not come up with a good enough conclusion or assessment. These are the experts and the PPANI agencies are the people who assess, monitor and police these matters on a daily basis. They are the ones who should assess every single case on its own merits.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to Mr Frew for clarifying that. I think that his instincts are correct, and I agree with him on many of the issues that he brings forward. I am not in any way trying to put down what he is attempting to do on this issue.

Of course, he is totally free to ignore me, but it is really good to get someone of his status in society trying to explain the more difficult things about how we manage sex offenders. The reason for bringing in amendments such as his is that we are able to manage in a wider framework.

7.30 pm

One of the more difficult things that I had to do was to ask for more money because there was a lack of funding for houses in Belfast where sex offenders were housed. People said, "What on earth are you giving money to that for?". The simple fact is that if you do not manage a situation, if you do not know where people are and if you do not have some way of dealing with the situation properly, you drive it underground and you cannot deal with it. My request is that, when those who care about these issues are on the media, they do not give the short-term phrase, "We're going to really stamp them out and kick them out" and whatever, but that they say, "This is a complicated issue that people manage pretty well", as the report said, and, "but we need you to understand that it's not just as simple as being really hard on people, even though I understand that anybody identified in that way would, naturally, attract public opprobrium".

You will gather that this is not always my way, but it is about looking at the tweaking that needs to be done on this particular amendment. In fact, it applies to the other amendment as well. The reason why the Minister of Justice and Lord Morrow are in agreement but are slightly embarrassed may be that the amendment is fairly modest in its ambition. There are some things to be considered about what the consideration means. There are issues about when it is necessary for a particular member of the public to protect a particular child. I am not sure that I have the same interpretation as Mr Givan, but I accept that I could be wrong, about whether you can say, as a generality, "Look, there is a problem with this person in this area". All that I am saying is that it requires further work.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. Obviously, the amendment speaks about the guidance. Some of us may have particular views as to how best you can do this. Of course, you could have brought forward an amendment to put in the Bill specifically the circumstances where the information should be released by whom and to whom. I believe that it is better to do that through guidance because that provides flexibility for changing circumstances. It allows these issues to be addressed in the future as well without requiring primary legislation. I appreciate the opportunity to say that the guidance needs to be robust. I hope and trust that it will reflect the spirit of what the principles motivating the amendment are based on.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for clarifying the position. We do not always see eye to eye on things, but that is not necessarily bad; it is just an exploring of different positions. He mentioned a pretty tragic situation in his constituency, which also happens to be my constituency. One of the issues that I had to deal with was a family breakup, where certain allegations were made. Eventually, the family got back together again, which is a good thing. You just hope that the allegations do not come out because they would have caused more of a problem. When people are highly emotional, things can be said.

The issue in all this is to try to handle it sensitively and appropriately.

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Frew: On the point about sensitivity and handling it right, there is absolutely no doubt — it is certainly at the forefront of my motivation for this — that, even with the existence of the scheme and its implementation, there needs to be with it awareness-raising for the public about what the scheme is and how they could use it. That is not to advertise a scheme to get everybody to apply, but there has to be education around this. What I mean by that is that members of the public will be informed about how they can detect telltale signs that may lead to suspicion. If that were done correctly and robustly, it might sift out a lot of applications for disclosure that were not needed. The more specific requests for disclosure would be of great value and use in the operation of PPANI. This would also bring a sense of relief, assuage fear and take away the frustration of members of the public. It is all about awareness. It is all about educating the public so that they know what this scheme will do and how it will go about doing it.

Mr B McCrea: I believe that the Member's instincts are correct in this. I certainly support it, but I encourage him to understand that this is part of the solution, not the whole solution. This is a tough message to get out. If you are going to do the positive things and say that this will give some protection, you also have to explain to the general public that they cannot go around accusing people willy-nilly because you do not like them. A responsible attitude needs to be taken. The reason why I labour this point is because, when we write generalities into an amendment, there is sometimes a temptation for other Members to interpret it as they think they see it, which may not be the way that the original proposer intended.

I will conclude my remarks by saying that I am not convinced of the effectiveness of public naming and shaming, the 'News of the World' publishing photographs and saying whatever, or the pinning of names and addresses on noticeboards with the words, "You should be concerned about this person". It is not right, it is not effective and it leads to really bad outcomes. Having a controlled environment where —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Frew: I am concerned by the Member's point about allegations. Let us be very clear that someone with that level of concern will make an allegation to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. In this scheme, they will apply for disclosure. There is a difference there. Let us be very clear that, if members of the public have an issue or a suspicion, they can go to the police straightaway. I worry about the terminology and language used in the House, because there will be media and, more importantly, victims watching.

Mr B McCrea: Maybe I got it wrong, but I thought that the proposer was saying that one of the key attributes of this amendment was that it would stop gossip in the pub — I think that that is what he said, but I am not sure so will have to check Hansard — or general chit-chat and that there was a more appropriate way of dealing with these matters. If I got that wrong —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Frew: I do not think for one moment that this will stop chit-chat. I do not think for one moment that this will prevent people who like a good yarn from talking. They will talk, but the scheme will take away people's frustration and assuage their fear because they will be able to use it to apply for disclosure.

Mr B McCrea: We have probably had enough exchanges across the Chamber. My concern in all of this is efficacy. I was familiar with PPANI, I look at MASRAM and I have seen how people manage these situations. I have also seen negative outcomes when people made allegations that led to the wrong people being identified.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes, Mr Ross.

Mr Ross: I appreciate that the Member has been trying to conclude for the last 15 minutes or so, but I think that this is an important point to make. He talks about people in the pub and communities, which almost creates the vision that we are talking about mobs or vigilante gangs seeking information. The focus of the amendment is on individuals who have guardianship of a child, whether they are a parent or a legal guardian, and fear that their child is in contact with someone who may be a sex offender. It is not so much about communities being able to find out this information. It is about individuals whose child is in close contact with that person. That is where the focus is.

As Mr Frew said, if information is disclosed to an individual, they must handle that information with confidentiality. I think that some focus will have to be put on how they deal with that information and the penalties should they disclose it inappropriately. It is more about individuals being able to access information than communities or mobs in pubs.

Mr B McCrea: I am desperately trying to conclude, but I am in agreement with Mr Ross on that. That is the way in which I would interpret it. I will have a look at it to see how it might work.

The issue that I am concerned about is this: if we make this into a huge situation and get people worried about a situation, how much harm are we doing to our society? The PPANI operation works really well. As Mr Frew said, it has been inspected and found to be exemplary. In fact, I think that he said that it is probably the best in the United Kingdom. This is a really good, working system, and I commend it. We have looked at what developments we might look at with the amendment at Further Consideration Stage. All that I have done is raise concerns that I have heard when listening to people. In particular, if there were 4,700 applications for notification, and 700 of those resulted in notification, what would happen with the other 4,000? We need to consider how we will manage this. I take it on board that what this is really saying is that, ultimately — I think that Lord Morrow said this — we have the right to request but only the PSNI has the right to inform. We need professional management of this, and we need to take the opportunity to send a message to the public that the situation with managing sex offenders or violent offenders, if you want to include them in this, is under control and is being managed properly and that people can rely on the system to work.

Mr Ford: We seem to have spent quite a time over the past while in discussion of matters on which there is almost total unanimity in the House on at least the broad principles of the points, although there has been general acknowledgement from a number of places that a certain amount of fine-tuning will be needed. I will therefore try not to take too much time, given that we are still on only the second group of five groups of amendments, and the night is moving on a bit.

I start by referring to amendment No 6 in the name of Mrs Kelly and her colleagues. I certainly understand the intention behind it, and I know that Women's Aid in particular raised a specific concern with the Justice Committee that a prosecutorial fine might be imposed in cases involving domestic violence. That concern is clearly shared by some Members. As has been acknowledged, the operation of prosecutorial fines will be underpinned by guidance that will be issued by the DPP and will set out the types of offence for which a prosecutorial fine is appropriate and suitable. It will be publicly consulted on, and it will form part of the code by which prosecutors will work. As has been made absolutely clear, prosecutorial fines are intended to be used for low-level offences committed by non-habitual offenders. I certainly do not consider that any offence of domestic violence could be suitable for the imposition of a prosecutorial fine. Indeed, the fact that it states in the Bill that the maximum prosecutorial fine will be at level 1 on the standard scale — the lowest level — is an indication of the kind of offence for which it is intended.

I am certainly supportive of Mrs Kelly's other amendments relating to domestic violence protection orders and domestic violence protection notices, which I will return to in a moment.

Given the detailed guidance and given that we might, if we were to start listing any offences in the Bill, list a large number of offences, it is more appropriate that we leave this matter to the guidance. Although I certainly agree with the intentions behind the amendment, I feel that it is better that we do not make amendment No 6 to the Bill. I trust that we can look at exactly how we deal with the consultation around the guidance. I hope that that will satisfy Members that that is the best way to proceed.

Amendment Nos 7 to 11 and 68 relate to provisions for victims and witnesses. Amendment Nos 7, 8, 9 and 10 make adjustments to victim statement provisions, which are known as "victim personal statements", to take account of comments that were made during the consultation on the victim charter about widening the scope of the provisions. They enable a victim, a parent, a bereaved family member or a family member acting on behalf of the victim to set out the impact that the crime has had. They will not be limited to the direct impact on an individual. It is likely to be relevant when there is an impact on a wider family circle, for example, with increased caring responsibilities. It will mean that a bereaved family member can set out the impact that the death has had on more than one family member, and I consider that that adequately provides for the views of family members to be appropriately reflected ahead of consideration by the court.

The amendments also provide that the use of the power may be reviewed, should there be a considerable increase in the number of statements, if it is deemed to negatively impact on the direct victim's statement, and they set out the provisions in the victim charter defining the close family member, which will apply for the purpose of the victim statement procedures.

Amendment Nos 11 and 68 create new clause 35A and new schedule 3A, which will allow us more effectively to advise victims about support services so that informed decisions can be taken. The provisions will enable the police and the prosecution service to pass victim and witness details to Victim Support, to the NSPCC Young Witness Service and to the victim information unit. Those service providers will be able to contact victims and witnesses directly to explain and offer their services. There are significant problems with the current system, and I believe that the changes will help to address some of them. For example, at the moment, two thirds of victims are not referred to Victim Support NI; around 20% of witnesses turn up at court on the day needing support but not having had any prior contact with the witness services provided by Victim Support or the NSPCC Young Witness Service; and only around a quarter of victims avail themselves of the victim information release schemes. That is an issue that comes to me fairly frequently when individuals or their representatives complain that they were not informed of the release of somebody who committed a crime against them. In many cases, it is because they did not register, perhaps in the confusion of the event. Allowing the direct referral will increase the chances that people will be made aware of that, and the changes are in line with the findings of the Justice Committee's inquiry that victims were not using support services and that the capacity of organisations to provide support was reduced because of issues about passing personal information. The information shared will generally be the contact details of the victim or witness and the crime type. Taken together, I trust that the measures will improve victims and witnesses' experience of the criminal justice process and ensure that they can better access the support available.

In this group, I also propose amendment No 17 to insert new clause 42A to facilitate the exchange of information between Access NI and the Disclosure and Barring Service. Only one Member made any reference whatsoever to that. The powers are not new, but they replace existing powers that have a sunset clause at the end of this year and are therefore appropriate.

There was considerable discussion about new clause 43A, the amendment in the name of Mr Frew and Lord Morrow. I have already signalled to them — they have referred to it — my intention to support the clause, which will add to the existing disclosure procedures set out in the 'Guidance to agencies on public protection arrangements' that I issued in 2011.

It is important to say one or two things about the work of the agencies that seek to protect us all, particularly children. First, we need to acknowledge that the management of risk is not an exact science. It takes many forms, and the most important element is that cases are treated on an individual basis and risk is minimised through a combined approach, involving numerous risk management tools and, where necessary, utilising cooperation between relevant statutory agencies and voluntary bodies. We live with risk every day in many forms, only one of which is risk from offenders who have finished their prison sentence and returned to live in society. That is, of course, reality: we do not lock people away for ever. What we can do and what the agencies already work hard at is identify the possible risks that offenders in the community pose; assess the level of risk in particular cases; and take steps to protect each of us from harm. Much of that is done under the multi-agency PPANI arrangements: police, probation, social services, prisons and others, working together, where they can, to minimise the risk from offenders. In order to work as effectively as possible, the Department keeps under review, in cooperation with the agencies, a range of policy options that might be used in furtherance of risk management.

In broad terms, there is the legislative framework for multi-agency working, from which flows the departmental guidance on the PPANI arrangements, guidance that the agencies are required to give effect to.

In that guidance, we set out a range of ways in which the agencies should cooperate and carry out their functions in the most effective way to manage risk. One of those ways is through disclosure of conviction information about offenders in order to protect victims, potential victims and other people who may be at risk. That is part and parcel of the existing procedures under the comprehensive PPANI risk-management framework, and I recognise its contribution to the overall protection of individuals. Indeed, a number of Members have referred to the successful work done by PPANI: successful, but never 100%. Members have commented on the inspection reports by CJINI, which have highlighted the good work done by the PPANI agencies.

We looked at extending the disclosure provisions, but we have also had to look at the circumstances in which disclosure arrangements operate in Northern Ireland. The police have had concerns about widening the arrangements beyond the existing PPANI framework, and I have had to take note of their position.

We have also had some doubts about the overall contribution that legislative change, such as that made in England and Wales, might have to the objective of genuinely protecting children. Those concerns relate largely to how such a system might affect the balance of compliance with different risk-management strategies.

I am glad to be able to say that I fully support the clause, which was worked through with my officials and that the police believe will be a practicable operation. I understand that the NSPCC is also in favour of taking this step. It offers a reasonable way to build on existing disclosure arrangements and yet will still offer a way for individual members of the public, who have particular concerns about a person who has access to a particular child or children, to make those concerns known to the police and be assured that, if there is a need to disclose information to protect those children, it will be disclosed to a particular person. How the details will be operated will be provided for in the PPANI guidance. The police and other relevant agencies will be consulted.

I was also pleased to be able to agree that the disclosure of conviction information will be considered in relation to any offender who falls within the PPANI framework, which could potentially protect a child from violent harm as well as sexual harm: a point that has been made in comparison with other jurisdictions.

We also need one crucial, contextual point. Nobody should assume that this is a panacea to prevent all risks to children. It is clearly not that. The proposal addresses only one element of risk: that which comes from offenders with convictions for sexual crime or certain types of violent offending. It still needs to be said, very clearly, that most offending behaviour against children is much more likely to come from persons known to the child but unknown to the police. That is the sad reality of the society we live in.

Having said all that, I hope that this change will help to protect more children from harm. I have therefore indicated my support for the provision. However, with the advice of legislative counsel, I intend — and I understand that the Members who tabled the amendment will not object — to bring a number of minor technical amendments at Further Consideration Stage to ensure full legislative clarity. For the sake of Hansard, Mr Frew is nodding at that point.

On the issue of the further group of amendments —

Mr Ross: I thank the Minister for giving way. Given the debate we had on the proposals for Sarah's law and Clare's law, the interest there has been from Members — perhaps an interest in some of the more technical details — and that we cannot have a Committee discussion about this because we are past Committee Stage, would the Minister agree that, for both proposals, when he is working with Mrs Kelly and Mr Frew, it would be appropriate if DOJ officials came to the Committee to brief Committee members on the changes that are taking place so that we are better informed for the Further Consideration Stage?

Mr Ford: I am always happy to do my best to inform the Committee, and the Committee sometimes informs me back in a constructive way. The precise details of how this might be set up, given that we are on a tight timescale, will need to be worked out. In principle, I am very happy that the Committee has the opportunity for a meeting, even if those sitting in the Box at the moment are currently scratching their heads and wondering how it will happen.

I will turn, now, to amendment Nos 21 to 29, standing in the name of Mrs Kelly and her colleagues, on domestic violence protection orders and the associated area. I have considered the range of amendments they have tabled and, while I am certainly in broad agreement with those, and I fully accept the spirit of them, I consider that there are some elements of detail that need to be adjusted. I should perhaps add at this point, for the sake of Mr Douglas, that my understanding of domestic violence is that it is gender-neutral. It is sexual-orientation-neutral as well. While we need to acknowledge that the vast majority of domestic violence is inflicted by men upon women and children, we should not suggest that that is the entire picture.

I believe that the introduction of domestic violence protection notices and domestic violence protection orders will make an actual difference in the suite of public protection arrangements, and I have already raised them as part of the considerations in the consultation on the stopping domestic and sexual violence and abuse strategy, with a view to consulting in greater detail on those initiatives with key stakeholders during this financial year. However, I will not now do so as I firmly believe that DVPNs and DVPOs are required to help fill a gap in the provision of immediate protection of victims of domestic violence in the short term. I will, instead, bring forward alternative amendments at Further Consideration Stage with the support and, I understand, agreement of Mrs Kelly and her colleagues — for the sake of Hansard, she is also nodding — to allow for a more immediate introduction of DVPNs and DVPOs in Northern Ireland than would otherwise be the case.

On the specific amendment that deals with domestic violence disclosures — I think that it is amendment No 28 — I am also in broad agreement with the introduction of such a scheme. In this specific instance, and in common with the position in England and Wales, where such a scheme has been in existence since 2012, there is no legislative requirement to deliver such a scheme. Police already have the powers necessary to disclose such information. I propose to bring forward shortly a specific consultation on the shape of such a scheme in Northern Ireland, taking into consideration the outcome of the operation of the scheme in England and Wales.

In summary, I am quite happy to accept the principles of everything that has been put forward by Mrs Kelly and colleagues, and I hope that I have given an indication that guidance on the prosecutorial fines should cover the concerns that she had there. I am committed to action at Further Consideration Stage or in public consultation on the other matters that she has raised. I support the specific amendment that Mr Frew and Lord Morrow have put forward, subject to some minor tweaking — I believe that is the technical term — for Further Consideration Stage. I note that nobody said anything very much about my amendments, and I trust that the House will endorse them.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank all the Members who participated in the debate and gave their support to the principle and the import of all the amendments, notwithstanding any particular concerns around the disclosure schemes that all Members have referred to and the need to come back with some further information. For our part we have no difficulty with the Minister sharing whatever dialogue we have with him in bringing forward disclosure, which is more commonly known as Clare's law, with the Chair of the Committee and Committee members. We would welcome such information sharing.

It is true to say that all the amendments in this group are very much victim-centred and, broader than that, support the family of victims of and witnesses to crime. That shows that it is a good day for the Assembly, and one when a devolved institution is meeting the needs and concerns of the people who we represent here. It is a good news story, and I welcome all the support from all the organisations, many of which have been mentioned right across the Chamber, in the statutory and community and voluntary sectors for their information in getting the Bill this far and, more generally, for the work that they do in protecting us, our families and our constituents on an almost daily basis.

I believe that all Members who made a contribution spoke largely in support of all the amendments from our party; certainly those of the Minister were broadly supported. Indeed, whilst there were some concerns about the amendment in the names of Mr Frew and Lord Morrow, I think that those concerns will be allayed at Further Consideration Stage. I look forward to the outworkings of that.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way again. She will recollect that, during my contribution, I mentioned two domestic violence charities that opposed the introduction of Clare's law.

I do not know whether the Member will agree or not, but it might be appropriate if she made contact with those charities to see if some of their concerns could be allayed, because, ultimately, we have the opportunity not only to introduce Clare's law, but a better version of it. If there are areas in which they feel there could be more support around some of the legislation that might be required, we could end up with a better piece of legislation than GB. I wonder if she would be keen to engage with both those charities in the interim before Further Consideration Stage.

8.00 pm

Mrs D Kelly: I would have absolutely no difficulty with that. I would be very pleased to liaise directly with those organisations but, in relation to that particular amendment, I am satisfied with the Minister's commitment this evening to have further consultation and, given the PPANI arrangements in relation to Clare's law here in Northern Ireland, it would have to come forward again to this House after public consultation. Therefore, I think that we will all have an opportunity to hear from those organisations. I had read some time ago — you prompted my memory — of their concerns but, in some of the papers that I researched, some of the concerns that they had rightly raised, I believed, had been allayed, maybe not with them, but, to my mind, they appeared to have been allayed.

I know that Members are anxious to get through the rest of the amendments, so I am sure that they will not mind if I do not mention them all by name, but just to say thank you all very much indeed for your contribution. I have said that the amendments broadly protect victims and witnesses of crime and should reassure the public that the concerns that they have raised with us as individual Assembly Members or collectively through campaigns and lobbying over the last number of years have been listened to and action has been taken. So, I am not going to repeat or rehash much of what people have said. It is a matter of record, and others will be able to research Hansard if they want to have a look at a particular individual's contribution.

I conclude by saying that, having listened to the Minister in relation to amendment No 6 and the reassurances that he has given around the guidance on prosecutorial fines, with the leave of the Assembly, I will withdraw amendment No 6.

Mr Ford: This group relates to technical, miscellaneous and regulation-making powers. The majority of the amendments in this group relate to the Bill’s single jurisdiction for County Courts and Magistrates’ Courts powers, but the group will also provide the opportunity to debate the Chair’s opposition to clause 86; the supplementary, incidental, consequential and transitional provision clause. I will first speak to the amendments and then return to clause 86.

Part 1 of the Bill creates a single jurisdiction for the County Courts and Magistrates’ Courts in Northern Ireland by abolishing the current statutory County Court divisions and petty sessions districts. Schedule 1 supports the provisions by way of a large number of consequential amendments to primary legislation. Amendment Nos 55 to 60 make a number of amendments to schedule 1, which will supplement the list already contained within the schedule. These further consequential amendments will, primarily, remove references related to County Court divisions and petty sessions districts contained in legislation that has been made since the Bill was drafted, as well as some very old provisions. These further amendments are intended to complete the list of consequential amendments needed as a result of the creation of a single jurisdiction and, therefore, do not represent new policy. In addition, amendment Nos 75 to 78 make a number of supporting changes to the single jurisdiction elements of schedule 6, which deals with repeals.

Amendment No 49 is the only amendment in the group that takes the form of a new clause, clause 85A, which delivers a Justice Committee request to remove the need for an increase in the salary of the member of the Lands Tribunal to be made by an affirmative resolution order and to align the arrangements for determining salary with the non-Assembly procedure used to determine other judicial salaries. I doubt whether the Committee Chair, the Committee Clerk or the members will miss the opportunity to once a year debate a 1% salary increase.

Amendment Nos 12 and 16 are minor technical amendments to correct small drafting issues with clauses 37 and 41, while amendment Nos 53 and 54 facilitate the coming into operation on the day of Royal Assent of the victims information sharing and the sexual offences against children amendments debated as part of other groups here today.

Finally, amendments Nos 61 to 67 make a number of consequential amendments to schedule 3 in support of the direct committal amendments that were debated as part of group 1.

I want to spend some time speaking in support of clause 86 remaining part of the Bill. Let me first make some general observations about the Justice Bill, and I will then make two key points about clause 86 and provisions of that type. First, those provisions are not standard and must be seen in the context of the relevant Bill, and, secondly, I will comment on potential utility.

Clause 86 fulfils a particular purpose. Provisions of that type appear in other statutes when necessary, and I remain of the view that clause 86 is needed in this Bill. Indeed, I note that the debate on clause 86 has been grouped with amendment Nos 12 and 16. That enables me to note that those amendments, which are short, technical and important, are rightly being brought forward for consideration as matters necessary to give full effect to the policy intentions in the Bill. If we were to find the need for those after Royal Assent, and if clause 86 were not available to us, we would be in some difficulty: we would be seeking primary legislation for two minor amendments.

This Bill has over 80 substantive clauses — it will have more by the time this Consideration Stage is finished — that deliver policy objectives on a range of issues. This is a complex set of measures, made even more complex by the need to amend and repeal a very large number of statutory provisions in furtherance of the policy objectives in the Bill. To illustrate that, I draw attention to schedule 1 of the Bill, which makes the amendments that are necessary to give effect to the single-jurisdiction provisions. Taken alone, schedule 1 runs to nearly 30 pages and makes necessary amendments to over 100 separate statutes, involving many hundreds of specific changes. The earliest statute so amended dates back to 1842. The remaining schedules of amendments and repeals run to an additional 30-plus pages.

It is the clear responsibility of my officials and those working on the Bill to make every human effort to pick up the necessary amendments and repeals needed to give effect to the policy objectives. That is fundamentally right, as we intend those measures to form part of our law, and it goes without saying that my officials have made every effort to ensure it is both accurate and comprehensive. It is only right that all the matters that we wish to form part of the Act should be before the Committee and the Assembly to be scrutinised as a whole.

Clause 86, despite what may have been suggested by some people, is absolutely not a substitute for the effort required to get this right, but is a proportionate and necessary safeguard against the possibility, however remote and undesirable, that something has been missed.

Having observed the complexities of this Bill, I will make two points on the necessity for clause 86. First, provisions like clause 86 need to be seen in context because they are not standard. I would certainly not argue that all Bills should have that as a safeguard; it would not be necessary, nor would it accord with practice. Of the Acts passed in this mandate, most do not include a provision like clause 86. Indeed, not all of my Acts have a provision of that type, but some Acts do contain a provision like clause 86, and that will have been dependent on the context. Where an Act is complex, wide-ranging and amends or repeals other statutes to a large degree, a provision of this sort is wise and proportionate. A small Act like the Education Act (Northern Ireland) 2014 has a provision of this sort, and the context for that was, no doubt, the degree to which it amended other statutes rather than the five substantive sections contained in the Bill. Indeed, the Education Minister spoke most eloquently about the need for a similar provision in that Bill.

My Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011, the Inquiry into Historical Institutional Abuse Act (Northern Ireland) 2013, the Charities Act (Northern Ireland) 2013, the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Act (Northern Ireland) 2014, the Education Act (Northern Ireland) 2014, which I just mentioned, and the Work and Families Act (Northern Ireland) 2015 all have a provision of that sort. Of the Bills introduced that have not progressed to Royal Assent in this mandate, four contain similar provisions: the Education Bill, the Reservoirs Bill, the Road Traffic (Amendment) Bill and the Pensions Bill. So, in context, more than 25 Acts and Bills in this mandate have not judged it necessary to include such a provision. That hardly supports the comment that I have heard being made, namely that such provisions are commonplace in devolved Administrations or that these provisions provide endless bites at the cherry.

To return to my point about amendment Nos 12 and 16, it is right that we remain vigilant during the course of a Bill and that we do not allow ourselves to rest on clause 86 as a desirable second-chance provision. It is not that at all, but it is a safety net, and a very important one. I have set out this detail to make the point that we do not and should not take an attitude that clause 86-type arrangements are standard. Clearly, they are not. They must be seen in the context of the specific Bill and judged in that way by the respective Committees and the Assembly as a whole. Given my opening observations on the complexities of the drafting needed to give effect to the policy objectives in the Bill, I remain firmly of the view that clause 86 is appropriate on this occasion.

My second point concerns utility, and there are two angles to that. The first concerns the way in which the clause is drafted; the second its potential utility in the future. I accept that clause 86 may look wide-reaching, and I fully understand why the Committee has given time to it. It is absolutely right that the Committee and the Assembly guard against sweeping powers and that the primacy of full scrutiny by the Committee and the Assembly is protected. However, clause 86 needs to be read very carefully. It is not a power for me as Justice Minister to do anything I like. I cannot use it to alter policy, and I cannot use it to dilute or disturb policy that I do not support. I cannot use it to frustrate democratic debate during the passage of the Bill. It could be used only in the limited circumstances set out in clause 86.

The building blocks in clause 86 are as follows: the first is that the power is permissive and limited to supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitory, transitional or saving provisions — these terms have meanings; and the second is that the clause is limited to the general or particular purposes of the Act, or in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision made by the Act. These two building blocks must be read together and as a whole. I would have the ability to offer to the Assembly only an order that was strictly limited to giving effect to the intentions in the Act, and the order can relate only to the matters described in clause 86(1)(a) and 86(1)(b). This gateway is, in reality, significantly narrower than some of the interpretations that have been placed on it. The important third building block appears in clause 87(6): any such order would be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Clause 86(2) enables an order to amend, repeal, revoke or modify any statutory provision, and I understand why this may seem broad, but this is limited by the subject matter of the Act: the power can be used to deal only with that subject matter. If that test is passed, clause 86(2) enables the order to do what the Act would have done — amend, repeal, revoke or modify — had the issue been picked up at an earlier stage. The affirmative procedure means that it must be subject to the full, active scrutiny of the Assembly. I invite careful consideration of the totality of clause 86. I do not believe that it presents a wide-ranging power for me or that it goes beyond what is necessary to manage a small and particular risk that arises from the complexities of the Bill.

My second point concerns the utility of clause 86. In short, I have no plans to use it. I will be delighted if there is no reason for it to be used, but that does not render it unnecessary. It simply reinforces the fact that this is a safeguard provision. I have not used similar provisions in the past, and I have no plans to do so in relation to this Bill, but were it to become apparent that the Bill had missed an amendment or repeal and that this rendered the policy objective impossible to implement, or created a gap in the law in some particular circumstance, clause 86 allows me to offer to the Assembly — I stress the word “offer” — a fix. Without this, it would be necessary to await the next primary vehicle, which may be a year or more away.

I readily acknowledge that, if I were to offer such a fix via an order under clause 86, it would be for the Assembly to decide whether to accept it. The Assembly would, no doubt, weigh this most carefully and consider matters such as whether the order was properly made under the narrow gateways that exist in clause 86; whether the fix was in fact needed; and whether it might be preferable to await a primary vehicle. The Assembly would also have the opportunity to consider whether the policy objective was so important, or the circumstances created by the unforeseen gap in the law so concerning, vital and urgent, that it may be persuaded to pass the order.

I cannot therefore agree with the proposition that clause 86 should not stand part of the Bill.

Nor can I support the amendment proposed to clause 87(8). It would limit the scope of regulation- and order-making powers in the Bill by removing the words “incidental, supplementary, transitional and saving” provisions and replacing them with the words “consequential and transitional”. The intention may in fact be to limit or alter the powers in clause 86, but it is not clear that it has that effect. Instead, it impacts on the other regulation- and order-making powers in the Bill. The Bill contains regulation- and order-making powers in Parts 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8 and 9, and there are 14 such powers. Clause 87(8) as currently drafted enables those regulations and orders to do certain things in furtherance of the policy objectives to which the regulations and orders under the Bill attach. As with clause 86, a Bill as complex as this, which is rightly leaving detailed schemes to regulations, requires some flexibility. That is because, of necessity, the regulations will come forward after Royal Assent. We will have schemes and ideas in mind, but, until the Bill is finalised and becomes an Act, it is not possible to describe entirely the detail that we need in regulations.

Regulations are often the subject of further and separate thought and analysis, but they are always true to policy intention, to the regulation-making powers in the Bill and to the limitations laid down in the Bill. If they were otherwise, they would be ultra vires and would face being struck down. Our legislative arrangements enable regulations. They give effect to policy in a very real way and are an important part of how we deliver law into operation. Regulation-making powers therefore need to be right, but they need a degree of flexibility, perhaps even more than clause 86. If we need to make minor and technical adjustments via the regulations to deliver policy objectives, we have traditionally decided as a legislature that we should be able to do so.

The amendment to clause 87(8) is, for me, troubling. It disturbs the scope of regulations in general under the Bill. It removes key words that act as safeguards to the policy objectives, and I would now like to focus on the words that would be lost, as the impact of the amendment needs to be understood. The amendment would remove the word “incidental” and seeks, I believe, to replace it with the term “consequential”. I do not see the benefit and would note that either term provides just a narrow opportunity for regulations and orders to give effect to policy objectives. The Supreme Court has noted the following:

“The limited role of the words ‘incidental to, or consequential on’ is clear from Martin v Most 2010 SC (UKSC) 40. In that case, Lord Rodger at para 128 spoke of ‘the kinds of modifications which are obviously necessary to give effect to a piece of devolved legislation, but which raise no separate issue of principle’, contrasting these with other provisions which were ‘independent and deal with distinct aspects of the situation’.”

The term “supplementary” would also be lost under the amendment. That is also problematic. Supplementary provisions are those that are required to supplement the provisions in order to make them work. Again, those are conditioned by the policy intent. It would not be possible for regulations to begin to introduce new policy or to take us away from the policy objectives in the Bill. In the case of Daymond v South West Water Authority, Viscount Dilhorne said:

“in that section, ‘supplementary’ means, in my opinion, something added to what is in the Act to fill in details or machinery for which the Act itself does not provide — supplementary in the sense that it is required to implement what was in the Act.”

The word “transitional” would be retained, and that at least would be welcome. For instance, the word is important to ensure an orderly transition between the law as it was before implementation of the new provisions and the law going forward. However, the word “saving” would also be lost through the amendment. A saving provision preserves the effect of an action or process ongoing at the time of the repeal of the existing legislation.

I therefore believe that we should tread most carefully indeed in matters such as this. Without great care and thought, the implications of the amendment cannot be fully understood and appreciated. I fully respect the Committee’s intention to make sure that Ministers do not take powers unto themselves that are not needed or appropriate. I again appreciate the care with which the Justice Committee has scrutinised the Bill — care that, I believe, has been reciprocated in the work that my officials have done with the Committee — but I caution against running into a problem in this area. For that reason, I cannot support either the removal of clause 86 or the amendment.

Mr Ross: Given that the majority of the amendments in the group are technical in nature or consequential — to use that language — to other amendments being made, I intend to restrict my remarks in the debate to amendment No 49, which, as the Minister has just outlined, changes the procedure for the annual determination of Lands Tribunal members’ salaries, and to the Committee’s opposition to clause 86 and our proposed amendments. As we have learned in recent months, technical amendments can be interesting. They deserve quite a bit of scrutiny and examination, and that is certainly what the Committee has done over the last number of months.

Amendment No 49, which introduces new clause 85A to remove the need for an affirmative resolution statutory rule to determine the salary of the members of the Lands Tribunal, originated from comments made by the previous Chairman of the Justice Committee during a debate in the Assembly in September 2013 on the Lands Tribunal (Salaries) Order (Northern Ireland) 2013. As the Minister outlined, the Department is required to bring forward an order that is subject to the affirmative resolution procedure for the annual determination of Lands Tribunal members' salaries. No other judicial salary is subject to Assembly approval. It affects the salary of only one individual, as the post of president of the tribunal is held by a Lord Justice of Appeal, who does not receive a salary for the post under the 1964 Lands Tribunal and Compensation Act. The rate of pay is set by the Review Body on Senior Salaries, which recommended a 1% pay increase in both 2013 and 2014. It is clearly not a good use of Assembly time to require a debate on the statutory rule, particularly when legal aid statutory rules making millions of pounds' worth of changes and affecting the entire legal profession are largely subject to the negative resolution procedure. For the reasons that I have outlined, it makes sense to align the procedure for determining Lands Tribunal members' salaries with the procedure used to determine other judicial salaries. The Committee therefore supports amendment No 49.

I now want to set out for the Assembly the background and rationale to the Justice Committee's opposition to clause 86 and the two amendments that we have tabled to clause 87. Members will know that good legislative scrutiny requires consideration of all parts of a Bill, including the provisions often described as technical in nature, which determine the effect of the legislation once enacted. They are usually found at the back of the Bill, and in the Justice Bill are contained in the supplementary provisions at Part 9.

When Department of Justice officials appeared at the Committee on 18 February 2015 to give evidence on the Bill, members took the opportunity to explore the exact purpose and effect of clause 86 and the extent of the powers that it provides to the Minister of Justice, much, I think, to the surprise of the officials at the time. The officials advised the Committee that the clause is a general construction that is used in lots of legislation to cover various eventualities, particularly in a large Bill such as this, where there is the potential for an issue to arise in a number of areas that might need some rectification, and indicated, as the Minister has today, that it is intended to address any minor points that might arise, rather than any substantive policy. On the face of it, that seemed reasonable, but, when the Committee pressed further regarding what limitations there were to the powers provided by the clause, the officials indicated that they would need to look at it in more detail and provide clarification in writing.

The Department subsequently wrote, indicating that a power to make supplementary, incidental, consequential and transitional provision, such as is provided by clause 86, is frequently included in a Bill that deals with complex changes in law in case difficulties that had not been identified in the legislative process arise. The Department described clause 86 as something of a safety blanket in case the operation of the legislative changes throws up some unexpected difficulty or to address necessary consequential changes that have inadvertently been overlooked during the drafting of the Bill.

Whilst the Department accepted that the power provided is widely drawn to take account of the fact that the precise circumstances in which it may be called upon cannot be determined, it outlined that, in its view, the purposes for which the power can be used are reasonably exact, given that clause 86(1) provides that the relevant orders must be used for the purposes of the Act or to make provision in consequence of or for giving full effect to the Act. It also highlighted that clause 87(6)(b) provides that any order made under section 86(1) that contains a provision that amends or repeals a provision of an Act of Parliament or Northern Ireland legislation will be subject to the draft affirmative procedure and cannot be made without Assembly approval, with other orders subject to the negative resolution procedure.

When the Committee considered clause 86, members continued to have concerns about the breadth of the powers provided to amend, repeal or modify primary legislation agreed and passed by the Assembly by way of secondary legislation.

Although some orders would be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, the Assembly would have to either accept or reject the order with no opportunity to amend it. Despite the best intentions, secondary legislation is not always scrutinised and debated to the level of detail that primary legislation is subjected to. The Committee did not agree with the Department's assessment that the purposes for which the power could be used are reasonably precise.

8.30 pm

The Committee noted that this type of clause can be a common occurrence, particularly in Bills of the size of the Justice Bill, but was not content with the wide-ranging powers it provided to make ancillary provision by subordinate legislation. The Committee is of the view that powers should be provided for an exact purpose rather than being so broad in nature and that, even though the affirmative resolution procedure would apply to some orders, as a consequence of clause 86, parts of the Bill passed by the Assembly could be changed or potentially reversed by the Department of Justice without the scrutiny the Bill itself has received. The Committee therefore decided to oppose the inclusion of clause 86, believing that its intention to remove this type of clause would send a message to all Departments to ensure that future legislation is well thought out beforehand rather than relying on extensive powers to fix things at a later stage.

Following the completion of the Committee Stage of the Bill, the Department of Justice wrote to the Committee on 20 May outlining that the Executive had discussed clause 86 on 14 May and that the Minister of Justice had undertaken to try to address the Committee's concerns. The letter advised that the Minister intended to include clause 86 in the Bill as a safety blanket in case the operation of the legislation threw up any unexpected difficulties. He noted the inclusion of similar provisions in other Bills. The Minister also indicated that he had no intention at present to make use of clause 86 but continued to believe that its inclusion in the Bill was essential.

The Minister suggested to the Committee that, rather than opposing clause 86, we might consider amending it so that the requirement for the affirmative resolution procedure was more clearly associated with the clause. This could be achieved by removing the requirement for the affirmative resolution procedure from clause 87 and placing it in clause 86. The Minister provided the wording of the necessary amendments to make the change. The Committee considered the proposal but noted that it did not address the excessive breadth and discretion that clause 86 afforded him, which is the basis of the Committee's concerns in relation to the clause. While his proposal was more presentational than addressing the key areas of concern, the Committee agreed to hear further evidence prior to the closing date for amendments for Consideration Stage to enable it to consider the matter further.

The Committee met on 26 May and heard further evidence from the Department on the rationale for keeping clause 86 in the Bill, much of which the Minister has outlined to the Assembly this evening. In essence, the Department advised the Committee that the provision is proportionate and necessary to manage the risk of something having been missed when preparing the Bill, as it covers a very wide range of old and complex legislative procedures. Apparently, one of the statutes amended by the Bill dates back to 1842. The Department indicated that not all of the justice Bills advanced during this mandate have included such a provision and believes that it is necessary in this one. The Department also provided examples of Bills from other Departments in which a similar clause had been included and was still of the view that, while, on the face of it, the provision looks very wide-ranging, it is very narrow when looked at in the context of the totality of the clause. The Department stated that it would not rely on clause 86 to cover any deficiency in the policy-making process and that the clause was not there to enable it to change its mind on the policy.

Members sought examples of when this type of clause had been used in the past and the likely circumstances that it would be used in with regard to this Bill. The Committee also sought clarification of the meaning of "supplementary, incidental, consequential and transitional" in the context of clause 86 and of why the clause could not be made more specific to ensure that any changes made under it are kept to a minimum, given that they would not be subject to the scrutiny that primary legislation receives. The Department responded by indicating that it understood that all the words had particular meanings, although it did not provide any further explanation of the meanings, and, if some or all were to be removed, it would need to seek further advice on the impact that that would have. The Department also confirmed that the provision enabled the Minister to amend any legislation, not just legislation relating to justice, but sought to assure the Committee that this would take place only if it were necessary to give effect to the policy.

The Committee found the further information provided by the Department in relation to clauses 86 and 87 helpful in assisting us to gain a better understanding of why the Department requires some sort of power to amend the legislation if it has missed something, particularly when it is looking at law dating as far back as 1842. However, the Committee still believes that primary legislation should be well thought through beforehand and that the Department should have identified unforeseen consequences and legislated for them in the Bill rather than relying on wide-ranging powers to amend things later through subordinate legislation. The Committee appreciates that there is a need to have some capacity to amend the primary legislation in the event of something minor being missed, such as described by the Department in relation to schedule 1 and legislation stretching back as far as 170 years ago. However, we are still not convinced that the breadth and scope of power provided by clause 86 is required.

By opposing the inclusion of clause 86 and amending clause 87 as set out in amendment Nos 51 and 52, the Committee aims to provide the Minister with some flexibility and scope to make minor amendments by way of secondary legislation, such as those described by the Department, that may be required if something small has been overlooked. However, it will ensure that any wider changes or amendments will require further primary legislation that will be subject to the rigorous scrutiny that has been applied to the Bill.

I listened carefully to the case that the Minister made for retaining clause 86 and rejecting the Committee's amendments to clause 87. Whilst he has tried to provide assurances to the Committee and the Assembly regarding the use of clause 86 — or the lack of use of it, as he keeps pointing out that he does not intend to use it — I am still not convinced, and I suspect that other Committee members are still not convinced of the necessity for the broad powers that the Bill confers on him. Having similar clauses in other Bills is not in itself an argument to have it in this Bill. He also referred to the Education Minister speaking — I think that he said "most eloquently" — about the need for a similar provision in the Education Act (Northern Ireland) 2014. Clauses 86 and 87 are much more extensive in the powers that they provide. Indeed, if my memory serves me right, an amendment was tabled to the clause in the Education Bill, as there were concerns about the powers provided in that clause as well.

Having heard from the Department on a number of occasions, the Committee is still of the view that the power to amend primary legislation provided by the clauses is too broad and needs to be narrower. While the Department has recently engaged with the Committee on the issue, it is fair to say that, initially, the explanations and rationale provided to the Committee about the need for the clauses and the breadth of the power contained in them did not fully address the concerns raised.

While this may seem a dry debate about technical clauses, it is about much more than that. It relates to public accountability and the checks and balances on the Executive by this legislative Assembly. The primary legislation-making process gives time and resources to close consideration and proper and detailed scrutiny. Regulations, if made by affirmative procedure, only provide an opportunity for approval or refusal and cannot be amended, and negative resolution rules require a prayer of annulment before a debate takes place. I do not think that anybody would argue that secondary legislation receives the same scrutiny as primary legislation.

The issue of what are termed Henry VIII clauses — in other words, a clause in an Act that enables the Act to be expressly or implicitly amended by subordinate legislation — has exercised and is exercising other jurisdictions around the world. A paper delivered to the 2011 Australia-New Zealand Scrutiny of Legislation Conference pointed out:

“Henry VIII powers provide the executive with a power to override primary legislation by way of delegated legislation. The practical significance ... lies in the loss of the public scrutiny and accountability for policy decisions that would usually occur when primary legislation is made”.

Their use appears to be particularly prevalent at Westminster, and I note that, in his farewell speech to the House of Commons, Sir John Stanley, of course a former Northern Ireland Minister during the Thatcher years and a Member of Parliament for Tonbridge and Malling from 1974 to 2015, said:

“I want to address my top concerns as I leave the House. The most important responsibility we have in this House is the proper and effective scrutiny of the Government’s proposals for the future law of the land. I have to be blunt: on the scrutiny of both primary and secondary legislation, this House has had its position in relation to the Executive weakened very substantially in the time I have been here ... The position on secondary legislation—almost entirely unreported and unrecorded—is every bit as serious in my view. The reason why we have virtually no debates at all on negative resolution statutory instruments and that those on affirmative resolution statutory instruments are for 90 minutes only and non-amendable is of course that secondary legislation is supposed to be relatively non-substantial and non-controversial. That was only a convention, and I believe that the House made an enormous mistake by not giving it a firmer buttress.

The convention was absolutely adhered to, as I vividly recollect.”

He went on to say:

“As the housing Minister responsible for the right to buy Housing Bill in 1979, I asked for a particular order-making power and the first parliamentary counsel, who was responsible for the drafting, came back to me—very politely, but very firmly—and refused to enshrine the power in the Bill because it was too widely drafted. I call on the House to revert to the position in which the then convention that secondary legislation should essentially be confined to non-substantive and non-controversial matters is restored and made firm either in Standing Orders or by legislation ... To give an illustration of the existing width of the powers ... under the so-called Henry VIII powers, Ministers now have an order-making power, which is defined as ‘a delegated power which enables a Minister, by delegated legislation, to amend, modify or repeal an Act of Parliament’.

I suggest to the House that that is a very disturbing example of the far too wide use of secondary legislation.”

That is where the quote ended. He is no longer a Member of Parliament and is an individual citizen.

Another example is provided by Lord Judge, the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales, who, at the Lord Mayor’s dinner for the judiciary in 2010, indicated that his deepest concern was directed to the increased use of Henry VIII clauses. He stated:

“Henry VIII was a dangerous tyrant.”

Just for clarity, I am not comparing the Minister to Henry VIII, but I will continue with the quote. He said:

“And there is a public belief that the Statute of Proclamations of 1539”

— which allowed the King’s proclamations to have the same force as Acts of Parliament — “was the ultimate in supineness.” Supineness is a fabulous word. Lord Judge referred to a number of Acts that contained powers to make such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision, or such transitory, transitional or saving provisions:

“as they consider appropriate for the general purposes, or any particular purposes, of this Act.”

To illustrate his concerns, he stated that, when these clauses are introduced:

“they will always be said to be necessary.”

The Committee has very properly and not unreasonably, in my view, scrutinised the purpose of clauses 86 and 87, and I pose this question: why should we get into the habit of allowing such clauses? The Committee has adopted a position that seeks to ensure that amendments to primary legislation by way of secondary legislation are minimised to what it considers those categories most closely connected to the Bill, consequential and transitional, to ensure effective scrutiny and accountability. The Committee believes that it has still provided sufficient powers to the Minister and the Department to address any minor oversights.

While clauses 86 and 87 are technical in nature, the argument around whether such clauses are appropriate in Bills is relevant to all Committees of the House and all Members of the Assembly as it is fundamentally about how much power Ministers should have to amend primary legislation by way of secondary legislation. I ask the Assembly, therefore, to support the Committee’s opposition to clause 86 and its two amendments to clause 87 on the basis that I have outlined.

I believe that the Justice Committee has carried out its legislative scrutiny function rigorously and has sent out a message to all Departments that every clause in a Bill, whether to give effect to policy or technical in nature, will be questioned, and they must be able to justify its inclusion in a Bill and the breadth of powers that it provides.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. You will be glad to hear that I will keep things short and not mention Henry VIII. The Minister made a robust argument that clause 86 should remain and was needed for a purpose as a safeguard. He said that it was a wise provision, that it was a safety net and must be seen in the context of the Bill. However, there were no plans to use the provision. I agree with the Chair, who has expanded much wider on the issue than any of us on the Committee would have known; he has covered it very well. I agree with his explanation and rationale, and the process through which the Committee dealt with the clause. Like him, I am not convinced either. I concur with him that it is a case of accountability.

The Committee sought clarification from departmental officials as to why they needed such wide-ranging powers, particularly after the Bill underwent detailed scrutiny, and in what circumstances it could be used. The explanation was that it was to fix a problem but there was no plan to use it. The Committee wanted to understand the need for a wide-ranging clause, given that the details should have been thrashed out in the first place. The Department should have accounted for unforeseen circumstances. After considering advice from the officials — the Chair has gone into much more detail than I have — we are agreeable to allowing flexibility to the Department to correct things that it may have missed but not to give it a power that is so wide that it can pretty much include anything that it liked. I support the Chair's position.

Mr A Maginness: I have very little to add to the learned treatise given by the very learned Chair of the Justice Committee. The only thing I would add is that Henry VIII is not the most popular person in history, particularly in Ireland, but he did introduce the harp as an official symbol for Ireland. He was king of not only England and France but Ireland. That is just a little historical footnote. We have been dealing with tradition and history all day today. I endorse everything that the Chair said in relation to this matter.

8.45 pm

Mr Elliott: In the interests of harmony, I will continue with Henry VIII. I was really pleased to hear Alban Maginness giving such a summary. He almost said that maybe Ireland should be back under the United Kingdom's control. I think that that is what he was referring to, anyway.

I do not have a great lot to add, but I point out that, on clause 86, I have some empathy with the Minister. When the Bill Office came back to us, there was quite close scrutiny of the issue. We looked at a separate option that was brought back by the Department as well; it was a slightly changed wording. It opens a pretty wide hornets' nest for not only the Department of Justice or Bills that the Minister of Justice brings forward but other Departments. The Minister indicated that it is in other legislation, so there is a difficulty, because what is good for the goose is good for the gander. If it is kept out of this legislation, there are other pieces of legislation that need to be looked at.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to.

Mr Ross: In fairness to the Committee, the nuclear option would have been to oppose clause 86 and give the Minister no flexibility at all. In fairness to Committee members, we decided to give the Department flexibility. We feel that we gave it enough flexibility to make the changes that may be necessary to change minor amendments, but we were not willing to give it the broad sweep of powers that perhaps it was asking for in the first place.

Mr Elliott: I accept that point. I was merely indicating that, while it is not an issue for today, I am sure that other Committees will be looking at the scrutiny of their Department when it brings forward legislation.

The Minister indicated in his opening remarks that he does not believe that there is enough flexibility in what the Committee has brought forward. After hearing from Mr Ross and others, I wonder whether the Minister has changed his mind to any degree or whether there will be a coming together in the interests of harmony on this group. I deliberated on this long and hard at Committee. I thought that the amendment from the Department may have gone some way to resolving the issue, but the Committee felt that it was still too wide and that it needed to be narrowed to some degree. On balance, there is probably enough remit in what the Committee has done to allow the Minister and Department to bring the amendments as and when they need to. I will wait for the Minister's remarks to hear whether he has changed his mind to any degree.

Mr Dickson: I also welcome the opportunity to speak on group 3, although perhaps "welcome" at this time of night is not entirely appropriate.

The amendments are mostly of a technical nature. A few elements caused considerable disquiet among some during Committee Stage, but I do not consider that to be warranted. Needless to say, I will support the Minister on this. I do not wish to strike a discordant note in the Chamber, and I doubt that I will be able to persuade others, but, nevertheless, we need to reflect on exactly what we are doing.

Clause 86, as has been indicated, is not unique in lawmaking. It provides the means for a Department to refine the law, ensure that it is efficient and purposeful, remove contradictions and make sure that it is fit for 21st-century use. The Bill, as many of us on the Justice Committee will be aware, is rather complex and wide-ranging. As has been referred to, it will deal with the repeal of some statutes that go back as far as the 1840s.

During Committee Stage, the Department admitted that the power could appear to be widely drawn, but, because of the precise circumstances that it may be called to, it cannot be determined. The Department further noted that the purposes of the power can be used as reasonably exact, and it drew attention to the fact that clause 86(1) provides that the relevant orders must be used for the purposes of the Act or to make provision:

"in consequence of, or for giving full effect to" the Act, and that, subsequently, clause 86(2) must be read in that light.

It is also indicated that clause 87(6)(b) provides that any order made:

"under section 86(1) containing provision which amends or repeals a provision of an Act of Parliament or Northern Ireland legislation" will be subject to draft affirmative procedure and cannot be made without Assembly approval. That seems to me to be reasonable. All orders made under clause 86(1) will also be subject to the usual subordinate legislative procedures. This is a safeguard to ensure good law and is not unique in legislation. I, therefore, believe that it is vital that we ensure that the Department is provided with this safety net when implementing such a complex and important reform to our judicial system. It is for these reasons that I will oppose amendment Nos 51 and 52 and the removal of the clause from the Bill.

Mr Frew: This is probably a quirk of history, but, whilst it can be described in that way, we, as legislators, have to take it very seriously. I fully support my colleague Alban Maginness on his reading of history. I am not that intrigued by Henry VIII — I do not find him that popular a guy — but I certainly support the symbol of the harp in Ireland. That is something that I find immense pride in, especially as I wore it on my caubeen in the Royal Irish. It is indeed a symbol of valour and dedication to the bravery of the British Army throughout Ireland through the ages, so I can certainly support the harp if not Henry VIII.

Moving on before I am told off, Mr Speaker, this seems to me to be just too wide-ranging and to have too much scope. It allows the Minister, even with the best intentions, to do things with legislation that has been scrutinised in both the Chamber and the Committee. There is a principle here in that it may go some way to demeaning the role of scrutiny in this legislature. That worries me. As we move on with legislation, this may well become an issue time and time again. There is an onus on Ministers and Departments when they bring forth legislation to ask themselves this question: is this clause essential, and, if it is, why is it essential? If they ask that question of themselves, there may be an opportunity whereby a Bill of this nature — even a Bill as wide-ranging as the Justice Bill, and this is probably a good example — may be for only a specific or small part. You might find that there would be more support for and less worry and concern about a clause like this if it were restricted in that way so as to catch only part of a Bill. Even then, of course, there would be concerns around what the Minister might want or intend to do in the future.

To me, the whole point of being here as a legislator is being able to scrutinise. The first thing that we should look at when we are scrutinising Bills is the indirect consequences of those Bills. We should be mindful of that every day that we are in the House and every day that we scrutinise legislation in Committee. I have worries and concerns about this clause. As a principle, we need to look at it more carefully. When I asked questions on this matter in the Committee, the understanding of the officials who addressed my question was that this provision enables the Department to amend any legislation, even that not related to Justice. If that is the case, that is very wide-ranging. I believe that, if it is there to affect legislation that does not even relate to justice, it must be scrutinised carefully because that, in itself, may lead to indirect consequences that will affect our people daily. So, whilst this certainly is a quirk of history, it is a very serious point, and we are having a very serious and principled debate.

As the Chairman of the Committee said, question marks are being raised all around the world on the content of this clause, and now, of course, it has come to the Floor of the Assembly. It concerns me greatly. The scope and the breadth of the clause are immense. If it can affect legislation brought forward by other Ministers and Departments, which has been thoroughly scrutinised in the House, there is something badly wrong.

I will leave it at that because I know that the Chair has covered all bases on this clause.

Mr Ford: I am more than a little surprised at the lack of confidence amongst members of the Committee. The number of references made by all participants in this bit of the debate, except my good colleague Stewart Dickson, to scrutiny not being carried out properly if it was secondary legislation, is a little disappointing. Over the last five years as Minister, I have seen a Committee that has given full, detailed scrutiny to everything put before it by the Department of Justice.

I find more than a little bizarre the suggestion that, somehow, the Committee would be lacking and incapable in the unlikely event that we needed to invoke the provisions of clause 86 or clause 87, meaning that something would be sent to the Committee for scrutiny on the basis that it was subject to affirmative resolution and so would also need to come to the Assembly.

After all, in the last few years, the Committee scrutinised the salary paid to a member of the Lands Tribunal. It carried out that function prior to the matter coming to the Assembly and when it was debated here. So I am a little disappointed that the Committee that I thought capable of advising and assisting me appears to regard itself as incapable of scrutinising what comes before it.

We also need to be realistic about the kind of things that are here. The point was made that this would cover any legislation, not just justice legislation. No. This covers the potential for making orders dealing with amendments to any Act for the particular purpose of, in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision made by this Act.

Of course, there is lots in the Bill that has nothing to do with justice legislation. The Married Woman's Property Act 1882, which is an amendment that falls in the addition to schedule 1, might just be classified as justice legislation, but I doubt that the Public Health (Ireland) Act 1878, the Local Government (Ireland) Act 1898 or the Open Spaces Act 1906 could be so described. None is justice legislation, but they are all mentioned because they make references to petty sessions districts or courts of quarter sessions. Despite the good work done in the Department before the Bill was published, and since, with further amendments coming through, because of the massive number of potential consequential amendments, all these issues could require primary legislation if we did not allow such provisions to go through.

It is slightly bizarre that the Committee has got itself so worked up by an academic who arrived from London knowing little about what happens in this place and who produced that kind of point. References to John Stanley and his experience here as a NIO Minister in the 1980s are completely outwith the way in which this place operates. There is absolutely no doubt that, for about the last 50 or 60 years, power in Westminster has moved from the House of Commons to the Executive. That is the reality. That is why, in 1998, our arrangements were set up in a completely different way. We have Committees that perform all the scrutiny functions that are carried out by different Committees in the House of Commons.

Standing Committees on Bills, as well as Select Committees on particular topics, have their functions combined in our Statutory Committees, where a level of expertise builds up, although I am not sure that it is necessarily the expertise that would have allowed Committee members to spot whether the Married Women's Property Act mentioned petty sessions districts.

9.00 pm

Mr Douglas: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: We have that expertise built up. We are not anything like Westminster, yet people are dragging in a frankly irrelevant reference from somebody who has been an MP there. I give way.

Mr Douglas: I heard the Minister say a couple of times that he was very disappointed, and we understand that. Perhaps he is taking this a bit personally. My colleague, the Chairman of the Committee, mentioned Henry VIII at one stage. I do not honestly believe that the Chairman was alluding to you; in fact, he said that he was not. However, might it not be the case that some Members are concerned that not you but the next Justice Minister may be a Henry VIII-type figure? Might we not be afraid of that?

Mr Ford: I am grateful for that consolatory remark. Frankly, about the only decent thing that was said by any member of the Committee, apart from Stewart Dickson, is that I am apparently not a tyrant like Henry VIII. When you get to the point where English kings are being praised by the SDLP and disowned by the DUP, heaven knows where we are getting to.

It is quite a serious point. Our structures are not those of Westminster. The Executive are not absorbing power from this place in the way that that has been clearly the case at Westminster. Our Committees have significant power and do their job in this place. On the basis that this is the same form of words as appears in other legislation, which deals with the necessity of catching matters that would otherwise create problems and require primary legislation, this is really not the right Bill to do this with. This Bill is so complex. It is one that, as I highlighted, has already about 30 pages of schedule 1, with another four being added by amendments before the House now, and there may even be one or two other points discovered before Further Consideration Stage. However, if they are not discovered before Further Consideration Stage, they have the potential to derail the Bill, if we do not allow things to be carried through as they should be.

When Members ask, "Is this clause essential?" or actually "Are these two clauses essential?", the answer is yes — not because I propose to use them but because they might be required. If an issue arose, waiting for primary legislation, given the time that it takes to get primary legislation through this place, is not the best example of how we would deal effectively with ensuring that the justice system gets reformed in the way in which it ought to be reformed.

Mr Ross: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: We must ensure that we can move things on in a much better way to achieve the faster, fairer justice that we all want to see. I will give way.

Mr Ross: The Minister hits on one of the key points about primary legislation, but at least in primary legislation there is a facility for the Committee to take evidence from stakeholders and to investigate thoroughly an issue and, if necessary, amend the legislation. If decisions are taken by statutory rule, there is no time or capacity in the Committee to take evidence from stakeholders and no ability for it to amend legislation. That is why the Committee felt that it wanted to tighten the power. We have not taken the nuclear option of removing any flexibility at all from the Minister or the Department; rather, we have sought to tighten up the provision to ensure that we have as much control over decision-making as possible.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Chair's point, which I was going to come to, about flexibility. The reality is that there is flexibility when Committees consider matters, if Departments put proposals before Committees and are willing to engage and discuss. Certainly, I accept that, at the point at which an order comes to the Chamber under the affirmative resolution procedure, there is no flexibility, but there is flexibility in the engagement that, I believe, has characterised the relationship between the Department of Justice and the Committee for Justice over the past five years. There is flexibility in the willingness to discuss different ways of doing things. There is flexibility, for example, in the way in which the victims and witnesses strategy was produced. That is an example of a Department that has engaged and has sought to be constructive in how it works and that, frankly, does not need to be hidebound in the event of possible difficulties coming up as we look at the extraordinarily complex issue of the number of existing Acts of Parliament that require amendment, modification or repeal.

That is where I think the Committee has got itself worked up into a lather about something that is entirely inappropriate for this Bill. It is entirely inappropriate for the structures that we have in this Assembly and the way in which we relate to legislation in this place. I wonder why. Tales of Henry VIII, of malpractice in Westminster and of conferences held in Australia and New Zealand do not suggest to me that people have actually confronted the reality of what happens in this place and the necessity to have clauses 86 and 87 in the legislation not because we want to use them but because we might need them. The idea that we would put a complex Bill like this through the House that could be derailed and require primary legislation in a year and a half's time because people are unwilling to allow the provisions that are specified in clauses 86 and 87 causes me considerable concerns. I certainly hope that the Committee will not press its proposal at this stage. I am happy that we continue to discuss the matter for the two weeks before Further Consideration Stage to see whether we can reach a better accommodation, but what is currently before the House from the Committee — removing clause 86 entirely and amending clause 87 — would not be good law, and I will resist it as it stands.

Amendment No 12 agreed to.

Clause 37, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 38 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 39 (Enhanced criminal record certificates: additional safeguards)

Mr Speaker: We now come to the fourth group of amendments for debate. The group deals with criminal records and the gathering and handling of evidence such as DNA, fingerprints and photographs. An amendment is also proposed in the group to allow the Attorney General power to summon evidence from health workers to support his power to direct inquests. With amendment No 13 it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 14, 15, 18, 30 to 33, 35 to 39, 47, 50, 69, 70 and 72. Amendment No 69 is consequential to amendment No 14, and amendment No 72 is consequential to amendment No 38. Members will also note that a valid petition of concern has been received in relation to amendment No 50, so that amendment will require cross-community support. I call the Minister of Justice to move the amendment and to address the other amendments in the group.

Mr Ford: I beg to move amendment No 13: In page 27, leave out lines 20 to 22 and insert

“(4A) The Department may from time to time publish guidance to chief officers as to the exercise of functions under subsection (4); and in exercising functions under that subsection a relevant chief officer must have regard to any guidance for the time being published under this subsection.”.

(a) any information supplied by the applicant in connection with the application; and

(b) any other information which appears to the Department to be relevant to the application.

REVIEW BY INDEPENDENT REVIEWER AFTER ISSUE OF CERTIFICATE

(b) the details of any other disposal.

(2) If, following that review, the independent reviewer determines that the details of any spent conviction or other disposal included in the certificate should be removed—

(a) the independent reviewer must inform the Department of that fact; and

(b) on being so informed the Department must issue a new certificate.

(3) In issuing such a certificate the Department must give effect to the determination of the independent reviewer and must (in the case of an enhanced certificate) again comply with section 113B(4).

(4) If, following that review, the independent reviewer determines that the details of any spent convictions or other disposals included in the certificate should not be removed—

(a) the independent reviewer must inform the Department of that fact; and

(b) the Department must inform the applicant that the application is refused.

(5) The independent reviewer must not determine that details of a spent conviction or other disposal should be removed from a certificate unless the independent reviewer is satisfied that the removal of those details would not undermine the safeguarding or protection of children and vulnerable adults or pose a risk of harm to the public.

AUTOMATIC REVIEW BEFORE ISSUE OF CERTIFICATE CONTAINING ONLY DETAILS OF SPENT CONVICTIONS OR OTHER DISPOSALS OF PERSON UNDER 18

6.—(1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) the Department proposes to issue (otherwise than under sub-paragraph (4)(b) or (6)(b)) a criminal record certificate or an enhanced criminal record certificate relating to any person; and

(b) the certificate would—

(a) the details of any spent conviction; and

(b) the details of any other disposal.

(4) If, following that review, the independent reviewer determines that the details of any spent conviction or other disposal included in the certificate should be removed—

(a) the independent reviewer must inform the Department of that fact; and

(b) on being so informed the Department must amend the certificate and issue the amended certificate.

(5) In issuing such a certificate the Department must give effect to the determination of the independent reviewer and must (in the case of an enhanced certificate) again comply with section 113B(4).

(6) If, following that review, the independent reviewer determines that the details of any spent convictions or other disposals included in the certificate should not be removed—

(a) the independent reviewer must inform the Department of that fact; and

(b) the Department must issue the certificate in the form referred to the independent reviewer.

(7) The independent reviewer must not determine that details of a spent conviction or other disposal should be removed from a certificate unless the independent reviewer is satisfied that the removal of those details would not undermine the safeguarding or protection of children and vulnerable adults or pose a risk of harm to the public.

(8) The fact that a review has been carried out under this paragraph before a certificate is issued does not prevent the operation of paragraphs 4 and 5 in relation to the certificate once issued.

"PART 8: DNA PROFILES OR FINGERPRINTS

6A. The amendment made by section 76D applies even where the event referred to in paragraph (1)(b) of the substituted Article 63N of the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 occurs before the day on which that section comes into operation.".— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Ford: The group relates to criminal records, evidence gathering and evidence handling. The criminal records provisions of the Bill and the proposed amendments make changes to the Police Act 1997 to modernise and improve the arrangements for the disclosure of the criminal record checks carried out by Northern Ireland's disclosure service, Access NI. I would like to take a moment to thank Access NI for the work that it does in processing some 125,000 applications each year. It has had a particularly challenging period recently with the introduction of a new IT system, including online applications from 1 April.

Amendment No 13 makes a technical adjustment to the existing clause 39 to make it clear that the code of practice to which chief officers must have regard when determining whether information should be included in an enhanced criminal record certificate must be published. Amendment Nos 14 and 69 introduce new clause 39A and schedule 3B to make provision for the introduction of a review mechanism for the filtering scheme operated by Access NI since April of last year. This is on the basis of legal advice that provision should be made to allow an individual to seek, in certain circumstances, a review of their case where a conviction or other disposal has not been filtered from their certificate. Following careful consideration to the views of stakeholders, the amendment includes an automatic referral for cases only involving offences committed by someone under the age of 18.

Amendment No 15 makes an enhancement to clause 40, in the light of experience, to exclude a small number of applicants for enhanced checks in relation to home-based positions from the update service so as to avoid the potential for the unintentional disclosure of third-party information.

The final amendments in the group concerning criminal records are amendment No 18, which provides statutory cover for the storage of cautions and other diversionary disposals, and amendment No 70, which offers a small correction to amend a minor drafting issue in the criminal records schedule to the Bill.

Amendment Nos 30 to 34 relate to the violent offences prevention order (VOPO) provisions in Part 7 of the Bill and reflect specific comments made by the Attorney General around notification requirements of the offender and their compliance with the ECHR. The proposed amendments have been agreed with the Attorney General. Amendment No 30 makes changes to clause 65, which provides police with the power to take fingerprints and photographs of an offender at notification to verify their identity. The proposed amendment ensures that fingerprints are retained by police only if they are to be used to replace an existing set of poorer quality prints. In such a circumstance, the former set would be destroyed. It also provides that photographs taken at notification are destroyed once the offender ceases to be subject to notification requirements but allows the Chief Constable to apply to the court for an extension of photograph retention for a further two-year period from when notification has ended. A power of appeal has also been included to allow the Chief Constable or the offender to appeal against a court order given to police to extend the period of retention or a refusal by the court to grant an order.

Amendment Nos 31 and 32 make changes to clause 68, which relates to the retention of information from other Departments and the Secretary of State, such as passport information relating to the offender. The amendments ensure that the information is destroyed by the police once the offender is no longer subject to notification requirements but enables the Chief Constable to apply for an order to extend the period of information retention for a further two years from when notification has ended. It also allows the Chief Constable and the offender to appeal against a court order given to police to extend the period of retention or a refusal by the court to grant an order.

The final VOPO amendment, amendment No 33, is made to clause 70. That clause concerns power of entry and search of an offender's home by police that is needed for the purpose of assessing risk. The amendment ensures proportionality of any interference with third-party rights. The court, when considering the need for a search warrant, must be satisfied that it is proportionate in all circumstances for police to enter and search the premises in the case when the premises is resided in by a third party; that is, where the offender is staying at the premises but when it is owned by another person.

Amendment Nos 35 to 39 and amendment No 72 are a package of amendments associated with the new DNA and fingerprints retention framework as set out in schedule 2 to the Criminal Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2013. Implementation of the equivalent legislation in England and Wales has identified a number of gaps in our provisions that require correction to ensure that the overall regime achieves the desired outcome. The first of the amendments, amendment No 35, inserts new clause 76A into the Bill to amend the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 (PACE). That is to allow police to retake fingerprints and a DNA sample in cases where an investigation has been discontinued and where the material originally taken has been destroyed in accordance with the new biometric retention regime but where the same investigation later recommences, perhaps because new evidence has emerged in the case.

Amendment No 36 inserts new clause 76B to correct a gap identified in article 63G of PACE, which makes provision for the retention of DNA and fingerprints taken from persons convicted of an offence outside Northern Ireland. As currently enacted, article 63G would not permit the retention of the DNA profile and fingerprints taken from a person in Northern Ireland on the basis of a conviction recorded against them for a recordable, non-qualifying offence in England, Wales or Scotland. Amendment 37 inserts new clause 76C to make provision for the retention of DNA profiles and fingerprints, taken by police in cases where an individual accepts a prosecutorial fine in relation to the offence, for a period of two years.

Amendment No 38 inserts new clause 76D, which will substitute existing article 63N of PACE, which has been found not to have achieved the intended effect. Article 63N will now make it clear that DNA and fingerprints taken from an individual in connection with the investigation of an offence may be retained on the basis of the outcome of a subsequent offence, irrespective of whether that offence is linked to the one for which the material was first obtained.

Amendment No 72 makes an associated amendment to schedule 5 to the Bill, which deals with transitional provisions and savings

Finally, in respect of the DNA aspects of the group, amendment No 39 inserts new clause 76E, which will amend the relevant PACE provision to disapply the general destruction requirements for DNA samples in cases where the material falls under the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 and is relevant in evidence in court.

9.15 pm

The last departmental amendment in the group is amendment No 47, which relates to clause 82 of the Bill. Clause 82 creates a new right for defendants to apply to the court for an order allowing access to premises for the purpose of preparing their defence or appeal. The premises will typically be the crime scene and, in the vast majority of cases at present, access is agreed between the parties. The Attorney General has suggested that the power should only be exercised to ensure compliance with article 6 of the ECHR. This adjustment to the threshold for obtaining an order allowing access to property is intended to ensure proportionality and greater clarity in the use of the power.

Let me turn to the final amendment in the group, which is amendment No 50, in the name of Mr McCartney and colleagues. It seeks to amend the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959 to grant the Attorney General extra powers to gain access to health and social care information about the direction of inquests. I understand that the provision was discussed at length by the Justice Committee during Committee Stage, with written and oral evidence taken from the Attorney General, DHSSPS and the Health and Social Care Board. Despite lengthy deliberations, the Committee could not reach an agreement to bring forward the proposition as a Committee amendment. Given the lack of consensus on the matter, I do not consider it appropriate for the Assembly to agree to the proposal without further consideration and policy development. The current statutory provisions that allow the Attorney General to direct an inquest are set quite wide, but how the medical information to which the Attorney General would seek access would be interpreted is unclear. For those reasons, and in light of the Committee's inability to reach a consensus on the proposal, I do not support the amendment.

Mr Ross: Hopefully, the Minister and I will return to harmony on this section of clauses and amendments. First of all, I will speak briefly on the clauses and amendments that aim to improve and modernise arrangements for the disclosure of criminal records by providing for electronic applications, portable disclosures, the issuing of single disclosures and an independent appeals mechanism, amongst other things.

At the start of the Committee Stage of the Bill, the Department advised the Committee of a number of amendments that it intended to bring forward, including one to create a review mechanism for the disclosure scheme to filter certain old and minor convictions and other disposals, such as cautions, from standard and enhanced criminal record certificates. That enabled the Committee to seek evidence on those as part of the Committee Stage of the Bill.

In the evidence provided to the Committee, there was broad support amongst stakeholders for the measures being taken to modernise and streamline the disclosure of information; the proposal for a review mechanism; and issues raised largely related to the disclosure scheme itself, the retention and disclosure of criminal record information regarding children and young people and the wider arguments in relation to whether under-18s should be able to apply to wipe the slate clean of old and minor convictions. Women's Aid was, however, concerned that the review mechanism to filter old and minor convictions might lead to serial perpetrators of domestic violence slipping through the cracks and facilitate their abuse of future victims, and indicated that it is vital that records remain in such cases.

The Committee noted that the measures covered by clauses 36 to 43 and related amendments reflect many of the recommendations made by Sunita Mason in her review of the criminal records regime in Northern Ireland, and took the opportunity during the oral evidence session with departmental officials to explore a number of issues, including the delay in implementing portable checks due to a delay in the commencement of the update service operated by the Disclosure and Barring Service; whether, once available, they will speed up the process, particularly given the current delays in obtaining criminal record checks; how automatic referral to the independent reviewer will operate in practice; and the type of convictions that are likely to be removed by that process. Having considered the evidence received and the further information provided by the Department, the Committee agreed that it is content with the criminal records clauses and related amendments.

I turn now to amendment Nos 30, 31, 32 and 33. The Department advised the Committee during the Committee Stage of the Bill that it intended to bring forward a number of amendments relating to the verification of identity, retention of fingerprints and photographs, and power of search of third-party premises to the violent offences prevention order clauses to reflect improvements suggested by the Attorney General and concerns that he raised about European Court of Human Rights compliance. The main issues raised in the evidence received by the Committee on this part of the Bill covered the use of VOPOs in relation to domestic violence offences; whether there was a need for separate domestic violence protection orders, which the Assembly debated earlier; and whether VOPOs should apply to offenders under the age of 18. Noting that VOPOs are a risk management tool and a means of protecting the public, rather than a sentencing or punitive disposal, the Committee is content to support the clauses and the amendments.

I now want to very briefly address amendment Nos 35, 36, 37, 38 and 39, which introduce a number of new clauses to the Bill to make policy amendments to the biometric provisions in the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989, which provides for the new DNA and fingerprint retention framework.

Having received information from the Department on the proposed amendments, the Committee noted that four of them aim to address shortcomings identified through early experience of operating the corresponding provisions in England and Wales and the other amendment will add a new article to PACE to reflect the introduction of prosecutorial fines in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the Committee agreed to their inclusion in the Bill.

I turn to amendment No 50, tabled by Sinn Féin. This would confer a power on the Attorney General for Northern Ireland to obtain papers and provide a clear statutory basis for disclosure in relation to the exercise of his power to direct an inquest where he considers it advisable to do so under section 14(1) of the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959. The Committee has given this detailed consideration, initially in the context of the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill and, more recently, as part of the Committee Stage of this Bill. The Attorney General asked the Committee to consider the amendment, albeit without the review mechanism and sunset clause, when it was carrying out the Committee Stage of the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill last year. The Attorney General outlined that the principal focus of his concern was deaths that occur in hospitals or where there is otherwise a suggestion that medical error may have occurred and indicated that he had experienced some difficulty in recent years in securing access to documents that, he believed, he needed.

At that time, the Committee indicated that it was generally supportive of the principle of the proposed amendment; however, it raised issues that required further consideration and scrutiny that could not be undertaken within the timescale for completion of the Committee Stage of the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill. The Committee agreed that, if an alternative Bill could be found in which the amendment could be considered properly, it would support such an approach. The Committee subsequently agreed that the Justice Bill provided such an opportunity and, when seeking evidence on the Bill, requested written evidence on the Attorney's proposal. The Committee also invited the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and the Health and Social Care Board to give oral evidence, as they would be directly affected by the proposal, and the Attorney General also attended to discuss the matter.

Both the Health and Social Care Board and the Department of Health had concerns regarding the proposed amendment. The Health and Social Care Board highlighted the fact that there was no equivalent provision in England and Wales. In its view, the duty is already on trust staff to report unexplained deaths, there are sufficient safeguards in the current process and the present system is suitably robust to ensure that the interests of justice are properly served. The board also had concerns that the serious adverse incident reporting system is expressly intended not to be an investigation to determine fault or blame but rather to facilitate learning in order to prevent recurrence and that the granting of this statutory power to the Attorney General, where he has stated he would intend to exercise it to gain access to serious adverse incident documentation, could well have the detrimental effect of discouraging openness and transparency.

The board stated that, in order to exercise his power under section 14(1) of the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959, all that is required is for the Attorney General to have a reason to believe that the circumstances of the death make the holding of an inquest advisable. In the board's view, it is unnecessary for him to effectively carry out the same role as the coroner, who is the statutory authority to properly investigate unexplained deaths. The role of the Attorney General, according to the board, is to supervise the coroner and to intervene if he suspects or believes that there is some deficiency.

When the Department of Health officials attended, they indicated that the Health Minister had no objection in principle to the Attorney General having the power to access the information necessary to enable him to discharge his functions under section 14(1) of the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959 but believed that more policy clarity on the precise intent of the proposed provision and how it would be used in practice was required. The officials outlined a range of concerns regarding the rationale for the proposed amendment, the broad scope of the power and the implications, including additional administrative burdens on staff. The Department of Health also shared the board's concerns regarding the possible impact on openness and transparency in relation to the serious adverse incident process and emphasised that it is a non-statutory-based system to identify learning, not an investigative system.

The officials outlined a number of initiatives already being pursued to provide greater scrutiny around the process for certifying deaths in Northern Ireland and to strengthen and improve the current process and indicated that a full review of coronial legislation was likely, which would provide a more appropriate opportunity to consider the proposal. The Minister of Health subsequently wrote to the Committee providing further information regarding the look-back exercise of serious adverse incidents and the initiatives being taken forward to strengthen and enhance public assurance and scrutiny of the death certification process, which includes the roll-out of a regional mortality and morbidity review system and consideration of the introduction of an independent medical reviewer, similar to that being introduced in Scotland.

The Attorney General, both in correspondence and when he attended the Committee, set out the reasons why he believed he needed the statutory power that the amendment would provide to obtain papers and outlined a high-profile incident involving a health and social care trust that served to strengthen his view that a power to obtain relevant material was crucial to the public interest in ensuring a high standard of health care and investigation of incidents that result in the death of a patient. In his view, there appeared to be a gap in the potential investigation for accountability purposes, and the amendment is designed to close that gap. He also provided an example of a case in which he had requested details of a death and the relevant HSC trust had responded by questioning the legal basis for him obtaining the information.

The Attorney General did not believe that providing him with the statutory power requested would create a burden on the health service and stated that the amendment would ensure that one of the safeguards in place in the system, namely his power to direct an inquest, can be improved. The Attorney General also indicated that, contrary to the misapprehension of the Health and Social Care Board, the statutory power to direct an inquest is not limited to cases in which a coroner has already been informed of the death or has made a decision about whether or not to hold an inquest. He is able to direct an inquest where there has been a decision not to notify the coroner, and it would not therefore be sufficient for him to simply request that the coroner shares the documents he has received, as suggested by the board, to inform his decision. The Attorney General also noted the suggestion by the board that he may be able to direct an inquest without obtaining information and stated that, while the threshold of advisability is low, it would not be right to burden the coronial system with unnecessary requests.

The Committee considered this amendment, which includes a review mechanism/sunset clause, on a number of occasions, with some Members indicating that they were inclined to support it and others indicating that they had concerns about it. Key issues discussed by the Committee included the need to ensure information is provided when it should be, whether the amendment would assist or support that and provide what the Attorney General described as “a second pair of eyes”; the need for openness and transparency and whether the amendment would assist that or create a climate of fear or reluctance, thus diminishing it; whether it would assist people in difficult circumstances to establish the truth about the death of a loved one; the fact that SAIs were introduced as a learning exercise rather than an investigative system and that staff are encouraged to participate in them on that basis; and the process of change and new initiatives the health service is implementing.

At the meeting on 11 March, a proposal was put to take forward the amendment proposed by the Attorney General, with the addition of provision for a sunset clause/ review mechanism as a Committee amendment. The proposal fell as it did not have the support of a majority of the members present.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. We will support the amendments tabled by the Minister. As the Chair outlined, they help the process of streamlining, particularly around convictions and other processes of disclosure.

I turn to the amendment tabled in our names in relation to what became known during Committee Stage as “the Attorney General’s amendment”. We tabled the amendment for two reasons. We honestly believe that the provision provides an appropriate and necessary level of public protection in relation to the power of the Attorney General, particularly in relation to inquests that arise out of deaths in hospitals.

The second reason was that, at the Committee, as the Chair has outlined, there was a discussion in which there was a fair degree of push and pull. When it came down to the vote on the last day — the result was five each — there were people who voted yes and no and throughout the process had reservations, doubts and fears. We felt that bringing the amendment here tonight would allow a wider discussion and let other Members be part of the process. In many ways, the petition of concern makes some of the arguments that we will make tonight a bit academic, but putting on the record our position serves a purpose.

Throughout Committee Stage, none of us, whatever way we came to the proposal by the Attorney General, was casting any doubt or making any observations on the professionalism of the people who work in the National Health Service, those providers. We all said, particularly when the people from the health and social care trusts were in front of us, that none of us was questioning that. Indeed, I think that most of us congratulated them on their professionalism.

9.30 pm

The health board said that, in many ways, the amendment was unnecessary and that all of the relevant documentation was already being provided to the coroner. Similarly, with reference to an earlier part of this discussion, I think that when people say that something is unnecessary and that there is already provision to do this, you ask why they do not want to it happen. The Attorney General made a number of observations. He referred to it in evidence as “a second pair of eyes”. He was not in any way casting any shadows or any doubts on the process as to when a coroner would deem an inquest necessary. He made the point very poignantly at the Committee where he said that there were people out there who perhaps do not have people to advocate on their behalf, and he said that he would provide that in that way.

The health professionals put forward the issue of staff reluctance to engage in adverse incident reports. Indeed, during Committee Stage, Edwin Poots, speaking as a Committee member, made the good point that sometimes health professionals are involved in operations that are very sensitive and that sometimes, in a sense, they take calculated risks that something can perhaps go wrong. He was mindful and fearful that too much scrutiny would perhaps leave health professionals where they would take a step back and perhaps not make decisions in light of that. On a number of occasions, he made the point that he could see why this was, if not necessary, something that he would not argue against.

On the issue of the risks that health professionals take, given that people were saying that the coroner had access to all of the documentation, I do not think that anybody was making the case that, because the coroner has the ability to have the documents, it was in any way preventing health professionals from doing the dedicated work that they do. However, unfortunately, there were, perhaps, in the past, circumstances where documents that should have been provided to the coroner were not. Perhaps we are in a better place now. When the health trusts were at the Committee, I raised a particular case. Again, I agree with what the health trusts were saying because, in the legislation as it is framed, there is a grey area. It says that it is only documents that are compellable for a High Court action, but it was found out, particularly during the O'Hara inquiry, that the trust had a report that, it said, was for internal use and was not compellable to the High Court. However, it revealed that there were issues with a particular child who, tragically, ended up dying that should have pointed up and should have been seen and, therefore, should have been acted on. However, because that document was not compellable, it was only found out through the inquiry. When that came out in the inquiry, the trust accepted that it was a document that the coroner perhaps should have had, but there was no legal imperative for it to provide it. I think that the point was made at the Committee and, indeed, at the inquiry, and the trust went on to admit negligence in that case.

It is in that type of scenario where you could have the second pair of eyes. If the Attorney General was asked on behalf of a family, this type of document could be brought forward more quickly, openly and transparently. I am not saying that death could have been prevented in this case, but certainly the family would not have been put in a place of further trauma. Secondly, it would ensure that documents that should be disclosed are disclosed in a meaningful way, rather than being hidden behind — maybe “hidden” is the wrong word — the fact that there is no legal imperative to do something. The point was made in Committee that, if a document in the hands of a trust could illuminate things and bring relief to a family, there is a moral obligation to release it in that spirit.

There is a suggestion that if this power was given to an Attorney General — not to the individual but to the office — they could perhaps overstretch themselves and use it in too many circumstances, which would itself put additional and unnecessary pressure on health care professionals. Now, the Attorney General was very clear that in recent times he has not used the powers that he has. If he has used them, he has done so infrequently. But if people felt it would be abused, putting undue pressure on health care professionals, a sunset clause would allow for a review after three years and then for it to be continued with the approval of the Assembly. That in itself would make it fail-safe. First of all, overuse would be detected through the number of cases, because it could be compared with the number that the coroner referred to inquest or, indeed, that the Health and Social Care Board itself surrendered for inquest. Secondly, if there was a need to either lower or adjust the powers, the sunset clause would allow for that. The policy — the Minister has said it — needs teasing out. You have the Attorney General asking for what is a second pair of eyes. Tonight, people will look on and ask, “Why would you not want a second pair of eyes?”. We have a process that in the main is very open and transparent, but if we block this people might feel that we are hiding something. I do not think that is a good place for anyone involved in the process to go.

Mr A Maginness: I do not intend to speak for long on these matters. First of all, in general terms, my party supports the amendments tabled by the Minister of Justice. They are helpful and worthy of support.

Amendment No 50, which has been tabled by Mr McCartney and his colleagues in Sinn Féin, relates to a proposition by the Attorney General that the Committee had considerable difficulty in agreeing to. Eventually, no agreement was reached, and the proposition put forward by the Attorney General was not endorsed by the Committee. The arguments on both sides were well balanced, and the Chair of the Committee has outlined the arguments against, in the main, and Mr McCartney the arguments for. Both outlined them very accurately and very well, but I think that anybody listening to both contributions would come to the conclusion that there are issues on both sides and it is difficult to make one's mind up on whether to support the proposition of the Attorney General or not.

It was further complicated for me when my brother gave evidence to the Committee against the proposition that the Attorney General had put forward. Nonetheless, I put that aside and made up my own mind. My colleague Mr McGlone also made up his mind in relation to it, and we were still divided. Eventually, we considered that it was useful to propose a sunset clause, because one of the principal arguments against the proposition that the Attorney General put forward was that, if you changed the law and allowed this to happen, there could be an accretion in power and an interference in the system that would be adverse.

It was thought — I think Mr McCartney was right — to bring some sort of time limitation into it, that there could be a proper review and that a sunset clause would serve that purpose so as to analyse exactly how the amendment would work in practice and see that it would not, for example, overburden health officials, have an adverse impact on their performance or inhibit them in carrying out their proper affairs in relation to their professional duties. The determining factor in the SDLP supporting the amendment was, in fact, the sunset clause. However, it has all been rendered nugatory by the fact that there is a petition of concern. I am mystified as to why there is a petition of concern. Nobody has told me, and perhaps I will never learn in any event. It is an academic exercise, but, for the record, we would support it, given the fact that a sunset clause was quite properly added to the proposition. I conclude there.

Mr Elliott: Once again, I will limit my contribution to amendment No 50, which was originally proposed by the Attorney General and was defeated in Committee — there were equal votes, so the matter fell — but Mr McCartney has brought it forward again as his amendment. I can understand why. I want to make it clear that I do not always support the Attorney General's view on issues, but on this occasion he brought it back on a number of occasions and narrowed the aspects of the proposal in the amendment. I accept the argument from the health professionals and officials, including Mr Maginness's brother. They supported it in principle but did not like the detail and were not convinced, simply because they did not see the overall rationale for it. I believe that it genuinely would have been used in very limited cases.

I saw some cases through the Western Trust, particularly where young children had died because of certain things, and the families and their legal representatives had huge problems accessing information from the trust that should have been made available. I suppose that was the one aspect that convinced me: I thought that it would be a good opportunity to have that second opinion or third opinion that would have been able to access that information and, hopefully, help to progress that case for those families, irrespective of what the outcome was going to be. The outcome might not have been in favour of the families or what they were looking for, but at least they would have had the opportunity to access that information. That is why I felt it appropriate to support that proposal. Obviously, the sunset clause in it makes it even more attractive now as well.

9.45 pm

I just wanted to put on record my thoughts and views behind it and why it is primarily a health issue. The Health Department and trusts would have to deal with the outworkings of it if it were to go through, although I assume that, with the petition of concern, it will not progress. I would like to have seen it go through. I would like to have seen it given those three years to see how it could have progressed and developed and whether it would have been of help to a number of families who are looking for that additional information.

Mr Speaker: I suggest that, with Members' agreement, after Mr Dickson finishes, it will be an opportune time to take a comfort break. I will then call the Minister to make his winding-up speech at about 10.00 pm.

Mr Dickson: I will certainly not hold Members back very long from their comfort break. I welcome the opportunity to speak on the fourth group of amendments, which relate primarily to criminal record evidence gathering and handling. The amendments are mostly for the purpose of tidying up this part of the Bill.

I would just like to speak for a short time specifically on the changes to Access NI disclosures. I am pleased to see further refinement of the filtering process that is now in place for Access NI applicants. This is a common-sense approach, making it more straightforward for rehabilitation and reintegration in the community and the workforce of people previously convicted of a crime. Amendment Nos 14 and 69 will allow for a review mechanism for the new filtering process, allowing an individual to seek a review of the filtering process if certain convictions or other disposals are included in their Access NI certificates. Furthermore, people who have offences included that were committed under the age of 18 will automatically be referred to the review mechanism. You must remember that many of these offenders have not been able to obtain a decent level of education and so would otherwise be unsure how to seek a review or deal with a complex application.

This is about making the justice system work for victims, but it is also about criminals with regard to reforming their behaviour, acting to rehabilitate people and giving them a true stake in society. Therefore, I support the amendments tabled by the Minister.

In respect of amendment No 50, I will not detain the House long. The arguments for and against have been made, and we have the petition of concern. I support the Minister in his view on this.

Mr Speaker: Members may now take their ease, a comfort break or whatever. We will suspend until 10.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 9.48 pm and resumed at 10.02 pm.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

Mr Ford: In reality, there is very little on which to wind in this particular group. It is clear that the bulk of the amendments put forward by me, with the support of the Committee, are accepted. The only issue really is that of the provision of information to the Attorney General, on which concerns were expressed by some Members. I was amused to learn that there was a debate within the Maginness family circle. We should not all admit to problems in the family when we cannot agree a line, but it is clear that there was a finely balanced decision on that and that there are issues that perhaps need to be examined in a different way at a different stage.

It is clear that there are significant concerns amongst health professionals that what was being proposed was imprecise and did not entirely sit easily with their duties. It is also the case that we are looking to a reform of coronial law in general. I suspect that it might well be best for the House to consider whether a review of coronial law might be a better way of handling the issue of the powers of the Attorney General to request information from medical authorities than simply putting it into a Bill at this stage.

There are also clearly significant issues about how far back things might go. If we were talking about somebody who died at the age of 90, there are serious questions as to how far back into people's careers they could be expected to answer questions. There are real issues in terms of resources. We know from the limited number of inquests at this point, where the attorney requests medical information, that people are diverted in the health and social care system from the provision of services to their patients and clients to the provision of information to the attorney.

Given all the concerns that have been expressed on something that has not been consulted on substantively, it is difficult to see that we should move in that particular direction. I welcome the fact, however, that the other amendments in this group, most of which fall to the simple tidying-up process that the Department has been doing with the Committee, have shown, as the Chair said when he introduced his comments, a set of harmony. I trust that that is where we will be.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We now come to the fifth group of amendments for debate. This group comprises amendments that amend existing offences or create new offences. The Committee for Justice proposes an amendment named "Ending the life of an unborn child", while the Department proposes amendments in respect of offences of meeting a child following sexual grooming, sexual communication with a child and causing or allowing a child or vulnerable adult to suffer serious physical harm.

With amendment No 34, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 41, 42, 48, 71, 73 and 74. Amendment No 71 is consequential on amendment No 48; amendment No 73 is consequential on amendment No 41; and amendment No 74 is consequential on amendment No 48.

Members will also note that a valid petition of concern has been received in relation to amendment No 34, so this amendment will require cross-community support.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I beg to move amendment No 34: After clause 71 insert

"PART 7A

ENDING THE LIFE OF AN UNBORN CHILD

Ending the life of an unborn child

71A.—(1) Without prejudice to section 58 and section 59 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and section 25 of the Criminal Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 1945 and subject to subsection (2) any person who ends the life of an unborn child at any stage of that child's development shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction on indictment to a period of not more than ten years' imprisonment and a fine.

9. An amendment made by section 83A or Schedule 4A does not apply in relation to any harm resulting from an act that occurs, or so much of an act as occurs, before the coming into operation of that amendment.'— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Ross: Before I address amendment No 34, which the Committee tabled, I want to briefly cover amendment Nos 41, 42, 48, and 71, which the Minister tabled.

I turn first to amendment Nos 41 and 42. In January, the Minister sought the views of the Committee on his intention to provide for a new offence of communicating with a child for sexual purposes, and to make a change to the existing offence of meeting a child following sexual grooming. The Committee noted that the new offence of communicating with a child for sexual purposes arose from an NSPCC lobby campaign to close what was considered a gap in the law in Northern Ireland relating to sexting. There is already a law covering this behaviour in Scotland, and the Serious Crime Act 2015 introduced it in England and Wales.

The Committee believes that it is very important to provide the same level of protection to children in Northern Ireland and therefore supports the amendment.

The amendment to the existing offence in the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 of meeting a child following sexual grooming will make a small but significant change to the evidence threshold for the offence by reducing the requirement for an adult to have communicated with a child on two occasions before meeting them or travelling to meet them before the offence is committed, to one occasion. The Committee noted that a report by Barnardo's showed how quickly contact offending can occur following just one communication or meeting, and it agreed to support the amendment on the basis that the grooming offence could play a much more important role in preventing such contact offending ever taking place and thus improving protection for children.

Moving on to amendment Nos 48 and 71, the Department provided the Committee with the results of a consultation it had undertaken on extending existing legislation to enable the joint conviction of members of a household who cause or allow a child or vulnerable adult to suffer serious physical harm. In England and Wales, the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims (Amendment) Act 2012 introduced the offence, which relates to circumstances whereby the injuries to the child or vulnerable adult must have been sustained at the hands of one of a limited number of members of a household but there is insufficient evidence to point to the particular person responsible. Clearly extending the scope of the current offence of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult to also include cases of causing or allowing a child or vulnerable adult to suffer serious physical harm will provide additional protection to children and vulnerable adults. The Committee therefore supports the amendments.

I will turn now to amendment 34, the intention of which is to restrict lawful abortions to NHS premises except in cases of urgency when access to National Health Service premises is not possible and where no fee is paid, and to include an additional option to the existing legislation to provide for a period of 10 years imprisonment and a fine on conviction. Most, if not all, Members will be aware of the background to amendment 34, which was brought forward during Further Consideration Stage of the Criminal Justice Bill in March 2013. A petition of concern was tabled then, as is the case today, and following extensive debate, the amendment fell as it did not receive the necessary cross-community support.

By way of background, in July 2014, at the start of the Committee Stage of the Justice Bill, Mr Jim Wells, who was at that time a member of the Justice Committee, advised the Committee that he intended to bring forward this amendment at Consideration Stage and asked the Committee to seek views on it when it was seeking evidence on the Bill because, when the amendment had previously been brought forward, one of the criticisms was that there had not been any consultation on it. The Committee discussed whether it was appropriate to seek views on an individual member's proposed amendment, and, while a range of views were expressed, the Committee agreed to do so.

Following the Committee's call for evidence on the Bill and a range of amendments, including the one proposed by Mr Wells, a total of 28 written responses were received from organisations in relation to that amendment. Of those, a total of 20 were in favour of the amendment, seven were not in favour and one made no comment on whether it supported the amendment or not. In addition, the Committee received a significant number of responses, letters and emails from individuals, a number of written and online petitions and almost 22,500 postcards in support of the amendment.

Having considered the written responses, the Committee subsequently took oral evidence from a number of organisations who supported the amendment and a number who opposed it. The organisations who gave oral evidence included Amnesty International, Care NI, Christian Medical Fellowship, Evangelical Alliance, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, Precious Life, the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority (RQIA), the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children and Women's Network.

The amendment clearly divides opinion, which was reflected in both the written and oral evidence received by the Committee, with organisations and individuals either strongly supporting it or indicating strong opposition to it. In the interests of brevity, I do not intend to rehearse the arguments put forward in the previous debate on this amendment. Nor do I intend to outline all the details of the written and oral evidence received by the Committee, but I do want to provide a brief synopsis of the main arguments that were put forward both in support of the amendment and opposing it.

Organisations that indicated opposition to the amendment included Amnesty International, the NI Human Rights Commission, Alliance for Choice, Women's Aid and the National Union of Students-Union of Students in Ireland (NUS-USI). The RQIA also raised a number of issues relating to it. The main points they made included that the amendment would constitute a further significant restriction on the right to privacy in Northern Ireland, and adoption of it would be contrary, they argued, to article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights and article 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. They also argued that the amendment would further hinder the state's ability to fulfil its positive obligation to create a procedural framework enabling a pregnant woman to effectively exercise her right of access to a lawful abortion; that people should be allowed to decide whether they use a private provider or not and that there are no other circumstances in which people are forced to use only a public health facility; that it is not clear how the word "urgent" is interpreted and the circumstances by which someone will be able to terminate a pregnancy outside of NHS premises in an "urgent" situation; that the amendment may be so broad as to include certain forms of contraception, including the morning-after pill and that further clarification was required — I believe that that came forward; and that there are issues relating to enforcement of criminal law regulations and any potential role for the RQIA, as it does not sit within the present regulatory framework.

The organisations that strongly supported the amendment included CARE, the Christian Medical Fellowship, Evangelical Alliance, Precious Life, the Society for the Protection of Unborn Children, Women's Network, the Northern Catholic Bishops, the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, the Free Presbyterian Church and the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Ireland. The main points in support of the amendment included the argument that life begins at the moment of conception; that there is a responsibility to protect the life of the mother and unborn child, and that that responsibility is best held with the Health and Social Care trusts and not those actively campaigning to change the law for financial gain; that there are no credible or compelling needs for private companies to provide abortion services in Northern Ireland; that there are issues of transparency where private clinics are concerned, including a failure to provide information on the number of abortions undertaken on their premises; that there is no evidence that private companies or charities are needed to meet existing levels of demand; that promotion of a more liberal approach on abortion is at odds with the law, culture and values of the people of Northern Ireland; that there are concerns regarding whether the law as it stands is being upheld and adhered to, as it is difficult to monitor lawful terminations outside of NHS premises owing to a lack of information; and, finally, that the European Court of Human Rights gives a broad margin of appreciation to states, as there is no consensus on abortion across Europe.

At its meeting on 4 March this year, the Justice Committee agreed to include the evidence that it received on this amendment in its report on the Justice Bill. The Committee also discussed the proposed amendment at several meetings, and opinion was divided, with some members indicating that they support the amendment and others indicating that they oppose it. At the meeting on 11 March, a proposal was put to take the amendment forward as a Committee amendment, as Mr Wells was unable to do so himself at that time, given that he was the Minister of Health. Although the proposal was agreed by a majority of members present at that meeting, some indicated their opposition to it.

I and the Committee recognise that this amendment deals with a very emotive issue, and, although I suspect that its fate is already known, I hope that Members will participate in the debate in a sensitive and moderate way and deal with the specifics of the amendment rather than the broader issue.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Níl Sinn Féin i bhfabhar le gínmhilleadh; vótáil Sinn Féin i gcoinne Acht 1967 a leathnú go dtí an Tuaisceart nuair a moladh sin sa Tionól. Creideann Sinn Féin gur chóir don gínmhilleadh bheith ar fáil i gcás éignithe, drochúsáide gnéasaí nó i gcol, agus i gcásanna ina bhfuil beatha na mná torraí i mbaol.

Sinn Féin is not in favour of abortion. We opposed and voted against the extension of the 1967 Act to the North when it was proposed in the Assembly. That remains our position. Sinn Féin believes that, in the case of rape, sexual abuse or incest and fatal foetal abnormality, or when a pregnant woman's life is in danger, the option of termination should be available. Sinn Féin believes that the issue should be dealt with in a comprehensive manner, involving a multi-agency response that develops effective services for sexual health and sex education, fuller access to child support provision and specific support for single parents.

I join the Chairperson of the Justice Committee in urging everyone who participates in the debate tonight to deal with this sensitive issue in a polite and respectful way and to respect that we have many different positions on it. I also respect and am conscious of the fact that there are strong and sincerely held views on all sides of the House.

This is the same amendment that was defeated on 12 March 2013. The Chair said that the Committee did not fully support it. For the record, the members of our party on that Committee voted against the amendment at that point.

Sinn Féin's view of the amendment is that it is clearly an attempt to restrict the right of a woman to obtain a termination in life-threatening circumstances. It is an attempt to further compound trauma by marginalising women at a time in our life when we are most vulnerable.

The criminal justice arena is not a place to deal with a sensitive health care issue such as this.

10.30 pm

The health professionals have called for guidance, the court has ordered Ministers of Health to bring forward that guidance, and, unfortunately, we still do not have it. Three successive DUP Ministers of Health to date have failed to bring forward the guidelines as ordered by the courts. The absence of legislative implementation of these judgements has created very dangerous grey areas in which women can die. The failure of DUP Ministers to have in place guidance to give clinicians the legal assurance required to allow them to intervene in life-threatening circumstances at the request of the mother represents gross negligence. We call on the new Minister of Health to bring the guidance forward. Clinicians and medical practitioners in the health service need the assurance and support of the law to allow them to carry out their work and, when required, to act to save lives.

Let us examine some of the arguments against, and, in the interests of us all getting home at a reasonable hour, I will be brief. Private healthcare versus public healthcare: the DUP and its allies in this have suddenly become cheerleaders for public rather than private healthcare. In Sinn Féin's view, in an ideal world, all aspects of health would be public. However, the current reality is that the National Health Service is heavily dependent on private health referrals. Is the DUP saying that it now wants to cancel all private operations funded by the taxpayer — children's heart surgery, heart operations, specialist operations? At least I could have some respect for their position if they had a consistent approach.

In the absence of guidance, there can be no other conclusion than that the amendment is aimed at ensuring that no other avenue will be open to women in a life-threatening situation to opt for a termination. Where a termination may or may not take place is not the issue: the important thing is that it happens within the law. Any institution that provides for a termination, whether it is in the National Health Service or the private healthcare domain, must of course be regulated. However, the amendment is not about medical emergencies or ensuring that women get the best treatment in those difficult circumstances; it is about limiting a woman's right to have that treatment.

I listened carefully to what representatives from the Marie Stopes clinic said about regulation and the law, and, at all times, they said that they wanted to work within the law. Thankfully, the amendment will be defeated because of a common-sense approach across a range of parties. Given the lateness of the hour, I have said enough, but I would like to end by thanking my colleagues in Alliance and the Green Party and Basil McCrea for helping to ensure that the amendment fails.

Mr A Maginness: At the outset, I will say that the amendment should not be about whether you support or do not support abortion. Even if you support abortion or a wider range of abortion in Northern Ireland, you could quite easily support the amendment. The amendment is about regulation, supervision and control over a private commercial abortion clinic in Northern Ireland. The fact that the Marie Stopes clinic is, in fact, a private commercial concern should give rise to concern for all of us in the Chamber. When the RQIA gave its evidence to the Committee, it made it plain that it would have no control, supervision or regulation in relation to a private clinic. It was as simple as that, and the RQIA was very honest and frank in its evidence to the Committee. That is the reality of the situation, and the amendment deals with that reality.

Another interesting fact is this: if one looks at the original 1967 Abortion Act for Britain, one sees that, at section 1(3), it says as follows:

“Except as provided by subsection (4) of this section, any treatment for the termination of pregnancy must be carried out in a hospital vested in the Minister of Health or the Secretary of State under the National Health Service Acts, or in a place for the time being approved for the purposes of this section by the said Minister or the Secretary of State.”

The people who drafted that legislation envisaged that abortions would take place on national health premises, as indeed, this amendment does. I concede the point that, further to this legislation, there have been amendments in relation to the performance of abortions. However, subsection (4) goes on to say:

“Subsection (3) of this section, and so much of subsection (1) as relates to the opinion of two registered medical practitioners, shall not apply to the termination of a pregnancy by a registered medical practitioner in a case where he is of the opinion, formed in good faith, that the termination is immediately necessary to save the life or to prevent grave, permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman.”

In this amendment, you have that reflected, because it deals with an urgent situation. In some ways, the amendment, which has been criticised by people in the House and outside it, reflects that aspect of the 1967 Act.

Let me say this: there has been considerable opposition to the amendment, not just in this form today but in 2013, and the opposition to it was on the basis that there was not sufficient consultation in relation to the amendment. The amendment has been consulted on exhaustively in the Committee, there have been numerous articles in the press and on television and so forth and all sorts of organisations have given evidence to the Assembly through the Justice Committee. There has been an enormous public reaction to it, both for and against. The reason why a petition of concern —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, indeed.

Mr Wells: As the Member knows, when I was on the Committee, I proposed the amendment, and I understand that there were 25,000 responses to the amendment. I stand to be corrected, but that is probably the largest response received to any amendment to any Bill in the House since 1998. That gives an indication of the huge level of understanding, both in favour of and against the amendment. The last time that the issue was discussed, in 2013, the pro-abortionists who wanted to defeat this legislation used the argument that we had not properly consulted. Having done that, they now seem to be moving the argument on to a new platform. It strikes me that they simply want to allow Marie Stopes to continue giving advice and perhaps taking things a bit further as far as abortion is concerned. I wish that they would be honest with the people of Northern Ireland and stand up and say, "We are for abortion on demand", and tell the people that, rather than trying to hide behind spurious arguments.

Mr A Maginness: I accept in the main the point that the Member makes. I am not certain whether everyone is saying that they want abortion on demand: some do not, some want a limited reform. I do not understand the proposition that you are pro-life but want abortion in certain circumstances. It is like saying that you are against capital punishment but you could have capital punishment for treason or something like that or the murder of a child. It just does not make sense. You are either —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: I want to get on, and I know that my time is limited. If I can come back to you, I will.

The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission has given evidence to the Committee. It is their duty to give evidence to the Committee, and I do not in any way query that. However, the advice that they have given is ill founded. Fundamental to the advice that they gave was the point that the amendment was incompatible with the European Convention on Human Rights and with the Assembly's competence: I reject that entirely.

There is a fundamental misunderstanding in legal terms by the commission of the relevant convention jurisprudence. That is compounded in its assessment that the amendment would hinder the Northern Ireland Executive's:

"ability to fulfil its positive obligation to 'create a procedural framework enabling a pregnant woman to effectively exercise her right of access to lawful abortion.'"

That comes from a Polish case — P and S v Poland, 2013 — which does not apply to our law in Northern Ireland. In Poland, there is a positive legislative provision in relation to abortion. Where there is a positive legislative provision that is made for lawful abortion and is applicable, those decisions do not apply to our law here, because our law is based on a different premise. Therefore, the Polish cases are not applicable. That is why the commission has got it wrong: it has got it wrong legally in the applicability of the law to our situation in Northern Ireland.

Further to that, if you look at A, B and C v Ireland case of 2010, the Grand Chamber, applying the margin of appreciation, rejected the argument — based on article 8 of the European Convention, which concerns the right to privacy — that Irish law needed to be revised so as not to criminalise those seeking an abortion on health or well-being grounds. The court found:

"the impugned prohibition in Ireland struck a fair balance between the right of the first and second applicants to respect for their private lives and the rights invoked on behalf of the unborn."

That is the basic position established by the European Court in our nearest neighbour and the nearest situation analogous to the law that exists here on abortion.

The court also considered the European-wide consensus in favour of greater access to abortion. The court did not consider:

"that this consensus decisively narrows the broad margin of appreciation of the State."

That is the jurisprudence of the European Court. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission should go back and look at that and respect what the European Court is actually saying in relation to the issue. It is therefore right and proper for the Assembly to make its decision on abortion and the criminal law. I respect the Human Rights Commission, and it has a duty to advise the Assembly, but it is in error in relation to the law on abortion. Article 8 rights are not engaged in relation to our law, and you cannot apply the Polish decisions, which are based on article 8, to our situation.

Finally, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission says that article 2 rights are also engaged. In fact, in the A, B and C v Ireland case, the Court dismissed the article 2 complaint that was brought by complainants in that case and said that those rights did not apply. If article 2 rights did not apply in the A, B and C v Ireland case, they surely do not apply in our case either.

Mr Givan: I thank the Member for giving way on this particular point. In the last debate, the Minister put forward spurious reasons and said that this Assembly could not legislate on these grounds because it was not within the competence of the Assembly to do so, as well as raising other issues to undermine what was being proposed. Maybe the Member was going to allude to the evidence given by the Attorney General. The Minister was challenged on why he did not seek advice from the Attorney General. The Attorney General gave evidence to the Committee on 4 February this year saying:

"there is no convention right to an abortion, so there is no way in which it could be plausibly said that the amendment would be outside competence on a convention ground."

He said the Human Rights Commission had got it wrong and that he disagreed with its legal assessment, which the Member has very ably articulated as well. Is it not the case that the most senior law officer for Northern Ireland is saying that it is within the competence of the Assembly to do it? Maybe that explains why the Minister, when this was first raised, did not go to the Attorney General to get advice.

10.45 pm

Mr A Maginness: All I would say in conclusion is that, first, there is no human right to abortion. There is absolutely none in international law and certainly not any in European law. Anybody who says that there is is inaccurate and is simply wrong. The Attorney General gave the Justice Committee advice and said that the amendment was compatible with the convention. He said that the amendment was within the competence of the Assembly. The Human Rights Commission has chosen a different view. I respect that, but I believe that it is wrong. I think that it is better to prefer the advice in these circumstances of the independent law officer in relation to the governance of Northern Ireland.

I will conclude on that point, and I think that this amendment is worthy of support. I think that it is sad that a petition of concern has been applied here because the Assembly is the right body to determine this issue untrammelled. I think that we have been deprived of the right to determine that issue. I say once again that this is not an issue for or against abortion; this is an issue about control, regulation and supervision.

Mr Elliott: I am pleased to start off by saying that the debate so far has taken place in a good and reasonable manner. I recall that a couple of years ago, when this debate came forward with the amendment, it slightly ran out of control. I ask that the remainder of the debate continues in the way that it has started, because I think that, as an issue, it is extremely difficult for people to comprehend the differing views on it. I do think that we have to respect the people who feel themselves forced to go to a clinic, whether that is within the National Health Service or, indeed, outwith it, to seek advice and, at times, to seek treatment. I think that we need to respect the views of those people as well.

When this amendment came forward two years ago, we all knew that it was going to fall because of the petition of concern. I did ask that there be a consultation process to garner the wider views of the public, and, to be fair, that is exactly what has happened in this case. We have had the consultation, and I know that Mr Wells has said that there was a huge number of responses, probably more than there was to any other piece of legislation or policy in the Assembly since it was formed in 1998. There were strongly differing views as well. The Ulster Unionist Party has a free vote on this, and I have come down on the side of support for this amendment, because I do believe that the regulation that we have is failing simply because the RQIA and others cannot inspect the premises that are already in place.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: I am happy to give way.

Mr B McCrea: I am interested to hear your argument about failing regulation. I wonder whether you will express an opinion on failing guidance because that could help the situation as well.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for the intervention, and he is quite right. I do agree with him on that. Yes, there is a need for further guidance, although I do have to say that that guidance is on the abortion issue. What we are talking about here is the regulation of the premises that carry out the procedures and processes, but that is a different argument, Mr McCrea. I do accept your point on that.

This amendment is doomed to fail because of the petition of concern. I therefore ask for an intensive look at the regulation process that can be put in place. We need to progress this matter and ensure that people who seek advice and treatment at such premises or facilities are content and can go there safe in the knowledge that the premises and what is carried on there undergo the closest scrutiny, inspection and regulation that can be put in place. I implore the Assembly, and the Departments that look after such regulation, to put measures in place to do that.

I again impress upon people that we need to be mindful of those who are in difficult situations. I do not want to cause any more hardship or difficulty for them or for those who take differing views here. Having spoken to people who have had to go to mainland UK for abortions, I know that it is not the easiest position or the easiest route to take. People need to be mindful of all that in the debate; let us give some respect to those who find themselves in difficult positions.

Mr Lunn: I rise to oppose amendment No 34, but otherwise support the amendments in this group. This will be the first time that I have been able to contribute to an ongoing abortion debate. I accept entirely Mr Maginness's premise that this is more of a regulation debate, but the two things are inextricably linked. Most certainly, we should not be discussing the issue on the basis of an amendment to a Justice Bill involving an alteration to the criminal law. Notwithstanding the fact that the amendment, as it was two years ago, is poorly drafted and defined and has no place in this legislation. That is why I, for the first time, have put my name to a petition of concern to block the amendment.

The Members who sit with me in the Assembly and Executive Review Committee will be entitled to a quiet smile at that development, given my often expressed distaste for this mechanism; and I see some of them smiling. It was necessary in this case to prevent bad law from being passed. For the record, it is only the second time since 2007 that Alliance has taken this action. I could compare that to the 91 times that unionists, or the 33 times that nationalists, have employed it since 2007.

Alliance allows us a free vote on matters to do with abortion. The last time this came before the House, we opposed the amendment unanimously, and I expect the same result this time, as the proposal causes equal concern to those of us who are pro-choice and pro-life. I will say at this point that my personal stance is pro-choice. I cannot justify insisting that women should be forced to carry babies to full term in the various unfortunate scenarios that are sometimes brought about by pregnancy. The mother's right to choose should be sacrosanct, and I am uncomfortable with the notion that an Assembly dominated by men should dictate in these matters.

On the specifics of the amendment, it does seem incredible that our abortion law relies on legislation passed in 1861 and 1945 — 150 years ago and 70 years ago respectively — and has not changed materially since. The amendment upholds the principles of those Acts in its first line and brings in the threat of up to 10 years' imprisonment or an unspecified fine.

Are the proposers really serious in threatening expert and experienced medical professionals with a jail term for exercising their professional judgement in a life-threatening situation? Is it a realistic proposition to insist that if a termination is vital to the physical or mental well-being of a mother, it must be carried out in health and social care trust premises unless access is not possible? Even if I had the slightest sympathy for the proposition, the wording should refer to what is reasonably practical and not to what is possible. What does this say about the quality of service and the professional ability of the qualified physicians in our private clinics, where, incidentally, as has been pointed out, the law applies equally and always has done?

The amendment goes on to make the same threat of imprisonment and fines to any person who:

"does any act, or causes or permits any act, with the intention of bringing about the end of the life of an unborn child,".

Where does such an act begin and end? Never mind causing or permitting, does the mother of a young pregnant girl, who cooperates with her daughter in arranging a termination, fall foul of the law by permitting the termination if the daughter is under the age of consent? Does a clinic that dispenses the morning-after pill or performs a medical termination in the early weeks of a pregnancy on the grounds of possible mental or physical damage to the mother run the risk of pers — I nearly said persecution — prosecution for causing an act to be carried out beyond the confines of a health trust venue? Will a doctor be challenged for proceeding to end a pregnancy, as a matter of extreme urgency, in a private facility on the grounds that a slot may have been available in a health service hospital?

Amendment No 34 also allows as a defence from prosecution that the act was:

“performed without fee or reward in circumstances of urgency”.

Many mothers in this country and beyond prefer private practice. There is payment involved. Where does that lead?

Mr Speaker, I could go on, but the hour is late, so I will not outline any more potential flaws that I see in the amendment. Frankly, I see the amendment as another barely disguised attempt to curtail and, ultimately, to end the operation of the Marie Stopes clinic in Northern Ireland. Marie Stopes operates within the law. If any of its critics have evidence to the contrary, they should use the procedures in place to bring it forward. Marie Stopes has asked to be brought under the regulation of RQIA, an offer that has not been taken up by the authorities. I have not followed the issue closely enough to understand why that should be but, you know, if Marie Stopes is prepared to be regulated —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Sure.

Mr Wells: First, may I congratulate the Member on being the first MLA, as far as I am aware, apart from Mr Agnew, to stand up and honestly say that he is pro-abortion, pro-choice and pro-abortion on demand? I think that that is a degree of honesty that is missing from so many other Members of the House. However, if he knew anything about RQIA, he would know that RQIA would be concerned with the cleanliness of the facilities, the parking, the emergency access and whether there is enough staff etc. It would have no interest whatsoever in what was actually going on in the clinic in terms of the ending of the lives of unborn children. Therefore, it does not matter one iota whether the clinic is under the control and authority of RQIA because RQIA does not regard it as its business to make any judgement on whether the law is being adhered to. So it is semantics to say that it should or should not be brought under RQIA control.

Secondly, does he accept that Marie Stopes has continuously refused to tell anyone — RQIA, the Department or the board — what it is doing: how many people it is seeing, how many terminations it has organised, how many people it has referred to England? It will tell absolutely nothing. It is state secrecy. Therefore, how can he be confident that what is going on in the Marie Stopes clinic is in line with the law?

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Wells for that. He seems to be making the point that RQIA has no real role to play, which I find astonishing. It is supposed to be the regulatory authority for these types of premises in Northern Ireland. If it —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Yes, sure.

Mr A Maginness: RQIA said that to the Committee.

Mr Lunn: Sorry. Said what?

Mr A Maginness: It said that it had no regulation or control over the clinic.

Mr Lunn: The fact remains that Marie Stopes is quite prepared to be regulated by whatever means the authorities choose to impose.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Hold on a minute.

As regards what goes on behind their closed doors, regulation and a proper regime of inspection would take care of that quite easily. If it is not in place at the moment, perhaps it should be.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: OK.

Mr Wells: The reality is that the legislation does not require Marie Stopes to give any of that information. I was on the Health Committee when we asked them to tell us what was going on, and they refused point blank to tell us anything that goes on with terminations in that building. Therefore, RQIA cannot do anything to address that problem, and Marie Stopes is not prepared to give us the information about what it is doing.

11.00 pm

Mr Lunn: We need a regime to be in place that compels it do exactly that, and the same goes for any other private facility in Northern Ireland. There is such a thing as the Ulster Clinic as well. Are you telling me that it does not reveal what goes on behind its front doors either? That is a nonsense argument. Marie Stopes is prepared to be regulated. It is up to the authorities, given that invitation and the strength of feeling around this Chamber and beyond, to put something in place to regulate it. That is an example of legislation that would be useful.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Marie Stopes provides a vital and useful service in an area where Northern Ireland lags behind the rest of the UK and beyond. We operate here under antiquated legislation in an atmosphere of uncertainty and fear amongst the medical profession. The result is an endless stream of distressed pregnant women going out of the jurisdiction, beyond the reach of our outdated laws to avail themselves of what is readily available to all other citizens of the United Kingdom. It really is time for us to move into the 21st century, recognise reality and begin to legislate properly in this area. It is now over two years since a previous Health Minister promised guidelines for the medical profession. We still wait for them, as others have mentioned.

The amendment, thankfully, has no future. The proposers could do worse than not move it. That really is up to them. It does nothing to clarify a confused situation. Its intention is to increase the difficulties that are already experienced by a vulnerable section of society. I am in no doubt about my decision to oppose it, and, in a one-off situation, which I hope never to repeat, sign a petition of concern to ensure that it is stopped. I will leave it there, Mr Speaker.

Mr Poots: I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on this group of amendments. I particularly welcome the amendments that relate to the issue of texting and people who follow that up to ensure that they engage in potential sexual liaison with minors. I think that is very powerful and hugely useful. It would be a shame if that were lost in this particular group because it is a very important step forward. I trust that it will receive widespread support in the Chamber.

On the controversial issue — I am not sure that it should be controversial — of amendment No 34, I think that it is very clear that there is not, at this stage, any credible or compelling evidence that private clinics are needed. I listened carefully to Ms Ruane's arguments. It is interesting that, under the guise of a lack of consultation, which was the only reason put forward last time by Sinn Féin —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: I will in just a moment. Under the guise of a lack of consultation, Sinn Féin tabled a petition of concern to block it the last time. They cannot make that excuse or give that reason on this occasion, but maybe Mr McCartney wishes to try.

Mr McCartney: I am holding a copy of the Hansard report of that debate. There were four Sinn Féin contributors. I have read through the four contributions. The lack of consultation was at the tail end of each one of those contributions. It is either disingenuous or misleading to say that the only opposition to that particular amendment was around the lack of consultation. You are being unfair to the debate and unfair to us.

Mr Poots: The Member has just admitted that each one of the Sinn Féin contributors referred to lack of consultation, so it is very clearly not a tail-end Charlie but something that they believed was a strong and cogent argument against the issue on that occasion. That argument does not exist on this occasion because consultation has been extensively carried out, and many members of the public have participated in that.

We do not have compelling evidence that private clinics are needed. I listened again to Ms Ruane, who talked about people who are in life-threatening situations. There is no issue within the health service that, if someone's life were under threat as a consequence of carrying on a pregnancy, they would not get a termination of that pregnancy within the National Health Service. That is not an issue. We should not seek to besmirch or slur the health service in any way, shape or form by saying that that is an issue. That is a red herring, introduced by Ms Ruane, which has no evidence base whatsoever. Let us be very clear in dealing with that —

Mr Lunn: I thank the Member for giving way. I am sorry to ask him to backtrack, but he said that there is no compelling evidence that private clinics are necessary in Northern Ireland. Does that apply to the whole range of medical services or is he just talking about abortion services?

Mr Poots: The Member may be comfortable comparing a hip replacement with the termination of a life. I am not. The purpose of the Ulster Clinic, for example, is to provide a wide range of medical services to people who wish to pay for them privately. The purpose of the Marie Stopes clinic is to provide sexual reproductive advice and terminations of pregnancies. Those are completely and totally different issues. We need to be very clear about that.

Sinn Féin claims to be a pro-life party. It uses the mantra that it is opposed to the 1967 Abortion Act, so it must be pro-life. That is just not true; it is just not factual. Sinn Féin is standing shoulder to shoulder tonight with the Alliance and the Green Party. Mr Lunn had the honesty to say that he is pro-choice. I do not agree with his position, but he had the honesty to say that he is pro-choice. Sinn Féin says that it is pro-life.

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: In a moment. Sinn Féin says that it is pro-life, yet it is standing shoulder to shoulder with the other two parties and, indeed, Mr McCrea, to support an organisation that is involved in the termination of three to four million pregnancies each and every year. How can you honestly stand up anywhere and say that you are pro-life but support an organisation that is taking the lives of three to four million unborn children each year, and allow it to operate here in Northern Ireland without regulation and without us knowing what it is doing?

Mr Lunn said that it is not breaking the law, but how can he know that? None of us knows what is going on behind those closed doors. We can only assume that it is not breaking the law, but we cannot say that that is the case.

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Poots for giving way. Whose fault is it that we cannot see what is going on behind those doors? That is the point.

I do not want to waste the Assembly's time after 11.00 pm by giving a personal testimony about being pro-choice, but it is possible to be pro-choice in a limited way. Without going into it in huge detail, I can only say that I do not advocate the introduction of the English legislation in Northern Ireland, certainly not in its present form, but there are circumstances, such as fatal foetal abnormality, which we will probably come to shortly, and other types of pregnancies where, frankly, it just seems the humane thing to do. I respect the views opposite. I ask you to respect mine as well.

Mr Poots: I thought that I had done that. You indicated that you can be pro-choice in a limited way. I think that is what Lord Steel thought he was doing in 1967, yet eight million abortions have taken place in the United Kingdom since then. One needs to be very careful about what they think that they are supporting and what will actually be the case.

The interruptions have taken away the focus of where I was driving my argument. Let us be very clear: you cannot claim to be pro-life and ensure by your actions — going the second mile in your actions — that Marie Stopes International operates in Northern Ireland. It is an organisation that takes three to four million lives each year. You cannot claim to be pro-life and go hand in hand with such an organisation.

By the way, I never believed that Sinn Féin was a pro-life organisation. It is the flip side of the IRA, which took over 2,000 lives in this country. I see the Member shaking her head. She does not like it, but it is a fact. If you do not have any respect for the life of people who are born, not having respect for the life of the unborn does not strike me as wildly ridiculous.

Ms Ruane also referred to the issue of terminations when there is a threat to life. Currently, Marie Stopes is operating on the basis of performing abortions before nine weeks — nine weeks or earlier.

Is she honestly saying that there is a threat to life at that stage? Again, that argument just does not stack up. Let us be very clear: none of the arguments that have been put forward this evening by Ms Ruane on behalf of her party stacks up. Consequently, one must look at the underlying reasons for the position that Sinn Féin is taking, which would indicate that it is not a party that is pro-life or supports the pro-life concept.

Interestingly enough, in the election just gone by, their candidate in North Belfast — Mr Kelly — produced a breakdown of the population from the census figures, equating Roman Catholics with nationalists or people who would vote for Sinn Féin, yet they are going so much against the Roman Catholic tradition in their actions today. That is hugely regrettable, and it should be noted by people from that background that the parties that are more closely aligned with that tradition's view do not include Sinn Féin, which was crying out for their votes just a few weeks ago, but parties that might be viewed as being from the other side of the fence.

I will leave it at that. The amendment is well constructed and is of good purpose. It will ensure that we have the regulation that is absolutely necessary and that that will be carried out by the health service. The RQIA is not in a position to carry out an assessment of what is going on in those clinics because it does not have the legal competence to do so. That is a matter of criminal law.

A couple of Members have, in interventions, mentioned guidance: the guidance has been drawn up and has been out for consultation. It is being worked on, and I believe that it will be returned to very soon. I trust that we will find a way forward on that, and I suspect that, although it has already been challenged twice, it will be challenged legally again. Nonetheless, it is important that it is brought forward for acceptance, and I trust that that will be the case in the not too distant future.

Ms Lo: The Alliance Party's stance on abortion is that it should be left to the conscience of its members. My personal view has always been that, when a woman is faced with an unplanned pregnancy, she should have the freedom to decide what to do with her own body within the legally permitted time limit. My party has always been reluctant to sign a petition of concern, but, on this occasion, it is essential to take that option, and I am proud to lend my name to blocking amendment No 34. It is a badly drafted amendment that has never been subjected to a full public consultation, not in 2013 and not now.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: No, I will not. I am sorry; my speech is short. The amendment would criminalise any person who ended the life of an unborn child at any stage of development. There is no definition in Northern Ireland law, UK law or Irish law of an unborn child. Ambiguous law is bad law, because it leaves itself open to interpretation. The morning-after pill could be seen as a medical intervention that prevents the development of a child, so who should spend 10 years in prison? Is it the person who bought the pill, the pharmacist who dispensed it or both?

11.15 pm

Right now, there is no clear guidance on abortion for women in Northern Ireland. After 10 years of delay, the courts ordered the Health Department to publish guidance on termination of pregnancy. That was in 2013, and we are still waiting. That is a serious failing of previous Health Ministers, and I hope that the new Health Minister will bring forward the guidance without further delay. As our law on abortion stands, healthcare professionals operate in a legal vacuum. That has been compounded by previous draft versions of the guidelines that instilled a climate of fear in our medical profession. Amendment No 34 serves only to further restrict clinicians in doing their job.

Many complaints were made during the Criminal Justice Bill debate in 2013 about the lack of regulation of private sexual health clinics that provided legal terminations. Given the fact that the Minister of Health said in November 2012 that he would introduce regulations and that Marie Stopes is on record as welcoming regulation, I do not accept the arguments of any Members who continue to use lack of regulation as a reason to support the amendment. The Health Minister could have done something about that, but he did not.

Among its many flaws, the amendment would prevent women receiving care and treatment in a private clinic. We know that women obtain abortion pills online and take them at risk to themselves without medical assistance. Regardless of your opinion on the morals of abortion, surely we should ensure that women receive appropriate healthcare. Private clinics like Marie Stopes allow women access to legal abortions with medical support.

The hypocrisy behind all of this is most frustrating. Thousands of women who can afford it travel every year to other jurisdictions to access terminations —

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: No, I am sorry.

Those who cannot afford it, resort to other means. Therefore, this is also a class issue.

As a legislature, we cannot even have a sensible discussion about sex education in schools, let alone a discussion on how we ensure that women have access to the help and information they require when faced with a crisis pregnancy. Perhaps it is not surprising that some Members choose to ignore the fact that we export the problem. They prefer to focus their time and energy on closing down Marie Stopes, which operates within Northern Ireland law.

I stress that women's healthcare should not be a matter regulated by criminal law. Women who seek to have legal abortions in private healthcare are patients, not criminals. It is the Health Minister's responsibility to produce guidance and to regulate clinics like Marie Stopes to safeguard women accessing legal terminations. Why have previous and current DUP Ministers not done that? The answer, to me, is simple: their sole aim is to make access to abortions harder for women, without any compassion or attempt to understand what the women are going through. Continuing to push for the amendment is not constructive, and the Justice Bill is certainly not the place to deal with it. I oppose the amendment.

Mr Allister: I support amendment No 34 and commend the Committee on bringing forward the proposition. Indeed, I commend Mr Wells who, some time ago, initiated the process. It is good to see it continuing to be pursued. It is unfortunate and sad that the attempt itself is to be aborted by the misuse of a petition of concern.

In the debate, we have heard the standard, predictable doublespeak from Sinn Féin on the issue and the pretence that, in some way, they are, in fact, pro-life.

I have been in the European Parliament, and I have watched them vote for pro-abortion reports: abortion-on-demand reports. That is their record on the matter and, as Mr Poots pointed out, it is further their record to support an organisation that is one of the most brazen operators in terms of advancing and implementing abortion on demand: the Marie Stopes organisation.

The doublespeak is predictable, but nonetheless quite shocking. Of course, such is the mystery of its stand on the matter, that this great pro-Marxist organisation raises the flag in support of private enterprise — profit-making, commercial enterprise — in support of abortion. It says that you should have organisations that can, with no regulation — within this country or elsewhere — operate on the basis of charging their customers for the perfection of abortion. That is the level of doublespeak that we now hear from Sinn Féin on the issue, underscoring that, at its heart, it is a pro-abortion party.

It seems tonight that there is another pro-abortion party in the House, because the two speakers from the Alliance Party very firmly nailed their colours to the mast, showing that they are overtly and unapologetically pro-abortion. As Mr Maginness very cogently set forth, whether you are pro-abortion or anti-abortion; pro-choice or pro-life, this issue is whether you think it is appropriate that, in this jurisdiction, you should have unregulated operations dealing with the subject. That is the truth and the reality of the Marie Stopes clinic: it acts, de facto, in an unregulated fashion. Oh yes, it would pretend to us that it self-regulates and that it self-certifies its compliance with the law. That is not worth anything. There is no transparency or capacity to interrogate whether or not Marie Stopes is breaking the law, because they are very cautious and very particular to keep secret all that they do. They will not answer fundamental questions like: “How many people have you referred for abortions?”; “How many medical abortions have been performed on your premises?”; “How many people have you referred to others for abortion services?”. They will not answer those basic questions, and yet we have the Alliance Party apparently content with that and joining with Sinn Féin to make sure that none of that changes.

Back to Mr Maginness’s point. Even if you are pro-abortion, why would you not want the matter to be properly controlled and regulated? Yes, I will give way.

Mr Lunn: The Member is constantly making the point — and I thank him for giving way — that Marie Stopes is unregulated, but does not make the point that it is possible for them to be regulated. Why is he not querying the fact that there is no regulation of that sort of establishment?

Mr Allister: Did Mr Maginness not tell us that the evidence of the RQIA to the Committee was that they do not have the capacity to regulate them.

Mr Lunn: They should have.

Mr Allister: Well, maybe they should. I do not see or hear, from the honourable Member or his party, any proposition in that regard. The reality is that they are unregulated. That is the way they want it and that is what they are clinging to. The issue in the House, and the question for every Member, is this: are they prepared to facilitate that? Are they prepared to acquiesce and to advance that situation?

Those who reject this amendment are embracing unregulated clinics such as this, supporting their operation in an unregulated environment and shrugging their shoulders and saying, “We have no concerns about that”. That is what facilitates the ambition of pro-abortion parties like Sinn Féin to facilitate, under the radar, abortion on the wholesale manner in which Marie Stopes is perhaps operating it. That issue is central to this whole matter, and this is therefore a justified amendment to ask, “Why would we not therefore only permit terminations in regulated premises?”. What is wrong with the essence of the proposal to only permit terminations in regulated premises? What offence is taken to that proposition? What offends Sinn Féin and the Alliance Party in the proposition that, if there are to be terminations, they should only be in regulated premises? It is, obviously, something; and the conclusion is that they are quite content to acquiesce in terminations in wholly unregulated environments.

That is the shame of the stance of those who oppose this amendment. They are giving a green light to terminations behind closed doors and to the secrecy and the non-transparency of the organisations in the private sector to do what they like, when they like, with perhaps no regard to law or regulation. No one wants to know. That is the essence of what Sinn Féin and Alliance are saying in the House tonight.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. We have heard the evidence time and again, and it has been through the courts. I would absolutely like to see all health provision carried under the NHS, but we have seen time and time again in the evidence presented that there is uncertainty around the law. We have heard evidence from doctors and midwives who have said that the law is uncertain and that they cannot act with confidence and know that they are acting within the law.

Mr Allister: The one thing that could be certain is that terminations could take place only in regulated premises, and I would have thought that pro-choice and pro-life protagonists could meet on that common ground. If that were the common ground, who would be losing? It would be only those who want to make money out of not being regulated. They are the losers, and they, sadly, are the people whom some parties in the House are more than happy to support tonight.

Mr Lyttle: I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to this debate and to oppose amendment No 34 and support the other amendments. I had not intended to speak this evening, but the ongoing DUP infatuation with misrepresenting the Alliance Party, ably assisted by its electoral pact sidekick Jim Allister, continues to reach the level of hysteria, and the inaccuracy and tone of some of the contributions serve no argument or cause whatsoever.

It is false for anyone to say that opposition to this amendment equates to support for all things Marie Stopes, and it is false for anyone to say that opposition to this amendment is support for abortion. Opposition to this amendment is opposition to a potentially dangerous prohibition of access to private healthcare provision that is delivered within the law.

The amendment includes the rather vague term of prohibition:

“circumstances of urgency when access to premises operated by a Health and Social Care Trust was not possible.”

I think that is a dangerously vague provision, and my colleague Trevor Lunn has already gone into why that is the case in some detail.

I want to clarify for the public record again, given the DUP's infatuation with misrepresentation, that the Alliance Party position on abortion is, indeed, a matter of conscience for its Members. For the record, my position is that I am against any significant extension of the current law on abortion in Northern Ireland. I hope this satisfies Mr Wells's insistence on misrepresenting most of us on this side of the House.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

11.30 pm

Mr Lyttle: No, I will not.

Mr Wells: [Interruption.]

Mr Lyttle: No. I have just heard enough from you to last me a lifetime.

I am in favour of quality, multi-agency and comprehensive, appropriate, relationship and sex education crisis advice and support and healthcare within the law. I am also in favour of clear guidance and robust regulation to ensure that any abortion services are provided within the law. I am not in favour of ill-conceived prohibition of private service provision that this amendment would introduce. The real issue here is that consecutive DUP Health Ministers have wholly failed to deliver clear guidelines and robust regulation of abortion services, and, ironically, it is two of those former Health Ministers that we have heard most from tonight, despite a complete failure to show any leadership on the issue.

MLAs say that much time has now been spent on this amendment. Perhaps if DUP Ministers of Health had spent the same time on guidelines and regulation, we would not today be debating this ill-conceived proposal for the second time. Let us be clear: if regulation needs to be enhanced, it is for the Minister of Health to show leadership and enhance it. I imagine that we will hear more about that further in the debate.

The real issue here is the failure of consecutive DUP Health Ministers to deliver the guidelines and regulation needed on these matters. Surely, it is self-evident that, in any democratic society, an individual should have the liberty to elect to choose the type of service they avail themselves of, provided that it operates within guidelines, within regulation and, most importantly, within the law. There is no one disagreeing with that proposition today, despite what Mr Allister falsely said to the contrary. The real challenge is to deliver the guidance and regulation necessary to ensure that access to the highest standard of service possible is provided within the law.

I and my colleagues are fully committed to working to protect all life in Northern Ireland, but I do not believe that the amendment moves us any further towards meeting the challenge that I have outlined, and I will not be supporting amendment No 34 today.

Mr A Maginness: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. My understanding is that there was to be one speaker from each party in this House in relation to this debate. We in the SDLP confined ourselves to one speaker, Sinn Féin confined itself to one speaker, the DUP confined itself to one speaker and the Chair of the Committee, yet the Alliance Party has broken that and put forward three speakers. I do not understand how such agreement was reached in order to minimise debate in the House and it has now been breached on two separate occasions.

Mr Speaker: I am sure that the Member expects me to respond, but it is not a point of order. I know that there was a discussion and an understanding between Whips, but that is a matter for the Whips. As far as Members who have spoken are concerned, parties and Members here have an absolute entitlement to speak if they wish, notwithstanding the circumstances you have outlined. I have names on my list of Members who wish to speak and I am obliged to call them by rote.

Mr Agnew: The Justice Bill has included provisions for such heinous crimes as the sexual abuse of children and physical and mental violence against women. With those heinous crimes, parties in this House have conspired to include seeking or providing an abortion to protect a woman's life if it is provided in a private facility. I would be overjoyed if I believed that there was such vehement opposition in the House to the privatisation of our health service but, sadly, that is not the motivation behind the amendment. Indeed, when challenged on that point, Mr Poots made it very clear, in another provision, that he has no problem with privatisation, but, in this, he supports an amendment that seeks to limit health provision.

There is very limited scope for abortion in Northern Ireland, and we have had much discussion about it and about the restricted circumstances in which it can be provided. Indeed, those who support amendment No 34 take great pride in the very limited circumstances in which it can be provided in Northern Ireland. What circumstances are those? They are in order to protect a woman's life. Those are the limited circumstances. The First Minister has made it clear that any attempt even to take one step beyond that and extend it to fatal foetal abnormality cases would be blocked at the Executive and would not make it to the Floor of the House.

As we are well aware, there is a lack of guidelines for health practitioners as to when they can carry out an abortion within the current law without fear of criminal conviction — criminal conviction for seeking to protect a woman whose life may be at risk — if they are found to have acted outside the very limited circumstances prescribed by Northern Ireland's law.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way.

Mr Givan: The Member alludes to the issue about the criminal law. If the Member is so concerned that it is the criminal law that regulates on this issue, why did he not put down an amendment to repeal all the provisions that exist around criminal law? Why did the Alliance Party, Ms Lo, who does not think it is a matter for criminal law, and Members who want to have that debate, not put forward an amendment to repeal all the criminal sanctions that relate to abortion? At least then they could have that debate, rather than trying to have a different debate that some Members want to have.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. Perhaps he has given me a suggestion for Further Consideration Stage. Let us look at that if there is time.

The lack of guidelines further restricts our already restrictive law. Just as Mr Allister was finishing, I sought for him to give way. To be fair, he was finishing his speech. If a woman can receive the treatment she needs on our NHS and can go with confidence and certainty that she will receive that treatment, why would she choose a private clinic? Why would she choose to pay if she could receive that service in confidence and free at the point of use?

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way.

Mr Wells: It is noticeable that Marie Stopes situated its new clinic immediately opposite the Great Victoria Street train station. It was quite obvious why that was done. It wanted to attract trade from the Irish Republic. Therefore, some of those who could be accessing abortions at Marie Stopes do not even come from Northern Ireland. Is he happy with a clinic that is not only unregulated but refuses to reveal one statistic about what is going on behind its closed doors? The fundamental difference between state provision and private provision is that the state has to provide all the statistics of who it is treating and what it is doing; yet he knows that every time that we asked Marie Stopes to give one scintilla of information about what was going on in Great Victoria Street, it consistently refused. Is he happy with that going on?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I have always sought transparency, including on other issues — and I will not get off the subject of the debate — but in areas where his party has opposed it. I have no problem with transparency; I have no problem with regulation. I proffer the suggestion that the reason why regulation has not come from successive DUP Health Ministers, and the reason why regulation for Marie Stopes has not come forward, is because the DUP wants a ban in order to restrict abortion, even in the cases where a woman's life is at risk, by not providing sufficient guidance through the NHS professionals and by banning Marie Stopes.

Mr Maginness used the word “control”: they want to control this issue and to control the choices that a woman has when she finds herself in a difficult situation. Bring forward regulation, and I will support it: propose a ban, and I will oppose it and sign a petition of concern. I will do all in my power to make sure that you do not get your way on this.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way.

Mr Wells: Will he support any change in legislation that will force Marie Stopes, like every trust facility in Northern Ireland, to reveal every statistic about what is going on behind its closed doors? Will he support that?

Mr Agnew: I will support regulation of Marie Stopes that is equal to regulation of the NHS, if that comes forward to the House.

In Northern Ireland, because there is not confidence that provision will be provided on the NHS, even within the very limited circumstances that our law will allow, the only recourse for some women is, unfortunately, to go to a private clinic. Mr Wells referred to those who come up from the Republic of Ireland, but he knows only too well of the 1,000-plus women every year who have to go across to Great Britain. We may be importing the problems of others, but we are exporting our own problems. We, as an Assembly, should provide the health service that women need and seek in the country or state of their birth.

I can only conclude that those who support the amendment, particularly those who have also frustrated the process of bringing forward clear guidelines, are seeking to restrict access, even in the current situations. I asked Mr Maginness to give way, and he refused: I was disappointed by that. He made the point that you cannot be pro-life —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I give way to the Member.

Mr A Maginness: I did not refuse. I was under time pressure, and I said that I would come back to you if I could get the opportunity.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am not sure about time pressure.

Mr A Maginness: I never refuse interventions.

Mr Agnew: I respect that, in other cases, he did not refuse, but he allowed two interventions from Members who supported his case and allowed none from me. Hansard will show that, subsequent to my request for an intervention, he gave way to another Member. I accept that the Member usually gives way — it is not a slight — but I was disappointed.

Mr A Maginness: It is a slight.

Mr Agnew: Check Hansard, Mr Maginness.

The point that I wish to make is that he said that you could not be “pro-life, but”. I ask every one of you here who says that you are anti-abortion, are you “anti-abortion, but”? Do you support the current law? If you support the current law, you are anti-abortion, but in the case where a woman's life is at risk. If you do not support the current law and do not support the protection of a woman's life, shame on you. I am interested to know which it is because, in some cases, I believe that there are Members of the House who would rather see a woman die than an abortion be carried out, so ideological are their views.

I am most disappointed in the position of the SDLP. It is a party that was born out of the civil rights movement. I work with it and support it on many issues to do with rights and equality. On this issue, it is saying to women, “You must fight harder for this right. You must fight longer for this right”. On this issue, the SDLP is blocking their path. The SDLP, the party that claims to be a party of equality and a party that says that there should be no hierarchy of victims, today said to women who are victims of violence that the SDLP would give them protection. However, it says to women who are victims of rape, "Do not seek the SDLP's support". Some victims are more equal than others. Some women are more equal than others.

Mr Rogers: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I give way.

11.45 pm

Mr Rogers: Does the Member accept that everyone, born or unborn, has a right to life?

Mr Agnew: I do not understand this definition of "unborn child". It has no definition in law, and I do not recognise it. I do not accept that there is a human life from the moment of conception. I believe that our lawmaking should be informed by the science. I believe that the position of protection from the moment of conception is, for many in the House, informed by religion; I do not share those views and beliefs. My views on the issue are informed by the science.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Where there is consciousness and will — I give way to the Member.

Mr Allister: If the Member does not believe in life from in or about conception, is he saying that he does not believe in life until birth? Is that the Member's position? If he is going down that road, he needs to bring some clarity to what he says, because it informs an attitude to abortion.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I was coming to that. I use the term "sentience": when is there sentience in a being? There is life in many things in our world that we do not give value to, and I have to say that, in those early stages of pregnancy, I give more value to the woman's life, health, well-being and choice. We should be informed by the science on where we make the threshold. My party — I make no apologies for it, and we are not ashamed of it — supports the extension of the 1967 Abortion Act.

Mr Wells: That is honest.

Mr Agnew: It is honest. Thank you, Mr Wells.

A woman contacted me today. Many outside will have lost interest in the debate at this late hour, but I suspect that she will still be paying attention. She was pregnant, and it was very much a wanted child, but there was a fatal foetal abnormality. She went elsewhere for treatment because she could not receive it here in Northern Ireland, and there were complications. The decisions that we have made in the House have meant that her situation was more difficult than it had to be. Had she been able to receive treatment in Northern Ireland, the place where she was born, and had she got the help and support of her politicians, we could have mitigated, in some way, a very difficult circumstance for her.

This is a health issue; it has no place in a debate on criminal justice. Criminalising a woman who seeks healthcare or a doctor who provides it is horrendous. Allowing a sentence of up to 10 years for someone who provides healthcare or who seeks it is obscene. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr B McCrea: A number of people have said to me, "Don't take too long about this. We want to get home". It is just approaching midnight, and I have to say that we should have had the debate not at this time but earlier in proper, full plenary. These are life issues that we have to deal with, and, when it comes to making arguments, I do not need people to make snide remarks from a sedentary position: I will take it straight on. I will happily debate the issue.

Let me make it clear where I stand on fatal foetal abnormalities. I have spoken to families that have faced that predicament.

I have seen the trauma that they have gone through; good people who were denied help in this jurisdiction. People opposite have made claims that you would get whatever help you need and there would never be a question in the NHS or whatever. That was not their experience. Those of you who know that story will know how appalling it is. I have to say on this issue that I support those families in their decision, but I absolutely regret that they had to go to England to get anything sorted out. It is absolutely appalling that people who are in a traumatised state and already suffering a bereavement due to a fatal foetal abnormality have to go to England; they know not where; they know not how. No one will give them any support or help. It is inhumane. We need to find a way to address this issue.

An argument was made by Alban Maginness earlier in the debate. By the way, I regret the fact that the SDLP has not spoken more on this issue. I would like to have heard what those Members had to say. I did not want to hear just one contributor; I wanted to hear what people had to say. The point that Mr Maginness made was that it is inconsistent if you support termination in cases of fatal foetal abnormality because you cannot then change your mind and say that you do not accept it in the case of rape, incest or any other issues. There are circumstances — terrible, horrible circumstances — where abortion is the correct choice for people.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Wells: Those are exactly the same arguments that were used in 1966 when Lord Steel was putting his private Member's Bill through the House of Commons. His Bill was designed for exactly the difficult cases that the Member has raised: foetal abnormality, rape and incest. He produced the 1967 Act with that intent. What has happened? De facto, what we have in the rest of the UK is abortion on demand and eight million human beings have had their lives terminated since 1967. That is the argument that he is making this evening — in fact, it is almost morning.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for clarifying what my argument actually is. Maybe if he listens, I will tell him what my argument is. When people try to make abortion illegal, it does not stop abortion. It does not make it go away. It does not fix anything. What you get is backstreet abortion or, if you want the modern equivalent, people buy drugs on the Internet that will induce labour at any stage; in other words, a miscarriage. Already, in our hospitals, we see women presenting with just those symptoms.

You can talk all you like here about the whys and wherefores. Meanwhile, people who are presented with unplanned pregnancies make their own decisions. If you truly want to regulate and reduce the number of unplanned, unwelcome pregnancies, the way in which to do it is with better education, better sex education, talking to people at earlier ages and the better provision of contraceptives.

The arguments that are coming from the opposite Benches would be much more cogent if you were prepared to accept that there are things to do other than give us some form of moral lecture. I do not support abortion on demand. I understand how difficult it is for every single person who goes through that trauma, but I do understand that there is something fundamentally wrong when people from this part of the world, many of them on very low incomes, find themselves in a really traumatic situation and who, sometimes with no help from their partner, have to cross the water to get something done. You talk about openness and transparency: people do it in privacy because they are afraid of the assault on their person that will come from those who disagree with their choice. That is not the right thing to do. That is not the right way to go forward.

People have tried to put forward arguments that it is about regulation, but that is balderdash. It is an attempt to close down Marie Stopes by the back door. It is not some highfalutin talk about human rights. It is about people who are fundamentally opposed to Marie Stopes saying, "This is how we will get them". All your weasel words will not change that fact.

Mr Wells: That is not true.

Mr B McCrea: It is true.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will.

Mr Wells: I have huge problems with a commercial organisation that terminates the lives of three to four million people each year throughout the world. I have enormous problems with that being in this part of the United Kingdom. What I have even more problems with is that everything that it does is done entirely under a cloud of secrecy. We have no idea what is going on in that clinic because Marie Stopes has continually refused to give us a scintilla of information about it. Therefore, I do have problems with it. I do not want Marie Stopes operating in those circumstances in this part of the United Kingdom. That is one of the reasons for my amendment.

Mr B McCrea: So, now, since we have had it said from a couple of people on this side of the House, at least he is being honest and truthful and putting it out. My argument, Mr Wells, through you, Mr Speaker, was that there are those who tried to say, "This is all about regulation: it does not matter whether you are pro-abortion, pro-life or pro-choice; it does not matter; what we need is regulation." That is my argument. That is not sensible. That is not an accurate representation of what is going on here.

By all means, people can put their arguments forward, as Mr Wells has just done. I will debate them. I am happy to do that, but do not pretend that it is somehow some legalese and a case of, "If only we had better regulation". Mr Lunn was taken to task on all those things. Do not pretend that that is what it is about. You want regulation: bring it in. You want some form of guidance: do not take 10 years over it. Do not sit here —

Mr Lunn: I thank the Member for giving way at this late hour. Would he agree with me that it actually suits the DUP's argument far better not to have Marie Stopes regulated? It gives them, from their perception, a better chance of getting rid of the operation.

Mr B McCrea: I agree with Mr Lunn. Actually, it turns the debate on its head. The truth is that this is an excuse. It is about people who do not want to take on a proper discussion on the matter. That is what is wrong with the debate.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Mr Allister.

Mr Allister: The Member said that it is an excuse. It is the reality that there is no regulation of Marie Stopes. The Member's contentment with that is an indication that is compatible with the pro-abortion line that he is peddling. Surely anyone — pro-life or pro-choice — should not dissent from the idea that where there are terminations there should be regulations.

By his stance, the Member is indicating a satisfaction with the fact that we have a clinic that is operating beyond control and beyond regulation. He wants to keep it operating that way and is quite content for it to do so.

Mr B McCrea: Before I address the substance of what Mr Allister said, I will acknowledge that he is a learned man, a barrister skilled in the arts of taking words, putting them in a slightly different way and saying that that is what you really meant. Is that not right? This is his profession. It is not a proper debate. It is legalese.

The issue is that the proposition has been brought forward as an amendment to a Justice Bill. This should not be a criminal justice issue. The idea that you will criminalise women and medical professionals who try to act in their best interests is frankly not correct — it is obscene. We should be trying to mitigate the worst excesses of the debate. We need regulations, guidance and some form of certainty so that our medical professionals can know how they can operate safely within the law. That really is what is missing. That is what I find really disappointing about people who have been Ministers of Health and have failed to bring things forward.

This is your job: this is what the courts tell you that you have to do.

12.00 midnight

When it comes to the issue tonight, and it is late, Mr Lunn was not the only person to sign a petition of concern for the first time. I also put pen to paper for the first time tonight, and I did so not because I had to. By the time I signed the petition of concern, it already had its 30 signatures. I could have sat here and decided not to debate the issue. I could have decided to sit in the shadows and watch it all go by in a quiet way so that it does not happen, but that is not the right way — that is not the way in which we should be debating this issue.

I respect that people have different points of view. I am happy to hear their points of view and engage. However, I come back to the fact that at the heart of this philosophical, legalese debate that we are having are human beings. These people are in distress, and they need help and guidance. With the right help and guidance, they may make a decision that people here may be happier with. I will tell you what does not help: leaving them alone, abandoning them and forcing them on to a boat to England. That is appalling. We need to address this issue absolutely properly. We need a proper debate in the House. Only then will we get to the bottom of it.

I will conclude by paying tribute to Mr Agnew. It is a bit of a toss-up between him and me as to which of us is mentioned as having signed a petition of concern. For the record, we both did, and I am pretty sure that every single time this comes forward, unless we have a proper debate with a proper set of proposals that can be discussed in a rational way, we will continue to sign a petition of concern. That means that this amendment is dead in the water.

Mr Givan: I find it pretty nauseating to follow Mr McCrea, who pontificates about women's rights and protecting women. When it comes to valuing women, I will take no lectures from the Member for Lagan Valley. Maybe he — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: I warn the Member that I do not like the tone of that particular comment, and I will stop you if you go there again.

Mr Givan: I will take your guidance, Mr Speaker. I think that I have said enough to make the point.

When this was last debated, those who opposed the amendment said that we should also do so because there had been no consultation. Colleagues have highlighted the fact that there has been extensive consultation on this issue. It was put out to consultation through the Committee. Today, Ms Lo repeated that there has been no consultation. At least Sinn Féin has not said today that this amendment was not publicly consulted on. I cannot recall Ms Ruane saying today that there was no public consultation, yet Ms Lo from the Alliance Party continues to say that there was no public consultation.

The Committee took out public advertisements, consulted and received written responses. It received well over 20,000 responses from individuals wanting the amendment to be supported. The Committee then went through extensive evidence sessions, and I can recall chairing the meeting at which we agreed which organisations we should call. We had those who had written in favour of the amendment and others who were against. Whoever the Committee members wanted to call, no organisation was precluded from coming forward. There was not a single organisation of those opposed to this amendment that we sought to thwart coming to the Committee. Anyone who asked to come was allowed to come.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. In all the evidence that the Committee received, did it receive any evidence that the Marie Stopes clinic was operating outside the law? Did it receive any evidence that the care that the Marie Stopes clinic provided was in any way inadequate or unsafe? Was there any evidence to that effect?

Mr Givan: I will touch on that later, but you are asking for people to come forward with information that there is no framework to solicit. Therein lies the problem. I appreciate that Members do not seem to get it about the non-regulation of Marie Stopes, but that is exactly what has been happening.

When organisations that were opposed came, they were facilitated and allowed to come forward and provide all their information. So, on the point about consultation, I believe that the Assembly and the Committee extensively consulted on this amendment in a way that, I think, went above and beyond what was necessary.

I will make this point: amendment No 19, which has just been voted on, provides for a paedophile disclosure scheme. I wholeheartedly support that, but it was not subject to public consultation; it was not subject to the scrutiny of the Justice Committee. Members cannot get up and procrastinate about a lack of consultation and scrutiny and say that that is one of the reasons why they are going to vote against this, but then vote for amendment No 19 because they agree with it. So, the arguments that have been put forward about the lack of consultation are flawed. Flawed seriously indeed.

In an intervention earlier, I dealt with the other argument that was put forward. The last time this was debated, the Minister articulated at length about the lack of competence. Mr Maginness, I think, very expertly put forward the European examples that show that this is within competence, and I brought to the Assembly's attention what John Larkin indicated, on the record, in public. He indicated that it is within the competence of the Assembly to do it, because there are no European Convention rights to an abortion. There certainly are convention rights to protect the right to life, which some Members want to forget about, but there are no convention rights to an abortion, and it is within the competence of the Assembly to do that.

I will not repeat the examples that I brought to the Assembly's attention last time, but I will briefly mention the instances in which countries were able to take these decisions. Germany, for example, was allowed state control over gambling. That was challenged by Ladbrokes, but the European Court of Justice said that it was within Germany's margin of appreciation to restrict it to the state, because it could see a greater public need for that to be done. Some may say that we should do that in Northern Ireland, but we have not done it. So, Germany was able to do it, and Europe allowed them to do that.

Italy prohibited the use of towing trailers by motorcycles. That was deemed to be proportionate by the European Court of Justice, because Italy said that there was no way in which it could guarantee road safety in respect of trailers. So, it was deemed proportionate that they could make provision to protect in those circumstances, because of concerns around road safety. We have concerns about human life. I think that it is even more justifiable that we would want to have restrictions put in place.

The House of Lords made a decision on fox hunting. Maybe the Green Party and others who do not want to protect the unborn would, I suspect, want to protect the life of a fox, interestingly enough. Some of us are consistent on both of those issues, but some are more keen to advocate animal rights than human rights. A case was brought to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords ruled that the fox hunting ban was compatible with European law because there was a fundamental public interest in the prevention of animal cruelty, and it was deemed within the margin of a sovereign Parliament to be able to restrict the freedom of those services. So, if we are able to make provision for banning fox hunting, I do not think it is unreasonable to be able to make provisions to have restrictions in place to protect human life. Those arguments were made in the last debate. They are on the record for anyone who wants to refer to them.

Mr McCrea seemed to indicate that we were wanting to somehow close down Marie Stopes through the back door. I am coming through the front door to try to close down Marie Stopes. I make no secret of that, and I make no apology for it, because it is an organisation for which we have no statistics on what it is doing and carrying out. We have no information, nor can we get the information about the clinical assessments.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: Unlike the Member who berated me yesterday and would not give way, I will show tolerance to the Member for Lagan Valley and give way.

Mr B McCrea: Since we are talking about tolerance, you did not give way the first time. So, if we are going to play pat-a-cake, that is where that goes, Mr Speaker. Is he saying that, if he could get regulation and openness and transparency, and if he knew the numbers that were going on behind Marie Stopes, that it would be OK? Or, is he making it clear to the Assembly that, no matter what information was provided to him, he would still be opposed to that organisation?

Mr Givan: Yes, I would. I would absolutely be opposed to Marie Stopes and private clinics carrying out abortions, and I will explain why in a moment. We have no statistics or information on the clinical assessments that are used because RQIA does not have the power to do that. I give way to Mr Dickson.

Mr Dickson: The Member just referenced Marie Stopes, and, in fact, that is the only clinic that we have heard reference to this evening. Does the Member accept or acknowledge that other private facilities in Northern Ireland can and do deliver similar services to Marie Stopes? Indeed, they have the potential to go far beyond the services delivered by Marie Stopes, because they actually provide surgical facilities meeting the requirements of the law in Northern Ireland.

Let us remember that what is being debated here this evening is the extremely narrow legal right to have an abortion in extremely narrow circumstances in Northern Ireland. That is all that is being debated this evening. We are not debating the wider issues of abortion, although many would like the public to think that that is the debate we are having this evening. The debate we are having this evening is about the extremely narrow provisions, which are now so clouded and so smoke-and-mirrored by the party opposite me, that it makes it virtually impossible. Medical staff have been traumatised by the fear of going to jail as a result of what is being said.

Does the Member accept that the reality is that the type of surgical intervention that is permitted under the law in Northern Ireland in the most extreme of circumstances could not be carried out in Marie Stopes but could be carried out in other private health facilities that provide surgical facilities?

Mr Givan: That may be the case, but who knows?

Mr Dickson: Well, again, if Mr Givan will allow me to intervene —

Mr Givan: Yes.

Mr Dickson: He raises the very important question “Who knows?”. We would all know if the two Members sitting opposite me, as former Health Ministers, had done something about it. They had an absolute right to bring appropriate legislation before the House to regulate and legislate to allow us to know what goes on inside those facilities.

Mr Givan: I was going to deal with that point later, but it has now been put forward that, had there been guidance, it would somehow deal with private clinics. It would not, because they remain unregulated. Guidance —

Mr Dickson: Regulate them.

Mr Givan: That is a different point: that is about the regulation of private clinics and how you would do that. There is no regulation, and there still would be no regulation, even if revised guidance was put out there. To subject —

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I am not going to give way again for the third time. Maybe at a later point in the speech I will be happy to do it.

The modus operandi of Marie Stopes is, first and foremost, carrying out abortions. That is the modus operandi of that organisation. Yes, there are issues with other private clinics, if we knew they were doing it. That would need to be addressed, and the amendment would cover that. We do not know whether they are. We know that Marie Stopes is carrying them out, and we know Marie Stopes's reputation. I will touch on that shortly. In this instance, what we have —

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way? The Member has made a serious accusation against Marie Stopes, because he is saying that Marie Stopes is carrying out — or is the Member saying that Marie Stopes clinic in Northern Ireland is carrying out abortions outside the law in Northern Ireland? That is a very serious allegation, if that is the allegation that he is making.

Mr Givan: I am pretty sure you can check Hansard, and I did not say that they were carrying out terminations outside the law.

Mr Dickson: You said that they were carrying out terminations.

Mr Givan: Yes, I did, but, again, I might be wrong about that. Marie Stopes will not actually tell us if they have carried them out. Therein lies the problem.

Members seem to want to defend the indefensible when it comes to an unregulated, unaccountable private clinic that is potentially involved in carrying out the termination of unborn children. Let us get the language beyond the medical phrase of “termination of an unborn child”: this is about killing. It is about taking the life of an unborn child. That is what we are talking about. We are not talking about a hip or knee replacement in a private clinic, which is a wholly different issue; we are talking about life, which is, rightly, protected through the criminal law, which is where the regulations lie.

My question — maybe the Minister can answer — is this: how will the Police Service of Northern Ireland, which is responsible for regulating abortion because it is a criminal offence to take the life of the unborn in every circumstance, know what is happening? Let me make it clear that the law prohibits abortion in any circumstance in Northern Ireland; however, there is a defence in certain circumstances, which is very different. There is no legal pathway for an abortion, but there is a defence in limited circumstances. How does the PSNI know that the law is being upheld if terminations are being carried out in Marie Stopes? We do not have a framework. What is the PSNI doing to make sure that the law is being complied with in the absence of any form of health regulation? That is very serious.

Through the National Health Service, where you have an accountable form of governance, we are able to call Ministers to the Assembly. The Health Committee is there to scrutinise what goes on. You have health trusts and people appointed to the health board. Layers of accountability exist for health services provided in the National Health Service. That is why it is best placed to be responsible for an abortion when it is carried out in Northern Ireland. Even if you had regulation of health clinics — herein I will answer one of the points that was raised by other Members — a conflict exists. Even if there is the highest degree of regulation, there is still a conflict because there is a financial transaction involved in a private health clinic. Surely Members can say that there is a conflict. Even if it is only a perceived conflict, it is there.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I will.

Mr Wells: Does the Member note with interest that a member of staff in a clinic in southern England who used to work for Marie Stopes described it as a production line for abortion and, indeed, said that staff were put under pressure to ensure the maximum number of abortions per week in the clinic to generate income for Marie Stopes? That is a totally different regime to what goes on in our five health trusts, where there is no pressure whatever to maximise abortions. They are there to give first-rate care and treatment.

Mr Givan: The Member makes the point for me. Marie Stopes operates bonus systems dependent on how many abortions are carried out. Is that the type of organisation that Members, even if they are pro-abortion, want to support? Members need to think seriously about that.

Where there is a clear conflict — I believe that there is, because there is a monetary transaction between the buyer and the seller — that is a real issue, because the victim in all of this is the unborn child. If you are assaulted in the street, you will be able to contact the authorities and make a complaint. Could someone tell me how the victim in this circumstance, whose life is taken, is afforded an opportunity to alert the authorities in the absence of any form of regulation or oversight? There is none. At least through the regulation of the National Health Service, there is a responsibility, because the criminal law exists to protect that unborn child and to restrain any activity that may put that life in jeopardy. I think that there is a conflict when money is involved in the issue of life or death.

As an organisation, Marie Stopes's stated position is "Children by choice not chance". That is what it said to the Justice Committee. Take that in: "Children by choice not chance". I believe in protecting the unborn child, whether it is planned or not. It is a real issue that the stated objective of Marie Stopes is the introduction of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland and is "Children by choice not chance". Interestingly enough, it is supported in that by Amnesty International, which said to the Committee when it was hearing evidence:

"Amnesty International is very clear that...rights to life do not extend prenatally."

Let us decode the language: Amnesty International's stated position is that no rights are afforded to the unborn child in any circumstance at any stage when it is in the womb. It is only at the point of birth that rights are afforded to the child.

Amnesty does not even support the 24-week limit. Its stated position is that only at the point of birth is the right to life afforded to the child. Those are the types of organisations that are involved in supporting Marie Stopes. That is why, even if there are Members here who are well meaning, they are sincerely wrong and they need to look at who they are lining up beside.

Some very well made points were made by Mr Ramsey when he spoke in the debate the last time. He pointed out the type of organisation that Marie Stopes is, and he gave examples. He gave the example where, in 2011, a doctor perforated the uterus of a woman and left parts of the baby inside her after an abortion at a Marie Stopes centre in London. That doctor was later struck off the register. That is the type of organisation around which some Members here have said we should have compassion and that, somehow, we who support this amendment are not compassionate. Those who are opposed to the amendment claim to be compassionate in allowing such an organisation with that type of record to operate.

In 2007, one of its senior directors, Paul Cornellis, who was in South Africa, stated that Marie Stopes does illegal abortions all over the world and that its objective was to get into a country, open the door and push the boundaries. That is the modus operandi of Marie Stopes, which is an organisation that made £172 million in 2012.

Martin McGuinness derided Dawn Purvis when the clinic first opened in 2012 because, given her socialist credentials, he was surprised that she was involved in a private clinic that was setting up as a rival to the health service. Martin McGuinness was right. If you are a socialist and a Marxist, you should believe solely in the NHS and in public provision. However, Sinn Féin is now coming shoulder to shoulder and taking the hand of a private organisation that generates £100 million and more on the taking of life of the unborn child. That is the organisation that people are going to allow to continue to operate in Northern Ireland.

Mr Agnew made a number of contributions, and, in fairness to him, he was honest in his position. I think that some of his arguments were quite remarkable: he does not believe that life begins at conception. The life of every single Member in here began at conception. You could not have had life without conception. Every single Member here was an embryo or the other scientific terms that Mr Agnew prefers to use. So, on the issue about when life commences, if you move away from life commencing at conception, where do you draw the line? It is a subjective position. Life begins at conception. That is why life should be protected.

What concerns me about the Green Party is that it seems to be more interested in protecting trees than human life. It was Mr Agnew who made the absolutely outrageous statement in this debate that there are MLAs who would rather allow a woman to die in life-threatening circumstances than have an abortion. That was an absolutely scurrilous and despicable thing to say.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I will give way.

Mr Agnew: A black-and-white position was being painted that you are either anti-abortion or pro-abortion. I was pointing out that there are grey areas. There are people who would say that they are anti-abortion but would support abortion in the case where a woman's life is at risk. I have not heard a Member who is supposedly in the pro-life camp say that they would support an abortion when a woman's life is at risk. Does the Member support abortion when a woman's life is at risk?

Mr Givan: Absolutely. That has been the stated position for as long as I can ever remember. In fact, I remember reading a speech by Dr Paisley when the issue was debated in the Assembly, and he made it clear even then what the DUP's position was, and I stated that position last time in the debate. That is beyond doubt; it is beyond question.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member further give way?

Mr Givan: I will.

Mr Agnew: Why, then, have the Member and his party, through their position in the Health Ministry, not brought the guidelines forward to ensure that women in those circumstances can receive that provision through the NHS?

Mr Givan: Guidelines exist, and draft guidelines are being challenged and worked on. There is nothing in that guidance, either before the current draft or in the current one that does not explain what the law is in Northern Ireland, which is that there are circumstances where you can provide a defence, and those circumstances are clear: where the woman's physical life is at risk and where her long-term mental health is at risk. That is our position, and it always has been. It will continue to be our position, including in our dealings with fatal foetal abnormality. In those circumstances, there is the right to choose, and I am happy to have that position.

I will briefly deal with some of the other arguments. The issue of the morning-after pill was raised again. That was dealt with last time. You have to prove that a life has existed, and that can be done only at the point of implantation. Therefore, the morning-after pill is not an abortifacient; it is a contraceptive. The coil is not an abortifacient; it is a contraceptive. In using all of those, you cannot prove that life existed. The Public Prosecution Service would never take a case on the basis of the morning-after pill. That is a spurious argument for anyone to put forward.

Mr Lunn made the point about resenting the fact that the issue was being handled by a male-dominated Chamber. I will note with interest whether Mr Lunn decides to vote, because he seems quite happy, as a man, to be able to vote on the issue and to say what a woman is able to get. If he is consistent on the issue, he would not have signed a petition of concern as a man; he would not even have spoken on the debate as a man about a women's issue, if that is how he regards it. We need to be careful when people use that language, because they highlight an inconsistency in their position. Of course, we are talking about the unborn child, of which there are men and women. Sadly, it is often girls who are aborted because of their gender more so than men. When we talk about this being a women's issue, you are right: it is the most vulnerable unborn women who are being targeted for abortion.

Other comments were made which, for the sake of time, we will not touch on. Suffice it to say that this is a debate that will continue, and it is one that needs to be resolved. We will continue to seek to provide a resolution. In conclusion, to those who have spoken in favour of abortion, it is notable that every single one of you is alive.

Mr Ford: I am conscious of the fact that there are actually seven amendments in this group. I will first speak on the other six.

Amendment No 41 introduces a new clause 78A to provide a minor amendment to the existing child grooming offence in the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008. It is supported by amendment No 73, which makes amendments to schedule 5 to the Bill. The amendment will reduce the number of times that an adult has to have met or communicated with a child before meeting them, or travelling to meet them, from two to one, in view of evidence now that there are real dangers of grooming at literally one contact. The change will enable a more effective intervention by police in relation to those who otherwise could not have been prosecuted without a second contact being established.

Amendment No 42, which introduces a new clause 78B to provide for the introduction of a new offence of sexual communication with a child, aims to strengthen the current law by ensuring a greater protection for children in Northern Ireland. It will also provide a greater cross-jurisdictional effect to tackling this type of abhorrent crime by ensuring parity with England and Wales and Scotland, which have similar provision to what is proposed today. The proposed new sexual communication with a child offence will criminalise an adult who intentionally communicates with a child where the content of the communication is sexual or is intended to cause or incite a child to communicate sexually.

Finally, on my amendments in this group, amendment No 48 inserts a new clause 83A into the Bill. This provides an extension to the Domestic Violence Crime and Victims Act 2004 to close a current gap in the legislation in cases where prosecutions for child cruelty or serious injury fail because there is insufficient evidence as to which member of the household was responsible.

Similar provision was made in England and Wales in 2012. A key factor of the amendment is that the defendants failed to take such steps as they could reasonably have been expected to take to protect the child or vulnerable adult from the risk of serious harm in circumstances that they should have foreseen. At present in Northern Ireland, legislation allows for the joint conviction of members of a household only in circumstances where the child or vulnerable adult dies and not in circumstances where they have been seriously injured. Therefore, this amendment, together with supporting amendment Nos 71 and 74, will close an existing loophole in the law and further protect the most vulnerable.

12.30 am

Like most Members, I shall now concentrate on Committee amendment No 34 to insert new clause 71A. It is just over two years ago that the House, as many have said, debated exactly the same amendment. Frankly, in my view, very little — actually, nothing at all — has changed in the intervening period to make me change the view that I expressed then. Nor, frankly, has anything been said in the debate to make me want to think again.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: Yes.

Mr Wells: All the Members from his party who opposed the amendment the last time made the point that there had not been proper consultation. Does he at least accept, unlike Ms Lo, that this was one of the most extensive and intensive consultation exercises ever undertaken by the Assembly?

Mr Ford: It may have been extensive in comparison with what happened previously, but, in the context of an amendment that was added at Committee Stage — it was not part of the Bill that passed Second Stage in the House, so it had not been consulted on officially — I am not sure that it is as extensive and perfect a consultation process as Members opposite claim. I acknowledge that there was more consultation this time than previously.

Two years ago, I rehearsed what I believed were the very good reasons why this offence was misplaced and not fit for purpose. I can summarise those reasons again briefly this morning. I also talked about the importance of accountability, scrutiny and oversight, and the need for a system that brings accountability and oversight to the provision of abortions in Northern Ireland, as to all medical and surgical interventions, regardless of where they are carried out. I said then, and I say again, that these are important issues that need to be addressed, but not in the way that is proposed here.

This proposal, as was the case in 2013, still provides potential for uncertainty and confusion. There are issues that could be subject to different interpretations. I listed some of them before, and I will do so again briefly. One is the use of the term “unborn child at any stage of that child’s development”. We have just heard a reference from Mr Givan to the issue of whether life can be certified only at implantation, yet he believes that life begins in its fullest form at conception. That is an example of the ambiguity of that phrase, which has not been used in any previous UK legislation.

The narrowness of the exception to the legislation causes me considerable concern. It talks about allowing terminations of pregnancy on premises not operated by a health and social care trust in circumstances where access to NHS premises is “not possible”. The usual legal provision in circumstances such as this is where it is “not reasonably practicable in all the circumstances”. As I said two years ago, if a woman was being treated in the Ulster Clinic by a consultant and a medical and nursing team — she knows them and has confidence in them — when a critical incident arose and there were major traffic jams around the Royal, it would still be “possible” to go there. Therefore, she could not remain in the Ulster Clinic with those whom she knows.

A similar situation could happen if there was snow on the road between Ballykelly and Altnagelvin. Those are practical issues not considered by those who looked only at their concerns about the operation of the Marie Stopes clinic. I believe that the concerns that I raised then continue. Nothing has changed, and I see no new evidence being presented today.

I want to take a minute or two to put on record the attempts that my Department and I have made to bring some form of proper thinking and progress on regulation other than by criminal sanction. In October 2013, following a commitment that I made during the debate on the Criminal Justice Bill to bring a paper to the Executive, I sent the then Health Minister a summary of a proposed paper on options for abortion outside the state sector. It covered restriction, regulation and what was termed “regulation plus”, which embraced ensuring clinical guidelines were followed. The Health Minister replied in November 2013, saying:

“I have read the summary brief you forwarded and am content that the issues highlighted are appropriate to seek the views of the public on. My officials will work with yours in order to take this matter forward.”

Discussions at official level followed, and health officials were to look at providing material through their Minister on the options that impacted on the health service, but nothing was ever received by my Department. I then wrote to the Health Minister in June of last year, enclosing the start of a draft consultation paper from the justice perspective on lethal foetal abnormality and sexual crime. I asked for his views on dealing with that and the regulation of private clinics in a single consultation process. I did not receive a response.

Mr Agnew and Mr McCrea, and perhaps others, referred to the issue of lethal foetal abnormality. I can inform the House that I have followed through on the promise that I made, and I have completed an Executive paper on lethal foetal abnormality. For those who have concerns about the way in which legislation was drafted by David Steel in 1966, I can say that I think that my proposals have considerably tighter regulation than those in what became the 1967 Act in GB. For my part, the need for regulation is clear, but that does not necessarily mean a need for further criminalisation. The criminal law on abortion applies equally across the public and private spheres. The need for another offence has not been established. Practitioners in private clinics are subject to the same legal requirements as in the NHS. It is worth remembering just what those legal requirements are. Under the current law in Northern Ireland, a woman must face risk to her life or serious injury to her physical or mental health, which is likely to be long term or permanent, before an abortion is legal. Some talked about just the risk to life, but that is not the position. It is slightly wider than that.

Our primary concern here should surely be that procedures in every establishment, whether public or private, be it the Marie Stopes clinic, the Ulster Clinic or any NHS hospital, are being carried out to standards that ensure the health and safety of the woman, who for reasons of risk to her health is faced with having to undergo such a procedure. That is a matter for the Department of Health and for regulation, not, Mr Speaker, for the criminal law. As far back as November 2012, the Health Minister committed to bringing proposals to the Assembly, such as those on the potential role of RQIA in regulating provision of abortion by private health care. Mr

Elliott, who is not in his place at the moment, raised the issue when he implored the Departments, and he used the plural, to look at the issue of regulation. For Mr Elliott's benefit, and everybody else's, it is not Departments that have a duty to regulate but the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety that has responsibility for regulations in the field of healthcare.

Mr Allister talked an awful lot about unregulated premises. However, the wording in amendment No 34 talks about premises that are not Health and Social Care premises. There is no case being made from this corner of the Chamber that there should not be regulation of private health care. We are the ones who have been making the case. It is those who have been complaining about the current position, whose successive Ministers over more than two years have failed to do anything to legislate to give a role to RQIA, a role that would allow it to carry out the full responsibilities that it should have for regulating every aspect of private health care.

There are certainly many strong views on abortion in the Assembly. We have aired them yesterday evening and this morning. However, any move to use the criminal law to create a further offence, as in the proposed amendment, is not the answer to the concerns held by those who argue for such a provision, and it is plainly against the concerns of those who hold the view that a woman's autonomy and right to the best standard of health service is key. As Justice Minister, I have to have an eye to the integrity of the criminal law to ensure that it is fit for purpose and not liable to dysfunctional outcomes. Neither should it be used where civil remedies such as regulation can do the job. Mr Speaker, I cannot accept amendment No 34.

Mr Ross: Given that it is 12.40 am, I suggest that no Member would thank me for a long-winded winding-up speech.

At least, there seems to be agreement on something at last, after two hours.

Eleven Members have spoken in this debate. Most Members did moderate their language and spoke in a respectful way. Whilst I understand and acknowledge that amendment No 34 was clearly the big-ticket item within this group of amendments, I do think that it is disappointing that, with the exception of Mr Poots, nobody talked about some of the other amendments in this group. Amendment Nos 41, 42, 48 and 71 introduce safeguards for children living in Northern Ireland against sexting and grooming and ensuring that there is legislation in place to allow joint convictions of those who would potentially abuse children or vulnerable adults. It is important that we also put on record that those are important amendments; ones that we actually have agreement on in this group. It is disappointing that perhaps we did not lend enough time during the last few hours to discuss those important issues.

I suspect that, irrespective of what I say in my winding-up speech, nobody would change their mind on this issue. I suspect that everybody will vote in the way in which they intended when they came in. To move things forward, I think that it is probably best that we just proceed to the vote now.

Mr Speaker: That was an excellent speech. Thank you very much.

Before I put the Question, I remind Members that amendment No 34 requires cross-community support due to a valid petition of concern.

Question put, That amendment No 34 be made.

(7) The independent reviewer must not determine that details of a spent conviction or other disposal should be removed from a certificate unless the independent reviewer is satisfied that the removal of those details would not undermine the safeguarding or protection of children and vulnerable adults or pose a risk of harm to the public.

(8) The fact that a review has been carried out under this paragraph before a certificate is issued does not prevent the operation of paragraphs 4 and 5 in relation to the certificate once issued.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 8 June 2015

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Resignation: Mr Brady

Mr Speaker: Before we begin today's business, I advise the House that I have received a letter from Mr Mickey Brady giving me notice of his intention to resign as a Member for the Newry and Armagh constituency with effect from Wednesday 3 June. I have notified the Chief Electoral Officer in accordance with section 35 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

New Assembly Member: Mr Murphy

Mr Speaker: I advise the House that I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that Mr Conor Murphy has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the Newry and Armagh constituency to fill the vacancy resulting from Mr Brady's resignation. Mr Murphy signed the Roll of Membership this morning in the presence of myself and the Clerk to the Assembly and entered his designation. Mr Murphy has now taken his seat, and I wish him every success.

Public Petition: Early Years Fund

Mr Speaker: Mr Dominic Bradley has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member has up to three minutes to speak.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm an achainí seo a chur faoi bhráid an Tionóil. Thanks very much, Mr Speaker. I am delighted to be able to present the petition to the Assembly on behalf of the Firs Playgroup in Armagh.

The petition has over 2,000 names. The reduction in funding of the early years programme has animated the community right across Northern Ireland. As you know, preschool education is the foundation stone of the future education of the individual. We know from the work of James Heckman, a Nobel laureate in economics, that investment in early years education is an investment that bears fruit not only financially, with each pound invested in it saving the Government almost £20 further in the person's life, but, of course, in that it develops the child in so many ways and is certainly an intervention that is well worth the investment.

This particular programme has benefited 153 communities and created 177 jobs. It supports 2,500 early years places and has helped 620 children with special educational needs and 250 children whose first language is not English. The 2,500 places — 1,600 of which are in the funded preschool sector, with 900 places for younger children in a variety of settings — have been supported by the Department of Education fund.

The 1,600 places are vulnerable because the settings have small numbers of funded preschool places yet require at least two members of staff. If the staff who are paid for out of the Department of Education fund are lost, those settings will simply not be able to survive. There are no other sources of funding for the 177 staff who are supported by the Department of Education fund. The figures are not alarmist, as some have suggested, nor are they inaccurate. They are factually correct. That is why the groups have been funded up until now.

Thank you very much for the opportunity, Mr Speaker. I look forward to a positive outcome.

Mr Speaker: Can you bring up the petition? I am waiting with great expectation. [Laughter.]

Mr D Bradley moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: I will forward the petition to the Minister of Education and send a copy to the Committee for Education.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I beg to move

That this Assembly condemns the disproportionate reduction of the Disability Action and community transport budgets; notes the very negative impact the severe reduction of departmental budgets is having on people with disabilities and the most vulnerable and isolated people in our society; and calls on the Minister for Regional Development to urgently reinstate this essential funding.

I welcome the opportunity to speak in the debate today. Like most in the House, I entered politics out of a desire to bring good to my community, to help my community and to protect the most vulnerable in our communities. I never expected that, one day, I would witness the most savage, the most callous and the most unjustifiable attack on the most vulnerable, the most isolated and the most exposed in our society. Unfortunately, I am witnessing an attack on the most vulnerable and isolated members of our community as a result of the unjustifiable and draconian cuts to Disability Action and rural community transport budgets. The cuts being brought about by the Minister for Regional Development and his departmental officials will reduce operating budgets by up to one third and will mean higher costs for passengers, a reduction in services and increased isolation.

We must not underestimate the importance of the Disability Action transport scheme (DATS) and the services provided through the rural community transport partnerships. In many instances, they offer the only transport options when an individual or group cannot use or access public or private transport. We should not make the mistake of thinking that those services are used solely by our senior citizens; our younger population is also heavily reliant on them, whether it is a school, a youth club, a scout group or a football team.

Our young, particularly those in isolated areas, need those services to access education, work and social requirements. This is ever-increasingly more relevant due to the Minister and his Department's abandonment of the public service obligations as they allow Translink to cherry-pick the profitable routes as it casts asunder rural and less-profitable routes, which enhances the isolation that many people experience. Even in cases where public transport is comprehensive, such as in urban areas, challenges still exist for service users. Many community transport service users do so because they are unable to use public transport due to the distance from public transport pickup sites, physical or mental disability, the need for specialist transport or support, or the cost of commercial public or private transport. In those cases, community transport and DATS services are often the only viable solution.

The Committee has taken evidence from community transport and Disability Action in recent weeks on the matter. We also afforded the Department the opportunity to justify its case. No doubt we will hear the same from the Minister later in the debate. We will hear, for example, about the pressures that his Department is facing because of budgetary restrictions and about how he is £60 million worse off than last year. He may also state that cuts to services amount to only 20% to 25%. The reality, of course, is that the Department's baseline reduction amounts to £3 million from last year. The reality also is that his Department has the fourth-highest budget allocation and that one third or more of the community transport budgets have been stolen from the most isolated and vulnerable people.

I acknowledge that the Minister has indicated that he intends to bid for £1.5 million to replace the funds that he and his officials have robbed from the most vulnerable and isolated citizens. However, he has allocated that not as a high priority but in his normal wish list of bids. There is an irony that, while he includes the replacement of those funds almost as an afterthought, he is seeking some £9 million in capital bids to support Translink. Whilst he and his officials have continually defended Translink's amalgamation of massive reserves, his officials are miscalculating the level of reserves held by some community transport providers; they have advised them, against the advice of the Department of Finance and Personnel, to use their limited resources, which puts their services further in jeopardy. To those who are disabled, are socially or geographically isolated, or those who cannot afford public transport, the services provided by those partnerships and organisations are often their lifeline to the wider world.

Without these services, users have little or no access to the health, education, work, social and leisure opportunities that many in the House take for granted. This increases the feeling of isolation. Indeed, the likes of the DATS group, which has had its entire budget removed, is in itself an opportunity for social interaction. In many circumstances, the services being provided are the difference between living independently and living in a residential care home.

The decision to cut these budgets so severely is a bad one. As you will no doubt hear during the debate, Committee members continue to be critical of the absence of negotiation, the lack of visibility of the level of reductions and the subsequent attempts by officials to try to paint the reductions in a better light. Members of the Committee were unanimous in wanting to bring the motion to the House, we were unanimous in our condemnation of these cuts being brought to bear in the first instance, and we were unanimous in wanting them to be reversed. Simply including a bid in a wish list is not enough. The Minister needs to make these moneys a priority. It is time for him to make a good decision and put the needs of the most vulnerable and isolated to the fore. It is time that he delivered against his stated objective of providing transport services designed to give people with disabilities and those living in rural areas improved access to work, education, healthcare, shopping and recreational activities and, by so doing, reduce their social isolation.

Having spoken as the Chair of the Committee, I want to add some personal remarks as a member of my grouping. During briefings that we had from some of those groups, it was clear that their interaction with the Minister's officials was poor, if not abysmal. The officials left it until the last moment before giving them any indication of their budget. It strikes me that some in his Department have made it very difficult for those groups to survive or to organise their finances.

As I said in my earlier remarks, officials talked about the groups' high reserves. We learned in the past about Translink's high reserves, but they never decided to rob Translink of its reserves. We have groups here who lost one third. In my comments as Chair, I referred to the DATS organisation, which provides a service to people who have severe disabilities and require specialist driving assessments. Its entire budget was removed. It is an awful indictment of the Minister and his officials that they removed that from such vulnerable people. The entire budget line of transport groups linked to that organisation was also removed. Despite the Minister receiving such a small cut to his £344 million budget, he has decided to attack the most isolated and the most vulnerable — the people who deserve support the most.

Translink provides an excellent service in many urban towns and villages. However, the DATS service is a lifeline to people in the most rural, isolated and vulnerable areas. Since the decision to slash its budget, many old and vulnerable people in my constituency have contacted our office about the difficulty that they now have because of cuts to the services and changes that the service providers are having to make because of those cuts. We will hear others from the Minister's party jump to his defence, but the Minister did not lose one third of his budget. He did not lose 1% of his budget. However, the Minister has decided to attack the most vulnerable and take one third off them.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I support the motion. I find it very difficult to disagree with anything that the Chair of the Regional Development Committee said. I note with concern the "disproportionate" — that is the word in the motion and is certainly the most active — cuts, particularly of the Disability Action and community transport budgets.

I commend the work of Community Transport Network NI, which is a network of 10 community transport providers that lobby for community transport on a not-for-profit basis. The aim is to reduce social and rural isolation and provide safe, affordable and accessible transport for some of the most vulnerable members of our communities. In my local area, which is covered by North Coast Community Transport, some 60,000 trips covering more than one million miles were made last year.

That is the equivalent of more than 40 times around the world. Further afield, across the 10 partnership members of the network, some 243,967 trips were carried out at an average cost of £14.20 and a distance of 13.4 miles. I think that the real benefit of community transport is that for every pound invested in rural community transport partnerships, £12 of social value is created. I think everyone will see the value of that across the board.

The historical levels of funding into community transport, particularly from 2010-15, have been around £3.5 million per annum, with a core grant of £2.75 million. Now, in effect, that money will be cut by some 33% on average, and, in some cases, that may go as far as 40%. I know that it is somewhat less in other cases.

I pay tribute to the Community Transport Association, particularly people like Kellie Armstrong and Ian Wilson who have lobbied, extensively, the Committee for Regional Development and members thereof on behalf of the CTA. As recently as last week, I was in touch with Disability Action and, indeed, met up with Mencap to discuss the severe effect that these cuts will have on their members, particularly in respect of transport.

In my own area, we have Billy Moore from North Coast Community Transport. I have also touched base with Anita Flanagan from the Fermanagh trust and Paddy McEldowney from Easilink. Since most of the members of the Committee for Regional Development are rural-based, we are aware of many of the volunteer drivers who carry out such essential work, and, because some of us have a background in community development — indeed, I am the chair of the all-party group on the community and voluntary sector — we realise the importance that the sector has for us. We also realise the —

Mr Speaker: Time is almost up.

Mr Ó hOisín: Thank you, Chair. We also recognise the —

Mr Speaker: Sorry, my fault.

Mr Ó hOisín: OK. I think I am all right.

Mr Speaker: We really are interested in what you are saying.

Mr Ó hOisín: Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle.

We also recognise the issues around transport poverty and isolation, and the effect they have on health issues. This is an example of something that has tied our community together. It has never been more important, given the reduction in the provision of public transport across the board. I can think of a local example whereby the only public transport to the local hospital, which might be only 15 miles away, involves taking the bus to the local village, if it is available, but may not be for the time it is required; taking a further bus, which, ironically, drives past the hospital; and taking a further service bus to the hospital. In real terms, six bus trips are required. It requires some logistics to tie that together if you make an appointment in the hospital. That also applies in the Causeway Hospital on the north coast.

A pilot scheme that is taking place in Dungannon was mentioned. I have yet to see the results or the benefits of that, but I will keep an open mind on it. The reductions in the Translink service have been acknowledged, and I acknowledge the bid for £1.5 million that the Minister has made to mitigate some of these cuts, but the bottom line is that that is disproportionate to the £9 million that is earmarked for Translink and the huge reserves held by that organisation, in comparison with the minuscule reserves that are held by those involved in community transport.

I have no issue about supporting the motion, and I am glad that it has been brought to the House. I hope that it gives some comfort to the community transport providers and volunteers who provide an essential service, particularly in rural areas.

Mr Speaker: I am sorry about the interruption in your presentation.

Mr Ó hOisín: It is all right.

Mr Dallat: Mr Speaker, 17 years ago, I left a secure teaching job to pursue the aspirations of the Good Friday Agreement, particularly on the principle of equality, because I realised that equality was not simply between Protestants and Catholics, but between everyone. When I heard of the cuts affecting Disability Action, I was emotionally upset. Members may remember that, many years ago, one of the first people to arrive from eastern Europe as a migrant worker lost her lower limbs in a tragic accident. She became a friend, and is still a friend, of the family. I pay tribute to Disability Action, which was involved in that girl's learning to drive, resuming her life and continuing a very normal way of being.

I believe it was a bad mistake to target Disability Action and the other group. I want to make it perfectly clear that I do not have a party-political thought in my head as I speak. This is about people who I took a decision to represent in public life. Forget about party labels or the election that might be coming up next year or perhaps even sooner.

The cuts were announced in mid-March. They are implemented from 1 April. Disability Action expected to receive some kind of cutback but not such a ferocious one. Disability Action is represented right across Northern Ireland, and it simply cannot sustain the type of cut that was imposed on it and, at the same time, provide the essential service that it does. I am sorry that Coleraine is one of the areas that will no longer be able to provide the driving lessons that I mentioned earlier for people with a disability.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Member for giving way. He talks about how we were expecting cuts. I am sure that the Member will also remember the presentation from representatives of the community transport sector, who said that they had asked for approximately 10% less but were actually going to provide more runs. So they voluntarily suggested a cut, but obviously the cut went much further.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Dallat: Thank you, Mr Speaker. That leads me to my next point. Members may know that I am the longest-serving member of the Public Accounts Committee and I do not take prisoners easily. No group is more scrutinised than the 11 community transport groups. They are not answerable a few years after the event; they must make returns on a monthly basis, so there is no reason why the Department would not know that those groups represent good value for money. Again, like Disability Action, they provide an essential service. That was a bad mistake, and, as the Chairman and other members know, during our inquiry we discovered that there is some remote group within the Department, which probably has no contact with the outside world, that brought forward these arbitrary figures.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

I am hopeful and I believe that the Minister, being the decent person that he is, will restore the money that went missing for Disability Action and the community transport groups. I believe that it is the only honourable way to address this problem, and, while we may have this debate, at the end of the day, I plead with the Minister: please put right those issues on which, I believe, some officials within your Department have totally misdirected you.

At the outset, I said that it is critical that, whatever our political problems, we do not forget the first principle of that agreement that was signed 17 years ago. The principle of that was to provide equality across the board. I cannot think of any more deserving groups than those that depend on Disability Action and community transport to provide them with a level of mobility to which, I believe, they are entitled. It would be a shame and disgrace if the Assembly were to go down in history as having taken away the meagre resources that those groups have to give people a reasonable chance of staying in communication with the outside world, visiting their doctors, dentists, physicians and attending hospital appointments — all the things that those organisations provide.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member please bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Dallat: Yes, I will indeed. I conclude by placing my trust in the Minister, somehow, and in the Executive, because they play a critical role in this. Please provide the money for those groups.

12.30 pm

Mr Beggs: It is important to recognise and pay tribute to the community transport system, which benefits many community groups. In my area, I used to be involved with Larne Youth, which provided a vital minibus service to young people, and I would like to acknowledge that from the start. Community transport provides a vital service to many vulnerable and disadvantaged people, as well as to young people. That has to be recognised.

I have not yet heard during the debate what suggestions the Committee has. I have heard criticism of Translink's review of its bus services and I heard the Chairman say that it is looking at its least profitable routes, but what is his suggestion? I have not heard alternative suggestions.

It is important that we attempt to protect front-line services and, in particular, protect the most vulnerable and isolated in our community. Let us also remember we are talking about the budgets before the impasse of welfare reform hit us. That is still hanging over all of this. It is also important that we plan our budgets well ahead in Northern Ireland. There has been very poor long-term planning by the Finance Minister and the Executive collectively. I understand that the Finance Minister knew the draft Budget allocation for this financial year in July 2013, so why, in June 2015, have the Executive still not put a funding package in place, with the finance behind it, to fund a voluntary redundancy scheme to reduce the number of civil servants? That, in turn, would take pressure off other organisations where, unfortunately and regrettably, cuts have been imposed. Without those options, what alternatives are there? I put that back to the Committee members. Perhaps those of you who have yet to speak and the Chairman can suggest alternatives later in the debate.

When I looked at the feedback on the draft budget, I noticed that the Committee commented largely on the capital reductions. That does not solve the problem of the day-to-day running costs faced by the Department. I notice that it welcomed the Minister's requirement for Translink to draw on its resources. I want to know what resources are held by the community transport organisations. Are they too high? I do not know. Does the Department require some of them to be drawn on? When I was a local councillor, it was recommended that, at each budget, you should have 10% of your annual turnover in reserve for unforeseen matters and day-to-day running costs. What is the advice on a reserve for community transport? This is public money, and it should be used for its purposes, not sit in a bank account. I hope that that will alleviate some of the apparent reductions that might occur but I have to acknowledge that, with a reduced budget, there will unfortunately have to be reductions. Again, I am looking for someone to suggest alternatives in the day-to-day running costs in the Department. Where does the money come from? I hope that members of the Committee will support bids for additional funding.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beggs: Yes, I will.

Mr Dallat: I have listened very carefully to the Member and I respect what he says, but does he agree with us that, when speaking about alternatives or cuts, we should not attack the most vulnerable people in society? They do not have a choice or an alternative, and they depend on community transport for mobility.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Beggs: I agree that that should be avoided as much as possible, but I also note that the Committee were critical of the fare increases by Translink. Those will affect many people who are not entitled to free transport and may well be working, yet the Committee criticised the increases. Where does the Committee want the money to be funded from?

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beggs: I want to continue.

I will move into a more constructive mode. I noticed in the Committee's report into bus transport in 2013 that there was a suggestion that all Departments should work together to make better use of money collectively and that we should look to how Scotland had introduced working across Departments. That has failed to happen here. With community planning coming forward, local councils could play a key role in working with all the Departments to make better use of our limited money for public transport. It is vital that we look at something new, and I hope that the Committee can drive that issue forward to protect local communities and ensure that more money goes to community transport. I genuinely believe that they can bring about advantages rather than continuing with the duplication of services that exists, but we need that drive to go forward and individual Departments not to work in individual silos. Who will take that forward? I understand that there have been a couple of pilot schemes, but I would welcome any update on that subject. Has the Committee had any further feedback since the report in 2013? Can the Minister say anything more about it?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Beggs: If I were in local government today, I would be looking at community planning and the needs of the community and trying to put ideas together to get all the departmental money to lead to better outputs for our local communities.

Mr Lyttle: I rise to support the motion and to add my voice to the serious concerns about the disproportionate reduction of the Disability Action and community transport budgets and, indeed, express concern about the impact that it will have on people with disabilities, older people, vulnerable people and those isolated in our society. I add my voice to the call on the Minister for Regional Development to redress that funding issue. Indeed, I believe that he has made bids in June monitoring that may permit him to do that, and I look forward to hearing more about that from him today.

Let us consider the policy and legislative context of the issue. The Department for Regional Development is responsible for implementing the transport programme for people with disabilities. It is also responsible for the implementation of the accessible transport strategy from 2005, the vision for which states:

"To have an accessible transport system that enables older people and people with disabilities to participate more fully in society, enjoy greater independence and experience a better quality of life."

DRD can also, in accordance with the Transport (Northern Ireland) Act 2011, provide grant funding to bodies that provide transport services that are wholly or mainly for the benefit of members of the public who have a disability, are elderly or live in rural areas.

Indeed, in 2014-15, the total funding allocated to support community and disability transport services after in-year allocations totalled £7.45 million. However, the starting budget for 2015-16 totals only £4.99 million, which represents a reduction of 33%. That reduction will impact on rural community transport partnerships and on Disability Action's disability transport scheme, which will experience a reduction of 21%. The group service will be a 100% cut and the mobility centre will be a 100% cut as well. Those are the most startling facts about the issue.

The Disability Action transport scheme is a service for people with disabilities or for those who find it difficult to use mainstream public transport. Services provided are targeted at those over 80 and those who are registered blind and/or in receipt of either the mobility or care component of disability living allowance, which is a vital service in our community. It has been provided across Northern Ireland by Disability Action in partnership with community transport organisations. Disability Action had, of course, anticipated a reduction in funding but not to the level that we are talking about and not with the timescale that was given to address those reductions.

What will the impact be on services? I asked the Minister, in a question for written answer, for a rationale for the reduction in those services. In his response, he said that he believed that with "continued efficiencies", it would be possible to "minimise the impact on service users."

That, I am afraid, is simply not the case. In the Committee, we are hearing of fare increases from £1.50 to £2.30 per trip and of reduced hours of service. Currently, the service runs from 7.30 am to 11.30 pm Monday to Saturday and from 8.00 am to 8.00 pm on Sunday. Unfortunately, the proposed reductions are to 8.00 am to 8.00 pm Monday to Friday and 9.00 am to 5.00 pm on Saturday and Sunday. A 5% reduction —

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyttle: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Beggs: What suggestion do you have for the Minister to live within his means for the Budget you approved?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for his intervention. He is inaccurate. Alliance Party Executive Ministers voted against the Budget and expressed concerns in relation to it. I will come to his question later in my contribution, but what we are detailing here is a disproportionate reduction to services for older people and people with a disability in our community, which, ultimately, will affect the mobility and independence of the people who need that most.

The mobility centre is providing a vital service as well. It is delivering driving assessments for people with disabilities to ensure they are able to gain adaptations to drive safely; driving lessons in specially adapted cars; driving theory courses, and essential information and advice for older people and people with a disability. It has experienced a 100% cut in funding from DRD. My understanding is that, in Wales for example, the comparable mobility centre is receiving in the region of £280,000 per year funding and is delivering a similar level of service. So, we want to hear from the Minister about how he is going to address that. Unfortunately, the reduction to the mobility centre also means that we will have a decrease from eight centres across Northern Ireland to only three.

We need to take into consideration the impact of delays and intransigence from Sinn Féin, SDLP and the Greens on welfare reform, but the Minister must also show leadership in considering other issues in his Department. He has shown little leadership to consider —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Lyttle: — potential changes to water pricing, which takes up £300 million of the Budget every year. I think it is time that we recognise the impact of these decisions on the most vulnerable in our community, and I look forward to hearing from him today.

Mr Easton: It is quite shocking to see, as part of the Minister for Regional Development's efforts to reduce the DRD budget, the disproportionate cuts to the Disability Action and rural community transport budgets. In 2014-15, the budget given to those organisations and groups was £7.15 million. This year, it has been set at £4.99 million, which is a massive reduction of £2.1 million. It is an overall reduction of 30%, which, compared to other areas where there are reductions in funding, is quite extraordinary and disturbing.

The rural community partnerships help to deliver services in rural communities that allow people living in those communities the chance to have much-needed transport. The partnership delivers 243,000 trips across Northern Ireland, with an average of 13.4 miles per trip. For every one pound invested in rural community transport, £12 of social value is created.

This overall 30% reduction is quite disturbing in itself, but when we look, in particular, at the community transport networks and the 11 rural transport providers, we see a huge discrepancy in how much is being taken from each provider. This will need to be explained, and, hopefully, the Minister will be able to do that for me at some stage. For example, when we look at the cuts to each of the providers of rural transport, those seem to be based on the reserves of each organisation and the cost per trip. Hopefully, that can be explained for me.

While it would be wrong to say that they should not have to dip into some of their reserves, I have to question the logic of that, based on the extreme differences between each organisation's reduction in funding. Hopefully, the Minister will explain that. There seems to be a difference for each organisation. Why are some being cut more than others? Surely, they should all be treated equally.

Also, in a Committee evidence session, a question was asked about rural-proofing the budget, and there does not seem to have been any of that. Maybe the Minister could explain that for me as well.

I note that many of the networks have written to the Minister presenting information on historical inequalities relating to how grants have been apportioned to the partnerships and have drawn his attention to partnership performance. Based on that information, can the Minister comment on the comments raised and the request that future allocations from the rural transport fund (RTF) be based on the average cost per trip across Northern Ireland, which stands at approximately £14? That appears to ensure fairness in grant allocations. I see that at least eight of the providers are asking the Minister for that.

I also see from a letter from Fermanagh Community Transport dated 26 May that it is querying where the Department is getting the figures for its reserves. The Department claimed that its reserves were an increase of 190%, but it turns out that that is really 24.5%. Is the Department getting its figures wrong in its assessment on reserves, and, if so, do we need to look again at those figures and the data that the Department is using and make sure that the figures are correct?

If we look at the impact of the excessive cuts, we see that there will have to be a reduction in the mobility centres from eight to three, with 10 jobs being lost by staff employed by Disability Action. DATS will see a reduction in its budget of £631,000, a reduction of 21%, which is quite huge. There is a reduction of 100% for group services and 100% reduction in mobility centres. That will lead to higher costs for groups using private-sector suppliers, a lack of accessibility transport options and more social isolation. The impact on the mobility centres will be that lessons for drivers will no longer be provided from the person's home. Customers will have to travel to one of the three remaining offices. That could be a round trip of 60 miles for some people. The cost of a driving lesson will increase from £25 to £35.

I certainly do not envy the Minister's task in resolving this. However, it is not fair on the people of Northern Ireland when we see the games being played by Sinn Féin, the SDLP and the Green Party over the Stormont House Agreement, which might have helped our budgets. I believe, however, that other savings can be found; and example of that is the 40 company cars provided for senior management in Translink —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Easton: — and the nine company cars for Northern Ireland Railways senior management. I do not believe that we should be providing those services, and that is where money can be found.

Mr Moutray: I support the motion. Disability Action and the range of rural community transport partnerships that exist in Northern Ireland provide a vital service to many people. That can be partly highlighted by the fact that 4,500 people regularly use the services of rural community transport partnerships. Moreover, recent figures released by the Department highlighted that, in 2014-15, the partnership network delivered almost 240,000 trips right across Northern Ireland. The services provided by Disability Action and by community transport play a pivotal role in society today. Those groups enable people to live independently, to play an active role in their local community and to access vital services such as education, employment and healthcare.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Member for giving way. I am sure that, like me, the Member has had many complaints from concerned parents regarding cutbacks and reduced budgets for people with disabilities. Does the Member agree that any cutbacks in that area will seriously affect those most vulnerable people, especially those living in our rural areas — like you, I represent a big rural area — where transport is much in need? Cuts of this nature —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member that interventions should be short.

Mr Anderson: — are causing further distress for those families, and they need more, not less, help at this time.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Moutray: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, although I think that most of it has been used up by now. I thank my colleague for his intervention, lengthy though it was.

There is now widespread anger and hurt in the community, which is felt by many, due to the severe reductions to those services in the year ahead. The grant available to partnerships to provide Dial a Lift services in rural areas has decreased in real terms by £1.4 million — from £3.6 million to £2.4 million — for 2015-16. In real terms, therefore, partnerships have endured a substantial reduction of 33% in the grant funding available to them to deliver these services for the year beginning 1 April 2015 compared with the funding that was available to them. My colleagues and I are also concerned at the disproportionate way those cuts have been implemented, with cutbacks ranging from a 25% reduction in funding for transport partnerships to a 40% reduction for others.

Furthermore, the Disability Action transport scheme has witnessed its funding being slashed by over £630,000, or 21%, by the Department for the year ahead. Consequently, Disability Action has been forced to increase fares and has had to decrease the hours that transport services are available. It is unfortunate that that may lead to increased isolation, particularly in rural communities.

It is a major concern that, because of the harsh cuts to Disability Action's funding, many disabled people across Northern Ireland may now have to face a situation where their personal mobility is greatly reduced, as well as their ability to lead independent lives. That is distressing not only for individuals concerned but for their families and friends.

In my constituency, the Down and Armagh Rural Transport (DART) partnership is facing a 28% reduction in the funding that it receives. I am particularly concerned about that development, because I know the work that DART does in our constituency under Mr Ian Wilson. Lives are going to be impacted by the cuts in the Craigavon and Banbridge area.

I feel that the Department should be seeking to invest in support for the community sector, not seeking to reduce its services, particularly when community transport will plug the gaps made by the withdrawal of some Translink bus routes from rural towns and villages across the country. Moreover, public transport is not a viable option for many elderly and disabled people who avail themselves of these services because the bus stop is too much of a distance to walk and the public transport that is available does not then meet their mobility requirements.

I understand that the Department's budget is under significant pressures for 2015-16, but the way the Minister has allocated his budget has, in my opinion, impacted harshly on vulnerable communities and individuals who cannot afford to be impacted in such a way. It is imperative that the Minister seriously reconsider as a matter of urgency the funding that his Department provides to Disability Action and the community transport network across Northern Ireland.

Mr Byrne: I also support the motion brought forward by the Committee. I think it is fair to say that Members have been very heavily lobbied by people in the community transport sector and Disability Action about the severity of the cuts.

In West Tyrone, as Members know, we have a significant rural constituency, meaning that many people there have historically faced social isolation and a dearth of public services. For the elderly and disabled people who live in rural areas such as Beragh or Trillick, a simple run to the shops or the bank is no easy task, and it is groups such as community transport and Disability Action that have been vital in granting people a better standard of living by providing them with a flexible transport service, often to attend a GP or hospital appointment.

As other Members said, Disability Action is facing funding reductions of over £880,000 this year. Its group service and mobility service centres are facing 100% reductions in their budgets, and the Disability Action transport scheme is receiving a cut of 21%, which is £631,000. Those reductions will seriously impact the lives of disabled people in Northern Ireland in personal mobility and independent living.

In West Tyrone, we have a community transport company called Easilink, which provides the door-to-door service for Disability Action. That community transport company uses many volunteer drivers and some paid drivers, who get reasonable rates of pay. People are therefore saying, "Why is there such a disproportionate cut in community transport and Disability Action? It seems unfair and discriminatory". In the current year, the budget proposal is to cut the community transport funding by around 33%. That is hard to explain or accept.

I think that departmental officials have been less than sensitive and less than caring, given the severity of the cuts to those particular interest groups, particularly the elderly and the disabled.

Ultimately, it is groups such as Community Transport Association (CTA) and Disability Action that seek to provide practical transport solutions to vulnerable people in Northern Ireland. They should be supported in such endeavours instead of being severely cut, as is the current proposal. I hope that, in the monitoring round, the Minister will get the support of colleagues to try to make sure that adequate funds are again put into the community transport sector and the disability sector, because of the sense of hurt and anxiety that there is among people involved in the CTA and Disability Action. The 11 community partnerships provide a local, flexible and reliable service in many areas for people across the North. I pay tribute to Mr Paddy McEldowney, the manager of Easilink, which covers the Derry, Strabane and Omagh districts. He and his committee have done excellent work for many years. The Assembly needs to demonstrate genuine concern for those who are disadvantaged and who need that vital service.

Mr Swann: In the Chairman of the Committee's opening comments, I think that he referred to how Members from this party would be jumping up and down to defend the Minister. I can assure the Chairman that the Minister is well able to do that himself, and I am sure that he will in his summing-up.

While I am fully supportive of the work that community transport does, including that of a number of community transport organisations that I have worked with that provide a vital service in north Antrim and the surrounding areas, I am a bit disappointed in the motion. On 18 May, a motion on funding cuts to the community and voluntary sector that Roy Beggs and I had tabled was debated, and the House passed it unanimously. The motion called on the Executive to take a collective approach and give a collective response to the cuts that may be made across the board, and some of the arguments have been remade today: that the approach should be coordinated, that the Departments should not work in silos and that Department officials should be working together better. Our motion called on the Executive:

“to act in a coordinated manner to ensure that the sector and its organisations receive the required level of support and funding allocations.” — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 104, p273, col 2].

In that debate, we made it clear that the motion was not tabled as a party political point-scoring motion, and I think that that was accepted by all Members on the day. The Minister for Social Development, Mervyn Storey, a man whom I have respect for and his ministerial portfolio, finished up by saying:

“Let me move on to the discussions with the First Minister and deputy First Minister. After recent discussions with voluntary and community representatives, I wrote to OFMDFM to offer my Department's assistance to the overview being undertaken by OFMDFM junior Ministers on budget decisions across Departments.” — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 104, p284, col 1].

That was directly an action to the voluntary and community sector. I wrote to the Minister for Social Development for an update, and the latest letter that I got back from him was on 29 May. Mr Storey's response was:

“I still await a response to my recent correspondence to the First and deputy First Ministers, where I offered my assistance and that of my Department to the overview being taken by OFMDFM junior Ministers on the budget decisions across Departments.”

That was directly linked to community and voluntary organisations.

Our debate on 18 May was very clearly about a collective and coordinated response from the House and its Ministers to the voluntary and community sector. I did not expect the debate to be followed by what can possibly be described as party political — I will not say “point-scoring”, because I do not want to go down that route.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: I will.

Mr Dallat: To clear the Member's mind of any thought that the motion on disability and community transport was party political, I say to him it was not, because it was my suggestion that that particular motion should come to the House before the motion down for tomorrow. It was not party political, and I have made it perfectly clear today that my contribution is not party political. However, people who are affected will not give one hoot whether it is the Social Development Minister, the Regional Development Minister, the Executive or the Assembly as a whole. We have not lived up to the principles of equality.

1.00 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member that, when he asks to make an intervention, it should be short.

The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Swann: I did not mind that intervention from Mr Dallat because he inferred that this should be the responsibility of the Executive. I took him as being genuine in that.

I referred to political opportunities that could have been taken. We go round the House and talk about how Ministers are not considering the vulnerable in our society. I could go round every party — Sinn Féin and its removal of early years budgets; the SDLP's removal of environmental organisations' budgets; the Alliance Party and the removal of support from NIACRO and the Pathways to Success education maintenance allowance (EMA); the DUP and the closure of care homes such as the Roddens, Pinewood and a number across Northern Ireland — and we could point and wag our fingers at each other. The Members in the corner, who are not Executive members, could say to get out of the Executive and do something. We must take responsibility. That is what we sought from Members of the House with our motion on 18 May: a collective response for the voluntary and community sector.

A concordat was signed by the Executive and the voluntary and community sector. We all have a responsibility to support that and to hold it up, because it is those people who are vulnerable and needy in our society. As the Chairman rightly said in his opening remarks, he was elected here to give those people a voice. That is why I came here. We need to look for a collective response rather than a motion here and a motion there. Let us get this sorted out and do it right. That is why I appeal to the Members who have some sway in OFMDFM. The Social Development Minister made a genuine offer to take a coordinated response to that. They should move on with it and accept it. Let us get something done that can support the people whom we are talking about today.

Mr Allister: I have some sympathy for the Minister, although I might temper that a little later in my remarks. [Laughter.] This is a Minister who, as I see it, is trying to live within his means in a context in which the overseeing Finance Minister is about to take us down the road of fantasy budgets. This is a Minister who conscientiously seems to think that he should at least strive not to indulge in fantasy but to be tempered by reality, never mind the fact that the rest of the Executive are quite happy to embrace the politics of the phantom and the fantasy, so I have some sympathy with him.

I also have sympathy with him on another score. This is a Minister who plays the game financially and, when it comes to monitoring rounds, gives up money that the Department has, in contrast to the Education Minister. I stand to be corrected, but I do not think that the Education Department has ever surrendered money in a monitoring round. So a Minister who makes efforts to do what is supposed to be the right thing is vilified — more so tomorrow, it would seem. In that context, I have some sympathy with him.

I have to say, however, that I have more sympathy with some of my constituents. During the recent election, I was canvassing in Cloughmills. I met an elderly lady who was returning to her home, clearly very tired, and carrying two heavy shopping bags. She explained that she had had to walk a mile and a half from Logans into Cloughmills, because the community transport service had been removed. She said that the last Translink bus that morning was at 9.00 am, and the next one was at 4.00 pm, so there was not a proper public transport facility.

She said that taxis were beyond her means, and she was, therefore, faced with having to walk a mile and a half out to Logans to catch the passing bus and a mile and a half back. In 2015, that is not good enough. That is the real consequence of cuts to some of these community services. Whatever our political persuasion, this should exercise us all. The Minister, whatever the moral and financial compunction that he, unlike others, feels to live within his means, needs to do so in such a way as to minimise the impact on, in the words of the motion, the disabled and elderly — those who can least afford to bear the burden of losing services that someone sitting in an office might think are not needed. “We can do without that. Look at the money we would save”, they say, with little or any thought for the consequences. Responsible, compassionate government needs to address those issues. As the Minister has discovered, not for the first time, he will get no thanks from his party political rivals in the Executive for playing the political game of being in the Executive.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member explain why he feels that a Minister who is at risk of spending beyond his budgetary control limits is playing the correct financial game?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Allister: It seems that, next week, if some people have their way, a fantasy Budget will be introduced to the House, which is supposed to set the financial frameworks. Today, then, are we meant to be seriously concerned when a Minister says, “These are my limits, quite properly so, and I must live within them”, knowing that the total abandonment of financial probity and responsibility is coming down the tracks? It is in that context that I have the level of sympathy that I have expounded for the Minister.

Mr McCallister: I want to focus on several things, starting with the impact that there will be on my constituency. South Down is a large rural constituency, and many vulnerable people are very dependent on this type of service. In response to a question for written answer, it was revealed that there would be a huge cut in funding for Disability Action from £2.9 million to £2.3 million, or 21%. The question for the Minister is this: does any other part of his Department, or any area of the Civil Service part of his Department, face that level of cut, and, if so, how he would deliver it?

Colleagues throughout the House, from all sides, have spoken about the impact that these cuts will have on the services. In an area that straddles the Minister’s and my constituency, namely the old Newry and Mourne District Council area, Newry and Mourne Community Transport were trying to develop services, including a service manned by volunteer drivers to take patients to and from appointments for cancer treatment, all of which might be put in jeopardy by these cuts. Has the Minister had any contact with the Department of Health about the impact not only on that service but on health and well-being overall? Let us face it: transport to get people out of their homes without it being, as Mr Allister said, a very difficult chore for them, is good for their mental health and well-being. We should be embracing that. I have to say that, if that service and the other services provided are not front line, I am not sure what is, or how the House would describe front line.

I also asked the Minister a written question about an equality impact assessment, to find out that, yes, there was one carried out on the regional transportation strategy and the accessible transport strategy when they were adopted, and one was carried out on the overall draft Budget, but those are now some time out of date, and it appears that there has been no impact assessment carried out on the current proposals. I would appreciate it if the Minister could say why that has not been done or will undertake to do that, because I think it is important that the Minister, the Department and officials making those decisions know of the impact that they will have, especially on vulnerable people and especially in isolated rural communities.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Certainly.

Mr McNarry: Thank you. On the matter of fairness, does the Member agree that it is grossly unfair for groups such as Down Community Transport, which is close to his and my heart, to be expected to use their reserves to fund gaps caused by the Department?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McCallister: I appreciate that, Principal Deputy Speaker. I agree entirely with the Member. We are faced at this point with a public body like Translink that has massive reserves, and yet there does not seem to be the same pressure on it to use those. Why would we expect a community-based transport organisation to use what little reserves it may have, when we have no evidence as to what level of reserves it even has? I think it would be detrimental to it. It is something that the Department and its partners, predominantly in Disability Action, should be delivering. That is what I want to see. I worry about the health impact that it is going to have.

On the wider politics, Mr Swann talked about a collective Executive approach. I would dearly love to see a collective Executive approach on anything, let alone this. It would be great to see. I am a huge supporter of collective Cabinet Government. The Executive and our Government desperately need to see that. With every debate that we have in here, it is one party attacking the SDLP Environment Minister for cuts to Mourne Heritage Trust, or suddenly the DUP is lined up for a full week of attacks on the Regional Development Minister, starting today and with a motion of no confidence tomorrow. That is not how and why collective government should work. Who votes for the Budget? You have some parties that vote against the Budget. Some parties claim that they are all right because their Ministers voted against the Budget.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to bring his remarks to a close.

Mr McCallister: We need to get back to the idea of a Government acting collectively in the interests of the people, and particularly vulnerable people in isolated rural communities.

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): At the outset, I want to record my appreciation of the valuable services that the community transport providers provide to local communities and to some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged people in our society. As Minister, I have increased funding for community transport services year on year through internal budget allocations over and above the baseline budget. My track record in supporting these services has ensured that this group of service providers is in a reasonably healthy financial position.

I have listened carefully to everything that has been said, and officials have taken note. If there are specific issues not covered in my response, then we will endeavour to write back to the Member concerned.

I have repeatedly made it clear to the House that I have had to make very difficult and challenging decisions due to the budget that has been allocated to me. The services provided by my Department and its arm's-length bodies impact on people's lives 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

We are talking about basic public services, including water services, a road network and bus and train services. I have had to make very difficult decisions on how to apportion the pain across those services, when, frankly, we ought to be investing in them. I assure the House that no areas have been immune from reductions, and, worse, I am now providing a skeleton road maintenance service with money that I do not currently have. The motion tabled by the Committee Chair does not, in my view, take account of the reality of the budgetary position that I face. This is despite that fact that, as recently as last Wednesday, officials and I have set out the stark reality to the Committee, then and on a number of occasions.

1.15 pm

I have to say that the Committee for Regional Development has been vocal in suggesting that I should restore the reduction from community transport, but I have yet to receive from the Committee any suggestion on how this could be achieved on the basis of my 2015-16 budget allocation. It is clearly fantasy economics to suggest that I could invest more in some areas without identifying where the funding should come from. Perhaps, it is another example of phantom budgeting. I wonder.

Community transport providers operate at a local level every day in towns, cities and rural areas across Northern Ireland to provide and deliver services to their members. The services are provided to people who are unable to access public transport for a variety of reasons. The grant provided by my Department is not a contract for a set number of trips; it is a contribution to the costs incurred by those organisations for the provision of community transport services. That is not to say that those organisations, like any organisations that receive funding from the public purse, should not have to demonstrate that they operate effectively and efficiently. As with every other public service, we need to scrutinise administration and bureaucracy and protect the front line as much as possible. I am pleased to advise the House that the community transport service providers have indicated a willingness to engage in the process in a constructive manner. We need to continue down this path. We need to be clear why there are variances in the average costs per mile and per journey. Not every transport provider has the same area to deal with; the geography is different. I need to be careful when I listen to some of the suggestions made to me on how we address the issue. In addition, there may be opportunities for the providers to share back-office services.

In Wales, they have been able to increase services while reducing costs. I have to say that I would need some convincing that we could not do likewise. It may not be easy, but my Department stands ready to assist the service providers in meeting the challenges before us. I recognise that that process will not happen overnight. We need to recognise also that some providers have built up sizeable reserves to cope with a rainy day. It is raining now — it is raining very heavily now. Having substantial funds sitting in a bank account while reducing front-line services is difficult to accept and difficult for everyone else to understand.

Mr Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Kennedy: No.

Given the limited budget available, my Department has allocated funding to community transport providers this year, taking account of costs and the financial position of each provider. I have also been very mindful of the need to maintain a network of services across Northern Ireland. I do not think that there is much merit in debates about ways of simply shifting funds from one organisation to another. We would end up with no services being provided at all in certain areas.

Members may not be aware of this, but I am pleased to indicate that all the community transport providers have signed and accepted the offers of grant made to them some time ago. Whilst we are debating the issue, my officials are moving on with the real business of delivering services to end users across Northern Ireland.

That said, I confirm that I will bid for additional funding in June monitoring for community transport services and other front-line services delivered through my Department in order to reduce the impact of cuts that I was forced to make due to my initial 2015-16 budget allocation. That bid will be to the tune of £1.5 million, which would simply bring us back to the situation of previous years. I am encouraged that there appears to be support around the Chamber today for that bid. I ask, therefore, that efforts be made to speak to political colleagues at Executive level to ensure that those funds are secured. That would provide at least a bit more breathing space to allow the changes necessary to reduce the cost base to be effected.

I turn to the contributions of Members. It was, in some ways, a predictable and slightly depressing opening from the Chair of the Committee for Regional Development. I am sorry to say that there was little or no sense of reality about the financial position that the Department faces. I regret that, but I am willing to continue to work with the Chair and the Committee to address all the issues.

Mr Ó hOisín commended the network and thought that the cuts were disproportionate. He raised the concerns, rightly, of the rural community. I represent a rural constituency; I know all about it, and I get representations too. I do not live in a bubble or with the dark forces that Mr Dallat seemed to indicate exist in my Department. I live in the real world; I represent real people and hear their concerns at first hand. It does not give me any pleasure to present cuts of this nature to groups or people providing essential community transport services, especially in rural areas, but we need to face political and financial reality.

I get slightly frustrated when I am criticised severely by Sinn Féin and other parties who are costing the Executive £2 million a week by not moving forward with welfare reforms. I have to say that £2 million a week would transform and seriously address many of the issues that I face in my budget not only for community transport but for road maintenance and structural repairs, grass cutting, gully emptying, street lighting and road marking. All of that would benefit substantially if only I had access to the £2 million per week that is being sacrificed for a political, ideological reason by Sinn Féin simply to obey their southern command. Do not come to me and complain about cutbacks when you are the authors of everyone's misfortune in this.

Mr Dallat assured us that there was no party political side to his contribution, and I am happy to accept that. Nevertheless, the financial challenges are there, and your party, Mr Dallat, is contributing to the blockage on welfare reform. It needs to look at that urgently and deal with it as quickly as possible.

Roy Beggs attempted to introduce an air of political reality by mentioning the financial challenges that we all face. Other members of the Executive are the same, and I have no doubt that there are challenges for every Department and everyone in charge of those Departments. This week, the focus seems to be on DRD and, perhaps, Danny Kennedy, but what is important is my focus and desire. I am more concerned about the attitudes of the people and impacts on front-line services beyond the confines of the Chamber than in some of the party-political posturing that we have seen.

Chris Lyttle introduced an interesting scenario. The Alliance solution to everything, apparently, is to impose water charges. I see no political consensus for that. Whilst I accept that that might be Alliance Party policy, it is certainly not Executive policy and it is unlikely to be so. I think that —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Kennedy: No, I will not give way. It is sometimes time to listen and learn.

Mr Easton raised the issue of rural proofing. In this case, because the policy predated the rural proofing initiative, it was not necessary. However, we do of course pay careful attention to all the necessary consultations that have to be undertaken.

Mr Moutray expressed the widespread anger on behalf of those areas that have been affected. I am aware of that, I am concerned about it, and I hope that there might be some consensus, particularly around the Executive table. It might not get a consensus from the Committee for Regional Development — it might be a little bit too optimistic to hope for that — but I hope that there would be more sympathy from the Finance Minister and Executive colleagues.

Mr Byrne highlighted the plight of the disabled and the elderly. He also paid tribute to the transport assistance service that operates in west Tyrone, which I have no doubt does that very effectively. I want to see that supported. However, the contribution from Mr Swann — the collective response — is the one that we should concentrate on.

It is on that basis that I make this plea: the provision of public services ought to be something that everyone in the House can agree on, no matter what their political persuasion, and I ask that the matter not be made into a political football. In my view, the Committee has failed to say where any additional money for community transport should come from. I am the Minister, and I have to deal with the realities that I face. I will continue to do that, and I ask the Committee to do so as well.

Mr Lynch (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank all the Members who contributed to the debate. The Chair was correct that a number of community transport organisations will struggle to survive. Cathal Ó hOisín spoke about the number of trips and the social value of community transport services. He also spoke about the role and importance of volunteers and drivers. John Dallat spoke about the magnitude of the cuts and agreed that it was a bad decision. He pointed out that, whilst many of the organisations expected some cuts, they did not expect such a high level of unsustainable —

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: I will.

Mr Clarke: The Minister did not take interventions, but he spoke about the organisations signing their agreements and moving forward. I want to remind the House and the Minister, who forgot to remind the House, that they signed those agreements on the basis of moving to a reduced service. They did not sign them in the full knowledge that it would be business as usual; they signed them in the knowledge that there would be a substantial reduction in the services provided.

Mr Lynch: I agree with the Member.

Roy Beggs paid tribute to the community transport sector but criticised the Committee for not offering alternatives.

The Committee's role is to advise the Minister, and we have strongly advised him to reverse these cuts.

1.30 pm

Mr Beggs also talked about reserve levels, which are small and are maintained according to DFP guidelines — guidelines that the Department for Regional Development is advising against.

Chris Lyttle spoke of his concerns about the impact that these cuts would have, especially at the huge levels applied. Alex Easton talked about how disturbing the cuts were and criticised the way in which the Department calculated the cuts based on the level of reserves. He also said that the cuts had to be rural proofed.

Stephen Moutray talked about the vital services provided by transport groups and how they allowed users to live independently. He said that Disability Action had had to increase fares and reduce services, adding to isolation. Joe Byrne spoke of social isolation and of a dearth of services in rural areas. Robin Swann spoke of the need for Executive coordination and said he believed that the motion was party political — despite it being agreed by the entire Committee, including his own party colleague.

Jim Allister spoke of his sympathy for the Minister, who was trying to work within his budget. However, he said that he had more sympathy for his constituents who were being negatively impacted as a result of the cuts. John McCallister talked about the impact on his constituents and asked whether similar levels of cuts were being applied elsewhere in the Department.

The Minister spoke about the challenges he faces because of the Budget allocation and the difficult decisions he had to make. He talked about protecting front-line services and said that his officials stand ready to assist community transport organisations in achieving efficiencies. He did not, however, provide any justification for the disproportionate levels of cuts applied by the Department and said that all the organisations had signed their letters of offer.

There is overwhelming support for the restoration of the budget for these vital services. I call on the House to support the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly condemns the disproportionate reduction of the Disability Action and community transport budgets; notes the very negative impact the severe reduction of departmental budgets is having on people with disabilities and the most vulnerable and isolated people in our society; and calls on the Minister for Regional Development to urgently reinstate this essential funding.

Private Members' Business

Funding for Musical Instruments

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other contributors will have five minutes.

Mr McCausland: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the cultural, artistic and community importance of bands in Northern Ireland; recognises the importance of the musical instruments for bands funding programme; expresses its disappointment at the failure of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to fund the programme this year; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to restore the funding for the programme.

The bands sector in Northern Ireland is one of our largest arts sectors in the Province, and I think it is one of the most important and significant. I refer Members to three reports; one was carried out by the Arts Council itself some years ago, when it reviewed the scheme for musical instruments for bands: that was the PricewaterhouseCoopers report in February 2006. Subsequently, a report was commissioned by the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure. It was formerly on the DCAL website and may still be there, although I have not checked. More recently, in 2013, a report was commissioned by the Department for Social Development, which brought forward the figures that, in Northern Ireland, we have over 660 bands, with an active membership of over 25,000 people.

Those independent surveys and reports were carried out for the Departments by reputable and respected consultancy organisations. When you have 660 bands in Northern Ireland and more than 25,000 people learning and making music in them, that is clearly, I suggest, our largest community arts sector.

There are two priorities that stand out in regard to arts and sport: participation and performance. In terms of participation — the number of people taking part — there is clearly a very significant contribution, with 25,000 people spread across flute bands, accordion bands, silver bands, brass bands and pipe bands. Those people are learning and making music on a weekly basis throughout the year. They are attending one or possibly two, and, in some cases, three, practice sessions per week. If you look at the pipe bands sector, you see that we have more pipe bands per head of population in Northern Ireland than Scotland. We also have a very good geographical spread of rural and urban bands. It is a very important sector that is deserving of strong support.

You can refer to the issue of not only participation but performance. People may say, "We are very good at what we do", "We're a very good sector" and so on, but you have to benchmark it; you have to be able to say, "Well, when you assess that, the evidence is there". In the case of bands, the evidence is there.

If we look at the pipe bands sector, we see that, for example, Field Marshal Montgomery has been world champions on numerous occasions. It is only one of the bands that are extremely successful at grade 1. When you look down grades 2, 3 and 4 — those are all very high standards; even grade 4 — at all the bands at all levels, whether it be in piping, drumming, the drum majors or any of the other different elements, you see that Northern Ireland is coming away with a whole raft of medals and trophies in competition after competition, not only in Irish or UK championships but world championships.

There are very few arts sectors where we can say, "We have the very best in the world". We have good theatre, good orchestras and a whole range of arts sectors and activities, but this is the one that I can think of where we are the best in the world. Dunloy Accordion Band, for example, performs at a very high standard. Through competitions, those bands are able to demonstrate not only mass participation but a very high standard, even up to world championship level.

The Belfast Tattoo in the Odyssey was an example of bands being able to demonstrate their quality, across a whole range of types of band, to a wide public audience. I think that the Minister was at the tattoo up in Londonderry at the Ebrington site, and I understand that she was impressed by the quality of some of the bands that she saw on that occasion. I think that everyone would have to admit that the quality is certainly there.

The other thing that is important to mention is that band membership can span generations. You can have maybe two or three generations in the one band, with the passing of skills from older members to younger members. It is about not only musical skills but social and personal skills. People learn to work in a group with others. They learn to develop those social skills working corporately. Young people gain personal self-confidence through becoming competent in a musical instrument.

There are personal, musical and social skills, but all that is dependent on having good instruments. The tragedy is that instruments today are extremely expensive. You could spend up to £10,000 on one instrument in some very extreme cases, but, for many bands, even the grant of a few thousand pounds that they were able to achieve through the fund has been extremely important for them in providing better quality instruments.

The contribution of bands to the economy through spend on instruments and transport is substantial. Members probably received a circular from the Ulster-Scots Community Network at one stage setting out some of the facts and figures. It said that bands from Northern Ireland represent Northern Ireland at events in Great Britain, USA, Canada, Norway, France, Gibraltar and Belgium and are regular visitors at prestigious events such as the Lord Mayor's show in London. So, this is an important sector.

It was, therefore, very disappointing to find that, when the budget was brought forward, this particular scheme, which has been going very successfully for a number of years, has been cut completely on this occasion. Other sectors had a cut imposed on them. It might have been 10%, 5%, 15%, 20% or whatever — there were cuts. We acknowledge that, because of a whole range of reasons, some external to Northern Ireland and some internal in the Assembly, cuts have been imposed. However, I could not find evidence of an entire sector being written out 100% in the way that this was. This was a 100% cut.

Our hope was that there would be some response and an opportunity to find a source of funding through the June monitoring round. The Minister was quoted in the papers and made some comments in answer to questions in the Assembly that were, I thought, encouraging. However, when I looked at the monitoring round and at what was being proposed, I found that I had to get a dictionary to check the meaning of the word "inescapable". Things get top priority where they are inescapable, but "inescapable" seems to have become a very elastic and flexible term.

What particularly interested me was that, whilst the funding for the band scheme was there as one of the bids, there were far more new bids being brought in for other things, particularly things regarding the Irish language that I know the Minister has stated her particular interest in and affinity with. I think that that is disappointing, because at a time when money is going to be tight — if, indeed, there is any money at all or any Budget at all — all these things are up in the air. However, the fact that this scheme was simply one among so many said to me that it was well down the list of priorities.

I encourage the Minister and the Department to look at this again. It is a modest sum of money in the scheme of things. It gives a very wide spread across male/female, rural/urban, younger/older and all these different areas. We hear members of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee applying pressure on the need to rural proof. One member in particular — he has just looked up — is very strong on rural proofing. Yet, the fact is that a large number of these bands are in rural areas. I encourage the Minister to think about this again, to give support to the bands and to reinstate the scheme. I believe that that would be very much appreciated and would do much to encourage the bands. It is sad to see bands sometimes having to rely on very old instruments. Given the change that it can make to the quality of the music and the experience for the young people, I think that it is very deserving.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom a rá ar dtús go bhfuil mé ag tabhairt tacaíochta don rún seo inniu. I support the motion today. Agus tá fócas an rúin ar mhaoiniú d'uirlisí ceoil. Its focus is on funding for musical instruments, but it criticises DCAL on the issue. I do not believe that that is valid.

When I look at the Minister's words, I see that she said that she intends to bid for additional funds for this valuable scheme in June monitoring and that she understands that the uncertainty will not be welcome for those in marching bands. We can see that over half a million pounds has been awarded under the scheme in the past three years. That shows a real commitment from the Minister. She says that she remains committed to supporting musical instruments for bands and will work to secure further funding when it becomes available. Le fírinne, bhí ráiteas an Aire dearfach, agus deir sí arís is arís go bhfuil sí tiomanta d'uirlisí ceoil ar chur ar fáil do bhannaí ceoil.

The Minister's statement, I believe, is positive. She reiterates her commitment to providing support for musical instruments for bands. Nonetheless, I support the general thrust of the motion. It is important to note the cultural, artistic and community importance of bands in the North. However, funding for instruments should include all musical forms. We should be encouraging the gamut of musical expression by initiating funding for as many musicians as possible so that the talents of all are nurtured and developed.

1.45 pm

One of the reports that the Member who has just spoken referred to was the 2011 report published by DCAL. It sought to provide information on the marching band sector and to aid its future development. The report was very wide ranging and informative and acknowledged the very positive impacts that marching bands have on their communities. I acknowledge that. However, it also drew attention to the negativity that is often associated with the sector. In one part, the report specifically states “contentious or sensitive parades could be considered the largest single issue facing the marching band sector”.

That must be seriously addressed.

It is also important that public money not be used to support any type of activity that is sectarian in nature or that disrespects other communities. A couple of years ago, we witnessed from a band a display of very offensive behaviour outside St Patrick's Church in Belfast. That was a precise example of what should not be happening or be supported by the fund.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Ms McCorley: Yes.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member join me, then, in highlighting the behaviour of a republican flute band outside St Anne's Cathedral?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Ms McCorley: I am not aware of the incident that the Member is speaking about, so I cannot comment on it.

I feel that it is important to note that most bands do not involve themselves in that sort of behaviour. Indeed, we have seen examples of very good behaviour by the Bands Forum in Derry, whose members have engaged very positively with other communities and, indeed, participated in the Sinn Féin ard-fheis earlier this year. That type of engagement is extremely positive and respectful, and we should all be seeking to see that replicated across the North, particularly in contentious areas such as north Belfast.

The report also references the contribution to the marching band tradition of the world-renowned flautist Sir James Galway. I listened to Sir James's comments in recent days. I imagine that he would not support the view that engaging in offensive behaviour is something that bands should be involved in.

Let us look at funding. Since 1995, marching bands have received £4.75 million. In comparison, Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann has received well under £500,000 for the same period. As I said earlier, we need to support all musicians, wherever possible. When Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann gave evidence to the Committee earlier this year, it told us that it supports 6,000 musicians and that its membership of 60,000 ranges in age from eight to 88. It also has a very positive impact on the community. The outcomes from the activity of Comhaltas, including the great success of the Fleadh Cheoil 2013 in Derry, are hugely positive and should be afforded a similarly high level of consideration as that given to the marching bands for the positivity that it brings to its own community.

While I am here, I would like to mention the Andersonstown school of music in west Belfast, which recently lost its entire funding. That is a great shame, because it provides tuition and support to many disadvantaged young musicians in my local area. I hope to see that funding reinstated also.

Mar sin de, tá mé ag moladh gur chóir comhionannas a bheith ann do gach sórt ceoil. Today, I am calling for equality for all musical forms. When the Minister is seeking further funding for marching bands, and I support here in that search, I urge her to consider other musicians, ones who do not belong to that tradition but who nonetheless must be encouraged and supported in their endeavours.

Mrs McKevitt: The musical instruments for bands funding scheme has been put on hold owing to budgetary restraints. As a member of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee, I hear regularly about culturally important funding being cut. That has affected not only those who use the funding scheme but many who rely on funding from the Department and the Arts Council. I could stand here and name 100 groups that have had their funding cut — some by 50%, some by 100% — but I could not fit in all their names in the short time that I have to speak.

A request was made in the June monitoring round for the musical instruments for bands funding scheme. The bid was submitted to the Department of Finance and Personnel last week, and the outcome will be announced in the coming weeks. Indeed, the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure agreed to write to the Minister in support of the restoration of the fund. The Committee recognises that, while other funds are available for musical instruments, they are not usually open to many bands, and, as such, there is a special need for the musical instruments for bands funding programme to be restored.

The motion is timely because many bands march during the summer months. I hope, as do my colleagues in the SDLP, that this season will pass off peacefully. Whilst I support the reintroduction of the fund, I encourage the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to work with the Arts Council to ensure that access to the fund is available only to marching bands that adhere to a specific code of conduct. My colleague Mr Bradley will, I hope, elaborate on that point during his contribution.

I fully recognise the cultural and community importance of bands and the need for bands to work in a cross-community manner and to promote good relations. I wish to share with you all a story told to me by a neighbour who was a member of the Commons Silver Band. It demonstrates the good relationship that existed between the Commons Silver Band, an organisation going back more than 70 years, and Irish nationalist bands. The story goes that, on the eve of the 12 July parade, the canvas on the drum belonging to the Commons Silver Band was damaged. There was no time to repair the drum so members of the band tried to find a drum to borrow. A drum was found and offered to the band by the Irish National Foresters (INF) — a gesture of cross-community relations even before the term was coined.

Mr Dallat: The Member has inspired my memory to work. Did she hear this morning, on 'Thought for the Day' on 'Good Morning Ulster', about the two bands from quite diverse backgrounds that eventually discovered that they were playing the same tune? Does she agree that money should be invested to encourage people to play the same tune?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mrs McKeivitt: I thank the Member for his intervention. That influenced me to add this wee story to the debate to lighten the mood of the House. I hope that the House is united and that we all sing from the same hymn sheet, if you will pardon the pun.

The only problem with the Irish National Foresters' drum was that its markings of origin had to be disguised, but, on 12 July that year, unbeknownst to the spectators, the INF drum kept the Commons Silver Band in beat.

I encourage more organisations to share instruments when possible and even to share their stories of cross-community cooperation because, sadly, most days we hear only negative news stories about bands.

I will finish by paying tribute to bands in my constituency, all of which play a very important role in our communities. I hope that no bands are lost due to a lack of funding. I hope that the June monitoring round will be successful in reinstating the musical instruments for bands scheme. The SDLP supports the motion.

Mr Cree: The objective of this funding through the Arts Council states that the programme is designed to:

"increase the quality of music-making in the community by helping bands replace worn-out instruments and purchase new instruments."

Should this funding not be considered for reinstatement in the current budget, what are the implications?

On 1 April this year, the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure announced that the scheme was being put on hold. She advised us that the budget shortfall meant that she was unable to endorse funding at the present time but intends to bid for additional funds for this valuable scheme in the June monitoring round. I believe that she has done so.

Those are encouraging words, but, given the current crisis situation in the Executive at the failure of the Minister's party to agree the overall Budget, I wonder how successful she will be in the June monitoring round. June is now upon us, and there is a big question as to how much money, if any, will be available for redistribution.

I want to share with the House key findings from a study, 'Marching Bands in Northern Ireland'. In my opinion, the findings encompass the very essence of why it is important to secure and reinstate the musical instruments for bands funding as a priority.

Over the past three years, some £500,000 has been allocated in support of the programme. In the wider scheme of events, another year's secured funding would amount to just over £166,000, which is a small, although not insignificant, amount to release, given the wider cross-community benefits to be gained. The study states:

"Internationally, marching bands have a large following. They provide many outlets for those involved, should this be learning to play a musical instrument, being with friends, being part of a community ... Additionally, they provide further benefits for their wider communities and economies through events and revenue generation."

All of these key criteria, along with the claim that the motivation for forming a band:

"is often driven by social, economic, religious, political and/or cultural needs", are, I believe, relevant and more than meet the criteria for releasing funding for cultural activities in Northern Ireland at this time.

Often, the media, unfortunately, give marching bands bad press, especially at sensitive times during what is commonly known, and has been referred to, as the marching season. Whilst we should not condone any unacceptable behaviour at these times by a minority of groups and individuals, neither should all bands be tarred with the same brush, as the press often imply. Marching bands extend much further than that narrow misconception.

Valerie Quinn, the chair of the Confederation of Ulster Bands, in her appraisal of the study of marching bands in Northern Ireland, commented:

"this large sector, with over 30,000 participants, has many strengths".

I agree with her that marching bands preserve our cultural heritage, support local communities and teach our young people new skills.

Finally, I urge the Minister to give serious consideration to restoring this vital funding and including it in her budget portfolio for 2016 and beyond. Adding continuity of funding and giving valuable support to the sector can only help to change the perception of marching band communities, locally and further afield. Mrs McKeivitt, in her example, mentioned the cooperation between bands. I tell the House that that is by no means unique, and I know many instances of bands lending instruments to each other. That is healthy, and I agree fully that there should be friendly cooperation.

I support the motion on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As Question Time begins at 2.00 pm, I suggest that the House take its ease until then. The debate will commence after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Anna Lo.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Sexual Orientation Strategy

1. Ms Lo asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister when they will bring a draft sexual orientation strategy to the Executive. (AQO 8321/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Mr Speaker, with your permission, before I answer this question — I am sure that I am speaking for the whole community — I would like to express our support for Paul Finlay-Dickson, whose home was attacked at the weekend in a homophobic attack. I am sure that I speak for most people when I say that it was a disgraceful attack on that man, who is grieving because of the loss of his husband Maurice, who died in January.

To answer the question, we have regularly stated our commitment to producing a sexual orientation strategy in the Assembly and in the context of the good relations strategy, Together: Building a United Community. To achieve that commitment, we asked officials to commence a public consultation process. The first phase of that process ended on 6 June last year. Analysis of responses to that 12-week consultation period has been finalised, and the results are being used to inform the content of a draft sexual orientation strategy. The draft strategy is being developed using a co-design process with relevant stakeholders through the sexual orientation project team. A meeting of the project team took place on 15 April, and a further meeting is planned for June. Once developed, the draft strategy will be referred to the Executive for final agreement and publication in draft form. A further 12-week period of public consultation will then take place.

Ms Lo: The 10-year delay in publishing and bringing forward the strategy is a disgrace. The junior Minister mentioned the incident with Mr Paul Finlay-Dickson. Does the Minister not see the need for urgency in bringing forward the strategy? The consultation has taken far too long, and we are still seeing more and more delay.

Ms J McCann: I agree with the Member that the strategy has been far too long in coming. As we see and have heard from the PSNI, there has been an increase in hate crime of that type in recent times, and there is an onus on us to bring the strategy forward. As I said, that is what we are looking to do. We are trying to get it brought forward as quickly as possible with agreement on the strategy. I hope to be here saying that that will be brought forward in a short period ahead.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. The Minister has already touched on this, but does she agree with me that the strategy needs to be put in place as soon as possible?

Ms J McCann: Certainly, given that, as I said in my previous answer, there has been an increase in that type of hate crime. There have been some debates in the Chamber recently, and there is an onus on a lot of people, when they are speaking, to be very temperate in their language as well, because I believe that we need to send a very clear message to the LGBT community that it has the reassurance that the Executive will ensure that its needs and interests will be addressed by government. To re-emphasise, this process has been delayed. However, we have to redouble our efforts to ensure that the strategy is put in place as soon as possible.

Mr Eastwood: Given the very positive affirmation of equal marriage by the people of the Twenty-six Counties, what will the Minister's Department do to advance the cause of ensuring that all the people of Ireland have the opportunity to be treated as equals in their own country?

Ms J McCann: The Member makes a very valid point. The recent referendum in the South means that the North is out of sync with the rest of Ireland and Britain. We really need to ensure equality and challenge any time when there is discrimination against anyone, no matter what the reason is for it.

People have a right to choose who they want to marry, and it is particularly important to send a clear message out to our young people in the LGBT community so that they feel valued and are given confidence and reassurance. We have to do that from this Chamber in particular, but we also have to ensure that we are legislating and that anything that we do here is for everyone, that we are progressive and, at any time, we need to challenge homophobia in any other places where that leads to discrimination and everything else against people, particularly our young people.

Mr Cree: How many strategies in the deputy First Minister's Department's area of responsibility have yet to be published? What are the various reasons for the delays?

Ms J McCann: As the Member will know, a number of strategies are being developed. At the moment, we have the sexual orientation strategy, the racial equality strategy and the gender equality strategy. We are pushing forward on those. Junior Minister McIlveen and me attended the gender advisory panel last Thursday. We are hopeful that that strategy will come out very soon. When we are talking about strategies, we need to put the time in to get those strategies right. We need to talk to all the stakeholders involved. I emphasise that a strategy will go a long way to help in some of the issues, but it is about implementing the strategy, not just having the strategy there. The strategy is only as good as its action plan and implementation, so we need to get it right.

Stormont House Agreement: Update

2. Mr Girvan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the progress of the implementation of the Stormont House Agreement. (AQO 8322/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: Executive party leaders continue to meet weekly to take forward the implementation of the Stormont House Agreement. An implementation plan was drawn up in early January, and work is continuing on a wide range of commitments, including matters such as dealing with the past, flags, parades and emblems. The current impasse over the welfare protections agreed at Stormont House and since and the budgetary pressures stemming from the British Government have created very serious difficulties, which have implications for the agreement and the future of these institutions. Those difficulties need to be resolved. I still believe that it is possible to do that, and I am very much in problem-solving mode. What is required now is political will from all parties and both Governments to reach a suitable resolution that protects the most vulnerable in our society and the economic viability of these institutions.

Mr Girvan: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. He alluded to the protection of the most vulnerable and some of the protections that had been negotiated and agreed in relation to welfare reform. Should direct intervention from Westminster be the only way forward, would those protections still be there for people who had the bedroom tax agreed previously?

Mr M McGuinness: For such an eventuality to occur — that is, the withdrawal of powers from this institution by the British Government — I have been on the public record as saying that that would be totally and absolutely unacceptable. What we need to recognise here is that the declarations of intent coming from the Treasury over the last while in relation to our future budgets and the £25 billion that it intends to cut from budgets all over these islands, with the exception of the South, some £12 billion of that is for welfare and £13 billion is for Departments.

Clearly, for the purposes of moving forward in a planned way, the questions that I have been asking of the Secretary of State over the last couple of weeks to identify for us the scale of those cuts in relation to this Executive have not been answered. I fail to see how we can plan for the future against the backdrop of some of the speculation that is coming from London in relation to all that. For example, speculation is rife about the prospect of the uplift that we would give to people on social welfare to ensure and protect their income. We are now being told — there is a lot of speculation about it — that, if there is an uplift, it is quite likely that it will be taxed by the British Government. People are talking about the taxation of carer's allowance.

The other important point in all this is that, when we talk to the British Secretary of State —

Mr Speaker: Two minutes is up.

Mr M McGuinness: I will come back to that in a supplementary.

Mr Nesbitt: Within the projections for new jobs created by lowering the rate of corporation tax, the Minister will be aware that there is a specific number from Invest Northern Ireland of jobs to be created once we set the rate and the date, rather than waiting for the corporation tax change to take effect. Those potential jobs are at risk because of the current impasse. Will the Minister share with the House the number of jobs at risk in that specific category?

Mr M McGuinness: I would prefer to focus on how we can avoid such a scenario, and one way of doing that is to ensure that we in this House do what the First Minister of Scotland has appealed to all the other parties in the Scottish Parliament to do, which is to join together to fight the cuts that are coming from London. The Member will be aware that there was a proposition from Scotland and Wales that Welsh representatives, Scottish representatives and representatives from here should meet. We were absolutely up for that meeting. That did not happen with our presence, but it did happen in Scotland with only Welsh and Scottish representatives present.

I think that we need to focus our attention on how we get the Stormont House Agreement implemented. My party is absolutely determined to see the Stormont House Agreement implemented, but it has to be done in a fashion that allows us to challenge the attempts by the British Government to continually undermine our budgets.

The point that I was going to make earlier is that Theresa Villiers keeps saying to us that there is no more money; there is no more money; there is no more money. Yet, the plans that the British Government have for us are to take more money off us. They declared that in relation to the July budget and the further articulation of that coming this autumn. I say to everybody in the House and every party in the House that we need to stand with Scotland, we need to stand with Wales, and we need to tell the British Government that this is unacceptable.

Mr Attwood: Last Thursday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that, independent of what happens in July and in the autumn, there will be in-year cuts to the current Budget measured in a number of billions of pounds. Have the Northern Ireland Executive, OFMDFM or DFP been advised that there are or will be any consequential in-year cuts for the 2015-16 Budget arising from what the Chancellor announced last week?

Mr M McGuinness: In recent times and at different meetings that we participated in, the Member and I have been on record highlighting the fact that there was speculation some time ago that there would be further in-year cuts to our Budget for 2015-16. That has now been made very clear by the Treasury. It is absolutely certain that, taking account of our proportion of all that, it intends to impose to further cuts on this Administration. That is without even talking about what is going to be announced in July, which is like a juggernaut coming down the track in relation to the budgets available to our Departments over the coming years when you consider a figure of £25 billion and what our proportion of that would be. I have asked the questions continuously, and the Member has been there when I have asked them. The answer that I get is, "Wait until July."

When it comes to future planning and our ability to deliver front-line services, the important thing is that this is not just about welfare. Anybody who thinks that this debate is just about welfare is living in cloud cuckoo land. This is a bigger debate about the intentions of this British Government to impose further cuts on vital Departments in this Administration, which will detrimentally affect people who are in employment. It will threaten their jobs and the jobs of others in society who are working to deliver within the health service and within the education system, not to mention all the other Departments.

2.15 pm

Mr Allister: We all know that the deputy First Minister has backed out of the welfare deal that he made at Stormont House, but the Stormont House Agreement also promised other things, including the delivery of structures for an opposition by March. March has come and gone by three months. Has he also backed out of that commitment?

Mr M McGuinness: I absolutely reject any suggestion that I have backed out of any commitment. When I give commitments, I keep them. I made a very firm commitment to the Royal Ulster Agricultural Society when it moved from the King's Hall to Maze/Long Kesh: I kept my side of the bargain; others did not keep theirs.

In relation to the Stormont House Agreement, it is quite interesting that the Member has focused on the issue of an opposition. He forms his own one-man opposition in the Assembly, and he is very proud of that. There are ongoing discussions taking place at the party leaders' meetings for the purpose of ensuring that, as we go forward, we put in place arrangements for an opposition if there are parties in the Assembly — which I doubt — prepared to take it up.

Human Rights Act 1998

3. Mr Lynch asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment of the impact on their Department's functions of the British Government's proposed repeal of the Human Rights Act 1998. (AQO 8323/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: We are aware of the British Government's intention to replace the Human Rights Act with a British bill of rights. Responsibility for such legislation lies with the British Ministry of Justice and the NIO. As a devolved Administration, we have a responsibility to implement and monitor human rights obligations and to provide advice on equality and human rights issues. OFMDFM carries out that role by liaising with the British Government in relation to matters on United Nations conventions, including providing input for reports and briefings for delegations attending UN oral examinations.

Any repeal of the Human Rights Act will have enormous implications, particularly for compliance with the Good Friday Agreement. The proposals have attracted criticism from various groups and individuals, such as the Scottish First Minister, Nicola Sturgeon, Jonathan Edwards and Simon Thomas of Plaid Cymru, a former British Attorney General, Dominic Grieve, and, locally, Les Allamby, chief commissioner of the Human Rights Commission, and Brian Gormally, director of the Committee on the Administration of Justice.

I am pleased that, just last week, the Assembly resolved to reject any attempts by the British Government to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998. We will continue to keep a watching brief, and as more details emerge on the proposals we will wish to discuss them with the British Government.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. He mentioned the Good Friday Agreement. How would any move to repeal the Human Rights Act be in breach of the Good Friday Agreement?

Mr M McGuinness: As the Member, and everyone else in the House, knows, the Good Friday Agreement was an agreement between the British and Irish Governments and many of the parties that participated in those negotiations.

Article 2 of an annex to the Good Friday Agreement binds the British Government internationally to the multi-party deal, which was endorsed through joint referenda on the island of Ireland in May 1998. After it was ratified, both Governments lodged the agreement as a treaty with the United Nations. The British Government committed to the complete incorporation into law here of the European Convention on Human Rights.

Any attempts to displace the European Convention on Human Rights and to repeal the Human Rights Act will have enormous implications, particularly for compliance with the Good Friday Agreement. Any lessening of human rights law, and specifically the repeal of the Human Rights Act, would be a grievous breach of the Good Friday Agreement and would mean that the institutional architecture of that agreement was seriously undermined, particularly in respect of policing and justice matters.

Mr Campbell: Is the deputy First Minister aware that part of the reason for changes to the Human Rights Act being demanded is that, particularly in GB, there have been a number of instances where legal representations have been made on behalf of people who have been guilty of very serious criminal and terrorist acts and have used the Human Rights Act to try to mitigate their heinous actions? Does the deputy First Minister agree that that has been the case?

Mr M McGuinness: I think that one of the primary considerations of this British Government in relation to ending the Human Rights Act and bringing in a British Bill of rights is all tied up in the ongoing so-called negotiation that is taking place between David Cameron and others in the European Union. It is quite obvious that as part of a menu of issues that the present British Government wish to renegotiate is the whole issue of the ability of the European Court of Human Rights to make important decisions in relation to member states. I think that that is the prime motivation. In relation to the matters that the Member mentioned, I think that, in the context of the law as it stands, there is the ability to bring those who are involved in criminality before the courts.

Historical Institutional Abuse Inquiry: Mother-and-baby Homes

4. Mr Ó hOisín asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they will recommend that the historical institutional abuse inquiry be extended to include mother-and-baby homes. (AQO 8324/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question.

Ms J McCann: The historical institutional abuse inquiry was initiated by the 2009 Assembly debate about the historical institutional abuse (HIA) of children. Its terms of reference refer to children under 18 years of age, and it was on that basis that the inquiry was designed and its chairperson and panel members appointed.

Mother-and-baby homes and Magdalene laundries were not established principally for the care of children and had many residents who were over the age of 18. To the extent that the inquiry has received applications from people who spent time in a home of this type here while under the age of 18, those will be considered. Until all applicants have been interviewed, it will not be possible for the inquiry to make a final decision on whether these cases properly fall within the terms of reference.

It is the view of the inquiry chairperson that the inquiry simply could not cope with some major new area of investigation within the timescales imposed by the Assembly. He felt that considering amending the scope of its terms of reference at this stage would undermine all of the considerable work that has already been done and the effort that has gone into reaching this critical juncture in the inquiry.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Can the Minister give us any more details of what options are in the scoping papers?

Ms J McCann: The Member asks a very valid question, because I think we realised that a number of people fell outside the terms of reference. The previous junior Minister, Minister Bell, and I met a number of individuals and organisations in relation to that. As I said, we were aware of it.

We asked officials to go away and bring us back a scoping paper that would look at some of the people who fell outside the remit of the current inquiry. They came back with a number of options, which include the following: extending the terms of reference of the HIA inquiry to include women aged 18 and over who were in mother-and-baby homes and Magdalene laundries; commissioning academic research into mother-and-baby homes and laundries; establish an interdepartmental working group led by the Department of Health to review the evidence and make recommendations to the Executive; invite the Committee for the First Minister and deputy First Minister to consider and advise on the issue of the mother-and-baby homes, including the Magdalene laundries; appoint independent experts to review the evidence and provide a confidential listening forum; and establish an independent statutory inquiry into mother-and-baby homes and Magdalene laundries.

We are looking at all of those options, and, obviously, meeting the people who were directly involved and who were in those mother-and-baby homes and who had their children forcibly taken off them, in many cases, and put into forced adoptions. We are very conscious that we need to talk to the people who were directly impacted by this and look at whatever option will be best for them.

Mrs D Kelly: In light of the refusal of the British Government to include Kincora in the historical institutional abuse inquiry, what way forward or action has OFMDFM planned to take to have Kincora included? Has it had any discussions with the historical institutional abuse inquiry that is being held here?

Ms J McCann: The Member will be aware that, on 30 September last year, we unanimously agreed that we would rather see the Kincora Boys' Home investigated by Westminster's independent panel. I think that we were all very disappointed when we heard that that was not happening. We have had consultation with the historical institutional abuse inquiry and Sir Anthony Hart, and we are conscious that he recently released a joint statement to say that they would be working together. There is also an ongoing judicial review as requested by one of the people who was in Kincora. As I said, we are doing our best to ensure that as many powers as possible can be transferred over, but I share the Member's disappointment that that inquiry is not taking place at Westminster.

Mrs Overend: Given that the HIA inquiry has added a module investigating the paedophile activities of Father Brendan Smyth, does the junior Minister agree that it is unfair that some victims are excluded from the HIA inquiry on the grounds of where the abuse took place rather than because of the nature of the abuse?

Ms J McCann: Yes. We have been in consultation with individuals and groups representing victims of clerical abuse. When we looked at the issue of people who fell outside the remit of the current inquiry, one thing that we considered was people who were the victim of clerical abuse outside institutions. We will continue in our efforts to reach some sort of position where we can take that forward.

Victims of sexual abuse, no matter where it happens, still face lifelong challenges. We need to be sure that, when we consider putting something in place, the terms of reference include people who have suffered this type of abuse no matter where it took place or who the perpetrator was.

Mr Speaker: A number of loud conversations are going on around the House. I am much more interested in hearing the questions and answers.

Social Investment Fund: Budget

5. Mrs McKeivitt asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister how much of the budget for the social investment fund has been spent to date. (AQO 8325/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer the question.

Ms J McCann: Expenditure on the social investment fund (SIF) to date is £1,576,366. That includes expenditure for consultancy support provided to steering groups in 2013 to develop their area plans. Of the overall programme, £53.5 million or 67% is now committed to 33 projects across the nine social investment zones. Many of those projects are to roll out over a number of years; therefore, immediate actual expenditure is not desired or expected. However, we are contractually committed to this expenditure, and the funding is ring-fenced and committed to those projects.

Expenditure is entering a key phase, with 12 revenue and five capital projects due to start delivery or build in the next few months. Due diligence work is progressing for the remaining capital projects, and it is anticipated that they will move to tender for design teams later in the summer. Work on achieving business case approval for the remaining projects is continuing.

Mrs McKeivitt: The junior Minister must acknowledge that, four years after the announcement of the £80 million fund, less than £2 million has been spent. She has to acknowledge that there are multiple difficulties with SIF. With the delays in allocating spending moneys, will she confirm whether there will be a SIF 2?

Ms J McCann: I do not know whether there will be a SIF 2. The Member makes a valid point about the delays, and I am very conscious of them. We have discussed this quite a lot at Question Time. Because SIF includes other Departments, getting through the economic appraisals and everything else was a lengthy process. The letters of offer and all that are there now. I hope that those projects will come to fruition, because I know that there is frustration for people in the community who want to see something happen on the ground. I am very keen that those projects are driven through as quickly as possible.

2.30 pm

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Parades Commission

T1. Mr Buchanan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether, as we approach the parading season, the deputy First Minister agrees that the Parades Commission is discredited and incapable of solving or finding a solution to the parading problem. (AQT 2601/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: No, I am sorry: I do not agree with the Member that the Parades Commission is discredited. The Parades Commission has been in place for a considerable time and undertakes a very onerous responsibility in assisting civic society and the police to ensure that the peace that we all believe is precious is preserved.

It is hugely important, as we approach the marching season, that we all — all the key stakeholders and key players — use as much influence as we can in what could be a volatile situation to ensure that peace remains on our streets and law and order is observed by everybody. Obviously, it is a huge issue, and, as someone who has experience in the north-west of how parading can be resolved — I am not the only one with that experience, as some from the Member's party have also played a very positive role, along with the Apprentice Boys, the business community and the Bogside residents, to bring peace on the streets of the north-west — I would like to see that extended to every part of the North. We are all very conscious that we face into a difficult situation again this year in north Belfast, and I appeal to everybody to use their influence to encourage people to get round the table, as was the case in the north-west, to seek resolutions. I think that, if people do that, resolutions can be found.

Mr Buchanan: Will the deputy First Minister use his influence to encourage his party colleagues across Northern Ireland to desist from protesting at traditional, legitimate parades?

Mr M McGuinness: When you look at the fact that there are many thousands of parades right throughout the North, you see that the parades that are contentious are few and far between. I encourage everybody, including all those in my party who, I know, play a very positive role in contributing to keeping the peace on the streets, to continue with that work.

Community Relations: South Belfast

T2. Mr McGimpsey asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an assessment of the damage done to community relations in south Belfast as a consequence of the comments made by the director of the Council for Ethnic Minorities, specifically in relation to the consultation on the new consolidated primary school. (AQT 2602/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: I think that we all recognise that the issue of community relations and the battle against racism require all of us to play a positive and constructive role. Patrick Yu, in my view, has for a very long time been very much to the forefront of assisting the process of ensuring good community relations.

In the context of the future education of children in that area, the particular matter that the Member raises is really an issue for the Department of Education. I know that an ongoing process is taking place on all that. I am sure that Patrick Yu, who has played a very powerful and positive role in the past will continue to play that role in the future.

Mr McGimpsey: Will the deputy First Minister agree with me that one of the best ways forward for community relations is to provide the new primary school, which has been in planning for somewhere around 15 years?

It is much needed. It would bring together all the local communities, which strongly support it, and integrate newcomer communities with the local community so that we live together, work together and are educated together, rather than continue with a form of segregation, which we appear to be developing.

Mr M McGuinness: On that matter, which has found itself in the headlines in the past seven days, there is a duty on all of us to play a positive and restrained role in how it is resolved. The final decision on the future education of children in that area of south Belfast obviously rests with the Department of Education. I am sure that whatever decision the Minister takes will be the one that he thinks is in the best interests of the children from that particular community. At this time, all of us need to be very conscious of the words that we use and of the responsibilities that we as elected representatives have to ensure that we deal with such matters in a way that is consistent with bettering community relations, not exacerbating them.

Paul McCauley: Condolences

T3. Ms Boyle asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to express their condolences to the family of Paul McCauley, following Paul's tragic death at the weekend after nine years in a coma as a result of a sectarian attack in Derry. (AQT 2603/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: This was an appalling criminal act carried out on a defenceless young man and his friends, which has resulted, nine years later, in the tragic and very sad loss of his life. I spoke to Jim McCauley yesterday. I am sure that everybody in the House will be very keen to put on record their sympathy, prayers and condolences to the family, who have conducted themselves with great dignity over the past nine years.

I very much welcome the comments made this morning on the BBC by William Hay, now Lord Hay. He exhorted people in the loyalist/unionist community to cooperate. I want to stress that I think that the vast majority of unionists in the Derry area are as appalled at what happened to Paul McCauley as anybody else, but the reality is that there are a tiny minority who were involved in that act and involved in assisting those who were involved in that act. William Hay hit the nail on the head this morning when he made it clear that people should cooperate with the Police Service so that the criminals responsible for what happened to Paul McCauley can be brought before the courts.

Ms Boyle: I thank the Minister for his response. Given the tragic nature and circumstances of Paul's death, as the Minister outlined, what more can be done, particularly in the communities that the perpetrators come from, to assist in securing justice for Paul and his family?

Mr M McGuinness: Paul's father has been in the media over the last nine years but specifically in the last 48 hours. He appeared on Radio 5 Live and did so again this morning, and it was heartbreaking to listen to him. It is also heartbreaking to hear his analysis that more could have been done in the unionist community to identify the perpetrators and bring them before the courts. He is using language such as, "It's well known who they are", and, of course, in the Derry area, it is well known who they are, but the difficulty is that the police — who have been on the record as apologising to the McCauley family, and rightly so — need to be assisted in the renewed murder investigation so that the people who were responsible for the horrendous injuries to Paul, and, ultimately, for his death, can be arrested and brought before the courts.

Child Protection Disclosures: Victims

T4. Mr Frew asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, given the fact that, only last week, the House passed an amendment to the Justice Bill to introduce child protection disclosures for sex offenders, whether they agree that we should do everything in our power to encourage the many victims out there who are yet to come forward to do just that. (AQT 2604/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, junior Minister McCann will answer this question.

Ms J McCann: The Member is quite right: we should do everything in our power. The deputy First Minister asked, through the North/South Ministerial Council, that we put in place a mechanism whereby people could come forward in a safe atmosphere because the most important thing is that people feel supported and that they can come forward. There are lots of those people out there. It is said, for instance, that, right across the island of Ireland, one in every four people suffers some form of sexual abuse in their lives. It is very important that we support them and have those support mechanisms in place. If we could work that through the North/South Ministerial Council, it would be a way forward for people to have that support mechanism.

Mr Frew: Will the junior Minister encourage everyone in the House, even members of her own party, to come forward with all information that they know on sex offenders and offences against children?

Ms J McCann: I certainly will. I encourage anyone who has any information to come forward. It is also important to send that very clear message out to people because we need to ensure that victims of any form of abuse know that they will be supported through that and that the support mechanisms that they need will be there when they decide that they want to come forward. It is also important that we help them when they access justice because they are entitled to justice.

Sustainable Development Strategy

T5. Mr B McCrea asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what importance they attach to a sustainable development strategy. (AQT 2605/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: It is very important that we recognise the need for a sustainable development strategy that works in the interests of all the people whom we represent, particularly given the very limited resources that we are all expected to work with and that will be further pressurised by the intention of the British Government to impose further draconian cuts not just on us but on other Administrations across these islands. Sustainable development is critical. We have sustainable development strategies in place. Our ability to fund those strategies is being threatened by the declaration of intent by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer that he will dramatically cut our budgets further in the time ahead.

Mr B McCrea: Will the deputy First Minister support Minister Mark H Durkan's desire to bring forward a climate change Bill? If so, how will he convince his Executive colleagues to support it?

Mr M McGuinness: I see that the Minister has entered the Chamber just at the right time. There has to be some coordination between that question and the appearance of the Minister.

Whatever the Minister brings forward on a climate change Bill will be considered very seriously by the Executive.

Victims and Survivors Service: Outreach Officers

T6. Mrs Dobson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to explain how the Victims and Survivors Service ensures that outreach officers assigned to assist its clients are appropriate to their needs, particularly in confidentiality and quality. (AQT 2606/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, Mr Speaker, junior Minister McCann will answer this question.

Ms J McCann: As the Member will be aware, the Victims and Survivors Service (VSS) is undergoing a review. Several reports have made a number of recommendations. What we heard very clearly from all parties, particularly in the Chamber, is that many victims and survivors of the conflict came forward a while back and said that they felt that going through the assessment process, for instance, was quite traumatic for them and that some of the support mechanisms that were in place could have been better. We will continue to monitor the ongoing review and recommendations, a number of which have already been put in place. We need to ensure that the service is fit for purpose and that people feel that they are getting help and support from it.

Mr Speaker: Sorry, there is no time for the supplementary. That ends this session.

2.45 pm

Environment

Litter/Maintenance: Roe Valley Country Park

1. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of the Environment whether litter collection and maintenance at the Roe Valley Country Park will be monitored to ensure high standards are maintained. (AQO 8335/11-15)

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): I have been advised that NIEA staff conduct daily patrols along the Roe Valley Country Park path network, during which litter collections are also undertaken. During those patrols, staff also monitor and record any site defects or damage. If a defect such as a fallen tree partially blocking a pathway or damage such as a broken fence is found, that is reported to park management to ensure that it can be addressed as soon as possible, to the extent that budgets allow.

The daily inspection process ensures that the site is continually monitored to ensure that high standards are maintained, as budgets allow. I have also been advised by officials that, as part of the ongoing site management, duties such as leaf blowing and grass cutting are undertaken as required in accordance with seasonal requirements.

I assure you that the local staff who manage Roe Valley Country Park staff take great pride in its management and will continue to manage it to the best of their abilities. That has been demonstrated through the three-star Tourism NI visitor attraction grade that the park achieved this year and the award of a TripAdvisor certificate of excellence.

Mr G Robinson: Will the Minister accept that usage of Roe Valley Country Park, a popular tourist attraction in Limavady, may decline if the level of upkeep is not maintained, including keeping paths open after trees fall, especially on the Limavady side of the park? I appreciate what the Minister said, but I have had complaints recently, particularly about paths never being cleared of fallen trees. People are trying to access the paths on which trees have fallen.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Mr Robinson for the question. It is imperative that we as a Department and the agency with responsibility for the park do everything within our power to maximise the number of people who can access it. Many want to access what is, undoubtedly, a very good tourist attraction that does a lot to bring tourists to the Member's constituency. It also provides a great area for recreation for people who live there.

As I said, staff are committed to carrying out daily site inspections, after or during which defects such as those mentioned by the Member are pointed out to site management. Where budgets allow, defects are addressed as quickly as possible. Fallen trees are obviously — well, hopefully — beyond the control of individuals. However, littering, to which the Member's original question referred, is very much the responsibility of individuals visiting the park. The more people we have visiting the park, the more litter is dropped, and the more litter is dropped, the fewer people we are likely to attract to the park. So, it is imperative that the team on the ground there keeps on top of the litter situation, and I believe that they do their best to do that.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Minister, there are long-running and ongoing issues with path maintenance, particularly on the western bank, and damage has been done to the disabled angling stand at the centre in the park. Given the estimated 350,000 visitors to the park per annum, will the Minister assure us that those issues will be rectified in the very near future?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for the question. I had been aware of issues around the paths and of ongoing work on the paths around the country park. In my answer to Mr Robinson's supplementary question, I mentioned the importance of maximising accessibility to the park, and that is why I take the issue of the disabled angling stand very seriously. I want to ensure that it is repaired as a matter of urgency. That was the first time that I had been made aware of that, but I will make sure that the team gets on it right away.

Mr Dallat: Does the Minister agree that those who set up the Roe Valley Country Park in the first place and brought it to its present state have created something that is beautiful beyond belief? Will he tell those who drop their litter in the Roe Valley Country Park that they are to blame for anything that is wrong there?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. I join him in praising the vision of those who established the country park and those who maintain it. Litter is very much a matter of personal responsibility, and while the vast majority of visitors to Roe Valley Country Park or any of the NIEA-managed properties are responsible with their litter, either binning it or taking it home to recycle it, there are, unfortunately, some who are less responsible and who are happy enough to drop their litter wherever they may be. In turn, that demands that litter patrols have to be carried out by staff on a daily basis.

I urge all visitors to NIEA sites, or wherever they may be, to be responsible with their waste and not to drop it as litter during their visit. Previously in the Chamber, we have discussed the cost to the councils of street cleaning, back-lane cleaning and so forth as a direct consequence of people dropping litter. This is money that could be much better spent by councils on positive things such as play facilities and items that our communities are crying out for.

Wind Turbine Planning Applications

2. Mrs Hale asked the Minister of the Environment to outline the duration of the environmental impact assessment as part of a wind turbine planning application. (AQO 8336/11-15)

Mr Durkan: While they are determined on a case-by-case basis, the majority of planning applications for wind farm developments will be accompanied by an environmental statement (ES). The environmental statement is provided by the planning applicant and is required to include information on the main effects that a development is likely to have on the environment and any measures that are required to avoid, reduce and, if possible, remedy significant adverse effects that the development may have on the environment.

In assessing an ES, my Department will consult a range of environmental bodies and the public. Given the detailed nature of an environmental statement, the consultation period can take a number of months and the consultation process can give rise to the need for further environmental information to be requested. Once received, this will also be subject to further consultation with environmental bodies and the public.

The ES remains a valid consideration until a final decision is made on a planning application. There may be instances during the processing of an application that will require information in the ES to be updated. However, it is extremely unlikely to be necessary to update an entire environmental statement. The information in an ES, the views of environmental bodies and the views of the public all constitute environmental information that my Department must take into account in reaching a final decision on a planning application.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. Will he assure the House that where the Planning Service determines that an environmental impact assessment is needed, all the findings of the required surveys, during and on completion of the scoping process, are open to the public?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. As I said in my original answer, not only does this go out to consultation prior to the submission of the environmental statement but, subsequent to the Department's deliberations on the environmental statement, it goes back out to consultation to environmental bodies and the general public.

It is often information from the public — information that has sometimes been missed by environmental bodies — that has caused the Department to look more closely and scrutinise even more some of the information submitted by developers with regard to applications.

The details of the application are advertised through a notice in the local newspapers circulating in the area to which the site relates. The notice will give information on how the public can purchase an environmental statement and how my Department has made it available for the public to view. Third parties generally are told that they have 28 days in which to respond to the consultation. However, any correspondence, problems or issues raised with the ES will be taken right up to the date of or even the minute before the determination of a planning application.

Ms Lo: The Minister indicated to the Committee that, following the publication of the finalised strategic planning policy statement (SPPS), he would undertake a review of the planning policies for renewable energy, including, obviously, wind turbines. Will he set out for us the timescale of the review, given the fact that councils are now developing their development plans?

Mr Durkan: I thank Ms Lo, the Chair of the Environment Committee, for that question. I assure the Member and the House that the final draft of the SPPS was completed in March, as I had aimed for it to be. I had hoped for it to be published in April, however; so that is a target that we missed. It was circulated in March to Executive colleagues. Since then, I have made every effort to bring it forward for Executive consideration. However, I am disappointed and concerned that that extremely important document has, thus far, failed to be tabled at an Executive meeting.

The publication of the SPPS will allow us to move on to the full strategic comprehensive review of PPS 18 and PPS 21, which some Members are keen to see reviewed as a matter of urgency. It will also provide councils with a useful tool in the development of their new local development plans and provide some certainty to users of the planning system — not just planning professionals but, extremely importantly, investors who are considering making investment here and across the 11 council areas. Therefore, it is my desire — it is certainly my hope — that the SPPS will emerge from the Executive relatively unscathed and will be published before the end of this term.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Does the Minister believe that the environmental impact assessment (EIA) process is robust enough and stands the test of time? When the applicant is asked to apply that test, is it as independent as possible?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. The environmental impact statement (EIS) system is robust enough. I am, however, aware of many instances where objectors to an application or to an approval post a decision being made on an application will contend that an EIS process has not been robust enough. On occasion, those objectors will be right. However, in the vast majority of instances, I contend that the system is robust. I also point to the fact that many if not most developers, not just of wind energy but other development, will protest that the system is possibly too robust. That, to me, is usually a good indicator that we are doing something right.

Mr Rogers: Minister, you expressed your concern about the delay in the single planning policy coming from the Executive: what are the reasons for that delay?

3.00 pm

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. It is one that I have regularly asked myself and of myself. I am not entirely sure of the reasons for delay. However, I am aware of the impact of the delay. The SPPS is an essential component of the effective delivery of the reformed two-tier planning system that came into effect with the transfer of the planning function to councils on 1 April. Its provisions apply to the whole of Northern Ireland. They must be taken into account by councils in their development of local development plans, and they are material to all decisions on individual planning applications and appeals. It is, therefore, important that the SPPS, as I said, is published as soon as possible to provide clarity and certainty to councils and everyone impacted on by planning decisions.

Local Government Staff Commission

3. Mr Maskey asked the Minister of the Environment to outline the rationale for the retention of the Local Government Staff Commission. (AQO 8337/11-15)

Mr Durkan: In July 2012, my Department initiated a review of the Local Government Staff Commission. Following consultation, I concluded that, although the commission had performed well in a necessary and challenging role for 40 years, other developments meant that a statutory body of that type was no longer required.

The staff commission's original role in ensuring and advising on fair employment has been overtaken by the development of other statutory provisions. Since other bodies carry out comprehensive scrutiny and monitoring, the commission's role in this area is no longer required. I am also conscious that, as we have moved from 26 to 11 councils, expertise and capacity will be consolidated in a smaller number of stronger organisations. There is, therefore, a real danger of the duplication of work by the commission and the councils' HR departments.

One of the central objectives of the reform process is to strengthen local government and to allow local authorities to assume more powers, taking responsibility for the well-being and development of their district. Therefore, it seems counterintuitive not to expect the new councils to take full responsibility for the recruitment and management of their own workforce. I am confident that the other functions that the staff commission provides can be carried out on a non-statutory basis. This would have the advantage of each council being able to decide which activity they wished to continue to have carried out and by whom at their own initiative.

I still believe that the staff commission will be required for a number of years to help reform to bed in. There is precedent in other jurisdictions for using such a body to assist and advise councils during a period of reorganisation. That is why I propose to dissolve the staff commission on 31 March 2017, two years after the councils it was created to support were superseded. In 2014, my Executive colleagues agreed that the commission should be wound up in March 2017.

Mr Speaker: I remind the Minister about the two-minute rule.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that response. Can the Minister advise the House of the cost implications of the retention of the staff commission until 2017 and who will bear that cost?

Mr Durkan: There are cost implications. Fortunately, I suppose, there are no cost implications for my Department. In this financial year, the staff commission will receive funding of approximately £710,000 from the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and the 11 councils. As I said, my Department does not provide any funding for the staff commission. Additionally, the commission administers funding of around £300,000 for the Local Government Training Group. That funding is used to provide sector-wide development programmes and courses from external providers. My Department does not provide any funding for the Local Government Training Group either. While there will be no significant financial implications, therefore, for the Department, council and Housing Executive contributions to the staff commission of around £1 million will no longer be required post 31 March 2017.

Environmental Crime Unit

4. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of the Environment for his assessment of the recent Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland's review of the Northern Ireland Environment Agency's environmental crime unit. (AQO 8338/11-15)

Mr Durkan: At the publication of the Criminal Justice Inspection report, I publicly welcomed it and thanked the CJI for its work. As I pointed out when the CJI review was published, it has recommended that the NIEA enhance its enforcement and regulation activity and develop a more rigorous approach to dealing with environmental crime offenders.

As I said previously, its recommendations mirror my approach. It supports and underpins my and NIEA's aims and strategy, and I welcome its suggestions.

To ensure that those recommendations are established as smoothly and as quickly as possible, I have approved the recent appointment of a new temporary head of the environmental crime unit — one who has extensive experience in the criminal justice sector. Given the importance with which I view the need to tackle environmental crime, I am committed to ensuring that that vital role is filled permanently as soon as possible.

In considering what the report advised in order to enhance the professional development of those tasked with tackling environmental crime, I publicly stated that CJI had put forward some excellent recommendations. In particular, I underline its recommendation that guidelines be developed for levels of enforcement and the rationale for the prioritisation of investigations. That will allow NIEA's finite resources to be directed towards tackling the most serious environmental offending.

In addition, my officials are examining how best to ensure that the recommended single environmental incident reporting mechanism can be advanced. I have supported, and will continue to champion, the need for a more straightforward system of public reporting. Put simply, the easier it is to let us know, the more likely it will be that people will tell us about environmental offending and allow us to take action.

It is clear that the impact of environmental crime on daily life here should not be underestimated. As I have said here before, it is not a victimless crime.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that response. During questions for oral answer on 21 January last year, I asked about a report into the dumping of illegal waste at the Mobuoy site in Londonderry. Your reply, on that occasion, was a promise to ensure a more joined-up approach between your Department and other agencies, including the NIEA. Is the Criminal Justice Inspection report an indication of failure? Or, could it be viewed as failure on your part?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. I am not sure that I view it as such; I am not sure how anyone, if they had read the report in detail, and read any statements from me, subsequent to 21 January 2014, could view it as such. We have radically changed and, I would like to think, radically improved the way in which NIEA responds to environmental crime and the way in which we deal with environmental crime and persistent offenders. I do not think that it is job done, by any means; there are further improvements to make. As outlined in my previous answer, I think that we could do more about the prioritisation of incidents, cases and offenders. In my opinion, a bit of time is wasted going after small fry when there are much bigger fish out there. I would like to see more focus on them. That is something that I have made known to my officials.

Our cooperation and collaboration with other agencies have certainly improved. What happened at Mobuoy demonstrated, very clearly, that there were huge failings there. They were highlighted in the Mills report into what had happened at Mobuoy. At that time, I said that an incident of that scale can never happen again, and I am confident that an incident of that scale will never happen again because we cannot afford for an incident of that scale to happen again.

Mrs Overend: Does the Minister fully agree with the review's finding that the ECU has delivered considerable gains with evidence of capability and capacity, given the apparent impunity with which fuel smugglers and polluters can operate along the border?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. Indeed, fuel smuggling and fuel laundering are a source of some very serious environmental crime. It is a crime that, in particular, requires collaboration between the NIEA, the ECU and other agencies on both sides of the border. Up here, you have the HMRC, which is responsible for enforcement, in collaboration with the PSNI, the National Crime Agency and, indeed, the Environmental Protection Agency, the revenue commissioners and the Garda Síochána in the South. The seriousness of the issue is such that it was actually raised as an agenda item on the NSMC plenary meeting on Friday in Dublin. There is agreement on both sides of the border that there needs to be an escalation or intensification of how the issue is dealt with. It has huge consequences for the economy and the Exchequer, and I am equally concerned about the consequences it has for our environment.

Mr Allister: With the catastrophic failure at Mobuoy, significant inaction, it seems, on fuel laundering and just two convictions in 2013, does the Minister not think that the agency was let off very lightly by the criminal inspection unit?

Mr Durkan: We certainly could do better, and I would love to stand here and say that we certainly will. We have done better in 2014-15 than we did in 2013-14, having secured 23 convictions for waste offending in the last financial year. In the same period, under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, ECU's financial investigations secured four confiscation orders to the value of over £500,000. This shows that the Proceeds of Crime Act clearly remains an effective tool and one that I would like to see the ECU and the agency use much more. That is how you hurt those criminals: you hit them in the pocket.

I have spoken to the Justice Minister, and we agree that there is a need for the judiciary to review the sentences available for waste criminals. In my opinion, the punishment does not fit the crime. Until it does, there are opportunist criminals out there who will continue to exploit weaknesses in the system. There are still some weaknesses — I do not deny that — and criminals will continue to exploit them for their own profit and gain.

Tyres: Larne Bonfire

5. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of the Environment what actions he will take in relation to tyres being used on bonfires in Larne. (AQO 8339/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Burning tyres generates toxic fumes and by-products that can be extremely dangerous to humans and animals. I am content that lead responsibility for bonfire management rests with local councils. However, I am committed to working with and supporting the councils to reduce and ultimately eliminate the burning of tyres on bonfires.

The Northern Ireland Environment Agency will, of course, use its enforcement powers in support of councils where it can. Whilst the legal position in relation to bonfires is complex and the relevant powers are exercised by a number of public bodies, including NIEA and local councils, I want to ensure that the environment is protected. In this case, at Craigy Hill estate in Larne, NIEA is aware of the issue. It is assessing opportunities to determine the source of the tyres and will take action where possible.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. According to the 'All Island Used Tyre Survey', published in 2013, 30% of all waste tyres in the North are being disposed of to unknown destinations. Will the Minister consider using the findings of that report as a starting point for investigating how tyres are being disposed of and how existing regulations can be improved?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question. I would say that 30% is possibly a conservative estimate for the number of tyres that end up where we know not where. I am certainly happy to take the findings of that report into account in determining a way forward on the issue. It is one that just keeps going round and round.

My officials are working closely with their counterparts in the South. We are looking closely at the South's development of a producer responsibility scheme. NIEA officials sit on the working group that is drawing up that scheme, and I am very interested to see how it rolls out and what we can learn from it. Should it prove successful, and I have no reason to doubt that it will, it is something that I would be very keen to see established in the North, perhaps even on a UK-wide basis.

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

3.15 pm

Driving Licences: Paperless

T1. Mr Wilson asked the Minister of the Environment whether the paperless driving licences that have been introduced today will apply also to Northern Ireland; if so, what action his Department has taken to ensure that motorists know that, because of the advent of paperless driving licences, when they go to hire a car, they will require a code, which will change every 72 hours; and whether he has informed drivers of how they can obtain such a code. (AQT 2611/11-15)

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. You could not get much more topical than that: it was just on the news at lunchtime.

I can assure the Member, the House and, indeed, the public that the new scheme in Britain will not apply here. I have asked officials to ascertain the rationale behind the introduction of the scheme in Britain, and the doing away with the paper part of the licence, to see whether it is worth pursuing here. With regards to making the public aware that it is not happening here, I issued a press release just before coming into the Chamber today to ensure that there is no confusion and that people do not dispose of their paper counterparts inadvertently or prematurely.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Minister for his reply. Another part of the driving licence policy that does not apply to Northern Ireland is the inclusion of the Union flag on driving licences. The Transport Minister in England has made it quite clear that, if the Minister here asks for arrangements to be put in place, people who wish to have the flag on their licence can have it included. In light of the decision by the Minister in England, what action has he taken to ensure that those who wish to have that choice can have it?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his question, although I think he is, perhaps, misconstruing this. Yes, it could be extended to the North that everyone here could have the Union Jack included on their licence, but choice would not come into it. To set up a system whereby people could have a choice as to whether or not they had the flag on their licence would cost somewhere between £15 million and £17 million. The British Government will not be prepared to pay that, and we are certainly not able to pay for it. That is to introduce choice in Britain. They are not going to afford us the luxury of choice when the choice does not exist for the citizens of England, Scotland and Wales; much to the dissatisfaction of many people, particularly in Scotland and Wales.

Planning: Workforce Model

T2. Ms Fearon asked the Minister of the Environment whether he is satisfied that the workforce model that was transferred for the delivery of planning services is fit for purpose. (AQT 2612/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for that question. I have answered questions in the Chamber in the not-so-distant past about the very same subject. I am content that the model that was transferred is fit for purpose; however, it attracted some media attention, after I gave the answer, when I said that it could not be denied that some teething problems have been experienced — in some councils more than others, I might add.

I also have to say that, with the transfer of the planning function, I also transferred a budget, which I ring-fenced from cuts to my budget and subsequent reviews and budgets agreed by the Executive. Therefore, it is the one function that transferred to local government on a truly cost-neutral basis. I have no doubt about the ability or commitment of the staff who moved over to councils. As I said, there have been some teething problems, but I believe that they are now bedding in well and working well.

Ms Fearon: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Is he aware that there is a huge backlog in planning decisions in some areas that is having a negative impact, particularly in places like Newry and Armagh? How does the Minister plan to tackle that?

Mr Durkan: I understand and appreciate that there is a backlog in many areas. I would love to stand here and blame the new councils for all that, but I know that they inherited a lot of that backlog. Often, applications that take long to process do so because they are pretty complex, with requirements for input from a number of consultees. Generally, the more complex an application, the longer it takes. I know that, in the Member's constituency, for example, or in her new council area, there are an awful lot of PPS 21 applications, which are sometimes quite difficult to determine. If the planners had their way, they would not be that difficult to determine, but I know of many cases in her constituency where I have been trying to work with elected representatives from that area and with applicants to achieve positive outcomes for those applicants. However, that is a timely process as well.

Clearing the backlog will be up to the new councils and the planning staff therein. I will have no further role in the vast majority of planning applications.

Mr Speaker: The next questioner is Karen McKeivitt. I remind you, Karen, that, as the Minister's Assembly Private Secretary, your question must relate specifically to a constituency issue in which you are directly involved.

Hedgehogs: South Down

T3. Mrs McKeivitt asked the Minister of the Environment whether he is aware of any reports of a significant decline in the hedgehog population in the south Down area. (AQT 2613/11-15)

Mr Wilson: That is a prickly one for you.

Mr Durkan: You have stolen my thunder. I was going to take that one, too. I was going to say that you can probably see as few hedgehogs today as Down supporters. [Interruption.] I am not aware of specifics for the south Down area. However, I am aware of reports of a huge decline in the hedgehog population across these islands. I saw it reported on television recently that, over the past 50 years, there has been a 97% decline in the population of hedgehogs, and genuine fears exist that, should positive action not be taken now, the species could face extinction by as soon as 2025. That is very alarming.

Hedgehogs are not something that we see every day. Unfortunately, the ones that we do see are often on the roads. As Minister for road safety, I do not know whether my remit extends as far as making roads safer for hedgehogs, albeit that I know that that is an initiative that has been looked at in some jurisdictions. Generally, if we see a hedgehog during the day, it is an indication that there is something wrong with it. I would be keen, as Minister of the Environment, to undertake a scheme of sorts or a campaign to educate people about the very real threat to hedgehogs and their potential extinction.

Mr Speaker: I am sure that the supplementary will help us to understand how you are directly involved in this issue.

Mrs McKeivitt: I met the USPCA about it. It has raised the issue, which probably goes right across our region, and I am delighted to bring it to the Floor today. The Minister touched on his Department's plans to help to address the matter. Perhaps he could enlighten us a wee bit more on those plans.

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for that question. They are not so much plans of the Department as plans of mine, although I hope that they will very much be plans of the Department before long.

I am keen to embark on a campaign. I know that a similar campaign has been embarked on in England to educate people on the risk to hedgehogs and on what they can do to ensure the survival of hedgehogs and, indeed, to boost their numbers. It could be simple measures such as leaving out a shallow tray of food. They particularly like cat food; I suppose they prefer that to being cat food. People could also cut holes in fences. Simple measures like that do a lot to help hedgehogs, particularly given the loss of habitat that they have suffered in recent years.

I would be keen to use the vehicle of Eco-Schools, which has been tremendously successful. We now have every school in the North signed up to the Eco-Schools programme. We could use it to get the campaign out there to educate children, who are great at going home and educating their parents on such matters.

Strategic Planning Policy Statement: Legal Advice

T4. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of the Environment to outline a time frame for the legal advice that he received in relation to the single strategic planning policy statement. (AQT 2614/11-15)

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for her question. I am not entirely sure what legal advice on the SPPS the Member is referring to. I cannot give a time frame for how long it will take the Executive to make their deliberations on the document. However, I can give the Member a commitment that, as soon as they do, I will publish it. It is vital for the reasons outlined earlier that that be done as soon as possible. Perhaps, in her supplementary question, the Member will expand on the particular legal issues to which she referred, and I will do my best to answer.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that. I ask specifically about advice that maybe relates to the policy on non-farming dwellings in particular. If there is specific advice, even from within his Department, maybe the Minister could refer to it.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for that clarification, which is helpful. I know that the issue of PPS 21, particularly on dwellings for non-farming rural dwellers, is one that her party has been extremely vociferous on for a couple of years and would very much like to see accommodated in the final SPPS. I have met a deputation from the Member's party to listen to their views and to hear how they would like to see the issue accommodated.

First, I have to emphasise that the SPPS was viewed very much as an opportunity to consolidate existing planning policy statements, as opposed to altering them drastically, regardless of how drastically or in what direction you might want them altered. Therefore, the legal advice that my Department has received is that it would be going too far to include the wishes or aspirations of Sinn Féin for PPS 21 in the SPPS. However, I have given a commitment — we touched on it earlier with PPS 18, which relates to the renewable energy policy — to review fully and comprehensively PPS 18 along with PPS 21 post the publication of the SPPS. It will be through that vehicle that more dramatic changes could be made to each of the policies. I know that they are changes that a lot of people think are required.

Tractors: Speed Limits

T5. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of the Environment for an update on plans to increase tractor speed limits. (AQT 2615/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for the question. Just recently, I put out for consultation a document in which I was seeking to increase the maximum speed limit of tractors from what is currently 20 mph to 25 mph or, to be precise, 24.8 mph, which is 40 km/h. I know that Mr Wilson does not particularly like speed limits given in kilometres per hour —

Mr Wilson: Or miles per hour.

Mr Durkan: He just does not like speed limits. [Laughter.] That document is out to consultation. The closing date for the consultation is 7 July, and I anticipate quite a number of responses. Indeed, I encourage responses from parties in the Chamber as well.

Mr Speaker: I call for a quick supplementary question within the speed limit.

Mr Rogers: Do you have any plans to address the maximum combination weight of tractors and trailers? As tractors get bigger and heavier, the situation could arise in which you could have small tractors towing big trailers? How do you plan to address that?

3.30 pm

Mr Durkan: Such issues are also addressed in the consultation. Again, I encourage people to have a look at that and respond to it.

With regard to increasing the speed limit, it was remiss of me not to point out that the vast majority of collisions in which tractors were involved and in which speed was a factor were brought about because the tractor was travelling too slowly.

Private Members' Business

Funding for Musical Instruments

Debate resumed on motion:

That this Assembly notes the cultural, artistic and community importance of bands in Northern Ireland; recognises the importance of the musical instruments for bands funding programme; expresses its disappointment at the failure of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to fund the programme this year; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to restore the funding for the programme. — [Mr McCausland.]

Ms Lo: The Arts Council has three funding programmes that are relevant to marching bands, the main one being the musical instruments for bands programme, which aims to improve the quality of the music and replace worn-out instruments in deprived areas. That scheme is currently on hold; it has not been removed. I understand that the Arts Council funding for its instrument programme is very thorough. To be eligible, an applicant has to reach a high standard, and monitoring continues for five years after an instrument has been received. Many bands work hard to get to that level, and it is important to maintain that incentive. Over £0.5 million has been awarded under the scheme in the past three years. The annual budget for that funding was set in 2006 at £150,000, with a maximum individual grant of £5,000. It is my understanding that bands in receipt of the previous round of funding are not eligible to apply.

I know that, when Nelson McCausland was Minister, he commissioned a report on marching bands in Northern Ireland, which I think he referred to earlier. That report gives a good overview of the importance of marching bands to sections of our community. Involvement requires commitment, skill and discipline. Bands have also reached out to traditionally difficult demographics — for example, male teenagers — and allowed them to engage in cultural and musical practice. It is not just the individual who benefits: through those social events, families and their communities are brought together. Of course, there are sectarian elements that need to be addressed, and the report goes into some detail on that. There is still a perception of disorderly behaviour and paramilitary connection attached to bands of both unionist and nationalist persuasions. While that could well be just public perception, there is obviously a need to promote a more positive image.

It is worth noting that there is already alternative funding for instruments that can be found in the Arts Council's small grants programme and its equipment programme. Bands can also apply for funds via the Community Relations Council's cultural diversity grant, Comic Relief, the Ulster-Scots Agency for some bands, local councils and the Heritage Lottery Fund. That is a better position than that of many other voluntary and community organisations and groups, which, when funding is cut, have nowhere else to turn to. A rationalisation of band instrument funding would be worthwhile, given that there appear to be seven sources of funding, although I appreciate that Comic Relief and the Heritage Lottery Fund are out of the scope of Assembly control. My view is that the Arts Council would be best placed to do that. Such an approach would also make it easier to apply conditions relating to community relations issues.

I ask the Minister to review how other funds can be incorporated in that. In such a difficult financial climate, we cannot continue to reject every money-saving idea that we are presented with. However, as the fund has not been scrapped and as the Minister is on record as saying that she would submit a bid in June, the Alliance Party will support the motion.

Of course, as we currently have no Budget, that support is only in principle.

Mr Hilditch: In supporting the motion, I declare an interest as the vice president of the Carrick, Whitehouse and Agnes Street brass band and a patron of Sir Henry Ingleby's Fife and Drum Corps.

Back in January this year, the Confederation of Ulster Bands presented to the Committee, and I found it very interesting, as did other members, that, week in, week out, almost 30,000 people now perform music to a very high standard in our communities. We have Irish champions, Ulster champions, British champions and world champions, all of whom are generally unrecognised by the wider community in Northern Ireland.

Every constituency represented in the Assembly probably has a role model. I would like to make you aware of one such young man, Jonathan Wilson, from Larne, who has been a member of the Killyglen Accordion Orchestra and the East Antrim Accordion School since he was nine years old, neither of which have received any funding. He has won a Northern Ireland title every year since he started playing. He also won the intermediate all-Ireland championship in 2014; the all-Ireland duet in 2014; and the United Kingdom championship in 2013 and 2014. He was runner-up in this year's competition as well being the duet champion. He is now 17 years of age and has travelled widely throughout the United Kingdom to compete. Jonathan Wilson is only one example of the young musical talent in Northern Ireland, and I congratulate all such young people on their tremendous achievements. What a start for a CV, and what a confidence booster for life?

The Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure is scrutinising the monitoring round with departmental officials. It is a bit disappointing that, even with the success of the arts infrastructure and the funding for bands scheme, it did not rank as important enough to make it into the inescapable pressures section, though I appreciate that it remains a high priority commitment for the Minister.

When we consider the success of the many well-established competitions, outdoor and indoor, the concerts and the tattoos, it is clear that these festivals are about much more than just music and parading. They bring economic benefit to many communities and attract visitors to Northern Ireland as well as domestic tourists.

The Belfast Tattoo, which is in its third year, has shown its huge potential. Its roots lie in the tradition of Ulster Scots, yet it has also been able to reach out in its formative years by showcasing many other talents relating to music and dance that Ulster-Scots people have come into contact with as they travelled around the world. Over 200 tickets for this year's event, in September, have already been sold to a southern Irish tour operator. The net has been spread far and wide to bring many bands and artists to perform each year in the various sections of the show. Each year, bandsmen and bandswomen from across the world bring new, innovative and exciting ideas to their performances.

We have already established the contribution that marching bands make to the arts community in Northern Ireland, but let us also be mindful of the social benefits and the fact that they are proving to have a large effect on the mental health of their participants. For spectators, loneliness is reduced and community cohesion is improved even by just attending a parade or event. For the elderly, attending a band parade or event during the week is sometimes their only communication with other people: they live on their own, so it is a chance to get out and about and meet other people.

There are other benefits to consider, such as when people decide that they no longer want to be in a marching band. They can still be involved in the community and can get involved in organising committees and marshalling groups to assist active bands. We also have a great deal of evidence that bands can re-engage young people who have become disaffected and disengaged from school. They experience a high level of enjoyment in a band, increase their interpersonal skills, improve their relationship development and increase their awareness of their cultural and moral responsibilities. Consequently, there is a reduction in the pull towards antisocial behaviour among the young people involved.

William Bradshaw from the Confederation of Ulster Bands confirmed at the CAL Committee meeting in January that approximately 50% to 60% of marching band participants are under 20 and male. Obviously, the majority are Protestant, which is the single hardest demographic for statutory bodies to engage with. For that community, musical instruments, such as accordions and pipes, can cost up to £2,500 each. You buy two instruments every seven years, which, from a band's perspective, does not suffice. To encourage and engage participants in the working-class community, more equipment needs to be purchased and needs to be available, because most working-class people just cannot afford that sort of money to pay for the instruments that they rely heavily on.

Finally, we look at the evidence that was provided to the Committee and consider that the band movement in Northern Ireland addresses many of the key government commitments in relation to accessibility of the arts to working-class communities.

Mr Speaker: Time is up, I am afraid.

Mr Hilditch: Thank you. In closing, I appeal for the Minister to have a look at the decision, and I look forward to her response.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo inniu agus beidh mé ag labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin. I welcome the debate, and I have no issue with recognising the importance of music and the provision of instruments for this purpose. The Minister has confirmed that she is committed to bidding for additional funds for what she described as "this valuable scheme". It is a scheme that has delivered over half a million pounds in the past three years for marching bands alone, and over £700,000 over a longer time period. However, this motion is wider than that. It covers bands, a definition that will require further examination and expansion if we are to be more inclusive in the funding streams required in the wider sector.

The additional value that many of these musicians and bands bring to the wider economy is patently obvious to many of us who enjoy music in a social and non-threatening environment, but there is a flip side to this. In March, I commissioned a research paper on the funding made available for marching bands across the North, which revealed a degree of disproportionality across the various interest groups in the sector. The Arts Council to date has distributed almost £5 million to bands and related organisations, some 31% of which was for instruments and 50% was for other equipment. Mr Hilditch referred to the Confederation of Ulster Bands representation to the CAL Committee in January, and I think that it was unfortunate on that occasion that we did not fully get to ask questions of that grouping. The £5 million represents a significant per capita investment of somewhere in the region of £160 per person over nearly 30,000 participants. This, however, does not compare favourably with the £436,000 received by Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann, an organisation responsible for, among many things, Fleadh Cheoil na hÉireann in 2013. That brought in some £43 million to the local economy alone in the north-west during the City of Culture year in Derry.

I believe that, while recognising that disparities exist in different communities, there should be a more equitable distribution of funding to all involved in music, regardless of the genre, type or definition. I also believe that there should be a caveat on which bands are funded and that a code of conduct and breaches thereof should be used as a disincentive for bad and threatening behaviour. Perhaps a wider examination of some of the culture or subculture that surrounds some of the band scene should be looked at when determining funding provision. Many people feel that many of our problems emanate from bands, whether it is through timing, nature, location, demeanour or behaviour. This is a perception and a reality that the provision of funding might address.

I recognise what is good in the band sector; who cannot recognise the efforts of the Field Marshal Montgomery band in reaching out, and the efforts of the bands forum in Derry? I support the motion, and I hope that we will see a more equitable division of funding and that the Minister can secure the same.

Mr Middleton: I thank my colleagues for tabling this motion, and I join with them in expressing my disappointment that the musical instruments for bands funding programme has not been funded this year. The band sector in Northern Ireland has made and continues to make a huge contribution to our society, culturally, economically and, indeed, through education.

Many of the events that bands hold throughout Northern Ireland are underfunded and under-promoted. I believe that it is time that the Minister and the Department, along with the Arts Council NI, recognise the significant contribution that this grouping of just over 25,000 musicians makes in our country. I believe that the marching bands sector has been adversely affected by the decision to stop this funding.

In comparison with other areas funded by the Arts Council NI in 2015-16, I have figures showing that circus skills received over £275,000; classical music and opera received almost £2.5 million; the Irish language received over £185,000; and the marching bands sector received zero. While I am not questioning the value of the work undertaken by the groups that were funded, I feel that a 100% cut to the marching bands sector is completely unjustified.

3.45 pm

In my constituency in Londonderry, good and significant work has been undertaken with schools to challenge misconceptions and stereotypes. The development of the Maiden City Accord was a valuable piece of work that brought together various groups in order to provide a structure that allows parades to take place. Of course, that could not have happened without funding. That is why funding for musical instruments is necessary to ensure that these bands can grow and expand, allowing them to continue this valuable outreach work.

Bands offer access to structured tuition, instruments and performance opportunities in many areas where there is no other engagement with arts activities. There is much more to it, of course, than just parading. Mention has been made of the value of the input that marching bands have made to the tourism sector. In my constituency, the Walled City Tattoo, which the Minister herself attended, has been a huge success. That event comprises many young musicians from the marching bands community and is an example of where communities can work together to showcase what is best for our cities.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. He makes some very salient points. Citing Londonderry as an example of how things should work across Northern Ireland is something that I have no disagreement with, but will the Member agree that, in order to get that agreement, those taking part in parades and those who would protest have to want to reach a solution?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Middleton: I completely agree. Both sides have to recognise that they have to work together to try to get the best outcome. Londonderry is an example of where that has happened, although there is a lot of work still to do. However, it is worth noting that it has been a success. We hope that the Walled City Tattoo will also continue for years to come.

It is worth mentioning that these events are attended by diverse audiences from far and wide. These musicians are fantastic ambassadors for our country. Many of them have travelled throughout the world, taking part in various events and showcasing our rich cultural diversity. I will not mention specific bands from my constituency because there are far too many to mention, but some of them are the best in the world in their field.

This talent must be supported and encouraged. I fully support the motion and call on the Minister to ensure that this matter is addressed as a priority within her Department.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Band culture is one of the features of our society. Whether they are brass bands, silver bands, accordion bands or pipe bands, all of them add to our culture and communities. Band membership varies in number from 12 to bigger bands that I have seen of 20, 30 or even 40. There is a wide age group within those bands, but, given what I heard this morning, I hope that there is nobody over 70.

All these bands need money to keep them going, but the problem facing them now is that that funding has been put on hold. That is because of the savage cuts made by the Tory Government. The Arts Council is unable to open the funding scheme in April as it usually does. This may not be the answer that people want to hear, but circumstances dictate how the Budget can be spent.

Today's motion states that the Assembly:

“expresses its disappointment at the failure of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to fund the programme this year; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to restore the funding for the programme.”

The Minister made it very clear in April this year what she can do. There will be a bid in the June monitoring round, so we have to wait until then. In the past three years, over half a million pounds has been awarded to bands under the scheme, and the Minister is on record as stating that she is committed to supporting the musical instruments for bands scheme. It may be that there is an opportunity to look at how we grant aid bands of all types, not just marching bands.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

I listened to Members talking about bands in their areas and the high level that they get to as Irish champions, Ulster champions and even world champions. It is the same for members of Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann, who travel widely in Canada and America on very little funding. It is wonderful what we have in common in how we try to get young people to learn music. We should be talking about it and working on it. We must look at funding because the majority of funding so far has gone to marching bands. I heard quite a lot of talk today —

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr McMullan: In a wee minute. I heard very little talk about other bands. Go ahead; I will let you in now.

Mr McCausland: Does the Member agree that the funding is for bands? The word “marching” is not in the title of the scheme. Secondly, even considering marching bands, there are bands from different traditions that have received funding through the scheme. For example, in north Belfast, quite a number of bands from what would be seen as a unionist background have received funding, but so has the O'Neill and Allsopp Memorial Flute Band from the New Lodge.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Member for his intervention, but I never said that any one place got 100% of the funding. Other people have to get funding. It is about what those bands do when they get the funding. There are rules that bands have to adhere to if they apply for funding. We know that one band was struck off the list and does not get funding because of its behaviour. Threatening behaviour must come into this, because you can no longer push a band through an area that is totally outside of its remit. I will give you an example. In my area of east Antrim, they insist on pushing a band through Carnlough on the return home from the parades. There is no need to put that band through Carnlough. They have a local band, but they insist on sticking a band from Larne through Carnlough. This has been going on for years, and the same band was reported to police and the Parades Commission for playing threatening music outside the chapel in Larne during Mass. I am sure you will agree that there is no need for that.

These things have to stop. We have to sit down and talk. Unless we talk, we cannot get on. The Member from Derry mentioned what is going on there, and I think Mr Humphrey agreed with him. What happened in Derry came out of talks. We must sit down and talk because if we are going to fund bands —

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McMullan: No, I have already given way.

If we are going to fund bands, we must do it in the knowledge that we can work together, not in isolation. The days when bands came in and threatened communities are gone. If you have influence in your area, I ask you to use it to ask bands to sit down and talk to local representatives so that an accommodation can be found in the way that it was in Derry. I congratulate them on that.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Caithfidh mé a rá go bhfuil áthas orm páirt a ghlacadh sa díospóireacht seo faoi bhuíonta ceoil máirseála. I am happy to participate in this debate on the funding of bands.

Bands bring benefits to their communities. They provide musical education, entertainment and productive participation for their members and learners. They also instil community pride and give the community focus. Indeed, my father was a member of the Irish National Foresters band in Camlough for many years.

He was an enthusiastic cornet player, as we were very much aware at home while he was practising. In my area, I have enjoyed the music of the Crimson Arrow Pipe Band, St Catherine's Band in Newry, St Brigid's Accordion Band from Jonesborough, the Hunter Moore Flute Band and Altnaveigh Pipe Band. There is indeed a rich tradition of bands where I come from. I hope that every Member has had a positive experience of their local band, as indeed I have.

You could say that band music is culture at grass-roots level. Bands from across the community have benefited from the musical instruments for bands scheme. It is a good scheme and one that I would like to see restored. I take the point that Mr Ó hOisín made that there is an imbalance in funding. For example, Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann, more popularly known as "the Comhaltas", received £460,000 in funding, whereas £5 million went towards the bands scheme. I am very aware of the good work that Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann does in teaching people traditional music and, indeed, in helping to provide festivals and fleadhanna throughout the country as a showcase for the skills of the young learners and the more competent musicians. The Pipers Club in Armagh is another group that comes to mind. It provides an excellent service to many young people throughout County Armagh and, indeed, parts of County Tyrone, teaching them how to play the fiddle, the uilleann pipes, the harp, the tin whistle and many more instruments. There is much good work going on, and that should all be recognised and reflected in an equitable form of funding.

Unfortunately, not all bands have behaved with dignity in public. A small number have used their music in a negative rather than a positive way. We heard reference to that here today. Mr McMullan mentioned it. Whether that behaviour is outside St Patrick's Church in north Belfast or St Anne's Cathedral, it is totally unacceptable, and no band that indulges in such behaviour should benefit from this programme of funding or, indeed, from any other. If the Minister is to restore the funding, she should take the opportunity to ensure that the criteria exclude bands that indulge in such behaviour from funding from her Department or any of its arm's-length bodies.

As I said, there is much good work being carried out at grass-roots level in promoting music through bands, traditional Irish music groups and many others. I hope that, if funding becomes available, the Minister will revisit the scheme and, indeed, try to broaden it to include others who may not have had a similar benefit in the past.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost up.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh céad maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle.

Ms Ni Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank all the Members who have spoken in the debate thus far. I support the main essence behind the motion. To be generous about it, I think that most people, if not all, spoke about the role and the merits that musical instruments for bands has brought and can bring in the future. That is why I support it.

The Chair of the CAL Committee, although he spoke as a member of the DUP, not as Chair, moved the motion and spoke about the role of the band sector. He also spoke about the different reviews of marching bands and what they bring to the economy. I think that all Members have spoken about the benefits of the role that marching bands, in particular, and musical instruments for bands have had to play in their communities.

I want to make one clarification of what Nelson McCausland said. Surely, having been Culture Minister and Social Development Minister, he should really know the difference between "inescapable", "desirable" and "high-priority" when it comes to the budget. "Inescapable" relates to the things that I am contractually obliged to do. This does not fit that criterion.

4.00 pm

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ni Chuilín: I will give way in a minute. This does not come under or meet the criterion. I have given it high priority, as two of my officials said last week when they went in front of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure.

Mr McCausland: The point about it being inescapable was actually raised with officials. In fact, we were told that "inescapable" went beyond contractual commitments. Obviously, that includes health and safety issues, but we were told that it also included ministerial priorities, so it was beyond that.

Ms Ni Chuilín: It does not include ministerial priorities if they are not contractually committed to. I will look at the Hansard report of that Committee meeting and will take it up with my officials. Had that been the case, there would have been different bids submitted in previous monitoring rounds. To be fair, if these are the criteria that I have been working to, they are clear and transparent.

This has received high priority. Recently, when I was up for questions, I said that I would support a bid. I did; I have put that bid forward. Indeed, as recently as last month, I met the Londonderry Bands Forum, not just about this scheme but about other work that needs to be done in the future. They are an exemplar, unlike others — they and Comhaltas are exemplars — and they show how, if you look at a few Departments and work across them, you can show what can be done if you do it the right way.

Rosie McCorley and others mentioned the need, where there have been isolated incidents — I do not think that anybody is in any denial about those incidents — of behaviour on Facebook, social media or the streets that could be described as sectarian, antisocial, abusive, threatening or intimidating, that nobody should be seen to support it. I am not hearing it being defended at all. I have told the Arts Council, the Ulster-Scots Agency and indeed any other funder within my remit that, where that behaviour has been proven — not suspected, but proven — funding eligibility will be different to what it was before the incident took place. I think that people can fully understand that. It applies across the board. It is not just for people who have behaved in a sectarian way outside St Patrick's chapel or indeed, allegedly, outside St Anne's. It is the first that I have heard of that incident, I have to say. I am not saying that it did not happen, but that it is the first I have heard of it. Wherever that behaviour occurs, it needs to stop. It needs to stop.

I would also like to point out that everybody has spoken about the merits of musical instruments. Some have actually spoken about the need to have a robust code of conduct and indeed to amend it to be inclusive of opportunities for other types of bands and people purchasing musical instruments for uses other than to be involved in marching bands. That is something that we need to review. I have met young musicians who are not part of a marching band culture but are maybe in a small traditional group or jazz group. They want opportunities. They have had opportunities, even under the Arts Council's small grants lottery scheme, to purchase instruments, but it is important that they are reflected in this as well.

There is a big difference in the funding that has been spent on musical instruments for some of the marching bands and indeed Comhaltas thus far, but it should not be just about purchasing equipment; it is also about where we take these opportunities in the future. David Hilditch spoke about his experience in his constituency and indeed pointed out the whole notion of social inclusion and ending isolation. That affects many people, particularly but not exclusively in rural communities. I have spoken to young Protestant men in working-class areas who do not want to be associated with some of the displays of sectarianism but value the role that marching bands have played for them.

I accept at face value what they say. There is a need to see this as an opportunity. The Londonderry Bands Forum gave me good examples, as did Comhaltas, of what this fund has allowed young people to attain musically. The intergenerational aspect was also mentioned, with people learning different instruments being involved not just with a band but with a structure that passes skills from one generation to another. That is very important.

When we are having debates, regardless of what they are about, I wish that people would not bring in the Irish language when there is no need. The only person to do that was Nelson McCausland. You end up just looking petty. I have never been petty or political about this scheme and never will. I try to give full expression and respect where they are due.

I have given recognition to the bands forums and individuals I met representing them. To be honest, at some meetings I had within the past month or so, people did not want to be involved in point-scoring or for their names to be associated with some of the debates in this Chamber, which they do not think are helpful. However, they do want investment and to be respected. They want that investment to come primarily from my Department but to be across other Departments, and I am willing to do that. It is much easier for us all collectively to do that when we just keep party politics out of it as much as possible.

In an intervention, William Humphrey raised a challenge about parades and protests. All of us, particularly people in north Belfast, have a lot to learn from the city of Derry. I hope that William and other representatives from north Belfast will use their influence to ensure that dialogue is not only initiated but sustained. That is something that we need to do.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely.

Mr Humphrey: The Minister will be well aware, since we share a constituency, as does Mr McCausland, that there has been dialogue, for example, around the impasse on parading on the Crumlin Road at Ardoyne for over 10 years. The point that I made in the intervention to my colleague from Londonderry was that an accommodation can be reached when people want to reach an accommodation. You will know that, in certain sectors of the nationalist community in north Belfast, the Twaddell initiative, for example, was dismissed out of hand.

Ms Ní Chuilín: You did not mention any geographical area; I thought you were talking in general. Now that you have mentioned an area, you need to use your influence to get people talking regardless. Do not set preconditions for those discussions because that dooms them to failure. I note that the Member did not mention St Patrick's or Carrick Hill, which are also in our constituency and need to be resolved. The best that we can do, and should definitely do, is ensure that where there are opportunities, we take them, and where there are not, we create them. That is our job as political leaders in a constituency that has a small number of parades and protests still to be resolved.

I raise that only because the Member raised it and it is something that we can do. Many of the bands involved in parades across the North, throughout this island and, indeed, as some Members mentioned, have participated in competitions that have world titles do not want to be associated at all with what goes on in our constituency. In fact, it is quite clear when you talk to members of the bands forums — certainly the Confederation of Ulster Bands — that there are differences of opinion between urban and rural, and even within urban and urban. There are lots of challenges, but if there is the political will and people are prepared to take risks and to give leadership and support, we can sort it out. However, we need to set our faces to sorting it out.

I guarantee that I will make a bid in June, and, hopefully, it will be successful. If it is not successful, I will look to other sources of funding within the DCAL family and give my best possible attention to getting funding for musical instruments, because I value the work of bands and people involved in music.

When we look at the next CSR, I am minded, after the summer, to look at having a review of this scheme. I am saying that up front: I am looking at having a review of what I think we need to do. While this is about the purchasing of instruments, which is very important, we also need to look at the added value that bands, regardless of their complexion, bring to community cohesion, economic regeneration and social inclusion. I do not think that that has happened properly. The reason why it has not happened properly is because people automatically assume an association with parades. I think that we have an opportunity to be inclusive, involving Comhaltas, for example, or even kids who just come together to form bands and who are not necessarily involved in marching bands culture. They need to have the opportunity to do that and to get that social inclusion.

That needs to be sustained from one generation to another, particularly in areas where young people face challenges to try to find their way. For many of those young people, music is how they make sense of things, and I think that that needs to be supported. However, if it gets reviewed, and I am arguing that it should, people should not be jumping up and down saying, "This is an erosion of our culture". It is not. It is about being more inclusive. We should always try to be more inclusive, particularly when we are looking at getting this bedded down further in any new funding opportunities. We also need to bring in other Departments, particularly to look at aspects of social inclusion and economic and community regeneration, as well as education and rural development.

There are huge opportunities here, but I think that there is and has been a pattern here where a small group of people has been very successful in availing itself of the funding streams, while others have looked on, not quite knowing how to go about availing themselves of them or maybe just not having the wherewithal. In the review, we need to look at how we can make it easier for people to get access. I have said throughout that access equals participation: if you cannot have those two fundamental elements, people will feel that they are and have been excluded because they cannot get involved.

I think that this has been a good-tempered and very useful debate, despite some differences, caveats and, indeed, warnings. I will read Hansard to see what we can do along with officials, the Arts Council and others. I am committed to trying to get some funding for this for the here and now, but I want to look long term. It will need a consultation to find out exactly what is needed, but, let me tell you, I have been in the Department for just four years, and I know that this is not just about the marching bands culture alone. While that is important, there are many others out there who have learned their craft and their skill through marching bands and who want to get involved in other music genres, and I think that they need to be included in some way. I welcome the debate.

Mr Humphrey: On 1 April 2015, the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure announced that, sadly, the musical instruments for bands scheme, administered by the Arts Council, would not be opening. That was a very retrograde step and was something that was hugely divisive for the community that has benefited so much from the award scheme and the funding that has come from the Department and one of its arm's-length bodies, the Ulster-Scots Agency.

As a member of the Orange and Black institutions — I have been an Orangeman for 30 years this year — I have walked behind bands that have been exemplary in their playing, deportment, discipline and decorum. I pay tribute to those bands. That has been my experience as a North Belfast representative in recent times and as an Orangeman sitting in West Belfast Orange Hall for all those years, as my father, grandfather and great-grandfather did before me.

I praise the role of the bands in the community. Other Members touched on that. I pay tribute to the Ulster-Scots Community Network for the role that it has played in working with the bands to improve them, secure funding for them, develop them and be a voice for them alongside the Confederation of Ulster Bands. I will return to that organisation in a moment.

4.15 pm

As others said, 25,000 people across Northern Ireland are involved in bands, and there are 660 bands in total. There has been, as I said, significant investment from the Arts Council and the Ulster-Scots Agency, but we have to put that in context. If you look at the cost of instruments, a concert flute, for example, can cost up to £15,000. A set of bagpipes can cost £750. An accordion — my colleague for North Belfast Mr McCausland is probably the most accomplished accordion player in the Chamber — can cost £1,500. For silver and brass bands, the cost of instruments goes up. Therefore, although £500,000 is no small amount of money in anyone's terms, 660 bands with 25,000 members puts it in some sort of context.

The Department for Social Development commissioned a study in 2013 that identified a number of things. The bands are varied geographically, and the communities they come from and their playing is diverse. They are also different in how they address issues. Many of them address social exclusion, isolation and poverty, as was touched on by Mr Hilditch. Bands contribute something like £19.3 million worth of charitable donations and social capital to community life in Northern Ireland. That is a huge amount of money being put back by the bands sector. The sector spends something like £8.2 million a year in the local economy on instruments, uniforms and transportation costs. Bands offer a structure for tuition, instruments and performance opportunities in many areas where there is no other engagement in the arts. We as a Committee have been touching on the detachment from the arts of working-class communities across this city and Northern Ireland. Bands absolutely fill a void in that area.

Bands are also intergenerational: they include siblings, parents, grandparents and so on. I attended the Festival of Marching Bands that was sponsored by my colleague Diane Dodds in the summer of last year, at which there was a perfect example of that, with a grandchild, father and grandfather in a band. That is an example, as the Orange family ripples out, of the involvement that there is in bands.

Ulster bands have played huge and significant ambassadorial roles in bands in the United States, Canada, Norway, France, Gibraltar and Belgium, and, of course, at the Lord Mayor's show in London. Just last year, I noticed some friends of mine taking part in the parade. They were walking with Baillies Mills Accordion Band. Skeogh Flute Band from outside Dromore and Hamilton Flute Band from Londonderry have also participated there. There are a considerable number of bands from Northern Ireland involved. The Pride of Ballinran Flute Band from Killeel will take part next year.

We must keep in context the positive role that bands play. Similarly, for the younger section of the community, they are the glue that holds it together. I pay tribute to the Confederation of Ulster Bands, which I mentioned earlier. The Committee heard earlier in the year from William Bradshaw, Valerie Quinn and Codie Murray about the role that they play. They are great, articulate and intelligent spokespersons for the band fraternity, and I pay tribute to them.

I was speaking earlier to my party colleague Nigel Kells, who is a councillor in Antrim and involved in Gortagilly Coronation Flute Band. That band has communitised to the extent that it has officers in charge of education and careers tuition in the band for young people for the 11-plus, Key Stage 3, GCSEs, AS levels and A levels. It also has members who advise the band and the wider community in the area about job application forms. That is an example of a band that is not just an organisation that people join and play instruments in; rather, it has absolutely communitised and is giving leadership, building capacity and giving confidence to that community in the south Antrim and southern part of Londonderry areas.

Mr McCausland: Will the Member give way?

Mr Humphrey: Yes.

Mr McCausland: Some years ago, BBC Northern Ireland did a series of programmes on Silverbridge GAA club that presented the club in a very positive light and helped people outside that sector to understand better the work of the GAA club in a rural community. Does the Member agree that a band such as the one that he just mentioned would be an excellent subject for a similar series of BBC Northern Ireland programmes?

Mr Humphrey: The Member will not be surprised to hear that I agree with him entirely. I watched those programmes. At meetings with the BBC that he attended with me, we pushed for equality in output from Broadcasting House in Belfast. Sadly, a band from County Tyrone that took part in a programme that I think was called 'Nolan and Hector Break for the Border' came out of that in a very negative way and had a very bad experience. I wrote to the controller of BBC Northern Ireland about it and subsequently met him. A local Church of Ireland clergyman had contacted me about the band issue. As a Presbyterian, I pay tribute to the Church of Ireland. The Church of Ireland, through the Zacchaeus project led by Sister Valerie Thom of the Church Army, has been doing tremendous work on Orange, Black, Apprentice Boys and band parades across Northern Ireland.

Mr D Bradley: Will the Member give way?

Mr Humphrey: Yes.

Mr D Bradley: Since the Member mentioned the Church of Ireland, is he aware of the work done by Church of Ireland minister the Reverend Gary Hastings in researching the similarities between traditional Irish music and the music played by the type of bands that the Member refers to, in which he found out that there is a common inheritance of music that is shared across the two traditions?

Mr Humphrey: I am aware of that. Of course, the most popular tune that will be played by bands from all sections of the community is 'Star of the County Down'. As the Member knows, that will be played at nationalist parades and on 12 July.

I will turn to the debate. Nelson McCausland said that bands are one of the largest sections and sectors of our community with, as I also said, 25,000 members, and he urged the Minister to look at the proposal again. Rosaleen McCorley supported the general thrust of the motion and praised the bands forum in Londonderry. Karen McKeivitt said that she hoped that a funding stream can be found and that her party wishes that parading will pass off peacefully this year. She also mentioned the work that she has been doing with the Commons Silver Band in Newry. Leslie Cree talked about the role of bands in local communities across Northern Ireland. Anna Lo said that the Alliance Party will support the motion and that over £500,000 had been awarded to reaching into the community. She said that that is important because many young people, especially unemployed males, have been reached by bands. David Hilditch referred to the confederation's presentation —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is almost out.

Mr Humphrey: I am sorry that I did not get to include all the Members who spoke. I will just say in conclusion that the bands fraternity is important to Northern Ireland. It is important for building confidence. I absolutely have to say that the vast majority of bands in Northern Ireland are responsible, decent and honourable people who are about playing music in a way that is respectful —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Member's time is really up.

Mr Humphrey: — and shows dignity and decorum. I pay tribute to them. I urge the House to back the motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the cultural, artistic and community importance of bands in Northern Ireland; recognises the importance of the musical instruments for bands funding programme; expresses its disappointment at the failure of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure to fund the programme this year; and calls on the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to restore the funding for the programme.

Adjourned at 4.23 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 9 June 2015

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Executive Committee Business

Reservoirs Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, Mrs Michelle O'Neill, to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Reservoirs Bill.

Moved. — [Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development).]

Mr Speaker: One amendment has been tabled. Members will have received a copy of the Marshalled List, which provides details of the amendment, and the grouping list. The amendment deals with exemption from planning permission for construction or alteration provisions. I remind Members intending to speak that they should address their comments only to the amendment. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

I call Mr Trevor Clarke to move the amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Mr Speaker: That concludes the Further Consideration Stage of the Reservoirs Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill: Final Stage

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister):
I beg to move

That the Final Stage of the Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill [NIA 48/11-16] do now pass.

Members will be aware that the Committee's Public Services Ombudsperson Bill will abolish the current offices of Assembly Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints as of 1 April 2016. Subject to Assembly approval, the powers and responsibilities of the current offices will be merged in a single new office of Public Services Ombudsperson.

The present ombudsman and commissioner holds those offices in an acting capacity and was appointed for 12 months, with effect from 31 August 2014. The current legislation provides for the offices to be filled by an acting office holder for up to 12 months.

Therefore, the acting appointments will come to an end on 31 August this year, at which point there will be a vacancy in the offices that will frustrate the purpose of the current legislation. At 31 August 2015, the Northern Ireland Public Services Ombudsman (NIPSO) Bill will still be in passage through the Assembly, so the amendment Bill will avoid a vacancy in the offices and will provide the time needed for the Assembly to consider and progress the NIPSO Bill and for commencement of its substantive provisions on 1 April 2016.

The Committee has engaged with OFMDFM, and Ministers are content that the amendment Bill, with the accelerated passage that the Assembly has permitted, adequately manages the risk of a vacancy in the offices of ombudsman and commissioner.

The amendment Bill was introduced in the House on 27 April this year. The Assembly granted accelerated passage, and the Bill passed Second Stage on 11 May. There were no amendments proposed at Consideration Stage on 1 June or at Further Consideration Stage on 8 June to the Bill's three clauses.

Clause 1 provides that, in the acting ombudsman provisions of the 1996 Orders, the references to "12 months" are to be substituted by "24 months". Clause 2 provides for retrospective effect to avoid any argument or difficulty arising regarding the ability to renew, extend or reappoint, or, indeed, to make a new appointment, and it will provide flexibility regarding the choice of mechanism. Clause 3 states that the Bill will come into operation on the day after it receives Royal Assent, and it provides the short title.

I trust that Members continue to share the Committee's view that the amendment Bill provides a pragmatic and straightforward means of avoiding a vacancy arising in the current offices and will provide the time needed for the Assembly to consider and progress the NIPSO Bill in a timely manner.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr Speaker: As no other Members have indicated that they wish to speak, I will move straight to the Question.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Final Stage of the Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints (Amendment) Bill [NIA 48/11-16] do now pass.

DRD Budget Management

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who speak will have five minutes.

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I beg to move

That this Assembly notes that the Committee for Regional Development has lost confidence in the Department for Regional Development's ability to effectively manage and maintain its budgets, as a result of an over-reliance on in-year monitoring, Translink's statement that it will cease to trade within the next two years, the potential for infraction proceedings arising from a lack of investment in waste water treatment plants and the risk of the Department exceeding its 2014-2015 budgetary control limits; and calls on the Minister for Regional Development to explain how he intends to negate these risks and to set out his financial strategy for the next financial period.

The motion asks the Assembly to note that the Committee for Regional Development has lost confidence in the Department's ability to manage its budgets. Somehow the Minister has misconstrued this as a personal attack on him and has reverted to type by running to the press to plead his case, as was evident in his appearance on the 'Sunday Politics' programme at the weekend. This is a continuation of his paper-politics tactics to avoid debate in the House and at Committee by making announcements in the press, such as he did when he published his draft budget, when he allowed Translink to announce a fare increase before Christmas and, at the weekend, when, yet again, he did the House a disservice by debating the motion in the press before giving Members the opportunity to speak on the matter. It is the Minister, not the Committee, that has made this about him.

If I may, I will address some of the allegations that have been made in that programme and yesterday during the debate on Disability Action and the rural community transport budgets. The scheduling of business in this place has never been an easy task. We have to take into account the Executive business brought to the House, the Minister's diary and, indeed, the Committee's forward work programme, which includes Executive and private Members' primary legislation.

There were limited time slots between now and recess to table essential motions, a situation exacerbated by the fact that the Minister has scheduled a visit to Latvia, as I understand it. Yes, Members asked that the Minister attend the Committee to brief it on the impact of his flawed budget, but only at his earliest convenience. It was his private office that first suggested a date later in the month, but then came back to suggest 10 June. The Minister's office, not the Committee, asked for this week. It is disingenuous, therefore, for the Minister to suggest that this is evidence of some type of a purge against him. When asked whether he was embarrassed about today's motion, he suggested that there was:

"more than a whiff of party politics being played".

That was yet another attempt by the Minister to deflect the established and continuous criticism of his Department.

There was muted opposition to the motion from the Minister's party colleague on the Committee, not because he was opposed to the substance of the motion but because it was a criticism of his Minister. The Committee did not divide, and the overwhelming majority of the Committee, comprising representation from my party, Sinn Féin, the SDLP, Alliance and UKIP, agreed the motion. The only dissenting voice, on the basis that he could not vote for a motion that criticised his party's only Minister, was that of the UUP member. That is not party politics. Rather, it is a Statutory Committee voicing its opposition to a Department's draconian budget.

During the 'Sunday Politics' programme, the debate yesterday and, I suspect, the same tired contributions today, it has been stated that the Committee never offered alternatives to the budget proposals. Section 29 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and strand one, paragraph 9, of the Belfast Agreement very clearly set out the Committee's role in the scrutiny of the Department, which is to advise the Minister in the formulation of policy, to scrutinise these policies and ask to:

"consider and advise on departmental budgets and annual plans in the context of the overall Budget allocation".

Our role is not to do the job of the Minister but to scrutinise his Department, policies and budget. On Sunday, the Minister bemoaned the fact that it was interesting that none of the major spending Departments currently operated by Sinn Féin or the DUP would face the same level of scrutiny from the Assembly and its Committees that he is facing this week. I welcome the fact that he believes there to be a high level of scrutiny by this Committee, and I welcome the fact that this scrutiny has been successful. I also welcome the fact that the Committee is unanimous in its desire to continue holding the Department to account.

I will now address the motion before the House today. The motion identifies four main areas of concern: over-reliance on in-year monitoring; Translink ceasing to trade in two years; infraction proceedings; and a departmental budget in danger of exceeding its control limits. These are not figments of the Committee's imagination — they are a reality.

Yesterday, Mr Beggs asked for examples of where the Committee had suggested alternatives, and I will give him an example of where the Committee went beyond its statutory responsibilities to help the Department. We have argued for a long time that the practice of reliance on in-year monitoring for funding was filled with folly. It is a successful tactic when the coffers are overflowing, but, as the Minister is finding out, when the purse strings are snapped shut, it is a foolhardy approach to budgeting. That is borne out by the fact that, since he became Minister, in-year budgeting has resulted in a shortfall of some £160 million in the required road maintenance budget. That could have been negated had the Minister accepted the Committee recommendation that he move away from his Oliver Twist approach to securing funds and the recommendation of the industry, which also addressed the issue. Specifically, the likes of the Quarry Products Association Northern Ireland (QPANI) consistently called for a baseline approach to his budget.

The Minister and his officials have consistently ignored this advice, instead opting for the budgetary version of Russian roulette, meaning that our street lights are out, the safety of drivers and vulnerable road users is being fatally compromised and the risk of homes and businesses being flooded because gullies and drains are not being emptied or cleaned has increased. That is not because of the hand that he and his officials believe that they have been dealt. This was the strategy of his officials long before the budget allocations were even made. This was an announcement in the press before Christmas, and it is what he and his Department have now imposed on Northern Ireland.

How does the Minister inspire confidence in his Department while his officials and his Department continue to support their pet project, Translink? They continue to prop up an organisation that, in the words of the current chief executive, will cease to operate in two years' time if the public purse does not continue to pump hundreds of millions of pounds into it. That organisation has consistently botched procurement exercises such as the Coleraine to Londonderry track and turned down a tender bid of £27 million because it did not represent value for money but comes out with a suggestion last week of £46 million.

10.45 am

I am sure that the Minister, prompted by his officials, will tell the House of the great capital investment that has been made and is planned for Northern Ireland Water. Whilst it is true that there is a significant investment programme in our water infrastructure, the Department still faces severe pressure and the very real potential of infraction proceedings because of the lack of investment in waste water treatment facilities, particularly those in Ballycastle and Belfast lough. The latter is particularly dire and poses a threat not just of infraction proceedings for pollution of the lough but, significantly, of economic investment in Belfast. That, however, seems to be the one area where the Minister and his Department fail to revert to their normal approach of running to the Finance Minister with their begging bowl. Instead, their proposed method is to wait and see whether the European Commission comes after them, at which point they will draw up an action plan that states that they intend to rectify that problem. The plan, however, is missing one key component: where will the Department get the £750 million needed to implement that plan? It is another game of budgetary Russian roulette. How does that inspire confidence in the Department?

The motion is not about the current budget allocation but the endemic failure of the Department to manage its budgets over a number of years. It is about a Department that takes unwarranted risks with its budget, with the public purse being its safety net. That is shown in the fact that it will most likely exceed its budgetary control limits because of a reliance on the public purse bailing it out to the tune of £20 million for the release of value from Belfast harbour, despite not being assured of that funding.

It is schoolboy budgeting, and it is not about the Minister. As you will hear from the contributions today, it is focused on the Department's failings and is about its failures in procurement and its inability to challenge adequately and to plan strategically. I have no doubt that the Department's response will see the Minister cast again in his role as Oliver Twist, when he will ask, "Can I have more?" How does that inspire confidence?

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I take this opportunity to speak on today's motion on the management of the DRD budget. We have heard contributions from officials about the budget over the past number of weeks in Committee, and it is important to point out, at the outset, that the baseline for DRD is £770 million for the 2015-16 financial year. Compared with last year, that represents a £70 million reduction in capital and £3 million in resource, but there is a very substantial budget of £770 million to begin with.

The cutbacks that we are looking at are having a great impact, particularly on the most vulnerable people in our community. We are looking at cutbacks in street lights, the emptying of gullies and grass cutting, and no external contractors will be able to be taken on. In Committee last week, we made the point that, even though this is a cutback in the budget, it could ultimately have a great impact on the safety of road users. I represent a rural constituency, and one of the biggest gripes of many of our constituents is potholes. Indeed, those will become more obvious and evident as we see a cut —

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr McAleer: Yes, OK.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member acknowledge that, in the absence of a voluntary redundancy scheme that would bring savings in-year and allow more funding to go towards issues such as potholes, it is difficult to make significant savings? Will he also acknowledge that he and his party are stopping that scheme coming in?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McAleer: It is important for the Member to acknowledge that this is one of the Departments that is pretty well protected, with a very grand budget of £770 million. The management of that budget is extremely important and that is what we are looking at here today.

If we look at the vulnerable people whom we represent in our areas, we see that the issues of road safety, potholes, gully emptying and grass cutting for things like sight lines on roads are extremely important. We have also been looking in recent times at proposed cutbacks in the region of over 30% to the rural transport budget. Coming from an area that has a very dispersed population, I know that that will have a huge impact on the most vulnerable people in our communities who rely on rural transport to get to local services, to get out and about and to reduce isolation.

Whilst we are looking at a reduced budget, the cuts that are being made are affecting the most vulnerable people and causing a great sense of alarm out there. There is a huge role here for DRD to look carefully at how the budget is managed and spent.

Mr Dallat: At the outset, let me assure the Minister that the SDLP is not looking for his head on a platter — certainly not today and most definitely not in the week following his £46·1 million investment in the Belfast to Derry railway. I have some sympathy for the Minister. He inherited an awful shambles from the past, and some of us who served on the Regional Development Committee in the past remember those dark days when Northern Ireland Water virtually ceased to function, with a dysfunctional chief executive, Laurence MacKenzie; the permanent secretary of the day, Paul Priestly; and, of course, the Minister of the day. I just wonder how many potholes could have been filled, how many grass verges could have been cut and how many street lights could have been repaired with the hundreds of thousands of pounds that was spent on legal fees for a case that never went to court because there was no justification. Sadly, during that time, four directors of Northern Ireland Water were sacked because they dared to change the way things ran. Mr Kennedy, you inherited that, and Northern Ireland Water today is somewhat better than it was then, but let us not live in the past. Let us move to the current dilemmas.

I am seriously worried about infraction — I have raised it on a number of occasions at Committee meetings — and not because the Minister has perhaps mishandled his budget but because the money is simply not there. This generation will not be forgiven for leaving behind a legacy of underdevelopment, which means that the future generation will have to pick up the penalties from the European Union should infraction become an issue. Let us move on from that as well, and let us hope that, in the future, the Executive will provide the capital investment that is needed to make sure that infraction is not an issue, as the Chairman mentioned.

Let us move on to Translink, and let me acknowledge straight away that that company provided a public transport service during the worst days of the Troubles. Nine of their drivers lost their life, but, again, that is in the past. Let us forget about it, at least for this purpose. The Minister will perhaps address this issue, but there is a board of directors in Translink who are sitting on their hands. Many of them serve in multiple organisations. That needs to end, and the public appointments process needs to change to ensure that Translink and Northern Ireland Water, which does not have a single woman on its board, change and move with the times. They need to ask the searching questions that are being asked here today, because the cosy relationship that existed between the Department, Translink and Northern Ireland Water in the past does not work any more. We are in a modern world.

I was, of course, extremely disappointed that the A5 did not go ahead, but, again, that cock-up happened before Mr Kennedy took over. The A6 is parked somewhere, and, again, the bypass at Dungiven was not decoupled, as the SDLP asked for on many, many occasions; but, again, the Minister of the day said, “No, no, just one contract; let it proceed”. Of course, it has not.

We are discussing this today, and the message probably going out to the Department is that, yes, there is a lot of disquiet at how things have happened. Let us go through it root and branch — the whole organisation from top to bottom — so that we produce a Department capable of overseeing a bus company and rail company that provide the services that the public wants, and let us never again be embarrassed by having street lights that do not work or having potholes. That is not the message that we want to send to the tourist industry, and it is certainly not the message or the legacy that we want to leave behind for future generations.

Mr Hussey: I am deeply disappointed that we are debating this motion today. I opposed it at the Committee for Regional Development as it amounts to nothing more than petty party political point scoring. It is utterly ridiculous that the Minister is being hauled in front of the Assembly twice this week and in front of the Committee tomorrow to explain why he has lived within the budget that he was allocated and to reiterate the points that he made time and time again at the Executive, in the Assembly and before the Committee.

Danny Kennedy has been unambiguous when highlighting the effects that his budget allocation would have on his Department's ability to deliver front-line services. In fact, he began to outline what it would look like after June monitoring was finally agreed last year. Before the very Committee that has brought the motion today, he has repeatedly been very clear about the difficult decisions that he would be faced with and the implications for front-line services; yet we have motions like the one brought forward today as though the current situation was a surprise. Who moved the motion? It was the DUP Chair of the Committee — a Member of the party that wants the Assembly to support a phantom budget — a budget that has no basis in reality and is nothing more than a fig leaf. Perhaps his fire-and-brimstone approach is more brimstone; yet he thinks that he can lecture others about fiscal responsibility.

The targeting of Danny Kennedy is nothing more than a poor attempt to deflect from the gross financial mismanagement by the DUP and Sinn Féin over the last four years, but we have seen that all before. I am sure that Members can remember the DUP's treatment of Michael McGimpsey when he warned that he was not being given enough money to run the health service and of what the future consequences would be, and now we see — as we knew all along — that he was right.

The DUP has a track record of playing silly games with Ulster Unionist Ministers. Look at how Simon Hamilton dealt with the £20 million Belfast port money. He allowed something that was quite clearly an Executive responsibility — he had accepted it as one the previous year and for this financial year — to create a financial pressure point in 2014-15 that drew money away from core services. I would love to be able to quote what the Chair of the Committee had to say about that during the motion that he brought forward, but I cannot, because he did not. Why not? It should have been of great concern that such an unfair and unjust penalty would bring pressure on the Minister's ability to deliver public services, but that would have required criticism of his own Minister, and we know that the DUP does not do that.

Who can forget the flurry of petitions of concern and disrupted Committees to save Nelson McCausland's blushes? We are all used to the selective memories of Sinn Féin, but surely it is not too difficult for it to recall the mess that Conor Murphy left behind after his time as Minister for Regional Development that Danny Kennedy has done so well to clean up. Indeed, just last week, the Member for East Londonderry Mr Dallat paid tribute to the Minister's revival of the Coleraine to Londonderry rail line after it had been left, as he put it, to wither on the vine by Conor Murphy. How deeply disappointing it is to see that it supports the motion today. However, I am pleased that Mr Dallat does not want the Minister's head.

Let us not forget that it is the action, or inaction, of Sinn Féin that will see the financial instability worsen. Its failure to honour its agreement on welfare reform is costing us £2 million a week. What Minister in the House could not put their hand up and say that that amount of money would have a transformational effect on the Department's ability to deliver services; yet we squander it every week because of the political ambitions of some people in the Chamber.

11.00 am

We will not be supporting this motion. Despite the hand that he has been dealt, Danny Kennedy has kept infrastructure projects on track, held off unfair water charges and invested in our rail and bus networks, seeing passenger numbers rise. It is important to note that the motion offers nothing constructive in how the Chair of the Committee thinks the Minister could apply his budget to achieve a different outcome. Perhaps that is asking too much of a party that will, next week, be asking us to abandon reality in favour of voodoo economics.

Mr Lyttle: I support the motion. It is only right that the Committee for Regional Development express its serious concern that the Minister for Regional Development is operating a budget that is at risk of exceeding its limits. I listened with interest to Mr Hussey raise concerns about the DUP playing "silly games" with Ulster Unionist Ministers. That did not seem to stop the Ulster Unionist Party entering headlong into electoral pacts with the DUP, so it is a bit late in the day to be playing that fiddle.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyttle: I will give way, yes.

Mr Clarke: In his contribution, maybe the Member will remind the previous Member to speak that this is a Committee motion, not a DUP one, and that it was supported by every party on that Committee.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for his intervention. I think —

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. The proposal was not supported by every political party on the Committee. I objected to it.

Mr Speaker: You have made your point on the record, but the fact of the matter is that this has been brought forward as a Committee motion. That does not mean that every party supported it.

Mr Lyttle: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I thank the Member for his intervention and I note the comments of Mr Hussey. The fact remains that there are at least four political parties here, perhaps even more, that are expressing their concern on this issue. To reduce it to the critique of political point scoring is inadequate in itself, but I am sure we will hear more of that. Indeed, yesterday, we heard plenty from Mr Beggs and Mr Swann, who were criticising the lack of alternatives and the lack of collective responsibility. Where was the Ulster Unionist Party's support when the Alliance Minister for Employment and Learning brought forward sound proposals on the rationalisation of teacher training and the savings that could be made? Where was the collective responsibility then? When people put forward alternatives, we are misrepresented by the Minister, unexpectedly. I expect better from the Minister than resorting to misrepresenting Alliance Party policy on these issues. When we put forward alternatives, they are brushed aside with the comment that water charging is the only suggestion that the Alliance has. That is a grossly inadequate contribution and I expect more from the Minister.

There is an over-reliance on in-year monitoring. The Committee learnt last week that, should the Minister's bid for June monitoring funds be unsuccessful, his Department could be around £20 million short of the funds necessary to deliver only the minimum required standards on street lighting, grass cutting, gully cleaning and general road maintenance, all of which are essential services for public safety and flood prevention in our community.

Of course there are tough decisions as to what should be prioritised, so simply sweeping aside water charges as unfair when the subsidy of £300 million a year for water pricing is being prioritised over issues that are essential to the safety and well-being of the public and to protect their properties is inadequate. We need to have open debate and discussion. The Executive have taken a clear decision not to introduce any type of water pricing for the foreseeable future, and the Alliance Party was part of that decision, but at what point will the Minister show some leadership by at least exploring some of the alternatives and issues?

The Department for Regional Development is also at risk of EU infraction proceedings for failing to introduce a water pricing policy that encourages conservation. The infrastructure is not just at risk in Northern Ireland; the EU has commenced infraction proceedings against the UK on 17 sites, one of which is in Ballycastle. My understanding is that that is for a breach of the waste water treatment directive.

We have heard also that around £750 million is required for the Belfast drainage plan, so where is the leadership, and what are the Minister's alternatives for trying to deal with those particular issues?

My party absolutely acknowledges that the political intransigence around the Stormont House Agreement and welfare reform is costing the Executive and the people of Northern Ireland dearly, and we hope to see progress from Sinn Féin, SDLP and the Greens in that regard. We also need to see much more leadership from the Minister for Regional Development, and perhaps he can set out clearly today where exactly he believes the pressures are coming from for his Department for the Committee to work on those issues. We need him to show leadership; we cannot have a passive Minister in taking the tough decisions that are necessary, and we look forward to hearing how he intends to deal with these challenges today.

Mr Easton: I rise to support the motion at a time when money is tight and budgets are coming under increasing pressure. It is vital that Ministers do all that they can to keep within their budgets that have been set and agreed and that they look at every possible avenue to reduce risk and to ensure that services are provided and protected as best they can be and that staff employed and, indeed, the public are given the best possible services that we can provide.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Easton: No, not at the moment.

When we look closely at the budget for DRD for this financial year, we see that it is around £333 million, which is about £11 million less than in the last financial year, when it was around £344 million. That is a reduction of around 0.6%. Yet, DRD claims that it has a shortfall of £60 million in its budget. This was explained by the Department and the Minister in an evidence session to the Committee for Regional Development. We see that the Department has an over-reliance on in-year monitoring rounds, and I have no doubt that, during the next June monitoring round, we will see bids by DRD and other Departments. In the 2015-16 budget set by DRD, we can see an allocation of £152 million for the Department, £61 million for Translink, £109 million for Northern Ireland Water and EU funding of about £0.5 million.

If we look at Northern Ireland Water, we see pressures of £15 million, largely due to rates revaluations. Has the Department appealed these? Instead, we see money being moved from roads to Northern Ireland Water, which, obviously, has caused a problem in the roads budgets. Have any costings been done on the voluntary exit scheme for Northern Ireland Water? Would this have gone some way to help the Northern Ireland Water budget? I also want to ask about the selling of assets that are no longer required. Where is Northern Ireland Water on these issues? I do not see much movement on these.

It is claimed that Translink is projected to lose about £14.3 million yet has assets of £55 million, although it was stated at the Committee meeting that this will be reduced to £41 million and that a further £11 million will then be lost, which will bring the reserves down to £30 million. We have been told that this will go down to £18 million of reserves left. Surely, until now, these reserves have been steadily increasing over the years and have now decreased rapidly, within the space of a year, and are being used to pay its bills. Surely, the overall budget for Translink was being used for paying its bills, not its reserves. That was stated by Mr May when answering questions from the Committee for Regional Development. In my opinion, something does not add up with the Translink reserves, and I believe that the Committee will need to have a closer look at what the reserves are being used for in Translink.

How much money has been saved under the voluntary exit scheme by Translink? Would this not help with the budget? Also, I question why Translink is providing company cars for 40 staff. Indeed, we found out that there were about nine company cars for Northern Ireland Railways. This is costing hundreds of thousands of pounds. Surely, this is an extravagance that, in this day and age, we cannot afford. Surely, the Minister must put a stop to this. I believe that money can be found in the areas of Translink that do not have to hurt the public. All that is needed is a bit of willpower and imagination from your Department.

For Transport NI, we see that £10 million was moved from roads to Northern Ireland Water. It is no wonder that we see pressure on street lighting, potholes not being fixed and no grass cutting, as, in essence, we are robbing Peter to pay Paul. We can see that £40 million is needed to meet long-term public-private partnership (PPP) contractual commitments. Has the Department gone back to look at whether those costs can be reduced through renegotiation? That is the logical thing to do. It is done in other Departments, so I hope that the Minister will consider doing that. I also note that Transport NI plans to save £3 million through the voluntary exit scheme and other admin efficiencies. It is a pity that the Committee cannot get the same information from Northern Ireland Water, Translink and Northern Ireland Railways on those issues.

Yesterday, we had a debate on community rural transport, which will see a huge reduction of £2 million in its budget. That is an increase of over 30%, which is quite worrying.

If we cannot agree our budgets across Departments, there will be a £600 million black hole, and the cuts that we are seeing now, which are quite bad, will have a devastating effect on the people of Northern Ireland from everybody's community. It is important that we all try to sort out our budgets and the Stormont House Agreement.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Easton: I believe that savings can be found elsewhere, and I urge the Minister to look at that.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Beidh mé breá sásta a bheith ag labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin seo. I support the motion. I have been on the Regional Development Committee for the past four years, but, if I had landed from Mars this morning, I might think that all the ills that we now face are down to one Conor Murphy. I am very glad that he is back in the Assembly, and I have no doubt that he will acquit himself of some of the allegations that have been constantly made against him for the period in question.

I was not blind to what was going on before I came here, because I had an abiding interest in all aspects of the Committee and the Department. Being from the north-west, I knew that the historical dearth of investment in infrastructure was patently obvious and needed addressing. In the last four years, I have had the opportunity to see at first hand the machinations of the Committee and the Department, the modus operandi and the personnel involved. I have been frustrated at the methodologies employed and at the time taken to make decisions, as well as with the outcomes and results.

We have had our own frustrations in the north-west, as was referred to earlier. The A5 is obviously a major one, and there is also the A6, in which the Minister knows that I have more than an abiding interest. The chair of the Freight Transport Association was airing his frustrations on Radio Foyle this morning. We have seen other projects literally bypass those projects; for example, the Magherafelt bypass, which was well down the list of priorities in ISNI for 2011-2021.

The Minister was rightly praised earlier for his work on the Coleraine to Derry line, although that in itself had a lot of shortcomings, as evidenced by the project assessment review report. That is why we have got to the point at which the line is costing some £26.5 million more than it should have done initially. I have also been vocal in the past about the Magilligan to Greencastle ferry, which I believe is eminently suitable for Trans-European Transport Network (TEN-T) funding under the motorways of the sea programme. Elsewhere, we have looked at the difficulties in the integrated transport pilot scheme in particular, which has been dawdling along for the past number of years without much in the way of a result. We have seen a £14.3 million projected loss at Translink, and that is coming from a body that has a £55 million reserve.

Yesterday, we discussed at length the saving of some £1.25 million by cutting funding in the community and disabled transport sector. All that time, however, we are still squandering money on a raft of other scenarios. In tomorrow's Committee meeting, we will look at a how a public transport company — namely, Translink — spends £800,000 a year on private-hire taxis and company vehicles. I am not sure whether that can be justified, particularly given the community transport situation. A number of years ago, I highlighted the case of the Belfast to Derry train drivers who were driving the train to Derry and then taking taxis home to Belfast at the cost of some £28,000.

11.15 am

In the past, reference has been made to a cosy relationship between Translink and the Department. I have never had it adequately explained to me; maybe the Minister will take the opportunity to do so today. There is a £9 million investment in Translink this year for the purchase of new vehicles.

The Minister talked about other Ministers and Departments "shroud waving". I am not sure of the biblical quotation about being a weeping Jeremiah, so I wonder if he might address that and give me a lesson on it. Overall, we are looking at a modest reduction in the DRD budget from £344 million to £333 million. Our constituents, as they see grass verges not being cut and the potholes not filled, are not sure that they are getting value for money, especially when it is being squandered elsewhere in the Department. I am sure that the Minister will take the opportunity to address that today.

Mr Byrne: As a member of the Regional Development Committee, I endorse the motion from the Committee. It would, however, be a gross mistake to kick the Minister and blame him for all the prevailing ills and difficulties. The reality is that the budget proposed for DRD in 2015-16 is the primary reason for the debate. The Department will be expected to live with £60 million cuts to its resource budget, and that obviously has immediate knock-on effects in cuts to community transport, Disability Action and roads, including routine maintenance — filling potholes, grass cutting, repairing street lights and emptying gullies. These are the up-front issues that concern the public at large and, indeed, members of the Committee. There have been concerns also about proposed cuts of £15 million in capital to the waste water treatment works and the water supply services. This is of particular concern in the western area where I live, which has a backlog of upgrading, as evidenced by the breakdown in water supply last January in Tyrone and Fermanagh.

We in this party are aware of the 2015-16 Budget problems generally in government here. We recognise that the austerity may get worse, if we are to believe all that we hear from across the Irish Sea. It would be easy to have a party political punch-up about the Assembly's more recent difficulties in agreeing a Budget against the background of austerity and welfare reform proposals. The Minister has to be congratulated for limiting the cuts in the current budget. Other Departments have proposed more severe cuts. We need to recognise that DARD, sorry, DRD — I am confused about what Committee I am talking about, Mr Speaker — has had a custom and practice of relying heavily on in-year monitoring rounds.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Byrne: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member acknowledge that the Roads Service has always wanted more money for maintenance but the Finance Minister has regularly used it as a means of utilising underfunding in other Departments through in-year monitoring? Although he has made good use of the money late, it is not something that anybody would wish for; it is simply a mechanism that the Executive have chosen to use.

Mr Byrne: I recognise what Mr Beggs has said; indeed, I have commented on that in the past. However, the custom and practice is such that, very often, money that is reallocated through in-year monitoring rounds has to be utilised immediately. The Roads Service has been very good at having shovel-ready proposals and projects available, and, because of that, the Department has fallen into a false sense of security and reliance on in-year monitoring moneys. I hope, however, that the Minister is successful in current monitoring round decisions, because that would help to relieve the immediate pressures that people will experience in road safety and grass cutting. I have to say that I was delighted yesterday evening, on the way home, to see that there has been quite a bit of cutting of grass verges in the last 24 hours.

The Minister has lobbied strongly for extra moneys to protect the general condition of the road network, and I hope he will be successful. I welcome, as my colleague John Dallat did, the courageous decision by the Minister to go ahead with the ministerial order in recommending the Coleraine to Derry phase 2 rail project update. The Minister has demonstrated a commitment to making sure that the general infrastructure across Northern Ireland improves under his tenure. Obviously, as someone who lives in West Tyrone, the A5 project is my continual nightmare issue. I know that the Minister has given assurances about that, and I hope that the Executive generally, with the two Governments, deliver on that economic peace dividend project, because it is still so important. Infrastructure is crucial to the future of the regional economy, as we all know. Road transport is crucial for moving people and goods from production locations to the ports of Larne, Belfast, Warrenpoint and Derry. It is fair to say that there have been some good improvements in recent times, but there is a lot more to be done.

It is important that we all recognise that it is about priorities. The Minister has become a victim of maybe less than full disclosure by his officials when they appear in front of the Committee, and that has damaged the relationship between the Minister and the Committee somewhat.

Mr Beggs: First, I would like to pick up on a couple of comments that Members have made. There was a comment from the Chair of the Committee that the Department continues to prop up Translink. I, for one, value public transport in my constituency, and so do my constituents. I do not wish to go towards a laissez-faire, private approach, where many vulnerable rural routes will be at risk. Even at the minute, the town services are being consulted on.

Mr Easton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beggs: The Member did not give way to me earlier, and now he expects me to give way to him. Alex Easton also criticised Translink's plan to reduce its reserves. There has been criticism of the level of reserves. The Department recognised that Translink had too many reserves and reduced its budget so that they come down, and you are still criticising that. What do you wish to do with those reserves, keep them at the high level? Whatever you do, it seems to be criticism for criticism's sake.

I turn to the crux of the matter, which is the current financial crisis here. Reductions in budgets are occurring, and difficulties are being created, principally by the parties who approved the Budget — the DUP and Sinn Féin — who then criticise the outworkings of their Budget rather than dealing with the issue and solving some of the difficulties. I go back to what I said earlier: we need our voluntary redundancy scheme to free up money so that it can be used to address the needs of the community. What is stopping it? It was built into the Stormont House Agreement and welfare reform, which Sinn Féin, in particular, along with the SDLP, is preventing from going through. That causes knock-on effects for every Department and for the vulnerable in our community.

The motion today is nothing but an attempt to direct attention away from the financial mess that we find ourselves in. It contains a line about losing confidence in the Department's:

"ability to effectively manage and maintain its budgets".

How do you maintain your budget? Your budget is set by the Finance Minister in the annual Budget, so how does the Department get more money into it? It bids for more, but the Finance Minister and the Executive have rejected that, so I really do not understand that criticism. You have to almost admire the sheer arrogance of some of the comments.

We are sitting in the Chamber today where it is anticipated that, very soon, the Budget will be brought forward — a Budget that does not consider the current financial reality that we are in. It is being brought about because three parties in this Chamber killed off a Bill, which is an action that comes with a consequence of at least £2 million a week in the current year, which, as I understand it, may rise to £4 million a week next year. On top of that is the absence of the voluntary redundancy scheme, which would allow us to free up our finances.

The Ulster Unionist Party opposed the Budgets that were brought forward for this mandate. We did not believe that they were fit for purpose. We have been proven right, as the mismanagement over the past four years has led to greater financial pain in the final year. Even at this minute in time, a further £100 million of excess spending last year is hanging over all our heads that could significantly adversely impact this year's spending if that agreement, which would allow it to be paid back on a longer-term basis, is not honoured.

The Committee Chair spoke of the role of the Committee in scrutinising the departmental budget. Yes, that is an important role, but scrutiny should not be about nitpicking and highlighting issues that do not bring about a solution and improvement. In my opinion, criticism should be constructive, with alternatives suggested. Certainly, when I was a member of the Health Committee and saw that there were difficulties, I supported every bid for more money in the annual monitoring rounds. That is not what is happening in this Committee. It is just nitpicking that is going on. I think that everyone should look at what they are doing and at how they can solve the problem.

Given the level of the reduction, some Departments' budgets have been subject to more criticism than others, but undoubtedly there will be problems in every Department, so why has this Minister, whose budget has been severely impacted, been picked out? It is really infantile politics.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Speaker: The Member's time —

Mr Beggs: Yes, I will.

Mr Speaker: Just about. Well done. [Laughter.]

Mr Dallat: Mr Speaker, I have just allocated the Member an extra minute, or part of one. The Member worries me. Does he not accept that one of the features of this Assembly is 11 scrutiny Committees that do their job largely above party politics and that are entitled to go in and shine a light in every corner where they think that improvements can be made?

Mr Beggs: Indeed. What I would like to hear are constructive ideas coming forward on how to bring about improvements. Everyone is well aware that, with in-year monitoring last year and money being clawed back from the Department, lights were not being fixed and drains were not being cleared as frequently as they should. That ought to have been a major warning of the severity and critical nature of the Department's finances at that time, and it should have been recognised.

The people of Northern Ireland deserve better. We deserve better than fantasy economics and phantom budgets. Clearly, this is a failure to address the main issue, which is solving the overall economic situation.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is up. I am starting to understand why the trains and buses have so much difficulty with their timetables.

Mr Allister: I suppose that, as an outside observer of the marvellous workings of our Government, I am a little bit reluctant to comment on this internecine warfare between the Executive parties, but I will say this: it is no surprise to me that the object of attack is a minority party within this Executive. That seems to be pretty much par for the course.

Of course, the Chairman, in introducing the debate, said that this was not a personal attack on the Minister, and then he spent the first four minutes of his speech indulging himself in precisely that in his own irascible way. I think that one is entitled to question just what is the motivation of the debate.

There was also the suggestion that there were party politics at play, which was dismissed by the Chairman. Methinks perhaps that the outcome of the general election in South Antrim might have had its own bearing on some of the approaches of the Chairman of the Committee.

I am no —

Mr Clarke: You did well in North Antrim as well, Jim. You ran away, Jim.

Mr Speaker: Order.

11.30 am

Mr Allister: I am no apologist for the Regional Development Minister. I have had meetings with him at which I have been critical of some of his policies and their consequences, but I do recognise when a Minister is being picked on in the Executive in Budget allocations and then in criticism of how he seeks to manage those allocations.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Dallat: Does the Member agree that, given that the Chairperson has called for the resignation of the Minister, he is just a little bit biased?

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Allister: The point is well made. That has been quite obvious, not just in this debate —

Mr Clarke: On a point of order. I seek clarification and your guidance on this, Mr Speaker. At which point did I ask for the resignation of the Minister? I know that another Member did seek that, but I do not think that my name should be associated with those comments.

Mr Speaker: I do not think that that is a point of order and I do not think that the Member had completed his particular reference. He may or may not make that allegation, but I have not picked it up so far.

Mr Allister: If what Mr Dallat says is correct, I am not surprised. It fits within the party politics allegation if it is correct.

The key thing that strikes me in this debate is the assault on the Minister for an alleged lack of budget probity from those who, in two weeks' time, in this very House, will advocate and vote for a fantasy Budget. A Budget that the Minister has already said has a £604 million hole in it. Yet the very people who today lecture on budget probity are the very people who, this day two weeks, will trip through this Lobby to vote for a fantasy, phantom Budget. Those who point the finger should just pause for a moment and reflect as to where the other fingers are pointing back. In that, they leave much to be desired.

Then, of course, onto this bandwagon jumps Sinn Féin, the party that has put us into this budgetary mess. That party is very eager and very quick today to criticise the hapless Regional Development Minister for his budgetary control, with no regard for the fact that it is the architect of the very budgetary quagmire in which the Assembly is wallowing day after day. There is much of a less-than-frank nature about some of the things that are being said.

Then we have lamentations about how there could be infraction proceedings from Europe against DRD. I have a very easy answer for that: exit from the EU would solve that problem, and many other problems, straight away. Indeed, exit would liberate this great nation of ours, uninhibited by all the constraints of Brussels, to make its own way as a great trading nation in the world.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Lyttle: Is the Member seriously diminishing the need for a high standard of water quality in our community with his party policy on Europe?

Mr Allister: I do not think we need Brussels to tell us what is good water and what is bad water, what is clean water and what is dirty water. We are more than capable of working that out for ourselves. Why, therefore, do we pay the phenomenal £17 billion a year to put ourselves under the jackboot of Brussels? I do not understand that and I urge and hope for the day when the British people, who do not understand it, will exercise their democratic right and —

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I call Mr Mike Nesbitt.

Mr Nesbitt: I had not intended to speak in the debate. I came down to listen. I was curious because this is the second day in a row that we have focused on the Department for Regional Development, having had, by the way, a question for urgent oral answer last week. I have no difficulty with Committees scrutinising their Department or with the fact that scrutiny sometimes results in criticism. I prefer it when it is constructive criticism that says that you are doing A but asks whether you have thought about doing B because it might be better. Scrutiny can, of course, also end in endorsement and praise for the way in which a Department is run. As the Chair of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, I am always keen to look for areas where scrutiny will result in a positive view of the actions of OFMDFM, although that is sometimes difficult.

Here we are focusing on the Department for Regional Development for the second day in a row as if everything in the garden is rosy, as if there was no Stormont House Agreement not being implemented and as if those who wish to protect the vulnerable are not responsible, through their flip-flop on the Stormont House Agreement, for the Treasury taking back £2 million a week. That is money that could be spent on our vulnerable people but which they are content to see the Treasury redistribute to the people of England, Scotland and Wales — not to our vulnerable people.

If the Committee is serious about criticising the financial management of the Minister for Regional Development, it needs to catch a grip and take a look at what the two main government parties are doing with their Budget. We have vulnerable people, and we call them “people who live with deprivation”. In the Programme for Government, there was a commitment to help people who live in deprivation, and that means poverty. The commitment was to spend £40 million over three years, ending on 30 March this year. At the same time, another £40 million was to be spent on those who live in dereliction in areas like the lower Newtownards Road, where all the shops are boarded up and painted over, and we are supposed to pretend that things are better than they are. That is £80 million for dereliction and deprivation. We all signed up to that and thought that it was a great idea to spend that money on the vulnerable in vulnerable and needy areas. What did we discover? How much of the £80 million was spent in the three years to which it was allocated? £1 million. £1 million out of £80 million. If there is a shortage of money for cutting the grass or repairing lights, go and ask Peter Robinson or Martin McGuinness. They have £79 million in their joint bank account. That is a disgrace, and that is the focus that the Chamber should bring to our Executive Government.

The Chairman opened the debate by accusing the Minister of misinterpreting the motion as a personal attack. As Mr Allister has just pointed out, the Chairman then spent the first four minutes launching a personal attack on the Minister. It was four minutes and 22 seconds long. It was four minutes and 22 seconds before the Chairman addressed the motion. That tells you all that we need to know about the motivation of the Member for South Antrim.

Mr McNarry: It is a privilege to serve on the Committee, in deference to which I take great exception to any scurrilous spin that, two weeks ago, we met to gang up on the Department and that resulted in today’s motion. It is not a fantasy motion; it is about real things. In case that realisation has not sunk in, which I suspect is and always was part of the problem, the Department has only itself to blame. The motion is borne out of months of frustration and bewilderment at listening to evidence from senior officials who fell apart under deep probing and close scrutiny of their decisions and actions. It is not a sudden surprise, and it should not be a sudden surprise to the Minister either. He will recall that, some time ago, I warned him personally that the arrogance of some of his senior officials was causing him to lose his Committee. Nothing changed; it was then and remains a Department out of control.

I say to the pipsqueaks seeking wriggle room with the question, “What would you do?” that it is a silly point. The Committee’s role is to scrutinise policy not make it. What could you do anyway with distorted facts and figures presented that did not stack up? It is not a question of “What would you do?”; it is and will remain a question of “What on earth is being done?”. We have a litany of serious compounded errors as detailed in various Hansard and Committee reports, showing over a lengthy period — not last week or yesterday — how the Committee’s concerns were met by excuses given by officials to exonerate the Department irrespective of how many times their forecasts proved to be inaccurate. Evasion was the name of their game. It was not of the standard expected in managing public money.

In a week when a so-called fantasy Budget is topical, let me say that the Committee has for months been treated to fantasy projects, spending fantasy money on proposed pet projects put together on the canvas of an artist’s impression, projects with guesstimated costs, downloaded on costs. The litany of that record is there for all to read. Yet, the Committee was informed only last Wednesday that there was no money for potholes, gully drains, grass verges, road markings, signage or bridges. It was incredible to hear it. We have a management putting public safety at risk, and it is not good enough. Nor is the proposed solution in June monitoring, which proposes to take us from no money to a skeleton service and then on to a minimum requirement service, none of which allays fears about public safety being at risk.

On that day, the financial director told me that the £6.6 million bid was being undertaken at a risk, when the Department has known for several years of a deepening Budget crisis — not yesterday or last week but for years. Instead of protecting public safety, it has put in immediate danger the Department’s critical routine and statutory legal responsibilities and duties. It has gone for populism at the price of safety.

The Department’s problem is its reliance on and abuse of in-year monitoring, where the guidelines state explicitly that the Department must not plan on the assumption that bids will be met. It is a strategy designed to fail, and it has failed. That has been the problem with the Department. A loss of confidence as a result of today’s motion will not be reversed as long as the Department’s financial management wastes millions of pounds of public money, admits that its monitoring bid is undertaken at a risk —

Mr Speaker: The Member’s time is almost up.

Mr McNarry: — and, in doing so, has emptied the money bank. It is a performance of zero rating.

Mr McCallister: I am sure that the Minister is touched by the number of Executive colleagues who have come out to support him today in the effort to reinforce collective Cabinet government. He is probably thinking to himself, “With friends like these, who needs colleagues?”. Mr Allister was spot on about the Committee Chair and Member for South Antrim; it is much more to do with an election result in South Antrim. Only a number of weeks ago, DUP colleagues were calling on people in Newry and Armagh to vote for Mr Kennedy; now they want his head on a platter. At least Mr Dallat does not.

11.45 am

Virtually every week in the Chamber the case is made for reforming the Assembly and the Executive. A number of weeks ago, in the water motion, we had the then junior Minister Bell calling on Minister Kennedy to follow Executive policy. That was really an attack on the Alliance Party, which is still in the Executive as well. All the Executive parties gang up on one another. Today's motion — I have to give it to the Committee — is exceptional when you consider where Northern Ireland is heading. Let's all gang up on the Minister for Regional Development — meanwhile, the entire Executive of Northern Ireland are hurtling down the tracks towards practical bankruptcy. We have a fantasy Budget on its way that will, of course, given the title "fantasy", bear no relevance to reality. We could be in a situation by late July or August where the permanent secretary of the Department of Finance and Personnel is running our finances. Yet, we are wondering here about Minister Kennedy getting the grass verges cut while our entire finances go down the plughole. Is there any sense of reality?

On this occasion, because of Sinn Féin's stance on welfare reform, we are haemorrhaging £2 million per week. With no real way of passing a meaningful Budget, the Finance Department will have to step in and take emergency measures. That is putting —

Mr Speaker: The Member should bring his remarks to a close.

Mr McCallister: — a real dent in our confidence in the Executive. What is worse is that the people out there have long since switched off and no longer worry about what this place does. It is not even a crisis. In Mr Nesbitt's words, it is barely a proper crisis.

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): At the outset, I apologise for my slight lateness to the debate. I think that a number of Members were, like me, caught by the rolling forward of business. No discourtesy was intended to you, Mr Speaker, the House or the members of the Regional Development Committee. The delay meant that I missed the four minutes and 22 seconds attributed to the Chairman of the Committee, but I caught enough of the end to hear myself being likened to Oliver Twist. I return the compliment by describing the Chair as the Artful Dodger: he seems to be dodging some of the financial issues that confront the Committee, my Department and me.

I welcome the opportunity to set out how I am managing — I stress the word "managing" — my budget in the difficult circumstances that I find myself in. First, I need to address the inaccuracies in the motion tabled by the Committee for Regional Development. We have a well-established public expenditure system here: the Budget sets the total for each Department, and, through the financial year, adjustments are made by the Executive through the monitoring rounds. That allows reduced requirements to be surrendered and some additional pressures to be met. All Departments make use of it for both purposes.

For my Department, particularly for road maintenance, the Executive adopted a deliberate policy of dampening my opening budget in the recognition that any surplus capital emerging later in the year, as invariably happens, can be soaked up by spend on structural maintenance. I have consistently made it clear that the use of my Department as a sponge militates against sensible planning and actually delivers less value for money, as the investment is best spent in the summer and autumn.

Nonetheless, that has been the pattern in recent years. Now, apparently, it is I who stands accused of over-reliance on in-year monitoring.

The Committees of this Assembly have a vital role. One element is scrutiny of Ministers and Departments. As a member of the House and a former Chair of Statutory Committees in previous mandates, I fully support that role, but another role is to champion Departments' interests and act as an advocate for investment. This must be the first time that a Committee is arguing against investment and has come to the Floor of the House to argue that point. I await with interest the Committee's explanation — hopefully it will come in the winding-up speech — to the many stakeholders who appear before the Committee for why it is somehow opposed to bidding for monitoring moneys. In particular, if it had its wish, we would see an even more marked deterioration in the fabric of our roads network in the years ahead. I have no intention of presiding over that.

I am intrigued by the Committee's position on monitoring. Last week, my officials appeared before the Committee to brief its members on my proposed June monitoring bid. That is a significant and important bid. I have reviewed that session with officials and have yet to find any argument against bidding. Indeed, officials were urged to accord a greater priority to one bid, namely that for community transport. It seems to me that the Committee is arguing for both more and less use of monitoring at the same time. I am confused about its position and wonder what it is.

I turn now to the 2014-15 out-turn —

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for giving way. The motion clearly states that the concern is over-reliance. There is no confusion in that. Of course the Committee will support monitoring round bids, but the concern is over-reliance. Indeed, yesterday, there was a motion supporting the need for additional funds for disability transport schemes.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member, but he misses the point that I made in my earlier submission, which is that the Finance Minister in the Executive deems it appropriate that monitoring rounds are how this Department is to be funded in terms of structural maintenance. That is my argument at the Executive. I would be a little bit more glad if the Committee actively supported me in that argument with not only the Executive but the Finance Minister.

I turn now to the 2014-15 out-turn. As part of Budget 2010, it was assumed, wrongly, by Conor Murphy — welcome back — that DRD could extract £20 million per annum from Belfast harbour. Hence, £20 million per annum was deducted from my allocations. It is now clear that no legal mechanism existed to extract funds from the harbour. In recognition of this, the £20 million was restored to me in 2013-14 through monitoring. In 2014-15, against the same context, my bid for £20 million was refused. Despite that, in response, I made over £20 million of savings and 4.4% of in-year cuts.

It was abundantly clear towards the end of the financial year that there were sufficient reduced requirements, not least from the Justice Department, available to the Executive to cover the Belfast harbour shortfall. No such allocation was made.

There may have been mismanagement of this issue, but it was not on my part. Others can speak for themselves. The shortfall was down to a fundamental erroneous decision in Budget 2010 and it could have been sorted out in 2014-15.

Mr Ó hOisín: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Kennedy: I have to make progress. I will move on to Translink. The Committee's motion refers to:

"Translink's statement that it will cease to trade within the next two years".

Regrettably, that is a highly selective and, perhaps, mischievous interpretation of evidence given to the Committee by the Translink chief executive on the February 2015 fare increase. My Department had extracted £9 million from Translink in 2014-15 to meet the budgetary pressure that I have alluded to. The company faced a further reduction of funding in 2015-16 of £13 million. In that context, the chief executive made clear that, should Translink not take action, the company would cease to exist in its present form. The chief executive went on to set out a programme of action: the fare increase; reductions in management and administration of £3.1 million; and a programme of service adjustments to deliver annual savings of £7 million. The chief executive has written to my Department in recent days to confirm that those measures are being implemented and that the company's future is secure as a result. He has described the reporting of his comments, as exemplified, I might say, in this motion, as, at best, selective and, at worst, misleading. I could not agree more.

In the recently concluded price control process for Northern Ireland Water (NIW), the regulator highlighted that while NIW might have expected to have available £1 billion to invest over the next six years, £1.7 billion was what it could, ideally, spend but, more critically, £2.86 billion is what should be spent.

We face huge challenges in upgrading our water and sewerage infrastructure. If we do not do so and put plans in place, yes, there will be a risk of infraction proceedings, but there will also be constraints on economic development. My Department is leading work approved by the Executive to put together a strategic drainage infrastructure programme of work, but making available the necessary funding is a matter for the Executive to grasp in this and the next mandate. More recently, we have been at risk of infraction because of inadequacies at Ballycastle waste water treatment works. I have ensured that a scheme to upgrade the work is now going ahead, with completion due in late 2017. As a result, infraction proceedings are unlikely. Again, Mr Speaker, reality differs significantly from the sensationalism in the motion.

I will now deal with the motion's call for me to set out my financial strategy for the next financial period. We only have a budget for 2015-16, and it looks vulnerable at present, but I have set out a clear financial strategy to deal with the £60 million of pressures that I face. I moved funding from roads and from Translink to fund NIW to within £5 million of the regulator's determined requirement. I levied cuts in my Department's staffing budget and had to make cuts in the budget for community transport. All of those decisions were unpalatable but necessary to ensure that I manage my budget. I would argue that the Committee's problem is not that I cannot manage my budget, but that it does not like the consequences of the reduced allocations to DRD. Some people seek to conveniently ignore those harsh financial facts. I do not like those facts either, but governing is about making decisions and standing over them, not cynical political grandstanding.

I and my officials have explained at length the basis of the £60 million of pressures that I face, yet there seems still to be a lack of understanding. If I did not face these pressures, I would not be making cuts. I came into politics, with so many others, to make a positive difference to people's lives. I have rehearsed the issues facing me for months, and I have yet to receive any alternative proposals from the Committee or anyone else.

Finally, Mr Speaker, I need to spell out the decisions that I have made in road maintenance, where I have a duty regarding public health and safety. With the budget available, I am able to put in place only a severely reduced road maintenance service. It is a skeleton service. It is the bare minimum consistent with protecting the public.

That service will cost money that DRD does not have at present. I am therefore providing it at risk. I have bid for the necessary funds in June monitoring. If the funding is not forthcoming, I will face another difficult decision. In that eventuality, I expect the Committee to support the need for investment.

12.00 noon

The issues before us are the consequence of Executive decisions. The services that DRD delivers affect every citizen. The public expect the representatives in this House to stand up for their needs, not to score political points off political opponents. The Committee needs to stand up and be counted. If it is in favour of safeguarding public services, it should support me.

Today's debate has been characterised by conflict, not just between some members of the Committee and my Department but between the comments of some Committee members and the comments of other Committee members. Those who will no doubt support the phantom Budget next week are criticising those who are endeavouring to live within budget this week. Those who call for more capital investment in infrastructure fail to support bids for additional capital. Those who blame a reliance on monitoring rounds fail to ask why DRD is being used as a valve Department by the Executive and why other Departments are able to underspend in a time of austerity yet DRD is being used as a sponge.

The motion fails to acknowledge the impact of the Budget passed by the DUP and Sinn Féin earlier this year and its impact on public services across a number of Departments. More than ever, the debate highlights the fact that our current system allows those in government to behave as though they are absolutely removed from it and as though they are in opposition.

Mr Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr Kennedy: Sadly, for people in Northern Ireland, some here today seem much more comfortable with the character of opposition — a harum-scarum opposition — rather than the responsibility of government.

Mr Clarke: I will summarise Members' contributions before I conclude. Declan McAleer spoke of the cuts to street lighting, gully clearing and pothole repairs, particularly for vulnerable people, despite the Department having a significant budget.

John Dallat spoke of his concerns over infraction proceedings and the possible penalties that will arise from them. He was also critical of board members. He perhaps forgot to mention that, although Translink had its difficulties, the Minister extended the life of its board and did not dispose of its current members. John also mentioned the nine drivers. I do not think that he meant exactly what he said, which was that we should forget about them. I think that he realised, after he sat down, that that was not his intention.

Mr Dallat: Will the Chairman give way?

Mr Clarke: Yes, I will.

Mr Dallat: I am glad that the Chairman mentioned that. I realised after I said it that I had made the wrong choice of words. Of course we should remember the nine drivers who lost their life.

Mr Clarke: I brought that up because I realised, after he sat down, that the Member had made the wrong choice of words.

Ross Hussey spoke of his opposition to the motion, calling it "party political". I emphasise that the motion was supported, as you now know, Mr Speaker, by all the political parties on the Committee, not just my own.

Chris Lyttle spoke of the over-reliance on in-year monitoring, especially for essential services. He also spoke about the risk of infraction proceedings, in particular for Ballycastle and Belfast lough. He called on the Minister to show leadership and not to remain passive.

Alex Easton also spoke about the DRD's over-reliance on in-year monitoring. He queried whether the Department has applied significant rates variation to NI Water. He also covered the issue of Translink's reserves.

Cathal Ó hOisín spoke about the historical lack of investment in the infrastructure of the north-west and the difficulties in trying to get information out of officials.

Joe Byrne spoke of the knock-on impact of the cuts to Departments' budgets. He said that the Department has a false sense of security through its reliance on in-year monitoring.

Roy Beggs said that the Minister was asking Translink to use its reserves. He forgot to say that it was the Minister's Department that propped up that organisation to the tune of £80 million of reserves. It was not until those reserves reached £80 million that the level of reserves was highlighted and the company was pushed on that matter. That relates to what Roy talked about yesterday. He was critical of the reserves held by the community transport sector and Disability Action transport. That is £80 million versus a few hundred thousand pounds in the community sector.

I also want to point out that, when Roy Beggs was on his feet, he was very supportive — everyone on the Committee has also been supportive — of Translink. The Committee may be critical, but it welcomes the fact that Translink delivers a good service in our constituencies. It is disappointing that he did not say that yesterday about community transport or the Disability Action transport service. Today he was very quick to point out about Translink, a publicly funded body —

Mr Beggs: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. The Member is misquoting me. If he examines Hansard, he will see that I made constructive comments about community transport. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Sorry, I cannot hear the point of order. Would you mind repeating that? It was interrupted.

Mr Beggs: The Member is incorrectly quoting what I said. If Hansard is examined, it will show that I made complimentary comments about community transport during my speech yesterday. I ask the Member to withdraw his remarks.

Mr Clarke: Mr Speaker —

Mr Speaker: I accept that the Member feels that Hansard will support his assertion that he recognised that. I ask you to take that on board. You have no more opportunity than I to adjudicate on the issue for now, but if it transpires that Mr Beggs' account is correct, I am sure you will acknowledge that at a suitable opportunity.

Mr Clarke: I am very happy to do that now. If Mr Beggs acknowledged that yesterday, that is good and proper and fine, and I accept it. However, today he did not. He outlined the valuable work that Translink does, but he forgot about disability transport today, he forgot about the community transport and he forgot to mention that they were cut by 33% when his Minister only lost 15% of his budget.

Jim Allister suggested that the Minister was being picked on by his Executive colleagues, and then he went on to talk about elections. This is Jim "runaway" Allister, who did not even run in an election. It is the Jim Allister who talked about how the sky was going to fall in on Northern Ireland years ago. Well, Jim, look outside: the sky is still there. The sky is still there, Jim.

Mike Nesbitt talked about the constructive criticisms in the Committee, but he forgot to mention that the Committee came up with the cycling inquiry, as well as integrated transport, for example. Mike criticised me for talking for four minutes and 22 seconds. I forgot to start the clock when Mike Nesbitt got up, but he criticised the Committee for tabling motions in the House. Woe is us, as a Committee, putting down a motion to talk about DRD. He spent most of his contribution talking about OFMDFM business. Maybe he should table a motion to talk about what he wants to talk about in OFMDFM. I think this Committee is doing a reasonably good job at holding the Minister to account and tabling motions, because that is what it is supposed to do. He used half of his slot to talk about OFMDFM.

Mr Speaker: Remarks through the Chair.

Mr Clarke: Maybe he should follow his processes, rather than being critical of others.

David McNarry spoke of his pride at sitting in the Committee and of the months of frustration caused by the evasive evidence of departmental officials.

I do not really know what John McCallister said, but it seemed that he was cosying up to his ex-partners in the Ulster Unionist Party and jumping to the defence of the Minister. Maybe we are going to see something there over the coming months. Much has been said today about elections. Maybe we will see John try to cast favour to Mike to get back into the wings of the Ulster Unionist Party.

The Minister spoke about the process and blamed the Executive for the over-reliance on in-year monitoring. I have to give it to the Minister that he recognises that. The Committee has said that previously. Our concern today is that, looking at the current budget and this current round, there has been more bid for in this in-year monitoring round, if it is added to what he has already got, than the Minister got in total last year. I think the Minister was being disingenuous as he forgot to say that not one member of the Committee that day spoke against the budgets that were being made. Everyone supported the budgets being made, because we understand the pressures that the Minister is under. When my colleague was on his feet, he forgot to say that we could give an example that, rather than leaving the potholes in disrepair, and instead of taking £10 million off Transport NI to give to NI Water, maybe more of a torch should be shone on NI Water to find out what is going wrong, because it raided the coffers of Transport NI. That is the difficulty that many of us have. It was not about insufficient budget, but about how the Minister and his officials allocated that budget.

The Committee is not opposed to investment. It is opposed to the ad hoc begging-bowl approach that has been adopted by the Department.

That does not lend itself to strategic planning, nor is it good for fundamental planning.

Whilst others want to characterise this as a DUP motion, I am glad that other Members spoke today. It emphasised the fact that this is a Committee motion. We want to see better financial planning in DRD, and we want it to stop raiding the coffers of the most vulnerable, whether it be through community transport, our roads, grass cutting or street lights. I support the motion.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes that the Committee for Regional Development has lost confidence in the Department for Regional Development's ability to effectively manage and maintain its budgets, as a result of an over-reliance on in-year monitoring, Translink's statement that it will cease to trade within the next two years, the potential for infraction proceedings arising from a lack of investment in waste water treatment plants and the risk of the Department exceeding its 2014-2015 budgetary control limits; and calls on the Minister for Regional Development to explain how he intends to negate these risks and to set out his financial strategy for the next financial period.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The sitting was suspended at 12.25 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Finance and Personnel

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Question 3 has been withdrawn.

Accruing Resources: DFP Definition

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her Department's definition of accruing resources. (AQO 8348/11-15)

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): "Accruing resources" is the term used to refer to the income received by a Department that it is authorised to retain to offset related expenditure rather than surrender to the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. The limits for such income are voted by the Assembly in the Budget Bills associated with the Main and spring Supplementary Estimates.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Minister for her response. Will the Minister confirm that the prospect of a senior civil servant setting a Budget at the end of July would be catastrophic for our public services? Rather than a so-called phantom Budget, the only sensible and responsible thing to do is for every party in the Assembly to support a real Budget that will balance our books and also provide —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Can we have a question, please?

Mr McCarthy: — the continuation of a half-decent service to our population.

Mrs Foster: Thank you for the supplementary. Indeed, it would be, to use the Member's word, "catastrophic" if we had to go into a situation where the permanent secretary of DFP had to act under section 59 of the Northern Ireland Act. That would be absolutely catastrophic for the Northern Ireland public because of the cuts that would have to be made to public services.

I have heard the Budget that I have circulated to Executive colleagues and, indeed, to the Committee being described in various ways: a fantasy Budget, a phantom Budget and whatever it is that the BBC deems to call it at that particular time. In fact, the Budget that I am bringing forward is a Budget that is based on the full implementation of the Stormont House Agreement. Therefore, the people who are not standing by the Stormont House Agreement have to look at themselves and ask themselves why they are not standing by their commitments in the Stormont House Agreement. To do otherwise will cause grave difficulties to public services in Northern Ireland. There are two choices if the Budget goes ahead: either the Westminster Government will have to implement welfare reform or those who have turned their face against welfare reform will have to deal with it. Those are the choices ahead of us.

Mr I McCrea: I can only echo the Minister's comments in respect of ensuring that the Stormont House Agreement and the Budget that comes out of it are implemented. The Minister will be aware that people in the rural community are concerned about single farm payments. Can the Minister provide any detail on how that will be resolved and how payments will be made if this Budget process is not completed?

Mrs Foster: Obviously, EU funding, including the single farm payment, is provided for specific reasons, and we will do everything in our power to ensure that that funding goes to the intended recipients. With the progression of the Budget Bill, which, as I said, I have already shared with Executive colleagues and the Committee, I anticipate that payments will continue as normal. If the Budget Bill should be rejected, however, I am taking steps, and I am confident that the single farm payment will be paid, although possibly not through the normal processes. I want to ensure that farmers are in receipt of their single farm payment because I know how important that single farm payment is to the rural community.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat. Is the Minister aware that other legal advice in respect of the spending of accruing resources runs contrary to the view that she has expressed?

Mrs Foster: Yes, I have received correspondence from the Committee. I have studied that correspondence, as the Member would expect me to do. I have to say that it does not lie alongside the very clear legal advice that I have, which indicates that I and the Department have no legal power to set accruing resource limits in the absence of an appropriate limit. That appropriate limit is set by the Budget Act. The Committee's letter in no way negates the legal advice that I have received. I am quite content to have a conversation with the Member as Deputy Chair or with the Chair about that advice, but, as far as I can see, that legal advice does not negate the very clear legal advice that I have received.

Mr Allister: Has the Minister yet met the Treasury to discuss the Budget mayhem? When she does, will she deal with the issue of how she can possibly set a Budget with a £604 million black hole without setting herself on a course of breaching Treasury constraints?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his question. As he probably knows from public commentary, I have asked for a meeting with Her Majesty's Treasury. That meeting was to take place on Thursday of this week. Unfortunately, that clashes with the Executive meeting, so I will not be able to attend. However, I have asked for another meeting date as soon as possible in order to discuss the situation that we find ourselves in.

As to breaching our controls, I am bringing the Budget forward on the premise that the whole of the Stormont House Agreement will be implemented: not parts of it, but all of it. If all of it comes to fruition, the Budget will not have a hole of £604 million.

Voluntary Exit Scheme

2. Mrs Overend asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether the funding for the voluntary exit scheme is dependent on the Stormont House Agreement being implemented. (AQO 8349/11-15)

11. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the voluntary exit scheme. (AQO 8358/11-15)

12. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether funding for the voluntary exit scheme is contingent on a Budget being agreed before summer recess. (AQO 8359/11-15)

Mrs Foster: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 2, 11 and 12 together, as they all relate to the Northern Ireland Civil Service voluntary exit scheme.

In her St Patrick's day speech, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said:

"All the other elements of the Stormont House Agreement would fail if the welfare aspects are not implemented".

The voluntary exit scheme and the £700 million required to fund it are key elements of the Stormont House Agreement, so, at present, we are unable to access that funding. That has significant implications for the Executive's Budget, the budgets of public-sector bodies and, importantly, the individuals affected.

Mrs Overend: I agree that it is a worrying time for those who have applied and have not yet had confirmation of their future. Will the Minister outline how much every month of the delay on the agreement or finalisation of the voluntary exit scheme is costing the Executive?

Mrs Foster: There are two aspects to the voluntary exit scheme. We have been allocated £700 million under the Stormont House Agreement to allow people to apply to the scheme. As the Member will know, over 7,200 people from the Civil Service applied. The head of the Civil Service has sent out the first tranche of conditional letters to 1,200 people. Those letters indicate their offer, that they could leave at the end of September but that that is conditional on our being able to access the £200 million for this year.

It is important that those people be allowed to leave in a timely manner because Departments have factored in savings from the pay bills of those leaving. I do not have the specifics in front of me, but each Department has factored a particular amount of money into its savings plan to allow those people to move on. Pay bill reductions will come into their savings plans, so there are two sides to it. It is very important that we can proceed with the voluntary exit scheme.

Mr Spratt: What interest has there been in the voluntary exit scheme from the Northern Ireland Civil Service? Is the scheme oversubscribed?

Mrs Foster: As I indicated, 7,285 individuals applied to be considered for selection by the closure of the NICS scheme. All Departments provided a profile of the numbers of staff by grade and discipline that they required to exit under the scheme in order to achieve the required pay bill savings. Not all applicants were selected, and we anticipate that not all those selected will choose to leave. They may decide to stay and work on, so it is not necessarily the case that all 1,200 will leave. At this stage, it is not possible to say whether the scheme is oversubscribed. We will know more later in the year.

Mr Easton: Can the Minister outline what other funding is dependent on the Stormont House Agreement being implemented?

Mrs Foster: In addition to the loss of £700 million reinvestment and reform initiative borrowing for the voluntary exit scheme, we would lose £150 million over five years to pay for institutions that help to deal with the past, and we all know how important it is to deal with those very difficult issues; £500 million over 10 years for capital projects in support of shared and integrated education; and certain flexibilities agreed in this year's Budget relating to the scope to continue repaying the £100 million loan taken out in 2014-15 from capital receipts and capital budgets. We would have to pay the full-year cost of not implementing welfare reform, £114 million, and would lose the flexibility to repay that from the capital budget. Very significant issues and funding are dependent on the full implementation of the Stormont House Agreement.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. What criteria have been used to determine eligibility for the voluntary exit scheme? Are they based just on finances or is consideration given to departmental needs?

Mrs Foster: Very much so. When Departments were determining their savings, they looked at business needs moving into the future. Business needs are very much part of the selection for the first tranche. As I said, Departments provided a profile of numbers, grades and disciplines of staff. What we do not want is the complete loss of a particular skill to the Civil Service because everyone has left under the voluntary exit scheme. We have seen that happen in other organisations that have run voluntary exit schemes. It is very important that the Civil Service continues to be run in a businesslike fashion.

Mr McCallister: Can the Minister confirm that, had she put a recruitment freeze on the Civil Service four years ago, we would not have needed a voluntary exit scheme and the £700 million of borrowing could have been used in other, more useful areas? Would she care to say which parties in this Chamber she thinks still support the Stormont House Agreement in full?

Mrs Foster: When I attend meetings on the Stormont House Agreement, I am told that all parties in this House support it. It is for others to determine whether that is right or wrong. The party that I represent certainly wants to see full implementation. I say that because it is a balanced agreement; you cannot have one part implemented and not the rest. It has to be implemented in full because it was a balanced agreement that took some considerable time to reach.

As for the other issue he raises, I am afraid that I was not in post four years ago, as I think he realises. I will check with the then Minister of Finance about what he believes is the case.

Rates Revaluation: Rural Business

4. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her assessment of whether the recent non-domestic rates revaluation places excessive financial pressure on rural businesses. (AQO 8351/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The revaluation is a long overdue correction and a help to many businesses that have been facing difficulty. Sectors and locations that have not performed well since the last revaluation 12 years ago are now paying less. Conversely, those that have fared better are paying more. The revaluation is informed by the property market, and we are not raising more money from it. However, should the correction present individual business with excessive financial pressures, I encourage them to speak to Land and Property Services about the possibility of a payment arrangement.

Mr McElduff: Is there anything that the Minister and her Department can do to assist businesses for which the revaluation exercise could become a tipping point, forcing them to lay off employees or even to close their doors? I am thinking about a number of small rural towns in west Tyrone, where it appears that local businesses have been hammered. One business in the Carrickmore area has seen a rise of 618%.

2.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Can we have a question?

Mrs Foster: The results across Northern Ireland are very much as expected. There may be individual businesses — he referred to one — that stand out, but it is a correction. If the Member watched television last week, he will have seen a report on Belfast city centre and how the correction has really helped to bring developers into the city centre because the rates were much too high in the past and a revaluation was needed.

I accept what he is saying in relation to the scale of the increase in percentage terms, but if you look at the real value of the rates that they are paying, you will see that they are, I would say, tens of times lower than in other places in Northern Ireland. Therefore, the revaluation did need to occur. I think it was the right thing to happen. I have said before that I am happy to speak to Members about individual cases that are at either end of the scale, if you like, in terms of the differences that have been made to them, but we already provide a wide range of reliefs, particularly to the non-domestic sector, so those should be looked at.

I also say to him that the Executive have frozen the regional rate. Actually, because of the revaluation exercise, the regional rate has reduced. Was that the case with the district rate? In many cases, council areas have increased the district rate and have not kept to the very prudent exercise that the Executive have been involved in.

Mr Middleton: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. Can she outline what she is doing to support the ratepayers who are adversely affected by the revaluation?

Mrs Foster: As I indicated, we have a wide range of reliefs available in Northern Ireland to support ratepayers. We all know that it is a shrinking public purse available to us. Indeed, a package of support worth up to £30 million has seen the impact of rates convergence effectively removed for any business ratepayer through an 80% subsidy in this year. We have small business rate relief still in existence. The empty shops rates concession, industrial derating and an exemption for rural ATMs have all been extended for this financial year, 2015-16, at a time when we are under significant pressures in relation to our funding. I ask Members, when they are asking for rate reliefs to be brought forward, to recall that we have a fixed amount of money. If we are going to give rate relief to businesses, rural businesses, or whatever it is to be, we have to find the money for that. We already have great constraints from our central government Departments, and we need to bear that in mind.

Ms Sugden: Is the Minister aware of how many successful appeals there have been against the net annual value, and does that suggest that the revaluation process in itself was flawed?

Mrs Foster: I do not have the precise figures in front of me. The draft rate went out in, I think, November last year and there have been a number of appeals since then, but there are many appeals still to be heard. Indeed, there are over 1,000 appeals in, and I encourage anyone who is not content with the rates that have been set to appeal. I do not take it in any way as an error in the revaluation to see appeals coming forward. I think it is actually testing the system to see what happens, because it is evidence-based, and, in many cases, some of the forms that were sent out to ratepayers for evidence before the rates were set were not actually returned. Therefore, the evidence may not have been available. If there is evidence available that was not taken into consideration, they should bring it forward.

Mr Cree: The Minister will be aware that many types of business have been affected quite dramatically, one of them being petrol forecourts. My question is based on the number of appeals that have been lodged. Is any trend emerging from those appeals to suggest, bearing in mind that it is a zero-sum game, that somehow those particular forms of business are suffering more adversely than others?

Mrs Foster: I think that it is a little bit too early to say whether there is a trend in a particular sector. I am aware at a constituency level of the petrol forecourts issue. I understand that there may even be a class action taken concerning their shops. I have already met those people at constituency level. Now that I am Finance Minister, which I was not at the time, I may well meet them again to discuss where their concerns lie. It is important that we be as transparent as we possibly can be. For example, where are the comparators? How did we arrive at a particular rateable valuation? I think that it is important to do that. We owe it to our constituents and, indeed, businesses to allow them to find the answers to those questions.

Scottish Government: Cooperation

5. Mr Milne asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her assessment of the importance of working closely with the Scottish Government on ensuring the sharing of best practice and information. (AQO 8352/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Of course it is important to work with other Administrations on areas of mutual concern and on where best practice can be shared. My officials are in regular contact with their Scottish counterparts on a broad range of matters that are relevant to the work of my Department.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a freagra go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answer thus far.

Following the recent visit by the Committee for Finance and Personnel to Scotland, it was widely perceived that the Scottish Executive have a much more robust approach to dealing with the Treasury in London than the Department here has. Does the Minister believe that it is time to step up her demands for a fair deal from London?

Mrs Foster: I am very pleased to hear the Member use the term “fair deal” because, of course, not so long ago, it was the DUP slogan, in that we would deliver a fair deal for Northern Ireland.

A Member: That worked out well.

A Member: It did not go down well for you.

Mrs Foster: I am hearing that it did not go down well for some Members — exactly.

Since my appointment, I have received correspondence from my counterpart, John Swinney MSP, the Scottish Deputy First Minister and Cabinet Secretary for Finance. I met John in my previous role and very much look forward to meeting him again so that we can discuss issues of mutual interest, including, I have to say, public-sector reform. I am also looking forward to meeting the Welsh Minister for Finance. She has also been in contact. So I look forward to a trilateral with those two Ministers, but I will probably be meeting John on an individual basis as well.

Mr Beggs: I recall a number of years ago, when I was a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, that a new Budget process was being arranged that would improve transparency and adopt best practice, but that was ultimately blocked by Sinn Féin Ministers, so I find it rather strange that that question was asked by a Member from that party.

Can the Minister advise the House of the actions that she has taken to ensure that we have a real Budget and, apart from that, to ensure that we have a better process such as the one that was previously approved by the Committee for Finance and Personnel and, indeed, the Assembly?

Mrs Foster: I say to the Member that he is absolutely right to call for more transparency in departmental budgets. That is what Committees need to see. It is what the public need to be aware of as well. I am now engaged in a process on how we can do that and how we can make, dare I say it, the Northern Ireland finances more accessible to the public. I very much want to be able to do that.

Regarding the Budget, I believe that it is a real Budget. I say that because it was agreed on figures that were agreed back on 23 December 2014 under the Stormont House Agreement. That is the process under which I am bringing the Budget forward. Whether it is through Sinn Féin and the SDLP stepping up to the mark on welfare or the Westminster Government taking action to deal with it, those are the options. As far as I am concerned, I am fulfilling my responsibility to bring forward a Budget when it comes to the House next week.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Mr Ross Hussey is not in his place.

Social Innovation Fund

7. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel when she plans to introduce the social innovation fund. (AQO 8354/11-15)

Mrs Foster: I plan to introduce the social innovation fund in the 2015-16 financial year. A consultation will issue shortly inviting views on, amongst other issues, the spending priority and distribution mechanism for the fund. Subject to the outcome of the consultation exercise, the Northern Ireland spending priorities will be subject to the draft affirmative resolution procedure in the Assembly.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her response. Is the consultation process likely to include feedback on topping up funds from additional contributions from trusts or sponsors that are supportive of the peace process?

Mrs Foster: We want any organisation that thinks it can help with the fund to become involved in the consultation. As I said, any definitive programme will be laid before the House for affirmative resolution, so the House will also have its role in relation to the fund. This is a good opportunity to be able to access funding, in particular for those organisations that perhaps do not feel that they can apply to the Big Lottery Fund. I welcome that and know that it will be welcomed in the general third sector.

Mr Ramsey: Certainly, Minister, the SDLP warmly welcomes this project. Although it is at an early stage, can you outline what type of social enterprise projects are likely to succeed or be entitled to funding?

Mrs Foster: I think it was my predecessor who decided to widen the scheme out to the wider social economy, and that was absolutely the right thing to do. We do not want to limit access for those involved with the third sector, particularly at a time when — let us be honest about it — they may be facing constraints from other areas of government.

The main benefit of the scheme is that it will give access to funding to organisations such as social enterprises that wish to invest in their activities but have, until now, been unable to access that money, whether through loans or grants. I think it will be broadly welcomed by the third sector, and I very much look forward to bringing it to the House.

Mr Craig: I thank the Minister for her answers. Can the Minister outline the exact purpose of this fund? I am assuming it is not to substitute existing schemes.

Mrs Foster: Absolutely not. This is to be an additional scheme and will not form part of public spending. I think that is why it will be welcomed not just by the third sector but by everyone in the Assembly, who should welcome this as an additional source of money for that sector. It is not a substitute for mainstream government spending but an additional source of funding. Although I do not want to pre-empt the consultation, it will probably be through loans so that they can proceed and develop their particular social enterprise.

Composite Economic Index: Budget Impact

8. Mr Hazzard asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her assessment of the impact of the Northern Ireland composite economic index on future budgets. (AQO 8355/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The Northern Ireland composite economic index provides information on the state of the Northern Ireland economy and, as such, may be used alongside other data to assist the Executive in determining their priorities.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answer. The Minister will be aware that the indicator was flat in three of the last four quarters. How do you propose to drive sustainable economic recovery?

Mrs Foster: The Member will have seen the purchasing managers' index (PMI) for this week, which looks back at April and indicates that there has been an increase, particularly in the manufacturing sector — not in the retail sector, not in the construction sector, but in the manufacturing sector — which I warmly welcome. It is about building on those sectors that can bring growth to Northern Ireland, and in particular looking to new export markets. We must be in an export-driven growth situation and, of course, continue to increase the amount of research and development money that is spent in Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to topical questions. The first question on the list has been withdrawn.

2.30 pm

EU: Impact of British Exit

T2. Ms McCorley asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her analysis of the potential impact on the local economy of a British exit from the EU. (AQT 2622/11-15)

Mrs Foster: As she knows, it is a potential exit. We are at a very early stage of negotiations, and the Prime Minister is engaged in discussing issues with other members of the European Union. It is rather early to be talking about an exit from the European Union when the negotiations have just begun.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister commit to providing a risk assessment of the impact of the in/out referendum on the local economy?

Mrs Foster: I am not quite sure how one could provide a risk assessment for part of a member state when it is the member state that is involved in the negotiations on the European Union and what needs to change with it. We are part of the United Kingdom; it is a member state, and negotiations take place at that level.

Ulster Bank PMI

T3. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to comment on the Ulster Bank purchasing managers' index (PMI) that was realised last week. (AQT 2623/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Yes; absolutely. As indicated by a previous questioner, the Ulster Bank PMI indicates that, following a disappointing start to the year, the private sector has reported significant improvements to business conditions, with firms reporting the fastest rate of growth in business activities and new orders in seven months. That is significant. Furthermore, firms have continued to increase their staffing levels at a faster rate than the long-term average prior to the downturn. Those are very encouraging signs for the Northern Ireland economy.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. With the potential for further cuts in the public sector, does she accept that the argument for rebalancing the Northern Ireland economy by supporting more jobs in the private sector has never been stronger?

Mrs Foster: That is the other side of public-sector reform. It is important that we proceed with public sector reform, but, on the other side, we have to ensure that rebalancing occurs. In other words, we have to ensure that jobs are available if, indeed, those civil servants decide that they want to go into the job market. I know that others may have other plans for their futures. Some may want to start their own businesses and some may simply want to retire. For those who want to seek a job, we need to ensure that we continue to grow the private sector.

As the House knows, Invest Northern Ireland had a record year for job promotion last year. I was also delighted that the Enterprise Minister announced 80 new jobs for RLC at Global Point today. That is a very significant announcement, and I am delighted to see those new jobs at Global Point.

Chancellor of the Exchequer's Statement: 4 June 2015

T4. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for her assessment of the impact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement last week will have on Northern Ireland. (AQT 2624/11-15)

Mrs Foster: As most Members are aware, on 4 June George Osborne announced £4.5 billion of measures that are designed to reduce the public debt in this financial year — 2015-16. Some £1.5 billion relates to the sale of the Government's stake in Royal Mail, with the remaining £3 billion coming from departmental savings in Whitehall. The outworkings of the Barnett formula mean that Northern Ireland's resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) will be reduced by £33 million and the capital DEL will be reduced by £5 million.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for her responses so far. Does she expect further significant cuts to be announced in July?

Mrs Foster: We are all well aware and, indeed, are reminded on numerous occasions by Members across the way, that the Chancellor is to make budgetary announcements on 8 July. We, of course, have no specific input to those announcements, and the Executive's Budget will be impacted again by the Barnett formula adjustments. That is even more reason why we should put our Budget in place at this time so that we have a definitive Budget in place before the Budget announcement on 8 July.

Scotland and Wales have their Budgets in place. I often hear people here talking about getting together with Scotland and Wales and going to the Westminster Government and pushing them. That is fine, and we can do that in relation to the Budgets for 2016-17 and 2017-18. However, we must have a Budget in place for Northern Ireland for 2015-16 and, as yet, we do not have that. If we are to be taken seriously on other matters, we need to get that Budget in place.

Corporation Tax

T5. Mr Craig asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether she still believes that we are in a position to set our own rate of corporation tax. (AQT 2625/11-15)

Mrs Foster: I do, because it was part of the Stormont House Agreement. As I have said many times during this Question Time, the Stormont House Agreement was a very balanced document, and part of it was to allow us to proceed with corporation tax. To be fair to Her Majesty's Government, they have taken through the Bill on corporation tax, and it has received Royal Assent. Therefore, it is now a matter for us whether we want to proceed with what would be an incredibly useful tool for Northern Ireland.

Mr Craig: Does the Minister also believe that we should look to devolve further powers? I think in particular of air passenger duty for short-haul flights.

Mrs Foster: I understand the frustration that is expressed by a number of our airports about air passenger duty. I share that frustration. However, I believe that the reduction of air passenger duty should happen on a UK-wide level. It is not just Northern Ireland's airports that struggle as a result of air passenger duty; other regional airports also suffer as a result of the imposition of what is, as far as I am concerned, a very unfair tax. In my role as Finance Minister, I will continue to push Treasury on the reduction of air passenger duty on a UK-wide level.

Expenditure Categories: Definition

T6. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to define the three categories of expenditure — inescapable, high priority and ministerial priority. (AQT 2626/11-15)

Mrs Foster: I think I know where this is coming from, having had a conversation with one of my colleagues at lunchtime. As far as I am concerned, "inescapable" means that we are contractually committed to expenditure. An example of an inescapable pressure from my previous days in the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment is a signed letter of offer to a company, where we have contractually committed to that company that we will give it money to allow it to grow. To me, that is an inescapable pressure; we are legally obliged to provide it. A ministerial priority that does not have a contractual obligation behind it is not an inescapable pressure. It may very much be a priority for that Minister, but it is not an inescapable pressure, as far as I am concerned.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that clarification, and I hope that it used by all Ministers. Minister, bearing that in mind, what is your best estimate of the likely resource and capital that will be returned as reduced requirements in June monitoring?

Mrs Foster: I am currently going through the reduced requirements in June monitoring. All I will say to the Member is that it will not take me very long.

Coleraine to Londonderry Line: DFP Role

T7. Mr Clarke asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what role her Department had in the contract for the Coleraine to Londonderry line, given that she will be aware of last week's good announcement about that service. (AQT 2627/11-15)

Mrs Foster: As the Member knows in his capacity as Chairman of the Committee for Regional Development, DRD announced the award of a contract for phase 2 of the upgrade of the Londonderry to Coleraine railway line on 2 June last year. There were some difficulties in and around that contract, and some errors were made in the original cost estimates for the project. Following receipt of the tenders for the work and confirmation of the revised costs,

I gave approval for it to proceed, because the Minister for Regional Development had to issue a direction to go ahead with the work. It is tremendously good news for the people who live along that line and use that service. We will be able to have hourly services between Coleraine and Londonderry, and that is something that the citizens of that area and, indeed, the many tourists who go to the area will very much welcome.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for that answer, and I welcome it. The Committee visited the area while it was waiting for the long-awaited announcement on the railway line. However, given that the costs have ranged from £20 million to £46 million, are you content, Minister, that the Minister will be able to live within his budget means?

Mrs Foster: Of course, I cannot guarantee that any Minister will live within their budget means. All I can do is monitor the situation and give advice and assistance where I can to any Minister. The case was made to me that this was worth doing. I agree with that, and I very much hope that it benefits the region.

Peace IV: Update

T8. Mr Easton asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the development of the Peace IV programme. (AQT 2628/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The draft Peace IV programme was submitted to the European Commission on 22 September 2014 in line with our regulatory deadline. The Commission has provided formal comments on the draft programme. Most are requests for clarification, and officials are working to address those. When that work is complete, the Executive will consider the final draft programme. Subject to Commission approval, I anticipate that the programme will be open for applications in late 2015.

Mr Easton: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. When will the new programme be open for applications for youth projects?

Mrs Foster: I hope that the general applications will be open late this year. The Member is right to talk about youth projects because they form a key element of the new Peace IV programme. We are, of course, delighted that there will be a Peace IV programme. A lot of hard work has gone into ensuring that we have it. It will certainly bring additional benefit to Northern Ireland and, indeed, to the Republic of Ireland. We very much welcome the fact that, hopefully, the Peace IV programme will roll out at the end of this year.

Northern Ireland Investment Fund: Update

T9. Mr Spratt asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for an update on the development of the Northern Ireland investment fund. (AQT 2629/11-15)

Mrs Foster: As the Member knows — we have had conversations about this — I am keen to ensure that the Executive do everything they can to support investment in infrastructure and that local project promoters have access to affordable project finance. Because of that, we have put in place the Northern Ireland investment fund. It is still at an early stage, but I hope that it will lever in additional funding that will help to boost investment and promote economic growth in Northern Ireland.

Mr Spratt: Will the Minister tell the House about the kind of projects that the fund will invest in?

Mrs Foster: The Executive have commissioned a feasibility study to find out the optimal scale, structure and investment strategy of the proposed fund. Deloitte has been appointed to advance that study, so it will look at where it would be best to focus the Northern Ireland investment fund. There will be many opportunities to put forward investment projects. I hope that the private sector, as well as the public sector, becomes engaged in the feasibility study so that we can make sure that we have the right mix moving forward for the benefit of the whole of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Question 10 has been withdrawn. As the next period for questions does not begin until 2.45 pm, I suggest that the House take its ease until then.

2.45 pm

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Leslie Cree, who has just arrived.

Bangor Community Hospital: GP Unit

1. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the future of the 20-bed GP unit in Bangor hospital. (AQO 8363/11-15)

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): The South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust's public consultation on the future of intermediate care in north Down and Ards closed on 29 April 2015. The trust is analysing the consultation responses.

The trust's preferred future option is to provide up to 105 intermediate care beds across the area. That would not include the 20-bed GP unit in Bangor Community Hospital, which is temporarily closed. In deciding whether to approve the implementation of that proposal, my Department will take into account the extent to which the proposal is consistent with my priorities as set out in the commissioning plan direction; the impact of the proposal on the quality, sustainability and accessibility of services and assurance on adherence to established standards of service; and the views of public and local community representatives.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that reply. Minister, can you tell me and, indeed, the House whether the proposal to close Northfield House in Donaghadee is likely to have any bearing on the 20-bed unit in Bangor?

Mr Hamilton: I was pretty sure that that issue would come up in this context, because, as the Member will be aware, the consultation on the closure of the 20 GP beds in Bangor Community Hospital was set, as I said, in the context of a wider need to provide 105 intermediate beds across the north Down and Ards area. Fourteen beds had been identified in Northfield House in Donaghadee. A consultation on its proposed closure is due to start soon. Those 14 beds were identified as part of the mix of 105 intermediate care beds. I can understand why the Member wants to raise that in the context of the GP bed situation in Bangor Community Hospital. Bear in mind that the consultation has been completed only recently. It has not yet come to me in the Department, but I am happy to place on the record to the Member that I will rigorously and robustly examine the proposal, particularly in light of the issue with Northfield House. I am told that the trust believes that those 14 beds can be dealt with through domiciliary care and by keeping people in their homes and out in the community. Whilst it is a factor in the overall mix, it does not have a direct bearing, because the type of patient in the Northfield beds would be very different to those in the 20 GP beds that were previously in Bangor Community Hospital. As I consider the issue, I am happy to examine the evidence that comes forward rigorously and robustly and whatever determination or recommendation the trust makes to me.

Mr Easton: What estimate is made of the cost of beds in the independent sector compared with those in statutory facilities?

Mr Hamilton: The 105 intermediate beds that I mentioned in response to Mr Cree's question have an element of use and greater use of the independent sector, which is quite strong in the Ards and north Down area. The average cost per bed, per annum in the independent sector is just over £30,000. The weekly cost of a bed in Northfield House is £808, which equates to roughly £42,000 per bed, per annum. By contrast, the 20 GP beds in Bangor Community Hospital cost nearly £1.5 million, which equates to roughly £75,000 per bed, per annum. On a direct contrast, you can see that it is considerably more expensive to provide a bed in Bangor Community Hospital than it is in the independent sector. I must point out, however, that the closure of the 20 beds in Bangor Community Hospital would not recover all of that £1.5 million. Some of that cost could not be recovered, but there is an anticipated saving of around £840,000. So on those figures — I appreciate that obviously it is not just those figures that we look at — on a pure value-for-money analysis, it is very clear that the greater use of independent beds is cost effective. If you were procuring more independent sector beds, you could obviously reduce that price further. On a pure value-for-money analysis, the independent sector is obviously much more cost-effective. However, it is not just that that is considered; it is a factor, a considerable one, but not the only thing that will be examined.

Mr McKinney: Following the concerns raised over the Transforming Your Care plan in the Audit Office report and in the Human Rights Commission report last week, does the Minister accept that it is absolutely paramount that community services, however they present themselves, domiciliary or such as those in Bangor and elsewhere, are invested in and bolstered?

Mr Hamilton: Transforming Your Care still represents the cornerstone of my vision for health and social care in Northern Ireland. The Member has been a great supporter of Transforming Your Care in recent times. It is something that he wants to see pushed forward, and I agree with him. I think that he appreciates the resource constraints that I am placed under and my inability to roll out Transforming Your Care at a pace that he, I and others want to see.

The vision of care being wrapped around the patient and the person or service-user being looked after in their community or in their home, with the home as a hub for their care, is something that I very much subscribe to. I want to see that enhanced and increased, because it is responding appropriately to the needs of the person, and analysis of people's views in our changing population has shown that that is what people want. That is where people want to be looked after and taken care of, and it is clearly, as I pointed out in a slightly different way in response to Mr Easton's question, a more cost-effective use of our resources. It is not always the best use for the person, but, where it is appropriate, I think that that is what we should be going for. That is certainly a vision that I want to see rolled out and progressed as we go along. As I said, Transforming Your Care set that vision out very clearly and it is still something that I want to see achieved progressively over time.

Health Service Reform

2. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline his plans for reforming services. (AQO 8364/11-15)

15. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his assessment of the Chief Medical Officer's comments that the health service requires reform. (AQO 8377/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will group questions 2 and 15 together.

There can be no doubt that our health service needs reform. Rising demand for services, a growing and ageing population, an increase in chronic conditions, technological advances and scarce resources create serious challenges for health systems across the world. Addressing those challenges requires innovation and transformation. We need a health and social care sector that constantly challenges itself to be better. I want to make it much easier for health and social care staff to promote innovation, whether it is big or small. To enable that, I have established a new strategic leadership group to help support and drive the culture of change and innovation that we need. The focus of our reforms must remain the delivery of person-centred care, with home as the hub of care wherever possible. To deliver that vision, we need to ensure that organisational boundaries do not limit the effectiveness of care, and we must continue to ensure that people take responsibility for their own health. That was the vision of care set out in Transforming Your Care in 2011. Those remain my priorities for reform.

The Chief Medical Officer and I are in agreement about the need for reform. His comments reflect the findings of reports like Transforming Your Care and, more recently, that by Sir Liam Donaldson. His report is clear that reform of health and social care services is required to meet the future health and social care needs of the citizens of Northern Ireland. The Chief Medical Officer was also, rightly, very clear that "no" and "slow" are not acceptable options in response to the drive for transformation.

Mr Ross: The Minister had a reputation for pushing through reform in his previous role, and I hope that he will be able to continue that in this role. Given the constraints on public finances, more than ever we need to have innovative approaches to old problems. I ask him, in that vein, what assessment he makes of the approaches taken in Antrim Area Hospital, in the measures it is taking not only to reduce the pressure on the emergency department

(ED) but to improve the patient experience when they go to the hospital.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his question. I visited the emergency department at the Antrim Area Hospital last week. Although it is not in the Member's constituency, many of his constituents avail themselves of the services provided out of that hospital. We are all well aware of the much-publicised problems that the old emergency department, in particular, at Antrim Area Hospital had in the past.

I have to say that the new emergency department is, aesthetically, a very impressive building that has been designed to alleviate some of those problems. I was particularly impressed with several innovations taking place in and around the emergency department. Probably the most impressive was the acute assessment unit, which is located in the old emergency department, where GPs can speak directly to staff, get advice, and arrange for a referral to the acute assessment unit for diagnostics and management. That can help to alleviate pressure on the emergency department because, where people might traditionally have gone directly to the emergency department, they can now go, through their GP, instead to the acute assessment unit. They can even be referred to it from the ED, which helps to relieve pressures.

As a new father, I am sure that the Member would be impressed with the new children's area in the emergency department. I hope that he never has cause to use it, but having had cause to use emergency departments before with children, particularly late at night, it is very good to have a separate area where they can be treated differently and separately. I was also impressed with the telemedicine that is being used there, particularly for stroke patients.

There are a lot of impressive reforms and innovations going on in our health and social care sector. Mr McKinney mentioned Transforming Your Care. Not all of those will be branded or badged as Transforming Your Care, but they are things that are happening day in and day out, right across the health and social care sector. They should be welcomed and celebrated. They are a sign of the way ahead.

Mr McCarthy: The Minister's party and other parties in the Assembly continually speak about protecting the vulnerable in our community when it comes to reforming the health service. Nobody will object to that. However, will the Minister follow the lead of a former Health Minister in the Assembly, namely Mr McGimpsey, who decided to reverse the decision taken by the Health Department to reduce the volume of continence products used by the most vulnerable in our society: those with learning disabilities? Will the Minister undertake to stop that, as it has been advised from this week onwards?

Mr Hamilton: I am not aware of the specifics of the issue that the Member raises. I see Mr McGimpsey rising in his place. He might be able to advise me if he gets called by the Deputy Speaker. I am not aware of the specifics, but I commit to examine the issue and to return to the Member. I will see what is happening, what the current position is, and whether something can be done. The Member knows that I seek always to do my best about these matters. I am happy to look at it and see what is possible.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr McGimpsey for a question. [Laughter.]

Mr McGimpsey: It is not in relation to Mr McCarthy.

Mr McCarthy: You did stand up for the vulnerable.

Mr McGimpsey: I did my best, thank you, yes. Absolutely. [Laughter.] This is in reference to Antrim A&E. I also had a part to play in delivering that. I remind the Minister that the four-hour waits, which should be at 95%, are down at around 60%, so clearly we need reform. I bring him to Transforming Your Care (TYC). It is a process that we used to call “shift left”, before Edwin Poots changed it to Transforming Your Care. Will we get a published timeline, with money, which is properly benchmarked? There is a lot of confusion in the Health Committee about exactly where we are with the process. It is essential to keep the patient at the centre of care, and, frankly, the Committee, as well as many of the officials, appear to be in the dark —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Mr McGimpsey, you have gone beyond the question.

Mr McGimpsey: — about exactly where this is going. Thank you.

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his oration; I think that there were a couple of questions included there. He is right about Antrim Area Hospital. I would not be content, and nor should any of us be, with the figures of four-hour waits in Antrim Area Hospital. It is still short of the target. However, improvements are being made, and I think that many of those improvements are down to the innovations that have been taking place in the Northern Trust and in Antrim Area Hospital. We should welcome those innovations, which are having an impact.

Interestingly, however, they are making those improvements at a time when the number of people coming to the ED at Antrim Area Hospital has risen annually from around 70,000 to around 75,000 in the last year. There has been a significant spike in the number of people presenting themselves to the emergency department, yet it is still making progress in trying to reach that four-hour target.

3.00 pm

The point about a published and funded timeline for TYC comes from the recommendation along those lines in the Donaldson report. The Donaldson report is being considered and will be responded to in due course. It is not fair — I appreciate that the Member did not say this — to say that TYC has not been rolling out. There are many examples of where Transforming Your Care has been implemented in various areas such as new pathways for care through the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service, the establishment of 17 integrated care partnerships and the commencement of the roll-out of primary care infrastructure. There are other examples. So things are happening. Would I like to see more happening? Absolutely, but he hit the nail on the head when he talked about the budget. He will know and understand the difficulties around the budget and the availability of finances. Whilst we have been able to invest a considerable amount in TYC over the last number of years, it has not been enough to do everything that we want, and, on that basis —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I remind the Minister of the two-minute rule.

Mr Hamilton: — I have made a bid through the June monitoring round for more funds to develop and roll out more of TYC.

Mr Rogers: Minister, thank you for your answers thus far. When the trusts review services, they speak about identifying areas for decommissioning. Can you outline the cuts in service provision that are being brought forward by trusts and the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB) through the £105 million in efficiency savings planned by your Department for 2015-16?

Mr Hamilton: I heard the Member talk about decommissioning and I thought that we had gone back in time in this place.

A commissioning plan is being brought forward by the Health and Social Care Board. I believe that it is due to come forward this week, and it will outline what is being commissioned for this year. There are well-publicised pressures that my predecessor and I acknowledge the Department is under. We are short of roughly £30 million to £40 million to enable us almost to keep going on the previous year's position. That is after having made savings and is predicated upon making roughly £157 million of savings in year, but we are still short of that £30 million to £40 million. Understandably, that will result in pressures and perhaps people not getting the services that they want within the time that they want them.

There is an understanding and an acceptance that we are under financial pressure, and that is not helped by the fact that we are continuing to lose £9.5 million a month because of the inability of some in the House to move forward on welfare reform. Even in the four weeks that I have been in post, there is hardly a Member who has not written to me about the need for some service development, including several Members from his party, who want more for this and more for that. The ability of the Executive as a whole to do more is inhibited by the fact that we are losing cash to the tune of £2 million a week because of the welfare reform fines. Members write to me or complain in the House or to their local press, but those who are inhibiting the welfare reform legislation from passing would do well to reflect on their part in our inability, as a Department, to deliver services at the level that they or, more importantly, their constituents want.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Minister for his replies. Minister, Transforming Your Care began three and a half years ago, and it is now three Ministers later. It was originally meant to move £83 million in the idea of a shift left from acute to community. How much money has actually moved from acute to community at this stage? Does he not need to give a very strong signal to the community that Transforming Your Care is still alive? I find that most people I meet in the health sector think that it has gone.

Mr Hamilton: I cannot lay my hands on the exact figures on what has been moved from acute to community. If I cannot find that, I will provide it to the Member. There has been some discussion over the last couple of weeks about the position of Transforming Your Care, not least at the recent Committee meeting.

It is something that you would expect me to reflect on personally as I have come into post. As I said in response to Mr McKinney, whilst it is a cornerstone of a vision for health and social care in Northern Ireland moving forward, it is not the only part of that vision. As I said in response to

Mr Ross, there are many transformations and innovations going on across our health and social care service that we should be immensely proud of, but they are not necessarily part of Transforming Your Care. It is not dead by any means at all. It continues, albeit, as I said previously, not at a pace that perhaps I or many of the rest of us would want to see, but that is something that is affected by resources.

In the current year, we have just over £15 million in the board, which will be spent on transformational projects. I have a bid in, as I mentioned, to the June monitoring round of around £5 million to progress five Transforming Your Care projects, and £1.5 million from the Executive change fund was secured during the Budget to implement three Transforming Your Care projects. There has been considerable investment from 2012-13 to 2014-15. There was £19 million allocated in 2012-13, nearly £10 million in 2013-14 and between £8 million and £10 million in 2014-15. The spend was around or slightly above that. So, money has been spent. It has produced good results around the creation of integrated care partnerships, the roll-out of primary care infrastructure around resettlement and better care pathways for the —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Minister, you have gone over the two minutes.

Mr Hamilton: — Ambulance Service. So, there are things happening. It is certainly not dead. It is part of a broader vision for the health service in Northern Ireland.

Suicide Reduction

3. Mrs Hale asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what progress is being made in reducing the number of suicides locally. (AQO 8365/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: Since the initial implementation of the Protect Life strategy in late 2006, a wide range of programmes has been put in place to prevent suicide in Northern Ireland. The programmes have been regularly updated and new programmes developed to reflect emerging international evidence of best practice. Suicide prevention services and initiatives include: Lifeline crisis de-escalation; counselling; training and awareness raising; improved in-patient safety; psychiatry services in hospital emergency departments; bereavement support; suicide cluster emergency response; local research; the self-harm registry; mental health crisis response teams; and self-harm intervention.

Suicide rates have not changed substantially since 2006, although the fact that they did not rise during the economic downturn may be an indication that prevention efforts have had some success. Provisional figures for 2014 show an 11% reduction in suicides on the previous year. That is encouraging. However, rates can fluctuate from year to year, and, given the very wide range of influences on suicidal behaviour, it is not possible to assess the impact of a single strategy on suicide rates.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his answer. Sadly, as we think particularly of Ronan Hughes's family at this time, unfortunately, too many families know how distressing suicide is for those left behind and how the aftermath is incredibly difficult to come to terms with. What actions are being taken to encourage responsible reporting by the media in suspected cases of suicide?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for her question. She is absolutely right. The tragedy and the impact of suicide is particularly in our minds today after the news of the tragic death of Ronan Hughes, and I am sure that I speak for everyone in the House when I say that I pass our condolences on to his family.

Reporting suicide presents a range of challenges for our media. On the one hand, there is an important role to be played by the media in Northern Ireland in raising awareness of suicide, but, on the other hand, sensationalist reporting can distress bereaved families and can run the risk sometimes of encouraging copycat suicidal behaviour. So, it is a balance that the media has to find in reporting.

Media guidelines were issued in 2007 by my Department to our media in Northern Ireland. That was updated last year, and the update took account of advances in technology, particularly around social media and the Internet, over that period. The Public Health Agency conducts media monitoring in conjunction with the Samaritans, and it looks at any reporting of suicides in Northern Ireland and identifies what might be described as insensitive reporting. The guidelines also try to encourage the media to use different, more sensitive terminology around suicides and to talk about "died by suicide" rather than "committed suicide". We can all understand that we get used to using a certain lexicon. It can be hard to change vocabulary. Occasionally, training is also provided for journalists, because some people move in and out of newsrooms, and it is therefore important to keep them updated on the guidelines. I can also report that a new resource, in the form of a pack, has been issued to newsrooms in Northern Ireland to try to encourage sensitive reporting of what are tragic events for families and communities.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí go dtí seo. What is the Minister's view on the University of Ulster research that highlighted the fact that 51.7% of people who took their own life had mental health disorders?

Mr Hamilton: I am not familiar with that particular piece of work, but I am happy to familiarise myself with it.

There is no one cause of suicide. There is a range of reasons. Sometimes, we do not even know the reasons for people taking their own life. Obviously, there are many connections, and, as the Member highlighted, there are connections with people's mental health. There can also be connections with alcohol or drug abuse. There is a developing school of thought in Northern Ireland from looking at the spike in the number of suicides in and around 2006 and the evidence that flowed from that, with many people drawing correlations between the Troubles and the end of the Troubles and the latent post-traumatic stress that people may suffer from and saying that that is causing an increase in suicide.

There is no one particular reason, as I said. Mental health obviously plays a significant part, and post-traumatic stress may be associated with it, too. I am happy to go away and look at the research that the Member mentioned. I think that the whole House would acknowledge that it is a problem that we are aware of and one that we have considerable resources applied to, right across the region and subregionally. Many initiatives are taking place that work in conjunction and in partnership, as came up in a recent Adjournment debate secured by Gary Middleton on suicide in the north-west. There, partnership with community and voluntary sector organisations has greatly helped to improve awareness and, hopefully, to combat suicide right across the Province.

Mrs Dobson: Does the Minister agree that 338 children attending Northern Ireland's emergency care departments for suicidal and self-harming actions or intentions is a shocking statistic? Will he detail specifically what support is available for under-16s with poor mental health?

Mr Hamilton: I agree with the Member that it is a shocking figure and a worrying upward trend. In some ways, it is deeply worrying that that has come about. That young people are able to present themselves is perhaps a sign of better awareness in the community. I suspect that numbers would not have been at that level in the recent past. However, a greater awareness among parents and communities has perhaps resulted in young people being able to present to hospital with suicidal tendencies. Once people enter that environment, the system will kick in and support them through community adolescent mental health services and other services. Again, many of those services are provided through the community and voluntary sector in Northern Ireland, and they will wrap themselves around that individual to help and support them and their family. Clearly, the young people are the most important people in this case, but support will also be given to families to ensure that they get the care that they need.

I agree entirely with the Member that it is a shocking and worryingly high figure, and it is the figure only for the young people who are presenting themselves. The problem is that there are obviously many more who do not call out or ask for help or whose issues are not spotted by their friends or family. It is deeply worrying that so many young people are having suicidal thoughts and, unfortunately, as we are tragically aware of today, taking their own life.

3.15 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We move on to topical questions. Mr Basil McCrea is not in his place. Mr Mike Nesbitt is not in his place. Question 1 was withdrawn.

Minor Injuries Unit: Armagh

T5. Mr Boylan asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to encourage all stakeholders with an interest in the minor injuries unit in Armagh city to participate in the ongoing consultation process, given the number of cuts to such facilities in the Armagh area in recent years. (AQT 2635/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: Yes, I am aware of a consultation being conducted by the Southern Health and Social Care Trust in respect of the Armagh minor injuries unit that will run until 11 September. Whilst not wanting to pre-empt the outcome of that consultation, I join the Member in encouraging people who have an interest in the local community to participate in it.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. Looking to the future, does he have any plans for the future delivery of services in the Armagh city and district area, such as through a health hub? We have seen cuts over recent years and a transfer of jobs out of that area. Maybe a health hub in the central area would facilitate a number of services, including GPs and everything else. Will the Minister encourage or does he have any plans to facilitate a central hub in Armagh city and district?

Mr Hamilton: I assure the Member that, whilst a consultation is being taken forward on the future of the Armagh minor injuries unit, it is proposed that all other services that are on site will remain there. There is no threat to them.

The Member mentioned getting a primary care centre in the Armagh area. I noticed early on in this job that there is a bit of a media fascination with decisions to close hospitals wholesale. That is not on my agenda. In fact, I want to see the further roll-out and progression of what we have seen being done to a very high standard, particularly in cancer care and coronary care, where we have regionalised specialist centres, where, in some cases, world-class care is taking place as we speak, supported by community hospitals such as those in Armagh and elsewhere in Northern Ireland. There is a vital role to be played by those hospitals in supporting the network of acute hospitals across Northern Ireland.

In respect of a primary care centre, I believe that Armagh is earmarked in the Southern Trust area for a primary care centre. However, we are moving forward, as the Member will appreciate, with the centres in Ballymena, Banbridge and Omagh, and then we will move forward with a different procurement model for the ones in Lisburn and Newry, which is in his constituency. We will evaluate that process and, beyond that, the strategic implementation plan, which is there to roll out the remainder, including Armagh. We will assess the future of those, their roll-out, the timing and the budget for all of that on the basis of the outcome of the evaluation of Lisburn and Newry.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I should have pointed out that question 4 has been withdrawn. Mr Robin Swann is not in his place.

Fatal Foetal Abnormality: Legal Advice

T7. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety on what legal basis he thinks fatal foetal abnormality can be covered by guidance rather than through legislative change, given that the legal advice to the Department, while Edwin Poots was Minister, said that it was not possible. (AQT 2637/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: This is another issue that is in my in tray, and it is one that has to be — I am sure the Member will agree — handled with the greatest sensitivity. That is the approach that I will take to the issue. We are dealing with a small number of cases, but they are very sensitive and difficult cases and they involve individuals and families in some of the most difficult of circumstances. I want to at all times — I hope that the House shares this view — bring that degree of sensitivity and appropriate handling to the issue.

I am very clear on what my concern is, and I have said this publicly already. Whilst I am aware that the Member's colleague and my colleague in the Executive, the Minister of Justice, is intent on bringing forward legislative change, it is my view and the view of many in the House that there is a risk, because it is always the case with any legislation that is brought forward that it can get changed, altered or amended through the various processes in the House. It may not make it through all the processes in the House. The big concern that I have is that, in a situation where, clearly, something has to be done on the issue and it is not acceptable to continue with nothing being done, the worst possible outcome for the difficult cases that may unfold in the future is to do nothing.

I fear and worry about having no legislative change, and that is not with any prejudice. Nothing has been published, and nothing has been put out there. I am not committing myself to supporting that legislation. In its absence and even with the fact that it might take some time for it to pass, something has to be done, and I believe that the new guidance has the potential to deal with many of the issues that have unfolded in the last number of years. On that basis, I will bring forward guidance to the Executive in the not-too-distant future, and I make the point that it is not my guidance but guidance that has been developed by experts in my Department.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister's two minutes are up.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for a comprehensive answer. Can I ask the Minister exactly when the guidance will come out?

Mr Hamilton: I cannot say when it will be made public because there is a process to go through. In fact, I was discussing it with officials only this morning, and they hope to have it with me very shortly, this week. Obviously, I will take some time to consider it before forwarding it to Executive colleagues for, hopefully, their agreement. Thereafter, it will be published.

I hope that the House and the Member can see the motivation I have in ensuring that we do not have a situation where nothing is done. The Minister of Justice has a particular view, and others will have different views. Whilst I have a view that it may not pass through the House, I know that legislation takes time. Guidance has the potential to deal with many of the issues. I have been discussing the potential of guidance with leading obstetricians and others in Northern Ireland, and I think that there is an acceptance on their part that guidance may have the potential to resolve many of the issues. It is on that basis that I hope to bring forward the guidance and unite the Executive around it and, hopefully, get the support of the House and, more to the point, the support of the wider community and of people who have been affected.

ADD-NI: Ministerial Meeting

T8. Mr Ó Muilleoir asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether he has given any thought to meeting representatives of NI Attention Deficit and Hyperactivity Disorder (ADD-NI) — a wonderful children's charity based in south Belfast that does wonderful work with children who are living with ADHD — given that its financial difficulties have been raised with the Minister who knows that it is facing some choppy waters, with turbulent times ahead. (AQT 2638/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: I am glad the Member raised this because it gives me an opportunity to speak about it. He may not have expected to get to his question, but I am glad he was able to raise it nonetheless.

On the question of meeting, I have committed to meeting NICVA — it is in the diary already — as an umbrella organisation for the community and voluntary sector, much of which is affected by the issue that the Member has raised. The Member raises an issue that revolves around something that has been described as core funding. This is core funding that goes to 67 organisations across Northern Ireland. As you would expect in the current climate, every spending line is being looked at across the board, and every Department should be doing that. Mine certainly is doing so, given the pressures that it faces. Those 67 organisations receive many millions of pounds in grants each and every year. It is 67 organisations and not 68, and there is no potential to grow that to 68 or 69. It is exclusively for 67 organisations, and that, in itself, raises some issues for me around procurement, state aid, equity and fairness.

The issue has been around for some time. Previous Ministers in my post have signalled to the sector that reform will happen to the core funding but that they were considering how that might be implemented. I am now doing that. However, from examining the core funding, I also found that it is not going to organisations to pay for services. It is, as I saw in one case last week, contributing towards salaries for the organisations' chief executives and finance directors. Particularly at a time when we have scarce resources, I think that we should be focused on giving that scarce and limited funding to organisations to provide services that have defined outcomes. It is in that context that I will look at the issue.

That is not to say that the work of any of those 67 organisations is not worthwhile, but I hope that the Member and, indeed, others can appreciate the circumstances that we find ourselves in and why I will continue to look at them and to carry on the work of my predecessors.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. While we await that review and reform, the Minister's colleague Mr Girvan and I are united in one aspect of our concerns for ADD-NI. It is that the Belfast Trust has referred over 300 children who have ADHD to that service, but it does not want to pay for it. I think that that is an area where the Minister might be able to use his good offices with the Belfast Trust to tell it that, if it wants and needs the service, which it does, it also has to pay the piper.

Mr Hamilton: That is a different issue, and I am happy to take it away and examine it. While it is first and foremost a matter for the trust, I am happy to examine it and to report back to the Member.

Community and Voluntary Sector: Value for Money

T9. Mr Girvan asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether he believes that we are getting value for money from the grants awarded to the community and voluntary sector, particularly given that he mentioned the 67 groups, not all of which are as needy as each other, with some making a better case than others. (AQT 2639/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: Mr Ó Muilleoir said that he and Mr Girvan were as one, and it seems that they are also in league in asking the same question. At this time, when resources are precious, limited, tight and very scarce, and when my Department's budget is under pressure, like every other Department in the Executive, I think it is very important that we look at the spending that we are doing and ensure that not only is it getting value for money but it is producing outcomes.

The core, infrastructure funding is something that I am keen to look at. As I said, it has been signalled to the organisations that have received it that previous Ministers wanted to move away from the current system. It has been a matter of transition and of how that might be implemented. When there are many organisations, like the aforementioned ADD-NI and others, that need money, there are questions about our giving money to organisations to pay for the salaries of staff, as opposed to getting outcomes and better results for our citizens.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister for his answer. I am giving my own view here, but sometimes I feel that the Department tries on many occasions to protect what it delivers, as opposed to trying to get better value for money from the community and voluntary sector. When can these organisations expect to hear about the prospective changes to their funding for the future?

Mr Hamilton: I appreciate the uncertainty that the issues around the infrastructure funding has created for many of these organisations. Whilst we would always like to see speedier decisions in all these things, I have been carefully considering it, because I value the work that the sector does. As I said, it is more that we have limited resources and are ensuring that we are getting good value for money and outcomes for the money that we invest that has delayed a final decision.

Self-harm: Public Health Agency Support

T10. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on what the Public Health Agency, which has a duty to provide advice on care facilities, is doing for those people who self-harm. (AQT 2640/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: My response to Mrs Hale's question outlined a considerable number of ways, particularly on suicide and, indeed, self-harm, in which a lot of work is going on, not just by the Public Health Agency, which does a lot of work to raise awareness and to try to prevent self-harm, but in response to self-harm when it does happen. There is, I feel, an impressive list of services provided in hospitals to people who present and who are at risk of self-harm, including counselling, training, response and intervention.

3.30 pm

I am happy to come back to the Member with greater detail on the specifics of what is being done on self-harm for people across Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We do not have time, unfortunately, for a supplementary because time is up.

Mr Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I was not in my place when called for a topical question, as I had popped out to take a call. That explains my absence but does not excuse it. I meant no disrespect to the House or the Minister.

Mr Swann: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): There is another point of order from the Ulster Unionists.

Mr Swann: Likewise, I apologise to you, the Minister and the House for not being in my place for topical questions.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): There is lots of contrition today. Before we move on to the Adjournment debate, I invite Members to take their ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Motion made:

That the Assembly do now adjourn. — [Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs).]

Adjournment

Nursery- and Primary-school Provision: East Belfast/South Belfast

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes to speak, and all other Members who wish to speak will have approximately five minutes. We will try to get as many in as we can.

Mrs Cochrane: I welcome the opportunity to raise this important issue once more in the House. I should probably start by declaring an interest as a mum of children at primary school in East Belfast and as a member of the board of governors at Strandtown Primary School. I also take the opportunity to thank the Minister for attending today and for his previous assistance to preschool and primary education in my constituency. I hope that the debate will be constructive and allow Members for East and South Belfast not only to raise their concerns but to put forward proposals to resolve what appears to be an escalating problem. In recent days, issues with secondary-level provision have been in the press. However, today's focus will be on the primary and preschool sectors.

I will start with preschool provision. Members will be aware that, further to my proposals, there have been a number of changes to the application process in recent years, through the two-step process, which gives priority to those in their immediate preschool year over those in their penultimate year, and through the removal of the July/August criterion. There has also been an increase in the number of places provided by new nursery schools, such as the one in Dundonald, and by some day-care providers. We continue, however, to hear complaints from constituents about the lack of preschool provision. Whilst this may be due partly to parents' unrealistic expectations, it is surely an issue that requires constant review and improvement.

I am sure that the Minister will be able to quote figures showing that only a handful of children are unplaced for the 2015-16 school year. However, I do not believe that that is an accurate reflection of the situation. I have heard of many parents who do not apply for a place or cannot take up a place because it is simply impossible to juggle that with their personal work circumstances. Some parents, for example, pay £48 a day to have children dropped in a day-care environment, which then sends them to an afternoon session for two and a half hours with a preschool provider. There are others who want their child to have the benefit of preschool education but simply cannot afford the expense, and there are no other options to combine it with their work. In reality, therefore, far more children could be unplaced, and I ask the Minister to outline today what he is doing to assess the number of children who will not receive a preschool experience but are not included in his unplaced figures.

That leads me on to ongoing complaints about the social disadvantage criterion. I have spent many hours trying to explain the rationale behind that approach to constituents. I agree that it is important that those children receive a place. However, given that the Minister has committed to ensuring that every child who wants a place will receive one, there is a question as to whether that criterion is still required. Is it causing more of a headache in the system? I think that all it does is to make it more difficult to explain to constituents why their child has not been allocated a place in their first choice of setting. They see the criterion as being unfair on working parents.

I have analysed intake figures in many of the East Belfast providers, and it appears that the majority of children who are placed under social disadvantage would still receive a place in the same provider if that criterion was removed, because they would get in under the distance criterion. I ask the Minister again to review the ongoing need for that criterion, because it is creating more of a headache than it needs to.

With preschool provision, I ask the Minister what more can be done to provide better information to parents to assist them in making the choices on their application forms. Every year, I see examples of those who have missed out on a more suitable setting because they marked unrealistic choices on their forms. It is clear that more needs to be done to encourage parents to visit the settings in advance and talk through the admissions criteria.

I do not know how many times I have raised this issue, but I continue to see parents being sent lists of options for preschool and nursery settings that are miles away from their homes. If someone lives on the Gilnahirk Road and has applied for a place at Kings Road and Dundonald nurseries but has been unsuccessful in securing a place, does the Minister think that it is appropriate to send a letter to the parents telling them that there are places free in Portavogie but not telling them that there are places in Ballyhackamore? Surely, with the new Education Authority, we should have a more joined-up approach across the old education and library board boundaries, or is that too much to ask for?

Mr McCarthy: What is wrong with Portavogie?

Mrs Cochrane: There is nothing wrong with Portavogie — [Laughter.] — apart from the fact that it is a long way from Gilnahirk.

Is the Education Authority simply the same structure as our previous boards, with an additional layer of bureaucracy on top? Perhaps I am being harsh, but the Education Authority needs to do more to ensure that relevant information is provided to parents.

I will move on to primary-sector provision. There has been a distinct rise in the number of my constituents who have been unable to secure a primary 1 place for their child in their first, second, third and, sometimes, fourth preference. As a parent, I know how much interest you take in ensuring the best educational start for your child. Most parents try to select a school based on its educational reputation, location, links with the community, family connections and the quality of leadership shown in that school — indeed, many of the same criteria that are assessed under the sustainable schools model. It is no wonder how distressing it can be for parents when they are asked to list five, six or seven choices for their children.

Parental choice is important, but I appreciate that not everyone will receive their first preference. However, given the increase in population evidenced with the demand for preschool places in recent years, we need to ask what is being done about proper area planning in East and South Belfast. Should we look at the schools that have offered quality education, strong leadership and are financially viable to see whether we should expand some of them, or should we focus on improving the schools that are seen to be failing in order to make them a more acceptable choice for parents? Those are the sorts of questions that need to be asked but do not appear to have been adequately asked in recent years. That is why we are starting to see pressures in the primary sector.

I believe that area planning should, first and foremost, be about developing a network of sustainable schools, raising standards and matching provision with the demand for places, but raising standards should not just be about throwing money at poorly performing schools. In East Belfast, there are few, if any, examples of our successful, popular schools being supported, whilst unpopular schools are receiving high levels of support in the form of subsidy, favourable advice and intensive curriculum support. It appears that the current system simply rewards underachievement. There are massive differentials in the part of the budget being administered by schools, with some receiving £2,400 per pupil in the last funding round while another school in the Belfast area received an average of £3,800. There are also further centrally administered amounts, which bring the pupil difference to one school receiving almost twice as much as another.

Whilst I understand that the centrally administered amounts for certain programmes can be beneficial, they do not always deliver the desired outcomes. For example, the additional funding allocated due to free school meals might be a way of assisting those from a disadvantaged background, but, when it is allocated as a percentage of school population thresholds, it can mean that some schools with more pupils on free school meals receive less than smaller schools. It needs to be addressed. Furthermore, much of the money allocated from central budgets does not actually lead to the rise in school standards that we look for. If we genuinely want to raise standards across the board, there should be more focus on supporting successful schools to provide the support and ambitious targets for clusters of schools. Change needs to be made in terms of self-evaluation, challenging standards and pedagogy. With the greatest respect to our civil servants, it is the school leaders and not the Education Authority who will be able to take this forward.

I also have concerns that the new Education Authority has been created with administrative control of over £400 million of expenditure on schools, whilst the budget that is being controlled by the actual schools is £800 million. The balance between school-administered and centrally administered amounts is already the lowest in most Western countries. I do not think that it is the best way to ensure investment in the classroom. When budgets are so tight, the focus must be on reducing the administrative burden, particularly somewhere as small as Northern Ireland. I ask the Minister to enter into direct dialogue with school principals' representatives to look at the concept of greater autonomy, incentives and disincentives in the system to ensure the reduction of shadow activities in the Education Authority. As a start, the layer of administrative burden for employment matters, financial transactions and admissions could be removed and those savings directed straight into the classroom.

At the same time, we must continue to focus on area plans, which should not be seen as static. Recent high birth rates in my constituency will have an impact on primary provision in years to come, as will some of the new large housing developments. It is important that the Education Authority and the Department foresee the challenges and are equipped to deal with them. Indeed, last month, at a meeting with the Education Authority, I queried the issue of future primary provision in the Dundonald area, as I have already begun a process of surveying residents in the new housing development in order to ascertain likely future demand. However, I met only the officers who are responsible for the Belfast district, and it would appear that the matter was not on their radar at all. They were focused on other smaller pockets of increased demand further into east Belfast. It could mean that they propose smaller but costly changes there, less than two miles away from a better and more cost-effective solution. If there is one thing that comes out of this debate, could it be that the Minister directs those in the Education Authority to move away from arbitrary lines on a map?

I was given an assurance that future plans would not be drawn up behind closed doors by civil servants and that there would be open and transparent engagement going forward. I welcome that approach as I think that many schools and stakeholders have creative ideas and need to be included in area-based planning. We also need leadership from elected representatives. Some will champion a cause for political gain when they really need to consider the wider educational needs of the whole community. When difficult decisions need to be taken, whether it be a school closure or amalgamation, they need to be honest and focus on actually bringing the community with them, rather than raising fears.

Finally, I would like to specifically raise the issue of Strandtown Primary School. I know that the Minister would be so disappointed if I did not, given the number of times that I have hassled him about it. The Education Authority has finally agreed to submit a development proposal to match the intake number at primary 4 with the admissions numbers for primary 1 in Dundela Infants' School, Greenwood Primary School and Belmont Primary School. I am obviously delighted that the blood, sweat and tears have paid off, although it would have been preferable not to have had to fight so hard for it given that it was always the common-sense approach. I trust that, when the proposal comes before the Minister, he will be swift to approve it, if only to keep me out of his office.

That still leaves the issue of the outstanding capital works required to provide permanent accommodation for all pupils on the Strandtown site. Further to the Minister's visit to Strandtown at my request, plans have been drawn up for new wings, but I am concerned that the plans include a large new kitchen area that would be owned by the Education Authority. Can the Minister confirm that, if money is available for some capital build through the schools enhancement programme, the Strandtown pupils will not be expected to forfeit classrooms at the expense of a kitchen for the Education Authority? Obviously, this may be irrelevant if there is no money at all, so, again, I would welcome an indication from the Minister of the likelihood of there being money under the programme going forward.

I will leave it at that for the moment. I think that I have asked enough questions. I thank the Minister for his attendance and look forward to his response.

3.45 pm

Mr Newton: I thank the Member for bringing forward a debate on an issue about which there is much concern currently and, indeed, about which there has historically been much concern. There has been an improvement in the situation, but further improvement is required. Many points have already been covered, so I will approach this generally rather than being specific.

There is a need for the Minister to address the issue, which has been going on for some time. The first question that I asked on this was in 2008 or 2009, yet the problem continues. There is a need to build confidence in parents and in school professionals that there is a solution to the problem and that next year we will not face the same situation. There is a need to address the ongoing issues. Parents are concerned initially when they get a letter saying, "Your child has been rejected. Please apply for ...". An example that was given was a facility in Millisle — 25 miles from where those folk live. That needs to be addressed so that we provide stability in our education system for teaching professionals, parents and children.

I think it has been mentioned that the Committee has produced a report on area planning. To my mind — the Minister did not dispute this to any great extent when we debated it in the Chamber — the report suggested a positive approach to area planning and outlined how a rational and professional look at the school estate not just across east Belfast but across Northern Ireland needed to be taken. It was admitted in the report that this is a complex problem because of the disparate nature of our education system and the various sectors that we operate in.

The report indicated that the Minister should not take an approach to area planning that was, as one witness described it, a cut-and-paste exercise. Whether that is valid or not is for the Minister to judge, but that was recorded when the Committee took evidence on the report. The report indicates that there needs to be a holistic approach to area planning and there can be no clauses for schools to opt out of area planning for whatever reason. The benefits of addressing the issues that we are talking about this afternoon can be achieved, providing stability for children, teachers and parents. All the school estate should be included in area planning.

I want to mention a couple of the report's recommendations. The Committee recognised, as the genesis of the report, the critical importance of education for parents and pupils. Indeed, it accepted that extensive costs were associated with the sectors in our education system and that those needed to be managed judiciously to get the maximum benefit for our young people.

Recommendation number one stated:

"... in order to ensure that Area Planning is undertaken in a transparent and consistent manner with clearly communicated sustainability criteria for schools and with Area Plans which are produced and updated within reasonable timescales."

It was the objective of the report to ensure that that recommendation can be taken forward.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I want to thank my young colleague Mrs Cochrane for bringing the subject forward and, in a remarkable show of generosity, for including South Belfast and East Belfast. It gives me a chance to praise some schools. I think that it would be inappropriate to praise the Minister, because self-praise or praise from a party colleague is no recommendation, but I want to praise some of the wonderful schools, primary schools in particular, that I have had the opportunity to visit.

In East Belfast, Strandtown Primary School strikes me as the most engaged primary school that I have ever visited. I have never seen that level of community and pupil engagement, especially during the Giro d'Italia. If any backing is needed for Mrs Cochrane's request to speed up the project she mentioned, I am happy to give it.

I am also a great fan of Holy Rosary Primary School in South Belfast, which is certainly one of the most diverse schools I have ever visited. It is also one of the most generous schools in reaching out to people who have moved to Belfast in recent times. Every time I visit the school, I come away buoyed up by the enthusiasm not only of the teachers but the pupils.

I also want to mention Scoil an Droichid, scoil lánGhaeilge i ndeisceart Bhéal Feirste. Áit a bhfuil spiorad iontach bríomhar i measc na ndaltaí uilig. Am ar bith a thugaim cuairt ar Scoil an Droichid, bíim iontach dóchasach maidir le toadhchái Bhéal Feirste, mar is léir go bhfuil siad ag tógáil glúin úr atá bríomhar, atá tallannach, agus atá ag smaoineamh ar an am atá le theacht. I was at Scoil an Droichid Irish-medium school this morning and, every time I visit, I come away amazed at how the next generation; this young generation — they are certainly several generations after me — are so focused on the future. They are so vibrant and dynamic, with high aspirations and ambitions. The teachers at Scoil an Droichid also deserve praise, and I got a chance to say that this morning. To give you a little example of why we are so impressed by all our schools, I learned this morning that the pupils at Scoil an Droichid had raised £7,000 to send one of their colleagues who had suffered from leukaemia, with her family, to her father's native country of Turkey in the summer. That struck me as a great testament to the big-hearted nature of the pupils and teachers.

I want to raise one other issue of importance. It is a different issue altogether, namely the expansion of South Belfast to include Carryduff. Of course, that cheers us all, because we want to see our city grow. In particular, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) has not managed that growth properly. As the Minister knows, on several occasions I have had to implore him to try to find more places at St Ita's Primary School in particular. The growth in that area has been rapid, yet the response of CCMS has not been as efficient as we would have liked. It is my hope that, in the time ahead, we get a plan for that area that accommodates all the parents, particularly those who have had great difficulties and who want a Catholic education for their children but have not been able to receive it.

I endorse some of the comments that my colleague made about the difficulty in getting preschool places. I am also aware that 99% of those who stick with the process get schools, thankfully, and that — the Minister explained this and will probably explain again — the letters that say that you can go to Portavogie from Dunmurry are not very sensible. That would not be a good way to start your child's education. As the Minister explained, that is not expected of people and, if it is not expected, hopefully the letters will change in the time ahead. I hope that we continue to achieve those sorts of numbers, 99%, in the difficult hotspots around South Belfast such as Finaghy, Malone and Dunmurry, where parents have problems getting preschool places. I hope that we can do even more in the time ahead to facilitate those parents.

Mr McKinney: I, too, would like to thank Judith Cochrane for bringing this important debate to the Assembly. I apologise to the Chamber: I have an urgent meeting that I need to get to after I make my contribution and I will have to leave. Obviously, I would normally stay until the end of the debate.

I would also like to thank all the staff of the schools in South Belfast and East Belfast for their hard work, commitment and dedication.

That dedication, in increasingly difficult circumstances, seeks to provide the best outcomes for children, and they deserve our full gratitude and support. We all recognise the importance of nursery and primary schools for young children. Those schools are at the heart of our community, and they play a vital role in influencing children's attitudes and providing them with all the necessary skills to progress through education and life. Without that strong foundation, many children may suffer greatly in educational development. I will touch on that later.

We all have high expectations of primary schools, but, critically, in Belfast and all across the North, teachers and principals now have to make significant cuts and compromises. I am left in little doubt that those will have a negative impact on the quality and standard of education that children may receive. Worryingly, in the current Budget, we have seen vital funding stripped from early years programmes, nursery schools and nursery units. The impact of the cuts on vulnerable children will be further compounded by drastic cuts to special educational needs provision, early years capacity building and the extended schools budget.

The issues of funding, education standards and future sustainability have all been well rehearsed. As has been outlined, the Bain report recommended area-based planning, which informs sustainable schools. That has been endorsed by the current Minister. They all have the objective of raising educational standards and creating strong school networks. However, we are all aware of the criticisms, with concerns raised about whether such a policy will achieve better educational standards. My colleague referred to it as "cut and paste"; some may have referred to it as just cuts, closure or amalgamation. We all recognise the current budgetary pressure that the Minister faces, but the area plans currently cannot be a slash-and-burn exercise. There must be openness and transparency at all stages, and parents' views have to be given the fullest consideration where robust plans are firmly centred on the children's best interests.

One of the issues that I was about to address has already been touched on. There is a major problem in Carryduff.

I acknowledge what the Minister says about CCMS monitoring that situation, but there is a major problem with the demand for schools in an area that is growing far faster than the educational provision caters for. Of course, that is true for other major facilities in the area, but it is a situation that causes major annual stress for parents and pupils not just when they are picking their schools but subsequently, when people find themselves in schools that are far from where they live. The headlines have also been dominated recently by the issues in south-west Belfast, but it is important to say that, when these proposals were put forward some 15 years ago, the race issue was not the dominating agenda: educational achievement was.

The major headlines underscoring the localised issues are still the unregulated transfer test that continues to cause stress and uncertainty for parents and a system that fails as many pupils as it delivers for. How, otherwise, would we have 400,000 people living in Northern Ireland without any qualifications whatever? Of course, there are headlines around how the system fails many young Protestant boys. Too often, it can be seen that we are actually breeding our children for export. For those for whom the system is delivering and even those for whom it is not, the only option is to leave. This goes to the heart of our economic debate and is the big question: what is our education system delivering for? What more could we do to link its ambition to our overall economic ambition?

Mr McGimpsey: I thank Mrs Cochrane for securing this debate on a very important subject. Like her, my office has had a huge amount of interest from constituents who have expressed concerns about preschool and primary provision.

We should start with a first principle: we are here to provide an education system that is free and specially tailored for the mixed talents and abilities of all our children — not some of them or most of them but all of them. A key part of that education system is, of course, preschool and primary provision. It is clear that some of our children lose out on preschool and nursery provision. I will talk about primary provision in a minute. One of the things that was impressed on me very much when I was Health Minister was how important those early years were for children. It was put to me that that is the time when children's brains are effectively hardwired. It is very difficult for them to catch up if they miss out on the opportunity at that time.

4.00 pm

There are certain conflicts. One of the conflicts, as has been pointed out, is that working parents appear to be disadvantaged in provision compared with parents who are defined as "socially deprived", which appears to be based on the criterion of certain benefits. Working parents who do not derive those benefits are not designated as socially deprived, and their children may lose out. That is not good enough. It is wrong. All children have the right to be treated equally, no matter who their parents are. Those who are socially deprived must, of course, have our support, but no parent should be coming to me and saying, "Because we're not on benefits and not meeting that criterion, our children lose out".

The issue in inner south Belfast has been well pointed out. Máirtín Ó Muilleoir pointed it out, as did Fearghal. Without rehearsing all of that, let me point out the situation in inner south Belfast. At Arellian Nursery School on Sandy Row, there were 104 applications for, I think, 54 places. I had meetings with the Belfast Education and Library Board (BELB) and the chief executive of the new board. They have found 40 extra part-time places, which has done an awful lot to address the issue this year. I am grateful to them for their support, and the parents clearly are as well. That has gone a long way to addressing the gap, but it is a gap that we knew was coming. It is not rocket science to work out the birth rate and what the needs and demands will be and match those to provision. If we had demand and provision matched, it would avoid an awful lot of angst in schools and, not least, families. That is very important.

A second point concerns the provision of primary schools. In inner south Belfast, we have the issue of the consolidated primary school. That issue has been running for about 15 years. I have been involved in it with various communities, and it just seems to go from one hurdle to another. The latest hurdle is the director of the Council for Ethnic Minorities appearing to say that newcomer children will not go to the new school and that they want to stay in Fane Street Primary School. That would jeopardise the provision of a new school. I will speak to Patrick in due course, and I am quite sure that he did not intend to get the reaction that he did, but that type of situation is most unhelpful. In the society that we are trying to build, in which we are all together, the key thing for us is that we live together, work together and are educated together. This is an absolutely perfect example of how we address the issue. It is about the provision of that new school, which has been so long in the planning. We have hit hurdle after hurdle. We have communities on board. It seems that that is the best way in which to address this.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr McGimpsey: I will draw my remarks to a close by making a plea to the Minister to intervene. Here is another reason that this should be provided: to give our children the best start that we can in the communities that, by any definition, are seriously socially deprived.

Ms Lo: The topic of nursery and primary-school provision in south and east Belfast has been talked about quite a few times. It was only a few weeks ago that I asked the Minister about the issue.

For parents whose children have missed out on nursery placements close to home, it means that they have to attend a nursery school further away and sometimes even one outside a catchment area. That puts additional time and cost pressures on parents.

Another common concern is that failure to secure a place of choice could impact on the child's eligibility when applying for a primary-school place. Of course, that is dependent on particular schools' admissions criteria. I welcomed the Minister's update that the majority of children were placed in the first round and that he has funding to provide extra places, should it be required.

As a governor of Cranmore Integrated Primary School, I understand that the school had 45 applications for its playgroup, with only 24 permitted places available for the coming year. The school has also applied twice, unsuccessfully, to change the playgroup to nursery status, which would give it more places for children.

Recently, I visited Fane Street Primary School. I know that the school's nursery is oversubscribed for this year by 2:1, yet, when the school applied for an additional nursery class for September, the request was turned down, even though it has adequate accommodation within the building to provide for it.

I move now to primary-school provision. The Minister will be familiar with the issues in South Belfast. I have written to him and tabled many questions over the years. There is a continuing increase in demand for places in my constituency, particularly in Carryduff. Demand for Catholic maintained schools such as St Ita's, St Bernard's and St Joseph's primary schools is growing each year, and oversubscription inevitably leads to disappointment for some families. As with nursery schools, parents are concerned about the prospect of being unsuccessful in getting a place in their first-choice school because of oversubscription in popular schools in South Belfast. That also means that many pupils face having to bypass their local schools.

The Department of Education needs to take into account change in demography. Inner south Belfast schools are facing amalgamation due to lower enrolment numbers, but outer Belfast areas, such as Carryduff, with new housing developments, are crying out for more school places.

There is an argument that part of the problem is that integrated schools have not been allowed to grow in the way that they should and that they are still being held back. Over the last few weeks, my office has been contacted by numerous disappointed parents whose children did not get into Lagan College in South Belfast because of oversubscription. Surveys have clearly shown that there is an increase in demand for integrated education. I have said this before: there is still too much focus on established schools. During the recent debate on area planning, my party colleague Trevor Lunn mentioned that the needs model works against the integrated sector, given that the other sectors have to agree before there is any increase or potential increase in the capacity target for integrated schools. There is a need for better forward planning and a vision for integrated education for all children in a shared society.

Mr Douglas: I certainly welcome the debate, and I thank my colleague for East Belfast for bringing it forward. I think she has put forward a very comprehensive argument in a number of areas. I also thank the Minister for attending, because, too often, these Adjournment debates have little or no representation from Departments. So I thank the Minister for being here. I also declare an interest as a member of the board of governors for the Braniel Primary School and, today, I was appointed to Ravenscroft Nursery School.

It is interesting; I was speaking to the principal of Ravenscroft today. It is oversubscribed. It is a very successful nursery, but the problem is that it is too small, so I want to record a bid to the Minister for an extension to that nursery school. Maybe he can keep that in mind for the future.

Seriously, though, I was looking through the mission statement of the Ravenscroft Nursery School today. This is what it says:

"teachers and nursery assistants offer a welcoming, secure, caring and stimulating environment for each child, with the aim of establishing a lifelong love of learning."

If this debate is about anything, it is about raising the expectations and interests of parents and children so that they will embark upon a lifelong love of learning. What a tremendous mission statement. So, it is building for the future and is an investment in our children and society.

I know that the colleague who brought forward the debate mentioned a number of areas. However, I want to raise some concerns over the next couple of minutes. The first thing that Fearghal McKinney mentioned was the number of children in East Belfast who have additional or special educational needs. I detect that that number is growing across East Belfast. The question is this: how do we protect and support the most vulnerable in our society?

I was speaking to a primary-school teacher earlier today who said that, of 30 children who were assessed, 28 had speech and communication difficulties. The big question is this: why is that happening? I am not quite sure why there is a growing number of children like that.

In the past, some of these children would have been assessed in October. One of my concerns is that they are now talking about January. In fact, I know of some children who have not yet been given a date for assessment. So, they are going into year 1 and already have a big problem in trying to catch up with other children. Hopefully, the Minister will address that problem.

Then, there is the whole issue of parents scrambling to get a place in nurseries and primary schools. It is a big issue. We have all faced those emails, phone calls and letters. My concern is that there seems to be a major problem in communication. I think my colleague mentioned that. Also, people must be given enough time to work out the areas that their children can go to.

I know that the Minister was at the launch of the EastSide Learning Partnership. There was no mention of asking for money; they were just celebrating the importance of lifelong learning. It is their mission to support children at the earliest possible stage, and I just want to let the Minister know that they are meeting the board, along with Early Years, in order to plan for next year. Instead of leaving it to the last minute, they are trying to get things organised. There is a problem with the lack of a strategy. It is the same every year; there seems to be a sense of absolute chaos.

I want to raise another issue. We discussed this recently in connection with support from the community and voluntary sector. The Dee Street Playgroup that I am involved with has just organised a petition, and we have signed up dozens of MLAs and a number of Ministers. Hopefully, during the June monitoring round, that petition will have some sort of influence, because playgroups like this do a tremendous amount of work.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Will the Member please draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Douglas: Mr Deputy Speaker, I have heard you mention how such groups in your area do tremendous work. They need support. I have spoken to the Minister about this before, so, hopefully, he will have a bit of good news for us for the future. I welcome this Adjournment debate.

Mr Lyttle: I, too, welcome the opportunity to contribute on the issue of preschool and primary-school provision in East Belfast. I take the opportunity to pay tribute to the teachers and schools in East Belfast that are serving our children and young people so well. I also pay tribute to the parent-teacher associations, which are central to the life and well-being of our schools.

I understand that approximately 15 preschool settings were oversubscribed in East Belfast at the end of stage 1 of the preschool admissions process this year, and that included nursery schools, nursery units attached to primary schools, and voluntary and private settings.

My understanding is that, in our primary school sector, approximately eight primary school settings in East Belfast are oversubscribed and that, whilst we are not discussing it today, there are also schools in our post-primary settings in East Belfast that are oversubscribed. Indeed, my colleague Anna Lo MLA made reference to what seemed to be quite a serious oversubscription issue at Lagan College this year. That, of course, also affects families in East Belfast who have a strong preference to send their children to an integrated school setting.

4.15 pm

That oversubscription has associated consequences, as many MLAs have pointed out today. It raises anxiety and confusion amongst families in our constituency, as well as a sense of a lack of fairness and common sense in the system. The Minister will, of course, respond to that ably and say that parents are advised of alternative options and that eventually most pupils will be placed in an appropriate preschool and primary school setting. The question is this: how reasonably located are some of those alternatives? As my colleague Judith Cochrane MLA suggested, how many parents and children does that exclude who have given up on the process altogether, such has been their frustration with it?

The Minister will also say that he is allocating sufficient funding to the provision of preschool and primary places, but the issue is not just one of finance. As many MLAs have said, not just the Minister but elected representatives, teachers and the community all have a part to play in these issues, particularly in improving area planning. There should also be better coordination of the available resources, and, as has been mentioned, the provision of timely information to parents should be improved to assist them in navigating what is a challenging application process. I do not think that we can overstate that point. As other MLAs said today, we can go a long way to alert parents at the appropriate time about when the applications must be submitted. We can try to provide them with the informal information on oversubscription that they need to improve the order of choices that they make about preschool and nursery provision.

I welcomed a recent opportunity I had with my colleague Judith Cochrane MLA to meet the Education Authority about the need for more places in East Belfast. I was encouraged by the Education Authority's responsiveness to the need to work up development proposals to increase admission numbers in East Belfast, in particular at Strandtown Primary School and, indeed, other primary schools. I, too, hope that the Minister will be able to give his commitment to deal with any such proposal as promptly as possible to ensure a resolution to that issue.

I welcome the Minister of Education's recent attendance at the launch of the EastSide Learning Partnership, and I hope that that will be a collective effort between teachers, parents and elected representatives to work together to ensure that we improve provision in East Belfast and work along the key aims of raising aspiration and the value that we put on education —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): The Member will draw his remarks to a close.

Mr Lyttle: — for our children and young people.

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Fáilte roimh an deis labhairt sa díospóireacht seo. I welcome the opportunity to respond to the debate and will do my best to respond to as many of the points raised by Members as is possible.

To cover the broader points of the debate, planning education provision in any given area is now the statutory responsibility of the Education Authority working in close conjunction with the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) and actively engaging with other sectors. It will take some time for it to establish itself, but I do not envisage any immediate changes to the area planning process, although I expect them to cross the old borders of the education and library boards and to engage on a regional basis, particularly in areas around south Belfast and east Belfast that cross over between the old boards. Members will be aware that it is an issue that I raised previously in a development proposal relating to post-primary education in the area, so I expect matters to improve there. My officials will, however, liaise closely with the Education Authority to develop comprehensive guidance on the area planning process. It will draw on the experiences of the process to date and build on the lessons learnt.

Area planning will continue to be the process through which the planning authorities examine primary and post-primary provision. It is important for the planning authorities to hear the views of all interested parties so that they can shape the educational provision to meet their needs. Initially, that will be through the local area planning groups, and part of their role will be to bring together all local stakeholders, planning authorities, sectoral bodies and any other interests. One of the tasks of the local group will be to consider the needs of the primary sector at local level.

I noted the comments of Mr Newton about the recent debate and the report of the Education Committee. I will respond formally to the Education Committee on its report, but I assure him that it will play a significant part in shaping the views on area planning going forward and that we will consider the lessons learnt from that report.

The Education Authority can provide details of representatives on local groups, and I encourage representatives from East and South Belfast to make their views known to the relevant schools' planning authority representatives. My Department will continue to scrutinise and challenge area plans and monitor progress towards delivering the changes required.

The statutory development process is the only means by which any significant change to the school estate, such as an increase in a school's capacity, can be made. Members mentioned a number of primary schools, in particular, and nursery units whose numbers should, they believe, increase. The only way to do that is through the development proposal process. I note that Strandtown was mentioned and that a development proposal is in the making or will be delivered to me very shortly. I will deal with that as I deal with all other development proposals. I cannot comment on any funding that may be aligned to that. The school enhancement programme for this financial year is fully committed. It is an important programme that future Ministers should take forward in planning because it allows the expansion of schools, but that will be for future budgetary rounds.

While statutory nursery provision is not covered by the sustainable schools policy and is not part of the area planning process, any significant changes there require a development process. The preschool advisory groups in each region of the Education Authority are responsible for ensuring that there is sufficient provision in their area to meet the Programme for Government commitment to ensure a preschool place for every child whose parents want it. It has to be said again that 99.8% of children have been placed at this stage of the process, and we continue to work with families. I will go into more detail on south and east Belfast in a moment.

As far as primary school admissions for 2015-16 are concerned, only three children remain unplaced in East Belfast, and one child from the south-east region is still seeking a place in the area. We will continue to work with the parents of those children to secure educational provision for them. No child is unplaced in South Belfast, as far as we are aware. However, the situation will continue to be monitored. It is also worth noting, as many Members did, that great work is going on in the primary schools in south and east Belfast. Mr Ó Muilleoir mentioned a number of schools, though he failed to praise me for my work and that has been noted. Many Members rightly praised the work going on in our primary schools, nursery schools and other providers of preschool provision.

Another way of dealing with an increase in demand — we have used this in south and east Belfast in recent times — is the temporary variation process whereby we can temporarily increase the number a school can take in in recognition of particular demand in the area. The terms are often mixed up: it is not to deal with "parental choice"; the term in legislation is "parental preference". We cannot live up to fulfilling the choice of each parent. We do our best on parental preference, and temporary variation is there to deal with significant demand in an area. A number of years ago, I introduced temporary variations into the nursery school sector, and we have used that again in South Belfast. I believe that we also used it in a number of areas in East Belfast —

Mr Douglas: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Just give me one second. We used it in East Belfast to deal with the increased demand in a number of settings. I give way to the Member.

Mr Douglas: The Minister mentioned increased provision in some schools. A school principal said to me recently that it is strange that, in her school, over the last 15 years, there have always been empty places, which are often filled by underage children, yet a school up the road has 10 extra new places. There seems to be a lack of strategy.

Mr O'Dowd: I would be concerned if a trend in an area was not being recognised through area planning and sufficient planning was not put in place for that.

When we talk about preschool provision, we often refer to nursery-school places. Members used examples of being lobbied about nursery schools having 54 applications for 26 places and so on, but be careful what you wish for in those circumstances. The community and voluntary sector plays a crucial role in the quality of the provision of preschool places. In a recent Question Time, I mentioned that Members are quite right to lobby me over the early years fund. That fund goes into the community and voluntary sector not the statutory sector, but if I were to remove more preschool places from the community and voluntary sector and put them into the statutory sector, I would not be able to fill the hole with the early years fund, even if I were to get more money for it. I caution Members that it is quite right and proper for the statutory sector to lobby, but all those things have a knock-on domino effect. It is only right and proper that the issue is being moved forward. There will be a mixture of provision from the community and voluntary sector and the statutory sector, and we have to get the balance right in each area.

Members raised a number of matters of concern, one of which was the socio-economic deprivation criterion for preschool provision and how that affects applications. It affects only 25% of applications for preschool places. Mrs Cochrane said that her surveys showed that those children who gained a place through that admissions criterion would have gained a place anyhow. I go back to why the criterion was brought in in the first place. Children from socially deprived backgrounds are less likely to succeed in education than those who are not, and the criterion was brought in in recognition of that. I accept that the criterion is somewhat tight in its remit of the benefits that it refers to, and I have asked my officials to take a look at the matter to try to widen it out to take account of working families on low incomes to see whether we can broaden out the criterion. However, it has a limited impact on preschool admissions.

Mrs Cochrane: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will give way in a minute.

It catches the attention of the media and others, and working parents are sometimes frustrated because they believe that it is the reason why they are not gaining a place in a preschool. That may be so in individual cases, but it is not as significant a problem as is sometimes portrayed. It is more of a significant opportunity to rebalance and give opportunities to young people than is portrayed.

Mrs Cochrane: I have argued the point with my concerned constituents and explained the rationale behind it. It was, however, brought in at a time when not as many preschool places were available. It was, therefore, important to make sure that those children got a place. What I am saying to you now is this: if it were to be removed, would it have such a detrimental impact? It is now just providing a headache. It is giving people an excuse to say that that is why they do not have a place when the evidence is starting to show that it is not. There are nearly enough places now, and it should not matter whether people do not get their first preference.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I will give the Minister an extra minute.

Mr O'Dowd: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. At this stage, my priority is to look at broadening the criterion. It may be that, in a number of years' time, the criterion will no longer be necessary.

There are a number of specific issues. Members constantly mention Carryduff in the Chamber, and Members mentioned it today. I will continue to raise provision for the Catholic sector in that area with CCMS. If there is a demand in other sectors, we will continue to raise it, move forward and try to ensure that we plan properly for the rise in the population in Carryduff and for facilities to meet those demands.

During Question Time last week, I made a commitment to raise the letters issue with the Education Authority. It may come down to administration and the cost of breaking down those letters into tighter geographical areas, but I recognise fully the angst that it can cause parents when they receive letters listing facilities in a wide geographical area. I will ask the Education Authority to see whether it can take a look at that and do it in a better way without raising administration costs.

I assure Members that I will continue to monitor closely preschool and primary-school provision in South and East Belfast. I am aware of the issue around post-primary provision in the area, and I will continue to monitor that. The only way forward is on an area plan basis to ensure that, whatever decisions we make, we know the impact that they will have on other schools and settings in the area and that no unintentional impact is made by decisions that are taken in isolation of other settings. Thank you, everyone.

Monday 15 June 2015

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Hussey: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. I apologise to you and your Deputy Speakers for my unavoidable absence at Question Time last Tuesday. I apologise for my absence.

Mr Speaker: Thank you for apologising in advance of today's Question Time. However, I want to address the issue of a point of order: it is not actually a point of order. Nevertheless, thank you very much for the apology; it is on the record.

Before we proceed with today's business, I remind Members that, due to unforeseen circumstances, the Minister for Regional Development will be unable to attend Question Time this afternoon. The Minister for Social Development, who was originally listed to answer questions tomorrow, has agreed to take his place. So, questions to the Minister for Social Development on his portfolio will commence at 2.45 pm after questions to the Minister of Justice. All Members were notified of that change last Friday afternoon.

Marine Conservation (Fixed Monetary Penalties) Order (Northern Ireland) 2015

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): I beg to move

That the draft Marine Conservation (Fixed Monetary Penalties) Order (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

A Cheann Comhairle, this statutory rule is being made under powers in the Marine Act (Northern Ireland) 2013, which prescribes that this order must be laid in draft form for approval by affirmative resolution of the Assembly.

As it stands, my Department has two options when there is a contravention of nature conservation by-laws: it can either take no enforcement action, or it can initiate criminal proceedings. There is nothing in between those two positions. This order would improve that situation by providing a more targeted and proportionate response. It would introduce a fixed monetary penalty that could be issued when a low-level offence was committed, but it would not warrant the full weight of the criminal law. That would provide for a more effective system of protection and management of Northern Ireland's marine area.

In saying that, I want to make it clear that my Department would retain the right to initiate criminal proceedings where it considered that a more serious case of environmental damage had occurred. The order would not change that position in any way.

I will now deal with the details. The order would give my Department the power to issue individuals with a fixed monetary penalty of £100, or £200 in the case of commercial enterprises. In each case, a 50% discount for prompt payment of the penalty and a 50% surcharge for late payment have been included. Members will also wish to note that any moneys received would be paid into the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund and that my Department would be able to recover any unpaid penalties as a civil debt.

Of course, where sanctions are involved, it is essential to include an appeals procedure, and this order would be no different in that respect. Anyone subject to a fixed monetary penalty would be entitled to make written representations to my Department, and, should it still decide to apply the penalty, an appeal could be made to the Water Appeals Commission, which is an independent body. The commission would then have the power to confirm, vary or quash the enforcement decision, in accordance with its existing procedures and without further referral to the Department. The provisions therefore provide for an independent, transparent and cost-effective appeals mechanism, which should provide members of the public with confidence that enforcement decisions relating to the fixed monetary penalties would be both balanced and robust.

Finally, I am grateful to the Environment Committee for its scrutiny of the draft Marine Conservation (Fixed Monetary Penalties) Order, and I ask the Assembly to approve it.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): I thank the Minister for his explanation of the background to and the purpose of this affirmative statutory rule. The Committee first considered the SL1 proposal at its meeting on 19 March, which was followed by an oral briefing from officials on 23 April. The Committee was advised that the purpose of the legislation is to provide for the level of fixed monetary penalties to be applied to unregulated activities that contravene the provisions of a by-law made for the protection of a marine conservation zone (MCZ). The fixed monetary penalties are low-level fines intended to be used for minor instances of non-compliance with by-laws. The Committee discussed the need to provide information to educate the public in order to raise awareness of the by-laws and the need to work with councils. Officials advised the Committee that there will be consultation on the development of by-laws, which will encourage public buy-in. The Committee also discussed the challenges in enforcing the by-laws and spotting offences, and whether there would be any real impact as a result of applying penalties, particularly if they were considered lenient. Officials assured the Committee that fines would have an impact but that they would be used in conjunction with education and awareness-raising. Accordingly, the Environment Committee has agreed to recommend that the motion be affirmed by the Assembly.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. My intention is to speak briefly in favour of the motion. As has been outlined by the Minister and the Chair of our Statutory Committee, we are dealing with a provision for a level of fixed monetary penalties in minor cases of marine pollution. We are dealing with the less serious type of offence, and that is reflected in the low level of fines.

I will ask a couple of questions of the Minister, if he is in a position to take them. How might public awareness of the new by-laws be raised? Can we be certain that the fines will have an impact?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Ms Lo and Mr McElduff. I reiterate my thanks to the whole Environment Committee for its support of the regulations.

The questions posed by Mr McElduff are indeed pertinent. It is vitally important that we do what is necessary to increase public awareness of the existence of these fixed penalty notices. If any such regime is to be successful, people need to be made aware of it. That will very much be an issue for those managing the MCZs, and in cases where no management body exists, the Department will play an active role. I encourage the Member to do what he can to make people aware, and I look forward to reading his press release on the passage of today's regulations.

Sorry, I forget the second question.

Mr McElduff: How can you be sure the fines will have an impact?

Mr Durkan: Regrettably, we cannot be sure of anything; however, when we look at other jurisdictions where similar measures have been taken, we see that they have proven successful. Obviously, we will continue to monitor the situation and remedy it, if needs be.

This new enforcement tool would benefit the whole of Northern Ireland by helping to ensure that the conservation objectives of Northern Ireland's marine conservation zones and European marine sites are met. I reiterate my thanks to the Chair and other members of the Committee.

Mr Speaker: I am afraid that we do not have a quorum, so I am requesting that the Division Bells be rung to ask Members to attend.

Notice taken that 10 Members were not present.

House counted, and, there being fewer than 10 Members present, the Speaker ordered the Division Bells to be rung.

Upon 10 Members being present —

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Marine Conservation (Fixed Monetary Penalties) Order (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

Planning (Amount of Fixed Penalty) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): I beg to move

That the draft Planning (Amount of Fixed Penalty) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am pleased to bring before the Assembly the draft Planning (Amount of Fixed Penalty) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015. These regulations will be made under sections 153(9), 154(9) and 247(1) of the Planning Act (Northern Ireland) 2011. Under section 247(3) of the 2011 Act, the regulations are required to be laid in draft and approved by resolution of the Assembly.

By way of background, the 2011 Act allows for the issuing of an enforcement notice or breach of condition notice by a council in its role as local planning authority responsible for enforcing against all breaches of planning control under the new two-tier planning system. If the offender fails to comply with such a notice, the further enforcement options open to a council would be to initiate court proceedings or to take direct action to remedy the breach of planning control.

The system of fixed penalty notices introduced by the 2011 Act is an additional enforcement measure and an alternative, at the discretion of a council, to potentially lengthy and costly court proceedings. Where a council might decide to issue a fixed penalty notice, it would give the offender the opportunity to pay a penalty as an alternative to prosecution.

These regulations will assist councils and strengthen their planning enforcement function. The key purpose of the regulations is to set out the level of the relevant fixed penalty. They propose a penalty of £2,000 for failing to comply with an enforcement notice and £300 for failing to comply with a breach of condition notice. Sections 153 and 154 of the 2011 Act provide for a 25% reduction of the amount payable where a fixed penalty is paid within 14 days.

Members may recall that the proposed amounts were part of the phase 2 consultation on planning reform and transfer to local government proposals for subordinate legislation. Overall, there was general support for the introduction of the fixed penalty notices as a discretionary enforcement tool for councils and for the proposed regulations that set out the penalty levels.

I recognise that for more significant breaches of planning control councils may still decide that prosecution through the courts would remain a more appropriate course of action. That will be a matter for an individual council in assessing the nature and scale of a particular breach of planning control and selecting the appropriate enforcement measure available to it. As I have said, the use of fixed penalty notices is discretionary, and councils will therefore exercise judgement as to their use in any particular circumstances.

The levels of £2,000 and £300 mirror exactly the levels applied in relation to similar fixed penalty notices in the planning regime in Scotland. These levels are viewed as being more appropriate for the more minor breaches that might be used by councils in relation to fixed penalty notice powers.

The Environment Committee considered the SL1 for the draft Planning (Amount of Fixed Penalty) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 on 16 April this year and confirmed that it was content for the Department to make the statutory rule.

I believe that the legislation will strengthen councils' enforcement powers by providing an additional, discretionary power as part of their enforcement toolkit. I believe that the system of fixed penalties provides a flexible and cost-effective alternative to court action and will act as a further deterrent to those who might consider flouting our planning legislation. I therefore ask the Assembly to approve the draft regulations.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): Again, I thank the Minister for his explanation of the affirmative statutory rule.

As the Minister said, the Committee first considered the SL1 proposal at its meeting on 19 March, which was followed by an oral briefing from departmental officials on 16 April. The Committee was advised that the rule sets the fixed monetary penalty for an enforcement notice or a breach of condition notice for breaches in planning control.

Members questioned officials about the rationale for the fixed monetary penalty and processes around the administration of enforcement. The Committee heard that the penalty is a mechanism for strengthening enforcement by offering an alternative to court proceedings for minor breaches and can act as a deterrent. The Committee sought clarification that, in circumstances where a notice is served but the breach is not fixed, local councils can take further action if deemed fit. The Committee also heard that bringing enforcement and building control together is a positive step and that councils will be able to adopt a more proactive approach to enforcement. The Committee also explored the rationale behind the provision of a 25% reduction for early payment, which is based on the Scottish model of enforcement to encourage early payment, and which will be kept under review by the Department.

Accordingly, the Committee for the Environment has agreed to recommend that the motion is affirmed by the Assembly.

Mr McElduff: Thank you, a Cheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire agus le cathaoirleach an Choiste Comhshaoil as an mhíniú. I thank the Minister and the Committee Chair, Anna Lo, for explaining the statutory rule once again and for reminding us that the Committee looked at this earlier in the spring. Most of the issues have been covered in the explanations, but I want to ask the Minister about the incentive for early payment. I think that the figure in the legislation is a 25% reduction. I wonder how that figure was arrived at and whether there is any information based on the Scottish experience of how many people tend to pay early in the process with that reduced figure.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Ms Lo and Mr McElduff again for their support and Mr McElduff for his questions. We did look at other jurisdictions, primarily and chiefly Scotland, when arriving at the amount for these fixed penalty notices and indeed for the discount that is available to those who pay early. The experience from Scotland is that this is working. Ideally, we want to be in a situation where people do not pay early or late and do not have to pay these at all because they do not breach planning conditions or enforcement notices. These are very much another tool in the planning enforcement toolkit that is aimed at reducing the number of breaches that we have. It will be primarily up to councils how and when they use them. They do have that discretion.

This is another step in the reform and transfer of planning to councils. Through having this new, wider range of enforcement measures available, including, now, fixed penalty notices, I believe that councils will be in a better position to respond appropriately and proportionally to a breach of planning control.

I thank the Chair and other members of the Committee for their support of this motion.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Planning (Amount of Fixed Penalty) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

Social Security (Members of the Reserve Forces) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That the Social Security (Members of the Reserve Forces) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

These regulations enable claimants of jobseeker's allowance (JSA) or income support (IS) or partners of a claimant in receipt of these benefits or employment and support allowance (ESA) who are new members of the Reserve forces to attend a maximum of 43 days' training in their first year of service without the need to end their entitlement to benefit.

Existing legislation that was implemented in July 2012 allows claimants and/or their partners who are in receipt of JSA or IS, or the partner of a claimant who is in receipt of ESA, to attend the mandatory 15-day annual training camp without losing entitlement. Income-based claimants also retain any passported benefits, such as housing benefit, during this training. They are treated as available for and actively seeking work, if appropriate, for the duration of this training, and their earnings are disregarded, leaving just 10p of benefit in payment. These changes removed the need for them to reclaim benefits after training has come to an end and to retain any passported benefits, such as housing benefit, during this training.

These amendments impact on claimants and/or their partners in receipt of JSA or IS and also ESA claimants' partners who are members of the Reserve forces. This will mean that they can attend a maximum of 43 days' training in future whilst in their first year of service without the need to terminate their claim to benefit. Once claimants and/or their partners have completed their first year of service, they will then be entitled to the annual continuous training concession of 15 days per calendar year to enable them to attend their mandatory annual training camp. By consolidating their first year's training into three or four blocks totalling up to 43 days, unemployed reservists can be trained more swiftly, thus helping to speed up and increase the number of trained reservists over the next few years.

Members of the lifeboat service, Fire and Rescue Service and others engaged in emergency duties for the benefit of others are also required to undertake training throughout the year. However, that usually takes place at evenings or weekends to fit around volunteers' work and other commitments, and, as a result, there is no adverse effect on their benefit claim.

I believe that it is unnecessarily cumbersome and time-consuming for claimants and my Department to terminate awards of benefit and then require new claims to be made when training has ended. These changes are entirely beneficial and will generate less disruption for reservists, who will no longer be required to end their benefit claim and then make a repeat claim when their training has ended.

Mr Speaker: I call Mr Stewart Dickson, speaking, I understand, on behalf of the Committee.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I am speaking on behalf of the Committee in the absence of the Chair and Deputy Chair for unavoidable reasons.

The Committee for Social Development considered the Department's proposals to make these regulations at its meeting on 12 March 2015, and the resulting statutory rule at its meeting on 16 April 2015. The Committee was supportive of the regulations.

The Committee noted that the regulations will enable claimants of jobseeker's allowance or income support, or partners of a claimant in receipt of those benefits or employment and support allowance, who are new members of the reserve forces, to attend a maximum of 43 days' training in their first year of service without the need to end their entitlement to benefit.

The Committee notes that the rule will reduce the administrative burden and payment delays. Jobseeker's allowance claims will be kept open by treating claimants as available for, and actively seeking, employment for the duration of their training. The Committee notes that the change will move claimants closer towards sustainable employment by allowing them to attend reservist training and encouraging networking within reservist-friendly organisations.

The Committee for Social Development recommends that the statutory rule be approved by the Assembly.

Mr Storey: I thank the representative of the Committee for his comments.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Social Security (Members of the Reserve Forces) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

Jobseeker's Allowance (Extended Period of Sickness) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015

Mr Storey (The Minister for Social Development): I beg to move

That the Jobseeker's Allowance (Extended Period of Sickness) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2015 be approved.

These regulations amend the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1996 to allow an extended period of sickness that will enable the claimant to voluntarily remain on jobseeker's allowance (JSA) when they have a short spell of sickness that is expected to last more than two weeks but fewer than 13 weeks or they have exhausted the number of occasions on which they may be treated as capable of work. Claimants will need to provide medical evidence to qualify for the new period of sickness.

This change presents an opportunity for a more proactive jobseeker's allowance regime in helping people to manage health conditions that affect their work capability, whilst allowing them the choice of remaining on JSA and staying in touch with the personalised support available from their adviser, keeping them engaged with the labour market. In practice, if a claimant provides evidence of sickness that is expected to last for more than two weeks, they will be directed to claim employment and support allowance (ESA). In addition, if a claimant has a third period of sickness, however short, during that 12-month period, their JSA award is terminated and they must claim ESA if they have no other source of income.

Being required to claim ESA for short periods can have a number of disadvantages. First, claimants on ESA before the medical assessment — work capability assessment — do not currently have any conditionality requirements and do not generally benefit from the support of advisers as they look for employment.

Secondly, being required to switch benefits for a short period is unnecessarily disruptive to the payment of benefits and can impact the payment of passported benefits, for example housing benefit.

12.30 pm

Under the proposed change, claimants with a temporary medical condition and appropriate medical evidence will have the option of voluntarily remaining on JSA for one period of sickness of up to 13 weeks. During this period, the claimant would not be required to take up paid work but would be treated as being capable of work and as meeting availability requirements, as per the existing JSA sickness provisions. Claimants who take up this opportunity can claim ESA at any point, should they wish.

The extended period of sickness will work as follows: it will be a continuous period for up to 13 weeks in a 12-month period and cannot be split into multiple periods; and claimants with a short spell of sickness of two weeks or less can still make use of the existing sickness provisions under regulation 55 of the JSA regulations. Therefore, it would be possible for a claimant to have two short periods of sickness and, separately, an extended period of sickness. Where a claimant starts on two weeks of sickness and that period extends beyond two weeks, they can transfer to the extended period of sickness. However, the initial two-week period will count towards the 13-week maximum.

For the purposes of applying the new sickness provisions to a claimant, the first 12 months in a job-seeking period will start from the first day on which the claimant is unable to work on account of the illness or disablement and, if the job-seeking period exceeds 12 months, in each successive 12-month period. That differs from the existing sickness provisions, in which the first 12 months in the job-seeking period start on the first day of the job-seeking period. It will also make it operationally more complex, but the change is being made to avoid, in most circumstances, a situation in which someone has a period of 13 weeks of sickness at the end of a 12-month period and another 13 weeks at the start of the next 12-month period.

Mr Dickson: I again reply on behalf of the Social Development Committee. The Committee for Social Development considered the Department's proposal to make the regulations at its meeting on 26 February 2015 and the resulting statutory rule at its meeting on 12 March 2015. The Committee supported the regulations.

The Committee noted that the regulations will amend the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1996 to allow an extended period of sickness that will enable claimants to remain on JSA when they have a short spell of sickness that is expected to last more than two weeks but fewer than 13 weeks, or they have exhausted the number of occasions on which they may be treated as being capable of work. The Committee further notes that claimants will need to provide medical evidence to qualify for the new period of sickness.

The Committee notes that the change would also have the effect of reducing the administrative burden that results from requiring claimants to switch to another benefit — JSA to ESA — for a short time. Importantly, it will also have the effect of keeping a claimant in touch with the labour market and treating them as still available for work. The Committee notes that advisers will take account of the easements on conditionality that will apply to the claimants during the extended period of sickness. In conclusion, the Committee for Social Development recommends that the statutory rule be approved by the Assembly.

Mr Storey: I thank Mr Dickson for his comments on behalf of the Committee. I also thank the Committee for the work that it has done on the two issues that I brought to the House today.

The change presents an opportunity for a more proactive JSA regime that will help people to manage health conditions that affect their work capability, whilst allowing them the choice of remaining on JSA and staying in touch with the personalised support available from their adviser to enable them to remain engaged with the labour market. It is a welcome change, and I thank the House for its support.

Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4): Suspension

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 15 June 2015.

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 15 June 2015.

Mr Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House and no dissenting voices, I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated. The motion is agreed.

Supply Resolution for the 2013-14 Excess Votes and Supply Resolution for the Northern Ireland Main Estimates 2015-16

Mr Speaker: The next two motions relate to the Supply resolutions and, as usual, there will be a single debate on the motions. One amendment has been selected for debate regarding the Supply resolution Main Estimates 2015-16 and is published on the Marshalled List. I shall ask the Clerk to read the first motion, on the Supply resolution for the 2013-14 Excess Votes, and call on the Minister to move it. The debate on both motions and the amendment will then begin. When all who wish to speak have done so, or when the time limit is reached, I shall put the Question on the first motion.

The second motion, the Supply resolution for the Northern Ireland Main Estimates 2015-16, will then be read into the record, and I will call the Minister to move it. I will then call Mr Allister to move his amendment. The Question will then be put on the amendment, followed by the Question on the second motion.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to four hours for the debate. The Minister will have up to 60 minutes to allocate at her discretion between proposing and making a winding-up speech. The proposer of the amendment will have 10 minutes to propose the amendment and five minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other contributors will have 10 minutes. If that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That this Assembly approves that resources, not exceeding £7,444,446.68 be authorised for use by the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, for the year ending 31 March 2014, as summarised for each Department in Part II of the 2013-14 Statement of Excesses that was laid before the Assembly on 8 June 2015.

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly approves that a sum, not exceeding £8,336,067,000, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund, for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 and that resources, not exceeding £9,004,299,000, be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1·3 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Estimates 2015-16 that was laid before the Assembly on 8 June 2015. — [Mrs Foster (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

The following amendment stood on the Marshalled List:

In the second motion leave out all after “exceeding” and insert:

“£7,732,067,000, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund, for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 and that resources, not exceeding £8,400,299,000, be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1·3 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Estimates 2015-16 that was laid before the Assembly on 8 June 2015, subject to a proportionate reduction for each Department, with the exception of the Department of Health Social Services and Public Safety, and each other public body referred to in columns 3(b) and 3(a) of table 1·3 of the aforesaid Estimates, so as to reflect the £604,000,000 shortfall resulting from the failure to implement the Stormont House Agreement.” — [Mr Allister.]

As just set out, the debate covers the Supply resolution and the Excess Votes in respect of the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The Supply resolution seeks the Assembly's approval of the 2015-16 departmental spending plans and that of their associated public bodies, as set out in the Main Estimates. The 2015-16 Main Estimates and the 2013-14 Statement of Excesses were laid in the Assembly on Monday 8 June 2015.

The Supply resolution, therefore, relates to the supply of cash and resources for the remainder of the 2015-16 financial year, as set out in the Main Estimates. A Vote on Account was passed by the Assembly in February, which provided initial legislative cover to ensure the continuation of public services until the Main Estimates could be presented to the Assembly for approval. This resolution, and the Budget Bill that I will introduce tomorrow, now request the balance to complete the total 2015-16 cash and resource requirements for the Departments and other public bodies. This balance amounts to over £8·3 billion of cash and over £9 billion of resources. These requirements have their origins in the Executive's 2015-16 Budget, which was approved by the Assembly earlier this year. It also reflects the demand-led annually managed expenditure (AME) required by our Departments to deliver public services and to pay benefits and pensions.

As Members will be aware, the context of the Budget Bill is far from business as usual. We find ourselves in the position where the Executive's 2015-16 Budget was predicated on agreement to implement welfare reform and the Budget flexibilities secured as part of the Stormont House Agreement. The ongoing uncertainty around welfare reform and the wider Stormont House Agreement is clearly putting the Executive's Budget in jeopardy. I must, therefore, stress that the Main Estimates and the associated Budget Bill are recommended to the Assembly on the assumption that welfare reform is agreed and that the Stormont House Agreement stands.

It is incumbent on all members of the Executive to ensure that we find a way forward on those difficult issues. On behalf of the Executive, and on the basis that welfare reform will be implemented, I request and recommend the levels of Supply set out in the motion under section 63 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

As is the norm, accelerated passage is required for the legislation. Indeed, there is a provision for that specific instance in the Assembly's Standing Orders. Owing to the unusual circumstances surrounding this year's Budget (No. 2) Bill, the Committee for Finance and Personnel has not yet been able to grant accelerated passage. I will attend the Committee this Wednesday, 17 June, to seek agreement to accelerated passage, and I hope that the Committee will be in a position to agree the request immediately after that briefing. I will, of course, update the House on the position at Second Stage, which is scheduled for next week. For now, I stress to members of the Finance and Personnel Committee and, in particular, the Committee Chair the critical importance of granting accelerated passage. I hope that the Committee will approach the briefing on Wednesday with that in mind.

I am sure that Members are aware that today's debate is time-limited. I therefore encourage Members to use their limited time to focus on the issues specifically related to the 2015-16 Supply resolution before us. The public-expenditure context facing the Assembly is an extremely difficult one. In their 2015-16 Budget, the Executive had to impose real-terms resource reductions on most Departments. With financial pressures mounting across a range of public services, that has led to difficult decisions across the board. Ministers have had to take decisions about what services to deliver, what services to reduce and, indeed, what activities to cease altogether.

I knew about the financial challenges facing the Northern Ireland Departments when I recently took up this post, and I am fully aware that that does not make my job any easier. Clearly, I would much rather have presided over a Budget in which there were plenty of resources to go around and in which the Executive would have the luxury of deciding what new services to introduce rather than what services to cut. However, we are in an environment of increasingly scarce resources. I am afraid that the immediate public-expenditure outlook is not a positive one.

The latest Office for Budget Responsibility (OBR) projections for the United Kingdom as a whole suggest that further resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) reductions are to come in the next few years. In fact, the latest projections suggest that the UK resource DEL will reduce by some 9% in cash terms between now and the 2018-19 financial year. That having been said, the outlook for capital

DEL is much more positive, with a projected increase at a UK level of 20% in cash terms over the same period.

As Members will be aware, the Chancellor, George Osborne, has announced that he will present a new UK Budget to Parliament on 8 July. It will set out the immediate Budget changes to be implemented by David Cameron's new Government. We have already had some insight into the direction of travel for the new United Kingdom Government for budget controls in last week's announcement of Whitehall in-year baseline reductions for many Departments. The outworkings of that through the Barnett formula have already had a negative impact on the Northern Ireland block.

Regarding longer-term spending plans, I anticipate that the UK Government will publish their spending review in the autumn, setting out their Budget plans for the period beyond this financial year. Whilst the outcome is uncertain, I expect the general direction of travel to reflect the latest Office for Budget Responsibility projections that I have just outlined.

The budgetary context that we find ourselves in means that we must take difficult decisions, minimise waste, promote the efficient delivery of public services and seek to protect front-line services. The spending priorities agreed by the Executive in the 2015-16 Budget will allow us to do just that. In that context, we cannot delay a decision on implementing welfare reform. The Executive and the Assembly must now move forward on the issue as quickly as possible to ensure that all elements of the Stormont House Agreement can remain in place.

I will say a few words about the second motion before the House today, which concerns two Excess Votes for the Department of Education and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. I confirm that the Public Accounts Committee has considered those Excess Votes and recommended that the Assembly grant its approval. I am anxious that both Departments ensure that the circumstances leading to the breaches are not repeated, and I note that steps have been taken in both cases to ensure that the risk of a repeat is now minimised.

Before I conclude my opening speech, I will address the amendment put forward by the Member for North Antrim. It calls for a £604 million reduction to the proposed amounts of cash and resources as set out in the Main Estimates. The Member is trying to use the Main Estimates debate to reopen the final Budget position that was agreed by the Executive. In doing so, he is demonstrating a lack of understanding of our budgeting framework and financial process. The Supply resolution on the Main Estimates cannot be used to propose changes to the Budget position. Only the Executive can agree budget allocations, based on recommendations put forward by me as Finance Minister. The Executive have now agreed their 2015-16 Budget. That was voted through the Assembly in January this year. That Budget stands and is reflected in the Main Estimates here today.

I look forward to debating the Budget Bill and, indeed, the Main Estimates. I request the support of Members to approve further Supply to enable vital public services to continue beyond the current provision in the Vote on Account.

Mr Allister: I have two little grandsons aged four and two. Very occasionally, they come to overnight with us when their parents have to be away. When that happens, the four-year-old will bounce into the house with his little suitcase and say, "I'm here on a pretend holiday." It is quite funny from a four-year-old. There is nothing funny about a Finance Minister coming to the House and putting before us a pretend Budget and pretend Estimates; pretending that she has and will have all the money anticipated in the 2015-16 Budget Bill; pretending that we have not had the reneging on welfare reform; pretending that we do not have a £604 million black hole in our budgetary arrangements; and pretending that we can simply carry on as if none of that had ever happened.

Of course, in doing that, the Minister herself is performing a considerable U-turn, because, during the welfare reform debate back at the end of May and in many public media interviews at that time, she identified the £604 million black hole in the Budget that had resulted. She told the House:

"we will not put our hands to supporting such a Budget".
— [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 105, p60, col 2].

Yet the Budget that she will bring tomorrow and upon which these Estimates are based is precisely that: a Budget with a £604 million black hole.

One of the main functions of the Assembly is financial management. The Minister suggested that I was misguided in my amendment. I refer the Minister to her own Department's guidance manual on Supply Estimates in Northern Ireland. I need go no further than the second paragraph of the foreword, where it says:

"As this manual will endeavour to explain, the Supply Estimates are at the heart of public spending control. It is through the Estimates that the Executive seeks the Assembly's authority for its spending plans".

The exercise in which we are engaged is fundamental to the budgetary arrangements that prevail. Who is to say that this House has not got the sovereign right to amend the Estimates? Of course it has. It is this House and this House alone that can give the imprimatur of approval to the Estimates and the spending plans, so this House is well within its powers in considering that.

Mr Speaker, the reality is that we are being asked to set a Budget, which, as the Minister knows, is not balanced, and which, as the Minister knows, will hit the buffers. If the House and the Executive cannot set a balanced Budget, the Executive cannot govern. That is what it comes down to. Of course, all of this scenario is a product of the failure of the system of government. The crisis that the Minister alludes to is the product of that. In mandatory coalition, parties have vetoes, which Sinn Féin recklessly exercises. It can blow hot and cold, as it has on welfare reform, and hole the budgetary process below the waterline, as it so cavalierly has done. The fact that that can happen is a product of the failure of the system of government. Today is an attempt to ignore that and an attempt to prop that up at the expense of all credibility.

This exercise makes the Assembly and the Executive an even greater laughing stock than it is already. We are going to pass Estimates even though we know the money is not there. We know there is a £604 million black hole, but we are going to pretend that all is well. It has been well labelled a fantasy Budget — a phantom Budget. When a parliamentary Assembly gets to the point of debating and approving fantasy financial arrangements, it fast loses any remaining shred of credibility. That is where we are.

It also, of course, is folly to totally abandon any sense of financial probity. Yes, these Estimates add up, but they add up to a phantom figure. In that sense, they are an escapade in false accounting, because the Minister knows — we all know — that whatever they say, there is a £604 billion black hole.

I was thinking about what a Sinn Féin Minister would do, if we had one — perish the thought. He or she would probably do pretty much what the Minister is going to do. They would pretend that there was money there that was not there. I would not expect anything better from Sinn Féin in that regard. I would not expect them, on their performance, to have any regard to financial probity. I would not be at all surprised that they would want to spend money that they do not have. They would probably produce a fantasy Budget as well. Of course, in the producing of this fantasy Budget, the Minister is buying time for the Sinn Féin shenanigans on the budgetary front in the hope against hope that something will turn up.

What will happen further down the road? That is a question I would like the Minister to address in her reply. She has set out this fantasy Budget, which is £604 million, in her terms, short. If nothing changes, what happens? What happens when she gets to the spring Supplementary Estimates? What happens when she gets to the Budget Bill, next year? It is quite clear from the guidance that she cannot amend these Estimates without the consent of the Executive. Para 1.8 of her guidance manual states that any significant changes to the Supply Estimates, in terms of content, must be cleared by DFP with the Executive.

So, we are hurtling down the road, spending money we do not have, and we reach the point where, effectively, the money has run out. The Minister wants to revise the Estimates to save the situation and to make budgetary changes to reconcile and remedy the situation. What does she think is going to happen? Does she think that Sinn Féin is simply going to say, "Yes, that's all right? Suddenly, we've had a conversion on financial probity".

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mrs Foster: Has the Member not just made the argument for why his amendment should not succeed, when he made reference to the fact that it is only the Executive that can change the Supply resolution?

Mr Allister: I am sorry. When she reflects on what she has said, the Minister may regret that she made that intervention, because the wording of para 1.8 of the manual is:

"Any ... changes to the Supply Estimates".

The Supply Estimates have not yet been made. Any changes after today, after the Assembly approves them, to the Supply Estimates — which are what we are talking about today and which will come with a vote of approval for them — any changes thereafter can only be made with the Executive's approval, but we are not at that point. We are now embarking on the journey to take ourselves to that point. We take ourselves to the folly of holding ourselves ransom to Sinn Féin saying: “We are quite happy to spend money that we do not have. We block you from making any changes to these Estimates.” That is tough, as far as they are concerned.

Mr Speaker: The Member’s time is almost up.

Mr Allister: The purpose of this amendment is to show what a balanced Budget would look like in the context of the folly of negating welfare reform. The House should be facing up to that folly, rather than pandering to, and practising, the economics of fantasy.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. The Minister and senior DFP officials are due to brief the Committee for Finance and Personnel at its meeting this Wednesday in relation to the Main Estimates and the associated Budget (No. 2) Bill. The Committee, in its scrutiny function, has an important role in deciding whether to grant accelerated passage to Budget Bills under the power in Standing Order 42.2. Importantly, that is on the basis that:

“the committee is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the ... expenditure proposals ... in the Bill”.

I thank the Minister for agreeing to come before the Committee to answer any questions that it may have at this week’s meeting.

The Committee will consider whether it is satisfied in that regard, and I will write to the Speaker on the outcome of its deliberations. Normally, the Committee would have received an oral briefing from DFP on the Estimates and Budget Bill before the Supply resolution debate. That did not occur; nonetheless, given that the Estimates and Bill reflect the Executive’s agreed Budget for 2015-16, I can confirm that there was significant engagement between the Committee and DFP on both the draft and final Budgets.

On voluntary exit schemes, the Committee heard from the head of the Civil Service and other senior officials on the overall position across the wider public sector. According to the previous Minister, the schemes will realise estimated annual pay bill savings of £500 million per annum by 2018-19 across the public sector. The Committee has also been advised that the Civil Service pay bill reduction for the second half of this financial year is estimated at £26 million and that the anticipated savings figure for the wider public sector is £70 million. However, the Committee has not received confirmation of the precise figure for projected pay bill savings, which has been included within departmental baselines for this financial year, including the breakdown across Departments and other public bodies, and perhaps that is something that the Minister can provide in closing today’s debate.

Two further points on the schemes require clarification. Given the savings opportunity offered by the voluntary exit schemes in the face of the current difficulties over further budgetary reductions, the Committee questioned officials at last week’s session to establish the scope for decoupling the borrowing power or finding other flexibility to progress the schemes and achieve the projected pay bill reductions in the current financial year. For some months now, we have been seeking a briefing from DFP on the outcome of the validation study of welfare reform costs, which was commissioned last autumn by the previous Minister. That is a significant delay which has been on the Committee’s books for some time, and it is a further issue on which it would be helpful to receive clarification.

It would also be helpful to receive clarity, at this stage, on the further budgetary reductions resulting from the Chancellor’s recent announcement of £3 billion in reduced spending with the prospect of additional in-year austerity measures by the Conservative Government in the coming weeks. The figure of £38 million has been referred to, and the implications of that and what is down the line are very worrying indeed.

1.00 pm

Given the risks around unresolved issues, the Committee invited the Minister to attend last week’s meeting to discuss scenarios that could arise if no progress is made, and what the available options might be. While the Minister did not take up that particular invitation, the Committee received independent legal advice from the Assembly’s Legal Services on the concern around whether Departments would have the power to use accruing resources in the event of the Budget (No. 2) Bill not being agreed by the end of July. That detailed and robust advice — the gist of which was shared with the Minister — set out a logical and lawful way forward in that scenario, given the Department’s powers of direction. While the Minister has responded with a contrary legal view, focusing more on the setting of limits, I believe the clarification that the Committee has obtained could be a helpful contribution for all concerned, should such circumstances arise in the future.

Today’s Estimates, and the related Bill, present a further scenario in anticipating the full implementation of the Stormont House Agreement. I therefore look forward to receiving further information and clarity on the issues I have highlighted ahead of the Committee’s decision regarding accelerated passage on Wednesday. Given that the Committee will not receive a briefing from the Department about the Supply resolution for the Excess Votes 2013-14 until Wednesday, I am not in a position to reflect a Committee position on that today.

To give a party view on the motion before us today, it is quite clear that there is potentially — indeed there has already been — wave after wave of cuts from London, from an economically incompetent Government blinded by ideology. The crisis, referred to earlier by the proposer of the amendment, does not come from here, but from London and the budgets that have been foisted on us from there. Those financial decisions are ideologically led and, increasingly, economists in Britain are finding it quite difficult to live with the basic economics of them.

As MLAs, we have to ask ourselves whether we are here to stand up for people, local communities and local businesses, or to act as puppets for a Tory Administration who cut budgets so deep that the Executive cannot effectively function. On Friday, 77 of the best-known academic economists outlined huge concern at the British Chancellor, George Osborne’s, new budget surplus law proposal. It ignores basic economics and shifts debt to households, consumers and businesses. The risk of a personal debt crisis to rival 2008 is very real indeed.

The Scottish Finance Minister, John Swinney, has blasted cuts to this year’s Budget as being completely and utterly unacceptable. The Scottish Parliament has already agreed its Budget. The Welsh Finance Minister also attacked George Osborne for his £50 million cut to their in-year Budget. We need a similar position from the Finance Minister and Executive here. We need a robust position and a defence of our Executive and our planning in relation to the economy, not only for a number of months ahead into the financial year, but for the next four to five years. The British Government make these decisions with little reference to the devolved Administrations. Scotland did not vote for the Tories; Wales did not vote for the Tories; and the North most certainly did not vote for the Tories. Those three jurisdictions most certainly did not vote for the economic policies that are being shoved down our throats year after year.

There is no doubt that there are huge challenges ahead, and I believe that we need to act collectively and to stand shoulder to shoulder with Wales and Scotland, who find themselves in a similar position. All of the Governments concerned — in Belfast, Cardiff and Edinburgh — are being increasingly undermined by a London Administration who ignore the fact that none of those Administrations are interested in the economic ideology being pursued by the Tory Government. Of course, London was in economic crisis four to five years ago. At this point, it was supposed to be out of it, but it is not, so it is quite clear that those economic policies have failed and need to be challenged by all the parties in this Executive.

We do not need a softly-softly approach from some parties in the Assembly. I believe that, if we adopt a collective voice with Scotland and Wales, the Tories will be forced to sit up and take notice. The situation that we are in at the moment is untenable and unsustainable. As locally elected politicians, we have to act in our people's best interests, and that is not about bending the knee to a Tory Administration.

Mr Girvan: I will speak in favour of the Minister's motion. I will deal with the Excess Votes at the outset. One area that we had a concern about was that the cause of the Department of Education's Excess Vote was arm's-length bodies. There is a major concern about accountability in some arm's-length bodies and how they deal with it. As a consequence, they overspend. That came out in the Public Accounts Committee (PAC) report, and we, as a Government, have to look at it and ensure that we are making those arm's-length bodies totally accountable for every penny that they spend.

The motion is to do with a Budget that we agreed on 27 January this year, albeit one that was very much predicated on the full implementation of the Stormont House Agreement and all its outworkings. As a consequence of its non-implementation up to now, there is a potential cost and a loss to our block grant over time, but my ambition is not necessarily to roll over and say that we have not won that war. We intend to fight and continue to see what we can bring back as opposed to saying, "Let us rule out all the moneys that there would have been as a result of the Stormont House Agreement". The figure of £604 million has been mentioned. I appreciate that there are costs associated up to now.

The voluntary exit scheme was one of the programmes put forward, and the savings that it could deliver are on hold until such times as we move forward with those who believe that our paymaster, the United Kingdom Government, will act. We are part of the United Kingdom, and, therefore, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have to accept the democracy that spoke to set up the Conservative Government. I appreciate that the Chancellor and the Government will put forward their spending plans in the autumn, but that will really reflect upon years further forward.

I will deal with our Supply resolution and the spend that we have for our Supply. We have to work with the Budget that we agreed on 27 January, albeit knowing that there could well be adjustments to it in-year and being aware of the outworkings of it, but the longer we delay in bringing forward —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Girvan: I will, yes.

Mr Allister: Can the Member, from his experience, explain to the House how, if matters unfold with a continuing deadlock and the £604 million gap becomes a very overt reality, the matter will be rectified? How do you then alter the spending authority of the Estimates or the Budget without the consent of the recalitrants who have put you in that position in the first place?

Mr Speaker: Given the extent of that intervention, I want to make it clear that, as Members have 10 minutes to contribute, there is no extra time. So, if you are taking interventions in future, remember that.

Mr Girvan: Thank you, Mr Speaker.

I appreciate that that leaves us in a very difficult position, but, as the Minister stated, should we not get implementation of the way forward, we cannot continue to move forward when we cannot balance our books at the end of the year, and that is where the difficulty arises. Ultimately, it is vital to push forward and continue the work to try to get a resolution, but the longer we leave it, the more in-year cuts we will have to make to balance the books, and that is a difficulty.

We have been very successful in ensuring that we held down our regional rate. Northern Ireland has held its regional rate for the last number of years and has just had an inflationary rise over that period to such an extent that we have a 1.4% rise in the current year — other regions of the United Kingdom have worked out at an average of 1.9% — and that has been a great help. The implementation of the small business rate relief scheme has also been a great help and ensured that almost 50% of businesses in Northern Ireland were able to avail themselves of some form of rate relief. That message was given to us as elected representatives, and we have had to take that on board.

We have to cut our cloth according to the amount that we are given, and it is vital that we do so. For the Estimates, we have a cash sum of £8.3 billion and a resource of just over £9 billion, and we will have to work within that amount for the forthcoming year. We have some difficulty in trying to ensure that the economics of the whole issue are brought forward. Mention was made of what the Scottish Executive have done and how they have agreed a Budget, albeit a Budget that has not taken a major hit for the non-implementation of welfare reform. We have concerns about many aspects of welfare reform, but, ultimately, they are not taking that hit.

Those who say that they are here to protect the most vulnerable in our community are removing money from vital budgets that would deliver health and education throughout our Province. A very interesting piece of graffiti appeared on a wall in west Belfast: "We don't want the IRA, we just want our DLA". That is quite interesting, and some of these people come up with wonderful ideas. The graffiti did not appear to stay very long, but that is the sort of thing that some people have been putting forward. That says more about what is going on here than anything else, because it is important that the most vulnerable are protected.

At the end of the day, everybody is suffering as a consequence of the non-implementation of the Stormont House Agreement, and it is vital that we get the work done. We are not rolling over and saying that we will just accept those hits. We will fight to try to ensure that we can move forward, balance our Budget and deliver for Northern Ireland.

Mr McKinney: I am sorry that I was not in for the Minister's opening remarks. I apologise that my colleague Dominic Bradley MLA, our finance spokesman, is unable to attend today.

During the last debate on the Supply resolution, Dominic Bradley reflected on how we were in a challenging financial situation, and the position has not got any better, of course; it has got worse. The SDLP has a long-standing view on the 2015 Budget, a Budget that is backed by parties here, including Sinn Féin, which called it the best deal possible. However, my colleagues and I recognise that this Budget was not a great deal and further realised that, if a Conservative Government were elected, it would mean further cuts. I recognise that many people did not expect a majority Conservative Government after the election, so we may have been blindsided — I think that we have — by the prospect of in-year cuts.

The Minister of Finance and Personnel said that Mr Osborne announced that a further £38 million of cuts could be made to the 2015-16 Budget. I welcome some comment from the Minister on whether there are flexibilities around that. However, it seems that we have no choice but to wait with bated breath until 8 July. Also, we will be opposing Mr Allister's amendment.

1.15 pm

We have been, and continue to be, extremely concerned by the budgetary pressure faced by the Northern Ireland Executive and the impact on front-line services. The Budget settlement is, without doubt, the most severe that Northern Ireland has faced in recent times, and the prospect of more in-year cuts would further affect departmental allocations. Frankly, it is not the way to stimulate an economy.

As Mr Girvan said, we welcome the Supply resolution for the Excess Vote, which provides further funding for Education and Health. Every Department has severe budget restraints, but I welcome the money that is being provided to those two vital Departments. It is in this context, as SDLP health spokesperson, that the remainder of my contribution will focus on health spend.

In that regard, today's debate is an important one. It is essential to recognise the job of the health service here. It serves two million people and costs almost £5 billion a year. It is vital, therefore, that every pound is spent productively; but today's subject is around the money and, in the health service context, how we are delivering for the money that we have or do not have.

We all know that the narrative we are facing at the moment is that we are facing ever-increasing waiting times; issues with hospital deaths and non-reporting A&E crises; incomprehensible breaches in 12-hour and four-hour targets; we are paying twice because of operations brought in through another system; our health staff are increasingly under significant stress and pressure; cancer drugs are being denied to our most vulnerable; and the service is witnessing massive wastage with bank and agency staff spend, among others. The public rightly have a genuine concern for how the system is being run.

The SDLP has indicated these failures in the health service time and again, and it is clearly very much in the public mind; but, remember, our current health financial situation has not yet been impacted on by welfare reform. It is brought into the argument all the time, but an important point to remember is that Health was protected in this year's Budget and was given an additional £204 million to protect front-line health services; but that has not stopped our series of Health Ministers seeking to hide behind the welfare issue.

The service here employs almost 55,000 people, who are dedicated professional staff working to the highest standards; but it is concerning to see the ongoing pressures suffered by staff on the front line and the numerous escalation measures in crisis management protocols that have been instigated. These are clear symptoms of the problem; they are not the cause. I think that the cause lies in policy and strategic direction.

We all know about the major change agenda in the system called Transforming Your Care (TYC). That represents, in essence, a number of things: first, a consensus about what is wrong with the system, and, secondly, a plan about how to deal with it. The SDLP has had suspicions about a privatisation agenda, but few have disagreed with the concept of taking care closer to the home and that that was the way to go. The plan was to shift healthcare provision from centralised institutions and into the community. If it was about anything, it was about the future strategic direction of health provision here. It was meant to be a three-year to five-year plan. It was anticipated that it would cost over £70 million and that we would see a stabilisation of health spend by now because, remember, that was in 2011, and we would see savings of £50 million per annum. If we had implemented it, we would not be in the state we are in today. That was the TYC business case endorsed by the Executive.

In light of the recent monumental healthcare failures and financial crises, we have to ask ourselves whether the health service is reforming for the better and whether the plan is still valid. As I said, that was four years ago. We would have had reasonable expectation of progress; but the SDLP has been asking questions about the plan, its budget, implementation, measurement and targets. In the end, we have a patchwork of targets, with trusts making decisions in silos, cutting community services, creating health inequalities, and with no central strategic plan.

As you know, during the tail end of last year, the five health and social care (HSC) trusts made a number of supposedly temporary service cuts as a result of financial crisis. We would like to know whether those are still temporary or not.

However, these cuts will be further compounded in this financial year, especially if the leaked commissioning plans published by the 'Irish News' are anything to go by.

Financial crisis or not, these cuts are completely counter-strategic to the TYC plan and do nothing but increase pressure on the system and negatively impact on the care that patients receive. It is the SDLP that has been saying that, and it has become increasingly clear that more people are beginning to accept the narrative, none more so than the recent Liam Donaldson review, the Audit Office's general report and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission's report into health and social care. Remember, we have asked some very basic questions over the last two years. Where was the plan? What were the targets? How were they being implemented? We have had two years of obfuscation, and now we are hearing something different. Now, the plan is not so much about a plan —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I am going to take the Speaker's advice, Mr Wilson, because there is no extra minute for giving way.

Now, the plan is not so much a plan: according to some departmental officials, it is a "philosophy"; according to the Health Minister, it is about the "principles" of TYC; according to the new Health Board chief, TYC was in the "context" of 2011. The context of 2011 has increased in 2015. You can see where they are going here. Is the plan still a plan? In that context we should all be worried that the concept of measurable change has been diluted and that millions of pounds have already been spent with questionable noticeable change.

I have already, in the midst of the headlines around that issue, approached the Audit Office to investigate TYC. I am deeply worried that what we are hearing now is an attempt to throw a smokescreen around a failed plan. We have heard the Minister talk a lot about reform since taking his post. He says that he wants a world-class health service and that he wants health staff to embrace reform to tackle resistance to change. I am sorry that that is where the Minister finds himself: appealing to staff for change.

The TYC document made one very important point at its core. It said that failing to plan for the future would lead to unplanned and haphazard change that would not be in the best interests of patients. That is exactly what we have been seeing. We have also heard Simon Hamilton say that he has established a regional leadership group to drive transformational change, but he had all that in the plan: he had a consensus ahead of the plan, which developed into the targets that were never implemented. He had a plan, but he is rapidly turning into a man with no plan. In light of that, the Minister must re-evaluate the Transforming Your Care model so that the system does not further deteriorate and staff are not placed under further pressure. I will accept an intervention at this point.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. He talks about vagueness and there being no plan etc. What is the SDLP's plan for the issue before us: how we ensure that there are sufficient resources to keep on the business of government in the Health Department and in all other Departments for the rest of the year?

Mr McKinney: In the context of what I have been saying, we want money spent properly; we want a proper Budget. We said from the outset in 2011 that there were insufficient funds. We need to see proper funding for government here.

Mr Cree: I am pleased to speak to the House on the Supply resolution. However, the situation is quite different from those in the past. We are not aware of the 2014-15 provision out-turn and therefore have no idea of the departmental budget management performance during the last financial year. We do not know the amount of the resources that the Executive can carry forward through the Budget exchange scheme, and we have not yet had sight of the June monitoring round and its outworkings. Has any money been returned to the Treasury, and has our financial transaction capital budget been fully expended? What is the situation with respect to moneys in the centre? Have all the Barnett consequentialities been received and have all welfare penalties been paid?

This time last year, I once again asked the then Minister for an update on the progress — I was being optimistic — of the review of the financial process, because that matter had been stalled since 2012. He very kindly did so and undertook to have further discussions with the Minister of Education, with a view to delivering a significant positive reform of the direct rule inherited publications and financial processes. I would like to know what the current situation is.

We all know that the elephant in the room is the failure of Sinn Féin to honour the agreement that it made at Stormont House last year. Welfare reform and its cost have not been agreed, and that is a major unknown. The Estimates need to take that significant fact into account.

The Stormont House Agreement included provision for £50 million of additional capital DEL for education. At this time, it cannot be included in the Budget because of the disagreement. The voluntary exit scheme is dependent on £700 million of borrowing from the reinvestment and reform initiative. It is also part of the Stormont House Agreement. In the absence of agreement, the money is simply not there, and £200 million of it has been anticipated for the current year. Thirty million pounds is planned to deal with the past, £100 million to repay the loan from the United Kingdom reserve, £114 million for welfare penalties and a further £100 million to cover extra capital projects. That equates to a black hole of some £600 million. How then can we possibly approve a Budget that does not stack up? Mr Allister's amendment attempts to address that issue.

We all recognise the tight fiscal framework. This year's resource budget has been reduced by 1.6% in real terms. I am sorry to say that the future does not look any better. The Minister referred to that. The Office for Budget Responsibility projections suggest that Northern Ireland could see its resource DEL being cut back by 13% in real terms by 2020.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: Are you itching to go?

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. He indicated that he believes that the amendment from Mr Allister addresses the problem, but, first, the amendment does not state where the £600 million comes off, so we are voting in the dark on that one. Secondly, the pressure on those whom the Member has quite rightly condemned for not implementing the Stormont House Agreement would be lifted if we were to remove the £600 million from the Budget.

Mr Cree: I agree with the Member —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: I will certainly. I agree with the second point that the former Minister makes, but Mr Allister is better equipped to answer the first one.

Mr Allister: Maybe the Member will suggest to Mr Wilson that he read the last five or six lines of the amendment to see where it is coming off of necessity. On the point about keeping on the pressure, surely the Minister's approach is to take the pressure off Sinn Féin and merely kick the can down the road.

Mr Cree: Thank you for that. I will go back to where I was at.

The days of handouts are over, and we have to manage devolution and move the Assembly forward. In January of this year, the former Minister of Finance and Personnel announced his intention to create a Northern Ireland investment fund. Its purpose was to lever additional finance to be used for investment in infrastructure. Some £40.9 million was forecast to be in the fund this year. Perhaps Minister Foster will update Members on the current situation with the fund. On the subject of funds, it was also announced that a social innovation fund would be created to provide specific groups with access to loan financing. Again, an update from the Minister would be appreciated.

In January, the former Minister, in addressing his final Budget, chided those of us who did not support the Budget. He said that although the Budget was:

"infinitely better for our public services and our economy than we could have hoped for, tough times lie ahead."
— [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 101, p7, col 1].

It is certainly a lot tougher now with a £600 million shortfall. The Estimates and the resultant Budget are not now sustainable, thanks to Sinn Féin, assisted by the SDLP. This is now make-your-mind-up time for the Assembly. We need to move forward and demonstrate to the Northern Ireland public that the Assembly is capable of delivering. We are currently haemorrhaging £2 million a week because of the lack of welfare reform. I hope that today will prove that, in political terms, we can turn the corner for the betterment of all in Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: You are just in time.

1.30 pm

Mr Attwood: I anticipated your speech coming to an end. Do the Member and his party agree or not agree that, on the face of it, the British Government are in breach of the Stormont House Agreement, in that, last week, they announced £38 million of cuts to the 2015-16 Budget, when Stormont House says — the Minister may wish to respond to this in due course — that the Budget that the DUP and Sinn Féin brought forward was "a final ... budget"? Does your party agree or not agree that a final Budget, which the British Government said had to be presented to the House, was then unpicked by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer last week when "final" became final less £38 million?

Mr Cree: The Member raises a very interesting point, but there is a lot more to it than that. In fact, we really have to say focused on the issue today. The issue today is that a Budget has been presented, but it does not stack up because of the failure of the Stormont House Agreement and the parties that have changed their minds about it. That is it.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: Go ahead. Yes.

Mr Speaker: The Member is finished. I call Mrs Judith Cochrane.

Mr Cree: I will give way to the Member if he wants to say sorry — [Laughter.]

Mr Speaker: That was a very interesting contribution and cocktail of interventions. Mrs Judith Cochrane.

Mrs Cochrane: I will give way to Mr Wilson if he wants. [Laughter.]

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. I do not even know what she was going to say. Would she agree with me that, regardless of how the SDLP tries to wriggle out of the embarrassment that it clearly finds itself in, having put public services in jeopardy, the final Budget referred to in the Stormont House Agreement was for 2014-15? Of course, we are now into a new financial year. Had it acted, we would have had the final Budget through and Departments would have had surety about the money that they would have available for this year.

Mrs Cochrane: I concur with the Member.

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Cochrane: No, I will not give way, thank you. I want to move on.

I support the motion, albeit with a degree of reluctance.

Mr Attwood: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Would you review the comments just made by Mr Wilson? He referred to the final Budget in Stormont House as the 2014-15 Budget, when everybody knows that it is the 2015-16 Budget.

Mr Wilson: Sorry.

Mr Speaker: I accept his apology from a sedentary position. I am really looking forward to hearing what Mrs Cochrane has to tell us.

Mrs Cochrane: I knew that Mr Wilson was referring to 2015-16.

I call on the House to show responsibility today by passing the Supply resolution and the Budget legislation to begin the process of recovering financial sustainability. At this moment in time, the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly collectively are acting in an irresponsible and irrational manner, and it is easy to understand why many people are cynical and frustrated with us all and their support for devolution is being tested. At present, there is no clear financial framework in place. No financial decisions are being taken to ensure that the Northern Ireland Government remain in budget, and the absence of delivery on welfare reform brings considerable financial consequences and risks the Stormont House Agreement, including the financial assistance opportunities for progressing a shared future, dealing with the past and rebalancing the economy.

It is clear that proceeding with the Supply resolution and the remaining Budget legislation is the least irresponsible option before us. I say that even though Alliance opposed the current Budget at the Executive in January. We did that because we believed it was not sufficiently strategic and because some difficult yet necessary reforms were not being pursued. We subsequently supported, however, the Supply resolution in February to give the Departments the legal authority to begin to spend in the new financial year. I suppose you could say that we opposed the Executive policy on the Budget, but, as the decisions had been taken democratically, we then faced up to our responsibility in government and supported the mechanisms to turn the previous policy decision into reality. We are now in June, and the second Supply resolution and Budget (No. 2) Bill need to be passed to put in place the remainder of the Supply decisions and legal spending power. Without that, we will be subject to even greater pressures.

Our central objective must be to do whatever we can to reduce the scale of cuts to public services and to the various levers for economic development. The consequences of not passing the legislation are a complete financial vacuum, no decisions on the way forward, financial uncertainty and likelihood of very severe cuts to follow. Avoiding or minimising that eventuality is of primary importance.

I believe that Mr Allister's amendment could actually stop any process that accepts the implementation of welfare reform, the Stormont House Agreement or any unilateral action by the UK Government to continue with other aspects of the Stormont House Agreement, so Alliance will oppose the amendment.

Of course, passing the Supply resolution does not in itself change any of the underlying financial and political challenges, but it will at the very least provide some space and opportunity where agreement can be found on implementing welfare reform, delivering the Stormont House Agreement and working towards balancing our books. This is now the time for all MLAs to show maturity and responsibility, to rise above narrow party politics and to show a willingness to confront difficult challenges.

Actions in recent weeks by the nationalist parties and the Greens are making Northern Ireland ungovernable and threatening the survival of the institutions. Indeed, it was quite ironic to hear a Sinn Féin MLA talk earlier about others as being "blinded by ideology". Those who oppose the Supply resolution and Budget Bill are, in effect, voting for bigger cuts, and I have yet to hear a credible alternative. I have heard talk of a fantasy Budget, but I think that the bigger issue is the fantasy economics from some Members of the House. The fact is that Northern Ireland is in a major hole. I therefore urge all Members today to be part of a solution and vote for the motion, so that we can continue to work towards a resolution and recover financial sustainability.

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate in my capacity as Chair of the Committee for Regional Development. I thank my colleague the Minister of Finance for bringing the motion to the House today. I note that the role of the Estimates is set out the detailed spending plans for the Northern Ireland Departments. I welcome the detail, as it is proving more and more difficult — as we debated last week — to get that level of detail from the Department for Regional Development.

I acknowledge that this financial year is going to be a difficult one for the Department for Regional Development and, indeed, for all Executive Departments, as the austerity measures coming from Westminster make themselves even more known to us. However, it is therefore imperative that the Department manages those budgets effectively in order to achieve its aim; namely, improving the quality of life for everyone in Northern Ireland through the provision, maintenance and enhancement of a range of essential infrastructure services. That role will, in the coming months, also be enhanced to ensure that the Department continues to shape Northern Ireland's long-term strategic development.

The resources being committed today are not insignificant: table 1.3 (a) and (b) of the Estimates, as referred to in the motion, shows sums of just under £306 million for resources and £414 million in cash. That represents approximately 45% of the total resource requirement and 50% of the net cash requirement. As I said, those are not insignificant totals; totals that may be supported through in-year monitoring rounds. It is worth noting that, whilst the Department continues to bemoan the reductions to its budgets and bandies about figures of 15% reductions, that provision is only 1.04% lower than the final net provision for 2014-15.

It is imperative that the Department for Regional Development manages these totals in a prudent yet imaginative fashion. It is encouraging, for example, to see allocations in respect of the EU INTERREG programme, because the Committee has for a long time encouraged the Department to make best use of the funding available through that and other EU programmes, such as the Trans-European Transport Network (TEN-T). I commend the Department for being very successful in acquiring funding through those programmes. Equally, I commend the Executive and the Minister of Finance for providing the match funding for those allocations. It would be remiss of me if I did not commend the Committee for the work that it does in encouraging departmental applications for funding and, indeed, as it has done in the past and will continue to do, negotiating and supporting those applications directly in the European Parliament and the EU Commission.

Last week, we had the opportunity to debate in the House, and indeed at the Committee, the impact of the current departmental budget allocations. We were critical of the Department's over-reliance on the in-year monitoring, and, subsequently, the Committee agreed to write to the Minister of Finance to ask whether a balance can be achieved between establishing appropriate baseline allocations and in-year monitoring bids.

During the plenary debates and in Committee last week, a great deal of attention focused on the lack of investment in roads and water infrastructure. It is worth noting, therefore, that the net total DEL is significantly higher in these two areas. The Committee would therefore expect the Department to put these to the best and most effective use to delay or defer adding to the roads structural backlog and the risk of infraction proceedings, particularly in respect of the Ballycastle waste water treatment works.

Of course, a large proportion of the allocation to Northern Ireland Water is in respect of the Executive's Programme for Government commitment to ensure that there are no domestic water charges during this mandate. I note from tomorrow's Order Paper that the Minister for Regional Development will introduce the Water and Sewerage Services Bill. It is intended that the Second Stage will be scheduled shortly, allowing the Committee to receive it before the summer recess. The Bill will extend the Executive's Programme for Government commitment towards non-domestic water charges and also seeks means to reduce the risk of flooding through the use of sustainable drainage systems. As the House will be aware, the Executive have previously had to invest significant amounts in compensation to homeowners who were impacted by the flash floods of recent years. It is therefore important that we re-examine the means to reduce or negate the risk of flooding. I look forward to receiving the Bill into the Committee shortly.

The next two highest allocations are in respect of railway services and road-passenger services. I would like to make a couple of points on these areas. First, we welcome the announcement of a new Translink chief executive and wish the current chief executive, David Strahan, all the best in his future endeavours. David brought a great deal of propriety and much-needed transparency to the role. I would hope that his successor, Chris Conway, will continue in the same vein as David. We look forward to working with Chris to ensure that we have a transport operator that is efficient and fit for purpose.

Secondly, the Committee is unanimous in its support of the Coleraine to Londonderry rail project and has shown its support over the years. This track is essential to the continued economic and social development of the north-west, and it is imperative that connectivity between the two largest cities in Northern Ireland is maintained and enhanced. However, whilst we continue to be supportive of the project and look forward to seeing it completed, as a scrutiny Committee, we cannot ignore the doubling of the budget through the incompetence of officials in the Department for Regional Development and Translink.

The Committee will soon complete its inquiry into the mishandling of this exercise and would hope that the House will support the conclusions that it has made to date. It will also continue to scrutinise Translink, as indeed it will scrutinise NIW, to ensure that the public purse is being used to the most appropriate means. We are scheduled to receive the Translink accounts very soon and will forensically examine these as we have in the past. It is no secret that we will focus in on the level of reserves — reserves, which, unlike those of the community transport sector and Disability Action, have continually, over the years, been bolstered by public funds. If it is right and proper for the Department to tell rural community transport providers to use their reserves, it is equally correct that private organisations that are supported by public funding are asked to do likewise.

I briefly referred to Disability Action and community transport. It is only right and proper that I congratulate the Minister for Regional Development on his decision to re-categorise his bid in June monitoring as "inescapable" in respect of the essential role that these organisations play. In debates last week, the Committee attracted some criticism for not offering alternatives to departmental decisions. This is yet another example of where the Committee has offered alternative solutions, and it is one which we as a Committee very much support.

The money in these Estimates is required to allow the Department for Regional Development to plan, develop and manage sustainable transportation networks and continue to contribute to the health and well-being of communities through the provision of clean and safe water and sewerage works. They are necessary for the economic, environmental and social development of the Northern Ireland economy. I therefore welcome and support the motion.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. We can and must create a wealthier, more equal society. We can do it on a foundation of participation, prosperity and fairness. Fairness does not follow after growth: fairness delivers growth. We want to build sustainable economic growth. To achieve that, we must explore every potential avenue for economic growth, but we also must deliver for our people.

1.45 pm

In this current economic and financial climate, in which the Conservative Administration have cut £1.5 billion from our local budget and are intent on delivering further cuts, we must also ensure that we here try to balance our books and protect local public services. Our people and business have had to face the challenges brought about by the economic mismanagement of successive Westminster Governments. We have a vision in Sinn Féin for a local economy that will drive quicker, more sustainable and more equal economic growth, with opportunities for all our people to flourish. We want to build a public sector and an economy that reflect the unique character, skills and values of our people.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Boyle: No, I will not give way, Mr Wilson, if you do not mind.

The current economic position demonstrates why we must deliver that vision. Right now, we face an unprecedented economic challenge of the no-growth austerity agenda from Westminster, without the powers at our disposal to fully drive economic growth and prosperity. The new Tory Government cuts are equal to 5.2% of GDP. If those cuts progress unchallenged, the local impact will be severe. The Tories have no coherent economic plan. Everyone from Paul Krugman to the IMF's Christine Lagarde have called for a plan B around this.

Sinn Féin has argued for an approach that puts investment at the heart of the solution. What makes the situation truly tragic is that the Chancellor's actions are, in themselves, self-defeating. I call on Sir George Osborne to end his obsession with austerity. It is time he listened and time he learned. If he will not, it is time he left us; it is time he left it to the people in this Assembly and Executive to shape a better economic future using the limited powers that we have. We are focused on helping local households and businesses through this economic crisis. That must be our job here in this Assembly. The economic challenges facing us are serious. Uniting to help our businesses and people to flourish, and uniting to build the next generation of economic success, will deliver for our people. We can build a new economic future for this island, North and South.

I want to, if you will allow me, Cheann Comhairle, refer to the financial pressures that have already been mentioned in health. The recent Audit Office report on the health and social care sector and the financial pressures in our health care system notes the scale of the financial difficulty facing our health and social care trusts. They were so severe in 2013 and 2014, despite receiving additional funding of over £115 million. The HSC bodies have found it increasingly difficult to balance their budgets in the face of rising inflationary costs and pressure. That adds to waiting times and clinical and social negligence claims around patients and safety.

We could do so much more if we had full control of our resources and economic decision-making. If you are unsure of that, Westminster's economic record is there for us all to see. The economic difficulties that we face are a product of the failed economic management of successive Westminster Governments. The Tories' economic strategy has "Made in London" stamped all over it. What we want is the opportunity to create a sustainable economy for our people, not the residents of London. Local people and businesses must be at the heart of all our decision-making here. We must invest in improving people's lives to improve the economy and society, not just because it will deliver better services or is the right thing to do, but because it is also the smart thing to do to achieve and secure a future for all our people.

There is a fundamental difference between the vision that we have for our people and that which is painted by the Tories. Do we go forward to an economy that flourishes, with economic powers and in charge of our own resources and decision-making, or do we allow all our achievements to be rolled back by London cuts?

Our opponents are content to argue about how the economic and financial cake is divided. They are content to accept a future in which cuts and austerity stretch on for years to come, but we in Sinn Féin are not. Access to economic powers will allow us to tailor economic policies to the priorities of our people, extend competitive advantages and address the challenges and opportunities presented by the local and island economy. It will help us to build a more dynamic economy. It will allow expenditure and tax policy to work together in harmony and enable us to use welfare to protect the most vulnerable. It will also allow us to end the economic mismanagement of successive London Governments and give us the tools to build the economy that we all want — one that is compassionate, prosperous and progressive. It will give us the powers to flourish.

I want to make a point today. On Friday, other West Tyrone MLAs and I met a group of individuals from Glenside and Knockavoe schools. Members from every Assembly party were at the meeting and heard how schools face cuts to their day care and residential services in my area of Strabane and West Tyrone and, indeed, the wider north-west. They told us that they face the daily challenge of having to turn away patients with adult learning disabilities because of the financial pressures on their budgets.

Mr Wilson: Which you have added to.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Hilditch (The Deputy Chairperson of the Audit Committee): I will be very brief. On behalf of the Audit Committee, I wish to confirm that the provision for the Northern Ireland Audit Office in the Main Estimates corresponds with the amount agreed by the Audit Committee and laid before the Assembly earlier this year. The Estimate, therefore, provides for a net resource requirement of £7.686 million, which is a 6.3% reduction from the agreed net resource requirement of £8.2 million for 2014-15. The reduction is consistent with the figures for the Audit Office in the Executive's Budget for 2015-16. The Committee expressed its unease in agreeing the Estimate. It would much prefer to be in a position in which the reduction was significantly less. The Committee recognises, and the Assembly should be aware, that the reduction to the Audit Office's budget has the potential to impact the services that it delivers.

The Committee does not want to see a situation in which the Audit Office lacks the necessary resources to provide effective backup to the Assembly in its task of holding Departments and others to account for the use of public money. That would not be in the public interest. However, the reality of the current financial position must not be overlooked. Cuts are being made across the public sector, and the Audit Office needs to accept its fair share of those.

The Committee wants the Audit Office to sustain, as far as possible, a similar service to that provided at present through continued efficiencies in its audit methodologies. However, given the risks that the Comptroller and Auditor General (C&AG) has identified, it is vital that the Audit Office receives sufficient funding from the Executive's transformation fund at the earliest opportunity to allow it to reduce its number of permanent staff by 10% and make the savings required by the Estimate.

It may be the case that there will not be a voluntary exit scheme or that it does not allow the Audit Office to make the savings necessary to live within the Estimate. If so, there will be a funding deficit and a gap between the work that the Committee wants the Audit Office to carry out and the resources that it has to make that happen. Understandably, the C&AG prioritises avoiding a situation in which the Audit Office has an Excess Vote, and the Committee respects that position. However, the Committee also recognises, particularly in light of the significant savings that the Audit Office identifies across the public sector every year, that our public finances would be worse off if the NIAO had to scale back its value for money work.

The Committee has been assured that the Executive respect the independence of the Audit Office. In order to give effect to that assurance, the Committee expects that, should a shortfall arise as a result of savings not being made from a voluntary exit scheme, the Finance Minister and the Executive will ensure that this is addressed during monitoring rounds. The funds required to do that would be relatively minimal but could have a significant impact.

The Audit Office has made significant savings in recent years, and it must continue to pursue efficiencies and cost reductions when possible, including through restructuring and reducing its permanent staff numbers. The Estimate that the Audit Committee has agreed reflects that. However, should it not prove possible to make sufficient savings from the voluntary exit scheme, it is crucial that the Audit Office receive the shortfall at the monitoring rounds. The Committee believes that we must not lose sight of what could be lost were the Audit Office not to be provided with adequate resources to serve the Assembly properly.

Mr Speaker: As Question Time begins at 2.00 pm, I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. The debate will resume after Question Time.

The debate stood suspended.

Oral Answers to Questions

Justice

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We will start with listed questions.

HMP Magilligan: Redevelopment

1. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the redevelopment of HMP Magilligan. (AQO 8378/11-15)

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): An outline business case for the redevelopment of Magilligan prison was approved by DFP on 9 January this year. I met the then Minister of Finance and Personnel on 28 April to discuss capital funding for delivery of the prison estate strategy. Until there is certainty on the capital available in the next spending review, it is not possible to give a commitment to deliver an eight-year construction programme. Securing the necessary capital will determine the timeline for the development of the new prison at Magilligan. My officials will complete the necessary bid to DFP to secure capital funding this summer.

Mr G Robinson: Does the Minister agree, given the continuing rise in the prisoner population at HMP Magilligan to near-maximum levels, that it is essential that redevelopment at the prison is concluded at the earliest possible date for prisoner and staff well-being?

Mr Ford: I certainly understand that it is important that we proceed with the programme for Magilligan. It is also important that we proceed with some of the capital work that is required at Maghaberry, including a facility for women, in the context of the difficult financial circumstances that the Executive, as a whole, face.

Mr Ramsey: Further to the Member's question, is there any intent to carry out a phased introduction of development, taking in the security and educational needs of prisoners, at Magilligan?

Mr Ford: Mr Ramsey makes a valid point on the scale of the redevelopment that is planned, which will be over a significant timescale; potentially up to eight years. The issues, frankly, are that some residential accommodation is probably the most urgent priority, given things like the lack of sanitation. It is possible to do some of the learning and skills operations in less than ideal buildings, but, frankly, we cannot continue to expect people to live in temporary buildings and Nissen huts.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for his answers. The Department was to engage with stakeholders in the area. Will the Minister give us an update on progress there?

Mr Ford: Mr Ó hOisín is right: the Department was to engage with stakeholders, and it did so, including with local businesses and local councils in terms of providing opportunities for rehabilitation.

My understanding is that 30 prisoners from Foyleview, the semi-open unit, are out working regularly in the community with charities such as Barnardo's and the Riding for the Disabled Association, businesses, churches and with a variety of other bodies. There are placements with the health and social care trusts in Coleraine and Greysteel. There are also three current prisoner placements with Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council, which builds on the work done originally with Limavady, Coleraine and Ballymoney councils, as they then were. All of these are good examples of work being done. One of the key factors in keeping the prison at Magilligan was to build on those local opportunities. I am pleased to see that we have made progress over the last couple of years.

Mr Swann: How much have the finance figures changed for the redevelopment since the initial costs were put in for the project?

Mr Ford: The answer to any capital programme in terms of things starting at an early phase and being considered over a period of years is that costs will increase. Part of the issue is because of the higher expectations of the facilities that would be provided. I do not have the figures immediately before me, but I will certainly write to the Member and give the current update on the figures. It is certainly a very significant programme, but it is required to ensure that Magilligan can fulfil its responsibility to rehabilitate prisoners and not merely incarcerate them.

Mr Allister: Within the priorities of the Department as to capital spend on prisons, will the Minister tell us where the Magilligan project ranks?

Mr Ford: The reality is that, as I have just said — and I will repeat for Mr Allister — there are requirements in all three prison units. There is a specific requirement for a proper facility for women, which will build on the work currently being done in Ash House in Hydebank Wood and the step-down facility being built elsewhere on the Hydebank Wood site.

There is a specific need for more residential accommodation and a plan for a significant cell block at Maghaberry. There is a need for a complete rehabilitation of Magilligan, which has, effectively, only one modern residential block with the rest of it still largely based on temporary buildings that were put up in the 1970s. All of those have to be considered together, and the Prison Service has a plan for phasing all three of those operations. However, what funding is available is clearly a significant issue for DFP and the Executive.

Social Investment Bonds

2. Mr Wilson asked the Minister of Justice to outline any discussions he has had regarding the use of social investment bonds as a means of attracting private funds to finance initiatives designed to deal with interdepartmental community-based projects targeted at vulnerable young people in interface areas. (AQO 8379/11-15)

Mr Ford: I have had no meetings specifically on social investment bonds, but my officials continue to explore potential options in this area. DFP is working with Departments to explore opportunities to pilot alternative financing models for public service delivery, including social impact bonds and the development of suitable procurement models. Social impact bonds are indeed a means of attracting private funds to finance interventions designed to achieve social outcomes. As the expected output of a social impact bond is success in improving social outcomes, there would be a requirement to meet outcome payments to private-sector investors if outcomes are achieved. The next step for relevant organisations is to consider the outcomes and affordability. My officials will continue to liaise with officials in DFP and elsewhere to further explore opportunities in this area.

Mr Wilson: I welcome the positive response from the Minister. Finding ways of attracting private investment will be very important, especially at a time when public budgets are under pressure. One of the groups that would benefit if such impact bonds were introduced would be Sport Changes Life, which has had a dramatic impact on problems at interface areas. However, there is a requirement for gap funding for that group until such time as impact bonds are in place. Can the Minister give us an assurance that, given the good work and the response from the PSNI, he will seek in the monitoring round to ensure that sufficient funds are made available to keep those projects going in the interim?

Mr Ford: I appreciate entirely the point that Mr Wilson makes about Sport Changes Life. Of course, he should declare an interest, as it is based in his constituency. One of its key projects was done in my constituency and no doubt had a significant effect. The unfortunate reality is that, given all the other pressures on core services of the Department, I am not sure that it is possible to prioritise even such positive and worthwhile community projects as we look at the June monitoring round. However, I will certainly look to see how we relate not just to Sport Changes Life but to our other NGO partners.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What initiatives is the Minister progressing towards the taking down of interface walls?

Mr Ford: I am really not sure how that sits in with social investment bonds, but I will happily explain to the House that work continues between officials in my Department and community groups in interface areas in Belfast, Derry and the Lurgan/Portadown area, all of which is seeking to build confidence in the communities on either side of interfaces to allow the removal or opening up of structures. We continue to make progress in that respect with things like the longer opening hours of gates and the fact that there are now seven fewer structures under the control of the Department of Justice than when justice was devolved.

Reducing Offending

3. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the approaches his Department is taking to reduce offending. (AQO 8380/11-15)

Mr Ford: My Department is engaged in a wide range of work to reduce offending by working to rehabilitate people who have offended in order to build a safer society. In September last year, I approved the creation of the new reducing offending directorate to focus on ensuring effective collaboration and partnership-working across the justice system in order to reduce offending. Establishing effective ways in which we can support desistance is central to the work of the new directorate. I will shortly publish a strategy that outlines my Department's commitment to promoting desistance from crime. Research indicates that there are several factors that can support the process of desistance, including securing and engaging in employment, maintaining relationships with family and community, and having hope and motivation to change.

In prison custody, the needs of the individual are balanced alongside their risks to create a dynamic personal development plan that focuses on improving their motivation and capacity to address their offending behaviour. Complementary to that ongoing work is the establishment of a partnership between the Prison Service, Belfast Met and North West Regional College, which will work to improve educational attainment and the employment prospects of prisoners.

The opening of the Burren House facility has also provided a low-security pre-release facility to test the capacity to work in the community and engage with employment or learning opportunities.

My Department is also thinking innovatively about the best ways to support offenders in gaining future employment. In recent weeks, we have seen the creation of an in-house cafe in Hydebank and the establishment of a social enterprise to employ young parents who have offended.

That is just a flavour of the significant work that my Department has been undertaking to reduce offending and to protect the public. However, I recognise that more can still be done, and my Department will continue to explore innovative and effective ways of reducing offending and making Northern Ireland safer.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his answer. He referred to the partnership between the Prison Service and Belfast Met and the North West Regional College: is that a new model for the delivery of learning and skills?

Mr Ford: Yes, it is a significant new model. In a sense, it is similar to the work that is being done around healthcare, where the expectation is being delivered that healthcare is better provided by the South Eastern Trust, a specialist health and social care provider, than by the Prison Service in-house. On exactly the same basis, the new contract, which will result in the creation of 33 new jobs to provide learning and skills opportunities with the two colleges in the three prisons, is a key way of building on the skills that exist in FE colleges and putting them to the best use of those who are in the care and custody of the Prison Service. A range of issues is being covered, including academic and vocational training, from numeracy and literacy essential skills through to degree-level work. Those are now being done in the prisons. Some of the practical issues are showing positive results, even at this early stage.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answers up to this point.

Has any valuation been done of the potential detrimental impact of the financial cutbacks in his Department on key stakeholder organisations such as NIACRO and on its programmes to help reduce offending?

Mr Ford: Mr McGlone highlights yet another effect of the difficult financial circumstances that we are in. There is no doubt that the cutbacks in grant funding have a detrimental effect on the services provided by some of our NGO partners, with NIACRO and Extern being two of the key ones in the rehabilitation of offenders. That comes after four years in which grants to the voluntary sector were, by and large, protected and in circumstances in which the most significant cuts from this point, as I frequently say, will be made to the core of the Department. Nonetheless, it has not been possible this year to continue to fund at the level that we were funding at last year. Of course, that was also complicated by the issue of European social funding, with NIACRO not being successful in its bid for its ongoing work.

Mr Campbell: Reducing offending and, indeed, reoffending can often be achieved by reviewing the severity of the sentences available to the judiciary. How regularly does the Minister do that?

Mr Ford: It is probably safe to say that, on virtually every occasion that a Minister produces the possibility of further offences being created, the appropriate sentences for the new offences are a consideration for my Department, in order to ensure that matters are kept in balance between offences of a broadly similar nature. There is ongoing work in the Department to keep an eye on that and to review those kinds of issues as they relate to other jurisdictions, particularly those within these islands, to ensure that there is broad comparability. I stress the words "broad comparability", not necessarily absolute equivalence.

Mr Lynch: Can the Minister give an update on what wider work has been done across government on reoffending? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Ford: Mr Lynch correctly highlights the point that reducing reoffending is not an issue that can be handled by my Department alone. As I pointed out, housing, health and social care and employment and training are all key issues. We seek to work in partnership with other Departments, as, for example, we have done with DEL and the two colleges over the issue of job skills training and routes into further employment. That requires a joined-up approach, and that is an issue on which the Department is seeking to work alongside other Departments that have direct responsibility for providing those services.

2.15 pm

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for that. Does he agree that it is difficult to get the level of offending now, due to the number of crimes going unreported because of the lack of bringing criminal cases to a conclusion?

Mr Ford: I am not sure that there is necessarily a great issue about reporting or, as Mr Elliott in essence suggested, of the reporting getting worse. It is no doubt the case that some criminal offences have historically gone significantly under-reported, domestic violence being the most obvious example. In recent years, hate crimes have clearly been under-reported, which is why we have been seeking to encourage increased reporting to ensure that they are addressed appropriately. However, as far as the generality of crimes is concerned, I am not sure that there is any greater under-reporting now than was the case a few years ago.

Integrated Domestic Abuse Programme

4. Mrs Cameron asked the Minister of Justice for his assessment of the integrated domestic abuse programme that is being delivered by the Probation Board for Northern Ireland. (AQO 8381/11-15)

Mr Ford: It is important to offer appropriate interventions aimed at changing the behaviour of those committing domestic abuse. The integrated domestic abuse programme (IDAP) ensures a consistent approach in providing interventions for perpetrators of domestic violence. IDAP has been delivered by the Probation Board since 2009. The primary aims of the programme are to identify, challenge and change men's abusive behaviour. IDAP is currently delivered at five sites: Armagh, Ballymena, Belfast, Derry and Omagh.

In providing the programme, the Probation Board works in close collaboration with the Police Service, social services and Women's Aid to manage risk constructively. Importantly, the programme also offers safety and support services to victims through women's safety services provided by Women's Aid. I understand that a full evaluation of the IDAP programme by the Probation Board is under way, and I look forward to receiving the report.

I am aware that in England the National Offender Management Service (NOMS) has replaced IDAP with the new accredited programme, Building Better Relationships. To achieve accreditation, programmes must be evidence-based to ensure that they are targeting the right people, focusing on the right things and being delivered in a way that is most likely to reduce reoffending. All NOMS-accredited programmes are monitored to ensure programme integrity. I understand that the Probation Board is committed to delivering accredited programmes and, as a result, plans to follow the same approach.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Given that funding for the women's safety work for perpetrators, associated with IDAP, has been withdrawn without notice, how will the programme continue to be accredited? Do you, as Minister, recognise that that totally unsafe practice places victims of domestic violence at an increased risk?

Mr Ford: I appreciate the point that Mrs Cameron makes. Sadly, it seems to be the case that, for virtually every question I answer these days, I point out the realities of the financial circumstances that we live in. Despite those difficulties, I certainly believe that the Probation Board, which has the specific responsibility in this area, is doing its best in the financial circumstances to manage programmes such as IDAP and, indeed, to look at the potential transformation across. Whilst there are undoubtedly challenges because of the budget reductions, I believe that there is also a lot of very good work being done by professionals right across the justice system that we ought to support, while recognising the pressures that this sometimes places on individual members of staff.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Does he support minimum sentencing for those found guilty of domestic abuse-related crimes?

Mr Ford: I stick to the general position on virtually every offence. The reason why we have judges producing sentencing decisions after court hearings at whatever level of court they take place is so that all the relevant factors can be taken into account. On that basis, legislating for minimum sentences can be an incredibly blunt instrument that does not actually meet the needs of providing a safer society and protecting our people. On that basis, I am not in support of mandatory minimum sentences.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat. Minister, I appreciate the answers that you have given thus far. Are you satisfied that there are sufficient resources to deal with the programmes related to domestic violence?

Mr Ford: I do not have any suggestion that there are specific problems around the issue of resources for these particular programmes. What is absolutely clear is that there are resource issues for the justice system as a whole, and, in the Department, we seek to manage resources across different programmes within different agencies as best we can, given the problems that we are falling under. Frankly, as long as the House fails to take a realistic attitude to some of the difficult decisions that need to be taken over funding generally, Ministers will continue to answer questions about difficulties with particular programmes.

Mrs D Kelly: Minister, do you share my concern that many women who have experienced domestic violence at the hands of former paramilitaries feel coerced into silence because they are being told, by other paramilitaries in their community, that if they report the crime to the police, it will have an impact on the early release that many of them are subject to? Therefore, Minister, will you undertake to write to the Secretary of State to clarify whether a conviction of domestic abuse would put their early release under threat?

Mr Ford: While Mrs Kelly makes some valid points about how issues are treated, and particularly about how we support victims of a variety of offences and those who would carry out activities that threaten people in general, we need to be slightly cautious about giving specific commitments on that. I am certainly happy to discuss the issue more widely with her, because there are issues that need to be discussed. They are, frankly, issues about the behaviour of paramilitaries, which have rather hit the headlines in recent weeks and months. There is a wider issue to address, and I am quite happy to have a discussion that is a bit longer than just giving a quick, snap answer now.

Parades and Protests: Public Disorder

5. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Justice whether he has discussed with the Chief Constable the social and financial implications of public disorder arising from disputed parades and related protests this summer. (AQO 8382/11-15)

Mr Ford: I have regular discussions with the Chief Constable about a range of issues, including parading and protests and their implications. I met the Chief Constable and his senior colleagues last month and plan to review the situation with him again before the 12 July parades. I recognise and welcome the fact that the vast majority of parades in Northern Ireland pass off without any difficulty. I recognise the rights of those who seek to parade within the law, and of those who wish to protest peacefully, but there is no cause, dispute or disagreement that justifies the use of violence or public disorder. Those who are involved in such behaviour need to recognise and understand the potential consequences of their behaviour, including through the courts. I hope that wise heads will prevail this year, that true leadership will be shown, and that we all see a peaceful summer.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree with me that, in the absence of political agreement to establish mechanisms for the regulation of parades, all parties and political leaders should encourage people to abide by Parades Commission decisions whether they agree with them or not, thereby upholding the law?

Mr Ford: Yes, I certainly agree with my colleague. The reality is that the Parades Commission is the body established by Parliament to deal with issues of parades and protests. The parties in the Assembly have been unable to agree any appropriate replacement for the Parades Commission, and therefore the Parades Commission remains the body established by law to take the difficult decisions that we have been unable to take on, for institutions established by the Assembly. I therefore believe it is incumbent upon every MLA, as it is upon every citizen, to uphold the determinations of the Parades Commission; to accept them, whether or not they like them; and to live within them, to ensure that we can have a peaceful society and a peaceful summer marching season.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for looking forward to the summer with some optimism. I share that optimism, but will he look back and tell us the financial cost, to his Department and to the community, of policing the flags protests and the demonstration at Twaddell Avenue in north Belfast?

Mr Ford: I cannot give Mr Ó Muilleoir the full statistics for policing flags protests. It was certainly the case, not that long ago, that it was costing close to £1 million per month to police 10 metres at the top of Twaddell Avenue every evening. As there has been some reduction in resources, it is now running at something less than that: I believe it is in the region of a third of £1 million per month. All of that is money that is either being spent in additional overtime, which creates pressure on police officers and the police budget, or it is a cost caused by officers being redeployed from other duties, including the basic everyday crime-fighting and public reassurance that Members frequently tell me they wish to see in their constituencies. It may only be an opportunity cost, but it is a significant cost nonetheless.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Minister agree that the recent visit by Prince Charles to Saint Patrick's Church in Donegall Street was a recognition by Prince Charles that such an institution and such a building should be respected by all, including the loyal orders? Does he agree that people, not just those involved in parades but those who protest, should learn the lesson from the Prince that there should be mutual respect in our society?

Mr Ford: I certainly agree with the tenor of Mr Maginness's comments. I am not sure that it should require a visit by a member of the royal family for people in this society to respect places of worship, but the very fact that he visited it should surely encapsulate the historic nature of the church and the specific issues. I have attended services there on two or three occasions related to different aspects of the justice system, including, most recently, for Prisons Week last November, and I believe that any place of worship that is providing a service to the community, as well as pastoral care and concern for its parish or congregation, should be respected by everybody in this society. In particular, recent determinations of the Parades Commission regarding respect for that place of worship should be upheld.

Mr Cree: The Minister refers to the Ardoyne/Twaddell area. Does he not accept that it is very difficult to get a localised agreement in that area when the two residents' groups apparently will not meet in the same room?

Mr Ford: Regardless of whether there is a difficulty in getting agreement in the area, the question that I was asked was about upholding Parades Commission determinations, and that was the point that I made absolutely clear. Matters might be easier in the Ardoyne/Twaddell area if those in the different factions and elements on both sides of that dispute were to engage constructively, but the fundamental issue is that people should uphold the law, especially those who belong to organisations that claim to be committed to upholding the law and the constitutional arrangements.

Prisons: Staffing and Morale

6. Mr Swann asked the Minister of Justice what discussions he has had with the Prison Officers' Association regarding staffing levels and morale. (AQO 8383/11-15)

Mr Ford: I met the Prison Officers' Association (POA) chair and a number of his colleagues in December 2014 to discuss a range of issues, including staffing levels and staff safety. Officials in the Prison Service continue to meet staff representatives through the formal Whitley structures and informally engage with trade unions and staff via a range of communication and engagement strategies. The Northern Ireland Prison Service keeps staffing levels under review, and a re-profiling exercise to look comprehensively at operational staffing levels across the service is nearing completion. As part of that exercise, there is an agreed process to consult with representatives of the POA prior to the introduction of the new profiles. There is a range of ways in which staff morale is kept under review, including mechanisms that facilitate staff engagement with senior management. That is done at a local level through full staff briefings and as part of the front-line forum meetings. The director general and the director of HR visit each prison specifically for front-line forum meetings, which bring together a cross section of staff. In addition, there are regular visits to the prisons by the leadership team.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for that. What practical measures has he put in place over the last year to resolve the low staffing complement and the high number of staff who are off on sick leave?

Mr Ford: There are two specific issues there. On the first question, to ensure that there are appropriate staffing ratios, a certain amount of overtime has been worked. There are also issues such as, at times, managing controlled lockdowns, which would not otherwise have been anticipated, to ensure safety for staff and prisoners. It is the job of managers in each part of the prison, in conjunction with their colleagues in HR, to ensure that the general issue of sickness absence is addressed. Indeed, as Members are well aware, that issue applies right across the Northern Ireland Civil Service.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions. Question 1 has been withdrawn.

2.30 pm

Legal Aid: Withdrawal Impact

T2. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the impact of the withdrawal of professional legal aid services on the justice system in Northern Ireland. (AQT 2642/11-15)

Mr Ford: The answer, at this stage, is that there has been a very limited impact from the withdrawal of legal aid services. The current period of withdrawal only commenced at the beginning of May, and therefore relatively few cases have been affected. I know of one case where an individual who was not represented in court succeeded in achieving bail on her own account by being invited by the judge hearing the application for bail to make her own representations, so it certainly did not have any effect on her. The number of cases being affected is relatively limited and will not kick on until the autumn term, when we will see. I hope that those who have currently said that they are withdrawing their services will reconsider the issue, especially when it comes at a time when the two professional bodies are judicially reviewing the decision that I took.

Mr Dunne: Has the Minister made any progress on the use of the proposed legal defender service for the management of legal cases in Northern Ireland?

Mr Ford: I am not sure what the proposed use of a legal defender service is. It is an issue that is potentially available in our legislative provision. I have sought all along to ensure that we maintain the existing system that allows individuals to choose their legal team from those who work in private practice, and that is the current position.

HMP Maghaberry: Maintenance Spend
